Another huge impediment is that women are not treated as equals in Tibetan Buddhism. In particular, young attractive women are subject to tremendous sexual attention, most of it unwanted, as well as actual harassment, emotional abuse and scare tactics which prevent them from speaking out. This is not of course a problem isolated to Tibetan Buddhism -- sexual harassment of women is a worldwide issue. But the fact that it exists in Tibetan Buddhism needs to be recognized and not explained away, justified or otherwise ignored.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 29th, 2012 at 6:19 AM

Title: Re: Translating "Dzogchenpa"

Content:

Namdrol said:

The only I have ever seen around Lamas that defies common sense is the willingness of people to lose it.

Adamantine said:

That's sad, if true. Well, you still have more life ahead of you. . .

Your dualistic framework of "either it's this or it's that" is not quite in line with how Buddhas communicate about the nature of reality.

Malcolm wrote:

The Buddha's framework is "Where this exists, that exists, with the arising of that, this arose."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 29th, 2012 at 6:18 AM

Title: Re: Translating "Dzogchenpa"

Content:

Adamantine said:

Your dualistic framework of "either it's this or it's that" is not quite in line with how Buddhas communicate about the nature of reality.

Malcolm wrote:

The Buddha's framework is "Where this exists, that exists, with the arising of that, this arose."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 29th, 2012 at 4:53 AM

Title: Re: Vajra Hell

Content:

Namdrol said:

Greed may be a failing but it is not a cause for a Vajrayāna student to criticize their teacher.

Sönam said:

That's why it's important to ponderate ... and not to excessively enter in a cycle of opinion, judgement and so on. Most of the discomfort could be resolved by splitting without necessarily providing a commentary. Of course if a guru is outrageously lying or abusing it should be reported ... but except for that, the best is only to quit.

Sönam

Malcolm wrote:

Correct.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 29th, 2012 at 4:52 AM

Title: Re: Translating "Dzogchenpa"

Content:

Namdrol said:

Funny how no one ever sees these "miracles" actually done. Oh right, we don't have enough merit, I forgot.

Adamantine said:

Sure, plenty of people see miracles. I have experienced enough that defies common sense not to entrust my faith to common-sense. Frankly, in all your time practicing Dharma and being around the Lamas you have, I'd be surprised if you've never experienced anything that defies "common sense". If you haven't, than I suppose it explains our different positions.

Malcolm wrote:

The only I have ever seen around Lamas that defies common sense is the willingness of people to lose it.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 29th, 2012 at 4:50 AM

Title: Re: Translating "Dzogchenpa"

Content:

Adamantine said:

I think you've maxed out on the number of times you can use that example. But since it's your favorite, I'll give it a go:

If Virupa was indeed a Mahasiddha, and he was working with the display of appearances to play with the presumptions of those in his immediate environment-- why would he want to scare the shit out of an entire world? I think you are really clinging to something that you feel should make sense to you, about a display that goes beyond sense altogether. This misses the point.

Malcolm wrote:

Then you have in fact admitted this is not a historical event, whatever else it may have been, and he did not stop the world's rotation on its axis (required for "stopping the sun").

So Mahasiddhas distort the perceptions of those whom they are trying to impress? Is that how it works?

Mahasiddhas can no more violate dependent origination than anyone else can.

I am not clinging to anything -- I don't take the stories of mahāsiddha's miracles literally, never have, never felt the need to.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 29th, 2012 at 4:18 AM

Title: Re: Translating "Dzogchenpa"

Content:

Adamantine said:

If we don't believe that anything is possible, then we no longer believe in Sunyata. We are either nihilists or eternalists.

Namdrol said:

If you think that apple trees can grow from wheat seeds, you have left the realm of common sense.

N

Adamantine said:

Well, hand prints in rock, or Milarepa fitting inside a yak's horn...these have all left common sense far behind. Vajrayana is meant to invoke uncommon sense.

Malcolm wrote:

Funny how no one ever sees these "miracles" actually done. Oh right, we don't have enough merit, I forgot.

If you assume for example that Virupa really stopped the sun such a cataclysmic event should have been recorded around the world. Can you imagine?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 29th, 2012 at 4:12 AM

Title: Re: Translating "Dzogchenpa"

Content:

Adamantine said:

There have been much greater numbers of authors in general in the West (what exactly are we defining as the West here?), so proportionally this is not a fair accounting. Also, you are clearly grouping many countries and multiple land masses into your accounting of what is the "West", and opposing it to India and Tibet, two countries only. I hardly think your comparisons are useful. Also, you deflect the issue of whether women are considered to have as great or greater potential as men onto an issue of authorship, which is a bit of a red-herring. Many yogis and yoginis who reach high levels of realization don't author texts.

Malcolm wrote:

Can you provide a citation from a primary text which states that women have more potential than men for awakening? I personally do not believe that gender makes one person superior to another person in terms of capacity for awakening. I think it is a very silly thing to say.

If Tibetan tradition truly maintains that women had a greater potential for awakening than men, it would stand to reason that it would report more instances of awakened women than men. But in fact there are very few reports of awakened women as opposed to endless litneys of men who are supposed to have achieved awakening.

While it is certainly the case that we can find positive messages about woman's potential for awakening in many tantras, in general Tibetan cultural practice, woman have been very disadvantaged.

If we take just one culture, Anglo-American culture, and compare it with Indo-Tibetan culture, the incidence of female authorship is much higher in our culture than in Indo-Tibetan culture. Why? It is quite simple -- in old Tibet educating women was not the norm, it was by far and away the exception. Of course, through the influence of Western values, Tibetan culture has decided to value the education of women, and this is a good thing, a positive direction. But there is still enormous sexism in both cultures, our and their's.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 29th, 2012 at 3:46 AM

Title: Re: Very Amazing Experience

Content:

YogaDude11 said:

Have you had any experiences similar to what i have described?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, but they are just experiences.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 29th, 2012 at 3:45 AM

Title: Re: Vajra Hell

Content:

deepbluehum said:

Okay. I have one question about samaya. What if the teacher falls into dualistic grasping in a such a way as to buy into a common run of the mill worldly point of view that the student thinks is petty?

Namdrol said:

The student should mind his own business.

deepbluehum said:

What if the teacher exhibits greed?

Malcolm wrote:

Greed may be a failing but it is not a cause for a Vajrayāna student to criticize their teacher.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 29th, 2012 at 3:41 AM

Title: Re: Translating "Dzogchenpa"

Content:

Adamantine said:

If we don't believe that anything is possible, then we no longer believe in Sunyata. We are either nihilists or eternalists.

Malcolm wrote:

If you think that apple trees can grow from wheat seeds, you have left the realm of common sense.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 29th, 2012 at 2:05 AM

Title: Re: Translating "Dzogchenpa"

Content:

Namdrol said:

Samaya is not koolaid, though it seem that many people treat it as such. Insitutionally mandated sexism does not need to be a part of Vajrayāna -- this just leads to the ruthless exploitation of women. Justifying it by invoking Machig Labdron is just sad.

N

Adamantine said:

I interpret this story of Machig in the same light as I would Padmasambhava being swallowed and eaten by his female teacher Kungamo,

Malcolm wrote:

The former (if true) is a story of teacher who gives a student a disease (though in fact the story hinges on ML breaking samaya and contracting a disease). The later is a story of a common feature of many initiations.

Adamantine said:

or Tilopa provoking Naropa to get the living crap beat out of him by a wedding party, etc.

Malcolm wrote:

Tilopa, supposedly, had the power to completely restore Naropa to health.

Adamantine said:

If we decide that the stories of the siddhas are just fantasy, bent on political ends, and hold mundane views of social politics and western scientific materialism as supreme--

Malcolm wrote:

I think TNR's defense of Kosha Cosmology is pretty poor, frankly, since it also depends on us accepting the the Bible, the Koran and so on as superior to western empirical science.

Adamantine said:

then it seems to me that this would render our faith in vajrayana and guru yoga sterile, and there wouldn't be much point in following this path at all.

Malcolm wrote:

If we are following Vajrayāna because of some miraculous tale, we are doomed before we have even started.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 29th, 2012 at 1:50 AM

Title: Re: Vajra Hell

Content:

Jax said:

Namdrol, what do think of Germano's research regarding sPyti being a reaction to the tantric elements being so broadly integrated into Dzogchen?

Malcolm wrote:

Highly speculative. The spyi ti texts were largely produced by Nyangral, one of the major promulgators of Nyingma tantric cycles in general.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 29th, 2012 at 1:23 AM

Title: Re: Translating "Dzogchenpa"

Content:

Adamantine said:

how Gurus may expect free labor for Dharma centers etc. then this is deeply built into the Dharma itself-- not related to Tibetan political structures.. The Vajrayana is founded on the model of mandalas in the form of kingdoms, with the Yidam/Guru on thrones in the center of palaces, etc. And serving the Guru and the Dharma are considered the supreme way to generate merit. . . If you have issue with these things, which is generally why the social-structures of Dharma centers arise the way they do-- then you aren't critiquing Tibetan culture per se you are criticizing the nature of Vajrayana itself.

Malcolm wrote:

The model of Vajrayāna that emerged in India during the 8-12 centuries is very much a reflection of the style of feudalism and vassalage present in Indian culture, a model Tibetans adapted to their own feudal system.

Serving the master and the Dharma is wonderful. But such service can be easily perverted to worldly ends.

I have observed before that in a real sense, anuttarayoga tantra is not suited to institutional practice of the kind we see in Tibetan culture.

Many absolutist notions about gurus we find in traditional sources (where they are not sheer didactic fabrications such as Milarepa's towers) need to be questioned, and can be questioned even after we have entered Vajrayāna.

Samaya is not koolaid, though it seem that many people treat it as such. Insitutionally mandated sexism does not need to be a part of Vajrayāna -- this just leads to the ruthless exploitation of women. Justifying it by invoking Machig Labdron is just sad.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 29th, 2012 at 1:14 AM

Title: Re: Translating "Dzogchenpa"

Content:

Adamantine said:

but from a feminist perspective this just doesn't fly.

Malcolm wrote:

This does not fly from the perspective of basic human decency. The minute that Vajrayāna practice becomes more important than basic human decency, Vajrayāna practice ceases to be Dharma and becomes a mere cult.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 29th, 2012 at 1:10 AM

Title: Re: Translating "Dzogchenpa"

Content:

Adamantine said:

then you aren't critiquing Tibetan culture per se you are criticizing the nature of Vajrayana itself.

Malcolm wrote:

I am ok with that. Vajrayāna can use some criticism.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 29th, 2012 at 1:08 AM

Title: Re: Vajra Hell

Content:

Pero said:

So I really doubt whatever anyone who doesn't respect his teachers says.

Namdrol said:

Of course. But I also would doubt what a teacher who does not respect his students says.

muni said:

Study/listen/reflect.... as much as you can, then find a teacher, I think, this advice once given, shouldn't be underestimated.

Malcolm wrote:

This is no guarantee that the teacher, once found, will be a good one, a qualified one. If that teacher does not measure up to Dharma standards, he or she should be dropped like a hot coal from one's hands.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 29th, 2012 at 12:35 AM

Title: Re: Vajra Hell

Content:

Pero said:

So I really doubt whatever anyone who doesn't respect his teachers says.

Malcolm wrote:

Of course. But I also would doubt what a teacher who does not respect his students says.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 29th, 2012 at 12:16 AM

Title: Re: Vajra Hell

Content:

deepbluehum said:

Okay. I have one question about samaya. What if the teacher falls into dualistic grasping in a such a way as to buy into a common run of the mill worldly point of view that the student thinks is petty?

Malcolm wrote:

The student should mind his own business.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 28th, 2012 at 11:42 PM

Title: Re: Very Amazing Experience

Content:

YogaDude11 said:

Hey Namdrol, Are you a practitioner of yantra yoga?

Malcolm wrote:

I have practiced it on and off for years, and have been a student of ChNN since 1992.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 28th, 2012 at 11:39 PM

Title: Re: Vajra Hell

Content:

heart said:

[

At the best you are interpreting Samaya here, but your interpretation is not in harmony with what I been taught or studied nor with what I have experienced. But I have no energy for this discussion.

/magnus

Namdrol said:

On whether you should stay with a teacher who has acted in a way that is not in accord with Dharma, simply examine page 51 of Buddhist Ethics where it clearly says that one should immediately sever one's relationship with such a person. On whether it is necessarily a breakage of samaya to criticize one's guru, examine the six criteria Kongtrul lists for samaya breakage to exist when criticizing one's guru, page 257. It depends primarily on one's motives.

No one is ever going to feel good about it, but sometimes, for the protection of others, it is necessary.

heart said:

One might wonder what is to be considered in accord with the Dharma when one consider Samaya a social construct?

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

I consider non-harming to be the basic criteria of Dharma. For example, it is the commitment of taking refuge in the Dharma.

Samaya is a social construct, and has no meaning outside of that construct. For example, samaya represents a contract between two people, a teacher and a student. But the salient point is that it is a two way contract and the teacher is as obliged to observe these commitments as the student.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 28th, 2012 at 11:35 PM

Title: Re: Vajra Hell

Content:

Jax said:

I use the Kunje Gyalpo as my root reference regarding original Dzogchen.

Malcolm wrote:

The sgra thal gyur is considered the root tantra of Dzogchen, not the kun byed rgyal po. And, if you take a text critical approach, they were both written around the same time.

For myself personally, I consider man ngag sde more profound in general. As it says in the man sngag sde tantras, sems sde is for intellectuals.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 28th, 2012 at 10:44 PM

Title: Re: Vajra Hell

Content:

pemachophel said:

"If so, are we not breaking these samaya's constantly when not in rigpa?"

This is exactly what I have been taught by my Teachers. When an Australian Lama friend once asked H.H. Dudjom Rinpoche what He did when He realized His mind had wandered, His Holiness said He immediately said Vajrasattva mantra.

Malcolm wrote:

These four samayas represent the state of the basis. They cannot be broken.

However, the Rangshar says:

As such, the qualified master remains in equipoise on the real,
the samaya holder does likewise.

Here samaya holder means the student. Allowing oneself to become distracted is a "breakage" of samaya i.e. one's delusion becomes stronger.

In the DC, rather than Vajrasattva, we would do Guru Yoga. Same meaning, different method.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 28th, 2012 at 10:22 PM

Title: Re: Vajra Hell

Content:

heart said:

At the best you are interpreting Samaya here, but your interpretation is not in harmony with what I been taught or studied nor with what I have experienced. But I have no energy for this discussion.

Malcolm wrote:

Everything requires interpretation, Magnus. Even your literalist stance is actually an interpretation.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 28th, 2012 at 9:53 PM

Title: Re: Vajra Hell

Content:

heart said:

[

At the best you are interpreting Samaya here, but your interpretation is not in harmony with what I been taught or studied nor with what I have experienced. But I have no energy for this discussion.

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

On whether you should stay with a teacher who has acted in a way that is not in accord with Dharma, simply examine page 51 of Buddhist Ethics where it clearly says that one should immediately sever one's relationship with such a person. On whether it is necessarily a breakage of samaya to criticize one's guru, examine the six criteria Kongtrul lists for samaya breakage to exist when criticizing one's guru, page 257. It depends primarily on one's motives.

No one is ever going to feel good about it, but sometimes, for the protection of others, it is necessary.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Wednesday, March 28th, 2012 at 9:31 PM
Title: Re: Vajra Hell
Content:

Namdrol said:
You can't really break these samayas since they concern your primordial state, and that is something you cannot break.

N

alpha said:
So these would be more like attributes of the primordial state?

Malcolm wrote:
Correct.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Wednesday, March 28th, 2012 at 9:31 PM
Title: Re: Very Amazing Experience
Content:
YogaDude11 said:
No I have not. But I will be doing that very soon. All i have is the book and the dvds.

Malcolm wrote:
You should understand then that vegetarianism is not required, nor is abstinence.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Wednesday, March 28th, 2012 at 9:12 PM
Title: Re: Vajra Hell
Content:

Namdrol said:
It lists general samaya as the famous four samayas of Dzogchen -- non-existence, singleness, ubuiquity, and natural formation.

N

alpha said:
Are these four samayas upheld only when resting in rigpa?
If so, are we not breaking these samaya's constantly when not in rigpa?

Malcolm wrote:

You can't really break these samayas since they concern your primordial state, and that is something you cannot break.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 28th, 2012 at 9:08 PM

Title: Re: Vajra Hell

Content:

Namdrol said:

And if you criticize them with a view to protecting others from their mistaken and harmful actions, there is also no fault.

N

Kilaya. said:

How do we decide whether a story about a specific Lama is correct or not, especially when we read it on the internet? I mean, there is no teacher you can't find any critical remarks about somewhere on the internet (including our own teacher).

Malcolm wrote:

How can one decide whether any gossip is correct? You have to go to the source, right?

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 28th, 2012 at 8:52 PM

Title: Re: Translating "Dzogchenpa"

Content:

Adamantine said:

I understand these things can be generalized-- but I just have rarely if ever seen any of these tendencies in a number of Tibetan lamas I've had the good fortune to study with-- a good portion from old Tibet, and some of which you and I share. But then, maybe the Nyingmas are a bit different because the monastic system isn't as overarching, and there's a greater proportion of female saints....

Malcolm wrote:

Nyingmapas are every bit as bad as the all the others -- this is a Tibetan cultural issue, not a lineage issue. Tibetans do not have, in their own culture, an idea of civil rights and universal suffrage. This is because Tibetans have not yet rejected the feudal power structures of their past -- in fact, all they have done is export them to west where they survive in extra-governmental organizations -- very much like the papacy preserving the structures of the Roman Imperium with the Pope as emperor and the college of cardinals representing the senate.

I do not want to paint all Tibetans in a bad light-- they are human beings just as we are, and we like they suffer many faults too that are a result of acculturation. But let's not be blind, shall we?

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 28th, 2012 at 8:45 PM

Title: Re: Vajra Hell

Content:

Jax said:

Samaya etc. pertain to tantric and other lower yantras. Dzogchen is beyond all mind constructed concepts.

Malcolm wrote:

This is not strictly true, Jax. In terms of samaya, the Rigpa Rangshar's interlinear notes clarifies the samaya of the view to realized i.e. non-conceptual prajñā.

It lists general samaya as the famous four samayas of Dzogchen -- non-existence, singleness, ubiquity, and natural formation.

Beyond that however, it also clarifies items constituting the body, speech and mind samayas of a Dzogchen practitioner:

The samaya of the body is abandoning taking life.

The samaya of speech is abandoning lying, calumny and harsh words.

The samaya of mind is not troubling concentration or disturbing the guru's mind.

However, the Rangshar also makes it very clear that the Guru is obliged to follow these samayas listed here, and others as well.

It makes it very clear that that the worst samaya to break is the samaya of the body i.e. not to take life. In other words, like all other Buddhist systems, Dzogchen establishes ahimsa as the most basic standard of conduct for a Dzogchen practitioner.

But the system of samaya in Dzogchen is not the system of samaya of maha and anu. On the other hand, it does not mean we completely ignore these samayas too.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 28th, 2012 at 8:24 PM

Title: Re: Translating "Dzogchenpa"

Content:

Namdrol said:

Off the top of my head, I can think of only five Tibetan woman who authored texts prior to the mid-twentieth century -- Yeshe Tsogyal, Machig Labdron, Jomo Menmo, Migyur Paldron (daughter of Terdag Lingpa) and Sera Khandro. There are only four or so significant Indian woman who authored texts too, Siddhirajni, Niguma, Sukhasiddhi, and Laksminkara.

N

Adamantine said:

This is more or less a global thing though Namdrol- - I mean, there were far fewer female authors in Europe or America in the 19th or early 20th century then there has been in the last 60 or so years... let's put things in perspective...

Malcolm wrote:

There have been hundreds of women authors through the ages in the West, especially since the 17th century. On this score, Western culture has a much better score than Indo-Asian culture.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 28th, 2012 at 8:21 PM

Title: Re: Very Amazing Experience

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Have you received transmission from ChNN?

N

YogaDude11 said:

Thanks for the share. Sounds like I am entering some kind of stage of development. I have been observing a vegetarian diet and i have cut out all intoxicants and everything that is not "good" for the body. I have tried to maintain celibacy as well, but I do have the occasional releases, but it seems to be getting more under control as time goes on. No television either, or as little as possible. It also seems that with consistent practice everyday I require much less oxygen on each breath, it is as if though the body just does not need to breathe as often.

From what I have read in the book by ChNN, it says that the resultant qualities of the practice are that the yogi develops "profound contemplation". From what I understand that means very deep meditation. So I do not know if what I am experiencing is profound contemplation or maybe the beginning stages of it?

I have been practicing yantra yoga for maybe a year now. I also do sitting mindfulness on the breath meditation. Lately I have been getting this extremely pleasurable feeling/vibration in the middle of the forehead. When I close my eyes my eyelids become heavy after a few minutes and I have this feeling like someone switched my mind off but I am still there fully present, no thoughts seem to arise. It is quite intoxicating and very pleasurable, to be honest if I did not have other things to do I can prob sit there the whole day and abide in this state. I have read some material on mediation and it seems what i am experiencing is the action of the third eye/ajna chakra. I am not quite sure what exactly I am experiencing, all I know is it feels pretty good. I was wondering if anyone can give some more info or personal experiences perhaps. Thanks!

Konchog1 said:

A step before the First Jhana? Try to spread the feeling throughout your body.

<http://www.accesstoinight.org/ptf/dhamma/sacca/sacca4/samma-samadhi/jhana.html> " onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 28th, 2012 at 8:17 PM

Title: Re: Vajra Hell

Content:

Namdrol said:

But as Jax says, in general samaya as commonly discussed in Tibetan Buddhism circles is just a social construct, a contract between you and a guru.

But what Jax did not say, and what he left out, was that real samaya is the comittment to discovering your own primordial state, and when discovered, maintaining knowledge (rigpa) of that state.

But in Dzogchen there are no specific rules or vows. It is all about being present, aware and working with circumstances.

N

heart said:

Really? I don't agree with that. If you disparage your Guru for example it is impossible to be present and aware at the same time.

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

That depends on whether someone who has acted as your guru is acting in accordance with the Dharma or not. If they are no, there is not fault in severing one's relationship with them. And if you criticize them with a view to protecting others from their mistaken and harmful actions, there is also no fault. Look it up, you will find I am correct.

"Guru" is a role, not a person. The role has certain obligations, just as the role "student" has certain obligations. The sooner people sort this out, the better.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 28th, 2012 at 9:24 AM

Title: Re: Translating "Dzogchenpa"

Content:

Namdrol said:

Its bullshit. skye dman simple means inferior rebirth, that is all.

Adamantine said:

Ok, but what's your understanding of what that means? Dronma is interpreting it that women don't have capacity for practicing Dzogchen, or Dharma, etc. .

My understanding is that it means there are greater obstacles to practicing Dharma. . . and to aspects of life in general-- freedoms, etc.. which is more or less what they were saying. . from a Vajrayana perspective it never meant that women had less capacity than men, that would automatically break a root vow to even use the term then..

Malcolm wrote:

What it has come to mean in the context of Tibetan society is that women are more suited to menial work. Off the top of my head, I can think of only five Tibetan woman who authored texts prior to the mid-twentieth century -- Yeshe Tsogyal, Machig Labdron, Jomo Menmo, Migyur Paldron (daughter of Terdag Lingpa) and Sera Khandro. There are only four or so significant Indian woman who authored texts too, Siddhirajni, Niguma, Sukhasiddhi, and Laksminkara.

The fact is that Tibetan Buddhism is completely patriarchal and sexist -- in fact it is pretty toxic for women in general and is in much need of reform (some of which is happening).

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 28th, 2012 at 8:07 AM

Title: Re: Don't Let Dharma Reinforce Groupthink

Content:

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 28th, 2012 at 8:03 AM

Title: Re: Translating "Dzogchenpa"

Content:

Adamantine said:

Well if the language changed in dependence on the sanskrit/indian then how that word gained contemporary meaning in the Tibetan society, how it was generally interpreted is another thing.. I believe this is what they are getting at and not just a simple revisionism. Certainly, either way is a generalization.. I am sure some used it in the most derogatory of ways at a given time and context, and some held other views..

Malcolm wrote:

Its bullshit. skye dman simple means inferior rebirth, that is all.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 28th, 2012 at 7:54 AM

Title: Re: Very Amazing Experience

Content:

deepbluehum said:

but the fact is that the samsaric body somehow dissolves into the five lights.

Namdrol said:

Also no.

deepbluehum said:

Now you've really got me on the edge of my seat. I would just love to get a complete thought from you. That would be just too exciting. Honestly. Please, do tell.

Please tell me what happens to channels and physical body when practicing Dzogchen

Malcolm wrote:

Nothing.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 28th, 2012 at 7:53 AM

Title: Re: Translating "Dzogchenpa"

Content:

Dronma said:

Jilkan, it seems that officially Tibetans do not use the term Dzogchenma. Probably, according to their view about females as being of lower rebirth, they do not even believe that a female can have such capacity for practising Dzogchen.

So, I personally doubt that they use Dzogchenpa for females, either.

Adamantine said:

This is not true, at all. Actually, women are generally considered to have superior spiritual potential than men. The term that we translate into English as "lower birth" according to Gross and Aziz via Judith Simmer-Brown is "not a point of doctrine but an insight from Tibetan Folk wisdom that accurately observes the constrictions and difficulties of a woman's life under patriarchy". Simmer-Brown also points out that this hardship is not looked at in traditional Tibetan understanding as something to lament, but rather something that provides greater recognition of the sufferings of samsara and thus even greater motivation for practicing Dharma. Actually, if you are interested in this issue, as you seem to be, -you should read Judith Simmer-Brown's book "The Dakini's Warm Breath: The Feminine Principle in Tibetan Buddhism" and specifically the chapter on gender in traditional Tibet.

Malcolm wrote:

Wonderful feminist revisionism — the term "skye dman" is a direct translation from Sanskrit i.e. jātiḥina, and far from reflecting Tibetan folk wisdom, merely perpetuates the patriarchal oppression of women.

The pre-Buddhist name for women in Tibet is "sman mo" literally "good woman" where the sman, which also means medicine, has the connotation of "goodness".

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 28th, 2012 at 6:43 AM

Title: Re: Very Amazing Experience

Content:

deepbluehum said:

but the fact is that the samsaric body somehow dissolves into the five lights.

Malcolm wrote:

Also no.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 28th, 2012 at 5:38 AM

Title: Re: Very Amazing Experience

Content:

deepbluehum said:

Dzogchen transforms the channels into light.

Malcolm wrote:

No.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 28th, 2012 at 3:40 AM

Title: Re: Vajra Hell

Content:

padma norbu said:

I've broken samaya and had no idea. My life didn't get any worse than usual.

Malcolm wrote:

Then you didn't break samaya. To break samaya you have to know what you are doing. You have to be aware and not care. You have to be indifferent.

But as Jax says, in general samaya as commonly discussed in Tibetan Buddhism circles is just a social construct, a contract between you and a guru.

But what Jax did not say, and what he left out, was that real samaya is the commitment to discovering your own primordial state, and when discovered, maintaining knowledge (rigpa) of that state.

But in Dzogchen there are no specific rules or vows. It is all about being present, aware and working with circumstances.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 28th, 2012 at 3:39 AM

Title: Re: Books and Study Materials on Tibetan Medicine

Content:

Nangwa said:

Tibetan Buddhist Medicine and Psychiatry by Terry Clifford.

Early in the book is a very interesting discussion of how Vajrayana Buddhism greatly influenced and contributed to the sophistication of ayurveda in India.

Malcolm wrote:

It is the opposite way actually. Ayurveda contributed to the development of annutarayoga tantra completion stage practices.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 28th, 2012 at 3:18 AM

Title: Re: Vajra Hell

Content:

pemachophel said:

Namdrol,

You will know what?

- A) That you broke samaya
- B) The awakened state beyond pain and suffering

Malcolm wrote:
That you broke samaya.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Wednesday, March 28th, 2012 at 12:58 AM
Title: Re: Vajra Hell
Content:
pemachophel said:
Jax,

Your theory sounds good. Recognize the suffering as empty and it's all good. However, in my experience, if you break samaya, you will experience suffering and you won't recognize. :

Malcolm wrote:
No, this is not how it is explained in texts. When you break samaya, you will know.

However, when it comes to samaya, common human decency trumps all and any contracts with gurus. In other words, if you have to break "samaya" to act with common decency, pick common decency.

N

Author: Malcolm
Date: Wednesday, March 28th, 2012 at 12:55 AM
Title: Re: Translating "Dzogchenpa"
Content:

Jikan said:
I'm still unclear on something after reading this thread through.

Is it acceptable grammatically to refer to a woman who practices the Great Perfection as a Dzogchenpa? is that normal usage?

Malcolm wrote:
Yes.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 27th, 2012 at 3:41 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen Community of Chogyal Namkhai Norbu

Content:

Pero said:

What is a jenang again? I forgot.

Nangwa said:

Its just a shorter kind of empowerment that is thought of as being a permission giving ritual.

Usually takes between an hour and half or so to three hours, whereas a full wang (at least in Sakya and Gelug) can take a day or two to complete.

Malcolm wrote:

Permissions do not contain the full four empowerments. They contain only a a body, speech and mind blessing.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 27th, 2012 at 2:27 AM

Title: Re: Translating "Dzogchenpa"

Content:

Dronma said:

Then I was surprised to discover that some men are denying the female gender of Tibetan language, and they like to equate it with English, which has no gender in nouns and adjectives.

Malcolm wrote:

No one did that. However, some people, who lack expertise in Tibetan, like making up "Tibetan" words.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 27th, 2012 at 2:01 AM

Title: Re: the matter of life and death

Content:

Lhug-Pa said:

]And at the end of the Mahapralaya is when the Basis begins to stir signifying the beginning of a Mahakalpa (?)

.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 27th, 2012 at 1:56 AM

Title: Re: ChNNR Dorje Drolo retreat

Content:

heart said:

Then of course there is also the question how many Yidams one actually need to practice as a Dzogchen practitioner?

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

The answer is none. Zero.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 27th, 2012 at 1:54 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen Community of Chogyal Namkhai Norbu

Content:

Dronma said:

But I cannot see the reason why I have to bow down to anyone who says something without providing any reliable source.

Malcolm wrote:

You do not. But you do need to learn a language before you start having many opinions about it.

As it so happens, I am one of the first batch of doctors who graduated from Shang Shung Institute, and I really do know Tibetan quite well.

The nature of language is that it changes, sometimes its influences are natural evolution from within; sometimes, like with so called "sngags ma", words are coined by outsiders that then become adopted.

For example, many people are not aware that mkha' 'gro really means ḍāka, the male; while mkha' 'gro ma means ḍākinī, the female. But in personal names the "ma" is general left off.

So, what I am trying to say is that while constructions like "rdzogs chen ma" might be possible, they are non-idiomatic, that is -- Tibetans never use these terms in their daily speech nor in their formal writing.

Also Tibetans are not, at this point, sensitive about political correctness in terms of gender use in speech. They still commonly refer to woman as "skye dman", lower rebirth.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 26th, 2012 at 10:57 PM

Title: Re: ChNNR Dorje Drolo retreat

Content:

pemachophel said:

In Jamgon Kongtrul's Knowing One Liberates All, He says it usually takes six months of recitation retreat (when going by time) to accomplish a given Deity. However, each sadhana typically spells out how many mantra (when going by number) one should expect to recite before achieving accomplishment. In most of the sadhanas I am familiar with, the recitations are divided into three stages: nyen-pa (approach [familiarization]), drub-pa (accomplishment), and lay-jor (activity), with each stage/mantra being said a certain number of times. A general rule for nyen-pa is to say the root mantra 100,000 times for each syllable with possibly another 100,000 for good measure, i.e., to make up any deficiencies. However, in the Paltrul sung-gyud (Paltrul Rinpoche's lineage of Longchen Nyingthig [as, for instance, carried on by Kyabje Chatral Rinpoche]), one typically does 11% over and beyond what the text stipulates. So, if the text says 100,000, the practitioner does 111,111. I agree with Dechen Norbu that it usually takes serious time and effort doing the root mantra before being able to make the activity mantra really work. I have also heard one Lama say (on several occasions) that reciting more than just a few of the activity mantra before having done the requisite nyen-pa and drub-pa is a breach of samaya that can shorten the Teacher's life. If that is true, then I think it goes without saying that it would also be bad for/dangerous to the sadhaka that did so.

Malcolm wrote:

This is definitely not what ChNN says to his students in general. Quality is far more important than quantity. One week of high quality is much better than months of low quality recitation in terms of quantity.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 26th, 2012 at 8:33 PM

Title: Re: the matter of life and death

Content:

Namdrol said:

Not necessarily, they revert to the basis.

Lhug-Pa said:

So this is what happens for them at the end of a Kalpa or Mahakalpa.... What about at the end of a Pralaya or Mahapralaya?

Malcolm wrote:

They revert to the basis at the end of the mahakalpa. The dissolution of the universe, pralaya, happens between great eons.

Lhug-Pa said:

Do Buddhas who have not reached full enlightenment fall into ignorance again?

Malcolm wrote:

No, there are no buddhas or sentient beings in the basis, there is no falling into ignorance per se, since there is no ignorance in the basis either. In any event, this type of cosmology is useless for most people's practice.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 26th, 2012 at 12:23 PM

Title: Re: Dzogchen Community of Chogyal Namkhai Norbu

Content:

Dronma said:

So, Namdrol was wrong when he said: "For example, all women from Eastern Tibet are Khampas, there is no term "Khamma" for eastern Tibetan women".

Malcolm wrote:

Well no, not really. While one can construct such a term, there is no word "kham mo" in any Tibetan dictionary.

There is a word "kham pa" which is defined as "kham kyi yul mi" i.e. a person of the region of Kham -- this term covers all persons from Kham.

But anyway, I am not going to waste my time arguing with you about a language I read fluently.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 26th, 2012 at 8:32 AM

Title: Re: the matter of life and death

Content:

Ryoto said:

Arhats, praytyekabuddhas, bodhisattvas are not fully enlightened buddhas. And in Vajrayana, those buddhas on the 11th and 12th bhumis are considered not fully awakened.

Thanks for your reply. Just to clear up the confusion are saying that these Arhats, Praytyekabuddhas, and Bodhisattvas all revert back to ignorance after the destruction of the universe?

Malcolm wrote:

Not necessarily, they revert to the basis.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 26th, 2012 at 4:55 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen Community of Chogyal Namkhai Norbu

Content:

Dronma said:

So, what happens with Naljorpa and Naljorma? Do they also reflect assignments in Sanskrit? [/color]

Malcolm wrote:

Yes.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 26th, 2012 at 12:28 AM

Title: Re: Five Mountain Zen Order & Paul Lynch

Content:

jrzen said:

Especially since Foster is gone.

Malcolm wrote:

He is not just gone, he has gone beyond apparently, having become the 81st Ancestor of Zen.

<https://prajnaInstitute.org/faculty/myogak-foster/> "
onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, March 25th, 2012 at 11:54 PM

Title: Re: Sugatagarbha : Gelugpa & Nyingma

Content:

Mariusz said:

Kagyu one of the best known Third Karmapa Rangjung Dorje elaborates it:

Likewise,

once the adventitious stains—or, more personally speaking, we as sentient beings—have dissolved, it is a moot question whether “our” dharmadhātu (or buddha nature) and “all the rest” of the dharmadhātu (or the buddha natures of all Buddhas) are the same or different, since what is called a sentient being is nothing but the very mistakenness that makes up such a distinction.

p.101:

Malcolm wrote:
Correct.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Sunday, March 25th, 2012 at 10:07 PM
Title: Re: the matter of life and death
Content:

padma norbu said:

That's what I thought until I read Namdrol's post and when I asked him if the Buddhas are destroyed, too, his response was not quite as definite as yours. He said something like "what does it matter?" which suggested to me that, even if that is the case, there's no point struggling against reality, it's still the best option out there. Sorry, I don't have the thread bookmarked.

dakini_boi said:

That's funny, I think I read in another of Namdrol's posts that fully enlightened buddhas will not revert to samsara even after the destruction of the universe. Think about it, if buddhahood is not permanent, then a buddha's reality would be samsara, by definition. So there would be nothing other than sentient beings of the 6 realms. Therefore there would be no buddha. I tend to take this on faith, that buddhahood is possible and that it is permanent, because otherwise. . . it's just too depressing

Ryoto said:

So you're saying there is such a thing as not fully enlightened Buddhas? One is either a fully enlightened Buddha or not. There is no in between.

Is this some Dzogchen teaching?

Malcolm wrote:

Arhats, praytyekabuddhas, bodhisattvas are not fully enlightened buddhas. And in Vajrayana, those buddhas on the 11th and 12th bhumis are considered not fully awakened.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Sunday, March 25th, 2012 at 9:54 PM
Title: Re: Dzogchen Community of Chogyal Namkhai Norbu
Content:

Dronma said:

So, for clearing up my query, can we say - for example - that Ayu Khandro was a Dzogchenma?

Is it correct from the point of Tibetan language? ?[/color]

Malcolm wrote:

No, it is not correct as there is no word in tibetan རྒྱལ་ཆེན་མ་.

As Adamantine says, Tibetans reflect gender assignations in Sanskrit with pa and ma, but these do not necessarily apply to Tibetans terms themselves.

If you want to read about the gender of Tibetan words there is a book by Steven Beyer, The Classical Tibetan Language, that explains this very well i.e. when pa and ma are gender signs, and when they are not.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, March 25th, 2012 at 9:01 AM

Title: Re: the matter of life and death

Content:

padma norbu said:

That's what I thought until I read Namdrol's post and when I asked him if the Buddhas are destroyed, too, his response was not quite as definite as yours. He said something like "what does it matter?" which suggested to me that, even if that is the case, there's no point struggling against reality, it's still the best option out there. Sorry, I don't have the thread bookmarked.

dakini_boi said:

That's funny, I think I read in another of Namdrol's posts that fully enlightened buddhas will not revert to samsara even after the destruction of the universe.

Malcolm wrote:

What I said was that fully awakened buddhas never revert to the basis, as opposed to all those with lesser or no realization.

The basis however possesses compassion, so whenever there are sentient beings, buddhas appear. But the division between samsara and nirvana is merely the deluded vision of sentient beings. There is no samsara and nirvana in the basis.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, March 24th, 2012 at 8:43 PM

Title: Re: 2 Karmapas: Let's avoid any hostility

Content:

sherabpa said:

It does not follow that there could not ever be two Karmapas at any point in time.

Malcolm wrote:
Politics.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, March 24th, 2012 at 11:31 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen Community of Chogyal Namkhai Norbu

Content:

Dronma said:

I asked about the Tibetan language!

So, like Naljorpa and Naljorma, Nagpa and Nagma, it might be Dzogchenpa and Dzogchenma or Dzogchenmo - as pensum suggested.

If somebody has accurate knowledge of this, I'd appreciate a lot an accurate grammatical response! [/color]

Malcolm wrote:

"sngags ma" is a western neologism that has been adopted by Tibetans.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, March 24th, 2012 at 11:29 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen Community of Chogyal Namkhai Norbu

Content:

Dronma said:

I'd like to bring this question to the surface of the board again, since it was buried by many posts.

So, from the replies it seems that "Dzogchenpa" is a qualified, serious practitioner of Dzogchen. Isn't it?

Then, what is the term for the female Dzogchen practitioner?

Dzogchenmo or Dzogchenma?

Pero said:

Perhaps there isn't one. The -pa doesn't necessarily indicate the male gender wherever you see it. In this case I think it simply means someone who is in the state of dzogchen.

Dronma said:

I think that -pa indicates the gender.

I'd like a response from someone who really knows.

Malcolm wrote:

ཁོ་ is a nominalizer. It does not necessarily indicate gender. For example, all women from Eastern Tibet are Khampas, there is no term "Khamma" for eastern Tibetan women.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 20th, 2012 at 4:51 AM

Title: Re: Two approaches.

Content:

Namdrol said:

Sentient beings are deluded about the display of the basis. When they cease to be so deluded, they are buddhas.

The basis never displays as anything other than the five lights.

gad rgyangs said:

so you're saying sentient beings and buddhas are the display of a different basis? you're saying that sentient beings and buddhas are not included in "all phenomena of samsara and nirvana"? you seem to be claiming there is the basis and its display, on the one hand, and then there's sentient beings and buddhas, but they have nothing to do with each other. if this were so, in what way would the basis be "our real nature"?

Malcolm wrote:

I like the way you systematically misrepresent what I am saying.

read what I said above, and you will see how much your statement purporting to represent what I said, does not represent it, much in the same way that a man with jaundice persistently sees white as yellow.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 20th, 2012 at 3:41 AM

Title: Re: Two approaches.

Content:

Dronma said:

Much Ado About Nothing!

The whole topic has been mutated to a personal controversy between gad rgyangs and Namdrol.

asunthatneversets said:

What seems like personal controversy on this thread is more like a resurfacing battle which originates from an epic and ancient war spanning eons of thread. We may never see the end of it, but know that you'll learn some interesting things and gain valuable insight while it goes on. It never sleeps and it cannot be stopped... Resistance is futile!

Malcolm wrote:

No personal controversy.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 20th, 2012 at 3:09 AM

Title: Re: Two approaches.

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

Therefore, are sentient beings and their delusion part of the display of the basis? check, and mate.

Malcolm wrote:

Sentient beings are deluded about the display of the basis. When they cease to be so deluded, they are buddhas.

The basis never displays as anything other than the five lights.

Further, The Luminous Space states:

That mind is produced out of the dualistic grasping to the six objects of the manifestation of wisdom.

How can that [mind] be produced? Since [the mind] is produced from that ignorance that does not recognize the intrinsic manifestation of wisdom [the mind] is produced.

Sentient beings, rocks and trees are assembled by delusion about the basis. But the basis only displays one way. It does not display as both samsara and nirvana.

Since that critical point of luminous empty vidyā was not recognized, grasping onto that produced the five elements, and the causal thigle [was produced] from the refined part of those. The body was produced from that [refined part] and energy [rtsal] of wisdom produces the five sense gates in that [body]. Within those [sense gates] the five wisdoms are produced. The five [sense gates] grasping onto those [five wisdoms produce] the five afflictions. After first being created by the energy of wisdom; in the middle, it was not recognized that the body of the refined part of the assembled elements actually is the five wisdoms, since this was not realized through intellectual views, the non-sentient and sentient both appear, but don't believe it. Here, it is actually five wisdoms to begin with; in the middle, when the body is formed from assembly of the elements through ignorance grasping onto those [five wisdoms] also, it is actually the five wisdoms. The five aggregates, sense organs, and afflictions also are actually the five wisdoms. In the end, since one transcends accepting, rejecting, proofs, and negations since those are realized to be real. As such, the sign of non-duality is [the body] disappearing into wisdom without any effluents because the critical point of the non-duality or sameness of the non-sentient and the sentient was understood according to the Guru's intimate instruction.

The basis only is the five wisdom and only displays the five wisdoms -- the rest is delusion. Ignorance [avidyā] is not a display of the basis, it is delusion about the display of the basis. Knowledge is not a display of the basis, it is the absence of delusion about the display of the basis.

One basis, two paths, two results.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 20th, 2012 at 12:15 AM

Title: Re: Two approaches.

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

the reason why we disagree about this is because you have already forgotten the last thread where this was decided once and for all. I will copy the crucial citation:

Malcolm wrote:

"In brief, those delusions also are not delusion that exist in the cause and basis, but as one does not understand the actual state of the basis one is stubbornly deluded about one's appearances. For example when grasping to a seeming appearance that does not exist in the material, a rope appears to be a snake. Like a conch shell appearing yellow, the actual state of the basis has not been understood, and there is fixated delusion about one's appearances."

-- Khandro Nyinthig

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 19th, 2012 at 11:16 PM

Title: Re: Dzogchen Community of Chogyal Namkhai Norbu

Content:

Lhug-Pa said:

Instead of complaining more about things not going well for me, how about I offer something potentially helpful here....

It's funny that I said:

A happy song for sure.

As I'm thinking that the song in question might be from the following CD (?):

http://www.snowlionpub.com/html/product_9636.html

About offerings:

In

[url=http://www.dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=48&t=6203&start=60#p73628]Guardians of the Teaching,[/url] Namdrol said:

When you do medium thun for example, it is sufficient to visualize offerings. If you want to set them up, that is ok too. Whatever you have space and time for.

In general, there are only two things that you need for offerings (apart from the Ganapuja), according to my understanding of ChNN's intent: light and incense, and even these are not absolutely required.

If you like setting out water offerings, sense offering, medicine and blood, tormas and so on -- go for it -- but it is not absolutely necessary. After all, the universe is a torma according to the torma tantra.

Lhug-Pa said:

Therefore in regard to working with circumstances, in my case I currently cannot burn incense where I live, so if I were to offer Sang and Serkyem, I would have to take Sang incense and try to distill into an essential oil in order to use in my essential oil diffuser (whenever performing a Puja, I at least try to diffuse essential oil, even if it's just some Sage oil or something that I have on hand).

Malcolm wrote:

You can just use juniper essential oil.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 19th, 2012 at 11:13 PM

Title: Re: gzhan stong and Great Madhyamaka

Content:

Mariusz said:

Moreover, I pointed-out you the seeming is not totally faulty here again, after I wrote your statement "the relative truth is totally faulty" in Academic Discussion forum when we discussed Madhyamaka. So it is only for you, not for me. As long as for you "the relative truth is always faulty" I recognize your view as nihilistic So I use here the dependent nature of Yogacara as one another antidote for your statement.

Malcolm wrote:

What I actually said that was "relative truth is the object of a mistaken cognition", "ultimate truth is the object of an unmistaken cognition". These are Candrakirti's definitions and not mine.

Further, Candra devotes a number of verses to refuting the dependent nature -- read them.

N

Author: Malcolm
Date: Monday, March 19th, 2012 at 10:03 PM
Title: Re: Two approaches.
Content:

Lhug-Pa said:
If Being in the State of Dzogchen Contemplation is equivalent to proper Recognition of the Basis & Its display; then in that moment of Contemplation, all Vision is a display of the Basis, yes?

Malcolm wrote:
Not exactly.

N

Author: Malcolm
Date: Monday, March 19th, 2012 at 8:11 PM
Title: Re: gzhan stong and Great Madhyamaka
Content:
Mariusz said:
Where I accept something for me? .

Malcolm wrote:
If you accept the perfected nature, your view is not Madhyamaka. This is why Candrakirti in detail refutes the three natures scheme.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Monday, March 19th, 2012 at 7:19 PM
Title: Re: gzhan stong and Great Madhyamaka
Content:
Namdrol said:
according to tortured late Tibetan exegesis [Mipham or Shakya Chogden]

Mariusz said:
I don't think so it is so. As you see above, I take it by simply using the subject-side perspective instead of object-side perspective. So for me nothing is "out there" existent, non-existent, so on and so fort.

Malcolm wrote:
Right, your view is cittamatra, since you accept the existence of the subjective side ultimately.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 19th, 2012 at 1:37 AM

Title: Re: "Location" of mind in Dzogchen

Content:

asunthatneversets said:

Its value/use applies mostly to tögal I'm pretty sure

Sönam said:

The crystal canal is not about mind ...

Sönam

asunthatneversets said:

Whatever term you would say the crystal canal concerns is synonymous with what I'm designating as "mind". I don't usually refer to it as mind either, it only warranted that title in the context of this thread to show the wide array and uses of the term "mind". So any deviation in shared view between you and I is going to be merely semantical.

Malcolm wrote:

No -- in this context the mind is physiologically sited in the lungs, and wisdom is sited in the heart. This is one key difference between the common teachings (i.e. mind has no source, no location and no destination when it leaves) and the uncommon teachings (mind has a source, a location and a destination).

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 19th, 2012 at 12:21 AM

Title: Re: Two approaches.

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

the basis manifests as all phenomena of samsara and nirvana. even if you break it down as basis--->five lights--->recognition&nonrecognition---->samsara&nirvana its not like what counts as the display stops at some point and then you get something that is ontologically different.

Malcolm wrote:

The basis only displays one way. That display is either properly recognized or not, leading to samsara and nirvana. Neither samsara nor nirvana exist in the basis. But the basis is made up of three wisdoms. Since there is no ignorance in that state to begin with, there can be no ignorance in that state later. This is why we disagree about whether ignorance is a display of the basis or not. The reason why samsaric phenomena are considered originally pure is that they are simply a result of misapprehensions of the originally pure naturally formed display of the basis. We do not need to manipulate these phenomena in anyway. But we do need to recognize their actual state, both as delusions (the way they are appearing to us (snang lugs)) and the way these apparent phenomena are present in and of themselves (gnas lugs).

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 19th, 2012 at 12:06 AM

Title: Re: Two approaches.

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

I was thinking about this too. what conclusion can be drawn from this fact? some possibilities are: the corpus is inconsistent, or the view operates on many levels which have different descriptions. certainly we must distinguish texts written "from the point of view of the basis" from those written from the point of view of sentient beings. they may appear contradictory because of this difference of perspective.

Malcolm wrote:

In Man ngag sde there are texts which are aimed at explicating tregchö and texts aimed at explicating thögal. The texts explicating the former are almost exclusively about the basis and the view. The text explicating the latter are almost exclusively about the path and meditation. Sems sde for example is also almost exclusively about the basis i.e. the view. klong sde and man ngag sde are more concerned with the path.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, March 18th, 2012 at 9:10 PM

Title: Re: Two approaches.

Content:

Pema Rigdzin said:

But wait, I thought there were no mistaken views because it's all the manifestations of the basis?

And thus how can Namdrol be mistaken, since his view is a manifestation of the basis?

gad rgyangs said:

Namdrol and his mistaken view are not a mistake in the sense that he and his mistaken view should never have arisen in the first place, for yes, him and his mistaken view are just an appearance of the basis. what else could they be? even if his view was not mistaken, he and his view would still be just an appearance of the basis. what else could they be?

so one can entertain mistaken views about the nature of the basis, but thats no more or less a manifestation of the basis than correct views. It leads to a different movie though.

Malcolm wrote:

You're mistaken in assuming that there is no error -- the proof of that is contained within your own statement.

There is a difference between the appearance of the basis, and the error and non-error regarding that apperance. It leads to different movies, just as you say. But the erroneous perception of basis leads to a movie that is desirable to avoid, as Longchenpa states, and the non-erronenous perception leads to a movie that is desirable to see.

Basically, your point of view entails that for you liberation is meaningless. Which is fine, but that is not the point of view of Dzogchen, nor Buddhism as a whole. It may be the point of view of various neo-advaita, pseudo-zen, new age gurus, but not Dzogchen.

You might be able to post this or that citation that you feels defends your perspective, but so can I -- so that is rather pointless. Nevertheless the String of Pearls states:

Having been gripped by the apprehender and apprehended in the aggregates, elements and gateways,
one remains in samsara itself for a long while,
within the belly of the three realms
one is placed in the prison of name and matter, [352] bound by the chains of ignorance, covered with dense black darkness of samsara,
attached to the spicy taste of passion,
one is bound by the noose of confusion,
tormented by the hot fire of hatred,
one's head is covered by pride,
the gates of jealousy are locked,
surrounded by the armies of resentment and so on,
tied about the neck with the noose of apprehender and apprehended, stuck in the swamp of past traces,
one's hands are shackled with ripened karma,
the mother of karma is joined with her child,
one following the other just like a water wheel,
alternating between good and bad bodies,
born in different forms,
and through heightening one's self-grasping
one sinks to the bottom of the ocean of suffering, one's heart is grabbed by the goad of the evil destinies,
one binds oneself with the enemy, afflictions.
Fire appears as water to hell beings,

as hunger and thirst to hungry ghosts,
as fog to animals.
the aggregates, gateways and elements appears as the five elements to humans,
those are also pleasurable, painful and neutral,
as weapons and armor to asuras,
and as desirable things to gods.
For example, just like a rapidly spinning fire wheel
one abides continuously in samsara for a long while.
Such various appearances are like seeing a snake in a rope since what isn't there is held to be there,
both the outer and inner container and contents form,
and if that is investigated, it is a rope,
i.e. the container and contents are already empty
the ultimate with the form of the relative."

The mistake then is seeing as there what isn't there, which is why this tantra, among others uses the rope/snake example. What this tantra is stating is that deluded appearances we see that are predicated in the basis do not exist in the basis and are not appearances of the basis, but rather misapprehensions of the appearance of the basis.

You on the other hand seem to be saying that the basis manifests as sentient beings and the six realms. If this is what you are saying, then you are very far away from the point of view of the great perfection.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, March 18th, 2012 at 4:25 AM

Title: Re: Two approaches.

Content:

Namdrol said:

"The essence of mind is an obscuration to be given up. The essence of vidyā is a wisdom to be attained."

--Longchenpa from nam mkha' dri med in the bla ma yang thig

Something did go wrong, the basis was not recognized. This is why there is, as stated in the dgongs pa zang thal teachings, one basis, two paths and two results. If something did not go wrong there would be no need at all for Dzogchen texts to spend thousands of words explaining how delusion and sentient beings arose.

N

gad rgyangs said:

just because there is rigpa and marigpa doesn't mean that one is right and one is wrong.

one (presumably) leads to cessation of suffering and efficacy in aiding beings, and the other leads to a movie full of all kinds of emotions and experiences. but both come from the same basis, and therefore are just as ka dag as that basis. that is why it is our real nature even while we are marigpa-pas. if it wasn't, introduction wouldn't be possible. think about it, buddhas and sentient beings have the same nature, so how could one be the result of "something going wrong?"

Malcolm wrote:

If something had not gone wrong, no introduction would be necessary, and we could all bliss out in the fake Dzogchen proposition that started this thread.

The point is not about whether everything is ka dag and lhun grub. The point is whether that is recognized and the consequences that occur when it isn't.

gad rgyangs said:

so how could one be the result of "something going wrong?"

Malcolm wrote:

Sentient beings are clearly the result of something gone wrong since they result from ignorance.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, March 18th, 2012 at 4:23 AM

Title: Re: Two approaches.

Content:

Namdrol said:

"The essence of mind is an obscuration to be given up. The essence of vidyā is a wisdom to be attained."

--Longchenpa from nam mkha' dri med in the bla ma yang thig

Something did go wrong, the basis was not recognized. This is why there is, as stated in the dgongs pa zang thal teachings, one basis, two paths and two results. If something did not go wrong there would be no need at all for Dzogchen texts to spend thousands of words explaining how delusion and sentient beings arose.

N

gad rgyangs said:

just because there is rigpa and marigpa doesn't mean that one is right and one is wrong.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, actually it means that one is right and the other is wrong. By definition marigpa is always wrong.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, March 18th, 2012 at 4:02 AM

Title: Re: Two approaches.

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

exactly, but both the "mistaken" and "not mistaken" are appearances of the basis. if you claim otherwise, you are in effect positing a dual ground, or at least a dual display, one for mistaken sentient beings and one for non-mistaken buddhas.

Namdrol said:

No. We already had this conversation before. There is one basis, two paths and two results. Because sentient beings are deluded they perceive the basis in terms of subject and object, etc. Since buddhas are not deluded about the basis they do not have this dualistic conceptual delusion. The basis only presents one way, but it is perceived differently by buddhas and sentient beings. As long as sentient beings are mistaken about the appearances of the basis, for that long they will continue to cycle in samsara.

N

gad rgyangs said:

this kind of dualism vision always has implicit within it the assumption that things should be different from what they are, that somewhere along the way, "something went wrong". Its really no different from the concept of the fall in Judaeo-Christianity. The assumption "something went wrong" leads naturally to the assumption "something needs to be done, to be corrected". I'm sure even you will agree this is not at all the Dzoghchen view. So, if we reject the idea that "something went wrong" and "something needs to be done", then the idea that all phenomena of samsara and nirvana are the display of the basis, including marigpa, makes perfect sense. texts have been cited in the other thread that demonstrate this, no need to haul them out again, but perhaps you should re-read that thread.

Malcolm wrote:

"The essence of mind is an obscuration to be given up. The essence of vidyā is a wisdom to be attained."

--Longchenpa from nam mkha' dri med in the bla ma yang thig

Something did go wrong, the basis was not recognized. This is why there is, as stated in the dgongs pa zang thal teachings, one basis, two paths and two results. If something did not go wrong there would be no need at all for Dzogchen texts to spend thousands of words explaining how delusion and sentient beings arose.

N

Author: Malcolm
Date: Sunday, March 18th, 2012 at 3:33 AM
Title: Re: Two approaches.
Content:

gad rgyangs said:
you're right about the "yes" part, but mistaken otherwise.

Namdrol said:
You are entitled to your opinion.
the basis is the real nature of sentient beings. the gzhi snang can (and is in the texts) subdivided into stages, but that doesn't mean you can say that "before this stage its the appearances of the basis, but after that stage, its not anymore." All I can do is refer again to the citations I gave, which are very clear.
Sentient beings are cognitive errors, that's all. What they are mistaken about is their own nature, which is the basis. When they cease to be mistaken about those appearances, they are buddhas.

N

gad rgyangs said:
exactly, but both the "mistaken" and "not mistaken" are appearances of the basis. if you claim otherwise, you are in effect positing a dual ground, or at least a dual display, one for mistaken sentient beings and one for non-mistaken buddhas.

Malcolm wrote:
No. We already had this conversation before. There is one basis, two paths and two results. Because sentient beings are deluded they perceive the basis in terms of subject and object, etc. Since buddhas are not deluded about the basis they do not have this dualistic conceptual delusion. The basis only presents one way, but it is perceived differently by buddhas and sentient beings. As long as sentient beings are mistaken about the appearances of the basis, for that long they will continue to cycle in samsara.

N

Author: Malcolm
Date: Sunday, March 18th, 2012 at 3:20 AM
Title: Re: Two approaches.
Content:

gad rgyangs said:
you're right about the "yes" part, but mistaken otherwise.

Malcolm wrote:

You are entitled to your opinion.

gad rgyangs said:

the basis is the real nature of sentient beings. the gzhi snang can (and is in the texts) subdivided into stages, but that doesn't mean you can say that "before this stage its the appearances of the basis, but after that stage, its not anymore." All I can do is refer again to the citations I gave, which are very clear.

Malcolm wrote:

Sentient beings are cognitive errors, that's all. What they are mistaken about is their own nature, which is the basis. When they cease to be mistaken about those appearances, they are buddhas.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, March 18th, 2012 at 2:59 AM

Title: Re: Two approaches.

Content:

Namdrol said:

Now then, you seem to be hard of hearing.

The appearance of the basis does not contain faults. Not recognizing the appearance of the basis is a fault, as the tantra I cited demonstrates.

N

gad rgyangs said:

.....and conveniently ignoring the citations I gave.

Malcolm wrote:

The citations you gave do not contradict what I am saying in the least.

gad rgyangs said:

lets try it this way: "are sentient beings included within appearances of the basis?"

Malcolm wrote:

Yes and no.

No, because there are no sentient beings in the basis and sentient being do not appear when the basis appears. Yes, because the non-recognition of the basis produces sentient beings after the basis appears. Sentient beings, and everything else, is made of the appearance of the five lights of the basis etc. But the five lights of the basis etc are never contaminated by the ignorance that does not recognize the basis for what it is. In this way the proper answer is both yes and no.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, March 18th, 2012 at 2:28 AM

Title: Re: Two approaches.

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

there isn't a Dzogchen master alive who would say that Longchenpa's writings are anything other than the purest expression of the the Dzogchen view we have. So, I will ignore the snide aspersions being cast upon him here.

Malcolm wrote:

Actually the aspersion was being cast on those who think that it is sufficient to rely on Longchenpa for a well-rounded view of Dzogchen. For example, Jamyang Khyentse Wangpo opines that dgongs pa zang thal teachings are more profound than other nyinthig teachings for this and that reason.

Now then, you seem to be hard of hearing.

The appearance of the basis does not contain faults. Not recognizing the appearance of the basis is a fault, as the tantra I cited demonstrates.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, March 18th, 2012 at 1:03 AM

Title: Re: Reigle vs Sparham - Sanskrit

Content:

Will said:

N. - if "dharma-dhātu is the svabhāva of the dharma-dhātu" is correct meaning, then the notion of dharma-dhātu having no svabhāva, ie, being empty of inherent existence, seems impossible. How can dharma-dhātu be both svabhāva & nisvabhāva at once? Is this not a big difference between Mahayana & Hinayana?

Namdrol said:

Since the svabhāva of matter and so on are emptiness, if the svabhāva of matter is emptiness and matter, etc., is also matter and so on are the svabhāva of the dharmadhātu, there is no contradiction

Will said:

Sorry N., but my stupid factor looms larger as the years pass. Please clarify if you are saying that 1) dharma-dhātu has svabhāva or 2) dharma-dhātu has no svabhāva or 3) some other option(s)

Malcolm wrote:

The dharmadhātu has a svabhāva and that svabhāva is dharmas such as matter and so on that lack svabhāva.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, March 18th, 2012 at 12:56 AM

Title: Re: Two approaches.

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

there is no fault in the basis, therefore, neither is there the possibility of fault in that which proceeds from the basis. in fact, the absence of fault in the basis is what guarantees that there is no possibility of fault in the display.

Malcolm wrote:

No one said there was a fault in the display or in the basis. All that was said was that not recognizing the display for what it is a mistake, a fault, an error.

A tantra called Uprooting Delusion from the dgongs pa zang thal cycle provides the following description:

The way sentient beings arise:
that nameless general ground,
is non-conceptual and not established at all, invisible and unclear, from which when the bifurcation occurs, since vāyu, vidyā, and space separate, [3/b]
the intrinsic sound of the elements produces vibration.
From the inside of the darkness of the clear part of appearances, as soon as a storm of fire emerges,
scattering everywhere,
Vidyā, like the mind of a lunatic,
is dazed and reeling.
Since vidyā lacks confidence in its own appearances,
it panics at sound, is frightened of rays,
and through awareness not taking its own place,
the ignorance that arises simultaneously with it is called "the causal ignorance.

Because of a lack of mindful attention, self and other are grasped as a duality, and both outer and inner dependent origination occur.
The whole universe arises through awareness looking externally.
All sentient being arise through awareness looking internally.

Through looking there, fearful appearances arise, through looking here, 'self' arises.
Many mistakes arise from the single mistake about the appearances of here and there.
Because of being mistaken about a self, there is a mistake about other, attachment to self, aversion to other.
From the seed of attachment and aversion,
the whole outer universe and inhabitants are mistakes.
Because one is held as two, [4/a] that is called the delusion of dualistic grasping.
Since one imputed and mistook outer and inner,
that is called "the imputing ignorance".
Because of familiarity of subject and object of that,
from the thick buildup of traces,
there was entrance into the state of samsara.
That is how the six migrations occurred."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, March 18th, 2012 at 12:21 AM

Title: Re: gzhan stong and Great Madhyamaka

Content:

Mariusz said:

With all respect I did not see it in your quotes. Perhaps prove it with another one please.
All I see is the dependent nature as never existed in the first place although it seems to be, so also not totally faulty.

Namdrol said:

You need to read the Mahayāna Samgraha by Asanga then it will be more clear to you.

N

Mariusz said:

Thanx. Do you know suitable english book on it?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, it is in translation.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, March 17th, 2012 at 11:59 PM

Title: Re: Two approaches.

Content:

Namdrol said:

The appearance of the basis is not a fault; the non-recognition of those appearances is.

gad rgyangs said:

so if you're saying that what should have happened is that "everybody" recognized and abided as samantabhadra, then you're denigrating the basis, saying it can't do anything right, it spits out a display and even that is all messed up with "faults" and mistakes", retarded sems can who don't know any better. what a loser-basis.

Malcolm wrote:

There is no fault in the basis. But not recognizing the basis is a fault.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, March 17th, 2012 at 11:17 PM

Title: Re: Bimala

Content:

treehuggingoctopus said:

Thank you guys. One more silly question: how much are you supposed to take? Would one pill per day be enough?

Malcolm wrote:

2

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, March 17th, 2012 at 11:06 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist ethics and BDSM?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Really, seven pages on bondage? Face it greg, some people like being tied up when they screw, lashed with whips, and otherwise dominated and humiliated, and some people like to do that stuff to others while screwing them, and BDSM is a protocol for doing it relatively safely without it resulting in rape, etc. Is it deluded? Yes. Does it matter? Not much.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, March 17th, 2012 at 10:55 PM

Title: Re: Two approaches.

Content:

Namdrol said:

Everything can be traced back to non-recognition of the appearance of the basis. That non-recognition is a mistake. Samsara is a fault because it is the result of an error.

gad rgyangs said:

and what: some part of the appearances of the basis are incompetent?

Malcolm wrote:

The appearance of the basis is not a fault; the non-recognition of those appearances is. That is where samsara comes from. And, as long as you have samsaric vision, karmic vision, you can be sure that you are not seeing the appearances of the basis as they are, but are viewing them through traces of affliction and action. In other words, the gnas lugs, how things are, and snang lugs, how things appear are dissonant because of ignorance., etc.

This is why many fake Dzogchenpas resort to the opposite of Garab Dorje's three words i.e. they introduce as many people as they can to to their own delusion, convince them that delusion is perfectly ok, and they all continue in samsara for ever.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, March 17th, 2012 at 9:32 PM

Title: Re: gzhan stong and Great Madhyamaka

Content:

Mariusz said:

With all respect I did not see it in your quotes. Perhaps prove it with another one please. All I see is the dependent nature as never existed in the first place although it seems to be, so also not totally faulty.

Malcolm wrote:

You need to read the Mahayāna Samgraha by Asanga then it will be more clear to you.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, March 17th, 2012 at 7:46 PM

Title: Re: Two approaches.

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

well said DarwidHalim. The common response to this view is "but if you are still seeing the story, it does no good to say its all dharmakaya/empty/perfect/dzogpachenpo/etc...you have to do the practices...etc". My contention is that it is precisely by understanding why doing practices actually changes nothing at all, that your practices can actually be beneficial. As long as you think they are actually changing anything real, they will not be so effective. that may seem paradoxical, but there it is. So the people fighting the Dzogchen view tooth and nail (surprisingly many of whom self-identify as students of Dzogchen) are actually doing themselves a disservice, and walking straight away from that which they so vociferously proclaim is necessary, that is, the reduction/elimination of suffering.

heart said:

Practices don't change the natural state, nor make it closer in any way. Practices destroy misunderstanding, intellectualized views and confusion. Our minds are very tricky and deceptive, which is obvious in these threads, and for this reason no matter how many pretty books you read you will never understand the Great Perfection. In all Dzogchen manuals it is written that you should find a qualified teacher and do anything he/she says. I am afraid that is the only way because cleverness will just not make.

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

Sometimes I think the problem is that people only read Longchenpa, who has a very specific take and they do not read the wider tradition of Dzogchen.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, March 17th, 2012 at 7:15 PM

Title: Re: gzhan stong and Great Madhyamaka

Content:

Mariusz said:

I also thank you. So it supports my investigation based only on english translation here in my previous posts. Good to see it finally as not the Mind only (Cittamatra), but as Yogacara compatible with Madhyamaka as I wrote earlier

Malcolm wrote:

That is not what Tom is saying. Tom is saying that imagination of the unreal exists. That is precisely the cittamatra POV. If one reads the MV objectively, there is no way to read it as Madhyamaka text. If you read it according to tortured late Tibetan exegesis [Mipham or Shakya Chogden], then you can try, but in doing so you have to basically assert that the perfected nature is never the dependent nature. But in fact in the MV it is made extremely clear that the perfected nature simple is the non-existence of the imagined nature in the dependent nature, and that non-existence exists. In summary, there really is no way to reconcile Maitreyanath's Madhyāntavibhanga and Dharmadharmatāvibhanga with Madhyamaka. They are all Yogacara (cittamatra) treatises meant to explicate the Yogacara tradition sutras such the Samdhinirmocana, the Lanka and so on. This applies also to the the Sutra-alaṃkāra. This also applies to the Uttaratantra. Why? Because the Cittamatras also present a presentation of freedom from reference points i.e. the wisdom exists but it is free from reference points. The Abhisamaya-alaṃkāra is also not free from fault in this respect because it really only discusses the structure of the path. The reason why the Yogacara commentaries of the AA are not widely studied in Tibet is because they are not compatible Madhyamaka view.

Primarily Aryavimuktisena and Haribhadra are studied, both Madhyamaka scholars critical of the Yogacara point of view.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, March 17th, 2012 at 7:04 PM

Title: Re: Two approaches.

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

well said DarwidHalim. The common response to this view is "but if you are still seeing the story, it does no good to say its all dharmakaya/empty/perfect/dzogpachenpo/etc...you have to do the practices...etc".

My contention is that it is precisely by understanding why doing practices actually changes nothing at all, that your practices can actually be beneficial. As long as you think they are actually changing anything real, they will not be so effective. that may seem paradoxical, but there it is. So the people fighting the Dzogchen view tooth and nail (surprisingly many of whom self-identify as students of Dzoghchen) are actually doing themselves a disservice, and walking straight away from that which they so vociferously proclaim is necessary, that is, the reduction/elimination of suffering.

Malcolm wrote:

Of course practices don't change anything real whoever said they did? -- we all know the path is completely illusory from beginning to end, even buddhahood is completely illusory. But this is not a Dzogchen perspective -- this is a perspective from perfection of wisdom sutras.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, March 17th, 2012 at 6:57 PM

Title: Re: Two approaches.

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

you can stop cycling in samsara if thats your predilection, its just that samsara is not a "fault" or "mistake". how could anything that arises be a mistake, since everything is ultimately traceable back into the ka dag, lhun grub and thugs rje of the basis?

Malcolm wrote:

Everything can be traced back to non-recognition of the appearance of the basis. That non-recognition is a mistake. Samsara is a fault because it is the result of an error. But there are some people who like this fake Dzogchen approach where they feel that all of the problems they cause themselves and others are "ok" because it is all "original purity and so on. This is little different than the kind of nihilism that some people who misunderstand the perfection of wisdom sutras engage in. So, the next time you are pissed off, or suffering, just try and explain it all away to yourself as the three wisdoms of the basis and then get back to us on how well that is working out for you.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, March 17th, 2012 at 6:04 AM

Title: Re: Two approaches.

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

not sure what "on top of" is meaning here?

Malcolm wrote:

What Khenpo Jigphun is saying is that there is no liberation in the basis, liberation and non-liberation are only valid questions from the point of view of the arising of basis.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, March 17th, 2012 at 6:02 AM

Title: Re: Two approaches.

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

cycling in samsara is only a fault if your view is dualism.

Malcolm wrote:

Please enjoy yourself then...even though it seems you have utterly missed the point that Dzogchen also just an attempt to solve the Buddhist question of how to stop cycling in samsara.

The answer to that question is not "Cycling in samsara? No problem, please continue...."

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, March 17th, 2012 at 5:15 AM

Title: Re: Two approaches.

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

there are not really two approaches, because it is by realizing the first that the second is fulfilled.

Longchenpa, in chos dbyings mdzod says "although Buddhahood is timeless, there is awakening to Buddhahood anew." Basically this means that you can enjoy the ride without sweating it. The awakening anew part is just for fun, the ground/you just playing hide and seek with itself/yourself.

Malcolm wrote:

Khenpo Jigphun points:

"Even though the omniscient guru [Longchenpa] may have stated "Samantabhadra was liberated on the basis", if there is liberation on the basis there be the fault of once again cycling in samsara. Therefore, it is necessary that liberation is on top of the appearance of the basis."

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, March 17th, 2012 at 3:22 AM

Title: Re: Two approaches.

Content:

Jinzang said:

The nub of the issue is that although buddha mind is ordinary mind (tha mal gyi shes pa), we don't see ordinary mind because of our obscurations. Hence the many expedient means to remove them. In the sense that seeing ordinary mind is quite rare, what is called ordinary is extraordinary.

Malcolm wrote:

tha mal gyi shes pa is just a yogi's word for ye shes i.e. wisdom.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, March 17th, 2012 at 2:57 AM

Title: Re: Rebirth of whom?

Content:

cyndilydia said:

While the organic host has died, it has left the entity charged with properties priming it for the next "rebirth".

I hope this makes sense.

duckfiasco said:

What is hosted by the entity? What is their relationship? What is leaving, where does it go, and what is left behind?

cyndilydia said:

Good questions. In talking things out, I can identify and address holes in reasoning. Let me take a stab..

The entity is that which lives the multiple lifetimes working to nirvana

The host is the organism whose life force is the entity. The host is born, lives and dies. Upon death, the entity is ready to be reborn to another host.

Leaving is death of the host, I don't know where the entity goes - am working on a couple of theories

What is left behind is a carcass

These answers aren't really satisfying. Hopefully it's like writing code for me - I don't know what I'm doing, but when the errors are all fixed, the program works.

Malcolm wrote:

There is no entity that takes rebirth. But there is rebirth.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, March 17th, 2012 at 2:55 AM

Title: Re: Reigle vs Sparham - Sanskrit

Content:

Will said:

N. - if "dharma are the svabhāva of the dharma-dhātu" is correct meaning, then the notion of dharma-dhātu having no svabhāva, ie, being empty of inherent existence, seems impossible. How can dharma-dhātu be both svabhāva & nisvabhāva at once? Is this not a big difference between Mahayana & Hinayana?

Malcolm wrote:

Since the svabhāva of matter and so on are emptiness, if the svabhāva of matter is emptiness and matter, etc., is also matter and so on are the svabhāva of the dharmadhātu, there is no contradiction

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, March 16th, 2012 at 11:02 PM

Title: Re: Two approaches.

Content:

White Lotus said:

so... we have these two approaches and should be aware that they cannot be reconciled. there have been great masters from many lineages who have emphasised one over the other.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, there are two approaches:

1) True Dzogchen teachings

2) False Dzogchen teachings (which by definition are not actually Dzogchen, but are various strains of recycled Neo-Zen, Crypto-Advaita, New Age fantasy and so on and so forth).

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, March 16th, 2012 at 10:23 PM

Title: Re: Reigle vs Sparham - Sanskrit

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

This gentleman's understanding is correct.

Will said:

Anyone competent enough in Sanskrit to understand who correctly translates these verses in the Abhisamayālaṃkāra? This is from this blog - <http://prajnaquest.fr/blog/> "onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

David Reigle

March 13, 2012 at 5:40 am

Regarding the quotations from Haribhadra's Āloka, rather than my own translations I had intended to give these as translated by Gareth Sparham (Abhisamayālaṃkāra with Vṛtti and Ālokā, 4 vols., Jain Publishing Company, 2006-2012). It is thanks to his English translation that I found these quotations. However, he incorrectly translates these as saying that the dharma-dhātu is the svabhāva of the dharmas, rather than that the dharmas are the svabhāva of the dharma-dhātu. Since this idea is of considerable importance to our research, I will provide some detail.

Gareth was the first (and still the only) person to translate the two primary Indian commentaries on Maitreya's Abhisamayālaṃkāra into English. This small and concise text outlines the path to Buddhahood buried in the large and diffuse Prajñāpāramitā sūtras. Because it gives the whole path to Buddhahood, the Abhisamayālaṃkāra (in Tibetan translation) became the most widely studied text in Tibet. Because of the complexity of this path, the Abhisamayālaṃkāra became the most commented on text in Tibet. Gareth has also translated Tsong kha pa's extensive commentary on it, titled Golden Garland of Eloquence. Gareth's long study of the Abhisamayālaṃkāra and the path it teaches, first with Tibetan lamas from Tibetan texts, and then later from the original Sanskrit texts, has allowed him to translate this complex material into English for us. One must know the technicalities of the system before the texts are comprehensible. One cannot just pick up a text and expect to comprehend it. So we are fortunate to have access to this material through his translations. But of course, in dealing with this vast material, small mistakes are easily made and are to be expected.

Haribhadra's statements usually use the compound, dharma-dhātu-svabhāvatayā, or dharmā-dhātu-svabhāvatvāt. The suffixes -tā and -tva, basically meaning “-ness” or “-hood,” are very often used in Sanskrit as a quick substitute for the finite verb meaning “is” or “are.” When declined in the instrumental or ablative cases, -tayā or -tvāt, as they are here, they mean “because [something] is [such and such],” more literally, “by being . . .,” or “due to being . . .” These compounds are usually straightforward. Here we have simple tatpuruṣa or case relation compounds. In these, the genitive case ending, meaning “of,” must be supplied for dharmā-dhātu. This gives us “the inherent nature (svabhāva) of the dharmā-dhātu.” The declined suffixes -tayā or -tvāt then give us “because [they, i.e., dharmas] are the inherent nature of the dharmā-dhātu.” This is, by the way, fully supported by the Tibetan translations, which supply the elided case endings for these tatpuruṣa compounds. They give chos kyi dbyings kyi ngo bo nyid, supplying the genitive case ending “kyi.”

In order to reverse this meaning, and get that the dharmā-dhātu is the inherent nature of the dharmas, one would have to take this compound as a bahuvrīhi, an adjective. This is apparently what Gareth did. However, this cannot be done. First, since the -tā or -tva suffixes already say that something “is” something, one would not expect these compounds to be bahuvrīhis or adjectives. Second, as a bahuvrīhi or adjective, it must agree in gender and number with the word it modifies. If it describes the dharmas, these words must agree; but they do not. What we have is dharmas in the masculine genitive plural, dharmāṇām (or rūpādīnām), while the compound ending in -tayā is feminine singular and the compound ending in -tvāt is neuter singular. If this compound was a bahuvrīhi or adjective (which it is not), it could be translated as “they whose svabhāva is the dharmā-dhātu,” or “having the dharmā-dhātu as svabhāva.” This is apparently how Gareth got his translations. The Tibetan translations also rule this out. To take this compound as a bahuvrīhi or adjective means to take the underlying compound as a karmadhāraya rather than as a tatpuruṣa, while the Tibetan translations show it as a tatpuruṣa.

This phrase, dharmāṇām dharmā-dhātu-svabhāvatayā (or -svabhāvatvāt), means literally, “of the dharmas, because of the being the inherent nature of the dharmā-dhātu.” This, in English, is a very convoluted way of saying, “because the dharmas are the inherent nature of the dharmā-dhātu.” This Sanskrit phrasing is very common, especially in prose commentaries on verse works. It was not until years into my Sanskrit studies (mostly reading verses) that I figured out how to translate this prose phrase. No Sanskrit textbook known to me explains it. To get idiomatic English, one must take the word declined in the genitive case as the subject, take the -tā or -tva suffix as the verb “is/are,” place the “because” at the very beginning (given at the very end of the Sanskrit by the instrumental or ablative case ending), and then bring in what the -tā or -tva suffix is attached to. Thus, “because (instrumental “ayā” of “ā”) the dharmas (dharmāṇām) are (-tā) the inherent nature of the dharmā-dhātu (dharmā-dhātu-svabhāva).” This also works when the word having the -tā or -tva suffix is declined in the nominative rather than the instrumental or ablative cases. One merely leaves out the “because.” Thus, rūpādīnām mahattā: literally, “of form, etc., [there is] greatness”; idiomatically, “form, etc., are (-tā) great.” When the “subject” in the genitive case is not stated, one may supply a pronoun, “it” or “they.” Thus, dharmā-dhātu-svabhāvatvāt: “because it is (or they are) the inherent nature of the dharmā-dhātu.”

Besides the instrumental -tayā and the ablative -tvāt, we also have the suffix -tva declined in the instrumental case, -tvena. In theory -tvena should have the same meaning as the instrumental -tayā (and the ablative -tvāt), “because (it/they) is/are,” but in practice -tvena more often means “as being” (or simply, “as”). Sometimes a phrase using -tvena is found along with a phrase using -tvāt. Then the -tvena phrase may be subordinated to the -tvāt phrase. Thus, sarva-dharmāṇāṃ dharma-dhātu-svabhāvatvena rāgārāga-viviktatvāt: literally, “of all dharmas, as being the inherent nature of the dharma-dhātu, because they are distinct from desire and non-desire.” For idiomatic English, we may place the “because” of the -tvāt phrase first, make the genitive the subject, then insert the subordinate -tvena phrase, and then complete the -tvāt phrase. Thus, “because all dharmas, as being the inherent nature of the dharma-dhātu, are distinct from desire and non-desire.” This explanation of the Sanskrit construction of these phrases is an aside, hopefully useful for Sanskrit students. The translation problem being referred to in this note specifically pertains to the construal of just the compound, not to the construal of the whole phrase.

With the help of Gareth’s translation, I have taken note of nine places in Haribhadra’s text where this statement is made. Here is a listing of these places, along with his translations. My additions are given in double brackets. The single brackets and parentheses are his. His translations are followed by the Sanskrit text, with references to both Unrai Wogihara’s 1932 edition, Abhisamayālaṃkāṛālokā, and to P. L. Vaidya’s 1960 edition, Aṣṭasāhasrikā Prajñāpāramitā. Then given are translations that are as literal as I could make them in keeping with English idiom, so that the Sanskrit text can be more easily followed and compared.

1. Sparham, vol. 1, p. 304: “And why? Subhūti says, Because a Bodhisattva is as boundless as form, etc., is boundless. Based on the maxim, ‘There is no dharma over and above the dharma element [[dharma-dhātu]],’ just as the dharma element is boundless, so too is the form [skandha], etc., that has that for its essential nature [[svabhāva]] boundless.” Sanskrit, Wogihara p. 110, lines 3-4, Vaidya p. 323, line 1: . . . dharma-dhātuvat tat-svabhāvi-bhūtānāṃ yasmād rūpādīnāṃ aparyantatayā bodhisattvāparyantatā . . . Reigle: “. . . like the dharma-dhātu, because form, etc., which are its inherent nature (svabhāva), are boundless, bodhisattvas are boundless . . .” (I have not translated yasmād here, because it correlates with tasmād later in the sentence).

2. Sparham, vol. 2, p. 124: “Here [Maitreya] is saying that form and so on [[the dharmas]] are great because the Dharma Element [[dharma-dhātu]] is their final nature (svabhāva).” Sanskrit, Wogihara p. 176, line 3, Vaidya p. 349, line 15: etad uktam | rūpādīnāṃ dharma-dhātu-svabhāvatayā mahattā. Reigle: “This is what was said: Form, etc. [the dharmas], are great, because they are the inherent nature (svabhāva) of the dharma-dhātu.”

3. Sparham, vol. 2, p. 130: “[Maitreya] is saying [the gods say a Bodhisattva] standing in that [Perfection of Wisdom] is certain that the form [skandha] and so on with the Dharma Element [[dharma-dhātu]] as its essential nature [[svabhāva]] is the Tathāgata.”

Sanskrit, Wogihara p. 182, lines 11-12, Vaidya p. 351 lines 15-16: etad uktam | prajñā-pāramitāyāṃ sthitasya vastuno dharma-dhātu-svabhāvatayā rūpādīnāṃ tathāgatatvādvadhāraṇam iti. Reigle: “This is what was said: For something established in the Perfection of Wisdom, tathāgatahood (buddhahood) is ascertained, because form, etc., are the inherent nature (svabhāva) of the dharma-dhātu.”

4. Sparham, vol. 2, p. 134: “[Maitreya] is saying [the gods are saying] that all dharmas have the Dharma Element [[dharma-dhātu]] as their essential nature [[svabhāva]], . . .” Sanskrit, Wogihara p. 185, lines 21-23, Vaidya p. 353, lines 10-11: etad uktam | dharma-dhātu-svabhāvatayā prajñā-pāramitāyāṃ sthitasya bodhisattvasya sarva-dharmāṇāṃ nodgraha-tyāga-bhāvanādikam iti. Reigle: “This is what was said: For a bodhisattva established in the Perfection of Wisdom there is no cultivation, etc., of the taking up or abandoning of all dharmas, because they are the inherent nature (svabhāva) of the dharma-dhātu.”

5. Sparham, vol. 2, p. 241: “. . . a wholesome root . . . and has the same own-being [[svabhāva]] because its own-being is the Dharma Element [[dharma-dhātu]].” Sanskrit, Wogihara p. 350, lines 23-25, Vaidya p. 391, lines 18-19: . . . dharma-dhātu-svabhāvatvāt tat-svabhāvam. Reigle: “. . . [has] the inherent nature (svabhāva) of that, because it is the inherent nature (svabhāva) of the dharma-dhātu.”

6. Sparham, vol. 3, p. 138: “He means that in true reality form, etc., its sign, and its own-being [[svabhāva]] are the Dharma Element, and the practice that therefore does not conceive, etc., of them enables [Bodhisattvas] to gain non-conceptual practice and not construct [or conceive of] powers that are ‘unthinkable,’ i.e., beyond thought.” Sanskrit, Wogihara p. 479, lines 1-2, Vaidya p. 425, line 8: tattvato dharma-dhātu-rūpatvād rūpādi-tan-nimitta-tat-svabhāvāvikalpanādi-pratipatti-sāmarthyena . . . Reigle: “In reality, because it is the form of the dharma-dhātu, through the capability of the practice of non-conception, etc., of form, etc., which are the sign of that and the inherent nature (svabhāva) of that, . . .”

7. Sparham, vol. 4, p. 196: “All dharmas have the Dharma Element for their own-being [[svabhāva]], [i.e., essential nature], so you cannot get at any other different suchness dharma. Since this is the case, ultimately, no one stands in suchness.” Sanskrit, Wogihara p. 859, lines 14-16, Vaidya p. 517, lines 14-15: dharma-dhātu-svabhāvatvāt sarva-dharmāṇāṃ tathatā-vyatiriktānya-dharmānupalambhe sati naiva kaścit paramārthatas tathatāyāṃ sthāsyati. Reigle: “Because all dharmas are the inherent nature (svabhāva) of the dharma-dhātu, there being no perception of other dharmas distinct from suchness, no one ultimately will stand in suchness.”

8. Sparham, vol. 4, p. 228: “To remove the conceptualization of a nominal (prajñapti) being, [they should meditate] on the fact that, because all dharmas have, in their original nature, the Dharma Element as own-being [[svabhāva]], they are isolated from a shared or specific place.” Sanskrit, Wogihara p. 898, lines 4-5, Vaidya p. 527, lines 27-28: sattva-prajñapti-vikalpa-nirāsārtham sarva-dharmāṇāṃ prakṛtyā dharma-dhātu-svabhāvatvena sāmānya-viśiṣṭa-deśa-viviktatvāt. Reigle: “This is for the sake of removing the conceptualization of the designation of a being, because all dharmas, as naturally being the inherent nature (svabhāva) of the dharma-dhātu, are distinct from a common or specific place.”

9. Sparham, vol. 4, p. 229: “To remove the conceptualization of attachment, [they should meditate] on the fact that all dharmas are isolated from attachment and non-attachment because they have as their own-being [[svabhāva]] the Dharma Element.” Sanskrit, Wogihara p. 898, lines 20-21, Vaidya p. 528, lines 2-3: sakti-vikalpa-nirāsārtham sarva-dharmāṇāṃ dharma-dhātu-svabhāvatvena rāgārāga-viviktatvāt. Reigle: “This is for the sake of removing the conceptualization of attachment, because all dharmas, as being the inherent nature (svabhāva) of the dharma-dhātu, are distinct from desire and non-desire.”

Note: I sent this to Gareth before posting it, and he very graciously encouraged me to go ahead and post it.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, March 16th, 2012 at 10:20 PM

Title: Re: gzhan stong and Great Madhyamaka

Content:

Tom said:

Here it says that abhūta parikalpa is the dependent nature, not imagined nature which is said to correspond to the object.

Malcolm wrote:

Correct. The "imagination of the unreal" is a single entity. However it contains content i.e. the unreal.

Some people seem to think that that it ought to be translated as "unreal imagination", as if the imagination itself in question is unreal. I do not think this is correct. Unreal is not an adjective of the imagination.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 15th, 2012 at 5:27 PM

Title: Re: gzhan stong and Great Madhyamaka

Content:

Tom said:

It seems to contradict verse 1:5.

Malcolm wrote:

I don't see how.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 15th, 2012 at 10:05 AM

Title: Re: gzhan stong and Great Madhyamaka

Content:

Tom said:

Why do you divide these two components into the real and unreal? I can't see this in the text.

Malcolm wrote:

The imagination of the unreal exists.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 15th, 2012 at 7:09 AM

Title: Re: gzhan stong and Great Madhyamaka

Content:

Tom said:

Just to be clear in "1) The imagination is the dependent." you mean imagination of the unreal "abhūta parikalpa," not imagination "parikalpita svābhava", yes?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes.

Tom said:

I only ask because of the context of the next verse (1:5).

Also, given verse 1:9 how do you conclude that the ālayavijñāna is equated with the imagination of the unreal?

Malcolm wrote:

Verse nine describes the imagination (the ālayavijñāna) of the unreal (the other seven consciousness).

You seem to think that all eight are the unreal. This is not the intention of 1:8-9.

Tom said:

Are you translating from the Tibetan? or are you using someone else's translation?

Malcolm wrote:

I generally translate directly from Tibetan, if not I give citation of source.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 15th, 2012 at 4:55 AM

Title: Re: Veganism

Content:

Namdrol said:

Not better, just different. Native Americans heavily altered the environment of North America to suit themselves.

gregkavarnos said:

Better and different. If one compares the environment, and the human life styles impact on it, in Europe to those in North America in the period prior to the full scale invasion and some time into it, you would be hard pressed not to consider them better, superior, more sustainable, less destructive, etc...

Malcolm wrote:

You forget that when Europeans first came to New England, Columbus had already introduced most of the western diseases that had completely depopulated North America by 90 percent, according to some estimates.

And, you forget the Mayans basically destroyed their civilization through not understanding environmental limitations.

You are basically making an argument that stone-age is better than copper or iron age. In reality, Indians loved guns. Couldn't get enough of them. Much better than arrows. More efficient at bagging game. If NA has not been depopulated by smallpox and so on, I think we would have a very different assessment of what kind of an impact Indians had on the land.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 15th, 2012 at 1:13 AM

Title: Re: Why the Buddha banned booze.

Content:

Dechen Norbu said:

Does he say why?

(I think the teacher who said the comment I alluded to earlier was Dzongsar Khyentse Rinpoche, but as I'm not 100% sure...)

Malcolm wrote:

For integration.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 14th, 2012 at 10:56 PM

Title: Re: Why the Buddha banned booze.

Content:

catmoon said:

I do have to wonder though, if alcohol consumption was a regular thing in the very early Sangha, how on earth did they manage to meditate? A couple of drinks and I'm out of the meditation game for 24 hours. Four or five and I'm out for 3 or 4 days.

Dechen Norbu said:

There are people who meditate very well after a sip. Not my case either. I can't even convince myself to drink a glass of red wine during meals, even if I know it would be great for my health. I get very lazy only by drinking a little.

Still, there was a teacher who even said that meditation went better after a martini (a small glass of vermouth... but I'm sure it doesn't matter), perhaps because some people tend to be very uptight when they start their formal practice (too much formality perhaps). But that comment was made in a specific context and under particular conditions. So it's better not to generalize it.

Malcolm wrote:

Dudjom Rinpoche recommends in one retreat manual that one should have a drink every day while in retreat.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 14th, 2012 at 9:58 PM

Title: Re: Veganism

Content:

gregkavarnos said:

But the topic of this discussion was their relationship to the animals they hunted and consumed (and if we stretch it a bit, to their environment in general). It would be very difficult to convince me that it was not (and still is to a degree) infinitely better than European attitudes and relationships.

Malcolm wrote:

Not better, just different. Native Americans heavily altered the environment of North America to suit themselves.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 14th, 2012 at 12:55 AM

Title: Re: Why the Buddha banned booze.

Content:

gregkavarnos said:

PS I do not consider wine with meals covered.

Can we stretch this one to cover beer and crisps or whiskey and peanuts?

Malcolm wrote:

Of course. That depends on one's capacity.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 14th, 2012 at 12:53 AM

Title: Re: Bentinho Massaro - Is he there in a dzogchen sense?

Content:

gregkavarnos said:

I think the mods have dealt quite well with a variety of individuals that come here merely to stir trouble.

Namdrol said:

I doubt that Jax has come here for the purpose of causing trouble. I don't agree with how he discusses the teachings and his point of view seems perennialist -- he does not strike me as a "troublemaker" per se.

N

Mr. G said:

Namdrol, are you saying you think he should not have been banned? If so, do you have suggestions on how to best objectively qualify in the future whether a member should, or should not be banned? To me, his claims of accomplishing the result of gtum mo, lack of respect towards his own Dzogchen teachers, repeatedly openly discussing the specifics of inner practices involving channels, gazing, etc., and bizarre statements blending advaita, Dzogchen and Gnostic teachings had me label him as a disruptive troll. Was I too quick to act? Is there better criteria to be used in the future?

Malcolm wrote:

I am not going to second guess the admin's decisions.

However, what he said regarding Gnostic blah blah blah has been said by John Reynolds.

As far as lack of respect of his teachers goes, that is his problem, not ours.

As far as talking about the specifics of thögal openly, this is not the correct way -- but it was corrected.

We have many people who say strange things here. It is to be expected. I think the main thing that bothered people was that he does not care about lineage and that he has some odd ideas about transmission.

So, whether you choose to readmit him or not, I think that most of what you outline above is not really something we ought to ban people for.

Most of us here understand the right way. We also do not want a repeat of E-Sangha.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 13th, 2012 at 11:54 PM

Title: Re: Why the Buddha banned booze.

Content:

Seishin said:

Are we talking about for monastics only?

Huseng said:

The five lay precepts include a prohibition on alcohol as well, so yes it includes everyone, not just monastics.

Malcolm wrote:

The point in general is intoxication, not alcohol. I do not consider wine with meals covered.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 13th, 2012 at 8:48 PM

Title: Re: Bentinho Massaro - Is he there in a dzogchen sense?

Content:

gregkavarnos said:

I think the mods have dealt quite well with a variety of individuals that come here merely to stir trouble.

Malcolm wrote:

I doubt that Jax has come here for the purpose of causing trouble. I don't agree with how he discusses the teachings and his point of view seems perennialist -- he does not strike me as a "troublemaker" per se.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 13th, 2012 at 8:43 PM

Title: Re: Censorship on This Forum

Content:

Jacks said:

Debate has the function of bringing out unsupported notions that can't survive the light of day. More importantly, great debate can be lots of fun!

Malcolm wrote:

Well for example, your notion that Dzogchen is an affirming negation turns out to be completely unsupported by the primary texts of the system. But that does not require debate, that merely requires reading the texts themselves.

In general, we find that in many Dzogchen texts the twin terms dgag and sgrub are used -
- dgag means to refute, sgrub means to prove. The essence of debate is refutation and proof, rejecting one point of view and accepting another point of view. But in reality, as Rongzom Chozang points out, the state of Dzogchen is beyond both refutation and proof. This is why I continue to insist that it is waste of time to debate about Dzogchen.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 13th, 2012 at 8:29 PM

Title: Re: Censorship on This Forum

Content:

Jinzang said:

Debate is just conceptual grasping itself.

Then spending time on forums is a waste, yes?

Malcolm wrote:

No, not necessarily. But I find debate singularly unproductive.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 13th, 2012 at 8:01 PM

Title: Re: Censorship on This Forum

Content:

Rudra said:

Vigorous Dzogchen debate is encouraged and taught in the Bon tradition.

Malcolm wrote:

Perhaps, but in IMO debate about Dzogchen is really a waste of time. Debate is just conceptual grasping itself.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 13th, 2012 at 7:55 PM

Title: Re: Censorship on This Forum

Content:

Rudra said:

There seems to be a belief that by refining one's intellectual understanding of Dzogchen terminology that one can build a stairway to Rigpa through conceptual grasping.

Malcolm wrote:

No one has this belief. Everyone here understands that the real knowledge of Dzogchen is based on personal experience.

I don't know why you were banned, but it might be because of saying things like "fundamentalist Taliban intellectuals".

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 13th, 2012 at 7:49 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen Community of Chogyal Namkhai Norbu

Content:

asunthatneversets said:

Would you say the translation you just posted above is most accurate? (I assume you would be saying that I'm sure you translated it)

Malcolm wrote:

IN general, yes. My translation of the passage is based on Vimalamitra's commentary of the passage in question, which apart from one error pointed out above, is perfectly fine.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 13th, 2012 at 2:49 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen and Neo-Advaita

Content:

Jnana said:

Yeah. And what's even more hilarious is arguing over poetry!!!

Malcolm wrote:

Dzogchen texts are not poetry. This is a common misunderstanding.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 13th, 2012 at 1:22 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen and Neo-Advaita

Content:

Adamantine said:

...

Malcolm wrote:

Sorry, I made a translation error -- this is from an old, unedited translation I have not re-examined. The passage should be read:

"Since neither of those exist [i.e. samsara or nirvana], one understands that the originally pure vidyā [rig pa] which apprehends the basis and the vidyā of insight, the chains, do not exist other than being mere designations...

(My bad I don't usually trot out unedited translations without checking them to see if they are free of errors)

The passage is trying to state that all of these discussions are merely nominal. This is why Longchenpa, Jigme Lingpa and others state over and over the intention of Dzogchen and the intention of Madhyamaka are the same.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 13th, 2012 at 1:13 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen and Neo-Advaita

Content:

Adamantine said:

I have to admit I am a bit confused too, even considering the context..that is if we are holding it to standards of logic as opposed to a type poetic allusion.

Unless it is trying to say that "existence" only makes sense when contrasted with non-existence.. and since there is nothing apart from pure vidya and vidya of insight therefore there is no "existence" of vidya per se.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 13th, 2012 at 12:49 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen Community of Chogyal Namkhai Norbu

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

it says "since there is nothing but X1 and X2, X does not exist" how does that make sense semantically?

Malcolm wrote:

You are being myopic:

Here is the passage Vimalamitra is commenting on:

There is no object to distinguish in me, the view of self-originated wisdom; it did not exist before, it will not arise later, and also does not appear in anyway in the present. The path does not exist, action does not exist, traces do not exist, ignorance does not exist, thoughts do not exist, mind does not exist, prajñā does not exist, samsara does not exist, nirvana does not exist, vidyā itself does not even exist, totally not appearing in anyway.

Context, context, context.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 12th, 2012 at 11:51 PM

Title: Re: Dzogchen Community of Chogyal Namkhai Norbu

Content:

Namdrol said:

Vimalamitra's final paragraph on this passage states:

"Since neither of those exist [i.e. samsara or nirvana], since one understands that there nothing apart from the originally pure vidyā [rig pa] which apprehends the basis and the vidyā of insight which apprehends the chains, it [vidyā] also does not exist. Since the essence of vidyā does not exist, the vidyā of the perduring basis (the source of both energy [rtsal] and qualities, and also the apprehender of characteristics) does not exist.

gad rgyangs said:

Hi N - I'm having trouble with this paragraph: the translation appears to be saying " since there (is)* nothing apart from pure vidya and vidya of insight, vidya does not exist." On the face of it, this makes no sense.

*Im assumng this word was left out accidentally?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, there is a a typo.

And the passage makes perfect sense.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 12th, 2012 at 11:16 PM

Title: Re: Dzogchen and Neo-Advaita

Content:

samdrup said:

Hey M,

You missed the main event Banned maybe? Don't know.

S.

Malcolm wrote:

Oh? What was the main event?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 12th, 2012 at 11:15 PM

Title: Re: Dzogchen and Neo-Advaita

Content:

Jinzang said:

The real difference between Advaita and Madhyamika is that what Advaita takes to be an inexpressible something Madhyamika explains as the absence of anything determinate.

gad rgyangs said:

comparing advaita and madhyamaka is apples and oranges. comparing advaita and dzogchen or shentong is more interesting. I wonder if Shakya chokden, Mipham, Kongtrul, Kalu Rinpoche or Dudjom Rinpoche came here they would be attacked for being "crypto vedantins" and banned.

Malcolm wrote:

First, Mipham was not a gzhan stong pa, though he was very interested in rennovating Yogacara and reintrepreting (unsuccessfully, IMO) it in a madhyamaka manner.

Dudjom Rinpoche was basically a follower of Kongtrul's modernized gzhan stong which owes more to Shakya Chogchen than Dolbuba.

Even here, the vast majority of modern gzhan stong pas claim that it (gzhan stong) is a post-meditative intepretive scheme not used in meditation. They claim that in meditation there their view is the same as what they describe as rang stong.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 12th, 2012 at 10:47 PM

Title: Re: Dzogchen Community of Chogyal Namkhai Norbu

Content:

Jax said:

You are Being.

Namdrol said:

This is not Dzogchen. This is Neo-Advaita.

Jax said:

Ok... you are not Being? If Dzogchen is a "confirming negation", which it is, then there is affirmative existence regarding Rigpa. This is the difference between Madhyamaka and Dzogchen. Madhyamaka is a "non-confirming negation", leaving us just with emptiness. Hence Madhyamaka is a different result. Vajrasattva means Diamond Being. It is not about neo-advaita or Taoism... its about what we are. We are Aware Emptiness in full integration with our equally empty, yet appearing Luminosity.

Malcolm wrote:

What makes you think Dzogchen is a affirming negation?

This is not the case. Dzogchen does not have a view to support or promulgate, and that is what affirming negations are for i.e. rejecting one thing in order to prove one's own perspective. By asserting that Dzogchen is asserting an affirming negation you are rendering Dzogchen inferior to Madhyamaka.

If Dzogchen is an affirming negation, than this statement from the Unwritten Tantra makes no sense:

“Apparent yet non-existent retinue, listen well! There is no object to distinguish in me, the view of self-originated wisdom; it did not exist before, it will not arise later, and also does not appear in anyway in the present. The path does not exist, action does not exist, traces do not exist, ignorance does not exist, thoughts do not exist, mind does not exist, prajñā does not exist, samsara does not exist, nirvana does not exist, vidyā itself does not even exist, totally not appearing in anyway.”

Vimalamitra's final paragraph on this passage states:

"Since neither of those exist [i.e. samsara or nirvana], since one understands that there nothing apart from the originally pure vidyā [rig pa] which apprehends the basis and the vidyā of insight which apprehends the chains, it [vidyā] also does not exist. Since the essence of vidyā does not exist, the vidyā of the perduring basis (the source of both energy [rtsal] and qualities, and also the apprehender of characteristics) does not exist.

Since the wisdom appearances of people's own vidyā that are seen in personal experience are not established as entities of any kind, it is the appearance of the exhaustion of dharmatā."

Further, Vimalamitra states in The Lamp Summarizing Emptiness:

Now then, the emptiness of dharmatā: natural dharmatā is the emptiness of the non-existence of a primal substance. Thus, all appearances were never established according to the eight examples of illusion. When appearances spread, that basis of the emptiness of dharmatā does not shift whatsoever, never transcending the emptiness of dharmatā. Furthermore:

Everything arose from non-arising;
even arising itself never arose.

Dharmatā in and of itself is empty without a basis, present at all times as the single nature of the great emptiness of the basis, path, and result. Furthermore, primordial emptiness is empty without beginning. [180]

Empty things are empty by nature.

Since the emptiness of dharmatā is present without being contrived and without being transformed in the basis, yogins are also liberated by remaining naturally without contrivance and without transformations.

And:

"That dharmatā emptiness dwells in a fortress and is captured in a fortress: the fortress (that is like a circle of spears in the sky) encircles (without a beginning or an end) dharmatā, i.e., existence is dharmatā, non-existence is dharmatā, both are dharmatā and neither are dharmatā. As such, [dharmatā] is surrounded by the names “clear and unclear”, “empty and not-empty”, “existence and non-existence”, “permanence and annihilation”, and so on. That lack of finding evidence itself is dharmatā. Further, in reality nothing exists apart from dharmatā. That being the case, that emptiness (as a mere representation, baseless, and non-referential, being non-existent like a pretense) is understood with scripture, accepted by reasoning, proven by argument, and captured in a fortress. Be confident that dharmatā is the unmistakable true emptiness.

Therefore, to describe Dzogchen as an affirming negation does not make any sense at all.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, March 10th, 2012 at 8:22 PM

Title: Re: Dzogchen Community of Chogyal Namkhai Norbu

Content:

Jax said:

You are Being.

Malcolm wrote:

This is not Dzogchen. This is Neo-Advaita.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, March 10th, 2012 at 6:28 PM

Title: Re: rigpa != presence ?

Content:

Sönam said:

Is there not a notion of knowledge in being present? ... instant presence is a knowledge, isn't it?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, it is.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, March 10th, 2012 at 2:31 PM

Title: Re: What is the Point of Tögal?

Content:

Pema Rigdzin said:

This^ contradicts what the Dzogchen tantras say. the tantras and the commentaries on them give at least 7 ways in which tögal and its realization is superior to trekchod.

Wanna know what they are? Gotta go talk to a Dzogchen master who will explain this at the proper time. Suffice it say that tögal is not some enhancement for trekchod. To the contrary, trekchod enables the knowledge and stability necessary for tögal to work.

Malcolm wrote:

There is no tregchö without tögal, and no tögal without tregchö.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, March 10th, 2012 at 2:16 PM

Title: Re: Origins of Dzogchen

Content:

Jax said:

Ahem... Guys, I didn't hear one word of refutation regarding Sam Van Schaik's and David Germano's attributions of the origins of Dzogchen. Do you know of more scholarly evidence that points to other origins? Or is this topic taboo to the "true believers" in the mythological stories regarding Dzogchen's origins?

Malcolm wrote:

There is nothing to refute. They are text critical historians -- their job is to figure out when a certain idea was first documented on a piece of paper. The inferences they draw from that however should not be regarded as gospels themselves. Western scholarship is all fine and dandy, but it does not lead one to understand what is a valid teaching and what is not.

Dzogchen tantras are intrinsically valid irrespective if they were written in the eighth century, the first aeon, or the twenty first century, they do not need the confirmation of this or that western scholar's opinion. They express the awakened state of persons such as Garab Dorje, Manjushrimitra, Vimalamitra, Rigzin Godem, ChNN, KDL, etc.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, March 10th, 2012 at 2:05 PM

Title: Re: rigpa != presence ?

Content:

Sönam said:

Not to forget that Namkhai Norbu itself has choose to translate rigpa by "presence".

Malcolm wrote:

ChNN sometimes translates it as instant presence, sometimes as knowledge. In fact, Vimalamitra defines fives kinds of vidyā.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, March 10th, 2012 at 12:58 AM

Title: Re: What is the Point of Togal?

Content:

Jax said:

If you read Longchenpa's Precious Seven Treasuries texts, the Lamas overseeing the translation, Chagdud Rinpoche, Tulku Thondup, Mingyur Rinpoche, Khenpo Tsewang Gyatso, Khenpo Gyurmed Tinley, and Lama Sonam Tsering... ALL chose the word "awareness" to be used for Rigpa whenever cited.

Malcolm wrote:

No, actually it was the editorial staff who chose that term. Since I know the senior editor who works on those books quite well, I am quite sure of this.

Jax said:

That is good enough for me. Also Tulku Urgyen often uses the term "awareness" for Rigpa in his dual volume As It Is texts.

Malcolm wrote:

No, that would have been Eric Pema Kunsang. Eric has since decided that "awareness" is not a good equivalent for rigpa.

Jax said:

That would be just translating "vidya" as knowledge from the sanskrit.

Malcolm wrote:

Which is clearly the intent of the term "rigpa"; hence ChNN over and over again defines rigpa (vidyā) as a species of knowledge about one's state as opposed to avidyā, i.e. not knowing that state.

It is best to leave the term either in Tibetan or in Sanskrit.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, March 9th, 2012 at 6:56 PM

Title: Re: Bentinho Massaro - Is he there in a dzogchen sense?

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

when he says "the awareness through which I can say that "I am aware of this sense of self"" this is basically a knowledge of the basis, and therefore, rigpa. (IMO)

Malcolm wrote:

Pity.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, March 9th, 2012 at 6:52 PM

Title: Re: Bentinho Massaro - Is he there in a dzogchen sense?

Content:

padma norbu said:

I see at least 50 people in the retreat photo on his website. At $70 per person per day

Malcolm wrote:

$3500 ($70 x 50 people) per day is a pretty good racket. A labor of love indeed.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 5th, 2012 at 2:29 PM

Title: Re: According to Yogachara...?

Content:

Jinzang said:

Most Nyingma... practitioners hold the view of other emptiness.

Malcolm wrote:

Definitely a huge over statement.

Some Nyingmapas like gzhan stong, not most.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, March 2nd, 2012 at 1:34 PM

Title: Re: Possession

Content:

Konchog1 said:

I read in the paper that a woman with two daughters was suffering from burning pain in her stomach and back, headaches, and anxiety. So Valentines Day, she buys her daughters some presents and the next day she drowns them. Everyone that knew her is stunned by her odd behavior so I was wondering Namdrol, do you think this is a case of possession? By Gyalpo?

Malcolm wrote:

Provocation for sure, not sure what kind.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 1st, 2012 at 3:00 PM

Title: Re: Taking vimala and semde concurrently

Content:

Pema Rigdzin said:

Namdrol,

Would it be OK to take semde in the a.m. and vimala at bedtime?

I ask because nearly a month of taking vimala every night has resolved my anxiety pretty much entirely, but while it's really taken the edge off my depression, it still lingers on.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes. Take semde in the am.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, February 27th, 2012 at 4:30 PM

Title: Re: Arhat From The Perspective Of Mahayana

Content:

Huseng said:

However, some might have suggested that the real cause for rebirth was ignorance with desire being a secondary by-product of that ignorance, in which case the ignorant Arhat, despite having achieved cessation of desire, could still be subject to eventual rebirth regardless.

Malcolm wrote:

But then we have the POV of Vasubandhu that Arhats and Pratyekabuddhas are subject to a non-afflictive ignorance, hence this will not drive rebirth.

Retrogression of Arhats, BTW, just means they return to the state of a never returner, not that they regress to being ordinary beings.

N

Author: Malcolm
Date: Friday, February 24th, 2012 at 11:39 PM
Title: Re: Ground of Being
Content:

heart said:
Exactly, I think that is clear from my quote as well.

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:
yup

Author: Malcolm
Date: Friday, February 24th, 2012 at 11:39 PM
Title: Re: Ground of Being
Content:

heart said:
Exactly, I think that is clear from my quote as well.

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:
yup

Author: Malcolm
Date: Friday, February 24th, 2012 at 10:15 PM
Title: Re: Ground of Being
Content:

heart said:
"Likewise, no ignorance exist in the ground, yet ignorance naturally arise from the aspect of what manifested as compassion."

/magnus

gad rgyangs said:
exactly.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, since that aspect was not recognized, but compassion does not arise as ignorance otherwise, ignorance would be intrinsic to the ground, and it is not. For example, the five lights do not arise as the five elements, but since the display of the basis was not recognized, the five elements are effectively arise through the non-recognition of the five lights.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 24th, 2012 at 4:53 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen, Buddhist and non-Buddhist teachings...

Content:

Dronma said:

Do they sound the same?

Malcolm wrote:

Not at all.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 24th, 2012 at 3:09 AM

Title: Re: Translating the Words of the Buddha

Content:

Karinos said:

I think they do deep revision sutra by sutra (or tantra by tantra) as far as I understood from their page. however you are right about complete revision at the end.

Malcolm wrote:

The thing is for example Conze has become a defacto standard in PP sutra literature. So the translation of Abhisamaalamkara by Spareham largely follows his lead.

So what do we do, retranslate the all these sutras and then make sure that the vast corpus of AA commentary texts use the those sutra passages or what? It is a big question -- that is why my verdict on the thing is only OK.

For example in the tantra they released they translated camphor but did not translate "silha" which is Frankincense and related resins from trees of the Boswellia family. With just a little extra digging they could have sorted that out.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 24th, 2012 at 3:01 AM

Title: Re: Ground of Being

Content:

Unknown said:

Namdrol could you please provide some quotes from where you got this? Looking at Tshigdon Mdzod it seems to me that it is saying that ignorance is not part of the appearances of the base. However I can't find anything that says that ignorance is prior to the appearance but more looks like the opposite (or maybe that they arise at the same time?). What is there to be ignorant about before the appearance of the basis?

Malcolm wrote:

There is no avidyā in the basis, but through non-recognition, avidyā depends on vidyā after the appearances of the basis. This is only possible if the awareness and knowing factor which are complete in the basis are not aware of themselves (which they aren't) That lack of knowledge I argue is a species of non-afflictive ignorance.

Samantabhadra upon the arising of the basis possesses the first two kinds of ignorance but never the third (imputing ignorance).

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 24th, 2012 at 12:07 AM

Title: Re: Translating the Words of the Buddha

Content:

Karinos said:

why would you question quality of translation of team of more then 100 people in the first place?

<http://84000.co/about/translators/> " onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

<http://84000.co/about/team/> " onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

Huseng said:

I can't judge for myself the quality of the translations because I don't know Tibetan. So, I asked Namdrol's opinion as he is a translator of Tibetan with many years experience.

I hope their translations are quality.

Malcolm wrote:

Once the whole thing is translated, a complete revision will be necessary to take into account intertextuality. It is a good first step, but these translations should be regarded as drafts subject to change, as all translation made in the present day should be.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 23rd, 2012 at 9:32 PM

Title: Re: Ground of Being

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

Im also not sure which term from the Dzogchen corpus you are translating as "convention"?

Malcolm wrote:

tha snyad, vyavahara.

This is why, as the rigpa rang shar states, though in Dzogchen there is actually no basis, path and result, nevertheless, we talk about a basis, path and result. Ergo, the basis and the rest are merely conventional, quite in line with Haribhadra's proclamation that the entire path, including buddhahood, is totally illusory.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 23rd, 2012 at 9:05 PM

Title: Re: Translating the Words of the Buddha

Content:

Pero said:

Which Dzogchen texts are in the Kangyur?

Namdrol said:

kun byed rgyal po

Huseng said:

Can you comment on the quality of the English texts being produced in the 84000 project?

Malcolm wrote:

they are ok.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 23rd, 2012 at 9:04 PM

Title: Re: Ground of Being

Content:

Namdrol said:

The basis is merely a convention.

gad rgyangs said:
in what sense, surely not in a madhyamaka sense.

Malcolm wrote:
There basis is not real. Ergo it is merely a convention. If someone should think the basis was real, they would be missing the point of ka dag. The basis is baseless, it is not established in anyway at all.

N

Author: Malcolm
Date: Thursday, February 23rd, 2012 at 8:59 PM
Title: Re: Translating the Words of the Buddha
Content:
Pero said:
Which Dzogchen texts are in the Kangyur?

Malcolm wrote:
kun byed rgyal po

Author: Malcolm
Date: Thursday, February 23rd, 2012 at 6:32 PM
Title: Re: Ground of Being
Content:
asunthatneversets said:
The basis is a convention isn't it?

gad rgyangs said:
the word "basis" is a convention, the basis is not.

Malcolm wrote:
The basis is merely a convention.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Monday, February 20th, 2012 at 11:36 AM
Title: Re: Ground of Being
Content:

gad rgyangs said:
Longchenpa was a historical personality whose realization is not disputed, and whose actual writings we have intact. Garab Dorje, not so much. Texts attributed to GD are pretty much like texts where Samantabhadra or Vajrasattva is speaking (not that that's a problem or anything).

Malcolm wrote:

Well, that is the difference between you and I -- I pretty much think that Garab Dorje is a historical personality. We have his extant writings.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, February 20th, 2012 at 7:42 AM

Title: Re: Ground of Being

Content:

Sönam said:

But Dzogchen view is not Dzogchen ... how can a point of view express the Base?
Language is his own limitation, sounds can possibly express the Base not concepts?

Sönam

gad rgyangs said:

tell that to Longchenpa, whose mdzod bdun (7 treasures) is devoted to expressing the Dzogchen view in many ways, from technical philosophy to poetry, and runs to ~4300 pages altogether.

Malcolm wrote:

Longchenpa, in most of these works, was attempting to legitimize Dzogchen in the context of scholasticism.

I prefer Garab Dorje.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, February 20th, 2012 at 6:51 AM

Title: Re: Ground of Being

Content:

Namdrol said:

<https://www.dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=48&t=6607&p=78514&hilit=Pralaya#p78514>

Lhug-Pa said:

So then gZhi is translated as Laya, Sthana, or could be translated as both?

Malcolm wrote:

Depends on context.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, February 20th, 2012 at 4:37 AM

Title: Re: Ground of Being

Content:

Namdrol said:

Pay attention to what I said-- "ignorance is not an appearance of the basis".

gad rgyangs said:

If "All phenomena of samsara and nirvana are appearances of the basis". (premise from innumerable texts) and "Ignorance is not an appearance of the basis" (Namdrol).

Therefore: ignorance is not a phenomena of samsara or nirvana. (implication of your claim).

Malcolm wrote:

Your major premise and minor premise don't match. Therefore, the conclusion is faulty.

Further, ignorance is prior to the appearance of samsara and nirvana, correct? Since ignorance is prior to the appearance of the basis, consequently, ignorance is not an appearance of the basis.

Ignorance exists before the basis appears; therefore ignorance is not an appearance of the basis.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, February 20th, 2012 at 1:27 AM

Title: Re: Ground of Being

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

if Namdrol refuses to acknowledge that "all phenomena of samsara and nirvana" are appearances of the basis

Malcolm wrote:

I did not refuse to acknowledge that. Pay attention to what I said-- "ignorance is not an appearance of the basis".

gad rgyangs said:

and insists that ignorance is instead separately based on a kun gzhi which is not itself an appearance of the basis,

Malcolm wrote:

Kun gzhi is a synonym of ignorance.

But, as I said before, it is not appropriate to argue and debate about Dzogchen.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, February 19th, 2012 at 8:51 AM

Title: Re: Are some Buddhists more equal than others?

Content:

Astus said:

The concept of equality is another thing, mostly a legal matter and such.

Namdrol said:

That is not how we Americans view the issue.

kirtu said:

My experience with American's and equality is that while Americans verbally venerate equality

Malcolm wrote:

It's a process. Once the concept of rights caught hold, human beings started to catch up with the idea.

The American concept of rights does not immediately mean that everyone sees the full implications the notion of equal rights or that there is no injustice. But rights are considered inalienable, and the process of our Democracy involves discovering those rights as we go along.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, February 19th, 2012 at 5:23 AM

Title: Re: Ground of Being

Content:

Namdrol said:

Third, sentient beings are part of the appearance of the basis (since they are comprised of the five elements), their ignorance however is not because ignorance does not and cannot belong to the basis. Their ignorance (avidyā) is precisely their lack of knowledge of the nature of the basis (hence ignorance depends on the basis), just as their knowledge (vidyā) is precisely the knowledge of the nature of the basis.

gad rgyangs said:

sentient beings are part of the appearances of the basis, and a sentient being is a consciousness obscured by non-recognition. "the ground of all that arises", "the ground for all phenomena of samsara and nirvana", how many different ways does it need to be said? If ignorance is not a phenomena of samsara, I don't know what is. "It arises as anything at all" - including ignorance, delusion, and confusion, i.e. us sentient beings.

Malcolm wrote:

The basis [gzhi] is not the all-basis [kun gzhi], which is that you are describing here.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, February 18th, 2012 at 9:49 PM

Title: Re: Ground of Being

Content:

muni said:

The methods of correcting/comparing/analysing/rejecting/accepting-tradition by intellectual scholars, what is that regarding nature-dzogchen?

Malcolm wrote:

Potentially useless proliferation divorced from practical experience -- but if it helps someone see their way clear to understanding, then fine, if not, well it is waste of time.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, February 18th, 2012 at 9:48 PM

Title: Re: Ground of Being

Content:

Namdrol said:

ཐུགས་རྗེ་སྤར་པ་ལས་མ་རིག་བ་བྱུང་

Ignorance was produced from an arising that falsely resembles [i.e. ltar as byed khul, not nang bzhin] compassion.

gad rgyangs said:

what justification is there for reading ltar as byed khul?

In any case, you still have not stated what you consider to be the ground of ignorance. is a sentient being part of the appearances of the basis? if so, so is its ignorance. if not, then what is a sentient being in relation to the appearances of the basis?

Malcolm wrote:

As for your first question, it is based on the context of the sentence as well as its grammar.

As for your second question I have explained this, so I am not going to explain it again.

Third, sentient beings are part of the appearance of the basis (since they are comprised of the five elements), their ignorance however is not because ignorance does not and cannot belong to the basis. Their ignorance (avidyā) is precisely their lack of knowledge of the nature of the basis (hence ignorance depends on the basis), just as their knowledge (vidyā) is precisely the knowledge of the nature of the basis.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, February 18th, 2012 at 12:39 PM

Title: Re: Ground of Being

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

are you still maintaing this, and if so, how do you explain it within the context of the quote?

Malcolm wrote:

That does not say that non-recognition is an appearance of the basis i.e.

གཞི་ལ་མ་རིག་པ་ཡོད་པ་ཅང་མ་ཡིན་

Ignorance never [cang ma yin] existed in the basis.

It says:

ཐུགས་རྗེ་མ་ངེས་པ་ལས་མ་རིག་པ་རང་བྱུང་

Ignorance self-originated from the non-ascertainment of compassion.

And:

ཐུགས་རྗེ་ལྟར་ཤར་བ་ལས་མ་རིག་པ་བྱུང་

Ignorance was produced from an arising that falsely resembles [i.e. ltar as byed khul, not nang bzhin] compassion.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, February 18th, 2012 at 12:17 PM

Title: Re: Ground of Being

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

Longchenpa in the tshig don mdzod quotes the Auspicious Beauty Tantra (bkra shis mdzes ldan):

Malcolm wrote:

So what's the problem? this is perfectly clear. You answered your own question.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, February 18th, 2012 at 10:21 AM

Title: Re: Are some Buddhists more equal than others?

Content:

Caz said:

There is no such thing as equality in Samsara and as far as I know Buddhists are still within Samsara.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, that is exactly one kind of equality i.e. being in samsara all sentient beings are equal.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, February 18th, 2012 at 7:06 AM

Title: Re: Are some Buddhists more equal than others?

Content:

Astus said:

Equality requires a mind that sees all as equals.

Malcolm wrote:

No, it doesn't.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, February 18th, 2012 at 3:17 AM

Title: Re: Are some Buddhists more equal than others?

Content:

kirtu said:

Methinks this is not an auspicious beginning

Malcolm wrote:

A reformation of Buddhism is inevitable in its coming to the west, just as the Protestant Reformation was inevitable in Northern Europe.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, February 18th, 2012 at 1:23 AM

Title: Re: Buddhism / Nonduality Influenced Metal Bands

Content:

padma norbu said:

David Tibet, too. That's not his real last name and he may be influenced by Tibetan Buddhism, but he's more of a Crowley/Spare kinda guy. He fronts Current 93

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, yes, yes, and yes.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, February 18th, 2012 at 12:48 AM

Title: Re: Are some Buddhists more equal than others?

Content:

Astus said:

"Therefore a bhikkhu ... should not present himself as equal to, nor imagine himself to be inferior, nor better than, another."

(<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/kn/snp/snp.4.05.irel.html>)

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, and I wish more bhikṣus would recall this.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, February 18th, 2012 at 12:22 AM

Title: Re: Are some Buddhists more equal than others?

Content:

Astus said:

The concept of equality is another thing, mostly a legal matter and such.

Malcolm wrote:
That is not how we Americans view the issue.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Saturday, February 18th, 2012 at 12:17 AM
Title: Re: Ground of Being
Content:

gad rgyangs said:
and the basis of that non-recognition is marigpa and the basis of marigpa is...?

Malcolm wrote:
Ignorance has three causes, essence, nature and compassion. However, as Padmasambhava states in the Khandro Nyingthig (volume I, pg 348)

"Therefore, in that case, the three causes of ignorance are the trio of essence, nature and compassion...Further more, though those three wisdoms above cannot cause delusion, there is the delusion of the condition of ignorance about them. For example, though within the sun there is no basis nor cause for darkness, it is like being blocked by fog in the sky."

Author: Malcolm
Date: Friday, February 17th, 2012 at 11:21 PM
Title: Re: Are some Buddhists more equal than others?
Content:
Huseng said:
This is one thing that might get dropped if Buddhism is really transmitted into the west.

Namdrol said:
And good riddance too.

N

Huseng said:
I've come to have similar sentiments.

But then here in Asia, from India to Nepal to Taiwan, the whole hierarchy thing is ever present. This kind of thing is part of institutionalized Buddhism everywhere in Asia of course, though trying to extract Buddhadharma from it while maintaining the lifeline of a tradition for more than a generation might prove difficult.

I think some monastics might try to justify it by saying it fosters humility or something, but that to me is just contrived and superficial head bowing. Another form of self-grasping and cause for worry about offending someone.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, the problem is that Asians tend to identify their hierarchy _as_ the Dharma. This is one reason I personally find the explicit leveling of hierarchy in Dzogchen so appealing, and why traditionally in Tibet, at any rate, Dzogchen teachings were considered threatening to the hierarchy. If you tell a bunch of folks that ignorant butchers will achieve realization faster than panditas based on instructions that you possess, it is going to shake some things up.

And yes, BTW to your question, the way it stands now is that some Buddhists are more equal than others -- for example, monastics with jobs still get to attend many teachings free of charge, while unemployed lay people are barred entrance. There is a phenomena in Buddhism where monastics correct every threat to their hegemony. This is largely sociological -- in societies where power lay in the hands of the aristocracy, the only way to power for common people is through the ecclesiastical hierarchy.

In societies like ours, where there is no de facto aristocracy, monastic heirarchies become one. In Buddhism in particular there is this notion of a hierarchy of virtue. I do not believe this was the Buddha's intent, however.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 17th, 2012 at 11:02 PM

Title: Re: Are some Buddhists more equal than others?

Content:

Huseng said:

This is one thing that might get dropped if Buddhism is really transmitted into the west.

Malcolm wrote:

And good riddance too.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 17th, 2012 at 10:39 PM

Title: Re: Are some Buddhists more equal than others?

Content:

Huseng said:

In many modern day societies there is at the least the pretence and belief that everyone is equal no matter their status or background.

I think this belief might get transferred over to contemporary Buddhist communities as well to some extent. It wouldn't please people to just outright say that the male monks are chiefly superior followed by the male novices, then female nuns, female novices and following them the laity, even though this is how it is presented on paper. Seating arrangements have always been quite important. Moreover, there is a prescribed hierarchy.

So do we run into a situation where everyone is equal, but some are more equal than others? Wouldn't it just be best to do away with such pretences and consent to the existence of a prescribed hierarchy where male monastics are at the top and laity at the bottom? Or should a monastic have to earn their position of respect from the laity by virtue of wisdom and deeds rather than by putting on robes and formally renouncing?

Malcolm wrote:

Of what use is this proliferation about rank and position?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 17th, 2012 at 10:35 PM

Title: Re: Dzogchen, Buddhist and non-Buddhist teachings...

Content:

catmoon said:

Did you mean to say "cause" instead of consequence?

The idea that Dharma is the cause and Dzogchen the result can't possibly be universal, simply because there are billions of Buddhists who are not Dzogchenpas.

Malcolm wrote:

All Buddhas are Dzogchenpas.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 17th, 2012 at 10:06 PM

Title: Re: Ground of Being

Content:

Namdrol said:

I am not claiming that non-recognition is an appearance of the basis. I never said that, or even implied it. That is your imputation.

gad rgyangs said:

what is there besides the basis and appearances of the basis?

Malcolm wrote:

The non-recognition of that appearance.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 17th, 2012 at 10:01 PM

Title: Re: gzhan stong and Great Madhyamaka

Content:

conebeckham said:

You assume the lack of the false imagination, and specifically the lack of duality, in the dependent is the only thing that parinispanna signifies? That the perfect nature is merely the lack of false imagination?

This would seem to imply that the seeds, or some sort of "contents" of the alaya, would still be present....or do you find all the seeds, habits, etc., would be purified merely by virtue of the lack of false imagination?

Malcolm wrote:

Recognizing the non-existence of the unreal is parinispanna, that is the classical Yogacara presentation of emptiness free from extremes.

How the paths and stages are meditated is a different story. I don't think we can say it is sufficient to merely recognize this fact and then we are finished. This is how the Yogacara scholars are presenting the view of emptiness, which is why for example, the Madhyāntavibhaga gives a presentation of the sixteen emptinesses. If this recognition were sufficient, there would be no purpose for the rest of the treatises which details the 37 bodhipakṣa dharmas and so on.

Anyway, in 1:3-4, Vasubandhu explains MV as follows:

As such, having described the characteristic of the existence and and characteristics of the non-existence of the imagination of the false, now the intrinsic characteristic will be described:

Consciousness appearing as objects, sentient beings, self, and cognitions arise, but its objects do not exist, since they do not exist, it does not exist.

Now then, appearing as objects means whatever appears as a thing such as form and so on; appearing as sentient beings what appears to the five sense organs appearing in the continuums of self and others; appearing as a self is the afflicted mind because the concomitance of confusion and so about a self; appearing as a cognition is the six consciousnesses. "Its objects do not exist means" the appearances as objects, and sentient beings do exist; self and cognitions means mistaken appearances. Since the objects do not exist, also that apprehending consciousness does not exist.

That imagination of the unreal is established because of that, is not as it seems, is not a total non-existent.

As such, however appearances are produced, they are not as they seem; because of the production of mere delusion, are also not totally non-existent.

If it is asked why its total non-existence is not asserted:

Having exhausted that, liberation is asserted.

If it were otherwise, bondage and freedom would not be established, and definitely the afflictive state and complete purification would be repudiated.

There are three points here:

- 1) The imagination is the dependent.
- 2) It is held to exist, but its content does not exist.
- 3) If it is held to be totally non-existent, both samsara and nirvana are impossible because there would be no basis for delusion.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 17th, 2012 at 8:58 PM

Title: Re: Ninth-Consciousness: Who Teaches This?

Content:

Jikan said:

Seems to me that Wonhyo advocated a ninth consciousness on the basis of the Vajrasamadhi sutra (published as Cultivating Original Enlightenment). I know that Wonhyo himself was likely the compiler of that text. I bring it up because I'd like to know if this concept took hold in Korean Buddhism following Wonhyo, or if it was forgotten.

Malcolm wrote:

This sutra is well established to be a Korean composition.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 17th, 2012 at 8:11 AM

Title: Re: Ground of Being

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

if (as you are claiming) appearances of the basis are the basis, and non-recognition is an appearance of the basis, then non-recognition is the basis. this makes no sense, therefore, appearances of the basis are not the basis.

Malcolm wrote:

I am not claiming that non-recognition is an appearance of the basis. I never said that, or even implied it. That is your imputation.

Anyway, Dzogchen is not something to be debated or argued. Learn Tibetan.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 17th, 2012 at 7:38 AM

Title: Re: Ninth-Consciousness: Who Teaches This?

Content:

Lotus_Bitch said:

I see. So this was completely of his own invention then?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 17th, 2012 at 7:37 AM

Title: Re: Ground of Being

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

thats not the basis appearing, otherwise there would be no reason to distinguish basis (gzhi) from appearances of the basis (gzhi snang) and have two terms.

Namdrol said:

And you think this because?

gad rgyangs said:

since the basis is also the basis for non-recognition, it would mean that marigpa would be a characteristic of the basis.

Malcolm wrote:

The basis is the basis for non-recognition. This is why for example, the Rosary of Pearls states:

Though the explanation of the basis of delusion is of many kinds it is natural formation and compassion.

There are three wisdoms of the basis, essence, nature and compassion. The appearance of the basis is the nature and compassion aspect. The "invisible" part of the basis is original purity; but essence, nature and compassion are inseparable. This is why the sgra thal rgyu states:

Other than wisdom dwelling in itself, there is no separation into three modes.

When the basis appears, it was not recognized. That non-recognition however is not a characteristic of the basis because the basis cannot be affected by non-recognition; for example, if one does not recognize someone's face in the crowd, it does not follow necessarily that one's own non-recognition is inherent in the face of the person one should recognize. If it were, that person could never be recognized.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 17th, 2012 at 7:25 AM

Title: Re: Ninth-Consciousness: Who Teaches This?

Content:

Lotus_Bitch said:

[quote="Namdrol"]It seems to be his original contribution. The idea is rejected by Bhavaviveka.

Malcolm wrote:

Was {aramarthas source ffrom any of the sutras?[/quote]

No, this is the reason it was rejected by Bhavaviveka.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 17th, 2012 at 7:16 AM

Title: Re: Ninth-Consciousness: Who Teaches This?

Content:

nirmal said:

The ninth consciousness, emphasized in Tantra, contains all the virtues and potentialities of Buddhahood. When one is Fully Enlightened, this consciousness becomes the totality of wisdom WITHOUT ANY SENSE OF CONSCIOUSNESS.
)

Malcolm wrote:

There is no Buddhist tantra which teaches a "ninth" consciousness. It does not exist.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 17th, 2012 at 7:10 AM

Title: Re: Random question on Chogyam Trungpa

Content:

Nangwa said:

Great username by the way.

Lotus_Bitch said:

Thank you. I came up with it based off a day dream I had at work, about starting a progressive death metal band with female vocals. The songs subject matter would've been based off of the buddhadharma; hence "Lotus"...With the inclusion of female vocals making it "Bitch." This may or may not be offensive to women.

Malcolm wrote:

I guess it is a rather literal translation of Padmadas, "Servant of Padmasambhava".

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 17th, 2012 at 7:01 AM

Title: Re: Ninth-Consciousness: Who Teaches This?

Content:

Lotus_Bitch said:

Does anyone know who or what sect has taught or teaches about the amala-vijnana ("stainless" consciousness?)

As far as I know there was only one individual who taught this; an Indian by the name of Paramartha (499-569.) Also apparently the Nichiren sect teaches this, according to this website I found while doing an internet search of the subject:

<https://www.sgi.org/buddhism/buddhist-concepts/the-nine-consciousnesses.html> Is that a legitimate source for what the Nichiren sect teaches? Because I thought it was based off the Lotus sutra and from reading the Lotus sutra: I didn't see any mention of an amala-vijnana?

Namdrol said:

This is a teaching by the Indian scholar Paramartha who introduced this idea to China. It was never a main stream Indian idea.

Lotus_Bitch said:

Where was the source of this theory? As in where did he learn of this? Or was it something he came up with by himself?

Malcolm wrote:

It seems to be his original contribution. The idea is rejected by Bhavaviveka.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 17th, 2012 at 6:26 AM

Title: Re: Ninth-Consciousness: Who Teaches This?

Content:

Lotus_Bitch said:

Does anyone know who or what sect has taught or teaches about the amala-vijnana ("stainless" consciousness?)

As far as I know there was only one individual who taught this; an Indian by the name of Paramartha (499-569.) Also apparently the Nichiren sect teaches this, according to this website I found while doing an internet search of the subject:

<https://www.sgi.org/buddhism/buddhist-concepts/the-nine-consciousnesses.html> Is that a legitimate source for what the Nichiren sect teaches? Because I thought it was based off the Lotus sutra and from reading the Lotus sutra: I didn't see any mention of an amala-vijnana?

Malcolm wrote:

This is a teaching by the Indian scholar Paramartha who introduced this idea to China. It was never a main stream Indian idea.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 17th, 2012 at 5:25 AM

Title: Re: gzhan stong and Great Madhyamaka

Content:

conebeckham said:

My personal understanding, at this point, subject to change, is that:

1. Yogacara texts do, in fact, assert an "existent."
2. The nature of that "existent" is the Perfect Nature.
3. The existent which is of the perfect nature is the substrate of all consciousnesses, including the ālayavijñāna, as well as all the other consciousnesses.
4. The ālayavijñāna is not the ultimate existent, as it is said to "cease." In the same way, all the other consciousness cease, so none of them can be said to be ultimate, though they are "of" the ultimate, in a sense.

Malcolm wrote:

The ālayavijñāna is the imagination of the unreal.

So we will break it down: the imagination [dependent nature] of the unreal [the imagined nature] exists; however in it duality does not exist [parinispanna].

So when the unreal is removed, what remains is the dependent nature. That is why it is said that the absence of the imagined in the dependent is the perfected.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 17th, 2012 at 4:35 AM

Title: Re: Ground of Being

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

since the basis does not appear, how can it be illusory?

Namdrol said:

The basis does appear. This is why we use the term "gzhi snang".

gad rgyangs said:

thats not the basis appearing, otherwise there would be no reason to distinguish basis (gzhi) from appearances of the basis (gzhi snang) and have two terms.

Malcolm wrote:
And you think this because?

Author: Malcolm
Date: Friday, February 17th, 2012 at 4:09 AM
Title: Re: Ground of Being
Content:
gad rgyangs said:
since the basis does not appear, how can it be illusory?

Malcolm wrote:
The basis does appear. This is why we use the term "gzhi snang".

Author: Malcolm
Date: Friday, February 17th, 2012 at 1:25 AM
Title: Re: Ground of Being
Content:
Namdrol said:
The point of view of Dzogchen, according to Rongzompa, is that all phenomena of samsara and nirvana are completely and totally equivalent with illusions.

gad rgyangs said:
sure but the basis is prior to all phenomena of samsara and nirvana.

Malcolm wrote:
Does not make it any less illusory, does it?

N

Author: Malcolm
Date: Friday, February 17th, 2012 at 1:07 AM
Title: Re: Ground of Being
Content:

gad rgyangs said:
"emptiness" cannot be a substance-noun, it means "the condition of being empty" (OED), agreed? "empty" is an adjective, as in "the glass is empty". you can nominalize this by speaking of "the emptiness of the glass", but this is referring to the fact that the glass is empty, it is not talking about some thing called "emptiness". now, we know that the basis is not some "thing" but rather pure potentiality, "es gibt Sein". Since only conventionalities can be "empty" (since only conventionalities are dependently arisen), and the basis clearly cannot be considered a conventional existent/dependent arising, then what sense does it make to call it "empty" , let alone calling it "emptiness(!)" surely you're not saying that the basis is simply the fact of the lack of svabhava in dependent arisings? now, if you want to posit another definition of "emptiness", fine, but then don't say that Dzoghchen follows prasangika madhyamaka. if you want, you can say it follows "great madhyamaka", as presented by Dudjom R in the Big Red Book.

Namdrol said:

The basis is a convention.

gad rgyangs said:

you mean like saṃvṛiti/kun rdzob?

Malcolm wrote:

In the Great Perfection, Atiyoga, there is no basis, path and result,
nevertheless a basis, path and result is taught.

-- Rig pa rang shar

The point of view of Dzoghchen, according to Rongzompa, is that all phenomena of samsara and nirvana are completely and totally equivalent with illusions.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 17th, 2012 at 12:36 AM

Title: Re: Ground of Being

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

"emptiness" cannot be a substance-noun, it means "the condition of being empty" (OED), agreed? "empty" is an adjective, as in "the glass is empty". you can nominalize this by speaking of "the emptiness of the glass", but this is referring to the fact that the glass is empty, it is not talking about some thing called "emptiness". now, we know that the basis is not some "thing" but rather pure potentiality, "es gibt Sein". Since only conventionalities can be "empty" (since only conventionalities are dependently arisen), and the basis clearly cannot be considered a conventional existent/dependent arising, then what sense does it make to call it "empty" , let alone calling it "emptiness(!)" surely you're not saying that the basis is simply the fact of the lack of svabhava in dependent arisings? now, if you want to posit another definition of "emptiness", fine, but then don't say that Dzoghchen follows prasangika madhyamaka. if you want, you can say it follows "great madhyamaka", as presented by Dudjom R in the Big Red Book.

Malcolm wrote:

The basis is a convention.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 16th, 2012 at 10:46 PM

Title: Re: Ground of Being

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

if you say that the basis is emptiness, you are reifying emptiness and Nagarjuna has pronounced you incurable.

Malcolm wrote:

For those whom emptiness is possible, for them, everything is possible.

For those whom emptiness is not possible, for them, nothing is possible.

--Nāgarjuna

The basis is emptiness aka original purity.

But I would rather be an incurable Dzogchenpa crossing space in a single movement than a myopic follower of some imagined "madhyamaka" that consists of drearily hopping along on one leg, wondering where the other leg had got to.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 16th, 2012 at 10:38 PM

Title: Re: ālayavijñāna--conventional or ultimate existent?

Content:

Mariusz said:

Excuse me, it was not mine:

"

Malcolm wrote:

You are missing the point. The point is that you took fragments of passages from different pages in this book, Middle Beyond Extremes, mixed your own words into them, and did not clearly differentiate any of them. Further, your attempt at citation does not form an argument.

Finally, citing what two nineteenth century Tibetan authors write about a 5th century Indian text gives us no insight at all into what the 5th century Indians might have intended in their own words. This thread is not about what Mipham, Dolbupa, Shenga, Tsongkhapa, Gorampa, Mikyo Dorje, Rangjung Dorje, etc. thought about the issues of the relationship between ālayavijñāna and the dependent nature, it is about what Maitryanatha, Asanga and Vasubandhu and their Indian followers thought. Karl's B's essay I pointed you too does an excellent job of clarifying that in fact the early Yogacaras authors all use the type 1 model of the three natures, the very one gshan stong pas aka (neo) "Yogacara Madhyamakas" term the cittamatra presentation, which Karl B readily admits. This is indisputable. Of course, KB's paper intends to find sources for the gzhan stong view in Early Indian Yogacara, but he fails because it is not there.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 16th, 2012 at 9:42 PM

Title: Re: ālayavijñāna--conventional or ultimate existent?

Content:

Mariusz said:

Also I'm collecting the arguments that show all Buddhism is cohesive and non contradictory in the principle, whatever if sutra or tantra.

Malcolm wrote:

I see, so there is no contradiction between positing partless ultimate atoms and emptiness. Sure.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 16th, 2012 at 10:01 AM

Title: Re: Chogyal Namkhai Norbu Rinpoche Fanboys

Content:

Pema Rigdzin said:

both balls and ovaries"?

Malcolm wrote:

Balls and tits, please.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 16th, 2012 at 9:54 AM

Title: Re: Ground of Being

Content:

Pema Rigdzin said:

That's just how my mind works. For me, the simplest way to sum up why there are no beginnings to anything is to rid myself of the notion of there even being things in an ultimate sense.

Malcolm wrote:

This is a totally unnecessary step. The simplest approach is to recognize that conditioned causes are results and must always themselves have causes. You don't even have to mention emptiness, being, etc. at all. Right?

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 16th, 2012 at 8:02 AM

Title: Re: Ground of Being

Content:

Pema Rigdzin said:

Each and every phenomenon one could ever think of is dependently originated--we impute singular "thingness" onto "things" which are really aggregations of multiple parts and causes and conditions, and each of those parts are likewise aggregations of multiple parts and causes and conditions, ad infinitum... No thing can be found anywhere that exists by the power of its own essence, made up only of itself, with no dependence on anything else. That being the case--that is, since all phenomena depend for their conventional "existence" on our imputing "thingness" and existence onto them--where can one find anything at all to have begin to exist, endured for a time, and then disintegrated?

At the same time, despite this emptiness, where can one find any cause at all that fails to bear a result, and who can be found that doesn't experience samsara as the Buddha said we do?

PadmaVonSamba said:

Well said!

Thats why cause ->"thingness" isn't a valid understanding.

Malcolm wrote:

I don't know why a simple question like this has to be ramped up to the ultimate right away.

There is no ultimate origin for conditioned phenomena. There are no beginnings for conditioned phenomena in general. Right? So bringing complicated discussions about imputations, and emptiness, and so on and so forth don't really answer the question.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 16th, 2012 at 7:41 AM

Title: Re: ālayavijñāna--conventional or ultimate existent?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Further, your habit of mishmashing citations from books is also not very skillful. The fact is that here you have randomly strung together passages from different pages. How can anyone take this as "scholarship"? Why should anyone bother with this type of disorganized presentation?

Mariusz said:

When the false imagination... from Maitreya, Khenpo Shenga and Ju Mipham.

Malcolm wrote:

In short, this is neither from Maitreyanatha, not Mipham, nor Shenga, because you have just randomly strung together bits and peices of texts written and translated by others and added here and there your own words without clearly distinguishing what is what.

Really, get it together, otherwise I am just not going to bother responding to anything you have to say.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 16th, 2012 at 7:26 AM

Title: Re: ālayavijñāna--conventional or ultimate existent?

Content:

Mariusz said:

also an advise no to make the fault of denigrating conventions for Namdrol.

Malcolm wrote:

I really wish you would stop making baseless personal criticisms that have no part in the conversation.

I really cannot see anywhere in this thread where I have even discussed conventions, let alone denigrated them.

This kind of random, off topic remark ruins conversations. Please desist and confine yourself to the topic at hand.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 16th, 2012 at 2:50 AM

Title: Re: ālayavijñāna--conventional or ultimate existent?

Content:

Mariusz said:

You are wrong because you: (2. With respect to the dependent nature, it is empty in the sense that this lack of entity is itself a non-entity, but) for you while nothing exists as imagined, it is the case that wakefulness does not exist.

Malcolm wrote:

Your response is a complete and total non-sequitar. In other words, it does not make any sense.

Also this thread is going wildly off topic due in part to the inability of all respondents to communicate with sufficient discipline.

Therefore, unless it returns to a proper course, I am finished with it.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 16th, 2012 at 2:46 AM

Title: Re: ālayavijñāna--conventional or ultimate existent?

Content:

Lhug-Pa said:

I've been under the impression that Yogacara is basically a term that can refer to either Asanga's Cittamatra or Vasubandhu's Vijnanavada.

In other words, that Chittamatra and Vijnana-vada are distinct, yet are also both considered Yogachara.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, cittamatra is a term used interchangeably with vijñānamatratvada by Mādhyamika authors. The yogacarins referred to themselves as "yogacarins".

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 16th, 2012 at 2:42 AM

Title: Re: ālayavijñāna--conventional or ultimate existent?

Content:

Mariusz said:

And it works compatible with my dzogchen

Namdrol said:

When it comes to Vajrayāna, one's intellectual contrived view is pretty irrelevant.

One's view is delivered through the third and fourth empowerments, and or direct introduction, and is maintained on the basis of that experience in one's practice. So all of this is really just dancing on books. (yawn).

Mariusz said:

Even writing it you unintentionally agree with me: "it" has to be pointed-out only. So the principle is the same even considering Vajrayāna/Dzogchen, let alone Yogacara or Madhyamaka. The difference is only the method.

Malcolm wrote:

Not so fast, sport: there is no "pointing-out" in Madhyamaka. From a Madhyamaka perspective, there is no "pointing-out" since there is nothing to be pointed out. The view in Madhyamaka is strictly a result of intellectual analysis, which one then applies in meditation.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 16th, 2012 at 2:19 AM

Title: Re: Chogyal Namkhai Norbu Rinpoche Fanboys

Content:

tomamundsen said:

The Crystal and the Way of Light is profound as balls.

Malcolm wrote:

```
if (typeof bbmedia == 'undefined') { bbmedia = true; var e = document.createElement('script'); e.async = true; e.src = 'bbmedia.js'; var s =
document.getElementsByTagName('script')[0]; s.parentNode.insertBefore(e, s); } https://phpbbex.com/ [video]
```

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 16th, 2012 at 1:16 AM

Title: Re: ālayavijñāna--conventional or ultimate existent?

Content:

conebeckham said:

I'm in agreement that this is all dancing on books--this being the Academic Discussion forum, of course that's what's done here. But I feel the need to point out that Yogacara was not merely a conceptual philosophy foisted upon us, but was an attempt to make sense of some real meditative experience, originally--or so I think. Also, all these categorizations into 6, 8, 9 or however-many consciousnesses need to be seen as dynamic attempts at explaining experience in a conceptual way, rather than as "positions" one must defend. Then again, maybe this is all inappropriate for the Academic Discussion.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, that is true, it was an attempt to explain the stages of the path. It's complexity has resulted in a lot of difficult discussions over the centuries, especially since for the most part the followers of Asanaga and so on were eclipsed by the more practical Mādhyamikas.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 16th, 2012 at 12:48 AM

Title: Re: Ground of Being

Content:

mint said:

Infinite regression? or beyond infinite regression? (Infinity can seem awfully constraining.)

Malcolm wrote:
Infinite regression.

There are no beginnings.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Thursday, February 16th, 2012 at 12:44 AM
Title: Re: ālayavijñāna--conventional or ultimate existent?
Content:
Mariusz said:
And it works compatible with my dzogchen

Malcolm wrote:
When it comes to Vajrayāna, one's intellectual contrived view is pretty irrelevant.

One's view is delivered through the third and fourth empowerments, and or direct introduction, and is maintained on the basis of that experience in one's practice. So all of this is really just dancing on books. (yawn).

Author: Malcolm
Date: Thursday, February 16th, 2012 at 12:21 AM
Title: Re: ālayavijñāna--conventional or ultimate existent?
Content:

Mariusz said:
Of course here I not consider it as the shentong also. Following Nitārtha Institute I consider it as yogacara not as cittamatra's the narrow interpretation.

Namdrol said:
Only gzhan stong pas maintain there is a difference between Yogacara and cittamatra.

N

Mariusz said:
Namdrol, with all respect you are not the only one who want to back into the source, a "archaeologist" for Madhyamaka. Karl Brunnhölzl in "The Center" discovered for example:

Malcolm wrote:
You should read his article at the Tsadra foundation blog where he substantially revises his position about this.

BTW, I remain committed to my statment. Only gzhan stong adherents maintain there is a distinction between a so called "Yogacara" and what Madhyamakas call "cittamatra"; what they like to term "Great Madhyamaka". This is a simple fact of the intellectual history of Tibetan Buddhism.

If you maintain there is such a distinction, you are a gzhan stong adherent.

Otherwise, please explain to us the difference between this so called "Yogacara" and gzhan stong. But please start another thread to do so. Thanks.

By the way, there is no shame in being a gzhan stong pa -- I simply don't agree that the gzhan stong interpretation of Maitreyanatha, Asanga and Vasubandhu's texts is the correct one. I think that Tsongkhapa's refutation of gzhan stong, as well as Rongston and Gorampa's, is apt and accurate. I think Rendawa's is a little too strongly worded.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 16th, 2012 at 12:11 AM

Title: Re: ālayavijñāna--conventional or ultimate existent?

Content:

Mariusz said:

So as I understand, it is still the middle way, the poining-out the freedom beyond the reference points.

Malcolm wrote:

Both Madhyakamaka and Cittamatra/Yogacara agree that wisdom is free from proliferation (nisprapañca) and free from reference points (anupalambha).

The difference between them is whether this wisdom is held to be ultimately real or not. This the main reason why Candarkirti goes to such great lengths to refute the Yogacara presentation of paratantra very pointedly at 6:72 in Madhyamakāvatara

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 16th, 2012 at 12:03 AM

Title: Re: ālayavijñāna--conventional or ultimate existent?

Content:

Mariusz said:

Of course here I not consider it as the shentong also. Following Nitārtha Institute I consider it as yogacara not as cittamatra's the narrow interpretation.

Malcolm wrote:

Only gzhan stong pas maintain there is a difference between Yogacara and cittamatra.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, February 15th, 2012 at 10:19 PM

Title: Re: Ground of Being

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

So, how can a cause pre-exist everything?

Malcolm wrote:

There was no beginning.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, February 15th, 2012 at 10:14 PM

Title: Re: ālayavijñāna--conventional or ultimate existent?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

When ever I present some text without attributing the authorship of the translation, you may immediately assume the translation is mine.

Mariusz said:

Now from the translation of Khenpo Shenga:

Malcolm wrote:

I assume by "translation" you mean the presentation of Khenpo Shenga's interlinear commentary as translated in the Middle Beyond Extremes (Snow Lion 2006)? Khenpo Shenga himself never translated anything.

The final line of Khenpo Shenga's commentary (which you seem to find at odds with Vasubandhu's statement I cited above) actually says:

ཐམས་ཅད་གཅིག་ཏུ་སྟོང་པ་ཡང་མ་ཡིན་ལ་གཅིག་ཏུ་མི་སྟོང་པ་ཡང་མ་ཡིན་པ་དེ་ནི་དབུ་མའི་ལམ་ཡིན་ནོ།

Though everything is not empty on the one hand, it is also not not empty on other hand. That is the middle way.

While someone might be tempted to see a difference in meaning between Khenpo Shenga's passage and Vasubandhu's original commentary based on the way the Dharmacakra translation committee has chosen to translate this passage, in reality, based on the way Khenpo Shenga wrote the original Tibetan there is no difference in meaning.

I think I should add that Khenpo Shenga was in no way a supporter of gzhan stong and was a staunch supporter of Gorampa. Therefore, he, like Gorampa before him, would have and did consider the Madhyāntavibhāga, the Dharmadharmatāvibhāga and the Mahāyānasutrālaṅkāra cittamātrīn texts.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, February 15th, 2012 at 9:21 PM

Title: Re: Stephen Batchelor - A Critique of "Buddhism Without Beliefs"

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Seem to me that this thread has lost its focus.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, February 15th, 2012 at 9:17 PM

Title: Re: Ground of Being

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

It is an incorrect starting point because in this assumption, "everything" is regarded as some kind of result.

Malcolm wrote:

Everything is some kind of result.

All causes are results, all results can be causes.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, February 15th, 2012 at 9:13 PM

Title: Re: ālayavijñāna--conventional or ultimate existent?

Content:

Namdrol said:

The question ought to be: is the dependent nature ultimate or not in yogacara texts. I think that actually the answer is yes.

N

Mariusz said:

I think that actually the answer is no.

Malcolm wrote:

The answer is yes:

From the Madhyāntavibhagatīka:

As it is said:

"The imagination of the unreal exists,
duality does not exist in that,
emptiness exists in this,
that also exists in that.

Now then, the imagination of the false means the concept of an apprehended object and the apprehending subject. Duality means free from a real apprehended object and an apprehending subject. Emptiness means the imagination of the false being free from a real apprehended object and an apprehending subject. "That also exists in that" means the imagination of the false. As such, that non-existence of something somewhere, that is truly seeing the empty truly just as it is. Whatever remains here, that is understood just as it truly is to exist here. As such, the characteristic of emptiness is demonstrated without mistake.

Not empty and not not empty,
in that way is everything explained,
because of existence, because of non-existence, because of existence, that is the middle path.

"It is not empty" means emptiness and the imagination of the false. "It is not not-empty" means duality i.e. the apprehended object and an apprehending subject. 'Everything' means 'the imagination of the false' is the conditioned and 'emptiness' is the unconditioned. 'Explained' means demonstrated. 'Exists' means the imagination of the false. 'Non-existence' means duality. 'Existence' means emptiness exists in the imagination of the false, and the imagination of the false exists in that too. "That is the middle path" means everything is not only empty.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, February 15th, 2012 at 12:01 PM

Title: Re: Candrakīrti and the ālaya

Content:

cloudburst said:

I personally find it bizarre that no-one has translated Prasannapada or the Avataraḥśya or the Catuḥśatīkā. I suppose patience is the order of the day.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, I agree and it is my personal bitch with Buddhist studies of Madhyamaka, as you know. There is no base line by which we can judge what all these Tibetans are gossiping about in their treatises unless one reads Tibetan and Sanskrit.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, February 15th, 2012 at 11:57 AM

Title: Re: ālayavijñāna--conventional or ultimate existent?

Content:

Huifeng said:

Any sort of academic discussion on the topic of "ālayavijñāna--conventional or ultimate existent?" would have to be text, or text statement, specific.

~~ Huifeng

Malcolm wrote:

Well then make one.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, February 15th, 2012 at 8:57 AM

Title: Re: ālayavijñāna--conventional or ultimate existent?

Content:

conebeckham said:

Reposted, after some editing, as off-topic on the Chandakirit/Alaya thread.

The question is, whether ālayavijñāna is posited to be truly existent, or merely conventionally existent, in Yogacara texts...

Malcolm wrote:

The question ought to be: is the dependent nature ultimate or not in yogacara texts. I think that actually the answer is yes.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, February 15th, 2012 at 8:25 AM

Title: Re: Candrakirti and the ālaya

Content:

conebeckham said:

Cloudburst-

Doesn't it make more sense to "birth" a storehouse consciousness, inherent or not, due to things such as "memories," "habits," etc., than to create the notion of ālayavijñāna as that which is merely the "mental consciousness knowing emptiness?"

Malcolm wrote:

Hi Cone:

The ālaya is emptiness, that is all that is needed for karma to function. No consciousness that stores seeds is required. But consciousness can know that emptiness, this is how Jayananda is glossing things because of the Lanka passage which describes the ālayavijñāna as subtle and deep, and easily mistaken for a self and also the Lanka passage to declares ālayavijñāna is emptiness.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, February 15th, 2012 at 8:21 AM

Title: Re: Candrakirti and the ālaya

Content:

cloudburst said:

Is it your point of view that Buddha did teach the alaya, but that he meant the mental consciousness knowing emptiness? This was misunderstood by yogacharins and the idea of an inherent storehouse consciousness was "born."

Malcolm wrote:

Well, technically the Yogacarins don't really treat the ālayavijñāna as "inherent", since if you read the Mahāyānasamgraha, Asanga clearly maintains that when the seeds are exhausted, the ālayavijñāna ceases to exist. So then the question becomes not so much about the this consciousness, the ālayavijñāna, but paratantra, dependent nature.

These interpretative difficulties are addressed somewhat by Candrakirti in the verses that cover the dependent nature, 47-72.

As to your first question -- definitely this is Jayananda's interpretation. Given the way Candrakirti cites the Lanka to this effect, it is probable that this is Candra's point of view as well, though I would not swear to it. Given that the Buddha of the Lanka also treats the Ālaya as an interpretable doctrine, the Buddha (as presented in this sutra) seems to have presented ālayavijñāna to just a consciousness that apprehends emptiness, but it is not so clearly stated. All the Buddha really says there is that "know that only emptiness is indicated by the [the term] ālayavijñāna".

To really get at the guts of what Candra thinks about this one would need to read the lengthy discussions of both commentaries covering the ground between 47-72.

I am sorry but I will have to spend some serious amount of time with these things before I really can respond any further. But I will. Jayananda has an exhaustive presentation of his perspective on Yogacara that fills his commentary.

Candra sticks more to the his own text.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, February 15th, 2012 at 6:44 AM

Title: Re: Candrakirti and the ālaya

Content:

Namdrol said:

Tibetan madhyamaka/yogacara is more safe than alone translations.

Malcolm wrote:

Both have their hazards.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, February 15th, 2012 at 6:10 AM

Title: Re: Guidance on renunciation

Content:

Nemo said:

Afterwards your job prospects will be shite. You won't even know about movies or sports people are talking about. You will be very soft and not well suited for the competitive world that we struggle in. Your guilelessness will get you into all sorts of trouble. After you may shack up with inappropriate women...

Malcolm wrote:

Glad I am not alone in this experience.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, February 15th, 2012 at 6:01 AM

Title: Re: Ground of Being

Content:

mint said:

If everything has a cause, who/what caused the ground of being (Base)?

Malcolm wrote:

The basis has no cause because it is just emptiness.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, February 15th, 2012 at 5:44 AM

Title: Re: Candrakirti and the ālaya

Content:

conebeckham said:

I don't see how this quote posits an existent Alaya--it posits an existent "luminous mind of dharmata," for sure....but this is not the ālayavijñāna.

Malcolm wrote:

You are totally off-topic. But this is just like saying dirty/clean cloth. The question is where the cloth is real, not whether it is dirty or clean, it's state of being clean or dirty is incidental; the question of its conventional or ultimate existence is not.

BTW. I can only handle so many threads at a time. Looking up answers takes time.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, February 15th, 2012 at 5:39 AM

Title: Re: Candrakirti and the ālaya

Content:

Namdrol said:

What Maitreyanatha, Asanga and Vasubandhu claim is that the dependent nature is real, it exists. However, the dependent nature = the ālayavijñāna. The ālaya is only called the ālaya as long as there are seeds. When these have been eradicated, the ālaya also ceases; but the dependent nature, being an existent, does not.

Mariusz said:

Can I ask two implications please? I cannot find more.

Is it means the dependent nature (gzhan dbang; paratantra) has no seeds at all during its "existence" with or without the ālayavijñāna? Or is it means the dependent nature (gzhan dbang; paratantra) has seeds somehow more subtle than the ālayavijñāna which are still "existent" even after the eradication of the ālayavijñāna?

Malcolm wrote:

It means that while the ālayavijñāna depends on seeds for the name "ālaya", the dependent nature does not depend on seeds for the name "dependent nature". But please, if you want to talk yogacara, start another thread.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, February 15th, 2012 at 4:51 AM

Title: Re: Candrakirti and the ālaya

Content:

cloudburst said:

I am sure you have your reasons as to why you refuse to answer this question post after post. So that we can know that you are not answering just to avoid having to admit that he did teach that, would you kindly answer?

According to you, did Buddha ever teach that there were 8 consciousnesses?

Malcolm wrote:

I did not answer directly because I already mentioned that fact that while svāsaṃvedana is not mentioned in the sutras, ālayavijñāna was. Since I stated that ālayavijñāna was mentioned as something taught by the Buddha, by implication we can understand the other seven were also taught since ālayavijñāna is never taught in absence of the other seven, no?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, February 15th, 2012 at 3:15 AM

Title: Re: Candrakirti and the ālaya

Content:

cloudburst said:

Is it your claim that Buddha never taught that inherent persons exist?

Malcolm wrote:

There are some who thought the Buddha taught such a thing aka the Pudgalavadins. I myself have never seen a sutra statement, for example, in the Pali canon, where the Buddha unambiguously claims there is an ultimate self of the kind proposed by Pudgalavadins.

Namdrol said:

The Buddha never explained anywhere that the self and the aggregates existed ultimately -- who told you he did?

Mipham (I know, you don't care about Tibetans and their points of view.)

Malcolm wrote:

Perhaps you can send me a citation by PM where he says such a thing. To me it seems a little strange and not in accordance with what I have understood about the Buddha's teaching in the Pali canon, etc.

Namdrol said:

Vasubandhu devotes an entire chapter in the Kosha refuting the person, his main Buddhist target being the Pudgalavadins.

This does not indicate that Buddha never taught it, though.

Malcolm wrote:

[/quote]

Vasubandhu shows how the key citations Pudgalavadins use to support their view is misunderstood by them. I suggest you read the Kosha, Chapter nine. If you think the Buddha taught such an ultimate self, or the aggregate(!?) as ultimate, please tell me where.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, February 15th, 2012 at 2:56 AM

Title: Re: Candrakirti and the ālaya

Content:

conebeckham said:

I don't think Vasubhandu claimed the Alaya, per se, "existed" as an absolute

Malcolm wrote:

What Maitreyanatha, Asanga and Vasubandhu claim is that the dependent nature is real, it exists. However, the dependent nature = the ālayavijñāna. The ālaya is only called the ālaya as long as there are seeds. When these have been eradicated, the ālaya also ceases; but the dependent nature, being an existent, does not.

Just to recap -- the classical Yogacara(Maitreyanatha, Asanga and Vasubandhu) model holds that parikalpita is non-existent, but paratantra and parinispāna do exist. The late Indian/gzhan stong interpretation is that parikalpita is non-existent, paratantra is merely conventionally existent, and parinispāna exists, mapping the three natures respectively onto false relative truth, true relative truth and ultimate truth.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, February 15th, 2012 at 1:42 AM

Title: Re: Stephen Batchelor - A Critique of "Buddhism Without Beliefs"

Content:

Huseng said:

Just the finer details of precisely how it was described and taught we are unsure of.

Malcolm wrote:

This is unimportant for the present conversation.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, February 15th, 2012 at 1:33 AM

Title: Re: Stephen Batchelor - A Critique of "Buddhism Without Beliefs"

Content:

Huseng said:

I'm just specifying that due to the differing accounts we can't be so sure about what the Buddha taught.

Malcolm wrote:

I guess I simply do not agree with this perspective. I think we can be very, very, very sure.

Btw, yoru statement above really harms claims you made earlier in this thread citing scriptural authority.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, February 15th, 2012 at 1:06 AM

Title: Re: Stephen Batchelor - A Critique of "Buddhism Without Beliefs"

Content:

Huseng said:

Well, the Vinaya does record what the Buddha said and provides his judgement on various matters. Don't you think that is important?

Malcolm wrote:

The Vinayas record what the Buddha said to different groups of monks in different parts of India. But also, they report differing accounts since these Sanghas were widespread.

Huseng said:

I agree that we have the general teachings and there is no doubt of that (especially in the case of rebirth, karma, dependent origination, etc...), but the finer details vary too much for us to say for sure exactly what was taught.

Malcolm wrote:

General principles are the point in this discussion, no?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, February 15th, 2012 at 1:00 AM

Title: Re: Stephen Batchelor - A Critique of "Buddhism Without Beliefs"

Content:

Namdrol said:

Our record of what the historical Buddha taught is therefore much better than what skeptics would have us believe. And as well, the content of the Pali canon is so homogenous, really, there is no doubt what the Buddha taught. And it was not what Batchelor is teaching as what the Buddha taught.

Huseng said:

One problem that comes to mind, though, is the discrepancies between the various Nikaya and Agama canons that we have. In general the main teachings are the same, but there are discrepancies. For example comparing various Vinayas in Chinese translation I noticed that while the rule might be the same, the finer details of how and why the rule came about differ across multiple editions. For example in the prohibition against alcohol they all say Sugata got drunk and passed out after a party celebrating his placation of a naga, but the details of where he passed out and whether he kicked the Buddha or not are all different when looking at the different editions of the Vinaya.

It doesn't seem like scribal errors to me.

Malcolm wrote:

Who cares about Vinaya (except monks)? The various Vinayas were redacted separately. This is common knowledge even to traditional scholars.

But the sutras, this is a different stories. My point is that there is an internal consistency in early Buddhist teachings of the sutras which is very homogenous and so the intent of the Buddha cannot be doubted.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, February 15th, 2012 at 12:53 AM

Title: Re: Candrakirti and the ālaya

Content:

cloudburst said:

as does the abhidharama where Buddha explained the self and aggregates to exist ultimately.

Malcolm wrote:

The Buddha never explained anywhere that the self and the aggregates existed ultimately -- who told you he did? Vasubandhu devotes an entire chapter in the Kosha refuting the person, his main Buddhist target being the Pudgalavadins.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, February 15th, 2012 at 12:48 AM

Title: Re: Candrakirti and the ālaya

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

I just want to note that I am far more interested in what Candrakirti has to say for himself, and what Jayananda has to say about that; then what Gorampa, or Tsongkhapa or any Tibetan scholar has to say about them from here on out.

Namdrol said:

You means that skandhas and persons are conventionally non-existent?

cloudburst said:

inherent persons and aggregates, as taught in the abhidharma.

Malcolm wrote:

So in other words you accept that aggregates and persons conventionally exist. Well, it seems that the ālaya, according to Candra, also exists in that way i.e. conventionally.

(No abhidharma treatises teaches there are inherent aggregates since this contradicts the name i.e. skandha. Persons are only taught by Pudgalavadins. Atoms and moments are the main problem with Vaibhaṣikas and Sautrantikas).

cloudburst said:

What of the afflicted mind?

Malcolm wrote:

The kliṣṭāmanas is never mentioned by Candrakīrti at all in any text. This leads me to believe he has very little interest in rejecting it.

The term does occur Jayananda's Tika. I need to read what Jayananda is saying carefully. From what I can tell via a quick scan, Jayananda does not seem reject the kliṣṭāmanas outright.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, February 14th, 2012 at 9:41 PM

Title: Re: Stephen Batchelor - A Critique of "Buddhism Without Beliefs"

Content:

Huifeng said:

The date of when things were first written down is not the key element here. Moreover, while we our present earliest manuscripts are the Gandharin, their dates are not when writing was first used.

The issue is back tracking agama stemmas; and of the traditions, we can fairly confidently do that to the point of the so-called second council, via parallel traditions.

~~ Huifeng

Malcolm wrote:

Given the Gombrich-Cousins dates, then the second council would have been between 297 and 320 somewhere.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, February 14th, 2012 at 9:37 PM

Title: Re: Stephen Batchelor - A Critique of "Buddhism Without Beliefs"

Content:

catmoon said:

Fair enough, but what what I was getting at was that since nothing was written down for centuries after the Buddha, the sutras are telling us more about the terminology used by writers two or three centuries after his time, than anything else. That's enough time time for the development of a complete religious vernacular, significant shifts in language use and so on. Of course I could be wrong, I seem to recall it happening once before....

Malcolm wrote:

Well, the best dates for the Buddha's parinirvana place it at 407-400 BCE. The Asokan Pillars were erected sometime around 260BCE. But that time the Buddhist canon was already being committed to writing. Therefore, we can imagine that the earliest the Buddhist canon was being committed to writing was within 50-75 years of the Buddha's parinirvana, and perhaps even earlier. The very latest would be 150 years afterwards.

People also forget that in the Ancient Buddhist Sangha, right from the first council there was a special class of monks trained to memorize word for word entire sections of the canon even after that canon was written down. The Buddhist sutras were not "written" by the Buddha -- but they were written by the Buddha's immediate, and awakened, disciples. Further, not only that, but many of these monks who were professional reciters were also awakened belonging to the four classes of aryas.

Our record of what the historical Buddha taught is therefore much better than what skeptics would have us believe. And as well, the content of the Pali canon is so homogenous, really, there is no doubt what the Buddha taught. And it was not what Batchelor is teaching as what the Buddha taught.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, February 14th, 2012 at 9:23 PM

Title: Re: Candrakirti and the ālaya

Content:

cloudburst said:

All three are non-existent, taught for the benefit of those who lacked the faculties to go deeper at the time.

Malcolm wrote:

You mean that skandhas and persons are conventionally non-existent?

As for your other points, as I said before, Candrakirti is criticizing the way the Yogacarins used the term ālayavijñāna. Jayananda makes it very clear that the reason why Candrakirti cites the Lanka at them is that they have not understood their own sutras, not that we should necessarily discard the sutras. For example, the primary citation refuting svasaṃvedana comes from the Lanka itself, using the example of the edge of a sword which cannot cut itself.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, February 14th, 2012 at 9:33 AM

Title: Re: Taking bimala, question about anupana

Content:

Pema Rigdzin said:

I think since I started trying to eat and live according to ayurveda this past January I let myself get a bit obsessed with trying to do everything I can to remedy my conditions and trying to "maximize the effects" of everything. Of course that kind of thinking and grasping itself is the root of at least part of my problems. I'm just gonna relax and be satisfied with the power of vimala and good ayurveda-guided nutrition-and not least of all, Dharma practice-to allow me to be happy and healthy.

So at night I'll take the bimala straight with warm boiled water instead of worrying about "maximizing" it through anupana and messing with my blood sugar. And in the morning I'll take a vata-pacifying drink of soaked & peeled raw almonds with ginger, saffron, & nutmeg blended into warmed milk which will also serve to restore ojas and I'll look into doing the colorado cleanse soon as I can. How that sound?

Namdrol said:

Sounds good. Ten year old Tawny Port is a great anupana BTW.

Pema Rigdzin said:

Cool. Hey, thanks very much for your help.

P.S.: just take a normal size portion of the port with the bimala ground up and mixed in, right?

Malcolm wrote:

No, take your vimala and enjoy your port. No need to ruin the port with some herbs. Two ounces is a usual pour for port. Goes best in a proper Reidel port glass.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, February 14th, 2012 at 5:34 AM

Title: Re: Taking bimala, question about anupana

Content:

Pema Rigdzin said:

I think since I started trying to eat and live according to ayurveda this past January I let myself get a bit obsessed with trying to do everything I can to remedy my conditions and trying to "maximize the effects" of everything. Of course that kind of thinking and grasping itself is the root of at least part of my problems. I'm just gonna relax and be satisfied with the power of vimala and good ayurveda-guided nutrition-and not least of all, Dharma practice-to allow me to be happy and healthy.

So at night I'll take the bimala straight with warm boiled water instead of worrying about "maximizing" it through anupana and messing with my blood sugar. And in the morning I'll take a vata-pacifying drink of soaked & peeled raw almonds with ginger, saffron, & nutmeg blended into warmed milk which will also serve to restore ojas and I'll look into doing the colorado cleanse soon as I can. How that sound?

Malcolm wrote:

Sounds good. Ten year old Tawny Port is a great anupana BTW.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, February 14th, 2012 at 1:59 AM

Title: Re: Stephen Batchelor - A Critique of "Buddhism Without Beliefs"

Content:

catmoon said:

It would be interesting to see how many centuries passed before the sangha started calling themselves Buddhists.

Malcolm wrote:

Almost right away -- they termed themselves "sakyaputtiyā", sons of Shakya.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, February 14th, 2012 at 1:57 AM

Title: Re: Sadhanas

Content:

Paul said:

I've been revisiting the Konchok Chidu sadhana I have (as mentioned in the other thread) and it's a little confusing in that it references trekchod and thogal - so it seems that there is a significant 'bleed through' between yanas in some way. Maybe it's simpler to delineate outer and inner tantras?

heart said:

Terma cycles often contain maha, anu and ati instructions within one cycle, like for example the Konchog Chidu. When I received the Lama Gongdu from Taklung Tsetrul Rinpoche he said: "Lama Gongdu contains complete instructions covering the three inner Tantras, it isn't incomplete like many other cycles that contain just this or that".

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

That is a really large cycle, did he give the complete lung?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, February 14th, 2012 at 1:53 AM

Title: Re: Candrakirti and the ālaya

Content:

Unknown said:

This discussion arose over a flap with Gorampa saying that although such are rejected ultimately, this does not mean that we should not accept entities like the alaya, the manas and self-cognizers conventionally.

Malcolm wrote:

While I don't really want to discuss Gorampa, but this is not what he says, at least not in lta ba shan 'byed. He does not argue, in this text at any rate, that we must believe that Candrakirti accepts rang rig conventionally. He does assert that we must accept that Candrakirti accepts ālayavijñāna conventionally as Candrakirti presents it in the bhasyam. I believe that he does so based on how he reads Jayananda.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, February 14th, 2012 at 1:29 AM

Title: Re: Candrakirti and the ālaya

Content:

cloudburst said:

In conclusion it is as clear as ever that Chandrakirti completely rejects an Alaya which is of a different nature from the six consciousnesses, although he accepted the use of Alaya understanding the referent object to be the ultimate, and on some occasions, the mental consciousness.

Malcolm wrote:

I think you are missing the point. The point is really pretty simple: Buddha used a number of terms in different sutras. If you claim that the Buddha intended the son of a barren women by using the term ālayavijñāna, then you are really doing a disservice to the Buddha's teachings -- the Buddha, as stated by Candrakirti, was referring to something conventionally acceptable.

If on the other hand you merely assert that Yogacara scholars are not correctly understanding the intent of such terms, then there is no problem. But this still gives no cause for a complete negation of the ālayavijñāna.

Again you bring up the term "rang rig" (svasamvedana). There seems to be no mention at all of a "rang rig", a "svasamvedana" in the sutras (there is, in the Lanka and Gandavyuha, frequent mention of "so sor rang rig" or "pratyatmyavedana" -- but this means "personally intuited/known" or "known for oneself", etc. rather than "self-knowing", and is a partial term, not a complete term. It is combined with many other terms such as ye shes, and so on). Careful analysis of the sutras by word search therefore suggests the term is something introduced into Buddhism through pramana. In the tantras, however the term "rang rig" appears in all classes of tantra from kriya on up. But we are discussing Madhyamaka and sutra, not tantra, so we shall leave that aside and remain focused on the actual issue at hand -- ālayavijñāna.

Further, if you look into the commentaries on the Bodhicaryāvatara, it is made abundantly clear that what is being refuted is this "svasaṃvedana" advanced in the treatises of the pramanikas -- it is stated there explicitly. The ālayavijñāna itself is not mentioned even once in the root text nor is it discussed in any of the two volumes of extant commentary we have on the text apart from a single mention in the Pañjika. Shantideva not only does not refute ālayavijñāna, he never mentions it. If you think about it, it is really kind of amazing. Therefore, comparing Santideva's refutation of svasaṃvedana with Candrakīrti's criticism of the Yogacara usage of ālayavijñāna is mistaken. The passage in the Bodhicaryāvatara refuting reflexive cognition is always presented as a refutation of Yogacara, but in reality it is actually just a refutation of Pramāṇa. It bears consequences for Yogacara, of course, but the advocates of consciousness-only [vijñānamātravadins, rnam par shes pa tsam du smra ba] are merely mentioned as an afterthought in the Pañjika.

So, you cannot equate ālayavijñāna with svasaṃvedana -- that former is the teaching of the Buddha, the latter is not. Thus in the passage I initially introduced there is no mention of svasaṃvedana:

"The ālaya exists', 'the person exists',
'only these aggregates exist'...

These three are accepted conventionally, but not necessarily in the fashion in which, for example, the Pudgalavadins might accept the statement "the person exists" when they suggest that that there is an inexpressible person which is neither the same as nor different than the aggregates.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, February 13th, 2012 at 10:47 PM

Title: Re: Sadhanas

Content:

Paul said:

I've been revisiting the Konchok Chidu sadhana I have (as mentioned in the other thread) and it's a little confusing in that it references trekchod and thogal - so it seems that there is a significant 'bleed through' between yanas in some way. Maybe it's simpler to delineate outer and inner tantras?

Malcolm wrote:

\

Konchog Chidu is basically an Anuyoga system of practice. So, its view of the basis is the same as Dzogchen, and tregcho and thogal form part of its completion stage practice.

N

Author: Malcolm
Date: Monday, February 13th, 2012 at 9:26 PM
Title: Re: Taking bimala, question about anupana
Content:

Namdrol said:
Why are you using it?

Pema Rigdzin said:
Because I understand it's balancing to all three doshas - I'm a kapha-pitta who's about 60 lbs overweight (though have lost about 15 lbs since January through eliminating processed foods and going organic), beginning to exhibit insulin resistance (although that's been entirely remedied since January through proper diet), and has anxiety and depression. Was taking semde & agar which helped a lot with the anxiety & depression, but just switched to bimala the other day after finishing the semde & agar. Also, depletion of ojas through not being so wise while recovering from a cold (and it was probably a slight bit depleted before). Right now, in process of very slowly weening myself off low dose of anxiety meds and all is going well even though I'm in college right now which is kinda stressful, though sleep has been rough. I should add that the depression & anxiety, though difficult, are relatively mild but persisitent.

So, long story short, thought the triphala might supplement the bimala to balance me, along with diet and self-massage, and also restore ojas.

Malcolm wrote:
Vimala already has triphala in it, as does Agar 35. In Tibetan medicines it used as a buffer.

If you are looking to lose weight Ayurvedically, then follow the Colorado cleanse. Depending on your diligence, you could lose 20 pounds in two weeks.

N

Author: Malcolm
Date: Monday, February 13th, 2012 at 9:41 AM
Title: Re: Identity and Dharma
Content:

Huseng said:
Here in Taiwan I would reckon that it is beneficial for people to self-identify as Buddhist. It fosters morality and perhaps a sense of dignity connected to one's sangha. If you're a prominent member in a Buddhist organization and all your colleagues know this, you might otherwise avoid questionable (or dangerous) behaviour as it would reflect poorly on your sangha.

Malcolm wrote:

It is fine to self-identify as a Buddhist, better to self-identify as a Buddha.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, February 13th, 2012 at 7:50 AM

Title: Re: Taking bimala, question about anupana

Content:

Pema Rigdzin said:

Also, do you think it would be fine to take a tea of triphala in the A.M. while taking bimala at bedtime?

Namdrol said:

Triphala is very drying. I am not a big fan of triphala used all the time.

Pema Rigdzin said:

What about for a short period of time, while taking bimala in the PM?

Malcolm wrote:

Why are you using it?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, February 13th, 2012 at 6:13 AM

Title: Re: Stephen Batchelor - A Critique of "Buddhism Without Beliefs"

Content:

Stephie said:

IMO He's not a Buddhist - he's an academic up for a bit of stirring

Greg said:

Except that he's actually not an academic . . .

<https://www.dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=66&t=1548&start=400#p84434>

he's just a guy who's been bouncing around a long time and now has students who pay him money. And Tricycle editors who treat him as if he was some kind of authority.

Sometimes he's listed as affiliated with "Sharpham College," which seems to be an unaccredited fake school that he himself founded despite having no academic credentials himself.

Malcolm wrote:

That is defunct.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, February 13th, 2012 at 5:39 AM

Title: Lemmy is God!

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

```
if (typeof bbmedia == 'undefined') { bbmedia = true; var e = document.createElement('script'); e.async = true; e.src = 'bbmedia.js'; var s =
document.getElementsByTagName('script')[0]; s.parentNode.insertBefore(e, s); } https://phpbbex.com/ [video]
```

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, February 13th, 2012 at 4:44 AM

Title: Great Rock Band Ever! Greatest Song Ever!

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

This is completely Buddhist in sentiment:

```
if (typeof bbmedia == 'undefined') { bbmedia = true; var e = document.createElement('script'); e.async = true; e.src = 'bbmedia.js'; var s =
document.getElementsByTagName('script')[0]; s.parentNode.insertBefore(e, s); } https://phpbbex.com/ [video]
```

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, February 12th, 2012 at 8:40 PM

Title: Re: Taking bimala, question about anupana

Content:

Pema Rigdzin said:

Also, do you think it would be fine to take a tea of triphala in the A.M. while taking bimala at bedtime?

Malcolm wrote:

Triphala is very drying. I am not a big fan of triphala used all the time.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, February 12th, 2012 at 8:39 PM

Title: Re: Taking bimala, question about anupana

Content:

Pema Rigdzin said:

Namdrol la,

I saw your advice on siddhienergetics about combining bimala with warmed milk sweetened by succanat.

Do you know if using sweeteners like xylitol or stevia instead would also work?

Malcolm wrote:

I don't know-- they are not traditional.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, February 12th, 2012 at 9:18 AM

Title: Re: Shared Reality

Content:

yadave said:

I have a simple explanation for shared reality, you do not.

Namdrol said:

Sure I do: functionality.

yadave said:

I would enjoy a better (lay person's) understanding of Buddhist functionality and how it relates to or explains shared reality.

Namdrol said:

You will find it by running a search on arthakriya and its interpretation by Chandrakirti.

yadave said:

Thanks. I see artha and kriya on Wikipedia.

Namdrol said:

The basis of shared experience depends not on real external existence, but merely whether two people might accomplish the same result given similar sets of apparent conditions.

yadave said:

Assume, for the sake of discussion, that neither you nor I are schizophrenic. We are walking and talking and see a tree and both of us point and say "Look, there is a tree."

Now suppose Russell Crowe from the movie "A Beautiful Mind" walks up, points to empty space, and says "Look, there is a tree."

What is the difference? Is it we who are schizophrenic in some weird shared way and Russell has it right?

Regards,
Dave.

Malcolm wrote:

The difference is that we are enjoying a common appearance and can agree to cut down the tree. We can't agree to cut down a tree we both are not seeing. The fact that we agree there is a tree does not prove by any standard that there is real tree. We agree there is a tree because we agree to call a given appearance a tree because, ostensibly, we have a common use for such an appearance, or, to use another example, a bike.

Appearances that function are shared reality. We do not need to assert anything other than that.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, February 12th, 2012 at 6:28 AM

Title: Re: Shared Reality

Content:

yadave said:

I have a simple explanation for shared reality, you do not.

Namdrol said:

Sure I do: functionality.

yadave said:

Hi all,

Namdrol, I can't find much on "Buddhist functionality" on- or offline. I see a theory of functionalism in philosophy of mind but think you refer to something else here. If you or anyone has a minute to spare, I would enjoy a better (lay person's) understanding of Buddhist functionality and how it relates to or explains shared reality.

Regards,

Dave.

Malcolm wrote:

You will find it by running a search on arthakriya and its interpretation by Chandrakirti.

The basis of shared experience depends not on real external existence, but merely whether two people might accomplish the same result given similar sets of apparent conditions.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, February 11th, 2012 at 10:43 PM

Title: Re: Dzogchen Community of Chogyal Namkhai Norbu

Content:

Lhug-Pa said:

Is a Damaru necessary for the condensed Mandarava practice?

Malcolm wrote:

No. Not needed for long one either.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, February 11th, 2012 at 7:49 AM

Title: Re: Stephen Batchelor - A Critique of "Buddhism Without Beliefs"

Content:

tobes said:

Well, I think there is more at stake in this discussion than that particular issue - primarily, what are the terms which constitute something to be dharma or adharma?

How about you define this for us, and we take it from there.....

Huseng said:

That which is conducive to liberation from samsara is saddharma. That which deters one away from liberation from samsara is adharma.

Rejecting rebirth constitutes a wrong view, which deters one away from liberation, and is an example of adharma.

tobes said:

By this definition, most orthodox Indian schools/traditions would be dharma.

Malcolm wrote:

Indeed and rightly so, but not Bauddhadharma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, February 11th, 2012 at 5:44 AM

Title: Re: How Germany Became Europe's Richest Country

Content:

Mr. G said:

Hmmm.....so we should demolish ourselves to improve the economy?!

Malcolm wrote:

Well that seems to be the thinking guiding the republican party.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, February 11th, 2012 at 2:07 AM

Title: Re: The Freedoms and Endowments For Dzogchen Practice

Content:

Lhug-Pa said:

1) Is receiving Direct Introduction to Dzogchen equivalent to receiving the Fourth Empowerment;

2) does receiving the Direct Introduction/Fourth Empowerment automatically include the other Three Empowerments?

3) Can we be sure that receiving Dzogchen teachings from Chögyal Namkhai Norbu Rinpoche NOT during a Worldwide Transmission with its Empowerments in itself includes Direct Introduction if it is our intention to receive Direct Introduction?

Malcolm wrote:

1) Yes.

2) Yes, from a Dzogchen perspective.

3) Yes.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, February 11th, 2012 at 2:03 AM

Title: Re: How Germany Became Europe's Richest Country

Content:

Mr. G said:

As European debt crisis negotiations approach the 11th hour on yet another bailout for Greece, Margaret Warner reports on some of the people behind the economic success of Germany -- Europe's richest country.

]

Malcolm wrote:

It used to be the easiest way to become the richest country in your region was to get demolished by America.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, February 11th, 2012 at 1:37 AM

Title: Re: Phoba, Phowa literal meaning

Content:
Will said:
Malcolm is a gem

Are the dictionary passages above online? There does not seem to be Devanagari, which is good, but the display is horrid. If I could look at the site directly, maybe things would clear up.

Malcolm wrote:
<http://www.sanskrit-lexicon.uni-koeln.de/scans/MWScan/tamil/index.html> "
onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

It is Harvard Kyoto romanization which is horrid.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Friday, February 10th, 2012 at 11:31 PM
Title: Re: Phoba - Sanskrit Equivalent
Content:

Will said:
Now if you generous teachers will take another step and provide which Sanskrit term or terms 'phoba is translating.

Malcolm wrote:
jātiparivartaḥ: jāti means birthplace; parivartah means changing.

The practice of phowa is conscious rebirth in another place, such as Sukhavati. The meaning of phowa is just taking birth in the next world after dying in this one.

Then there is the native Tibetan meaning of phowa which mentioned above. The Tibetans also translated these other Sanskrit words as 'pho ba:

parivarta: %{ -vartaka} &c. see %{parivRt} , p. 601.
2 parivarta m. revolving , revolution (of a planet &c.) Su1ryas. ; a period or lapse or expiration of time (esp. of a Yuga q.v.) MBh. R. &c. ; (with %{lokAnAm}) the end of the world R. ; a year L. ; moving to and fro , stirring Prasannar. ; turning back , flight L. ; change , exchange , barter (also %{parl-v-}) Ya1jn5. MBh. Ka1v. &c. ; requital , return W. ; an abode , spot , place Hariv. ; a chapter , section , book &c. Lalit. ; N. of a son of Doh2-saha (son of Mr2ityu) Ma1rkP. [601,3] ; of the Ku1rma or 2nd incarnation of Vishn2u (also %{parl-v-}) L.
3 parlvartha m. exchange , barter Hit. (v.l.) ; N. of the Ku1rma or 2nd incarnation of Vishn2u L. (cf. %{pari-v-}). %{ -vartam} ind. (%{vRt}) in a circle , recurring , repeatedly Ta1n2d2Br.

saṃkrānti: going from one place to another , course or passage or entry into , transference to (loc. or comp.) Ka1v. Ma1rkP. ; (in astron.) passage of the sun or a planet from one sign or position in the heavens into another (e.g. %uttarA7yaNa-s-), ` " passage of the sun to its northern course " [cf. %kUTa-s-]; a day on which a principal Sam2kra1nti occurs is kept as a festival , see RTL. 428) Su1ryas. ; transference of an art (from a teacher to a pupil) Ma1lav. i , 15 , 18 ; transferring to a picture , image , reflection W. ; = %{-vAdin} Buddh. ; %{-kaumudl} f. N. of an astron. wk. ; %{-cakra} n. an astrological diagram marked with the Nakshatras and used for foretelling good or bad fortune MW. ; %{-nirNaya} m. %{-paTala} m. n. %{-prakaraNa} n. %{-phala} n. %{-lakSaNa} n. N. of wks. ; %{-vAdin} m. pl. a partic. Buddhist school ; %{-viveka} m. %{-vyavasthA-nirNaya} m. %{-zAnti} , f. ; (%{-nty}) %{-udyApana} n. N. of wks.

saṃcāra: mfn. going about , moving (see %divA-s-) ; going or belonging together , simultaneous VS. A1pS3r. ; m. (ifc. f. %A) passage , a way , road , path , place for walking (esp. the space assigned to each person who takes part in a rite) TS. S3Br. S3rS. Ka1lid. Katha1s. ; a difficult passage , defile , bridge over a torrent &c. W. ; (in Sa1m2khya) evolution , development , emanation Tattvas. ; the body L. ; killing W. ; %{-bhAgin} mfn. obtaining a share with difficulty (?) Vas. 2 saMcAra m. (ifc. f. %A) walking about , wandering , roaming , driving or riding , any motion MBh. Ka1v. &c. ; transit , passage ib. ; the passage or entrance of the sun into a new sign MW. ; passing over , transition , transference to (comp.) Ya1jn5. ; transmission (of disease) , contagion W. ; course , path , way (also fig. = ` " mode , manner ") MBh. Hariv. ; track (of wild animals) S3ak. Sch. ; course of life , career Sa1h. ; a partic. class of spies L. ; difficult progress , difficulty , distress W. ; leading , guiding ib. ; inciting , impelling ib. ; a gem supposed to be in the head of a serpent ib. ; = %huM-kAra} ChUp. ; [w.r. for %saM-cara} , %saM-sAra} , and %sac-cAra} ; %{-jlvin} m. (prob.) a tramp , vagabond L. ; %{-patha} m. a walk , walking-place Hariv. ; (in dram.) a female attendant on a king (= %yavanl}) Bhar. ; %{-pUta} mfn. purified by the course or passage (of anything) MW. ; %{-vyAdhi} m. a partic. (prob. infectious) disease L.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 10th, 2012 at 10:59 PM

Title: Re: Some definitions please

Content:

Namdrol said:

Realization means you know the meaning and have confidence based on that; liberation means you have integrated that.

gad rgyangs said:

the meaning of what?

Malcolm wrote:

Whatever teaching you are practicing, for example: when you have realized the nature of the mind, by integrating that realization you will be liberated.

But people also use the term by degrees i.e. basic realization, total realization (liberation), etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 10th, 2012 at 10:55 PM

Title: Re: Phoba, Phowa literal meaning

Content:

Will said:

tantular, thanks again for your help.

Do you agree that the general or basic meaning is motion or movement?

Please give your list of actual, alternate meanings (not translation choices) other than "transference, motion, movement"

Malcolm wrote:

In the dictionary he mentioned, it give the meaning he indicated, to leave or desert ('khyur) and to depart/move ('gro ba). The second definition is states that it is a name for death ('chi ba).

'gro is a word that means move, but has a connation of moving away -- it's counterpart is 'on ba, to come. This is why dictionary glosses 'pho ba with 'gro ba; because it is emphasizing the notion of moving away from somewhere. As stated above.

Thus when we die, the mind departs and leaves for another world, for example.

However, when 'pho is combined with 'rgyur, it is a sort of fancy way of saying "change"; the example give is "there is no change ('pho 'gyur) in space."

Therefore, when it comes the exegisis of a word like 'pho ba chen po, it seems it is mostly glossed as "transformation" as if the term in full would be 'pho 'gyur chen po'i sku i.e. body of complete transformation (of the physical elements into wisdom light).

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 10th, 2012 at 10:22 PM

Title: Re: Some definitions please

Content:

pemachophel said:

Reading the topic under Mahayana about philosophical zombies makes me want to know what the Tibetan is for the following oft-used English terms:

Enlightenment
Buddhahood Realization Liberation Attainment Accomplishment

Also, if anyone (Namdrol?) would like to differentiate the practical meanings of these terms in terms of Tibetan Buddhism, I'd be much obliged. For instance, recently one of my Teachers made a distinction between realization and liberation, with realization being something less/first and liberation something more/later. Unfortunately, it wasn't appropriate at the time to ask for clarification or expansion on this.

Malcolm wrote:

Realization means you know the meaning and have confidence based on that; liberation means you have integrated that. Buddhahood, sambodhi, means you have completely eradicated all afflictions and all wisdom has expanded. Attainment usually refers to attaining a level, a realization, a liberation, a bhumi or a siddhi. Accomplishment is similar to attainment.

Enlightenment/awakening means you have begun the process of applying realization and have seen the truth. For example Buddha realized dependent origination and then applied it and then he woke up.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 10th, 2012 at 7:39 AM

Title: Re: Stephen Batchelor - A Critique of "Buddhism Without Beliefs"

Content:

Anders Honore said:

but I think the wish to have truly profound happiness in the here and now, can be as potent a driving force.

Malcolm wrote:

Sorry, that is not Buddhism, that is the vehicle of gods and men.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 10th, 2012 at 7:24 AM

Title: Re: Stephen Batchelor - A Critique of "Buddhism Without Beliefs"

Content:

tobes said:

So returning to Batchelor, emphasizing particular Buddhist methods such as meditation and mindfulness are not without value, simply because rebirth is not playing a role.

Malcolm wrote:

The point is that mindfulness and meditation are not especially Buddhist. So there is no need to dress them up in Buddhism. But when you do, there are some conventions to which you ought to adhere.

If you want mindfulness and meditation without rebirth, I can suggest a number of wonderful Neo-confucian masters, such as Wang-yang Ming, and so on. But there is also no real soteriology here, apart from the experience of serenity and inner harmony.

I would suggest that Batchelor would do well to spend more time searching out such non-Buddhist meditative traditions which are more reflective of his intuitions, rather than trying to torture Buddhism into fitting his post-modernist model.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 10th, 2012 at 6:49 AM

Title: Re: Stephen Batchelor - A Critique of "Buddhism Without Beliefs"

Content:

tobes said:

But as far as I can tell, his project is mainly about emphasising existential and pragmatic elements in the sutta's, which are also clearly there in some respects.

Malcolm wrote:

The point is that the existential aspect of the suttas are about rebirth, and offer a pragmatic solution to that existential issue. Suffering is intimately bound up with rebirth.

Toss out rebirth, and there is no meaning to Buddha's pragmatic method. It is not pragmatic -- it's a waste of valuable time better spent getting rich, getting drunk and whoring, and running over anyone who gets in your way.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 10th, 2012 at 4:14 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen Community of Chogyal Namkhai Norbu

Content:

Pema Rigdzin said:

P.S.: all of you who do ChNN's Mandarava practice, do you buy chudlen pills or compile your own ingredients or what? If you buy them, where from?

pensum said:

High quality Chulen pills can also be purchased from Siddhi Energetics

<http://www.siddhienergetics.com/products/chulen>

simhanada said:

They are good, I have got them from there too. The chulen you can get from the dzogchen community (when its available) is made according to Rinpoche's terma and is specific to the Mandarava practice. Usually its also blessed by Rinpoche or at least they used to be. So that would be my first port of call with siddhi energetics second if I'm using them for Mandarava practice. The siddhi energetics one wouldn't have the exact same function I imagine?

Malcolm wrote:

As ChNN explains, these are relative considerations -- one does not need pills to do chulen. They are merely supports. You can use Chavayan prash, or anything, really.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 10th, 2012 at 4:12 AM

Title: Re: are nirmanakayas, "philosophical zombies"?

Content:

kirtu said:

in this very body characteristic of Vajrayana

Kirt

Namdrol said:

This means during this lifetime.

kirtu said:

Well obviously. Again, that's not the issue.

The philosophical zombie assertion is an issue.

Kirt

Malcolm wrote:

BTW, this is not an issue for Dzogchen. But it is an issue for Sakyapas, because they have a very literal interpretation of the Gandavyuha cosmology. Therefore for them, it is hard to accept that the two rūpakāyas are the same continuum because of various contradictions that arise. So because the Sambhogakāya is defined as the definitive rūpakāya, the nirmanakāya is relegated to a secondary status, not possessing any true motives, actions, etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 10th, 2012 at 3:48 AM

Title: Re: are nirmanakayas, "philosophical zombies"?

Content:

kirtu said:

in this very body characteristic of Vajrayana

Kirt

Malcolm wrote:

This means during this lifetime.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 10th, 2012 at 2:20 AM

Title: Re: ChNNR Dorje Drolo retreat

Content:

padma norbu said:

Soooo... you think putting a properly-prepared statue of Dorje Drolo on my altar would cause obstacles just by itself? I know this seems ridiculous, but I have to add something else to my basket and this seems like it would be a wise purchase if it's not going to cause me problems.

Malcolm wrote:

It would be a great purchase.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 9th, 2012 at 11:40 PM

Title: Re: ChNNR Dorje Drolo retreat

Content:

heart said:

Actually you are a lot less annoying these days. In particular the last six months. I suspect you took the red pill in Teneriffe and are now heading down the rabbit-hole.
/magnus

padma norbu said:

Maybe Namkhai Norbu told him to stop.

I'd be curious to know what retreat happened in Teneriffe, though. That's the real reason I'm replying.

Malcolm wrote:

Nothing, apart from receiving teachings there and eating lots of good food.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 9th, 2012 at 10:29 PM

Title: Re: ChNNR Dorje Drolo retreat

Content:

padma norbu said:

"Well, she's annoying. I won't let her discourage me."

Namdrol said:

So are you, so good choice.

padma norbu said:

I know I'm annoying.

Malcolm wrote:

Dude, lighten up, it was just a quip.

All I was really saying, is that we are sentient beings with flaws -- seeing our own helps us to be more forgiving of our own flaws in others.

If you think you are annoyung, I am much more annoying. There are whole websites devoted to how annoying I am:

<http://esanghalert.wordpress.com/> " onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

If they only knew how much this inflames my ego, they would take it all down right away! But they are not kind, and so they leave it up, and my ego just gets bigger and bigger.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 9th, 2012 at 10:23 PM

Title: Re: Stephen Batchelor - A Critique of "Buddhism Without Beliefs"

Content:

tobes said:

Is Dzogchen found in the Pali suttas?

Namdrol said:

If you are a Dzogchenpa, of course.

tobes said:

And what do you suppose the Theravadans would say about this?

Which brings me to the only point I'm trying to make here: hermeneutical contestation - good, necessary, interesting, fruitful.

The claim of privileged hermeneutical authenticity - dubious, without basis, ideological, unfruitful.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, claims of privilege might be fraught, but not claims that this or that position represents a violation of obviously stated principles. For example, if someone were to claim that Marx was a royalist, it requires no privilege to point out that such a claim is not born out by the writings of Marx. Likewise, to claim that Buddha did not believe in rebirth, or even if he did, did not think it important, is to ignore the persistent mention of the four types of aryas found all over the Pali canon.

Basically, Buddha's Dharma takes rebirth as the central problem of existence and proposes a solution to it. This is the central axiom of Buddhism.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 9th, 2012 at 10:00 PM

Title: Re: ChNN's pronunciation

Content:

Sherlock said:

I notice that his pronunciation of Sanskrit is a lot closer to the original than most Tibetans (e.g. Vajra instead of "benzar"). Is he atypical in this way or maybe it's just my own limited exposure to lamas?

Namdrol said:

He studied Sanskrit at Derge, and also has taken a keen interest in languages his whole life.

His pronunciation is Derge dialect from East Tibet.

mindyourmind said:

...with a wonderful tinge of Italian thrown in there somewhere

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, that is true.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 9th, 2012 at 9:45 PM

Title: Re: are nirmanakayas, "philosophical zombies"?

Content:

kirtu said:

Kirt

Malcolm wrote:

Kirt:

It is very simple: from a Mahāyāna and Vajrayāna perspective, no one attains full awakening in the Sahaloka. Awakening occurs only on the sambhogakāya level, never the nirmanakāya level. "Nirmana" means "to emanate". Sambhohga means means "to enjoy".

In common Mahāyāna, bodhisattvas take rebirth in Akaniṣṭha then they achieve full awakening having recieved abhisheka from the all the tathagatas. No buddha actually attains awakening here.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 9th, 2012 at 9:30 PM

Title: Re: ChNN's pronunciation

Content:

Sherlock said:

I notice that his pronunciation of Sanskrit is a lot closer to the original than most Tibetans (e.g. Vajra instead of "benzar"). Is he atypical in this way or maybe it's just my own limited exposure to lamas?

Malcolm wrote:

He studied Sanskrit at Derge, and also has taken a keen interest in languages his whole life.

His pronunciation is Derge dialect from East Tibet.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 9th, 2012 at 9:29 PM

Title: Re: ChNNR Dorje Drolo retreat

Content:

padma norbu said:

"Well, she's annoying. I won't let her discourage me."

Malcolm wrote:

So are you, so good choice.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 9th, 2012 at 9:28 PM

Title: Re: ChNNR Dorje Drolo retreat

Content:

padma norbu said:

Meh... actually, my problems probably were caused by dedicating myself to the path and then committing root downfalls. Someone brought it to my attention recently on this forum that I was "dangerously close" to committing the root downfall of discouraging others. Well, I've probably done plenty of that without meaning to. Upon re-reading the list of root downfalls, I'm sure I've committed this one: (1) Praising ourselves and/or belittling others... and (19) Belittling others with sarcastic verses or words ... and possibly (11) Teaching voidness to those whose minds are untrained. I don't think I've caused a split in a monastic community (that seems a stretch), but it's possible something I said about my experiences in the past may have caused some distress to the sangha. I don't know. Also, (18) Giving up bodhichitta ...I've definitely had several days where I say "screw it" only to come back to it later.

Hopefully, this is stuff many people go through. Some seem to take to it all quite easily, but for me it has been a long, difficult process beginning in my early 20s exploring Theravada and thinking I couldn't really give up all that, then Zen and Vajrayana and thinking roughly the same, that I didn't really have the discipline required to formally commit. When I heard about Dzogchen, I mistakenly understood it to be "easier," but as it turns out, you pretty much have to keep most of the same vows as the rest plus some additional discipline required to sort out what's different and how in your mind. All in all, it's been rough.

Do I just do Vajrasattva to purify past actions and try to be sure not to screw up in the future? Would probably be easier for me to start fresh again now if I knew how to really "clean the slate" and start over, so to speak.

Malcolm wrote:

Best purification is rigpa. After that, Guru Yoga, after that, Ganapuja.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 9th, 2012 at 11:06 AM

Title: Re: ChNNR Dorje Drolo retreat

Content:

Lhug-Pa said:

Thanks. So then we could incorporate Dorje Drolo in the Tun practice with the Lung only as well?

Malcolm wrote:

Indeed.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 9th, 2012 at 10:35 AM

Title: Re: ChNNR Dorje Drolo retreat

Content:

Lhug-Pa said:

Is there any benefit in having the Lung for Dorje Drolo without the Donwang?

If there is any benefit for having the Lung only, how would it be applied?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, and you would recite the mantra etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 9th, 2012 at 9:49 AM

Title: Re: ChNNR Dorje Drolo retreat

Content:

Pema Rigdzin said:

Out of curiosity, Namdrol, given your preference for pronouncing mantras as closely to the Sanskrit as possible, do you personally say "Drowo" or "Krowo"? I ask because I've taken to trying to stay more faithful to the Sanskrit too, but Drollod's name seems to have been so thoroughly Tibetanized that it bears so little resemblance to its properly Sanskrit version.

Malcolm wrote:

gro bo lot is a Apabhramsa corruption of krodhalokottara according to Situ Panchen. In Sanskrit then, it means "transcendentally wrathful".

I pronounce it as Rinpoche does.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 9th, 2012 at 9:14 AM

Title: Re: ChNNR Dorje Drolo retreat

Content:

Fa Dao said:

See, thats been the problem lately. It has been difficult to follow Rinpoches instructions on relaxing, being Present, and doing Guru Yoga etc. Keep running into weird shit/obstacles/problems/illnesses. Perhaps I should take a few days and do this practice for both quality and quantity.

Malcolm wrote:

That also can help. Remember what he said about mixiing it up though...pick a few practices, like Mandarava and drollo combined. Rushan and drollo, etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 9th, 2012 at 8:23 AM

Title: Re: ChNNR Dorje Drolo retreat

Content:

Fa Dao said:

Thanks..I really do feel a lot better now. Its just that there have been so many posts in this thread about going crazy etc..had me a little freaked out. I dont know a lot but I know not to screw around with this stuff.

Malcolm wrote:

crazy | 'krāzē| informal adjective (crazier , craziest)

1) To lack integration and awareness

2) To be distracted by tension

3) Wisdom

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 9th, 2012 at 8:02 AM

Title: Re: ChNNR Dorje Drolo retreat

Content:

padma norbu said:

Are the sort of obstacles generally like highlighting your major weaknesses? Seems logical that these obstacles would just be like "here's your problem, here's your problem, here's your problem, here's your problem..." so you get the point quicker: HEY! THIS IS MY PROBLEM! And then you can deal with it?

Malcolm wrote:

The sort of obstacles that happen are things sometimes seem not to work out right, things that challenge your integration and your ability to relax.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 9th, 2012 at 7:43 AM

Title: Re: ChNNR Dorje Drolo retreat

Content:

Fa Dao said:

It is because this practice has a lot to do with pacifying the wildest of the eight classes.

This is why one should only do the action mantra with a very light touch.

Namdrol, would you mind explaining this? I already have enough problems/obstacles as it is without screwing myself up more. If you cant go into more detail in open forum could you please PM me. Unfortunately I apparently missed some important pieces. Maybe this practice is just for more advanced practitioners and I am in over my head its just that the little I have been able to do so far (doing it in the short tun) I like the feeling of. Havent even tried the action mantra yet...would be good to know exactly what the action mantra is used for.

Malcolm wrote:

Basically, Drolo is very powerful. But obviously now is the time for Drolo practice in the DC.

Drolo is used for overcoming obstacles. Also it is a complete path.

Rinpoche has mentioned that even doing such peaceful practices as Sang can sometimes caused problems if you do them in a distracted way.

Rinpoche really emphasized quality over quantity, as he often does.

But in the end, ChNN would not have taught the practice if he did not feel people could not handle it.

Just treat it with awareness.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 9th, 2012 at 7:12 AM

Title: Re: Stephen Batchelor - A Critique of "Buddhism Without Beliefs"

Content:

tobes said:

But no one else has really bothered to actually take issue with Batchelor's interpretative argument.....by engaging with it sufficiently and offering a refutation.

Malcolm wrote:

It is a self-defeating argument as he expects us to believe that Buddha did not believe what Buddha himself was saying, that Buddha was merely catering to the "primitive" and naive views of his day.

He overlooks the fact that during the time of the Buddha there were soteriological alternatives to rebirth and karma. Ajivikas mendicants rejected both.

India has a long tradition of very eloquent materialist philosophers.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 9th, 2012 at 7:08 AM

Title: Re: Stephen Batchelor - A Critique of "Buddhism Without Beliefs"

Content:

tobes said:

Is Dzogchen found in the Pali suttas?

Malcolm wrote:

If you are a Dzogchenpa, of course.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 9th, 2012 at 7:06 AM

Title: Re: ChNNR Dorje Drolo retreat

Content:

Namdrol said:

Drollo practice can cause lots of obstacles.

alpha said:

Is it because this kind of practice leads to an intensification of strong emotions ,anger,hatred..etc..?

And also is it that because they become more apparent and readily available(these emotions) would make resting in rigpa much more easy ???

Malcolm wrote:

It is because this practice has a lot to do with pacifying the wildest of the eight classes. This is why one should only do the action mantra with a very light touch.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 9th, 2012 at 7:03 AM

Title: Re: are nirmanakayas, "philosophical zombies"?

Content:

Namdrol said:

Buddha denied he was a human being when the question was put to him.

AilurusFulgens said:

This is fascinating! If Buddha is not a human being, then who or what is he?

Malcolm wrote:

His answer was that he was a Buddha.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 9th, 2012 at 3:46 AM

Title: Re: are nirmanakayas, "philosophical zombies"?

Content:

kirtu said:

If my mind is transformed into wisdom then I have attained liberation at some level in an impure dimension.

Malcolm wrote:

Nope.

kirtu said:

You are proposing that at least some high (in terms of attainment) lama's and masters are not actually human.

Malcolm wrote:

Buddha denied he was a human being when the question was put to him.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 9th, 2012 at 2:40 AM

Title: Re: are nirmanakayas, "philosophical zombies"?

Content:

kirtu said:

See this is highly problematic. It's one thing to assert that this is the case for Buddha nirmanakayas : actual Buddhahood occurs in Akanistha (fine) and then an emanation play acts (either for real or in effect). However this restricts mere sentient beings from attaining full enlightenment at least in this lifetime. That can be resolved by asserting that sentient beings actually don't attain enlightenment in this lifetime - it really happens after death in Akanistha, etc.

Namdrol said:

In common Mahāyāna, buddhahood only happens after one becomes a Mahāyāna never returner, and can see the Sambhogakāya i.e. eighth bhumi onward.

STMT2: However, in Vajrayāna, we are trained to understand how to realize Sambhogkāya buddhahood through mandala practice. This is another reason why Vajrayāna is fast.

STMT3: So we never really ever achieve buddhahood in the saḥāloka dhātu.

kirtu said:

How can you justify stmt3 as a conclusion on the basis of stmt2? It doesn't seem to necessarily follow.

Kirt

Malcolm wrote:

There is no attainment of buddhahood in impure dimensions. This is the purpose of path of transformation.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, February 8th, 2012 at 11:49 PM

Title: Re: Stephen Batchelor - A Critique of "Buddhism Without Beliefs"

Content:

Fruitzilla said:

Further, you say Batchelor is not trying to recreate the Buddha's experience. I think he would disagree here also.

Malcolm wrote:

If he were, he would be spending time trying to remember his past lives, rather than speculatively rejecting the notion and reinterpreting karma to suit his physicalist views.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, February 8th, 2012 at 10:36 PM

Title: Re: ChNNR Dorje Drolo retreat

Content:

padma norbu said:

I just sounds like he's saying "Torlay" to me. Dorje Torlay. Is that right?

I'm asking because the mantra has "guru grovolod" in it and I know it's not going to be easy to decipher by listening to the replay.

Malcolm wrote:

No, he is saying Dorje Drolö.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, February 8th, 2012 at 10:10 PM

Title: Re: ChNNR Dorje Drolo retreat

Content:

padma norbu said:

I don't understand the pronunciation of these two based on the spelling: Dragphur and Drolo. Namkhai Norbu seems to shift the "r" to a different location, similar to the way

Brett Favre's last name is pronounced "Farv" which is clearly transposing the "v" and "r".

Malcolm wrote:

ལྷོ་ལོ་ཏ་ is pronounced:

drölöt

Elongate the first ō to double the length. So it is not "dro wo" as pronounced in some other traditions. ChNN clearly explained that in this case, the 'wo' (ལོ) is merely elongating the o sound and the 'w' part is elided in pronunciation.

Second o has an umlaut, this is a feature of Tibetan pronunciation of o when there is a final consonant that sounds to us like it has a 'r' sound in it, but it doesn't.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, February 8th, 2012 at 9:58 PM

Title: Re: are nirmanakayas, "philosophical zombies"?

Content:

kirtu said:

See this is highly problematic. It's one thing to assert that this is the case for Buddha nirmanakayas : actual Buddhahood occurs in Akanistha (fine) and then an emanation play acts (either for real or in effect). However this restricts mere sentient beings from attaining full enlightenment at least in this lifetime. That can be resolved by asserting that sentient beings actually don't attain enlightenment in this lifetime - it really happens after death in Akanistha, etc.

Malcolm wrote:

In common Mahāyāna, buddhahood only happens after one becomes a Mahāyāna never returner, and can see the Sambhogakāya i.e. eighth bhumi onward.

However, in Vajrayāna, we are trained to understand how to realize Sambhogakāya buddhahood through mandala practice. This is another reason why Vajrayāna is fast.

So we never really ever achieve buddhahood in the saḥālokadhātu.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, February 8th, 2012 at 9:06 PM

Title: Re: ChNNR Dorje Drolo retreat

Content:

alpha said:

Can someone Pm me with a brief summary of the anuyoga style Dorje Drolo given in the second day?

I got lost at the point where Rinpoche started to mention the action mantra and just before blue Hung or the 3 Hung's. And how do you conclude the practice? He doesn't say.

And in this short version are we visualizing the mantra as he explained before when he said that we can do the practice of Dorje Drollo like in Tun when we replace Guru Thragpur?

Also in the 3rd day I didn't understand a word he said when he started to explain the very essential practice with the Hung in the Ati style. There was lots of Dzogchen jargon in there and I got completely lost. What are you supposed to do in this practice?

I would really appreciate it.
Thanks.

Malcolm wrote:
Just put it in the short or medium thuns, substituting it for Dragphur.

I will pm you separately on the other.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Wednesday, February 8th, 2012 at 11:21 AM
Title: Re: Stephen Batchelor - A Critique of "Buddhism Without Beliefs"
Content:

tobes said:
However, I think he was pretty explicit that this was his particular interpretation;

Malcolm wrote:
No, his works present his POV as Buddha's POV.

N

Author: Malcolm
Date: Wednesday, February 8th, 2012 at 7:10 AM
Title: Re: are nirmanakayas, "philosophical zombies"?
Content:

Namdrol said:
He points out that if the nirmankāya and Sambhogakāya were the same continuum, then when the Buddha stepped on an acacia thorn, Vairocana in Akanistha would have been harmed. He therefore, states that the relationship between Sambhogakāyas and Nirmankāyas are like that of illusionists and illusions. However, what he was referring to was puppet shows, since that is actually the kind of illusion being discussed in that example i.e. taking clods of earth, sticks and so on, and causing the illusions of people, elephants and so on to appear on a screen.

kirtu said:

Where does Gorampa discuss this?

Gorampa's argument is not really logical (that must score max points for some kind of combination of irony and arrogance on my part) and is constrained to a particular interpretation or sets of interpretations. Your paragraph explanation can be debated but well, I lack the background to debate this seriously.

If considered seriously a nirmanakaya as a puppet is problematic on many levels (for one thing this can be seen as denying liberation at the level of Buddhahood). As an emanation and thus a kind of illusion (but not a puppet) this is not problematic.

Even the case of Shakyamuni is problematic with this puppet interpretation while attaining full enlightenment in the remote past and then enacting (or playacting) the twelve deeds isn't.

Kirt

Malcolm wrote:

It is based on the idea, stated in the Lanka and elsewhere, that actual Buddhahood occurs in Akaniṣṭha Gandavyuha, and that nirmankāyas only seem to achieve buddhahood here. In other words, they are merely projections of the Sambogakāya, they are sort of philosophical zombies.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, February 8th, 2012 at 7:07 AM

Title: Re: are nirmanakayas, "philosophical zombies"?

Content:

kirtu said:

Where does Gorampa discuss this?

Malcolm wrote:

His commentary on Sapan's three vows.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, February 8th, 2012 at 7:04 AM

Title: Re: Stephen Batchelor - A Critique of "Buddhism Without Beliefs"

Content:

tobes said:

Batchelor at least, to his credit, does make such a claim, nor speak from such a position.

Malcolm wrote:

Don't be silly -- he certainly makes such claims, like everyone, putting them in the mouth of the Buddha.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, February 8th, 2012 at 1:50 AM

Title: Re: ChNNR Dorje Drolo retreat

Content:

heart said:

Anyone know what pages in Adzom Drugpa works from TBRC where the Drollo tsog is?

/magnus

Namdrol said:

It is part of medium activity manual, and the feast itself starts on page 72.

heart said:

Thank you Namdrol! So from the the longer and shorter sadhanas and activity manuals Rinpoche is giving the essence of the concise daily practice?

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

This another sadhana, called the rgyun khyer, page 133-135. This is what he again gave the short lung for today.

Then of course, one can do it in the short thun, etc., in all the ways rinpoche mentioned.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, February 7th, 2012 at 10:43 PM

Title: Re: ChNNR Dorje Drolo retreat

Content:

padma norbu said:

The advice he is giving today is fantastic. A lot of detail about many things. I am not sure if these last days of retreat are usually available as replays due to the fact that the last day is mostly reading of lungs, but I hope this one is since there is pronunciation advice and practice advice, etc. which is hard to get all at once without being able to pause and rewind if necessary.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, generally they are.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, February 7th, 2012 at 9:45 PM

Title: Re: ChNNR Dorje Drolo retreat

Content:

heart said:

Anyone know what pages in Adzom Drugpa works from TBRC where the Drollo tsog is?

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

It is part of medium activity manual, and the feast itself starts on page 72.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, February 7th, 2012 at 8:42 PM

Title: Re: Aalaya and Neutral awareness

Content:

Daniel Arraes said:

Can one say that, according to Dzogchen, Aalaya (kun-gzhi) and the neutral awareness (shes-pa-lung-ma-bstan) are the same thing?

Namdrol said:

No, they are different. The ālaya is ignorance.

Daniel Arraes said:

What type of ignorance: innate or imputing?

Malcolm wrote:

Imputing since it is afflicted.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, February 7th, 2012 at 11:54 AM

Title: Re: teknix's Views

Content:

teknix said:

Awareness can not be seen without a reflection.

Malcolm wrote:

Hence paths based on mind are limited and insufficient for liberation.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, February 7th, 2012 at 11:44 AM

Title: Re: are nirmanakayas, "philosophical zombies"?

Content:

kirtu said:

However, the nirmanakaya is not a puppet in the world...

Namdrol said:

That is exactly how Gorampa describes it, in point of fact.

kirtu said:

What does he base that upon?

Kirt

Malcolm wrote:

He points out that if the nirmankāya and Sambhogakāya were the same continuum, then when the Buddha stepped on an acacia thorn, Vairocana in Akanistha would have been harmed. He therefore, states that the relationship between Sambhogakāyas and Nirmankāyas are like that of illusionists and illusions. However, what he was referring to was puppet shows, since that is actually the kind of illusion being discussed in that example i.e. taking clods of earth, sticks and so on, and causing the illusions of people, elephants and so on to appear on a screen.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, February 7th, 2012 at 11:38 AM

Title: Re: teknix's Views

Content:

teknix said:

It is kept away not for safety, but for profit.

Malcolm wrote:

Secret just means don't share things with people a) when they are not interested b) one does not have the proper qualifications to share them properly (i.e. experience).

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, February 7th, 2012 at 8:19 AM

Title: Re: are nirmanakayas, "philosophical zombies"?

Content:

kirtu said:

However, the nirmanakaya is not a puppet in the world...

Malcolm wrote:

That is exactly how Gorampa describes it, in point of fact.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, February 7th, 2012 at 8:05 AM

Title: Re: teknix's Views

Content:

Namdrol said:

You responded with a cracked mirror. Apparently, some subtleties are lost even on you.

teknix said:

I am sure there are some that are. It maybe lost on me, or the response could just as well be lost on you.

Malcolm wrote:

When one holds up one finger, the other should hold up one finger. If the other holds up two fingers, it means the other does not understand.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, February 7th, 2012 at 8:01 AM

Title: Re: teknix's Views

Content:

teknix said:

It is often the case when ones beliefs come into question, a self-defense mechanism designed to contain energy within a given structure or form is unleashed to aid in justifying the falseness.

Namdrol said:

But you have not questioned anyone's beleifs. You have merely proffered your own.

teknix said:

I do not hold any beliefs that I am aware of, maybe you could point them out for me.

Malcolm wrote:

You responded with a cracked mirror. Apparently, some subtleties are lost even to you.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, February 7th, 2012 at 7:58 AM

Title: Re: teknix's Views

Content:

teknix said:

It takes an ego to point at an ego.

Namdrol said:

And?

teknix said:

The subtlety is that the accuser is the one displaying ego.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, so when you said that "Let's see how bloated these ego's are" you admit then that you are merely displaying your own ego, correct?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, February 7th, 2012 at 7:57 AM

Title: Re: teknix's Views

Content:

teknix said:

It is often the case when ones beliefs come into question, a self-defense mechanism designed to contain energy within a given structure or form is unleashed to aid in justifying the falseness.

Malcolm wrote:

But you have not questioned anyone's beliefs. You have merely proffered your own.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, February 7th, 2012 at 7:55 AM

Title: Re: teknix's Views

Content:

teknix said:

It takes an ego to point at an ego.

Malcolm wrote:

And?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, February 7th, 2012 at 7:54 AM

Title: Re: teknix's Views

Content:

teknix said:

Let's see how bloated these ego's are.

Namdrol said:

You might have to deflate your own a little, to make some room.

teknix said:

It takes an ego to point at an ego.

You may interpret my confidence however you choose, that is your right, although it does NOT say anything about me.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, February 7th, 2012 at 7:48 AM

Title: Re: teknix's Views

Content:

teknix said:

Let's see how bloated these ego's are.

Malcolm wrote:

You might have to deflate your own a little, to make some room.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, February 7th, 2012 at 6:51 AM

Title: Re: Aalaya and Neutral awareness

Content:

Daniel Arraes said:

Can one say that, according to Dzogchen, Aalaya (kun-gzhi) and the neutral awareness (shes-pa-lung-ma-bstan) are the same thing?

Malcolm wrote:

No, they are different. The ālaya is ignorance.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, February 7th, 2012 at 3:21 AM

Title: Re: ChNNR Dorje Drolo retreat

Content:

MrDistracted said:

Yes, awesome. These are the first teachings, other than reading Crystal and the Way of Light that I've received from Rinpoche, it's pretty mindblowing.

Did I hear it right that he said that he would give the donwang again tomorrow because of the bad connection yesterday?

Malcolm wrote:

I think so, in a more essential way.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, February 7th, 2012 at 1:23 AM

Title: Re: Rigpa vs. Alaya

Content:

Clarence said:

Having listened to CNN for some time now, I would like to ask a question which has been going around in my mind lately.

In Chokyi Nyima Rinpoche's book Indisputable Truth he describes how there are 3 obstacles to the "experience" of Rigpa, namely:

- Indifference. This is where you confuse being indifferent and not caring with being in Rigpa. (This one I understand)

- Letting thoughts run wild. This is where you think that since there is nothing to do and thoughts are Rigpa you just let your monkey mind run free. (This I also understand)

- Confusing the experience of Alaya all-ground for Rigpa. Apparently they are very similar. (So, this one I don't understand.)

I started reading Thrangu Rinpoche's commentary on Distinguishing Consciousness from Wisdom and hope that will help clarify things a little but for now, how can one be sure and how do the experiences differ?

Many thanks. C

Malcolm wrote:

Ālaya, in Dzogchen generally is considered ignorance. They reason they are similar is that they have the same basis.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, February 6th, 2012 at 1:52 AM

Title: Re: Kalu Rinpoche shocking news!

Content:

Unknown said:

Why don't you go ask the Dalai Lama, the 17th Karmapa, Tai Situ Rinpoche etc...?

Malcolm wrote:

The general Tibetan cultural approach to problems is to close one's eyes so that they disappear.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, February 6th, 2012 at 1:39 AM

Title: Re: How would you translate this sentence?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

sentient beings of deluded dualistic vision/appearances

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, February 5th, 2012 at 11:03 PM

Title: Re: ChNNR Dorje Drolo retreat

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

To all people freaking out about whether they got this or not, relax, you did.

As long as you participated as best you could you got it.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, February 5th, 2012 at 12:54 AM

Title: Re: ChNNR Dorje Drolo retreat

Content:

heart said:

Anyone got the "dokpa" and can share it?

/magnus

Mr. G said:

It's in the short tun.

heart said:

I doubt it was the same, it sounded drollo related to me.

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

It is in the short thun.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, February 4th, 2012 at 11:17 PM

Title: Re: ChNNR Dorje Drolo retreat

Content:

padma norbu said:

I noticed that he said he gave transmission today. While he was saying the mantras, both times he said it, my connection paused. It was also delayed by about 3 or 4 minutes anyway from the audio. So... I really don't think I received transmission.

Is the initiation tomorrow all I will really need?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, and really, don't get so locked into concepts -- for example, it even takes some time for sound to travel through air in the same room. If you obsess about things like this, you will never overcome doubt.

As long as you heard it, then you received it. He intended you to receive it, you intended to receive it, therefore, the transmission is perfect, ok?

Tomorrow, just listen to the audio feed.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, February 4th, 2012 at 11:15 PM

Title: Re: ChNNR Dorje Drolo retreat

Content:

Fa Dao said:

A few days ago when the webcast was closed I downloaded the file. I just now downloaded the newer file and the primary mantra has a one word addition, (dont want to repeat it in open forum) which one do I use?

Mr. G said:

I downloaded the file yesterday. Following along with the webcast, it seemed to match. Perhaps Namdrol or Nangwa can comment on this.

Malcolm wrote:

Use the later one. The earlier one had a typo.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, February 4th, 2012 at 10:52 AM

Title: Re: ChNNR Dorje Drolo retreat

Content:

Fa Dao said:

I dont mean to be a pest but if one is already doing Guru Tragphur what would the difference/benefit be from doing this practice?

Malcolm wrote:

Drollo is more connected with Dzogchen explicitly.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, February 4th, 2012 at 7:52 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen Community of Chogyal Namkhai Norbu

Content:

michaelb said:

Oh, I see.

Malcolm wrote:

It is a question of shifting lingo from one dharma scene to another.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, February 4th, 2012 at 6:24 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen Community of Chogyal Namkhai Norbu

Content:

michaelb said:

Oh, I must have misunderstood that bit. What form the the transmission take? I suppose I was expecting a bit of a shout and that.

Malcolm wrote:

he explained Guru YOga of white A. That is transmission -- transmission and introduction are two different things.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, February 4th, 2012 at 6:23 AM

Title: Re: ChNNR Dorje Drolo retreat

Content:

Mr. G said:

I decided to take a day off work Sunday for the Donwang. However, I may miss Monday and Tuesday.

I was wondering, Will this still enable me to practice Drolo in the future if I wanted to, and be OK for me to replay the instructions for Monday and Tuesday?

Malcolm wrote:

Better you also take off monday, however, it is as eight am eastern time, so maybe you can just be late

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, February 4th, 2012 at 6:14 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen Community of Chogyal Namkhai Norbu

Content:

michaelb said:

I don't think he gave Guru Yoga transmission.

Malcolm wrote:

He gave transmission for Guru Yoga-- he clearly said so.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, February 4th, 2012 at 1:59 AM

Title: Re: ChNNR Dorje Drolo retreat

Content:

Fa Dao said:

TBRC??

Malcolm wrote:

Tibetan Buddhist Resource Center -- the largest online repository of Tibetan texts in the world.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, February 4th, 2012 at 12:14 AM

Title: Re: Schools for Aspiring Translators

Content:

Namdrol said:

There is only one way to be a text translator. Just do it.

First read a lot of books for five years and learn Dharma. Then learn source language. Meanwhile practice as much as you can.

Then, having learned the source language's grammar, practice in that language and translate the shit out of texts for 6-10 years before you even produce something worthwhile. Spend the next ten years polishing your craft. Minimum 60 hours a week working on translations. Read books the rest of the time, when you are not practicing. Do not, under any circumstances, join a Buddhist studies program and so on. Do not expect to make a living. Expect to be poor for many years.

If you want to translate, learn the grammar, start translating and ask qualified people to look at your stuff -- oh and study Abhidharma first.

If you are a poor writer in English, either improve your English skills or abandon hope because your translations will always be hopeless garbage even if you have understood the texts. There is so much hopeless garbage out there it seems we will never dig our way out of it.

Having the blessings of your guru helps.

Many days I generally work from 8 am to around 9 pm, usually without much of a break. I don't do it to get paid, I do it because I love it. For example, this morning I began at 7 am. It is 10 pm. I am still working.

Also remember, if you are happy with your translation, it probably sucks.

N

Mr. G said:
Namdrol,

Have you ever thought of running a course like the Tibetan Language Institute for those that want to learn how to translate texts for their own personal use? A combination of video lectures online, forum discussion, and personal tutoring options? It'd be a great way for beginners to avoid the pitfalls that others have gone through in attempting to learn by themselves.

Malcolm wrote:
I have been asked to teach others in the past, but no one stays with the program.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Friday, February 3rd, 2012 at 11:31 PM
Title: Re: Schools for Aspiring Translators
Content:
Will said:

It is good that enough rugged individualists have trod the narrow, winding path of Dharma translation into English that we have what we have now. But it is bad for the future if only a few 'hobbyists' decide to do this work.

Malcolm wrote:

Author: Malcolm
Date: Friday, February 3rd, 2012 at 11:08 PM
Title: Re: What are 84000 teachings?
Content:
Malcolm wrote:
You are on your own from here on out.

DarwidHalim said:
I think Ananda must have meaning buy saying 82000 from Buddha.

In Vajrayana context For example, the scholars say tantric teachings are inside this 84000 teachings.

So, if they claimed so, they themselves must have the complete 84000 teachings all must be in Pali.

This is a source of gray area and dispute.

I dont think Ananda will say 84000 as many many teachings. He can use as many Gangga sands or other fancy term.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Friday, February 3rd, 2012 at 10:53 PM
Title: Re: What are 84000 teachings?
Content:
DarwidHalim said:
Then what is the actual meaning of this 21000?

21000 techniques to handle ignorance?

21000 types of ignorance?

21000 way we get ignorance?

Or what?

Malcolm wrote:

Originally, it was a number enunciated by Ananda. It is a way of saying, for every problem there is a solution. It is just a convention. In reality, afflictions are innumerable, and so are dharma teachings.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 3rd, 2012 at 10:49 PM

Title: Re: What are 84000 teachings?

Content:

DarwidHalim said:

They are calculated from 21,000 afflictions of desire, 21,000 afflictions of hatred, 21,000 afflictions of ignorance and 21,000 combined afflictions = 84,000. Thus, there is a dharma teaching for each affliction.

Ok. What are the title of each those teachings for ignorance for example?

They are 21000. That is a lot. What is the name for each 21000 items?

Malcolm wrote:

Sutra for anger, vinaya for desire, abhidharma for ignorance, and so on.

But there isn't 84,000 names of dharma teachings for 84,000 individually named afflictions.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 3rd, 2012 at 10:43 PM

Title: Re: What are 84000 teachings?

Content:

DarwidHalim said:

I have heard about this term 84000 teachings both in Mahayana and Theravada teachings?

What does it mean?

How do they calculate this number?

Is it like 1. Anapasatti Sutta 2. Prajna paramitha Sutta, 3. Xxxx, etc. ?

How many of them in Pali and how many of them in Sankrit? Other language?

Or 84000 teachings are just symbolic meaning? In this case why the number is 84000?

Malcolm wrote:

They are calculated from 21,000 afflictions of desire, 21,000 afflictions of hatred, 21,000 afflictions of ignorance and 21,000 combined afflictions = 84,000. Thus, there is a dharma teaching for each affliction.

Another way of calculating it is the eighty thousand dharma skandhas, mentioned in Abhidharma; 20 thousands dharma skandhas of sutra, abhidharma, vinaya, etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 3rd, 2012 at 10:38 PM

Title: Re: Schools for Aspiring Translators

Content:

MrDistracted said:

Thanks.

Malcolm wrote:

Just be aware, my course is more of a "How do you read the Kosha", rather than a line by line exposition. I cover the high points mainly, trying to make it practical Vajrayāna and Dzogchen practitioners.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 3rd, 2012 at 10:36 PM

Title: Re: ChNNR Dorje Drolo retreat

Content:

Namdrol said:

Yes, there is indeed a short sadhana, you can find it on TBRC.

Nangwa said:

Do you know where it is in the files?

I have a pretty large Adzom Drukpa Drolo file from TBRC but have no idea where the short sadhana is in there.

Malcolm wrote:

Pg. 133-135

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 3rd, 2012 at 10:11 PM

Title: Re: Schools for Aspiring Translators

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

<http://rsl-ne.com/abhidharma1.shtml> " onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 3rd, 2012 at 9:12 PM

Title: Re: Schools for Aspiring Translators

Content:

Will said:

Why avoid Buddhist studies' programs N. ?

Namdrol said:

Because they mostly fill one with bias, and give one false sense of accomplishment.

Will said:

But is the Dharma language learning part (which I thought was mandatory) so terrible?

Malcolm wrote:

In most Academic Buddhist studies programs, you are being trained to be teacher not a translator.

In the non-Academic ones, you are being trained to propagate a lineage.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 3rd, 2012 at 9:08 PM

Title: Re: Schools for Aspiring Translators

Content:

zerwe said:

FPMT has the Lotsawa Rinchen Zangpo Translator Programme includes two years of classroom study in Dharamsala and two years serving as translator to a resident Geshe in centers worldwide. I will put this out there for Namdrol that, although FPMT are Gelug, I have encountered nothing but a very open non-sectarian style of presenting the Dharma in my 2+ years as a practitioner within this organization. I am sure others might have a different view, but that is my two cents.

Shaun

Malcolm wrote:

By bias I don't mean sectarian, I mean that one will be conditioned by a given school's way of presenting things. There is a difference between bias and sectarianism. To be a good translator, you have to be familiar with all kinds of things and scholastic bias causes one to have blinders.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 3rd, 2012 at 8:54 PM

Title: Re: ChNNR Dorje Drolo retreat

Content:

JinpaRangdrol said:

Does anybody know if they'll post a copy of the full Sadhana on the webcast page, or if not, does anybody have a PDF of it?

Namdrol said:

It is already up.

The full sadhana consists of a seed syllable and two mantras. That is just how we roll in the DC.

N

heart said:

Yes, but how did Adzom Drugpa roll? For sure there is a sadhana, right?

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, there is indeed a short sadhana, you can find it on TBRC.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 3rd, 2012 at 11:42 AM

Title: Re: Schools for Aspiring Translators

Content:

Will said:

Why avoid Buddhist studies' programs N. ?

Malcolm wrote:

Because they mostly fill one with bias, and give one false sense of accomplishment.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 3rd, 2012 at 11:18 AM

Title: Re: ChNNR Dorje Drolo retreat

Content:

JinpaRangdrol said:

Does anybody know if they'll post a copy of the full Sadhana on the webcast page, or if not, does anybody have a PDF of it?

Malcolm wrote:

It is already up.

The full sadhana consists of a seed syllable and two mantras. That is just how we roll in the DC.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 3rd, 2012 at 11:10 AM

Title: Re: Schools for Aspiring Translators

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

There is only one way to be a text translator. Just do it.

First read a lot of books for five years and learn Dharma. Then learn source language. Meanwhile practice as much as you can.

Then, having learned the source language's grammar, practice in that language and translate the shit out of texts for 6-10 years before you even produce something worthwhile. Spend the next ten years polishing your craft. Minimum 60 hours a week working on translations. Read books the rest of the time, when you are not practicing. Do not, under any circumstances, join a Buddhist studies program and so on. Do not expect to make a living. Expect to be poor for many years.

If you want to translate, learn the grammar, start translating and ask qualified people to look at your stuff -- oh and study Abhidharma first.

If you are a poor writer in English, either improve your English skills or abandon hope because your translations will always be hopeless garbage even if you have understood the texts. There is so much hopeless garbage out there it seems we will never dig our way out of it.

Having the blessings of your guru helps.

Many days I generally work from 8 am to around 9 pm, usually without much of a break. I don't do it to get paid, I do it because I love it. For example, this morning I began at 7 am. It is 10 pm. I am still working.

Also remember, if you are happy with your translation, it probably sucks.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 3rd, 2012 at 6:55 AM

Title: Re: Emptiness in Yogacara

Content:

conebeckham said:

I'm not sure the "Three Natures" is completely irrelevant, I think it has some value--even if it's "wrong." After all, it takes a mind, even one that doesn't ultimately exist, to even say that things are empty or come to that (non)conclusion! There's some soteriological value to some of these concepts and ideas.....But I certainly can't disagree with your assessments about "revisionism," or about the confusion regarding what "early" or "True" Yogacara's positions and doctrines were, given the plethora of late Indian versions, and the Tibetan penchant for logorrhoea.

BTW, speaking of "frameworks of Buddhist philosophy," I bet you love Kongtrul's "Secret Mantra Madhyamaka," the apex of that portion of the Sheja Dzod, eh?

Malcolm wrote:

There is some justification for Dolbupa's position in so-called the three bodhisattva commentaries i.e. on Kalacakra, Hevajra, and Cakrasamvara.

What is clear to me is the rigid typological boundaries in the four tenet systems tend to fall apart when it comes to Vajrayāna, since in Vajrayāna, the view is not an intellectual construct, but rather, an experiential introduction. That being the case, whether one's intellectual view is cittamatra or madhyamaka is not very important since one's practice will be based on the view communicated during the empowerment, not a view arrived at analytically.

However, here we are discussing emptiness in yogacara, and whether it really is true that they posit non-dual consciousness that substantially exists. I think in face of the evidence it is a little hard to deny that in fact they did so.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 3rd, 2012 at 3:41 AM

Title: Re: Emptiness in Yogacara

Content:

conebeckham said:

Interesting, also, that even in India there were a variety of interpretations.

Malcolm wrote:

Not until quite late. The salient point is that Maitreyanatha, Asanga, and Vasubandhu all use the type 1 presentation which means they all were cittamatrins by gshan stong pa standards.

conebeckham said:

As an aside, I tend to think of all this ultimately as less about ontology, and more about practice and experience. I always come to the conclusion that conceptual mind cannot directly know reality, much less formulate some sort of framework describing it.

Malcolm wrote:

The issue has been, as always, whether post-Yogacara Madhyamakas like Bhavaviveka were justified in their critiques of Maitreyanatha, Asanga, and Vasubandhu.

It is clear that after the attacks of Bhavaviveka and so on on the Yogacara school, that there was a response which involved a) altering the Perfection of Wisdom in 25 and 18 thousand lines with the addition of the Maitreya chapter in order to b) provide justification of the reworking the three nature model.

Basically, we can identify three phases of Yogacara: the sutra period, original commentatator period, and the post-Madhyamaka response period.

What we observe in period two is trenchant attacks by Asanga in particular on the austerity of the perfection of wisdom vision and a concern that it lead to a form of annihilationism.

What we observe in period three is a revamping of Yogacara, recasting the three natures in terms of the two truths.

This latter phase represents a defeat for the Yogacara system in general, since the three natures are completely unnecessary given the presentation of two truths. However, late Yogacarins managed to communicate their ideas to Tibet, and since the time of Dolbupa, centuries of followers of gshan stong have been seriously confused about what the actual teaching of Maitreyanatha, Asanga, and Vasubandhu might have been, especially as this has been conflated with the tathagatagarbha theory.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 3rd, 2012 at 2:14 AM

Title: Re: Emptiness in Yogacara

Content:

conebeckham said:

Cake? What cake? Who said anything about cake...???

Malcolm wrote:

Read this, especially the conclusion.

<http://wordpress.tsadra.org/?p=1215> " onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 3rd, 2012 at 12:37 AM

Title: Re: Uncontrived

Content:

Beatzen said:

I think it's ironic that ritualists like Tibetan buddhists criticize anything about zazen as contrived.

Malcolm wrote:

If you think you can sum Tibetan Buddhism up as ritualist, it means you have not understood anything at all about Tibetan Buddhism.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 3rd, 2012 at 12:29 AM

Title: Re: Using a mala

Content:

MalaBeads said:

I am interested in buying a mala. I have heard that different malas are used for different mantras. I would like to do Tara and Chenrezig mantras mostly. What kind of mala should I buy

Malcolm wrote:

You should get a bodhiseed mālā since the Buddhist tantras state quite clearly this is preferred general purpose mālā.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 2nd, 2012 at 11:08 PM

Title: Re: Emptiness in Yogacara

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

As an aside, what the Madhyamakas are trying to explain to the Yogacarin is that they cannot have their cake and eat it too.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 2nd, 2012 at 8:58 PM

Title: Re: ChNNR Dorje Drolo retreat

Content:

padma norbu said:

Looks like it's an open webcast after all!

This is from an email I got from Conway, MA:

3rd Feb.

4-6pm. - Introduction of this retreat teaching and the transmission of Ati Guru Yoga.

^ is that the correct US time and is that when the Dorje Drolo wang will be given?

...or more likely this day:

5th Feb.

10-12am. - Donwang of Guru Dorje Drolod and the instruction for doing the practice of Dorje Drolod in daily life.

Donwang appears to have the word "wang" in it.

Again, are these the correct US times? No need to add or subtract 2 or 3 hours? I pretty much always miss these things. Don't want to miss this one.

Malcolm wrote:

Argentina is two hours ahead of NY, so when the retreat starts at 4:00 pm, tune in at 2:00 pm.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 2nd, 2012 at 8:47 PM

Title: Re: Emptiness in Yogacara

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

well, yes, thats what they say, but I'll be damned if it makes any sense at all.

Malcolm wrote:

It makes sense: for them, paratantra is like a cloth; when it is dirty it is made dirty through the imagination of the false; but the dirt does not inhere to the cloth, when it is removed, it is perfect.

In reality, it is just an attempt to explain the Buddha's statement here:

"Luminous, monks, is the mind. [paratanta] And it is defiled by incoming defilements." [parikalpita]

"Luminous, monks, is the mind. [paratanta] And it is freed from incoming defilements." [parinispanna]

<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/an/an01/an01.049.than.html>
onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

Thanissaro mentions that the commentaries mention that this refers to the bhavanga citta, and we know for a fact that the Asanga equates the bhavanga citta with the ālayavijñāna.

For the yogacara, the emptiness of the mind lies in its innate freedom from affliction, this is why in the passage above that I introduced Vasubandhu terms this emptiness "unconditioned" while the imagination of the false is termed "conditioned".

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 2nd, 2012 at 9:08 AM

Title: Re: Emptiness in Yogacara

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

if the alaya is a designation only, then what kind of reality does it have beyond being parikalpita? if the seeds that are the basis of that designation is what is being called paratantra then, when there are "no more seeds", what is left? you said "a non-dual consciousness... now called wisdom" but what is that basis for that designation?

Malcolm wrote:

The non-dual consciousness is present from the beginning. This is why Yogacaras use the three own natures.

Paratantra is not parikalpita. Please don't confuse yourself and others by misusing these terms.

"The imagination (parikalpita) of the unreal exists (paratantra), duality does not exist (parinispanna) in that (paratantra).

Therefore, the basis of the designation for wisdom is paratantra in which the seeds have been removed [as the result of the transformation in the basis]. When the seeds have not been removed, paratantra is termed ālayavijñāna. The other seven consciousnesses are termed parikalpita, they are themselves the seeds which function dualistically.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 2nd, 2012 at 7:21 AM

Title: Re: Uncontrived

Content:

Beatzen said:

But in zazen, we aren't doing such things. Steadying the mind on the breath in the tanden region, we empty our mind of its contents and relax into glimpsing our original face.

Malcolm wrote:

That is a pretty contrived meditation, from this Tibetan Buddhist's POV.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 2nd, 2012 at 7:18 AM

Title: Re: Conventional & Ultimate Truth

Content:

Anders Honore said:

I freely admit, I am more interested in interpreting Yogacara prescriptively than descriptively. So my point of curiosity in this is: Without regard for what yogacara scholars may be saying about their own texts, is yogacara necessarily realist?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, as your citation below shows.

Anders Honore said:

le, you say yogacara goofed on the whole transformation thing, but did they have to commit this fallacy to retain the integrity of their system or not? I am thinking of passages like this from the platform sutra:

Although the sixth and seventh are transformed within the cause, the [first] five and the eighth are transformed on the basis of the result. Only the names are transformed; the [consciousnesses] are not transformed in their essences.)

Which strikes me as a simple solution to the controversy. If it is indeed so, it does make me wonder why the yogacarins were allegedly so vested in not opting for this solution.

Malcolm wrote:

This passage means that Yogacarins are cittamatrins.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 2nd, 2012 at 6:41 AM

Title: Re: Emptiness in Yogacara

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

the whole paratantra thing was parikalpita from the start.

Malcolm wrote:

This is one reason I find it unrewarding to have this discussion, as most people are incapable of weeding out how gzhan stong pas present the three natures [as you have above] and the way Yogacara scholars in India actually present them.

If, as you suggest, paratantra is parikalpita, then you are asserting that parinispanna is also completely non-existent. Why? Because the yogacara authors very clearly explain that the absence parikalpita in paratantra is parinispanna. This bears that consequence that paratantra must exist.

In any event, I did not invent the term āśrayaḥ parivarta. You can blame Yogacarins for that. If you carefully examine their literature, they are indeed asserting that there is a transformation of the kind described. This is especially clear in the Mahāyāna samgraha.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 2nd, 2012 at 5:43 AM

Title: Re: Conventional & Ultimate Truth

Content:

Mariusz said:

Are Bhaviveka and Candrakirti, Santarakṣita the Madhyamikas, who did not "never locate reference points"?

Namdrol said:

You should read them for yourself and find out what they think.

Mariusz said:

I can not find suitable english books these days. Can you recommend any books which deals directly with what I asked? As far as I know the quotes from Candrakirti, He never located reference points in the Two Truths, but for the purpose of the debate to help others understand Madhyamka He sometimes used suitable reference points as the "antidote, medicine" for them only. To free them "from all reference points", from clinging to the Two Truths, the freedom "beyond" the seeming=unblurred, unimpaired vision.

Malcolm wrote:

Procure and read Nāgārjuna's Reason Sixty. A somewhat clumsy translation, to be sure, but it has Candrakirti's commentary. Incidentally, Candrakirti's densest treatment of worldly convention seems to be contained in his commentary on the seventy verses on emptiness.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 2nd, 2012 at 5:25 AM

Title: Re: Emptiness in Yogacara

Content:

conebeckham said:

Regarding your comments about the internal contradiction in the three natures, my understanding of the Three Natures is that the False Nature is purely imaginary, thus obviously nonexistent, the Dependent nature is empty dependent origination, and the Perfect nature is neither existent nor nonexistent.

Malcolm wrote:

And this is a perfectly gzhan stong interpretation.

The way this is parsed in authentic Yogacara texts is that the non-existence of the imagined in the dependent is the perfected nature. Hence the citation above states that the imagination of the false is empty and not empty as well has existence, non-existence, and as well as existence.

The ālayavijñāna is the dependent nature; when the seeds within it are exhausted, there is a transformation in the basis, it's nature as the ālayavijñāna ceases, becoming wisdom. Why? The Yogacara designate the ālayavijñāna based upon the storage of seeds. When there are no more seeds, then there is no basis for designation of a container or storage place of seeds. What remains is a non-dual consciousness. That is not longer termed "mind", it is now termed "wisdom".

The sole thing that is refuted by the Yogacara school as being non-existent is duality. Duality does not exist in the imagination of the unreal. But the imagination itself exists. It's emptiness is solely emptiness of the unreal.

For this reason then we can understand their school is a non-dual realism i.e. "everything is not only empty".

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 2nd, 2012 at 4:47 AM

Title: Re: Tibetan Doctors, please read

Content:

Lhug-Pa said:

Would Chulen that is taken for the purpose of needing less sleep and having more energy for a retreat, have to be taken according to the instructions that Padma Norbu posted in the original post?

Or could these said Chudlen be taken the same way as say Bimala or Semde?

Malcolm wrote:

Chulen pills have a method of being blessed as in Mandarava practice, so use that.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 2nd, 2012 at 4:37 AM

Title: Re: Emptiness in Yogacara

Content:

conebeckham said:

Do we agree that the real question, regarding Yogacara, is not whether Buddhahood is the result of transformation or revaluation, but whether Yogacaras posit an absolute existent, such that they are to be considered "realists?"

Malcolm wrote:

The two questions are inextricably related. The Tibetan gzhan stong debates have caused the issue to become skewed.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 2nd, 2012 at 4:30 AM

Title: Re: Conventional & Ultimate Truth

Content:

conebeckham said:

In fact, Eighth Karmapa's commentary on the Abhisamayalamkara indicates that it is a mistake to think that, for instance, the Alayavijnana turns into Mirror-like wisdom, as many Mahamudra practitioners do. He says it is "not possible within the sphere of knowable objects that something impure turns into something pure," or vice versa.

Malcolm wrote:

This nevertheless is the fault of the yogacara school, the inner contradiction of their position that dependent nature must exist since it is what imagines the false. You must read very carefully what Vasubandhu says in the citation above.

The Karmapa's commentary, incidentally, will be based on either Ārya Vimuktisena's commentary Haribhadr's or a combination of both, depending whether he prefers a three kāya scheme following the former, or a four kāya scheme following the latter, so his commentary on that will hardly be relevant here.

We are discussing what Yogacara scholars say about their own texts.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 2nd, 2012 at 4:02 AM

Title: Re: Conventional & Ultimate Truth

Content:

Mariusz said:

Are Bhaviveka and Candrakirti, Santarakṣita the Madhyamikas, who did not "never locate reference points"?

Malcolm wrote:

You should read them for yourself and find out what they think.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 2nd, 2012 at 4:01 AM

Title: Re: Conventional & Ultimate Truth

Content:

conebeckham said:

Mahayanasutralamkara, VI. 8:

The mind that is aware that nothing other than mind exists.

Then, it is realized that mind does not exist either.

The intelligent ones are aware that both do not exist and abide in the Dharmadhatu, in which these are absent.

This would lead to "revealed," rather than transformed, yes?
Though it's true the Yogacara texts are constantly going on about the "fundamental change of state."

Malcolm wrote:

My response to this is the evidence provided in the Madhyāntavibhagatīka:

As it is said:

"The imagination of the unreal exists,
duality does not exist in that,
emptiness exists in this,
that also exists in that.

Now then, the imagination of the false means the concept of an apprehended object and the apprehending subject. Duality means free from a real apprehended object and an apprehending subject. Emptiness means the imagination of the false being free from a real apprehended object and an apprehending subject. "That also exists in that" means the imagination of the false. As such, that non-existence of something somewhere, that is truly seeing the empty truly just as it is. Whatever remains here, that is understood just as it truly is to exist here. As such, the characteristic of emptiness is demonstrated without mistake.

Not empty and not not empty,
in that way is everything explained,
because of existence, because of non-existence, because of existence,
that is the middle path.

"It is not empty" means emptiness and the imagination of the false. "It is not not-empty" means duality i.e. the apprehended object and an apprehending subject. 'Everything' means 'the imagination of the false' is the conditioned and 'emptiness' is the unconditioned. 'Explained' means demonstrated. 'Exists' means the imagination of the false. 'Non-existence' means duality. 'Existence' means emptiness exists in the imagination of the false, and the imagination of the false exists in that too. "That is the middle path" means everything is not only empty.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 2nd, 2012 at 2:08 AM

Title: Re: Conventional & Ultimate Truth

Content:

Namdrol said:

What they propose is that a mind freed from subject object transforms into wisdom, and if this wisdom does not really exist, liberation is impossible. In order for this wisdom to exist, then the mind out of which wisdom is transformed necessarily must exist. Yogacara thus becomes a non-dual realist system. This is not simply a prasanga distinction -- this is a universal mahdyamaka charge against the treatises of yogacara.

N

gad rgyangs said:

"transforms into wisdom" or "is revealed as wisdom"?

Malcolm wrote:

Transforms.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 2nd, 2012 at 1:42 AM

Title: Re: Conventional & Ultimate Truth

Content:

conebeckham said:

Some "Yogacaras" don't posit that Mind ultimately exists, I should point out. Or, so say some Tibetan commentators. The standard objection of some Tibetan "Prasangika Madhyamika adherents" often ignores this....

Malcolm wrote:

What they propose is that a mind freed from subject object transforms into wisdom, and if this wisdom does not really exist, liberation is impossible. In order for this wisdom to exist, then the mind out of which wisdom is transformed necessarily must exist. Yogacara thus becomes a non-dual realist system. This is not simply a prasanga distinction -- this is a universal mahdyamaka charge against the treatises of yogacara.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 2nd, 2012 at 12:44 AM

Title: Re: ChNNR Dorje Drolo retreat

Content:

dakini_boi said:

How do you log on to a closed webcast? Go to the normal webcast site? Anything special you have to do?

Malcolm wrote:

Use your webcast team assigned user name and password on the login page which is found on the files page

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, February 1st, 2012 at 11:36 PM

Title: Re: Buddhism and Peak Oil

Content:

mañjughoṣamaṇi said:

Technology is only one part of the equation. Without addressing the other two we will just rip through whatever savings we may find through more efficient technologies.

Malcolm wrote:

Then there is the Jevons Paradox:

In 1865, the English economist William Stanley Jevons observed that technological improvements that increased the efficiency of coal-use led to the increased consumption of coal in a wide range of industries. He argued that, contrary to common intuition, technological improvements could not be relied upon to reduce fuel consumption.

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Jevons_paradox " onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

This led to a reexamination and restatement as the Khazzoom-Brookes postulate:

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Khazzoom-Brookes_postulate " onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

"When individuals change behavior and begin to use methods and devices that are more energy efficient, there are cases where, on a macro-economic level, energy usage actually increases." The effect of higher energy prices, either through taxes or producer-induced shortages, initially reduces demand but in the longer term encourages greater energy efficiency. This efficiency response amounts to a partial accommodation of the price rise and thus the reduction in demand is blunted. The end result is a new balance between supply and demand at a higher level of supply and consumption than if there had been no efficiency response.

<http://www-dse.ec.unipi.it/persona/docenti/luzzati/italiano/didattica/herringefficiency.pdf> " onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;"

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, February 1st, 2012 at 11:02 PM

Title: Re: Dependent origination Vs Interdependent

Content:

gregkavarnos said:

If the seed exists in the sprout then it is not a cause it is an effect. Something cannot be a cause and an effect simultaneously.

If the sprout arises from the seed then the sprout exists as the seed. Something cannot be an effect and a cause at the same time.

If the seed exists independently of the sprout or the sprout exists independently of the seed then we fall into eternalism as we have uncaused effects.

If neither the seed nor the sprout exist we fall into nihilism.

Malcolm wrote:

Nagarjuna says about this, and repeated by Candrakirti in the Prasannapāda is that causes and effects are neither the same nor are they different, using the example of milk and butter.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, February 1st, 2012 at 10:57 PM

Title: Re: Conventional & Ultimate Truth

Content:

DarwidHalim said:

By the way, the concept of particle only valid for Vaibhasika and Sautrantika.

Cittamantra already reject particle. Cittamantra itself is rejected further by Madyamika.

Cittamantra say everything is mind, and the existence of mind is rejected by Madyamika.

Malcolm wrote:

Some Madhyamakas, such as Bhaviveka and Candrakirti, accepted the model of relative truth proposed by the Sautrantikas, but rejected that of Yogacara. Others, such as Santarakṣita, accepted the relative truth proposed by Yogacara but rejected Yogacara presentations of the ultimate.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, February 1st, 2012 at 9:25 PM

Title: Re: ChNNR Dorje Drolo retreat

Content:

Sherlock said:

The wang will be given through the webcast too?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, a so called don dbang, a meaning empowerment.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, February 1st, 2012 at 9:23 PM

Title: Re: Buddhism and Peak Oil

Content:

Aemilius said:

Actually romans did have machines, here is a picture of a roman sawmill, as an example:

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/File:R%C3%B6mische_S%C3%A4gem%C3%BChle.svg

Namdrol said:

Yes, run by slaves. The cotton gin was also a machine, albeit run by slaves.

Aemilius said:

The roman saw mill uses the power of gravity, ie the flowing of water to a lower level, as in a normal waterpowered electricity generator.

Malcolm wrote:

Manned by slaves again.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, February 1st, 2012 at 9:09 PM

Title: Re: Conventional & Ultimate Truth

Content:

DarwidHalim said:

Partless particle is absurd.

Partless means no part.

Malcolm wrote:

Partless particles are a Sautranika tenet, not a tenet of Bhavaviveka.

Partless particle have no sides i.e. no top bottom, east, west, etc. They do not adhere to one another as in the building block idea of atoms of the Vaibhaṣika school that have sides, etc., which form matter by adhering to the sides of each other.

This is all basic Abhidharma, and do not really have much to do with Mahdyamaka.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, February 1st, 2012 at 4:31 AM

Title: Re: Understanding The Basis

Content:

Namdrol said:

No that, in his lingo, is self-perfected.

Pero said:

Yeah but I think sometimes he says infinite potentiality (not primordial, my mistake).

You know like when he's saying not only emptiness (ka dag) but also infinite potentiality.

Couldn't we say that lhun grub is the potential for manifestation and thugs rje is the way this potential manifests (as either dang, rolpa or tsal)?

Malcolm wrote:

We talk about three wisdoms, but really, these three are aspects of a single state.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, February 1st, 2012 at 1:52 AM

Title: Re: Understanding The Basis

Content:

Namdrol said:

It's a meaning gloss. On the other hand, "energy" does not fully express theb nirmanakāya activity of benefitting sentient beings, of which it is the base (hence the reason the wisdom of the basis is described as thug rjes or karuna). So I prefer to translate it as compassion, save energy for "rtsal". "Energy", in my opinion is too vague since it does necessarily included the fact that nirmanakāyas manifest to guide sentient beings.

Someone who understands Dzogchen teachings will then understand the unpacked meaning of thugs rje with the seen the three wisdoms described. ChNN these days tends to translate it as "primordial potentiality". No matter what, when ever it is explained, you always have to mention that it literally means "compassion".

Pero said:

Hmmm I thought primordial/infinite potentiality was lhun grub.

Malcolm wrote:

No that, in his lingo, is self-perfected.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 31st, 2012 at 11:13 PM

Title: Re: Teacher & Root Guru

Content:

AlexanderS said:

Wouldn't it be necessary, to actually have formally have asked a teacher to be your root guru before it is so. I mean, that there is a formal and conscious relationship between the teacher and the student. I wouldn't want to break heavy samaya by slandering or having wrong views about my root guru without actually consciously knowing he is my root guru.

Malcolm wrote:

Whenever a guru gives a major empowerment or direct introduction, there is always a possibility that one or more students will have an authentic discovery of their true state. He already accepts that some students their may discover their real nature, and that they might come to regard him or her as their root guru. That is what it means to take responsibility for giving transmission. When someone gives transmission they are doing so in order to help people become realized, to realized their own nature. When that happens, that guru becomes the root guru for that student, and from then on that student has real knowledge of their own nature. The person who removes that doubt for you is your root guru and no other. It also does not mean you realize that right away. Sometimes it may take you a little while to figure out. So there is never any need to ask formal permission from some Lama "Oh, can I consider you my root teacher"-- if they say yes, than what shall you do? If you do this, it means you do not have real knowledge of your state or that you have some doubts or are in a state of confusion. Especially if the request is based on just some sort of love-sick emotion that poses as faith (which happens a lot, and why unstable western students often leave this or that lama when the infatuation wears off). The identity of your root guru is based on your own knowledge. No one can tell you who your root guru is, not even some Lama who is acting as a guru. If some Lama declares to you "I am your root guru" before you have some real knowledge of the teachings, then be careful, especially if you have never received some sort of empowerment or direct introduction from that person. If you take a major empowerment from some guru, as I have said, according to the system of Sakya, etc., this person already is your root guru. In this system, one can therefore have as many root gurus as one has received major empowerments. Receiving the four empowerments automatically makes them your root guru. If you received sixteen major empowerments from sixteen different gurus you have sixteen root gurus. According to this system, however, there is also the concept of the karmic link root guru which resembles the Kagyu and Nyingma approach i.e. based on this guru's instructions you have an authentic realization of the nature of your mind. So, if you are approaching this from a Kagyu and Dzogchen point of view, and you do not have real confidence in your state, then you don't have to consider anyone your root guru. Of course you still have gurus -- but when you have real conviction and knowledge then those people who have given you that conviction and knowledge are your actual root gurus. Before that time, they are just your gurus."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 31st, 2012 at 11:13 PM

Title: Re: Teacher & Root Guru

Content:

AlexanderS said:

Wouldn't it be necessary, to actually have formally have asked a teacher to be your root guru before it is so. I mean, that there is a formal and conscious relationship between the teacher and the student. I wouldn't want to break heavy samaya by slandering or having wrong views about my root guru without actually consciously knowing he is my root guru.

Malcolm wrote:

Whenever a guru gives a major empowerment or direct introduction, there is always a possibility that one or more students will have an authentic discovery of their true state. He already accepts that some students their may discover their real nature, and that they might come to regard him or her as their root guru. That is what it means to take responsibility for giving transmission. When someone gives transmission they are doing so in order to help people become realized, to realized their own nature. When that happens, that guru becomes the root guru for that student, and from then on that student has real knowledge of their own nature. The person who removes that doubt for you is your root guru and no other. It also does not mean you realize that right away. Sometimes it may take you a little while to figure out. So there is never any need to ask formal permission from some Lama "Oh, can I consider you my root teacher"-- if they say yes, than what shall you do? If you do this, it means you do not have real knowledge of your state or that you have some doubts or are in a state of confusion. Especially if the request is based on just some sort of love-sick emotion that poses as faith (which happens a lot, and why unstable western students often leave this or that lama when the infatuation wears off). The identity of your root guru is based on your own knowledge. No one can tell you who your root guru is, not even some Lama who is acting as a guru. If some Lama declares to you "I am your root guru" before you have some real knowledge of the teachings, then be careful, especially if you have never received some sort of empowerment or direct introduction from that person. If you take a major empowerment from some guru, as I have said, according to the system of Sakya, etc., this person already is your root guru. In this system, one can therefore have as many root gurus as one has received major empowerments. Receiving the four empowerments automatically makes them your root guru. If you received sixteen major empowerments from sixteen different gurus you have sixteen root gurus. According to this system, however, there is also the concept of the karmic link root guru which resembles the Kagyu and Nyingma approach i.e. based on this guru's instructions you have an authentic realization of the nature of your mind. So, if you are approaching this from a Kagyu and Dzogchen point of view, and you do not have real confidence in your state, then you don't have to consider anyone your root guru. Of course you still have gurus -- but when you have real conviction and knowledge then those people who have given you that conviction and knowledge are your actual root gurus. Before that time, they are just your gurus."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 31st, 2012 at 10:07 PM

Title: Re: Teacher & Root Guru

Content:

Namdrol said:

According to the traditions of Sakya, Gelug and Jonang, a root guru is anyone from whom one has received the four empowerments.

In Kagyu, a root guru is someone who actually caused you to recognize the nature of your mind in a non-intellectual way.

In Dzogchen, a root guru is the person who introduces one to one's primordial state in an unmistakable way.

Clarence said:

N-la,

Is there a difference between what is shown in Kagyu and Dzogchen or do they both show the same thing, only the way to get there is different?

Best, C

Malcolm wrote:

You will probably get different answers, but the former is included in the latter, so there is some similarity of meaning. The terminology is very different however, and there are key differences between the two presentations that depend on their respective paths.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 31st, 2012 at 10:07 PM

Title: Re: Teacher & Root Guru

Content:

Namdrol said:

According to the traditions of Sakya, Gelug and Jonang, a root guru is anyone from whom one has received the four empowerments.

In Kagyu, a root guru is someone who actually caused you to recognize the nature of your mind in a non-intellectual way.

In Dzogchen, a root guru is the person who introduces one to one's primordial state in an unmistakable way.

Clarence said:

N-la,

Is there a difference between what is shown in Kagyu and Dzogchen or do they both show the same thing, only the way to get there is different?

Best, C

Malcolm wrote:

You will probably get different answers, but the former is included in the latter, so there is some similarity of meaning. The terminology is very different however, and there are key differences between the two presentations that depend on their respective paths.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 31st, 2012 at 9:30 PM

Title: Re: Teacher & Root Guru

Content:

Totoro said:

In another post Gregkarvanos said:

A teacher is one thing, but a root guru is a completely different deal!

When does a teacher become a root guru? Say, if a teacher decides to spend a couple of years or so to check out a disciple and vice versa, before 'accepting' him as a serious student, what will happen to change that status to 'root guru'? Thanks.

Malcolm wrote:

According to the traditions of Sakya, Gelug and Jonang, a root guru is anyone from whom one has received the four empowerments.

In Kagyu, a root guru is someone who actually caused you to recognize the nature of your mind in a non-intellectual way.

In Dzogchen, a root guru is the person who introduces one to one's primordial state in an unmistakable way.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 31st, 2012 at 9:30 PM

Title: Re: Teacher & Root Guru

Content:

Totoro said:

In another post Gregkarvanos said:

A teacher is one thing, but a root guru is a completely different deal!

When does a teacher become a root guru? Say, if a teacher decides to spend a couple of years or so to check out a disciple and vice versa, before 'accepting' him as a serious student, what will happen to change that status to 'root guru'? Thanks.

Malcolm wrote:

According to the traditions of Sakya, Gelug and Jonang, a root guru is anyone from whom one has received the four empowerments.

In Kagyu, a root guru is someone who actually caused you to recognize the nature of your mind in a non-intellectual way.

In Dzogchen, a root guru is the person who introduces one to one's primordial state in an unmistakable way.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 31st, 2012 at 9:07 PM

Title: Re: Dzogchen Chod vs Mahamudra Chod

Content:

twonny said:

As far as I know there is no such think as Dzogchen or Mahamudra chod

Malcolm wrote:

Sure there are. Jigme Lingpa's chö is an example of Chö from the Dzogchen tradition.

Troma Nagmo from Dudjom Tersar is another. These chö practices are marked by using termonology from the system of Dzogchen.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 31st, 2012 at 9:05 PM

Title: Re: Buddhism and Peak Oil

Content:

Aemilius said:

Actually romans did have machines, here is a picture of a roman sawmill, as an example:

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/File:R%C3%B6mische_S%C3%A4gem%C3%BChle.svg

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, run by slaves. The cotton gin was also a machine, albeit run by slaves.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 31st, 2012 at 9:03 PM

Title: Re: Understanding The Basis

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

thugs rje rig pa'i ye shes su bzhugs pas mkhyen pa'i cha ma 'gag par so sor gsal kyang
bya ba dang byed pa'i rnam pa yul yul can du snang ba ni med do/

Namdrol said:

Though the knowing part manifests individually without ceasing [mkhyen pa'i cha ma 'gag par so sor gsal kyang] since compassion is present as the wisdom of vidyā [thugs rje rig pa'i ye shes su bzhugs pas], the aspect of action and agent [bya ba dang byed pa'i rnam] appearing as [du snang ba] an object and a subject [yul yul can] does not exist.

gad rgyangs said:

thanks, this is awesome! first, i'm wondering how the published version translated "rig pa'i ye shes" as "intrinsic awareness (rig pa) of pristine wisdom (ye shes)", it seems backwards to me, or doesn't it really matter?

Malcolm wrote:

It matters. It is a genetive constuction. Also intrinsic awareness in an inappropriate gloss. Pristine is a little weird because it is usage that dates from 16th century which is not generally current. These days pristine means "new or fresh", generally not "original, former, primitive and undeveloped", unless we are talking about old growth forests and wilderness as in "pristine wilderness". Ye nas "has always" is a synonym of rtag tu, "will always, permanently", etc., and as a clause in Tibetan functions the same way.

gad rgyangs said:

I've been thinking about "energy" as the translation of thugs rje...

Malcolm wrote:

It's a meaning gloss. On the other hand, "energy" does not fully express theb nirmanakāya activity of benefitting sentient beings, of which it is the base (hence the reason the wisdom of the basis is described as thug rjes or karuna). So I prefer to translate it as compassion, save energy for "rtsal". "Energy", in my opinion is too vague since it does necessarily included the fact that nirmanakāyas manifest to guide sentient beings.

Someone who understands Dzogchen teachings will then understand the unpacked meaning of thugs rje with the seen the three wisdoms described. ChNN these days tends to translate it as "primordial potentiality". No matter what, when ever it is explained, you always have to mention that it literally means "compassion".

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 31st, 2012 at 7:36 AM

Title: Re: ChNNR Dorje Drolo retreat

Content:

arsent said:

It seems to me it will be an open webcast..

Malcolm wrote:

It isn't

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 31st, 2012 at 6:56 AM

Title: Re: Understanding The Basis

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

thugs rje rig pa'i ye shes su bzhugs pas mkhyen pa'i cha ma 'gag par so sor gsal kyang
bya ba dang byed pa'i rnam pa yul yul can du snang ba ni med do/

Malcolm wrote:

Though the knowing part manifests individually without ceasing [mkhyen pa'i cha ma 'gag par so sor gsal kyang] since compassion is present as the wisdom of vidyā [thugs rje rig pa'i ye shes su bzhugs pas], the aspect of action and agent [bya ba dang byed pa'i rnam] appearing as [du snang ba] an object and a subject [yul yul can] does not exist.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 31st, 2012 at 4:47 AM

Title: Re: ChNNR Dorje Drolo retreat

Content:

padma norbu said:

Thanks for the clarification, Namdrol. I'm sure I would practice incorrectly, but maybe it's something I could do on my deathbed.

Malcolm wrote:

It is best to have such a teaching so it can be practiced when needed.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 31st, 2012 at 4:06 AM

Title: Re: Understanding The Basis

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

if sentient beings and buddhas are the basis' awareness, what the basis' awareness manifests as, then it is not necessary to posit an aware entity that is dangerously close to being a deity. the basis sleeps in its bardo, and its awareness (us) is withdrawn. it wakes, and we manifest.

Namdrol said:

This is basically how it is -- but since there is no individuating consciousnesses driven by affliction, the awareness latent in the basis is not discussed in plural terms, that is until there are individuating consciousnesses when samasara and nirvana "turn their back to each other".

gad rgyangs said:

ok. now: next problem. what the heck is this cyclic thingy of the basis, its "sleeping" phase, with latent awareness, and its manifest phase? first of all, this is temporal, and certainly anything that is beyond concepts of existence or non-existence is going to be way beyond temporality. so, the basis cannot actually have a cycle, its tsal maybe does whatever it wants, including cycles, but not the basis itself.

Malcolm wrote:

Oh, this comes about because of traces of action and ignorance. Nothing in the basis changes, of course, what happens is that there is sort of cosmic pulsation of ignorance and its subsidence which results in the appearance and disappearance of samsara and nirvana; and as we know, traces can accumulate in wisdom.

You have to understand that all of this explanation of cosmic cycles is really intended to be brought down to the level of the individual's life cycle in terms of the four bardos:

The bardo of death == destruction of the universe up to the two higher form realms

The bardo of dharmatā == the arising of the sound, light and rays of the basis

The bardo of becoming == non-recognition of the basis

The natural bardo of this life == the appearance of samsara and nirvana

It is an explanation for practice.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 31st, 2012 at 3:44 AM

Title: Re: ChNNR Dorje Drolo retreat

Content:

padma norbu said:

heehee, I should do this retreat just so you can all see just how bad the results can be... but, seriously, thanks again for the info. Will steer clear of this one for sure.

asunthatneversets said:

Why steer clear? It's not often opportunities like this come up, even if you receive the wang, lung and tri and don't do the practice at this point in time it's still good to receive the teaching... you may change your mind in the future and then you're already locked and loaded. Not everyone has access to teachings like this, or teachers like ChNN, you have the opportunity, I'd say take advantage of it. Authentic teachers are few and far between and life is delicate and can be lost at any moment, now is the time!

padma norbu said:

Uh... I don't need any more obstacles and I'm crazy enough already. Based on what Namdrol has said here, at least I have enough sense to avoid this teaching. I'm just thankful for the knowledge and wanted to express my thanks. I've received other teachings without knowledge of what it fully entails and didn't appreciate it too much. I would be furious if I learned this practice can create obstacles or madness after the fact, when my life seems to be going even more haywire than it already is.

Malcolm wrote:

Receiving the teaching does not cause problems -- practicing it incorrectly does.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 31st, 2012 at 3:23 AM

Title: Re: Understanding The Basis

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

if sentient beings and buddhas are the basis' awareness, what the basis' awareness manifests as, then it is not necessary to posit an aware entity that is dangerously close to being a deity. the basis sleeps in its bardo, and its awareness (us) is withdrawn. it wakes, and we manifest.

Malcolm wrote:

This is basically how it is -- but since there is no individuating consciousnesses driven by affliction, the awareness latent in the basis is not discussed in plural terms, that is until there are individuating consciousnesses when samasara and nirvana "turn their back to each other".

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 30th, 2012 at 9:54 PM

Title: Re: Evidence for Design?

Content:

Adumbra said:

There is really no strong refutation of theism once you trade in the idea of a good and perfect creator for one who is, at best, amoral and capable of error such as the demiurgos of Plato's conception.

gregkavarnos said:

Of course there is, Dependent Origination, yah know???

Malcolm wrote:

Thank you, Greg.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 30th, 2012 at 9:19 PM

Title: Re: Buddhism and Peak Oil

Content:

Aemilius said:

They didn't have machines, that's true, but they had some form of mass production of tiles. It is justified when historians have said that certain emperors owned tile factories.

Malcolm wrote:
Yes, millions of slaves.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Monday, January 30th, 2012 at 9:18 PM
Title: Re: Understanding The Basis
Content:

Namdrol said:
The basis is the three kāyas. The three kāyas are free from thought, but the basis is not a mere inert void.

gad rgyangs said:
2 questions:

1. is the basis aware in any way, or are we sentient beings and not-quite-perfect-buddhas the only manifestations of sentience?

Malcolm wrote:
Define what you mean by "aware".

gad rgyangs said:
2. can we agree (in the interests of communication) that rang byung ye shes (self arisen wisdom) usually pertains to the base, is in fact a synonym for the base, and rigpa is the manifestation of that ye shes in/as a sentient being?

Malcolm wrote:
Rigpa is one's knowledge of the basis and that is all. Rigpa is not the basis.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Monday, January 30th, 2012 at 9:08 PM
Title: Re: ChNNR Dorje Drolo retreat
Content:

michaelb said:
I know. I attended some teachings in London a couple of years ago, and have watched quite a few open webcasts, and met up with local members for the transmission. but joining just for one closed webcast when i really want teachings on another terma may not be the best reason to join.

Malcolm wrote:
It could be a perfect reason to join.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 30th, 2012 at 9:07 PM

Title: Re: ChNNR Dorje Drolo retreat

Content:

Clarence said:

Having everything decentralized just doesn't work efficiently in this case.

Malcolm wrote:

It is mostly an issue of differences in international law.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 30th, 2012 at 8:54 AM

Title: Re: Understanding The Basis

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

so its more like the basis is a container for this aggregate of latent awarenesses, rather than it being the awareness of the basis itself?

Namdrol said:

It is part of the rtsal of the basis.

The basis is not one thing, it is not many. It is the dharmadhātu.

N

gad rgyangs said:

so sentient beings and buddhas are part of the tsal of the basis, but the basis itself has no awareness, since during the bardo phase, the latent awarenesses in the basis are really the dormant sentient beings and non-'samyak sambuddha' buddhas? where are the samyak sambuddhas then, if the basis is the dharmakaya, they must be there too? i mean, there's no "larger context" within which the basis is found, no "where" outside the basis where the samyak sambuddhas would be?

Malcolm wrote:

The basis is the three kāyas. The three kāyas are free from thought, but the basis is not a mere inert void.

There is no larger context and you know better than to ask one of the fourteen questions Buddha refused to answer (i.e. where do tathagatas go after death).

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 30th, 2012 at 6:20 AM

Title: Re: Understanding The Basis

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

so its more like the basis is a container for this aggregate of latent awarenesses, rather than it being the awareness of the basis itself?

Malcolm wrote:

It is part of the rtsal of the basis.

The basis is not one thing, it is not many. It is the dharmadhātu.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 30th, 2012 at 5:07 AM

Title: Re: Evidence for Design?

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

so what becomes of the latent awareness of the basis? are we it?

Malcolm wrote:

When the latent awareness (shes pa bag la nyal] of the basis recognizes the basis as its own display, it becomes prajñā [shes rab] and realizes buddhahood as Samantabhadra.

When the latent awareness of the basis does not recognize itself, under the power of the imputing ignorance that imputs appearances as other and that awareness as a self, it becomes consciousness [rnam par shes pa].

The 'latent awareness of the basis' is an aggregate name for all those beings who have not achieved total buddhahood in the previous eon, but achieved a so called "buddhahood that reverts to the cause", [as I have explained now several times within the last few weeks] in the same way that we refer to the aggregated consciousnesses of all sentient beings as the vijñānadhātu, along with dhātus of earth, water, air, fire and space, the so called sadadhātu, the six dhātus.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 30th, 2012 at 4:45 AM

Title: Re: Misunderstanding emptiness

Content:

Fruitzilla said:

Call me Fruity if you like, but I then start wondering why Nagarjuna is so highly valued in Mahayana circles, and his work explained on such a broad basis, instead of the narrow one for which it seems it was initially meant.

It does make good sense to me in the narrow way, and it explains why in the broad way it often feels like missing the mark.

Thanks!

Malcolm wrote:

Most of Nagarjuna's works are critical, but they are based in Mahāyāna sūtra perspectives, specifically, the prajñāpāramitā sūtras.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 30th, 2012 at 3:29 AM

Title: Re: Misunderstanding emptiness

Content:

yadave said:

My smart phone knows my name.

Malcolm wrote:

So it is a "knowing knower?"

Related to your other comment, there are instances where Nagarjuna's refutations are completely irrelevant in the modern context, and instances where they are relevant and very much so.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 30th, 2012 at 3:11 AM

Title: Re: Evidence for Design?

Content:

Namdrol said:

Apparently not in Dzogchen, since during this phase, there are neither buddhas nor sentient beings, no samsara, no nirvana. This the reason why the basis is also called "the bardo of samsara and nirvana", meaning that neither are manifest during this period.

gad rgyangs said:

hang on: the basis isn't only during the bardo. what about the basis right now?

Malcolm wrote:

The basis is called the basis because it has not been realized.

At present the basis is not latent, like it is between eons. At present the basis is in a state of manifestation as Buddhas and sentient beings. When the basis is latent, we term it "the time of the basis" or "the bardo of samsara and nirvana". After the basis manifests we term this phase "samsara and nirvana turn their backs to one another". When we

When we fully realize the path of dzogchen, it is called "the universe manifests as the basis": in other words, our total experience will be the three wisdoms subsumed under the name, great original purity.

The basis itself has not changed in anyway during these three time periods.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 30th, 2012 at 1:42 AM

Title: Re: Evidence for Design?

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

i was thinking of the general sense of knowing awareness, more specifically self-awareness. in the sense of rigpa maybe? im just interested in the idea that if the basis is not conscious, so where does consciousness in general, and rigpa specifically, come from?

Namdrol said:

The basis possesses a neutral or latent awareness [shes pa lung ma bstan or shes pa bag la nyal] which is unaware of itself. But this is only a very general way of speaking, just as we speak of the six dhātus: earth, water, fire, air, space and consciousness.

gad rgyangs said:

isnt awareness (of any kind) a characteristic of a sentient being, indeed the definition of a sentient being?

Malcolm wrote:

Apparently not in Dzogchen, since during this phase, there are neither buddhas nor sentient beings, no samsara, no nirvana. This the reason why the basis is also called "the bardo of samsara and nirvana", meaning that neither are manifest during this period.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 30th, 2012 at 1:21 AM

Title: Re: Evidence for Design?

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

i was thinking of the general sense of knowing awareness, more specifically self-awareness. in the sense of rigpa maybe? im just interested in the idea that if the basis is not conscious, so where does consciousness in general, and rigpa specifically, come from?

Malcolm wrote:

The basis possesses a neutral or latent awareness [shes pa lung ma bstan or shes pa bag la nyal] which is unaware of itself. But this is only a very general way of speaking, just as we speak of the six dhātus: earth, water, fire, air, space and consciousness.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 30th, 2012 at 1:13 AM

Title: Re: Evidence for Design?

Content:

Namdrol said:

Thugs rjes (karuna) is the word used to describe the nirmanakāya function of the basis. As long as we understand that is what compassion means, we do not need a better word than compassion to describe this aspect of the basis.

N

gad rgyangs said:

so on what level does cognizance make its appearance: dharmakaya, sambhogakaya, or nirmanakaya?

Malcolm wrote:

What is the Tibetan word for you are using "cognizance"?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 30th, 2012 at 12:45 AM

Title: Re: Evidence for Design?

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

then the basis is just a metaphor (fine with me).

Namdrol said:

Well, no -- compassion is the basis for the expression of the nirmanakāya and its activities.

gad rgyangs said:

maybe "compassion" and "responsiveness" are not good translations then, since they are so clearly agentive. Rinpoche in Crystal +Way of Light seems to be translating thugs rje as "energy"

Malcolm wrote:

Thugs rjes (karuna) is the word used to describe the nirmanakāya function of the basis. As long as we understand that is what compassion means, we do not need a better word than compassion to describe this aspect of the basis.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 30th, 2012 at 12:43 AM

Title: Re: Evidence for Design?

Content:

AdmiraUim said:

Ok I understand now, but it raises the question what are we seeking liberation from and how does a Bodhisattva save all sentient beings

Malcolm wrote:

We are seeking liberation from beginningless samsara; and bodhisattvas do not save all sentient beings, they merely wish to do so.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 29th, 2012 at 10:14 AM

Title: Re: Evidence for Design?

Content:

AdmiraUim said:

where did these previous beings from the previous universe come from? it just goes around in circles and would only work if there were a finite amount of beings

Malcolm wrote:

From the universe prior to that ad infinitum. The logic of dependent origination does not permit of any sort of beginnings whatsoever. No first causes, no first moment, no first universe, etc. There are an infinite number of sentient beings who also have no beginning.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 29th, 2012 at 9:47 AM

Title: Re: Evidence for Design?

Content:

AdmiraUim said:

Design means to draw or create deliberately according to some plan -- but instead the universe arose because the blind force of the collective actions of ignorant sentient beings [from a previous universe]/quote where did these previous beings come from?

Malcolm wrote:

The previous universe.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 29th, 2012 at 9:21 AM

Title: Re: Misunderstanding emptiness

Content:

yadave said:

You caught my sense Tom, it was about the ball, MMK CH2:1 is about the rolling.

Malcolm wrote:

MMK refutes moving movers, such as rolling balls. The minute you suggest that balls roll, then automatically the subroutine that refutes rolling rollers kicks in.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 29th, 2012 at 2:39 AM

Title: Re: Candrakirti and the ālaya

Content:

cloudburst said:

Yes, persons and aggregates exist conventionally.

We can reject the alaya as a non-existent by carefully reading Chandrakirti.

Malcolm wrote:

So in other words, you admit that it is not explicitly obvious that Candrakirti rejects ālaya conventionally, and this rejection must be based on a "careful" reading of the MAV.

cloudburst said:

In the MAV verse you cite above, he says that although things are natureless, he taught that they exist. This can only mean that although things are natureless, he taught that they exist by nature, because otherwise he wouldn't have set up natureless and existence as opposites and used the word "though." So Buddha taught that the alaya, persons, aggregates, etc exist inherently or by nature whereas they do not.

Malcolm wrote:

Here is Candra's statment commenting on 6:46:

"Now then, if it is said that ālayavijñāna is something which is said in the Ārya Lankāvatara and so on to be the basis [possessing a special power of limitless phenomena] of all seeds which are the cause of the arising of all things, like waves and an ocean. Does that not exist as arising in any way at all?"

Such is not the case, but that was demonstrated as stated because it is demonstrated as existing to those to be disciplined. In order to introduce the nature [svabhāva] of all things, only emptiness is demonstrated by the word ālayajijñāna."

If you read this passage alone, you will come away with the idea that Candrakīrti is basically saying there is no ālaya. But...

Jayananda's expansion of this passage is interesting, and I think it is likely a source of disagreement among Tibetan scholars on this point because of a) how he qualifies Candrakīrti's discussion b) because his is the only Indian commentary we possess after Candrakīrti's bhasya of MAV. I have parsed out the passage for clarity and have spent some time doing so today since I don't know that anyone has actually looked at this before (maybe, perhaps in some journal somewhere).

That 'suppose' is for demonstrating the argument of the cittamātrins, it is said "Supposing in that way...". When 'presented in connection with the result of actions', though the ālayavijñāna does not exist, since the actions lack a nature, the conclusion of a perished action is presented as the production of the the result of action in the relative [samvṛtti].

The 'basis which has a special power of limitless phenomena' means a consciousness of the appearance of infinite phenomena such as blue, yellow, and so on. The power of those means the traces (vāsanā). For example, like the scent arising from approaching a flower, in that same way, the consciousness of blue and so on perfume the ālayavijñāna; it is the basis or support of the traces. Therefore, this is the significance of saying it is the cause of all the seeds (bījas) i.e. consciousnesses.

Now in order to demonstrate the example, waves and so on are mentioned.

'The cause of the arising all things' means because it is the cause of giving rise to the consciousness of the appearances of blue and so on.

"Ārya Lankāvatara and so on..." says
The ālayavijñāna is deep and subtle, like a flowing river upon which all the seeds fall,
I do not teach this to the immature since they will imagine they should impute a self.
'Does that not exist in anyway?' means 'has it never existed'?

Now then, in order to respond to the question, it is said 'Such is not the case...' and so on.

'Such is not the case' means 'it is not non-existent', but on the other hand, 'it was taught as existent for a purpose by the Bhagavan.'

'That was demonstrated as stated because it is demonstrated as existing to those to be disciplined' means 'Since the ālayavijñāna was demonstrated as existent, the ālayavijñāna was demonstrated as existent to those persons who were to be disciplined'.

Ultimately [don dam], because the 'ālayavijñāna' is demonstrated as being an description of only emptiness, it is said '...the nature of all things' and so on.

For what reason is it said 'In order to introduce the nature of all things'? It is for introducing the the emptiness of things with "Not from self, not from other..." i.e. only emptiness is the ālaya, but because of the consciousness of that [emptiness] itself [de nyid] i.e. because of the perfect comprehension of that is free from perception of all phenomena [chos thams cad mi dmigs pa], therefore, emptiness itself is demonstrated by the term ālayavijñāna."

I submit therefore that this passage opens up a very different way of looking the Candrakirtian treatment of the ālayavijñāna. Since we ought to accept that Jayānanda possessed the oral lineage of interpreting this text, I think we can safely say that this passage means we really ought to carefully rethink whether Candrakirti so thoroughly rejects ālayavijñāna as some Tibetan Madhyamaka scholars seem to think he does.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 28th, 2012 at 10:34 PM

Title: Re: Evidence for Design?

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

in the Dzogchen view, the characteristics of the basis are purity (kadag, emptiness), inexhaustible and uninterrupted manifestation (lhundrup) and responsiveness/compassion (thugje). now, can there be compassion and responsiveness as an impersonal phenomena? I don't see how, since it is by definition intentional, and intentionality is a characteristic of consciousness, of awareness.

Namdrol said:

Gems are inert, so they have no intention. Whoever possesses that gem can get what they want.

Likewise, compassion has no intentionlity, but since everyone posssess that basis, liberation is possible for all sentient beings.

gad rgyangs said:

then the basis is just a metaphor (fine with me).

Malcolm wrote:

Well, no -- compassion is the basis for the expression of the nirmanakāya and its activities.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 28th, 2012 at 10:29 PM

Title: Candrakirti and the ālaya

Content:

cloudburst said:

Did Gorampa accept that the Alaya as a consciousness was non-existent like the hair on a bald man's head? If not we DO disagree there which as the original point.

Malcolm wrote:

Candra says: in MAV 6:43-44 (my translation):

"The ālaya exists', 'the person exists',
'only these aggregates exist',
these teachings are for those who cannot understand the profound dharma.
Just as the Buddha taught 'I' and 'mine', though free from the view of a self [satkāyadṛiṣṭi];
likewise, though indeed things are natureless,
'existence' is demonstrated as the provisional meaning [neyartha].

The first question I have for you is: do persons and aggregates exist conventionally, and if they do, upon what basis are we then to reject the ālaya as being the son of a barren women, if we on the other hand admit that persons and aggregates are the sons of fertile women?

The second question I have for you is: what in your view, is the difference between the provisional meaning and conventional truth?

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 28th, 2012 at 5:49 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen Community of Chogyal Namkhai Norbu

Content:

Fa Dao said:

Rinpoche has given the Medicine Buddha transmission numerous times. Is there a specific DC practice for this or can it be done in Anuyoga style? Also I have heard the mantra done a couple of different ways, how does Rinpoche teach it?

Malcolm wrote:

There are two -- Orgyen Menlha and the Medicine Buddha from Namcho. I am not sure where you can get them, but I think if you send an email to the secretary of DCA, he can help you further.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 28th, 2012 at 4:14 AM

Title: Re: Misunderstanding emptiness

Content:

Tom said:

The reason for which is the lack of existence of motion in any of the three times. It just seemed your previous statement could be read as drawing an ontological distinction between moved objects and moving objects.

Namdrol said:

There is no basis for saying that something is moving, apart from something which has not moved or has moved. If you are familiar with the argument rejecting motion in the MMK than all of this is old hat.

Tom said:

I don't disagree, you are basically just quoting MMK CH2:1, my point is just that this verse is about the rolling not the ball.

Although, I do understand that motion and movement exist interdependently. Without motion there is no mover and without a mover there is no motion and that this precludes existing either independently or inherently.

Malcolm wrote:

I was responding to this: "a basketball rolling across the floor."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 28th, 2012 at 3:35 AM

Title: Re: Misunderstanding emptiness

Content:

Tom said:

The reason for which is the lack of existence of motion in any of the three times. It just seemed your previous statement could be read as drawing an ontological distinction between moved objects and moving objects.

Malcolm wrote:

There is no basis for saying that something is moving, apart from something which has not moved or has moved. If you are familiar with the argument rejecting motion in the MMK than all of this is old hat.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 28th, 2012 at 3:24 AM

Title: Re: Misunderstanding emptiness

Content:

yadave said:

If something like this worked, it might be easier to understand Nagarjuna's fivefold reasoning applied to, say, a basketball rolling across the floor.

Namdrol said:

No, Nāgārjuna would say something much simpler:

"Apart from a ball which has rolled and a ball which has not rolled, there no ball rolling."

CF his negation of movement.

Tom said:

Isn't it problematic to posit a rolled ball and a not rolled ball and then refute the rolling ball? They all exist in the same way, by way of conception.

What is refuted is that there is rolling in the past, rolling in the future, or rolling in the present (which is an instant).

Malcolm wrote:

The subject of the analysis in MMK is "I am going to town". "The ball is rolling" is the same sort of statment, treated the same way.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 28th, 2012 at 2:45 AM

Title: Re: Misunderstanding emptiness

Content:

yadave said:

If something like this worked, it might be easier to understand Nagarjuna's fivefold reasoning applied to, say, a basketball rolling across the floor.

Malcolm wrote:

No, Nāgārjuna would say something much simpler:

"Apart from a ball which has rolled and a ball which has not rolled, there no ball rolling."

CF his negation of movement.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 28th, 2012 at 12:29 AM

Title: Re: Fatigue in high humidity climates.

Content:

Huseng said:

Question for Namdrol.

I've noticed that in high humidity climates my strength drains away and I suffer fatigue. I can't sleep enough and feel tired until at least around 10am/11am.

I don't seem to have this problem in low humidity climates like in Ladakh or Canada, or even around Bihar when I was there in February. But in summertime Japan and during the rainy season there, as well as here in Taiwan where the humidity is always high, I suffer fatigue. Getting up at 6am is a hard struggle. Though in low humidity zones this isn't an issue for me.

Any suggestions?

Malcolm wrote:

The best thing I can suggest is to try sleeping on an outside veranda with screening.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 28th, 2012 at 12:14 AM

Title: Re: "taking someone else's negative karma"

Content:

Namdrol said:

How about "suffering cannot be removed with the hand..."

Sherab said:

No source of the citation was provided.

Malcolm wrote:

It is a citation produced in a thousand Tibetan texts. My example was found in a text on Madhyamaka called Moonrays penned by Rongton Shebya Kunrig.

I have tried text searches on the bka' 'gyur and bstan 'gyur to no avail. If it exists there, it does not exist in the common translation one sees in a thousand tibetan books.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 27th, 2012 at 11:50 PM

Title: Re: Gorampa untenable according to Karmapa

Content:

cloudburst said:

look at me go! I would say we can both spit out a basic presentation of how madhyamaka works. Did Gorampa accept that the Alaya as a consciousness was non-existent like the hair on a bald man's head? If not we DO disagree there which as the original point.

Malcolm wrote:

I think the question you are asking is "Does Gorampa accept that idea that Candrakirti thinks the ālaya as a consciousness is like the hair on a bald man's head."

As I stated before, I think that Gorampa thinks that Candrakirti's view on the conventional existence or non-existence of the ālayavijñāna is more nuanced and subtle than what some other scholars are willing to allow and that he disagrees with how some other scholars present Candrakirti's refutation of the ālayavijñāna, and so on, for reasons that are complex.

I have no idea whether Gorampa is correct or incorrect because Candrakirti is not around to be questioned. My suggestion is that one should examine the Bhasya and Jayānanda's commentary.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 27th, 2012 at 10:53 PM

Title: Re: Gorampa untenable according to Karmapa

Content:

Namdrol said:

I am not discussing my own POV.

cloudburst said:

Whose POV are you discussing?

In this particular exchange, I am discussing what gorampa has to say, and because what Gorampa has to say is a little complicated about a very specific point, I was teasing out the threads so it would be easier to understand.

As far as learning Tibetan goes, it is my observation that people get led very far afield because they become attached to certain English phrases which are not very precise renditions of Sanskrit and Tibetan terms, or in the case of Khenpo Karl, rather novel attempts at accuracy which have not gained wide currency. Thus, if they learn Tibetan, they will have more ability to check a given translation in order to better understand it. I must say, that is an excellent point and I accept it and applaud you and second it. I find one of the best ways to question this is to debate it, honestly.

Malcolm wrote:

It might help you, then, to debate with someone who is more highly trained than myself, or the average run of the mill internet user. For example, let us say you defeat in debate someone who is inarticulate at expressing Tsongkhapa's view -- have you defeated Tsongkhapa's view? No.

I really hesitate to boldly state: "This scholar is wrong, this scholar is right". The reason I continually encourage people to go back to the basic Indian texts is that, quite frankly, Tibetan scholarship on these issues extremely complex.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 27th, 2012 at 10:27 PM

Title: Re: Gorampa untenable according to Karmapa

Content:

Namdrol said:

Gorampa is saying that conventional things possess internal contradictions — this fact [that they possess internal contradictions] is what allows them to be refuted ultimately. He is not saying that these internal contradictions are what appear prior to analysis.

cloudburst said:

Though I fear to give you further feelings of futility and despair, I cannot agree with Gorampa. If you must think it is for sectarian reasons so be it. I think that whatever internal contradictions they appear to have are resolved at the conventional level. Contradictions may appear, but these contradictions only arise when you fail to be satisfied with valid appearances.

Malcolm wrote:

You just agreed with Gorampa. Gorampa said contradictions exist within conventionalities which do not appear until analysis. All analysis appears at the conventional level. No one is disputing that; but all analysis has one aim, at least in Madhyamaka, to discern the real state of a given event or thing, such as a self-cognizing mind or a self-illuminating lamp, and so on.

cloudburst said:

Does a lamp dispel darkness? Yup. Does an orange seed give rise to an orange tree? Yup. If you begin to analyze these conventions, they will become unstable, but if analyzed, as all the Madhyamaka masters advise, they appear and function in a thoroughly non-contradictory manner.

Malcolm wrote:

You just agreed with Gorampa.

cloudburst said:

in the MMK Nagarjuna's investigation seeks out HOW the darkness is dispelled.... does it meet with the light? But how could it, where the lamp is there is no darkness! etc. This contradiction arises as a result of the beginning of an ultimate search. Conventionally, we can say that the lamp dispels the darkness and there is a conventional reason for that. What about that reason, does it too have a reason? Yes.

and so on until the answer is I don't know why that is, but we know that in fact it is.

Malcolm wrote:

You just agreed with Gorampa. This is the sort of hastiness that has led to centuries of Tibetan trench warfare.

Namdrol said:

I am not saying that Gorampa is better than you, for on this score, indeed he is not.

you are no better than either of us low-down beings who cannot refrain from polemics. Declaim all you like but

Malcolm wrote:

I am trying to show you that such polemics carried out in the way we all have previously carried them out bring no one closer to any real understanding of anything, and in fact merely dig deeper sectarian trenches.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 27th, 2012 at 9:51 AM

Title: Re: Yantra Yoga - 2 DVDs set

Content:

spanda said:

I addressed this question because I thought that Yantra Yoga can be learned only if I attend retreats with yantra yoga instructors. Now I can learn by myself, using these DVDs, if I have the transmission?

Also: it is possible to replace with this system of yantra, another system of tsa-lung, connected with a tummo practice from another lineage/cycle of teachings?

I can practice this system of yantra yoga with tummo from a different cycle of teachings, with the same efficiency?

Namdrol said:

Sure. why not.

spanda said:

So, we can't say in any way that a specific system of yantra (from kalachakra, or Lamdre, for example), is better than this one, for tummo practice?

Malcolm wrote:

The best system is the one you will practice.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 27th, 2012 at 9:46 AM

Title: Re: "taking someone else's negative karma"

Content:

Namdrol said:

Because the force of our ignorance is stronger than their power.

spanda said:

Are you serious here? This is not a joke?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, I am being completely serious.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 27th, 2012 at 9:30 AM

Title: Re: "taking someone else's negative karma"

Content:

spanda said:

Being a bodhisattva on the paths and stages does not mean one has knowledge of methods. It just means one has realized emptiness and is practicing the six perfections.

.

My mistake. Fully enlightened beings. Why they don't coordinate the elements of all the people in sufferings, to make them healthy, if it is possible? There are limitations for them also, here?

Malcolm wrote:

Because the force of our ignorance is stronger than their power.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 27th, 2012 at 9:16 AM

Title: Re: Yantra Yoga - 2 DVDs set

Content:

spanda said:

I addressed this question because I thought that Yantra Yoga can be learned only if I attend retreats with yantra yoga instructors. Now I can learn by myself, using this DVDs, if I have the transmission?

Also: it is possible to replace with this system of yantra, another system of tsa-lung, connected with a tummo practice from another lineage/cycle of teachings?

I can practice this system of yantra yoga with tummo from a different cycle of teachings, with the same efficiency?

Malcolm wrote:
Sure. why not.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 27th, 2012 at 9:15 AM

Title: Re: "taking someone else's negative karma"

Content:

spanda said:

And by the limitation imposed by Namdrol (somehow logical) its' very difficult to explain how this practices work.

Malcolm wrote:

They work because we are all connected through the elements, and the elements are empty.

At the level of Dzogchen they function because of rtsal.

But there are serious limitations on what we can do for someone else.

Being a bodhisattva on the paths and stages does not mean one has knowledge of methods. It just means one has realized emptiness and is practicing the six perfections.

For example, in Tibetan Medicine we discuss the issue of karmic diseases. When someone has a karmic disease there is nothing they can do about it except accumulate merit. They can hire someone do rituals on their behalf, and this is effective because they are causing the action to take place, etc. etc.

When a community of people do a long life practice for teacher for example, as a community they are generating merit, and since the teacher belongs to that community too, also their own merit increases, etc. It is mutually reinforcing.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 27th, 2012 at 8:55 AM

Title: Re: Yantra Yoga - 2 DVDs set

Content:

spanda said:

Detailed instruction on ALL series of Yantra Yoga? If I have learned from an instructor, only the basis of Yantra Yoga (Warm Ups - The Nine Purification Breathings - Tsigjong, Lungsang, Tsadul), I can learn the rest of Yantra yoga (the five series) form this DVDs? It's to nice to be real...

Malcolm wrote:

There are two different sets -- this covers everything up through first series of yantras;

there is another CD which covers the rest.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 27th, 2012 at 8:46 AM

Title: Re: Evidence for Design?

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

in the Dzogchen view, the characteristics of the basis are purity (kadag, emptiness), inexhaustible and uninterrupted manifestation (lhundrup) and responsiveness/compassion (thugje). now, can there be compassion and responsiveness as an impersonal phenomena? I don't see how, since it is by definition intentional, and intentionality is a characteristic of consciousness, of awareness.

Malcolm wrote:

Gems are inert, so they have no intention. Whoever possesses that gem can get what they want.

Likewise, compassion has no intentionality, but since everyone possesses that basis, liberation is possible for all sentient beings.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 27th, 2012 at 8:45 AM

Title: Re: Evidence for Design?

Content:

Will said:

[

So intelligent design, Yes - Supreme Creator, No.

Malcolm wrote:

Design means to draw or create deliberately according to some plan -- but instead the universe arose because the blind force of the collective actions of ignorant sentient beings [from a previous universe]. So, no intelligence, no design and no creator.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 27th, 2012 at 8:42 AM

Title: Re: Evidence for Design?

Content:

Namdrol said:

The universe, therefore, arose from distant cause of ignorance.

gad rgyangs said:

just as long as this is not interpreted as a mistake, or something that needs to be "corrected"

Malcolm wrote:

It needs to be corrected so that the universe will arise as the basis.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 27th, 2012 at 8:41 AM

Title: Re: "taking someone else's negative karma"

Content:

Sherab said:

I've also stated that vajrayana practices/customs point to the ability of giving and taking something that has been manifested.

Malcolm wrote:

For example? What practices? Customs are not Dharma. They are customs. For example is was the custom in a part of Eastern Bhutan to slaughter animals for ganapujas until Kunzang Dechen Lingpa put an end to it.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 27th, 2012 at 8:39 AM

Title: Re: "taking someone else's negative karma"

Content:

Sherab said:

I've asked for quotations to show that manifested results cannot be remove from a being by another...

Malcolm wrote:

How about "suffering cannot be removed with the hand..."

This is about as clear a citation as you can get.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 27th, 2012 at 8:37 AM

Title: Re: "taking someone else's negative karma"

Content:

Namdrol said:

The idea that Buddhas can take on the karma of sentient beings is the worst sort of theistic thinking.

Sherab said:

Assertion like this without providing explanations does not help move a discussion forward to a resolution and is merely an attempt to impose a particular viewpoint. And I think no one here is really referring to the action karma or any latency but to the manifested results.

Malcolm wrote:

The Buddhas are free from experiencing the ripening of the result of karma [karmavipakaphala], hence it stands to reason they cannot take on the results of karma.

Birth in one of the six lokas is the manifested result of karma. Do you think Buddha can just place one in nirvana?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 27th, 2012 at 7:14 AM

Title: Re: Gorampa untenable according to Karmapa

Content:

Mariusz said:

As everyone can see

Namdrol said:

Good luck with your studies.

N

Mariusz said:

Sorry, its my english. I did not mean wordly beings but worldly beings, and worldly daily-life consensus.

Malcolm wrote:

worldly daily life consenseus = lokavyavahara = worldly convention, which is what we are discussing. So you just agreed with Gorampa.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 27th, 2012 at 7:12 AM

Title: Re: Tibetanmedicine-edu.org 3 year online course

Content:

JinpaRangdrol said:

Namdrol,

Is the Shang Shung Institute's online Tibetan Medicine school up and running yet? It seems that they said they'd have info by September of last year, but I still don't see anything. I'm planning on applying for the full 4-year program. Do you have any info or advice?

Malcolm wrote:

I am pretty sure that it is.

You ought to contact Dr. Phuntsog Wangmo and find out from her directly.

Best,

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 27th, 2012 at 6:20 AM

Title: Re: Gorampa untenable according to Karmapa

Content:

Mariusz said:

As everyone can see

Malcolm wrote:

Good luck with your studies.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 27th, 2012 at 5:55 AM

Title: Re: Can someone please post some works of Nagarjuna?

Content:

Namdrol said:

Bocking's Nagarjuna in China is one of the clearest. Full MMK plus commentary closely related to Buddhapālita which clearly identifies positions.

Jnana said:

There's also Akira Saito's doctoral dissertation:

<https://digitalcollections.anu.edu.au/handle/1885/8139>, which includes an English translation of Buddhapālita's commentary and edited Tibetan text.

Malcolm wrote:

Awesome, saves me the task of completing my translation of the same.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 27th, 2012 at 5:52 AM

Title: Re: Tibetan question

Content:

Jack Dawkins said:

Hi, I'm hoping someone can help on an issue of punctuation. I want to quote the first two lines - but only the first two lines - of the following:

འཁོར་བ་ཐུ་ངན་འདས་པ་ལས།
ཁྱད་པར་ཅུང་ཟད་ཡོད་མ་ཡིན།
ཐུ་ངན་འདས་པ་འཁོར་བ་ལས།
ཁྱད་པར་ཅུང་ཟད་ཡོད་མ་ཡིན།

Can anyone tell me which punctuation marks I should include? If the first two lines are put on a single line (i.e.):

འཁོར་བ་ཐུ་ངན་འདས་པ་ལས།ཁྱད་པར་ཅུང་ཟད་ཡོད་མ་ཡིན།

Do I need to delete one or both of the shads in the middle? Also, do the shads at the beginning and end remain the same?

The text is of course from MMK 25.19

Many thanks,

JD

Malcolm wrote:

It has to look like this:

འཁོར་བ་ཐུ་ངན་འདས་པ་ལས། ཁྱད་པར་ཅུང་ཟད་ཡོད་མ་ཡིན།

You need more space between final shad and the beginning shad.

But if you did it in Sanskrit it would be just one long string i.e. two verses of Tibetan generally = one verse of Sanskrit.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 27th, 2012 at 5:48 AM

Title: Re: "taking someone else's negative karma"

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The idea that Buddhas can take on the karma of sentient beings is the worst sort of theistic thinking.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 27th, 2012 at 5:44 AM

Title: Re: Evidence for Design?

Content:

Will said:

Buddha defined karma as intentional or purposive (cetana) action; thus action/karma requires a being or beings. So the universe arises from beings.

Malcolm wrote:

Correct, the universe arises from the actions of beings in it. Actions are motivated by afflictions. Afflictions arose from knowledge obscuration of ignorance. The universe, therefore, arose from distant cause of ignorance.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 27th, 2012 at 5:38 AM

Title: Re: Gorampa untenable according to Karmapa

Content:

cloudburst said:

You no longer wish to debate but for some reason you do while complaining about it.

Malcolm wrote:

I am not debating. I have no position to lose, or point to score. I am not discussing my own POV.

My purpose was to respond to Mariusz who produced a citation in which it can be easily shown that the ninth Karmapa, following the eighth, is engaging in the kind of straw man polemics Tibetan scholars are so famous for. Gorampa does it, Tsongkhapa does it [though he, like Rongton, is quite moderate in his production of strawmen], they all do it.

By immediately responding that Gorampa was wrong on this or that point, all you immediately do, if indeed you think he was an arya, is accumulate the negative merit of criticizing aryas.

I am attempting to encourage people to take a more constructive approach: instead of saying, as I have many times in the past, "Tsongkhapa was wrong to say that we may leave off the second two alternatives of the four extremes because they are double negatives", it is better to think long and hard why he might give such an opinion. Rather than immediately assume that Gorampa is wrong in asserting that Candrakirti accepts things like svasamvedana conventionally, it is better to ask yourself why he might assert that. These great scholars almost always have very solid reasons for saying what they do about this and that thing, and the thing is, we have to really question ourselves if we think something they said is wrong. That is my point.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 27th, 2012 at 4:56 AM

Title: Re: Gorampa untenable according to Karmapa

Content:

cloudburst said:

To say that Tibetans invented them is misleading.

Malcolm wrote:

It is not at all misleading. There were no separate schools of Madhyamaka in India [unless you count Yogacaras as Madhyamaka, and they certainly thought of themselves in this way.]

There was a difference in opinion among different Madhyamaka scholars about how best to use reasoning to refute opponents and that is the extent of it. The whole controversy hinged solely on Bhavaviveka's criticism of Buddhapalita for not using a fully formed syllogism to refute self-production; with Candrakirti coming to Buddhapalita's defense. End of story.

The development of a "Prasangika" school occurred at Sangphu because Phyapa and his students were hostile to Chandrakirti's texts when they were introduced by Batsap. Thus, the division between Prasangika and Svatantrika is wholly a Tibetan invention.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 27th, 2012 at 12:57 AM

Title: Re: Gorampa untenable according to Karmapa

Content:

cloudburst said:

Gorampa is making a mistake here.

In the MMK Nagarjuna is refuting inherent production, and it is in this context that he brings in the example of the lamp. All his consequences are designed to show that nothing is inherently produced.

Because lamps do dispel darkness conventionally, there are no contradictions conventionally. The contradictions arise when the analysis probes under the convention, and this is the beginning of analysis for the ultimate.

Malcolm wrote:

If there were no contradictions, then these things could not be rejected ultimately. It is because these conventional entities do possess internal contradictions that they cannot bear ultimate analysis.

cloudburst said:

Chandrakirti clearly refutes the existence of the alaya even conventionally in the avatara and it's bhasya.

Malcolm wrote:

That is indeed what some people think. Other people think Candrakirti's view is more nuanced than that. Candrakirti, in citing the Lanka in the Bhasya, clearly states that ālayavijñāna is a synonym for emptiness, thus laying the ground for ālayavijñāna to be accepted conventionally.

cloudburst said:

Shantideva refutes self-cognition even conventionally in Bodhicharyavatara etc so Gorampa's defense of these is not based on good scholarship.

Malcolm wrote:

Santideva is rejecting a truly established mind and the argument of reflexive cognition that cittamatrins introduce to defend it. That is the context of Santideva's argument, and that is all.

cloudburst said:

Gorampa makes an error here as well:

"Someone's position that after one understands the passages which reject a reflexive cognition that is able to bear analysis have been understood from the MMK, the Vighrahavyavartani and the Prasannapāda, one should apply them to a rejection of reflexive cognition conventionally is erroneous. [It is erroneous] because just as in the MMK a lamp illuminating itself is rejected having refuted the given example for reflexive cognition, a lamp, through analysis, since also removal of darkness [by a lamp] also rejected [in the MMK], the consequence would be that even conventionally [a lamp's ability] to remove darkness would not be acceptable.

the example of a lamp illuminating itself and others in MMK is used to show that there is no ultimate production. As for this, there is production conventionally, but not ultimately, just as a lamp does not illuminate itself or others ultimately. Conventionally, it does illuminate other, but is not self-illuminating.

Malcolm wrote:

So some would have it.

cloudburst said:

If we follow the position Gorampa puts forward, then even though things are contradictory conventionally, we should still accept them. This gives disastrous consequences. Without the ability to refute something conventionally as a result of internal contradictions in the position, we have no power to refute anything.

Malcolm wrote:

I guess you are not understanding Gorampa's point [which is why I find this whole exercise to be one of utter futility since you seem only interested in rejecting rather than understanding]. Gorampa is saying that conventional things possess internal contradictions — this fact [that they possess internal contradictions] is what allows them to be refuted ultimately. He is not saying that these internal contradictions are what appear prior to analysis. Thus your statement is the kind of unthinking fault-finding that I find troublesome in these conversations to begin with and why I no longer wish to participate in these kinds of discussions.

You do not read Gorampa openly. You read him polemically. I.e. for every statement advanced, a fault is found, for every fault that is found, a counter fault is found, and it just goes on and on. It seems impossible that people are capable of enjoying the subtlety of Tsongkhapa, Gorampa, and so on because they are so caught up in their political parties.

I am not saying that Gorampa is better than you, for on this score, indeed he is not.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 26th, 2012 at 10:29 PM

Title: Re: Evidence for Design?

Content:

mint said:

Design explains all the most important aspects of existence: truth, goodness, freedom, justice, beauty, love, the order of the universe, the origin of life, the progressive development and existence of rational, autonomous, moral beings who have the capacity for unselfish love and the right to life, freedom and self-determination.

Scientific evidence for design consists of:

1. The laws of nature which are necessary for life and a rational existence.
2. The directiveness of living organisms.
3. The progressive nature of development.
4. The information system contained in the DNA code.
5. The survival of life despite overwhelming odds.
6. The development of the most complex phenomenon in the universe: the human brain.
7. The existence of rational, autonomous, moral and responsible beings with a capacity for unselfish love.

What are your views?

Malcolm wrote:

"The variety of the world arises from karma."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 26th, 2012 at 10:27 PM

Title: Re: "taking someone else's negative karma"

Content:

kirtu said:

The suttas referenced wrt merit transfer for dead relatives are the Sigaloavada Sutta, Tirokudda Kanda Sutta, and the Janussonin Sutta.

Malcolm wrote:

Sigaloavada Sutta has alms offered on behalf of the dead -- which is clearly a pre-Buddhist custom such as that mentioned in the first part of the Mahāparinibbana.

Tirokudda Kanda Sutta: has clean good and drink offered to pretas, but the merit accrued is one's own.

Janussonin Sutta: <http://online-dhamma.net/nanda/AccessToInsight/html/tipitaka/an/an10/an10.177.than.html> "onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;"

This sutra says that gifts made to one's ancestors who have been reborn as hell beings, animals, gods or human cannot be enjoyed by them. However, gifts made to hungry ghosts can be enjoyed by them. In all cases the donor enjoys the merit of the gift.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 26th, 2012 at 9:54 PM

Title: Re: Gorampa untenable according to Karmapa

Content:

Mariusz said:

If we look at the controversies between great masters or schools in this way, they can be helpful as models to gauge and refine our personal insights.

Malcolm wrote:

I guess I don't agree with this. Controversies merely breed more controversy.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 26th, 2012 at 9:53 PM

Title: Re: Gorampa untenable according to Karmapa

Content:

Mariusz said:

If there were anything to be observed

Through direct perception and the other instances [of valid cognition],

It would be something to be established or rejected.

However, since no such thing exists, I cannot be criticized. [/i]

Malcolm wrote:

The point that Goramapa is making is that this is rejection of authority ultimately, not conventionally. The purpose of the Vighavyavartani is to reject svabhāva and the notion that there are inherently authoritative cognitions.

Nagarjuna is not rejecting conventional inference [anumāṇa] and direct perception [pratyakṣa] -- he is rejecting the notion that authorities [pramāṇa] and objects of authority [prameya] are inherently authoritative. He is also rejecting the argument in this text that since emptiness is not an object, it cannot lead to valid knowledge, since valid knowledge must come from truly valid direct perceptions and inferences based on objects of knowledge that truly exist.

Nagārjuna, Buddhapalita, Candrakīrti, as well as Śāntideva all use instances of conventional direct perception and inference in their writing.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 26th, 2012 at 9:43 PM

Title: Re: Gorampa untenable according to Karmapa

Content:

Mariusz said:

However, these do not contradict the possibility the analysis for one's own help will lead to the collapse until realization? The analysis is not meaningless. As for Mahamudra or Dzogchen it can be also the support.

Malcolm wrote:

I told you in the very beginning that Karmapa was misrepresenting Gorampa's position.

I guess you have not understood what I was trying to say -- so please try to listen. If you are going to follow what some Tibetan says, fine. Pick one scholar. Follow their point of view. Unless you are prepared or capable of reading the scholars with which they choose to disagree, please do not jump on Team Goramapa, Team Tsongkhapa, Team Karmapa or Team Mipham. I have made that mistake in the past. I now clearly recognize that it is an error to jump on the bandwagon of Post-Indian Madhyamaka developments. It is one thing to try to understand the intellectual history of Tibetan Madhyamaka -- that can be interesting for some people. It is quite another to jump on the bandwagon of this or that school -- then this just becomes scholastic politics.

As far as Mahamudra and Dzogchen go, Madhyamaka is not absolutely required at all. While Madhyamaka can be a support, more often than not it turns into a meaningless intellectual game of proof and rebuttal, accepting and rejecting — leading to outlandish thread titles like the one that heads this thread.

What is meaningless is the endless games of dialectics [in which I have also played] where each school and scholar triumphantly asserts that only they have the real key to Nagarjauna's intention. It is total nonsense.

What we do not need to transmitted to the West is the scholastic environment of competitive sectarianism. This helps not one's practice at all. When we see clear misrepresentations of one scholar's point of view by another, as we have in this thread, how can we trust any of it?

Without understanding the political background of anxiety of Kagyu and Sakya about the burgeoning success of the Gelug tradition, how can we fairly assess the criticisms of Tsongkhapa by Rongton, Gorampa, Shakya Chogden, and so on? Without understanding the relationship between Shakya Chogden and his Karma Kagyu patrons, how can we understand his seeming championship of the gzhan stong position? Without understanding the relationship between Rendawa Zhonnu Lodo and his very critical assessment of various schools and trends during his day, how can we understand the writing of his main disciple, Tsongkhapa? Without understanding the hostile reception Candrakirti's works met at Sangphu when they were initially translated by Batsab with Jayananda, how can we really understand the Tibetan invention of Prasangika and Svatantrika? All of these things must be understood by any responsible scholar of Tibetan Madhyamaka. And even more basic, the conditions that produced Indian Madhyamaka were quite different than the conditions that produced Tibetan Madhyamaka. Tibetans introduced all kinds of issues in their prosecution of Madhyamaka that would have never occurred to Indians. You have Tibetans arguing over points that to Indians would seem utterly irrelevant. I personally think Candrakirti would have been appalled at all the divisions and sub-divisions of Madhyamaka in which the Tibetans sincerely and earnestly engaged.

So please be more careful in future. And honestly, learn Tibetan.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 26th, 2012 at 8:46 AM

Title: Re: "taking someone else's negative karma"

Content:

Namdrol said:

Merit is not shared in a real sense, but by sharing your merit you create much more for yourself.

xabir said:

So the story in the sutras about mogallana saving his mother in hell by dedicating merits have no basis in dharma at all?

Also, "according to the Sutra of The Great Vows of Ksitigarbha Bodhisattva, one can "transfer" 1/7 merit of an act they have performed to a deceased loved one"... You think this is not true?

Malcolm wrote:

If the transfer of merit could rescue beings from samsara, then considering that no one has greater merit than a Buddha, and no greater generosity, why have we not all been liberated?

In any event, I think the Ksitigarbha sutra is 100% Chinese apocrypha.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 26th, 2012 at 8:40 AM

Title: Re: Gorampa untenable according to Karmapa

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Mariusz:

Let's examine what you initially introduced:

There are some, such as Gorampa and Shākya Chokden, who say that this verse [verse 6.75 of the Entrance] proves that Chandrakirti holds, from his own perspective, that self-awareness exists conventionally.

What does Gorampa actually say?

He says, quote "This master [Candrakirti] explains the all-basis, the afflicted mind, reflexive cognition and so on from authoritative citations. Even though no distinction of whether they are true or not is made, the internal contradictions of conventions are accepted conventionally, but the refutation of those upon analysis is maintained from the perspective of the ultimate."

He continues:

"Someone's position that after one understands the passages which reject a reflexive cognition that is able to bear analysis have been understood from the MMK, the Vigrahavyavartani and the Prasannapāda, one should apply them to a rejection of reflexive cognition conventionally is erroneous. [It is erroneous] because just as in the MMK a lamp illuminating itself is rejected having refuted the given example for reflexive cognition, a lamp, through analysis, since also removal of darkness [by a lamp] also rejected [in the MMK], the consequence would be that even conventionally [a lamp's ability] to remove darkness would not be acceptable. [It is erroneous] because when, in the Vigrahavyavartani, the self-evidential validity of that authoritative cognition is rejected, since validity through another is also rejected, the consequence would be that there can never be an authoritatively cognizing subject even conventionally. [Finally, it is erroneous] because when the Prasannapād cites sutras that state that a mind which experiences cognition without reflexive cognition cannot be found, the consequence would be that even the experiencing mind itself would not exist conventionally."

So you see, that passage is not about whether reflexive cognitions exist. The passage is concerned with how Candrakirti treats citations concerning conventionality.

In this case, what is being affirmed is not reflexive cognition. What is being rejected is the Gelug over-negation of reflexive cognition through showing contradictions implicit in rejecting reflexive awareness, as well as other conventions, conventionally.

If this passage and its reasoning is not clear for you, I can explain it further. But it not a passage stating that reflexive cognition exists conventionally, it is a passage stating that reflexive cognition is to be accepted conventionally [i.e. without analysis], even if that convention contains many internal contradictions, which Gorampa admits that it does right up front. However, conventionally, those internal contradictions are not subject to analysis; just in the same way as when we turn on a light, we say "Turn on the light" in order to remove darkness, even though when analyzed, a light capable of removing darkness can never be found.

In other words, for Gorampa there is no doubt that these things like ālaya-vijñāna, the afflicted mind, and so on cannot bear analysis -- but as conventions we leave them alone with all their myriad internal contradictions just as we leave the convention that lamps remove the darkness of rooms alone.

For this reason, it is little irresponsible merely to just throw out soundbites of positions. I am sure that Gorampa's critique of Tsongkhapa's position [though I have not read it] on this issue also has problems, or that he selectively misreads Tsongkhapa's point of view and so on.

So just compare what Gorampa says here to the Jayananda citation I produced above. And for Buddha's sake man, at least learn Tibetan. I don't have time to do this in general!

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 26th, 2012 at 7:07 AM

Title: Re: Gorampa untenable according to Karmapa

Content:

Namdrol said:

Since meditation in Vajrayāna systems is based on an example wisdom gained during the introduction of the third and fourth empowerments, Gorampa points out in a treatise refuting some on Tsongkhapa's interpretations of the Guhyasamaja sadhana that it does matter very much what your intellectual view might be; whether cittamatra or madhyamaka, since your meditation is not based on an intellectual analysis, but rather a path wisdom derived from the introduction of third and fourth empowerment.

kirtu said:

Shouldn't this read:

that it does not matter very much what your intellectual view might be

Kirt

Malcolm wrote:

Thank you for catching that typo.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 26th, 2012 at 4:56 AM

Title: Re: "taking someone else's negative karma"

Content:

dakini_boi said:

What about the case of a Buddha liberating demons? While not exactly taking on their karma, if a Buddha can actually liberate them, then their karma is completely dismantled.

Malcolm wrote:

This is entirely symbolic -- demons arise because of your affliction and karma. When you have eliminated your own affliction and karma, then demons become gods.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 26th, 2012 at 4:54 AM

Title: Re: "taking someone else's negative karma"

Content:

AlexanderS said:

Is negative karma cannot be taken, how can merit then be giving and shared?

Malcolm wrote:

Merit is not shared in a real sense, but by sharing your merit you create much more for yourself.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 26th, 2012 at 4:42 AM

Title: Re: ChNNR Dorje Drolo retreat

Content:

Namdrol said:

One becomes a rudra much more rapidly than other practices. It is a dangerous practice for one's ego.

The guardians of Drollo are the worldly eight classes, in general.

There is nothing more wrathful in any school.

Jikan said:

would such or similar dangers inhere also in practices that invoke Dorje Drollo, such as Trungpa's _Sadhana of Mahamudra_? (as opposed to a practice in which one takes the same as a yidam)

Malcolm wrote:

The sadhana of mahamudra is a yidam practice.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 26th, 2012 at 4:16 AM

Title: Re: ChNNR Dorje Drolo retreat

Content:

Namdrol said:

One becomes a rudra much more rapidly than other practices. It is a dangerous practice for one's ego.

The guardians of Drollo are the worldly eight classes, in general.

There is nothing more wrathful in any school.

AilurusFulgens said:

Thank you for the reply, Namdrol. Just one last question in this respect: are termas the exclusive source for all existant Dorje Drollo sadhanas or are there also other sources - like for instance tantras transmitted directly by Guru Rinpoche and coming down through various unbroken lineages i.e. sources, which are NOT termas?

Malcolm wrote:

Termas are the exclusive source.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 26th, 2012 at 2:51 AM

Title: Re: "taking someone else's negative karma"

Content:

spanda said:

Could someone explain me, what exactly Milarepa did? Was Milarepa capable (if he wanted) to take someones else's suffering? If yes, this mean that he could "take"/reduce someone else karma?

Malcolm wrote:

This is a story in a Tibetan novel. Pure fiction.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 26th, 2012 at 2:43 AM

Title: Re: ChNNR Dorje Drolo retreat

Content:

Namdrol said:

It is a little complicated. But the long and short of it is that it is the most wrathful practice there is. If your view is very stable, then there is no problem, but if not. Drollos name is "krodha lokottara" i.e. "transcendent wrath" -- gro wo lod is a corruption of that.

AilurusFulgens said:

If you can talk about this in an open forum, may I then ask what exactly are the negative side-effects of the Dorje Drollo practice specifically i.e. in case something goes wrong?

What exactly would be the benefits if you do everything correctly? What precisely does the Dorje Drollo practice do - aside from the very general statement that it clears the obstacles?

Is the Dorje Drollo the most wrathful practice in all of Vajrayana or is this just valid for the Nyingma school?

A. Fulgens

Malcolm wrote:

One becomes a rudra much more rapidly than other practices. It is a dangerous practice for one's ego.

The guardians of Drollo are the worldly eight classes, in general.

There is nothing more wrathful in any school.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 26th, 2012 at 2:36 AM

Title: Re: Gorampa untenable according to Karmapa

Content:

Namdrol said:

If you want to know Candrakirti's own point of view on this passage in the Madhyamaka - avatara from his autocommentary, however, well, here it is:

gang phyir gang gis yul myong 'gyur de las/ /dran pa 'di gzhan nga la yod min pa/ /de phyir nga yis mthong snyam dran 'gyur te/ /'di yang 'jig rten tha snyad tshul lugs yin/ /gang gis yul myong ba de yul nyams su myong ba'i shes pa de las dran pa'i shes pa gzhan nyid du ji ltar med pa de ltar na sngar bshad zin to/ /gang gi phyir dran pa gzhan nyid yod pa ma yin pa de'i phyir/ gang nyams su myong bas myong ba de dran pa'i shes pas myong ba ma yin pa ma yin pas dran pa yul dang ldan par 'byung la/ nyams su myong ba'i shes pas yongs su gcod pa gang yin pa de dran pas yongs su ma bcad pa ma yin pas bdag gis mthong ngo zhes bya bar 'gyur ro/ /'di yang 'jig rten tshul lugs yin gyi shin tu dpyad par

bya ba ni ma yin te/ brdzun pa'i don can nyid kyis 'jig rten gyi tha snyad yin pa'i phyir ro/

Mariusz said:

Ok. Give me a minute. I will translate it in google translator

Malcolm wrote:

Here is Jayanada's sub-commentary on this passage:

brjod par bya ste zhes bya ba la sogs pa gsungs te gang gis yul myong 'gyur zhes bya ba ni sngon po'i shes pa gang gis yul nyams su myong bar 'gyur ba'o/ /'di las dran pa 'di gzhan nga la yod min pa/ /zhes bya ba ni yul shes pa de la dran pa'i shes pa gzhan ma yin pa'o/ /de'i phyir nga yis mthong snyam dran 'gyur te/ /zhes bya ba ni gang gi phyir nyams su myong ba'i dran pa las dran pa'i shes pa gzhan nyid ma yin pa de'i tshe gang nyams su myong ba'i shes pas gang nyams su myong ba de nyid dran pa'i shes pas kyang nyams su myong ba yin pas ngas mthong snyam du dran par 'gyur ba'o/ /gal te shes pa rnams skad cig ma yin pa dang rang rig med pas ngas mthong ngo snyam du ji ltar dran zhe na/ de la lan ni/ 'di yang 'jig rten tha snyad tshul lugs yin/ /zhes bya ba gsungs te/ 'jig rten pa'i tha snyad brtag dpyad kyi go skabs med pas na 'jig rten na ci ltar yod pa de ltar khas blang bar bya dgos pas so; /des na 'jig rten pas rang rig med du zin kyang mthong ngo snyam pa'i tha snyad byed pas/ nyams su myong ba'i shes pa dag gcig tu zhen pa yin pas skyon yod pa ma yin no zhes pa'o/

Here is the salient point of the passage, to make of what you will:

/gal te shes pa rnams skad cig ma yin pa dang rang rig med pas ngas mthong ngo snyam du ji ltar dran zhe na/ de la lan ni/ 'di yang 'jig rten tha snyad tshul lugs yin/ /zhes bya ba gsungs te/ 'jig rten pa'i tha snyad brtag dpyad kyi go skabs med pas na 'jig rten na ci ltar yod pa de ltar khas blang bar bya dgos pas so; /des na 'jig rten pas rang rig med du zin kyang mthong ngo snyam pa'i tha snyad byed pas/ nyams su myong ba'i shes pa dag gcig tu zhen pa yin pas skyon yod pa ma yin no zhes pa'o/

"If it is asked, 'how is can there be a memory such as in the thought "It was seen by me" if cognitions are momentary but there is no reflexive cognition [rang rig, svasamvedana]?"

The reply to that is: 'This also is the standard of worldly convention.'

Since there is no opportunity to analyze the conventions of the worldly, however it seems in the world, it is necessary to accept it as such. Therefore, as the worldly also maintain there is no reflexive cognition [rang rig, svasamvedana], since the convention of the thought "it was seen" was generated, there is clinging to the cognitions of the experience [nyams su myong ba' shes pa dag] as being the same, thus there is no fault." Therefore we can infer from this that since Candrakirti rejects reflexive cognitions based on world convention, in order to be consistent he must accept outer objects since those too are accepted based on worldly convention.

Tibetans may now argue amongst themselves.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 26th, 2012 at 1:49 AM

Title: Re: Gorampa untenable according to Karmapa

Content:

Mariusz said:

The Madhyamikas debate is always beneficial and healthy.

Malcolm wrote:

It might be if you were really talking about what Candrakirti and Nagarjuna said, but you are not -- you are arguing about what Tibetans say about categories of Madhyamaka invented wholly by Tibetans.

Mariusz said:

Can I ask personal question to Namdrol? Why did you not protest when questions to Tsongkhapa, but protest when questions to Gorampa?

Malcolm wrote:

You have forgotten that I spent several weeks defending Tsongkhapa from what I considered to erroneous criticisms of his view on e-Sangha.

You have also forgotten that when someone opined that one could not realize the meaning of Dzogchen if they held Tsongkhapa's point of view about "Prasangika" [Prasangika being a Tibetan invention, a term coined at Sangphu by Batsab Nyima Drag in the 12th century] I swiftly reminded them that both Jigme Lingpa and Shabkar upheld Tsongkhapa's interpretation of Prasangika.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 26th, 2012 at 1:42 AM

Title: Re: Gorampa untenable according to Karmapa

Content:

Mariusz said:

Very excuse me. Madhyamaka is not meaningless.

Malcolm wrote:

I did not say Madhyamaka was meaningless, I said that worrying about Tibetan scholastic nit picking this or that point was meaningless.

If that is really what you want to spend your life doing, then the only fair way to do it is to select the scholars from all four schools: present what each and everyone of them says about each passage in the Madhyamaka avatara for example with their refutations of each other's POV and leave it like that.

Otherwise, this cherry picking just leads to confusion and a very incomplete understanding and causes people to criticize amazing scholars we could not even withstand for five seconds in debate.

I am quite sure that if you read Tsongkhapa with a open mind, at the end of the day, you will be completely sure he is correct and perfect.

But then, I am quite sure that if you read Gorampa with a open mind, at the end of the day, you will be completely sure he is correct and perfect.

Then, I am quite sure that if you read Dolbupa with a open mind, at the end of the day, you will be completely sure he is correct and perfect.

Next, I am quite sure that if you read Mipham with a open mind, at the end of the day, you will be completely sure he is correct and perfect.

And it just goes on and on.

Why? Because there is no end to intellectual analysis.

If you want to know Candrakirti's own point of view on this passage in the Madhyamaka - avatara from his autocommentary, however, well, here it is:

gang phyir gang gis yul myong 'gyur de las/ /dran pa 'di gzhan nga la yod min pa/ /de phyir nga yis mthong snyam dran 'gyur te/ /'di yang 'jig rten tha snyad tshul lugs yin/ /gang gis yul myong ba de yul nyams su myong ba'i shes pa de las dran pa'i shes pa gzhan nyid du ji ltar med pa de ltar na sngar bshad zin to/ /gang gi phyir dran pa gzhan nyid yod pa ma yin pa de'i phyir/ gang nyams su myong bas myong ba de dran pa'i shes pas myong ba ma yin pa ma yin pas dran pa yul dang ldan par 'byung la/ nyams su myong ba'i shes pas yongs su gcod pa gang yin pa de dran pas yongs su ma bcad pa ma yin pas bdag gis mthong ngo zhes bya bar 'gyur ro/ /'di yang 'jig rten tshul lugs yin gyi shin tu dpyad par bya ba ni ma yin te/ brdzun pa'i don can nyid kyis 'jig rten gyi tha snyad yin pa'i phyir ro/

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 25th, 2012 at 11:55 PM

Title: Re: ChNNR Dorje Drolo retreat

Content:

Pero said:

I really doubt this. Anyone else heard the same elsewhere?

Namdrol said:

Yup.

Drollo practice can cause lots of obstacles.

Pero said:

Wow... But why is that? I thought Drollo was for clearing obstacles.

Malcolm wrote:

It is a little complicated. But the long and short of it is that it is the most wrathful practice there is. If your view is very stable, then there is no problem, but if not. Drollo's name is "krodha lokottara" i.e. "transcendent wrath" -- gro wo lod is a corruption of that.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 25th, 2012 at 11:08 PM

Title: Re: Birth, Life and Death with Dr. Malcolm Smith

Content:

Mr. G said:

Namdrol,

Will this be offered in MP3 format for purchase at a later date for those that can't make it in person?

Malcolm wrote:

I have no idea -- that is a question for SSI.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 25th, 2012 at 10:28 PM

Title: Re: "taking someone else's negative karma"

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Misdeeds cannot be washed away with water, the suffering of living beings cannot be removed with the hand, my realization cannot be transferred to another, but by showing the true nature of things, there will be liberation.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 25th, 2012 at 10:12 PM

Title: Re: Role of śamatha and vipaśyanā in dzogchen?

Content:

Spiny Norman said:

Good stuff, but I'm not sure about describing it as the "unity" of awareness and emptiness. Isn't it just awareness of emptiness?

Spiny

pensum said:

As you are not sure Spiny I strongly recommend you visit a lama...

Malcolm wrote:

He did that, decided Vipassana was more suited to his nature.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 25th, 2012 at 9:43 PM

Title: Re: Gorampa untenable according to Karmapa

Content:

Mariusz said:

The term "self-liberation" is nothing new. For example is also in Dzogchen where "cutting through until primordial purity", or "the all is the play of Mahamudra" from the tradition IX Karmapa is.

Malcolm wrote:

The difference of course is introduction. There is no introduction in sutra, hence, no introduction for Madhyamaka.

Madhyamaka is not equivalent with Dzogchen and Mahamudra. As both Longchen pa and Jigme Lingpa points out, while the intellectual structure of the view of Prasanga and Dzogchen are identical i.e. free from all extremes, the former is based on an intellectual analysis whereas the latter is based on a personal experience.

In Dzogchen and Mahamudra meditation is based on an example wisdom. This is not the case with Madhyamaka.

Since meditation in Vajrayāna systems is based on an example wisdom gained during the introduction of the third and fourth empowerments, Gorampa points out in a treatise refuting some on Tsongkhapa's interpretations of the Guhyasamaja sadhana that it does matter very much what your intellectual view might be; whether cittamatra or madhyamaka, since your meditation is not based on an intellectual analysis, but rather a path wisdom derived from the introduction of third and fourth empowerment.

Therefore, I feel personally that all of this scholastic nit picking about Tibetan scholar's disagreements about what they think Indian scholars think is pretty much just an empty diversion. Hence the reason I lack patience with it, and am not very interested in defending Gorampa or criticizing Dolbupa, or Tsongkhapa, etc. I simply think that it is a waste of time.

If people want to spend their time reading books about Madhyamaka, I have no problem with that, but silly thread titles like "Gorampa untenable according to Karmapa" for me are meaningless. Honestly, who cares? (well obviously mariusz does). Also Gendun Chopel faults Gorampa for this and that point -- and there is no doubt the eighth Karmapa can be faulted for this and that point. It is all just meaningless dancing on books to me, something scholars do when they have a bit of free time for fun. The whole history of Tibetan Buddhist scholastics is scholars faulting each other for this and that point.

That is why I recommend going back to the basics: If you want read Madhyamaka, read the originals. If you have to learn Tibetan or Sanskrit to do so, great. But honestly, all this "Tsongkhapa is wrong!" "Gorampa is wrong!" "Karmapa is wrong!" Dolbupa is wrong" is really nonsensical and just perpetuates a sectarian intellectual culture that we should leave behind.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 25th, 2012 at 9:07 PM

Title: Re: ChNNR Dorje Drolo retreat

Content:

Pero said:

I really doubt this. Anyone else heard the same elsewhere?

Malcolm wrote:

Yup.

Drollo practice can cause lots of obstacles.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 25th, 2012 at 9:04 PM

Title: Re: Buddhism & Guns?

Content:

Namdrol said:

...This is simply a fact.

gregkavarnos said:

Yup! And Department of Justice statistics verify this fact. But certainly there are other factors involved. For example, did you know though that "During the offense that brought them to prison, 15% of State inmates and 13% of Federal inmates carried a handgun, and about 2%, a military-style semiautomatic gun." So basically "only" 17% of convicted crimes were carried out using a firearm anyway?

Malcolm wrote:

Which puts to rest the notion that the US is a society filled with gun violence. It isn't.

gregkavarnos said:

Another factor may also be that underprivileged adolescent males (ie those most likely to commit violent crimes) have been shipped off (with fantastic economic incentives) to kill and die in foreign lands (Iraq and Afghanistan) instead of in their own country since the mid-nineties?

Malcolm wrote:

No, only since 2003. The number of military personnel in the US was cut by a third under Clinton.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 25th, 2012 at 10:27 AM

Title: Re: Gorampa untenable according to Karmapa

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Sherab:

Mind can never transcend itself. This is why intellectualism is useless.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 25th, 2012 at 9:28 AM

Title: Re: Buddhism & Guns?

Content:

gregkavarnos said:

The strange thing? In my fifteen years on the island there has not been a single reported instance of somebody shooting somebody dead using assault rifles. Not one. Actually, shooting deaths on the island are normally by shotgun and very rare. On the island of Crete, where they have a handgun culture that rivals even the US, people get shot and killed all the time. In Athens, again, mainly handguns and normally during robberies.

Malcolm wrote:

Though I am not a gun owner, and do not support the wide proliferation of firearms, however there is a very interesting fact about America: since the early 1990's, the number of guns of all kinds have proliferated enormously in the US, but the incidence of all crimes, including violent crimes of with guns, has steadily declined.

This is simply a fact.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 25th, 2012 at 8:18 AM

Title: Re: Gorampa untenable according to Karmapa

Content:

Namdrol said:

The suffering of chasing mirages never ends. The only way to end it is simply to stop.

The suffering of accepting and rejecting never ends. The only way to end it is simply to stop.

Sherab said:

I can agree with these.

Namdrol said:

..likewise, the suffering of intellectual pursuits never ends. The only way to end it is simply to stop.

..likewise, the suffering of proof and rebuttal never ends. The only way to end it is simply to stop.

Sherab said:

I have a problem with these. Why? I cannot leave contradictions and paradoxes unresolved as they eat away at my faith/belief in the Dhamma/Dharma and disturb my mental peace. That's just me I guess.

Malcolm wrote:

intellectual pursuits are like mirages, always promising satiation and just creating more doubt.

Proof and rebuttal is merely intellectual accepting and rejecting.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 25th, 2012 at 8:16 AM

Title: Re: "taking someone else's negative karma"

Content:

Sherab said:

However, all these anecdotes do not square with what I was taught about karma .. that it cannot be taken away by someone else. But I think the suttas and sutras are silent about this. So what I've stated in my previous post is my way of resolving the impasse.

Malcolm wrote:

They are not silent about it. The sutras reject this idea explicitly.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 25th, 2012 at 7:51 AM

Title: Re: "taking someone else's negative karma"

Content:

spanda said:

...Therefore I wonder, is really impossible to take someone else karma, or it is possible in exceptional cases?

Sherab said:

My speculation:

Enlightened beings can take away the karma that you have already created but they cannot stop you from creating new karma. Without the stopping of creation of new karma, taking away karma already created is ultimately an exercise in futility.

Malcolm wrote:

Quite impossible, from a Buddhist pov.

However, in Hinduism, Jivanmuktis are considered able to accomplish this feat.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 25th, 2012 at 7:43 AM

Title: Re: Tibetan Art and Initiations Question

Content:

Mr. G said:

I'm thinking of having a thangka commissioned to be done by a trained Tibetan Buddhist artist. This is a gift for a teacher later this year.

My question is, does the artist need to have already received initiation on the Yidam in order to paint it? I think the Yidam may be quite rare, so I'm curious.

Also, if anyone could give recommendations, that would be great. I was thinking of the following:

<http://www.tibetanpaintings.com/> " onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;
<http://www.tashimannox.com/> " onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

Namdrol said:

Segei Noskov is quite excellent and fast, but he works with acrylics.

The tibetan painting people do quite excellent work, but they take three years.

Mr. G said:

Thanks Namdrol, I found his site:

<http://sergey-noskov.artistwebsites.com/index.html> "
onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

Do you think a thangka could be completed in a couple of months? I was hoping before June.

Also, the Yidam I want done is from a terma. Does one need initiation in the Yidam before painting?

Malcolm wrote:
not necessarily

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 25th, 2012 at 7:18 AM

Title: Re: Tibetan Art and Initiations Question

Content:

Mr. G said:

I'm thinking of having a thangka commissioned to be done by a trained Tibetan Buddhist artist. This is a gift for a teacher later this year.

My question is, does the artist need to have already received initiation on the Yidam in order to paint it? I think the Yidam may be quite rare, so I'm curious.

Also, if anyone could give recommendations, that would be great. I was thinking of the following:

<http://www.tibetanpaintings.com/> " onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;
<http://www.tashimannox.com/> " onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

Malcolm wrote:

Segei Noskov is quite excellent and fast, but he works with acrylics.

The tibetan painting people do quite excellent work, but they take three years.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 25th, 2012 at 7:06 AM

Title: Re: ChNNR Dorje Drolo retreat

Content:

dakini_boi said:

At the end of the retreat this morning, Rinpoche mentioned there would be a Dorje Drolo retreat soon. He said it wouldn't be open, but would be on webcast - does that mean that DC members will be able to attend through webcast? Anyone have any more info on when it will be? Thank you.

Malcolm wrote:

Correct, that means if you are a member of the DC you can log in to the webcast page using you pre-assigned user name and password.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 25th, 2012 at 7:04 AM

Title: Re: Misunderstanding emptiness

Content:

conebeckham said:

The imputation of existence, as well as the bifurcation into subject/object dichotomy, are both cognitive errors.

PadmaVonSamba said:

YEAH!

Paul said:

That reminds me of a thread that Namdrol once started in E-Sangha that started off a real atom of posts - the original post being something very terse like "Reality is a cognitive error". People went a bit crazy - it was very amusing.

Malcolm wrote:

"Sentient beings are nothing more than cognitive errors".

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 24th, 2012 at 8:56 PM

Title: Re: Bentinho Massaro - Is he there in a dzogchen sense?

Content:

wayland said:

Some pretty profound vids on YouTube by Bentinho Massaro.

I'm unsure what to make of them. Would you say that he is abiding in rigpa?

Is this a direct introduction to mind?

<https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=C6-J5BjWb9I> "

onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

<https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=Tij5PtEtHvU&feature=related> "

onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

<https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=OaWfcrA6ByY&feature=related> "

onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

Malcolm wrote:

Not profound.

Not rigpa.
No.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Tuesday, January 24th, 2012 at 11:21 AM
Title: Re: Misunderstanding emptiness
Content:
Unknown said:
it is when you throw "existence/reality"

Malcolm wrote:
You need to examine your attachment to the imputation you label "reality". That is the rabbit horn to which you are attached.

But part of the problem is that what you think is real is the external whole. You are happy to accept that your mental functioning creates an illusory identity, but you seem to think inert things like lettuce to be more real than your mind. Minds and lettuce however are of a piece, they are both depend phenomena and therefore, amount to no more than passing illusions.

N

Author: Malcolm
Date: Tuesday, January 24th, 2012 at 4:13 AM
Title: Re: China party official warns members over religion
Content:
Beatzen said:
Marx was good at describing the structure of the cage, but in the end he offered no alternative to industrial capitalism. :p

Malcolm wrote:
Right, he thought the cage was progressive.

His nineteenth scientism is quaint and charming, but utterly irrelevant.

I much prefer Naess.

N

Author: Malcolm
Date: Tuesday, January 24th, 2012 at 3:00 AM
Title: Re: Buddhism & Guns?
Content:

gregkavarnos said:

And what of the gun nut poster? It is not extreme, right? It's a balanced, moderate and objective view, right?

Namdrol said:

Not a shining example of moderation either.

David N. Snyder said:

Huh? Not sure what that is supposed to mean?

Good moderation is to allow all sides to have their say. I haven't moderated or censored anyone's posts here in this thread or others, including the ad hom and emotional ones against me or others.

Malcolm wrote:

Not that moderation. More in the line of "everything in moderation".

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 24th, 2012 at 2:52 AM

Title: Re: Misunderstanding emptiness

Content:

yadave said:

I have a simple explanation for shared reality, you do not.

Malcolm wrote:

Sure I do: functionality.

BTW, you seem to think I am trying to convince you Madhyamaka is correct -- I am not -- I am trying to help you understand what Madhyamaka is actually pointing out. Madhyamaka is not necessarily the appropriate POV for all practitioners.

Namdrol said:

So whatever clinging we have to any impermanent collection whether internal or external in terms of identity is certain to lead to suffering. This is the point of Madhyamaka i.e. to demonstrate that the belief that attributions of identity onto impermanent collections are anything more than mere conventions is a delusion. We agree on the internal part, we agree Madhyamaka extends this idea to external stuff, we've (hopefully) seen that I don't accept the latter, the meaning of "clinging to salt" is dubious and bears little relationship to "clinging to self" which, as you point out elsewhere, was Nagarjuna's main target in the first place.

Malcolm wrote:

The point was clinging to identity (atman). Atman, as you know, means self, it also means "essence" in Sanskrit, and it's synonym of svabhāva. This will be addressed below.

Namdrol said:

Of course these conventions work, but they are no more real than the habit of the "I" we attribute to our personal collection of aggregates. The habit of "I" certainly works, but that "I" is not real. The imputation of salt onto a given collection we have chosen to call salt "works" but the "salt" can't be found apart from the imputation we make onto that collection so we can use it effectively.

This flattening of external into internal just doesn't work for me, Namdrol. It looks elegant on the surface but loses too much "reality". And I have a strong suspicion that you and I have just about the same "salt experience."

Malcolm wrote:

Of course we do. Conventional truth is called "conventional" (vyavahāra) because it is based on empirically observed functionality shared by common people's ordinary healthy sense perception. What Madhyamaka rejects is that there is an salt atman or svabhāva, and further observes that claims for the existence of salt, or anything else for that matter, quickly become entangled with identity propositions.

Namdrol said:

Madhyamaka as a whole is an exercise in trying to introduce people to the real meaning of dependent origination i.e. the emptiness of persons and phenomena based in the Buddha's observation that statements about existence and non-existence were at odds with the real meaning of dependent origination.

Since there are no permanent phenomena, claims for the existence and non-existence of phenomena are completely naive on anything other than a conventional level.

"Permanent phenomena" is a straw man imho, a nonexistent used to assert something about existence. Impermanence is measurable, quantifiable, rocks persist longer than thoughts, let's not throw out the baby with the bath.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, and for this reason, in the Majjhima Nikāya, the Buddha quips that if one must choose a self between the body and the mind, it is better to choose the body since it at least lasts for up to 80 years, whereas a thought lasts mere milliseconds.

But permanent phenomena is not such a straw man, since we see in physics a trend to try and prove "self-origination" through the big bang theory and so on.

Namdrol said:

So you can keep insisting that salt harms snails as much as you like. Since you are making a conventional statement you are not going to get any complaint from me, but if you assert that there is saltiness in salt, for example, you have only two courses -- mire yourself in the myriad contradictions of asserting that there is an essence of salt or simply accede the point that "salt" is a conventional identity proposition that is at best a functional imputation and nothing more than that.

I think we're going in circles, Sir. There are salt molecules. "Essence" is your word, your quagmire, I was just offering something for it to mean wrt salt.

Malcolm wrote:

Not really, I am trying to explain to you that Madhyamaka states the self, the identity, the atman of any given phenomena, not merely personal phenomena, is merely an imputed label which derives from the functionality of that phenomena. The absence of identity in external phenomena does not obliterate them, indeed, from a Madhyamaka POV that absence of identity is all that makes them possible since whatever conditioned phenomena there are must be dependently originated and hence, must lack an intrinsic or unique identity, a "self", an essence, an atman.

We are not asserting, for example that dependent phenomenon are in the class of children of barren women or horns on rabbits or other such total non-existents -- which I suspect is your fear.

Dependent phenomena are free from both existence and non-existence since dependent phenomena are empty of a self or svabhāva, in other words, when a salt molecule ceases, there is no atman of salt that continues, and there is no atman of salt that ceases. When a salt molecule perishes all that has happened is that the causes and conditions for producing salt have ceased. Cessations are absence of causes, and are not caused per se.

If phenomena were to exist, they would not need causes and conditions, and since phenomena appear to be produced from causes and conditions, they are not non-existent either. They are not both existent and non-existent, since this is just a summary of the first extreme, and they are not neither, since this is just a summary of the second.

Therefore, since we cannot say that phenomena fall into one of these four extremes, Nagarjuna states dependent origination is free from eight extremes: in dependent origination there is no ceasing, arising, annihilation, permanence, going, coming, difference or sameness. He praises the Buddha for giving such a teaching because it frees one from ontological doubts i.e. pacifies proliferation.

All I am trying to get you to understand is that emptiness means that when you examine some conventional entity, something that we would say "exists out there in shared reality", there is no underlying reality proping it, apart from being labeled on the basis of functional appearances, such conventional entities cannot be found.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 24th, 2012 at 1:53 AM

Title: Re: Buddhism & Guns?

Content:

gregkavarnos said:

And what of the gun nut poster? It is not extreme, right? It's a balanced, moderate and objective view, right?

Malcolm wrote:

Not a shining example of moderation either.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 23rd, 2012 at 8:58 PM

Title: Re: Gorampa untenable according to Karmapa

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

[quote="Mariusz"]Is it means the distress is really produced? In contrast, let's look what

IX Karmapa wrote:

[/quote]

Of course not. There is no real production.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 23rd, 2012 at 11:31 AM

Title: Re: Misunderstanding emptiness

Content:

yadave said:

[\\

At the end of the day, we would know that our saltiness experience required one of these saltiness producers and hope that it wasn't one of the nasty ones that causes zits. Sorry.

Malcolm wrote:

And at the end of the day, we will still be left with the fact that all of these so called "things" are just imputations of identity onto impermanent collections, which themselves are composed of still further impermanent collections.

So whatever clinging we have to any impermanent collection whether internal or external in terms of identity is certain to lead to suffering. This is the point of Madhyamaka i.e. to demonstrate that the belief that attributions of identity onto impermanent collections are anything more than mere conventions is a delusion.

Of course these conventions work, but they are no more real than the habit of the "I" we attribute to our personal collection of aggregates. The habit of "I" certainly works, but that "I" is not real. The imputation of salt onto a given collection we have chosen to call salt "works" but the "salt" can't be found apart from the imputation we make onto that collection so we can use it effectively.

The problem most laypeople have with the MMK is that people rarely are acquainted with the views that MMK is seeking to correct. Without understanding Abhidharma, most of the arguments in the MMK will seem rather pointless if not obscure in the extreme. Some people mistakenly think that MMK is a panacea -- when in fact it is rather narrow text with a rather narrow project i.e. to correct Abhidharma realism and bring errant Abhidharmikas back to a proper understanding of dependent origination and help them to abandon a kind of naive essentialism that had crept into Buddhism.

Madhyamaka as a whole is an exercise in trying to introduce people to the real meaning of dependent origination i.e. the emptiness of persons and phenomena based in the Buddha's observation that statements about existence and non-existence were at odds with the real meaning of dependent origination.

Since there are no permanent phenomena, claims for the existence and non-existence of phenomena are completely naive on anything other than a conventional level.

So you can keep insisting that salt harms snails as much as you like. Since you are making a conventional statement you are not going to get any complaint from me, but if you assert that there is saltiness in salt, for example, you have only two courses -- mire yourself in the myriad contradictions of asserting that there is an essence of salt or simply accede the point that "salt" is a conventional identity proposition that is at best a functional imputation and nothing more than that.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 23rd, 2012 at 10:24 AM

Title: Re: Misunderstanding emptiness

Content:

yadave said:

In this sense, saltiness is an inherent quality of salt molecules, guilty as charged.

Tom said:

Quick question for Dave, and apologies if this interrupts the flow of debate - it is a quick one ...

I'm interested to know if you consider substances, say for example salt, that bear qualities, in this instance saltiness, to be more than conceptual fictions?

yadave said:

Hi Tom.

Yes.

Regards,
Dave.

Malcolm wrote:

I think the real question is, do you accept that these substances are intrinsically real, qualitatively real.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 23rd, 2012 at 10:17 AM

Title: Re: Misunderstanding emptiness

Content:

yadave said:

Saltiness arises when we combine salt molecules with a tongue. I get that. If we look at all the tastes a tongue provides and ask which ones are salty, what do we find? Salt molecules.

Malcolm wrote:

Hi dave, that's just not true. Monosodium glutamate is not salt. But it produces a salty taste.

There are lots of things that taste salty, that have no salt in them.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 23rd, 2012 at 9:21 AM

Title: Re: Misunderstanding emptiness

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

So then, the question becomes: "to what may one apply the term "exist?"

...and you are saying that "exist" can apply to conditionally arising phenomena,

...and (I believe) Namdrol is saying that it is erroneous to apply the term "exist" to conditionally arising phenomena.

.
.
.

Malcolm wrote:

As the Buddha specified:

Dvayaṃnissito kho'yaṃ kaccaana loko yebhuyyena atthita—ceva natthita—ca
Kaaccana, this world abides in duality, normally abiding in 'is' and 'is not'.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 23rd, 2012 at 8:43 AM

Title: Re: Misunderstanding emptiness

Content:

yadave said:

I think if we place one salt molecule on a snail and watch under a microscope we will see tiny bubbles. Not sure what you mean yet.

Malcolm wrote:

Salt molecules do not produce this effect all by themselves. You need a snail for that.

The rest is pointless to respond to.

I was not making a Madhyamaka claim, but the way with pointing out the karana hetu. Karana hetu (what you mistook as a Gaia statement) is a Abhidharma claim which Madhyamakas assert is merely a convention that cannot withstand analysis, like salt.

The point of that description however, was that conventionally speaking, Madhyamakas are generally considered to accept production from another, even if this does not withstand ultimate analysis, it is the conventional mode Madhyamakas are comfortable with because it accords with dependent origination. Thus salt a dependent collection upon which term salt is applied, the same goes for cars, persons and everything else without the need for some non-dependent entity to exist which can serve as a basis for designation.

Salt molecules are not independent entities, so "salt" therefore, is just a dependent designation on a collection, like "Dave" and "Malcolm".

The absolute truth of salt, Dave and Malcolm is emptiness i.e. that when salt, dave and malcolm are sought as distinct entities in their respective collections, nothing can be found apart from a designation upon a collection.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 23rd, 2012 at 7:36 AM

Title: Re: Misunderstanding emptiness

Content:

yadave said:

Right, but this is why we stopped looking for salt beyond a salt molecule earlier because all the smaller stuff isn't salty.

Malcolm wrote:

This is why for you saltiness is an inherent quality and intrinsic characteristic. But if you try to find salty in a salt molecule, you will not find it.

Look at the examination of intrinsic characteristics in the MMK.

but it is hopeless, you already decided you are a "realist" and that things "really exist".

Madhyamaka is not antirealist, Madhyamaka is beyond the extremes of "real" and "unreal".

Madhyamaka can be considered "antirealism" to the extent that realism is a wrong view, but not because Madhyamaka proposes there are "unreal" things.

To change the terms a little, "It is not that we claim that things are unreal, we merely remove claims of real things".

Salt is merely an imputation on a collection, but there is no real salt in salt. Dave is likewise an imputation on a collection, but there is no Dave in Dave. If would look for Dave in the collection called "Dave", where are we going to find it? In your head, brain, heart, liver, hand, etc? Apart from your head, liver, etc.? The same analysis of the person, by which we discover that persons are merely designations on a collection, must be extended to phenomena. That is the intent of Madhyamaka. In other words, just as the term car is merely a designation on a collection of parts, and not car is found in a car, likewise, we can make the same observation for all compounded phenomena. People are not one case and cars and salt another.

N

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 23rd, 2012 at 7:11 AM

Title: Re: Gorampa untenable according to Karmapa

Content:

kirtu said:

How would Gorampa critique it?

Kirt

Malcolm wrote:

As I explained elsewhere, according to Goramap the imputation of mere existence is sufficient to produce this distress.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 23rd, 2012 at 6:27 AM

Title: Re: Gorampa untenable according to Karmapa

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

"inherent existence" is an abstract concept only appearing to an onto-analytical consciousness of a philosopher, and even then not usually when he's drinking tea!

kirtu said:

No - inherent existence is an emotional grasping to objects. If someone broke a favourite cup then this causes emotional distress with most people who liked that cup. Grasping to inherent existence of phenomena takes place before conscious thought and is a product of momentary ignorance of impermanence and dependant origination.

Kirt

Malcolm wrote:

Gorampa would not agree with this assessment.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 23rd, 2012 at 6:25 AM

Title: Re: Misunderstanding emptiness

Content:

cloudburst said:

Though you bridle, it is actually a form of obscurantism that you will not admit up front that you are using the term "existent" in a specialized sense. As a result, newbies can't figure out what you are saying.

Malcolm wrote:

I regularly qualify that in Madhyamaka the term "existent" is used in a very specific way. I discovered this through a close reading of Buddhapalita many years ago -- this is one of the reasons why I cite him more frequently than others.

Namdrol said:

There is some disagreement among Tibetans as to what we are not supposed to find. However, when we clearly identify that the object of our investigation is a truly existent phenomena, for example, the body that we normally perceive with our faulty perception, all schools agree that it does not exist in any way. We all fail to find the same thing.

Malcolm wrote:

The difference is that not all Tibetans agree that this is all we are supposed to find, i.e. the non-existence of a "chos bden par sgrub pa", a truly existent phenomena. Many Tibetans assert, and have done so for centuries prior to Tsongkhapa, that not only are we to not find truly existent phenomena, we are indeed to find no phenomena at all which exist according to any of the four extremes. If these Tibetans are incorrect, then how can we accept the realization of any Tibetans prior to Tsongkhapa, or in any school that differs in opinion with his view? How are we for example to accept the realization of Atisha, Milarepa, etc.?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 23rd, 2012 at 6:17 AM

Title: Re: Misunderstanding emptiness

Content:

Namdrol said:

The emptiness of salt does not prove salt does not exist, it merely removes the claim that there is an existent called "salt" When salt is analyzed, no salt is found in salt. There is no entity among the components of salt that make salt salt.

yadave said:

Salt molecules are entities, conditioned entities, the smallest things we find that have properties we know of that make salt salt, make salty taste salty. What are you looking for?

Malcolm wrote:

If salt molecules are conditioned entities they are unable to act as salt alone. Hence there is no "salt" in the appearance we are labeling salt because the conditions which support the appearance of "salt" do not end at "salt molecules", do they? Salt molecules, we will readily, are conditioned entities upon which we label the aggregate we are calling salt. But a salt molecule itself is an aggregate, and so and so forth. A salt molecule cannot act as salt, it must be in an aggregate to have that function. And a given salt molecule itself cannot function without the aggregate upon which it depends. And that dependence has both depth as well as extension i.e. not only does it depend on its own specific causes and conditions, but its dependence is lateral, since it depends the presence of the element of sodium, chloride, as has been mentioned above. Not only does salt molecule depend on these two elements, it depends on conditions of pressure, heat, and so on. So a great deal more goes into producing the appearance we are labeling salt mere salt molecules. In fact, the presence of salt molecules is dependent on every other phenomena in the universe i.e. karana hetu or "creative cause" or the "dominant condition" the principle that all phenomena are causes for all other phenomena apart from themselves. When all of this is taken into consideration, as any proper analysis must, we find that in a very real sense salt is empty of salt just as persons are empty of persons, and just as all conditioned phenomena are empty of conditioned phenomena.

Whatever arises dependently, that is empty -- that is Nagarjuna's message -- there is no place where we say "Oh, we can stop our analysis here". If you stop your analysis, you are in effect making a claim of independence, at least, that is what Nagarjuna is trying to force you to admit.

yadave said:

Well I apologize, Namdrol, I know we've been through this, but we do find a basis for our labels.

Malcolm wrote:

Only if we arbitrarily limit our analysis of dependent relations. And if we limit that analysis, the Madhyamakas will try to force us to admit that we have made a claim about essences.

yadave said:

The only way I can make sense of your assertion is by imagining some kind of blocks world where we are looking for a smallest indivisible block to label. But we don't do this when looking for the smallest component of salt, we label this "salt molecule." For Padma's composite thunderstorm, we find a basis consisting of wind, rain, lightning, an array of composite entities that we collectively label "thunderstorm." We don't include "airplanes" in our collection because they are not required to have a "thunderstorm."

Malcolm wrote:

Airplains and all other phenomena are required, it is intrinsic to the logic of the six causes and four conditions, which are the six causes and four conditions that Nagarjuna sets out and dismantles completely in the first chapter of the MMK.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 23rd, 2012 at 5:52 AM

Title: Re: Gorampa untenable according to Karmapa

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

in the west, it was Heidegger who pointed out that in our everyday lives, we don't really notice the cup at all: we just use it. we take it from the cupboard, pour tea in it, drink from it, wash it and put it away without ever thinking about it at all! so not only do we not perceive a cup's "inherent existence", we normally don't even perceive its existence as an object for a subject at all! its only when the handle falls off or it breaks that we even notice the cup as a cup, it puts us in an entirely different state of consciousness in relation to the cup. the point is that the "philosophical" activity of contemplating the cup's existence or lack of it, is a quite artificial one to begin with. So, if conventional reality is defined in Madhyamaka as the way the world unthinkingly goes about its business with "objects" that function, then its really more the way Heidegger says it is, and certainly not the way tsongkhapa says. "inherent existence" is an abstract concept only appearing to an onto-analytical consciousness of a philosopher, and even then not usually when he's drinking tea!

Malcolm wrote:

Nagarjuna was critiquing the notion that a cup is there. He was critiquing how common everyday language is misleading. Hence his famed refutation of movement:

"Apart having moved or not having moved, there is no present movement".

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 23rd, 2012 at 5:21 AM

Title: Re: Misunderstanding emptiness

Content:

Namdrol said:

There is some disagreement among Tibetans as to what we are not supposed to find.

PadmaVonSamba said:

Tibetans put salt in their tea.

Malcolm wrote:

Is this really a helpful statement? If so how? If people spent less time being smart asses and trying to be clever, this conversation might be more worthwhile.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 23rd, 2012 at 5:18 AM

Title: Re: Misunderstanding emptiness

Content:

yadave said:

My concern is when folks begin claiming that "emptiness of salt proves salt does not exist"

Malcolm wrote:

The emptiness of salt does not prove salt does not exist, it merely removes the claim that there is an existent called "salt" When salt is analyzed, no salt is found in salt. There is no entity among the components of salt that make salt salt.

It is the same for any composite entity. We experience an appearance, we impute a label upon it, this act lets us work with that appearance. When we examine the appearance to find the basis for the label, however, none can be found. That non-finding is the emptiness of the appearance in question.

There is some disagreement among Tibetans as to what we are not supposed to find.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 23rd, 2012 at 5:11 AM

Title: Re: Gorampa untenable according to Karmapa

Content:

Virgo said:

Just that it exists, but before I studied I thought there was actual "cup" and not just rūpa.

Kevin

Malcolm wrote:

What is the difference between "actual" and "exists"? Nothing substantive, as far as I can tell.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 23rd, 2012 at 4:58 AM

Title: Re: Gorampa untenable according to Karmapa

Content:

Tsongkhapafan said:

It is not that people perceive things to exist, it's that they perceive things to exist inherently.

Malcolm wrote:

This is the unproven assertion at the heart of Tsongkhapa's system.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 23rd, 2012 at 4:56 AM

Title: Re: Gorampa untenable according to Karmapa

Content:

Namdrol said:

Gorampa points out that Tsongkhapa's first assertion is untrue, since inherent existences does not appear

Virgo said:

But don't sentient beings naturally impute or assume this?

Malcolm wrote:

That is what Tsongkhapa believes and what Gorampa rejects.

You can ask yourself the question very simply-- when you see a cup of coffee, do you think, even for a second, that it exists inherently? Or do you merely accept that it is exists there?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 23rd, 2012 at 3:33 AM

Title: Re: Gorampa untenable according to Karmapa

Content:

Tsongkhapa said:

My understanding is that the Prasangikas who follow Gorampa completely deny the validity of conventional truth. For them, conventional truths are completely false objects appearing to an ignorant mind, so when you become enlightened, you do not perceive conventional truths. Tsongkhapa teaches that conventional and ultimate truths are mutually supportive and equally valid (albeit that conventional truths incorrectly appear as inherently existent to non-Buddhas) and that Buddhas realize the union of conventional and ultimate truth simultaneously.

Malcolm wrote:

The difference is that for Tsongkhapa, conventional truths are able to withstand ultimate analysis since all that is being analyzed is the subtle object of negation, inherent existence, not the existence, of a conventional truth.

For Gorampa, they can not, since no phenomena can survive examination via the course object of negation, existence. Gorampa accepts that Candrakirti specifically identifies (in the Prasannapāda) a subtle object of negation, but according to Gorampa, it is just a formal identification since inherent existence is automatically eliminated when existence itself is analyzed.

According to Tsongkhapa, what is being misperceived by sentient beings in conventional truths is the inherent existence of conventional truths i.e. he claims that when an ordinary person sees a chair, they are seeing an inherently existent chair. However, Tsongkhapa also claims that ordinary sentient beings are incapable of distinguishing between mere existence and inherent existence.

Gorampa points out that Tsongkhapa's first assertion is untrue, since inherent existence does not appear, and Tsongkhapa's second assertion is self-contradictory, sentient beings only see existences, not inherent existences.

Tsongkhapa replies that conventional truths are linguistic entities, mental imputations, and that therefore, the notion of inherent existence is embedded in all imputations of conventional truth. Gorampa counters that this interpretation of conventional truth is faulty, since in fact relative truths are first and foremost appearances to a deluded mind, and what such a deluded mind grasps is not a truly existent object, but rather a merely existing object, and imputations of inherency are confined to the philosophical speculations of scholars, not the naive imputations of ordinary persons such as Chai wallas, who would never imagine their tea cups had some intrinsic nature that made them teacups.

So, at base, a large part of the disagreement hinges on how these two masters understand conceptual operations in sentient beings and what they understand Nagarjuna, Buddhapaṇita and Candrakīrti to be saying about such conceptual operations. This is why Tsongkhapa places such importance on separating and identifying the correct object of negation, and why Gorampa thinks that such an effort misses the point and is unnecessary, since the coarse object of negation is sufficient for removing wrong views via the classic tetralemma (in ordinary persons -- awakened persons have no need of the caturskoti).

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 23rd, 2012 at 12:23 AM

Title: Re: Role of śamatha and vipaśyanā in dzogchen?

Content:

Namdrol said:

In the early period of Buddhism, there were two yānas, śamatha yāna and vipaśyāna yāna; beginners went to Śariputra to training in vipaśyāna for stream entry; then they would go train in śamatha with Maudgalyana for further progress.

Lance Cousins wrote a very interesting article about this.

Mr. G said:

Hi Namdrol,

Do you recall the name of the article, or if the article was published in a book? I just searched on JSTOR and didn't find anything.

Malcolm wrote:

Cousins, L.S., 1984, 'Samatha-yāna and vipassanā-yāna' in Dhammapala D., et al., eds, Buddhist Studies in Honour of Hammalava Saddhatissa, Nugegoda, Sri Lanka, pp. 56-68.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 22nd, 2012 at 10:21 PM

Title: Re: Dzogchen, Buddhist and non-Buddhist teachings...

Content:

catmoon said:

The idea that Dharma is the cause and Dzogchen the result can't possibly be universal, simply because there are billions of Buddhists who are not Dzogchenpas.

Malcolm wrote:

Actually, the point being made is that Dzogchen is the cause and basis for all dharma traditions, whether of samsara or nirvana. But I don't expect anyone to accept that.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 22nd, 2012 at 10:14 PM

Title: Re: Gorampa untenable according to Karmapa

Content:

Anders Honore said:

I am not sure how one can possibly avoid existence and non-existence.

Malcolm wrote:

This is the purpose of dependent origination.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 22nd, 2012 at 9:57 PM

Title: Re: Role of śamatha and vipaśyanā in dzogchen?

Content:

Spiny Norman said:

Actually I think in the early teachings samatha and vipasyana were not seen as separate activities anyway.

Spiny

Malcolm wrote:

In the early period of Buddhism, there were two yānas, śamatha yāna and vipaśyāna yāna; beginners went to Śāriputra to training in vipaśyāna for stream entry; then they would go train in śamatha with Maudgalyana for further progress.

Lance Cousins wrote a very interesting article about this.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 22nd, 2012 at 9:20 AM

Title: Re: Misunderstanding emptiness

Content:

cloudburst said:

In the meantime, since we both know you cannot take your own advice, please feel free to continue debating!

Malcolm wrote:

I have very little interest in debate, since debate generally consists of dancing on books.

However, please do not confuse my sincere answers to questions as debate, since that is not my intent. My days of debating this point and that point are finished.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 22nd, 2012 at 3:47 AM

Title: Re: Gorampa untenable according to Karmapa

Content:

Mariusz said:

There are some, such as Gorampa and Shākya Chokden, who say that this verse [verse 6.75 of the Entrance] proves that Chandrakīrti holds, from his own perspective, that self-awareness exists conventionally. They also say that in Chandrakīrti's tradition the all-base, self-awareness, outer objects, and the person all exist conventionally, but they do not exist as "conventional phenomena that can withstand analysis."

These positions are untenable. The master Chandrakīrti does not, as his own position, accept any phenomenon as existent or nonexistent in either ultimate or conventional truth

Anders Honore said:

Stupid outsider question here that I am sure has been covered a thousand times in the endless Prasangika/Svatantrika debates, but what exactly is wrong with saying that things exist conventionally? How could there even be language if we did not play along with the convention that things exist?

Malcolm wrote:

This is all nauseating hair-splitting by Tibetan scholars with nothing better to do with their time.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 22nd, 2012 at 3:40 AM

Title: Re: Gorampa untenable according to Karmapa

Content:

Mariusz said:

As you see the topic is linked to our discussion in Madyamika Sautrantika vs Prasangika forum, so I think it is beneficial.

Malcolm wrote:

Yup. Don't care.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 22nd, 2012 at 2:20 AM

Title: Re: Combining Ayurvedic/Tibetan Medicine and Herbs & Supplements

Content:

catmoon said:

Um, if mercury sulfate

Malcolm wrote:

My error, mercury sulfide.

In any case, detoxified mercury is not a commonly used medicine, because it is difficult to make, and if prepared improperly, can harm the patient. That being said, it is used, it is prepared, and when used properly, is quite beneficial for many diseases.

Quite frankly, people get all het up about mercury, but think nothing of doing chemo.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 22nd, 2012 at 12:29 AM

Title: Re: Western Buddhists, modernity and the European enlightenment

Content:

dumbbambu said:

really?

Malcolm wrote:

Really.

Though my vehicles are inconceivable, they are included in two categories:
samsara and nirvana.

--Rig pa rang shar tantra, the main explanatory tantra of Dzogchen.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 21st, 2012 at 10:12 PM

Title: Re: Misunderstanding emptiness

Content:

cloudburst said:

In context, as explained above, we can see that since what Nagarjuna is talking about here is essential existence, it must either be svabhava or parabhava, and as you correctly point out, parabhava is actually just a form of svabhava.

thanks!

Namdrol said:

For Nag. that is the only kind of existence there could be i.e. bhāva = svābhava.

cloudburst said:

It would seem then that his principal disciples failed to understand him as they repeatedly refer to things existing conventionally, as did Buddha, upon whose explanations Nagarjuna's work is based.

I know precisely what you are trying to say. You are just having a awful, self-contradictory time doing it.

If svabhava, exhaustively refuted by Nagarjuna, were the only way in which things could exist, nothing would exist in any way.

Malcolm wrote:

As Buddhapalita states:

"It is not that we assert non-existence, we merely remove claims for existing existents".

Your concern is to maintain people's conventional sense of reality.

The Madhyamaka concern is to remove people's false conceptions.

See my post over in the Gorampa thread. All of this discussion is just chasing illusions and being wrapped in accepting and rejecting.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 21st, 2012 at 10:03 PM

Title: Re: Gorampa untenable according to Karmapa

Content:

Namdrol said:

You go first. Tell me where Gorampa actually says this. It is not sufficient to produce a charge without providing evidence.

Mariusz said:

My quote of the Karmapa is already in the first post where "The Feast for the Fortunate. A Commentary on the Entrance to the Middle Way That Easily Pulls Along the Chariot of the Takpo Kagyü Siddhas " of the Karmapa;

2.2.2.1.1.6.2.3.1.1.1.2.1.1.2.2.2.2.1.2.2.2.2.2. (Refuting claims that the above refutation applies equally to our own explanation of memory).

Malcolm wrote:

Not playing. This kind of thing for me is no longer of any importance. But I do suggest that those who are interested may read Gorampa for themselves.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 21st, 2012 at 9:50 PM

Title: Re: Gorampa untenable according to Karmapa

Content:

Mariusz said:

ccording to the Karmapa for Gorampa "outer objects exist conventionally" somewhere "out there" although can not withstand analysis.

Namdrol said:

This is a misrepresentation of Gorampa' view, thus it is worthy of no further consideration.

Mariusz said:

Why do you think it is a misrepresentation? Can you quote please?

Malcolm wrote:

The suffering of chasing mirages never ends. The only way to end it is simply to stop. likewise, the suffering of intellectual pursuits never ends. The only way to end it is simply to stop.

The suffering of accepting and rejecting never ends. The only way to end it is simply to stop.

likewise, the suffering of proof and rebuttal never ends. The only way to end it is simply to stop.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 21st, 2012 at 9:23 PM

Title: Re: Dzogchen Community of Chogyal Namkhai Norbu

Content:

Jikan said:

good morning webcasters

Malcolm wrote:

good morning!

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 21st, 2012 at 8:42 PM

Title: Re: Misunderstanding emptiness

Content:

cloudburst said:

In context, as explained above, we can see that since what Nagarjuna is talking about here is essential existence, it must either be svabhava or parabhava, and as you correctly point out, parabhava is actually just a form of svabhava.

thanks!

Malcolm wrote:

For Nag. that is the only kind of existence there could be i.e. bhāva = svābhava.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 21st, 2012 at 8:38 PM

Title: Re: Combining Ayurvedic/Tibetan Medicine and Herbs & Supplements

Content:

catmoon said:

OMG are you guys serious? You are eating things laced with mercury and arsenic? That's crazy dangerous.

Malcolm wrote:

Arsenic is not present in all Shilajit.

"Mercury" used in Ayurveda and Tibetan Medicine is a form of processed mercury, processed into mercury sulfate, which is inert in the human body, but very useful for treating many kinds of serious diseases. Mercury preparations are not commonly dispensed, however.

Both Ayurvedic and Tibetan medical texts are filled with warnings about using and handling raw mercury.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 21st, 2012 at 8:35 PM

Title: Re: Anyone Know Anything About This?

Content:

alpha said:

So, for those who run the international dzogchen community is social networking something unacceptable?

Malcolm wrote:

No, but putting up websites that represent the community without checking is unacceptable.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 21st, 2012 at 8:26 PM

Title: Re: Gorampa untenable according to Karmapa

Content:

Mariusz said:

According to the Karmapa for Gorampa "outer objects exist conventionally" somewhere "out there" although can not withstand analysis.

Malcolm wrote:

This is a misrepresentation of Gorampa's view, thus it is worthy of no further consideration.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 21st, 2012 at 10:09 AM

Title: Re: Combining Ayurvedic/Tibetan Medicine and Herbs & Supplements

Content:

Nemo said:

I think there may be more than one type of shilajit and they have different properties.

.

Malcolm wrote:

Traditionally there are several kinds, depending on what minerals are present in it.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 21st, 2012 at 10:08 AM

Title: Re: Combining Ayurvedic/Tibetan Medicine and Herbs & Supplements

Content:

Nemo said:

It's not the same as it was years ago. It used to come from the Himalayas and was black.

Malcolm wrote:

Try Siddhi Energetics stuff. It is from Ladakh and it is as black as obsidian. Tell em I sent you.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 21st, 2012 at 9:54 AM

Title: Re: Anyone Know Anything About This?

Content:

Pema Rigdzin said:

So does anyone have any idea what the actual problems with Dzogchen World were? The reasons for shutting it down were not at all clear to me in that email.

Malcolm wrote:

They did not get the sign off of the international Gakyil among other issues. There are fairly rigid guidelines about what an official DC website can be.

I don't think that they anticipated social networking, however.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 21st, 2012 at 9:51 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen Community of Chogyal Namkhai Norbu

Content:

Jikan said:

Kundalini is mentioned in _The Crystal and the Way of Light_ (p. 124) in a way that is a bit confusing. is it thigle, is it prana... ?

wisdom said:

Ah! It seems to indicate that thigle/kundalini is the essential nature of prana. It reads: There are many types of prana, and they support the many types of dualistic mind; as long as the prana circulates in the many various channels, these dualistic minds persist. But when prana is brought into the central channel, its essential nature -thigle, or kundalini- is activated and enters the channels. Dualistic mind is then overcome, and realization achieved.

So its not saying prana is kundalini (which accords also with what Hindu tantra believes) but that when prana is brought into the central channel, its essential nature manifests as thigle or kundalini. In the same way, the mind has its thoughts, imputations, and so forth, and its essential nature which can be revealed.

Malcolm wrote:

In the Guhyasamaja system, bindu refers to a bindu of prana vāyu. Bindu therefore can refer to prana vāyu.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 21st, 2012 at 5:37 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen Community of Chogyal Namkhai Norbu

Content:

Clarence said:

Kundalini energy? I thought Buddhists don't recognize Kundalini? Namdrol-la, how are we to understand that?

Malcolm wrote:

The term kundalini never occurs in any buddhist texts. But the notion of unblocking the nadis of the cakras from the bottom cakra on up does exist in Buddhist tantras.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 21st, 2012 at 5:34 AM

Title: Re: Combining Ayurvedic/Tibetan Medicine and Herbs & Supplements

Content:

Lhug-Pa said:

In reading

<http://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=96&t=4893&p=50672&hilit=Shilajit#p50672>, it looks like Shilajit is more-or-less neutral temperature-wise, yet leaning a little towards warming.

Malcolm wrote:

You are right, I was in error. In Tibetan medicine is used to reduce fevers.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 21st, 2012 at 5:31 AM

Title: Re: Misunderstanding emptiness

Content:

Beatzen said:

I knew that the mahayana extended that absense to external phenomenon. But when it's analysis of the inner self, is it "emptiness of self" instead of where the pali would dictate "no self"?

Malcolm wrote:

These two terms are identical in meaning.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 21st, 2012 at 5:19 AM

Title: Re: Misunderstanding emptiness

Content:

Beatzen said:

Namdrol, is there a variance between teachings of anatman and shunyata?

Malcolm wrote:

Mahāyāna traditionally maintains that the Pali canon and its kin and the traditions that derive from them focuses on teaching the emptiness of persons only and do not in general extend the analysis of absence of identity to phenomena themselves.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 21st, 2012 at 5:04 AM

Title: Re: Role of śamatha and vipaśyanā in dzogchen?

Content:

Paul said:

Thanks for posting that. It's reminded me of something that Erik Pema Kunsang said recently - that Dzogchen is beyond both a gradual path and an instantaneous path. It's far more complex than those two categories.

Malcolm wrote:

From my point of view, it is far less complicated; Dzogchen in a real sense is not a path, it is one's state.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 21st, 2012 at 4:07 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen Community of Chogyal Namkhai Norbu

Content:

Kilaya said:

Video connection is working, too. Tenerife guys must have read our complaints and did something about bandwidth.

Namdrol said:

If you are in tenerife, then you are not listening the actual retreat....

There is a glitch where a recorded retreat is at the shang shung address.

Use this

<http://www.freezecast.com:8000/audio> " onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

Kilaya said:

Rinpoche is presently speaking about sacred places. Am I listening to the actual retreat?

Malcolm wrote:

yes

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 21st, 2012 at 4:01 AM

Title: Re: Is taking medication a sin?

Content:

waqqashokhar said:

I am an academic researching this topic from the point of view of patients asked to take medication which may have religiously forbidden ingredients e.g. Gelatine or stearic acid.

Would like to know that in the context of vegetarianism being accepted practice in many Buddhist traditions, is there any dietary law that prohibits any specific animals or use of animal products in medication?

Would appreciate comments, suggestions for further reading or expert opinions.

Malcolm wrote:

Nope, the traditional Buddhist medicine is Ayurveda and there are kinds of meat, as well as urines, feces, etc., recommended as remedies for diseases in Ayurvedic texts as well as texts on Tibetan Medicine.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 21st, 2012 at 3:51 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen Community of Chogyal Namkhai Norbu

Content:

Kilaya said:

Video connection is working, too. Tenerife guys must have read our complaints and did something about bandwidth.

Malcolm wrote:

If you are in tenerife, then you are not listening the actual retreat....

There is a glitch where a recorded retreat is at the shang shung address.

Use this

<http://www.freezecast.com:8000/audio> " onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 20th, 2012 at 10:56 PM

Title: Re: Misunderstanding emptiness

Content:

Namdrol said:

But is said also in the suttas that the Buddha once levitated to an elevation of 14 palm trees.

PadmaVonSamba said:

maybe they were teensy weensy trees.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, but even levitating half an inch off the ground is pretty damn amazing, don't you think?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 20th, 2012 at 10:49 PM

Title: Re: Big Mind, Big Money, Big Scam

Content:

BuddhaSoup said:

I'm just amazed that Genpo stills markets himself as Roshi, and a Zen Master.

Malcolm wrote:

He's got bills, like everyone else.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 20th, 2012 at 9:49 PM

Title: Re: Unseen Beings in Tibetan Buddhism

Content:

Paul said:

Is there such a thing as a poltergeist in Tibetan buddhism? I seem to remember mention of a type of being with "power over the movement of objects" in a sangcho text and it sounded very similar.

Malcolm wrote:

Sure.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 20th, 2012 at 9:47 PM

Title: Re: James Low & Simply Being

Content:

asunthatneversets said:

... He just uses different terms like "staying in the I AM" ...

Sönam said:

It does not sound very dzogchen ...

Sönam

Malcolm wrote:

Agreed. Not very dzogchen at all.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 20th, 2012 at 9:46 PM

Title: Re: Western Buddhists, modernity and the European enlightenment

Content:

Thug4lyfe said:

Isn't that the same thing what most other Mahayana schools are teaching? If all Dharma gates are equal, why does it sound like your trying to say Dzogchen is da best au? Know wat im sayin?

Astus said:

Sectarian thinking never becomes outdated.

Malcolm wrote:

Some people might think that is what is behind my statement, but they would be mistaken.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 20th, 2012 at 10:47 AM

Title: Re: Misunderstanding emptiness

Content:

yadave said:

People, hummingbirds, and snails must all "go around the tree" to get to the other side. Words and perceptions may differ, but the "tree" is real in this sense and no personal hubris of mine causes this to be so.

Namdrol said:

But some people don't.

yadave said:

Namdrol, are you saying some people go through the tree, as in walking through a wall?

Regards,

Dave.

Malcolm wrote:

One day Candrakirti was walking through a passageway in Nalanda, his head in a book, and he bumped his head on a pillar -- a student saw this and said "Aha! That pillar is not so empty, is it!". Candra looked at him, and passed his hand right through the pillar much to the student's embarrassed astonishment. Or so this traditional story runs.

Of course there is kashina meditation -- ostensibly, if you meditate on the kashina of earth, you gain control over the earth element and can travel through mountains, etc.

It is my opinion that the apparent solidity of phenomena such as trees and rocks, etc., is directly related to the solidity of one's delusion. The more solid one's delusion, the more solid apparent phenomena seem.

On the other hand, people with very solid delusions regularly kill themselves too, through not recognizing that solid things will kill them, like the ground when they attempt to fly off buildings.

But is said also in the suttas that the Buddha once levitated to an elevation of 14 palm trees. Such yogic feats are described too often in Buddhist texts generation after generation for me to simply reject them out of hand.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 20th, 2012 at 10:11 AM

Title: Re: Misunderstanding emptiness

Content:

yadave said:

People, hummingbirds, and snails must all "go around the tree" to get to the other side. Words and perceptions may differ, but the "tree" is real in this sense and no personal hubris of mine causes this to be so.

Malcolm wrote:

But some people don't.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 20th, 2012 at 3:16 AM

Title: Re: How "Old School" of an Internet user are you?

Content:

kirtu said:

Way back when I do played around with the Altair 8800, PET, etc. My first personal machine was in Germany and was an Atari 800. I've been online permanently since 1984 both on the Internet and BBS's and was probably on BBS's a bit while in Germany (so maybe from '83). Of course we had email even before that in college but no Arpanet access then (maybe Arpanet was just for college professors and researchers at that time).

I played around with Minitel in Strassbourg in early fall 1983 when visiting a friend there.

Kirt

Malcolm wrote:

Had a mac in 85, never bothered with BBoards though I knew what they were. Got first modem in 1994 along with second mac. Found AOL., etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 20th, 2012 at 3:14 AM

Title: Re: Misunderstanding emptiness

Content:

yadave said:

Namdrol has me pulling out my Jay Garfield MMK and I remember an important term missing from this list. Jay says (page 220) "Essence by definition is eternal and independent" so

Malcolm wrote:

Right, but the point is that Nag. equates existence (bhāva) with svabhāva (essence in this translation). In other words, Nag. is asserting that bhāva is svabhāva by necessity.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 20th, 2012 at 12:02 AM

Title: Re: Combining Ayurvedic/Tibetan Medicine and Herbs & Supplements

Content:

Nemo said:

Where does Shilajit come from now? It is a completely different colour than it was years ago.

Did Nagarjuna leave any of his recipes for mercury medicines? I just read about his alchemical practices last night. Perhaps we should dig up his old recipes for turning iron into gold to support the Dharma.

Malcolm wrote:

Shilajatu is a kind of bitumous exudate that oozes from cliffs in the heat of summer.

Nagarjuna's method of processing mercury into mercury sulfate still exists and is used in Tibetan medicine.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 19th, 2012 at 11:41 PM

Title: Re: Misunderstanding emptiness

Content:

DarwidHalim said:

Nagarjuna view is clarified by his last student Chandrakirti that there is no such thing called arise, persist and perish even at conventional level.

Malcolm wrote:

You are simply mistaken about Candrakirti.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 19th, 2012 at 11:38 PM

Title: Re: Western Buddhists, modernity and the European enlightenment

Content:

dumbbombu said:

gotcha, thanks. so would it be fair to say Dzogchen views all schools favourably then although it perhaps views itself as the pinnacle or ultimate?

Malcolm wrote:

Dzogchen regards all vehicles favorably and perceives itself as the final meaning of all Buddhist, as well as non-Buddhist, teachings.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 19th, 2012 at 11:31 PM

Title: Re: Western Buddhists, modernity and the European enlightenment

Content:

Namdrol said:

All teachings spring from dzogchen, it is the source of all teachings, and the place to which all teachings return.

N

dumbbombu said:

hi Namdrol, this is an interesting statement. when you say it, are you meaning all Vajrayana teachings, all tantric teachings or all Buddhadharma teachings, period? if the latter, care to elaborate a little in layman's terms? cheers.

Malcolm wrote:

All dharma teachings. All dharma teachings arise from the need to educate people about their real state. That real state is called "Dzogchen". Some teachings are more direct, some are less so, but in the end, that is the state they are all pointing at, whether directly or indirectly.

Of course, dzogchen teachings themselves point to this state in the most direct way.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 19th, 2012 at 9:28 PM

Title: Re: Combining Ayurvedic/Tibetan Medicine and Herbs & Supplements

Content:

Lhug-Pa said:

Although in reading the thread here about Shilajit, it seems that it might be cooling, which wouldnt be good for Tummo practice; although it was also said that Shilajit could have a warming after-digestion effect.

Malcolm wrote:

Quite the opposite, Shilajatu is very warming.

Pregnant women in general should take no herbs at all.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 19th, 2012 at 9:26 PM

Title: Re: A 1st look: Red Pine's Laṅkāvatāra Sūtra as Jasmine Tea

Content:

Will said:

Could this "book of Indian letters" be some sort of dictionary and he was just back translating from Chinese into Sanskrit, then Tibetan? Why say he then "established it"; why not simply write "he translated it."?

Malcolm wrote:

No, it cannot mean that.

It means that he had an Indian manuscript of the text in front of him. Established here means something like "edited it". Means he translated it and checked it for accuracy.

It is quite likely he had a Chinese version with him as well. Many early sutras translated into Tibetan were translations which triangulated between Sanskrit originals and Chinese translations.

For example, here is another colophon for the 'phags pa legs nyes kyi rgyu dang 'bras bu bstan pa zhes bya ba theg pa chen po'i mdo zhus chen gyi lo tstsha ba bande chos grub kyis rgya gar dang rgya'i dpe las bsgyur cing zhus te gtan la phab pa/

The Zhuchen Lotsawa, the monk Chosdrup, translated it from an Indian and an Chinese text, edited it and established it.

Or here from one of the Ratnakuta sutras, the āryāyusmannandagarbhāvākṛāntinirdeśa lo tstsha ba 'gos chos grub kyis rgya nag gi dpe las bsgyur cing zhus te gtan la phab pa

Lotsawa Gos Chosdrup translated from a Chinese book, edited it, and established it.

I will grant you however, it seems that our Lotsawa Gos here is more comfortable with Chinese than Sanskrit. However, given that the Sanskrit was available to Gos at the time, and that he knew it, it seems unlikely he translated the Lanka directly from Chinese.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 19th, 2012 at 10:49 AM

Title: Re: The Sacred Space

Content:

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 19th, 2012 at 9:43 AM

Title: Re: A 1st look: Red Pine's Laṅkāvatāra Sūtra as Jasmine Tea

Content:

Will said:

In Porter's defense, he avoided translating the Lanka for many years because he could not understand Gunabhadra's Chinese. It followed the Sanskrit syntax, which makes a profound text many times harder to understand, much less translate into English. The fact that only one other translation has appeared since 1932, suggests it was & is a very hard nut to crack.

Namdrol said:

If you don't know Tibetan or Sanskrit, then yes it could be.

The Tibetan version reads very straightforwardly though.

Will said:

Good for Chos-grub, but he was translating from the Chinese of Gunabhadra, not the Sanskrit - why? - beats me. Also I wrote "Sanskrit syntax", but Porter wrote "Sanskrit word sequence" - if that makes any difference. A later Tibetan version by Anonymous is from the Sanskrit.

Malcolm wrote:

'gos chos grub kyis rgya dpe las bsgyur te gtan la phab pa'o

"Gos Chodrup translated from the Indian text and established it."

rgya dpe - rgya gar gyi yi ge dpe cha, rgya dpe -- a book of Indian letters

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 19th, 2012 at 8:38 AM

Title: Re: Misunderstanding emptiness

Content:

yadave said:

Hey guys and gals,

Let me know if you don't want to discuss this anymore. In the meantime, are the following statements equivalent in the language of Madhyamaka?

1. X ultimately exists.
2. X inherently exists.
3. X is unconditioned.
4. X is independent.
5. X is not dependently originated.
6. X is not empty.

Regards,

Dave.

Malcolm wrote:

Add to that:

7. X exists

And I would say you have a full deck.

You see, in chapter 15 of MMK Nagarjuna asks, where is there an existent not included in svabhāva (inherent existence) or parabhāva (dependent existence defined as a stealth version of svabhāva in the previous verse)? He then goes on to say that if existents are not established, then non-existents are not established, since a non-existent is normally defined by people as something which existed before, does not exist now. Having set this out, he then says, whoever has a view involving existents, non-existents, inherent existents or dependent existents does not understand Buddha's view. He then cites the Reply to Katyayana, the only sutra cited in the whole of the MML i.e. "The world is bound by a duality, "It is" and "It is not".

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 19th, 2012 at 6:01 AM

Title: Re: A 1st look: Red Pine's Laṅkāvatāra Sūtra as Jasmine Tea

Content:

Will said:

In Porter's defense, he avoided translating the Lanka for many years because he could not understand Gunabhadra's Chinese. It followed the Sanskrit syntax, which makes a profound text many times harder to understand, much less translate into English. The fact that only one other translation has appeared since 1932, suggests it was & is a very hard nut to crack.

Malcolm wrote:

If you don't know Tibetan or Sanskrit, then yes it could be.

The Tibetan version reads very straightforwardly though.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 19th, 2012 at 4:57 AM

Title: Re: Stranded on a desert island...which 3 books would you want?

Content:

Mr. G said:

Scenario: You're stranded on a desert island and can only have 3 Dzogchen books with you. Which ones would you pick?

Malcolm wrote:

The unwritten tantra

the sgra thal gyur

the rigpa rangshar

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 19th, 2012 at 4:56 AM

Title: Re: Why do Tulku/reincarnate realized masters

Content:

reg said:

why are these demons or demonic forces or whatever so bent on harming or interfering with others' spiritual practice?

kirtu said:

They are dedicated to evil and want to turn at least our world into a hell realm.

Malcolm wrote:

No, they are manifestations of karmic debts that we owe to sentient beings we have knowingly or unknowingly injured.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 19th, 2012 at 3:26 AM

Title: Re: Smoking tobacco

Content:

Virgo said:

Yes, but no one can protect you from your karma. And when the five poisons increase... you do bad things.

Isn't it true Loppon?

Kevin

Malcolm wrote:

True.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 19th, 2012 at 3:08 AM

Title: Re: Smoking tobacco

Content:

wisdom said:

Oh I fully agree in the objective existence of the protectors, and I believe that Virgo had the experience he says he had. I have enough experience with the objective spirit world to know of its power. I guess my question is why does tobacco have this quality, and not any other number of vices? I can smoke pot constantly by this theory, and still be protected, but one cigarette will exempt me from protection. Or if I am a perfect practitioner with perfect conduct, but walk into a bar where people are smoking, all the protectors will abandon me, and I will be left unprotected and unable to be helped? What about walking down the street, am I unprotected every time I walk past a smoker? Or at a bus stop? I guess my question is why do the protectors hate smoke this much, why are they unable to stand its presence?

Malcolm wrote:

Worldly protectors, the once that react to tobacco smoke, don't really live in cities anyway. Too many humans, too much pollution.

Wisdom protectors don't care.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 19th, 2012 at 2:43 AM

Title: Re: Riwo Sangchod - ingredients question

Content:

ngodrup said:

Who can check Chogyur Linpga's recipe for magnetizing incense for musk?

Malcolm wrote:

Where is it located, send me the page number and I can tell you.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 19th, 2012 at 12:24 AM

Title: Re: Ngondro

Content:

Clarence said:

One day I will have learned enough acronyms to belong to the group of deep knowledge.

Anyway, I think I will order ToC.

gregkavarnos said:

Asking your lama would probably be a good idea too. I was lucky enough to get a transmission of Gendun Rinpoche's advice for Ngondro to three year retreatants . Unbelievable quantity of detail (and quality too), stuff that was neither in the sadhana, nor the ToC. Stuff that you can only get from a lama! Plus when you get it from a lama you also have the opportunity to ask questions regarding details and about stuff that was not said or read.

Malcolm wrote:

TOC is an incomplete translation. All the Sahaja Mahāmudra stuff was left out.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 18th, 2012 at 11:53 PM

Title: Re: Role of śamatha and vipaśyanā in dzogchen?

Content:

wayland said:

Thanks Namdrol. I found the following on p194 of The Supreme Source by CNN, in the context of not following a gradual path: Training to progress along the levels of realization, one practices the methods for stabilizing the state of calm, however, meditation tending towards perfection is far from the equanimity of the state free of concepts.

Seeking to understand the ultimate nature of existence, one practices the methods of meditation for clarity, however, meditation directed to clarifying something is far from the equanimity of the state free of concepts.

Is this contrasting śamatha and vipaśyāna (as practiced by other schools) with that of the dzogchen path you quoted above?

They seem to be portrayed as a gradualist method in this context.

Malcolm wrote:
Yes.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Wednesday, January 18th, 2012 at 11:00 PM
Title: Re: Misunderstanding emptiness
Content:
DarwidHalim said:
Nagarjuna said there is no arising, there is no duration, there is no cessation.

Malcolm wrote:
He said there is no arising, duration or perishing which can be found on analysis.

But the consequence of this is that there is nothing unconditioned or ultimate which can be found either.

If you can't find a thing, you can't find its nature.

But in terms of conventional truth, Nagarajuna certainly accepted that things arose, persisted, and perished. Just not ultimately so.

N

Author: Malcolm
Date: Wednesday, January 18th, 2012 at 10:26 PM
Title: Re: Smoking tobacco
Content:
Adamantine said:
Do you really think it would have been hard for him to procure cigarettes?

Malcolm wrote:
Snuff and pipe smoking was common enough. But rolled cigarettes? Possible but not too likely in regular supply in Golog.

But perhaps they came in with the brick tea trade.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Wednesday, January 18th, 2012 at 10:19 PM
Title: Re: Smoking tobacco
Content:
Lingpupa said:
I could be wrong, of course, but I would be surprised if cigarette smoking was widespread in 19th century Tibet. Snuff, perhaps, again, I don't know, but cigarettes? Do you think that one is true or just someone re-telling the story of Dudjom Lingpa and grafting it on to Gendun Chopel?

If anything it strikes me as more likely (I must stress again that this is not much more than an educated hunch) that the story might have been first attached to a figure of Gendun Chopel's time and then grafted back to Dudjom Lingpa.

Malcolm wrote:

People did not smoke cigarettes in Tibet during the 19th century. But they did smoke these tiny little pipes.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 18th, 2012 at 1:32 AM

Title: Re: robaire on Buddhism & Christianity

Content:

robaire said:

I know enough.

Malcolm wrote:

Not, apparently, about Buddhism.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 17th, 2012 at 11:52 PM

Title: Re: China party official warns members over religion

Content:

gregkavarnos said:

Karl Marx talked about the inherent contradictions of capital that give rise to an impoverished proletariat and that the social/historical consequences of this dialectic will be the collapse of capitalism and the institution of a proletarian centred political/economic/social structure.

You are talking about Karl Marx right? Not Groucho, Harpo or Chico Marx? Right???

Or maybe you read the Smith and Keynes translation of his works?

Malcolm wrote:

I think Beatzen is referring to the fact that Marx called capitalism "progressive", and a necessary phase in the historical developments which presage Industrial Socialism.

What Marx was, in fact, was an ideologue of urbanism and industrial civilization.

In terms of Smith, there is in fact very little in Marx that goes beyond Smith's labor theory of wealth. Marx's Capital is essentially a commentary on Wealth of Nations, properly understood.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 17th, 2012 at 11:41 PM

Title: Re: Role of śamatha and vipaśyanā in dzogchen?

Content:

wayland said:

To what extent are śamatha and vipaśyanā considered important in dzogchen and does dzogchen have its own definitions of them?

Namdrol said:

They are important and yes.

wayland said:

Hi Namdrol,

I'd be interested if you could point me in the direction of any information regarding how dzogchen interprets them. I would assume (perhaps incorrectly) that they are a natural condition within dzogchen, as opposed to a gradualist presentation?

Thanks

Malcolm wrote:

When one loosely rests vidyā in its own state, after coarse and subtle concepts come to calmly rest on their own, vidyā vividly abides in its own state. That śamatha is called “dwelling in the essence of vidyā”. In that state there is no lethargy or agitation in vidyā. Clarity, pristine lucidity, vividness, nakedness, and limpidity respectively cannot be seen with the eye, cannot be described with words, and cannot be established as a thing. The clarity that is like seeing, the pristine lucidity that is like an experience, the vividness that is like description, the nakedness that is like apprehending a thing, and the limpidity that is like a thought occurs in vidyā in and of itself. That alone is the wisdom of vipaśyāna. Though śamatha and vipaśyāna are given two separate names, in essence there is no difference.

-- Explanatory Tantra of Distinguishing Mind and Vidyā

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 17th, 2012 at 11:20 PM

Title: Re: How practical is consort practice for the majority?

Content:

Lhug-Pa said:

Also, about "obsession with fluids and gender", try telling that to H.H. the Dalai Lama, who is, first and foremost, a Dzogchenpa.

Malcolm wrote:

I would be happy to discuss this with HHDL anytime. I have ample proof in the form of texts and so on that his presentation is not properly understood by others.

Anyway Lhugpa, you are not even remotely an expert on this subject. You have received what, a couple of direct introductions, at best from ChNN? Have you ever received a full on major empowerment such as Hevajra, Kalacakra, Guhyagarbha, etc? If you have not, then I would suggest that you are not qualified to have an opinion on this topic, let alone be discussing it.

You are not speaking from the perspective of a practitioner. You have not engaged in creation stage practice, so how can you pretend to have any insight at all into completion stage practices? At least, at the very least, I spent three years in solitary retreat doing these practices.

You are not speaking from the perspective of a translator, nor a scholar. You are speaking from the perspective of an enthusiastic layperson with very inadequate knowledge of the subject.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 17th, 2012 at 11:11 PM

Title: Re: Anyone Know Anything About This?

Content:

Mr. G said:

Can someone verify they know the owner of this site, or at least confirm this site is fine? There's a lot of personal questions that are asked upon registration.

Malcolm wrote:

I think it was set up by Song Park. He is the first registered user.

I know him pretty well, He is a good guy.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 17th, 2012 at 11:04 PM

Title: Re: How practical is consort practice for the majority?

Content:

JinpaRangdrol said:

I think it's interesting that a Dzogchenpa is this adamant about condemning homosexuality on an internet forum. I'd be interested to hear ChNNR's opinion on the matter...

Malcolm wrote:

Lhugpa is a noob (sorry, but its true). I would not call him a Dzogchenpa just yet.

He is working it out. He has a lot of conceptual baggage from non-Buddhsits he stills find authoratative.

He will realize eventually that all this obsession with fluids and gender is a complete waste of time.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 17th, 2012 at 11:01 PM

Title: Re: How practical is consort practice for the majority?

Content:

Lhug-Pa said:

In regard to all three above-mentioned Lamas now:

"Any reliable sources for your assertion?"

Malcolm wrote:

In the case of the latter, a personal student of Dudjom R-- personal communication verified by a second party.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 17th, 2012 at 10:43 PM

Title: Re: How practical is consort practice for the majority?

Content:

JinpaRangdrol said:

H.E. Garchen Rinpoche and Thrangu Rinpoche are two prominent gurus who support homosexual pairings in traditional Yab Yum practice, as well.

Malcolm wrote:

So did Dujdom R.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 17th, 2012 at 10:02 PM

Title: Re: Smoking tobacco

Content:

JinpaRangdrol said:

All of the spiritual side effects aside (blocked channels, breaking of Samaya with protectors, addiction, distress in the Bardo, etc.), I think the bottom line lies in the Four Thoughts. The precious human birth is EXTREMELY hard to attain. Why would you EVER participate in a practice that is proven to destroy it, without any kind of tangible benefit whatsoever?

Namdrol said:

Catmoon is not a Nyingmapa, and so I don't think these dire warnings, which are from a Nyingma perspective, have much influence.

gregkavarnos said:

The four thoughts are a Nyingmapa thing??? We go through them before every single practice in the Karma Kagyu lineage.

Malcolm wrote:

No, I meant all the terma warnings.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 17th, 2012 at 10:01 PM

Title: Re: Role of śamatha and vipaśyanā in dzogchen?

Content:

wayland said:

To what extent are śamatha and vipaśyanā considered important in dzogchen and does dzogchen have its own definitions of them?

Malcolm wrote:

They are important and yes.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 17th, 2012 at 10:00 PM

Title: Re: Misunderstanding emptiness

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

How many is in a lapse of memory?

Malcolm wrote:

Forever.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 17th, 2012 at 9:58 PM

Title: Re: Misunderstanding emptiness

Content:

DarwidHalim said:

Which Buddhist text that explain the duration of thought is 13 milliseconds?

Malcolm wrote:

The Abhidharmakosha among others.

A kṣanas is the most fundamental unit of time in Buddhism. The duration of a kṣanas is the duration of a thought. So if you do the math:

120 kṣanas equals on tatkṣana; 60 tatkṣanas equal a lava; 30 lava equal a muhurta; 30 muhurtas equal an ahorata, which is a single 24 hour period of time. So, according to Buddhist principles then, a moment of thought has a duration of 0.0013 seconds.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 17th, 2012 at 9:44 AM

Title: Re: Western Buddhists, modernity and the European enlightenment

Content:

Beatzen said:

Give it a couple hundred years. Some western yogis will develop novel approaches to dharma.

Malcolm wrote:

No need. We have what we need.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 17th, 2012 at 9:34 AM

Title: Re: How practical is consort practice for the majority?

Content:

Namdrol said:

Masturbation is not listed as lay sexual misconduct in Abhidharma or the Vinaya Sutra.

It is a sexual misconduct that requires confession and penance in the case of bhikṣūs.

N

Adamantine said:

So you don't disagree that for a Vajrayana practitioner it is breaking the fourth root vow?

Malcolm wrote:

I disagree that it breaks the fourth root samaya. That vow is referring to Mahāyāna bodhicitta, not semen.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 17th, 2012 at 9:32 AM

Title: Re: Western Buddhists, modernity and the European enlightenment

Content:

Beatzen said:

I'm sure you can say that dzogchen constitutes the essence of the path, sort of the way Trungpa said that the three yanas compliment each other. I'm sure you get what I mean by "preserving the essence though

Malcolm wrote:

The essence is dzogchen.

If you ask someone else, they will give you a different answer.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 17th, 2012 at 9:30 AM

Title: Re: Western Buddhists, modernity and the European enlightenment

Content:

Beatzen said:

I wouldn't know that, but it seems like preserving atiyoga is peripheral when it concerns the survival of the whole enchilada. Not unimportant, just that why focus on dzogchen?

Malcolm wrote:

All teachings spring from dzogchen, it is the source of all teachings, and the place to which all teachings return. Therefore, preserving dzogchen is of the greatest importance.

Monastic sangas are secondary, and not every Buddha's dispensation has one.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 17th, 2012 at 9:14 AM

Title: Re: Smoking tobacco

Content:

JinpaRangdrol said:

All of the spiritual side effects aside (blocked channels, breaking of Samaya with protectors, addiction, distress in the Bardo, etc.), I think the bottom line lies in the Four Thoughts. The precious human birth is EXTREMELY hard to attain. Why would you EVER participate in a practice that is proven to destroy it, without any kind of tangible benefit whatsoever?

Malcolm wrote:

Catmoon is not a Nyingmapa, and so I don't think these dire warnings, which are from a Nyingma perspective, have much influence.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 17th, 2012 at 9:01 AM

Title: Re: Unable to visualize

Content:

Inge said:

I have been trying to learn to visualize for a couple of year now, but it is as if I lack the ability to do so. Could this be a result of my rlung imbalance? Is it something specific that can be done in order to overcome this problem.

I feel that much of the practice I try to do is ineffective because I can't do the visualisations. Especially the guru yoga of white A.

kirtu said:

Do you think in images? Can you imagine an image of a circle in your mind?

Kirt

Inge said:

No I don't and no I can't.

Malcolm wrote:

Hi Inge,

Then just sound A and relax into that state -- don;t worry about the visualization. It is not important.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 17th, 2012 at 8:57 AM

Title: Re: Western Buddhists, modernity and the European enlightenment

Content:

Beatzen said:

The only way to preserve the pure dharma of established traditions is to establish a strong monastic community here.

Malcolm wrote:

I used to believe that, but I don't anymore. Dzogchen does not survive well in the monastic system.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 17th, 2012 at 8:55 AM

Title: Re: Western Buddhists, modernity and the European enlightenment

Content:

Beatzen said:

My european history professor argues that modern people are distinguished by their capacity for doubt.

Malcolm wrote:

He never met a 12th century Tibetan scholar then. Let alone a 6th century Indian Buddhist acharya.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 17th, 2012 at 5:44 AM

Title: Re: Misunderstanding emptiness

Content:

Namdrol said:

Buddhists may assent to the fact that there is no person identity which is any other than a designation for the five aggregates, but I don't think you will find any Buddhists who assert that the aggregate of consciousness is a non-existent, conventionally speaking.

yadave said:

Exactly. Buddhists have skandhas, Kant had his categories, scientists speak of a language center, an analytical left side, an intuitive right side, and so on. Conventional descriptions of dravya (flow of consciousness).

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, my point was is that there are two kinds of dravya in Buddhism, rūpa and nāma, material dravya, and mental dravya. What you said was that Science and Buddhism where in agreement that the former existed and the latter does not. I think this a false statement.

Some scientists, like Dennet, et al, are certainly of the opinion that there is no such a thing as a mind at all.

One of more impressive western scholars on the question of the hard problem of consciousness is Colin McGinn, whom I once had the pleasure of hearing speak. He argues, pretty well in my opinion, that the nature of consciousness is cognitively closed to human minds i.e. that in some sense we are frogs in a well and that our view is limited to what we can see out of the top of it.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 17th, 2012 at 4:12 AM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

Namdrol said:

In the US, there is trend for yoga practicing Buddhists to eschew eating meat. Also amongst some younger Tibetan Buddhists there is a trend to stop eating meat -- which is ironic, because virtually all instructions of yantra and tummo recommend that one eat some meat, especially lamb and yak, which are quite warming.

Virgo said:

Hey Loppon, what about elk and venison?

Thanks,

Kev

Malcolm wrote:

Both prettty warming, as is bison.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 17th, 2012 at 3:54 AM

Title: Re: Misunderstanding emptiness

Content:

Namdrol said:

The five abhijñās, i.e. the ability to recall past lives, see into other realms, know the minds of others and so on are simply a result of concentrated śāmatha practice and are in themselves nothign special.

N

Clarence said:

One more time

Thanks N-la. Nothing special because they are easy to attain or because they don't lead to liberation?

- C

Malcolm wrote:

They do not lead to liberation. not so easy to attain. They come naturally though, for most practitioners who practice enough.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 17th, 2012 at 3:45 AM

Title: Re: Misunderstanding emptiness

Content:

Clarence said:

Going

N-la,

Namdrol said:

Such a demonstration is cognitively closed to anyone who has not developed the yogic capacity to know other minds directly. If one had that ability, then there are all kinds of phenomena in the universe one could experience but never prove to someone else who had not developed the same skills.

Clarence said:

How does one develop those skills? Is it described in the Abhidharma? Are those the same perceptions developed through for example Tsa Lung practices?

Many thanks, as usual,

Clarence

Malcolm wrote:

The five abhijñās, i.e. the ability to recall past lives, see into other realms, know the minds of others and so on are simply a result of concentrated śāmatha practice and are in themselves nothing special.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 17th, 2012 at 3:44 AM

Title: Re: Misunderstanding emptiness

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

... there is no duration of thought which cannot be divided infinitely

Malcolm wrote:

Actually, according to Buddhist texts, the duration of a thought is about 13 milliseconds, almost three times the amount of time it takes for a neuron to fire in the brain.

The basic unit of time in Buddhism is the duration of a thought.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 17th, 2012 at 2:10 AM

Title: Re: Misunderstanding emptiness

Content:

yadave said:

So Tsongkhapa had a revelation that doesn't count but yogi's have other revelations that do count.

Malcolm wrote:

Yogis don't have revelations, they have direct personal knowledge.

Now, Tsongkhapas followers believe of course that Tsongkhapa was a realized person with such direct knowledge. Tsongkhapa's detractors on the other hand are not convinced.

yadave said:

Now you label me physicalist after erasing my actual view. Scientists and Buddhists agree that a "mind" or "self" really does not exist.

Malcolm wrote:

Buddhists may assent to the fact that there is no person identity which is any other than a designation for the five aggregates, but I don't think you will find any Buddhists who assert that the aggregate of consciousness is a non-existent, conventionally speaking.

yadave said:

My curiosity is to keep all doors open rather than repeat a dogma I cannot personally confirm in direct experience per Mr. Buddha's recommendation.

Malcolm wrote:

Actually, Buddha, in the Eastern Gatehouse Sutta, asserted the opposite -- those who do not have direct knowledge need to accept it on faith from people who do. The Sutta spoken to the Kalamas was spoken to non-buddhists who were confused by all the competing claims made by itinerant religious teachers who visited them. In the end, in that Sutta, Buddha does not teach anything especially Buddhist, but gave them the brahma viharas, asserting that those who practiced these would take rebirth in a better place, and even if they did not believe in rebirth, this practice would improve their lives as they were. But the four brahma viharas are not a specifically Buddhist practice and therefore are never held to lead to liberation. They are the practice of the "vehicles of gods and humans".

Namdrol said:

The fact that there is no identity, or self, is the natural conclusion of the logic of dependent origination.

I think the Buddha was blown away practicing self-enquiry under a tree before he started writing books.

Malcolm wrote:

What Buddha arrived at was the logic of dependent origination through having reviewed thousands of his previous lives. When he discerned the principle of dependent origination, he applied to his continuum and then he woke up. In other words, his view preceded his realization.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 17th, 2012 at 1:06 AM

Title: Re: banned from zenforuminternational...

Content:

Fruitzilla said:

Mostly they don't mind so much as far as I remember.

But I know that as soon as I (for example) would start talking about rebirth being metaphorical instead of literal, or what have you, some people would immediately get on my case, and wouldn't stop hounding me until I cried uncle...

It's not a very pleasant situation to be in to be honest, so I can imagine someone with these viewpoints not getting into a habit of posting here frequently.

Malcolm wrote:

The reason why people would get on your case about it is that it is quite obvious that the Buddha never intended for rebirth to be taken as a metaphor. There is simply no justification for such a view. If you wish to understand rebirth metaphorically, that is one thing -- but asserting that rebirth must be understood as a metaphor is completely wrong.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 16th, 2012 at 11:29 PM

Title: Re: Energy from Buddhist perspective

Content:

DarwidHalim said:

Same with karma. Although we experience good karma, actually that karma cannot be exhausted or vanish. It just changes.

Malcolm wrote:

This is a completely baseless statement. You really do need to study abhidharma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 16th, 2012 at 11:24 PM

Title: Re: banned from zenforuminternational...

Content:

Fruitzilla said:

Again, I never said or meant subversive, just cultural. Buddhist "modernists" would fit badly in this culture for example, so the chance of one sticking around here for a time are pretty slim.

So, I think I can actually correlate that.

Malcolm wrote:

They would fit badly if they expected people to simply roll over and not challenge any of their views.

I love it when "Buddhist" modernists feel they have an absolute right to challenge any Buddhist idea they like, but get so offended when their own modernist biases and irrationalities are called into question.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 16th, 2012 at 11:21 PM

Title: Re: Smoking tobacco

Content:

Virgo said:

For example, work places should let smokers smoke outside the front or back doors, etc., one should not have to leave the parking lot and so on.

Malcolm wrote:

Oh, I don't agree. I hate walking through clouds of smoke into a building. Smoking is a nasty habit and it would be better for all concerned if cigarettes were taxed and banned until it just becomes impossible to smoke. For years I would not go listen to music, or go to clubs, because of all the smoke.

There is no two ways about it -- smoking is an awful habit.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 16th, 2012 at 11:05 PM

Title: Re: Unable to visualize

Content:

Inge said:

I saw this in the "smoking tobacco" thread

Fa Dao said:

Is it possible from a Tibetan medical or spiritual standpoint or any other for that matter that smoking could effect my ability to do visualization?...

Namdrol said:

Yes, by disturbing your wind/vatta/rlung.

...

N

Inge said:

I have been trying to learn to visualize for a couple of year now, but it is as if I lack the ability to do so. Could this be a result of my rlung imbalance? Is it something specific that can be done in order to overcome this problem.

I feel that much of the practice I try to do is ineffective because I can't do the visualisations. Especially the guru yoga of white A.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, visualize a western Letter A in a thigle. That is fine.

IN terms of deity practice, in Dzogchen, it is sufficient to think you are the deity. There is no need to focus on all details.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 16th, 2012 at 7:54 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen Community of Chogyal Namkhai Norbu

Content:

asunthatneversets said:

Is there also such thing as a vajra guru? Who takes it upon themselves to have sole responsibility of their student's realization? I heard this somewhere.

Malcolm wrote:

The only person who can be responsible for your realization is you, despite whatever else you may have heard.

A vajra guru just means a teacher of secret mantra.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 16th, 2012 at 6:20 AM

Title: Re: banned from zenforuminternational...

Content:

Fruitzilla said:

Well, you're pretty pivotal here also it looks like.

Mr. G said:

The overall policies of this forum were, and are setup by the Owner, Founders, Administrators, and Moderators. Namdrol assisted in setting up the initial policies for the Tibetan Medicine sub-forum as he is the Tibetan Medicine Lead.

Malcolm wrote:

Right, I have no role at all otherwise.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 16th, 2012 at 5:17 AM

Title: Re: banned from zenforuminternational...

Content:

Fruitzilla said:

Funny that there's a Theravada, a Mahayana(actually mostly Vajrayana) and a Zen forum by the way. Three pretty different interpretations/temperaments it seems.

Malcolm wrote:

That is pretty much exactly how it was at E-Sangha. What made people unhappy was that most of the mods were Tibetan Buddhists, even though we tried hard to have team balanced between Zen, TB and Theravada.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 16th, 2012 at 4:54 AM

Title: Re: banned from zenforuminternational...

Content:

Fruitzilla said:

I always figured you and Nonin had more in common than you both wanted to admit.....

Namdrol said:

One thing people really don't understand is that I virtually had no hand in making the policies of E-Sangha.

I was just a convenient person to blame.

N

Fruitzilla said:

I have no insight into the internal affairs of the moderating team.

You did seem pretty pivotal in the prevailing culture over there though.

Malcolm wrote:

No more so than here.

The fact is that E-sangha was too big, and trying to wear too many hats, being everything to everyone. The fact that it fell apart and reconstituted itself into three separate forums completely makes sense.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 16th, 2012 at 4:45 AM

Title: Re: The individual in dzogchen, independence, dharmakaya

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

But if having a brain were all that was needed to be perfectly free from suffering, then why wouldn't beings be perfectly free from suffering? Why seek food and warmth?

.

padma norbu said:

Also, something I just remembered regarding Namdrol's point of neurons firing (sentient beings) vs. hormones (plants) is that all forms of Buddhism I am aware of consider various spirit beings as sentient beings. Pretas (ghosts) and demons, etc. have less of a body than plants (from the human perspective of being able to examine and compare, anyway). I suppose in deciding about the sentience of beings, we must defer to whatever the Buddhas have said.

Malcolm wrote:

I was talking about sentient beings with gross physical bodies.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 16th, 2012 at 4:43 AM

Title: Re: banned from zenforuminternational...

Content:

Fruitzilla said:

I always figured you and Nonin had more in common than you both wanted to admit.....

Malcolm wrote:

One thing people really don't understand is that I virtually had no hand in making the policies of E-Sangha.

I was just a convenient person to blame.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 16th, 2012 at 4:37 AM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

<http://www.grist.org/list/2012-01-12-american-beef-consumption-is-at-a-50-year-low> "
onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 16th, 2012 at 3:51 AM

Title: Re: banned from zenforuminternational...

Content:

klqv said:

has anyone else experienced this kind of bullshit on a supposedly buddhist website?

gad rgyangs said:

you're joking right? have you ever heard of e-sangha?

Malcolm wrote:

The funny thing is they all quit e-sangha because we were too "draconian" -- but from what I hear, they have instituted very draconian policies.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 16th, 2012 at 3:48 AM

Title: Re: Misunderstanding emptiness

Content:

Namdrol said:

This is the point of view of physicalism ala Dennet, etc. And I do not think it is accurate at all. MRI, PET scans, etc., don't measure the mind. They measure the brain's bloodflow, etc., but they do not measure minds.

yadave said:

You seem to hold a substantialist view. There is no mind to measure. There is bloodflow and electrical patterns and nerve impulses that "seem" like a mind. The illusion is strong but there is really no independent mind.

Malcolm wrote:

Consciousness is classified as a dravya [lit 'flow'], in classical Buddhist texts. So, conventionally, it is a substance, like water, or fire, it is not a material substance; it is a substance of a different order than material substances.

Namdrol said:

But the cause and condition of a mind is not a brain, from a Buddhist perspective. Judging from your disagreements with Gelugs and so on, I'm not sure a single Buddhist perspective exists. For example, HHDL seems pretty open to all this, MIT invites Buddhists to help with this work, there is even a new branch of "contemplative science." I find it fascinating rather than threatening and believe it will help us better understand ourselves and so be better able to relieve suffering.

Malcolm wrote:

The perspective on this in Tibetan Buddhism comes from the second chapter of Dharmakirti's Pramanasiddhi, where he systematically excludes physicalism. This text is shared by all schools of Tibetan Buddhism, and no one disagrees with its points. The reason why people disagree with Tsongkhapa is that his explanations of things are not discernable in Indian Madhyamaka literature, which he himself admits, combined with his and his disciples assertion that Tsongkhapa's Madhyamaka view came about largely as a result of a series of spiritual encounters he had with the bodhisattva Mañjuśrī, and not out of his personal intellectual investigations.

I don't feel threatened by research into cognition and the brain. You might think that knowledge about the relationship between the brain and sense organs is modern, not known to Tibetan Buddhists before the 20th century -- but in point of fact Tibetan Medicine was aware of the connection between the brain, sense organs and internal organs from at least the 11th century and understood the function of the brain was to act as a central processor for sense data, as well as the organ that governs motor impulses, internal organ function, so on and so forth. All of this information is pretty clearly described in Tibetan Medical literature on nerve damage and head injuries.

Namdrol said:

...the onus is on you to show us a "mind" without an associated brain or person.

Malcolm wrote:

Such a demonstration is cognitively closed to anyone who has not developed the yogic capacity to know other minds directly. If one had that ability, then there are all kinds of phenomena in the universe one could experience but never prove to someone else who had not developed the same skills.

Namdrol said:

These recent scientific studies confirm ancient Buddhist truths. Anatta. Emptiness in spades. I would think this fascinating to anyone studying Buddhism.

Malcolm wrote:

Hume rejected a self too. Not too interesting, from my point of view. He also rejected necessary connection -- Nagarjuna beat him to the punch by 1500 years.

The fact that there is no identity, or self, is the natural conclusion of the logic of dependent origination. Scientific studies only confirm what some Buddhists have already known for millenia -- entities in causal relationships have no intrinsic nature or essence. If entities did, they would not need to be in causal relationships.

The primary difference between Buddhist schools was in how far down they were willing to extend that analysis. The non-Mahāyāna schools stopped at paramanus i.e. "atoms"; the Mahāyāna Yogacara school stopped at consciousness. Madhyamaka extended its analysis all the way and came up with emptiness as the basis of reality i.e. that in the end, reality has no objective basis whatsoever.

Namdrol said:

My teachers encouraged an attitude of curiosity. Hope I don't lose this.

Malcolm wrote:

The unwillingness to entertain the idea that yogis may possess knowledge that cannot be tested for in a lab is a form of lacking of curiosity. Thinking that PET scans, etc., prove that the mind is merely an epiphenomenal illusion is simply fundamentalist physicalism. The only thing these experiments prove is what Buddhists have been saying all along, mind and matter can interact, conventionally speaking. Pet scans don't work on formless realm beings. You would assert it is because they don't exist. Buddhists would assert that it is because they do not have physical bodies. As I said, you can only verify their existence yogically. You cannot share that perception directly in an empirical or testable fashion, because not everyone has the same capacity to develop the necessary skills to perceive devas in the form and formless realms.

N

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 16th, 2012 at 2:28 AM

Title: Re: Smoking tobacco

Content:

Fa Dao said:

Is it possible from a Tibetan medical or spiritual standpoint or any other for that matter that smoking could effect my ability to do visualization? And yes, if I ever am able to go to a live retreat with ChNNR and he was to tell me that I had to stop I would do it without any hesitation.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, by disturbing your wind/vatta/rlung.

He would never tell you that you have to stop. But he always tells people it is better if they do not smoke.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 16th, 2012 at 1:44 AM

Title: Re: The individual in dzogchen, independence, dharmakaya

Content:

padma norbu said:

:: kills self ::

Seriously, though, great last few pages. I particularly like the breakdown of the brain constituents and molecular comparison to a rock. I've had a sense of vague unease at times when others talk about sentient beings and vegetarianism and the idea is always raised that plants are not sentient beings. I always think of the famous experiments which show some sort of reaction from plants in response to negative or positive actions in their presence (not even necessarily to the plant itself). The plants don't have a brain, but the mind isn't found in the brain. In relation to what I've learned and pondered these past couple days about energy, there is something interesting yet unknowable here...

Malcolm wrote:

All living things have tsal. But while plants have a hormonal system, they lack a neural system, and while the mind is not reducible to the brain and neural system, in any thing we define as sentient there is always at least a rudimentary neural network. Also, information transfer in plants depends on hormones, while information transfer in animals depends on neurons i.e. when a plant is attacked, it communicates that by releasing hormones, when an animal is attacked, it fire neurons.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 16th, 2012 at 1:16 AM

Title: Re: Increase in 5 Poisons

Content:

Virgo said:

What is going on?

Malcolm wrote:

The world is not getting worse, your vision is getting clearer.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 16th, 2012 at 1:15 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen Community of Chogyal Namkhai Norbu

Content:

padma norbu said:

Thanks for taking the time to explain these things.

Malcolm wrote:

I am glad you have found some benefit in my posts.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 16th, 2012 at 12:51 AM

Title: Re: Smoking tobacco

Content:

Fa Dao said:

I have been following this thread with interest for a while now. Can anyone explain exactly how and why smoking effects ones practice without resorting to "its bad...its evil..it blocks the channels..etc etc" Please explain how it blocks channels and effects practice. And if possible how it effects Dzogchen practice. Thank you.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, for one the tar from tobacco blocks the channels in the lungs, reducing our ability to breath.

Secondly, it contaminates the air we breath directly.

Third, it creates a vata imbalance, this will directly affect whatever practice you are doing.

Fourth, it physically addictive, which means your body will start to crave it, and this craving is distracting.

In short, there is nothing positive about smoking at all -- it is a stupid, addictive, life-destroying habit.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 16th, 2012 at 12:31 AM

Title: Re: 'How Yoga Wrecks the Body' via The New York Times

Content:

Namdrol said:

The fact is that most of the people I know who have done a lot of yoga (of any kind) have seriously injured themselves, and this includes more than one high lama.

N

Anders Honore said:

Since we Buddhists tend to prefer the Lotus position for that sweet blend of relaxation and upright firmness, what would you propose?

Simply going into it without proper being properly limber for it is a sure way to ruin your knees and is not very relaxing either. If not yoga, how would you propose to work towards that? Or is it only some kinds of yoga that should be cautioned against?

Malcolm wrote:

Deep squats using a chair helps.

The reason it is easy for Asians to sit in lotus is that they mostly hunker when they have to go to the toilet. The infamous Asian toilets which are little more than ceramic troughs on the floor are the reason that Asians can more easily sit in lotus.

Sitting in lotus is a not a question of knee flexibility, it is a question of hip openness. This a reason why women usually find it easier to get into lotus then men, and children easier than adults.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 16th, 2012 at 12:18 AM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

I hope you like barbeque. I am destined for many hell realms first.
but I never read any sutra that specifically prohibited cannibalism, so grab a fork.

Malcolm wrote:

It is prohibited in Vinaya, along with the meat of predators and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 15th, 2012 at 10:27 PM

Title: Re: Smoking tobacco

Content:

catmoon said:

Chogyam Trungpa. His mere existence disproves the whole idea that smoking is a barrier to enlightenment.

Malcolm wrote:

This presumes that Trungpa was an awakened person. I have had increasing doubts about this.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 15th, 2012 at 10:20 PM

Title: Re: Dzogchen Community of Chogyal Namkhai Norbu

Content:

padma norbu said:

Also, my other problem with the whole concept of "there is no more power an offering than offering to the Guru" is very simple: just what that means exactly is just a jumbled up mess in my brain.

Malcolm wrote:

There are four gurus: the guru who gives you introduction is the outer guru; the path practiced is the inner guru; the result realized is the secret guru; rigpa is the ultimate guru;

But without the first, the rest will not happen.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 15th, 2012 at 10:16 PM

Title: Re: Misunderstanding emptiness

Content:

yadave said:

A brain is the smallest common denominator we know of that appears in any "mind experience."

Malcolm wrote:

This is the point of view of physicalism ala Dennet, etc. And I do not think it is accurate at all. MRI, PET scans, etc., don't measure the mind. They measure the brain's bloodflow, etc., but they do not measure minds.

Mind and soul differentiated in Buddhism; the former exists, the latter do not. The former is an impermanent dependent phenomena; the latter is permanent, non-dependent phenomena.

But the cause and condition of a mind is not a brain, from a Buddhist perspective. But this discussion of differences in POV between Buddhism and physicalism is a bit off topic.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 15th, 2012 at 10:18 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen cosmogeny

Content:

Mr. G said:

Thanks Namdrol. I will give this some thought.

Malcolm wrote:

The definition of lhun grub is "not made by anyone". Lhun drub is dependent origination free of afflictive patterning, thus it is pure process and transformation.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 15th, 2012 at 8:24 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen cosmogeny

Content:

Mr. G said:

Hi Namdrol,

Am I inferring correctly that dependent origination from a Dzogchen POV is illusory?

Malcolm wrote:

Dependent origination from the Buddha's point of view is illusory.

Mr. G said:

How would a Dzogchenpa address the concern that the Basis does not accord with dependent origination?

Malcolm wrote:

Lhun grub.

Mr. G said:

How would a Dzogchenpa address the concern that the Basis has been reified?

Malcolm wrote:

Ka dag

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 15th, 2012 at 8:12 AM

Title: Re: Misunderstanding emptiness

Content:

yadave said:

I tried to say that you appear to be looking for an "I" while the actual process involves no "I" in transforming sensory input into "a thought". In other jargon, there is no homunculus, no "little person" directing things in the brain. It is one massive complicated network of systems that eventually deliver something that arises as "my thought" in the forebrain, the final place where most of us start to play.

Malcolm wrote:

A view pretty much completely incompatible with Buddhism. From a Buddhist POV, the mind is not located in the brain, nor does it depend on the brain.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 15th, 2012 at 7:20 AM

Title: Re: Misunderstanding emptiness

Content:

yadave said:

In the meantime, I'm gonna just say salt molecules exist and they are the smallest common denominator we know of that appears in any "salt experience." This is a nonmetaphysical "essence" if you like.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, this a substantialist position, which is incompatible with all Mahāyāna tenet systems, but is entirely compatible with non-Mahāyāna tenet systems.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 15th, 2012 at 6:07 AM

Title: Re: A 1st look: Red Pine's Laṅkāvatāra Sūtra as Jasmine Tea

Content:

Leo Rivers said:

t or if you are pontificating yourself

No, I was stumbling trying to explain that Red Pine's use of the word "memory" limits the depth of the 4th skanda referred to. My bad. I am unfamiliar with it all.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, limits it in a way that is entirely inappropriate. "Formations" is better, since the saṃskāra skandha consists of regular formations of mental factors associated with various positive, negative, and afflicted mental states.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Sunday, January 15th, 2012 at 4:43 AM
Title: Re: Dzogchen cosmogeny
Content:

gad rgyangs said:
but there are no sentient beings during the basis-bardo, so does that mean that there are no buddhas either?

Malcolm wrote:
Correct.

gad rgyangs said:
Do both Buddhas with traces and Buddhas without traces get absorbed into the basis during the basis-bardo?

Malcolm wrote:
Again, all sentient beings achieve some species of awakening by the end of a given eon. Samyak Sambuddhas achieve buddhahood without remainder.

gad rgyangs said:
So are there Dzogchen Buddhas who wave bye bye to the Samyak Sambuddhas who enter into parinirvana without remainder? is it simply a choice which one you want to be, or is one considered a "higher" level of realization (I assume since we are talking Dzogchen view, the abiding-nirvana-Buddhas are higher)?

Malcolm wrote:
According to Dzogchen texts, Samyak sambuddhas Buddhas enter into parinirvana without remainder. Buddhahood without remainder is considered superior to or higher than Buddhahood with remainder. It is the highest form of Buddhahood, according to Dzogchen.

N

Author: Malcolm
Date: Sunday, January 15th, 2012 at 4:08 AM
Title: Re: Dzogchen cosmogeny
Content:

gad rgyangs said:
im confused about where the samyak sambuddhas are during the basis-bardo.

Malcolm wrote:
Parinirvana without any remainder.

This is another place where Dzogchen doctrine differs from common Mahāyāna -- the goal in common Mahāyāna is a non-abiding nirvana.

The ultimate result of Dzogchen is an abiding nirvana.

Why? Because compassion is innate in the basis, and whenever sentient beings appear, so do Buddhas.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 15th, 2012 at 3:58 AM

Title: Re: Misunderstanding emptiness

Content:

yadave said:

If Nagarjuna had an electron microscope, he would have thought it was an alien death ray machine and freaked out. Namdrol told me the molecules-are-atoms theory and I replied that atoms weren't salty. "Self-inherent existence" is a metaphysical Buddhist notion, a stellar concept with regards to our intuitive notion of self, a misplaced idea when projected onto shared perceptions. In my humble opinion of course.

Malcolm wrote:

Your view is similar with Sautrantika position. You accept the absence of identity of persons, but you uphold that things bear intrinsic characteristics.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 15th, 2012 at 3:55 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen cosmogeny

Content:

Namdrol said:

Those who have completed the fourth vision experience the universe arising as the basis [snang srid gzhi bzhengs].

gad rgyangs said:

what is the "basis" of that experience? it can't be the same basis, as that would be circular.

Malcolm wrote:

It is the same basis since self-originated wisdom is unchanging.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 15th, 2012 at 1:56 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen cosmogeny

Content:

Namdrol said:

Everything from stream enterers up to the 12th bhumi.

gad rgyangs said:

are you saying up to and including 12th bhumi has traces and gets re-absorbed? 13th-16th counts as samyak sambuddha and doesn't get re-absorbed? so where do they hang out during that bardo period? and if the basis is rang byung ye shes, are they then not "grounded" in it (so to speak), not needing to "return" to it?

Malcolm wrote:

Those who have completed the fourth vision experience the universe arising as the basis [snang srid gzhir bzhengs].

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 15th, 2012 at 1:25 AM

Title: Re: A 1st look: Red Pine's Lañkāvatāra Sūtra as Jasmine Tea

Content:

Leo Rivers said:

On the very same page as the self characterization of the text by the translator is this statement:

"These include the 5 Skandhas (form, sensation, perception, memory, and consciousness)", (page 15).

That rendering into English of "samskāra" as "memory"

Malcolm wrote:

This is simply misleading and wrong. The samakāra skandha is composed of all kinds of caittas, mental factors, of which smṛti, memory, is merely one. I hope that the rest of his translation is not dominated by such coarse glosses.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 15th, 2012 at 12:56 AM

Title: Re: Misunderstanding emptiness

Content:

Namdrol said:

So are you then asserting that saltiness is caused by something other than salt?

N

Beatzen said:

Salty is a discrimination of mind consciousness. The sense object alone is not the cause of the salty experience, because that is a byproduct of the object's interaction with the sense organs. Each link in the chain leading up to mind categorization as "salty" is not the cause in itself. Therefore, emptiness via effective causality.

Malcolm wrote:
So you are saying that salt is not salty?

Author: Malcolm
Date: Sunday, January 15th, 2012 at 12:53 AM
Title: Re: Dzogchen cosmogeny
Content:
gad rgyangs said:
so even fully enlightened Buddhas never really eliminate all afflictions

Namdrol said:
Samyak Sambuddhas fully eliminate traces. Hence the "samyak". Dzogchen texts speak of them achieving parinirvana.

N

gad rgyangs said:
so when you said earlier:
there are no sentient beings at the time of the latent basis, because all sentient beings, theoretically, achieved some kind of buddhahood in the last eon.
"some kind of buddhahood" includes types that leave traces ("returning to the cause" kind?) and the samyak kind, that does not entail getting re-absorbed into the basis during the bardo period?

Malcolm wrote:
Everything from stream enterers up to the 12th bhumi.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Saturday, January 14th, 2012 at 11:07 PM
Title: Re: Dzogchen cosmogeny
Content:
gad rgyangs said:
so even fully enlightened Buddhas never really eliminate all afflictions

Malcolm wrote:
Samyak Sambuddhas fully eliminate traces. Hence the "samyak". Dzogchen texts speak of them achieving parinirvana.

N

Author: Malcolm
Date: Saturday, January 14th, 2012 at 11:05 PM
Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

Dechen Norbu said:

Can Insects Feel Pain?

.

Adamantine said:

Just to shake things up even more, it's a must to read this book as an overview of contemporary scientific research into intelligence in life forms other-than-human, -- including plants (that make decisions, interact with their environments, and appear to feel pain) and slime molds which solve mazes. Warning-- the contents of this book certainly do challenge some long-held Buddhist beliefs about the limits of "sentience" .

Acchantika said:

I just wanted to clarify that whether an insect can or can't feel pain is not a reflection of whether or not it is sentient. As before, some human's can't feel pain, but that doesn't mean they are not sentient. Just as humans lack the sensory capabilities to detect gamma rays, but are sentient, insects lack a centralized nervous system which would make it impossible for them to experience pain as we currently understand it. But, we may understand it wrong. Either way, this doesn't mean they are not aware or conscious at all.

Sönam said:

when you have no other choice, you better kill the animal form the most distant from buddhahood ... an insect is more distant to buddhahood than a cow, for exemple.

Sönam

Namdrol said:

I violently disagree with this point of view, actually.

Acchantika said:

Forced to kill one or the other, what would inform your decision?

Malcolm wrote:

I would insist the person forcing me be the one to choose.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 14th, 2012 at 6:41 AM

Title: Re: You know your a Tibetan Buddhist when,...

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

You know you're a Tibetan Buddhist when you reflexively jam your left ring finger into all food and drink and flick it in the air.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 14th, 2012 at 6:39 AM

Title: Re: Smoking tobacco

Content:

Nemo said:

You know your a Tibetan Buddhist when you don't mind if your neighbors smoke pot, but when a whiff of tobacco smoke comes across your deck you close all the windows and go inside.

Malcolm wrote:

Very true.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 14th, 2012 at 6:31 AM

Title: Re: Misunderstanding emptiness

Content:

yadave said:

But atoms are not salty. The homework assignment was to find saltiness.

Namdrol said:

If atoms don't produce saltiness, then from where does it come? From where does the saltiness of salt molecules come? Your analysis is not finished.

N

Beatzen said:

The sixth consciousness labels the experience "salty", but the taste is dependent both on the molecules of salt and the molecules of taste buds. To paraphrase Padma, there is nothing existing which could be called salty, or cause of it's own saltiness.

Malcolm wrote:

So are you then asserting that saltiness is caused by something other than salt?

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 14th, 2012 at 6:00 AM

Title: Re: May wrathful practice be performed?

Content:

Kilaya said:

Does Throma Nagmo have any separate sadhana of her own apart from the Chöd ritual?

Namdrol said:

Yes. Many.

N

Kilaya said:

Is her specific activity similar to that of Sengdongma?

Malcolm wrote:

The kama origin of Krodhakali is the mahāsiddha Virupa who received the sadhana for Krodhakali in Oddiyāna. This sadhana was introduced to Tibet by Padampha Sangye.

The remaining Krodhakali practices are all terma, beginning with the Krodhakali practice of Nyang Ral Nyima Ozer.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 14th, 2012 at 5:58 AM

Title: Re: May wrathful practice be performed?

Content:

JinpaRangdrol said:

Nyingma Sengdongma or the Sarma Sengdongma from the Chakrasamvara Tantra.

Malcolm wrote:

They are the same. They both use the 14 syllable mantra. The sole difference is whether it is kama or terma. Nyingma Simhamukha is all terma. Kama Simhamukha comes from Bari Lotsawa through Sakya.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 14th, 2012 at 5:56 AM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

padma norbu said:

What I would like to know is... how do I bring them back to life? You know, like Tilopa. just kidding.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, I think rebirth pretty much covers it.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 14th, 2012 at 5:55 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen Community of Chogyal Namkhai Norbu

Content:

Sönam said:

when you have no other choice, you better kill the animal form the most distant from buddhahood ... an insect is more distant to buddhahood than a cow, for example.

Sönam

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, I never explained such a principle. I violently disagree with this point of view, actually.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 14th, 2012 at 5:54 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen Community of Chogyal Namkhai Norbu

Content:

Sönam said:

Yes but, and that is why have difficulty with that recommendation of Rinpoché, at the same time you are more upstream of the chain, because you are also one of the multiple causes of the violent death of the concerned animal.

Namdrol said:

This is just as much a problem with animals killed during the production of wheat.

Sönam said:

yes but, as you explained to me years ago, there is a hierarchy by animals regarding buddhahood ...

Sönam

Malcolm wrote:

I did not explain it, but other people maintain that higher animals lives are more precious because they are higher life forms.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 14th, 2012 at 5:21 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen Community of Chogyal Namkhai Norbu

Content:

JinpaRangdrol said:

but then I spent a few years eating meat, constantly justifying it to myself with the same ol' Vajrayana rhetoric of "imbibing poison to transform it."

Malcolm wrote:

Nothing to purify, it's all rtsal.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 14th, 2012 at 5:19 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen Community of Chogyal Namkhai Norbu

Content:

Sönam said:

Yes but, and that is why have difficulty with that recommendation of Rinpoché, at the same time you are more upstream of the chain, because you are also one of the multiple causes of the violent death of the concerned animal.

Malcolm wrote:

This is just as much a problem with animals killed during the production of wheat.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 14th, 2012 at 4:55 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen Community of Chogyal Namkhai Norbu

Content:

padma norbu said:

Uh, because I don't believe that is possible. Namdrol once said he's a vegetarian now EXCEPT for not refusing such offerings because he didn't quite think he had that ability himself, but he would never refuse ritual substances.

Malcolm wrote:

Our bodies, essentially, are composed of rtsal which is expressed in our ignorance as the five outer and inner elements.

When practitioners eat the flesh of those who have been killed (necessarily by someone else, not at our specific encouragement, nor have we seen the animal killed) a positive cause is created for this being. Why? Because a connection is made through the field of rtsal which also includes minds.

Since we don't eat anything but cattle, pigs, goats, sheep, fowl, fish and seafood, these animals are in some sense luckier than others, they are more closely associated with human beings, and more likely to wind up in the diet of practitioners.

It is not a question of ability, it is question of knowledge. When you know how everything is connected through rtsal, then such questions about the mechanisms by which a practitioner consuming the flesh of some unfortunate animal benefits that animal becomes very obvious.

The reason why Ganapujas have a powerful effect is that there is no more power an offering than offering to the Guru. If your ganapuja is just a dry ritual, then of course it will have little benefit.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 14th, 2012 at 4:40 AM

Title: Re: Misunderstanding emptiness

Content:

yadave said:

But atoms are not salty. The homework assignment was to find saltiness.

Malcolm wrote:

If atoms don't produce saltiness, then from where does it come? From where does the saltiness of salt molecules come? Your analysis is not finished.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 14th, 2012 at 4:14 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen cosmogeny

Content:

AilurusFulgens said:

Namdrol, and what would those methods be ,if i may ask?

Namdrol said:

Rushan.

N

padma norbu said:

As found in that little pamphlet The Practice of Purification of the Six Lokas?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, that among other rushans.

'khor 'das ru shan practices are called "seperation of samsara and nirvana" is that successful completion of them guarantees one will not longer be reborn in samsara, equivalent with attaining patience on the path of application.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 14th, 2012 at 12:35 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen cosmogeny

Content:

AilurusFulgens said:

Does it mean that whoever has not achieved the Rainbow Body of Great Transference i.e. the complete and final result of Dzogchen can fall back into a state of ignorance after the pralaya happens and then a new universe (or should I rather say multiverse) emerges?

A. Fulgens

Namdrol said:

No, one can achieve complete realization either in this life, at the time of death, or in the bardo of dharmatā.

If one is a Dzogchen practitioner, even if one is at best an average practitioner i.e. the lowest capacity, there are methods to ensure rebirth in the five pure nirmanakāya buddhafiels, where one will attain samyaksambuddhahood within five hundred human years, according to the texts.

alpha said:

Namdrol, and what would those methods be ,if i may ask?

Is not that i am an average practitioner but i hope that one day i will come to engender the hope of becoming a beginner and thus i could be called a proper "average practitioner"

I find the knowledge in this tread extremely fascinating.

Malcolm wrote:

Rushan.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 14th, 2012 at 12:15 AM

Title: Re: Smoking tobacco

Content:

JinpaRangdrol said:

Also, I think it should be mentioned that a very prominent (relatively) western practitioner that I was very close to was a cigarette smoker. He died of a heart attack a couple of years ago (probably related to smoking), but his enlightenment in the Bardo of Dharmata was attested by multiple Rinpoches. There were also incredible signs surrounding his death. He was an accomplished Tögal practitioner, but had smoked long before he started practicing Buddhism...

Malcolm wrote:

Tögal does not work with relative channels. What is being discussed is relative channels.

Your friend is fortunate to have received tögal instruction, and unfortunate to have had an addiction that prevented his complete realization in this life.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 13th, 2012 at 11:25 PM

Title: Re: Red Tara Sadhana

Content:

sangyey said:

For instance I had been trying to visualize when listening to music the sound as the mantra conjoined with emptiness as a way to develop compassion/wisdom.

Malcolm wrote:

Sound is already mantra. Just enjoy it.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 13th, 2012 at 10:48 PM

Title: Re: Dzogchen cosmogeny

Content:

AilurusFulgens said:

Does it mean that whoever has not achieved the Rainbow Body of Great Transference i.e. the complete and final result of Dzogchen can fall back into a state of ignorance after the pralaya happens and then a new universe (or should I rather say multiverse) emerges?

A. Fulgens

Malcolm wrote:

No, one can achieve complete realization either in this life, at the time of death, or in the bardo of dharmatā.

If one is a Dzogchen practitioner, even if one is at best an average practitioner i.e. the lowest capacity, there are methods to ensure rebirth in the five pure nirmanakāya buddhafiels, where one will attain samyaksambuddhahood within five hundred human years, according to the texts.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 13th, 2012 at 9:36 PM

Title: Re: Dzogchen cosmogeny

Content:

Namdrol said:

No, the basis is self-originated wisdom; sentient beings arise from the condition of ignorance. The cause of their arising is the non-recognition of wisdom. Hence the term "buddhahood that returns the cause".

N

wisdom said:

What is the meaning of "returning to the cause".

Malcolm wrote:

Means returning to the state of the basis -- the basis is called the basis because it has not been realized. When it is realized, the basis is called the result. If it is realized imperfectly, then that is called a result that returns to the cause; when it is realized perfectly, then it is called "the result that does not return to the cause".

Please bear in mind that these things are theoretical, and they have very little if nothing at all to do with daily practice.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 13th, 2012 at 9:46 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen cosmogeny

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

Malcolm, this is super-fascinating. thanks for taking the time to explain this stuff.

I have a question here:

Because of traces of action and affliction remain from previous universe, the basis is stirred, lights shine out, and they are either recognized or not, resulting in samasara and nirvana.

where are these traces during the basis-bardo, in the basis itself? that doesn't sound plausible. we would then have a basis with latent awareness(es) and latent afflicted traces???

Malcolm wrote:

In the basis itself, which is why I cited the passage "Wisdom is the accumulator of traces". And yes, that is exactly what Dzogchen "cosmology" is saying i.e. that there are latent awareness [shes pa bag la nyal] in the basis.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 13th, 2012 at 9:30 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen cosmogeny

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

the dzogchen presentation of the basis, what exactly it is or isn't, and how things arise from it, is intimately related to questions of just what a sentient being is, just what we are, what our awareness is, where it comes from, etc. none of this stuff is trivial.

Namdrol said:

Things don't rise from the basis. They arise from non-recognition of the basis, i.e. the parikalpita- avidyā.

N

gad rgyangs said:

what is it that fails to recognize the basis?

Malcolm wrote:

I have explained this now several ways. So, I'll try again: there are no sentient beings at the time of the latent basis, because all sentient beings, theoretically, achieved some kind of buddhahood in the last eon. The notion of the basis in Dzogchen man ngag sde is very similar to the Hindu idea of Pralaya. [In fact, in the term kun gzhi, ālaya, kun = ā, gzhi = laya. The term kun gzhi is distinguished from the term gzhi in Dzogchen, as you can easily find out, but the fact that gzhi is described as the bardo of samara and nirvana is nothing if not telling. If someone is taking a text critical approach, they will note that there is a movement in Buddhist tantric texts in India in the late 9th through the 10th century in such texts as the Samputa tantra and the Kalacakra to borrow and repurpose some Samkhya concepts. Hence Dzogchen use of the term prakriti, etc.]

After the collapse of the previous universe, there are no buddhas and sentient beings -- and this is called the bardo of samsara and nirvana. Present in the latent basis however is a neutral awareness which does not know itself.

Because of traces of action and affliction remain from previous universe, the basis is stirred, lights shine out, and they are either recognized or not, resulting in samasara and nirvana.

This neutral awareness is what happens when someone achieves an incomplete full awakening, for example an arhat or some other form of lesser liberation that can "return to the cause". This is why Dzogchen makes such a big deal about Dzogchen Buddhahood being one that "does not return to the cause".

gad rgyangs said:

have sentient beings existed since beginningless time alongside the basis, but not arising from it?

Malcolm wrote:

The Dzogchen answer is no. Sentient beings newly arise at the end of each bardo of samsara and nirvana.

How do they arise? They arise when neutral awareness in the basis makes the error of not recognizing the display of the basis as its own display. The imputing ignorance results in self and other, the ālaya forms, the twelve links start up, samsara and nirvana divide. Etc.

As I mentioned above, Dzogchen texts do not distinguish whether this neutral awareness in the basis is multiple or singular.

So this question is left for us to solve on our own: either the neutral awareness of basis is multiple, not entirely satisfying for a number of reasons, but this explains how there are individual mind streams from the start; or it is singular (not entirely satisfying for a number of reasons), but gets warped by the presence of trace afflictions into individuated sentient beings; or is it neither singular or multiple (not entirely satisfying for a number of reasons) and gets warped by the presence of trace afflictions into individuated sentient beings. In the last two scenarios, the inability of awakened people to completely eradicate all traces of afflictions leaves traces of affliction left over, where they act as seeds for new sentient beings. There is a passage in the Gongpa Zangthal that describes wisdom as "the accumulator of traces".

gad rgyangs said:

do the basis and sentient beings have a common origin?

Malcolm wrote:

No, the basis is self-originated wisdom; sentient beings arise from the condition of ignorance. The cause of their arising is the non-recognition of wisdom. Hence the term "buddhahood that returns the cause".

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 13th, 2012 at 8:12 AM

Title: Re: Krishnamurti and Buddhism

Content:

Beatzen said:

Atisha explicitly stated not to concern oneself with others. You really shouldn't even judge yourself. You are encouraged to cultivate without hope of benefit or reward.

gregkavarnos said:

Hogwash, not only do we have the right to judge the capacity and motivation of those that are teaching us, we have to! It's a tantric thang! How else will we find a teacher to totally commit to?

Malcolm wrote:

The unexamined master is a māra for the disciple,
the unexamined disciple is the enemy of the master.
-- Tantra of Self-arisen Vidyā

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 13th, 2012 at 7:36 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen cosmogeny

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

the dzogchen presentation of the basis, what exactly it is or isnt, and how things arise from it, is intimately related to questions of just what a sentient being is, just what we are, what our awareness is, where it comes from, etc. none of this stuff is trivial.

Malcolm wrote:

Things dont rise from the basis. They arise from non-recognition of the basis, i.e. the parikalpita- avidyā.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 13th, 2012 at 5:34 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen cosmogeny

Content:

Kai said:

Therefore KaDag ChenPo = basis = yeshe?

Malcolm wrote:

indeed.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 13th, 2012 at 4:31 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen cosmogeny

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

i don't see how anyone could not experience some perplexity with this story.

Virgo said:

It's actually the clearest explanation of things I've come across.

Kevin

gad rgyangs said:

i didnt say it wasnt clear, i said it was bizarre.

Malcolm wrote:
No more bizarre than Kalacakra space atoms.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Friday, January 13th, 2012 at 4:05 AM
Title: Re: Dzogchen cosmogeny
Content:
gad rgyangs said:
a "basis" that is "self originated" and possesses some kind of rudimentary
"awarenesses". it sounds like some kind of primordial blob or something.

Namdrol said:
I guess you are not very interested in understanding Dzogchne. It is probably better for you to study Lamdre or Mahamudra.

N

gad rgyangs said:
that's not fair. i am asking honest questions and expressing my perplexity with some aspects of this creation story. i don't see how anyone could not experience some perplexity with this story. your explanations are very clear and appreciated, but that doesn't mean it's something to be just swallowed hook line and sinker without question.

Malcolm wrote:
You should examine the tone of your questions. BTW, it is not a creation story. The basis refers to a time between universes. Also, as I have mentioned before, if you are not practicing thögal, this explanation is not relevant to your practice. This explanation is directly tied to tögal teachings and provides the basis for understanding the Nyingthig model of liberation. It is actually not really good that there is so much out there about this "cosmology" since people misunderstand its intent badly.

N

Author: Malcolm
Date: Friday, January 13th, 2012 at 3:59 AM
Title: Re: How practical is consort practice for the majority?
Content:
Malcolm wrote:
Masturbation is not listed as lay sexual misconduct in Abhidharma or the Vinaya Sutra.

It is a sexual misconduct that requires confession and penance in the case of bhikṣūs.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 13th, 2012 at 3:51 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen cosmogeny

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

a "basis" that is "self originated" and possesses some kind of rudimentary "awarenesses". it sounds like some kind of primordial blob or something.

Malcolm wrote:

I guess you are not very interested in understanding Dzogchne. It is probably better for you to study Lamdre or Mahamudra.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 13th, 2012 at 3:42 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen cosmogeny

Content:

Namdrol said:

The basis is original purity. The Unwritten Tantra states:

“There is no object to investigate within the view of self-originated wisdom: nothing went before, nothing happens later, nothing is present now at all. Action does not exist. Traces do not exist. Ignorance does not exist. Mind does not exist. Prajñā does not exist. Samsara does not exist. Nirvana does not exist. Even vidyā itself does not exist i.e. nothing at all appears in wisdom. That arose from not grasping anything.”

However, Prasaga is an intellectual view. Dzogchen is not and that is the main difference between the two.

gad rgyangs said:

so wisdom (ye shes) is prior to vidya (rig pa), and is actually a synonym for the basis?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes.

gad rgyangs said:

when ye shes takes an object it becomes rig pa (or rather ye shes stirs and becomes a duality of rigpa and object)? what then is "resting in rig pa", what is the object then?

Malcolm wrote:

Awarenesses [shes pa rnam] in the basis are neutral, meaning they are not afflicted, but they possess innate ignorance since they not know themselves. When there is a stirring in the basis and the light of wisdom shines out, then these awarenesses either recognize it, in which case their shes pa becomes a shes rab and they know [vidyā] the basis as their own state; or they reify appearance of the five lights as an object through the imputing ignorance and this sets into motion I-making, dependent origination and all the rest of it, and their shes pa becomes rnam shes.

BTW, the texts themselves do not speak of the shes pas in the plural. They just use the the term shes pa lung ma bstan.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 13th, 2012 at 3:18 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen cosmogeny

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

is the basis a dependent arising or not? if it is, its not a basis. if it is not, it is not empty, which is impossible.

Namdrol said:

The basis is not dependently originated. It is self-originated.

The Blazing Lamp Tantra:

Within initial original purity

the nature is like so:

not made by anyone, intrinsically clear

the nature is already just so.

gad rgyangs said:

how is this reconcilable with the standard Dzogchen trope that Dzogchen follows the view of Prasangika Madhayamaka and the MMK?

Malcolm wrote:

The basis is original purity. The Unwritten Tantra states:

“There is no object to investigate within the view of self-originated wisdom: nothing went before, nothing happens later, nothing is present now at all. Action does not exist. Traces do not exist. Ignorance does not exist. Mind does not exist. Prajñā does not exist. Samsara does not exist. Nirvana does not exist. Even vidyā itself does not exist i.e. nothing at all appears in wisdom. That arose from not grasping anything.”

However, Prasaga is an intellectual view. Dzogchen is not and that is the main difference between the two.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 13th, 2012 at 3:12 AM

Title: Re: May wrathful practice be performed?

Content:

Kilaya said:

Does Throma Nagmo have any separate sadhana of her own apart from the Chöd ritual?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes. Many.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 13th, 2012 at 3:08 AM

Title: Re: How to Generate Merit?

Content:

Clarence said:

So, after some thinking and contemplating, I decided to get cracking at increasing my merit. Now, my life is good and easy so I am looking to increase the merit so I get to do retreats and meet realized Lamas. I don't need merit to attract women or money, so you can skip that.

What would you suggest are the best practices for this?

Many thanks, C

Malcolm wrote:

DO Ganapujas. Sing SOV. More merit in a single moment of contemplation than all the stupas in the universe.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 13th, 2012 at 3:05 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen cosmogeny

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

is the basis a dependent arising or not? if it is, its not a basis. if it is not, it is not empty, which is impossible.

Malcolm wrote:

The basis is not dependently originated. It is self-originated.

The Blazing Lamp Tantra:

Within initial original purity

the nature is like so:

not made by anyone, intrinsically clear

the nature is already just so.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 13th, 2012 at 12:27 AM

Title: Re: Orthodoxy in Vajrayana

Content:

Astus said:

Thanks Namdrol for the initial input. You listed the major differences between sutra and tantra, but what are the fundamental doctrines that tantras have to accord with in order to be considered authentic? I think of something similar to the four seals and such.

Malcolm wrote:

Those are the ten criteria I listed above. Then I mentioned that Dzogchen tosses them out.

Astus said:

You say the transmission is valid if the teacher is realised or if s/he has an unbroken lineage. I assume there are no verifiable proofs for either of that, are there?

Malcolm wrote:

Zero.

Astus said:

Is a lineage authentic as long as it originates from a realised master -

Malcolm wrote:

Yes. But this is true of both sutra and tantric teachings.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 13th, 2012 at 12:19 AM

Title: Re: The Lack of Cause and Result in Dzogchen

Content:

Mr. G said:

Hi Namdrol,

Perhaps I was being a bit more granular than I wanted to be. This is the context in which I was using the word "causation":

The accumulation of merit leads to the meeting of Dzogchen teachings, which leads to receiving Direct Introduction, which leads to the eventual recognition of rigpa. So:

merit ---> Direct Introduction ---> recognition of rigpa.

Does this sound about right?

Malcolm wrote:

Not at the time of the basis; after the basis has arisen and samsara and nirvana have split, then this is correct. I.e. it is correct for sentient beings. At the time of the basis however there are neither buddhas nor sentient beings, hence it is called the bardo of samsara and nirvana.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 12th, 2012 at 10:58 PM

Title: Re: The individual in dzogchen, independence, dharmakaya

Content:

Namdrol said:

No, since it is naturally formed [lhun grub] i.e. it is not made by anyone [sus ma byas, (the actual definition of lhun grub)] gaden rgyangs said:

this is the actual definition of svabhava.

Malcolm wrote:

There is no diversity in a svābhāva. There is diversity in lhun grub. This is the reason why ka dag is termed ngo bo, or svabhāva; while lhun grub is termed prakriti or rang bzhin.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 12th, 2012 at 3:04 AM

Title: Re: Mahāmudrā & Dzogchen

Content:

Kai said:
Thats a strictly Sakya view.

Malcolm wrote:
Nope, it is view of the Samputa tantra.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Thursday, January 12th, 2012 at 3:03 AM
Title: Re: The individual in dzogchen, independence, dharmakaya
Content:

gad rgyangs said:
sounds good, but im not sure how this is really different from Vishnu dreaming the universe or other creation myths. this "basis" seems like a possesor of substance svabhava.

Malcolm wrote:
No, since it is originally pure.

gad rgyangs said:
if you say no, its empty, then that means its dependently originated, in which case, the question becomes, what kind of "basis" is it that would be dependent on causes and conditions, and what would these causes and conditions be in this case?

Malcolm wrote:
No, since it is naturally formed [lhun grub] i.e. it is not made by anyone [sus ma byas, (the actual definition of lhun grub)] but it is also not conditioned by afflictions.

However, since it is naturally formed, it can appear as dependently originated phenomena, for example, the five lights being reified as the five elements, etc.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Thursday, January 12th, 2012 at 1:54 AM
Title: Re: Yeah, Dzogchen is confusing
Content:

Nemo said:
I think that reading a book about dzog chen without a Masters supervision is about as useful as reading a book on brain surgery.

Malcolm wrote:
Agreed, fortunately I have all necessary transmissions and instructions. Thanks.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 12th, 2012 at 12:49 AM

Title: Re: The individual in dzogchen, independence, dharmakaya

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

then this implies that the sentient being exists first, and then fails to recognize its state, which results in it being a sentient being, which is a circular regress.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes.

As I have stated elsewhere, Dzogchen cosmology is just a minor variation on the standard abhidharma cosmology. In Abhidharmakośa, at the end of the eon, all sentient beings are reborn in the two upper form realms, where their minds are in a state of dharmatā. After twenty anatarakalpas, intermediate eons, because of traces of latent afflictions, the air mandala forms and so on, resulting in a container universe which is repopulated by sentient beings who take birth in it from top to bottom.

In Dzogchen, at the end of the previous mahākalpa, all sentient beings attain "buddhahood" after taking birth in the Kalavinkaloka. Then after twenty thousand eons while samsara and nirvana does not appear (this is called the bardo (antara) of samsara and nirvana in dzogchen texts), because of the lingering traces of affliction and action left over from the last eon, the basis becomes stirred, the five lights shine out and there is a chance for recognition or non-recognition by the neutral awareness(es) that is/are obscured by the innate ignorance of mere non-recognition while the basis is in a latent state. Depending on the fact of recognition or non-recognition, there is Samantabhadra and sentient beings.

Thus, we understand that the basis has two phases, active and latent. During the bardo of samsara and nirvana, it is in a latent phase.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 12th, 2012 at 12:23 AM

Title: Re: Yeah, Dzogchen is confusing

Content:

padma norbu said:

One last question, then: when everything is destroyed at the end a world age, do the Buddhas survive that or not?

Malcolm wrote:

This is one of those fourteen questions....

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 12th, 2012 at 12:11 AM

Title: Re: The Lack of Cause and Result in Dzogchen

Content:

Namdrol said:

....are called the basis (aka bodhicitta in sems sde) when they are not recognized. When they are recognized, they are called the path.

N

Mr. G said:

Hi Namdrol,

What "causes" the act of recognition?

Malcolm wrote:

It is more like, what is the condition for recognition. The condition for recognition is the stirring of the basis

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 12th, 2012 at 12:06 AM

Title: Re: The Lack of Cause and Result in Dzogchen

Content:

Mr. G said:

The basis was not recognized as being originally pure and free of afflictions which initiated samsara and nirvana. However, we can't call the act of "recognition" a real act or cause due to the the basis which possesses a nature, essence and compassion. So it is not the individual that is "recognizing", but it is the intelligence of the basis that is at work.

Malcolm wrote:

The three wisdoms, essence, nature and compassion, are called the basis (aka bodhicitta in sems sde) when they are not recognized. When they are recognized, they are called the path. When they are realized, they are called the result.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 11th, 2012 at 10:40 PM

Title: Re: Misunderstanding emptiness

Content:

yadave said:

Then I look at my example of a modern person searching for saltiness and stopping at the salt molecule and it seems so dumb to continue decomposing things, everything is made of the smaller stuff.

Malcolm wrote:

Molecules are made of atoms which are made of electrons and protons, etc.

By stopping at the salt molecule, you are making precisely the mistake Madhyamakas criticized Sarvastivadins for making i.e. arbitrarily stopping your analysis at a false level of irreducibility.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 11th, 2012 at 10:36 PM

Title: Re: Misunderstanding emptiness

Content:

yadave said:

And if you can argue for and against a view, it makes one wonder why you casually brush one off.

Malcolm wrote:

Because I think that Tsongkhapa's presentation does not reflect Chandrakirti's intention, or that of Nagarjuna.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 11th, 2012 at 10:28 PM

Title: Re: How practical is consort practice for the majority?

Content:

Jnana said:

There are also other conservative interpretations on the role and importance of karmamudrā. For example, Chomdan Rigpey Raltri's Dohālamkārāpuṣpa (Do ha rgyan gyi me tog):

People who do not know [that] the nature of everything [is] co-emergence claim that unadulterated great bliss is attained while engaging in sexual union with a karmamudrā. They are mistaken, like the thirsty wild deer who sees a mirage as water, goes running after it and gets injured. They die from thirst; can they get water from the sky? Similarly, [such people] mistake the bliss of the four joys to be primordial awareness, and do not realize co-emergence. For this reason, since that bliss which is born from sexual union has no capacity to give rise to and sustain co-emergence, where can it complete the realization [which is] free of the three worlds, [i.e.] the three doors? Well, it cannot complete this.

Malcolm wrote:

Correct. The bliss of karmaudra practice is just a tool. In the lamdre system, it is called the practice of small bliss and emptiness and is connected with the third consecration. It does not produce a final result since it works by purifying the the white and red bodhicitta. For that, you need the practices of the jñānavāyu, the wisdom winds (albiet still practiced with either sort of mudra), termed in Lamdre, great bliss and emptiness -- the practice that transforms the karmavāyus into jñānāvāyus -- thus resulting in rainbow body, as in Dzogchen.

The main advantage of Dzogchen togal over these practices is that a) it does not require a consort b) it does not require the step by step purification of the four mandalas through the two stages (i.e. the outer body channel mandala, the inner channel syllable mandala, the bodhicitta mandala, and the vāyu mandala). This is why togal is sometimes equated with the completion stage practices of the gsar ma system.

The practice of tregchö, the inseparability of samsara and nirvana of Sakya, mahāmudra of Kagyu, and clear light nature of the mind of the Gelugpas have essentially the same point i.e. cultivating a momentary unfabricated awareness.

Dzogchenpas maintain however that this cultivation of a momentary unfabricated awareness by itself will not result in rainbow body, but rather, will result only in the the body dissolving at death into subtle particles. In Nyingma, Sakya and Gelug, it seems this cultivation of a momentary unfabricated awareness forms the basis for the practice the two stages, whereas Kagyu dissents, and asserts that this meditation alone can be sufficient for a person of supreme caliber.

In any event, the main point of the view in all four (or five if we included Jonang) schools is the experiential cultivation of a momentary unfabricated awareness. Other than that, the main differences are terminologies related to the specifics of each schools presentation of their respective paths and methodologies.

N

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 11th, 2012 at 10:12 PM

Title: Re: The Lack of Cause and Result in Dzogchen

Content:

Namdrol said:

Sentient beings occur through non-recognition of the basis.

The result does not arise from a cause.

Mr. G said:

Would you be able to elaborate on this? I'm stuck on the notion that recognition or non-recognition is a "cause" of sorts that enables the result.

Malcolm wrote:

The result does not depend on the two accumulations.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 11th, 2012 at 10:11 PM

Title: Re: The individual in dzogchen, independence, dharmakaya

Content:

Namdrol said:

The basis is free from one and many, therefore it is neither individual nor shared.

gad rgyangs said:

are you an individual? yes does that mean you and the basis are therefore distinct?

Malcolm wrote:

Imputing ignorance [kun brtags ma rig pa] reifies the basis as a self and an other. This ignorance does not exist in the basis, has never existed in the basis and will never exist in the basis. Nevertheless, the basis, nature, essence and compassion, serve as its cause in the sense that it is the basis which is reified. However, the basis itself is free from reification and therefore any sort of enumeration. Even the notion of three wisdoms of essence, nature and compassion is merely a way of talking about the basis which in fact has one essence.

Individuals occur because the basis was not recognized at the beginning of the eon, when the neutral awareness [shes pa lung ma bstan, jñāvyakṛta] in the basis became consciousness [rnam shes, vijñāna] through not recognizing the basis as its own state due to the imputing ignorance mentioned above. When that neutral awareness recognizes the basis as its own display, it becomes prajñā [shes rab] through knowing [rig pa, vidyā] the basis as its own display, there is effortless buddhahood in the state of realization called "Samantabhadra".

Sentient beings in others words are merely a continuation of ignorance about our own true state.

The answer of course is that individuals are neither the same nor different than the basis. If they were the same, the basis would be afflicted, if they were utterly different, sentient beings could not become buddhas through recognizing the basis as their own state.

Also bear in mind that the term "basis" is applied to the three wisdoms because they have not been realized. When the three wisdoms are realized, then they are termed the fruit and one rests on the stage of great original purity, uttarajñāna, highest wisdom.

N

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 11th, 2012 at 2:22 PM

Title: Re: How practical is consort practice for the majority?

Content:

Adamantine said:

Namdrol, could you explain how you can say wanking is only sexual misconduct for monks without contradicting Dudjom Rinpoche? I am not trying to debate, I am just genuinely interested.

Malcolm wrote:

Because that item is not covered as part of sexual misconduct for laypeople.

Losing the "white" bodhicitta is interpreted differently by different masters. So I regard the whole thing as a matter of opinion, with no masters opinion being definitive.

I don't consider either Ngari Panchen or Dudjom R. to be final authorities about anything. The same goes for Sakya Pandita, Kongtrul, etc.

In other words, I am happy to contradict any scholar living or dead if I think they are mistaken.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 11th, 2012 at 2:10 PM

Title: Re: The individual in dzogchen, independence, dharmakaya

Content:

Acid_Trancer said:

I am very much interested in dzogchen but I dont understand the relation between the dharmakaya and the individual natural state.

Malcolm wrote:

The basis is free from one and many, therefore it is niether individual nor shared.

The three kayas have one essence.

The three kayas do not exist apart from the basis.

Sentient beings occur through non-recognition of the basis.

The result does not arise from a cause.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 11th, 2012 at 1:56 PM

Title: Re: The individual in dzogchen, independence, dharmakaya

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

attempting to get back to the OPs mereological question, the holographic paradigm may point to an understanding: in a hologram, each fragment contains/reflects the whole. Aurobindo also said (IIIRC) something to the effect that each thing is the whole universe presenting a different frontal aspect. clues like these may be fertile for rumination.

Sherab said:

So if one part of the universe becomes enlightened, every part of the universe become enlightened?

gad rgyangs said:

since this is the Dzogchen forum, of course theres nothing to "become enlightened", in the sense of a process or attainment actually happening. Illusory holographic fragments may kaleidoscopically change colors, that is all. the point is, there is both the illusory individual fragment holographically containing/contained in the illusory whole, and the illusory whole containing/contained in the illusory fragment. its not an either/or situation.

Malcolm wrote:

Read Guenther much? Word salad. At best some distorted Hua Yen. It is just not that complicated.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 11th, 2012 at 1:47 PM

Title: Re: Misunderstanding emptiness

Content:

yadave said:

It is odd that there was such interest in Conventional Reality on its original thread but now there is none.

It is odd that the only response was "More Gelug naval gazing" and no Gelug's jump forward (if this has anything to do with it).

Almost makes me uncomfortable to ask.

Malcolm wrote:

The reason is, is that that I can argue for the Gelug position and against it. BTW, I know Jay Garfield reasonably well, and we have also had this conversation. He is a smart guy, but I don't completely agree with his assessment of Madhyamaka -- but we respect each other.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 11th, 2012 at 1:43 PM

Title: Re: The individual in dzogchen, independence, dharmakaya

Content:

brendan said:

The less Theism in the place the better.

Malcolm wrote:

There is no theism in my thinking or statements, so it is just your imagination.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 11th, 2012 at 1:42 PM

Title: Re: The individual in dzogchen, independence, dharmakaya

Content:

brendan said:

Your facebook profile says "Originally Pure Natural Formation", you seem to be contradicting your self once again with "wishing people to experience nirvana".

Malcolm wrote:

The reason the basis is called "the basis" is because it has not been realized.

Once the basis has been fully realized, then there is parinirvana.

There is no contradiction.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 11th, 2012 at 11:57 AM

Title: Re: The individual in dzogchen, independence, dharmakaya

Content:

Sherab said:

Wow, the exchanges are UNREAL.

asunthatneversets said:

FOREAL.

Malcolm wrote:

brenden is forever seeing theism under every bed.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 11th, 2012 at 11:54 AM

Title: Re: The individual in dzogchen, independence, dharmakaya

Content:

brendan said:

RIP=Theism

Malcolm wrote:

Only you if have severe aversions to wishing people to experience nirvana.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 11th, 2012 at 10:17 AM

Title: Re: The individual in dzogchen, independence, dharmakaya

Content:

brendan said:

Why then did you write "RIP Steve Jobs" on your facebook page when Steve Jobs died?

Namdrol said:

Why do you care?

brendan said:

Dont cheat.

Malcolm wrote:

The answer is: I wrote that out of sentimentality because I am fond of his products.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 11th, 2012 at 10:00 AM

Title: Re: The individual in dzogchen, independence, dharmakaya

Content:

brendan said:

Why then did you write "RIP Steve Jobs" on your facebook page when Steve Jobs died?

Malcolm wrote:

Why do you care?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 11th, 2012 at 8:31 AM

Title: Re: How practical is consort practice for the majority?

Content:

Tsering927 said:

I think this is the crucial point of Vajrayana.

Malcolm wrote:

The crucial point of Vajrayāna is using the body as the method.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 11th, 2012 at 1:27 AM

Title: Re: The individual in dzogchen, independence, dharmakaya

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

dharmakaya is a turtle living in a gingerbread house under the sea, but it isn't real, so my statement is buddhist and not a fairytale.

Malcolm wrote:

Being unreal does not mean being arbitrary.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 11th, 2012 at 12:35 AM

Title: Re: The individual in dzogchen, independence, dharmakaya

Content:

wisdom said:

It is also all pervading and infinite, present in all things.

gad rgyangs said:

how is this different from vedanta or theism?

Malcolm wrote:

Dharmakāya isn't real.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 11th, 2012 at 12:22 AM

Title: Re: How practical is consort practice for the majority?

Content:

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 10th, 2012 at 11:33 PM

Title: Re: Yeah, Dzogchen is confusing

Content:

padma norbu said:

It seems there is a quality of awareness which contains all knowledge and which is shared by everything in various quantities like an energy of some sort, basically, and then you basically contact and capture bits of this awareness like lightning bugs in a jar.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, it is called thugs rjes which expresses itself as rtsal or energy.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 10th, 2012 at 10:59 PM

Title: Re: Yeah, Dzogchen is confusing

Content:

padma norbu said:

So... why is it necessary to receive knowledge from something "other" at all? Why can't he just know these teachings if they come from his real nature without the necessity of a manifestation of wisdom display to communicate it back to himself?

Malcolm wrote:

Because he has a body, and therefore a mind, and in the state of dreams, everyone has seven times more clarity than when they are awake.

Also while he is a realized person, he says he is not a completely realized person at the end of the path.

You also have this same state, so, you might as well ask yourself why you are not spontaneously receiving these teachings, etc.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 10th, 2012 at 10:36 PM

Title: Re: How practical is consort practice for the majority?

Content:

deff said:

masturbation is very dangerous?

Namdrol said:

Some people apparently think so -- they might go blind or grow hair on their palms.

Dechen Norbu said:

If it was, most male teens would never reach adulthood...

Malcolm wrote:

Some women would argue that most male teens never do.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 10th, 2012 at 10:35 PM

Title: Re: Yeah, Dzogchen is confusing

Content:

padma norbu said:

We are told that if we have visions of deities not to hold too much importance to that

Malcolm wrote:

Because those visions are mental projections, based on mind.

padma norbu said:

and yet here we have world-famous teachers writing entire series of books based on visions from deities.

Malcolm wrote:

Because this teacher has knowledge of his real state, and because he is expert in dream yoga, the display of his wisdom manifests as teachers and deities that communicate knowledge which he then commits to writing.

And he also has provided the method by which we may know the difference between karmic dreams (based on on mind) and dreams of clarity (based on wisdom).

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 10th, 2012 at 9:06 PM

Title: Re: Bhairava in Buddhism?

Content:

Namdrol said:
Hindu Bhairava = Mahākala

Karinos said:
Mahakala and Bhairava are not the same.

Malcolm wrote:
I know that Bhairava and Mahākala are not the same.

However, Bhairava shrines in Nepal are considered Mahākala shrines by Tibetans.

It is the same principle with Vajrayogini statues being considered to be emanations of Kali.

N

Author: Malcolm
Date: Tuesday, January 10th, 2012 at 8:17 PM
Title: Re: Bhairava in Buddhism?
Content:

Adamantine said:
Hi, wondering if anyone is familiar with the cross-pollinating deities of Nepal, and specifically with the various statues and shrines devoted to Bhairava and how / if they fit into the context of tantric Buddhism. I wonder because I find some of the statues beautiful and powerful, but I am not familiar with the link.. some appear almost identical to the protector Mahakala... but unlike Siva I have not heard that Bhairava specifically corresponds to a Nyingma protector ---->although Bhairava is supposedly another manifestation of Siva -- so would I then consider Bhairava as Mahadeva?

I know that this deity was particularly important to Newars, but I also understand Newars are primarily Buddhist. . . if anyone has any in-depth insight I'd love to hear it.

Malcolm wrote:
Hindu Bhairava = Mahākala

Author: Malcolm
Date: Tuesday, January 10th, 2012 at 10:23 AM
Title: Re: Misunderstanding emptiness
Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:
is physical phenomena an illusion or is it the reality of physical phenomena that is the illusion?

Malcolm wrote:

If the reality of physical phenomena is an illusion, physical phenomena are illusory because the nature of a thing cannot be different than the thing that bears that nature -- for example, wetness and water, heat and fire, etc.

PadmaVonSamba said:

But why is divisibility the criteria for establishing the "reality" of something?

Malcolm wrote:

Irreducibility is held to be the criteria for establishing identity. Identity is the basis for establishing the reality of a given thing. If the identity of a given thing cannot be established for that thing because a given thing can still be reduced and analyzed, that thing's reality depends on non-analytical acceptance (hence a convention). Assuming that no phenomena can bear ultimate analysis, a given thing's reality is an imputation based upon an appearance that has not been subject to ultimate analysis.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 10th, 2012 at 9:24 AM

Title: Re: Misunderstanding emptiness

Content:

Namdrol said:

Anyway, this is a boring game of semantics.

PadmaVonSamba said:

....Or does it only APPEAR to be???

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, it appears so.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 10th, 2012 at 8:17 AM

Title: Re: My father

Content:

KeithBC said:

My father left this life at 2:05 this afternoon, three weeks short of his 89th birthday. If you feel so inclined, please join me in wishing him a safe journey to his next life, and fortunate rebirth. He did his best in this life.

Om mani padme hum.

Keith

Malcolm wrote:

Om aḥ hūṃ bodhicitta mahāsukha jñānadhātu a

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 10th, 2012 at 7:09 AM

Title: Re: Yeah, Dzogchen is confusing

Content:

Namdrol said:

yes.

Lhug-Pa said:

Thanks. I've got enough 'practices' lined up as it is, but if upon reading about the Longsal preliminaries we decide that it's more effective, then it can only help to adjust our practice for the better. Of course it's important too to work with what we have and stick to it, instead of going something like "Oh, I now have a Lung for this other better practice, I'd better learn it first before I start practicing." (note to self)

Pero

No worries lol

Ah I see, thanks again.

Malcolm wrote:

Who is "we".

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 10th, 2012 at 7:09 AM

Title: Re: 'How Yoga Wrecks the Body' via The New York Times

Content:

Namdrol said:

The fact is that most of the people I know who have done a lot of yoga (of any kind) have seriously injured themselves, and this includes more than one high lama.

N

zangskar said:

Do you mind saying a bit about what kind of (permanent?) injuries? (Not who.)

Best wishes

Lars

Malcolm wrote:

Neck, back, knees.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 10th, 2012 at 6:32 AM

Title: Re: Yeah, Dzogchen is confusing

Content:

Lhug-Pa said:

With having the Lung for Longsal preliminaries, can I practice the preliminaries until I receive the Longsal Empowerment as well?

Malcolm wrote:

yes.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 10th, 2012 at 5:58 AM

Title: Re: 'How Yoga Wrecks the Body' via The New York Times

Content:

Lhug-Pa said:

If there is any danger in "Yoga", it's that most mainstream "Yoga" studios don't teach Hatha Yoga for its original purpose: To prepare the body for deep meditation.

It seems that most "Yoga" studios nowadays only, whether intentionally or unintentionally, teach people how to increase their vanity and lust; and charge an arm & a leg to boot (whether for overpriced classes, supplies, clothing, mats, etc.)

Better to learn Yantra Yoga instead, and from a qualified source.

Hatha Yoga can be very beneficial too though, that is with proper guidance (even if only from an authentic book) and Right Intention.

Malcolm wrote:

The fact is that most of the people I know who have done a lot of yoga (of any kind) have seriously injured themselves, and this includes more than one high lama.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 10th, 2012 at 5:48 AM

Title: Re: How practical is consort practice for the majority?

Content:

deff said:

masturbation is very dangerous?

Malcolm wrote:

Some people apparently think so -- they might go blind or grow hair on their palms.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 10th, 2012 at 5:45 AM

Title: Re: Misunderstanding emptiness

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

If you are having a dream, and somebody in the dream comes up to you and tells you that you are dreaming, since they are not "real", why should you believe them?

Malcolm wrote:

Who else would you believe if there are no real persons.

Anyway, this is a boring game of semantics.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 10th, 2012 at 3:03 AM

Title: Re: Misunderstanding emptiness

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

If what you are experiencing is illusion, then how do you know it is illusion?

Malcolm wrote:

The same way you know you are dreaming when you are in a dream.

Not easy, not impossible.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 10th, 2012 at 3:00 AM

Title: Re: Misunderstanding emptiness

Content:

yadave said:

There are other methods to reveal knowledge

Malcolm wrote:

There is all kinds of knowledge and all kinds of methods to reveal it -- Madhyamaka is intent on discovering the knowledge that completely pacifies suffering.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 10th, 2012 at 2:45 AM

Title: Re: How practical is consort practice for the majority?

Content:

Tsering927 said:

My point is that they are not in union in bed

Malcolm wrote:

Of course they are -- this idea is a total fantasy, I am sorry to say.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 9th, 2012 at 11:53 PM

Title: Re: Misunderstanding emptiness

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

really true meaning, "is (the alledged fact of) ignorance being just as illusory as buddhahood merely a subjective projection of the mind, or can we say that objectively ignorance is just as illusory as buddhahood?

Malcolm wrote:

The entire path, from the beginning until final Buddhahood is completely illusory, insubstantial, according to Haribhadra.

For example, afflictions are not substantial entities in the mind that must be removed. They have no more reality than the mind they are felt to afflict. Wisdom is not something substantial which is gained by the mind.

The whole network of dependent origination is insubstantial. There are no substantial members which belong to anything dependently originated. Substantiality is a deluded mental appearance.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 9th, 2012 at 11:45 PM

Title: Re: Yeah, Dzogchen is confusing

Content:

Clarence said:
Namdrol-la,

You are allowed to teach Dzogchen. What if someone like Padma came to you with his story, what would you say? Why would he have to learn Tibetan (colloquial or Tibetan)? How would that get rid of his doubts? I know you don't want to teach but I am genuinely curious as Padma isn't the only one with doubt.

The advice to practice more seems not to work perfectly well either as the problem is doubt. Not just doubt about the whole tradition but also doubt about whether the practice is done right. At the same time we hear stories that if the practice is done wrongly, the results will be disastrous. So, the practice more exhortation does not work in this case. At least, that is what I think.

Just curious about your opinion.

Thanks, C

Malcolm wrote:

If someone comes to me with doubts, I generally send that person back to their teacher. In Padma's case, he should try and get his hands on ChNN's Upadesha on All-Penetrating Wisdom (ye shes zang thal), Longsal Series Volume three. If he attended the recent webcast, ChNN gave the Longsal transmission of Yeshe Zangthel in the last open retreat, not the lung, but the transmission. This book also contains the Longsal Ngondro for which ChNN gave the lung in the last retreat. So he should have no trouble procuring this text. I personally found this one short text to be something like a key that deepened my understanding of Dzogchen beyond tregchö and unlocked the meaning of many tantras.

BTW, in tregchö, that is it. All you are doing just totally relaxing in a state of instant presence. It does not make anything better but if you are relaxed, you don't mind, also if things are better, you don't mind. If you are not being relaxed, then you are not understanding the main point of tregchö. So you must learn and apply the four chozhags. Cog (མོག) is an ancient Tibetan word that means all. It also means to have leisure. Shag (གཤག) means to let go. So this is why ChNN translates this as total relaxation. There are four points of cogzhag which should be applied together at the same time. It is not hard to learn what this means, as I recall ChNN talked about this in the last retreat.

N

Author: Malcolm
Date: Monday, January 9th, 2012 at 11:29 PM
Title: Re: Misunderstanding emptiness
Content:

Namdrol said:

No, ignorance is just as illusory as buddhahood.

N

PadmaVonSamba said:
Is that really true?

Malcolm wrote:
Word games. Not interested.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 9th, 2012 at 11:28 PM

Title: Re: Orthodoxy in Vajrayana

Content:

Astus said:

What constitutes orthodoxy (including orthopraxy) in Vajrayana? What is its definition? Or is it that there are several definitions? What are they?

I find that faith is emphasised as an essential key to Vajrayana practice. However, is it based on pure faith in the tantras, the lineage and the guru, or there are objective criteria for what makes a teaching Vajrayana? What are the requirements of a lineage, transmission, treasure text? Is it possible at all to separate transmission from the teaching, or they implicitly require each other? What is the guarantee for a transmission to be true?

What would be good to have here are actual references in answer for the above questions, and then some extra discussion of them.

Malcolm wrote:

There are ten criteria that define a valid tantra, for example. But the Dzogchen tradition throws them away.

The real difference between sutra and tantra is the following: yoga tantra and highest yoga tantra has a method based on transmission of an example wisdom communicated by a guru, a physiologically based understanding of meditation and the path, a concept of wisdom being physically embodied in the center of the body, the theory of mind and vāyu interactivity; teachings on ṇāḍī, vāyu and bindu which is crucial to tantric praxis, the so called body method. All of these features are almost completely lacking in lower and non-Vajrayāna teachings.

As far as transmission goes, the Nyingmapas argue that all Mahāyāna teachings are treasure texts. The gsar ma schools were predicated on bringing back new Indian texts. So Sakya, Gelug and Jonang tend to emphasize the new tantras as being more authentic since they have a clearer Indian pedigree. Kagyus go both ways, historically -- that is to say. Nyingmapas have developed various polemics to defend continued text production.

Basically, the Nyingma collection of tantras is not closed, the Kengyur and Tengyur are closed. I am a student of three different tertons who have produced "new" tantras.

One cannot separate transmission from the teaching. The transmission is true if a) the teacher teaching it has personal realization of the teaching, or his lineage is unbroken. The first is the best of course, but most people get the latter. Of course there are no guarantees at all.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 9th, 2012 at 11:16 PM

Title: Re: Yeah, Dzogchen is confusing

Content:

padma norbu said:

lol, thanks for point that out, Namdrol.

I think I should change my name to "the grappler"... I wrestle too much. seems to be how my brain is wired.

Malcolm wrote:

What you should do is learn Tibetan.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 9th, 2012 at 11:06 PM

Title: Re: Yeah, Dzogchen is confusing

Content:

padma norbu said:

btw, I was joking about throwing the mala in the toilet. Just venting and grappling with some shi-yot, per usual. I don't know why I bother, though, really. I already know everything, apparently, because I never hear anything new. :: pats self on back :: is know-it-all ::

Malcolm wrote:

There is a bit of a pun on the word māla and mala in this story. In prakrit, Indians tend to not pay attention to long and short vowels -- so māla means a garland of flowers, but mala means excrement. So he threw his māla in the mala.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 9th, 2012 at 11:03 PM

Title: Re: Yeah, Dzogchen is confusing

Content:

padma norbu said:
Well, I'm throwing my mala in the toilet.

Malcolm wrote:
Who needs a mala?

Author: Malcolm
Date: Monday, January 9th, 2012 at 11:00 PM
Title: Re: Misunderstanding emptiness
Content:
Namdrol said:
Those who still cling to existents as real necessarily have shallower understanding of dependent origination than those who understand that the final implication of dependent origination is that existents, though apparent, are not real in any meaningful and ultimate sense.

PadmaVonSamba said:
Are those people really clinging? I mean, Really?
Is the fact of ignorance real?

Malcolm wrote:
No, ignorance is just as illusory as buddhahood.

N

Author: Malcolm
Date: Monday, January 9th, 2012 at 12:57 PM
Title: Re: Misunderstanding emptiness
Content:
Namdrol said:
Those who still cling to existents as real necessarily have shallower understanding of dependent origination than those who understand that the final implication of dependent origination is that existents, though apparent, are not real in any meaningful and ultimate sense.

N

Virgo said:
And thus we have Madhyamaka.

Kevin

Malcolm wrote:
Well, the main point is to help people overcome limitations, not erect a school.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 9th, 2012 at 12:27 PM

Title: Re: Misunderstanding emptiness

Content:

yadave said:

I'm too tired to redesign religions. The feeling of fatigue. Sleep well.

Malcolm wrote:

If you wish to understand Madhyamaka, then I, among others can help you here. Some of us, like myself, have formal training in the field.

But there is nothing in Buddhism to redesign. Buddhism is all about understanding dependent origination. Some people's understanding of dependent origination is deeper than that of others. Those who still cling to existents as real necessarily have shallower understanding of dependent origination than those who understand that the final implication of dependent origination is that existents, though apparent, are not real in any meaningful and ultimate sense.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 9th, 2012 at 12:21 PM

Title: Re: Misunderstanding emptiness

Content:

Unknown said:

If "Buddhism" means many schools of equal status

Malcolm wrote:

It doesn't. Madhyamaka is definitive, the rest are not.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 9th, 2012 at 11:03 AM

Title: Re: Misunderstanding emptiness

Content:

yadave said:

In other words, the Candrikirti interpretation you provide requires Buddhists to be antirealists --

Namdrol said:

Not all Buddhists, just Madhyamakas.

yadave said:

Guess I value a bigger Dharma, larger audience, higher number of liberated beings than you.

Malcolm wrote:

There is a term Madhyamikas, including Gelugpas, use for other Buddhist schools below Madhyamaka "dngos po smra ba" (vastuvadins) which roughly means "those who advocate things as real". This assumes of course that Madhyamaka is the ultimate Buddhist perspective.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 9th, 2012 at 10:50 AM

Title: Re: Misunderstanding emptiness

Content:

catmoon said:

Yup, us nasty, navel-gazing cowherders got better things to do. Fer Instance, I need to take a leak. Please notice how carefully I aim so it does not land on someone else's path.

Malcolm wrote:

My point was that this book is typical of Madhyamaka books these days that cannot escape the event horizon of Gelug -- but there is a whole neglected world of Madhyamaka out there that has nothing to do with Tsongkhapa and his opinions.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 9th, 2012 at 10:24 AM

Title: Re: Misunderstanding emptiness

Content:

yadave said:

Candrikirti would reject his own formulation today. QED.

Malcolm wrote:

You're reaching.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 9th, 2012 at 10:23 AM

Title: Re: Misunderstanding emptiness

Content:

yadave said:

In other words, the Candrikirti interpretation you provide requires Buddhists to be antirealists --

Malcolm wrote:
Not all Buddhists, just Madhyamakas.

N

Author: Malcolm
Date: Monday, January 9th, 2012 at 5:01 AM
Title: Re: Illusory body /rainbow body after death and rebirth
Content:
heart said:
I have no idea. But if you have a rainbow body rebirth just doesn't make any sense.

/magnus

Namdrol said:
Khyentse Wangpo managed it. Guess this begs the question -- when is rebirth not rebirth?

heart said:
Since he was Chetsun Senge Wangchuk in an earlier life?

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:
indeed.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Monday, January 9th, 2012 at 4:59 AM
Title: Re: Misunderstanding emptiness
Content:

yadave said:
So you agree with MS and, for Candrakirti, a truth [satya] means an object, and each "object" is really two objects...

Malcolm wrote:
Not exactly, a truth is "an object of a cognition" -- you cannot leave the cognition part off since it is integral to the definition. A truth is not merely an object, it is an object defined as relative or ultimate depending upon whether the cognition is deceived or undeceived. One object, two natures, hence two cognitions, correct and false.

This is an development over the Abhidharmic concept of a truth, in which a truth [satya] is a cognition, for example, a cognition of water is a relative truth, whereas a cognition of the characteristics of water, limpidity, wetness and coolness, are ultimate truths.

In other words, here, in Abhidharma, an ultimate truth is defined as the irreducible cognition that remains after something (such as a cup or water) has been subjected to complete analysis.

There really isn't that much difference between this and the Madhyamaka definition. The Madhyamaka definition might run something like "...an ultimate truth is defined as the object of an unmistaken cognition that remains after something (such as a cup or water) has been subjected to complete analysis."

The emphasis in both cases, both in Abhidharma and Madhyamaka is on the cognition. So no, I do not agree with the MS discussion in all respects.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 9th, 2012 at 4:41 AM

Title: Re: Illusory body /rainbow body after death and rebirth

Content:

heart said:

I have no idea. But if you have a rainbow body rebirth just doesn't make any sense.

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

Khyentse Wangpo managed it. Guess this begs the question -- when is rebirth not rebirth?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 9th, 2012 at 4:38 AM

Title: Re: Yeah, Dzogchen is confusing

Content:

Clarence said:

It worries me when a relative Dzogchen newbie (who claimed earlier to be a Sotapanna) starts giving Dzogchen advice to other newbies. I don't know whether this should be the place for such things. Especially with the certainty that accompanies said advice.

Virgo said:

People are generally always worried about something. But I am not concerned.

Kevin

heart said:

At your level of realization you should try to do something special to test your realization, here is a good example http://chronicleproject.com/stories_19.html "

onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

Frankly, in this story, Trungpa just comes across as a clueless jerk.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 9th, 2012 at 3:42 AM

Title: Re: Buddhism and Peak Oil

Content:

Huseng said:

How is it that China, let alone the rest of the world, is going to transition from an economy and infrastructure that is based in its majority on fossil fuels to something that isn't?

Malcolm wrote:

Yak shit!

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 9th, 2012 at 3:39 AM

Title: Re: Misunderstanding emptiness

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

the whole point of madhyamaka is to deconstruct the abhidharma phenomenology as anything other than arbitrary and illusory convention. once abhidharma loses its really existent simple dharmas, it collapses as anything other than a language game.

Malcolm wrote:

You've confused Madhyamaka with Wittgenstein.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 9th, 2012 at 3:30 AM

Title: Re: Misunderstanding emptiness

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

the whole point of madhyamaka is to deconstruct the abhidharma phenomenology as anything other than arbitrary and illusory convention. once abhidharma loses its really existent simple dharmas, it collapses as anything other than a language game.

Malcolm wrote:

No, the whole point of Madhyamaka is to bring abhidharma back into line with dependent origination by refuting abhidharma essentialism. Madhyamaka does not reject such things as the 5 skandhas, twelve āyatanas, and eighteen dhātus, the twelve nidanas and so forth.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 9th, 2012 at 3:14 AM

Title: Re: Misunderstanding emptiness

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

where in madhyamaka texts does it talk like that?

Namdrol said:

Gorampa uses this term all the time in his Madhyamaka texts.

gad rgyangs said:

i mean indian madhyamaka texts, not post-dzogchen tibetan ones

Malcolm wrote:

Gorampa was not a Dzogchen practitioner at all. He was a Sakyapa. He rejected the authenticity of kun byed rgyal po, and so on.

But anyway, it does not matter. Pre-Yogacara Madhyamakas [i.e. pre Shantarakṣita] accepted the standard cognitive model of Abhidharma, so for them it was proper to speak of objects, organs and sense consciousnesses. So in fact your whole line of inquiry is in vain. For them, there were, conventionally speaking, given objects in precisely the terms to which you object. For them, from Nagarjuna onwards, without the meeting of a cup, for example, and a healthy eye organ [i.e a functional patch of atoms in the shape of a flax flower in the back of the eye], and an eye consciousness operating through that sense organ, there could be no eye-consciousness of a cup at all. Three things are required for an instance of vision, in the Madhyamaka model.

Face it, my statement was just not a problem from a classical Madhyamaka point of view so I am not going to spend anymore time on this. Why? Because this is non-controversial.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 9th, 2012 at 2:35 AM

Title: Re: Misunderstanding emptiness

Content:

yadave said:

always means something like "object + a cognition". If yours is the latter, I'll have to work on managing unusual expressions like "true relative truth." (Seem simpler to just say "true cognition" is a truth, "false cognition" is a falsehood...)

Malcolm wrote:

For Candrakirti, a truth [satya] is always the object of a cognition (of which there are two kinds).

The reason why we say that there is a true and false relative truth, is as I explained it above. The former is mistaken concerning the nature of an apparent object; the latter is mistaken about the apparent object itself.

An ultimate truth is an object of an wholly unmistaken cognition.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 9th, 2012 at 2:10 AM

Title: Re: Buddhism and Peak Oil

Content:

kirtu said:

I am talking about inherently safe designs that cannot result in another Fukushima or Chernobyl. As for spent nuclear fuel, we can either store it or send it into the Sun. It's a matter of commitment. We can really move to a completely electrical driven economy for this with the vast majority of electricity generated from renewable energy and the rest generated from nuclear sources. Over time electricity costs actually drop to 0.

Kirt

Namdrol said:

Nuclear is one of the least efficient ... energy sources.

N

kirtu said:

Nuclear fission exceeds all other power sources in terms of potential energy by at least 1M times. So how is it the least efficient energy source? Your statement is wholly unsupportable.

Malcolm wrote:

Because of the total amount of energy that goes into mining and refining fissionable material, in addition to the costs of disposing the waste (the sun, really? you have any idea how expensive that would be in terms of energy cost?), constructing the plants, etc.

Nuclear is totally untenable.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 9th, 2012 at 2:03 AM

Title: Re: Misunderstanding emptiness

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

... if it does need the sentient being, then it is really just a mental appearance. if it doesn't need the sentient being, then it's either being reified, or it's some kind of alaya/paratantra.

Malcolm wrote:

According to classical Madhyamaka texts, a perception cannot occur if there is no object and no subject. I.e. the standard abhidharma triad, sense organ, object, sense consciousness. Candrakīrti rejects reflexive cognition, you may recall.

Remind me: with whom did you study madhyamaka?

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 9th, 2012 at 2:01 AM

Title: Re: Misunderstanding emptiness

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

where in madhyamaka texts does it talk like that?

Malcolm wrote:

Gorampa uses this term all the time in his Madhyamaka texts.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 9th, 2012 at 1:42 AM

Title: Re: Misunderstanding emptiness

Content:

Namdrol said:

conceptual construction occurs after perception of an appearance.

gad rgyangs said:
what exactly is it that is "appearing"?

Malcolm wrote:
A clearly apparent non-existent or non-existent clear appearance (med par gsal snang), take your pick.

N

Author: Malcolm
Date: Monday, January 9th, 2012 at 1:14 AM
Title: Re: Misunderstanding emptiness
Content:

gad rgyangs said:
yes but an apparent what? you can't say a table is apparent in any way beyond an arbitrary conceptual construction.

Malcolm wrote:
That is not true -- conceptual construction occurs after perception of an appearance.
Otherwise, we would left with many ensuing faults. Please see Gorampa on this point.

gad rgyangs said:
"the given"

Malcolm wrote:
"Given" means when this specific chair is offered up for examination, this chair is the given chair. This is the kind of petty quibbling that really stalls meaningful conversation.

gad rgyangs said:
the statement about understanding the ultimate through the relative is didactic like saying to understand that mirages are illusions, you first have to be fooled by one.

Malcolm wrote:
No, first you merely have to see one, whether you are fooled by a mirage or not, still one perceives one, no?

Author: Malcolm
Date: Monday, January 9th, 2012 at 12:51 AM
Title: Re: Misunderstanding emptiness
Content:
Namdrol said:
What Candrakirti is saying is that Nagarjuna is saying that any given entity someone perceives can be perceived either correctly or incorrectly.

N

gad rgyangs said:

entities are not "given" and if you are perceiving one, it is an incorrect cognition. this goes back to the prajnaparamita sutras.

Malcolm wrote:

Perhaps we do not mean the same thing by entity. Here I am using "entity" simply to mean an apparent.

If you mean by an "entity" something which possesses being, then we are in agreement — any perception predicated on perceiving an entity as existent is an incorrect cognition.

Apparents are a given, that is what it means when Nagarjuna states that one understands ultimate truth through relative truth. If they are not a given that the classical statement "Matter is empty, emptiness is matter..." etc., is unintelligible.

We have to have "given" objects because we do not reject appearances in classical Madhyamaka. We understand that appearances arise in dependence. What we reject about appearances is not the appearance itself, rather, that it has any underlying reality. For example, a moon in the water.

This is quite different than yogacara where appearances themselves in their totality are rejected.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 9th, 2012 at 12:04 AM

Title: Re: Ganesh in Tibetan Buddhism

Content:

Mandarava said:

Namdrol where do you get the info that Saraswat is Shiva's wife? Can you quote it please as traditionally she is viewed as the wife of Brahma.

http://www.sanatansociety.org/hindu_gods_and_goddesses/saraswati.htm " onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

Malcolm wrote:

From the initiation text of the white Sarsvati cycle. She can also be Brahma's wife, just as she is Manjuśrī's consort. These goddesss have a busy schedule!

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 8th, 2012 at 11:58 PM

Title: Re: Misunderstanding emptiness

Content:

yadave said:

In terms of language or rhetoric, Nagarjuna's method works so well, and frustrates so many, because it is based on two truths, and two truths is effectively two contexts from which to interpret anything, be it the true/false value of truthbearers (like statements, perceptions, cognitions), or the real/unreal value of objects (like whether something exists).

So one cannot say "p is true" because it is not true in all contexts. Similarly, one cannot say "p is false" because Nagarjuna again shifts to the other context. Same method works for statements about existence.

Malcolm wrote:

What Candrakirti is saying is that Nagarjuna is saying that any given entity someone perceives can be perceived either correctly or incorrectly.

Among incorrect perceptions of objects there is a further subdivision; true relative truth and false relative truth. A true relative truth is something that is efficient and producing a result, for example, a wheat seed that produces a wheat sprout. Such observed efficiency provides the basis for consensus reality. False relative truths are conventional delusions, for example, a drunk who has doubled vision or a jaundice patient who perceives everything as yellowed.

Ultimate truths are always true no matter the context. Relative truths are contextual. For example, the relative truth of the speed of light breaks down when gravitational conditions are altered the event horizon of a black hole, for example. However, we can connect these relative truths on a continuum by understanding their context so they remain generally true even when they are not specifically true.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 8th, 2012 at 11:49 PM

Title: Re: Misunderstanding emptiness

Content:

gad rgyang said:

as soon as you posit "something" that is either given an imaginary nature by erroneous cognition, or understood as empty of that imaginary nature by correct cognition, it is trīsvabhava.

you said "the given apparent phenomena being perceived as an object", which is saying "something" ("phenomena") is being perceived as an object, i.e. paratantra is being perceived as parikalpita.

Malcolm wrote:

No, what you said is that the imputed identity was parikalpita. Look back at what you said.

The three own natures have to do with how objects themselves are deluded cognitions (parikalpita) i.e. mental states (caittas) which arise from the activation of seeds (bijas) stored in the ālayavijñāna (paratantra). When those appearances are recognized as being mere mental states, and non-existent in the ālayavijñāna itself, then the ālayavijñāna transforms into wisdom (pariniṣpanna). Paratantra only refers to the ālayavijñāna.

Basically, if you want to talk about Yogacara this is not the thread to do it.

As I said, what I stated it basically pulled directly from MAV -- and as you know, Candra, later in this text, demolishes the three own nature theory altogether.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 8th, 2012 at 11:18 PM

Title: Re: Yeah, Dzogchen is confusing

Content:

padma norbu said:

Imagine being able to subdue monstrously powerful demonic manifestations to the point that you never stray from the realization that they are merely mental phenomena.

Malcolm wrote:

The most powerful demonic manifestation is the misconception of "I" that started the whole process of samsara.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 8th, 2012 at 11:16 PM

Title: Re: Yeah, Dzogchen is confusing

Content:

Mr. G said:

Namdrol who translates for both Chogyal Namkhai Norbu

Malcolm wrote:

I have done translations at the encouragement of ChNN, but I don't translate for the community.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 8th, 2012 at 10:46 PM

Title: Re: Yeah, Dzogchen is confusing

Content:

padma norbu said:

...

Malcolm wrote:

One's rigpa is embodied, it exists in a body. How it exists in a body is the root of understanding all Dzogchen teachings.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 8th, 2012 at 9:32 PM

Title: Re: Misunderstanding emptiness

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

this is yogacara:

Namdrol said:

No, since Yogacara rejects the appearance itself as being a mere cognition.

Here, the appearance is not being rejected, only the correct or false cognition of the object.

gad rgyangs said:

paratantra is not a mere cognition.

Malcolm wrote:

Parikalpita, however, is. That is what appears in the three nature scheme. Madhyamaka on the other hand accepts external phenomena according to common consensus i.e. if it appears for everyone, it is not questioned further until analysis.

Basically, what I stated above is straight out of Madhyamaka-avatara.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 8th, 2012 at 1:37 PM

Title: Re: Misunderstanding emptiness

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

this is yogacara:

Malcolm wrote:

No, since Yogacara rejects the appearance itself as being a mere cognition.

Here, the appearance is not being rejected, only the correct or false cognition of the object.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 8th, 2012 at 1:02 PM

Title: Re: Misunderstanding emptiness

Content:

yadave said:

Anyway, here is a potential problem with Nagarjuna's reliance on Ratnakuta Sutra: If we just blindly "accept what the world accepts" then, on the conventional at least, "a Madhyamika's principal epistemic task [is] just to passively acquiesce and duplicate." (MS152.)

It is a trivialization of the idea of truth. If truth means nothing, then qualifying it with "conventional" or "ultimate" adds little.

Regards,

Dave.

Malcolm wrote:

First things first -- truths (satyas) are objects of cognitions -- which can be either correct (ultimate) or false (relative). Since you are studying Gelug influenced discourse, this may not be immediately evident to you.

This means that if you see something that you identify as salt, and it functions as salt, this cognition is true in so far as it is efficient.

When you analyze that appearance for some fundamental saltiness in that appearance of salt, that cognition of salt fails because no fundamental saltiness will or can be found. In other words, relative truths are true so long as they are not investigated, that is, so long as the appearance which produces the cognition which labels that appearance is not analyzed to discover whether or not there is an essence which produces the identification of the given appearance in question.

A relative truth is the subject of a cognition that is not in possession of the fact that the given apparent phenomena being perceived as an object of said cognition lacks the identity imputed to it. An ultimate truth is an object of a cognition which is in possession of the fact that the given apparent phenomena being perceived as an object of said cognition lacks the identity imputed to it and does not perceive the identity which is non-existent in that object of cognition.

The function of the two truths is to lead to the cessation of proliferation about identity. The lack of identity within phenomena and persons alone is emptiness and nothing else.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 8th, 2012 at 12:00 PM

Title: Re: Misunderstanding emptiness

Content:

yadave said:

I read online that "In the Ratnakuta Sutra, the thought of the Middle Way is developed, which later became the basis for the Madhyamaka teaching of Nagarjuna." So Nagarjuna agreed with the Dalai Lama and we can relax.

Namdrol said:

But [Ratnakuta Sutra] doesn't [undermine Madhyamaka] at all.

yadave said:

I think some scholars disagree. Probably just nasty Gelugpa nonsense but let me look up the problem again.

Malcolm wrote:

Reading Nagarajuna through the lense of 15th century Tibetans is inherently problematical.

The problem is not Tsongkhapa per se, but the extent to which modern Madhyamaka studies centers around Tsongkhapa's interpretation of Madhyamaka.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 8th, 2012 at 11:39 AM

Title: Re: Misunderstanding emptiness

Content:

yadave said:

Page 151 of MoonShadows restates the Ratnakuta passage that Sunshine and I have been playing with here,

Candrakirti said:

The world (loka) argues with me. I don't argue with the world. What is agreed upon (saṃmata) in the world to exist, I too agree that it exists. What is agreed upon in the world to be nonexistent, I too agree that it does not exist.

yadave said:

and explains how this undermines the Madhyamika project.

Regards,

Dave.

Malcolm wrote:

But it doesn't at all.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 8th, 2012 at 11:28 AM

Title: Re: Buddhism and Peak Oil

Content:

kirtu said:

I am talking about inherently safe designs that cannot result in another Fukushima or Chernobyl. As for spent nuclear fuel, we can either store it or send it into the Sun. It's a matter of commitment. We can really move to a completely electrical driven economy for this with the vast majority of electricity generated from renewable energy and the rest generated from nuclear sources. Over time electricity costs actually drop to 0.

Kirt

Malcolm wrote:

Nuclear is one of the least efficient and most polluting energy sources.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 8th, 2012 at 7:25 AM

Title: Re: Misunderstanding emptiness

Content:

yadave said:

Well, after skimming several chapters of MoonShadows,

Malcolm wrote:

Boring, just more warmed over Gelugpa navel gazing.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 8th, 2012 at 6:20 AM

Title: Re: How practical is consort practice for the majority?

Content:

Tsering927 said:

Does the human consort have to be there in physical form?

Malcolm wrote:

If you are practicing karmamudra, yes. If not, then you are practicing jñānamudra with an imaginary consort and your hand. You need to get an erection (or if you are female, aroused) somehow and develop physical pleasure. Otherwise the solo practice does not work and is just intellectual exercise not grounded in the bliss of the body.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 8th, 2012 at 5:16 AM

Title: Re: First cases of totally drug resistant TB in India, one dead

Content:

Huseng said:

I was in a hospital in India a few weeks ago where TB patients are also kept.

The quality of healthcare in India, especially public hospitals, leads to these problems no doubt.

Malcolm wrote:

TB is not easy to get. You have to be malnourished, live in damp, cold conditions, and be continually exposed to it for a very long period of time. It is one of the hardest bacteria to culture.

TB is mostly a public health issue i.e. if people's living conditions are improved, their risk of contracting the disease lessens considerably. This is that reason that in the US most cases of TB are in the homeless population.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 8th, 2012 at 2:14 AM

Title: Visionary Experience in Buddhism

Content:

AdmiraUim said:

So what are Buddhist experiencing when they get visions as a result of particular practices?

Malcolm wrote:

That really depends on how deluded they are.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 7th, 2012 at 11:30 PM

Title: Re: Ganesh in Tibetan Buddhism

Content:

catmoon said:

It's an odd thing but I keep bumping into Ganesh in TB. There must be a reason for that.

kirtu said:

Ganesh seems to get around. There was an article sometime several years ago in Tricycle written by a student of the Khenpo Brothers who kept seeing Ganesh. They also told the author that Ganesh was considered a worldly deity under command of the Buddhas and gave some advice.

Kirt

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, for example, there is a Ganapati sadhana that is part of the thirteen golden dharma. Ganapati is a common worldly dharma protector in Nyingma, as is Shiva.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 7th, 2012 at 11:28 PM

Title: Re: How practical is consort practice for the majority?

Content:

kirtu said:

But that conduct wasn't even real. It was just a vision seen by some people. Others saw other things (lamps, etc.).

Kirt

Malcolm wrote:

You can believe whatever you like, Kirt.

He was also hanging out with prostitutes in bars before he got bounced from the monastery.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 7th, 2012 at 11:07 PM

Title: Re: How practical is consort practice for the majority?

Content:

Lhug-Pa said:

I'm clueless there ^^^. It couldn't be referring to Jnanamudra or Vajroli Mudra, so maybe Namdrol took for a bunch of wankers and was only takin' the mickey.

Namdrol said:

Vajrayāna in India was an urban phenomena.

Lhug-Pa said:

Sure. But in reading Sky Dancer for example, I remember the said 'esoteric conduct' (Karmamudra) having taken place in more rugged settings.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, in Tibet. Tibetans were very prudish about sexuality.

But not in India. For example, when Virupa was practicing conduct, he did so in his room in the monastery. This is why he got kicked out actually.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 7th, 2012 at 10:26 PM

Title: Re: How practical is consort practice for the majority?

Content:

Caz said:

Tantric wanking ?

Isn't this why it's not meant to be discussed openly to prevent fits of giggles ?

Malcolm wrote:

It is a skillful means meant to make Buddhism appealing to teen football hooligans.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 7th, 2012 at 9:26 PM

Title: Re: How practical is consort practice for the majority?

Content:

Namdrol said:

In fact, to do consort practice, you have to inflame you and your partner's desire as much as possible, use very erotic language, candles, nice food, wine, clothes, scents, being as free from physical inhibition as possible, etc., and you have to do so for an extended period of time, weeks and months.

People who claim that it is some dry yogic experience free of desire obviously have never actually received actual detailed instruction on it, or done the practice.

Lhug-Pa said:

Karmamudra practice is at times combined with a Pancatattva-style Ganachakra or Ganapuja. Although didn't many of the Mahasiddhas do consort practice in places like caves and such, and therefore did not always have many of these kinds of ornaments for the practice? Yet considering that they were Siddhas and Mahasiddhas, they probably could have just manifested them out of thin air.

Malcolm wrote:

Vajrayāna in India was an urban phenomena.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 7th, 2012 at 12:57 PM

Title: Re: How practical is consort practice for the majority?

Content:

Astus said:

What do you make of the similar magic techniques described in HYT like the Cakrasamvara Tantra? It becomes symbolic suddenly?

Namdrol said:

Oh, who really knows. The way these tantras are interpreted however is that they are all symbols.

kirtu said:

All symbolic? Methinks this is a bit of an exaggeration.

Kirt

Malcolm wrote:

In the case of Cakrasamvara, Hevajra and so on, not at all.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 7th, 2012 at 11:04 AM

Title: Re: Hell in Tibetan Buddhism

Content:

Jangchup Donden said:

That's interesting. So each hell being's delusional experience is unique to that hell being?

Malcolm wrote:
So it seems.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 7th, 2012 at 9:04 AM

Title: Re: Ganesh in Tibetan Buddhism

Content:

Konchog1 said:

There are prayers to him (as Ganapati) I don't know if he is considered Enlightened or not. Same with Saraswati.

Namdrol said:

The former no, the latter, yes. She is Mañjuśrī's consort as well as Shiva's wife.

Konchog1 said:

She isn't Brahma's wife?

Malcolm wrote:

Nope.

For example, when the premission blessing is given, there is always a tormā given to Parvati, who is Shiva's other wife, who because of her jealousy will otherwise afflict practitioners of White Sarasvati with poverty.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 7th, 2012 at 8:52 AM

Title: Re: Ganesh in Tibetan Buddhism

Content:

Konchog1 said:

There are prayers to him (as Ganapati) I don't know if he is considered Enlightened or not. Same with Saraswati.

Malcolm wrote:

The former no, the latter, yes. She is Mañjuśrī's consort as well as Shiva's wife.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 7th, 2012 at 8:51 AM

Title: Re: Hell in Tibetan Buddhism

Content:

Tenzin1 said:

According to Berzin, Vasubandhu presents the Buddhist Cosmology in the Abhidarmakosha, "Treasure House of Special Topics of Knowledge", and it's intended to be understood to be as real as our current existence.

Namdrol said:

Yes, Berzin is correct, as far as the Kosha goes. However, in Vasubandhu's text, 20 verses as well as its commentary, the realms of ghosts and hell beings do not have the same level of conventional existence as animals on up.

Jangchup Donden said:

How can something be conventionally more or less real than something else? It would seem like something is either conventionally real or not. I find it hard to fathom something being 25% conventionally real.

Malcolm wrote:

It means that while animals, humans, gods, and asuras all share the same conventional universe; hell beings and ghosts do not. It means that experience of hell beings and ghosts is an unshared deluded vision.

Our deluded vision however is shared with animals, gods, and asuras.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 7th, 2012 at 8:48 AM

Title: Re: Ganesh in Tibetan Buddhism

Content:

Jangchup Donden said:

How is Ganesh viewed in Tibetan Buddhism?

I was recently given a (rather nice) jeweled painting of him and was wondering what to do with it.

Malcolm wrote:

Put it on your shrine. Ganesh is a worldly deity, under the command of Vajrapani.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 7th, 2012 at 8:12 AM

Title: Re: Is it possible to be a Buddhist and believe in God?

Content:

Nemo said:

How would you explain the Primordial Buddha Samantabhadra to a person lacking a strong background in philosophy?

Namdrol said:

The same way I would explain it to you -- Samantabhadra was the first person in this eon to wake up, did so without ever falling into samsara, hence he is the first (adi) buddha.

N

Caz said:

How can you wake up if your not asleep ? Like a Day dream ?

Malcolm wrote:

Samatabhadra possessed a non-afflictive ignorance. Simply put, he, like all of us, was in a state where he was not aware at the time of the basis.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 7th, 2012 at 8:03 AM

Title: Re: How practical is consort practice for the majority?

Content:

wayland said:

Is it merely a case of imagination and visualization?

Malcolm wrote:

Jñānamudra is a visualized consort.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 7th, 2012 at 5:31 AM

Title: Re: Hell in Tibetan Buddhism

Content:

Tenzin1 said:

According to Berzin, Vasubandhu presents the Buddhist Cosmology in the Abhidarmakosha, "Treasure House of Special Topics of Knowledge", and it's intended to be understood to be as real as our current existence.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, Berzin is correct, as far as the Kosha goes. However, in Vasubandhu's text, 20 verses as well as its commentary, the realms of ghosts and hell beings do not have the same level of conventional existence as animals on up.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 7th, 2012 at 4:53 AM

Title: Re: Hell in Tibetan Buddhism

Content:

Namdrol said:

Anyway, it is a Yogacara idea.

Mr. G said:

Is there higher view which you prefer?

Malcolm wrote:

No, i think the yogcara idea is a good one.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 7th, 2012 at 4:49 AM

Title: Re: How practical is consort practice for the majority?

Content:

Mr. G said:

I don't think it is practical for the majority. There's probably a handful of people who know how to properly practice karmamudra. It can easily turn into some ego-trip where people think they are progressing on the path when in fact they are increasing afflictions.

Tilopa said:

Correct. Unless you can cause the winds to flow in the central channel consort practice will only increase bondage to samsara. It's a practice for yogis with a considerable degree of accomplishment.

Malcolm wrote:

Certainly that is how it is explained but certain people in Tibetan Buddhism.

Others explain it differntly i.e. it is method for inducing rapid accomplishment. For example, in Lamdre, there is union yoga both below and above the path of seeing.

This relates somewhat to what David Chapman was talking about in the Aro thread i.e. that "tantra" or the erotic elements in Vajrayāna have been somewhat suppressed. Probably a necessary consequence of Vajrayāna in monasteries. But in reality, tantric practice in India was more liberal. There is also cultural issues -- Indians have a more eroticized culture than Tibet.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 7th, 2012 at 4:40 AM

Title: Re: Hell in Tibetan Buddhism

Content:

thetrouserman said:

"Basically,Vasubandhu, in the Vimasatika, refutes the idea that Hells are real places because the hell beings (karma yamas) that one is tortured by would be gathering karma, but in fact they are not. They are just projections of the mind." --Namdrol

My own Buddhist teacher said that even this world is a projection of the mind, and yet it feels very real, and pain in it feels very real, so how is it not real in Tibetan Buddhism? Even here we have torturers who are collecting up bad karma.

Also could you tell me where I can find this information that you have given?

Malcolm wrote:

The difference is that hells do not have a conventional or externally perceivable location, unlike ghosts, animal realm, human realm, god realm, and so on.

Anyway, it is a Yogacara idea.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 7th, 2012 at 4:37 AM

Title: Re: How practical is consort practice for the majority?

Content:

Namdrol said:

One of the funny things that people say is that lower tantra is more suitable for general public. Nothing could be further from the truth.

Actually, in lower tantra there are many rites for attracting and seducing human and non-human woman, killing enemies, and so on.

The model for the four activities, pacifying, enrichment, power, and destructive rites, etc., come directly from kriya tantra. Kriya tantra is practiced for these siddhis specifically.

Astus said:

What do you make of the similar magic techniques described in HYT like the Cakrasamvara Tantra? It becomes symbolic suddenly?

Malcolm wrote:

Oh, who really knows. The way these tantras are interpreted however is that they are all symbols.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 7th, 2012 at 4:36 AM

Title: Re: How practical is consort practice for the majority?

Content:

Namdrol said:

in lower tantra there are many rites for attracting and seducing human and non-human woman,

wayland said:

Hi Namdrol,

In the absence of a flesh & blood consort, is a Jñāna Mudrā - a maiden created through the power of one's visualization - a viable alternative? I wondered if the non-human woman you mention above is similar?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, viable.

No, in kriya tantra such rites are just for having control over woman. Non-human in this case means yakshinis and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 7th, 2012 at 4:33 AM

Title: Re: How practical is consort practice for the majority?

Content:

Lhug-Pa said:

'Tantric wanking' ?

Are you referring to Vajroli Mudra?

Vajroli Mudra, though it might appear to be like "wanking", is actually quite the opposite of wanking.

Edit: Of course there is also Jnanamudra; and there are also many variations of Vajrolimudra out there.

Malcolm wrote:

Nope. That is different. Vajroli is training in drawing fluids into the urethra.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 7th, 2012 at 4:18 AM

Title: Re: How practical is consort practice for the majority?

Content:

justsit said:

I was referring to wanking.

Malcolm wrote:

Unless of course it is tantric wanking since you lack a real consort, for example, monks. You still have to inflame your passion and so on. It is not just simple visualization.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 7th, 2012 at 4:05 AM

Title: Re: How practical is consort practice for the majority?

Content:

Lhug-Pa said:
Sexual-misconduct like masturbation

Namdrol said:
Wanking is only sexual misconduct for monks.

justsit said:
It's still craving and attachment for everyone, yes?

Malcolm wrote:
In fact, to do consort practice, you have to inflame you and your partner's desire as much as possible, use very erotic language, candles, nice food, wine, clothes, scents, being as free from physical inhibition as possible, etc., and you have to do so for an extended period of time, weeks and months.

People who claim that it is some dry yogic experience free of desire obviously have never actually received actual detailed instruction on it, or done the practice.

N

Author: Malcolm
Date: Saturday, January 7th, 2012 at 2:57 AM
Title: Re: How practical is consort practice for the majority?
Content:
Lhug-Pa said:
If people want to waste their energy through masturbation, that's their choice then. But I do not recommend it at all.

Anyway, in The Crystal and the Way of Light, Chögyal Namkhai Norbu Rinpoche implied that Karmamudra is not necessary for Dzogchen, but that it can be a great Semdzin practice.

Malcolm wrote:
Karmamudra practice is completely unnecessary in Dzogchen.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Saturday, January 7th, 2012 at 2:34 AM
Title: Re: The Aro gTér: some answers and questions
Content:
cloudburst said:
But we are having fun.

Malcolm wrote:

Strange idea of fun -- recycling endless boring conversations on the internet.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 7th, 2012 at 2:32 AM

Title: Re: How practical is consort practice for the majority?

Content:

Lhug-Pa said:

No, because it causes damage to the nervous system whether we are a monk or not.

Malcolm wrote:

Bollocks.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 7th, 2012 at 2:27 AM

Title: Re: How practical is consort practice for the majority?

Content:

Lhug-Pa said:

Sexual-misconduct like masturbation

Malcolm wrote:

Wanking is only sexual misconduct for monks.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 7th, 2012 at 2:25 AM

Title: Re: How practical is consort practice for the majority?

Content:

Lhug-Pa said:

Also, if you have received the Direct Introduction of Dzogchen, you can perform Karmamudra as a Semdzin, without having to do any complicated visualizations.

Malcolm wrote:

That is not karmamudra.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 7th, 2012 at 2:24 AM

Title: Re: The Aro gTér: some answers and questions

Content:

Jikan said:

Apropos of whether an invented history & lineage are problematic for Dzogchenpas: I also saw lay tantrikas who had acted irresponsibly, old sorcerers, and ordinary people who had pretended to be lamas, inconceivable numbers of them vomiting blood and experiencing unbearable bodily pain. I saw many carnivorous creatures devouring them and many denizens of hell hurling accusations of misdeeds at them.

This is from Delog Dawa Drolma's account of her experiences in the various realms, recorded in English in Delog (p. 82). I assume this text has some authority in this forum and in this thread.

I would like to know if there is any plausible rebuttal to the position that our friends involved in a "vajra romance" with the Aro scene are, in fact, students of ordinary people who are pretending to be lamas, as Dawa Drolma puts it. This is the primary critique against Aro, that it's phony. It's clear to me from this and other sources that if it's phony, then it's a problem. But the problem goes away if David or anyone else can show it's not phony. Well?

Malcolm wrote:

This whole thread is ridiculous-- why? Because this was first discussed on the Trike boards. Then E-sangha. Now here. And it is largely the same people, and the same words.

It is very clear -- some people like Chogyam and his trip; other people think it is bullshit. So, nothing has changed. Some people like Dzogchen, other people think it is bullshit. Some people like Mahamudra, other people think it is bullshit. Some people like Gelug, other people think it is bullshit. Some people like Lamdre, other people think it is bullshit. Some people like gzhan stong, other people think it is bullshit. Some people like Tibetan Buddhism, other people think it is bullshit. Some people like Zen, other people think it is bullshit. Some people like Buddhism, other people think it is bullshit.

So, we have gone nowhere further than discovering some people like Chogyam and his trip, and other people think it is bullshit.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 7th, 2012 at 2:07 AM

Title: Re: How practical is consort practice for the majority?

Content:

DarwidHalim said:

Kriya tantra, such as avalokiteshvara tantra is more suitable for general public. This tantra is without consort and te conduct has to be extremely pure. No garlic and vegetarian.

Malcolm wrote:

One of the funny things that people say is that lower tantra is more suitable for general public. Nothing could be further from the truth.

Actually, in lower tantra there are many rites for attracting and seducing human and non-human woman, killing enemies, and so on.

The model for the four activities, pacifying, enrichment, power, and destructive rites, etc., come directly from kriya tantra. Kriya tantra is practiced for these siddhis specifically.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 7th, 2012 at 1:25 AM

Title: Re: How is Dzogchen/Mahamudra different from Zazen Samadhi

Content:

conebeckham said:

Mahamudra is at all times inseperable from the path of Tantra, in fact. It's inseperable from all experience.

Malcolm wrote:

All sentient beings are emanations of mahāmudrā, the essence of those emanations is the forever non-arising dharmadhātu, also all characteristics of dualistic appearances, happiness, suffering and so on, are the play of mahāmudrā, the original dharmatā.

-- Virupa

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 6th, 2012 at 11:00 PM

Title: Re: devotion in refuge practice

Content:

tomamundsen said:

That leads to the immediate follow-up question: should I even be doing the inner preliminaries if I don't have tremendous devotion for him yet? I mean, yea he has been guiding through the visualization and mechanics of the practice, but is there some sort of implicit agreement in Tibetan sanghas that you shouldn't actually begin ngondro until you can see him as a buddha?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes.

No.

While you are to understand the object being visualized as inseperable with your root guru, if you don't have a root guru, just focus on the object of refuge.

Do not contrive devotion you do not have. But by practicing you will develop devotion.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 6th, 2012 at 10:57 PM

Title: Re: devotion in refuge practice

Content:

tomamundsen said:

there actually a difference between the two? Even if there is no difference, I still feel like it will be two separate processes.

Malcolm wrote:

You always, no matter what, take refuge in your root Guru inseperable with the object of refuge you are visualizing, for instance, Guru Rinpoche or Vajradhara.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 6th, 2012 at 5:59 AM

Title: Re: The Aro gTér: some answers and questions

Content:

David Chapman said:

Uh, no. Are you referring to "No cosmic justice"? That doesn't reject rebirth or karma at all. (I understand that it could easily be misread that way if you start from the assumption that anyone who isn't altogether traditional will hold all modernist prejudices. Maybe it needs some clarification and expansion.)

The page explicitly endorses a particular notion of karma, and says nothing about rebirth one way or the other. The point is that there isn't an external, eternal mechanism of reward and punishment.

Malcolm wrote:

I think you might one to rework that one, than -- because there is nothing partiucclarly novel about the Dzogchen presentation of karma. There are novelties in Dzogchen, but that is not one of them.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 6th, 2012 at 5:58 AM

Title: Re: The Aro gTér: some answers and questions

Content:

David Chapman said:

Adamantine, yes, the distinction between terma and other re-presentation is worth being clear about. (Although, according to Guru Chöwang, ultimately, all Dharma is terma.)

Malcolm wrote:

No, Guru Chowang's point is that the whole universe is a treasure.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 6th, 2012 at 3:46 AM

Title: Re: Vimala or Agar

Content:

MalaBeads said:

What is the best way of obtaining some vimala or agar? There are no Tibetan doctors in my area.

Being conditioned by the western medical system, I have an assumption that a doctor would want to see me before prescribing but that may not be the case. I know some Tibetan herbs may be obtained via mail. If so, how and where would I send for them? What's the best way of going about this?

Malcolm wrote:

Vimala can be used by more or less anyone.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 6th, 2012 at 3:37 AM

Title: Re: How is Dzogchen/Mahamudra different from Zazen Samadhi

Content:

Namdrol said:

Mahāmudra is a result by whatever path you practice to get there. Sure, you can say "This is the road to New York". But being on the road to New York is not being in New York. Likewise, you can say "this is the path of Mahāmudra", meaning that if you practice this path, you will realize the result, mahāmudra.

Jinzang said:

Mahamudra is taught as ground, path, and fruition. This sort of logic chopping is not helpful to the practitioner.

Malcolm wrote:

Sure: Tilopa describes the ground, path and result mahāmudra quite concisely in this passage:

Beyond all objects of perception, the nature of the mind is luminous, [basis] without a path to traverse, the path of Buddhahood is entered, [path] if one cultivates without an object of meditation, one will attain unsurpassed awakening.
[result]

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 6th, 2012 at 1:51 AM

Title: Re: Mahāmudrā & Dzogchen

Content:

conebeckham said:

I understand this position, Namdrol, and I have had almost exactly the same conversation with Khenpo Tsultrim Gyamtso myself, and have also heard him comment on it publically in a larger group, as well. Nevertheless, if one takes the position, as you have in another thread, that Mahamudra REALLY means the "result," then can it not be said that all practices and techniques are really Mahamudra teachings, in a sense? Granted, the contents of the teachings contained in the Sutra presentation focus on Mind's Emptiness and Nature, Qualities, Awareness, etc. But even Serlingpa's Lojong tradition, which is surely a Sutra-based tradition with no Tantric content can be said to be part of the presentation.....

Malcolm wrote:

No, not really, because sutrayāna practice will not result in the realization of the 13th bhumi. The state of mahāmudra and the thirteenth bhumi are synonymous. The name of thirteenth bhumi, much less, mahāmudra, does not exist in sutra and is not really even hinted at.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 6th, 2012 at 12:40 AM

Title: Re: How is Dzogchen/Mahamudra different from Zazen Samadhi

Content:

tomamundsen said:

The truth is that if you just dig a little deeper and read some of the less popular fascicles in Shobogenzo, you'll see he talks about literal reincarnation, accumulation of merit, etc.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes I know that. I have.

But in fact I disagree with you about the first point. I do not agree that Dogen is a gradual school adherent.

That is why I use the term "non-gradual" rather than sudden.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 5th, 2012 at 11:23 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist Universities/Buddhist Studies

Content:

lotwell said:

My fantasy is unearthing ancient texts in remote monasteries and translating them. In reality I would more likely be looking at sitting in front of a computer all day translating works no one will ever read.

Malcolm wrote:

The reality, if you can actually get a teaching position, is that you will spend your days teaching world religion classes to freshman who don't care and survey courses on Buddhism, and in the evening writing papers because of the publish or die phenomena that is pervasive in academia. You will get little translation done.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 5th, 2012 at 10:04 PM

Title: Re: The Aro gTér: some answers and questions

Content:

heart said:

Protestant Buddhism expressing its true face as the degeneration of Dharma in our times. There can't be much of Dudjom Rinpoche left in Ngakpa Chögyam teachings if his students say this.

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

In David's case, he explicitly rejects karma and rebirth and claims that the rejection of karma and rebirth is intention of Dzogchen, its "little secret".

Of course this is completely false since the concept of multiple bardos and so on come directly from the Dzogchen tantras.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 5th, 2012 at 9:59 PM

Title: Re: How is Dzogchen/Mahamudra different from Zazen Samadhi

Content:

Astus said:

Dogen... taught no enlightenment to be achieved but zazen itself became buddhahood for him.

tomamundsen said:

A common misunderstanding of Dogen.

Malcolm wrote:

Well then, there are tons of Soto Zen practitioners out there who misunderstand Dogen and there own tradition.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 5th, 2012 at 2:25 PM

Title: Re: How is Dzogchen/Mahamudra different from Zazen Samadhi

Content:

DarwidHalim said:

Soto is a gradual enlightenment school of zen

Namdrol said:

No, this is not so.

tomamundsen said:

Right, but it's not sudden either.

Malcolm wrote:

The best term is non-gradual.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 5th, 2012 at 1:00 PM

Title: Re: Are Karma and Rebirth Real?

Content:

Beatzen said:

I don't believe that we are the same "person" who is reborn. The mind is the same, but the contents are more or less [dis]similar, though influenced by past karma.

Malcolm wrote:

Causes and effects are not the same, nor are they different.

The mind that takes rebirth is not as same as the previous mind nor is it different.

This is the reason why it is possible for sentient beings to experience serial rebirth through the appropriation of an infinite series of new physical bodies over time, relatively speaking.

By saying that there is no actual rebirth, one is committing oneself to a metaphysical position called ucchedavada i.e. annihilationism. Committing oneself to the position that there is an actual self, person, or entity that is reborn is called śāśvatavāda, eternalism.

But when one understands that one instant of mind is neither the same nor different than the next instant of mind; since they are not the same, one avoids śāśvatavāda; and since they are not different, one avoids ucchedavada — thus one can understand the truth of rebirth, karma and its result, and dependent origination in the manner in which the Buddha intended and leave off the metaphysical speculations that plague non-Buddhists about such issues. One can then also understand that since the mind has no beginning, it never arose; and since it never arose, it never ceases.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 5th, 2012 at 12:07 PM

Title: Re: Mahāmudrā & Dzogchen

Content:

Jnana said:

All of the sectarian criticisms from all quarters have already been voiced and addressed centuries ago.

Malcolm wrote:

You seem to have mistaken me for someone who is sectarian.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 5th, 2012 at 11:51 AM

Title: Re: How is Dzogchen/Mahamudra different from Zazen Samadhi

Content:

DarwidHalim said:

Find for yourself whether it is true or not.

.

Malcolm wrote:
I already have.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Thursday, January 5th, 2012 at 11:40 AM
Title: How is Dzogchen/Mahamudra different from Zazen Samadhi
Content:

DarwidHalim said:
Soto is a gradual enlightenment school of zen

Malcolm wrote:
No, this is not so.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Thursday, January 5th, 2012 at 11:28 AM
Title: Re: How is Dzogchen/Mahamudra different from Zazen Samadhi
Content:
DarwidHalim said:
You are mixing up with what is called Pure Mahamudra, and Tantric Mahamudra.

There is no such thing called consort practice or deity yoga in Mahamudra, like what had been said by Virupa and Saraha.

Pure Mahamudra is free from all these tantric stuff, energy stuff, and free from ceremony etc. In this way, Shikantaza fits properly with pure Mahamudra practice.

Malcolm wrote:
What you are referring to as "pure" mahāmudra is based on a direct introduction as the Dohakosha of Saraha clearly states "The non-dual is demonstrated by the venerable supreme Guru".

In this respect it is nothing like Shikantaza in Soto Zen, since in Soto Zen there is no direct introduction.

The practice of Shikantaza is non-gradual. Sutra mahāmudra is gradual. So they are different in this respect as well.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 5th, 2012 at 10:49 AM

Title: Re: How is Dzogchen/Mahamudra different from Zazen Samadhi

Content:

Namdrol said:

There is no path of mahāmudra. Mahāmudra is not a path and not meditation. For example, the mahāsiddha Kotalipa states:

Do not cultivate a mental meditation,
also non-meditation is not a meditation.
Beyond meditation and non-meditation,
not existing in the mind, is mahāmudrā.

tomamundsen said:

This sounds a lot like shikantaza.

Malcolm wrote:

The difference is that this is based on direct introduction and consort practice. Kotalipa also said:

Bhadrapa said excellently:

“There is no instruction, meditation, or contemplation;
Buddhahood itself is attained because of the beautiful consort possessing supreme joy.”

And:

When the sun and moon are seized by the eclipse Buddhahood itself arises here through the non-dual wisdom which melts from the union of the prajñā and the vajra.

And:

Possessing the power of the ten wisdoms.
The space of the sublime Prajñā Queen’s lotus is the path upon which to travel, to return to Bhadra’s stage.

But then of course we have Dombhi Heruka's Four Syllables:

The Upadeśa of the Great Bliss of Dharma

There are three essences, four commitments, three deviations and four methods of equipoise.

The three essences:

Effortlessness;

Without contrivance;

Everything that occurs is understood as one's own mind.

The four commitments:

Afflictions are not abandoned because they are one's mind.

Antidotes are not relied upon because the mind is non-dual.

The true nature is not meditated upon because mind is without grasping.

A result is not hoped for, realizing the mind itself is Buddhahood.

The three deviations:

If there is hope for Buddhahood, it is a deviation.

If there is fear towards Samsara, it is a deviation.

If there is attachment to appearances, it is a deviation.

The four methods of equipoise:

Just like the limpid quality of water when it is undisturbed, remain relaxed in uncontrived mind.

Just as a bird in the sky leaves no tracks, consciousness remains without support.

Just like the sun not concealed by clouds, remain in one's own unobstructed state relaxing into the objects of the six sense organs.

Just like water always falling, remain undistracted at all times and in all activities.

The heart upadesha of the great master Dombhi Heruka called 'Four Syllables' is complete.

Translated by Lama Migmar Tseten and Loppon Kunga Namdrol.

© Drogmi translation Project 2006

Dobhi Heruka himself, however, achieved complete awakening through the empowerment.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 5th, 2012 at 10:33 AM

Title: Re: The Neurotic Zen of Mint

Content:

mint said:

I just wish I had some sort of plan laid out for me like a syllabus explaining what I can and can't, should and shouldn't do.

Malcolm wrote:

There are no limitations.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 5th, 2012 at 10:25 AM

Title: Re: Mahāmudrā & Dzogchen

Content:

Namdrol said:

Sahaja Mahāmudra, according to the great Drugpa Kagyu master Gyalba Yanggonpa, is Gampopa's own system. So you really cannot claim that Kagyu Mahāmudra is any more Indian than the Dzogchen you are criticizing.

conebeckham said:

Well...although Saraha certainly practiced the Two Stages, he is often credited as the primary Mahasiddha source of Sahaja Mahamudra.....which is presented as separate from the two stages.

Or so I've been taught.

Malcolm wrote:

There are two systems of realizing mahāmudra: the two stages or guru yoga.

Mahāmudra is based on direct introduction in both cases. Apart from that, there is no other Mahāmudra.

Some people like to talk about a sutra mahāmudra, but it is very clear that was elaborated by Gampopa for people he felt were not ready for real Mahāmudra teachings. Not only have I read this, but this was also kindly explained to me by Khenpo Tsultrim Gyatso personally.

BTW, since this is just the "Mahāmudra" forum -- it is not the sole province of Kagyupas. Sakyas, Gelugs, Nyingmapas also have teachings on Mahāmudra. So in no way can the Kagyu perspective on Mahāmudra be considered definitive or all-embracing -- all schools of Tibetan Buddhism have lineages and teachings on Saraha's original Sahaja Mahāmudra. But only Kagyu and later, Gelug, have teachings on a system termed sutra mahāmudra. Sutra mahāmudra is not bad -- in fact, it is quite a good system -- but in reality it is just a name for perfection of wisdom teachings with some effort made to correlate the view of the tantras and the dohas with the view of sutra.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 5th, 2012 at 10:19 AM

Title: Re: How is Dzogchen/Mahamudra different from Zazen Samadhi

Content:

DarwidHalim said:

Z

Mahāmudra is not combined with tantric practice, it is the result of tantric practice of the two stages.

Jinzang said:

Mahamudra is the result, but also a set of practices that lead to the result, and not just the development and completion stage practices. So says every Kagyu lama I have ever met, and their view ought to be definitive, and not the view of some critics of mahamudra.

Malcolm wrote:

Mahāmudra is a result by whatever path you practice to get there. Sure, you can say "This is the road to New York". But being on the road to New York is not being in New York. Likewise, you can say "this is the path of Mahāmudra", meaning that if you practice this path, you will realize the result, mahāmudra.

The two stages are not the only way to realize mahāmudra. There is also Guru Yoga.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 5th, 2012 at 8:59 AM

Title: Re: How is Dzogchen/Mahamudra different from Zazen Samadhi

Content:

DarwidHalim said:

Z

Tantric yoga is combined between Mahamudra practice + deity yoga + guru yoga , and so on.

That is the point I want to make it clear by putting all this Saraha, Virupa song.

Malcolm wrote:

Mahāmudra is not combined with tantric practice, it is the result of tantric practice of the two stages.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 5th, 2012 at 8:25 AM

Title: Re: How is Dzogchen/Mahamudra different from Zazen Samadhi

Content:

DarwidHalim said:

This is even scarier.

What is the use all master explaining the PATH of mahamudra?

Again, we need to know the place when we are talking realization and when we are talking the practice part to realize that.

Please don't mix them.

Malcolm wrote:

There is no path of mahāmudra. Mahāmudra is not a path and not meditation. For example, the mahāsiddha Kotalipa states:

Do not cultivate a mental meditation,
also non-meditation is not a meditation.
Beyond meditation and non-meditation,
not existing in the mind, is mahāmudrā.

And Virupa states:

That great profound term “mahāmudrā”, whatever it's basis of designation is, also has the label “empty”;
as moments are empty by nature who realizes selflessness?
There is no realizer, just a name, a term, a label,
Also that is not perfect, a projection of disciples, also in disciples there is no self, similar with illusions and emanations, “Mahāmudrā” is a mental imputation of the childish.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 5th, 2012 at 7:53 AM

Title: Re: The Neurotic Zen of Mint

Content:

wisdom said:

My financial situation sucks too. I make 10$ an hour, live with a room mate who has pretty heavy delusions, I take public transit to work. I haven't even been able to afford to join the DC yet, let alone buy a pile of books and DVDs. My family is poor, my father is basically homeless. On top of this I have about 10 grand in debt from various stupid things. Most of that is from a single electric bill and the IRS, despite being minimum wage they think I owe them thousands of dollars and I can't afford to fight it. I have no schooling to show for it, and can't afford to attend the Buddhist college I want to go to because they don't accept FAFSA. I can't ordain to become a monk because you have to be debt free, and I would actually do that for a few years if I could and learn Tibetan, then go off to a 9 year college in Tibet. If I had only 20k, I could begin to make all my dreams a reality. As it stands most likely none of them will ever happen, and such a small barrier in reality exists between them being a fantasy and reality. Such is life.

Malcolm wrote:

Acually, what you have to do is file for bankruptcy. Chapter 7. Really. They will just clear your debts. Including your tax debt, as long as you filed.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 5th, 2012 at 7:47 AM

Title: Re: How is Dzogchen/Mahamudra different from Zazen Samadhi

Content:

DarwidHalim said:

In this case you are saying there is no meditation in Kagyu lineage.

Please note we are now talking not in the ultimate sense, but in relative sense. If we just mix them without knowing the place, it simply brings confusion.

Malcolm wrote:

You cannot meditate on mahāmudra.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 5th, 2012 at 6:41 AM

Title: Re: Is Zen Buddhism...

Content:

Beatzen said:

that's what makes it fun. And also fun is playing ball with the teacher where teacher constantly knocks down all your bullshit opinions about the meaning.

Malcolm wrote:

The meaning of the heart sutra is very simple -- it is about the inseparability of samsara and nirvana. That is simple, but it is also profound.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 5th, 2012 at 6:23 AM

Title: Re: Hell in Tibetan Buddhism

Content:

tomamundsen said:

I thought all beings in Kamadhatu had form bodies?

Namdrol said:

Basically,Vasubandhu, in the Vimasatika, refutes the idea that Hells are real places because the hell beings (karma yamas) that one is tortured by would be gathering karma, but in fact they are not. They are just projections of the mind.

tomamundsen said:

Ah, thank you for the clarification Loppon-la. But in the Kosa, he presents it as a physical place, right?

Malcolm wrote:

Correct.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 5th, 2012 at 6:02 AM

Title: Re: Hell in Tibetan Buddhism

Content:

Caz said:

Basically,Vasubandhu, in the Vimasatika, refutes the idea that Hells are real places because the hell beings (karma yamas) that one is tortured by would be gathering karma, but in fact they are not. They are just projections of the mind.

This wouldnt not make it any less real would it ? Just like the dream that you never awake from. I wouldnt assume that hells where physically existing places but rather like the bardos no ?

Malcolm wrote:

In other words, they have no physical location, they are not x number of yojanas below the ground.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 5th, 2012 at 5:51 AM

Title: Re: Hell in Tibetan Buddhism

Content:

thetrouserman said:

I learned from two of my Theravada teachers that hell is a real place of torture that you go to when you die if your karma is bad enough to merit going there. What is the Tibetan Buddhist view of hell? Is it the same?

Namdrol said:

In Tibetan Buddhism, in Mahāyāna in general, it is considered a mental state, but not a real external place.

tomamundsen said:
I thought all beings in Kamadhatu had form bodies?

Malcolm wrote:
Basically,Vasubandhu, in the Vimasatika, refutes the idea that Hells are real places because the hell beings (karma yamas) that one is tortured by would be gathering karma, but in fact they are not. They are just projections of the mind.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Thursday, January 5th, 2012 at 5:43 AM
Title: Re: The Neurotic Zen of Mint
Content:
Pero said:
Otherwise most of us here could go ballistic half the time Namdrol posts something.

Malcolm wrote:
....

Half the time people do...

Author: Malcolm
Date: Thursday, January 5th, 2012 at 3:21 AM
Title: Re: The Neurotic Zen of Mint
Content:

mint said:
I'm scared to practice Dzogchen...

Malcolm wrote:
This is like being scared of recognizing your own face in a mirror.

N

Author: Malcolm
Date: Thursday, January 5th, 2012 at 2:58 AM
Title: Re: Hell in Tibetan Buddhism
Content:
thetrouserman said:
I learned from two of my Theravada teachers that hell is a real place of torture that you go to when you die if your karma is bad enough to merit going there. What is the Tibetan Buddhist view of hell? Is it the same?

Malcolm wrote:

In Tibetan Buddhism, in Mahāyāna in general, it is considered a mental state, but not a real external place.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 5th, 2012 at 2:56 AM

Title: Re: The Aro gTér: some answers and questions

Content:

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 5th, 2012 at 2:53 AM

Title: Re: The Neurotic Zen of Mint

Content:

mint said:

I hope, after reading this thread, people will exercise more discretion when pushing people into things which they themselves acknowledge that they're not ready for!

Malcolm wrote:

No one pushed you to do anything.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 5th, 2012 at 1:51 AM

Title: Re: Expanding Samadhi

Content:

Beatzen said:

Can you also give me a rundown of the other mental factors, for my learning?

Malcolm wrote:

Here is a good list.

http://www.rigpawiki.org/index.php?title=Fifty-one_mental_states "

onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

As for discovering mind's root, that doesn't sound like Zazen, and I'd like not to be tempted to shop around after these couple years of study with the Zen people. I have a hard time with a meditation where you "look" for things. Not my personal style.

Discovering the root of the mind eliminates the need for Zazen or any other form of contrived meditation.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 5th, 2012 at 1:21 AM

Title: Re: How is Dzogchen/Mahamudra different from Zazen Samadhi

Content:

DarwidHalim said:

All are complete path. If not complete, Saraha and Virupa will not criticize these practices in this Mahamudra.

Malcolm wrote:

What you seem to fail to understand is that for Saraha and Virupa, there is no meditation of Mahāmudra at all. Mahāmudra is a name for the result, buddhahood.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 4th, 2012 at 11:14 PM

Title: Re: I Believe in Literal Rebirth - Poll

Content:

Beatzen said:

Well I'm certainly not going to apologize for that, Ad. I've always regarded pali sources as more authentic when it comes to the words of the buddha. I value the prajnaparamita sutras, but when it comes to teachings on dependant origination, and other technical concepts - I usually look for the pali reference. Just an ideosyncrasy I have.

Malcolm wrote:

The Pali Canon (as well the Agamas) does not tease out the nuances of dependent origination and emptiness

That is where Mahāyāna sutras and tantras are important.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 4th, 2012 at 11:08 PM

Title: Re: Mahāmudrā & Dzogchen

Content:

Namdrol said:

I see, so for you, the most profound practice and the high point of India Mahāyāna is the two stages with their result, Mahāmudra as taught by Virupa, Tilopa, Naropa, etc. from the Hevajra, Cakrasamvara, Kalacakra and other annutarayoga tantras.

Jnana said:

Yes, of course. And also the teachings of Maitrīpa and Atiśa, and so on.

Malcolm wrote:

Ok -- well, I find the 17 tantras and Nyinthig more interesting.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 4th, 2012 at 10:51 PM

Title: Re: How is Dzogchen/Mahamudra different from Zazen Samadhi

Content:

DarwidHalim said:

Why I said Shikantaza and Mahamudra is similar is because of the direct path meditation.

Not all Mahamudra needs ceremony. They can be as plain and as simple as Shikantaza.

Malcolm wrote:

Sutra Mahāmudra also has rather elaborate system of introduction.

All Mahāmudra is based on introduction, because ultimately Mahāmudra is a Vajrayāna system.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 4th, 2012 at 10:50 PM

Title: Re: How is Mahamudra different from Shikantaza

Content:

DarwidHalim said:

Virupa mentioned:

"Some are completely tortured with empowerment rites, some always count their rosary saying hūm phat, some consume shit, piss, blood, semen and meat, some meditate the yoga of nadi and vāyu, but all are deluded."

Funny, this is my translation from which you are quoting.

You are missing a crucial point. This Doha for example, of Virupa is not an expression of mahāmudra as a path. It is an expression of Virupa's realization of the result from following the path of the two stages of creation and completion based on his practice of Nairatmayogini (the consort of Hevajra).

At the end, I just want to say that Mahamudra meditation is a meditation free from visualization, it is a direct path to realize this clear light. Can you see the conflict with Tantra - generation Path, where actually we PURPOSELY do visualization? They are conflicting each other.

Malcolm wrote:

These three mahāmudras are regularly practice by Karma Kagyus without conflict (This elaboration of three mahāmudras is mostly Karma Kagyu approach, BTW, in Drugpa and Drigung, they practice a different system that comes from Phagmo Dru called five-fold mahāmudra). In fact they are considered to be mutually supportive.

But in all of this you are missing one crucial point -- sutra mahāmudra that you cite, according to Kongtrul, is elaborated for those who do not have the capacity to practice the two stages. This meditation is does not rely on mantra and visualization because it is sutra path of the perfection of wisdom.

The middle one, is classical Indian tantric practice of the two stages of creation and completion.

The last, essence mahāmudra, is the mahāmudra which is solely based on a direct introduction and finds its justification in the mahāmudra chapter of the Jñānasiddhi by Indrabodhi. Through this, the disciple realizes the essence of the nature of the mind and remains in that state.

But Darwid, this far, while I have received teaching on Zen, Mahāmudra, and Dzogchen, I am not sure what teachings, if any you are have received from anyone. If you have not received any real teachings on these things, you are like a blind man talking about colors.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 4th, 2012 at 10:30 PM

Title: Re: Mahāmudrā & Dzogchen

Content:

Namdrol said:

So you really cannot claim that Kagyu Mahāmudra is any more Indian that the Dzogchen you are criticizing.

Jnana said:

Again, the teachings of the Indian mahāsiddhas (Tilo, Naro, etc.) is the high point of Mahāyāna Buddhism, and hasn't been surpassed by anything that came later, including Kagyu mahāmudrā.

Malcolm wrote:

I see, so for you, the most profound practice and the high point of India Mahāyāna is the two stages with their result, Mahāmudra as taught by Virupa, Tilopa, Naropa, etc. from the Hevajra, Cakrasamvara, Kalacakra and other annutarayoga tantras.

If I did not know better, I would say you were a Sakyapa.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 4th, 2012 at 9:43 PM

Title: Re: How is Dzogchen/Mahamudra different from Zazen Samadhi

Content:

Astus said:

Zen doesn't require anything special, there are no transmissions,

Malcolm wrote:

This is the main different between Zen on the one hand, and (Kagyu) Mahāmudra and Dzogchen on the other. It is also the main difference between sutra and tantra i.e. the presence or absence of direct introduction. Mahāmudra and Dzogchen are based on direct introduction. This does not exist in any school of Zen, much less sutra.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 4th, 2012 at 9:34 PM

Title: Re: Mahāmudrā & Dzogchen

Content:

Jnana said:

However, IMO the teachings of the Indian mahāsiddhas (Tilo, Naro, etc.) represent the high point of Mahāyāna Buddhism, and nothing else has surpassed them in any way (contrary to the claims of certain Tibetan doxographies, and so on).

Malcolm wrote:

The path of such Indian mahāsiddhas was the two stages. Mahāmudra was the result experienced by these Indian mahāsiddhas from practicing the two stages which is why Saraha, Tilopa and Naropa passed on so many tantric practices (especially, Cakrasamvara, which begins with Saraha).

Sahaja Mahāmudra, according to the great Drugpa Kagyu master Gyalba Yanggonpa, is Gampopa's own system. So you really cannot claim that Kagyu Mahāmudra is any more Indian than the Dzogchen you are criticizing.

In fact, if anything, the Dzogchen you are criticizing is, from a western textual perspective, a bit earlier than Kagyu Mahāmudra. Chetsun Senge Wangchuk achieved rainbow body in 1128, having passed on his teachings to lCegom Nagpo and Shangton, just to put things in perspective. By this time the 17 tantras and the Dzogchen Nyingthig system were fully articulated. Milarepa passed in 1135. Milarepa's teachings became famous, in part, because his student Gampopa spread the fame of his teacher among Kadampas and secured the reputation of the Kagyu school. Nyingthig continued in obscurity in western Tsang largely, I imagine, because it became a family lineage of the lCe clan (Lcegom Nagpo, etc) and the Zhang clan (Zhangton, his son Zhangkhas Nyibum, etc.).

While I am not going to knock the practice the two stages, for me, Dzogchen is more interesting.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 4th, 2012 at 9:12 PM

Title: Re: Mahāmudrā & Dzogchen

Content:

Namdrol said:

Well, except that modern authors, like Dudjom R., ridiculed the Tibetan tendency to dismiss "Tibetan" tantras just because they were "Tibetan", pointing out there was no good reason to assume that Indians were more realized by nature than Tibetans.

gregkavarnos said:

But then doesn't the concept of lineage just fall apart at the seams? I mean, so much time and energy is spent by all trying to trace the lineage of their teaching back to its (normally) Indian source and suddenly...

Doesn't a statement like this leave the whole deal open to tantras that do not have an Indian origin (or at least a lineage to back them up), like the English language tantra of the Aro mob?

Malcolm wrote:

Well, not at all. If a full realized Tibetan produces a tantra, then it should be accepted as a valid teaching -- same goes for a fully realized American, African, European, etc.

The fact is however, is that there is very little to "reveal" -- so there is not much point in producing new texts that say the same stuff over and over again.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 4th, 2012 at 9:10 PM

Title: Re: Mahāmudrā & Dzogchen

Content:

Namdrol said:

And how is this different than Mahāyāna in general?

Jnana said:

It isn't. As I've already said, it's the same boring recurring theme in the long history of Buddhist polemics: Move the goal posts, invent new rules, create a lineage history going back to some authoritative source (preferably Indian), then claim that yours is a superior game. It's like arguing over the quickest way to arrive at the Garden of the Hesperides.

[/quote/

I wasn't making a polemical argument -- I was making a taxonomical statement, which for some reason you insist was polemical -- even though it is not.

Namdrol said:

Generally speaking it works like this -- if you read books by Kagyus, Mahāmudra and Dzogchen are the same.

And this is the crux of the issue, given that this thread is in the Mahāmudrā sub-forum. I've offered explicit statements by a number of teachers who have trained in both systems, as has Astus. I think that their analysis is cogent, and that yours is not.

Malcolm wrote:

And I can offer citations by masters who have trained in both systems who assert the presentation of the basis in Dzogchen and Mahāmudra are not the same, and that it is an error to conflate them based in superficial similarities.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 4th, 2012 at 9:05 PM

Title: Re: Is it possible to be a Buddhist and believe in God?

Content:

Nemo said:

How would you explain the Primordial Buddha Samantabhadra to a person lacking a strong background in philosophy?

Malcolm wrote:

The same way I would explain it to you -- Samantabhadra was the first person in this eon to wake up, did so without ever falling into samsara, hence he is the first (adi) buddha.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 4th, 2012 at 11:45 AM

Title: Re: Mahāmudrā & Dzogchen

Content:

gregkavarnos said:

You reckon if we keep thrashing it we will finally break it down to its essential particles?

wisdom said:

I for one want this horse to look like its been through CERN!

Seriously though, because I'm not well read enough to know about these subtle distinctions, and since I have both Dzogchen and Mahamudra books, its nice to see how people think they are the same and different

Malcolm wrote:

Generally speaking it works like this -- if you read books by Kagyus, Mahāmudra and Dzogchen are the same. If you read books by Nyingmapas, they are different, and Kagyu Mahāmudra is just Dzogchen sems sde in drag. Sakyapas happily admit Dzogchen and Mahāmudra are different (where they are not shunning it as a Hashang deviation) and charitable Geluggpas like HHDL try to convince everyone that the fundamental mind of clear light and Dzogchen are the same.

Me, I stick with what ChNN says about the issue (i.e. Dzogchen and Mahāmudra are completely different, with different paths and so on).

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 4th, 2012 at 11:41 AM

Title: Re: Is it possible to be a Buddhist and believe in God?

Content:

AdmiraUim said:

This idea that 'Buddhism' is strictly atheist is a western invention used to please secularists

Malcolm wrote:

No, not at all -- there are detailed refutations of God in all sorts of classical Buddhist texts.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 4th, 2012 at 11:35 AM

Title: Re: How is Dzogchen/Mahamudra different from Zazen Samadhi

Content:

DarwidHalim said:

In this case, we are simply back to the square.

Ok then, let it be.

Malcolm wrote:

Ball is in your court, since the initial assertion was yours.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 4th, 2012 at 11:33 AM

Title: Re: Mahāmudrā & Dzogchen

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

To them, to call a teaching "Tibetan" rather than "Indian" was the ultimate put down.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, except that modern authors, like Dudjom R., ridiculed the Tibetan tendency to dismiss "Tibetan" tantras just because they were "Tibetan", pointing out there was no good reason to assume that Indians were more realized by nature than Tibetans.

Now then, there is certainly good reason to dismiss a "Tibetan" teaching if you find that it does not meet your criteria for a useful teaching.

ince I have no vested interest in harmonizing this or that teaching with some other teaching, I am free to examine each teaching based on its merits and from its terminological perspective.

The fact is that I think that Dzogchen is more interesting than other teachings and more relevant and more profound for a ton of reasons space will not allow me to expand upon.

Jñāna seems to think that just because people use similar terms they must mean the same thing or have the same path. But we know this is a very faulty and problematical perspective. This kind of thinking has lead to reams of improper refutation -- for example, Gelugpas refuting Lamdre and Dzogchen on an equal footing as mind-only school proponents, (not to mention Kagyu Mahāmudra) because both Dzogchen and Lamdre use the term "ālaya" (albeit in different ways)

My sole point which set this off is that the basis discussed in dzogchen and the basis discussed in mahāmudra are not the same since the path is not the same. Is it the case that tregchö and mahāmudra are very similar? Yes -- but tregchö is not summum bonum of Dzogchen.

But according to Jñāna, we should ignore tögal because, according to him, it and man ngag sde has no "Indian" antecedent (as if that is even important).

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 4th, 2012 at 11:05 AM

Title: Re: How is Dzogchen/Mahamudra different from Zazen Samadhi

Content:

DarwidHalim said:

There is no dispute in the view of mahamudra. So, we are not discussing mahamudra here. My view about Mahamudra has no conflict with all proponents of Mahamudra here.

Malcolm wrote:

Your view of mahāmudra is in conflict with mine.

DarwidHalim said:

Since you can say Zazen is less direct than Mahamudra, you have must a solid base to say it out. We want to know your this solid base about Zazen.

Malcolm wrote:

Since you obviously think Zazen is the same as Mahāmudra, "you have must a solid base to say it out. We want to know your this solid base about" mahāmudra.

N

PS, everyone can see by now this conversation is fruitless.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 4th, 2012 at 10:41 AM

Title: Re: Mahāmudrā & Dzogchen

Content:

Jnana said:

It's rather hilarious that something which was never a significant part of Indian Buddhism is now proclaimed as the apex of all things Buddhist!

Malcolm wrote:

And how is this different than Mahāyāna in general? Just what exactly is it about Indians that make their insight intrinsically more valuable than those from Oddiyāna, or Khotan, or Gilgit or even Tibet -- not to mention China or Japan?

At least when I dismiss something, I don't do so on the basis of its national origin. I try to do so based on what is actually being said.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 4th, 2012 at 10:38 AM

Title: Re: Mahāmudrā & Dzogchen

Content:

Namdrol said:

What Tibetan and Sanskrit term are you using for natural state?

Jnana said:

Buddhist soteriology doesn't require a specialized language. But take your pick: gnas lugs, gshis kyi gnas lugs, gshis kyi babs, etc., etc..

Malcolm wrote:

Well, yes it does. Dharmatā for example, does not have the same meaning in every system, correct?

Mahāmudra has its terminology based on its path; Dzogchen, its terminology based on its path; they are different paths and their terminology is not commensurate because of that.

Jnana said:

The Dzogchen Tantras fall into the same category of scriptural apocrypha as the Vajrasamadhi Sutra and other non-Indian sources.

Malcolm wrote:

When did you become an Indiophile, or have you always been and I just never noticed?

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 4th, 2012 at 10:20 AM

Title: Re: How is Dzogchen/Mahamudra different from Zazen Samadhi

Content:

DarwidHalim said:

It is fair isn't it? If we want to say something we must know what we are talking in great detail. Please then elaborate.

Malcolm wrote:

As our Norwegian friend said, apply the same standard to yourself, then we can talk. For starters, please tell us who gave you instruction in Dzogchen and Mahāmudra.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 4th, 2012 at 10:18 AM

Title: Re: How is Dzogchen/Mahamudra different from Zazen Samadhi

Content:

Namdrol said:

My initial point, which prompted this flood of comments, was to disabuse someone of the notion that the meditation of mahāmudra, dzogchen and Soto Zen are more or less the same. This assertion could not be more mistaken.

gregkavarnos said:

So, to clarify the situation for me, what you are saying is that the methods differ but not the outcomes? Am I understanding you correctly?

Malcolm wrote:

All Buddhist paths lead to buddhahood, some sooner, some later.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 4th, 2012 at 5:59 AM

Title: Re: Mahāmudrā & Dzogchen

Content:

Namdrol said:

Honestly, I think this analysis by this master is a bit misleading -- he is trying to assert that gzhi described by Dzogchen has an equivalent counterpart in the kun gzhi of the Mahāmudra system.

Jnana said:

The natural state is the natural state.

Malcolm wrote:

What Tibetan and Sanskrit term are you using for natural state?

Namdrol said:

The system of differentiating mind and wisdom (sems and ye shes) in Mahāmudra is not the same as differentiating between mind and vidyā in Dzogchen and does not have the same intention.

I suspect that the Indian mahasiddhas would have had no problem satirizing these Tibetan maneuvers. As would the Chinese Chan masters.

Malcolm wrote:

[/quote]

Ok, I will repeat one more time for the benefit our readers, since you are clearly not interested in having any kind of reasonable discussion -- these differences in presentation depend on respective differences in paths.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 4th, 2012 at 4:58 AM

Title: Re: Mahāmudrā & Dzogchen

Content:

Unknown said:

Tsele Natsok Rangdröl indicates otherwise. The Circle of the Sun:...

Malcolm wrote:

Honestly, I think this analysis by this master is a bit misleading -- he is trying to assert that gzhi described by Dzogchen has an equivalent counterpart in the kun gzhi of the Mahāmudra system. However, if you read any straight mahāmudra manual, for example, Dagpo Tashi Namgyal's texts or Sakyapa presentations and so on, for them the basis [gzhi] is the all-basis [kun gzhi], the clear and empty nature of the mind. It is called the all-basis because when it is not recognized, it is the basis for samsara, and when it is recognized, it is the basis for nirvana.

On the other hand, you have Dzogchen texts that systematically differentiate between gzhi and kun gzhi. The reason for this is not arbitrary and have everything to do with the path of Dzogchen. These topics are not mentioned at all in any system of Mahāmudra since they form no part of Mahāmudra practice. The system of differentiating mind and wisdom (sems and ye shes) in Mahāmudra is not the same as differentiating between mind and vidyā in Dzogchen and does not have the same intention.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 4th, 2012 at 2:15 AM

Title: Re: rTsa, rTsal, and the Fruition of Trekchö

Content:

Lhug-Pa said:

Are there Tibetan (or even Sanskrit) words that would fill in the following blanks?

Trekchö - Kadag - Dharmakaya - Thigle - Essence - Sounds

Thögal - Lhungrub - Sambhogakaya - Lung - Nature - Lights

Yermed - _____ - Nirmanakaya - rTsa - Energy - Rays

Malcolm wrote:

samapatti; viśuddhi, dharmakāya, tilaka/bindu, svabhāva, śabda xxxxx ; nirabhogana/anabhogana, sambhogakāya, vāyu, prakriti, ābhāsvarāḥ, prabhā asambhedaḥ, karuna, nirmanakāya, nāḍī, kāra, raśmi

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 4th, 2012 at 12:30 AM

Title: Re: Mahāmudrā & Dzogchen

Content:

Astus said:
there are different views possible, or something else?

Malcolm wrote:
There are different views.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Tuesday, January 3rd, 2012 at 11:33 PM
Title: Re: Mahāmudrā & Dzogchen
Content:
Astus said:
kalden yungdrung,

The topic of lights, energy and bardo are covered under the six yogas of Naropa. In that sense, it is the path of transformation and not the path of liberation.

Malcolm wrote:
You should read Dudjom R. You are suffering from more misconceptions than I have time to remove.

Astus said:
Also note what Jnana has referred to here before, that the whole tögal teaching with the lamps, etc. is a later development in Dzogchen.

Malcolm wrote:
You know what? We really do not know this to be a fact. All we know for sure is that the earliest texts we see for these practices (klong sde and man ngag sde) that we have access to seem to date from around the mid 10th century onward. But it is very hard to date this material. There is also a kama transmission for thögal which is held to date to the 8th century that consists of just a page or two where it forms part of the completion stage of Kilya/Yangdag.

Anyway, even if man ngag sde did prove to be a later elaboration, it does not matter. Jñāna seems to evince a preference for Indian authored material. That's ok, but I do not see Indian authorship as proof of superior content, or Tibetan authorship of inferior content.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Tuesday, January 3rd, 2012 at 11:06 PM
Title: Re: How is Dzogchen/Mahamudra different from Zazen Samadhi
Content:
Namdrol said:
My initial point, which prompted this flood of comments, was to disabuse someone of the notion that the meditation of mahāmudra, dzogchen and Soto Zen are more or less the same. This assertion could not be more mistaken.

gregkavarnos said:

So, to clarify the situation for me, what you are saying is that the methods differ but not the outcomes? Am I understanding you correctly?

Malcolm wrote:

It is a question of directness. Mahāmudra and Dzogchen are more direct, Soto less, but in the end, all Buddhist paths lead to complete liberation.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 3rd, 2012 at 11:04 PM

Title: Re: Mahāmudrā & Dzogchen

Content:

Namdrol said:

Nevertheless the distinction is crucial.

Astus said:

Crucial to what?

Malcolm wrote:

To the path of Dzogchen.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 3rd, 2012 at 11:03 PM

Title: Re: Mahāmudrā & Dzogchen

Content:

Jnana said:

then claim that yours is a superior game.

Malcolm wrote:

You know what? I didn't say anything of the kind in this discussion.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 3rd, 2012 at 11:00 PM

Title: Re: Mahāmudrā & Dzogchen

Content:

Jnana said:

What is the Sanskrit term for gzhi?

Malcolm wrote:

According to Khyenste Wangpo, sthāna.

Jnana said:

The basis in mahāmudrā is not limited to compounded, momentary minds. Karmapa Wangchuk Dorje, Mahamudra: The Ocean of Definitive Meaning:

[Ground mahamudra] is what is realized and actualized by the nondual mind of the buddhas and noble individuals. It is the basic state (gshis kyi babs) of the three realms of samsara and the true nature of all phenomena from the beginning. It is connate wisdom (lhan gcig skyes pa'i ye shes), which pervades the entire ground.

Malcolm wrote:

Right, this is not the same thing as the gzhi. Tilopa describes this as the nature of mind:

As such, the nature of the mind resembles space from the beginning, there are no phenomena not included in it...

This is still the ālaya. As the third Karmapa writes in The Profound Inner Topics:

The cause is the beginningless nature of the mind, which does not fall into any partialities, yet from its unceasing play -- the essence emptiness, and the nature, clarity-- all kinds of aspects arose.

Not recognizing itself,
the movements of mind's formations are like waves moving on water, from which object and apprehender both appear,
itself focusing on and apprehending itself;
that mind moves outward; from the apparent aspect the consciousness that apprehends objects in external objects appears.

This is the ālaya but it is not the gzhi as described by Dzogchen.

The terminology of dzogchen and mahāmudra are not commensurate with each other because the paths are different.

Jnana said:

Neither mahāmudrā nor dzogchen require tögal (cf. all of the dzogchen teachings composed prior to the development of the man ngag sde class).

Malcolm wrote:

However things may have been prior to the 11th century, since then tögal is the main thrust of Dzogchen practice. And since this is so, the way the basis is described is different, necessarily so. And so I still do not agree that similarity in terminology indicates similarity in intention.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 3rd, 2012 at 9:35 PM

Title: Re: Mahāmudrā & Dzogchen

Content:

Astus said:

It is amazing how this can be brought to quite a different discussion by picking out a single word and then setting up a whole view on it.

Malcolm wrote:

Nevertheless the distinction is crucial.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 3rd, 2012 at 9:32 PM

Title: Re: Mahāmudrā & Dzogchen

Content:

kalden yungdrung said:

Could it be that if the latter is referring to Kun gzhi, this is in relation to the Chittamatra view ?

KY[/color]

Malcolm wrote:

the all-basis (kun gzhi, ālaya) is not the all-basis consciousness (kun gzhi rnam par shes pa, ālayavijñāna). The former is the mere clarity and emptiness of the mind; the latter is an afflicted, impure consciousness.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 3rd, 2012 at 9:11 PM

Title: Re: Mahāmudrā & Dzogchen

Content:

Jnana said:

Here are a few quotations regarding view and meditation from teachers who have trained in both systems. Tsele Natsok Rangdröl, The Circle of the Sun:

In short, what dzogchen calls 'endowed with the threefold wisdom,' the wisdom of the primordially pure essence, the wisdom of the spontaneously present nature and the wisdom of the all-pervasive compassion, is described by the followers of mahāmudrā as the nonarising essence, the unobstructed nature, and the variously manifesting expression. '

Namdrol said:

I don't agree with this point. The former is referring the basis (gzhi), the latter is referring to the all-basis (kun gzhi). The gzhi and kun gzhi are completely different.

N

heart said:

Tsele Natsok Rangdrol don't mistake the gzhi and the kun gzhi, in fact he makes a big point of the distinction between these in the two first chapters of Circle of the Sun. So maybe he don't think that essence, nature and expression in Mahamudra is referring to the kun gzhi.

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

I don't have this book, so I cannot really comment further about his perspective. But I can say that in Mahamudra, there is no distinction made between gzhi and kun gzhi.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 3rd, 2012 at 8:40 PM

Title: Re: Mahāmudrā & Dzogchen

Content:

Jnana said:

If the natural state is the same thing, how can you meaningfully assert that the basis recognized is different?

Malcolm wrote:

The alaya is the inseparable clarity and emptiness of the mind.

The gzhi, in Dzogchen, has nothing to do with the mind.

Another point I want to make is the reason for basis [gzhi] being described the way they are in these two systems as everything to do with their respective paths.

Tregchö is not the path in Dzogchen. It is the ground for practicing the path. The path in Dzogchen is thögal. Hence, the way the basis is explained in Dzogchen reflects the actual path in Dzogchen, thus the explanation of the basis in Dzogchen is completely different than that of Mahāmudra.

A Different basis is elaborated because the paths are very different.

The point of tregchö and mahāmudra is basically the same i.e. the instant of unfabricated awareness [ma bcos shes pa skad cig ma]. But in Dzogchen, this only the starting point -- it is not the path, which is why in general, no-one is considered to achieve rainbow body (yes, I know there are some theoretical formulations which might contradict this assertion) only through tregchö.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 3rd, 2012 at 8:37 PM

Title: Re: Mahāmudrā & Dzogchen

Content:

Namdrol said:

The western academic consensus is that there are none.

Jnana said:

Yes. And I would suggest that the Kagyu mahāmudrā system is generally using older Indian terminology as used by Saraha, Tilopa, Naropa, and Maitripa. This difference in terminology doesn't entail a different basis.

Malcolm wrote:

Look, if you decide that Mahāmudra is an older terminology, then you have to accept that the authors of man ngag sde class (which defines essence, nature and compassion) were familiar with this older terminology of the ālaya/kun gzhi, found it lacking and had a different aim in their writing. In other words, you have to accept that Dzogchen terminology is different and has a different intent on the basis of the claim that it is different. You have to accept the fact that the Indian-derived Sarma notions of the all-basis was inadequate for the purposes of Dangma Lhungyal and Chetsun Senge Wangchug, for example (should we take these persons to be the original authors and collators of the 17 Tantras and Vima Nyinthig), and that therefore, these authors chose to elaborate a terminology to express their differences.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 3rd, 2012 at 8:10 PM

Title: Re: Mahāmudrā & Dzogchen

Content:

Namdrol said:

I don't agree with this point. The former is referring the basis (gzhi), the latter is referring to the all-basis (kun gzhi).

Jnana said:

Tibetan polemics....

Malcolm wrote:

Not at all.

Jnana said:

But more to the point: Where is the Indian pedigree for dzogchen as we now have it with the inclusion of tögal instruction? That is, Indian texts written in India by Indians (i.e. not tantras or termas composed by Tibetans).

Malcolm wrote:

The western academic consensus is that there are none. As you know already, according to the annals of the upadesha class, the Indian Panditas kicked Dzogchen out of India and sent it to Tibet with Vimalamitra because they could not deal with it.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 3rd, 2012 at 7:43 PM

Title: Re: Mahāmudrā & Dzogchen

Content:

Jnana said:

Here are a few quotations regarding view and meditation from teachers who have trained in both systems. Tsele Natsok Rangdröl, The Circle of the Sun:

In short, what dzogchen calls 'endowed with the threefold wisdom,' the wisdom of the primordially pure essence, the wisdom of the spontaneously present nature and the wisdom of the all-pervasive compassion, is described by the followers of mahāmudrā as the nonarising essence, the unobstructed nature, and the variously manifesting expression. '

Malcolm wrote:

I don't agree with this point. The former is referring the basis (gzhi), the latter is referring to the all-basis (kun gzhi). The gzhi and kun gzhi are completely different.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 3rd, 2012 at 7:31 PM

Title: Re: How is Dzogchen/Mahamudra different from Zazen Samadhi

Content:

AlexanderS said:

Namdrol can you point me to a thread or info, that explains the differences between Dzogchen and Mahamudra? Also would you say that Dzogchen is superior to Mahamudra?

Malcolm wrote:

The state of Dzogchen and the state of Mahāmudra are not two different states. They are the same thing.

The path of Dzogchen and the path of Mahāmudra are completely different.

The superior path is whichever one you will actually practice.

My initial point, which prompted this flood of comments, was to disabuse someone of the notion that the meditation of mahāmudra, dzogchen and Soto Zen are more or less the same. This assertion could not be more mistaken.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 3rd, 2012 at 4:23 PM

Title: Re: How is Dzogchen/Mahamudra different from Zazen Samadhi

Content:

DarwidHalim said:

Dzogchen, Mahamudra, and Shikantaza are just same method of meditation.

Malcolm wrote:

Not even remotely.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 3rd, 2012 at 9:38 AM

Title: Re: Is ecumenical Buddhism realistic?

Content:

Beatzen said:

Actually, it isn't. I know from my studies of history that the Zen philosopher Mo Ho Yen was banished from Tibet by the "buddhist" government there for exactly this difference.

Namdrol said:

If you wish to be more informed, read the blog "Early Tibet" -- it will add layers of nuance to your understanding.

N

Huifeng said:

Yeah, that is a fairly complicated issue. Reading Hvasang Mohoyen as somehow representative of Chinese Buddhism as a whole is highly problematic. But, we've already discussed this one to death before ...

~~ Huifeng

Malcolm wrote:

Right, Hasahang only represented a strand of Northern Chan, now extinct.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 3rd, 2012 at 9:25 AM

Title: Re: Is ecumenical Buddhism realistic?
Content:
Huifeng said:
Yes, I am fairly uninformed about Tibetan Buddhism.

~~ Huifeng

Malcolm wrote:
I was talking to Beatzen actually.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Tuesday, January 3rd, 2012 at 7:45 AM
Title: Re: How is Dzogchen/Mahamudra different from Zazen Samadhi
Content:
Nangwa said:
In my opinion Mahamudra and even more so Dzogchen have very little in common with Zazen.
So much so that I think it is really odd that folks think they have a lot in common.
If you ask me they are all three completely different animals.

Malcolm wrote:
Well, actually I disagree, I think Kagyu Mahāmudra and Chan/Zen have a great deal in common.

Dzogchen on the other hand is a different animal.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Tuesday, January 3rd, 2012 at 7:36 AM
Title: Re: How is Dzogchen/Mahamudra different from Zazen Samadhi
Content:
Nangwa said:
In my opinion Mahamudra and even more so Dzogchen have very little in common with Zazen.
So much so that I think it is really odd that folks think they have a lot in common.
If you ask me they are all three completely different animals.

Beatzen said:
it's probably my western naivete. I know these two things.

I thought the taoist-influence of 'naturalness' in zen meditation had some bearing on the 'natural state' that mahamudra and dzogchen allude to.

Malcolm wrote:

There is much less Taoist influence on Zen/Chan than most people realize. In particular, most people do not realize that so called Zen arts in Japan, really come from the Neo-confucian artistic revival of the Sung dynasty. Calligraphy, and martial arts such as swordsmanship and archery, as well as riding, and so on, are the arts of the Confucian gentleman.

"Natural state" is a translation of a term "gnas lugs", which in turn is a translation of the Sanskrit term "tattva" or bhutatā, both meaning "reality".

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 3rd, 2012 at 7:18 AM

Title: Re: Expanding Samadhi

Content:

Beatzen said:

There's only been a few times when I've actually experienced samadhi

Malcolm wrote:

That is not true. You are experiencing samadhi all the time. Why? Samadhi is a natural function of the mind, called a "mental factor".

The problem is not samadhi, the problem is how to move your mind from its tendency to rest on afflictive objects to path objects.

But rather than worrying about all these contrived meditations it is more more interesting to discover the root of the mind.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 3rd, 2012 at 7:15 AM

Title: Re: How is Dzogchen/Mahamudra different from Zazen Samadhi

Content:

Beatzen said:

Just for myself, what do you mean by "sharp"?

Namdrol said:

neither agitated nor lethargic

Beatzen said:

That's what I thought you meant. What's the longest period of your life you had mental silence? (I heard an interview someone asked pema chodron this question. She said 'a year')

Malcolm wrote:

Never. The mind's job is to think and have thoughts. Thoughts are not a problem.

If what she said is true, I wonder how she managed to make to the bathroom, or eat food.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 3rd, 2012 at 5:38 AM

Title: Re: How is Dzogchen/Mahamudra different from Zazen Samadhi

Content:

Beatzen said:

Just for myself, what do you mean by "sharp"?

Malcolm wrote:

neither agitated nor lethargic

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 3rd, 2012 at 5:33 AM

Title: Re: How is Dzogchen/Mahamudra different from Zazen Samadhi

Content:

Beatzen said:

I don't know why, but Alan Watts is one of my heros. Next to Jetsunma Tenzin Palmo. I wish I had the balls to spend 12 years living like a hermit in a cave. That's Nuts!

Namdrol said:

I did not do 12 years, but i lived alone for three years and half years in a cabin in the woods and never left. And for the final year and a half, I spoke to and saw no one.

It is not hard, but not east to readjust find work. and so on

Beatzen said:

That, to me, is so interesting. You must have emerged from that quite changed.

Malcolm wrote:

Being in retreat was very interesting. One of the happiest times of my life. I was very relaxed. That experience has informed my practice ever since.

Most important point of practice is to be relaxed but sharp.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 3rd, 2012 at 5:25 AM

Title: Re: How is Dzogchen/Mahamudra different from Zazen Samadhi

Content:

Pero said:
But how did you get food then?

Malcolm wrote:
It was delivered once a month.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Tuesday, January 3rd, 2012 at 5:14 AM
Title: Re: How is Dzogchen/Mahamudra different from Zazen Samadhi
Content:

Namdrol said:
I did not do 12 years, but i lived alone for three years and half years in a cabin in the woods and never left. And for the final year and a half, I spoke to and saw no one.

Pero said:
But how did you get food then?
It is not hard, but not east to readjust find work. and so on Yeah that's what would worry me most if I'd go on such a retreat. Did it take long for you to get back into the rhytm of "normal" life?

Malcolm wrote:
I never did.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Tuesday, January 3rd, 2012 at 4:53 AM
Title: Re: How is Dzogchen/Mahamudra different from Zazen Samadhi
Content:
Beatzen said:
I don't know why, but Alan Watts is one of my heros. Next to Jetsunma Tenzin Palmo. I wish I had the balls to spend 12 years living like a hermit in a cave. That's Nuts!

Malcolm wrote:
I did not do 12 years, but i lived alone for three years and half years in a cabin in the woods and never left. And for the final year and a half, I spoke to and saw no one.

It is not hard, but not east to readjust find work. and so on

Author: Malcolm
Date: Tuesday, January 3rd, 2012 at 4:25 AM
Title: Re: Namkhas (colored-thread elemental) are they only Bon?
Content:
JinpaRangdrol said:

I remember watching an old documentary following an extremely elaborate Tara puja (possibly Nyingma, but definitely not Terma) in which namkhas were used to construct a mandala of sorts. I wish I remembered more about it, but it certainly seemed to be an old Tara Tantra, just judging by the complexity of the ritual.

Malcolm wrote:

Not a tantra, a rite called "grol ma gyul ldog" i.e. The rite of Tara for repelling Armies

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 3rd, 2012 at 2:57 AM

Title: Re: How is Dzogchen/Mahamudra different from Zazen Samadhi

Content:

Beatzen said:

I was very interested in the Vimalakirti sutra until I came across Pruning the Bodhi tree, which is based on the arguments of Matsumoto Shiro and other dissenting Soto masters

Namdrol said:

And what does it say there?

Beatzen said:

That the Vimalakirti sutra is heretical and is one of the contributing factors in the degradation of Zen Buddhism. Along with infiltration of certain Shinto influences.

Malcolm wrote:

How can a sutra be heretical?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 3rd, 2012 at 2:30 AM

Title: Re: are karma and rebirth for real?

Content:

Beatzen said:

My understanding will change, and I may come to trust in the reality of rebirth for myself. I don't see how admitting that I don't understand it yet makes me a heretic.

Virgo said:

Forgive me if I have missed a post or two that might contain the answer, but, do you believe that nothing happens at death? It's just "black"? or do you believe in some form of permanent afterlife (perm heaven or hells)?

Either way, there is no point in spiritual (Buddhist) practice if you believe either of those.

Kevin

Beatzen said:

I haven't made up my mind. I was hoping that I would gain a meditative insight. I won't share my thoughts on the subject, first of all because I take my thoughts with a grain of salt, and secondly because I don't want to get flamed for expressing "un-buddhist" views.

Malcolm wrote:

Listen -- you will have to forgive us. These endless discussions about rebirth are tiresome. We don't care. Either you accept it or you don't. If you don't fine. But there is no doubt that rebirth was the Buddha's teaching. People who cannot accept that, cannot accept must of the other teachings of the Buddha.

And please spare us the "buddhas teachings were not written down until..."First of all, this is false. Worst case scenario, Buddha's teachings were written down 150 years after his parinirvana (dates of Asokha pillars), which best scholarship places 407-400 BCE. But it is very likely that the earliest sutras were being written down within 50 years.

Mahayana sutras were almost certainly later compositions.

Tantras later than that.

But the one thing all these teachings share is a common thread of rebirth, karma, and dependent origination which are the cause of samsara, and the breaking of rebirth and karma through understanding dependent origination, which gauranteed freedom from rebirth in this or at most seven rebirths.

All those people who think they will attain awakening withotu understanding Buddha's actual teachings on this subject are deluded.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 3rd, 2012 at 2:17 AM

Title: Re: How is Dzogchen/Mahamudra different from Zazen Samadhi

Content:

Beatzen said:

I was very interested in the Vimalakirti sutra until I came across Pruning the Bodhi tree, which is based on the arguments of Matsumoto Shiro and other dissenting Soto masters

Malcolm wrote:

And what does it say there?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 3rd, 2012 at 2:08 AM

Title: Re: How is Dzogchen/Mahamudra different from Zazen Samadhi

Content:

Beatzen said:

I mean a state which is tranquil, space-like. I would almost say a fusion of subject and object, but I know from experience and from my own study that the Buddhist view on this state leaves the wiggle room for a capacity to investigate the nature of the self which experiences the state that I describe. I don't know which school characterizes what I mean.

[edit] I'd like to know, as a student, why tantric methods are any more expedient than the method I am describing.

Malcolm wrote:

Vajrayāna methods are more expedient than sutra based methods because of the profound understanding of the relationship between the body and the mind present in Vajrayāna, and the employment of that understanding in practice.

Dzogchen is more profound still.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 3rd, 2012 at 1:55 AM

Title: Re: Reincarnation, Zen, etc.

Content:

kirtu said:

The perceived world is functional and is more or less really composed of atoms, etc. (essentially the Vaibhasika view but Zen is also heavily influenced by Mind Only teaching).

Beatzen said:

How does this relate to the Taoist concept of fluidity and movement? I have only been earnestly studying for two years now, and I suppose if one were to pose the model of modern physics, Zen conceives the world more as waves than particles.

I can't really respond to Namdol's question of which form of Samadhi I was talking about, since I don't completely comprehend what is meant by "tantric." Remember, I'm not familiar with that branch of Buddhist terminology. I will explain, however, that I am under the impression that we are discussing a similar experience of yogic, or non-dual awareness and eventually, certainty (perhaps ultimately, a clear comprehension of relative and absolute truth simultaneously) that arises from meditation on emptiness in whatever I mean by "samadhi"

Malcolm wrote:

What do you mean by nondual? From which point of view, Buddhist or Hindu; if Buddhist, Yogacara or Madhyamaka?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 3rd, 2012 at 1:37 AM

Title: Re: Reincarnation, Zen, etc.

Content:

kirtu said:

Tibetan meditation runs the gamut from traditional analytic meditation, basically skips over zazen as it is presented in the Japanese and Korean traditions (but possibly not the Chan tradition - I haven't had Chan instruction) and then focuses directly on wisdom or an example wisdom experienced during empowerment. Practitioners develop familiarity with that wisdom or example wisdom during deity yoga practice where the deity is an example of a fully enlightened Buddha manifesting in some form that can be glossed as highly symbolic. The peaceful deities in particular are often more accessible as they can often be seen directly by beginners in this tradition as Buddhas and Arya Bodhisattvas. In fact they are an example of ultimate wisdom manifesting in a relative way through the mind of the practitioner. So deity yoga samadhi could just be at a mind level for a practitioner and in this sense is no different from zazen samadhi esp. if the practitioner is basically just doing samatha (so shamatha based on a mental image of a deity or on an external physical representation like a statue or a thangka). However Tibetan Buddhist meditation also directly uses the human energetic body. This is done in a different way that in yoga and in Taoism and has different results. Basically the starting point in Tibetan Buddhism is the vision of the Avatamsaka Sutra - the entire universe is a manifestation of the Buddhas and it is our perception that causes beings to experience it as a place of suffering. Interdependence is mostly but not entirely glossed - its exposition tends to be muted.

Kirt

Malcolm wrote:

And then of course, there is Dzogchen, which is completely different than all of this.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 3rd, 2012 at 1:07 AM

Title: Re: Blavatsky on Buddhism in America

Content:

Lhug-Pa said:

Of course.

Although the term "aliens" is derogatory, so better to refer to them as <http://gnosticteachings.org/topics/extraterrestrials.html>.

Malcolm wrote:

Right, if you call them aliens they will be subject to deportation.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 3rd, 2012 at 1:04 AM

Title: Re: Lojong, Rushens, and Semdzins

Content:

Lhug-Pa said:

Do all of the explanations of the practices in The Precious Vase contain complete instructions?

...

But I'm wondering if the Six Lokas practice as presented in The Precious Vase is still complete in itself.

Malcolm wrote:

As for one, you can always find more instructions.

And for two, yes.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 3rd, 2012 at 1:03 AM

Title: Re: Reincarnation, Zen, etc.

Content:

Beatzen said:

3. Again, how is Samadhi different between Zen and Tibetan Buddhist experiences of it? Tibetan Buddhists are often quite aggressive about the superiority of their method to insight.

Malcolm wrote:

Which school of Tibetan Buddhism; do you mean samadhi in a sutrayāna sense, or in a tantric sense?

Your question is so broad as to be meaningless.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 3rd, 2012 at 12:12 AM

Title: Re: Reincarnation, Zen, etc.

Content:

Beatzen said:

If you do not accept rebirth, this simply represents a defect in your present understanding of Buddhadharma.

I don't think of myself as defective. But feel free to do so yourself. I'm simply open about the fact that I haven't had an insight into it's reality while in meditation, which is the way to investigate it, is it not? From one buddhist practitioner to another, I wasn't expecting to be judged like that. I think it is better if we support eachother towards realization than characterize eachother as defective.

This has nothing to do with my question.

Malcolm wrote:

I did not say you were defective, I said your understanding was. You are not your understanding, no? It can change, correct?

The state of non-arising and rebirth are not contradictory. In fact, the former makes the latter possible.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 2nd, 2012 at 11:52 PM

Title: Re: Reincarnation, Zen, etc.

Content:

Beatzen said:

2. I read a Zen teacher on Zen International responding to Namdrol's sectarian arguments on here concerning the inefficacy of Zazen to produce "full awakening" Since Tibetan Buddhism is more of a path of moral/ethical self-edification than of self-knowing (in stark contrast to Zen), can Namdrol really make such a claim?

Malcolm wrote:

Hard for me to reply to a response of something I may or may not have said. You would need to reproduce here what I said, and their "response".

As to your second contention, Tibetan Buddhism is not a monolithic tradition.

If you do not accept rebirth, this simply represents a defect in your present understanding of Buddhadharma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 2nd, 2012 at 10:43 PM

Title: Re: Is ecumenical Buddhism realistic?

Content:

Beatzen said:

Actually, it isn't. I know from my studies of history that the Zen philosopher Mo Ho Yen was banished from Tibet by the "buddhist" government there for exactly this difference.

Malcolm wrote:

If you wish to be more informed, read the blog "Early Tibet" -- it will add layers of nuance to your understanding.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 2nd, 2012 at 9:51 PM

Title: Re: what is the cause of Avidyā(ignorance)?

Content:

Huifeng said:

Avidya and samskara play a mutually supportive role, with vijnana right there too.

Try not to think of the links of pratityasamutpada as a line or circle, it isn't that simple.

~~ Huifeng

Malcolm wrote:

Well, it is that simple.

--> Affliction -->Action --> Suffering --> Affliction...etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 2nd, 2012 at 9:48 PM

Title: Re: Is ecumenical Buddhism realistic?

Content:

Huifeng said:

It's kind of interesting in one way. But what is perhaps more interesting in my mind is how many conceive of Chinese and Tibetan Buddhism as distinction from each other in the first place, and that a combination is therefore "ecumenial".

Beatzen said:

This might sound rather sectarian...

Malcolm wrote:

No, it just sounds rather uninformed about Tibetan Buddhism.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 2nd, 2012 at 7:21 AM

Title: Re: Namkhas (colored-thread elemental) are they only Bon?

Content:

Adamantine said:

Just wondering about any personal-experience stories: has anyone on this forum actually constructed and empowered a Namkha for themselves? If so, did you see a difference in your life afterwards, any noticeable benefits that you would attribute to it?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, and yes.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 2nd, 2012 at 5:15 AM

Title: Re: Blavatsky on Buddhism in America

Content:

Lhug-Pa said:

They may have written about some of their teachings in terms that 19th century scientific materialists could relate to, however to say that the Mahatmas were materialists in that sense would be incorrect.

Also, the quote you posted of the Mahatmas regarding Matter would have to be in reference to Mulaprakriti (notice how they are referring to and affirming Parabrahman, etc. as well), not mere "matter" in the 19th century 'scientific' materialistic context.

Moreover, H.P. Blavatsky would have rejected them had they been 19th century 'scientific' materialists, considering that nearly half of the content of her books is dedicated to exposing 19th century 'scientific' materialism as being actually unscientific in many ways (i.e. according to Theosophy, Occult Science is the only true science; whereas materialistic or profane science is limited at best).

For the Mahatmas to have been 19th century 'scientific' materialists, would mean that they would have had to have had rejected Parabrahman, astral projection, transmigration, reincarnation, etc.

Malcolm wrote:

I read more than a few of those letters -- they are filled with a naive physicalism.

But you have rose colored glasses on, and refuse to see what is in front of your eyes.

But there is no point in further dicussing the irrelevant opinions of invented masters and and their nineteenth century "representatives".

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 2nd, 2012 at 4:43 AM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

Acchantika said:

He encouraged actions which reduced suffering. So, if we have to choose between killing an aphid and killing a steer, we should choose whichever creates less suffering.

Malcolm wrote:

Since a steer can feed many beings, and an aphid, very few, one to one, it seems the benefit of killing steer outweighs that of killing an aphid since the suffering of hunger is reduced for many by killing a steer and the killing of an aphid reduces the suffering of hunger for no one, apart perhaps from that of an aphid wasp's progeny*, oh and the humans that eat the produce from farms where aphid wasps and other creatures are employed to eradicate pests.

Your argument just does not work.

The subfamily Pemphredoninae also known as the aphid wasps...As with all other sphecoid wasps, the larvae are carnivorous; females hunt for prey on which to lay their eggs, mass provisioning the nest cells with paralyzed, living prey that the larvae feed upon after hatching from the egg.

In short, you cannot compare the suffering of one sentient being with another and state as an absolute fact, this being suffers more than that when it comes to ending the life of one given being vs another given being.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 2nd, 2012 at 3:55 AM

Title: Re: Namkhas (colored-thread elemental) are they only Bon?

Content:

Virgo said:

As far as I know, these instructions were given to Rinpoche in a mind ter.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 2nd, 2012 at 3:54 AM

Title: Re: Namkhas (colored-thread elemental) are they only Bon?

Content:

Adamantine said:

Oh Ok, so they are considered a proper Buddhist practice then? I just haven't seen them ever on home shrines of my friends in Nepal, etc.. is it something that used to be more widespread or is more practiced in certain areas?

Malcolm wrote:

This is something very specific to Dzogchen Community and Norbu Rinpoche's transmisson. It is not common.

Thread crosses are commonly used in Buddhist ransom ceremonies (glud) where they represent the energy of the person's five elements.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 2nd, 2012 at 3:51 AM

Title: Re: Namkhas (colored-thread elemental) are they only Bon?

Content:

rai said:

hello, do you think Namkha could be printed on paper (i made one in a graphic program) or it has to be made of stick/strings/threads to have a function ? thank you!

Malcolm wrote:

You need to manufacture it or have it manufactured for you. But it better to do it yourself.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 2nd, 2012 at 3:50 AM

Title: Re: Namkhas (colored-thread elemental) are they only Bon?

Content:

Adamantine said:

I have the book compiling ChNN's teachings on the meaning of and how to make a Namkha. . in the introduction, it seems to imply this is primarily a Bon practice. Is this true? I was thinking of making one and getting it blessed by one of my Nyingma Lamas but if it is primarily a Bon thing he may not know much about it or even approve.. does anyone have any insight? The book alludes to similar practices being widespread among indigenous cultures around the world, which is interesting..

If it is mainly Bonpo, is there an equivalent and effective practice among Buddhists to harmonize the elemental energies of the individual?

Malcolm wrote:

Not it is not just a Bon thing, but if you are going to make a Namkha then you should just do the right to authenticate it yourself, there is no need to bring it to a Lama at all.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 2nd, 2012 at 3:12 AM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

Namdrol said:

When someone uses one being to kill another being on purpose, how is this different than asking a butcher to kill a steer for your family?

Acchantika said:

Because unlike higher-order mammals, insects lack pain receptors, a thalamus and all the other necessary structures to enable them to experience pain and, thus, suffer.

Malcolm wrote:

Insects do not suffer? They do not feel pain? Of this you are certain?

Acchantika said:

So the question is whether it creates more suffering to indirectly encourage the killing of highly evolved mammals versus encouraging the use of organic pesticides.

Malcolm wrote:

I don't recall anywhere in Buddha's teaching where he says "You can kill all the bugs you like, there is no problem".

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 2nd, 2012 at 2:42 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Universities/Buddhist Studies

Content:

lotwell said:

Dear all,

I'm interested in doing a masters in Buddhist Studies and have a few questions.

What are some of the best programs? In the US, I know Emory has a Tibetan partnership and there is Naropa. What about other countries?

It seems like you need to choose a language and a field as part of your specialization ... perhaps someone who has completed a MA in Buddhist Studies could speak to this.

Thank you!

Lowell

Malcolm wrote:

University of Virginia probably has the most balanced program. Harvard has the most language intensive, it is the most "European". Colombia's is very Gelug heavy.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 2nd, 2012 at 2:26 AM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

wisdom said:

Think about it like this. Non local, non organic food has many harmful elements.

Malcolm wrote:

I agree with pretty much everything you have said. I just wanted to add one clarification.

Most organic farms use pesticides when necessary, they also employ insects like ladybugs and wasps to kill "pests". Organic pesticides are used to protect human and livestock health, not to protect the lives of "pests".

When someone uses one being to kill another being on purpose, how is this different than asking a butcher to kill a steer for your family?

If someone should argue that buying meat encourages the killing of steer, and so on; is it not also true that buying vegetables encourages the killing of "pests"? And if it is argued that one is participating in the killing of steer through buying meat in a market, is not also true that one is participating in the killing of pests by buying say apples and other fruit in the market?

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 1st, 2012 at 10:25 PM

Title: Re: Blavatsky on Buddhism in America

Content:

Lhug-Pa said:

...looks like it is in reference to Prakriti or Mulaprakriti.

Malcolm wrote:

No, the Mahatmas were followers of current 19th century scientific materialism.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 1st, 2012 at 9:05 AM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

catmoon said:

All killing is not the same. There is killing in self defense, killing for survival, killing for vengeance, killing just for the sheer hell of it, killing with intent and without, with regret after and with rejoicing after. From a karmic POV they are quite different beasts.

Namdrol said:

But all lack compassion.

PadmaVonSamba said:

There is a story about the Buddha in a former life who is on a boat with many people, and he knows that one of the people is going to kill the others, so he kills that person out of compassion (before he kills anybody else) because he is aware of the suffering that person would otherwise reap from killing all the people on the boat.

Malcolm wrote:

That is not killing, that is liberation.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 1st, 2012 at 8:55 AM

Title: Re: Blavatsky on Buddhism in America

Content:

Will said:

Namdrol translates: " It was truly spoken 'May all rely on this in order to stop and be parted from afflictions, the cause of suffering that is not desirable in any way, and properly progress on the excellent path'"

"This" refers to what exactly?

Malcolm wrote:

I assume the book, but there is no explicit reference to a book in the Tibetan text itself.

BTW, I note that you avoided addressing the explicit materialism declared in the Mahatma letters.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 1st, 2012 at 8:22 AM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

Namdrol said:

because virtually all instructions of yantra and tummo recommend that one eat some meat, especially lamb and yak, which are quite warming.

Virgo said:

What is the need for warming food products under these circumstances Loppon?

Kevin

Malcolm wrote:

well, yantra can be quite demanding physically, as can tummo, so you need rich nutritious heavy warming food to prevent vata disorders and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 1st, 2012 at 8:21 AM

Title: Re: Erroneous views on Dzogchen of W.Y. Evans-Wentz and C.G.Jung

Content:

Namdrol said:

If you wish to believe in HPB's mahatmas, go ahead.

I think that these letters and personal accounts are part and parcel of a wide-spread nineteenth century occult literary culture that had certain norms, conventions, and experiential expectations, fueled by nineteenth century philology, and fueled by a European colonial orientalism, attitudes adopted also by Western Educated Indians.

I regard these accounts at worst delusions, and at best, fantasy writing. But I cannot take them seriously.

N

Will said:

No need to take anything seriously; but most of the witnesses were Hindus, who were hardly Western educated or even sympathetic, at first, to theosophy or Blavatsky.

Malcolm wrote:

If they could write in English that well, they were highly educated Hindus who had excellent western educations.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 1st, 2012 at 8:20 AM

Title: Re: Erroneous views on Dzogchen of W.Y. Evans-Wentz and C.G.Jung

Content:

Lhug-Pa said:

The Panchen Lama and H.H. 14th Dalai Lama on H.P. Blavatsky's The Voice of the Silence:

<https://www.dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=77&t=5830#p65050> "
onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

Will said:

The late Geshe Gyeltsen translated this Panchen Lama quote for me around 1979, if I can ever find it I will post it. Or maybe Namdrol can translate it?

Malcolm wrote:

It says, " It was truly spoken 'May all rely on this in order to stop and be parted from afflictions, the cause of suffering that is not desirable in any way, and properly progress on the excellent path'"

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 1st, 2012 at 7:57 AM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

catmoon said:

All killing is not the same. There is killing in self defense, killing for survival, killing for vengeance, killing just for the sheer hell of it, killing with intent and without, with regret after and with rejoicing after. From a karmic POV they are quite different beasts.

Malcolm wrote:

But all lack compassion.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 1st, 2012 at 7:56 AM

Title: Re: Blavatsky on Buddhism in America

Content:

catmoon said:

I wonder, Will, have you read the Book of Mormon? It opens with a similar testimony of multiple witnesses. They were witnessing something quite different though. This might tie in with what Namdrol said about the nature of the times.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes Will, do please compare:

<http://lds.org/scriptures/bofm/introduction?lang=eng> "
onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 1st, 2012 at 7:40 AM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

LastLegend said:

If people are going to eat meats, try halal meats by the Muslim farmers as these farmers have a special way of killing the animals. They pray for the animals for they kill them. At least that is a more compassionate way of killing.

Malcolm wrote:

Killing is killing, there is nothing compassionate about taking a life.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 1st, 2012 at 7:37 AM

Title: Re: Erroneous views on Dzogchen of W.Y. Evans-Wentz and C.G.Jung

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

If you wish to believe in HPB's mahatmas, go ahead.

I think that these letters and personal accounts are part and parcel of a wide-spread nineteenth century occult literary culture that had certain norms, conventions, and experiential expectations, fueled by nineteenth century philology, and fueled by a European colonial orientalism, attitudes adopted also by Western Educated Indians.

I regard these accounts at worst delusions, and at best, fantasy writing. But I cannot take them seriously.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 1st, 2012 at 6:18 AM

Title: Re: Erroneous views on Dzogchen of W.Y. Evans-Wentz and C.G.Jung

Content:

Namdrol said:

Will: As for phony Mahatmas, here is testimony of others who knew them:

http://www.blavatskyarchives.com/chelas_on_the_mahatmas.htm "
onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

These accounts are about as believable as Benjamin Cream's "Maitreya".

Will said:

And just what would it cost you to believe these testimonies N.? Why would all these people lie?

Malcolm wrote:

I don't think they were lying, Will, I think they were deluded.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 1st, 2012 at 5:24 AM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

catmoon said:

Maybe we can shift the grounds of these arguments, since I don't see any agreements coming anytime soon. While slogging through five pages of this stuff, I could not help but wonder, since when is it Buddhist practise to correct someone over and over again, when they have made it patently clear they are not interested in the advice offered? Now, I can see it being encouraged in evangelical Christianity, or in Maoist-era "education" sessions, but in Buddhism?

It is hard to see that any good is being done by pursuing the topic. Everyone is talking, no one is changing their point of view, and animosity is encouraged. If pursued to a logical end, the arguments will not lead to resolution, but to the creation of a vegan sect, a vegetarian sect, an ovo-lactarian sect and so on.

Malcolm wrote:

This already exists.

My personal opinion is that the Vegetarianism in Mahāyāna sutras and lower tantra is largely a product of a cultural response and an appeal to dietary trends in Indian culture, and need not be taken as "gospel". They are not definitive teachings.

Thervadins, Japanese Buddhists and Tibetan Buddhists by a large eat meat.

Chinese Buddhists do not.

Many Tibetan Buddhists feel bad about it, because they also follow Mahāyāna; but because Anuttarayoga tantra is more important, they eat meat.

Chinese Buddhists are very shrill and aggressive about not eating meat and many Tibetan Lamas with lots of Chinese students have succumbed to pressure not to eat meat (which is undoubtedly better for their health).

In the US, there is trend for yoga practicing Buddhists to eschew eating meat. Also amongst some younger Tibetan Buddhists there is a trend to stop eating meat -- which is ironic, because virtually all instructions of yantra and tummo recommend that one eat some meat, especially lamb and yak, which are quite warming.

There are lamas like the Karmapa and Chatral Rinpoche, that advise everyone to stop eating meat. Then there are Lamas like Chogyal Namkhai Norbu, who advise everyone to eat meat.

I also have gone through periods of revulsion towards meat. But in the end, my conclusion is that diet is mainly important for maintaining one's health. Therefore, one should eat whatever is best for one's health, and that is a state that changes with age, with the seasons, and with illness.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 1st, 2012 at 4:53 AM

Title: Re: Erroneous views on Dzogchen of W.Y. Evans-Wentz and C.G.Jung

Content:

Tenzin1 said:

Will, I'm not sure it was Bell, I only recall it was a British officer she had tea and a frank talk with. You can look it up in:

"Tournament of Shadows: The Great Game and the Race For Empire In Central Asia", by Karl E. Meyer and Shareen B. Brysac. The same chap provides some interesting insight as to why the Roerichs weren't allowed to go to Lhasa, in spite of having a Tibetan visa that included Lhasa. The book's a good read.

Will said:

Tenzin1,

It would be so helpful if, when slandering someone, the source of the slander could be given. Where did Charles Bell write that he met Blavatsky?

Are you also "not sure" Blavatsky said she was a fake? You made the charge, you look it up & you provide the supporting quote.

As for phony Mahatmas, here is testimony of others who knew them:

http://www.blavatskyarchives.com/chelas_on_the_mahatmas.htm "
onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

Malcolm wrote:

These accounts are about as believable as Benjamin Cream's "Maitreya".

In any case, the "Mahatmas" are clearly materialists, as this letter and others show:

"In other words we believe in MATTER alone, in matter as visible nature and matter in its invisibility as the invisible omnipresent omnipotent Proteus with its unceasing motion which is its life, and which nature draws from herself since she is the great whole outside of which nothing can exist."

<http://www.theosociety.org/pasadena/mahatma/ml-10.htm> "
onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 1st, 2012 at 4:16 AM

Title: Re: The essence of Dzogchen

Content:

kalden yungdrung said:

Tashi delek ,

Stupid question maybe, but what be the essence of the Dzogchen (Teachings)?

Mutsog Marro

KY

Malcolm wrote:

Knowing your own state.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 1st, 2012 at 2:43 AM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

Nemo said:

The statements about it's health benefits are rather dubious, but it is a compassionate choice.

Malcolm wrote:

For people who have severe cardiovascular disease, there is little choice -- they should immediately switch.

For people who are prone to various kinds of cancer, they should switch.

The China Study is an excellent book that demonstrates quite well that people who eat large quantities of meat and dairy have an elevated risk of cardiovascular disease and cancer.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 1st, 2012 at 12:59 AM

Title: Re: The Neurotic Zen of Mint

Content:

mint said:

I haven't practiced Guruyoga in a couple of days,

Malcolm wrote:

When you feel like it practice; when you don't; don't.

You better learn to enjoy groundlessness, because it your real state anyway.

Happy new eon of self-liberation!

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 1st, 2012 at 12:25 AM

Title: Re: Metta in Theravada Vs Bodhicitta in Mahayana

Content:

Namdrol said:

By itself, metta has no force to lead to liberation, as Dharmakirti points out.

Mr. G said:

Hi Namdrol,

Do you recall which work of his that I can read this?

Malcolm wrote:

Pramanavarttika, I beleive.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 31st, 2011 at 10:06 PM

Title: Re: Buddhism and Peak Oil

Content:

Huseng said:

The whole global infrastructure depends upon oil and even with alternative energy sources online they still won't pack the same power punch.

With declining standards of living we're likely to see a lot of social problems arise. The utopian ideas of some Buddhist thinkers in the past century will prove infeasible and this will visibly be demonstrated, too.

Malcolm wrote:

We agree.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 31st, 2011 at 2:22 PM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

David N. Snyder said:

I see one extreme form of vegetarians that condemn meat eaters and consider them to not be Buddhist. And then there is another extreme of meat eaters who believe all vegetarians are really Jains and that all vegetarians are "holier-than-thou" and are not real Buddhists and need to be forced to eat meat.

Malcolm wrote:

I dont think anyone suggested that those who choose not to eat meat should be force fed meat.

Sakya Pandita pointed out that meat eating was acceptable in the Śravaka schools, forbidden in general Mahāyāna and permitted in Highest Yoga Tantra.

And in Dzogchen, there are no rules at all, other than knowing your own situation and working with circumstances.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 31st, 2011 at 12:51 PM

Title: Re: Is it possible to be a Buddhist and believe in God?

Content:

Ervin said:

Peace. Thanks, PadamaVonSamba. That has cleared up a bit my knowledge. Creator of everything that exists God is what I had in mind, omniscient and omnipotent.

Thanks

Malcolm wrote:

No, does not exist in Buddhism, despite what this or that deluded person cares to believe.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 31st, 2011 at 12:38 PM

Title: Re: Buddhism and Peak Oil

Content:

Heruka said:

Abiotic Oil

Namdrol said:

And as I showed elsewhere, this theory had been completely and thoroughly repudiated.

It is completely obsolete in Russia as well.

Heruka said:

was deepwater horizon bp oil spill an attempt to establish a deep drilling abiotic oil head? after 5,000 feet of water and then drilling is pretty deep, but not that deep.

http://www.wired.com/cars/energy/magazine/15-09/mf_jackrig "
onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

The mother lode of oil in the deepwater Gulf is so significant that Tahiti and other successful fields in this region are expected to soon produce enough crude to reverse the long-standing decline in US oil production of about 10 percent per year.

the USA is flush rich with oil in alaska and gulf coast, but hey lets use mid east oil first...drive up the price by implying a shortage in supply with peak oil narative..

supply and demand, oldest con in the book.

Malcolm wrote:

Peak oil is a very misunderstood term. Peak oil refers not to the total amount of oil in the ground, rather it refers to the total amount of _easily recoverable oil_(or any other mineral resource).

There is a relationship between the high price of oil and drilling for oil in places where it expensive to recover, or the cost of extracting it (think shale oil and hydro fraking (which is not just about gas)) is very high.

When the price of oil rises too high however, it triggers recession, demand drops off, prices decline, and it becomes too pricey to drill for oil in exotic places (like the deep gulf).

Basically, what peak oil is really about is the energy return on energy investment (EROI). In 19th century, the ratio was roughly 50 to one i.e. for barrel of oil or equivalent amount of energy, one could recover fifty barrels of oil. Presently, the EROI is between one to five barrels of for each BOE invested.

What peak oil theory is actually about is not the actual amount of oil that exists in the ground, it is a critique of the economic feasibility of extracting oil from ever more difficult places to reach it.

Hubbert's basic contention is sound:

"Our principal constraints are cultural. During the last two centuries we have known nothing but exponential growth and in parallel we have evolved what amounts to an exponential-growth culture, a culture so heavily dependent upon the continuance of exponential growth for its stability that it is incapable of reckoning with problems of nongrowth."

When EROI drops below one BOE, it becomes very unfeasible to invest in any new petroleum recovery. That is what peak oil is actually about. When it is no longer profitable for oil companies to recover oil, then all the dominos begin to fall...

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 31st, 2011 at 9:11 AM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

i always hoped that, if nothing else, Buddhists understood the importance of compassion, not as some abstract concept, but rather as concrete action in the world.

Malcolm wrote:

What we have discovered about you is that your notion of compassion is very hemmed in by conceptual limitations concerning proper diet.

But if you wish to be a disciple of Devadatta, than that is your choice.

N

Author: Malcolm
Date: Saturday, December 31st, 2011 at 5:43 AM
Title: Re: Buddhism and Peak Oil
Content:
Heruka said:
Abiotic Oil

Malcolm wrote:
And as I showed elsewhere, this theory had been completely and thoroughly repudiated.

It is completely obsolete in Russia as well.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Saturday, December 31st, 2011 at 5:27 AM
Title: Re: distinction between common & uncommon preliminaries Content:
kirtu said:
Manjushri is the archetype for the Shepherd Bodhisattva.
Kirt

Malcolm wrote:
That would be Avalokiteshvara, AFAIK.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Saturday, December 31st, 2011 at 4:42 AM
Title: Re: Metta in Theravada Vs Bodhicitta in Mahayana
Content:
Namdrol said:
Bodhicitta is the direct cause of buddhahood.
By itself, metta has no force to lead to liberation, as Dharmakirti points out.

Astus said:
Bodhicitta is the intention to become a buddha, but there is a path to be followed and without that path there is no buddhahood. If bodhicitta were the direct cause of it there would be no need of a path.

Malcolm wrote:
For a bodhisattva, bodhicitta is an intention and the path as well.

This is why, in terms of relative bodhicitta, there is both aspiration and engaged bodhicitta.

In terms of ultimate bodhicitta, there is śamatha and vipaśyāna.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 31st, 2011 at 3:41 AM

Title: Re: Kalu Rinpoche shocking news!

Content:

Tenzin1 said:

He's spoken publicly of sexual abuse? When was this?

Malcolm wrote:

First retreat I was ever at, 1992, Buckland.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 31st, 2011 at 3:27 AM

Title: Re: Buddhism and Peak Oil

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

"If peak comes around 2010, production in 2040 will likely equal something not far from production in 1980 (about 20 billion barrels). The oil produced in 2040 will have to meet the needs of a much larger global population and a world in crisis, but 20 billion barrels is still a lot of oil. In the same way, as reserves are depleted and production continues to slump over the decades that follow, the available oil will fall further and further below the levels needed to maintain a modern industrial society, but for a long time to come there will still be some petroleum available.

...

In the long term, the challenge is to get through the Long Descent with as much useful information and resources as possible, and to transmit them to the successor cultures that, to judge by past models, will begin coalescing sometime in the 23rd and 24th centuries.

John Michael Greer. The Long Descent: A User's Guide to the End of the Industrial Age

Huseng said:

This basically means energy will no longer be abundant and the cost of it will increase. Unless some miracle technology is produced, industrial civilization will over time come to an end and we will more or less return to pre-industrial conditions. No more commercial aviation, private automobiles, mass production or industrial food production.

Namdrol said:

But that will take about 300 years if you follow in reasoning in Greer's Long Descent.

Huseng said:

If I'm not mistaken he accepts Hubbert's peak oil plot:

In a few decades we'll have a lot less oil than now with a lot more demand.

The final end of industrial civilization will come later, but a lot of industrial goodies like industrial healthcare and commercial flights will become unavailable sooner rather than later.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 31st, 2011 at 3:19 AM

Title: Re: Kalu Rinpoche shocking news!

Content:

Tenzin1 said:

Have you heard otherwise?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, of course, otherwise, I would not mention it.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 31st, 2011 at 12:30 AM

Title: Re: Buddhism and Peak Oil

Content:

Huseng said:

This basically means energy will no longer be abundant and the cost of it will increase. Unless some miracle technology is produced, industrial civilization will over time come to an end and we will more or less return to pre-industrial conditions. No more commercial aviation, private automobiles, mass production or industrial food production.

Malcolm wrote:

But that will take about 300 years if you follow in reasoning in Greer's Long Descent.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 31st, 2011 at 12:27 AM

Title: Re: distinction between common & uncommon preliminaries

Content:

Namdrol said:

No, this is the standard presentation of two of the three main kinds of bodhicitta. In Tibetan Buddhism, we mostly use the royal bodhicitta -- i.e. I will attain buddhahood for the benefit of all sentient beings.

In Zen and Chinese Buddhism in general, they mostly rely on the sheperd kind.

gregkavarnos said:

Skewed from the angle that once again Tenzin is trying to set up a hierarchy: Shepherd and Helms-man like Bodhisattvas are deluded because, whether they like it or not, they will get enlightened anyway, thus king-like is (actually) the only way to go, by default.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, actually the Shepard bodhicitta is considered to most superior. The king the most practical.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 31st, 2011 at 12:05 AM

Title: Re: distinction between common & uncommon preliminaries

Content:

gregkavarnos said:

According to this view shepherd-like bodhisattvas won't become Buddha until all beings are not totally liberated and helmsman/ship captain-like bodhisattvas won't become Buddha if all beings are not ready to be totally liberated.

Malcolm wrote:

Of course this is your somewhat skewed view of the teaching, yes!

[/quote]

No, this is the standard presentation of two of the three main kinds of bodhicitta. In Tibetan Buddhism, we mostly use the royal bodhicitta -- i.e. I will attain buddhahood for the benefit of all sentient beings.

In Zen and Chinese Buddhism in general, they mostly rely on the sheperd kind.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 31st, 2011 at 12:00 AM

Title: Re: Kalu Rinpoche shocking news!

Content:

Tenzin1 said:

He said he was sexually abused. That's why this video is generating so much discussion all around the internet. It's the first time an insider, a Tibetan from a monastic background, has spoken of this.

Malcolm wrote:

That's not true. ChNN has talked about this for many years.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 30th, 2011 at 11:52 PM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

even if you get eaten at a ganapuja (after all, there has been vajrayana in those parts from centuries ago)?

Malcolm wrote:

Well, first of all, this is not necessary, since you are human being -- there are other methods in Dzogchen to guarantee your samsara is finished in this lifetime.

Secondly, there are laws against cannibalism, so you have to work with circumstances, sorry.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 30th, 2011 at 11:42 PM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

Namdrol said:

.

Using meat in ganapuja guarantees that animal's course in samsara is ended.

N

gad rgyangs said:

hey, maybe i'm gonna go to New Guinea like Michael Rockefeller, get killed and eaten, and then my course in samsara will be ended! fast-track!

Malcolm wrote:

No, that won't work.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 30th, 2011 at 11:41 PM

Title: Re: Metta in Theravada Vs Bodhicitta in Mahayana

Content:

Namdrol said:

It is actually the opposite, this passage shows that metta cannot lead to liberation since it is "is fabricated & intended".

Astus said:

Metta is not the direct cause of liberation but it leads to liberation, just as meditation and morality leads to liberation. Bodhicitta is not the direct cause of liberation either but it leads to that. The quoted sutta lists 11 different practices to attain liberation with, among them are the immeasurables.

Malcolm wrote:

Bodhicitta is the direct cause of buddhahood.

By itself, metta has no force to lead to liberation, as Dharmakirti points out.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 30th, 2011 at 11:03 PM

Title: Re: Metta in Theravada Vs Bodhicitta in Mahayana

Content:

Namdrol said:

The former does not have the capacity to bring you to liberation, since it is a mundane meditation.

Astus said:

Metta and the other three can lead to liberation.

"Then again, a monk keeps pervading the first direction with an awareness imbued with good will, likewise the second, likewise the third, likewise the fourth. Thus above, below, & all around, everywhere, in its entirety, he keeps pervading the all-encompassing cosmos with an awareness imbued with good will — abundant, expansive, immeasurable, without hostility, without ill will. He reflects on this and discerns, 'This awareness-release through good will is fabricated & intended. Now whatever is fabricated & intended is inconstant & subject to cessation.' Staying right there, he reaches the ending of the mental fermentations. Or, if not, then — through this very Dhamma-passion, this Dhamma-delight, and from the total wasting away of the first five Fetters — he is due to be reborn [in the Pure Abodes], there to be totally unbound, never again to return from that world.

<http://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/mn/mn.052.than.html>

Malcolm wrote:

No, what liberates here is insight into the nature of the impermanent.

"This awareness-release through good will is fabricated & intended. Now whatever is fabricated & intended is inconstant & subject to cessation."

It is actually the opposite, this passage shows that metta cannot lead to liberation since it is "is fabricated & intended".

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 30th, 2011 at 10:51 PM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

BTW, ChNN just mentioned the "miserable compassion" of sutra and lower tantra at 9:50 am ET or so in open webcast.

Using meat in ganapuja guarantees that animal's course in samsara is ended.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 30th, 2011 at 10:41 PM

Title: Re: Buddhism and Peak Oil

Content:

Huseng said:

One thinker I appreciate a lot is Michael Greer. His ideas can be summarized like this:

Malcolm wrote:

<https://thearchdruidreport.blogspot.com/> " onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 30th, 2011 at 10:17 PM

Title: Re: Is ecumenical Buddhism realistic?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

All your yānas are belong to us

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 30th, 2011 at 10:13 PM

Title: Re: words to the west

Content:

tobes said:

And, that many westerners tend to adopt that stereotype, which has damaging implications on their practice.

:

Malcolm wrote:

Thankfully we have ChNN, who completely avoids this type of stereotyping.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 30th, 2011 at 10:11 PM

Title: Re: words to the west

Content:

kirtu said:

Well they could have been following Guru Rinpoche and trying to save the world from being overrun by the rakshas living on Cannibal Island (North America and Europe).

Kirt

Malcolm wrote:

Then they were a few centuries much too late. Fait accompli.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 30th, 2011 at 10:05 PM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

Adamantine said:

Or, we could all move to the mountain caves and practice chulen, live off the essences and stop harming all life-forms?

Sound like a plan?

Malcolm wrote:

The sgra thal rgyur tantra has a section on the chu len of meat.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 30th, 2011 at 10:04 PM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

Huseng said:

The unfortunate reality of samsara is that we must create negative karma just to survive...

Malcolm wrote:

Exactly.

Huseng said:

One other factor in support of vegetarianism is that while meat production is carried out with the express intention of killing an animal, agriculture, provided it is organic, can be carried out without having the intention to kill.

Malcolm wrote:

As I have shown, the minute you want to protect a crop for your own consumption, this is impossible. Of course, you can simply allow all your crops to be taken over by insects, rodents, and so on -- but even organic farmers will not permit this. Therefore, the idea that you can engage in agriculture without deliberately killing some being is mistaken. So this argument is rejected.

Huseng said:

The meat eater who simply buys their meat from another party may not directly participate in the act, but they are a supporting member in a collectively sanctioned intentional action (i.e., collective karma)...

Malcolm wrote:

No, not if the meat would have been slaughtered in any case. For example, I buy meat, but I do not rejoice in, support the aims of, etc. of the meat industry. So this argument is rejected.

Huseng said:

Clearly, a consumer of meat is sharing in the responsibility of the intentional act of killing when they purchase the product.

Malcolm wrote:

Only if they request or see the animal being slaughtered. So this argument has an incomplete reasoning.

The difference with agriculture is that provided it is done without pesticides then the parties involved, consumer and grower alike, are not intentionally killing sentient beings.

Huseng said:

As shown above, the production of meat is not tied to demand, at least, it is not tied to consumer demand.

Nonsense. If people didn't eat meat, there would be less meat produced.

Malcolm wrote:

This, unfortunately, is just false as I claimed above and as kirt demonstrated.

Huseng said:

Look at China or Japan -- in the last few decades they have acquired much wealth and it has enabled them to be able to afford meat everyday, and meat consumption AND production has consequently increased.

Malcolm wrote:

It is the fact of modern market economies that worldwide we discard half the food we produce.

The demand for meat is not actually tied to its production. Meat is provided to the market in large quantities which outstrip actual demand so that it is always available.

Huseng said:

Your defence of meat eating is disappointing given that some years ago on eSangha you were advocating vegetarianism and calling meat eating sinful.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, this is true. I still advocate vegetarianism (primarily for reasons of health). Meat eating as done by ordinary persons is a bit sinful.

But I was addressing the argument that being a vegetarian is less harmful (it isn't) to living beings and the contention that practitioners who eat meat are not assisting the unfortunate sentient being who lands on their plate, as well as the contention that eating meat ipso facto makes one culpable in the act of killing (rejected by Bhavaviveka and also by me).

If you recall, on E-Sangha, I asserted that eating meat for one's health was acceptable, and that following the protocol of the ganapuja was not negotiable, at least not for me.

I am not so much defending the eating of meat as I am pointing out the error of "the compassionate vegetarian" argument -- it is total bollocks.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 30th, 2011 at 1:33 PM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

Huseng said:

Being a vegetarian lessens harm to sentient beings in the form of helping to decrease environmental destruction which meat production contributes greatly to. Much more than vegetable gardens or wheat fields.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, industrial meat production is very environmentally destructive. So is growing corn for ethanol.

Huseng said:

If you don't eat meat, you don't contribute to the industrial production of meat, which is bad for the animals AND the environment.

Malcolm wrote:

As shown above, the production of meat is not tied to demand, at least, it is not tied to consumer demand.

BTW, personally, I do not purchase any industrially produced food stuff as much as possible. Given where I live, that is very possible.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 30th, 2011 at 1:16 PM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

Namdrol said:

Everyone who gardens does so with full knowledge they are harming living beings. The same is true of farmers -- killing is still killing whether motivated by malice, craving or ignorance. If you are arguing that meat eaters participate necessarily in the intent to kill; then so do vegetarians. Why? Because it is impossible to eat any food during the production of which no sentient being was harmed. When an organic farmer applies an organic pesticide to save his or her crop from an aphid infestation, this is no less a deliberate act of killing than leading cattle, pigs or fowl to a slaughter house.

gad rgyangs said:

killing as an unfortunate by-product of farming, and intending to minimize it as much as possible, cannot be compared to the horrors of the sufferings deliberately inflicted on animals in abattoirs.

Malcolm wrote:

Sure it can -- have you ever seen an insect die from insecticide -- now you are just engaging in rationalizations.

gad rgyangs said:

plus, it is conceivable that technology, say in the form of an electromagnetic field, could be developed to repel insects from crops without harming them. you cannot eat real meat without killing.

Malcolm wrote:

Now you are engaging in fantasies -- that is not the real condition of farming -- you do know why monks cannot farm, right? Because if they dig in the ground they will harm creatures.

gad rgyangs said:

when one chooses to eat meat, there are many causes and conditions that entail from that decision. the absence of consciousness in the already-dead meat is not the point.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, actually it is.

gad rgyangs said:

it is both the past suffering of the animal that was killed so that there would be a piece of meat for you to eat, as well as the message your eating that piece of meat.. sends into the socio-economic nexus of the food industry.

Malcolm wrote:

Then this is true of eating a veggie burger too.

gad rgyangs said:

there is no way to divorce your action of eating meat from the killing

Malcolm wrote:

Then this is true of a veggie burger too.

The fact of the matter is this, if your criteria for being a vegetarian is to lessen harm to sentient beings, than you are completely fooling yourself. The millions of birds, rodents and insects that are killed during the production of food don't really care if you are not eating meat. They still die because you eat at all. You are not saving a single animal from a miserable death by being a vegetarian. If you think so, you are kidding yourself or living in a fantasy.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 30th, 2011 at 12:32 PM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

if nobody bought meat, the industry would disappear. be the change you want to see in the world.

Malcolm wrote:

Ah, the idealism of zealotry.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 30th, 2011 at 12:29 PM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

Namdrol said:

There are, in breif, two points, arguments ChNN makes, with which I am sure you are familiar:

One, the production of vegetables, grains, fruit and so on is not free from harming creatures, whether organic or conventonally produced. Thus the belief that one is being less harmful to living beings by being a vegetarian is a mistaken delusion.

gad rgyangs said:

this has already been easily defeated on the grounds that there is no intent to kill sentient beings in vegetable farming, indeed the intent can be to try and minimize it as much as possible.

Malcolm wrote:

Everyone who gardens does so with full knowledge they are harming living beings. The same is true of farmers -- killing is still killing whether motivated by malice, craving or ignorance. If you are arguing that meat eaters participate necessarily in the intent to kill; then so do vegetarians. Why? Because it is impossible to eat any food during the production of which no sentient being was harmed. When an organic farmer applies an organic pesticide to save his or her crop from an aphid infestation, this is no less a deliberate act of killing than leading cattle, pigs or fowl to a slaughter house.

gad rgyangs said:

On the other hand, the whole point of the exercise in meat eating depends on deliberately killing sentient beings.

Malcolm wrote:

Not at all, if your argument is intent, merely consuming meat does not equate with the intent to kill sentient beings. That only follows if one slays or requests the slaughter, of a given sentient being. Purchasing meat does not satisfy this criteria.

Your argument is actually the specious one, rejected quite thoroughly by Bhavaviveka. If one does not kill an animal, request its death, or see it being killed, since there is no consciousness in the flesh of dead animal, there is no karmic consequence to eating meat. Nor is there any reasonable moral reason not to eat such meat. The only reason not to eat meat under these circumstances is aesthetic choice.

gad rgyangs said:

so should we encourage butchers to kill animals..

Malcolm wrote:

Encouraging the slaughter of animals would be to engage in killing. This is forbidden. But eating meat that one has not killed, requested the slaughter of or seen slaughtered bears no fault. And, if one is a practitioner, the consumption of such meat has an added benefit of creating a positive cause for that animal.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 30th, 2011 at 12:05 PM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

Virgo said:

I hope that someday you can understand that you cannot stop butchers and other people from killing animals.

gad rgyangs said:

not as long as you keep buying the carcasses for your parties, that's true.

Malcolm wrote:

Whether you buy meat or not, the abattoirs will still keep churning out carcasses. Not buying meat does not prevent killing.

Buying it does not increase the level of killing. The meat industry has targets set for how many animals they must kill in order to keep meat fresh in markets, and it bears no relationship, at this point economic history, with actual demand in the marketplace. Far more meat is discarded everyday than is purchased from markets.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 30th, 2011 at 12:03 PM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

re: "my kind of vegetarianism" as "miserable compassion". i'd love to hear an excursus on that.

Namdrol said:

Someday, I am sure you will.

gad rgyangs said:

i'm ready.

Malcolm wrote:

There are, in breif, two points, arguments ChNN makes, with which I am sure you are familiar:

One, the production of vegetables, grains, fruit and so on is not free from harming creatures, whether organic or conventonally produced. Thus the belief that one is being less harmful to living beings by being a vegetarian is a mistaken delusion.

Second, when a practitioner consume the flesh of animals who have been killed it creates a cause for that animal to meet the teachings. Indeed, it is held that the animal accrues merit because it's body contributes to the well-being of a practitioner. Eschewing such food lacks compassion since no connection is made with said animal.

Therefore, ChNN desribes vegetarianism based on the idea that one is being more compassionate and less harmful to sentient beings as a form of "miserable compassion" -- his words, not mine -- wholly divorced from reality.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 30th, 2011 at 11:42 AM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

re: "my kind of vegetarianism" as "miserable compassion". i'd love to hear an excursus on that.

Malcolm wrote:

Someday, I am sure you will.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 30th, 2011 at 11:11 AM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

As far as ChNNR goes, I'm sure he would be more open to a discussion of the issue that you give him credit for. as i said, next time i see him i will try to bring it up.

Malcolm wrote:

Yeah sure, I would love to see this -- especially after he referred to your kind of vegetarianism as "miserable compassion" during the Tenerife retreat.

Yes, please, try and condition Norbu Rinpoche to your point of view, good luck.

I have heard ChNN extol the virtues of practitioners eating meat again and again since I first took teachings from him in 1992. I am quite sure you will not dislodge him from his perspective on this.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 30th, 2011 at 11:10 AM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

you mean like swallowing a live goldfish?

Malcolm wrote:

That would equal killing, of course. So no, not like that.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 30th, 2011 at 11:00 AM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

Dechen Norbu said:

Your words? Indeed. The cult of vegetarianism.

The parts of your lama's advice that don't agree with your pre-established ideas about diets are thrown away as bullshit. First and foremost: diet! Then Dzogchen and your master. You'll go far with that attitude.

gad rgyangs said:

its not a cult its called morality 101: non-killing. you've heard of it perhaps?

Malcolm wrote:

Eating meat does not equal killing -- I suggest you review Bhavaviveka's argument on this subject.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 30th, 2011 at 10:56 AM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

are you claiming you agree with everything he says, no questions asked? do you believe he is omniscient?

Malcolm wrote:

ChNN is an awakened person, one of the few in the world and he is my root Guru.

If he is not your root Guru, it is ok.

Everyone is free. You are free not to eat meat, I am free to eat meat.

I have argued both sides of this issue extensively. In the end, however, I just follow my teacher's advice since he is an awakened person, and I am not.

As far as antinomian goes, that was not my point -- my point was to what extent you were taking your convictions. Certainly there are many now who beleive that meat as well as alchohol is not really needed in a ganapuja.

They can think that if they like. I have never agreed with this point of view. AFAIC, these two things are somewhat indispensable for various reasons.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 30th, 2011 at 9:13 AM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

this seems to be the crux of what you are saying, all I can do is remind you that this theory is far from being accepted in buddhism in general. is it true? i certainly have no way of knowing. does my teacher ChNNR teach this? yup. do I buy it? not really.

Namdrol said:

Well, that's your problem.

N

gad rgyangs said:

i got 99 problems but eatin' meat aint one.

Malcolm wrote:

That is not the problem to which I was referring, this was:

"does my teacher ChNNR teach this? yup. do I buy it? not really."

But of course, you are free. But instructing people to be vegetarians in direct contradiction to what your teacher teaches...

?

And then piling another teachers POV on top of that?

?

Next you will be telling us we should eschew meat in the ganapuja...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 30th, 2011 at 8:58 AM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

this seems to be the crux of what you are saying, all I can do is remind you that this theory is far from being accepted in buddhism in general. is it true? i certainly have no way of knowing. does my teacher ChNNR teach this? yup. do I buy it? not really.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, that's your problem.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 30th, 2011 at 6:38 AM

Title: Re: Metta in Theravada Vs Bodhicitta in Mahayana

Content:

DarwidHalim said:

According to your opinion, what are the difference among metta in Theravada vs Bodhicitta in Mahayana?

Malcolm wrote:

The former does not have the capacity to bring you to liberation, since it is a mundane meditation.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 29th, 2011 at 11:41 PM

Title: Re: Teachings by Khenpo Namdrol

Content:

phantom59 said:

In early 2009 Khen Rinpoche gave a commentary on a short text by Mipham, "Lion's Roar: Buddha Nature in a Nutshell" to students of the Rigpa Shedra East <http://www.knamdrol.org/mipham-stong-thun-senge-ngaro-g.avertin.pdf> "
onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

cloudburst said:

these teachings have many reference numbers in the three and four hundreds, do you know what they refer to? for example,

"Because in fact, there only appears to be a progressive liberation from the obscurations that veil self--- appearances (rang snang), while the actual essence remains in its primordial state free from any obscuration. [393] "

thanks!

Malcolm wrote:

Probably the page number of the edition of the text he was using.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 29th, 2011 at 11:02 PM

Title: Re: words to the west

Content:

heart said:

But Namdrol, the so called "American Buddhists" are arrogant and think they know the Dharma better than the Tibetans and this interview was directed at them.

Malcolm wrote:

Really? Who are these so called "American Buddhists"?

heart said:

Also the whole world consider the Americans more arrogant than any other country in the world in political matters.

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

Don't confuse the actions of a small corporate controlled faction controlling our government with the American people. Thanks.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 29th, 2011 at 10:33 PM

Title: Re: words to the west

Content:

Adamantine said:

There's a lot in there, what do you not accept? All of it? Or just the part about Western Dharma teachers?

Malcolm wrote:

"Because Americans are very arrogant and their capitalism's-habit is to think they are very superior to everyone else. They don't respect other races, and other cultures. They are nationalistic. National - how do you say? Chauvinistic. It is another manifestation of a nihilist view. But the West has no pure Buddhist lineage because they don't respect sublime beings, and they don't believe in teachers. Whatever they do not understand deeply, then they reject, and they say, "This is useless". The problem is how pure Buddhist teachings can flourish in the west.

...

I cannot say, neither they are or are not because I am not a sublime teacher. But main problem is that almost all Western teachers of Buddhism are nihilists.

This is what I do not accept. I know many Americans, the vast majority of them are not arrogant and do not think they are better than anyone else.

If nationalism is a fault, it applies to all -- including, and especially Tibetans.

The western Buddhists I know respect sublime persons and they do believe in teachers.

If we are not understanding some teaching deeply, that is the fault of the teachers. But the way many Tibetans want it, is that one should have total faith before receiving teachings. This will not work in the West. And this was also not Buddha's intention.

So I find myself in disagreement with this point of view.

I also do not accept the blanket condemnation that almost all Western teachers of Buddhism are nihilists.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 29th, 2011 at 11:26 AM

Title: Re: words to the west

Content:

Adamantine said:

That's fine, but I don't think that's what was happening in this interview. I mean look at the spectrum from Stephen Batchelor to Dennis Merzel or Roach... and so many others that fall to extremes based on the underlying pervasive influence of the nihilist or eternalist conditioning of their cultural context. I think he was generalizing to make a point, based on real examples, and warn us of a dangerous trend. You don't have to make it all about you! Anyway, I have a feeling the entire interview would read differently, as Lama Tharchin expressed, and you are reacting to the manipulated-by-Tworkov fragments..

Malcolm wrote:

I guess I just don't accept TNR's analysis of our situation.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 29th, 2011 at 10:21 AM

Title: Re: words to the west

Content:

Namdrol said:

but I am neither an eternalist nor a nihilist.

Adamantine said:

Yup I wouldn't peg you as either. . . but this isn't really about you... I mean there's not too many of you around.

Malcolm wrote:

I guess I object to the persistent stereotyping of Americans by Tibetans.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 29th, 2011 at 8:09 AM

Title: Re: Questions about energy

Content:

Namdrol said:

But....there are two kinds of buddhahood discussed in Dzogchen; buddhahood that reverts to the cause and the buddhahood that does not revert the cause.

Those whose buddhahood was incomplete can still fall into sentient being hood if they do not recognize the arising of the basis as being their own display.

Mr. G said:

Hi Namdrol,

Why do they call the Buddhahood that reverts to the cause Buddhahood if it's incomplete? Shouldn't another term be used? Does incomplete Buddhahood put one on the path to complete Buddhahood eventually?

Malcolm wrote:

There are, if you recall, three stages of Buddhahood. Since the first two stages of Buddhahood do not realized all phenomena as the display of their own wisdom, the eleventh and twelfth bhumi are not complete buddhahood, this true even in Sarma schools.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 29th, 2011 at 7:53 AM

Title: Re: words to the west

Content:

heart said:

Ah, I think no one have except maybe Tricycle. There was some conflict connected with this interview, can't remember what.

/magnus

Adamantine said:

You can see the conflict from reading Lama Tharchin's letter, and knowing the editorial bias of Tricycle in general, which is fairly obvious if you've ever looked at a few!

Silent Bob said:

There was actually a mini-scandal over the way the editor, Helen Tworikov, had manipulated Norbu Rinpoche's responses in the published copy of the interview to reflect badly on him and on Vajrayana in general. Tricycle lost quite a few subscribers, including myself, over that little lapse of judgement and I believe the magazine printed a carefully worded not-quite-apology afterward.

Chris

Malcolm wrote:

Yup -- you see, Tworokov, so I understand, was a disgrunteled ex-student of TNR's who had defected to Zen.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 29th, 2011 at 7:49 AM

Title: Re: words to the west

Content:

Adamantine said:

but hardly an over-exaggeration. . . at least, from my POV.

Malcolm wrote:

I am not a realized person, but I am neither an eternalist nor a nihilist.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 29th, 2011 at 7:13 AM

Title: Re: Bodhicitta Aim

Content:

Namdrol said:

You can say the same thing about watching porn.

catmoon said:

Different intentions, different results.

Malcolm wrote:

IN both cases, limitless samsara.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 29th, 2011 at 7:12 AM

Title: Re: Bodhicitta Aim

Content:

kirtu said:

Mind training, the basis of all of Buddhist practice, is valuable even if it starts as a contrived method.

Kirt

Malcolm wrote:

we are not talking about mind training -- at least I am not. I am talking about fake bodhicitta. It is better for people to admit that they don't want to attain buddhahood for all sentient beings if in fact they really do not have that kind of compassion.

Otherwise, bodhicitta just turns into a bunch pious foppery.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 29th, 2011 at 7:00 AM

Title: Re: Are sutra's to be taken literally?

Content:

kirtu said:

That's true but I was thinking of Mahayana sutras and I also threw in the "mostly".

As a concrete example, Atisha provides a Bodhisattva Vow practice in his Lamp on the Path. He meant literally that Manjushri had a former life as a monk named Ambaraja and that in that lifetime he took the Bodhisattva Vow quoted six times a day with his right knee bent, etc. This story and this practice quoted from a sutra are meant to be taken literally both as an actual practice from Bodhisattva Manjushri's former life and as a practice for us to do as well.

Kirt

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, I am sure he did.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 29th, 2011 at 6:29 AM

Title: Re: words to the west

Content:

kirtu said:

...but in general the second publication supported the statement in the original that basically most Western teachers were either nihilists or eternalists.

Kirt

Namdrol said:

A bit of of an over-exaggeration I'd say.

N

heart said:

I think the point is that without realization you will always tend to fall towards nihilism or eternalism.

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

Then the comment should have been extended to cover almost all Buddhist teachers.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 29th, 2011 at 6:19 AM

Title: Re: Bodhicitta Aim

Content:

sangyey said:

I also wanted to ask in this thread that Maitreya's definition of bodhicitta given in his Ornament for Clear Realization is to attain Buddhahood for the benefit of others but did the Buddha give a teaching on what bodhicitta is or as Kirt put it the extraordinary cause for Buddhahood? I mean Maitreya's definition is given a lot but I am uncertain where Buddha actually spoken or taught about such.

Malcolm wrote:

There are 22 types of bodhicitta mentioned in the beginning of the Abhisamaya-alamkara.

Basically, intellectually contrived bodhicitta is just a facsimile, since it does not have actual compassion as its basis.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 29th, 2011 at 6:17 AM

Title: Re: Are sutra's to be taken literally?

Content:

Huseng said:

Literature on precepts have seldom been taken literally, both in present times and historically.

kirtu said:

Well that depends too. The sutras dealing with precepts are mostly meant to be taken literally.

Malcolm wrote:

Not by Mahāyanists unless they are Mahāyana sutras, and even then, it depends.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 29th, 2011 at 6:16 AM

Title: Re: words to the west

Content:

kirtu said:

...but in general the second publication supported the statement in the original that basically most Western teachers were either nihilists or eternalists.

Kirt

Malcolm wrote:

A bit of of an over-exaggeration I'd say.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 29th, 2011 at 6:00 AM

Title: Re: Long Life Practices and Rites

Content:

rai said:

thank you Namdrol! very very helpful!

also i read on your blog that "...also when we consider the winds that course through the body and regulate sensory functions, the elements are present in those winds in an even more refined manner. And finally, we can understand that since the winds and the mind are inseparable, the four or five elements are even present in consciousness."

Is this why we can visualize the absorbing/restoring of the elements and it actually works?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes. As long as your practice is functioning well.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 29th, 2011 at 3:49 AM

Title: Re: Yes, the sutra's are to be taken literally?

Content:

Will said:

Most sutras these days are used as nests by insects.

N

Thus proceeds the Dharma Ending age, with Dharma Lite, denial of rebirth etc.

Malcolm wrote:

What I mean, Will, is that they are not read by anyone but people like myself, Huseng, Huifeng, and so on. There are thousands of copies of the Kenjur and Tenjur that just sit on shelves.

They are brought out once a year, their titles read, rewrapped, etc. eventually, not even this happens. Eventually, they just become bug nests. This is a commonly stated observation in Tibetan Buddhist texts.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 29th, 2011 at 3:13 AM

Title: Re: Are sutra's to be taken literally?

Content:

Will said:

Namdrol: You cannot follow all sutras, much less tantras, literally. It is completely impossible.

Quite true, but I did say or think that. What I do know is true (from 30 years of feeble practice) is that "One can follow literally & practice those parts of all shastras, sutras & tantras that fit one's present point on the path of stages." Or "One can follow literally & practice primarily one sutra or shastra or tantra."

Malcolm wrote:

The original question was "are sutras to be taken literally". The answer is no. They cannot be. There is too much internal contradiction in Buddhist texts for this ever to be possible.

Will said:

I didn't say texts were useless. But they have no life on their own, dharma solely lives in practice.

You do see the high possibility Namdrol, that putting "personal experience" as most important and teaching that the Tripitaka texts "have no life of their own" can easily be misunderstood as meaning that "texts are useless"?

Malcolm wrote:

On their own, texts are of little help. One needs a teacher. Why? Because a teacher has experience.

Will said:

After all, sutra recitation & sutra copying are ancient practices and cannot be done other than "literally". I will not even accept that sutras have "no life of their own". They are hardly as powerful as being in the presence of the author, but they are not dead piles of paper.

Malcolm wrote:

Most sutras these days are used as nests by insects.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 29th, 2011 at 1:23 AM

Title: Re: Are sutra's to be taken literally?

Content:

Will said:

Then the Tripitaka was a silly notion and Nagarjuna, Asanga, Chandrakirti, Je Tsongkhapa & hundreds of sages were fools to write or have their disciples write down their teachings and further advise the close study and pondering of said texts.

Malcolm wrote:

I didn't say texts were useless. But they have no life on their own, dharma solely lives in practice.

I say this Will, because as you know, I have read thousands and thousands of texts, and practiced for the past two decades.

For example, the real Kalacakra tanta is not the book. It is the experience of mandala. The real Prajñāpāramita is not the several volumes of texts in the Tripitika, it is experience of inexpressible emptiness. The real Vinaya is not the rules and stories about the rules, the real Vinaya is not harming sentient beings.

You cannot follow all sutras, much less tantras, literally. It is completely impossible.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 29th, 2011 at 12:44 AM

Title: Re: Are sutra's to be taken literally?

Content:

gregkavarnos said:

It seems that Namdrol is dealing with all Sutra in the same manner as the 6th Patriarch Huineng, when he advised the nun seeking explanations on the MahaParinirvana Sutra to look past the finger and see the moon.

Malcolm wrote:

Not just all sutras, all written texts.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 28th, 2011 at 10:31 PM

Title: Re: Are sutra's to be taken literally?

Content:

Will said:

Focusing on step one; it says put your personal experience of the literal Dharma first - not the person who explains it for you. But in order to do that, one must have enough confidence or faith in the plain sutra text as authoritative as is. The fact that we (most of us) deal with translations and much innate ignorance is no excuse for fobbing off responsibility for our initial understanding to another.

Step One: Follow the [scriptural buddha] dharma, not the person [who dazzles with his spin].

Malcolm wrote:

No, it is not saying follow the literal words of a given text. Dharma does not live in texts.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 28th, 2011 at 10:11 PM

Title: Re: Bodhicitta Aim

Content:

Namdrol said:

None. Completely inauthentic and not connected at all to sentient beings real situation, which is that they are suffering because they do not know their own nature.

All the contrived conceptual wishful thinking about how nice it would be to save sentient beings does not help them, or oneself, even one little bit.

I am not saying "don't be nice to people" -- of course one should be nice. But one shouldn't paint being decent with religious fantasies.

N

xabir said:

One of the major differences said to differentiate bodhisattva and arhat is that bodhisattva has bodhicitta, which I thought has to do with the aspiration for full Buddhahood and the wish to liberate other sentient beings. If you say bodhicitta is simply realizing one's true nature, what exactly then is the difference between an arhat and a bodhisattva?

Malcolm wrote:

You misss the point completely. Uncontrived bodhicitta is based on one's personal experience of the nature of the mind, and from that stems limitless compassion for others.

What I am saying is that intellectually cultivated bodhicitta is next to useless.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 28th, 2011 at 12:52 PM

Title: Re: Are sutra's to be taken literally?

Content:

Will said:

I am not advocating "reliance" only on scripture, but just in the four-fold sense, where the first step is literal acceptance, with deeper views coming later.

Malcolm wrote:

No, this leads to far too many contradictions because there are far too many contradictory sutras. For this reasons, in terms of sutra hermeneutics we are given the famous formula:

Follow the dharma, not the person;
the meaning, not the words;
the definitive meaning, not the provisional meaning;
wisdom, not conceptuality.

Again, the ultimate authority is personal experience.

In terms of what I offered you, since it is hard to understand the sutras and tantras, you need to rely on oral instruction. In order to rely on oral instruction, you need a teacher. But in order to confirm the teacher's instruction is correct, you need your experience of the path. So again, in the end, experience is the final authority in dharma.

And Buddha wanted it that way.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 28th, 2011 at 12:46 PM

Title: Re: Bodhicitta Aim

Content:

TMingyur said:

Not every concentration is right concentration

Malcolm wrote:

In terms of awakening, they are more or less the same.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 28th, 2011 at 12:38 PM

Title: Re: Bodhicitta Aim

Content:

Namdrol said:

Real bodhicitta comes from realizing your nature. The rest is just contrived bullshit conceptual bodhicitta that is of no use at all.

TMingyur said:

I would not express it so drastically. There certainly has been contrivance through reification of thought and further conceptual fabrications.

However if you take into account the teachings of the Buddha then you will recognize that practicing (conceptual) bodhicitta follows the scheme of entering into samadhi in that it follows the scheme of applied thought and sustained thought (vitakka/vicara).

Kind regards

Malcolm wrote:

You can say the same thing about watching porn.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 28th, 2011 at 12:29 PM

Title: Re: Bodhicitta Aim

Content:

Jangchup Donden said:
No use at all?

Malcolm wrote:
None. Completely inauthentic and not connected at all to sentient beings real situation, which is that they are suffering because they do not know their own nature.

All the contrived conceptual wishful thinking about how nice it would be to save sentient beings does not help them, or oneself, even one little bit.

I am not saying "don't be nice to people" -- of course one should be nice. But one shouldn't paint being decent with religious fantasies.

N

Author: Malcolm
Date: Wednesday, December 28th, 2011 at 11:56 AM
Title: Re: Bodhicitta Aim
Content:

Malcolm wrote:
Real bodhicitta comes from realizing your nature. The rest is just contrived bullshit conceptual bodhicitta that is of no use at all.

wisdom said:
Bodhicitta has many levels. The highest is "I will enlighten all beings" without any consideration of whether or not one is a Buddha beforehand. If one can't honestly cultivate this level of Bodhicitta one should still want to, and hope for a time when they have the resolve to do so.

Bodhicitta should be aroused before hearing, reading, practicing or teaching Dharma. Equally important is dedicating the merit accumulated from these actions (even reading WOMPT). In reference to why we dedicate merit and what happens if we do not, 'The Way of the Bodhisattva' says:

"All the good works gathered in a thousand ages,
Such as deeds of generosity,
And offerings to the Blissful Ones—
A single flash of anger shatters them."

And in regards to this passage, Dudjom Rinpoche states-

"It only takes a single cause for exhausting merit—a surge of intense anger directed toward a special object, or similarly a wrong view—for one's store of virtuous deeds to be depleted. But by dedicating them to enlightenment, they will never be exhausted but grow greater and greater."

So basically even the highest Bodhicitta aspiration will come to nothing without dedication.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 28th, 2011 at 11:33 AM

Title: Re: Are sutra's to be taken literally?

Content:

Will said:

Is not putting personal experience primary and written Dharma secondary, a fundamentalist view?

Malcolm wrote:

Nope. The Sakya school, for example, teaches four authorities: text, oral instruction, guru, and experience.

Of those four, it is only the last that confirms the first three as authoritative. This is why the buddha instructs us that he cannot remove our suffering, or hand us liberation, but only show us the path.

And for that reason, I instruct my students to rely on their experience rather than some words in a book. Why, because I am a practitioner who has confirmed the truth of the essence of the dharma in my own experience, and that was not based on some words in a book.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 28th, 2011 at 1:32 AM

Title: Re: Mandalas and your place in them/ Namdrol inspired thread

Content:

AlexanderS said:

Namdrol, are pure lands like sukhvati any less real to us with no realisation than places like our planet earth?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, since we live here and not there and we have no realization, which means we grasp as real that which we sense.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 28th, 2011 at 12:56 AM

Title: Re: Are sutra's to be taken literally?

Content:

gregkavarnos said:

So, like, in the good ol' days there was a fiction and non-fiction section in the Dharma library for readers to choose from then?

Malcolm wrote:

Well, there was a my sutra/not my sutra section.

You see this all the time in Indian scholastic debates where one person says in such and such as sutra it says x and the reponse is "we don't read that sutra so your point is irrelevant"

Sutras and tantras are secondary to personal experience. This is why a Buddhism fundamentalism is impossible. We can certainly use sutras to illustrate our points, but there is no settled 'canon'. Gzhan stong pas have their scriptures, Gelugs have theirs, Zen has another canon; Theravada theirs, etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 27th, 2011 at 11:57 PM

Title: Re: Long Life Practices and Rites

Content:

rai said:

regarding the Long Life practices and rites i was wondering is the life force the same as "life sustaining wind"? then how is it possible that we can restore or gather the life force (which is something physical) just by chanting or visualization?

wouldn't it have more sense to do some yoga and improve our diet instead of doing long life practices?

Malcolm wrote:

Good question.

Life force i.e. srog or jiv is connected with our tshe or ayus. Ayus refers to longevity, and to have a long life, we need to reinforce our jiv, our life force.

The reason we use an arrow during long life rites is that it is a symbol of the karmically projected span of our life i.e. in Abhidharma is states that longevity is like an arrow shot from a bow; and when the force impelling the arrow is exhausted, the arrow falls to the ground.

Now the principle of longevity is based on three factors: merit, karma, and life force itself. If you exhaust your merit you will die. If you meet with karmic circumstances, you will die. If you exhaust your life force, you will die.

One's merit is a factor in one's longevity, and so therefore, when one's longevity is threatened, merit-making activities can reinforce it, thus practice. This can also theoretically delay a karmic disease and so on. Also since one's life force is physical, yoga, prāṇāyāma, diet, and so on can reinforce it.

To answer your first question -- no, Jiv is not the same thing as prāṇā vāyu; however, without breathing you will quickly die, and so respiration is called "life sustaining" vāyu or wind. Jiv is associated with the heat of the body. When you cease breathing, your body slowly loses its heat which is the sign that you have lost your life and your life force is gone. Actually, your body starts losing its heat even before you die, and coldness in the extremities is a sign of death. You can read about signs of death, both distant and near in texts on the bardo as well as in the chapter on the signs of death in the translations of the medicine tantra.

N

Almost all major cycles of long-life practice have prāṇāyāma, rasāyāna and dietary recommendations, and all systems of yoga are oriented towards disease prevention and life-extension. So long life practices are a perfect combination of religious practice, yoga and diet which serve to extend life.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 27th, 2011 at 11:28 PM

Title: Re: Is ecumenical Buddhism realistic?

Content:

Unknown said:

Most Tibetan Buddhists I know take zero interest in things outside TB. They might be Gelug-pa and while Nyingma or Kagyu practices and teachings might be absorbed, they'd never think to go study under a Chan teacher. This isn't necessarily a bad thing, and I believe people should do what they feel appropriate given their karmic circumstances. Still, Buddhism underwent a massive holocaust in the last century (in the 19th century Buddhism was probably the largest religion in the world), and unity and fellowship is, in my mind, important to cultivate.

I suppose, though, it depends not so much on institutions, but people's karmic propensities and relations. Some feel great connection to Theravada and nothing else, others feel a connection only to TB and little else.

Malcolm wrote:

Once you have settled on whatever practice you are interested in, there is not much point, apart from academic interest, in pursuing other school's teachings.

Also there is a question of terminology and hermeneutics -- Sino-Japanese hermeneutics are not compatible to a large degree with Indo-Tibetan hermeneutics -- their interpretive criteria are simply too different to make comparisons meaningful. For example, take the perennial debate about Chan in Tibetan Buddhism. Anyone who has studied Dzogchen deeply knows that Dzogchen and Chan are not related. But for all of that, there is superficial rhetoric that causes people to consistently conflate the two.

Also the deep differences between Tibetan Buddhism and Sino-Japanese Buddhism sometimes render influences of one upon the other hard to see, for example, underlying current of debt Kagyu Mahāmudra systems own to Chan Buddhism via such texts as the Vajrasamadhi sutra. It is also a contention of certain Tibetan scholars that Chan is influenced by Dzogchen (via Tun Huang).

Whatever the case may be, what we usually observe is people moving through schools and practices until they find people they like and with whom they feel comfortable. I know many people who like Namkhai Norbu Rinpoche's teachings, but do not feel welcome in Dzogchen Community, and so they do not stay -- the DC simply does not address their emotional and social needs. And these two latter factors, the meeting of emotional and social needs, I would argue, are far more important than doctrine in terms of why people select the practices and lineages they do, over all.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 27th, 2011 at 11:07 PM

Title: Re: Origins of Amitabha

Content:

Son of Buddha said:

the pureabode isn't apart of the 3 realms of samsara; it's a place of NON RETURN NONE RETROGRESSION,

Namdrol said:

Perhaps in Theravada it is not considered part of the three realms. However, in Sarvastivada it is.

N

Huifeng said:

Still is in Theravada, too.

Though, non-return (anagamin) ≠ non-retrogression (avinivartaniya).

The former is a term for sravaka-phala, the latter as a stage on bodhisattva path.

~~ Huifeng

Malcolm wrote:

right, I know, but I don't think our friend, Buddhaputra, is much interested in listening to anyone.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 27th, 2011 at 11:06 PM

Title: Re: Origins of Amitabha

Content:

Son of Buddha said:

then the same can be said about those in amitayus pureland because they are not enlightened they have not eradicated all unusayas they are also still apart of the triple realm.

Namdrol said:

It is difficult to say that the buddhafiels are part of samsara. They are more like an inverse image of purgatory.

N

Ryoto said:

According to Dzogchen.

Malcolm wrote:

The notion of buddha fields is complicated -- there are pure buddha fields, like Sukhavati, and impure buddhafiels, like this Saha universe (Shakhyamuni's buddhafiels). Preparing a buddhafiels is part of the deeds of a bodhisattva -- and in the case of Bodhisattva Dipamkara, his buddhafiels, Sukhavati, came with certain gaurantees. One main difference between for example the Śuddhavasas, the realms of non-returns, and Sukhavati, is that one can take rebirth here or elsewhere.

There is of course a teaching about buddhafiels in Dzogchen, but it is quite different than this.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 27th, 2011 at 1:19 PM

Title: Re: Origins of Amitabha

Content:

Son of Buddha said:

in the bdk english tripitaka the 3 pureland sutras translated inagaki hisao on page 65 he translates amitayus pureland as PUREABODES

Malcolm wrote:

A buddha kṣetra is not a śuddhavaśa.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 27th, 2011 at 12:15 PM

Title: Re: Neuropathology and Buddhism?

Content:

steveb1 said:

He maintained that there is virtually nothing in the traditions/monastic orders or in the Dharma itself that deals with the mental effects of brain disease/brain injury.

Malcolm wrote:

This is because he has no knowledge of Tibetan medicine where brain injuries and nerve disorders are treated rather extensively.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 27th, 2011 at 8:53 AM

Title: Re: Bodhicitta in the Lam Rim Chen Mo

Content:

Konchog1 said:

In the last chapter of the Lam Rim Chen Mo, Lord Tsongkhapa says to develop experience in Bodhicitta and confirm it "with the rite" and then study the Bodhisattva deeds, what to discard and adopt, and to take the vow of engaged Bodhicitta.

So there are two separate Bodhisattva vows? One for Aspiring and one for Engaged?
What deeds? What should be discarded and adopted?

Thank you.

Malcolm wrote:

This is an novel position of Tsongkhapa's. In general, in the other schools it is sufficient to take the bodhisattva vow in the Madhyamaka tradition. But in Gelug, it is considered important to also supplement that with the Yogachara system.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 27th, 2011 at 8:46 AM

Title: Re: Ligmincha Institute : 2 Year Yeaching on Soul and Life-Force

Content:

Lhug-Pa said:

the Bonpo Soul and Lifeforce Retrieval practices could have some extra benefit that other Long-Life practices don't have.

Malcolm wrote:

Not really.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 27th, 2011 at 8:17 AM

Title: Re: Ligmincha Institute : 2 Year Yeaching on Soul and Life-Force

Content:

Lhug-Pa said:

The fact that this is a two-year training course that includes four five-day retreats, tells us that there's most likely more to it than what one would get out of other Long-Life practices.

Malcolm wrote:

These kinds of ritual arts are not so complicated.

Anyway people are free to do what they like.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 27th, 2011 at 6:53 AM

Title: Re: Ligmincha Institute : 2 Year Yeaching on Soul and Life-Force

Content:

Tenzin1 said:

Sounds like anti-Bon bias, to me. Sectarian rears its ugly head.

Malcolm wrote:

Why pay hundreds of dollars to learn a rite that is a common to almost every long life practice?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 27th, 2011 at 1:42 AM

Title: Re: Dbu ma rtsa ba shes rab kyi 'grel pa 'thad pai rgyan

Content:

Pema Rigdzin said:

Namdrol (and others),

I came upon this text, Dbu ma rtsa ba shes rab kyi 'grel pa 'thad pai rgyan by Rma bya Byang chub Brtson 'grus, published with an English translation as Ornament of Reason. It appears to be a line by line commentary by Rma bya of the Mulamadhyamaka-karikas, and since its author is Sakya and I've become quite a fan of Gorampa's Madhyamaka, I thought it might be in a similar vein and worth reading.

Any familiarity with this text and/or this particular translation? If so, do you recommend it?

Malcolm wrote:

Good read. Pre-sectarian Tibetan Madhyamaka.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 27th, 2011 at 12:09 AM

Title: Re: Are sutra's to be taken literally?

Content:

Huifeng said:

The only question then, is which sutras are which - and that's where most disagree.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, duh, it is the ones I like.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 27th, 2011 at 12:01 AM

Title: Re: My Reincarnation

Content:

kirtu said:

A compelling glimpse into Namkhai Norbu's life, family and activity and unintentionally an expose of the lack of maturity and confidence in many Westerners in Dharma Circles.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, December 26th, 2011 at 1:59 PM

Title: Re: Ligmincha Institute : 2 Year Yeaching on Soul and Life-Force

Content:

phantom59 said:

Ligmincha Institute is excited to announce a new two-year training program in Soul and Life-Force Retrieval. This unique program, offered in four five-day sessions in the spring and fall of 2012 and 2013, will provide the in-depth knowledge and experience needed to perform the Bon Buddhist practice of soul and life-force retrieval for oneself or, with the instructor's permission, for others <https://www.ligmincha.org/news-releases/soul-retrieval.html> "

onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

Malcolm wrote:

What a ripoff.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, December 26th, 2011 at 3:15 AM

Title: Re: Curing sesame oil

Content:

Nemo said:

Who makes good Ayurvedic massage oils? I still have my stash of ancient ones. Sandalwood and camphor and Himsagar Taila were two of my favourites. I have actual snake oil as well, an old Mogul recipe. Very effective.

What I would really love right now is Mahlakshmi Vilas Ras with Gold. But you have to be very careful who you buy alchemical medicines from. I used to love taking it when I was young with chandan nadi. You would almost glow and your whole body would smell of sandalwood. Then I went into a retreat eating only black mercury and warm milk and honey. Regained my health. I was so sickly before. Does anyone still do these things? Making money and getting a career was such a mistake. Now I am just bored, worn out and old. I should go back to being a Dharma bum as soon as my youngest daughter turn 20.

Malcolm wrote:

Sarada and Tri-health make the best that are available in the US.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, December 26th, 2011 at 3:11 AM

Title: Re: Is ecumenical Buddhism realistic?

Content:

Blue Garuda said:

Thanks. That also answers the point about one school's superiority over another, as Dzogchen seems outside of any school's 'ownership' and thus universally attainable with the right instruction and guru/disciple relationship.

Malcolm wrote:

Correct -- no one school "owns" Dzogchen, though since it entered Tibet in the old promulgation period, and is associated with the treasure tradition, it has come to be seen as a "Nyingma" teaching.

These days "Dzogchen" has come to be seen and treated as a "school", but this is incorrect. Dzogchen is a personal experience — not a school, not a religion, and not a philosophical position.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, December 26th, 2011 at 2:21 AM

Title: Re: Is ecumenical Buddhism realistic?

Content:

Blue Garuda said:

Does Dzogchen rely upon attainment of the nine yanas? If not, then is it 'above' or simply 'beyond' the nine? If not linked as a progression, then are the Nine and Dzogchen complementary or not associated at all, like a staircase and an elevator?

Namdrol said:

The nine yānas is one way of presenting Dzogchen i.e. as the result of a gradual progression.

But there there is Dzogchen proper, which is beyond the nine yānas because it and of itself, Dzogchen is not gradual in anyway.

N

Blue Garuda said:

Ah, thank you. I guess that equates to 'developmental' and 'revelatory', where the latter may occur at any time?

Malcolm wrote:

The latter is dependent on the instruction of the master and the confidence of the student.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, December 26th, 2011 at 2:18 AM

Title: Re: Hormonal imbalance

Content:

Mandarava said:

Can anyone tell me if T.M can help with hormonal imbalances in women?

Malcolm wrote:

Depends on what kind of imbalance you mean.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, December 26th, 2011 at 1:07 AM

Title: Re: Is ecumenical Buddhism realistic?

Content:

Blue Garuda said:

Does Dzogchen rely upon attainment of the nine yanas? If not, then is it 'above' or simply 'beyond' the nine? If not linked as a progression, then are the Nine and Dzogchen complementary or not associated at all, like a staircase and an elevator?

Malcolm wrote:

The nine yānas is one way of presenting Dzogchen i.e. as the result of a gradual progression.

But there there is Dzogchen proper, which is beyond the nine yānas because it and of itself, Dzogchen is not gradual in anyway.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 25th, 2011 at 11:47 PM

Title: Re: Is ecumenical Buddhism realistic?

Content:

gregkavarnos said:

While it is good to be honest, and I commend people for being so, it is also good to be tactful. If i am not aware that this is a basic analysis found in the Nyingma teachings then when somebody makes the statement it basically just sounds like they are puffed up full of pride, boastful and demeaning. For me it is a matter of tactfulness (look who's talking, many will say). I am sure that other schools and traditions also have their hierarchical analysis where they are numero uno, but to use it as a show piece?

Malcolm wrote:

But you see, here, in this forum, Greg, there is no one who does not understand what the Nyingam POV is, so there is no point in chiding Sonam for stating what we all know to be the case i.e. that the Nyingmapas place every practice on the nine yānas, and in fact, place Dzogchen above that nine yāna scheme.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 25th, 2011 at 11:42 PM

Title: Re: Dzogchen Study

Content:

Sönam said:

Sure you are all right ... it's just that I had recently a "hard" discussion with a Gelugpa on what is non conditioned, pretending that Dzogchen is so and so, using HHDL quotations.

Sönam

Malcolm wrote:

Well, a "Gelugpa", and a Gelug Dzogchen practitioner are entirely different animals. The former cannot be expected to understand Dzogchen.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 25th, 2011 at 11:35 PM

Title: Re: Madyamika Sautrantika vs Prasangika

Content:

Mariusz said:

Followers of non-sectarian Rime know the fact I posted above that Je Tsongkhapa had visions of Manjushri at least considering Yamantaka Single Hero practice of HYT.

Namdrol said:

This lineage actually starts with Lama Umapa. Nevertheless, it is preserved in Kongtrul's Dam sngags mdzod in the Kadampa section.

N

Mariusz said:

<http://www.scribd.com/doc/34036423/The-Union-of-Bliss-and-Emptiness-By-Dalai-Lama> page.24; The Union of Bliss and Emptiness. Teachings on the Practice of Guru Yoga by Dalai Lama:

Here is brief explanation of the short lineage. In secret biography by Jamyang Choje Tashi Pelden, Tsongkhapa had many visions of deities even as a child and after he came to central Tibet received many instructions from Manjushri. Then this transmission was handed down to Togden Jampel Gyatso...Then to Baso Chokyi Gyaltsen...then mahasiddha Chokyi Dorje...

Further Dalai Lama even wrote: Gelug as the practice of 3 types of Manjushris: Manjushri, Yamantaka, Kalarupa from Tsongkhapa

Malcolm wrote:

BTW, I was mistaken, the practice is preserved in Khyentse Wangpo's Collection of All Tantras, and it is as I said, the lineage starts with Umapa.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 25th, 2011 at 11:34 PM

Title: Re: Dzogchen view of Pure Land practice?

Content:

heart said:

In the bardo, if you don't recognize you nature in the luminous bardo of dhamatha which is like the primordial pure ground then the sounds, rays and lights will arise along with the peaceful and wrathful manifestations and this is like the ground manifestations. I guess you can call that wisdom display.

Malcolm wrote:

Sounds, lights and rays are the bardo of dharmatā. If you do not recognize those, then you pass into the bardo of rebirth.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 25th, 2011 at 2:27 PM

Title: Re: Origins of Amitabha

Content:

Son of Buddha said:

DOES EVERYONE UNDERSTAND NOW????????

Malcolm wrote:

We already understood.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 25th, 2011 at 11:51 AM

Title: Re: Origins of Amitabha

Content:

Son of Buddha said:

majjhima nikaya mahasihanada sutta 12 the pureabodes is not apart of the 5 transmigrations of rebirth in fact once u get to the pureabodes u dont EVER have to be reborn again verse 57-59

Malcolm wrote:

Once you get to the Pure abodes you never have to be reborn in the desire realm again -- that is the meaning of "never-returner", as opposed to say "once returner". It does not mean that the pure abodes are not in the triple realm. They are.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 25th, 2011 at 11:47 AM

Title: Re: Origins of Amitabha

Content:

Son of Buddha said:

the pureabode isnt apart of the 3 realms of samsarasan its a place of NON RETURN NONE RETROGRESSION,

Malcolm wrote:

Perhaps in Theravada it is not considered part of the three realms. However, in Sarvastivada it is.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 25th, 2011 at 11:46 AM

Title: Re: Origins of Amitabha

Content:

Son of Buddha said:

then the same can be said about those in amitayus pureland because they are not enlightened they have not eradicated all unusayas they are also still apart of the triple realm.

Malcolm wrote:

Actually, the point of Amitabha's "pureland" (the term is a misnomer which derives from Chinese Buddhism) is that one does not even have to be a stream entrant to be reborn there. This, of course, is the general appeal of Buddhakṣetra buddhafiels doctrine of Mahāyāna (for example, Sukhavati), as opposed to the Pure Abodes common to the Shravaka schools.

A buddhakṣetra does not require stream entry or attainment of the first bhumi, or anything beyond faith in the Buddha that cultivated that buddhafiels. It is the same for Bhaisajyaguru's buddhafiels, Akaṣobhya's, and so on.

It is difficult to say that the buddhafiels are part of samsara. They are more like an inverse image of purgatory.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 25th, 2011 at 11:23 AM

Title: Re: Origins of Amitabha

Content:

Son of Buddha said:

hey namdrol

no thats incorrect a once returner comes back to the realms of human one more time one who goes to the pureabodes/pureland is a (NONE RETURNER) who will not return to samsarasana but will stay in the pureabodes till he reaches enlightenment he stays in a state of non retrogression.

Malcolm wrote:

You just agreed with what I said, only anagamins (never returners) can take birth in the pure abodes. They are still part of the triple realm however, because one has not eradicated all anusayas.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 25th, 2011 at 11:00 AM

Title: Re: Origins of Amitabha

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

In order to be reborn in the pure abodes one must be a never-returner.

N

Son of Buddha said:
hey mister g man

actually not quite in the majjhima nikaya(i used to be thervadan before i became mayahana) the pure abodes is a realm of gods JUST like amitayus pureland(we are reborn as gods in amitayus pureland as his vow we will all receive vajra god bodies) in sources i posted in the pali in samsarasan we will be reborn in either hell,ghosts,animnals,human,gods these are the realms of samsdara the PUREABODES is seperated from the 5 transmigrations and is given its own realm (strictly for Buddhists with faith)(the desrtuction of the fetter of DOUBT)(true faith) the pure abodes is a palce of non-retrogression just like mahayana pureland it is a place where you go and are NEVER reborn back to samsara it is a resting place for people till they become enlightened there.

the other source i gave you was of a laity man who died (killed by a cow) and was reborn in the pure abodes to stay till he became a Buddha.

the pureland and pureabodes is the same thing (abodes) TRANSLATES to (land) from sanscrit to the chinese launguge(pureland/pureabodes) so the pureland can be found in the pali canon in every single nikaya the only thing that is different is the 5 fetters must be desroyed and the mahayana warns of the 5 burnings (same things) the amitayaus pureland is easier to get into.

so the foundation of pureland can be found in all Buddhist suttas/sutras (amitayus cannot be found in tbhe pali canon but the pureloand(abodes) can be found in them.

peace and love

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 25th, 2011 at 9:59 AM

Title: Re: How do demon like beings operate acording to Budhism?

Content:

steveb1 said:

1) But can't beings be released from Karma by a Buddha or an enlightened being?

Malcolm wrote:

No.

steveb1 said:

Didn't Buddha essentially liberate the infamous killer who made a necklace with the fingers of his victims... as well as liberating in this life... many other people?

Malcolm wrote:

All a buddha can do is give you teachings. The rest is up to you.

steveb1 said:

If the above propositions are generally correct, then is it unreasonable to think that some demons can be liberated, if not while existing in a hell realm, but - say - from a living person by way of exorcism? If memory serves, is not Tibetan Buddhism deeply infused with native Himalayan shamanism? And doesn't shamanism's chief concern lie in knowing the spirits, living, dead, good, bad, theriomorphic/totemistic, etc . . . and being deliberately possessed by spirits (the famous "Oracle" scene in Kundun comes to mind) - as well as performing exorcisms?

Malcolm wrote:

In point of fact, it is rather the other way around. Tantric Buddhist ritual provided a structure and syntax around which Himalayan "shamans" constructed many rites derived from Buddhism. But to some extent it was also a two way street, with aboriginal peoples in India and the Himalayas being influenced by Tantric ritual and influencing Tantric ritual. It is mostly the former, however, and not the latter.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 25th, 2011 at 6:39 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen Study

Content:

pemachophel said:

Sonam-la,

Someone has already answered about H.H.'s being Gelugpa and a Dzogchen practitioner/Teacher. Are you suggesting being a monk is somehow antithetical to being a "real" Dzogchenpa?

Sönam said:

Being a monk not ... being a Gelugpa possibly, because of particular Gelugpa's view about what is "real"

Sönam

Malcolm wrote:

Sonam,

Jigme Lingpa's Madhyamaka view was Gelug, as was Shabkar's -- so it is pretty clear that one can hold Gelug Madhyamaka view and still be a realized Dzogchen practitioner.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 25th, 2011 at 6:33 AM

Title: Re: Is ecumenical Buddhism realistic?

Content:

Namdrol said:

People can always find a reason not to like something.

gregkavarnos said:

This is soooooooo... true, but my issue is: why GIVE them a reason?

Malcolm wrote:

Because, if you dissemble, pretend that you think everyone's practice is the same, people will eventually find out you are schmoozing and they will think you are dishonest.

If you take the other approach, which is to admit up front that our tradition has some major triumphalist rhetoric, then people may not like it, but they can't fault you later when they do find out that it is true.

In other words, since this type of hierarchical approach to Buddhist teachings exist in Tibetan Buddhism from the start, it is better to just be open about it.

Now, you personally may not buy into it, but since the nine yānas hierarchy is there, and since it is embedded into our tradition, it is a little too much to insist that people not speak from the point of view of the teachings they follow. To be quite honest with you, as far as I am concerned, it gives an honest assessment, if terse, of the key points of the teachings of various schools and shows what their limitations are.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 25th, 2011 at 5:34 AM

Title: Re: Is ecumenical Buddhism realistic?

Content:

gregkavarnos said:

Let's, for the sake of the discussion, say that the stated hierarchy is actually objective and valid. That it is a true hierarchisation based on objective praxis. Even if that were the case, if one was interested in a truly ecumenical approach to Buddhism based on mutual respect of each tradition and the practitioners in each tradition (individuals that truly believe that what they are doing is valid, useful AND leading to ultimate liberation) wouldn't it be more "intelligent" or "diplomatic" to not publicly state the position?

Malcolm wrote:

All Yanas are valuable and useful, hence the term "yāna".

The best approach is honesty. Everyone thinks their version of Buddhism is the best, otherwise, they would not practice it. A true ecumenical spirit recognizes this. We are not trying to sell anything. Your stated approach seems to bear with it a concern for the consumer. The reality is that people wind up with the practice and teachers they have a connection with and no other.

Whether it is three yānas of the new tantra school, or the nine yānas of Nyingma, and so on, we don't need to worry about people being turned off to this or that. People can always find a reason not to like something.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 25th, 2011 at 4:52 AM

Title: Re: Is ecumenical Buddhism realistic?

Content:

Namdrol said:

He didn't. He made a standard remark about the relationship between the nine yānas and the two accumulations.

gregkavarnos said:

Yes, just that the standard remark is derogatory, since the standard is not exactly a standard, but a particular subjective view of the relationship of the nine yana to the two accumulations. One that sets a hierarchy of capacity and ability.

Malcolm wrote:

Greg:

The nine yānas sets out a heirarchy of capacity and ability. That is the whole point of the system -- to grade various Buddhist practices in a hierarchy.

They are not arbitrary assignations, incidentally, but assignations found in the tantras.

If you want to consider the Nyingma system derogatory, please go ahead by all means. And yes, Vipassana, Madhyamaka, Zen, Pure Land, Kriya Tantra, Yoga Tantra and so on all find their place within the nine yānas somewhere, and of course, none of them are at the head of it.

N

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 25th, 2011 at 4:01 AM

Title: Re: Madyamika Sautrantika vs Prasangika

Content:

Tom said:

Since for Tsongkhapa the ultimate truth and conventional truth are two different aspects (conceptual identities) of one ontological entity why should this follow? Just because we see one aspect of an entity why should it follow that we perceive all the other aspects?

I would have expected instead the critique that this position holds emptiness as not beyond existence and non-existence, but as existent.

Malcolm wrote:

I was addressing the notion that the two truths were one entity.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 25th, 2011 at 3:56 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen Study

Content:

asunthatneversets said:

And also be keen on distinguishing Dzogchen from the lower vehicles. Don't get caught up in the bullshit.

Namdrol said:

Lower vehicles are not bullshit.

N

asunthatneversets said:

Whoa! Never said the lower vehicles are bullshit... What's going on in this thread?! I'm in the misconstrued twilight zone

Malcolm wrote:

Your statement is not very clear.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Saturday, December 24th, 2011 at 11:24 PM
Title: Re: Dzogchen Study
Content:

asunthatneversets said:

And also be keen on distinguishing Dzogchen from the lower vehicles. Don't get caught up in the bullshit.

Malcolm wrote:
Lower vehicles are not bullshit.

N

Author: Malcolm
Date: Saturday, December 24th, 2011 at 1:24 AM
Title: Re: Madyamika Sautrantika vs Prasangika
Content:

Namdrol said:

But false perception is mthong brdzun, so what Candrakirti is clearly saying is that false/faulty/incorrect perception is relative, or totally obscuring, truth.

5heaps said:

seems like this blockhead understanding of Chandra leads to the following idea:

Namdrol said:

The two truths are about how objects are perceived. They can be perceived in only two ways, correctly and incorrectly. Perceiving them incorrectly, a false perception of them is called relative truth. The word brdzun pa means "to lie" as well.

5heaps said:

for in gelugpa the two truths are divisions of reality. what do you think about the two truths being 1 entity? for me it seems super air-tight so it would be good if you could find a sharp barb to sink in!

Malcolm wrote:

If the two truths are one entity, seeing relatives truth would be seeing ultimate truth and all commoners would always have correct perception.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 22nd, 2011 at 3:50 AM

Title: Re: Branding and Buddhist Institutions

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Things won't get fixed in the US because there is too much money to make with things being broken.

However, it is really not as bad as you think. You just happen to live in one of the the worst parts of the US.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 22nd, 2011 at 3:46 AM

Title: Re: Garlic, leeks and onions

Content:

Blue Garuda said:

You cite Hevajra as an example and write that the level is the key -just to check, would this be true for any HYT practice such as Vajrayogini?

Malcolm wrote:

I think if you are an HYT practitioner, you can eat whatever you like, meat, garlic, etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 22nd, 2011 at 3:23 AM

Title: Re: Questions about energy

Content:

Namdrol said:

The whole point of rang byung is that it arises from your own state.

N

gad rgyangs said:

ye shes/rig pa does not arise from your own state, it is your own state. since it is uncaused, it is described as "rang byung"

Malcolm wrote:

If you insist. I gave you a countervailing example -- but have it your way.

Incidentally, there is no contradiction.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 22nd, 2011 at 3:22 AM

Title: Re: Questions about energy

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

only if its a bad translation, or if the word is untranslatable, in which case it is usually left in the source language.

Malcolm wrote:

Not true. This is why the explanation of any translated Dharma text requires special skills.

One has to strike a balance between readability and over-glossing a term. In many cases, it is better to select a simple translation that indicates to the explainer a broader range of meaning, which then can act as a hook to remind the person who has received the explanation of the text in question of the broader explanation.

Take a term like mngon sum. It means completely different things depending on how it is used -- but in general, always refers to actually witnessing an event. Sometimes, as in logic, direct perception is better. Sometimes, like when discussing a visionary experience, "personally saw guru rinpoche" meaning that Guru P actually showed up and you saw him in person, as opposed to a dream. Or in Dzogchen, when discussing the first of the four visions, here it means having a personal experience of vidyā as a visual phenomena, seeing a thigle.

In the latter case, if you translate chos nyid mgon sum as direct perception of dharmatā, someone who has no idea about Dzogchen will understand this to be a reference the path of seeing (which it is not). For that matter, even the meaning of dharmatā is different, which is why in so many dzogchen texts, when discussing dharmatā ala sutra style, the term stong pa nyid is always appended i.e. chos nyid stung pa nyid, to make the distinction between dharmatā as ye shes or rig pa in the visions.

Ideally of course you would want everything to be easily understood, but in practice this is far more difficult than you imagine. Something simple has to be explained beyond the translation equivalent you select.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 22nd, 2011 at 3:04 AM

Title: Re: Questions about energy

Content:

Namdrol said:

Anyone who really understands how rang byung is being used in these texts would read it that way. rang byung ye shes is so called because it does not arise from other than one's own experience, it is not given to you, it does not arise from someone's instruction, etc. It is the wisdom that comes from within oneself. Vida the fourth empowerment of Hevajra "You yourself are its father".

gad rgyangs said:

I'm sure that ChNNR understands how it is being used in the texts, but that is not the way he translates it.

Malcolm wrote:

How things are translated and what they mean are two entirely different things.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 22nd, 2011 at 3:03 AM

Title: Re: Questions about energy

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

also, isn't saying "the wisdom that arises from oneself/one's self" problematic because A) surely it doesn't arise from the conventional self, and what other kind of self is there? and B) the whole point of rang byung is it is arisen without causes or conditions, and your rendering is in an "A arises from B" format.

Malcolm wrote:

The whole point of rang byung is that it arises from your own state.

When you have read sufficient amount of texts this will be more clear to you. For now, just go with the conventional reading.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 22nd, 2011 at 3:01 AM

Title: Re: Questions about energy

Content:

Namdrol said:

The basis is not rigpa.

gad rgyangs said:

you said earlier:

at the time vāyu stirred in the basis, the three wisdoms were not recognized wisdoms = ye shes? If ye shes/rig pa is a "knowingness", then who or what did or didn't recognize them?

Malcolm wrote:

Wisdom = ye shes.

This is a subtle point of Dzogchen most people do not pay attention to. There is very little difference between Dzogchen cosmology and Abhidharma cosmology. But there is a slight difference. In Dzogchen cosmology all sentient beings achieve buddhahood.

But....there are two kinds of buddhahood discussed in Dzogchen; buddhahood that reverts to the cause and the buddhahood that does not revert the cause.

Those whose buddhahood was incomplete can still fall into sentient being hood if they do not recognize the arising of the basis as being their own display.

According to the commentary on the རྟུན་ལྗོངས་ཀྱི་འཕྲུལ་རྒྱུ་ by Garab Dorje in the Vima Nyinthig, the basis arises because of traces of latent affliction and action left over from the previous eon. At that time, one either recognizes the stirring of the basis or not.

N

When the

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 22nd, 2011 at 2:52 AM

Title: Re: Questions about energy

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

yes like in the chod sadhana where it says that beings are in samsara due to not recognizing "rang byung gi rig pa" as the ultimate refuge,

Namdrol said:

This should be read as "the vidyā that arises from oneself", and is how I read it.

N

gad rgyangs said:

interesting. is that an original reading or would 4 out of 5 Lopons recommend it?

Malcolm wrote:

Anyone who really understands how rang byung is being used in these texts would read it that way. rang byung ye shes is so called because it does not arise from other than one's own experience, it is not given to you, it does not arise from someone's instruction, etc. It is the wisdom that comes from within oneself. Vida the fourth empowerment of Hevajra "You yourself are its father".

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 22nd, 2011 at 2:49 AM

Title: Re: Questions about energy

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

If its the same, then is it holographic, as in each individual (rang) rig pa is the "same" as the whole, or is there a hypostatization of "miniature" rig pas "proceeding" from the "big daddy" rig pa?

Namdrol said:

Everyone's knowledge is unique to them, so there is no "big daddy" rigpa

gad rgyangs said:

so what is the rig pa of the basis?

Malcolm wrote:

Your individual knowledge of the basis. The basis is not rigpa.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 22nd, 2011 at 2:43 AM

Title: Re: Questions about energy

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

If its the same, then is it holographic, as in each individual (rang) rig pa is the "same" as the whole, or is there a hypostatization of "miniature" rig pas "proceeding" from the "big daddy" rig pa?

Malcolm wrote:

Everyone's knowledge is unique to them, so there is no "big daddy" rigpa

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 22nd, 2011 at 2:42 AM

Title: Re: Questions about energy

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

yes like in the chod sadhana where it says that beings are in samsara due to not recognizing "rang byung gi rig pa" as the ultimate refuge,

Malcolm wrote:

This should be read as "the vidyā that arises from oneself", and is how I read it.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 22nd, 2011 at 2:09 AM

Title: Re: Branding and Buddhist Institutions

Content:

kirtu said:

Now Americans can't produce anything of quality because the focus is strictly on lowering costs.

Namdrol said:

Americans can't produce anything because the manufacturing jobs have all left.

kirtu said:

No - American's in general can't produce anything of quality because of the exact reasons I gave. The managers and accountants justify everything based on time to market and costs of improving quality, etc.

Kirt

Malcolm wrote:

This applies everywhere in the world -- the quality of goods worldwide has gone downhill, not just in the US.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 22nd, 2011 at 1:17 AM

Title: Re: syllables on bell

Content:

dakini_boi said:

What are the 8 syllables that go around the the bell, and what do they signify? Thanks.

Malcolm wrote:

depends on tradition.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Thursday, December 22nd, 2011 at 1:15 AM
Title: Re: Is ecumenical Buddhism realistic?
Content:

gregkavarnos said:
Don't you think that it's strange that you feel justified in making derogatory comments about practitioners of other traditions

Malcolm wrote:
He didn't. He made a standard remark about the relationship between the nine yānas and the two accumulations.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Thursday, December 22nd, 2011 at 1:04 AM
Title: Re: Branding and Buddhist Institutions
Content:
Namdrol said:
And take for example the "organic" brand. Given two tomatoes in a market, side by side -
- which will you choose? Organic or non-organic?

kirtu said:
Given no other information I would pick the organic tomatos.

Malcolm wrote:
Exactly.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Thursday, December 22nd, 2011 at 1:01 AM
Title: Re: Branding and Buddhist Institutions
Content:
kirtu said:
Now Americans can't produce anything of quality because the focus is strictly on lowering costs.

Malcolm wrote:
Americans can't produce anything because the manufacturing jobs have all left.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Thursday, December 22nd, 2011 at 12:50 AM
Title: Re: Garlic, leeks and onions
Content:
Adamantine said:

It clearly makes someone super stinky, so yes, it pollutes the air. It is the equivalent to noshing on a skunk.

In addition, in Ayurvedic and yogic theory it raises the passions-- i.e. increases the intensity of desire and anger, etc. which generally for Yogis is not considered a positive thing.

If one has developed some capacity to transform the passions in the highest yoga tantras of Vajrayana, then I would imagine this is a reason why one may be encouraged to eat more meat, garlic, etc. . because you need fuel for the fire so to speak.

It is also generally considered to reduce the power of one's mantra, yes... but this is also probably due to how it affects the subtle nerves, and is related to how it is considered to raise the passions, etc.

I am sure Namdrol could explain from a Tibetan Medical perspective, if he hasn't already in another thread. In this <http://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=40&t=5006&hilit=garlic> thread he mentioned it is used medicinally in Tibetan Medicine... but I suppose this may be the same as in ayurveda: it is a medicine for certain conditions but it is not considered to be a good food.

Malcolm wrote:

If you are a Hevajra practitioner, for example, you have no dietary restrictions at all -- you can eat anything. But if you are a lower tantra Tara practitioner, you have many. Food restrictions are specific to which level you are practicing at.

Garlic and onions are frowned upon mostly because they smell bad and are associated with lower castes.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 22nd, 2011 at 12:41 AM

Title: Re: Branding and Buddhist Institutions

Content:

kirtu said:

I don't see how branding creates a perception of limited supply at all. A brand implies that there will be a continuing supply of whatever they are marketing.

Malcolm wrote:

I can't help your lack of vision.

Not necessarily.

And take for example the "organic" brand. Given two tomatoes in a market, side by side -
- which will you choose? Organic or non-organic?

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 22nd, 2011 at 12:27 AM

Title: Re: The Neurotic Zen of Mint

Content:

mint said:

I don't believe that instant presence is possible, but it makes for good reading.

Malcolm wrote:

Without instant presence, reading would not be possible.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 22nd, 2011 at 12:22 AM

Title: Re: Branding and Buddhist Institutions

Content:

Namdrol said:

The purpose of branding is to create demand. Branding creates a perception of limited supply, hence ramping up demand.

gregkavarnos said:

Or the perception of a qualitative difference where no fundamental qualitative difference exists.

Malcolm wrote:

Agreed.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 22nd, 2011 at 12:10 AM

Title: Re: Branding and Buddhist Institutions

Content:

kirtu said:

But supply and demand function outside of some complexity about a item for sale or trade. This has nothing whatsoever to do with branding.

If I frequent a market and tomato seller X has the lowest prices and the freshest tomatos then I buy from them one week. If next week tomato seller Y has the tomatos according to my criteria then I buy from them. The tomato sellers are trying to sell their tomatos to me in response to a perceived demand by me and others. In no way has branding taken place.

The case of branding would be if I am habitually attached to a particular seller for some reason.

Kirt

Malcolm wrote:

The purpose of branding is to create demand. Branding creates a perception of limited supply, hence ramping up demand.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 21st, 2011 at 11:48 PM

Title: Re: Branding and Buddhist Institutions

Content:

Jikan said:

but merely that the intensity and the particular qualities by which this sort of thing goes on now is conditioned by commodity-logic. By consumerism, in you like that language better.

kirtu said:

Nothing has changed. Commodity logic has always driven human activities, all of them.

Malcolm wrote:

How would you define commodity logic? Just reacting by liking something or being attached to it for some reason isn't a form of logic although we can propose rules and advance explanations for this behavior (already done in psychology and economics).

Kirt[/quote]

Supply and demand...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 21st, 2011 at 11:44 PM

Title: Re: Sex in pureland?

Content:

gregkavarnos said:

I think that you will find that in the abovementioned tantra the yogi is to go beyond the objectification of all dualising discrimination ... 7.jpg

Malcolm wrote:

The padmini is not explicitly described in this tantra, however, like them all it says to the male student:

"Now then, one should offer the attractive, youthful, decorated female prajñā" etc.

As to your general point, yes, all women are to be regarded as embodiments of yogini, just as all men are to be regarded as embodiments of heruka.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 21st, 2011 at 11:22 PM

Title: Re: Questions about energy

Content:

Namdrol said:

For the most part, in Dzogchen, rang byung often just means "comes from oneself", and rang rig nearly always just means "one's knowledge".

N

gad rgyangs said:

rung byung ye shes usually refers to the basis, no? rig pa is associated with individual sentient beings? what exactly is the relationship between the two, or are they synonyms?

Malcolm wrote:

As for one, not necessarily -- but you know, you have to find a context. As for two, yes.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 21st, 2011 at 11:17 PM

Title: Re: PTSD

Content:

Paul said:

How does Tibetan Medicine deal with PTSD and how effective is it? A relative of mine may go to see a Tibetan doctor about it, so I thought I'd get some information.

Malcolm wrote:

There is no specific diagnosis for PTSD; but whatever associated disorders of the "humors" there are can be treated.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 21st, 2011 at 12:18 PM

Title: Re: Questions about energy

Content:

Namdrol said:

In any case, the essential point is that vidyā and avidyā are completely different. Avidyā depends on vidyā in the sense that the three wisdoms of the basis are the "cause" of ignorance. They are the cause of ignorance in the sense that at the time vāyu stirred in the basis, the three wisdoms were not recognized and samsara and nirvana started from that point.

gad rgyangs said:

If the basis is prior to rigpa/marigpa, then is there no sense of knowing-ness/awareness/cognizance/ye shes in the basis? how would one account for the innate responsiveness (thugs rje) if there is no cognizance? How does the (rang byung) ye shes (wisdom/gnosis) of the basis relate to the rang rig (pa) of sentient beings?

Malcolm wrote:

As for your first question, the basis possesses a "shes pa lung ma bstan", a neutral awareness -- when the lights are recognized as one's own appearances, that neutral awareness becomes discriminating wisdom (shes tab); when not, that neutral awareness becomes consciousness.

For the most part, in Dzogchen, rang byung often just means "comes from oneself", and rang rig nearly always just means "one's knowledge".

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 21st, 2011 at 8:48 AM

Title: Re: Sex in pureland?

Content:

Namdrol said:

Nevertheless, the definition of the ideal woman partner, laid out in countless tantras, is the padmini i.e. prominent, large breasts, narrow waist, etc., i.e., completely sexist.

N

simhanada said:

i.e. Dolly Parton.....

Malcolm wrote:

I think this is more what they had in mine:

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 21st, 2011 at 8:34 AM

Title: Re: Questions about energy

Content:

Namdrol said:

First, this is defining the all-basis, based on a citation from the sgra thal gyur:

The definition: "all" (kun) is a collection;
basis (gzhi) is accumulating and gathering...

So here, ignorance is being defined as the all-basis. When that all basis is divided into four, the first is "...the ever-present actual all-basis is the aspect that arose at the same time on top of vidyā from the start, like gold and tarnish, the avidyā that depends on vidyā (rig pa la ltos nas ma rig pa), i.e."

The point is not different than what I outlined above, there is never ignorance in the basis; even though ignorance can cover over the basis. That ignorance is called the "all-basis". The basis and the all-basis are completely different.

After giving the definitions of the four types of all-basis, Longchenpa then goes on to analyze assertions such as the assertion that the all-basis is stained vidyā, etc.

gad rgyangs said:

the point that interests me is the "arose at the same time" and "from the start" (ye thog dang po'i dus nas). Otherwise, there is this implicit assumption that "first" there was vidya, then there was a "fall" and then you get "avidya". To say that they arose together from the very first does not mean that there is avidya in vidya, but rather that they are inseparable. No samsara without nirvana, no nirvana without samsara.

Malcolm wrote:

Of course they arose together -- there was a state prior to both. When Samantabhadra recognized his state, we did not recognize ours.

Actually, an argument can be made that avidyā precedes vidyā because even Samantabhadra experienced the innate ignorance.

In any case, the essential point is that vidyā and avidyā are completely different. Avidyā depends on vidyā in the sense that the three wisdoms of the basis are the "cause" of ignorance. They are the cause of ignorance in the sense that at the time vāyu stirred in the basis, the three wisdoms were not recognized and samsara and nirvana started from that point.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 21st, 2011 at 4:52 AM

Title: Re: Sex in pureland?

Content:

gregkavarnos said:

Funnily enough you laid the trap via your narrow definition of what the positive characteristics and attributes of a woman are. The feminine wisdom element of the dakini is to be found in ALL female forms.

Malcolm wrote:

Nevertheless, the definition of the ideal woman partner, laid out in countless tantras, is the padmini i.e. prominent, large breasts, narrow waist, etc., i.e., completely sexist.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 21st, 2011 at 4:41 AM

Title: Re: Conceptuality in Buddhism

Content:

Tom said:

So I understood you - for you the Nirmanakaya is uncaused.

gregkavarnos said:

Seems, to me, to be uncaused. I am open to other options if you care to explain them.

My thought was that this position is difficult to hold if you consider the Nirminakaya as the appearance to an ordinary mind.

Appearance of a manifestation. Theoretically (and once again, please correct me if I am wrong) for one to sense, there has to be a sense object.

Just to be clear, I am making this st up as I go along based on my meager knowledge. Please feel free to prove me wrong.

Malcolm wrote:

In general Mahāyāna, the dharmakāya comes from the wisdom accumulation while the rūpakāya (both the sambhogakāya and the nirmankāya) arise from the accumulation of merit.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 21st, 2011 at 3:47 AM

Title: Re: Branding and Buddhist Institutions

Content:

Namdrol said:

Nothing has changed. Commodity logic has always driven human activities, all of them.

gregkavarnos said:

I disagree, there were, and are, countless and constant instances of non "commodity logic" based societies (and individual actions) throughout human history.

Malcolm wrote:

Let me rephrase, in societies with markets (most agricultural societies, the only ones Buddhism has evolved in), commodity logic has driven most human activities.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 21st, 2011 at 3:00 AM

Title: Re: Branding and Buddhist Institutions

Content:

Jikan said:

but merely that the intensity and the particular qualities by which this sort of thing goes on now is conditioned by commodity-logic. By consumerism, in you like that language better.

Malcolm wrote:

[/quote]

Nothing has changed. Commodity logic has always driven human activities, all of them.

The struggle between the terma tradition and the important new translation schools is an instance of consumer appeal.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 21st, 2011 at 2:44 AM

Title: Re: Sex in pureland?

Content:

gregkavarnos said:

but just for the firmness of their posterior, or the size of their breasts,

Malcolm wrote:

They're out there.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 21st, 2011 at 2:43 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchenpa by Accident?

Content:

Namdrol said:

Annihilationism is the assertion that something existent becomes non-existent.

dakini_boi said:

Thank you, Namdrol. I'm still a bit confused - I thought nihilism was defined as the view that nothing exists. (which ignores the fact that things do appear) But I gather from your posting, this is an imprecise definition?

Malcolm wrote:

Ucchedavada (literally "advocating cutting off") is the view that an entity which exists (such as a self) becomes non-existent (thus negating rebirth, karma and so on).

If you cannot find any existent there is no reason to propose non-existence.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 21st, 2011 at 2:16 AM

Title: Re: Questions about energy

Content:

Namdrol said:

Wisdom can serve as a "cause" for ignorance in the sense that it comes from the non-recognition of wisdom. But even the example you give shows that ignorance is not a part of wisdom no more than the tarnish is a part of the gold.

Also you did not provide enough of the citation -- you need to supply what comes after the ལྟེན་, in order for me to understand the entire sense of the passage (or a page number).

N

gad rgyangs said:

i've attached the page 53v. Isn't it saying though that the rigpa and marigpa are equally primordially arisen? like two sides of the same coin?

Malcolm wrote:

First, this is defining the all-basis, based on a citation from the sgra thal gyur:

The definition: "all" (kun) is a collection;
basis (gzhi) is accumulating and gathering...

So here, ignorance is being defined as the all-basis. When that all basis is divided into four, the first is "...the ever-present actual all-basis is the aspect that arose at the same time on top of vidyā from the start, like gold and tarnish, the avidyā that depends on vidyā (rig pa la ltos nas ma rig pa), i.e."

The point is not different than what I outlined above, there is never ignorance in the basis; even though ignorance can cover over the basis. That ignorance is called the "all-basis". The basis and the all-basis are completely different.

After giving the definitions of the four types of all-basis, Longchenpa then goes on to analyze assertions such as the assertion that the all-basis is stained vidyā, etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 21st, 2011 at 1:46 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchenpa by Accident?

Content:

Namdrol said:

The nature of appearances is empty, that is correct. But then you have to ask the question: do appearances arise? They seem to , but do they? Do appearances remain, they seem to, but do they? Appearances seem to vanish. They seem to, but do they? When you understand that appearances do not arise, remain, or vanish, then you understand the emptiness of appearances. If appearances do not in reality arise, remain or vanish, how could their emptiness arise, remain or vanish?

N

dakini_boi said:

Namdrol,

How is this view different from nihilism?

Malcolm wrote:

Annihilationism is the assertion that something existent becomes non-existent.

To discover whether the view above is annihilationism, we have examine how appearances arise. First, if an appearance is an existent, can it arise from another existent? Or does it arise from a non-existent? As for the first, an existent does not arise from another existent because the arising of something existent is a contradiction in terms; and the arising of an existent from a non-existent is impossible. To address this, Nāgārjuna writes:

An existent does not arise from an existent;
an existent does not arise from a non-existent;

a non-existent does arise from an existent;
a non-existent does not arise from a non-existent — where then can there be an instance of arising?

If the arising of existents is not established, the arising of appearances is not established. If arising is not established, remaining is not established, and likewise, perishing is not established. If the three, arising, remaining and perishing, are not established, then there is no reason to accept the charge of annihilationism since I never suggested that there was an existent entity that could perish.

All we are left with is empty appearances: they are not real because no existence, etc., can be ascertained regarding them; they are not unreal since they appear. All we can say about them is that they arise in dependence.

N
N

Author: Malcolm
Date: Wednesday, December 21st, 2011 at 12:36 AM
Title: Re: Questions about energy
Content:

gad rgyangs said:
what about this from tshig don mdzod:?

Malcolm wrote:
Wisdom can serve as a "cause" for ignorance in the sense that it comes from the non-recognition of wisdom. But even the example you give shows that ignorance is not a part of wisdom no more than the tarnish is a part of the gold.

Also you did not provide enough of the citation -- you need to supply what comes after the ལྟེན་, in order for me to understand the entire sense of the passage (or a page number).

N

Author: Malcolm
Date: Tuesday, December 20th, 2011 at 4:59 AM
Title: Re: Dzogchenpa by Accident?
Content:
heart said:
And CC is the sock puppet of alwayson.

/magnus

deff said:
and alwayson was the sockpuppet of Enochian?

heart said:
Yeah, could be.

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:
And Enochian was a sock puppet of Namdrol BwaHahahahahahahahahahahah Bwahahahahahahahahahahaha.....

(kidding)

Author: Malcolm
Date: Tuesday, December 20th, 2011 at 4:57 AM
Title: Re: Questions about energy
Content:

sangyey said:
Namdrol, I know in another post somewhere on this board you had mentioned that the elements can come from conciousness but conciousness does not come from the elements. It would seem that on a large cosmic scale at some point say the earth element would have had to spun off from the basis of someone's delusional mind and become a seperate entity. For instance, right now there is a wooden chair in my room and so speaking if we trace back the origins of the elemental parts they would have had there basis from someone's mind or perhaps the solidification of one of their 5 wisdoms transforming out of delusion into say the earth element?

Malcolm wrote:
Basically, the way it works is that we do not recognize the wisdom of equality for what it is; that non-recognition solidifies our perception of the yellow radiance of the wisdom of equality, and the external earth element arises from that misperception.

N

Author: Malcolm
Date: Tuesday, December 20th, 2011 at 4:54 AM
Title: Re: Parting from the Four Attachments in Tibetan?
Content:

kirtu said:

Does tib_o.jpeg
always result in ö then or are there exceptions?

Kirt

Malcolm wrote:
Depends on suffix. O in འཁོར་ sounds like "core"; o in ཡོངས་ sounds more like so; འདྲ་ or བློ་ sounds more like ö.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Tuesday, December 20th, 2011 at 4:14 AM
Title: Re: Parting from the Four Attachments in Tibetan?
Content:

kirtu said:
I had thought that the | marked sentence ends?

Kirt

Namdrol said:
No, they mark where one should take a breath when reading the text aloud.

kirtu said:
So text's were primarily composed for recitation?

Kirt

Malcolm wrote:
No, but Tibetans, until recently, did not read silently.

N

Author: Malcolm
Date: Tuesday, December 20th, 2011 at 4:01 AM
Title: Re: Questions about energy
Content:
sangyey said:
Does everything in the phenomenal universe come from the five wisdoms becoming more solidified due to ignorance?

Malcolm wrote:

Everything in the universe is created out of the delusion of not recognizing the basis, yes.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 20th, 2011 at 3:16 AM

Title: Re: Questions about energy

Content:

asunthatneversets said:

From the perspective of avidya(ignorance/dualistic perception) the notion that one is in 'bondage'(samsara) governs one's point of view...

Malcolm wrote:

No, generally speaking sentient beings have no idea that they are in bondage or suffering from some kind of mistaken perception about anything. The Rosary of Pearls explains:

Having been gripped by the apprehending subject and apprehended object in the aggregates, elements and gateways,
one remains in samsara itself for a long while,
within the belly of the three realms
one is placed in the prison of name and matter, [352]
bound by the chains of ignorance,
covered with dense black darkness of samsara,
attached to the spicy taste of passion,
one is bound by the noose of confusion,
tormented by the hot fire of hatred,
one's head is covered by pride,
the gates of jealousy are locked,
surrounded by the armies of resentment and so on,
tied about the neck with the noose of apprehending subject and apprehended object, stuck in the swamp of past traces,
one's hands are shackled with ripened karma,
the mother of karma is joined with her child,
one following the other just like a water wheel,
alternating between good and bad bodies,
born in different forms,
and through heightening one's self-grasping
one sinks to the bottom of the ocean of suffering, one's heart is grabbed by the goad of the evil destinies,
one binds oneself with the enemy, afflictions.
Fire appears as water to hell beings,

as hunger and thirst to hungry ghosts,
as fog to animals.
the aggregates, gateways and elements appears as the five elements to humans,
those are also pleasurable, painful and neutral,
as weapons and armor to asuras,
and as desirable things to gods.
For example, just like a rapidly spinning fire wheel
one abides continuously in samsara for a long while.
Such various appearances are like seeing a snake in a rope
since what isn't there is held to be there,
both the outer and inner container and contents form,
and if that is investigated, it is a rope,
i.e. the container and contents are already empty
the ultimate with the form of the relative.

asunthatneversets said:

Dzogchen cuts straight to the point and states that experience is fundamentally pure from the very beginning.

Malcolm wrote:

Delusion is not a part of the basis and is not fundamentally pure.

asunthatneversets said:

Dzogchen accounts for this error by discouraging futile attempts at intellectually understanding and states that ALL is a reflection of the base and is inseparable from the base

Malcolm wrote:

Dzogchen states that basis is free from ignorance from the very beginning. All of our deluded experience comes from not recognizing the basis itself. There is no ignorance in the basis. The Transcendence of Sound states:

“Ignorance” is not possible in the essence, the wisdom of original purity.

The Letterless states:

Since my self-originated wisdom is pure of delusion from the start, it is beyond the extremes of being and non-being.

Also the Luminous Clarity states:

The essence, the wisdom of original purity, is free from the stain of ignorance

The Rosary of Pearls states very clearly:

The mere term delusion cannot be described within the original purity of the initial state,

likewise, how can there be non-delusion?
Therefore, pure of delusion from the beginning.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 20th, 2011 at 2:35 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchenpa by Accident?

Content:

wisdom said:

Just to play devils advocate for a moment, but also to ask a legitimate question because I don't really know the answer...

Isn't it said that appearance and emptiness are dependent on one another. Without one, the other does not exist? Wouldn't this imply causality? From emptiness arises appearances, appearances are of the nature of emptiness, which gives rise to appearance, which is of the nature of emptiness, and so on and so forth, and beyond the arising of appearance from emptiness, and beyond the emptiness of appearance, would be the unconditioned state itself (and therefore also the Middle Way), which would be free from the extremes of emptiness and appearance?

If this dependence on one another, emptiness giving rise to appearance, and appearance giving rise to emptiness, is not described as causality, what is it described as? Is this basically what is meant by DO?

I'm way in over my head with this one, thanks in advance!

Malcolm wrote:

The nature of appearances is empty, that is correct. But then you have to ask the question: do appearances arise? They seem to, but do they? Do appearances remain, they seem to, but do they? Appearances seem to vanish. They seem to, but do they? When you understand that appearances do not arise, remain, or vanish, then you understand the emptiness of appearances. If appearances do not in reality arise, remain or vanish, how could their emptiness arise, remain or vanish?

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 20th, 2011 at 2:28 AM

Title: Re: Willam Cassidy, Charges Dismissed

Content:

ronnewmexico said:

how can any of us say this is just some innocent old man tweeting then put in jail for 10 months for a suspect charge....

Malcolm wrote:

The point is that he was not guilty of the crime for which he was arrested.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 20th, 2011 at 1:59 AM

Title: Re: What should practitioners do when someone passed away

Content:

Jotham said:

I am sure almost (if not all) of us experience death within our home. The problem is that the deceased may be a non-buddhist or a buddhist (who have taken refuge in the Triple Gems) who does not practise diligently. They may not have received the phowa teaching and hence unable to perform the phowa themselves. Some are too sick and may have passed on in their sleep. I know qualified Rinpoches, Khenpos and Lamas may not be easily available or accessible. In this light, what should we (as practitioners) do to assist the deceased when such thing happens in the house?

Malcolm wrote:

Do shiro for them.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 20th, 2011 at 1:56 AM

Title: Re: Willam Cassidy, Charges Dismissed

Content:

ronnewmexico said:

Not to get to absurd with this thing...but Bernie Madoff was released upon bail.

Malcolm wrote:

Madoff could afford his bail bond. Cassidy could not.

You can find out all the gory details of Cassidy's past conviction pretty easily if you care to look.

Basically, he was convicted of arson in Los Vegas in 2003 or so. He was put on probation for this.

<http://www.lasvegassun.com/news/2003/nov/06/ex-goodman-aide-pleads-guilty-to-arson-battery-cha/> " onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

After he first met Alyce Zeoli, he got in trouble with his probation officer (the precise details) escape me. He spent a year in jail because of that.

The other thing the prosecution was unable to prove is that a single tweet issued from an account that was opened by Cassidy.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 20th, 2011 at 1:33 AM

Title: Re: America's Disappearing Post Offices

Content:

Quiet Heart said:

I grew up in the 1950's and 1960's in a small dairy farming village in western Massachusetts. The total population of our town was probably 1000 people at the best.

Malcolm wrote:

Where? I grew up in Ashfield, and live there presently.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 20th, 2011 at 1:32 AM

Title: Re: Date problems

Content:

Daniel Arraes said:

How come some sources state Kamalashila lived between 713 and 763 c.e., whereas the Samye debate took place supposedly around 794 c.e?
Is there any hypothesis like there being two kamalashilas?

Malcolm wrote:

Tibetans were very fuzzy about dates, and imperial dates used to be considered 60 years earlier than we think of them now.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 20th, 2011 at 1:30 AM

Title: Re: Willam Cassidy, Charges Dismissed

Content:

ronnewmexico said:

Then....why no bail? Why was this a cash only bail? Ten months for a stalking accusation seems a bit unusual...wouldn't you say?
What then was the bail?

Malcolm wrote:

Because it was a federal charge, because he had a previous felony conviction, and because he frequently travelled abroad, so the DA managed to convince the judge he was a flight risk, and so a rather high bail was set that he could not meet.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 20th, 2011 at 1:15 AM

Title: Re: Willam Cassidy, Charges Dismissed

Content:

ronnewmexico said:

So that is the situation not that this person did not engage in criminal behavior....if he did not why the ten months served?

He was apparently convicted. Then released upon appeal...the appeal being of a free speech issue not on the merits of the criminality.

Malcolm wrote:

I am very familiar with the particulars of this case -- the reason he was in jail for ten months is that he could not make bail. He was not convicted of any crime in this case.

The case was tossed out because the definition of "stalking" defined by this statute was not met and the Judge decided that the prosecutor had not correctly understood the language of the statute.

Hence, no crime of cyber-stalking was committed.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 20th, 2011 at 1:04 AM

Title: Re: Questions about energy

Content:

Lhug-Pa said:

In Taoism, perhaps the best way to begin to understand Chi at least intellectually would be to look at how Jing, Chi, and Shen are interrelated.

Is there a difference between Vayu and Prana in Tibetan? Or are they both translated as rLung?

Malcolm wrote:

Praṇā is srog i.e. life; vāyu is rlung i.e. air. Praṇā vāyu is the basic vāyu from which all the others arise.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 20th, 2011 at 12:55 AM

Title: Re: Parting from the Four Attachments in Tibetan?

Content:

kirtu said:

I had thought that the | marked sentence ends?

Kirt

Malcolm wrote:

No, they mark where one should take a breath when reading the text aloud.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 20th, 2011 at 12:51 AM

Title: Re: Questions about energy

Content:

Namdrol said:

Yes and no. Yes, in the sense that the energy that new age folks are talking about is what we call "rlung", vāyu or "wind energy". No, because they do not understand this point at all.

kirtu said:

Ch'i in Taoism is physical but subtle and there are many different kinds (including geomantic). So is ch'i synonymous with rlung/vāyu or is rlung/vāyu a subset of ch'i as understood in TCM?

Malcolm wrote:

These two concepts have points of intersection, but not completely identical.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 20th, 2011 at 12:38 AM

Title: Re: Willam Cassidy, Charges Dismissed

Content:

ronnewmexico said:

That the district court judge saw fit to throw out the apparent conviction, on a point of legal consideration, free speech rights.... in no manner shape nor form infer that there was not criminal conduct being displayed.

Malcolm wrote:

That is exactly what it shows -- no criminal conduct. No crime was committed.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 20th, 2011 at 12:06 AM

Title: Re: Questions about energy

Content:

mint said:

Is this energy "real" - in the sense that, though it is the manifestation of my primordial nature, it has the ability to affect me, help me, harm me? Is there any objectivity to a brick, for instance? Is there any objectivity to a brick hitting me in the head? Or is it all just a manifestation of energy from my primordial nature?

Malcolm wrote:

It is objective because you are in the grip of duality, and therefore, subject to karma.

mint said:

Second question, is there any objectivity to the people in my life?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes. Conventionally speaking.

mint said:

Third question, is there any relation between the so-called energy field that the new agey people talk about and the energy that Dzogchen talks about?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes and no. Yes, in the sense that the energy that new age folks are talking about is what we call "rlung", vāyu or "wind energy". No, because they do not understand this point at all.

mint said:

Is it possible that all beings and all things have an energy field because all things are nothing more than the play of energy, light and insubstantial color?

Malcolm wrote:

Everything manifests through sound, light and rays.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, December 19th, 2011 at 11:20 PM

Title: Re: Willam Cassidy, Charges Dismissed

Content:

ronnewmexico said:

needless to say subsequent to that I received a call from a police detective telling me that although they are hindering my ability to do business by filling my messageing with useless messages.....I may not call them back telling them repeatedly to not call me as that impinged on their ability to do business.

Malcolm wrote:

You were being scammed. Robocallers have a legal obligation to remove you from their call lists if you so request it.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, December 19th, 2011 at 11:19 PM

Title: Re: Willam Cassidy, Charges Dismissed

Content:

ronnewmexico said:

Agreed.... but a blog may not be disregarded if there are 8000 posts

Malcolm wrote:

The 8000 number comes from the number of times Cassidy's tweets were retweeted by others, specifically Alyce Zeoli's supporters.

Of course, no one has bothered to mention the ample evidence of harassment of Cassidy by Zeoli's supporters which you can read in the comments section on his blog.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, December 19th, 2011 at 11:12 PM

Title: Re: Dzogchenpa by Accident?

Content:

Mr. G said:

You don't understand cessation or annihilationism.

Annihilationism is an absence of causes, by definition.

Center Channel said:

Annihilationism is the mistaken belief that an existent thing becomes non-existent, for example, a self.

But this fact has not stopped any of the Indo-Tibetan Madhyamikas from treating emptiness as an object and running it through a 7 point Prasangika analyses (or similar) to prove that emptiness is conditioned. This is part of Madhyamaka's charm.

Malcolm wrote:

The Tarkajvala asserts the following.

"The unconditioned is the two cessations, space and suchness"

The unconditioned is analytical cessation and non-analytical cessation, space and suchness. Analytical cessation is discriminating wisdom i.e. having analyzed and extinguished the evident afflictions, that analysis and cessation is given the name "nirvana". Non-analytical cessation is when a given thing is never separate from cessation by any means. Space opens up room and has the characteristic of being unobstructed. Suchness previously did not exist, nor come to not exist through destruction, is not [presently] mutually dependent and has no basis. Those four are permanent because their nature is unchanging.

Since emptiness and tathāta are synonyms, it is a little hard to prove that emptiness is conditioned.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, December 19th, 2011 at 1:38 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchenpa by Accident?

Content:

Namdrol said:

Space and cessation are not caused

Center Channel said:

If you are positing something that is uncaused/nonconditioned permanent, as you do here, you really lose Madhyamaka view IMO

Malcolm wrote:

Space is uncaused, unconditioned.

You are really missing the point of Madhyamaka, CC. BUt I have to go out for the day and cannot respond in more detail.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, December 19th, 2011 at 1:36 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchenpa by Accident?
Content:
Namdrol said:
Space and cessation are not caused

Center Channel said:
Of course cessation is caused.

Malcolm wrote:
Nope. Cessation is an absence of causes, by definition.

N

Author: Malcolm
Date: Monday, December 19th, 2011 at 12:46 AM
Title: Re: Dzogchenpa by Accident?
Content:
Namdrol said:
Emptiness isn't a thing, it is freedom from all extremes, hence it cannot be caused, destroyed, etc.

Center Channel said:
Sure I agree with all that.

But do you agree with this statement from Madhayamaka POV? :

"There is nothing that is not caused."

Malcolm wrote:
Space and cessation are not caused, so, no, the statement is not completely correct from a Madhyamaka POV.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Monday, December 19th, 2011 at 12:37 AM
Title: Re: Dzogchenpa by Accident?
Content:
Namdrol said:
Emptiness is not caused.

N

Center Channel said:

There is nothing that is not caused.

Malcolm wrote:

Emptiness isn't a thing, it is freedom from all extremes, hence it cannot be caused, destroyed, etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, December 19th, 2011 at 12:32 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchenpa by Accident?

Content:

Dechen Norbu said:

CC,

That's a very awkward statement. Emptiness being caused... really man, what are you thinking?

Center Channel said:

In Madhyamaka, EVERYTHING is caused.....without exception.

Malcolm wrote:

Hi CC:

Emptiness is not caused.

Emptiness and DO are synonyms because whatever arises from a cause is empty by definition.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, December 19th, 2011 at 12:05 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchenpa by Accident?

Content:

heart said:

Exactly, and which Buddhist believe that Buddhahood results from a cause? Certainly no Vajrayana Buddhists.

/magnus

Namdrol said:

Actually most Vajrayāna Buddhists. Again, you are so conditioned by Dzogchen you cannot even imagine that there is a view different than yours. Mahāyoga and Anuyoga are both result vehicles.

N

heart said:

Well, thanks, but I still can't see Buddha teaching that anatta is produced, nor is emptiness and certainly not the buddhanature (whatever name you want to give it). The Buddhas teaching is always pointing to something that already is there.

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

No, for example, omniscience. This is a quality of Buddhahood that Kamashila, (and numerous other masters) assert arises from a cause. The result, i.e. the two kāyas, is considered to arise from gathering the accumulations of the merit and wisdom. That is what is meant by saying the "the vehicle of the cause". The vehicle of the result is so called, because one takes the result as path in order to rapidly gather the two accumulations.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 18th, 2011 at 10:34 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchenpa by Accident?

Content:

asunthatneversets said:

The starting and ending point is the same space of awareness.

Namdrol said:

Nope. There is a huge difference between mind (citta) and vidyā.

N

asunthatneversets said:

I'd replace 'huge' with 'monumental'.

Malcolm wrote:

Academic, if you have not distinguished the two.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 18th, 2011 at 10:08 AM

Title: Re: Parting from the Four Attachments in Tibetan?

Content:
kirtu said:
Are Tibetan cases then to be induced solely from examples?

Malcolm wrote:
Yes.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Sunday, December 18th, 2011 at 10:06 AM
Title: Re: Dzogchenpa by Accident?
Content:
asunthatneversets said:
The starting and ending point is the same space of awareness.

Malcolm wrote:
Nope. There is a huge difference between mind (citta) and vidyā.

N

Author: Malcolm
Date: Sunday, December 18th, 2011 at 10:03 AM
Title: Re: Dzogchenpa by Accident?
Content:
asunthatneversets said:
Understand that Dzogchen is a teaching which is meant to reveal your primordially pure enlightened state which has been absolutely perfect since beginningless time.

Malcolm wrote:
You really don't understand Dzogchen yet. But that's ok. Eventually you will. In the meantime, make sure that you pay attention to karma.

N

Author: Malcolm
Date: Sunday, December 18th, 2011 at 9:57 AM
Title: Re: Dzogchenpa by Accident?
Content:

heart said:
Exactly, and which Buddhist believe that Buddhahood results from a cause? Certainly no Vajrayana Buddhists.

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

Actually most Vajrayāna Buddhists. Again, you are so conditioned by Dzogchen you cannot even imagine that there is a view different than yours. Mahāyoga and Anuyoga are both result vehicles.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 18th, 2011 at 1:51 AM

Title: Re: Guardians of the Teaching

Content:

gregkavarnos said:

PS Is there anywhere we can find a translation of the gtor lung che chung gi rgyud (Major and Minor Torma Tantra)? Thank you!

Malcolm wrote:

No, I do not think so.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 18th, 2011 at 1:32 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchenpa by Accident?

Content:

heart said:

Well, that could well be, but that is not exactly what is written in that quote.

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

It means that Dzogchen should not be taught to people who are convinced that Buddhahood results from a cause.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 18th, 2011 at 12:58 AM

Title: Re: Guardians of the Teaching

Content:

alpha said:

And i think that the practice of the guardians if done in a state of knowledge is the best offering one can make while the relative offerings are not that important and not really necessary .

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, that is correct.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 18th, 2011 at 12:46 AM

Title: Re: ཞི་གནས་ = shiney ?

Content:

kirtu said:

ཞི་གནས་ = shiney ?

But it should be shi-na shouldn't it? shiney should be ཞི་གནས་ unless the sa actually modifies the na.

Thanks!

Hmm - the Wylie is indeed zhi-gnas. So the sa isn't really silent but modifies the na?
Are there rules for that?

Kirt

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, a subsequent ས་ generally modifies the "a" to "e", for example, འདས་, གནས་, བས་, ལས་, etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 18th, 2011 at 12:41 AM

Title: Re: Guardians of the Teaching

Content:

Center Channel said:

From a risk benefit scenario, how much better is working with the guardians than over SOV?

(Guardians can kick your butt as stated by several others.)

Noone needs to answer, I'm just thinking outloud...

Malcolm wrote:

SOV is essential, guardian practice is merely important.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 18th, 2011 at 12:40 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen Community of Chogyal Namkhai Norbu

Content:

Lhug-Pa said:

Does anyone remember if he gave Lungs for Avalokitesvara Korwa Tongtrug and/or Narag Tongtrug at that retreat?

Malcolm wrote:

Both.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 18th, 2011 at 12:28 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchenpa by Accident?

Content:

heart said:

The reference in Kunjed Gyalpo to the "vehicles based on cause and effect" is actually the "vehicle of gods and humans" in the ancient five path scheme. The Vehicle of Gods and Humans is where one practices good actions and abandons bad ones. So why don't the Kunjed Gyalpo that the practitioners of this path should be taught Dzogchen? Because then they will abandon doing good actions and "for a long time they would lose any possibility of meeting me".

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

No, it refers to the eight yanas. Three causal vehicles; and five resultant vehicles.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 18th, 2011 at 12:22 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen Community of Chogyal Namkhai Norbu

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

He did. He gave lung for all protectors including long invocations for all. As for your third question, all mantras require individual transmission, but you have received those.

Lhug-Pa said:

Does anyone know if Rinpoche gave the Narag Tongtrug transmission during this retreat?

Or if he gave any of the Lungs for the main Protectors?

(With the Protectors, isn't having received Dzogchen Transmission period, enough to work with the Protectors; considering that they're part of the Tun?)

If no one knows, then I'll try to listen to the replay soon and report back.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 18th, 2011 at 12:20 AM

Title: Re: Guardians of the Teaching

Content:

alpha said:

Why is it that in DC when doing TUN none of this is necessary?

Are the guardians still happy with us not offering anything whatsoever ?

Malcolm wrote:

Do you really think Guardians think in such dualistic terms?

When you do medium thun for example, it is sufficient to visualize offerings. If you want to set them up, that is ok too. Whatever you have space and time for.

In general, there are only two things that you need for offerings (apart from the Ganapuja), according to my understanding of ChNN's intent: light and incense, and even these are not absolutely required.

If you like setting out water offerings, sense offering, medicine and blood, tormas and so on -- go for it -- but it is not absolutely necessary. After all, the universe is a torma according to the torma tantra.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 18th, 2011 at 12:06 AM

Title: Re: Guardians of the Teaching

Content:

Namdrol said:

Equating illegal pornography with images of protectors just shows how much you like to exaggerate.

gregkavarnos said:

I did not equate illegal pornography with images of protectors, the point I was trying to make was that just because something is freely available does not make it's availability legitimate. I understand what you are saying, it does not mean that I agree with it, but could you please refrain from straw men and ad homs? Thank you.

Malcolm wrote:

Your example was a red herring.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 18th, 2011 at 12:01 AM

Title: Re: Ojas (general discussion)

Content:

Lhug-Pa said:

And from what I've learned Semen/Suhkra can indeed be transmuted into Ojas; however that if semen sits untransmuted in the body for too long, it dies (i.e. no longer capable of creating life externally or internally), and would therefore become a waste product in this latter case.

Nevertheless, there is not necessarily any need to ejaculate it if it happens to become a waste product, because it will come out on its own with our urine during defecation, or even during urination alone. At the very least, Sukrha can also be absorbed back into and dissolved in the bloodstream.

Malcolm wrote:

You still fail to understand the different between a rāsa and a kita.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 17th, 2011 at 2:16 AM

Title: Re: Guardians of the Teaching

Content:

Namdrol said:

...Greg, if your Lama thinks so, that is his opinion but has no relevance to me.

gregkavarnos said:

This is fair enough and I don't expect what my lama says to be of relevance to you but it does not answer my question: Does the fact that it is present legitimate its presence? Back in the "good ol' days" protector and yidam practices were personal and secret, you don't believe that here was a valid reason for this? Does this reason no longer have a meaning in the "information age"? Or maybe it is even MORE important to keep ones personal practices personal?

Malcolm wrote:

The "secrecy" of practices is a much vaunted and little kept thing. There are Mahakala statues in full public view all over Katmandhu and have been for centuries.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 17th, 2011 at 2:14 AM

Title: Re: Guardians of the Teaching

Content:

gregkavarnos said:

Or to be more precise: Does this somehow justify its existence out there in cyberland? Does the fact that it is present legitimate its presence?

Malcolm wrote:

It is simply there, it does not need justification.

You can cruise any Dzogchen Community website and find images of the protectors.

For example, the Merigar temple has all images of protectors in public view. The Merigar temples is a tourist destination.

There are many more examples.

Equating illegal pornography with images of protectors just shows how much you like to exaggerate.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 17th, 2011 at 2:07 AM

Title: Re: Guardians of the Teaching

Content:

gregkavarnos said:

The links which you posted in no way invalidate my point. Just because information on the protectors is available does not mean that it should be available nor does it mean that we should make it available.

Namdrol said:

The internet routes around censorship.

kirtu said:

Tell that to Baidu users.

Anyway openness does not negate responsibility. I have no idea why Rigpawiki made entries of protectors although the three mentioned are enlightened protectors aren't they? Part of an argument for could be that most people will not encounter this information anyway. Nonetheless circumspection and discernment is needed.

Kirt

Malcolm wrote:

discussing the protectors and their role is not a samaya breakage. It is silly to presume so. Greg, if your Lama thinks so, that is his opinion but has no relevance to me.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 17th, 2011 at 1:37 AM

Title: Re: Parting from the Four Attachments in Tibetan?

Content:

tantular said:

I wouldn't worry too much about English case names---they bear no relation to how Tibetans understand their own language. Even the Tibetan case names, mechanically borrowed from Sanskrit, don't explain how particles are actually used.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 17th, 2011 at 1:22 AM

Title: Re: Guardians of the Teaching

Content:

gregkavarnos said:

The links which you posted in no way invalidate my point. Just because information on the protectors is available does not mean that it should be available nor does it mean that we should make it available.

Malcolm wrote:

The internet routes around censorship.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 17th, 2011 at 12:33 AM

Title: Re: Guardians of the Teaching

Content:

Namdrol said:

It is so silly to make this argument considering that every name and picture of virtually every major protector has been spread far and wide on the internet.

gregkavarnos said:

Yes I agree, unfortunately this is very true, but we can be part of the problem or part of the solution.

Malcolm wrote:

Take it up with Rigpa Wiki:

<http://www.rigpawiki.org/index.php?title=Ekajati> "

onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

http://www.rigpawiki.org/index.php?title=Dza_Rahula "

onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

http://www.rigpawiki.org/index.php?title=Dorje_Lekpa "

onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 17th, 2011 at 12:21 AM

Title: Re: Understanding emptiness

Content:

conebeckham said:

So, Emptiness is not the sole most important topic, or apex, or summit, of "sutra" doctrine.

Namdrol said:

Sure it is.

N

conebeckham said:

Okay..what, then, "realizes" emptiness?

Malcolm wrote:

There is no realizer of emptiness; when emptiness is seen, there is no seer, no object, and no seeing.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 17th, 2011 at 12:13 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchenpa by Accident?

Content:

Adamantine said:

This is from the "SUPREME SOURCE" translation from ChNN and A. Clemente Pg 140

"Do not make my teaching known to those who follow the vehicles based on cause and effect! If you do, by affirming the law of cause and effect of positive and negative deeds, they would cover my true condition with conjectures, and for a long time they would lose any possibility of meeting me."

Malcolm wrote:

I didn't say that liberation was a result of cause and effect. It isn't. Liberation is a result of knowledge, knowing what your actual state is and integrating that knowledge. In the meantime, while you are integrating that knowledge, it is important to recognize and observe how you are living in a dualistic condition and behaving in a manner which takes that into account, rather than slipping into the ravine of denying afflictive cause and effect which is our present condition.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 17th, 2011 at 12:09 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchenpa by Accident?

Content:

asunthatneversets said:

Accumulating merit (which is an adopted notion in and of itself) to maintain a higher rebirth (another adopted notion) in samsara doesn't free one from samsara. It's the golden cage.... but still a cage. Dzogchen is saying the cage is illusory. So why not investigate why one takes the cage to be real? Instead of polishing the cage.

Malcolm wrote:

We know why we take the cage to be real, so this is an empty question.

But hey, if you don't want to accumulate merit, and therefore, without doubt take birth in a lower realm, then please go ahead.

asunthatneversets said:

I mean in truth, these ideas like merit and rebirth are just ideas. They aren't tangible aspects of reality, one chooses to believe or disbelieve them based on opinion. And to boot they aren't even an integral part of dzogchen.... it stands with or without them.

Malcolm wrote:

You are quite wrong about this. This is why I said you are veering towards a "Dzogchen" nihilism. Merit and rebirth are both integral to Dzogchen. This is, for example, why there are so many purification practices aimed at removing causes for taking rebirth in the six realms and so on. This is why there is a detailed account of why you will achieve liberation in nirmanakāya buddhahood if you do not manage to achieve liberation in this life or in the bardo.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 16th, 2011 at 12:33 PM

Title: Re: Dzogchen Community of Chogyal Namkhai Norbu

Content:

Pero said:

I try to do Narag Tongtrug three times a month.

Adamantine said:

Hmmmmnnnn... I don't remember receiving a transmission of that from ChNN before, is it not one he normally gives at the end of retreats?

Malcolm wrote:

He used to give it more -- now only rarely.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 16th, 2011 at 12:25 PM

Title: Re: Understanding emptiness

Content:

conebeckham said:

So, Emptiness is not the sole most important topic, or apex, or summit, of "sutra" doctrine.

Malcolm wrote:

Sure it is.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 16th, 2011 at 11:20 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchenpa by Accident?

Content:

asunthatneversets said:

Very true and that isn't what i'm suggesting at all...

Malcolm wrote:

The potion you are missing is that as long as you are under the influence of afflictions, you will engage in actions. Actions will result in suffering. The purpose of accumulating merit (from a Dzogchen perspective) is to maintain higher rebirth in samsara and create favorable conditions for meeting the teachings, and of course, to dedicate it to others.

What you are veering towards is a sort of "Dzogchen" nihilism that will just ruin your path.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 16th, 2011 at 9:20 AM

Title: Re: Guardians of the Teaching

Content:

Namdrol said:

The idea that saying the name "rahula" breaks samaya is quite ridiculous.

gregkavarnos said:

You go with what your lama tells you, I'll go with what mine tells me.

If you believe it is quite okay and that it is valuable to plaster your protectors names all over a public board then go for it! I am not judging, I am merely recanting what I have been instructed.

Malcolm wrote:

It is so silly to make this argument considering that every name and picture of virtually every major protector has been spread far and wide on the internet.

Everyone knows knows that the ma-za-dam sum are the main protectors of Dzogchen. This is not a big secret.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 16th, 2011 at 9:13 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchenpa by Accident?

Content:

asunthatneversets said:

Right, so what i'm saying is that for those who fail to recognize their nature, they enter into actions and give credence to these notions such as karma, merit and rebirth which only serve to reify the seeming duality... thus never escaping from samsara.

Malcolm wrote:

You can not think yourself out of ignorance. You can not declare, "I am perfect" and then expect to awaken.

What you have to understand is the basis. The reason the basis is called "the basis" is because it has not been realized.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 16th, 2011 at 8:52 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen Community of Chogyal Namkhai Norbu

Content:

Pema Rigdzin said:

way, do any of you other ChNN students do Vajrasattva daily too?

Malcolm wrote:

No.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 14th, 2011 at 7:38 PM

Title: Re: Guardians of the Teaching

Content:

gregkavarnos said:

Calling on protectors (stating their name) without appeasing breaks samaya. Frivolous talk about protectors and their practices breaks samaya.

Malcolm wrote:

As I said, this all depends on the opinions of this or that Lama.

No one here is discussing the guardians frivolously.

The idea that saying the name "rahula" breaks samaya is quite ridiculous.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 14th, 2011 at 7:36 PM

Title: Re: Dzogchen Community of Chogyal Namkhai Norbu

Content:

alpha said:

I need to know this.

Having received all the usual lungs Rinpoche gives at the end of webcasts what would be the DAILY commitments i have to keep?

Do i have any samaya that i have to be aware of?

If i have broken any samaya can it be repaired with OM BENZA SATO

SAMAYA.MANUPALAYA.....given that i have received the DORJE SEMPA empowerment, lung and explanation.....?

Malcolm wrote:

Guru Yoga is the only commitment. And that is super easy to maintain.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 14th, 2011 at 7:34 PM

Title: Re: Dzogchenpa by Accident?

Content:

asunthatneversets said:

Seems to only obscure and delay any assimilation in my eyes. I've never understood (aside from helping with ascending conduct) the presence of these notions in dzogchen. Your nature is primordially pure and perfect from beginningless time, which is what dzogchen points towards.

Malcolm wrote:

But you did not recognize your nature, and so, under the influence of ignorance, you fall into duality and enter into actions, thus never escaping from samsara.

Another way of putting it that I noticed in a Dzogchen text the other day "Vidyā is seeing the substance of the mind. Avidyā is not seeing the substance of the mind". We mostly continue in a state of avidyā.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 14th, 2011 at 9:39 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchenpa by Accident?

Content:

Namdrol said:

So, mentioning Dzogchen and speaking about it as often as possible is a compassionate act because it creates the seed?

mint said:

Yes, if you think someone is interested. Otherwise, better not to try to condition them.

N

Malcolm wrote:

But, one should speak as much as one's knowledge allows, yes? Otherwise the wrong impression might be given thus ruining karmic opportunities for both parties.[/quote]

If you think someone is genuinely interested, suggest a book for them to read. If they buy, they are actually interested, if not, they were just being polite.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 14th, 2011 at 7:17 AM

Title: Re: Guardians of the Teaching

Content:

gregkavarnos said:

This thread is like the samaya breaking party of the year!

Malcolm wrote:

Talking about protectors breaks samaya?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 14th, 2011 at 4:08 AM

Title: Re: Guardians of the Teaching

Content:

asunthatneversets said:

They are meant for aid, inspiration, strength, courage and on some levels may not be anything other than archetypal in nature and implements to fortify our own intention and certainty we project into our practice and path.

Malcolm wrote:

They are not archtypes. Archtypes don't kick ass.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 13th, 2011 at 10:40 PM

Title: Re: Guardians of the Teaching

Content:

mint said:

So, there's no guardians who can aid the beginning student of Dzogchen? or, it's useless? or, it's too harmful?

Malcolm wrote:

Guardians exist to protect the teachings and assist practitioners.

As long as you have the lung for the practices, you can do them.

There are many different traditions around how to relate to guardians, most of them based on the opinions of this or that lama. This is why there is no standard rule about it. So -- in the Dzogchen Community, if you do the short thun, then you always do guardian practice.

If you are following the ChNN's teachings, pay no attention to what those are not students of the ChNN say about guardians.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 13th, 2011 at 9:41 PM

Title: Re: Ojas, Shukra & Tummo

Content:

dakini_boi said:

Oh, I thought it was the ojas that was important. Do shukra and ojas have different roles in tummo, or do they act together as the basis for bliss?

Also, what is the relationship between bindu and ojas?

Namdrol said:

In tummo, what is important is bliss.

There are different kinds of bindu. The most basic bindu is the bindu of pranavayu in the heart. The so called "bodhicitta" that circulates in the body is actually ojas.

Sukra acts as the basis for bliss.

rai said:

is there a connection between sukra and being joyful or depressed for normal people (not a yogis)? thank you

Malcolm wrote:

Only if they are losing ojas. The main thing that depletes ojas however, is mental worry and stress.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 13th, 2011 at 10:56 AM

Title: Re: Rinchen Terdzod & Dudjom Tersar

Content:

Totoro said:

Well it's important for me to know since my point is to find out whether someone who has received Rinchen Terdzod but not Dudjom Tersar (explicitly) can practise or transmit Dudjom Tersar. A Lama said he is not sure but maybe when DKR or Dudjom Rinpoche might have included it when they 'edited' Rinchen Terdzod? (don't mean to add more rumor and confusion, but the Lama himself was not sure so take this with a pinch of salt) So hope someone else can have more insight?

Malcolm wrote:

Dudjom Tersar is not in Rinchen Terzo. A person who has not received Dudjom Tersar cannot practice or transmit it.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 13th, 2011 at 5:33 AM

Title: Re: This is your brain on Madhyamaka....

Content:

Namdrol said:

I don't have the temperment for the rigors of academic writing.

Mr. G said:

What do you mean Namdrol?

Malcolm wrote:

It requires discipline.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 13th, 2011 at 5:32 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchenpa by Accident?

Content:

Namdrol said:

This is why I put འུ་ཨ་ཤེ་ཤེ་ཤེ་ཤེ་ཤེ་ in my signature. These are the representation of the six munis in the six lokas in the form of syllables. The syllables enter the eye of the person who sees them and this creates the connection for them to be liberated.

mint said:

So, mentioning Dzogchen and speaking about it as often as possible is a compassionate act because it creates the seed?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, if you think someone is interested. Otherwise, better not to try to condition them.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, December 12th, 2011 at 11:19 PM

Title: Re: This is your brain on Madhyamaka....

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

Namdrol is as good as a academically-trained scholar except he doesn't like to give useable references unless you twist his arm.

Malcolm wrote:

No, definitely not. I am a traditionally trained acarya. I don't have the temperment for the rigors of academic writing.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, December 12th, 2011 at 11:11 PM

Title: Re: Dzogchenpa by Accident?

Content:

wisdom said:

The difference is that all those social interactions don't produce anything in those individuals.

Malcolm wrote:

Sure it does. It creates a trace.

This is why I put འུ་ཨུ་ཤུ་ཡུ་ཨུ་ in my signature. These are the representation of the six munis in the six lokas in the form of syllables. The syllables enter the eye of the person who sees them and this creates the connection for them to be liberated.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, December 12th, 2011 at 10:38 PM

Title: Re: Dzogchenpa by Accident?

Content:

mint said:

What makes this so incredible is that, as a social being, every person I mention Dzogchen to, must have great merit, and every person they mention Dzogchen to must also have great merit, etc.. It grows exponentially until everyone has heard about Dzogchen. Not a bad thing, but it just calls the issue of merit into question, I think.

Malcolm wrote:

And even more so those who practice Dzogchen...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 11th, 2011 at 1:20 AM

Title: Re: Etymology of "Tantra"

Content:

dakini_boi said:

How did the word tantra come to be translated in Tibetan as gyud (continuity)? I mean, what is the etymological connection between the two words?

Namdrol said:

Because in the Guhyasamaja tantra the word tantra (rgyud) is defined as a continuum (rgyun).

N

dakini_boi said:

Is there a similar etymology for the Sanskrit word tantra? (i.e. does Tantra imply continuum in Sanskrit?) Do we have access to the Sanskrit version of the Guhyasamaja Tantra?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes and yes.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 10th, 2011 at 10:59 AM

Title: Re: End of the Kali-Yuga and the Mayan-Tibetan Connection

Content:

Lhug-Pa said:

Such as I asked if there's even one example of where the Dalai Lama (who is not limited in his views to Gelug or Sarma) said that it's okay to orgasm...

Malcolm wrote:

HHDL is not an authority for all Tibetan Buddhists and schools. His POV is characteristically Gelug. It is not shared by Sakya, etc.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 10th, 2011 at 10:53 AM

Title: Re: Conceptuality in Buddhism

Content:

tobes said:

My posts have been moved a number of times from the Madhyamika vs Svatantrika thread. Not my idea, and seemingly not a very good idea.

They are explicitly about the relation between emptiness and the conventions of language - and it was a while ago now, but there was fruitful dialogue on the matter.

This topic cannot in any way be "a kind of imponderable" unless you want to also classify the preoccupations of just about every Mahayana tradition as similarly futile and irrelevant to liberation.

catmoon said:

Moved posts? I did all that thinking for nothing? Oh, that's just depressing that is. I guess you'll just have to disregard the lot. Nothing else for it.

Maybe I can salvage something... when you use the phrase "This topic" in the above quoteback, were you referring to my "this topic" or yours? Emptiness is not an imponderable, but I think there is credible argument that the inner workings of a Buddha's mind often are. It could even be fitted into one of the classic 14/10/8 imponderables. (Number varies with sources used).

tobes said:

I'm referring to the topic my posts have been engaged with.

The references to a buddha's mind are merely a synonym for shunyata /ultimate reality. i.e. in relation to the two truths, the perspective of paramatha satya.

I don't think it's credible to argue that this is anything like an imponderable topic.

Malcolm wrote:

As Candrakirti makes extremely clear, the two truths are for ordinary persons and not buddhas.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 10th, 2011 at 6:53 AM

Title: Re: End of the Kali-Yuga and the Mayan-Tibetan Connection

Content:

Namdrol said:

That was not what he "revealed" -- what he discovered was its gematria value (useless number mysticism though it is)

N

wisdom said:

Gematria is useful if you study Kabbalah, its not very useful in the way Crowley used it. Its used as a mnemonic tool for making associations between ideas in a quick manner or discovering associations that you otherwise would not have discovered. Its also used as a meditation tool by Abulafia. Some Kabbalists also claim that its used to conceal information, that only someone who has received the oral tradition of Kabbalah will understand fully.

Malcolm wrote:

As I said, useless number mysticism.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 10th, 2011 at 5:49 AM

Title: Re: End of the Kali-Yuga and the Mayan-Tibetan Connection

Content:

Namdrol said:

Crowley was correct: the Hindu Om̐ is formed out of four components: a u m and the bindu which is pronounced ṅg.

N

wisdom said:

Interesting! Crowley displays it as his own revelation, something he realizes in meditation. And perhaps he did, at that.

Malcolm wrote:

That was not what he "revealed" -- what he discovered was its gematria value (useless number mysticism though it is)

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 10th, 2011 at 5:33 AM

Title: Re: End of the Kali-Yuga and the Mayan-Tibetan Connection

Content:

always on said:

Seriously what is this:

<http://gnostic-community.org/distribution/topic?f=8&t=1801> "
onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

wisdom said:

This is the same kind of crap Crowley pulled when he said AUM is really AUMNG.

Malcolm wrote:

Crowley was correct: the Hindu Om̐ is formed out of four components: a u m and the bindu which is pronounced ṅg.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 10th, 2011 at 1:30 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Jargon

Content:

Huseng said:

Mantras in Tibetan are rendered into Tibetan pronunciation.

Malcolm wrote:

No, Tibetans may pronounce mantras however they do, but they accurately represent the long and short vowels, consonants, the the ṭ series and so on correctly.

My take on this issue (as a professional translator) is that for general translations, there should be a short list of about 20-30 terms that are back translated into Sanskrit -- dharmadhātu, dharmakāya, vajra, prajñapāramita, dharmatā, etc. Then, depending on the specific literature, there may be more technical terms rendered in Sanskrit or not depending on circumstances.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 10th, 2011 at 1:15 AM

Title: Re: Thinley Norbu's terms for ignorance

Content:

dakini_boi said:

Are innate ignorance and imputing ignorance also sometimes translated as "cognitive obscurations" and "obscuration of afflicted emotions"?

Malcolm wrote:

Never.

However, there are two kinds of avidyā: one is non-afflictive and is a knowledge obscuration; the other is afflictive.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 10th, 2011 at 1:13 AM

Title: Re: Etymology of "Tantra"

Content:

dakini_boi said:

How did the word tantra come to be translated in Tibetan as gyud (continuity)? I mean, what is the etymological connection between the two words?

Malcolm wrote:

Because in the Guhyasamaja tantra the word tantra (rgyud) is defined as a continuum (rgyun).

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 10th, 2011 at 1:09 AM

Title: Re: Tibetan Myth of Chan

Content:

MalaBeads said:

Isn't it possible that sudden enlightenment is only possible because of lhun grub?

Malcolm wrote:

Dzogchen is not a sudden awakening path. It has no grades, either sudden or gradual since it is the result that is free from a cause.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 9th, 2011 at 10:30 PM

Title: Re: Tibetan Myth of Chan

Content:

Astus said:

The buddha qualities in Zen is put under the term of function that is the perfect functioning of the six sense spheres in general. There are a few detailed discussions of these functions but it is not really important as one can use them spontaneously once the nature is realised, and such functioning is exemplified in many Zen stories.

Malcolm wrote:

But this is standard sutra (chinese style). Lhun grub is not about buddha qualities per se.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 9th, 2011 at 7:16 AM

Title: Re: Ojas, Shukra & Tummo

Content:

dakini_boi said:

Oh, I thought it was the ojas that was important. Do shukra and ojas have different roles in tummo, or do they act together as the basis for bliss?

Also, what is the relationship between bindu and ojas?

Namdrol said:

In tummo, what is important is bliss.

There are different kinds of bindu. The most basic bindu is the bindu of pranavayu in the heart. The so called "bodhicitta" that circulates in the body is actually ojas.

Sukra acts as the basis for bliss.

Inge said:

Does it also act as the basis for the bliss that arises in the jhanas?

Malcolm wrote:

No.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 9th, 2011 at 6:29 AM

Title: Re: End times propaganda in Buddhism?

Content:

Huseng said:

is problematic because Madhyamaka teaches the cessation of all views via negation, not assertion.

Malcolm wrote:

This passage does not assert a view it provides a definition.

Huseng said:

How are conditioned entities able to depend on that which is unconditioned for their existence?

Malcolm wrote:

They don't, nor did I claim they were.

Huseng said:

My contention is that you assert it is unconditioned yet still forms an essential basis for which conditioned entities arise.

Malcolm wrote:

According to Candrakirti, emptiness can be accepted as a basis for the arising of phenomena.

BTW, the characteristic of space is not the absence of form since space pervades everything.

Huseng said:

Suchness is free of characteristics like this -- it is not conditioned, it is not unconditioned. It is beyond all characteristics.

Malcolm wrote:

As I pointed out already, suchness can be defined as unconditioned.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 9th, 2011 at 6:11 AM

Title: Re: Ojas, Shukra & Tummo

Content:

dakini_boi said:

Oh, I thought it was the ojas that was important. Do shukra and ojas have different roles in tummo, or do they act together as the basis for bliss?

Also, what is the relationship between bindu and ojas?

Malcolm wrote:

In tummo, what is important is bliss.

There are different kinds of bindu. The most basic bindu is the bindu of pranavayu in the heart. The so called "bodhicitta" that circulates in the body is actually ojas.

Sukra acts as the basis for bliss.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 9th, 2011 at 5:40 AM

Title: Re: Ojas, Shukra & Tummo

Content:

dakini_boi said:

If shukra is a waste product, and ojas is generally not lost in the discharge of shukra - then what is the rationale behind not ejaculating when practicing tummo?

Malcolm wrote:

It acts as a basis for the bliss of tummy.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 7th, 2011 at 9:52 AM

Title: Re: Tibetan Myth of Chan

Content:

Astus said:

At the same time, it seems that either you think that Dzogchen can be discussed only by those who have gone through rigorous training of some sort...

Malcolm wrote:

Yes. Dzogchen is not Buddhism as usual.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 7th, 2011 at 4:03 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen Community of Chogyal Namkhai Norbu

Content:
alwayson said:
The only essential feature is holding the breath.

Malcolm wrote:
Well, how is also essential, If you hold your breath the wrong way, you can give yourself many serious illnesses.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Wednesday, December 7th, 2011 at 4:02 AM
Title: Re: Ojas (general discussion)
Content:
Malcolm wrote:
deleted

Author: Malcolm
Date: Wednesday, December 7th, 2011 at 1:21 AM
Title: Re: End times propaganda in Buddhism?
Content:
catmoon said:
The suchness of things is conditional on the existence of things, is it not?

Malcolm wrote:
No -- since things are not established, their suchness is not established either. That is the suchness of things.

N

Author: Malcolm
Date: Wednesday, December 7th, 2011 at 1:19 AM
Title: Re: Ojas (general discussion)
Content:
Lhug-Pa said:
Samael Aun Weor wrote about the black Tantra practice of mixing masculine Sukra with feminine Raja right here:

<http://sacred-sex.org/scriptures/western/64-samael-aun-weor-forms-of-tantra.html> "
onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

alwayson said:
This Samael Aun Weor a@#hole has the most distorted and retarded understanding of Indian concepts I have seen in a while.

Malcolm wrote:

Indeed, what is presented there is nothing but a mishmash from his distorted confusion.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 7th, 2011 at 1:09 AM

Title: Re: Ojas (general discussion)

Content:

Lhug-Pa said:

Although I highly doubt that Buddhist Root Tantras recommend such a thing.

Namdrol said:

They do, actually. Furthermore, you need to read carefully the SOV book and see what ChNN has to say about this. You will discover that what I have said is in fact the case, from a Dzogchen perspective.

N

Paul said:

Do you have a page reference for that? Thanks.

Malcolm wrote:

Pg. 61-62.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 7th, 2011 at 1:03 AM

Title: Re: Tibetan Myth of Chan

Content:

Namdrol said:

The main point behind lhundrup is practical, it is not theoretical or abstract. It has to do with how Dzogchen is practiced.

Astus said:

Then it'd good if you could give it a definition. As a start, I bring here one.

Spontaneous presence/accomplishment is an inherent aspect of buddha-mind, and means the aware side and the buddha qualities.

As such, the same teaching is found not only in Chan but in all East Asian schools following the buddha-mind teachings as found in the treatise "Awakening Mahayana Faith" and other works.

Malcolm wrote:

Hi astus:

I really suggest you learn Tibetan and learn Dzogchen teachings in a proper way. Otherwise, you are just spinning empty words.

n

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 7th, 2011 at 12:43 AM

Title: Re: Tibetan Myth of Chan

Content:

LastLegend said:

Dzogchen and Chan are two completely different systems of teachings. However, all the teachings that Dzogchen teaches, Chan also teaches.

Namdrol said:

No, since the basis is different, than path is different, and since the path is different, the result is different.

Jikan said:

Do both paths lead one to Buddhahood?

(even if on different time scales?)

Malcolm wrote:

Of course.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 6th, 2011 at 10:49 PM

Title: Re: Ojas (general discussion)

Content:

Lhug-Pa said:

Although I highly doubt that Buddhist Root Tantras recommend such a thing.

Malcolm wrote:

They do, actually. Furthermore, you need to read carefully the SOV book and see what ChNN has to say about this. You will discover that what I have said is in fact the case, from a Dzogchen perspective.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 6th, 2011 at 10:24 PM

Title: Re: Tibetan Myth of Chan

Content:

kalden yungdrung said:

Chan fails to understand cleaning or not cleaning the mirror so we have here 2 aspects or point of view. Even without cleaning the mirror, i never heard the practice or Tantra about the Bardo States in Zen, which are unique only to the Dzogchen Traditions.

Astus said:

This is a valid point here, as far as Chan is not concerned with specific practices related to the intermediate state, however, such is not unique to Dzogchen but found in other Vajrayana traditions too. Nevertheless, that is not relevant to seeing the nature of mind.

Malcolm wrote:

Teachings concerning that bardo in other Vajrayāna systems are quite limited, compared to Dzogchen.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 6th, 2011 at 10:23 PM

Title: Re: Tibetan Myth of Chan

Content:

LastLegend said:

Dzogchen and Chan are two completely different systems of teachings. However, all the teachings that Dzogchen teaches, Chan also teaches.

Malcolm wrote:

No, since the basis is different, than path is different, and since the path is different, the result is different.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 6th, 2011 at 7:52 AM

Title: Re: Does this render the Buddhism redundant?

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

ok, then, would the light coming out of whatever-channels-it-comes-out-of be included in the rupa skandha?

Namdrol said:

Light does not come out of any channels of the human body. And that "light" to which you are referring is not part of the rupa-skandha since it is a wisdom appearance.

N

gad rgyangs said:

does it have any abhidharmic classification? and why are they called 'od rtsa then?

Malcolm wrote:

Of course not, since it is part of Dzogchen teachings. It is considered by some masters that these channels are composed of "light" i.e. wisdom.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 6th, 2011 at 7:29 AM

Title: Re: Tibetan Myth of Chan

Content:

Namdrol said:

I see, those colors are conditioned or unconditioned?

You can see where this is going, right? lhun grub is not conditioned. But your "function" is. So they are completely different.

Astus said:

Is rupakaya conditioned or unconditioned? Are the qualities of buddha-mind conditioned or unconditioned? Are the wisdoms conditioned or unconditioned? It is possible to argue for both actually. Still, since the conditioned is in fact unconditioned, such extremes are only pedagogic.

Malcolm wrote:

The answer to these questions depend very much on whose perspective one is considering.

However saying that the conditioned is unconditioned is unintelligible. Saying that both the conditioned and the unconditioned are not established, however, is perfectly reasonable.

The main point behind lhundrup is practical, it is not theoretical or abstract. It has to do with how Dzogchen is practiced.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 6th, 2011 at 7:11 AM

Title: Re: Tibetan Myth of Chan

Content:

Namdrol said:

So they are completely different.

Jnana said:

Semantic nonsense. Are you really this foolish Malcolm, or is it a game?

Jinul's Complete and Sudden Attainment of Buddhahood:

It is also the perfectly bright purity of the original true nature of sentient beings which abides in pollution but is not stained, which is cultivated but becomes no purer. When defilements cover it, it is concealed; when wisdom reveals it, it appears. It is not something which comes into being due to the arising-cause; it is, rather, only understood through the understanding-cause.

If someone looks back on the radiance of his own mind's pure, enlightened nature and thereby extinguishes falsity and cleanses his mind, the myriads of images then appear together. It is just like seawater that has settled: there are no images which are not reflected. Hence it is called the ever-abiding function of the ocean-seal of all phenomena in the universe. Accordingly, we can know that the perfectly bright and self-reliant functions of the dharmadhātu which remain, including the unimpeded interpenetration of all phenomena as described in the three pervasions, are never separate from the pure enlightened nature. As explained by Uisang, the dharma-nature is perfectly interfused, has no name or sign, and is free of all relativity.

Malcolm wrote:

Hi Geoff:

This is not lhun grub.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 6th, 2011 at 6:10 AM

Title: Re: Does this render the Buddhism redundant?

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

would light coming out of the kati channels be included in the rupa skandha?

Namdrol said:

It does not come out of that channel.

gad rgyangs said:

ok, then, would the light coming out of whatever-channels-it-comes-out-of be included in the rupa skandha?

Malcolm wrote:

Light does not come out of any channels of the human body. And that "light" to which you are referring is not part of the rupa-skandha since it is a wisdom appearance.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 6th, 2011 at 5:41 AM

Title: Re: Tibetan Myth of Chan

Content:

Namdrol said:

How so? You mean you can see it with your eyes?

Astus said:

I can see colours with my eyes, also perceive and imagine colours in my mind. That is functioning.

Malcolm wrote:

I see, those colors are conditioned or unconditioned?

You can see where this is going, right? lhun grub is not conditioned. But your "function" is. So they are completely different.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 6th, 2011 at 4:44 AM

Title: Re: End Times NWO stuff

Content:

Namdrol said:

I mean, it is silly, calling Crowley's OTO a "black lodge" and so on. Crowley was the single most important and influential occultist of the 20th century. All this stuff and nonsense about white and black lodges amounts to nothing more than various occultists calling each other names because they disagreed.

Lhug-Pa said:

It's not about what they disagreed about so much, as it is about what they actually practiced. Although if I mention why Aleister Crowley's "X°" and "XI°" rituals are black here, the mods will most likely delete my post.

As I've said, as for the 20th century the work of Rudolf Steiner, Huiracocha, Dion Fortune, Max Heindel, Samael Aun Weor, and Manly P. Hall, is all more relevant than Aleister Crowley's.

Malcolm wrote:

We will agree to disagree. As for tenth and eleventh degree, heterosexual intercourse and homosexual intercourse are nothing to be ashamed of, and are hardly "black". This is a sort of prudish Victorianism that Crowley rightly ridiculed.

Lhug-Pa said:

Some of them were Buddhist. From what I understand H.P. Blavatsky and Henry Steele Olcott took Refuge (and H.P.B's The Voice of the Silence was approved of by the Dalai Lama and the Panchen Lama).

Malcolm wrote:

Not likely, and Blatvatsky was a great fraud. In fact, they all were to some degree or another, Blavatsky, Westcott, Mathers, etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 6th, 2011 at 3:15 AM

Title: Re: End Times NWO stuff

Content:

Lhug-Pa said:

Haha I knew you were going to say something like that.

Malcolm wrote:

I mean, it is silly, calling Crowley's OTO a "black lodge" and so on. Crowley was the single most important and influential occultist of the 20th century. All this stuff and nonsense about white and black lodges amounts to nothing more than various occultists calling each other names because they disagreed.

If they had any common sense they would have all just become buddhists.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 6th, 2011 at 3:01 AM

Title: Re: End Times NWO stuff

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Honestly, who cares about any of this stuff?

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 6th, 2011 at 2:43 AM

Title: Re: Does this render the Buddhism redundant?

Content:

gregkavarnos said:

would light coming out of the kati channels be included in the rupa skandha?

On that note: what about the light produced during a visualisation? Sound does not have an absolute speed, light does.

Cars do not have an absolute speed but they are considered to have form, so why not sound? Please note that I am playing the devils advocate here (to an extent)

PS Namdrol, could you please post a reference to the Abhidharma text where this is stated In Abhidharma, light is a shape i.e. a form.

But terms in terms of radiation, light is a product of fire or heat.

I have not come across this concept in my studies of Abhidhamma and/or Abhidharma yet.

Malcolm wrote:

Light is defined as a form, an object of the eye, in the first chapter of the Abhidharmakosha.

Fires produce light and heat, so it stands to reason light is included under the fire element.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 6th, 2011 at 2:42 AM

Title: Re: Does this render the Buddhism redundant?

Content:

Blue Garuda said:

How is the talk of photons relevant to the OP?

tomamundsen said:

OP is asking how do formless phenomena interact with form. Someone posits that light is formless but interacts with the eye.

Also, for the record, light is not matter.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, not so fast:

"In physics, a photon is an elementary particle, the quantum of the electromagnetic interaction and the basic unit of light and all other forms of electromagnetic radiation."

Since energy and matter are convertible, to say that light is "non-physical" is not really correct.

Light has form in a classical buddhist context i.e. it is defined in terms of shape; and it is material, since it is a property of the fire element.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 6th, 2011 at 2:25 AM

Title: Re: Does this render the Buddhism redundant?

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

would light coming out of the kati channels be included in the rupa skandha?

Malcolm wrote:

It does not come out of that channel.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 6th, 2011 at 2:09 AM

Title: Re: Tibetan Myth of Chan

Content:

Namdrol said:

Does Buddhamind have color?

Astus said:

Essentially no, functionally yes.

Malcolm wrote:

How so? You mean you can see it with your eyes?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 6th, 2011 at 1:33 AM

Title: Re: Does this render the Buddhism redundant?

Content:

Namdrol said:

Light has a speed, right?

gregkavarnos said:

So does sound...

Malcolm wrote:

Sound does not have an absolute speed, light does.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 6th, 2011 at 1:31 AM

Title: Re: Does this render the Buddhism redundant?

Content:
gad rgyangs said:
i thought "matter" was a better translation of rupa anyway.

Namdrol said:
Well it depends on whether it is rūpa skandha or rūpa-āyatana. The former is best translated as matter, and the latter, form.

N

gad rgyangs said:
so then it needs to be clear whether light as matter or light as something perceived is meant.

Malcolm wrote:
In Abhidharma, light is a shape i.e. a form.

But terms in terms of radiation, light is a product of fire or heat. In terms of what greg is referring to, the physics of light and optics are well understood.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Tuesday, December 6th, 2011 at 1:13 AM
Title: Re: Tibetan Myth of Chan
Content:
Namdrol said:
it would be better for you to properly learn Dzogchen and find out for yourself what the difference is.

Astus said:
As you seem to already know that difference, it would be beneficial for all reading this thread if you could explain it. General statements like "that is sutra, this is tantra" and "ask your guru" doesn't help.

Malcolm wrote:
Does Buddhamind have color?

Author: Malcolm
Date: Tuesday, December 6th, 2011 at 1:11 AM
Title: Re: Does this render the Buddhism redundant?
Content:
gad rgyangs said:
i thought "matter" was a better translation of rupa anyway.

Malcolm wrote:

Well it depends on whether it is rūpa skandha or rūpa-āyatana. The former is best translated as matter, and the latter, form.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 6th, 2011 at 12:56 AM

Title: Re: Does this render the Buddhism redundant?

Content:

gregkavarnos said:

Fire is responsible for the heat of phenomena. In the kasina meditations of the Theravada tradition there is a different meditation for light and a different one for fire. So...

PS If light had form and was composed of particles (photons) how would they pass through matter? Plus we know that light can exist without heat (phosphorescence for example) and heat can exist without light (friction for example).

Malcolm wrote:

Light has a speed, right?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 6th, 2011 at 12:21 AM

Title: Re: Tibetan Myth of Chan

Content:

Namdrol said:

it would be better for you to properly learn Dzogchen and find out for yourself what the difference is.

Astus said:

As you seem to already know that difference, it would be beneficial for all reading this thread if you could explain it. General statements like "that is sutra, this is tantra" and "ask your guru" doesn't help.

Malcolm wrote:

This has been explained many times to you and to others.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, December 5th, 2011 at 11:04 PM

Title: Re: Does this render the Buddhism redundant?

Content:

gregkavarnos said:

How does light (a formless phenomenon) interact with the eye?

Namdrol said:

It has form, called photons.

gregkavarnos said:

How can something that is massless be considered to have form?

PS If I take your statment as correct, then of which of the mahabhuta is light composed of?

Malcolm wrote:

Fire.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, December 5th, 2011 at 10:47 PM

Title: Re: End times propaganda in Buddhism?

Content:

Huseng said:

Namdrol,

You said,

Namdrol said:

Reality i.e. suchness, emptiness, etc., is not conditioned.

Huseng said:

Do you mean they are unconditioned?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, of course the reality of things is unconditioned, since it is not a product. Anything which is a product is by definition is conditioned; anything which is not a product is unconditioned.

Huseng said:

I said that things arise in dependence i.e. dependently, because of the reality of things i.e. the reality of things being emptiess free from extremes.

In other words, it is due to the reality of things (which you assert are not conditioned, which I'm wondering if you mean unconditioned like space), that things arise in dependence.

Malcolm wrote:

In other words, like space, the reality of things is not a product. Emptiness, suchness and so on are not produced, etc., it is in that sense along that we consider the reality of things "unconditioned".

Huseng said:

If you say that emptiness is unconditioned, then you have to explain how it has some kind of causal functionality which allows things to arise in dependence.

Malcolm wrote:

Emptiness is not an efficient cause, but it is a formal cause, like space. In other words, if things were not empty, they could not arise since they would have to exist; the arising of the existent is a contradiction in terms.

Huseng said:

If you agree that suchness is neither conditioned nor unconditioned, then there is no disagreement. If you're saying that suchness is unconditioned (like empty space), then I will disagree.

Malcolm wrote:

Suchness is not a product, therefore, it is unproduced. Whatever is unproduced is not subject to conditions. Whatever is not subject to conditions is, by strict definition, unconditioned.

If you deny that suchness is unconditioned, you also disagree with the Madhyamaka school. For example the Tarkajvala states:

"The unconditioned is the two cessations, space and suchness"

The unconditioned is analytical cessation and non-analytical cessation, space and suchness. Analytical cessation is discriminating wisdom i.e. having analyzed and extinguished the evident afflictions, that analysis and cessation is given the name "nirvana". Non-analytical cessation is when a given thing is never separate from cessation by any means. Space opens up room and has the characteristic of being unobstructed. Suchness previously did not exist, nor come to not exist through destruction, is not [presently] mutually dependent and has no basis. Those four are permanent because their nature is unchanging.

I am afraid that trying to prove that idea that suchness is neither conditioned nor unconditioned is fraught with definitional flaws.

Suchness is not a product, therefore, it is included among unconditioned phenomena, like space and the two cessations.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, December 5th, 2011 at 9:31 PM

Title: Re: Does this render the Buddhism redundant?

Content:

gregkavarnos said:

How does light (a formless phenomenon) interact with the eye?

Malcolm wrote:

It has form, called photons.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, December 5th, 2011 at 9:27 PM

Title: Re: Tibetan Myth of Chan

Content:

Namdrol said:

The first is not lhun grub, and the second is not direct introduction.

Astus said:

Could you define the difference?

Malcolm wrote:

it would be better for you to properly learn Dzogchen and find out for yourself what the difference is.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, December 5th, 2011 at 9:25 PM

Title: Re: Tibetan Myth of Chan

Content:

MalaBeads said:

I am one who happens to think that there indeed methods of direct introduction to the nature of mind in both Chan and Zen.

Malcolm wrote:

Introduction to the nature of the mind exists in sutra.

But that is not what "encountering one's own state" (ngo rang thog du sprad) aka direct introduction aka the first of the three words of Garaba Dorje, means.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, December 5th, 2011 at 8:42 PM

Title: Re: Tibetan Myth of Chan

Content:

Astus said:

That all comes, abides and returns to the buddha-mind is found in Chan. And the classic definition of Chan explicitly says direct pointing to the nature of mind as the hallmark of the tradition.

Malcolm wrote:

The first is not lhun grub, and the second is not direct introduction.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, December 5th, 2011 at 7:24 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen and Religious Pluralism

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

btw i am born Catholic, baptised and confirmed. i dont consider myself a christian but ill say again: its all-good in the expanse.

Malcolm wrote:

Then, no problem. As far as they are concerend, you are still Catholic.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, December 5th, 2011 at 7:09 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen and Religious Pluralism

Content:

treehuggingoctopus said:

ChNNR explicitly and repeatedly said that a good Dzogchen practitioner has no problems participating in Christian (or any other non-Buddhist) rites:

Malcolm wrote:

But he would want you do it respectfully, understanding and not transgressing their limitations -- and in this case, if that limitation meant that one should not take part in the sacrements of the Church since one was not baptized, one should not. For example, I was never baptized, and I have never taken part in any Church sacrements and never would.

ChNN also makes a point about following the laws of the country one is in. Canon law specifically forbids non-Christians from participating in the sacrements.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 4th, 2011 at 9:50 PM

Title: Re: The hardest thing in the world

Content:

ryu said:

Hi friends,

Buddhism is such a challenge for me. I love everything it stands for but I find it challenges my comfort zone.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes. And it never stops.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 4th, 2011 at 9:32 PM

Title: Re: Dzogchen and Religious Pluralism

Content:

mint said:

This statement seems to implicitly suggest that all religious views and philosophical systems can ultimately be incorporated under the umbrella of Dzogchen since Dzogchen is the ultimate nature of every single being.

Malcolm wrote:

What it actually means is that worldly religions such as Christianity, etc. are included in the nine yanas. The nine yanas in the root tantra of Dzogchen, the "Drathal Jyur" are a little different than in other places. Here, the first vehicle is the vehicle of gods and men, where we can include Christianity, Islam, Hinduism, Confucism, Taoism, and so on.

As to your other question, yes, realizing the meaning of Dzogchen is Buddhahood.

People have to work out the implications of that for themselves.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 4th, 2011 at 9:24 PM

Title: Re: Tibetan Myth of Chan

Content:

Astus said:

A reoccurring critique and usual argument to differentiate Chan view from Dzogchen (nb. I don't say they're the same!) is that Chan knows nothing about the aware nature of mind but only the empty. That is of course not so.

Malcolm wrote:

This is not the Dzogchen critique of Chan. So what is it? Chan lacks an understanding of natural formation (lhun grub). It also lacks the principle of direct introduction.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 4th, 2011 at 9:06 PM

Title: Re: Dzogchen Community of Chogyal Namkhai Norbu

Content:

mint said:

What is the difference between these two books, aside from price?

http://www.shangshungstore.org/index.php?l=product_detail&p=104 "
onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

https://www.amazon.com/Cycle-Day-Night-Primordial-Essential/dp/0882680404/ref=sr_1_4?s=books&ie=UTF8&qid=1322956981&sr=1-4 "
onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

Paul said:

Hi mint. Out of these two, the second is the one you want. The first has the root text and compares it paragraph by paragraph to an older terma - this is interesting of course, but the second has more useful information.

I would actually buy this instead:

http://www.shangshungstore.org/index.php?l=product_detail&p=87 "
onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

Malcolm wrote:

The text is not a terma -- the text is a tantra found in the Vairo gyud bum that ChNN discovered years later after writing CDN.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 4th, 2011 at 9:04 PM

Title: Re: Conceptuality in Buddhism

Content:

Food_Eatah said:

Without busy bodies to feed the trolls they could not possibly exist. Just like gangstas attract gangstas and saints attract nobel friends...

Malcolm wrote:

Ummm, you do realize this post counts as a troll, right?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 4th, 2011 at 11:43 AM

Title: Re: Protective Result

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

They should make a point to attend the next open webcast of ChNN.

ronnewmexico said:

I have a close relation who is exposed to many peoples in their line of work.

These people are of the shaministic type, resorting to shamanistic magic as a result of a response to their situaion of inequality discrimination and lack of opportunity.

Some may be quite malignant, and act at times for no known reason. Sickness and even death may occur as result of curse or ceremony to bring curse.

A specific ceremony is present in their faith of protective nature but not of blanket nature. As in if one was to receive a curse one would then seek and receive a cure in ceremony from a spiritual person by participating.

I think a normal protective nature commitment in tibetan buddhism would suffice for this protective issuse.as one aspires to dhama one is protected by dharma.

This is not for me but for other who has this situation.

So.....(long winded)...does anyone know a protective empowerment teaching being given in the southwest perhaps central new mexico, albuquerque, gallup, southern colorado or western arizona. This person is willing and able to establish a commitment.

I have checked locally with no result....so this is a shot in the dark. A month or two time frame would be preferable. As would a two or three day teaching on the weekend. But this shot I will take

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 4th, 2011 at 11:36 AM

Title: Re: James Low & Simply Being

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

bump: still looking for a useable reference that includes the edition, you know, like how references are given in an academic publication...

thanks in advance.

Malcolm wrote:

I am not an academic (thankfully), but here you go:

dri med 'od zer. "gsang ba bla med sgron ma dbu skor gyi gdams pa:." In snying thig ya bzhi. TBRC W12827. 4: 158 - 245. delhi: sherab gyaltzen lama, 1975.
http://tbrc.org/link?RID=O01CT0042%7CO01CT00423JT6812\$W12827 " onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

N

Author: Malcolm
Date: Sunday, December 4th, 2011 at 11:31 AM
Title: Re: End of the Kali-Yuga and the Mayan-Tibetan Connection
Content:

Lhug-Pa said:
Even the Dalai Lama said something along the lines of that perhaps some 'Atoms' or 'Particles' (Ain-Soph Atoms) of the Absolute perhaps somehow originally came into manifestation in the relative Universe. I can't remember in what book, so I'll have to find it and maybe even post the quote here. Like I said, something along those lines, so I want to double check what he said not paraphrased.

Malcolm wrote:
No, what HHDL was talking about was particles of space in the Kalacakra cosmology.

N

Author: Malcolm
Date: Sunday, December 4th, 2011 at 11:30 AM
Title: Re: End of the Kali-Yuga and the Mayan-Tibetan Connection
Content:
Lhug-Pa said:
I'll have to look it up again like I said to get the proper context.

Basically, it seems that in Kabbalah, AIN (Soph) is The Absolute Truth (whether with or without Paranishpanna or Paramartha) and the Tree of Life itself (Paratantra) and the Klipoth spheres (Parikalita) are of Relative Truth.

Of course all of this would likely require much deeper analysis in relation to Madhyamaka and Yogachara philosophy in order to fully qualify these statements, intellectually anyhow.

Malcolm wrote:
No, this is not how the three own natures function. The non-existence of the imagined in the dependent is the perfected nature.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 4th, 2011 at 11:29 AM

Title: Re: End of the Kali-Yuga and the Mayan-Tibetan Connection

Content:

wisdom said:

The foundational philosophy of Kabbalah is emanationism, but beyond that point it recognizes almost all the points of DO.

Malcolm wrote:

Let me put it to you this way: an XML scheme that is broken is not XML at all. A teaching (such as Dzogchen) is either completely in agreement with dependent origination from top to bottom, or it is not.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 4th, 2011 at 5:58 AM

Title: Re: End of the Kali-Yuga and the Mayan-Tibetan Connection

Content:

Lhug-Pa said:

Well I would somewhat disagree Namdrol, in that "Kabbalah" would predate the written Zohar (and even the "Chaldean Book of Numbers"), and also predates Plato, Ammonius Saccas, Plotinus, Proclus, etc.

Malcolm wrote:

Nonsense.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 4th, 2011 at 5:40 AM

Title: Re: Thinley Norbu's terms for ignorance

Content:

MalaBeads said:

I would rather look for how it's the case.

Malcolm wrote:

His translations are overly literal.

lhan cig skyes translates sahaja, which just means innate; but it often literally translated out of Tibetan. Same thing with kun brtags, or parikalpita, a term borrowed from Yogacara in Dzogchen texts, which just means "imputed" or "imagined".

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 4th, 2011 at 5:37 AM

Title: Re: Conceptuality in Buddhism

Content:

Dechen Norbu said:

So that you fellows know, RichardLinde has been banned. This account was a sockpuppet as many of you had already figured.

Carry on, please.

Malcolm wrote:

He'll be back.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 4th, 2011 at 5:07 AM

Title: Re: End of the Kali-Yuga and the Mayan-Tibetan Connection

Content:

wisdom said:

Atika Qadisha (Something like the primordial Buddha, literally it means "The Ancient Holy One").

Malcolm wrote:

No, nothing at all like Samantabhadra.

Kabbalah and Dzogchen could not be further removed from one another.

Kabbala is basically a mysticized neo-platonical emanationalism, Dzogchen is not.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 4th, 2011 at 4:47 AM

Title: Re: End of the Kali-Yuga and the Mayan-Tibetan Connection

Content:

alwayson said:

How do you reconcile the basis of Western esoterism, kabbalah, with the the fact that everything is dependently originated in Buddhism?

gregkavarnos said:

Dissociative Identity Disorder? That would be one way to deal with it!

Anyway, kabbalah is esoteric judaism, that makes it semitic, not western. I am sure there were esoteric traditions in the "west" well before esoteric judaism (13th century CE). Some examples I can think of would be: the Eleusinian Mysteries, Orphism and Dionysian cults which existed around the 14-15th century BCE.

Malcolm wrote:

Kabbalah is esoteric Judaism with a strong shot of neo-platonic doctrine. Actually it is more neo-platonic than "semitic".

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 4th, 2011 at 4:11 AM

Title: Re: Thinley Norbu's terms for ignorance

Content:

dakini_boi said:

from Cascading Waterfall of Nectar, p.20:

Simultaneously born ignorance

Is the dispersion of mindless unawareness

All-naming ignorance

Is clinging to the duality of self and other.

These two, simultaneously born ignorance and all-naming ignorance,

Are the cause of delusion for all sentient beings.

Question:

"simultaneously born ignorance" = innate ignorance

"all-naming ignorance" = imputing ignorance

?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 4th, 2011 at 3:54 AM

Title: Re: Curing sesame oil

Content:

Inge said:

While curing sesame oil I accidentally heated it to maybe 150 degrees celsius. Does this make it unsuitable for ayurvedic oil massage?

Malcolm wrote:

No, but why don't you just buy some high quality ayurvedic oils?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 4th, 2011 at 12:56 AM

Title: Re: James Low & Simply Being

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

༩༩། །གནད་ཀྱི་གཟེར་བྱ་ག།

Six Points.

མི་མཐོ་

Don't anticipate.

མི་བསམ་

Don't plan.

མི་སེམས་

Don't think.

མི་དཔྱད་

mi dpyod

Don't analyze.

མི་སྦྱོང་

mi sgom

Don't cultivate.

རང་སར་བཞག་

Stay where you are.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 4th, 2011 at 12:40 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen Community of Chogyal Namkhai Norbu

Content:

Lhug-Pa said:

Speaking of Santi Maha Sangha and The Precious Vase,[...] rather?

Edit (DN): As above. Please follow the advice Namdrol gave you.

Malcolm wrote:

Not an appropriate topic of discussion. If you have specific questions about topics in this book or others, best to write to Jim Valby or another SMS instructor. I am not one of these.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 4th, 2011 at 12:28 AM

Title: Re: Protection chords

Content:

Blue Garuda said:

I do recall a specific function of a cord as 'protection' prior to a specific Highest Yoga Tantra Initiation.

Malcolm wrote:

That is different, that functions to protect one's bodhicitta element and is only necessary during the empowerment.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 4th, 2011 at 12:00 AM

Title: Re: End times propaganda in Buddhism?

Content:

Lhug-Pa said:

Are there any Buddhist scriptures that mention the Precession of the Equinoxes?

Malcolm wrote:

Kalacakra takes precession into account, without mentioning it explicitly.

See Henning's book.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 3rd, 2011 at 11:51 PM

Title: Re: End of the Kali-Yuga and the Mayan-Tibetan Connection

Content:

padma norbu said:

Just found this:

"The Tibetan calendar is so similar to the Mayan that traditional scholars now speculate that they share a common origin."

from http://www.world-mysteries.com/sar_3.htm "

onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

Malcolm wrote:

The Tibeian calendar is based on calculations in the Kalacakra tantra, so, no relationship to Mayan calendar in anyway.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 3rd, 2011 at 11:39 PM

Title: Re: Protection chords

Content:

Dharmaswede said:

I am looking for information on protection chords; how they work, significance of different colors, different types of chords, exceptions to wearing them etc.

Thank you!

Best Regards,

Jens

Malcolm wrote:

Protection cords are for non-practitioners and animals. Practitioners have no need to wear them.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 3rd, 2011 at 10:57 PM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Here is a basic point:

All living and non-living things are created from the five elements.

All living and non-living things are maintained by the five elements.

All living and non-living things are destroyed by the five elements.

There are no exceptions.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 3rd, 2011 at 9:30 PM

Title: Re: Conceptuality in Buddhism

Content:

Namdrol said:

Richard Linde is famous for making things up as they go along.

RichardLinde said:

That is not at all true. All I ask is that people use reason to support their arguments, rather than relying on the fallacy of appeal to authority (false authority, usually).

That's not much to ask on an academic forum, is it?

Malcolm wrote:

If you want to know what Mahāyānist believe, Mr. Trevor Solway-Linde, then you should consult texts authored by Mahāyānists, instead of making things up based on your own limited reasoning.

RichardLinde said:

Who is it who decides that the Long PP sutra is valid? And who decides which commentaries are valid? And who decides how the commentaries are to be interpreted?

Malcolm wrote:

Centuries of Mahāyānists who wrote commentaries on this sutra in India, China, Tibet and Japan.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 3rd, 2011 at 10:36 AM

Title: Re: Conceptuality in Buddhism

Content:

Namdrol said:

Apparently, you are completely and totally ignorant of Mahāyāna positions.

RichardLinde said:

Where can I read the official Mahayana position? Who decides what the official Mahayana position is? Is there a team of people who get together and decide which Sutras are to be held to be authoritative, and exactly how those Sutras are to be interpreted?

Tom said:

Would you care then to provide at least one quote from a Mahayana specific commentary which explicitly supports your position.

I had thought the Mahayana position on omniscience was summed up nicely in the quote from Ornament of Clear Realisation that I referenced quite a few posts ago.

Malcolm wrote:

Kevin Solway aka Richard Linde is famous for making things up as they go along.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 3rd, 2011 at 10:35 AM

Title: Re: Conceptuality in Buddhism

Content:

Namdrol said:

Apparently, you are completely and totally ignorant of Mahāyāna positions.

RichardLinde said:

Where can I read the official Mahayana position? Who decides what the official Mahayana position is? Is there a team of people who get together and decide which Sutras are to be held to be authoritative, and exactly how those Sutras are to be interpreted?

Malcolm wrote:

Well, for starters you can read the Long PP sutra and its commentaries connected with the Abhisamaya-alamkara.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 3rd, 2011 at 9:58 AM

Title: Re: Conceptuality in Buddhism

Content:

RichardLinde said:

It doesn't help to appeal to the imagined "Mahayana definition", which doesn't even exist.

Malcolm wrote:

Apparently, you are completely and totally ignorant of Mahāyāna positions.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 3rd, 2011 at 6:39 AM

Title: Re: Conceptuality in Buddhism

Content:

Acchantika said:

If it is possible to know any detail about anything with certainty, that is a realist position...

Namdrol said:

The counter-example to your assertion is the omniscience of a buddha, which has unimpeded knowledge of all phenomena precisely because all phenomena are illusory and unreal.

N

Acchantika said:

Only if we consider unimpeded knowledge of all phenomena to be the same as knowing all details about everything with certainty.

Malcolm wrote:
Yes, that is the Mahāyāna definition of omniscience.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Saturday, December 3rd, 2011 at 6:37 AM
Title: Re: Is receiving transmission via webcast a farce?
Content:

padma norbu said:
If you got any of the Longsal books, let me know what you think. I wanted to get them before they sold out, but it seemed like there was going to be an endless amount of volumes, so I just didn't even start. So many teachings and books...

Pero said:
Just FYI, Longsal volumes are now considered restricted to people who either received the respective teachings or received the Longsal root initiation.

Paul said:
When did that change happen?

Malcolm wrote:
recently.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Saturday, December 3rd, 2011 at 6:08 AM
Title: Re: Conceptuality in Buddhism
Content:

RichardLinde said:
There are two main camps: those who believe that it is possible to perfectly know all details about everything, including future events, and those who don't.

Namdrol said:
No, the difference is that former are not realists; and the latter are realists i.e. realists in the sense of thinking that phenomena are fundamentally real (even if they try excuse themselves with the 'lacking inherent existence clause) and that there are therefore concrete limitations on what an "unimpeded mind", such as a Buddha's, can know.

N

Acchantika said:
If it is possible to know any detail about anything with certainty, that is a realist position...

Malcolm wrote:

The counter-example to your assertion is the omniscience of a buddha, which has unimpeded knowledge of all phenomena precisely because all phenomena are illusory and unreal.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 3rd, 2011 at 4:15 AM

Title: Re: Conceptuality in Buddhism

Content:

RichardLinde said:

There are two main camps: those who believe that it is possible to perfectly know all details about everything, including future events, and those who don't. The way I see it, the former are those who have "faith" in what they believe to be authority, and the latter are those who have investigated the issue.

Malcolm wrote:

No, the difference is that former are not realists; and the latter are realists i.e. realists in the sense of thinking that phenomena are fundamentally real (even if they try excuse themselves with the 'lacking inherent existence clause) and that there are therefore concrete limitations on what an "unimpeded mind", such as a Buddha's, can know.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 3rd, 2011 at 4:08 AM

Title: Re: End times propaganda in Buddhism?

Content:

Namdrol said:

Reality i.e. suchness, emptiness, etc., is not conditioned. Things arise in dependence because of the reality of things. Things are conditioned, but the reality of things is not.

N

Huseng said:

You say things arise in dependence because of the reality of things -- that those arisen things are conditioned, yet they arise in dependence on the unconditioned.

Malcolm wrote:

Read it again:

I said:

Things arise in dependence because of the reality of things.

You interpreted:

"that those arisen things are conditioned, yet they arise in dependence on the unconditioned"

I never said that things arise depending on the unconditioned. I said that things arise in dependence i.e. dependently, because of the reality of things i.e. the reality of things being emptiness free from extremes.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 3rd, 2011 at 2:53 AM

Title: Re: James Low & Simply Being

Content:

Namdrol said:

Hi

ChNN uses the term presence for what other people translated as mindfulness; and instant presence (rig pa skad cig ma) for being present in the stage of knowledge of one's primordial state. It is important to differentiate the two terms. Mindfulness is not rigpa.

N

mint said:

So, presence is not mindfulness? Experientially, they would seem to be the same thing, I would think.

Is mindfulness the natural state?

Malcolm wrote:

Presence = mindfulness

Instant presence = rigpa.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 3rd, 2011 at 2:44 AM

Title: Re: Deity Yoga Questions

Content:

Adamantine said:

It seems that ChNN's style is to treat everyone as if they are the highest capacity...

Malcolm wrote:

This is not a style, this characteristic of Dzogchen teachings and teachers in general. For example, Shabkar's Flight states right at the outset:

If this is practiced, all will be liberated;

there is no distinction between sharpness and dullness in capacities.

Dzogchen is not a gradual path.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 3rd, 2011 at 2:38 AM

Title: Re: James Low & Simply Being

Content:

Namdrol said:

Rigpa is the knowledge you have that allows you to wake up. Rigpa is a complicated word in Dzogchen texts, and has different meanings in different contexts, but generally it just means knowledge, which in English is the antonym of ignorance (ma rig pa).

mint said:

Adriano Clemente translates 'rigpa' as 'presence' in the book "Dzogchen: The Self-Perfected State." Is this the same as mindfulness?

Along those same lines, after my meditation, I have a sense of calm relaxation. No thought or sensation disturbs me. There is placidness and presence. Even when talking, knowledge of this placidness remains. Is this the natural state or rigpa?

Malcolm wrote:

Hi

ChNN uses the term presence for what other people translated as mindfulness; and instant presence (rig pa skad cig ma) for being present in the stage of knowledge of one's primordial state. It is important to differentiate the two terms. Mindfulness is not rigpa.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 2nd, 2011 at 10:04 PM

Title: Re: Reasons for Conventional Reality

Content:

Sherab said:

To give an example, the model tries to make consistent the ideas of causality, dependent arising and lhundrup. It is still a work-in-progress though. So far I've only attempted to float the model to one person but have met with silence from that person thus far. Not sure if it was a polite silence or a freak-out silence.

Malcolm wrote:
it is simple:

vidyā		avidyā
---		...
original purity		emptiness
natural formation		dependent origination

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 2nd, 2011 at 6:16 AM

Title: Re: Is receiving transmission via webcast a farce?

Content:

mint said:

[Personally, I see the restricted texts as largely another business scheme, though I imagine it can't be very profitable considering its niche market.]

Malcolm wrote:

Dzogchen Community has never made a real profit in a material sense. In fact, the person who supports it financially the most is ChNN.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 1st, 2011 at 11:34 PM

Title: Re: Madyamika Sautrantika vs Prasangika

Content:

RichardLinde said:

I did cite the Buddha saying that he doesn't know with certainty what will happen after the Dharma is extinguished. He doesn't give the reasons why he doesn't have this certainty, but we can work the reasons out for ourselves easily enough.

gregkavarnos said:

You have cited no such thing

RichardLinde said:

See <http://www.cttbusa.org/shurangama/shurangama2.asp>.

So too, will the Dharma flare and die. After this time it is difficult to speak with certainty of what will follow.

So clearly the Buddha doesn't have the kind of omniscience that would give him certain knowledge of future events - quite apart from the fact that such things can be easily proven to be impossible.

Malcolm wrote:

This text is inadmissible because its authenticity is disputed.

In any event your remarks Buddha's omniscience are appropriate from a non-Mahāyāna point of view, but not from a Mahāyāna point of view. Therefore, there is no further basis for a discussion because there is no common agreement about what omniscience of a buddha entails, much less whether a buddha possesses concepts.

N

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 30th, 2011 at 10:40 PM

Title: Re: James Low & Simply Being

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

interesting passage u got page ##s please?

Malcolm wrote:

Vima Nyinthig, volume two, starts on page 222.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 30th, 2011 at 10:34 PM

Title: Re: Is receiving transmission via webcast a farce?

Content:

mint said:

What happens when ChNNR has his pariniravana?

Malcolm wrote:

Then you follow ChNN's children -- who have both been given mandates to teach.

For now, stop worrying so much.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 30th, 2011 at 10:22 AM

Title: Re: Madyamika Sautrantika vs Prasangika

Content:

Tom said:

. . . the elimination of all knowledge obstacles

RichardLinde said:

The "obstacles" being referred to here are those obstacles arising from delusion, and not any other kind of obstacles.

The "knowledge" being referred to is knowledge of the true nature of things. Such a knowledge does give a person a lot greater ability to predict the future than a normal person, but predictions of detailed future events can never be certain.

Malcolm wrote:

You are going to need to start providing citations for your opinions. Thus far, all you have presented are opinions -- but the rules of this specific forum require citations.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 30th, 2011 at 4:37 AM

Title: Re: James Low & Simply Being

Content:

heart said:

A single essence doesn't mean they are the same. Like the nature of mind not being the same as mind. Actually, what you say sounds more Mahamudra related than Dzogchen.

/magnus

Namdrol said:

It means there is only one vidyā that has five expressions.

heart said:

Not making a clear distinction between "sem" and "rigpa" is not the Dzogchen way, so it still sounds like Mahamudra to me.

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

Take it up with Vimalamitra. He writes about this in both the Copper Letters and the Agate Letters.

The vidyā that apprehends characteristics: “the vidyā that imputes phenomena as universals and as mere personal names”, is one’s mere non-conceptual self-knowing awareness defiled by many cognitions.

The [vidyā that] appropriates the basis creates all cognitions when present in one’s body, and is present as the mere intrinsic clarity [of those cognitions] is called “unripened vidyā”.

The vidyā present as the basis is the reality of the essence, original purity, that exists possessing the three primordial wisdoms. The vidyā which is not covered by partiality is present as the essence of omniscient wisdom. Further, that primordial wisdom is present as a subtle primordial wisdom. If that primordial wisdom did not exist, there would be no liberation from emptiness. Further, there would be no liberation from the inert. However, if vidyā exists as primordial wisdom, it would be no different than the realist’s nirmanakāya.

The vidyā of insight is those vivid appearances when the instruction is demonstrated. It is called “the essence of the self-apparent thigle”. As there are many unmixed appearances, the Teacher stated:

Everything arose from non-arising, showing the great miraculous display in every way.

The vidyā of thögal is the absence of increase or decrease in experience having reached the full measure of appearance through practice. Having completed all the signs and qualities, also they are not established by their own nature. When self-manifesting as omniscient wisdom, it [the vidyā of thögal] is called “abandoning phenomena”, “the exhaustion of phenomena”, “beyond phenomena”, “liberated from phenomena”, and “no arising even in mere arising”.

Are those vidyās different or not? They are not different since there is nothing more than a single nature.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 30th, 2011 at 3:50 AM

Title: Re: Deity Yoga Questions

Content:

mint said:

This thread was started to ask questions in relation to deity yoga:

Is a guru required before engaging in deity yoga?

Is ngondro required before engaging in deity yoga?

Does Dzogchen practice include deity yoga?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes

No

Yes, but not necessarily.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 30th, 2011 at 3:48 AM

Title: Re: James Low & Simply Being

Content:

Namdrol said:

mind is the result of karmic winds mixing with the rtsal of rigpa.

N

Thoughts are the energy [rtsal] of rigpa.

N

alwayson said:

Sure I believe all that

Then what does distinguishing between rigpa and sems mean if sems is actually partly derived from rigpa.....

Malcolm wrote:

It means knowing the difference between the crystal that produces a rainbow and the rainbow projected from the crystal -- the rtsal of the crystal produces the rainbow, the rainbow comes from the crystal but is not part of the crystal. Likewise, thoughts come from the energy of vidyā, but they are not vidyā.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 30th, 2011 at 3:40 AM

Title: Re: James Low & Simply Being

Content:

heart said:

A single essence doesn't mean they are the same. Like the nature of mind not being the same as mind. Actually, what you say sounds more Mahamudra related then Dzogchen.

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

It means there is only one vidyā that has five expressions.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 30th, 2011 at 3:36 AM

Title: Re: James Low & Simply Being

Content:

conebeckham said:

From the POV of Dzokchen, would a fully enlightened Buddha have "thoughts?" I'm thinking of the Madhyamika thread.....I understand that the nature of thoughts is the energy of rigpa, but how does this impact the discussion of Buddhas being concept-free?

Namdrol said:

No impact, and no, a Buddha still has no thoughts since, from a Dzogchen POV, mind is the result of karmic winds mixing with the rtsal of rigpa.

N

Sönam said:

Then what is the rtsal of rigpa when no thoughts?

Sönam

Malcolm wrote:

rtsal.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 30th, 2011 at 3:11 AM

Title: Re: Sherab vs. Lodro

Content:

dakini_boi said:

Thanks, Namdrol. So, in Tibetan, do they both imply "discriminating wisdom" or ordinary intelligence? Or are they both used interchangeably for either of these?

Malcolm wrote:

They overlap.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 30th, 2011 at 2:57 AM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

gregkavarnos said:

One can also make a karmic connection to an animal by saving it from from being slaughtered and eaten.

That's what the practice: Essence of Benefit and Joy by Jamgon Kongtrul Lodro Thaye is all about.

You can buy it here http://www.namsebangdzo.com/Essence_of_Benefit_and_Joy_p/5324.htm "

onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

And I have an electronic version of it available here for download <https://dl.dropbox.com/u/9844773/Essence%20of%20Benefit.rar.exe> " onclick="window.open(this.href);return false; for whoever wishes.

Kyosan said:

I agree.

And what are these karmic connections from eating meat? Could it be that in a future life, the animal who was eaten is afraid of the person who ate him? Or could it be that in a future life the person is an animal and the animal is a person, and the person eats the animal? I see both of these as being negative; it would be interesting to see examples of positive karmic connections that are beneficial.

Malcolm wrote:

If you use the proper method, and maintain awareness while eating meat, that animal will be reborn as your student when you achieve awakening.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 30th, 2011 at 2:31 AM

Title: Re: Sherab vs. Lodro

Content:

dakini_boi said:

Could someone explain the difference between these two words, which are both translated as "wisdom"? Are they used differently in Buddhist texts?

Thank you.

Malcolm wrote:

one translates prajñā (shes rab), the other translates mati (blo gros).

One means discriminating wisdom, prajñā, the other refers more to intellectual capacity, intelligence. In Tibetan they are somewhat synonymous.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 30th, 2011 at 2:12 AM

Title: Re: James Low & Simply Being

Content:

conebeckham said:

From the POV of Dzokchen, would a fully enlightened Buddha have "thoughts?" I'm thinking of the Madhyamika thread.....I understand that the nature of thoughts is the energy of rigpa, but how does this impact the discussion of Buddhas being concept-free?

Malcolm wrote:

No impact, and no, a Buddha still has no thoughts since, from a Dzogchen POV, mind is the result of karmic winds mixing with the rtal of rigpa.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 30th, 2011 at 1:53 AM

Title: Re: End times propaganda in Buddhism?

Content:

Dharma Atma said:

As for me I believe Dharma itself is conditioned.

Namdrol said:

Reality is not conditioned. The Dharma comes from recognition of reality. So while the expression of Dharma may be subject to change and adaptation, reality is always there to be perceived. Further, all Dharma teachings stem from Dzogchen. Dzogchen will be the first teaching in any given eon and the last.

N

catmoon said:

Reality is not conditioned? How does this fit in with dependent origination?

Malcolm wrote:

Reality i.e. suchness, emptiness, etc., is not conditioned. Things arise in dependence because of the reality of things. Things are conditioned, but the reality of things is not.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 30th, 2011 at 1:41 AM

Title: Re: James Low & Simply Being

Content:

Namdrol said:

For this reason we can understand that thoughts are included in rigpa.

N

alwayson said:

How can thoughts be included in rigpa??

What about the infamous distinction between rigpa (knowledge) and sems, expounded by the omniscient masters?

Malcolm wrote:

Thoughts are the energy [rtsal] of rigpa.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 30th, 2011 at 12:25 AM

Title: Re: James Low & Simply Being

Content:

heart said:

I am afraid that makes no sense. Does ChNN say this?

/magnus

Namdrol said:

Rig pa cog bzhag is allowing all thoughts to be as they are. Conceptual knowledge is included in thoughts.

heart said:

There is no conceptual knowledge apart from thoughts because this is the conceptual obscuration, the heart of "sem". Allowing the self-liberation of "sem" is rigpa.

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

In The Lamp of Vidyā, five aspects of vidyā are described. According to Vimalamitra, the first, the vidyā which apprehends characteristics, designates general and specific phenomena, it is a non-conceptual awareness sullied by many cognitions.

When asked "Are those vidyā' the same, or are they different?", the reply is that there is nothing other than a single essence.

For this reason we can understand that thoughts are included in rigpa.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 30th, 2011 at 12:18 AM

Title: Re: Madyamika Sautrantika vs Prasangika

Content:

Namdrol said:

If Buddhas appear to have concepts, that appearance comes from our concepts.

RichardLinde said:

There is only a problem with "concepts" if we define a "concept" to be the projection of inherent existence onto things.

Malcolm wrote:

But that is not how a vikalpa (rnam par rtog pa) is defined.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 29th, 2011 at 12:07 PM

Title: Re: James Low & Simply Being

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

Rigpa is that which enables you to be astonished that there is something rather than nothing.

Malcolm wrote:

What are you, a Heidegger fan?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 29th, 2011 at 12:05 PM

Title: Re: Madyamika Sautrantika vs Prasangika

Content:

RichardLinde said:

And Buddhas appear to have concepts, so we say they have concepts.

Malcolm wrote:

If Buddhas appear to have concepts, that appearance comes from our concepts.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 29th, 2011 at 8:35 AM

Title: Re: Deity Yoga Questions

Content:

alwayson said:

I thought you got Dzogchen transmission.

Forget about all this deity stuff and get some rigpa/vidya/knowledge.

As far as I understand, there are only 4 essential Dzogchen practices:

rigpa / guru yoga

Song of the Vajra

Chulen of Space

4 visions

Malcolm wrote:

Add rushen to that list and that would be about right.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 29th, 2011 at 8:28 AM

Title: Re: Root Lamas

Content:

Blue Garuda said:

I believe any guru giving you an HYT empowerment is considered to be a Root Guru.

Vajra Masters may receive HYT empowerment from each other and become a Root Guru for each other for those practices.

heart said:

Any master that gives you an empowerment becomes your Guru, I am with you so far. However, root in root Guru is pointing directly at your own realization. If a lama and the empowerment's he/she give you don't have a lasting influence on your own realization why would he/she be considered a root Guru? I think using the word root Guru in such a casual way degenerates the meaning of the word, using the word Guru is strong enough.

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

Different lineage, different terminology.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 29th, 2011 at 8:25 AM

Title: Re: Root Lamas

Content:

kirtu said:

In Sakya the root lama is the lama who bestows highest yoga tantra empowerment:

From The Questions of the Contemplative Nyimo Gomchen and the Responses of Sakya Pandita What makes a person one's true Guru? The person from whom one correctly receives the four empowerments in accordance with the Tantras in one's true Guru. A Guru from whom one has not received such empowerment – how ever good a person he might be – is one's Guru in name only, For example, the person from whom one receives monastic ordination is one's true abbot, but if one has not been ordained by someone, he is not one's true abbot. And even if he is called "Abbot", he is such in name only. Thus: "without bestowing empowerment, there is no Guru. Without monastic ordination, there is no abbot. Without precepts, there is no continuum of virtue. Without going for refuge, one is not a spiritual person." That is the meaning of the above verse.

Kirt

Caz said:

Bing Bing ! But as far as I know this is the same for all traditions

Malcolm wrote:

Nope.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 29th, 2011 at 8:25 AM

Title: Re: Root Lamas

Content:

kirtu said:

In Sakya the root lama is the lama who bestows highest yoga tantra empowerment:

heart said:

All of them?

/magnus

Paul said:

I think Magnus has a point - that quote only seems to describe a tantric guru, not ones root guru.

Malcolm wrote:

for those whose view is tantra, that is their mula guru.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 29th, 2011 at 7:53 AM

Title: Re: James Low & Simply Being

Content:

heart said:

I am afraid that makes no sense. Does ChNN say this?

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

Rig pa cog bzhag is allowing all thoughts to be as they are. Conceptual knowledge is included in thoughts.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 29th, 2011 at 2:34 AM

Title: Re: End times propaganda in Buddhism?

Content:

Dharma Atma said:

As for me I believe Dharma itself is conditioned.

Malcolm wrote:

Reality is not conditioned. The Dharma comes from recognition of reality. So while the expression of Dharma may be subject to change and adaptation, reality is always there to be perceived. Further, all Dharma teachings stem from Dzogchen. Dzogchen will be the first teaching in any given eon and the last.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 29th, 2011 at 2:30 AM

Title: Re: Madyamika Sautrantika vs Prasangika

Content:

tobes said:

The direct apprehension of emptiness is pretty clearly defined as the cessation of conceptual thought

RichardLinde said:

I am suspecting that there has been an error in translation. Can you give a reference to a text that defines the apprehension of emptiness as "the cessation of conceptual thought".

I mean, I could understand if it was defined as the cessation of papanca (deluded conceptual proliferation).

Malcolm wrote:

MMK 18:

aparapratyayaṃ śāntaṃ prapañcair aprapañcitaṃ
nirvikalpam anānārthaṃ etat tattvasya lakṣaṇaṃ|

ཁགཞན་ལས་ཤེས་མེན་ཞི་བ་དང་། རྫོགས་པ་རྒྱས་ཀྱིས་མ་རྫོགས་པ།
རྒྱུ་རྟོག་མེད་དོན་ཐ་དང་མེད། འདི་ནི་དེ་ཉིད་མཚན་ཉིད་དོ།

Not known from another; peaceful; lacking proliferation with proliferations;
non-conceptual; undifferentiated — that is the characteristic of reality.

Buddhapalita comments:

"Not known from another"; here not known from another i.e. not scriptural, but one's direct perception, thus it is a convention for one's direct perception. "Peaceful" is a convention for "empty by nature". "Lacking proliferation with proliferations" is a convention for freedom from mundane phenomena. "Non-conceptual" means not designated "This is this". Undifferentiated means not different objects such as "though it this, it is also this". Why is that? Because of lacking concepts, there is no proliferation with proliferations. Why? Because there is no proliferation by mundane phenomena. Why? Because that is peaceful, it is undifferentiated. Therefore, the knowledge of such a nature is a personal knowledge, not known from elsewhere. That should be understood to be the characteristic of reality.

According to Mahāyāna, a buddha is in a state of continuous equipoise on reality. It is impossible therefore that a buddha will experience concepts.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 29th, 2011 at 1:52 AM

Title: Re: Triyik Yeshe Lama.

Content:

always on said:

Of course.

Namdrol said:

In any case Yeshe Lama is kind of a beginners text. It is not that deep.

N

heart said:

I don't agree, I found it very special. But some parts are very short short and some seem to be missing.

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

There is a reason why there is an oral instruction lineage connected with TYL, and that is because the text itself is not complete.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 29th, 2011 at 1:50 AM

Title: Re: James Low & Simply Being

Content:

Fa Dao said:

When we say "Knowledge" of the natural state is rigpa, by "knowledge" we mean gnosis not knowledge as in the acquisition of intellectual data, right?

Namdrol said:

By knowledge, we mean that you know what is being discussed. No need to gum up the works with fancy words like gnosis. In the beginning you need to acquire intellectual data. Then you need to apply it. This is all part of "rigpa".

If you say that rigpa is only a "gnosis" than this makes things more complicated --it means in order to have that knowledge you must already be awakened. But this is not the case. Rigpa is the knowledge you have that allows you to wake up. Rigpa is a complicated word in Dzogchen texts, and has different meanings in different contexts, but generally it just means knowledge, which in English is the antonym of ignorance (ma rig pa). Conceptual knowledge is included under the general definition of vidyā, this is a poorly understood point.

N

heart said:

True, but in Dzogchen Trechö rigpa is not conceptual knowledge, that also seems to be poorly understood.

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

Conceptual knowledge is included in rigpa in tregchö -- this is why we have rig pa cog bzhag.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 29th, 2011 at 12:42 AM

Title: Re: Triyik Yeshe Lama.

Content:

alwayson said:

Of course.

Malcolm wrote:

In any case Yeshe Lama is kind of a beginners text. It is not that deep.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 29th, 2011 at 12:35 AM

Title: Re: Triyik Yeshe Lama.

Content:

Pema Rigdzin said:

Exactly what is incorrect in Sangye Khandro and Lama Chonam's most recent translation? I haven't found a single mistake. This must just be something you've heard from someone partial to Duff's work or something.

alwayson said:

Duff's version is even more recent than this.

In the intro he trashes the Snow Lion Yeshe Lama on multiple grounds including even the source texts used.

Someone gave me a copy when they shouldn't have. I have since deleted it, since I didn't feel right about having it.

Malcolm wrote:

There is no such a thing as a perfect translation.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 29th, 2011 at 12:34 AM

Title: Re: Primordial stains ?

Content:

Merely Labeled said:

Why didn't a primordial Buddha (Kuntuzangpo) fall into ignorance ?

Malcolm wrote:
Samantabhadra also possessed ignorance.

N

Author: Malcolm
Date: Tuesday, November 29th, 2011 at 12:15 AM
Title: Re: Triyik Yeshe Lama.
Content:
Jnana said:
For example, he wants to read Maitripa and Milarepa as being proponents of gzhan stong.

Malcolm wrote:
Yes, this is completely incorrect.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Tuesday, November 29th, 2011 at 12:13 AM
Title: Re: Triyik Yeshe Lama.
Content:
Pema Rigdzin said:
I seem to remember hearing this from someone else. Personally, I have only so much as heard of Duff's name. But I was thinking that "Wisdom Guru" sounds a bit too literal for a translation of Yeshe Lama in this context; since the aim of the text is (ideally) enabling one to attain the unexcelled stage of Dzogchen realization called "yeshe lama," translating it as "Unexcelled Wisdom" or "Highest Wisdom" would seem to make more sense to me... even if the guru, the state of Dzogchen, and the realization of that state are all one in the same ultimately.

Malcolm wrote:
It means "highest wisdom", uttarajñāna, not jñānaguru. It is a reference to the sixteenth bhumi.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Tuesday, November 29th, 2011 at 12:07 AM
Title: Re: Madyamika Sautrantika vs Prasangika
Content:
Namdrol said:
their acts of speech are not connected with concepts and signs.

RichardLinde said:
Do you mean to say that that the speech of a Buddha is not a pointer (a "sign") to the truth? That the speech of a Buddha is not a finger which points to the moon?

In the context of Western culture, a "concept" is defined as a thought or idea, according to the Oxford dictionary. Surely it wouldn't be correct to say that a Buddha has no thoughts or ideas?

Or does the word "concept" have an entirely different meaning within the context of Buddhism?

Malcolm wrote:
Hi Kevin Solway:

Buddha don't have thoughts, therefore, they have no concepts. They are however omniscient.

N

Author: Malcolm
Date: Monday, November 28th, 2011 at 11:25 AM
Title: WTF?
Content:
Unknown said:

Mr. President, I would also point out that these provisions raise serious questions as to who we are as a society and what our Constitution seeks to protect. One section of these provisions, section 1031, would be interpreted as allowing the military to capture and indefinitely detain American citizens on U.S. soil. Section 1031 essentially repeals the Posse Comitatus Act of 1878 by authorizing the U.S. military to perform law enforcement functions on American soil. That alone should alarm my colleagues on both sides of the aisle, but there are other problems with these provisions that must be resolved.

Malcolm wrote:
http://markudall.senate.gov/?p=press_release&id=1746 "
onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

Author: Malcolm
Date: Monday, November 28th, 2011 at 11:03 AM
Title: Re: Madyamika Sautrantika vs Prasangika
Content:
tobes said:

Right - but how can any sentence that is heard be devoid of concepts?

Malcolm wrote:
Concepts are formed by sentient beings concerning what they interpret as speech acts by Buddhas.

tobes said:

What you're really saying is that vajra speech emanates from the dharmakaya right (i.e. as the sambogakaya)? So it is ontologically distinct from ordinary speech.

I would accept the argument that sambogakaya contains a multiplicity of different communicative modes, many of which are not linguistic.

But when there is linguistic communication, that involves words, symbols, signs, signifiers. So I suppose the question is: how can a signifier (or chain of signifiers which comprise a sentence) not be a concept?

Malcolm wrote:

What I am saying is really simple: Buddhas do not have conceptual minds, therefore, their acts of speech are not connected with concepts and signs.

[/quote]

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 28th, 2011 at 2:19 AM

Title: Re: TTM & herbs contra cancer

Content:

AdmiraUim said:

also to cure a tumour completely the only 100% effective way of doing that is cut it out and western surgery is more developed in this respect. traditional medicincal doctrines are better at preventing cancer because of their more developed dietary systems/advice. so to prevent cancer follow the dietary advice of those older systems but if you get cancer it is better to see an oncologist and western surgeon to try to cure it.

Malcolm wrote:

Agreed.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 28th, 2011 at 2:12 AM

Title: Re: Weight

Content:

Kyosan said:

You don't have to eat meat to get enough calories. Grains, legumes, many root vegetables and nuts are all decent sources of calories. Most fruits are lower in calories but avocados and durians are good fruit sources.

Ngawang Drolma said:
Thanks What's a root vegetable?

Best,
Laura

Malcolm wrote:
Carrots

Author: Malcolm
Date: Monday, November 28th, 2011 at 1:07 AM
Title: Re: Weight
Content:

Ngawang Drolma said:
Aye, three meals now. Ok. I dropped another ten in a week totaling 60 in five weeks. At this point it's becoming an interference but I guess that would be obvious.

Thanks,
Laura

Malcolm wrote:
Whole grain cereals for breakfast with whole milk, pastries, etc., not yogurt and fruit
Rich, nutritious food at lunch, pasta, butter, olive oil, meat, etc.

Soups for dinner, beef barely, etc.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Monday, November 28th, 2011 at 12:46 AM
Title: Re: Weight
Content:
Ngawang Drolma said:
Namdrol la and all,

How can you at least keep your weight from dropping even if you're consuming food and nutrients and even fats?

Thanks,
Laura

Malcolm wrote:
Eat three meals a day, with your noon meal being the largest.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 28th, 2011 at 12:34 AM

Title: Re: Restless itching sensation inside the chest.

Content:

Inge said:

Hi

At the age of 13 I started having a restless, burning and itching sensation in the chest. It is located at around four cm above the lower tip of the chestbone. It strengthens and weakens in waves, and at times it is so intense it is driving me mad, especially at night (it often begins in the afternoon, exhausts me through the night, and releases in the early morning. It is accompanied by feeling hot and dry on the body surface, itching of the skin (especially in the groin area), and excessive thirst. Holding something cool to the chest, and moving around is what I have found to ease the sensation. Often I have thought this might be heartburn, but once when the sensation was particularly tormenting I decided to lie completely still and listen to it in hope of figuring out what it was. In waves it grew stronger and stronger until at a point when I felt I was dying it exploded into blissful waves of "energy" going up and down the body, making me laugh and cry uncontrollably. After this the sensation was gone for some years, but now it is back. Do you know what this could be, and how to treat it?

I have made the following self-diagnosis: The itching sensation in the chest is in fact heartburn, probably due to a hiatus hernia that I recently learned that "everybody" on my mothers side of the family has. The blissful energy waves was bliss arising from concentration on unpleasant sensation.

Do tibetan medicine have useful treatment for heartburn?

Malcolm wrote:

You should cut down on processed foods, drink more hot water, never eat after 6, eat your main meal at noon, these habits should help reduce your acid reflux. There are also herbs that one can take such as Congzhi Drugpa.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 28th, 2011 at 12:26 AM

Title: Re: Democracy in the country that gave birth to democracy

Content:

tobes said:

Naomi Wolf gets it right again:

<http://www.guardian.co.uk/commentisfree/cifamerica/2011/nov/25/shocking-truth-about-crackdown-occupy> " onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

Malcolm wrote:

Alternet's refutation of Wolf's post:

http://www.alternet.org/occupywallst/153222/naomi_wolf%26acirc%3B%26euro%3B%26trade%3Bs_%26acirc%3B%26euro%3B%26tilde%3Bshocking_truth%26acirc%3B%26euro%3B%26trade%3B_about_the_%26acirc%3B%26euro%3B%26tilde%3Boccupy_crackdowns%26acirc%3B%26euro%3B%26trade%3B_offers_anything_but_the_truth?page=entire " onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, November 27th, 2011 at 11:48 PM

Title: Conceptuality in Buddhism

Content:

tobes said:

...how can you explain the fact that if a Buddha still speaks to sentient beings, she must apprehend the concepts which those sentient beings communicate?

Those concepts are necessarily conventional.

So, does it not follow, that a Buddha must be able to apprehend the conventional phenomena of ordinary speech?

Malcolm wrote:

First, I don't regard that as a fact. The rest of your statement depends upon me accepting that fact, but I don't.

The primary Mahayāna sutra metaphor for a Buddha is a wishfulfilling gem because a wishfulfilling automatically gem fulfills the wishes of sentient beings without concepts.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, November 27th, 2011 at 11:40 PM

Title: Re: Madyamika Sautrantika vs Prasangika

Content:

tobes said:

Notice how you're leaning on a tantric text to support your argument?

There is nothing in Nagarjuna, nor Chandrakirti which asserts vajra speech. The assumption clearly comes from elsewhere.

Malcolm wrote:

There are sutra statements to similar effect. Anyway, it merely proves the point, which, in essence, is that people hear what they want to hear regardless of who is speaking.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, November 27th, 2011 at 11:27 PM

Title: Re: TTM & herbs contra cancer

Content:

kalden yungdrung said:

What did cause their conclusion e.g. that their treatment according the TTM would be "senseless"? Also seems it strange to me that they do not have remedies against cancer whereas TTM is/ was confronted with cancer for many centuries.

Malcolm wrote:

According to most Tibetan doctors I know, modern cancers do not really exist in pre-modern Tibet.

[/quote]

Could you give some examples about the power of TTM / Aryurveda regarding the mentioned prevention of chronic diseases?

- Further, what do you mean with a chronic disease or when is a disease chronic according TTM? [/color] according to TM, cancers and all chronic diseases come from maldigestion -- other chronic diseases are edemas, benign tumors, and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, November 27th, 2011 at 2:20 AM

Title: Re: TTM & herbs contra cancer

Content:

kalden yungdrung said:

How did you came to that conclusion, e.g. that western medicine would be better than TTM regarding the treatment of cancer?

Malcolm wrote:

Tibetan Doctors in the Tibetan Hospital in Xining.

Cancers on the outer body can be treated, but cancers of internal organs are not really treatable with Tibetan Medicine.

Prevention is a different issue -- TTM /Ayurveda are more effective than western medicine for prevention of many chronic diseases.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, November 27th, 2011 at 2:11 AM

Title: Re: Tibetan Astrological "overlap" with others?

Content:

padma norbu said:

That's just as bad as any creation myth I ever heard.

Malcolm wrote:

This is a truncated version of a much better version:

When that is applied to the tortoise of the basis, first, out of total nothingness there is the so called "primordially existing or abiding tortoise". And from this arose, or were produced, all the Buddhas of the three times and all the sentient beings of the three realms. The example for that is the void of spacem and since the meaning is the dharmadhātu of Samantabhadra, it exists without any coalescence or separation in any of the three times. No head or tail can be seen here, no limbs are shown here, in terms of time, here it abides without abiding. Without grasping to any extremes -- Buddhas and sentient beings are in that. The dharmakāya, the sambhogakāya, and the nirmanakāya, the emanations of the body, speech, mind, qualities and activities of the Victors, male, female, neuters, moving and resting and so on -- that superior one is called the "abiding tortoise"

Second, the tortoise of formation: the seven water maṇḍalas come from the moist breath of the abiding tortoise and from the mouth of the tortoise formes a green maṇḍala of water. Above that, from the flesh of the tortoise form Meru, the oceans and major and minor continents and the golden firmament. The pores of the tortoise form as grass and trees. That is the description of the tortoise of formation.

The golden tortoise of existence is the tortoise of existence that comes from the meeting of the tortoise of abiding and the tortoise of formation. The head of the tortoise of existence faces south. The rear-end faces north. The four limbs are in the four intermediate directions.

From its white carapace, Grandfather Sky [khen pa rgad bu] formed as heaven.

Above, the region of the gods arises, the four formless realms, the great god Brahma of the pure abodes and so on. Below that arose the Trāyāstrimśāḥ gods and the Paranirmitavaśavartino gods on the top of Meru. On the slopes of Meru arose the four great king gods, the sun, the moon and all of the planets and stars.

The sun and moon arose from the eyes of the tortoise, and the sound of thunder came from the sound of his palate. Lightning flashes from his extended tongue produced thunder bolts and hail.

Wind came from the breath of the tortoise, the five external elements came from his five functional organs.

Earthquakes were caused by the movements of the tortoise's body. The golden belly of the tortoise formed or arose from Grandmother Earth [khon ma rgan mo] as the ground. And from that region of the nāgās, the eight wild nāgās and so on, arose. Furthermore, that tortoise of existence is divided into two, method and wisdom or male and female. The golden tortoise of mentation is equal with space, the nature of method, and face down. The silver tortoise of phenomenal objects is equal with the surface of the world, is the nature of wisdom and lays on its back and so on, as it is in the many methods of explanation.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, November 27th, 2011 at 2:06 AM

Title: Re: Tibetan Astrological "overlap" with others?

Content:

maybay said:

I haven't heard good reviews about this book.

Malcolm wrote:

It's a fine book.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, November 27th, 2011 at 12:04 AM

Title: Re: TTM & herbs contra cancer

Content:

kalden yungdrung said:

Tashi delek,

We all know all the illness called cancer.

Regarding cancer there arose some questions in relation to TTM.

- How is cancer seen and general treated in TTM ?
- What are the herbs etc. which can cure what kind of cancer ?
- Where can we obtain those pills or medicines ?
- How can (what kind of) cancer be avoided regarding the TTM ?

Mutosg Marro

KY

Malcolm wrote:

Western medicine is better than TTM for cancer.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, November 27th, 2011 at 12:03 AM

Title: Re: Madyamika Sautrantika vs Prasangika

Content:

Namdrol said:

Not at all. Recall, all phenomena means all the five sense organs and sense objects, six consciousnesses, mental factors and unconditioned phenomena i.e. what is included in one skandha, one ayatana, and one dhātu.

One's own wisdom means that one encompasses all phenomena with omniscience.

Thus, no monism.

N

alwayson said:

I see.

So it is more a realization of the nature of all phenomena.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, precisely.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, November 27th, 2011 at 12:01 AM

Title: Re: Democracy in the country that gave birth to democracy

Content:

Namdrol said:

Since utopias are impossible

N

alwayson said:

Serious question:

Is it not possible for a rainbow body to stay in this world and help establish a better society?

Malcolm wrote:

Of course, this result is called phowa chenpo. Kuzang Dechen Lingpa achieved this. Hopefully ChNN will manifest this as well.

For some time, ChNN has been emphasizing that the best way to go is personal evolution through Dzogchen -- he is convinced this will change the whole world. Revolution does not work.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, November 26th, 2011 at 11:59 PM

Title: Re: Madyamika Sautrantika vs Prasangika

Content:

Namdrol said:

one perceives all phenomena as the display of one's wisdom.

alwayson said:

Monistic tendencies strike again LOL

Malcolm wrote:

Not at all. Recall, all phenomena means all the five sense organs and sense objects, six consciousnesses, mental factors and unconditioned phenomena i.e. what is included in one skandha, one ayatana, and one dhātu.

One's own wisdom means that one encompasses all phenomena with omniscience.

Thus, no monism.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, November 26th, 2011 at 11:54 PM

Title: Re: Madyamika Sautrantika vs Prasangika

Content:

tobes said:

Therefore, how can it be asserted that conventional phenomena disappear upon apprehension of the ultimate?

Malcolm wrote:

Well, for bodhisattva on the stages, apprehension of the conventional occurs only in post-equipoise. Buddhas experience no post-equipoise phase, ergo, no apprehension of conventional i.e. deluded phenomena.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, November 26th, 2011 at 11:50 PM

Title: Re: Madyamika Sautrantika vs Prasangika

Content:

Unknown said:

So I don't agree. "completely non-conceptual"

Malcolm wrote:

I said "completely spontaneous" for emphasis on spontaneity; not completely non-conceptual, which would be redundant.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, November 26th, 2011 at 11:47 PM

Title: Re: Madyamika Sautrantika vs Prasangika

Content:

tobes said:

I think there is more at stake here than the inevitable Tsong Khapa vs everyone else Tibetan framing of the problem.

I'd agree that the way a Buddha perceives a given phenomenal object is devoid of any conceptual content.

But it doesn't matter how spontaneous a Buddha's interactions with sentient beings may be: if the Buddha speaks she is using concepts. Concepts which are necessarily conventional.

How could speech possibly be non-conceptual???

Malcolm wrote:

It is simply a Tsongkhapa vs. the world argument.

As far as Buddha's speech goes, as the Guhyasamaja says, "A single vajra word is heard differently by different sentient beings". A Buddha's vocal actions are also non-conceptual.

This is a very huge polemical area in Tibetan Buddhism, but in general, Nyingmas, Sakyapas and Kagyupas hold that a Buddha's actions, whether verbal or physical are completely spontaneous and free from conceptuality and cognition of conventional signs.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, November 26th, 2011 at 11:34 PM

Title: Re: Democracy in the country that gave birth to democracy

Content:

alwayson said:

The utopias you guys want will only ever be unrealistic fantasies.

You want government instead of private corporations?

We already tried it. Its called Stalin.

Malcolm wrote:

Since utopias are impossible, I would like to have a strong, democratic government than can keep the economic and environmental impact of banks and corporations beneficial and in the interests of the people, and which provides a high level of educational and social welfare benefits to everyone.

But even that is utopian in this day and age of corporate rapaciousness and neo-liberal, chicago school, economic piracy.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, November 26th, 2011 at 9:03 AM

Title: Re: Democracy in the country that gave birth to democracy

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

As we gather together in solidarity to express a feeling of mass injustice, we must not lose sight of what brought us together. We write so that all people who feel wronged by the corporate forces of the world can know that we are your allies.

As one people, united, we acknowledge the reality: that the future of the human race requires the cooperation of its members; that our system must protect our rights, and upon corruption of that system, it is up to the individuals to protect their own rights, and those of their neighbors; that a democratic government derives its just power from the people, but corporations do not seek consent to extract wealth from the people and the Earth; and that no true democracy is attainable when the process is determined by economic power. We come to you at a time when corporations, which place profit over people, self-interest over justice, and oppression over equality, run our governments. We have peaceably assembled here, as is our right, to let these facts be known.

They have taken our houses through an illegal foreclosure process, despite not having the original mortgage.

They have taken bailouts from taxpayers with impunity, and continue to give Executives exorbitant bonuses.

They have perpetuated inequality and discrimination in the workplace based on age, the color of one's skin, sex, gender identity and sexual orientation.

They have poisoned the food supply through negligence, and undermined the farming system through monopolization.

They have profited off of the torture, confinement, and cruel treatment of countless animals, and actively hide these practices.

They have continuously sought to strip employees of the right to negotiate for better pay and safer working conditions.

They have held students hostage with tens of thousands of dollars of debt on education, which is itself a human right.

They have consistently outsourced labor and used that outsourcing as leverage to cut workers' healthcare and pay.

They have influenced the courts to achieve the same rights as people, with none of the culpability or responsibility.

They have spent millions of dollars on legal teams that look for ways to get them out of contracts in regards to health insurance.

They have sold our privacy as a commodity.

They have used the military and police force to prevent freedom of the press. They have deliberately declined to recall faulty products endangering lives in pursuit of profit.

They determine economic policy, despite the catastrophic failures their policies have produced and continue to produce.

They have donated large sums of money to politicians, who are responsible for regulating them.

They continue to block alternate forms of energy to keep us dependent on oil.

They continue to block generic forms of medicine that could save people's lives or provide relief in order to protect investments that have already turned a substantial profit.

They have purposely covered up oil spills, accidents, faulty bookkeeping, and inactive ingredients in pursuit of profit.

They purposefully keep people misinformed and fearful through their control of the media.

They have accepted private contracts to murder prisoners even when presented with serious doubts about their guilt.

They have perpetuated colonialism at home and abroad. They have participated in the torture and murder of innocent civilians overseas.

They continue to create weapons of mass destruction in order to receive government contracts. *

To the people of the world,

We, the New York City General Assembly occupying Wall Street in Liberty Square, urge you to assert your power.

Exercise your right to peaceably assemble; occupy public space; create a process to address the problems we face, and generate solutions accessible to everyone.

To all communities that take action and form groups in the spirit of direct democracy, we offer support, documentation, and all of the resources at our disposal.

Join us and make your voices heard!

*These grievances are not all-inclusive.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, November 26th, 2011 at 8:44 AM

Title: Re: Madyamika Sautrantika vs Prasangika

Content:

Dechen Norbu said:

Wouldn't that mean then that Buddha would bump every object along his way?

Might there be the case that, at least from a Dzogchen perspective, all phenomena are recognized as ornaments, manifestation of the energy aspect and not taken as something existent? I'm just asking to see if I can make some sense out of this.

Namdrol said:

Buddhas perceive only wisdom.

tobes said:

A Buddha gets into a car. When she encounters a traffic light, does she need to distinguish between the conventional meanings of red, orange and green?

Malcolm wrote:

Depends on who you ask. According to the Gelugpas, yes -- according to everyone else, no.

tobes said:

These are nothing but imputations of conventional meaning: but to say that they are not perceived is to say that the Buddha cannot function amidst the conventions of human life.

Malcolm wrote:

Conventional truths are objects of delusion. Buddhas possess no delusion, therefore, do not perceive conventional truths.

tobes said:

Surely it is necessary for a Buddha to perceive conventional meanings a/ in order to communicate with sentient beings and b/ in order to function harmoniously in the world of sentient beings.

Malcolm wrote:

Not at all, a Buddha's interactions with sentient beings are completely spontaneous and non-conceptual.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, November 26th, 2011 at 7:10 AM

Title: Re: Root Lamas

Content:

kirtu said:

Anutarayoga tantra empowerment in Sakya is relatively rare.

Kirt

Namdrol said:

What are you talking about -- this is total nonsense.

kirtu said:

In what way?

Malcolm wrote:

You made as sound as if HYT empowerments were rare in Sakya -- when what you really means is that Sakya Lamas are rare.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, November 26th, 2011 at 6:52 AM

Title: Re: Root Lamas

Content:

kirtu said:

Anutarayoga tantra empowerment in Sakya is relatively rare.

Kirt

Malcolm wrote:

What are you talking about -- this is total nonsense.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, November 26th, 2011 at 6:51 AM

Title: Re: Root Lamas

Content:

kirtu said:

In Sakya the root lama is the lama who bestows highest yoga tantra empowerment:

heart said:

All of them?

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

Yes. But then there is one's karmic root guru.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, November 26th, 2011 at 6:44 AM

Title: Re: Democracy in the country that gave birth to democracy

Content:

Namdrol said:

Yup. I do. Eventually, you will come to understand that the type of capitalism we have today is very destructive, that is, unless, like neo-cons, you have a superstitious fetish for the so called "free market" (which we tried in the late nineteenth century -- it did not work out to well).

alwayson said:

Can anyone mention a better economic system than the "the type of capitalism we have today"

Proven in the real world of course

Malcolm wrote:

The system of capitalism we had in the United States of America between 1945 -- 1972 -
- Strong controls on financial industry, high taxes on the wealthy, etc. Better, but not perfect.

Since 1980, when Reagan began dismantling the New Deal, average Americans have gotten increasing more poor, and corporations have had increasingly high profits.

Since 1999, when the barriers between savings and loans and investment banks were dismantled, things have gotten markedly worse.

Greer's three economy analysis is very good. Read The Wealth of Nature: Economics as If Survival Mattered.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, November 26th, 2011 at 2:53 AM

Title: Re: Democracy in the country that gave birth to democracy

Content:

alwayson said:

Are you sure you want me to read those?

I actually thought Food Inc., was a POSITIVE documentary LOL!

Namdrol said:

https://www.amazon.com/Shock-Doctrine-Rise-Disaster-Capitalism/dp/0312427999/ref=pd_sim_b_30 " onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

alwayson said:

67 one star reviews

Malcolm wrote:

Yup. I do. Eventually, you will come to understand that the type of capitalism we have today is very destructive, that is, unless, like neo-cons, you have a superstitious fetish for the so called "free market" (which we tried in the late nineteenth century -- it did not work out to well).

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, November 26th, 2011 at 2:22 AM

Title: Re: Democracy in the country that gave birth to democracy

Content:

alwayson said:

I think you are conflating investment banks with corporations.

These are not the same.

Germany, the strongest country in the EU, has a ton of corporations and business incentivizing.

Malcolm wrote:

From where do you think corporations get their monetary capital?

Corporations, conceptually speaking, are not inherently bad. But you seem to have neglected the fact that banks (there is no point in talking about investment banks anymore, banks are banks) are in fact corporations. Moreover, you seem to have neglected the fact that due to moneyed interests, the market deregulate has done more to destroy our environment and economy than anything else. We can thank Reagan and his crew.

I suggest you read:

https://www.amazon.com/When-Corporations-World-David-Korten/dp/1887208046/ref=sr_1_2?s=books&ie=UTF8&qid=1322245235&sr=1-2 "onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

https://www.amazon.com/Shock-Doctrine-Rise-Disaster-Capitalism/dp/0312427999/ref=pd_sim_b_30 " onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, November 26th, 2011 at 2:04 AM

Title: Re: Democracy in the country that gave birth to democracy

Content:

Namdrol said:

You need to investigate more deeply.

alwayson said:

I guess you are generating your own electricity and typing on your homemade laptop.

Malcolm wrote:

Bread and circuses again. You are missing the point -- Most of what is wrong with the world environment and economy today is precisely a result of rapacious corporate behavior.

I can't educate you about this, but you can educate yourself.

The way corporations act these days is criminal. It does not matter that they provide goods and services to privileged people in first world countries (though the US is slipping quickly into a second tier nation).

What matters is that the free marketeer, radical capitalist ideology that they have sold to the US and Europe is destroying the world.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, November 26th, 2011 at 1:06 AM

Title: Re: Democracy in the country that gave birth to democracy

Content:

Namdrol said:

Democracy is not possible for as long as we allow banks and corporations to rule the world.

alwayson said:

Investment banks yes, I agree. They should be broken up into small firms or something.

I don't agree that corporations are bad.

Malcolm wrote:

You need to investigate more deeply.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 25th, 2011 at 11:17 PM

Title: Re: Democracy in the country that gave birth to democracy

Content:

Heruka said:

democracy is described as two wolves and one sheep voting on whats for dinner.

gregkavarnos said:

There are various levels and economic bases for democracy. A direct democracy with an economic base of mutual aid is not the same as a representative democracy with a capitalist economic base.

Malcolm wrote:

<http://www.nakedcapitalism.com/2011/11/mark-ames-austerity-fascism-in-greece-> "onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;--the-real-1-doctrine.html

Fascists back in power in Greece.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 25th, 2011 at 7:18 AM

Title: Re: Buddhism on God

Content:

tobes said:

Again, let me clarify - my interest on this thread is basically epistemological.

Maybe I'm wrong, but it seems to me that the general trend so far has been for Buddhist's to articulate Buddhism as rationally coherent, and critique theism on the grounds that it's irrational (i.e. merely unfounded belief, assumption etc).

Therefore, there is clearly an epistemological commitment to rationality.

Before we go anywhere else, does that sound basically right?

Malcolm wrote:

We are merely following the Buddha in this assessment.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 25th, 2011 at 5:15 AM

Title: Re: Travelling with herbal medicine

Content:

Paul said:

I am currently taking Tibetan medicine and it's impressively effective. I have to go to another country soon on business and will be flying. However I'm not looking forward to getting bags of brown powder through customs. Has anyone done this? Is it best to go in my main suitcase to avoid the nonsense about not taking certain things in ones hand luggage?

Malcolm wrote:

Put it in your suitcase.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 25th, 2011 at 4:05 AM

Title: Re: ChNN's Vajra Armour teaching

Content:

Pero said:

Man now I'm confused. <http://www.fpmt.org/media/resources/dharma-dates.html> says it's on Friday. As well as a calendar in my language and some other stuff online. But then I also found stuff that says it's today (Thursday). Which is it LOL? I wanted to do some practice on new moon and planned it for tomorrow. But if it's today I'll try to do it today. Oh and I'm in Europe BTW...

Malcolm wrote:

Just follow calendar.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 25th, 2011 at 2:31 AM

Title: Re: Buddhism on God

Content:

BradleyWiggins said:

Each mind stream is a condition for every other mind stream (among other things) but not itself.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, this is called karana-hetu.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 25th, 2011 at 2:30 AM

Title: Re: Buddhism on God

Content:

alwayson said:

So if you are agreeing with me, you are agreeing with Namdrol LOL

BradleyWiggins said:

And this (karma and rebirth) is not something that can be objectively proven.

Malcolm wrote:

Agreed -- I never claimed they could be. In fact, I have stated innumerable times that karma and rebirth can only be yogically verified, for oneself.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 25th, 2011 at 2:27 AM

Title: Re: Buddhism on God

Content:

Namdrol said:

DO and karma require that mind-streams are unique, separate and beginningless.

BradleyWiggins said:

You are correct, but there are countless such mindstreams in you right now.

Malcolm wrote:

No.

BradleyWiggins said:

This means that each mind stream is affected by every other mind stream.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, mind streams can and do influence other mind streams.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 25th, 2011 at 1:15 AM

Title: Re: Buddhism on God

Content:

BradleyWiggins said:

Yet your misunderstanding of the 12 links betrays your misunderstanding of DO in general.

Namdrol said:

Why don't you state what my misunderstanding of the 12 links might be?

BradleyWiggins said:

I don't want to get in trouble with the moderators for taking this topic off-topic. So you will be personally responsible if this happens, right?

This should probably go in a separate topic.

The 12 links of DO are not about physical life and death. "Birth" is not about physical birth, and "death" is not about physical death. It has nothing at all to do with the physical human body.

You imagine that there are separate streams of consciousness, which each one associated with a particular physical body. This is not the case. It's like you are putting things in a cage, constricting them, when DO is precisely about unconstricting.

Malcolm wrote:

We simply disagree. DO also includes literal rebirth.

Buddha's teachings on DO and karma require that mind-streams are unique, separate and beginningless.

Therefore, you, Kevin Solway aka Bradley Wiggins, do not have a proper understanding of dependent origination. Your understanding of DO is distorted.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 25th, 2011 at 12:55 AM

Title: Re: Buddhism on God

Content:

alwayson said:

Unless you are Kevin Solway, who believes he has rigpa.

BradleyWiggins said:

I thought that Kevin Solway said that he definitely didn't have rigpa, as you define it?

In any case, I don't know why you wouldn't want to hear the views of someone who claims to know what they are talking about.

Malcolm wrote:

Because one thinks they are full of it?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 25th, 2011 at 12:51 AM

Title: Re: Buddhism on God

Content:

BradleyWiggins said:

Yet your misunderstanding of the 12 links betrays your misunderstanding of DO in general.

Malcolm wrote:

Why don't you state what my misunderstanding of the 12 links might be?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 25th, 2011 at 12:44 AM

Title: Re: Buddhism on God

Content:

BradleyWiggins said:

The problem is that since you have a literal interpretation of the 12 links of dependent origination, this means that you don't understand dependent origination yourself.

Malcolm wrote:

Kevin Solway, you should understand that there are two models of DO. The twelve links are the specific theory of DO applied to the process of samsara. It is derived from the general theory of DO, "Where this exists, that exists..." and so on.

The specific theory of DO also has four variations, serial, static, momentary and simultaneous.

Now, since the Buddha admonished Ananda for thinking DO was an easy read -- what are we to make of your claim to have "understood" it before encountering Buddhism?

In reality, DO is profound and subtle. DO is also one of those things that when we first read it, we all say, "wow, I already get that." But that does not mean we really understand DO. It merely means we recognize the concept to be true.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 25th, 2011 at 12:02 AM

Title: Re: Buddhism on God

Content:

BradleyWiggins said:

How do you know? Have you done a survey of every person on earth, quizzed them as to their concept of "God", if they have any, and fully understood what they told you, regardless of what language they were speaking?

alwayson said:

LOL

Is there another one besides dualism and monism?

I would be interested if there was!

Malcolm wrote:

Don't feed trolls.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 24th, 2011 at 11:59 PM

Title: Re: Buddhism on God

Content:

BradleyWiggins said:

So how come I fully understood dependent origination, long before I ever studied Buddhism?

Malcolm wrote:

You didn't.

BTW, Hi Kev.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Thursday, November 24th, 2011 at 11:43 PM
Title: Re: Buddhism on God
Content:
alwayson said:
C. Dependent Origination (Buddhism)

BradleyWiggins said:
So of all the people in the world, only Buddhists have realized the simple truth of dependent origination?

Malcolm wrote:
Yup. Them's the facts.

N

Author: Malcolm
Date: Thursday, November 24th, 2011 at 11:15 PM
Title: Re: Democracy in the country that gave birth to democracy
Content:
gregkavarnos said:
Eeeeeerrrr... no actually, what I am saying is that they want to be actively taking part in the creation of their reality and not having it forced on them by others. That's what democracy is all about.

Malcolm wrote:
Democracy is not possible for as long as we allow banks and corporations to rule the world.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Thursday, November 24th, 2011 at 9:16 AM
Title: Re: Buddhism on God
Content:
tobes said:
But it's interesting, isn't it, that we're happy to get our conceptions of theism from "ordinary definitions/common folk" but not our conceptions of Buddhism.

Malcolm wrote:
Buddhism derives our notions of god (Prajapati, etc.) from Samkhya, etc. Not from common people.

So this is not an accurate portrayal.

Western theists and philosophers are not so original that their theologies require some sort of special reading by Buddhists when the theologians and philosophers are subject to investigation.

In reality, there are only so many definitions of god that one arrive at i.e. creator, etc.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 24th, 2011 at 7:37 AM

Title: Re: Democracy in the country that gave birth to democracy

Content:

alwayson said:

Bhutan??

Malcolm wrote:

I prefer living in the US. But that does not mean it is "the best and most awesome" country.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 24th, 2011 at 7:22 AM

Title: Re: Democracy in the country that gave birth to democracy

Content:

conebeckham said:

It's not simple. At all. And just because no country on Earth is "awesome," doesn't mean we should accept defeat, or ignore the conventional problems we have. Though I don't foresee Utopia in our future, frankly.

alwayson said:

This is a cop out.

You all should name a real country that is your ideal.

Malcolm wrote:

Khechari realm.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 24th, 2011 at 6:49 AM

Title: Re: Democracy in the country that gave birth to democracy

Content:

alwayson said:

99% of Americans are not homeless. Its really quite simple.

Malcolm wrote:

That does not mean america is working very well for that 99 percent.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 24th, 2011 at 6:39 AM

Title: Re: Democracy in the country that gave birth to democracy

Content:

Namdrol said:

Stat extrapolated from National Center for Homelessness adjusted for downturn.
Average number of homeless people is about 2 million. Then of course there is the inadequately housed, and that number is much higher.

alwayson said:

Isn't that less than 1% of the population??

If the American system works for 99% of the population, you don't mess with it.

Malcolm wrote:

But it isn't. Wages have not increased to match cost of living increases for 30 years. The average salary in US is 30,000 or so. That 30 grand is worth much less than it was thirty years ago.

Your argument about play stations and other consumer items is what the romans called "panem et circuses" i.e. bread and circuses to keep the masses appeased and complacent.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 24th, 2011 at 5:31 AM

Title: Re: Democracy in the country that gave birth to democracy

Content:

Sönam said:

Curiously (not so in fact), poor country have less homelessness, just because peoples are much more in solidarity. The poor in those countries give food and a place to others poors ... and I speak about experience (in Africa)

David N. Snyder said:

Assuming Namdrol's statistic is correct, that would be about 1% for the U.S. From my experience in Africa, the percentage appears much higher. At night, you can literally see rows and rows of people sleeping on the sidewalks and some onto the streets, taking their chances of not getting run over by cars and taxis.

That is true about the culture of helping people, but it can only go so far when the poverty is at such a large scale.

Malcolm wrote:

Stat extrapolated from National Center for Homelessness adjusted for downturn.
Average number of homeless people is about 2 million. Then of course there is the inadequately housed, and that number is much higher.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 24th, 2011 at 5:08 AM

Title: Re: Buddhism on God

Content:

Namdrol said:

They tend to regard all devas as protectors of one kind or another.

Yeshe said:

I can't be sure that common folk don't know the difference - they may simply propitiate both Hindu and Buddhist deities for different purposes or simply be 'hedging their bets.

However, I agree with Namdrol. It is most unlikely that they differentiate. I hope that the practices of the worldly protectors all die in time.

Malcolm wrote:

I don't think you want that -- some, like Virupaksha and so forth, have been with us since the Buddha.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 24th, 2011 at 5:07 AM

Title: Re: Democracy in the country that gave birth to democracy

Content:

kirtu said:

Homelessness in the US is usually a result of direct poverty.

Kirt

alwayson said:

Lets not conflate poverty with homelessness though.

VAST majority of poor are NOT homeless.

Many, but not all, homeless are drug addicts and mentally ill people who refuse all treatment.

Malcolm wrote:

There are two to three million homeless people.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 24th, 2011 at 4:30 AM

Title: Re: Buddhism on God

Content:

Jnana said:

Sounds like these ancient Indian non-Buddhists knew what a Buddhist wasn't willing to swallow. And this qualification could easily be expanded to include the rejection of atheistic/materialist views as well by surveying the extant Indian Buddhist literature which addresses these issues.

Huseng said:

Ironically in Nepal it is common for people to making offerings at a Buddhist temple and then go across the street and worship Shiva. The common folk don't necessarily distinguish between a theist Hinduism and non-theist Buddhism.

Jnana said:

Which is a good reason for not taking refuge in the "common folk."

Malcolm wrote:

They tend to regard all devas as protectors of one kind or another.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 24th, 2011 at 2:37 AM

Title: Re: Choegyal Namkhai Norbu's USA Program for 2012

Content:

Dechen Norbu said:

Yes and generally one can register till the day they start.

Pero said:

Actually you don't have to be a member to attend a retreat. Non-members just don't get any discounts on the price.

Malcolm wrote:

In merger they created a "temporary" membership.

But not in US.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 24th, 2011 at 2:34 AM

Title: Re: Romney outright lying about Obama in a campaign ad
Content:

kirtu said:
People are over the Mormon thing.

Kirt

Malcolm wrote:
Born again Christians aren't. They make up a substantial portion of the GOP base.

N

Author: Malcolm
Date: Thursday, November 24th, 2011 at 2:33 AM
Title: Re: Romney outright lying about Obama in a campaign ad
Content:
alwayson said:
You all know the one I am talking about right?

The one where they use a quote of Obama, using a quote of McCain.

But they edit out the part, where he begins with 'McCain said'

Namdrol said:
Yes, I know. It is unlikely America will vote in a Mormon. If he is picked by the GOP, Obama is looking at four more years.

kirtu said:
People are over the Mormon thing. And people like me are looking to vote Green forever now.

Kirt

Malcolm wrote:
I am a registered green, but the Green Party, at best, is a social ecology platform ala bookchin. I agree with the Green platform, but it does not go far enough.

Also, the Greens have been sidetracked by the labor movement.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 24th, 2011 at 12:56 AM

Title: Re: Romney outright lying about Obama in a campaign ad

Content:

always on said:

You all know the one I am talking about right?

The one where they use a quote of Obama, using a quote of McCain.

But they edit out the part, where he begins with 'McCain said'

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, I know. It is unlikely America will vote in a Mormon. If he is picked by the GOP, Obama is looking at four more years.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 24th, 2011 at 12:39 AM

Title: Re: Madyamika Sautrantika vs Prasangika

Content:

Tom said:

Namdrol,

Do you mind elaborating on the apparent contradiction...

"A correct perception takes ultimate truth as its object" and "most Madhyamikas would say that objects are not perceived at all"

Or put another way how do you equate for Candrakirti referring to ultimate truth as an object with Santideva's emphasis that it is not an object (9:2)

I understand that Gelugpa's in post meditation identify emptiness as an object and as such need to tweak Santideva's position but what about most Madhyamikas where ultimate truth is beyond any categorizations don't they need to tweak Candrakirti's assertion which refers to ultimate truth as an object?

Malcolm wrote:

Candrakirti is speaking conventionally, hence no contradiction.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 24th, 2011 at 12:37 AM

Title: Re: Romney outright lying about Obama in a campaign ad

Content:

always on said:

You all know about this?

I've never seen anything like it.

If this is how its going to be, America is going to be tore apart.

Malcolm wrote:

It already has been.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 23rd, 2011 at 8:53 AM

Title: Re: Madyamika Sautrantika vs Prasangika

Content:

Dechen Norbu said:

And wouldn't perceiving wisdom mean recognizing all phenomena as the energy aspect instead of not perceiving phenomena at all? Perceiving manifestation "as it is" instead of not perceiving manifestation? Again, just asking to see if this makes sense.

Malcolm wrote:

one perceives all phenomena as the display of one's wisdom. But this is not really part of madhyamaka.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 23rd, 2011 at 8:36 AM

Title: Re: Madyamika Sautrantika vs Prasangika

Content:

Dechen Norbu said:

Wouldn't that mean then that Buddha would bump every object along his way? Might there be the case that, at least from a Dzogchen perspective, all phenomena are recognized as ornaments, manifestation of the energy aspect and not taken as something existent? I'm just asking to see if I can make some sense out of this.

Malcolm wrote:

Buddhas perceive only wisdom.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 23rd, 2011 at 8:23 AM

Title: Re: Madyamika Sautrantika vs Prasangika

Content:

conebeckham said:

Namdrol-

Thanks. Would it be fair, then, to say that a correct perception does not see "objects," or phenomena, per se?

Malcolm wrote:

This where there is a huge divide between gelug and the rest of Tibetan madhyamakas. Gelugs would tend to say what is not perceived is inherent existence of objects; most Madhyamakas would say that objects are not perceived at all.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 23rd, 2011 at 5:56 AM

Title: Re: Madyamika Sautrantika vs Prasangika

Content:

conebeckham said:

I'll ask the "leading question" then...if objects can be perceived only in two ways, correctly and incorrectly, and incorrect perception is relative truth, then what is correct perception?

Or, in other words, is "perception" always incorrect?

Malcolm wrote:

A correct perception takes ultimate truth as its object.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 23rd, 2011 at 5:39 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen Community of Chogyal Namkhai Norbu

Content:

Fa Dao said:

Will the upcoming webcast retreat in New York on Dec 9-14 be about Tibetan language or will it be like a normal webcast retreat?

Malcolm wrote:

Strictly about Tibetan language.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 23rd, 2011 at 5:38 AM

Title: Re: Tibetan Astrological "overlap" with others?

Content:

padma norbu said:

Well, that's what I was wondering; if such personality typing holds any water in Tibetan Astrology.

Namdrol said:

It does not really exist per se. Tibetan astrology is mostly about calendar creation and figuring out whether one will have obstacles and what to do about them. There is some procedures related to marriage, how to dispose of bodies and so on as well.

padma norbu said:

Thanks! I've never bought Namkhai Norbu's calendar before... have you? If so, do you notice things move along more swimmingly by following it? I think I would feel weird about not doing something on a certain day because it's not looking like a beneficial day for it, but then again... if it works...

Malcolm wrote:

I do follow astrology and yes I use Rinpoche's calendars and yes I do find that things move along more swimmingly if I pay attention.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 23rd, 2011 at 3:51 AM

Title: Re: Tibetan Astrological "overlap" with others?

Content:

padma norbu said:

Well, that's what I was wondering; if such personality typing holds any water in Tibetan Astrology.

Malcolm wrote:

It does not really exist per se. Tibetan astrology is mostly about calendar creation and figuring out whether one will have obstacles and what to do about them. There is some procedures related to marriage, how to dispose of bodies and so on as well.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 23rd, 2011 at 2:23 AM

Title: Re: Tibetan Astrological "overlap" with others?

Content:

padma norbu said:

This is pretty surprising stuff for me. I wonder when these cultures came into contact with each other... ancient Greece/India connection?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, there are three main astronomical/astrological Siddhantas in India, Surya, Yavana (Greek) and Romish (Roman).

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 23rd, 2011 at 2:07 AM

Title: Re: Tibetan Astrological "overlap" with others?

Content:

padma norbu said:

Is there any overlap with this kind of detail (rising sign, trine, square, etc.) and the elements, animals, trigram, etc.?

Malcolm wrote:

None.

padma norbu said:

Do signs like Aries, Virgo, Gemini, Libra, etc. compare roughly equivalent with anything in Tibetan Astrology or it's just completely different altogether?

Malcolm wrote:

It is part of Kalacakra astrology.

padma norbu said:

Have you ever sat down and tried to compare a natal chart from a Tropical Western Astrological perspective vs. the Tibetan Astrological equivalent based on the year, time and place of a person's birth?

Malcolm wrote:

No. I have not.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 22nd, 2011 at 11:30 PM

Title: Re: Tibetan Astrological "overlap" with others?

Content:

padma norbu said:

I am of two minds on astrology; on the left hand (passive), I regard it with suspicion and doubt (sort of the 'default' position), but on the right hand (active) I keep an open-minded and superstitious leaning in favor of it.

The interesting thing, to me, is that Tropical Astrology is supposed to be bunk according to many people out there who favor Sidereal Astrology or Tibetan Astrology, but the older I get, the more I happen to fall into conversations with people about astrology and people always say the same things regarding certain signs.

I'm just curious what anyone who's studied multiple systems thoroughly has to say. I know nothing about Tibetan Astrology.

Malcolm wrote:

Tibetan astrology (skar rtsi) is tropical, since the Kalacakra is based on a tropical zodiac, unlike Jyotish, which is based on a sidereal zodiac. Incidentally, Kalacakra sets out to correct the calculations of Surya Siddhanta.

Elemental calculation ('byung rtsi or nag rtsi), often miscalled "Tibetan astrology", has nothing to do with horoscopy, and so on, so the Zodiac, tropical or sidereal, is perfectly irrelevant. It is based on the five elements i.e. wood, fire, earth, metal and water; the twelve years, tiger and so on; the eight trigrams (spar kha); what we call the magic square of saturn and its nine versions (sme ba).

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 21st, 2011 at 10:57 PM

Title: Re: Buddhism on God

Content:

tobes said:

Indeed. And also the inverse: why do so many western Buddhists so desperately feel the need to refute and negate the G-word whenever it appears near the context of Dharma?

Namdrol said:

Because it is a signifier that posits any number of monolithic, totalizing concepts that have nothing to do with Dharma.

tobes said:

The truth is, this requires more philosophical work than simply decreeing that the signifier has nothing to do with Dharma -

Malcolm wrote:

No, it does not. And that is why this whole thread is mostly just intellectual masturbation.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 21st, 2011 at 10:33 AM

Title: Re: Madyamika Sautrantika vs Prasangika

Content:

Mariusz said:

Thank you very much conebeckham. You have exactly the same objections to Namdrol:

Malcolm wrote:

Your objection is totally faulty since your objecting to something I never said.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, November 20th, 2011 at 10:57 PM

Title: Re: Madyamika Sautrantika vs Prasangika

Content:

Mariusz said:

Perhaps what differentiate us is that I take these so-called "objects" as pedagogical tools only, expedient meaning but not as the definitive.

Namdrol said:

As I said, you are not understanding my point, and imputing things on to me that I have never stated.

Mariusz said:

The Consequentialists (Prasangikas) are not imputing anything You presented something of Candrakirti that suggested for me: first: the objects are perceived in the ultimate, second: all the "relative" is totally faulty. So can you please write what is your understanding of what you presented?

Excuse me, here was your presentation, not mine:

But false perception is mthong brdzun, so what Candrakirti is clearly saying is that false/faulty/incorrect perception is relative, or totally obscuring, truth. The two truths are about how objects are perceived. They can be perceived in only two ways, correctly and incorrectly. Perceiving them incorrectly, a false perception of them is called relative truth.

Malcolm wrote:

This does not say that objects are perceived in the ultimate.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, November 19th, 2011 at 11:33 AM

Title: Re: Buddhism on God

Content:

tobes said:

Indeed. And also the inverse: why do so many western Buddhists so desperately feel the need to refute and negate the G-word whenever it appears near the context of Dharma?

Malcolm wrote:

Because it is a signifier that posits any number of monolithic, totalizing concepts that have nothing do with Dharma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, November 19th, 2011 at 1:18 AM

Title: Re: Madyamika Sautrantika vs Prasangika

Content:

Caz said:

I take note that there seem to be very few Rime practitioners for outside the Gelug tradition who would be familiar with The Gaden oral lineage of Mahamudra perhaps this is once again because others hold Je Rinpoche's teachings to lack Authenticity ? As Namdrol has kindly elaborated people respect Je Rinpoche but apparently do not respect him enough to accord his teachings rightful authentication.

Malcolm wrote:

AFA Gaden Mahamudra goes, even within Gelug this teaching at one time was highly controversial since it first appeared with the First Panchen Lama.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, November 19th, 2011 at 12:44 AM

Title: Re: Gyalwa Gyatso / Red Avalokiteshvara / Jinasagara

Content:

Silent Bob said:

First he was asked by Marpa to go to India and receive these teachings on the nine dharmas of the formless dakinis from Tiphupa.

Namdrol said:

This part of Gampo abbey's thing is wrong. Mila asked Rechungpa to go, not Marpa. Rechungpa never met Marpa.

Silent Bob said:

You're right--that part doesn't make sense. Please try to forgive me.

Malcolm wrote:

You are not at fault, so nothing to forgive.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, November 19th, 2011 at 12:38 AM

Title: Re: Madyamika Sautrantika vs Prasangika

Content:

Mariusz said:

You see, earlier I also was argued about definition of "the seeming" because the terms "faulty" or false" (for all the seeming) are a little tricky.

Malcolm wrote:

You are choosing to follow a very non-standard and rather modern translation for kun rdzob, samvritti -- for which the vast majority of people have for many years translated as "relative". There is no problem with this per se.

However, you are conflating two terms (mthong brdzun pa i.e. false/faulty/incorrect, etc. perception) with (kun rdzob (for which you like "seeming" following KB), the object of a false perception.

There is a breakdown of communication because we are not using the same English terms to discuss these things.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, November 19th, 2011 at 12:13 AM

Title: Re: Gyalwa Gyatso / Red Avalokiteshvara / Jinasagara

Content:

Silent Bob said:

First he was asked by Marpa to go to India and receive these teachings on the nine dharmas of the formless dakinis from Tiphupa.

Malcolm wrote:

This part of Gampo abbey's thing is wrong. Mila asked Rechungpa to go, not marpa. Rechungpa never met Marpa.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 18th, 2011 at 11:21 PM

Title: Re: Madyamika Sautrantika vs Prasangika

Content:

Mariusz said:

Perhaps what differentiate us is that I take these so-called "objects" as pedagogical tools only, expedient meaning but not as the definitive.

Malcolm wrote:

As I said, you are not understanding my point, and imputing things on to me that I have never stated.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 18th, 2011 at 11:10 PM

Title: Re: Dzogchen Community of Chogyal Namkhai Norbu

Content:

Namdrol said:

In Dzogchen the method of trying to discover what your actual state is begins with introduction. In Vajrayana, it begins with receiving some kind of empowerment, in Hinayana and Mahayana, it begins with receiving some kind of vows.

mint said:

So, the Song of the Vajra book and cultivating guruyoga are only recommendations/tools but not mandatory?

Also, how does one go about purchasing restricted books? Am I given some sort of secret password after receiving transmission?

Malcolm wrote:

Nothing is mandatory in Dzogchen, at least not the way it is taught by ChNN.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 18th, 2011 at 10:54 PM

Title: Re: Dzogchen Community of Chogyal Namkhai Norbu

Content:

mint said:

What is a Samaya? Is Lhug-Pa per Namdrol correct that all who receive the DT will receive a Samaya?

What happens if I don't immediately act on studying the Song of the Vajra book or cultivating guruyoga?

Have I been given contradictory advice?

Malcolm wrote:

A samaya is a commitment. In the case of receiving any Vajrayana transmission, it is impossible that someone did not receive some kind of commitment. But in Dzogchen the primary commitment is to recognizing and then maintaining knowledge of your actual state. So to begin with, you should be trying to discover what that is. This is the point of all Dharma. So on this point, all Dharma teachings have the same commitment. In Dzogchen the method of trying to discover what your actual state is begins with introduction. In Vajrayana, it begins with receiving some kind of empowerment, in Hinayana and Mahayana, it begins with receiving some kind of vows.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 18th, 2011 at 9:23 AM

Title: Re: Reasons for Conventional Reality

Content:

deepbluehum said:

Do you ever get the feeling you are in a room full of smokers discussing the fresh air in Switzerland?

Namdrol said:

No, I get the feeling that I am a non-smoker trying to convince smokers that they should breath fresh air.

deepbluehum said:

I meant except you of course. I'd like to read a good fishin' tale. Know any?

Malcolm wrote:

Old man and the sea?

Moby Dick?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 18th, 2011 at 9:17 AM

Title: Re: Reasons for Conventional Reality

Content:

deepbluehum said:

Do you ever get the feeling you are in a room full of smokers discussing the fresh air in Switzerland?

Malcolm wrote:

No, I get the feeling that I am a non-smoker trying to convince smokers that they should breath fresh air.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 18th, 2011 at 8:44 AM

Title: Re: Reasons for Conventional Reality

Content:

Lhug-Pa said:

<http://www.dharmafellowship.org/library/texts/the-cuckoo-of-awareness.htm>,
<http://gnosticteachings.org/books-by-samael-aun-weor/cosmic-teachings-of-a-lama/1259-alaya-and-paramartha.html>, and <http://gnosticteachings.org/books-by-samael-aun-weor/cosmic-teachings-of-a-lama/1278-substances-atoms-forces.html>.

Malcolm wrote:

The three own natures are irrevelant in any discussion of Madhyamaka.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 18th, 2011 at 5:24 AM

Title: Re: Reasons for Conventional Reality

Content:

conebeckham said:

Perhaps we need to define what a "view" is.

Acchantika said:

View or position (Pali diṭṭhi, Sanskrit dṛṣṭi) is a central idea in Buddhism. In Buddhist thought, in contrast with the commonsense understanding, a view is not a simple, abstract collection of propositions, but a charged interpretation of experience which intensely shapes and affects thought, sensation, and action. Having the proper mental attitude toward views is therefore considered an integral part of the Buddhist path.

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/View_\(Buddhism\)) onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;)

I personally feel this is a pretty good definition.

gad rgyangs said:

N doesn't say he doesn't have any view (drsti) he says he has no thesis (pratijñā)

Malcolm wrote:

Sure he says he has no views:

gang gis thugs brtse nyer bzung nas/ /lta ba thams cad spang ba'i phyir/ /dam pa'i chos ni ston mdzad pa/ /gau ta ma de la phyag 'tshal lo

"I prostrate to Gotama, who, through his loving mind, taught the sublime Dharma in order to abandon all views".

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 18th, 2011 at 5:19 AM

Title: Re: Reasons for Conventional Reality

Content:

Namdrol said:

So in other words, he is starting with what the opponenet takes as real, correct?

In this case, how is this a) his beleif b) a philosophical position of his? The answer is, actually, they are not his beleif nor his philosophical position.

M

gad rgyangs said:

He's accepting the validity of the two truths scheme, which (he says) is what Buddhas rely on to teach "truth". He would have to maintain either that he has already demonstrated the validity of this schema through his argumentation earlier in the book, or that he's accepting it on faith since Buddhas rely on it. In either case, its a philosophical position.

Malcolm wrote:

But if he does not accept the validity of conventional truth (he does not) how can you say he is erecting a philosophical position around the two truths?

Remember, he states "Since the Jinas have proclaimed nirvana alone is true, what wise person would not understand the rest is false?"

The two truths, are for Nāgārjuna merely a pragmatic methodology used by Buddhas to lead sentient beings from delusion to non-delusion. But they are not a philosophical system, at least, not for Nagarjuna and Aryadeva. In other words, if anything, the two truths are a pedagogical method, and that is all.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 18th, 2011 at 4:52 AM

Title: Re: Reasons for Conventional Reality

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

which contains all kinds of views about what conventional truth is, what the ultimate and nirvana are. In short, a whole worldview, not to mention all kinds of epistemological beliefs about what is or isn't valid reasoning etc.

Namdrol said:

All kinds of views? Describe them please and let's see if they are in fact views. For starters, what is a conventional truth according to Nāgārjuna. And why is this a thesis?

gad rgyangs said:

As it says two karikas earlier, conventional truth is worldly truth, that is, consensus reality. It isn't a thesis (neither he nor I said so), because he isn't trying to prove it: he's taking it as a given, which is even worse as it is an unproven belief.

Malcolm wrote:

So in other words, he is starting with what the opponenet takes as real, correct?

In this case, how is this a) his belief b) a philosophical position of his? The answer is, actually, they are not his belief nor his philosophical position.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 18th, 2011 at 4:26 AM

Title: Re: Reasons for Conventional Reality

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

which contains all kinds of views about what conventional truth is, what the ultimate and nirvana are. In short, a whole worldview, not to mention all kinds of epistemological beliefs about what is or isn't valid reasoning etc.

Malcolm wrote:

All kinds of views? Describe them please and let's see if they are in fact views. For starters, what is a conventional truth according to Nāgārjuna. And why is this a thesis?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 18th, 2011 at 4:12 AM

Title: Re: The Bad and The Ugly

Content:

Dechen Norbu said:

Hi Ron, can you give me some sources for me to find those episodes you talk about? The maitreya revolutions thing. I never heard of it, but as this is the second time you talk about it...

Is <http://www.newworldencyclopedia.org/entry/Maitreya> " onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;" your source?

Malcolm wrote:

The phenomena of Maitreya millennialism and the vigorous violence these Chinese cults engaged in are well known to history. But they have nothing really to do with Buddhism.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 18th, 2011 at 4:08 AM

Title: Re: Reasons for Conventional Reality

Content:

Namdrol said:

For example, what kind of philosophical position does Nāgārjuna hold. Please provide an example.

gad rgyangs said:

jeez, take your pick. how about 24.10 (and now thanks to Terma we have Bockling's translation to use):

"Unless you rely on the conventional truth
You will not attain the ultimate meaning.

Unless you attain the ultimate meaning
You will not attain nirvana."

Malcolm wrote:
This sounds like a prescription, not a position.

N

Author: Malcolm
Date: Friday, November 18th, 2011 at 3:32 AM
Title: Re: Ojas (general discussion)
Content:

Lhug-Pa said:

My main focus is Dzogchen, yet I'm not considering to abandon Gnosis either; however I'll refrain from saying much more about this for right now, as I do not want to become somehow responsible for causing any sort of split in the Sangha (there are many other disciples of Chogyal Namkhai Norbu Rinpoche who post here).

If in Meditating upon it I conclude that something more should be said, then perhaps I will.

Best Regards

Malcolm wrote:
It's not about meditation or gnosis, its about physiology.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Friday, November 18th, 2011 at 3:01 AM
Title: Re: Reasons for Conventional Reality
Content:

gad rgyangs said:
three views:

eternalist - "exists"

nihilist - "does not exist"

madhyamaka - "not 'exists', also not 'does not exist'"

Namdrol said:
This last view is refuted by Madhyamaka. This is explained most clearly by Aryadeva in the Jñānasarasammucaya.

gad rgyangs said:
ok six views then.

right now im sorting out N's use of the word pratijñā in VV and its use as a technical term in the Nyaya system.... basically it seems that a distinction needs to be made between the thesis of a syllogism, which N disavows, and philosophical positions, which his texts are of course full of. You can't just sweep everything under the word "view" because he didn't.

Malcolm wrote:
For example, what kind of philosophical position does Nāgārjuna hold. Please provide an example.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Friday, November 18th, 2011 at 2:59 AM
Title: Re: 100 Syllable Mantra SUPO KAYO ME BHAVA
Content:
dakini_boi said:
Wow, Tantular, thank you. You've cleared up my confusion.

Malcolm wrote:
Yes, nice explanation.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Friday, November 18th, 2011 at 2:39 AM
Title: Re: Madyamika Sautrantika vs Prasangika
Content:
Mariusz said:
Thank you for continuing. It will benefit all of us. Of course I took it: a correct perception of them (the perceived objects) is called ultimate truth. That's why I asked you: "Do you really think the so-called "objects", somewhere "out there", can be perceived correctly in the ultimate truth"?

Malcolm wrote:
Candrakīrti very specifically says "yang dag mthong yul gang de de nyid de" i.e. "Any object [yul] of a correct (yang dag) perception (mthong) that is real (de nyid)" i.e. an ultimate truth. Then he says mthong ba brdzun pa kun rdzob bden par gsungs i.e. "[The object of] a false perception is a relative truth."

He also specifies very precisely just before these two lines:

/dngos kun yang dag brdzun pa mthong ba yis/ /dngos rnyed ngo bo gnyis ni 'dzin par 'gyur

"Since all things are perceived correctly and falsely;
all things will possess two natures.

He then explains in his commenatary:

de'i phyir dngos po thams cad rang bzhin de gnyis 'dzin pa yin no/ /rang bzhin de gnyis las kyang mthong ba yang dag pa'i yul gang yin pa de ni de nyid de/ de ni don dam pa'i bden pa'o zhes bya ba'i don to/ /de'i rang gi ngo bo ni bshad par bya'o/ /mthong ba brdzun pa'i yul gang yin pa de ni kun rdzob kyi bden pa'o/ /de'i phyir de ltar bden pa gnyis rnam par gzahag nas/ mthong ba brdzun pa rnam la mthong ba yang dag pa dang brdzun pa nyid las

Therefore, all things possess two natures. Also out of those two natures, any object of a correct perception means that it is called "ultimate truth". Its own nature has been explained. Any object of a false perception is a relative truth. Therefore, after having demonstrated the two truths, among false perceptions there are also true and false."

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 18th, 2011 at 12:13 AM

Title: Re: Madyamika Sautrantika vs Prasangika

Content:

Mariusz said:

Can you specify what exactly the saying you mean? I compared only: "The two truths are about how objects are perceived. They can be perceived in only two ways, correctly and incorrectly. Perceiving them incorrectly, a false perception of them is called relative truth" with mine ""The ultimate is not the sphere of cognition ("perceptions" whatever if "false" or "correct") It is said that cognition is the seeming (only)" . I did not see agreement here.

Jnana said:

Center of the Sunlit Sky, p. 85:

There is no contradiction between, first, the explanation that the ultimate is taken as the object of the wisdom of noble ones and, second, the teaching in some sūtras and treatises that it is not the sphere of cognition.

Mariusz said:

Excuse me, I have not the book with me now to check the context. Are you quoting on the wisdom of noble ones that is beyond the perceptions of objects, beyond all reference points? If so, it agrees with Santideva saying, but not with the saying of Namdrol.

Malcolm wrote:

What do you take Namdrol to be saying? In your own words please.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 18th, 2011 at 12:07 AM

Title: Re: Can someone please post some works of Nagarjuna?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Bocking's Nagarjuna in China is one of the clearest. Full MMK plus commentary closely related to Buddhapalita which clearly identifies positions. Translation of Kumarajiva's translation.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 17th, 2011 at 11:08 PM

Title: Re: Madyamika Sautrantika vs Prasangika

Content:

Caz said:

Ah Now I see Thanks for that Namdrol this is probley where alot of the Anamosity toward Gelugpa's Originally arose from. So I take it on that root practitoners from Non Gelug traditions would see Lama Tsongkhapas recieved Mahamudra teachings from Manjushri as equally false and wrong then ?

Namdrol said:

Well, while it is possible for ordinary people to have pure visions, they are not usually regarded as the basis for having large amounts of faith in that person.

Caz said:

Im sure your well aware what Implication that would have for the Gelug lineage and all of its teachings and transmitted lineages then. That it would be a false lineage.

Malcolm wrote:

No, Tsongkhapa was a good yogi, and had experience. He received the transmissions of the tantras, practiced them, was skilled in the arts of Vajramaster, and conveyed them properly, he was an interesting and novel scholar. However, it is precisely his novelty that landed him in hot water with those who were not his students.

In this instance, his students had lots of faith in him and thus there is a new lineage. Those who were not his students rather resented the Sakya sarmas as they were called for a while, these new Sakyapas later known as Gelugpas.

So while we all respect Tsongkhapa, we do not all assume that he achieved awakening.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 17th, 2011 at 10:53 PM

Title: Re: Reasons for Conventional Reality

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

three views:

eternalist - "exists"

nihilist - "does not exist"

madhyamaka - "not 'exists', also not 'does not exist'"

Malcolm wrote:

This last view is refuted by Madhyamaka. This is explained most clearly by Aryadeva in the Jñānasarasammucaya.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 17th, 2011 at 6:53 AM

Title: Re: St. John of the Cross on Spiritual Materialism

Content:

mint said:

He may have even been a pratyekabuddha.

Namdrol said:

Quite impossible. Pratyekabuddhas only occur when there is no Buddha.

N

TMingyur said:

Then it would be possible because at that time there was none.

kind regards

Malcolm wrote:

No, because the Buddha's sasana remains. Pratyekabuddhas only occur when there is no Buddha's sasana, to be more precise.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 17th, 2011 at 6:52 AM

Title: Re: Poll: Which Operating System Do You Use?

Content:

Namdrol said:

Sorry, my boy, that is just not the case. You can't FUD your way out of this.

alwayson said:

Thats absolutely the case.

Famed Mac security expert Charlie Miller, who won multiple years for the fast Mac hack at Pwn2Own, comments, " Mac OS X is no more secure than any other operating system. It has vulnerabilities, and it will let you download and run malware. The difference is that there simply isn't that much malware written for it. The bad guys have focused all their energies at Windows, which makes up the vast majority of the computers out there. However, as market share for Macs continues to inch up, that equation is going to change and bad guys will begin to focus in on Macs, if that hasn't already started to happen. And as I mentioned above, Macs are no more inherently secure than Windows, so when the bad guys decide to go after them with gusto, it'll get ugly fast."

Malcolm wrote:

More FUD. Same stuff we have been hearing for years.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 17th, 2011 at 6:47 AM

Title: Re: Madyamika Sautrantika vs Prasangika

Content:

Caz said:

Ah Now I see Thanks for that Namdrol this is probley where alot of the Anamosity toward Gelugpa's Originally arose from. So I take it on that root practitoners from Non Gelug traditions would see Lama Tsongkhapas recieved Mahamudra teachings from Manjushri as equally false and wrong then ?

Malcolm wrote:

Well, while it is possible for ordinary people to have pure visions, they are not usually regarded as the basis for having large amounts of faith in that person.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 17th, 2011 at 5:50 AM

Title: Re: Poll: Which Operating System Do You Use?

Content:

Namdrol said:

All holes a fixable, the point is, there should not be so many.

alwayson said:

Lets be clear that Mac has more such holes than Windows.

Malcolm wrote:

Sorry, my boy, that is just not the case. You can't FUD your way out of this.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 17th, 2011 at 5:43 AM

Title: Re: Poll: Which Operating System Do You Use?

Content:

Namdrol said:

<http://arstechnica.com/business/news/2011/11/microsoft-fails-to-patch-duqu-but-fixes-critical-hole-in-windows-tcpip-stack.ars> " onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

alwayson said:

These are just typical updates that Microsoft releases. My PC automatically installs them. I don't even have to think about it.

You made it sound like there are some fundamental unfixable holes to Windows.

Malcolm wrote:

All holes a fixable, the point is, there should not be so many.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 17th, 2011 at 5:22 AM

Title: Re: Poll: Which Operating System Do You Use?

Content:

Namdrol said:

If this were true, there would not be so many holes in Windows.

N

alwayson said:

Who says there are holes in Windows 7?

There aren't any holes on Windows 7.

Like I said, it has UAC.

Malcolm wrote:

<http://arstechnica.com/business/news/2011/11/microsoft-fails-to-patch-duqu-but-fixes-critical-hole-in-windows-tcpip-stack.ars> " onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 17th, 2011 at 5:20 AM

Title: Re: comparative sdom gsum texts

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

There is a section at the end of the book that details this.

xylem said:

lama namdrol...

i probably didn't make my question clear enough. kongtrul's buddhist ethics is exhaustive in presenting the three systems of vows. it is however, not exhaustive in presenting how different masters and schools understand the combined practice of these three systems of vows. jan-ulrich sobisch (copenhagen) has written about how there are very subtle but often very substantial differences in the understanding how the three vows are held and practiced by an individual. some masters, like jigten sumgon suggest that the three vows are essentially of the same nature as they are antidotes to the three poisons. others like gampopa suggest that they are very distinct because they come into existence by very different rituals. some masters suggest all the vows must be assumed together, each one supporting the other, while others suggest it is possible and even necessary to drop the outer aspects of the pratimoksha for the practice of mantra... while others see them being possessed upwardly, the higher systems perfecting the intention of the lower ones.

given the tibetan proclivities for comparative tenets and hermeneutics, it would seem natural that ethical comparative works might also be authored.

-xy

i am not overly familiar with the different genres of tibetan religious literature. are there any comparative texts on the three vow systems? i know different authors criticize and analyze different points of other authors, but are there any comparative treatments in the tradition?

-xy

Namdrol said:

Kongtruls' Buddhist Ethics is exhaustive in this respect.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 17th, 2011 at 4:18 AM

Title: Re: Poll: Which Operating System Do You Use?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

People use computers for three things:

Communications

Productivity

Entertainment

Most people have no need and do not want to tinker with their boxes. They just want a hassle free computer -- and for a hassle free computer, you cannot beat a mac.

wisdom said:

Like in many cases, we give up freedom for security.

Mac may be more secure, but there are far fewer variations available. When you look at things like the apps store you can see how much stricter (and therefore less free) Mac is vs. PC/Android. People who build gaming computers to my knowledge almost always do this with PCs, and most gamers own PCs and not Macs. Many games are released on Mac only after on PC. Everything Mac is more expensive. Mac is a single corporation, PC's can be (like a Dell computer), but often the parts and programs are all separate entities, so you have more choice in which companies, which hardware, and which software you want to have and support.

Basically as a Mac user you are a Mac user in its entirety, and must abide by the rules that Apple puts forth. As a PC user you can have thousands of permutations of hardware and software, and there really are no rules. You can build your own PC, have a warranty for each piece of hardware, and if any burns out you can just fix it yourself. No warranty is broken for fixing your own computer, which is cheaper and easier on every level if you know what you're doing. In terms of customization you can fit a TON Of things in a PC. Your expansion capabilities are also much higher. If you have a PC and a new better CPU comes out, you just buy a new motherboard/CPU, much cheaper than being forced to buy a whole new computer for only slightly more speed.

In terms of security a good anti-virus and spyware program, and a little forethought about what you are downloading and clicking on, will remove almost all potential security breaches from happening.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 17th, 2011 at 3:34 AM

Title: Re: Poll: Which Operating System Do You Use?

Content:

Namdrol said:

and virtually all require user permission to occur. This is not the case with Windows.

alwayson said:

Depends on the version. Windows 7 has UAC which I am sure you are aware of.

UAC prompts you every time some code wants to run.

Malcolm wrote:

If this were true, there would not be so many holes in Windows.

Face it, Windows is designed to run in a trusted enterprise. It is not safe machine. I have run my mac, without firewall or any security on the net behind a standard NAT router and have never been hacked or even tickled for years.

No workstation mac has ever been hacked. Macs that have been hacked are web servers, and only because they are running some kind of webserver with outdated code. But the OS itself is very bullet proof unless you download something on purpose and install it, like mac defender.

You just cannot make the same claim with any version of Windows.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 17th, 2011 at 3:01 AM

Title: Re: Madyamika Sautrantika vs Prasangika

Content:

Tsongkhapa said:

That's actually not so because Tsongkhapa realized emptiness directly much later when he was able to see Manjushri and receive teachings from him directly.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, I understand that this is what you believe. You will forgive me for pointing out that Tsongkhapa is not universally regarded as someone who attained the path of seeing. We can respect Tsongkhapa as a great practitioner and scholar without acquiescing to your demand that we perceive him to be an aryan pudgala.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 17th, 2011 at 2:55 AM

Title: Re: Buddhism on God

Content:

mañjughoṣamaṇi said:

at least in the early phases these were not compatible schools of thought and were in disagreement with each other.

All the best.

Malcolm wrote:

Correct; Prajñapāramitā schools, Tathāgatagarbha schools and Yogacāra schools were in some disagreement until Maitrīyanāth's synthesis. After the dust settled, it was left between the Yogacāras and the Madhyamikas to battle it out.

Then Vajrayāna made their arguments somewhat irrelevant because of the Vajrayāna synthesis of the two schools.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 17th, 2011 at 2:02 AM

Title: Re: Poll: Which Operating System Do You Use?

Content:

always on said:

Oh really?

<http://www.dailytech.com/Apple+Orders+Technicians+to+Feign+Ignorance+About+Mac+Malware/article21693.htm> " onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

Malcolm wrote:

MacDefender?

What a joke. There is one known exploit for the Mac, and it is more of a social engineering exploit than a true hack or malware -- it depends on the ignorance of someone to actually download a program and then physically give them a credit card number. This is not really a malware program. This is a fraud.

Really, this is the best that windows community can do in pointing out flaws in Mac Security?

If you want to know about ongoing issues for the mac, look here:

<http://www.securemac.com/> " onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

You will see that by comparison, there are very few exploits against the mac, and virtually all require user permission to occur. This is not the case with Windows.

Remember, I was a professional Windows system engineer for several years working in high security environments such as Putnam Investments, Genuity, and so on. So I am not just talking idly.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 17th, 2011 at 1:39 AM

Title: Re: Poll: Which Operating System Do You Use?

Content:

alwayson said:

Windows 7 is as secure as any other OS.

Malcolm wrote:

No, it really isn't.

Compared to a Mac, security wise W7 is terrible.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 17th, 2011 at 1:36 AM

Title: Re: Poll: Which Operating System Do You Use?

Content:

alwayson said:

Whats wrong with Windows 7?

Malcolm wrote:

The Windows part.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 17th, 2011 at 1:26 AM

Title: Re: Best Language to Learn First?

Content:

wisdom said:

What is the best language to learn first, Tibetan or Sanskrit? Which language have the bulk of most Buddhist texts been written in? Especially the Mahayana tradition?

Malcolm wrote:

Tibetan.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 17th, 2011 at 1:19 AM

Title: Re: Madyamika Sautrantika vs Prasangika

Content:

Mariusz said:

Perhaps you should read Karmapa Mikyo Dorje

Malcolm wrote:

I have. Thanks.

I have studied Tibetan polemical authors of Madhyamaka quite well.

The Indian masters are better.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 17th, 2011 at 1:10 AM

Title: Re: public evaluation of teachers

Content:

xylem said:

One, I have noticed over the years on various different Buddhist forums (the old Tricycle, e-sangha and now here) that the most vitriolic and divisive threads generally involve the evaluation of the authenticity of Buddhist teachers and lineages.

Malcolm wrote:

Correct, it is better to leave people to their delusions.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 17th, 2011 at 1:04 AM

Title: Re: Reasons for Conventional Reality

Content:

Acchantika said:

If we consider this in terms of your examples, we remember that Nagarjuna spent the previous 23 chapters negating the possibility of a referent.

gad rgyangs said:

...which is, of course, itself a view.

Acchantika said:

Negating something does not necessarily equal affirming its absence.

Malcolm wrote:

Agreed, a negation does not entail possession of a view. According to Rongzom, so called non-affirming negation is used to reject an opponents POV. The affirming negation is used to prove one's own view. According to him, Madhyamalas only use the former and never the latter in reference to reality. He also points out that they accept the consequence that their own position is harmed i.e. they do not maintain a position but purely maintain a critical stance.

But right from the beginning there was rebellion against this, for example, the harsh criticism of Candrakirti found in the colophon of the translation of Ratnakarashanti's Madhyamakalamkara.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 17th, 2011 at 12:58 AM

Title: Re: 100 Syllable Mantra SUPO KAYO ME BHAVA

Content:

tantular said:

Old Tibetan was not a tonal language, so this couldn't have been the difference between the ca and tsa sde, and when Lhasa dialect did develop tone, both series follow the same rules. Nowadays Himalayan peoples in Nepal write their Tibetan names in Devanagari as if ཅ = चै: for example ཅེ་རི་ཅོ་ is always written as छेरिड. I've asked people why they do this, and it's not because they're aware of the official Tibetan transliteration of Sanskrit (most have no idea), but simply because to their ears Nepali छ sounds like the closest equivalent of ཅ; certainly far better than त्ह would be.

The Tshigdzöd Chenmo states that ཅ and ཅ both have 1) the palate as place of articulation, 2) the middle of the tongue as organ of articulation, 3) contact of tongue and palate as its manner of articulation, & 4) unvoiced, unaspirated phonation, exactly the same as Sanskrit grammarians describe च. Sanskrit-Tibetan phonological theory does not distinguish plosives from affricatives (these are both called spr̥ṣṭa/phrad pa), or the alveolar ridge and palate (both tālu/rkan). Therefore, Sanskrit and Tibetan grammarians have no theoretical framework for distinguishing the https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Voiceless_postalveolar_affricate and the https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Voiceless_alveolo-palatal_affricate. In India this wasn't a problem because the latter sound didn't exist. It does exist in Tibetan, however, and therefore the Tibetan language needed to have two series of letters, even if the grammarians couldn't exactly describe the difference between them. All Tibetan grammatical treatises are in agreement that the tsa sde was invented first to represent the Sanskrit ca-varga, and the ca sde was only developed afterwards, once Tibetans realized their language had an additional set of affricates not found in Sanskrit. According to legend, this happened when Thonmi had a conversation with a traveller that included the "six new letters of Tibetan":

མོ་བ་དཔོན་གྱིས། ཁྱེད་གང་ནས་བྱོན་པར། དེ་ན་རེ། ཁང་ཁྱང་ནས་འོངས་ཟེར། གང་དུ་འགྲོ་བྱས་པས། ཟ་ཉར་ཅུ་འགྲོ་ཟེར། གང་གི་དོན་དུ་འགྲོ་བྱས་པར་ང་ཉ་ཅུ་འགྲོ་ཟེར། ནམ་སྐབས་བྱས་པས་ཅེ་ཆ་ཟེར།

dakini_boi said:

Thank you Tantular, that is very helpful. This information seems in accord with the idea that the Indians who introduced Buddhism into Tibet may have been from a region where च was actually pronounced " tsa." Would you agree with that?

Malcolm wrote:

It is the opposite. It does not accord with that idea.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 17th, 2011 at 12:11 AM

Title: Re: comparative sdom gsum texts

Content:

xylem said:

i am not overly familiar with the different genres of tibetan religious literature. are there any comparative texts on the three vow systems? i know different authors criticize and analyze different points of other authors, but are there any comparative treatments in the tradition?

-xy

Malcolm wrote:

Kongtruls' Buddhist Ethics is exhaustive in this respect.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 16th, 2011 at 11:55 PM

Title: Re: Reasons for Conventional Reality

Content:

Namdrol said:

A view is a position concerning either existence or non-existence, that is the basis of all views. Madhyamakas do not have views concerning either.

Astus said:

Should add that it's independent existence and total annihilation. But to say that "there is no self" is not a position of non-existence, i.e. annihilation, and to say that "phenomena are inter-dependent" is not a position of existence, i.e. eternal self-sufficient being.

Malcolm wrote:

As I have pointed out from time immemorial bhāva is included with svabhāva by Nāgārjuna.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 16th, 2011 at 11:53 PM

Title: Re: Buddhism on God

Content:

tobes said:

Knowing Nagarjuna's arguments about emptiness does not instantly grant access to all of the world's philosophies and the arguments therein.

Malcolm wrote:

Nope, it just makes them all completely irrelevant to the one thing that matters: liberation.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 16th, 2011 at 11:36 PM

Title: Re: Madyamika Sautrantika vs Prasangika

Content:

Mariusz said:

In the short lineage of Yamantaka Umapa is not listed as I know. What is the source of your statement?

Malcolm wrote:

It is based on the lineage list (volume 30, page 109 compiled by Loter Wangpo) in the rgyud sde kun 'dus based on the lineage of Cangkye Rolpai Dorje

The close lineage is as follows:

From Vajrabhairava, Jamyang Tenpa'i Khor Lo (Mañjuśrī Sasanacakra, and Gyalba Jampal Nyingpo (Jina Mañjuśrīgarbha) or alternately, from Mañjuśrī and Vajrabhairava individually to Lama Umapa, and then all three to Tsongkhapa, then Kheydrup and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 16th, 2011 at 11:06 PM

Title: Re: Reasons for Conventional Reality

Content:

Namdrol said:

Dependent origination is not a view. It is the pacification of views. Emptiness is not a view, it is the pacification of views. This is stated countless times in Madhyamaka texts.

Where there is no view, there is no proliferation. Where there is no proliferation, there is no view.

view = proliferation.

N

gad rgyangs said:

You still haven't defined what you consider a "view" to be. If its not "a statement about the nature of reality/how things are", then what is it? And "proliferation" basically just means "other people's views that you don't agree with", so thats not a definition.

Malcolm wrote:

A view is a position concerning either existence or non-existence, that is the basis of all views. Madhyamakas do not have views concerning either.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 16th, 2011 at 11:05 PM

Title: Re: Madyamika Sautrantika vs Prasangika

Content:

Mariusz said:

I don't want show you my curriculum vitae either because here I think only the investigation counts, sorry.

Malcolm wrote:

My investigation is finished. I have nothing further to investigate. I rely on my own knowledge now.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 16th, 2011 at 10:36 PM

Title: Re: Madyamika Sautrantika vs Prasangika

Content:

Mariusz said:

Please read the Madhyamaka Forum here in Dharmawheel.

Namdrol said:

There is no need for me read what amateurs have to say about Madhyamaka, whether Gelug or non-Gelug.

N

Mariusz said:

Upss, no comments

Malcolm wrote:

The point is, I can argue for or against any position and win. I don't really have a stake in a position. But I know perfectly well what Nāgārjuna says, Aryadeva, Buddhapalita, Candra, Jñānagarbha, Śāntarakṣita, Sapan, Gorampa, Dolbuwa, Tsongkhapa, etc. have to say.

I have studied Madhyamaka for 25 years. On this forum, the only people who have anything to share with me about Madhyamaka is Jñāna and Ratna, and even then, it is only more sources, and different information. They have nothing to share with me concerning the essential principles of Nāgārjuna and other tenet systems.

So, you can either benefit from my extensive knowledge of these teachings, honed by years of constant study with the best Tibetan lamas in the world, mastery of classical Tibetan, and personal experience in meditation, or not. It is your choice. No one is forcing you to listen.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 16th, 2011 at 10:23 PM

Title: Re: Madyamika Sautrantika vs Prasangika

Content:

Mariusz said:

Please read the Madhyamaka Forum here in Dharmawheel.

Malcolm wrote:

There is no need for me read what amateurs have to say about Madhyamaka, whether Gelug or non-Gelug.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 16th, 2011 at 10:10 PM

Title: Re: Madyamika Sautrantika vs Prasangika

Content:

Namdrol said:

The two truths are about how objects are perceived. They can be perceived in only two ways, correctly and incorrectly. Perceiving them incorrectly, a false perception of them is called relative truth.

N

Mariusz said:

I do not agree. Do you really think the so-called "objects", somewhere "out there", can be perceived correctly in the ultimate truth?

Malcolm wrote:

Have you ever read Candrakirti? If not, I suggest you do.

It is pointless for me to educate you. But in breif, Candra says "all phenomena have two natures, one ultimate, the other, relative" and "Whatever is correctly perceived, that is real; false perception is said to be relative truth".

Please examine these things. I'm out.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 16th, 2011 at 10:01 PM

Title: Re: Madyamika Sautrantika vs Prasangika

Content:

Namdrol said:

You are not at liberaty to invent your own Dharma - well you are, just don't call it Candrakirti's intent.

False, faulty, incorrect, etc. All of these apply to relative truth.

N

Mariusz said:

Khenpo Karl Brunnholzl often use a alternative term "the deceiving" which I also like because doesn't suggest useless: "Generally speaking, if a given philosophical system differentiates the two levels of seeming and ultimate reality, then in whatever way it does so, one it speaks about seeming, relative, or deceiving phenomena", it must also accept this mean that such phenomena are precisely something that is not established.

Malcolm wrote:

Ok, you are not understanding something -- kiun rdzob is relative truth, but actually means "totally obscuring" in Tibetan.

But false perception is mthong brdzun, so what Candrakirti is clearly saying is that false/faulty/incorrect perception is relative, or totally obscuring, truth.

The two truths are about how objects are perceived. They can be perceived in only two ways, correctly and incorrectly. Perceiving them incorrectly, a false perception of them is called relative truth. The word brdzun pa means "to lie" as well. Further, for example, there are two schools in Yogacara rnam bden pa and rnam brdzun pa i.e. true aspect and false aspect. The latter is the higher of the two. The term brdzun pa means false.

So a false perception is relative truth.

When Shantideva is taking about the two truths, he says - ultimate truth is beyond the mind, because the mind itself is relative. The mind can never apprehend ultimate truth.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 16th, 2011 at 9:55 PM

Title: Re: Madyamika Sautrantika vs Prasangika

Content:

Mariusz said:

In the short lineage of Yamantaka Umapa is not listed as I know. What is the source of your statement?

Malcolm wrote:

The lineage prayers.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 16th, 2011 at 9:21 PM

Title: Re: Madyamika Sautrantika vs Prasangika

Content:

Mariusz said:

Perhaps "faulty" is not correct here,

Namdrol said:

Faulty is quite correct, since that is what Candrakirti says i.e.:

mthong ba brdzun pa kun rdzob bden par gsungs

"False perception is said to be relative truth".

N

Mariusz said:

It is the same, false does not mean useless here I think but could suggest as it also. So I prefer the term seeming.

Malcolm wrote:

You are not at liberty to invent your own Dharma - well you are, just don't call it Candrakirti's intent.

False, faulty, incorrect, etc. All of these apply to relative truth.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 16th, 2011 at 8:59 PM

Title: Re: Madyamika Sautrantika vs Prasangika

Content:

Mariusz said:

Perhaps "faulty" is not correct here,

Malcolm wrote:

Faulty is quite correct, since that is what Candrakirti says i.e.:

mthong ba brdzun pa kun rdzob bden par gsungs

"False perception is said to be relative truth".

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 16th, 2011 at 8:35 PM

Title: Re: Madyamika Sautrantika vs Prasangika

Content:

Caz said:

...no wonder why the schools would have problems with each other if this is what they would say of people who did not think the same way. Considering he was a Keeper of Vinaya and certainly we all know the benefits of refuge vows with regards to spirits that line of said reasoning really does sound petty.

Mariusz said:

Followers of non-sectarian Rime know the fact I posted above that Je Tsongkhapa had visions of Manjushri at least considering Yamantaka Single Hero practice of HYT.

Malcolm wrote:

This lineage actually starts with Lama Umapa. Nevertheless, it is preserved in Kongtrul's Dam sngags mdzod in the Kadampa section.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 16th, 2011 at 8:34 PM

Title: Re: Madyamika Sautrantika vs Prasangika

Content:

Caz said:

yes, whereas non-Gelugpas think he was deluded by a spirit posing as Manjushri.

N

Wow Namdrol its no wonder why the schools would have problems with each other if this is what they would say of people who did not think the same way. Considering he was a Keeper of Vinaya and certainly we all know the benefits of refuge vows with regards to spirits that line of said reasoning really does sound petty.

Malcolm wrote:

Gorampa mentions this as possibility in his differentiation of views, and basically asserts that Tsongkhapa was lead astray by Umapa's channeling of "Manjushri".

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 16th, 2011 at 8:23 PM

Title: Re: Reasons for Conventional Reality

Content:
Namdrol said:
Madhyamakas do not have views.
N

gad rgyangs said:
Ok, lets approach it this way: since Madhyamikas make all sorts of statements about the nature of reality (dependent origination, emptiness, etc), then, for you, a "view" is not a statement about the nature of reality. What is a "view" to you then?

Malcolm wrote:
Dependent origination is not a view. It is the pacification of views. Emptiness is not a view, it is the pacification of views. This is stated countless times in Madhyamaka texts.

Where there is no view, there is no proliferation. Where there is no proliferation, there is no view.

view = proliferation.

N

Author: Malcolm
Date: Wednesday, November 16th, 2011 at 9:57 AM
Title: Re: Reasons for Conventional Reality
Content:

Tsongkhapa said:
Gorampa is unable to distinguish...blah blah blah

Malcolm wrote:
The Gelug misunderstanding of madhyamaka is tragic.

N

Author: Malcolm
Date: Wednesday, November 16th, 2011 at 9:55 AM
Title: Re: Reasons for Conventional Reality
Content:

Namdrol said:
"It is not that we claim non-existence, we merely remove claims for existing existents"

-- Buddhapalita.

Madhyamakas do not have views.

N

Tsongkhapafan said:

Yes they do. 'phenomena do not exist inherently' is a Madhyamika view. It's not possible to follow a spiritual path without possessing correct views.

Malcolm wrote:

Correct view is no view.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 16th, 2011 at 9:54 AM

Title: Re: Reasons for Conventional Reality

Content:

Tsongkhapafan said:

All conventional truths are objects of deluded minds' is a pretty crude and wrong statement

Malcolm wrote:

This is Candrakirti's definition in Madhyamaka-avatara.

If you want to consider it crude, as compared to a Tibetan's POV, well, that is your problem.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 16th, 2011 at 8:31 AM

Title: Re: Reasons for Conventional Reality

Content:

Namdrol said:

MMK refutes both:

"Where is there an existent not included in inherent existence or dependent existence?

If an existent is not established, a non-existent is not established.

Those who perceive existents, non-existents, inherent existence or dependent existence do not see the truth of the Buddha's teaching."

Madhyamaka therefore do not assert any views. Not asserting a view does not mean "incapable of engaging in conventional discourse", something you gelugpas seem to be afraid of.

N

gad rgyangs said:

Unless you rig the question by insisting that having a view can only mean accepting existence, non-existence, both, or neither, then having a view means any opinion about the nature of reality. In which case, what MMK is saying here is definitely a view: it is saying there is such a thing as the Buddha's teaching, and if you perceive X (which already assumes, and raises, all kinds of epistemological views), then you do not see it, etc.

Malcolm wrote:

"It is not that we claim non-existence, we merely remove claims for existing existents"

-- Buddhapalita.

Madhyamakas do not have views.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 16th, 2011 at 8:30 AM

Title: Re: Reasons for Conventional Reality

Content:

Sherab said:

Bodhisattvas on the 8th stage and beyond perceive appearances of buddhas don't they?
Are these appearances of buddhas deluded?

Malcolm wrote:

Their experience is divided in terms of meditation and post-meditation.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 16th, 2011 at 6:43 AM

Title: Re: Madyamika Sautrantika vs Prasangika

Content:

Mariusz said:

I like Je Tsongkhapa, as for example initiator of Yamantaka Ekavira Single Hero HYT system from Manjusri, because He wrote (in Tsongkhapa's Final Exposition of Wisdom; page.158):

"during states subsequent to meditative equipoise on the stages of generation and completion (of Highest Yoga Tantra) one takes suchness to mind within analyzing it...with respect to that occasion, do not posit analytical meditation as one-pointed meditation" and there were many masters of His Yamantaka system who got Vajrayana realizations

Malcolm wrote:

Intellectual views do not count for much in Vajrayāna.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 16th, 2011 at 5:33 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen Community of Chogyal Namkhai Norbu

Content:

mint said:

Also, as I've explained elsewhere in this thread, I just don't have the ability to watch (or understand) the webcasts when they air. This factors into my less-than-stellar attitude towards all of this, too.

Acchantika said:

If you have time, there are some ChNN videos on youtube with English subtitles, <https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=-XrfN8TY80Y&feature=related>. This may help one get used to his manner of speech, accent etc.

Malcolm wrote:

Best is to just go meet him in person.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 16th, 2011 at 5:27 AM

Title: Re: Madyamika Sautrantika vs Prasangika

Content:

Mariusz said:

I very like Je Tsongkhapa because His intention was to built epistemological very complicated system, validated conceptually by valid cognition, that should fit together,

Malcolm wrote:

The problem is that pramanas and prameyas are just conventional fictions, as Nagarjuna shows in the Vigrahavyavartani. In other words, there are no ultimate pramanas, so elaborating a Madhyamaka systems which makes use of this kind of language is very faulty indeed.

In other words, valid cognitions, like all relative truths, are the objects of faulty cognitions.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 16th, 2011 at 5:06 AM

Title: Re: Poll: Which Operating System Do You Use?

Content:

alwayson said:

Any Windows lower than Windows 7 is complete crap.

I use Windows 7 Ultimate 64 Bit with Service Pack 1.

Malcolm wrote:

Revise that to "Any Windows is complete crap" and I will agree.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 16th, 2011 at 5:04 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen Community of Chogyal Namkhai Norbu

Content:

mint said:

Wouldn't receiving the DT and then not practicing guruyoga be the karmic end of me?

Malcolm wrote:

No. If you don't want to practice Guru Yoga, you don't have to.

If you want to, you can.

But first, you need transmission.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 16th, 2011 at 3:59 AM

Title: Re: 100 Syllable Mantra SUPO KAYO ME BHAVA

Content:

dakini_boi said:

Ok. Where can Sapan's explanation be found?

Malcolm wrote:

You can look in his collected works.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 16th, 2011 at 2:49 AM

Title: Re: 100 Syllable Mantra SUPO KAYO ME BHAVA

Content:

dakini_boi said:

Namdrol, can you tell me what is the textual source where he explains this idea?

Malcolm wrote:

Doesn't exist. Apart from two short texts, nothing of his survived. Sapan explains this quite well, but no one seems interested in taking Sapan's word for it. My explanation is based on that.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 16th, 2011 at 2:30 AM

Title: Re: 100 Syllable Mantra SUPO KAYO ME BHAVA

Content:

dakini_boi said:

so how would using those characters have prevented Tibetans from pronouncing the Sankrit with tonal alterations?

Namdrol said:

training.

dakini_boi said:

What I meant was, how would using characters tsa tsha dza have prevented pronouncing sanskrit with tonal alterations, any more than using ca cha ja - either way, training would be necessary.

Malcolm wrote:

You will have to ask Thonmi. It was his idea.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 16th, 2011 at 2:09 AM

Title: Re: Wine and Meat Offerings?

Content:

narraboth said:

I totally agree that people should follow what their master said, but i disagree that it's about "view", otherwise it will be an attack to dza paltrul rinpoche and all other nyingma monasteries/centres/groups following his trandition (or 'book').

No, preventing offer meat (at least fresh meat) is not 'lower tantra' view, because you don't even need to talk about meat to lower tantra practioners, they just don't use it. It is out of compassion and proper conducts of buddhism. Maybe just like ChNN advicing his group to 'buy meats from as many animals as possible', it's out of compassion (not because the view is higher, otherwise meat from one animal and many animals should be equal isn't it). I don't see there's right or wrong between the two methods (as i was quoting from two great masters), but it's really nothing to do with the views. I don't think dza paltrul rinpoche's view would be lower than many masters at anytime, but i very appreciate that he pointed out important things that people easily miss in so-called high views. But of course, if someone can see sh*t equally as tasty sausages, he can comfortably say whay he want to say.

Malcolm wrote:

What I am saying is that the view of lower tantra is that it is not correct to eat meat.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 16th, 2011 at 2:08 AM

Title: Re: Wine and Meat Offerings?

Content:

gregkavarnos said:

You want a beer with your burger?

Malcolm wrote:

Always, and fries.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 16th, 2011 at 1:53 AM

Title: Re: Reasons for Conventional Reality

Content:

Tsongkhapafan said:

Conventional reality is only appearance, that's true, but to say that it's an appearance only for the deluded means that Buddhas do not perceive conventional reality. This is refuted by Tsonghkapa and other authors.

Malcolm wrote:

And proven by Gorampa, etc.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 16th, 2011 at 1:52 AM

Title: Re: Buddhism on God

Content:

Jnana said:

Okay. So what exactly is the Theos of an atheist such as yourself?

KevinSolway said:

It is the All, composed of all phenomena, all concepts, all that is unknown and beyond concepts, and all of these elements tied together and impelled by cause and effect.

Malcolm wrote:

pantheism.

of course, such a concept is absolutely foreign to Buddhism.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 16th, 2011 at 1:28 AM

Title: Re: Madyamika Sautrantika vs Prasangika

Content:

Caz said:

Thats true Gelugpa's Believe Tsongkhapa's Doctrine distills the essence of Nagarjunas teachings.

conebeckham said:

Well, most Gelukpas do.....but see Gendun Chopel, for example....as for others- Sakayapas, Kagyupas, Nyingmapas, and Jonangpas generally do not.

Malcolm wrote:

Ganden Chopel, from the beginning, was a Nyingmapa. He was never a "pure" Gelugpa.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 16th, 2011 at 1:27 AM

Title: Re: Madyamika Sautrantika vs Prasangika

Content:

Mariusz said:

Irrelevant. Conceptual is essential even after these first two Paths according to Tsong-kha-pa.

Namdrol said:

It is fairly straightforward.

Gelugpas care very much about what Tsongkhapa says, and accept him as the supreme authority, even over Nāgārjuna.

Non-gelugpas don't, and don't accept him as an authority at all, let alone as an authority more important than Nāgārjuna.

N

Caz said:

That's true. Gelugpa's Believe Tsongkhapa's Doctrine distills the essence of Nagarjuna's teachings.

Malcolm wrote:

yes, whereas non-Gelugpas think he was deluded by a spirit posing as Manjushri.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 16th, 2011 at 1:14 AM

Title: Re: Madyamika Sautrantika vs Prasangika

Content:

Mariusz said:

Irrelevant. Conceptual is essential even after these first two Paths according to Tsong-kha-pa.

Malcolm wrote:

It is fairly straightforward.

Gelugpas care very much about what Tsongkhapa says, and accept him as the supreme authority, even over Nāgārjuna.

Non-gelugpas don't, and don't accept him as an authority at all, let alone as an authority more important than Nāgārjuna.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 16th, 2011 at 12:53 AM

Title: Re: Wine and Meat Offerings?

Content:

narraboth said:

I don't know how wisdom deities accept offering

Malcolm wrote:

Without duality.

narraboth said:

but if they will feel 'happy', probably won't be because you kill some animals for offering them.

Malcolm wrote:

Wisdom deities are in a state of total equanimity. If there is negative consequence to killing animals for a ganapouja, it is because the act is predicated on ignorance and falls in the class of the ten non-virtues.

narraboth said:

well, please don't take it as an attack to any group,

Malcolm wrote:

Not attacking anyone, merely pointing out that there are differences in views.

In this case, it is better for people to follow the advice of their individual teacher, rather than a teacher in a book. Every teacher has a different teaching because people are different and need different things. But if someone falls into Dzogchen Community, then it is better they heed ChNN's instructions -- the same goes for everyone else.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 16th, 2011 at 12:47 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen Monk?

Content:

Namdrol said:

They should be educated in the five major sciences, sutra, tantra, have done retreats, have gained some measure of signs of experience, skilled in giving explanations, in addition to having bodhicitta, and so on.

N

Sönam said:

And what's about Khyentse Yeshe and few others of the kind ?

Sönam

Malcolm wrote:

Khyentse Rinpoche is not my teacher, and I don't know him as a teacher, though I have met him.

I am sure he is qualified to teach because his father, my teacher, said so.

But I am talking in general, not each specific teacher. There are always exceptions to every rule.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 16th, 2011 at 12:43 AM

Title: Re: Reasons for Conventional Reality

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

two truths is a view.

Tsongkhapafan said:

That's right - it's the compatability of conventional and ultimate truths that Nagarjuna was teaching. This is correct view.

Malcolm wrote:

The two truths are part of conventional truth, not ultimate truth. Therefore even the two truths are not established. The two truths are objects of mistaken minds.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 16th, 2011 at 12:41 AM

Title: Re: Reasons for Conventional Reality

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

I'm not sure who you mean by "we" (paleface), but the MMK is full of all kinds of views about sunyata, pratityasamutpada, etc

Namdrol said:

DO prescribed as the end of views in the MMK, not as a view in and of itself.

A view requires an existent or a non-existent. Since MMK shows that neither can be found, upon what could any view be based?

N

Tsongkhapa said:

This is also an extreme. MMK refutes inherent existence, not existence per se. It also refutes non-existence. Views are based on mere imputation and mere appearances, that's why they exist and function. It's incorrect to assert that the Madhyamikas do not assert any views.

Malcolm wrote:

MMK refutes both:

"Where is there an existent not included in inherent existence or dependent existence?

If an existent is not established, a non-existent is not established.

Those who perceive existents, non-existents, inherent existence or dependent existence do not see the truth of the Buddha's teaching."

Madhyamaka therefore do not assert any views. Not asserting a view does not mean "incapable of engaging in conventional discourse", something you gelugpas seem to be afraid of.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 16th, 2011 at 12:32 AM

Title: Re: Wine and Meat Offerings?

Content:

narraboth said:

There are really two views of this, one is mainly from great dza patrol rinpoche, as in Kunzang Lama Shelung he suggested that offering killed meat to wisdom deities is like offering a killed child's meat to his mother.

Malcolm wrote:

But of course wisdom deities do not perceive offerings in this way. This is our perception.

narraboth said:

Quite convincing i have to say.

Malcolm wrote:

If your view is lower tantra, perhaps.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 15th, 2011 at 11:49 PM

Title: Re: Wine and Meat Offerings?

Content:

narraboth said:

theoritically they shouldn't even let outsiders see wine and meat on the shrine.

Malcolm wrote:

Those of us who follow ChNN follow what ChNN has to say. In this case, he says buy meat from markets, as many kinds as possible, sausage is better since it is made from the meat of many animals. When used in a ganapuja, it creates a cause for that animal's liberation.

Wine should be consumed in a mindful manner.

When you follow ChNN you follow the system of Dzogchen as he teaches it, since he is the only teacher that I know for a fact is a realized Dzogchen master. I am sure there are others, but I do not know that for a fact nor who they are. But I know ChNN is an awakened person and this is not because of my faith. This is because he has described his experience openly to a large extent. So I am certain he is an awakened person, beyond any doubt whatsoever.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 15th, 2011 at 11:44 PM

Title: Re: Buddhism on God

Content:

KevinSolway said:

Whether or not it includes God depends entirely on how God is defined. You are thinking of God as some sort of phenomena or concept, which is an error.

Malcolm wrote:

There is no God in Buddhism. You are not allowed to redefine Buddhist principles just as you please.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 15th, 2011 at 10:15 AM

Title: Re: Buddhism on God

Content:

tobes said:

I'm just saying, be careful of contexts (i.e. not to assume Indian cosmology is the same as Hellenic cosmology), think carefully about the metaphysics and don't assume all of this is totally nailed.

Malcolm wrote:

All you have to assume is the precise definition of cause and condition and the answer is clear -- there is no room for a creator god in Buddhism.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 15th, 2011 at 10:13 AM

Title: Re: Buddhism on God

Content:

tobes said:

But we need to be a little more careful when thinking about his direct statements about the existence of the world in time. If the matter is clear cut, then why the silence?

Malcolm wrote:

He was never silent about the creation of conditioned entities. All effects must have causes, all causes are effects.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 15th, 2011 at 10:00 AM

Title: Re: Buddhism on God

Content:

tobes said:

And I do really think that there are some damn interesting dialogical possibilities with some strands within theism, which ought not automatically be closed down just because Buddhists feel comfortable enough in their own skin such that they can happily to refuse to bother with the most loaded signifier in history.

Malcolm wrote:

There is nothing interesting in theism at all. It is just pure delusion.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 15th, 2011 at 9:48 AM

Title: Re: Buddhism on God

Content:

catmoon said:

First, Buddhism flatly denies the existence of a Creator.

tobes said:

Metaphysically, yes. But I'd be wary of the statement 'Buddhism flatly denies....' ~ the Buddha was famously silent on such questions. Strong negations come later.

Malcolm wrote:

Buddha flatly denies a creator because the logic of dependent origination forbids it.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 15th, 2011 at 9:42 AM

Title: Re: Reasons for Conventional Reality

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

I'm not sure who you mean by "we" (paleface), but the MMK is full of all kinds of views about sunyata, pratityasamutpada, etc

Malcolm wrote:

DO prescribed as the end of views in the MMK, not as a view in and of itself.

A view requires an existent or a non-existent. Since MMK shows that neither can be found, upon what could any view be based?

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 15th, 2011 at 8:52 AM

Title: Re: Reasons for Conventional Reality

Content:

Paul said:

It is just for the sake of refuting non-Buddhist opponents
That the learned ones have promoted them

Astus said:

And for this purpose I'd like to see all the many reasons for the validity of the Buddhist view vis-a-vis non-Buddhist views.

Malcolm wrote:

We don't have a view, per se, we just eliminate the incorrect views of others.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 15th, 2011 at 8:02 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen Monk?

Content:

Acchantika said:

My understanding is that traditionally, (native Tibetan) monks spend 9 years at a monastery college studying, then 3 years doing PhD-equivalent studies, then a further 3 years in retreat in the case of Nyingma Dzogchen. At this point they receive certification etc. So 15 years of hardcore study and retreat to become eligible to actually teach, at least.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, this is good. Less is insufficient.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 15th, 2011 at 12:01 AM

Title: Re: St. John of the Cross on Spiritual Materialism

Content:

mint said:

He may have even been a pratyekabuddha.

Malcolm wrote:

Quite impossible. Pratyekabuddhas only occur when there is no Buddha.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 15th, 2011 at 12:00 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen Monk?

Content:

Namdrol said:

They should be educated in the five major sciences, sutra, tantra, have done retreats, have gained some measure of signs of experience, skilled in giving explanations, in addition to having bodhicitta, and so on.

N

Clarence said:

Well, why don't you teach more then? You are qualified according to your own qualifications. BTW, I think you are qualified as well. Just something I have been think about lately.

Thanks, C

Malcolm wrote:

Maybe I am not so qualified, sometimes I still get mad in political discussions.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 14th, 2011 at 11:58 PM

Title: Re: Reasons for Conventional Reality

Content:

Astus said:

I think this is going to an unintended direction. My question is if there are arguments to establish correct view on the conventional level.

Malcolm wrote:

In Madhyamaka, correct conventional is distinguished by efficiency. If it appears to work, it is correct conventional.

Of course, then there is famous example of a Geshe who challenged milarepa, who responded by banging on space with a stick as if it were a drum; or Candrakīrti who bumped into a pillar since he had his head in a book, and when challenged about reality of the pillar, passed his hand right through it.

Conventional reality is an appearance for the deluded.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 14th, 2011 at 11:28 PM

Title: Re: Reasons for Conventional Reality

Content:

Tsongkhapafan said:

Nagarjuna's view is the perfect union of conventional and ultimate truth.

Malcolm wrote:

No. Nagarjuna's view is the following:

"Since the Jina's have declared that nirvana alone is true, what wise person would not understand the rest is false?"

And:

"Neither samsara nor nirvana exist;
instead, nirvana is the thorough knowledge of samsara"

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 14th, 2011 at 10:53 PM

Title: Re: Reasons for Conventional Reality

Content:

edearl said:

Are there an Ultimate Buddhist Reality, a Conventional Buddhist Reality and other realities, or are other realities part of Conventional Buddhist Reality?

Do all Buddhist schools teach the same or different Ultimate and Conventional realities?

Malcolm wrote:

All expressed truths, both relative and ultimate, are part of conventional truth. For this reason, Haribhadra states that the entire path, including the attainment of Buddhahood, is completely illusory -- it is not real in anyway.

The unenumerated ultimate truth is inexpressible.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 14th, 2011 at 10:50 PM

Title: Re: Dzogchen Monk?

Content:

Tsongkhapafan said:

Even animals can benefit from hearing the sounds of holy Dharma, so it's not wrong to teach if your motivation is good.

Namdrol said:

An unqualified physician is the enemy of his patients, doing more harm than good.

Likewise, an unqualified dharma teacher is a mara for his students, sending both himself and his students to hell.

N

Clarence said:

Namdrol,

When do you consider someone qualified? Of course it depends on what they are teachings but I am sure some generalizations can be made.

Malcolm wrote:

They should be educated in the five major sciences, sutra, tantra, have done retreats, have gained some measure of signs of experience, skilled in giving explanations, in addition to having bodhicitta, and so on.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 14th, 2011 at 10:44 PM

Title: Re: Reasons for Conventional Reality

Content:

Tsongkhapa said:

There is no contradiction between the teachings of Dharmakirti and Nagarjuna.

Malcolm wrote:

Of course there is: Nagarjuna rejects the whole concept of pramana.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 14th, 2011 at 10:43 PM

Title: Re: Reasons for Conventional Reality

Content:

Tsongkhapa said:

Conventional reality has gross and subtle aspects. The gross nature of conventional truth can be established by valid cognition as explained by Dignaga and Dharmakirti (this is very important) because forms such as our body are objects of valid minds and they perform the functions they appear to possess.

Namdrol said:

No, it can't. All conventional truths are objects of mistaken cognitions, per Candrakirti.

Tsongkhapa said:

It's important not to go to an extreme and negate the validity of all conventional truths.

Malcolm wrote:

Delusion is delusion. Better to recognize it for what it is, rather than making excuses for it and continuing in that way.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 14th, 2011 at 10:41 PM

Title: Re: Dzogchen Monk?

Content:

Tsongkhapa said:

Even animals can benefit from hearing the sounds of holy Dharma, so it's not wrong to teach if your motivation is good.

Malcolm wrote:

An unqualified physician is the enemy of his patients, doing more harm than good.

Likewise, an unqualified dharma teacher is a mara for his students, sending both himself and his students to hell.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 14th, 2011 at 10:27 PM

Title: Re: Madyamika Sautrantika vs Prasangika

Content:

catmoon said:

I wonder tho, if I start digging into Prasangika-Madhyamaka, is that going to throw me into conflict with my foundation in Gelug orthodoxy?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, since you will discover that gelug "prasanga" is not the "prasanga" of the founder of Prasanga, Batsab Nyima Drag.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 14th, 2011 at 10:20 PM

Title: Re: Reasons for Conventional Reality

Content:

Tsongkhapafan said:

Conventional reality has gross and subtle aspects. The gross nature of conventional truth can be established by valid cognition as explained by Dignaga and Dharmakirti (this is very important) because forms such as our body are objects of valid minds and they perform the functions they appear to possess.

Malcolm wrote:

No, it can't. All conventional truths are objects of mistaken cognitions, per Candrakirti.

Tsongkhapafan said:

The subtle conventional reality, that is, form being a manifestation of emptiness can also be established by the same reasons that establish emptiness, since they are one nature.

Malcolm wrote:

See above.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 14th, 2011 at 9:09 PM

Title: Re: Dzogchen Monk?

Content:

wisdom said:

My only ambition in life is ... to be a spiritual teacher for others,

Namdrol said:

Big Ego Trip.

Best to give it up.

wisdom said:

Thanks Namdrol, this is sage advice.

Malcolm wrote:

The first principle is: anyone who thinks of being a teacher, must first understand there are many teachers superior to him or herself. So in this case, better to send prospective students to one's own or another teacher.

If in the end it turns out that someone really cannot enter the dharma without your help, then and only then is it really necessary for you to act as a teacher. Then it does not become an ego trip.

But even in this case, if you do not have sufficient knowledge, understanding and practical experience, you really cannot help others, you will only harm them.

In this case, it is better not to teach, even if there are no other teachers available.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 14th, 2011 at 6:50 AM

Title: Re: Own-being cannot be cognized

Content:

Kyosan said:

I disagree that phenomena cannot be perceived.

Malcolm wrote:

He is saying there are no phenomena qua phenomena, rather, there are only appearances.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 14th, 2011 at 6:49 AM

Title: Re: Own-being cannot be cognized

Content:

norman said:

" Form itself does not possess the own-being of form, etc. Perfect wisdom does not possess the mark (of being) 'perfect wisdom.' A mark does not possess the own-being of a mark. The marked does not possess the own-being of being marked, and own-being does not possess the mark of [being] own-being. "

- Prajnaparamita in 8000 lines

"Own-being" is therefore not cognizable as an object of thought.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, it can be an object of thought as an abstraction i.e. as a mere name. But a svabhāva cannot be perceived since there is no such thing.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 14th, 2011 at 6:34 AM

Title: Re: Buddhism on God

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Jungian Archetype thingy in my opinion is basically metaphysical nonsense.

Lhug-Pa said:

Nice^^^

Padma Norbu

Hm I remember reading where Vajranatha wrote that:

<http://vajranatha.com/teaching/Simhamukha.htm> "
onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

You may not agree with Vajranatha, but his and some other's exploring of these kinds of cross-cultural connections is far from "ridiculous" or "bologna".

Don't really want to debate it right now though.

May you achieve Omniscience through Dharma practice, and know if these things are true or not through direct-experience (Gnosis).

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 14th, 2011 at 5:56 AM

Title: Re: Commie scums and capitalist pigs!!!

Content:

Acchantika said:

Economic Left/Right: -6.38

Social Libertarian/Authoritarian: -8.05

Fight the power, man.

" If you're not liberal when you're young, you have no heart.

If you're not conservative when you're old, you have no brain." ~ Anonymous

Namdrol said:

Winston Churchill.

Acchantika said:

" There is no record of anyone hearing Churchill say this. "

~ <http://www.winstonchurchill.org/learn/speeches/quotations/quotes-falsely-attributed>
" The phrase originated with Francois Guisot (1787-1874): "Not to be a republican at twenty is proof of want of heart; to be one at thirty is proof of want of head." It was revived by French Premier Georges Clemenceau (1841-1929): "Not to be a socialist at twenty is proof of want of heart; to be one at thirty is proof of want of head. "

~ https://en.wikiquote.org/wiki/List_of_misquotations "
onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;
Sorry old chap.

Malcolm wrote:

Hey, blame my dad -- he was the one that communicated it to me.

Incidentally, this does not mean that Churchill did not repeat it himself.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 14th, 2011 at 5:16 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen Community of Chogyal Namkhai Norbu

Content:

mantrika said:

Is there also a practice text available for Nyangyud Khorva Dongtruk?

Malcolm wrote:

not yet

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 14th, 2011 at 5:13 AM

Title: Re: Buddhism on God

Content:

KevinSolway said:

The Buddha had the right idea, for when he criticized things like "the All", for example, he would qualify it as "the All as a phenomena". And then he would explain the errors associated with the idea of "the All as a phenomena".

Malcolm wrote:

He did -- there is such a sutta.

"Monks, I will teach you the All as a phenomenon to be abandoned. Listen & pay close attention. I will speak."

"As you say, lord," the monks responded.

The Blessed One said, "And which All is a phenomenon to be abandoned? The eye is to be abandoned. [1] Forms are to be abandoned. Consciousness at the eye is to be abandoned. Contact at the eye is to be abandoned. And whatever there is that arises in dependence on contact at the eye — experienced as pleasure, pain or neither-pleasure-nor-pain — that too is to be abandoned.

"The ear is to be abandoned. Sounds are to be abandoned...

"The nose is to be abandoned. Aromas are to be abandoned...

"The tongue is to be abandoned. Flavors are to be abandoned...

"The body is to be abandoned. Tactile sensations are to be abandoned...

"The intellect is to be abandoned. Ideas are to be abandoned. Consciousness at the intellect is to be abandoned. Contact at the intellect is to be abandoned. And whatever there is that arises in dependence on contact at the intellect — experienced as pleasure, pain or neither-pleasure-nor-pain — that too is to be abandoned.

"This is called the All as a phenomenon to be abandoned."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 14th, 2011 at 5:07 AM

Title: Re: Commie scums and capitalist pigs!!!

Content:

Acchantika said:

Economic Left/Right: -6.38

Social Libertarian/Authoritarian: -8.05

Fight the power, man.

" If you're not liberal when you're young, you have no heart.

If you're not conservative when you're old, you have no brain." ~ Anonymous

Malcolm wrote:

Winston Churchill.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 14th, 2011 at 3:16 AM

Title: Re: Buddhism on God

Content:

deepbluehum said:

You don't think the idea of Jesus as bodhisattva or Buddha is interesting?

Silly.

KevinSolway said:

So you think the Dalai Lama is silly?

It's very unusual on forums such as these for anyone to say a bad word against the Dalai Lama.

Malcolm wrote:

I think HHDL understands that the word bodhisattva has come to mean "compassionate person", and that is all.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 14th, 2011 at 3:15 AM

Title: Re: Buddhism on God

Content:

Namdrol said:

If someone should assert brahmin as an ultimate truth, it means they have not understood even a single word of the Buddha's teaching, let alone have any realization whatsoever.

KevinSolway said:

Buddhists do not get to define the meaning of words from other traditions. I mean that you can certainly define the word "Brahman" to mean something other than "Ultimate Truth" if you want to. You can even define it to be a tea-cup if you want to. But it is pointless to do so, since others have their own meaning for the term, which has nothing to do with the meaning you are giving to it.

Malcolm wrote:

You misunderstand -- if Hindus define brahmin as an ultimate truth, that definition will never be accepted by Buddhists. Such a person who defines brahmin as ultimate in any way, shape or form is not a Buddhist.

For Hindus atman and brahman are interchangeable.

What I am telling you is not that Buddhists are redefining brahman -- instead I am telling that we reject the Hindu ideas about what is ultimate entirely. What they consider ultimate, we consider to be a non-existent, an imputation, a false thought.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 14th, 2011 at 3:10 AM

Title: Re: Commie scums and capitalist pigs!!!

Content:

gregkavarnos said:
there it is ladies and gentlemen our very first dharmawheel +/+.

Will said:
And probably the only one - you silly people.

Malcolm wrote:
We need a token conservative around here.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Monday, November 14th, 2011 at 2:55 AM
Title: Re: Buddhism on God
Content:
Kunga Lhadzom said:
When something that is read is also comprehended, you are the same as the one that wrote it.

KevinSolway said:
There are many different levels of comprehension. And there is also zero comprehension, which is more far more common than people imagine.

The understanding of Brahman, <https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Brahman>, requires an exceptional type of comprehension that isn't found in everyone.

Malcolm wrote:
Brahmin is not an ultimate truth for Buddhists. It is an ultimate truth for certain schools of Hindus.

If someone should assert brahmin as an ultimate truth, it means they have not understood even a single word of the Buddha's teaching, let alone have any realization whatsoever.

N

Author: Malcolm
Date: Monday, November 14th, 2011 at 2:53 AM
Title: Re: Buddhism on God
Content:
Namdrol said:
You don't think the idea of Jesus as bodhisattva or Buddha is interesting?
Nope, pretty boring. But then I was never baptized and was not raised in a Christian household.

KevinSolway said:

Well I think that the recognition of a bodhisattva, and the recognition of a whole new Dharma teaching, is very significant.

Malcolm wrote:

I don't. I don't even think that is what is happening.

KevinSolway said:

While I respect your book learning, I don't believe you have anything more than book-learning regarding such matters. So I don't believe you are qualified to speak on the true nature of Brahman, or the Dharmakaya, etc. You can only repeat what you have read.

Malcolm wrote:

You are not the first person to make that error, nor the last.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 14th, 2011 at 2:20 AM

Title: Re: Buddhism on God

Content:

padma norbu said:

So far, it seems to me like all of these debates led by KevinSolway have been pointless. Other than the "mental rebirth" concept he introduced in the "Are Karma And Rebirth For Real?" thread, the rest have been about God, The All, Ultimate Truth and Dharmakaya... with no worthwhile point ever being made.

KevinSolway said:

You don't think the idea of Jesus as bodhisattva or Buddha is interesting?

Malcolm wrote:

Nope, pretty boring. But then I was never baptized and was not raised in a Christian household.

KevinSolway said:

Or the similarities between the Hindu "Brahman" and the Dharmakaya?

Malcolm wrote:

There are no similarties— I can say that because I have studied Vedanta, Advaita, Vistadvaita, and so on quite thoroughly.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 14th, 2011 at 1:28 AM

Title: Re: Buddhism on God

Content:

padma norbu said:

So far, it seems to me like all of these debates led by KevinSolway have been pointless. Other than the "mental rebirth" concept he introduced in the "Are Karma And Rebirth For Real?" thread, the rest have been about God, The All, Ultimate Truth and Dharmakaya... with no worthwhile point ever being made.

Malcolm wrote:

Most of the conversations on the internet are pointless.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 14th, 2011 at 1:20 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen Community of Chogyal Namkhai Norbu

Content:

Fa Dao said:

oops, almost forgot...does the practice that Rinpoche gave last night work the same as Purification of the Six Lokas?

Malcolm wrote:

It is similar.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 14th, 2011 at 1:10 AM

Title: Re: Wine and Meat Offerings?

Content:

Fa Dao said:

Im glad this was brought up. I am still struggling with this. Does anyone know if Shabkar Lama participated in Ganapujas?

Malcolm wrote:

He did.

Ganapujas are about going beyind limitations.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 14th, 2011 at 1:06 AM

Title: Re: Buddhism on God

Content:

deepbluehum said:

Quacks practicing without a license need to get ostracized publicly.

Malcolm wrote:

From experience, I can tell you that trying to maintain such standards on an internet board just leads to a world of conflict.

On the internet, everything is caveat emptor.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 14th, 2011 at 1:05 AM

Title: Re: Buddhism on God

Content:

deepbluehum said:

Brahma-Vishnu-Shiva trinity idea comes from Samkya philosophy and three gunas.

Buddhism has a long history of easily trouncing three gunas; perhaps you are not aware.

See Bodhicaryavatara.

Namdrol said:

Yes, however, they are also adopted into Buddhism via the Kalacakra tantra as well as the Samupta tantra.

N

deepbluehum said:

Just to keep this bit going: Three Gunas = Hinduism. Three gunas has not been adopted into legitimate Buddhism.

Malcolm wrote:

The three gunas (rnam gsum yon tan), sattva, rajas and tamas (snying stobs, rdul, mun) are discussed at length and used as important concepts in Kalacakra as well as some other Buddhist tantras.

It's just a simple fact. The way the three gunas are used in these tantras and their commentaries is very interesting.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 14th, 2011 at 12:32 AM

Title: Re: Commie scums and capitalist pigs!!!

Content:

Pero said:

Economic Left/Right: -8.00

Social Libertarian/Authoritarian: -4.82

So uhm, can someone explain to my uneducated self what this means?
I don't get these numbers.

Malcolm wrote:

It means you are junior tree-hugger.

The only reason my score was in the low -7s is that I did not put all strongly agree or disagree; some were only agree, disagree, since they were questions I do not have strong feelings about.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 14th, 2011 at 12:27 AM

Title: Re: Buddhism on God

Content:

deepbluehum said:

All you are is a self-appointed savant.

Malcolm wrote:

That applies to us all.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, November 13th, 2011 at 11:10 PM

Title: Re: Occupy wall street

Content:

tobes said:

In this sense, neoliberalism is profoundly totalitarian. It does not tolerate dissent, and is brazen in its contempt for anything genuinely democratic.

Malcolm wrote:

Indeed, unlike totalitarian regimes, the "free-market" neo-liberal corporations blackmail nations into suppressing dissent for them.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, November 13th, 2011 at 10:27 PM

Title: Re: The Dharmakaya. The Truth Body.

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

According Vasubandhu, the meaning of dhātu is mine i.e. source.

The definition Tibetans (such as Longchenpa and Jetsun Dragpa Gyaltsen) give for dbying is dbyung gnas i.e. source. The proper, though clumsy translation, of dharmadhātu i.e. chos kyi dbying in a Mahāyāna context therefore, is "source of phenomena".

In Abhidharma dharmadhātu means the object of the mind, comprised all mental factors as well as three unconditioned phenomena. To distinguish this Abhidharma concept of dharmadhātu the Tibetans translate it as chos kyi kham i.e. element of phenomena.

deepbluehum said:

Honestly, I do not ascribe to those descriptions. It's a lot of poetry only, mostly based on faulty translations of faulty Abhidharma analyses (making the basic subjects far more complicated and abstract than they need to be), that have in turn given rise to entirely faulty traditions. But you can look at the early suttas yourself to see how the Buddha used the words dharma, dhatu and ayatana.

(Mula Sutta)

<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/an/an10/an10.058.than.html> "
onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

(Dhatu Sutta)

<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn25/sn25.009.than.html> "
onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

(Sabba Sutta)

<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn35/sn35.023.than.html> "
onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

"Space of Phenomena" is a bad translation of dharmadhatu. Then one gets into a whole bunch of stuff about space and yoga, which in my opinion is on a wrong track. I am a Vajrayana practitioner mind you, so I am not discounting the power of the path of methods.

padma norbu said:

You should be a guru then, no? It seems to me your understanding must be beyond those of the teacher you follow if you are a vajrayana practitioner.

deepbluehum said:

I cannot stress enough, one must clearly understand what "a dharma" is in Buddhist terms. This will clear up a lot. If you know in simple and clear terms what "a dharma" is, then what a "dharmakaya" or a "dharmadhatu" is will be very clear. There is no dharma apart from perception and cognition. So right there you are Xing out "outer" phenomena such as space. Also there is no such thing as "intrinsic awareness" in Buddhism, so there is no "inner space" either. Light touches the retina (phassa) and the brain constructs an image (vinnana); the mind says "this is X" (namarupa). You get some feeling (vedana) of pleasure or pain, and love or hate it (upadana), which makes you want to do something about it (tanha). In other words, 12-links is the dharmadhatu/dharmakaya. There is no "dharma" apart from 12-links, so how could there be a "dharmadhatu" or a "dharmakaya" that is something else either? Not knowing this is avidya. Knowing this is vidya (wisdom).

padma norbu said:

"Like space" is not the same as space. "Space of Phenomena" is not talking about actual space. It is likened to space because, what else could you compare it to? All the analogies, such as the crystal ball, the mirror, the sun and space are just analogies, and always explained as such.

Despite what you have just said, I see no error in the Vajrayana definitions which was supposedly pointed out in the suttas you linked. If "dharmadhatu" is exactly the same as "dharmakaya," why did he use two terms? And why are all the Tibetan gurus apparently not as knowledgeable in the matter as you are?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, November 13th, 2011 at 10:02 PM

Title: Re: Buddhism on God

Content:

KevinSolway said:

I am the Buddha of the Internet.

Malcolm wrote:

All your dharma are belong to us....

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, November 13th, 2011 at 9:57 PM

Title: Re: Dzogchen Monk?

Content:

wisdom said:

My only ambition in life is ... to be a spiritual teacher for others,

Malcolm wrote:

Big Ego Trip.

Best to give it up.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, November 13th, 2011 at 9:54 PM

Title: Re: Commie scums and capitalist pigs!!!

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Economic Left/Right: -7.75

Social Libertarian/Authoritarian: -7.08

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, November 13th, 2011 at 4:16 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen Community of Chogyal Namkhai Norbu

Content:

Lhug-Pa said:

Aw well the schedule said 10 - 12AM, so unless it were a 14 hour webcast, one would assume that 10PM to 12AM was meant. But that's why I sent an email asking about it. Eh... like I said, since no one responded, I should have gotten up early just in case. Well, if I get my Dzogchen Community membership-password soon, I can still watch it before the live Anniversary Transmission Webcast on the 20th.

And I'd actually purchased a copy of the Song of the Vajra book on Amazon.com a couple weeks ago. Although I didn't read it yet, and didn't intend to until after having started practice. So it's sitting on my altar right now. I figured if there's a restricted book floating around on Amazon, if someone is going to get it it might as well be me, since I knew I'll treat it with respect. Maybe that's only pride and false justification though. But what's done is done. At least it's ready to be studied as soon as Receiving the Transmission.

Malcolm wrote:

Transmission comes along with doing Guru Yoga with Rinpoche. So tune in tomorrow morning, three am your time.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, November 13th, 2011 at 3:12 AM

Title: Re: Lama Dawa Rinpoche Live Webcast 19-20 November

Content:

catmoon said:

Is this the same Lama Dawa that does the divinations?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, November 13th, 2011 at 3:08 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen Community of Chogyal Namkhai Norbu

Content:

Lhug-Pa said:

Thanks Pero, Namdrol and Fa Dao

Namdrol, do you mean that the Guru Yoga Transmission Webcaste actually was early this morning in the USA time zones!?

Here's the body of an email I sent but didn't get any response:

To be sure, the next few days of the Guru Yoga Webcaste of Chogyal Namkhai Norbu Rinpoche from Tenerife are from 10PM to 12AM GMT?

Just want to make sure that 10AM - 12 was not meant by chance.

I'm in the Rocky Mountain timezone so figured that according to the Tenerife retreat schedule, it would be at 3PM here today.

Well it would be my fault for not getting up before 3AM just in case....

Malcolm wrote:

No, three am.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, November 13th, 2011 at 2:25 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen Community of Chogyal Namkhai Norbu

Content:

Lhug-Pa said:

Okay so what I meant is, since the Direct Introduction is as you say the meaning of the Four Empowerments, that we are Receiving not only the Four Empowerments of Vajrayana by default, but also the very essence and meaning of them?

About Dzogchen Samaya: So then it goes back to what I'd said at first, that we basically only have one Samaya, that is, to remain in Awareness of the Natural State, but also with Awareness of that by remaining in this Presence or Awareness we are eliminating or better said Self-Liberating the poisons/afflictions (i.e. kleshas, klistas, vasanas, samskaras, etc.) that obscure or cause us to have deluded perception of our Body, Speech, and Mind?

Another critical question:

If, in attending a Transmission, our minds are suffering afflictions at the moment of the Direct Introduction, we would most likely not recognize the Natural State at that moment? So in this case would the 'seed still be planted' so to speak, so that we could proceed with Rushen or Semdzin practice as to recognize that 'seed'? Or in such a case would it better to—instead of proceeding to practice Dzogchen—wait for another Transmission and in the meantime practice Shamatha/Zhine so that the next time we attend a Transmission our consciousness is more ripe for being simultaneous with the Guru's Pointing Out of the Natural State at the moment of Direct Introduction to the Nature of Mind?

Thank you.

Malcolm wrote:

You need to listen to this morning's talk again. Also you should get and read the Song of the Vajra book, which is Rinpoche's best general explanation of Dzogchen anywhere.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, November 13th, 2011 at 2:21 AM

Title: Re: Buddhism on God

Content:

deepbluehum said:

Brahma-Vishnu-Shiva trinity idea comes from Samkya philosophy and three gunas. Buddhism has a long history of easily trouncing three gunas; perhaps you are not aware. See Bodhicaryavatara.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, however, they are also adopted into Buddhism via the Kalacakra tantra as well as the Samupta tantra.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, November 13th, 2011 at 2:20 AM

Title: Re: 100 Syllable Mantra SUPO KAYO ME BHAVA

Content:

dakini_boi said:

so how would using those characters have prevented Tibetans from pronouncing the Sankrit with tonal alterations?

Malcolm wrote:

training.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, November 12th, 2011 at 11:57 PM

Title: Re: Dzogchen Community of Chogyal Namkhai Norbu

Content:

Lhug-Pa said:

When we Receive the Introduction to the Natural State and Nature of Mind, I take it that the Four Empowerments of Vajrayana are included in It (?)

And if the Guru doesn't explain during the Teaching the Samaya(s) that comes with that Transmission, do we go ahead with just the one Samaya of remaining in the Natural State from moment to moment?

Or does Receiving the Dzogchen Transmission, without explanation of which Samaya(s) come with the Transmission, automatically imply the 28 Samayas of Dzogchen and/or the four Samayas of Trekchö and Thögal? (Which are listed in Enlightened Journey by Tulku Thondup)

(Of course the Samayas of Thögal wouldn't apply until we're actually at the level of Thögal)

Malcolm wrote:

,

Direct introduction is the mother of all empowerments, or so it is said. It does not contain all four empowerments. It is the meaning of the four empowerments.

As ChNN says, the principle is not empowerment and then vows; the principle is introduction and then maintaining. It does not mean you have no samaya. You do. But it is basically boils down to the body, speech and mind samayas common to Nyingma.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, November 12th, 2011 at 9:42 PM

Title: Re: Dzogchen Community of Chogyal Namkhai Norbu

Content:

Nangwa said:

You get used to the accent.

ChNN's accent is actually very light in comparison.

mint said:

It's not just the accent; the accent I can work with, maybe. It's his phrasing, the stop/start of needing to be translated, the stop/start of poor buffering, etc. It's extremely difficult to comprehend such deep subject matter with such distractions. I seriously have yet to understand a single concept he's tried to convey yet because I don't know what concepts he's trying to convey.

Malcolm wrote:

Keep listening and reading.

It is not that complicated. You have a primordial state. You don't know what it is. This is how to discover it.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, November 12th, 2011 at 1:10 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen Community of Chogyal Namkhai Norbu

Content:

Lhug-Pa said:

Thanks Namdrol. I may address this more later....

For now though, it looks like today's Webcast is audio only?

Will the Transmission on the 20th be audio and video?

Malcolm wrote:

I have video

<http://www.shangshunginstitute.net/webcast/video.php> "
onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;"

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 11th, 2011 at 11:16 PM

Title: Re: Buddhism on God

Content:

Namdrol said:
Buddhists just don't see it that way.

KevinSolway said:
It's possible that the Brahma in the Buddhist scriptures has a completely different meaning than it has in other religious traditions. But it certainly makes it confusing if the Buddha used words in his teaching that borrow from other religious traditions, but used them with a different meaning.

Malcolm wrote:
The Buddha does this all the time. For example, he terms a brahmin someone who is very virtuous; not someone from a particular family.

Mahāpitṛ Brahma (the one that is held to be the creator, so called the Brahma the great ancestor), in Buddhist texts, is understood to consider himself as the creator of the universe, but the Buddha personally ridicules him for this conceit in several places. The Buddha taught that the universe has no creator.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Friday, November 11th, 2011 at 9:24 PM
Title: Re: Buddhism on God
Content:
padma norbu said:
It's interesting how KevinSolway still does not get that dharmakaya is a state.

KevinSolway said:
I have no idea how you get to that conclusion from the fact that the Brahma of the Buddhist scriptures is an aspect of Brahman, the Supreme Godhead

Malcolm wrote:
Buddhists just don't see it that way. We don't accept the existence of brahman at all. In fact, we explicitly reject it as eternalism.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Friday, November 11th, 2011 at 8:55 PM
Title: Re: How Many Transmissions?
Content:
wisdom said:
How many transmissions can a Dzogchen student receive?
Should one strive to receive transmission from as many Gurus as possible when the opportunity arises?
Also assuming that you receive transmission from a Guru who is very busy and travels, how does one know when/how to progress with teachings when the teacher might be practically inaccessible due to traveling and having hundreds or thousands of students?

Malcolm wrote:
Limitless.

That depends on you. I have received teachings from perhaps forty gurus. Most of them Nyingma. I received Dzogchen transmission from seven of them. Three of them I am close to and have received many transmissions from. One is my primary root guru, Chogyal Namkhai Norbu, though in reality for me they are all Vajrasattva, but in the end, I am a Dzogchen Community person.

Rely on your vajra brothers and sisters. They will help you.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 11th, 2011 at 8:47 PM

Title: Re: Dzogchen Community of Chogyal Namkhai Norbu

Content:

Namdrol said:

The Buddhist counterpart is called "demarcating the boundaries" also known as the protection cakra. It is generally done at the beginning of more elaborate practices.

Lhug-Pa said:

Is there any direct relation at all between the practices of Vajrakilaya or Guru Tragphur and Demarcating the Boundaries/Protection Chakra?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, in some types of lower tantra, kīlas are used to establish boundaries.

Namdrol said:

In Dzogchen, rig pa is the ultimate protection cakra, obviating the need for any explicit rites of protection.

This I do not doubt at all; although for reference, will you please cite any sources for this?

Malcolm wrote:

The protection cakra section of many anuyoga level sadhanas make this point.

Namdrol said:

I suggest you follow Dzogchen as a path unto itself and leave off all this other metaphysical/esoteric stuff. Eventually, it will just be so much dead weight. No need to carry it around.

That seems to be the general consensus around here.

And I agree with it to an extent. However I've addressed this in the "Rushen Preliminaries of Bönpo Dzogchen" thread.

Malcolm wrote:
Who needs anything other than the stainless teaching of the Buddha and Garab Dorje?
The rest is all just a distraction.

Studying Crowley led me to Dharma. But I don't spend much time at all thinking about or referencing Crowley and Thelema and so on. For me, it is obsolete. Likewise, the whole western esoteric tradition with its Qabala, godforms, masonic roots, tarot and so on is obsolete for me. Once I gave myself to the Dharma, these things just became irrelevant.

Your time would be better spent on getting a handle on the five major and minor sciences, the study of Abhidharma and so on. At least this is directly connected with the teachings.

N

Best Regards[/quote]

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 11th, 2011 at 6:09 AM

Title: Re: Democracy in the country that gave birth to democracy

Content:

kirtu said:

Perhaps you do not recognize homelessness. No one out on the street has asked you for money?

<http://www.coalitionforthehomeless.org/pages/basic-facts>

Kirt

alwayson said:

If you are using that criterion, I have seen some in America.

But all countries will have that. You can't do anything about it.

Malcolm wrote:

All countries do not have homelessness.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 11th, 2011 at 6:00 AM

Title: Re: Democracy in the country that gave birth to democracy

Content:

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

Yeah well hey if that's what you mean by point by point I can understand why you think it would be tedious bullshit.

Malcolm wrote:

The point by point thing is tedious because basically, the libertarian party will never gain power in this country.

We can agree that there is no way a third party will be a relevant force in American politics. You think it is because of "entitlement" programs and so on.

I think it is because corporations have their hands too deep in American politics and that so called free market thinking has been systematically destroying the middle class in America, a middle class that was birthed and grown under a Keynesian model.

I see the headlong rush of the rest of the world's economies to follow our example to be folly unparalleled.

Instead of increased centralization and more policies that favor growth and expansion, we need to do a global about face, reduce world populations, etc.

You know the drill.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 11th, 2011 at 5:20 AM

Title: Re: Democracy in the country that gave birth to democracy

Content:

always on said:

Where are the impoverished masses resorting to cannibalism?

Like I said before, most "poor" people in America have air conditioning, a fridge, XBOX 360, DVD player, flat screens etc.

Malcolm wrote:

Gadgets bought on credit cards are not wealth.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 11th, 2011 at 5:14 AM

Title: Re: Democracy in the country that gave birth to democracy

Content:

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

Hence all the armies, navies and fighter jets with Starbucks, Canon, Macy's, IBM, Microsoft, Merck, etc, logos on them. Check.

Malcolm wrote:

Only a matter of time.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 11th, 2011 at 5:12 AM

Title: Re: Democracy in the country that gave birth to democracy

Content:

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

Hence all the armies, navies and fighter jets with Starbucks, Canon, Macy's, IBM, Microsoft, Merck, etc, logos on them. Check.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, had you studied history, you would have read about the Marine General, who upon retiring, detailed all the American adventures in Central America and elsewhere that he fought for Dole, etc.

Or the perhaps you recall the Allende government that was undermined by the CIA because Allende was going to nationalize the mines. ALCOA had a hand in that and benefitted mightly.

I could do on. The fact is that we do engage in military adventures precisely to benefit US corporations. Now that we have international corporations, we use NATO.

Lockheed Martin would be the logo you are thinking of, BTW.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 11th, 2011 at 5:04 AM

Title: Re: Democracy in the country that gave birth to democracy

Content:

Namdrol said:

Also, at a certain point, the point by point becomes tedious bullshit.

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

Especially when you have all the answers. Got it.

Malcolm wrote:

Basically, I detest Ayn Rand. She was an evil bitch. She worshipped serial killers. Milton Friedman was her minion. Ron Paul named his kid Rand. Need I say more?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 11th, 2011 at 5:02 AM

Title: Re: Democracy in the country that gave birth to democracy

Content:

Namdrol said:

It would certainly result in less wars.

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

Oh ya and wars. Right. Cause Libertarians love wars. Like, you know, Ron Paul wants to stay in Iraq forever and thought it was a really good idea to invade. Right. Forgot. Sorry. Check check.

Malcolm wrote:

War is a result of unimpeded capitalism. Wars are fought because it is profitable. When libertarian capitalist see there is more profit in a war than in peace, they will go to war likely split.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 11th, 2011 at 5:00 AM

Title: Re: Democracy in the country that gave birth to democracy

Content:

Namdrol said:

You will be moved like cattle into large cities, warrens, really ...

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

Uh this already happened it was called the industrial revolution.

Oh yeah I forgot, cities. Cities bad. Calhoun's rats. Dark Satanic Mills. Cities bad. All that. Got it. Check. Roger.

Malcolm wrote:

Large cities are pretty horrible, most of them. They smell bad, they are polluted, people who live in them tend to be pretty stressed out.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 11th, 2011 at 4:56 AM

Title: Re: Democracy in the country that gave birth to democracy

Content:

Namdrol said:

They are all evil bastards.

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

So instead of using a computer made by a corporation, using a server run by a corporation over a phone line run by a corporation, using electricity produced by a corporation, generated by power administered by a corporation, from oil mined by a corporation, strip naked and wear a grass skirt and walk to me to deliver your messages to me on tree bark. That way I'd respect your outrage.

Malcolm wrote:

tried it, no one listened.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 11th, 2011 at 4:41 AM

Title: Re: Democracy in the country that gave birth to democracy

Content:

Namdrol said:

And yes, corporations are evil and they are basically sociopaths and serial killers.

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

That is the most paranoid, deranged, pathologically insane thing I have ever heard anyone say on these boards.

Malcolm wrote:

Funny you post that -- you really want me to go through the list of labor, environmental, health and so on abuses of the corporate groups that produce all those commodities?

Just take ALCOA -- it has one of the worst pollution records. In addition, The Brazilian government used Agent Orange to defoliate a large section of the Amazon rainforest so that Alcoa could build the Tucuruí dam to power mining operations. Large areas of rainforest were destroyed, along with the homes and livelihoods of thousands of rural peasants and indigenous tribes. They run terrible sweatshops Mexico and elsewhere:

<http://www.globallabourrights.org/reports?id=0220> "
onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

I could go on.

They are all evil bastards.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 11th, 2011 at 4:32 AM

Title: Re: Democracy in the country that gave birth to democracy

Content:

Namdrol said:

The middle class is all but dead.

alwayson said:

You are kidding me right?

Chill Namdrol....

Go to Best Buy or something. Play some Wii or Xbox 360.

Malcolm wrote:

Dude, you just don't get it -- Wii etc., cheap electronic gadgets are just crack to keep the increasingly impoverished masses passive, bovine and content.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 11th, 2011 at 4:29 AM

Title: Re: Democracy in the country that gave birth to democracy

Content:

Namdrol said:

Market transparency means transparency to corporations -- we know, that like their human counterparts, they don't give a frak about anything other than enriching themselves at the expense of others.

alwayson said:

Not again with corporations being evil.

Go to India where meat is so expensive.

Corporations allow Americans to maintain a middle class lifestyle on multiple levels.

Malcolm wrote:

And yes, corporations are evil and they are basically sociopaths and serial killers.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 11th, 2011 at 4:28 AM

Title: Re: Democracy in the country that gave birth to democracy

Content:

Namdrol said:

Market transparency means transparency to corporations -- we know, that like their human counterparts, they don't give a frak about anything other than enriching themselves at the expense of others.

alwayson said:

Not again with corporations being evil.

Go to India where meat is so expensive.

Corporations allow Americans to maintain a middle class lifestyle.

Malcolm wrote:

No, they don't. The middle class lifestyle is swiftly disappearing in the US? Why? Corporations and neo-liberalization of trade. Cost of living has been rising steadily against wages for years in the US. The middle class is all but dead.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 11th, 2011 at 4:04 AM

Title: Re: Democracy in the country that gave birth to democracy

Content:

gregkavarnos said:

Look at the American deficit, is that due to the socialist agendas of Americas political parties? NO!!!

alwayson said:

Is this supposed to be a joke?

43% (and exponentially increasing with population) of our debt in America is caused by socialistic entitlement programs such as Medicare and Social Security.

I mean, thats just fact.

Malcolm wrote:
NO, this is false.

Budget for 2011
$2.627 trillion (estimated) [1]

Total expenditures $3.729 trillion

There is a 1.101 trillion dollar deficit.

So, lets say we look at the numbers:

$553.0 billion (+0.7%) - Department of Defense
$118.0 billion (-26.0%) - Overseas Contingency Operations

Right there, you have 671 Billion. That is more than half of the deficit. All that military entitlement spending.

Medicare and Medicaid combined is like 754 Billion.

So, like most Rebuplicants, you want to keep the army and spend more money on it, but strip people of already inadequate health care.

SSI brings in $925 billion - Social Security and other payroll tax
It spends $761 billion

Looks to be like SSI pays for itself pretty damn well. Nothing socialist there.

The simplest thing to do, to pay for the whole thing is redistribute some wealth from the %1. Yes, raise taxes of rich people, since they are not creating an goddamned job and are just bloodsuckers, capitalist leeches.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 11th, 2011 at 3:52 AM

Title: Re: Democracy in the country that gave birth to democracy

Content:

gregkavarnos said:

Look at the American deficit, is that due to the socialist agendas of Americas political parties? NO!!!

alwayson said:

Is this supposed to be a joke?

Most of our debt in America is caused by socialistic entitlement programs such as Medicare and Social Security.

I mean, thats just fact.

Malcolm wrote:

These are not socialist programs, since people pay FICA out of their paychecks for them every week. We PAY for SS. Or did that little fact escape your attention.

The problem with our country is that there is no enough socialism in it; not that there is too much.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 11th, 2011 at 3:48 AM

Title: Re: Democracy in the country that gave birth to democracy

Content:

kirtu said:

The so-called neo-liberalism thing is almost certainly on the way out. Anyway, how can you actually expect a group of social democracies to support a version of laissez-faire capitalism + fixed markets in international trade? Or do you have another view of neo-liberalism?

Kirt

Malcolm wrote:

My view of neo-liberalism is that WTO type agreements have basically caught everyone in a neo-liberal free trade nightmare. Look at all the so alled "austerity" measures being enforced by banks on this and that country. International capital has become a more powerful force than national governments, which is the whole point and goal of the neo-liberal agenda from the beginning i.e. less regulation, more market transparency, weaker unions, more profits, etc.

I think neo-liberalism is more powerful than ever, not weaker.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 11th, 2011 at 3:35 AM

Title: Re: Buddhism on God

Content:

Virgo said:

I'll ask Robert Kirkpatrick because I remember discussing this with him in Thailand.

This is from wikipedia:

"Brahmā Sahampati, said to be the most senior of the Mahābrahmās, was the deity who invisibly attended on the Buddha when he attained enlightenment, and when the Buddha was meditating at Uruvelā afterwards, encouraged him to teach the Dharma to humans. According to some commentaries he was an anagami (non-returner),[2] one of the Śuddhāvāsa (Pure Abodes) deities. He was the rebirth of a monk named Sahaka, who had been in the Saṅgha of Kāśyapa Buddha.

Kevin

Malcolm wrote:

I just had a look around the bka' gyur and bstan 'gyur -- and it appears everywhere that Sahampati is listed with worldly gods such as Indra, the four guardians and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 11th, 2011 at 3:09 AM

Title: Re: Buddhism on God

Content:

Virgo said:

According to Theravada Commentaries, He (Brahma Sahampati) is actually an Anagami, having attained that stage under a past Buddha, and been reborn as a Brahma.

Malcolm wrote:

That's interesting. This is a commentarial difference. AFAIK, according to Sarvastivada, etc, beings can fall into five pure abodes from the arupyadhātu, which rules out their solely being locations of aryas. I will have to find out if Sahampati is considered an arya in Sarvastivada, since I don't know.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 11th, 2011 at 2:47 AM

Title: Re: Democracy in the country that gave birth to democracy

Content:

gregkavarnos said:

Look at the American deficit, is that due to the socialist agendas of Americas political parties? NO!!!

Malcolm wrote:
According to Faux news, yes.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Friday, November 11th, 2011 at 2:46 AM
Title: Re: Democracy in the country that gave birth to democracy
Content:
Namdrol said:
The Greek debt Crisis was caused by running large deficits

N

alwayson said:
You say large deficits.

I say socialism.

We are saying the same thing.

Malcolm wrote:
Deficits are a perfectly capitalist way of doing business. All governments run on debt.
They always have.

N

Author: Malcolm
Date: Thursday, November 10th, 2011 at 11:17 PM
Title: Re: Are women conscious?
Content:
Namdrol said:
... see past the end of their own dicks.

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:
For the third dang time, as an inveterate wanker I take offense to the dick slandery that goes on in this forum. I personally find my dick to lead to all kinds of upaya in the name of world peace.

Heeheehehehehehehehe!

Malcolm wrote:
I wasn't slandering dicks, I was pointing out the faults of myopia-- completely different.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 10th, 2011 at 11:11 PM

Title: Re: Democracy in the country that gave birth to democracy

Content:

Namdrol said:

It is time for the Euro to go.

N

Sönam said:

It's time for Euro to go federalism ... altogether, European countries have no problem and are strong. When one step is made to go "One World", also when at first it's made for business purpose, it's a positive step ...

Sönam

Malcolm wrote:

You will regret -- it would be better for European countries to return to their own currencies and dismantle the EU. The EU is actually a policy agenda of neo-liberalism.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 10th, 2011 at 11:09 PM

Title: Re: Are women conscious?

Content:

KevinSolway said:

Rousseau once said "Women, in general, are not attracted to art at all, nor knowledge, and not at all to genius".

Malcolm wrote:

Typical blind misogyny. Of course, if you like you can find many men whose thinking about the other sex is quite primitive and dismissive, since they cannot, in their myopia, see past the end of their own dicks.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 10th, 2011 at 11:07 PM

Title: Re: Are women conscious?

Content:

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

Before the mods ban you, I commend you. You have been running rings round everyone since you got here precisely because no one can apparently understand the fact that all of what you say is a JOKE.

Malcolm wrote:

KTD, sadly, it is not true. I first encountered Kevin and David Quinn on Buddha-l and Buddhist back in the 1990's. They have very persistent and consistent.

I don't think they are joking at all.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 10th, 2011 at 11:02 PM

Title: Re: Are women conscious?

Content:

Namdrol said:

Frankly, Kevin, to be blunt -- this is a very stupid way to put things. To say that male = consciousness and female = unconsciousness is plain stupid.

KevinSolway said:

I don't know how many of the people that have been participating in this "Dharma-free-for-all" forum, since I've been here, are physically female, but I strongly suspect that the number is no higher than one or two.

I run a Youtube channel about philosophy with almost 1,500 subscribers, only 3% of which are female, and of that 3% at least half a dozen of them are male-to-female transsexuals.

This lack of interest in philosophy, and lack of interest in the realm of ideas, by those who are physically female, is no coincidence.

How many female geniuses have there been throughout the whole of human history? None, so far as any thinking being can tell. Perhaps there are one or two who are marginal.

Malcolm wrote:

Kevin:

Has it ever occurred to you once that perhaps women's general lack of interest in your philosophy has to do with its misogynistic bent?

You see, I never participate in "philosophical" discussions of mysandrous feminsists.

What would be the point?

So why should women participate "philosophical" discussions of misogynists men?

Your imputation about female geniuses is very immature. There have been countless female geniuses in all fields. For example, the first computer program was written by Lovelace. Here is a short list compiled out of 4000 years of famous woman in science.

<http://www.astr.ua.edu/4000WS/timelist.shtml> "
onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

You are stuck, Kevin. Just accept it and move on. You are reading history through a thick lense of mysogyny.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 10th, 2011 at 10:11 PM

Title: Re: Are women conscious?

Content:

KevinSolway said:

It's a matter of consciousness vs unconsciousness.

Malcolm wrote:

Frankly, Kevin, to be blunt -- this is a very stupid way to put things. To say that male = consciousness and female = unconsciousness is plain stupid.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 10th, 2011 at 10:01 PM

Title: Re: "stress" in translations from Pali & Sanskrit

Content:

Aemilius said:

How does that word sound in your ear ?

Malcolm wrote:

Stupid. Effluent is better.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 10th, 2011 at 9:51 PM

Title: Re: Are women conscious?

Content:

Namdrol said:

Fortunately, this does apply to all Mahāyāna sutras, the episode with the Goddess of the Ganges being a pointed example:

KevinSolway said:

Even Hsuan Hua, the so-called "misogynist" relates the case of the dragon king's daughter:

"When Sariputra said that she could not become a Buddha, she took a precious gem, her most valuable and cherished possession, and offered it to the Buddha, who accepted it. She then asked Sariputra if the Buddha's acceptance of her offering was fast, and he replied that, indeed, it had been quick. "I shall become a Buddha that quickly," she said and then she became a Buddha. This is proof that women's lot is not hopeless. All they must do is resolve to cultivate courageously and they too can become Buddhas."

Malcolm wrote:

Not a perfect example. In the actual text of the sutra, the Saddharmapundrika, before the nāgā princess becomes a Buddha, she first transforms into a male bodhisattva and then becomes a Buddha.

KevinSolway said:

Different sutras are written for those of different capacity. Those with a misogynistic bent, are, from my perspective, written intending those of lower capacity i.e. men who suffer from mysogyny and woman who suffer at the hands of misogynistic men and wish to escape their "lower birth".

Your interpretation is mistaken. I haven't seen any sutras with a misogynistic bent. It takes but a single moment for a woman to be reborn as a man, provided the conditions are met.

Malcolm wrote:

You are a misogynist, so naturally you don't see these texts as being "misogynistic".

There is no reason why a woman should want to be a man, apart from men telling her that her state is inferior.

KevinSolway said:

Remember that rebirth is not about physical bodies, but mental ones. A woman does not require the physical form of a male to be reborn as male.

Malcolm wrote:

Rebirth is minds appropriating physical bodies, Kevin.

KevinSolway said:

The truth is that there is no such thing as gender in phenomena

You said yourself that different beings have different capacities. That is what we are talking about here. It's nothing to do with physical sex. A person with a woman's physical body can mentally be male. In that case she has been reborn as a man.

Malcolm wrote:

As I said, there is no reason why a woman would want to be any other gender than the one she possesses, the same for a man -- unless said person has transgender impulses.

In Buddhist texts, men are considered method, but woman, wisdom. Awakening comes about from uniting means and wisdom.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 10th, 2011 at 9:41 PM

Title: Re: Ultimate Truth

Content:

Sherab said:

Hi KevinSolway, I've a question for you:

The relative truth refers to all that is conditioned.

The ultimate truth refers to all that is unconditioned.

Malcolm wrote:

This fails the test of a basic syllogism:

All that is unconditioned is ultimate truth;

space is unconditioned;

space is ultimate truth.

Your statement is therefore false because space is definitely not an ultimate truth.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 10th, 2011 at 9:37 PM

Title: Re: Are women conscious?

Content:

padma norbu said:

So, Namdrol, do women have the 5 poisons, then? Or not? While it was traditional in Buddhism due to cultural circumstances and implications to find a male human birth most favorable, is there anything to suggest women are not conscious?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, women are sentient beings, obviously, and they have three or five poisons. No, there is nothing to suggest in traditional literature that women are not conscious, indeed, there were many female arhats during the time of the Buddha and later; not to mention female bodhisattvas and Buddhas.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 10th, 2011 at 9:34 PM

Title: Re: Buddhism on God

Content:

catmoon said:

Source please.

KevinSolway said:

Before I go looking up sources, consider this for a moment: Do you honestly think that the Buddha, after having achieved his Great Awakening, is going to take advice from a deluded being? I think not. By commonsense alone we know that the Brahma that the Buddha confers with is no samsaric being.

Malcolm wrote:

The Buddha accepts requests from samsaric beings, as in this case. By definition, any being defined as a deva is samsaric since they belong to the three realms. It is not possible for brahmas to enter the Buddhist path, actually. The path of awakening is open only to human beings. While it is true that there are devas who are arhats, they must have become stream enterers, once-returners or never returners as human beings in their previous births. It is nowhere indicated that this brahma was in fact an arya.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 10th, 2011 at 9:31 PM

Title: Re: Buddhism on God

Content:

Namdrol said:

The only reason why Brahma thought he created the universe is that he was the first being to take rebirth in the brahmaloka. When other beings popped out after him, he convinced them he was the creator since he himself did not know where he had come from.

KevinSolway said:

You are speaking of a lower form of Brahma. The highest form of Brahma, to whom the Buddha himself turned for advice upon his awakening, is identical with Brahman.

Malcolm wrote:

No, Kevin, you are clearly mistaken on this point.

"Then Brahma Sahampati, having known with his own awareness the line of thinking in the Blessed One's awareness, thought: "The world is lost! The world is destroyed! The mind of the Tathagata, the Arahant, the Rightly Self-awakened One inclines to dwelling at ease, not to teaching the Dhamma!" Then, just as a strong man might extend his flexed arm or flex his extended arm, Brahma Sahampati disappeared from the Brahma-world and reappeared in front of the Blessed One. Arranging his upper robe over one shoulder, he knelt down with his right knee on the ground, saluted the Blessed One with his hands before his heart, and said to him: "Lord, let the Blessed One teach the Dhamma! Let the One-Well-Gone teach the Dhamma! There are beings with little dust in their eyes who are falling away because they do not hear the Dhamma. There will be those who will understand the Dhamma."

<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn06/sn06.001.than.html> "
onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

This Brahma is not the so called "ancestor Brahma". In fact there are many Brahmas, since brahma is a class of deva, and not a single deva. This brahma is just a brahma in the brahmaloka.

So you are conflating these things a bit. It can be a bit confusing, I know, but patience and attention to detail is required to properly understand Buddhism and its context within Indian religion as a whole.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 10th, 2011 at 9:16 PM

Title: Re: Are women conscious?

Content:

Namdrol said:

How does this thread have anything to do with Buddhism?

KevinSolway said:

Amongst the writings and Buddhist quotations provided in this topic you will find much information and resources for those women who want to be reborn as men, as well as for those who want to be reborn in realms where there are no women at all. That is one of the subjects covered in the Earth-store bodhisattva sutra.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, I am aware that within Mahāyāna sutras there is some pointed misogyny.

Fortunately, this does apply to all Mahāyāna sutras, the episode with the Goddess of the Ganges being a pointed example:

Sariputra: Goddess, what prevents you from transforming yourself out of your female state?

Goddess: Although I have sought my "female state" for these twelve years, I have not yet found it. Reverend Sariputra, if a magician were to incarnate a woman by magic, would you ask her, "What prevents you from transforming yourself out of your female state?"

Sariputra: No! Such a woman would not really exist, so what would there be to transform?

Goddess: Just so, reverend Sariputra, all things do not really exist. Now, would you think, "What prevents one whose nature is that of a magical incarnation from transforming herself out of her female state?"

Thereupon, the goddess employed her magical power to cause the elder Sariputra to appear in her form and to cause herself to appear in his form. Then the goddess, transformed into Sariputra, said to Sariputra, transformed into a goddess, "Reverend Sariputra, what prevents you from transforming yourself out of your female state?"

And Sariputra, transformed into the goddess, replied, "I no longer appear in the form of a male! My body has changed into the body of a woman! I do not know what to transform!"

The goddess continued, "If the elder could again change out of the female state, then all women could also change out of their female states. All women appear in the form of women in just the same way as the elder appears in the form of a woman. While they are not women in reality, they appear in the form of women. With this in mind, the Buddha said, 'In all things, there is neither male nor female.'"

Different sutras are written for those of different capacity. Those with a misogynistic bent, are, from my perspective, written intending those of lower capacity i.e. men who suffer from misogyny and women who suffer at the hands of misogynistic men and wish to escape their "lower birth".

KevinSolway said:

Kevin is entitled to his mysogeny.

Malcolm wrote:

Truth is not misogyny. Are you saying that all those great Buddhist minds, and perhaps even the Buddha, were misogynists?

Was the author of "The Ultimate Extinction of the Dharma Sutra" a misogynist?

[/quote]

The truth is that there is no such thing as gender in phenomena, as we see from the above exchange between the Goddess and Sariputra. Gender is an imputation.

Many great Buddhist minds seem to have suffered from a culturally embedded mysogeny, yes.

But not the Buddha himself. Why? Because he had many female arhats among his disciples, as well as some teachers, such as Dhammadinna, whose sermons may be found in the Majjhima Nikaya, quite extensive as well.

When Ananda convinced the Buddha to ordain women, while it is true that when the Buddha ordained women, he predicted it would shorten the duration of the his Dharma; it is also true that the Buddha predicted that the ordination of women would cause the Dharma to spread much wider. So all that exchanged was a bit of length for increased width. And we can understand here that what he was really referring to the ordained Sangha. Such teachings as Dzogchen are not under the same restrictions as Vinaya and lower sutrayāna.

In short, you are cherry picking citations to support your views -- you are not presenting a balanced picture, presenting both negative and positive representations of women in Buddhist texts.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 10th, 2011 at 8:54 PM

Title: Re: Buddhism on God

Content:

catmoon said:

If we are talking about God the Father, God the Creator, God the Omniscient, Omnipresent and Omnipotent, Buddhism dismisses him as fiction.

KevinSolway said:

Buddhism doesn't dismiss Brahma the Omnipotent Creator, who convinced the Buddha to share his wisdom with others.

What makes you think that God is any different to Brahma (ultimately Brahman)?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, the Buddha does. The only reason why Brahma thought he created the universe is that he was the first being to take rebirth in the brahmaloka. When other beings popped out after him, he convinced them he was the creator since he himself did not know where he had come from.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 10th, 2011 at 8:28 PM

Title: Re: Democracy in the country that gave birth to democracy

Content:

catmoon said:

Now outside of Greece, Italy and Spain, governments are not completely stupid. Aware of the fact that high debt is an unstable situation, they limit debt to avoid the above nightmare scenario. But they still want to be able to buy votes, so they skate as close to the edge of disaster as they think they can get away with. This time, it isn't working, because of a new factor.

Malcolm wrote:

The debt situation of each of these three countries is completely different and independent.

The Spanish debt crisis was caused by a building bubble that collapsed -- basically, very similar to the US.

The Greek debt Crisis was caused by running large deficits, which caused their bonds to give yields as high as %15 (meaning they are very risky).

The Italian debt crisis is being caused by rising yields on Italian bonds, which means that borrowing costs for the Italian government is rising too high to make it easy for them to borrow. Typically, when bond yields rise above %7 they become riskier. This is not happening because the Italians want this to happen, it is happening because of poorly regulated financial markets putting pressure on the price of Italian debt.

US exposure to all of this debt comes in the form of CDS -- invented by Wall Street.

It is time for the Euro to go.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 10th, 2011 at 8:09 PM

Title: Re: Democracy in the country that gave birth to democracy

Content:

catmoon said:

Who is responsible? We are. We demand education for free, we demand unemployment insurance, we demand the most expensive medical treatments, we demand high wages, we demand military supremacy, and as a direct result governments go into debt to meet those demands.

tobes said:

Totally disagree. The responsibility lies with the finance sector and the finance sector alone. They pushed for radical deregulations in the 70's & 80's. They resisted every attempt to re-regulate - and still resist, despite the catastrophe of the GFC mark 1. They are the ones who have made tremendous, startling, amazing profits over these few decades, whilst industries which actually make real stuff have bled dry....

Malcolm wrote:

Here, here -- I completely agree with you.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 10th, 2011 at 8:08 PM

Title: Re: Democracy in the country that gave birth to democracy

Content:

Namdrol said:

No, the debt crises was caused by Wall Street, not by Europe.

alwayson said:

According to multiple sources the Greek debt crisis was directly caused by their socialistic policies.

I already posted links to substantiate this in earlier threads.

Or just watch the nightly news.

Malcolm wrote:

<http://online.wsj.com/article/SB10001424052970204644504576652781479494882.html>
l " onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;::

"U.S. creditors own just 5% of direct exposure to Greek debt. But they are also indirectly exposed to at least 43% of such debt through CDSs, which total upwards of €25 billion. This equals about half of the European Central Bank's direct Greek exposure of €52 billion."

Credit Default Swaps were invented by Wall Street financial wizards. The reason we are exposed to the Greek debt crisis is because of derivatives we created in order to invest in debt. So please, don't give me a bunch of nonsense about how Greek Socialisms is destroying the American economy. The only thing destroying the American economy is the progressive deregulation of financial markets and the export of our manufacturing base, started by the GOP and continued by the Dems with NAFTA and the WTO agreements.

In short, what is destroying the world economy is nothing other than neo-liberal policies.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 10th, 2011 at 7:58 PM

Title: Re: Are women conscious?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

How does this thread have anything to do with Buddhism?

Kevin is entitled to his misogyny. And I think that exposing him to ridicule over it is a little cruel and certainly will not make him question whether or not his biological determinism is justified.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 10th, 2011 at 7:39 PM

Title: Re: Dzogchen Community of Chogyal Namkhai Norbu

Content:

Lhug-Pa said:

A Buddhist counterpart of this would then be Vajrakilaya, Guru Tragphur, etc.

So I asked if Guru Yoga would be sufficient for protection, because I'd remembered reading that during Guru Yoga we are in the Ultimate state of protection. Although perhaps that is just during the Guru Yoga Sadhana....

Malcolm wrote:

The Buddhist counterpart is called "demarcating the boundaries" also known as the protection cakra. It is generally done at the beginning of more elaborate practices.

In Dzogchen, rig pa is the ultimate protection cakra, obviating the need for any explicit rites of protection.

I suggest you follow Dzogchen as a path unto itself and leave off all this other metaphysical/esoteric stuff. Eventually, it will just be so much dead weight. No need to carry it around.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 10th, 2011 at 4:44 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen Community of Chogyal Namkhai Norbu

Content:

alwayson said:

Does anyone know when the next Direct Introduction will be given?

I checked here:

<http://tsegyalgar.org/theteachings/webcastcalendar/default.htm?month=&year=2012&idlist=> " onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

Namdrol said:

Next worldwide transmission day is march eighth --

Sönam said:

there is one before november 20th

Sönam

Malcolm wrote:

Oh right, I missed it in my calendar, sorry. Next one is one November 20th

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 10th, 2011 at 3:26 AM

Title: Re: Democracy in the country that gave birth to democracy

Content:

alwayson said:

I hate the fact that the American economy is at the complete mercy of Europe's socialism/debt problems.

Europe has been causing the world's problems for centuries.....colonization of Africa, Asia, New World (slaughtering all the Mayans, Aztecs etc.)..... World Wars 1 & 2.....and now this socialism / debt stuff.

Malcolm wrote:

No, the debt crises was caused by Wall Street, not by Europe.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 10th, 2011 at 2:52 AM

Title: Re: Democracy in the country that gave birth to democracy

Content:

Sönam said:

... Proudhon's theories ...

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

Property is theft huh?

Meh. I own my body therefore I own the effects of what that body produces, whether that thing is three square meals, four walls, or a murder.

Malcolm wrote:

Really, so you own your children?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 10th, 2011 at 2:48 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen Community of Chogyal Namkhai Norbu

Content:

alwayson said:

Does anyone know when the next Direct Introduction will be given?

I checked here:

<http://tsegyalgar.org/theteachings/webcastcalendar/default.htm?month=&year=2012&idlist=> " onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

Malcolm wrote:

Next worldwide transmission day is march eighth -- but the next webcast is open:

11-17 November 2011 - TENERIFE RETREAT:

Ati Yoga retreat of Rigdzin jangchub Dorje's terma "Nyangyud Khorva Dongtruk" (Tib. Snyan-rgyud 'khor-ba dong-sprug).

Tenerife Spain- GMT (+0) - OPEN WEBCAST

11th Nov.5-7pm. Teaching start.

12th Nov.10-12am. Teaching of transmission of Guru Yoga.

13th Nov.10-12am. After Guru Yoga altogether, teaching of “Nyangyud Khorva Dongtruk”.

14th Nov.10-12am. After Guru Yoga altogether, teaching of “Nyangyud Khorva Dongtruk”.

16th Nov.10-12am. After Guru Yoga altogether, teaching of “Nyangyud Khorva Dongtruk”.
4-7pm. Gana Puja and so on.

17th Nov.10-12am. Giving some advice for daily practices and some tridlungs. We finish our retreat with Ati Guru Yoga practice altogether.

To follow the webcast please see: <http://shangshunginstitute.net/webcast/video.php> "
onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 9th, 2011 at 10:19 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist Geeks 2012 Conference

Content:

Chaz said:

I made a list of recognized Buddhist teachers that have been Vince Horn's guest at least once.

Richard Reoch, Dzogchen Ponlop Rinpoche, Sara Harding, Surya Das, Trudy Goodman, Stephen Batchelor, Christopher Titmuss, Diane Hamilton, Bernie Glassman, Sumi Loundon Kim, Hokai Sobol, Richard Brown, James Zito, Kenneth Folk, Jiun Foster, Grace Schireson Genpo Merzel Roshi, Rick Hanson, Vincent Horn, Judith Simmer-Brown, Rodney Smith, Kenneth Cohen, Jaimal Yogis, Yongey Mingyur Rinpoche, Erik Curren, Danny Fisher, Norman Fischer, Brad Warner, Gaylon Ferguson, Tami Simon, Susan Blackmore, Daniel Ingram, Diana Winston, Richard Shankman, Gerry Shishin Wick, Joseph Goldstein, Reginald Ray, Jun Po Denis Kelly, Jeffrey Hopkins, Ven. Robina Courtin, Nova Spivack, B. Alan Wallace, Melvin McLeod, Stuart Lachs, Susan Piver, John Daido Looi, Diane Hamilton, Wes Nisker, Noah Levine, Thubten Chodron, Sharon Salzberg, Ethan Nichtern, Robert Spellman, John Travis, Annie McQuade, Fleet Maull, and Phil Stanley.

Nangwa said:

There are several people on that list that I wouldn't consider to be Buddhist teachers.

Chaz said:

Really? Care to name them?

Malcolm wrote:

Well, Nova Spivak, whom I happen to know personally since 1990, is an internet venture capitalist who happens to be a Buddhist, and so on -- but he is not a Buddhist teacher. Melvin McLeod may have some role in Shambhala, but mainly he is an editor, the same with Susan Piver, etc.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 9th, 2011 at 10:10 PM

Title: Re: Ultimate Truth

Content:

KevinSolway said:

Define what you mean by "Enlightened" (with a capital "E", no less) and I'll attempt to answer your question in a constructive manner.

Malcolm wrote:

The minimum standard Buddhist definition of awakening (preferable to "enlightened") is that one has seen the truth of the world in such a way that one is freed from the first three of the ten fetters:

a view of personal identity doubt concerning the meaning of the Buddha's teachings attachment to rules and rites as effective means of liberation

When one is free from these three fetters, one can no longer be troubled by afflictions [kleshas]. According to the teachings, such a person will become an arhat within seven to one lifetimes following this one.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 9th, 2011 at 10:02 PM

Title: Re: are karma and rebirth for real?

Content:

KevinSolway said:

Everything in the sutras is written from the perspective of Ultimate Truth.

Malcolm wrote:

If that is the case then you must hold that rebirth is an ultimate truth since the Vipaka sutta states:

"Monks, the taking of life — when indulged in, developed, & pursued — is something that leads to hell, leads to rebirth as a common animal, leads to the realm of the hungry shades. The slightest of all the results coming from the taking of life is that, when one becomes a human being, it leads to a short life span.

"Stealing — when indulged in, developed, & pursued — is something that leads to hell, leads to rebirth as a common animal, leads to the realm of the hungry shades. The slightest of all the results coming from stealing is that, when one becomes a human being, it leads to the loss of one's wealth.

"Illicit sexual behavior — when indulged in, developed, & pursued — is something that leads to hell, leads to rebirth as a common animal, leads to the realm of the hungry shades. The slightest of all the results coming from illicit sexual behavior is that, when one becomes a human being, it leads to rivalry & revenge.

"Telling falsehoods — when indulged in, developed, & pursued — is something that leads to hell, leads to rebirth as a common animal, leads to the realm of the hungry shades. The slightest of all the results coming from telling falsehoods is that, when one becomes a human being, it leads to being falsely accused.

"Divisive tale-bearing — when indulged in, developed, & pursued — is something that leads to hell, leads to rebirth as a common animal, leads to the realm of the hungry shades. The slightest of all the results coming from divisive tale-bearing is that, when one becomes a human being, it leads to the breaking of one's friendships.

"Harsh speech — when indulged in, developed, & pursued — is something that leads to hell, leads to rebirth as a common animal, leads to the realm of the hungry shades. The slightest of all the results coming from harsh speech is that, when one becomes a human being, it leads to unappealing sounds.

"Frivolous chattering — when indulged in, developed, & pursued — is something that leads to hell, leads to rebirth as a common animal, leads to the realm of the hungry shades. The slightest of all the results coming from frivolous chattering is that, when one becomes a human being, it leads to words that aren't worth taking to heart.

"The drinking of fermented & distilled liquors — when indulged in, developed, & pursued — is something that leads to hell, leads to rebirth as a common animal, leads to the realm of the hungry shades. The slightest of all the results coming from drinking fermented & distilled liquors is that, when one becomes a human being, it leads to mental derangement."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 9th, 2011 at 7:03 AM

Title: Re: Madyamika Sautrantika vs Prasangika

Content:

Namdrol said:

I think it is better to stick to Nagarajuna and Aryadeva. Nagarjuna and Arydeva are straightforward and easy to understand. This is the "pedagogical tradition" of Khenpo Shenga.

Terma said:

I will take your suggestion here, Namdrol.

I have been studying Chandrakirti's madhyamakavatara, by way of a very lengthy and detailed teaching given by Dzongsar Khyentse Jamyang Rinpoche (pdf format). It is quite "meaty", and somewhat challenging. But of course, like was mentioned some of the commentary/teaching is done according to the Tibetan Shedra tradition, though I feel Rinpoche tries to keep it to its original form, rather than taking the positions of the various lineages or schools.

Has anyone studied this? Comments? (BTW, I found this much easier to digest than Mipham's commentary)

Is Chandrakirti perhaps not the best angle to take here? Do you feel that Nagarjuna/Aryadeva might present things in an easier format as suggested earlier? Can someone recommend a good starting point in terms of nagarjuna (ie. books/commentaries)

thanks,

Terma

Malcolm wrote:

Candra is fine too, but not as essential.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 9th, 2011 at 5:57 AM

Title: Re: are karma and rebirth for real?

Content:

padma norbu said:

<http://www.theabsolute.net/> " onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

Malcolm wrote:

Pretty misogynistic, overall.

Oh well, just another day in samsara.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 9th, 2011 at 1:58 AM

Title: Re: are karma and rebirth for real?

Content:

Namdrol said:

This is the point of view of Dzogchen, not sutra.

gregkavarnos said:

So there are no formless realms in Dzogchen?

Malcolm wrote:

The class exists, but here "formless" means "very little form", similar with Theravada Abhidhamma understanding of formless realms. It is kind of like saying that you are broke, even though you can afford a cup of coffee.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 9th, 2011 at 1:09 AM

Title: Re: are karma and rebirth for real?

Content:

deepbluehum said:

That's 7th Century stuff; a lot of water under the bridge there. I'm saying Pali Suttas are sutra stuff, and I can't find dualism in Buddha's sermons. The opposite.

Namdrol said:

The very fact that formless realms beings are immaterial proves substance dualism in sutrayāna.

gregkavarnos said:

I remember you saying in another thread that consciousness is composed of the mahabhuta of air, from which yana does this teaching come from, and if it is true (across all yana) then does this then not mean that even formless realm beings have a (subtle) physical basis (I was going to say body, but then reminded myself of name and form)?

Malcolm wrote:

This is the point of view of Dzogchen, not sutra.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 9th, 2011 at 12:54 AM

Title: Re: Triyik Yeshe Lama.

Content:

heart said:

Yes, I think you are right that I read from the top down. I never did anything except Ngondro in the Kagyu so I actually know very little about Sarma Tantra. I think ati of mahayoga sounds just great to me and in a way only the name makes a point I been trying to make many times here.

About Anuyoga I am not so sure. This is what I been taught about Anuyoga;

"Anuyoga focuses mainly on the completion stage (Tib. རྫོགས་རིམ་, dzogrim), and emphasizes the inner yoga of channels, winds-energies and essences" (Tib. རྩ་རླུང་ཐིག་ལེ་, tsa lung tiklé). Visualization of the deities is generated instantly, rather than through a gradual process as in Mahayoga.

<http://www.rigpawiki.org/index.php?title=Anuyoga> "
onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

I thought the focus in Anuyoga was on "tsa-lung"?

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

The main point of anuyoga is not rtsa rlung, since mahāyoga also possesses rtsa rlung as part of the completion stage.

The main point of difference between anuyoga and mahāyoga is view; the view of the basis in anuyoga dzogchen, from the beginning. For this reason there is no summoning of the wisdom being, or if there is, it is stated as a something like the commitment being and wisdom being have always been inseparable. Second, based on this, the method of creation is instant rather than gradual. That latter point is the most important difference between mahā and anu.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 9th, 2011 at 12:49 AM

Title: Re: are karma and rebirth for real?

Content:

deepbluehum said:

That's 7th Century stuff; a lot of water under the bridge there. I'm saying Pali Suttas are sutra stuff, and I can't find dualism in Buddha's sermons. The opposite.

Malcolm wrote:

The very fact that formless realms beings are immaterial proves substance dualism in sutrayāna.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 9th, 2011 at 12:45 AM

Title: Re: are karma and rebirth for real?

Content:

KevinSolway said:

So it's clear from the above that you cannot conceive of consciousness, as you define it, as having an external cause - outside of the series of moments of consciousness. The only way this could be possible is if one of the following were true:

1. You conceive of consciousness as being inherently existent.
- or
2. You conceive of consciousness as being the only thing in existence.

Do you agree?

Malcolm wrote:

No -- Neither the first nor the second consequence are entailed.

A given consciousness is a conditioned stream, composed of moments, each moment being neither the same nor different than the previous moment (this is the solution to the problem of identity in a series suggested by Nāgārjuna).

There are infinite number of such given beginningless consciousnesses.

The status of objects in general is purely conventional, I am happy with either the relative truth model of sautrantikas or yogacara -- does not matter much to me. Which ever you like.

If you prefer sautrantika, then the stream of material existents is also without beginning. If you prefer yogacara, all material existents are mental projections and have no existence outside of the mind that perceives them.

This is all from a sutrayāna POV.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 8th, 2011 at 10:09 PM

Title: Re: Triyik Yeshe Lama.

Content:

Namdrol said:

From a Dzogchen perspective, guru yoga is better.

heart said:

From my perspective guru yoga contains the two stages. Probably the best way to practice the two stages.

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

We differ on that point, probably because we practice different Guru Yogas.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 8th, 2011 at 10:07 PM

Title: Re: Triyik Yeshe Lama.

Content:

heart said:

Yes, but the theory of the development stage is not that "if you imagine that everything is a mandala it will become a mandala" rather it is "everything is a mandala use your imagination to discover your natural state".

/magnus

Namdrol said:

Hi Magnus:

Actually, in gsar ma schools that is exactly what creation stage means -- if you imagine it is a mandala, it becomes a mandala. This is why it is called "path of transformation". We are transforming our impure vision into a pure vision. We do this to undermine our tendency to engage in afflictive attachments. If we see everything as pure, we will have less grasping. The creation stage is conceptual, not non-conceptual. The completion stage is used to cut attachment to conceptuality of the creation stage. Eventually, we are supposed to unify creation and completion so that we are in the state of the union of illusory body and luminosity aka mahāmudra.

This is partially why one finds criticisms of the two stages approach even in Mahāmudra upadeshas.

Guhyagarbha contains the view of Dzogchen, this is why the thirteenth chapter of Guhyagarbha emphasizes that the mandala has always been naturally formed [ye nas lhun grub] . So it is a very different approach. It is not really the approach of the two stages.

You are so conditioned by Anuyoga, you have a hard time relating to mahāyoga in and of itself.

N

heart said:

Well that could well be, I can just say how I been taught to practice. I am currently reading the Guhyagarbha Tantra and, at least to me, it seem to support the understanding my Guru given me about these matters. Guhyagarbha Tantra is classified as a Mahayoga Tantra. The fact that it contains the view of Dzogchen seems to support what I say.

I can't say I been taught much Anuyoga.

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

It supports what you say solely from a Nyingma POV. But Nyingma is not the end all and be all of Vajrayāna. Sarma schools have a different POV, especially Sakya and Gelug. So you need to qualify your statements.

As to Anuyoga, what you practice is mostly anuyoga. Most termas are anuyoga.

You need to be able to differentiate what you have been taught from the approach of other schools. Your reading is top down. Since your teachers are all Dzogchen practitioners, it is natural that Dzogchen colors everything they teach.

Guhyagarbha is classified as ati of mahāyoga, actually.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 8th, 2011 at 9:43 PM

Title: Re: Triyik Yeshe Lama.

Content:

heart said:

For this reason if you have recognized rigpa Tantra is a really helpful as it hit the right spot.

/magnus

Namdrol said:

If you have discovered knowledge (rig pa) of the basis, you don't need creation stage and completion stage. That's the whole point of Dzogchen. Creation and completion stage are means of discovering that knowledge, but not the only means. Hence, Dzogchen and direct introduction.

N

heart said:

But discovering that knowledge doesn't mean that you are constantly in that knowledge, so for this reason also after recognizing the natural state creation and completion is very helpful.

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

From a Dzogchen perspective, guru yoga is better.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 8th, 2011 at 9:42 PM

Title: Re: Triyik Yeshe Lama.

Content:

heart said:

Yes, but the theory of the development stage is not that "if you imagine that everything is a mandala it will become a mandala" rather it is "everything is a mandala use your imagination to discover your natural state".

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

Hi Magnus:

Actually, in gsar ma schools that is exactly what creation stage means -- if you imagine it is a mandala, it becomes a mandala. This is why it is called "path of transformation". We are transforming our impure vision into a pure vision. We do this to undermine our tendency to engage in afflictive attachments. If we see everything as pure, we will have less grasping. The creation stage is conceptual, not non-conceptual. The completion stage is used to cut attachment to conceptuality of the creation stage. Eventually, we are supposed to unify creation and completion so that we are in the state of the union of illusory body and luminosity aka mahāmudra.

This is partially why one finds criticisms of the two stages approach even in Mahāmudra upadeshas.

Guhyagarbha contains the view of Dzogchen, this is why the thirteenth chapter of Guhyagarbha emphasizes that the mandala has always been naturally formed [ye nas lhun grub] . So it is a very different approach. It is not really the approach of the two stages.

You are so conditioned by Anuyoga, you have a hard time relating to mahāyoga in and of itself.

N

Author: Malcolm
Date: Tuesday, November 8th, 2011 at 9:01 PM
Title: Re: are karma and rebirth for real?
Content:
Namdrol said:
Sutrayāna upholds substance dualism

deepbluehum said:
I haven't found it in the Pali Canon.

Malcolm wrote:
Examine Dharmakirti's proofs of rebirth.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Tuesday, November 8th, 2011 at 8:56 PM
Title: Re: are karma and rebirth for real?
Content:
Namdrol said:
There cannot be an absolute cause of a beginningless series.

KevinSolway said:
There can't be a serial beginning to a beginningless series, but there can certainly be a cause to the entire series.

What is it that separates one beginningless series from another one? That would be the cause of a particular beginningless series.

Malcolm wrote:
One cannot posit a first cause of a beginningless series, that is a contradiction in terms.

N

Author: Malcolm
Date: Tuesday, November 8th, 2011 at 8:54 PM
Title: Re: Triyik Yeshe Lama.
Content:
heart said:
For this reason if you have recognized ripga Tantra is a really helpful as it hit the right spot.

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

If you have discovered knowledge (rig pa) of the basis, you don't need creation stage and completion stage. That's the whole point of Dzogchen. Creation and completion stage are means of discovering that knowledge, but not the only means. Hence, Dzogchen and direct introduction.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 8th, 2011 at 8:53 PM

Title: Re: Triyik Yeshe Lama.

Content:

Namdrol said:

Tantric generation stage is exactly imagining that all beings and the world are the mandala. It is an exercise in creative imagination. If you think, if you really think that where you are is pure and everyone you meet is a buddha deity, then you cannot possibly have any problems.

N

heart said:

I keep hearing people repeating that Tantra is just imagination but I am afraid that this isn't what is written in the Guhyagarbha Tantra. Imagination is just the means that brings people to the natural state of inseparable purity and equality which is the view of Mahayoga. Pure perception is the spontaneously occurring post-meditation. For this reason if you have recognized ripga Tantra is a really helpful as it hit the right spot.

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

Magnus, read what I said again: Tantric generation stage...We are not talking about a result here. Just the means.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 8th, 2011 at 8:49 PM

Title: Re: Did I Receive Transmission?

Content:

Lhug-Pa said:

So my first question is: If he had received authentic Direct Introduction at some point before this situation I'm describing here occurred, does that in itself qualify him to give others Transmission (if he was keeping his Samaya of course)?

Malcolm wrote:

No.

Lhug-Pa said:

Or would have to meet other qualifications (besides simply having received the Transmission) in order to qualify for giving the Direct Introduction to other people?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes.

Lhug-Pa said:

And if that alone doesn't make him qualified to do that, yet he for other reasons was somehow qualified to give me the Transmission (which I doubt); did it "count", since I was not fully aware of what was occurring?

In other words, has he been my Root Guru all along without me knowing it? If so, then I've been breaking Samaya innumerable times since then? (Bear in mind that this was over three years ago)

Malcolm wrote:

No.

Lhug-Pa said:

so I think he may have been or is a practitioner at some level; but was not qualified to teach others, and therefore I did not actually receive a Direct Introduction to the Nature of Mind (?)

Malcolm wrote:

Correct.

Lhug-Pa said:

Samaya is established only if it is made crystal clear to us everything that that specific Samaya entails, yes?

Malcolm wrote:

Samaya is established by interest in a teaching and participation. Samaya is like wine, it develops with age.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 8th, 2011 at 10:17 AM

Title: Re: are karma and rebirth for real?

Content:

KevinSolway said:

In the case of each series, there is neither a beginning nor an end. And yet one series is not the other one. Something separates them.

Let's say that the first one is consciousness and the second one is some other infinite series. It doesn't matter, for our purposes, what the cause of the second one is (for example, whether it is caused by consciousness). The question is, what is the cause of the first one? That is, what is the cause of the particular infinite series that we call "consciousness".

Malcolm wrote:

There cannot be an absolute cause of a beginningless series. A given series however is unique because its causes are unique to it.

KevinSolway said:

You appear to be upholding the views of the "Mind only" school, which have been refuted.

Malcolm wrote:

No, I am not a cittamatrin.

KevinSolway said:

Ok, I believe you are speaking something that makes more sense to me now. It's good that we can agree on something.

Rather than saying there is "mind only" you are suggesting that mind is an aspect of something we might call "matter".

Malcolm wrote:

What I am suggesting is that mind and matter are a non-dual field -- rather than one being an epiphenomena of the other. They are in fact equally products of delusion in one sense. In another, they are merely expressions of intelligent light.

KevinSolway said:

But I don't believe that Sutrayana is as mistaken as you seem to suggest.

Malcolm wrote:

Sutrayāna upholds substance dualism, conventionally speaking. Vajrayāna, and in particular, Dzogchen, do not.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 8th, 2011 at 6:48 AM

Title: Re: Triyik Yeshe Lama.

Content:

heart said:

See, this I just don't get. Pure perception, the way I learned it, is not imagining that the world and beings are something good and pure, rather it is acknowledging the world just as it is. It is about relaxing and not about some high level fantasy. It hit right at the view if you know Dzogchen.

/magnus

Namdrol said:

Tantric generation stage is exactly imagining that all beings and the world are the mandala. It is an exercise in creative imagination. If you think, if you really think that where you are is pure and everyone you meet is a buddha deity, then you cannot possibly have any problems.

N

pensum said:

"Furthermore, if you believe in the way ordinary people see objects, you stray into materialistic ordinariness.

If you regard them one-sidedly as either existent or nonexistent, you stray into the eternalism or nihilism of heretical extremists.

If you believe that objects exist separate from mind, you stray into being a shravaka or pratyekabuddha.

If you claim that perceptions are mind, you stray into being a Mind Only follower.

If you believe that the world and beings are deities, you stray into Mantra.

What is the use of meditation practice without knowing how to cut through these strayings!"

Padmasambhava

(my emphasis)

Malcolm wrote:

This is appropriate for someone who has stabilized their practice of Dzogchen. However, one cannot stray into Mantra if one has no concrete knowledge of Dzogchen, correct? I think ChNN's point is that it is far better to stray into mantra if you have a tendency to demonize your vajra brothers and sisters.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 8th, 2011 at 6:14 AM

Title: Re: are karma and rebirth for real?

Content:

Namdrol said:

Consciousness depends only on prior moments of consciousness

KevinSolway said:

Question for Namdrol.

Prior moments of consciousness are still consciousness. So what is the cause of consciousness itself? That is, what is the cause of the whole infinite series of moments of consciousness?

Malcolm wrote:

As I said, there is no beginning to any given series, as the logic of dependent origination necessarily entails. In other words, consciousness is beginningless, also the other five dhātus (space and the four mahābhutani) are beginningless, since their cause, consciousness (i.e. the collective minds of all infinite sentient beings) has no beginning.

The Buddhist perspective, as indicated by the suttas and thousands of treatises, is that while consciousness contains the potentiality of all five elements, the five elements themselves do not contain the potentiality to give rise to consciousness.

However, you will find that when you move into Vajrayāna and especially the teachings of the Great Perfection, the explicit substance dualism of the sutrayāna is abandoned.

Up to this point, we have been discussing these issues from a strictly sutrayāna perspective.

In Vajrayāna there begins to be a movement which recognizes that matter is in fact intelligent, rather than something inert opposed to consciousness.

This movement in Buddhist teaching reaches its fullest expression in the teaching of the Great Perfection (Dzogchen) where matter is seen as the pure expressive radiance of the natural processes of pure "consciousness" which in fact forms a non-dual field, punctuated, if you will, on the one hand by the delusion of non-recognition (of this matrix of radiant intelligence called "vidyā and jñāna (the name for the five elements in their pure state)" because of subject/object dualism predicated on grasping identity in that which lacks identity) which creates serial point events called "sentient beings" and on the other hand, the wisdom of recognition which creates serial point events called "buddhas" and the shades in between i.e. yogis.

Within this scheme, nevertheless, karma as well as physical and literal rebirth are still quite possible and assumed because of the delusion of self-grasping. In Buddhism, ignorance (āvidya) drives rebirth and karma, and nothing else.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 8th, 2011 at 5:54 AM

Title: Re: Triyik Yeshe Lama.

Content:

pensum said:

For Magnus and any others who are "pro" ngondro: how does doing ngondro improve or increase buddha nature? and conversely how is buddha nature negatively affected if one doesn't do any ngondro?

And for all those who are "con" ngondro: how is buddha nature diminished or degraded by doing ngondro? and how does not doing any ngondro improve or augment buddha nature?

Malcolm wrote:

It is basically a question of time. Since time is limited, it is better to strive for the essence of the teachings from the beginning. It is better to select teachings which rapidly lead to personal experience. All teachings are good, but some are more effective.

So, the main message is don't waste time.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 8th, 2011 at 5:50 AM

Title: Re: Triyik Yeshe Lama.

Content:

Virgo said:

...simply practicing trechgo creates a great deal of merit and understanding.

Malcolm wrote:

more merit, actually.

But please recall, merit really refers to what kind of body you will get as a result.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 8th, 2011 at 5:13 AM

Title: Re: Triyik Yeshe Lama.

Content:

Sönam said:

I was just reading that ChNN's point of view regarding tantra (extracted from Dzogchen Teachings) ... it can help to clarify some points.

Training in pure vision is the samaya, or commitment, of the Tantric teachings. That is good also for Dzogchen practitioners. For example, if you see your Vajra brothers and sisters as enlightened beings, as if they were your teachers, you will never have problems with them. On the other hand, if you always think they are the ones who are creating difficulties, you will always have problems. Thus, it is very useful to train a little in pure vision according to the Tantric system. This is why we also need this knowledge and understanding.

Of course, the methods of the various levels of the path are different. In tantra we use transformation methods, whereas in Dzogchen the method used is that of self-liberation. If you understand how Tantric methods work, then, when you learn the method of self-liberation as it is practiced in Dzogchen, you can better understand what the difference is between them.

heart said:

See, this I just don't get. Pure perception, the way I learned it, is not imagining that the world and beings are something good and pure, rather it is acknowledging the world just as it is. It is about relaxing and not about some high level fantasy. It hit right at the view if you know Dzogchen.

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

Tantric generation stage is exactly imagining that all beings and the world are the mandala. It is an exercise in creative imagination. If you think, if you really think that where you are is pure and everyone you meet is a buddha deity, then you cannot possibly have any problems.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 8th, 2011 at 3:38 AM

Title: Re: are karma and rebirth for real?

Content:

Dechen Norbu said:

... unless you can prove them.

KevinSolway said:

Well it's your forum and you can run it how you see fit. I cannot force you to understand my arguments.

But I do hope you will be consistent with your rulings.

Unless a person can prove that one person can be reborn as another person, after their physical death, or that a person can be reborn as an animal, or a preta, etc, then they should not be permitted to express any such ideas here, either in their own words or in words quoted from anywhere else.

Malcolm wrote:

I suspect that by "proof", Dechen means "actually found in the teachings of the Buddha" -- not empirically proven in a scientific study.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 8th, 2011 at 3:05 AM

Title: Re: are karma and rebirth for real?

Content:

KevinSolway said:

I consider that it is a matter of definition that the substrate or cause of consciousness is "physical", and it is ultimately the physical world, which is the cause of consciousness, which is the physical body.

Namdrol said:

The Buddha has taught us consistently that the cause of the physical world is consciousness.

KevinSolway said:

And he's not mistaken on this. In the case that we divide things up into the duality of "mind" and "matter", there are only two things, and each of these two must be caused by something. Since the only thing other than mind is matter, then matter must be the cause of mind. Likewise the only thing other than matter is mind, so mind must be the cause of matter.

Beyond the duality of "mind" and "matter" is the undifferentiated Natural World, which has various names.

Malcolm wrote:

According to the Buddha all phenomena in the universe, the natural world, are categorized into six classes: consciousness, space, air, fire, water and earth. Consciousness is the cause of the other five. Consciousness has the potential to give rise to the other five, but the other five do not have the ability to give rise to consciousness. It is not a relation of mutual dependence. Matter depends on consciousness, but consciousness does not depend on matter. Consciousness depends only on prior moments of consciousness, and since there are no beginnings, according to the logic of dependent origination, there is no fault of infinite regress.

N

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 8th, 2011 at 2:17 AM

Title: Re: are karma and rebirth for real?

Content:

KevinSolway said:

I consider that it is a matter of definition that the substrate or cause of consciousness is "physical", and it is ultimately the physical world, which is the cause of consciousness, which is the physical body.

Malcolm wrote:

The Buddha has taught us consistently that the cause of the physical world is consciousness.

This, I will suggest, is the reason why your speculations are dissonate with what the majority of Buddhists understand about the Buddha's teachings.

Consciousness is the cause of matter, not the other way round.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 8th, 2011 at 1:20 AM

Title: Re: The matter of faith

Content:

Namdrol said:

If we know that someone is an awakened person, than as the Eastern Gatehouse shows, we can have confidence in what they say.

KevinSolway said:

Yes, but you would only know that they were awakened if you yourself were awakened.

So you would only trust them inasmuch as you can trust yourself.

Malcolm wrote:

No, this is false inference.

You can infer someone's awakening, or lack thereof, much in the same manner as a fire can be inferred from the presence of smoke.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 8th, 2011 at 1:18 AM

Title: Re: are karma and rebirth for real?

Content:

KevinSolway said:

If dependent origination was about the physical body, then things would be in an entirely different order.

Malcolm wrote:

Dependent origination is about both mind and body -- this is why we have links such as consciousness, name and form, six sense organs, etc.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 8th, 2011 at 1:16 AM

Title: Re: are karma and rebirth for real?

Content:

Namdrol said:

Consciousness has a cause, but not a material cause, even though, according to them, it can be conditioned by material substances.

KevinSolway said:

Conditions are the same as causes.

Malcolm wrote:

No, conditions are not the same thing as causes.

Conditions do not bear the potential to bring about a result. for example, no matter how much it rains, without a seed, there can be no shoot.

Causes carry the potential to bring about a result. For example, even though it may not rain, as long as a seed is viable, it can produce a sprout when the proper conditions are present.

In the example of consciousness, consciousness, according to the Buddhist model, is of six kinds: mental consciousness and five physical sense consciousness. The sole difference between these six is whether consciousness is conditioned by sense organs or not leading to the descriptors "eye consciousness" and so on. However, consciousness also exists in absence of a physical substrate, for example, arūpyadhātu beings, those beings of the four immaterial realms, have no physical bodies. In the Buddhist way of seeing things, mind and body are different substances, with different causes.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 7th, 2011 at 10:50 PM

Title: Re: The matter of faith

Content:

KevinSolway said:

I say that we only really have faith in that which we ourselves know.

The less we ourselves know, the less faith there is.

Malcolm wrote:

If we know that someone is an awakened person, than as the Eastern Gatehouse shows, we can have confidence in what they say.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 7th, 2011 at 9:21 PM

Title: Re: are karma and rebirth for real?

Content:

KevinSolway said:

that consciousness does not exist independently, but that it too has a cause, and that it's life is as fragile as that of a candleflame.

Malcolm wrote:

No one ever said that consciousness had no cause. Consciousness is a substance, conceived of by the Buddha and Buddhists to be of a different kind than matter.

Consciousness has a cause, but not a material cause, even though, according to them, it can be conditioned by material substances.

Dharmakīrti runs through these reasonings in much detail in the Pramāṇasiddhi chapter of the Pramāṇavārtika.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 7th, 2011 at 2:07 AM

Title: Re: The matter of faith

Content:

KevinSolway said:

Even in the case that I'm not a Buddha, I could be of a level far higher than you can conceive of.

Malcolm wrote:

I doubt it. Your knowledge of the Dharma appears very elementary, basic and utterly lacking nuance. (Note to catmoon -- now that is a qualified ad hominem statement).

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 7th, 2011 at 2:04 AM

Title: Re: The matter of faith

Content:

KevinSolway said:

Ironically, not according to the Kalama sutra!

Malcolm wrote:

The Kalamas were not followers of the Buddha.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 7th, 2011 at 1:15 AM

Title: Re: Madyamika Sautrantika vs Prasangika

Content:

Namdrol said:

Khenpo Shenga's commentary on MMK has not been published yet.

gad rgyangs said:

Speaking of which, Brother Namdrol, Lotsawa Namdrol, where are your translations????? Isn't it time to make a contribution? What are you waiting for? (certainly not a six figure advance from snowlion, i hope). With your experience, expertise and insight, how can you hide your light under a basket? If you don't want to make translations and give them away, and can't or won't deal with publishers, then just make pdfs and sell them on Lulu or Amazon. I'd buy every single one. I mean, come on, bro, daylight's burning. death is certain but the time is uncertain....you know the drill.

Malcolm wrote:

I want to make sure my mango not only looks ripe, but is in fact ripe.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 7th, 2011 at 12:32 AM

Title: Re: The matter of faith

Content:

KevinSolway said:

In any case, the Buddha himself made his own personal experience the criterion for all his judgements, and he accepted whatever accorded with his own personal experience, and rejected what did not accord with his own personal experience.

Malcolm wrote:

The difference between you and the Buddha is just that -- you are not a Buddha and so do not have access to the same level of personal experience. A sutta to balance the Kalamas is the Pubbakotthaka Sutta:

"Excellent, Sariputta. Excellent. Those who have not known, seen, penetrated, realized, or attained it by means of discernment would have to take it on conviction in others that the faculty of conviction... persistence... mindfulness... concentration... discernment, when developed & pursued, gains a footing in the Deathless, has the Deathless as its goal & consummation; whereas those who have known, seen, penetrated, realized, & attained it by means of discernment would have no doubt or uncertainty that the faculty of conviction... persistence... mindfulness... concentration... discernment, when developed & pursued, gains a footing in the Deathless, has the Deathless as its goal & consummation."

What is the Buddha's range of experience, according to the Buddha?

Ten Powers of a Tathagata

9. "Sariputta, the Tathagata has these ten Tathagata's powers, possessing which he claims the herd-leader's place, roars his lion's roar in the assemblies, and sets rolling the Wheel of Brahma.[5] What are the ten?

10. (1) "Here, the Tathagata understands as it actually is the possible as possible and the impossible as impossible.[6] And that [70] is a Tathagata's power that the Tathagata has, by virtue of which he claims the herd-leader's place, roars his lion's roar in the assemblies, and sets rolling the Wheel of Brahma.

11. (2) "Again, the Tathagata understands as it actually is the results of actions undertaken, past, future and present, with possibilities and with causes. That too is a Tathagata's power...[7]

12. (3) "Again, the Tathagata understands as it actually is the ways leading to all destinations. That too is a Tathagata's power...[8]

13. (4) "Again, the Tathagata understands as it actually is the world with its many and different elements. That too is a Tathagata's power...[9]

14. (5) "Again, the Tathagata understands as it actually is how beings have different inclinations. That too is a Tathagata's power...[10]

15. (6) "Again, the Tathagata understands as it actually is the disposition of the faculties of other beings, other persons. That too is a Tathagata's power...[11]

16. (7) "Again, the Tathagata understands as it actually is the defilement, the cleansing and the emergence in regard to the jhanas, liberations, concentrations and attainments. That too is a Tathagata's power...[12]

17. (8) "Again, the Tathagata recollects his manifold past lives, that is, one birth, two births, three births, four births, five births, ten births, twenty births, thirty births, forty births, fifty births, a hundred births, a thousand births, a hundred thousand births, many aeons of world-contraction, many aeons of world-expansion, many aeons of world-contraction and expansion: 'There I was so named, of such a clan, with such an appearance, such was my nutriment, such my experience of pleasure and pain, such my life-term; and passing away from there, I reappeared elsewhere; and there too I was so named, of such a clan, with such an appearance, such was my nutriment, such my experience of pleasure and pain, such my life-term; and passing away from there, I reappeared here.' Thus with their aspects and particulars he recollects his manifold past lives. That too is a Tathagata's power...

18. (9) "Again, with the divine eye, which is purified and surpasses the human, the Tathagata sees beings passing away and reappearing, inferior and superior, fair and ugly, fortunate and unfortunate, and he understands how beings pass on according to their actions thus: 'These worthy beings who were ill-conducted in body, speech and mind, revilers of noble ones, wrong in their views, giving effect to wrong view in their actions, on the dissolution of the body, [71] after death, have reappeared in a state of deprivation, in a bad destination, in perdition, even in hell; but these worthy beings who were well-conducted in body, speech and mind, not revilers of noble ones, right in their views, giving effect to right view in their actions, on the dissolution of the body, after death, have reappeared in a good destination, even in the heavenly world.' Thus with the divine eye, which is purified and surpasses the human, he sees beings passing away and reappearing, inferior and superior, fair and ugly, fortunate and unfortunate, and he understands how beings pass on according to their actions. That too is a Tathagata's power...

19. (10) "Again, by realizing it for himself with direct knowledge, the Tathagata here and now enters upon and abides in the deliverance of mind and deliverance by wisdom that are taintless with the destruction of the taints. That too is a Tathagata's power that a Tathagata has, by virtue of which he claims the herd-leader's place, roars his lion's roar in the assemblies, and sets rolling the Wheel of Brahma.

20. "The Tathagata has these ten Tathagata's powers, possessing which he claims the herd-leader's place, roars his lion's roar in the assemblies, and sets rolling the Wheel of Brahma.

21. "Sariputta, when I know and see thus, should anyone say of me: 'The recluse Gotama does not have any superhuman states, any distinction in knowledge and vision worthy of the noble ones. The recluse Gotama teaches a Dhamma (merely) hammered out by reasoning, following his own line of inquiry as it occurs to him' — unless he abandons that assertion and that state of mind and relinquishes that view, then as (surely as if he had been) carried off and put there he will wind up in hell.[13] Just as a bhikkhu possessed of virtue, concentration and wisdom would here and now enjoy final knowledge, so it will happen in this case, I say, that unless he abandons that assertion and that state of mind and relinquishes that view, then as (surely as if he had been) carried off and put there he will wind up in hell.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 7th, 2011 at 12:27 AM

Title: Re: Madyamika Sautrantika vs Prasangika

Content:

conebeckham said:

Thanks, Namdrol--that's really interesting! Didn't know about that linguistic sleight-of-hand, and that's something most of us would never catch..... And a good example of why you stress the importance of the root (Indian) texts.

Do you know if Khenpo Shenga's commentary to MMK is in the works for publication in translation?

Also, off-topic I know, but w/ regard to Maitreya's Five Treatises, Are you familiar with this?

https://www.amazon.com/Universal-Discourse-Literature-Mahayanasutralamkara-Treasury/dp/0975373404/ref=sr_1_1?s=books&ie=UTF8&qid=1320596282&sr=1-1 "onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

I think Thurman was the head translator. I'm wondering if it's a good translation? (Perhaps a thread about JamChoDeNga in translation may be a good idea...)

Malcolm wrote:

It's a little wierd in my opinion, but it is consistent in its wierdness and scholarly.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, November 6th, 2011 at 8:06 PM

Title: Re: Madyamika Sautrantika vs Prasangika

Content:

conebeckham said:

I know that text isn't Madhyamika, Namdrol....also understand how Mipham labors to make it non-contradictory....I recall that Khenpo Shenga's commentary on this particular text was based on Vasubandhu, per the forward...not Buddhapalita.

Perhaps he uses Buddhapalita as a source for the true madhyamika works?

Malcolm wrote:

Right, we are not communicating well. Khenpo Shenga's commentary on MMK has not been published yet.

His commentary on the dharmadharmata vibhanga is based on Vasubandhu. It also presents Mipham's side by side. Mipham's attempt to reconcile DDV with Madhyamaka is exactly the kind of Tibetan exegesis that muddies the water because Mipham uses a couple of linguistic sleights of hand that are possible in Tibetan (suggesting that if you substitute rnam par snang ba for rnam par rig pa (vijñapti) the text can be read as Madhyamaka text) and are completely impossible in Sanskrit.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, November 6th, 2011 at 7:59 PM

Title: Appeals to Fact

Content:

KevinSolway said:

Appealing to authority is something you do as a very last resort

Malcolm wrote:

IF we are talking about what Kevin Solway thinks, the first thing I will do is look up Kevin Solway's writings. When talking about what The Buddha thinks, the first thing I will do is look up what the Buddha said in that or that sutta.

If Kevin Solway claims some idea for the Buddha, if such a claim, no matter how reasonable, is not born out in an examination of the record of the Buddha's teaching, then Kevin Solway's claim must be rejected. For example, if Kevin Solway claims that Buddha intended rebirth to be interpreted figuratively but an examination of the record shows Buddha intended rebirth quite literally, then Kevin Solway's claim must be rejected, even if I myself too do not accept literal rebirth.

For example, if someone were to say "Kevin Solway believes in literal rebirth", and examination of your writings will show this to be false, therefore, that claim must be rejected.

In this case, these are not appeals to authority -- I have no interest in whether you believe in rebirth or not -- but I am interested seeing that the Buddha's teaching not being corrupted by modernist revisionism whether Buddha's teachings about this and that in the end prove to be false.

For example, Vasubandhu teaches a geocentric Meru Cosmology that is clearly at odds with modern cosmology. I do not accept this cosmology, but if someone were to come along and try to convince me that Vasubandhu did not teach such a cosmology, I would point to the Kosha and show that Vasubandhu plainly did teach such a cosmology. This is not an appeal to authority, it is an appeal to fact.

Pointing out that Buddha universally teaches literal rebirth in the sutras is a fact. Do not think you can select one or the other of the four distinct presentations of dependent origination, serial, static, momentary and simultaneous -- they are all necessary for a proper understanding of dependent origination and karma. Part of that is the Buddhist doctrine of conception i.e. literal rebirth taught by the Buddha himself in Vinaya to Nanda and in the Suttas to Ananda.

Those who rejected literal rebirth were considered nihilists by the Buddha and his disciples.

N

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, November 6th, 2011 at 9:14 AM

Title: Re: are karma and rebirth for real?

Content:

Namdrol said:

Vasubandhu also rejected the physical existence of hell realms, but did not reject their existence altogether.

KevinSolway said:

Have you considered that ALL of the realms are not physically real. That is, they are real, but not physically real.

They are mentally real, but that is all.

That is in fact my position. Not only are the hell realms not physically real, but nor are the preta realms, the animal realms, the human realms, deva realms, etc.

They all exist within the mind, here and now.

The vast majority of homo-sapiens on earth are in fact in the lower realms, mentally, and this is very real.

Malcolm wrote:

Vasubandhu did not reject the conventional physical existence of human realms and so on -- merely the physical existence of hells since he reasoned that hell guardians must only be mental projections of the tormented. '

It is only when discussing how phenomena exist ultimately that they are ascertained to be "mind-only".

If however you maintain that phenomena are only mental real, then you very little basis for rejecting any of the six realms, and none whatsoever for rejecting rebirth as frogs, devas, and hell beings, as well as humans.

In fact, you just sank your whole argument against rebirth. Saying that literal rebirth is not a fact when you at the same time deny that there is any physical reality at all is incoherent.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, November 6th, 2011 at 9:10 AM

Title: Re: are karma and rebirth for real?

Content:

Namdrol said:

The suffering of a being experiencing a hell realm is far worse than any imaginable human suffering, however.

KevinSolway said:

And you know this how?

Malcolm wrote:

Unlike yourself, who cannot accept anything beyond your own senses, and cannot accept any authority beyond your limited direct perception, I am happy to accept the authority of the Buddha on such subjects.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, November 6th, 2011 at 9:08 AM

Title: Re: are karma and rebirth for real?

Content:

KevinSolway said:

Those who reject literal reincarnation do not reject serial rebirth.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, in fact they do. If

KevinSolway said:

"Serial" means "not occurring at the same time", and indeed, the consequences of one's actions do not occur at the same time as one's actions, but they occur afterwards. For example, a teacher must first teach the students before mental activities in the students can be kindled. The one follows the other, in series. The future follows the present. This is what is meant by "serial rebirth".

Malcolm wrote:

Not according to the Buddha, and it is Buddha's definition of rebirth that are under consideration, not Kevin Solway's. In this instance, an appeal to authority is valid since the Buddha's teachings are the one's being considered. In some other circumstance, were we interested in discussing Kevin Solway's doctrine of karma and so on, then an appeal to the authority of the Buddha would be useless, since we would not be discussing Buddhism, but rather Solwayism.

KevinSolway said:

Those who reject the literal rebirth interpretation do in fact accept the teaching of the Buddha on mental causality.

Malcolm wrote:

Essentially, serial rebirth is the serial or successive appropriation of successive bodies by an afflicted mental continuum; for example, a mental continuum that in one instance appropriated the body of an amphibian, and later came to appropriate the body of a deva or a human.

KevinSolway said:

read the mahāniddana sutta

Your interpretation differs from mine. Please try to use reason rather than appealing to authority. The appeal to authority is a logical fallacy, and this should be taught by all Buddhist teachers.

Malcolm wrote:

If you are not a Buddhist, an appeal to authority of the Buddha is of course useless. If you are a Buddhist, then an appeal to the authority of the Buddha's teaching, as recorded in hundreds of suttas, is entirely appropriate.

Essentially, it is rational decision tree:

Does mind derive from matter? Yes or no?

If one answers yes, then one is a physicalist and there is no point in proceeding further. Buddha's teachings have little value beyond their ethical content, in this instance. There is nothing particularly special about Buddhist teachings on emptiness, dependent origination, and so on that may be not gleaned from Hume, Adorno and so on.

If no, then we can continue. If mind does not derive from matter, it must have a cause, nevertheless. If it does not have a first cause, it must have a conditioned cause. Since things like memory of past lives and so on are best accounted for through mental moments that exist in a serial continuum, two moments in a continuum being neither the same nor different from one another, things like memory of past lives and so on are easily accounted for without having to invent a self as a repository of information.

It is the nature of mind as a substance (dravya) that requires that all mind are unique-- this is well established by Vasubandhu.

KevinSolway said:

It doesn't have anything to do with people being reborn as frogs or suchlike speculative nonsense.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, you can accuse the Buddha of being a speculator if you like. It is pretty clear that Buddha discussed person's taking rebirth as different forms of beings, animals, devas and so on and did so in a manner that indicates he actually beleived in rebirth as I have outlined it.

Now, you don't have to accept it, but please do not expect us to think that the Buddha did not beleive it. It is very clear that he did.

KevinSolway said:

Unless you have come up with a way to read words without interpreting them, then you are also interpreting the words.

Malcolm wrote:

There no need to interpret what the Buddha has said on this point.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, November 6th, 2011 at 8:32 AM

Title: Re: are karma and rebirth for real?

Content:

gregkavarnos said:

. . in an unhappy destination, in perdition, in hell...

KevinSolway said:

Do you honestly think the countless hell realms, with their mountains of red-hot iron and black flames, are physically real places? They're not. They are created by the mind of the individual, here-and-now. The reason there are so many hell realms (countless, in fact) is because of the countless forms of suffering people create inside their own minds.

Malcolm wrote:

From a Mahāyāna perspective, this is a trivial point. Vasubandhu also rejected the physical existence of hell realms, but did not reject their existence altogether.

The suffering of a being experiencing a hell realm is far worse than any imaginable human suffering, however.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, November 6th, 2011 at 6:04 AM

Title: Re: are karma and rebirth for real?

Content:

KevinSolway said:

Those who reject literal rebirth don't argue such a thing.

Just as a candle can be used to light many other candles, which burn simultaneously, in just the same way mental activities kindle many other mental activities, in other physical forms, which function simultaneously. For example, a teacher can have many students, and a parent can have many children.

Cause and effect is a tree-like web of interactions, rather than a narrow linear channel.

Malcolm wrote:

As to the first point, those who reject serial rebirth do not accept the teaching of the Buddha on mental causality.

As to your second point, this is not what the Buddha meant by rebirth. What did he mean by rebirth? You can read the mahāniddana sutta.

As to your third point, you are conflating the teaching about general cause and effect with dependent origination. Whether you decide to use the model of the Sarvastivadas (six causes and four conditions) or the model of the Theravadins i.e. twenty four conditions (i.e. 6*4) matters little. The teaching of serial rebirth or reincarnation was clearly taught by the Buddha in hundreds of suttas.

You can of course choose to ignore the Buddha's teachings on this point, and try to "interpret" rebirth -- but you cannot present this modified doctrine as the Buddha's own teaching.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, November 6th, 2011 at 1:36 AM

Title: Re: Buddhism on God

Content:

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

We are embodied here for a reason. Explicating what that reason is precisely requires the delicacy of our current situation.

Malcolm wrote:

We are embodied here because our minds are driven by afflictions. That's it.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, November 5th, 2011 at 9:25 PM

Title: Re: are karma and rebirth for real?

Content:

KevinSolway said:

Buddhists really do believe these things.

Malcolm wrote:

The Buddha didn't merely believe these things, he knew these things to be so, and outlined methods through which one may come to know directly oneself.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, November 5th, 2011 at 9:22 PM

Title: Re: are karma and rebirth for real?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

For the Buddha, rebirth, punarbhāva, was a simple fact.

Either one accepts rebirth or one does not.

Arguing that the continual appropriation of new physical forms by an afflicted mental continuum that spans countless eons is not the Buddha's teaching is rather unwise, since it clearly is the Buddha's teaching.

It is unwise, therefore, to pretend that there is some other option, or that the Buddha meant rebirth only figuratively.

Arguing with people who do not accept rebirth is equally unwise because they are addicted to a trenchant physicalism and prefer a secular understanding of mind and life. However, such people, may, in a limited way, derive some benefit from Buddha's teaching of dependent origination and so on even if that teaching will not lead them to ultimate liberation in this lifetime because of their addiction to views.

The answer to the thread is that yes, for Buddha karma and rebirth are for real. And if one wishes to have a full appreciation of the Buddha's teaching, it is important to understand this fact.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, November 5th, 2011 at 8:11 PM

Title: Re: Can a complete beginner benefit from Dzogchen practice?

Content:

TravisMay11 said:

I can't remember the sources right off hand where I've read about this, at the moment, but I believe traditionally that no one ever started practicing Dzogchen right off the bat.

Malcolm wrote:

One's good fortune in meeting Dzogchen teachings in this life depend greatly upon one's merit from past lives. If you have the merit to meet a great master like ChNN, etc., don't waste your time doing other things. Merely meeting such a master is a sign that you are not a "beginner" in Dzogchen teachings, it is a sign that one is riding the crest of one's merit from past lives.

if you follow a master like ChNN -- you will become a sane human being, even without studying Abhidharma and so on.

Following Dzogchen teachings is the best mind training.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, November 5th, 2011 at 7:52 PM

Title: Re: Namkha arte-sky gazing

Content:

Fa Dao said:

Does anyone know where this practice originated from?

Malcolm wrote:

The original form of sky gazing come from the perfection of wisdom sutras.

But Namkhai arte is not just gazing at sky since it is connected with Dzogchen view.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, November 5th, 2011 at 7:44 PM

Title: Re: Dzogchen Community of Chogyal Namkhai Norbu

Content:

Lhug-Pa said:

Ah I see. Although everywhere I've searched it says that the booklet is either reserved or restricted. But since we most likely would have to sign up for at least an online Dzogchen Community membership in order to view the webcast for the Worldwide Transmission by Chogyal Namkhai Norbu Rinpoche, I guess it doesn't matter if it's restricted or not, since membership should grant permission to purchase the booklet or maybe even the Guru Yoga book.

Malcolm wrote:

You can get the transmission book-- you may have to call a gar to do so.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, November 5th, 2011 at 7:43 PM

Title: Re: Madyamika Sautrantika vs Prasangika

Content:

conebeckham said:

The third alternative, and one I feel the majority of us follow, is to stick to one Tibetan pedagogical tradition.

Namdrol said:

I think it is better to stick to Nagarajuna and Aryadeva. Nagarjuna and Aryadeva are straighyforward and easy to understand. This is the "pedagogical tradition" of Khenpo Shenga.

N

conebeckham said:

...which is really just using Vasubandu's commentaries, mainly, to "flesh out" the rather terse original texts, in most instances, is it not?

I'm reading the translation of Maitreya/Asanga's Madhyantavibhaga currently, which has Khenpo Shenga's commentary as well as a commentary by Mipham. This particular text is more terse, perhaps, than Nagarjuna and Aryadeva's originals, but I'm sure glad Mipham wrote his commentary.

Malcolm wrote:

Hi Cone:

This is but one text out of many. The text you are referring has nothing to do with Madhyamaka, despite Mipham's bold attempt to make it fit into a Madhyamaka mold by riding roughshod over the text.

Shenga's MMK commentary consists of wrapping the MMK in Buddhapalita's commentary.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, November 5th, 2011 at 7:41 PM

Title: Re: Madyamika Sautrantika vs Prasangika

Content:

conebeckham said:

I think it is better to stick to Nagarajuna and Aryadeva. Nagarjuna and Arydeva are straightforward and easy to understand.

Jinzang said:

They aren't to me.

Malcolm wrote:

What do you find difficult about them?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, November 5th, 2011 at 1:41 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen Community of Chogyal Namkhai Norbu

Content:

Lhug-Pa said:

Thanks Namdrol and Sönam

Since GURUYOGA by Chogyal Namkhai Norbu Rinpoche is a restricted book; if we are to receive the Direct Introduction from Chogyal Namkhai Norbu Rinpoche via the Worldwide Transmission, would we email a request to purchase GURUYOGA explaining that we currently do not have physical access to a Dzogchen Community center, and that we need the said book in order to participate in the Worldwide Transmission?

Malcolm wrote:

Generally, in order to purchase many book, you must be a member, If you are member of the DC, this shows your interest. Transmission will occur sometime. To do the world wide transmission, you need only the small worldwide transmission booklet -- should be easy to get and is not restricted.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 4th, 2011 at 10:36 PM

Title: Re: Madyamika Sautrantika vs Prasangika

Content:

conebeckham said:

The third alternative, and one I feel the majority of us follow, is to stick to one Tibetan pedagogical tradition.

Malcolm wrote:

I think it is better to stick to Nagarajuna and Aryadeva. Nagarjuna and Arydeva are straighyforward and easy to understand. This is the "pedagogical tradition" of Khenpo Shenga.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 4th, 2011 at 10:10 PM

Title: Re: Dzogchen Community of Chogyal Namkhai Norbu

Content:

Pero said:

FYI, to attend the WWT you have to know what to do during it beforehand. If you don't, there's not that much use to attend.

Epistemes said:

Where do you go to learn what to do during it beforehand? Is there a code in "The Crystal and The Way of Light" that we have to crack? Not all of us have ease of access to a community. Can other practitioners e-mail you the instructions?

Malcolm wrote:

There is a new book I saw, called Guru Yoga -- it has all the instructions for each of the three international transmission days, as well as complete instructions for all the major guru yoga practices in teh DC.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 2nd, 2011 at 11:37 PM

Title: Re: Triyik Yeshe Lama.

Content:

Namdrol said:

We need to strive for mutual respect. That is important.

heart said:

Yes, I feel that there is a lack of respect for the traditional Nyingma style of Dzogchen practice in this and other forums. I think you do understand the point I am trying to make Namdrol.

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

Others feel there is a lack of respect for ChNN's style of Dzogchen and that people push this ngondro + two stages approach too hard and want to condition DC practitioners into their way of thinking.

Just accept it, we don't think tantric ngondro is that important over all. No use in trying to convince us.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 2nd, 2011 at 11:34 PM

Title: Re: Triyik Yeshe Lama.

Content:

heart said:

Longchenpa is not old-school enough for you Nangwa?

/magnus

Namdrol said:

Nope. He is too influenced by Sarma.

Rongzom, Aro Yeshe Jungney, Phang Mipham Gonpo, Chetsun Senge Wangchuk, now that is old school.

N

heart said:

so please post your proof that they didn't do Ngondro or Keyrim and Dzogrim before or during their Dzogchen practice. They were all pretty involved with Tantra as well, no?

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

There is no creation stage, completion stage or deities in Vima Nyinthig.

Rongzom states quite clearly that there is no need for the two stages in the sixth chapter of his major work -- his approach to Dzogchen works equally well if you are a tantric practitioner or not.

Plus there is a broad understanding in sems sde, klong sde, etc. that deity yoga is not necessary.

I don't think Senge Wangchuk was that involved with deity yoga -- there is no evidence that he emphasized it at all. I am sure he knew it, however. Aro Yeshe either.

What you did before you practice Dzogchen is not that important. As you agree already, Dzogchen is not gradual.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 2nd, 2011 at 11:11 PM

Title: Re: Triyik Yeshe Lama.

Content:

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

The debate about ChNNR and ngondro has been done to death so many times before ...

Malcolm wrote:

It is not a debate. It is plain difference of style. Magnus is very Nyingma in his approach, based on his tradition and teachers. Magnus' idea is that ChNN students do not understand something important.

Personally, I think ChNN is the greatest master of Dzogchen alive. Just read my post on atikosha.org about him. But that is me.

Other people who follow other masters should feel their master and his or her approach is the best. Those of us who follow ChNN need to respect other masters and their students -- we should not get into some trip about this tradition or that tradition. Often these days ChNN is fond of saying that there is no "dzogchen tradition".

We need to strive for mutual respect. That is important.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 2nd, 2011 at 11:03 PM

Title: Re: Triyik Yeshe Lama.

Content:

heart said:

Longchenpa is not old-school enough for you Nangwa?

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

Nope. He is too influenced by Sarma.

Rongzom, Aro Yeshe Jungney, Phang Mipham Gonpo, Chetsun Senge Wangchuk, now that is old school.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 2nd, 2011 at 9:01 PM

Title: Re: Triyik Yeshe Lama.

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

In response to Geoff's question:

It is useless to read about togal without introduction to togal.

It can block your practice because it can cause strongly clinging and obsession.

Showing the postures and gazes in an incorrect way will, according to the texts, make your gaze unstable.

Tögal is not especially complicated, but if not approached in correct way, will cause problems for practitioner.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 2nd, 2011 at 8:55 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist ethics and BDSM?

Content:

Astus said:

BDSM is not intended to be a spiritual practice.

Malcolm wrote:

Tell that to the modern primitives.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 2nd, 2011 at 4:18 PM

Title: Re: Triyik Yeshe Lama.

Content:

heart said:

You can of course chose to ignore that if you want.

Namdrol said:

Yes, he should, his master is not all these other teachers -- his master is ChNN.

N

heart said:

Or he could keep an open mind and realize there might be more than one path that leads to the top of the mountain.

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

He can keep an open mind, but still follow his master's advice which is not the advice of all these other masters.

Face it Magnus, people in the DC are _never_ going to agree that they have to do ngondro, creation stage, completion stage, etc., since our master says that the tantric approach to these things is not our approach and are not necessary. This is not the path that ChNN has laid for us.

As you well know, our master, ChNN says the only necessary thing for his students is Guru Yoga of White A. On the other hand, he also says that since people have many conditions and circumstances, they should not limit themselves, and this is why he provides methods such as tara, mandarava, namkha, serkyem, chulen, yantra, etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 2nd, 2011 at 4:12 PM

Title: Re: Triyik Yeshe Lama.

Content:

heart said:

So why would ChNN make people in the SMS do unnecessary practices?

Malcolm wrote:

SMS level one is connected with the Dzogchen sems sde system of Sogdog Lodo Gyalpo. In his system one does a short ngondro retrea before main practice.

But if you are not an SMS student, then you are free to do what you like. Not everyone is in SMS.

In General, ChNN prefers people to understand their primordial state and to do Guru Yoga (which are the same thing). This, he feels, is much superior to any of the other uncommon preliminaries. So basically, he prefers people to skip over the other uncommon preliminaries and to make Guru Yoga their main practice until they have real knowledge (rig pa) of their primordial state. For example, he considers purification of the five elements better than Vajrasattva. And if you are going to do Vajrasattva, one week is sufficient, etc.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 2nd, 2011 at 6:44 AM

Title: Re: Triyik Yeshe Lama.

Content:

heart said:

You can of course chose to ignore that if you want.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, he should, his master is not all these other teachers -- his master is ChNN.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 2nd, 2011 at 6:39 AM

Title: Re: Triyik Yeshe Lama.

Content:

heart said:

Isn't there is Ngondro in SantiMaha Sangha also?

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, one to three weeks of each for the main four, refuge and so on. But this is only for SMS people. Otherwise only rushan is considered vital.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 2nd, 2011 at 3:12 AM

Title: Re: Madyamika Sautrantika vs Prasangika

Content:

conebeckham said:

Well, the thread wouldn't exist if we relied only on the Indian Texts...

Malcolm wrote:

Yes and that would be wonderful...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 1st, 2011 at 5:20 PM

Title: Re: Triyik Yeshe Lama.

Content:

deepbluehum said:

I realize this thread is about Triyik Yeshe Lama, but the Bonpo Dzogchen practitioner might be interested to know that the Shardza Tashi Gyaltsen text translated as "Heartdrops of the Dharmakaya" is a very useful instruction that covers all the same topics covered in Yeshe Lama, but has the nice feature of not being wordy and being very down to earth. Of course there are those who will disagree, but I feel the description of the view in the section on Trekcho is very good. I have had the transmissions of many Dzogchen texts and I find myself coming back to "Heartdrops" more and more, especially as my practice develops, I find its simplicity to be easy to read when you need a short glance and don't want to get too heady into information.

Malcolm wrote:

Many years ago, in 1992, ChNN advised us not to look at thogal texts prior to receiving total instructions. So people in the DC should not read that or any other togal text just because they feel like it. They should wait until ChNN or some other qualified master can bestow the teaching on them in a proper way.

My point about availability is a little different, however. I feel the text classical texts should be available, since to a large extent they are self-secret. But this does not mean people should just go ahead and read them without having had the instruction from a qualified teacher. If they do, there is a good chance they will create obstacles for their practice. So people should be mature.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 1st, 2011 at 12:26 AM

Title: Re: Madyamika Sautrantika vs Prasangika

Content:

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

The svatantrika and prasangika views are both "rangtong" madhyamaka views since they both state that genuine reality is self-empty.

Malcolm wrote:

This is incorrect. There is no such thing as rang stong, at least, not in real madhyamaka.

"If there were something subtle not empty, there would be something subtle to be empty; as there is nothing not empty, where is there something that could be empty?"

--MMK

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, October 31st, 2011 at 4:28 PM

Title: Re: Tögal for dzogchen beginners?

Content:

Namdrol said:

...

Tenerife is awesome.

-

Pero said:

I'm glad you were able to go to these teachings!

And a little bit envious too I guess haha. One question, was it his Longsal Thogal?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, October 30th, 2011 at 10:29 PM

Title: Re: Tögal for dzogchen beginners?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

For all interested people:

ChNN is giving a wonderful teaching on tögal. He even permitted people to come who have never before received teachings or transmission. Anyone who asked him was allowed to come or so I understand. There are 1100 people in attendance from all over the world. This is probably that largest single group of people outside of Tibet to receive tögal teachings at one time.

There was no empowerment. Rinpoche did only the very simplest of introductions during the first session and has spent the last three days explaining how to do this practice very thoroughly through all four visions, how to recognize them, how to develop them and the signs of attaining each one.

Namo Guru Bhyah!

He also explained very carefully why and how Dzogchen is a separate vehicle; how and why it is also related to Vajrayāna; and how and why Dzogchen does not need to depend on the methods common to Vajrayāna. He also explained why people should not be averse to the methods of Vajrayāna and why they are useful and important. All in all a balanced presentation.

He also clearly explained the principle of rainbow body and great transference body similarities and differences.

Tenerife is awesome.

N

-

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, October 26th, 2011 at 9:08 AM

Title: Re: Lazy people should just give up, right?

Content:

padma norbu said:

Crowley rejected Buddhism.

Malcolm wrote:

Not really. He considered it to be a "Yellow" school, outside of western teleologies and so therefore, something to draw from, but irrelevant to his overt rebellion against Christianity.

Nothing in Buddhism to rebel against.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, October 26th, 2011 at 8:58 AM

Title: Re: Lazy people should just give up, right?

Content:

padma norbu said:

It's clear he has a Buddhist understanding and he applies that to Thelema for some reason. Not entirely sure why.

Malcolm wrote:
Rebranding.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Wednesday, October 26th, 2011 at 7:04 AM
Title: Re: Trungpa Rinpoche's "Crazy Wisdom": Padmasambhava's Crime
Content:
Caz said:
You work with convention to benefit others not against it.

Malcolm wrote:
Tell that to Tilopa.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Wednesday, October 26th, 2011 at 7:03 AM
Title: Re: Trungpa Rinpoche's "Crazy Wisdom": Padmasambhava's Crime
Content:
Food_Eatah said:
Now, no one here has been in the same room with the Buddha. Yet where are all the scandals involving him?

Malcolm wrote:
Well, there was the girl who accused the Buddha of getting her pregnant for a starters....

Author: Malcolm
Date: Wednesday, October 26th, 2011 at 5:43 AM
Title: Re: Buddhism and the relation between mental and physical Content:
coldmountain said:
yet I know Buddhism doesn't posit a dualism.

What is physical? What is mental? Are they independent? Could the physical exist without the mental? Is one metaphysically prior to or dependent on the other?

Thanks and peace.

Malcolm wrote:
Buddhism does posit a substance dualism until you get to Yogacara.

Physical is anything made of the four elements.

Mental is all cognitions and their associates.

No.

Matter depends on the mind, even in Abhidharma.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, October 26th, 2011 at 5:40 AM

Title: Re: Ayurveda = Smoke & Mirrors

Content:

Epistemes said:

Breathe like this, breathe like that. Stretch like this, stretch like that. Eat like this, eat like that. Drink like this, drink like that.

And you'll still get punched in the stomach by a virus.

Malcolm wrote:

Not necessarily, and even if you do, you will recover much faster.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, October 24th, 2011 at 8:18 AM

Title: Re: Poll: Which Operating System Do You Use?

Content:

maybay said:

Ubuntu's come a long way in the last few years Namdrol. Once its setup its a breeze. Its a pity about Unity though. Gnome 2 was just fine. Hardware support is the main issue for me.

Namdrol said:

I never had problems with Linux. But for what I do, a mac is a far superior machine in terms of the support for unicode Tibetan and so on. Also I need to use acrobat quite a lot in my work with Tibetan texts. Linux equivalents won't cut it for me.

N

maybay said:

THDL provides Tibetan fonts for Ubuntu. They even package them in debians so you can download through the software center. Otherwise any font can be converted with the right program. PM me.

Acrobat reader is provided on Ubuntu. But if its straight Acrobat - for creating and editing - you can install it on Wine. Wine is a Windows emulator. Essentially you can install any Windows program. Only programs I've had trouble with are full-screen games. But I didn't give it much attention.

LibreOffice is the (free) Unix equivalent of Microsoft Office, and it exports to PDF just fine. I never had a problem. It can't edit PDFs though.

Malcolm wrote:

The best Tibetan Font, Monlam, is part of the Mac OS 10 operating system. Why bother with WINE? Windows programs leak memory like crazy and generally slow down any system they run on. Also font technology in the Mac beats Windows and Linux handily. The screen redraw programs on the Mac cannot be outdone by Windows or Linux.

I need to edit PDF, and manipulate them. Even Preview, on the Mac, is inadequate for this task. Also Mac OS 10 Lion is like 30 bucks and can be downloaded for one price on multiple machines.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, October 24th, 2011 at 1:19 AM

Title: Re: Subdivide Tibetan Medicine forum?

Content:

dakini_boi said:

Why not subdivide the TM forum so there's a section just for questions which only authorized TM practitioners can answer, but another section where amateurs who have an interest in TM can post their comments. That way, Tara wouldn't have to constantly "clean up" the board, and also, posts relating to TM would be easy to find, without getting lost in another more general category. At the same time, the rigorous standards of the TM board would be retained in the "only professionals are qualified to answer" section.

Malcolm wrote:

It would be better to have an alternative health forum.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, October 24th, 2011 at 12:12 AM

Title: Re: Poll: Which Operating System Do You Use?

Content:

Will said:

Too dense to understand any OS, so I stuck with Windows for years. Even after I got an "all-in-one" just so the desk would be clearer of machines. That AiO was an iMac; but I had a techie split the drive so I could have the familiar OE email etcetera. Then it got sick & died. I was going to replace it with one of the PC AiO machines now out there, but found out that Windows 7 cannot handle Outlook Express. So, what the hell, I got another iMac and am finding it not so terrible to figure out (provided I ignore 90% of its features).

I am using Snow Leopard because I heard of too many bugs in Lion. Anyone confirm or deny the flea-infested Lion rumors are true?

Malcolm wrote:

They fixed it with the iCloud release, OS X 10.7.2

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, October 24th, 2011 at 12:10 AM

Title: Re: Poll: Which Operating System Do You Use?

Content:

maybay said:

Ubuntu's come a long way in the last few years Namdrol. Once its setup its a breeze. Its a pity about Unity though. Gnome 2 was just fine. Hardware support is the main issue for me.

Malcolm wrote:

I never had problems with Linux. But for what I do, a mac is a far superior machine in terms of the support for unicode Tibetan and so on. Also I need to use acrobat quite a lot in my work with Tibetan texts. Linux equivalents won't cut it for me.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, October 23rd, 2011 at 9:06 PM

Title: Re: Trungpa Rinpoche's "Crazy Wisdom": Padmasambhava's Crime

Content:

Epistemes said:

So, nobody was actually (conventionally) killed?

Malcolm wrote:

It's a didactic tale, not history.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, October 23rd, 2011 at 9:05 PM

Title: Re: Trungpa Rinpoche's "Crazy Wisdom": Padmasambhava's Crime

Content:

Epistemes said:

Huh?? Padmasambhava accidentally murders two people and karmically gets away with it?

Malcolm wrote:

If it was an accident, there is no karmic retribution. "Karma is volition and what proceeds from volition" -- this is the definition of karma given by the Buddha.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, October 23rd, 2011 at 9:28 AM

Title: Re: Ojas

Content:

Namdrol said:

No, the most damaging thing to Ojas is anxiety and worry. The next most damaging thing to ojas poor food. The next most damaging thing to Ojas is releasing it along with semen during the summer when Ojas is not produced abundantly since one's food is too "pale" i.e. lacking substantial nutrition. During this season it is more difficult to separate.

Lhug-Pa said:

Agreed, about the anxiety and poor food part; but still, according to my understanding, Ojas should not be released with the semen at all, regardless of the season. Perhaps lay people were advised to, but Initiates (whether Buddhist or not) should transmute it to the Heart Center instead of expelling it.

Malcolm wrote:

But indeed it is, if imperfectly separated from sukra.

Lhug-Pa said:

As for the context of all of this in the Buddhist Tantras, I would have to study them more in order to understand the proper context, that is instead of simply taking your word for it based on your interpretations.

Malcolm wrote:

this is not my interpretation. This is what the texts actually say.

Lhug-Pa said:

So I'll reference what you've said here, and see what I come up with in comparing it to other Buddhist teachings whether Sutra or Tantra (and also what is within the Sacred-Sex link in my signature).

yet I also respect the already mentioned teachers of other traditions (Hindu, Gnostic, etc.), and want to take some time to learn more as well, before saying too much more on the topic.

Malcolm wrote:

I have no problem with Hindus. Caraka was a rishi. His authority in the matter is undisputed.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, October 23rd, 2011 at 9:15 AM

Title: Re: Ojas

Content:

Lhug-Pa said:

Given the above citations, among others, it is well known in Indian Yoga and Tantra that the physical Bindu and/or Ojas can be transmuted into non-physical Ojas and stored in the Brain and Heart Center (again, please see the above quotes and links in my previous posts in this thread).

Malcolm wrote:

Really, prove it. Give me a source text, a direct quotation. With Sanskrit.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, October 23rd, 2011 at 8:50 AM

Title: Re: Ojas

Content:

Lhug-Pa said:

Fair enough, if we can at least explore the possibility of Ojas being both physical and non-physical.

Malcolm wrote:

Sorry, this is just bullshit. To be frank. It is based on a misunderstanding, someone's mystical fantasies.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, October 23rd, 2011 at 8:49 AM

Title: Re: Ojas

Content:

Lhug-Pa said:

And from what I understand, its not even the loss of physical semen that's necessarily the most damaging to ones storing of Ojas. It's the spastic movements of the orgasm that releases tremendous amounts of Ojas; Ojas that ought to be saved (in the heart centre as radiance, as Keith Dowman says in Sky Dancer).

Malcolm wrote:

No, the most damaging thing to Ojas is anxiety and worry. The next most damaging thing to ojas poor food. The next most damaging thing to Ojas is releasing it along with semen during the summer when Ojas is not produced abundently since one's food is too "pale" i.e. lacking substantial nutrition. During this season it is more difficult to separate.

Basically, Lhugpa-- I could care less what Sivananda and Auer say. I care what Medicine Buddha says, Padmasambhava, Caraka, Sushruta, Vagbhata, etc. People are very confused about this issue because the tantras discuss these issues in an indirect and obscure way and people ignorant of their true meaning interpret them in many incorrect ways. On the other hand the Ayurvedic traditon and Tibetan Medical tradition discuss these things clearly and openly.

For example, Padmasambhava, since he knows medicine quite well, in the text I mentioned in the KN, discusses how to divided the rasa and kitta of the bindu. Why? Because ojas is the final physical product of the digestion of food, the final rasa.

For example, the explanatory tantra states:

"The final state of the semen (sukra) of the physical constituents (saptadhātu) is the supreme one called "ojas"; located in the heart, pervading the entire body, and causing longevity, and causing a radiant complexion and a brightness."

As I said, Caraka, etc. identify this as a clear fluid in the body, surrounding the heart etc. It is physical, not non-physical.

You do not seem to understand that in the Tibetan translation of the Aṣṭangahridayasamhita, ojas is translated as mdang when it refers to ojas, and gzi mdangs when referring to a radiant complexion, and mdangs 'gyur when referring to pitta that exists in the skin, i.e. bhrajaka pitta.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, October 23rd, 2011 at 8:20 AM

Title: Re: Ojas

Content:

Lhug-Pa said:

Well perhaps some of those Lamas such as the ones you referred to as not being educated in medical knowledge, agree with teachers such as Swami Sivananda and Samael Aun Weor, in that all of the physical semen can literally be transmuted into non-physical Ojas.

Malcolm wrote:

Ojas is a physical fluid. It is stated so quite clearly by Caraka, Sushruta, and Vagbhata. However, many people do not understand these texts because they do not understand the underlying anatomy of the body in Indian culture. I however am a fully trained Tibetan doctor, someone who has done three year retreat, have read literally thousands and thousands of pages of these texts in Tibetan.

Ojas is a physical fluid. People who think otherwise are simply mistaken.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, October 23rd, 2011 at 6:20 AM

Title: Re: Ojas

Content:

Namdrol said:

The Dzogchen term, "mdangs", i.e., radiance, has nothing to do with ojas, and nor does, gdangs, i.e., luminescence.

Lhug-Pa said:

I'm sure that in Dzogchen these terms have a much deeper context and meaning than they do in Tantra; however I doubt that the said deeper Dzogchen context and meaning completely excludes the Tantric context related to Ojas.

Malcolm wrote:

The Dzogchen context completely excludes the Tantric context related to Ojas. The word mdang does not only translate ojas. It also translates chavi i.e. chavi f. skin , cuticle , Pa1rGr , iii , 12 Hariv. 15709 Sus3r. VarBr2S. lxix , 28 ff. ; colour of the skin , colour MBh. iii , 12387 Mr2icch. Megh. &c. ; beauty , splendour Ragh. ix , 34 S3is3. ix , 3 Naish. xxii , 55 ; a ray of light L. ; cf. %kRSNa-cch-}.

When you do not know Tibetan well, or lack a grasp of how Tibetans translate various different Sanskrit terms using the same word into Tibetan, you can mislead yourself into making unwarranted conclusions.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, October 23rd, 2011 at 6:18 AM

Title: Re: Ojas

Content:

Lhug-Pa said:

[

Namdrol said:

Conserving semen is a non-issue in Dzogchen. This is clearly explained in the Khandro Nyinthig.

Lhug-Pa said:

Are these the very words of Padmasambhava or Longchenpa? Or are they the words of another commentator?

Malcolm wrote:

Padmasambhava.

Namdrol said:

In terms of highest yoga tantra, Jetsun Dragpa Gyaltsen and Sapan clearly explain there is no fault in ejaculating if one is not practicing the completion stage practices such as tummo and union yoga.

That may be, but I don't see any benefit in expelling the physical aspect of Thigle/Bodhicitta (semen) from one's body at all, whether in the context of Tantra or Dzogchen.

Malcolm wrote:

There is a very good reason: if you block or forcefully prevent ejaculation, it will result in semen stones and impotence long term. It is bad for the health of your body. If the semen moves, you should just let it go. Sukra is a kitta (snyigs ma, waste product), it is an impurity to be expelled from the body, like it's female counterpart, menstrual tissue and the oocyte, like all the kittas in the process of digestion, for example, sweat, hair, nails, rectal grease, and so on.

What is important to conserve is ojas, this is the real thigle or bindu we should care about. Ojas is most likely to be lost with semen in hot seasons like the summer (from the first day of the fourth month of the lunar calendar to the first day of the seventh month) when people are eating food with little rasa or bcud -- therefore one should only ejaculate bi-weekly during this season. In the winter one can ejaculate as much as one likes (up to five times a day) because people generally eat food that is very oily, (snum, snigdah) and nutritious (rasa, bcud) during this season. Every other day is the proper ratio during early spring and the fall.

Namdrol said:

Nevertheless, the world's spiritual traditions are unanimous regarding the benefits of the absolute conservation of semen or complete chastity (and by chastity I don't mean exoterically as in repression. I mean chastity from the esoteric viewpoint of sublimation and transmutation).

Malcolm wrote:

No, they are not. And definitely not in Anuttarayoga tantra. People who think there is something to sublimate or transform do not understand the principles of physiology that informs the tantras (and this is shockingly in common in Lamas who lack medical educations). There is something refined to retain, and something that is a residue or a waste product (of the process of refinement) to eliminate. Ojas is the former, and sukra is the latter. Really.

Namdrol said:

Is this available in English?

Malcolm wrote:

No, I am afraid it is not.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, October 23rd, 2011 at 4:19 AM

Title: Re: Ojas

Content:

Namdrol said:

The whole point of Ayurveda and Tibetan Medicine is to refine and purify ojas in the body for longevity etc. In Tibetan the term ojas is translated as "mdangs".

Lhug-Pa said:

Interesting. Are mdangs and gdangs different?

And how are they related to Thugs-rJe, gDangs, Rolpa, and rTsal in the context of Dzogchen? With Ngo-bo (Ngowo) and Rang-bZhin (Rangzhin) already in mind of course.

Malcolm wrote:

The Dzogchen term, "mdangs", i.e., radiance, has nothing to do with ojas, and nor does, gdangs, i.e., luminescence.

Conserving semen is a non-issue in Dzogchen. This is clearly explained in the Khandro Nyinthig.

In terms of highest yoga tantra, Jetsun Dragpa Gyaltsen and Sapan clearly explain there is no fault in ejaculating if one is not practicing the completion stage practices such as tummo and union yoga.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, October 23rd, 2011 at 3:11 AM

Title: Re: So this forum is comprised mostly of former New-Age hippies?

Content:

padma norbu said:

Bah, Portishead ain't psychedelia.

gregkavarnos said:
Pedant! Trip Hop then...

Malcolm wrote:
Modern psychedelia is like the magic mushroom band, ozric tentacles, etc.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Friday, October 21st, 2011 at 10:59 PM
Title: Re: Triyik Yeshe Lama.
Content:
padma norbu said:
Namdrol,

Well, to be fair, I think Tony didn't want to sell it to me for good reasons; either he didn't want me to get mixed up and confused or waste my time in a practice I was not ready for or hurt myself or whatever the possible disadvantages are of starting thogal before you're ready. If you own texts about thogal would you fax me a copy? Probably not, eh?

Malcolm wrote:
You can read all about togal on the internet.

I own many texts about togal, hundreds of them. No one asked me for my credentials to buy them. Many I downloaded. Others I bought in Tibet. Others I had shipped from India.

It is appalling that books in Tibetan that freely available to anyone with a buck can are "restricted" in English.

Things will be changing soon, I guarantee it.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Friday, October 21st, 2011 at 10:46 PM
Title: Re: Tibetan Buddhist sadhana practice for non-Buddhists
Content:
padma norbu said:
Is there such a thing published anywhere?

My mother is getting a bit old and I have noticed her emails are more and more depressed sounding. I don't know if it is possible to edit out the Buddhism of a sadhana and still have it work. Has anyone ever seen a book like this? She is very Christian and supposedly gets joy from her beliefs, but I think the only joy she gets is clinging to hope. Other than that, she looks around and sees nothing but wickedness everywhere... except in little babies and animals, which she also enjoys.

I know that sadhanas really work and work quickly, but I suppose without refuge and bodhicitta and mantra they are not going to work too well, eh? My mom wouldn't even chant anything because she thinks meditation is a way for evil spirits to enter you. It seems like she might say something like "God my creator, Jesus my savior, my wish is to be filled with love for all beings, that I may help as many as possible and leave judgement in God's hands..."

Ah, this is a stupid question, but I'm going to post it anyway just in case anyone knows of such a thing.

Malcolm wrote:

Hail Mary and the Lord's Prayer. You should buy her a really nice new rosary.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, October 21st, 2011 at 10:17 PM

Title: Re: Triyik Yeshe Lama.

Content:

padma norbu said:

congrats on rising to the challenge? Also... see Pero's response. I have zero remorse. Why? Because I did nothing wrong, no matter how hard you look for it. I had just read this other forum, literally, the day before this thread began and I literally posted my FIRST response from memory to help. My second response (after Heart's) was to clarify (complete with link pulled from my browser history). Yours? Just bullshit. Start to finish. Bullshit.

Case in point:

Yontan said:

Tony has some fine translations, but this is not the only of his works of texts previously translated that make a point to note how his is superior. He has a personal interest in selling his translations, I'm sure. We all need to eat. Grain of salt.

padma norbu said:

Right... I suppose that's why he responded to my request for the book with a brief dismissal. Because he wanted to sell it to me by not selling it to me, even after I mentioned that Snow Lion would sell me their version if I proved I have received transmission (which I have several times). Yeah... hmmm... Duff apparently wants to sell it so bad that his full response was a complete mystery to the uninitiated, along the lines of "there's no point in saying more than this, but I won't sell it to you" (paraphrased).

Malcolm wrote:

All this business of "restricted books" is elitist bullshit. Gyurme Dorje's translation of Longchenpa's commentary of Guhyagarbha is available for free and to anyone with a browser.

Every classical Dzogchen text can be read by anyone who knows Tibetan and can downloaded for free from TBRC.

The time has passed for so called "restricted translations".

While I respect the right of a given tertion to maintain brand control over his treasures, in terms of classical literature, there should be no more "restricted" texts. Its a bunch of bullshit, and these days it is perpetuated mostly by westerners.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, October 21st, 2011 at 9:53 PM

Title: Re: Poll: Which Operating System Do You Use?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

I use an iMac. Superior machine.

Linux is ok, but I am no longer a systems engineer and I am too busy to worry about running shell scripts, recompiling apps, and so on. I used to use linux all the time, but mostly for network hacking when I worked as a systems engineer. Also, I have zero interest in unix as a hobby. I like the user experience on OS X. I used to be a certified MSCE, but I hate Windows. Windows sucks.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, October 21st, 2011 at 9:10 PM

Title: Re: Spleen Qi Deficiency

Content:

dakini_boi said:

Couldn't you say that weak jatharagni would be the Ayurvedic equivalent of spleen qi deficiency? It's not an exact match, but I think that would probably be the closest thing.

I have more to say about spleen qi deficiency, but I will wait until the topic has been moved.

Malcolm wrote:

In Tibetan Medicine the spleen is the spleen, located on the left side of the body, above the pancreas. These are the types of spleen illnesses we identify explicitly as "spleen" illnesses: hot spleen illness, blood bloating, wind spleen, phlegm spleen, and swollen.

Weak stomach heat i.e. jaṭaragni is not related to the spleen itself in either Tibetan Medicine or Ayurveda. However, your intuition is good.

It seems that in Chinese medicine the spleen means the liver, and the liver means the spleen. The liver is indeed responsible for transformation and nourishing blood and muscles in Tibeian Medicine. So in my opinion when Chinese medicine is talking about spleen deficiencies we would understand this as a problem with the liver's ability to process nutrients. Our approach would be to restore liver heat, and then one can eat whatever one likes without avoiding anything. The possible approach to this would be to do a round of Pancakarma or failing that, a seasonal cleanse to remove lymphatic blockages, cleanse the biliary pathways, and cleanse the intestines of excess mucous which is blocking the uptake of nutrients in general.

This is essentially a cold liver disease from a Tibetan Medical POV.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, October 21st, 2011 at 8:52 PM

Title: Re: So this forum is comprised mostly of former New-Age hippies?

Content:

Tarpa said:

Old mod / traditional skinhead here,

Malcolm wrote:

I was the first old mod /traditional skinhead in Boston circa 1980.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, October 21st, 2011 at 4:10 AM

Title: Re: Spleen Qi Deficiency

Content:

Epistemes said:

Does TM have a parallel diagnosis for Spleen Qi Deficiency as in Traditional Chinese Medicine? What is it called?

Malcolm wrote:

Not really, different theory.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, October 20th, 2011 at 10:11 PM

Title: Re: So this forum is comprised mostly of former New-Age hippies?

Content:

himalayanspirit said:

What I did not like is that the hippies take up Buddhism due to their drug experiences, and also go on to preach about how drugs could be beneficial for Buddhists.

Malcolm wrote:

No one said this. What was said was that for many people in the west, beginning in the sixties, having some experiences with hallucinogens expanded their consciousness so they became interested in Eastern religion.

Everyone here recognizes that Buddha taught that one should avoid intoxicants.

However, everything in the world is medicine when one knows how to use it. Everything in the world is poison when one does not know how to use it. This also applies to hallucinogens. For example, there is promising research that taking LSD, etc., reduces anxiety about death in terminally ill patients. There is research that shows that MDMA helps permanently alleviate PTSD. Marijuana is proven to reduce nausea in people doing chemo-therapy, and those who have long term chronic pain, and its effects are much less destructive than opiates. Alcohol also has many medicinal effects. The Buddha permitted monks to use alcohol for medical conditions. So we must have a flexible view.

Perfectly respectable non-Buddhist people are better people because they have had spiritual experiences from taking Ayahuasca, and so on. We may not make that choice for ourselves, but we are in no position to judge them.

Some people destroy their lives with food. But no one suggests that we all stop eating.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, October 20th, 2011 at 9:57 PM

Title: Re: Spontaneous Presence

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

There is no practice of spontaneous presence [lhun grub] per se. Lhun grub in fact refers to natural [lhun] formation [grub] of the basis. There is a practice related to this aspect of Dzogchen teachings, however, called thögal. It has nothing to do with anything taught by Tolle.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, October 20th, 2011 at 4:16 AM

Title: Re: astrology

Content:

maybay said:

Most modern Indian astrologers use the sidereal zodiac which puts all the symbolism out by a sign and a half.

Some like Ernst Wilhelm say use the tropical for the signs and sidereal for the nakshatras.

Malcolm wrote:

Kalacakra uses tropical for everything.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, October 19th, 2011 at 8:00 PM

Title: Re: Gayatri Mantra in Tibetan Buddhism

Content:

dharmasack said:

I have definitely heard recordings of Tibetan Monks chanting it, but other than that I don't know much.

Malcolm wrote:

Nope, you have not. The Gayatri does not exist as a tradition in Buddhism of any kind. There may however be some Western Tibetan Buddhists that are fond of chanting it (I know one too).

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, October 19th, 2011 at 7:58 PM

Title: Re: Debunking Homeopathy

Content:

catmoon said:

So who can you trust? Sadly, you can't trust anyone all the time, but the standard doctor in a white coat does have a nearly 100% success rate with some things. You can trust him to set your broken bones, suture your cuts and scrapes, lance boils and they are pretty good with infections. But the moment he hands you a pill with a name a yard long, you're on your own. It might be good, it or might wreck your kidneys, or your liver, or send you into some psychotic hell of no return in twenty years. There's just no way to know.

Malcolm wrote:

The difference between modern pharmaceuticals and Tibetan and Ayurvedic formulas (as well as Chinese formulas) is that the former have no track record and are relatively recent. The latter have been tested on human populations for 1000 years+ and their effects, dosages, indications, and counter-indications are well known and described.

The caveat is that herbal medicines, like their allopathic counterpart, require a) a medical theory which underlies a nosology b) a clinically experienced doctor trained in that field of medicine.

I personally have no confidence in the efficacy of homeopathic formulas. But they are also not harmful. So if people want to spend their money on them, I have no problem with it.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, October 19th, 2011 at 7:28 AM

Title: Re: Debunking Homeopathy

Content:

Epistemes said:

My girlfriend's mother is a big advocate of homeopathic medicine. I don't know even know what it is.

All I've gathered is that it is supposedly better than allopathic medicine for the sole reason that it isn't allopathic medicine and a stranger to Big Pharma.

It seems like a pretty generic term for anti-allopathic medicine.

I think my girlfriend is actually currently seeing a homeopathic doctor for her angioedema. Or maybe it's an Oriental medicine doctor? All I know is that she's taking some Chinese herbs and getting acupuncture done. It's hard to keep track since she's been to so many doctors with this thing.

Malcolm wrote:

CHinese medicine and not homeopathy.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, October 19th, 2011 at 3:26 AM

Title: Re: Debunking Homeopathy

Content:

AdmiraUim said:

It is my plan along with the Humanist Society in Aberdeen city, to hold a stall advocating removing funding for Homeopathic remedies at the cost of the National Health Service. currently the uk government supports despite hard financial times funding for 4 homeopathic hospitals. Medical studies have shown no effect of homeopathy besides the placebo effect. It is my plan this Sunday to have a mass overdose of homeopathic remedies - anyone with a elementary knowledge of chemistry should understand that there is no active ingredient in these remedies.

Malcolm wrote:

You're just jealous that you didn't think of the $20 million duck first.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, October 19th, 2011 at 3:19 AM

Title: Re: Tibetanmedicine-edu.org 3 year online course

Content:

AdmiraUim said:

How much does it cost? I have often wondered what the benefits of a dual qualification in western and tibetan medicine would be.

Malcolm wrote:

One will be able to practice Tibetan medicine without obstacles.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, October 18th, 2011 at 10:53 PM

Title: Re: Tibetanmedicine-edu.org 3 year online course

Content:

Inge said:

Do you know if the three year Tibetan medicine distant learning online course of Dr. Pasang Y. Arya T. Sherpa at <http://www.tibetanmedicine-edu.org/index.php/tibetan-medicine-course> is a good program?

Malcolm wrote:

He is a qualified doctor, so I am sure it is fine.

There are two other options as well.

My Alma mater:

<http://tibetanmedicineschool.org/programs/4-year-program/> "
onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

Nida Chenagtsang's program:

<http://www.thesoriginstitute.com/> " onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

All three are fine programs, all have their strengths and their weaknesses. All three are run by qualified Tibetan doctors who speak english well.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, October 18th, 2011 at 7:48 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Military Sangha (U.S.)

Content:

kirtu said:

I also see this hyperconservatism in... Massachusetts ..."

Malcolm wrote:

Maybe the Massachusetts in some alternate universe, but not in the Massachusetts I live in. Of course, I am merely 15 miles from the VT border as the crow flies (go bernie!).

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, October 18th, 2011 at 5:12 AM

Title: Re: longterm use of agar-35 & semde

Content:

pemachophel said:

Namdrol,

One other question: Paltul Rinpoche has had me on the same three sets of TM pills for almost a year now. Does that mean they are being absorbed as food and not as medicine?

Malcolm wrote:

Depends on the medicine and depends on the disease. Some chronic diseases, like Padkan Mugpo, have to be treated for a year or more. In this case one takes usually one herb for a very long time, and other herbs are often, but not always, changed for season and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, October 17th, 2011 at 9:41 PM

Title: Re: Killing Insects and Buddhism

Content:

Namdrol said:

[quote="edearl"

...

A house mice may not be able to survive in a forest, they have adapted to living with humans and in open fields, according to Wikipedia.

edearl said:

This is an example of where Wiki and reality do not meet. The mice we have in our house _are_ field mice.

N

I checked some additional sources.

According to <http://faculty.njcu.edu/fmoran/vol4fieldmouse.htm> "

onclick="window.open(this.href);return false; the long tailed field mouse never lives in houses.

Malcolm wrote:

They should come to my attic, then. They will understand something different.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, October 17th, 2011 at 8:32 PM

Title: Re: Ayahuasca and Buddhism

Content:

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

Is there anything in experience that is not a hallucination?

I'm not much of a fan of Batchelor but he had one metaphor that I thought was good - practice is like climbing the mountain, psychedelics are like being helicoptered to the summit. Certainly for the long term it doesn't seem like a good idea to rely on the helicopter. But it may give some boost to faith.

gregkavarnos said:

Except that after taking you for a brief trip to the summit, they then drop you off at the lowest level of the subteranean cave system which exists below the mountain, rather than at the base of the mountain. Thus one requires to expend twice as much energy just to get to zero again. Then with every subsequent use they drop you even further until in the end you don't even bother trying to reach the summit anymore, you're happy enough to just briefly gaze upon the summit after every hit.

Malcolm wrote:

According to Garab Dorje, the purpose of using hallucinogens is to see that the mind is malleable, not a fixed or permanent substance. So, in fact hallucinogens do have a use in Dharma, albeit an extremely limited and narrow one.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, October 17th, 2011 at 7:05 PM

Title: Re: Killing Insects and Buddhism

Content:

Epistemes said:

...

We've captured squirrels before in a cage, driven a few miles away, then let them out.

Pero said:

Hm yeah, I suppose I could drive them to the forest nearby.

edearl said:

A house mice may not be able to survive in a forest, they have adapted to living with humans and in open fields, according to Wikipedia.

Malcolm wrote:

This is an example of where Wiki and reality do not meet. The mice we have in our house _are_ field mice.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, October 17th, 2011 at 7:03 PM

Title: Re: Killing Insects and Buddhism

Content:

Ryoto said:

The other day I had mice in my house who were leaving crap everywhere and chewing into packaged foods so I got these glue traps which caught 3 of them in one night. They will die a slow death but it had to be done.

Tilopa said:

It didn't have to be done like that. There are other ways of catching mice that don't involve killing:

<http://members.aceweb.com/patrussell/mousetrap/Mousetrap.htm> "
onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

Pero said:

That's cool, we have mice in our house too and I was thinking if there was another way instead of killing them. The thing is though, it is not a complete solution. What do you do with the mice? Throwing them out is no solution IMO, they'll just come back.

Malcolm wrote:

You have to drive them about 3 miles away from your house. Preferably across a stream. That is what I do.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, October 17th, 2011 at 8:02 AM

Title: Re: longterm use of agar-35 & semde

Content:

pemachophel said:

Namdrol,

Sorry, I did not read your previous explanation of this, but can you please explain how the body processes foods differently than medicines according to TM? My initial impression is that the body is going to process anything that is ingested p.o. in the same way via the same digestive processes. How does the body distinguish between a food/herb and a medicine?

Sorry if I'm being obtuse here.

Thanks.

Malcolm wrote:

According to the four tantras, it states that medicines are completely digested within an hour or so after being ingested. Food takes seven days to fully digest. When you use herbs for too long, the herb in question is no longer digested rapidly. By digest, we mean for the rasa of the food to work its way through the blood, muscle, fat, bone, marrow and semen.

There are of course some exceptions, but not many.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, October 17th, 2011 at 7:59 AM

Title: Re: Evolution of humans and Mahayana Buddhism

Content:

Aemilius said:

I've never read the Vedas myself, except maybe some short excerpts, but a friend of mine who works in the University Library said that in Vedas there is a description of Earth being like an iron ball in space, that is held in place by invisible magnets.

Malcolm wrote:

As far as I know, this cosmological description is found in the Surya Siddhanta, which cannot be later than the 5th century. But I don't think it is found in the Vedas.

In the Surya Siddhanta, the earth is described as round, suspended in space like a piece of iron held in place by the forcefield of two magnets. Mt Meru is at the North Pole, where the gods live, and the anti-Meru is at the south pole, where the asuras live.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, October 16th, 2011 at 7:01 AM

Title: Re: Lazy people should just give up, right?

Content:

padma norbu said:

Dzogchen way is not creative visualization.

Malcolm wrote:

The Dzogchen way does not exclude visualization. Quite the contrary.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, October 16th, 2011 at 5:26 AM

Title: Re: Questions for those who prefer Sanskrit mantra pronunciation

Content:

Namdrol said:

You are going to have to ask them. If you ask the same question over and over again, it starts to become a little annoying.

dakini_boi said:

It's impossible to tell on an internet forum if the question was overlooked, misunderstood, or if no one had the answer. In all honesty, Namdrol, you're so incredibly knowledgeable that I assumed you probably would have had an answer, and therefore must have either overlooked or misunderstood the question. I didn't mean to be annoying.

Malcolm wrote:

Ok.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, October 16th, 2011 at 5:11 AM

Title: Re: Questions for those who prefer Sanskrit mantra pronunciation

Content:

dakini_boi said:

But in all other cases besides the b/v issue, you can easily recover Sanskrit pronunciation just from looking at the Tibetan text - for example, even though Tibetans say "Bhekhandze" or "Sutokhayo" etc, the Tibetan text retains the Sanskrit pronunciation. So why would they have chosen to transcribe Sanskrit ँ in such a way that it is unclear whether it should be pronounced v or b? Since no Tibetan words contain ँ, then presumably this character was invented specifically to transcribe ँ. So why was it not used uniformly?

Malcolm wrote:

I did not say there were no Tibetan words that use ँ, just that there are very few. If you examine that construction of ँ you will see that it is a modified ँ.

ཁ means fox, BTW. For example, I have seen varttika spelled with both a ཁ and ཁ. Just chalk it up to human inconsistency and move on.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, October 16th, 2011 at 5:08 AM

Title: Re: Questions for those who prefer Sanskrit mantra pronunciation

Content:

dakini_boi said:

So why was it not used uniformly?

Malcolm wrote:

You are going to have to ask them. If you ask the same question over and over again, it starts to become a little annoying.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, October 16th, 2011 at 4:38 AM

Title: Re: Questions for those who prefer Sanskrit mantra pronunciation

Content:

dakini_boi said:

Also, from this conversation it appears likely that even Guru Rinpoche himself might have said "Bajra," being that he was from the north. This would also explain why written Tibetan Sanskrit uses འ instead of ཨ for many cases where originally you would have ཨ.

Malcolm wrote:

No, this is more easily explained than that: in Tibetan, འ and ཨ are pronounced the same way in some dialects such as Amdo. Also, འ following a ར is also pronounced ཨ, as in རའང་. There, it is like that at the point when Thonmi was formalizing Tibetan grammar, འ and ཨ were pronounced very similarly and were in some sense interchangeable. In fact, there were very few Tibetan words that begin with ཨ, and no words that contain it.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, October 15th, 2011 at 11:10 PM

Title: Re: Killing Insects and Buddhism

Content:

cooran said:

Hello all,

What are the karmic results of deliberately killing insects?

Kai said:

Just like the normal karmic effect coming from unwholesome action of killing combined with having ill will or aversion;

Illness, disability and short life in the next rebirth, born in war zone area, unattractive, lots of enemies, etc.....

cooran said:

Thanks Kai. Though I'm not sure many people in this thread accept or believe the Teachings on this matter - as they write about intentionally killing other beings frequently.

Malcolm wrote:

Accept and beleive. Also, one must keep in mind that a karmic act is perfect only if you are happy about it.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, October 15th, 2011 at 10:11 PM

Title: Re: Questions for those who prefer Sanskrit mantra pronunciation

Content:

ratna said:

Slightly off-topic -- the difference between ba and va is not as great as one might think:

<https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=gCvdZhrEmm4&feature=related> "

onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

Malcolm wrote:

Doesn't work on me.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, October 15th, 2011 at 9:12 AM

Title: Re: Questions for those who prefer Sanskrit mantra pronunciation

Content:

Greg said:

Do all of these things apply to "va" sounds in the middle or end of a word? It wouldn't be "Bajrasatba" would it?

Malcolm wrote:

According to my Varanasi trained Lama, Wajrasattwa. Hewajra, etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, October 15th, 2011 at 5:30 AM

Title: Re: Questions for those who prefer Sanskrit mantra pronunciation

Content:

tantular said:

To Namdrol: is Sapan's description in the Khenjug? I'd love to read it. While the absence of different characters for v and b is strong evidence that in ordinary speech these 2 consonants had already merged in Sapan's time, if he explicitly states that they were distinguished, it could indicate that in special circumstances care was taken to pronounce them correctly. And just to be clear, I wholeheartedly agree with your main point: there is such a thing as "correct" Sanskrit pronunciation, and people should make an effort to follow it. śuddham astu!

Malcolm wrote:

Sapan says that in some places va is pronounced ba, like in Kashmir.

It is in collected works, I will get you the reference.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, October 15th, 2011 at 12:03 AM

Title: Re: Questions for those who prefer Sanskrit mantra pronunciation

Content:

Karma Dorje said:

It is unlikely that they were reading mantras from books and pronouncing them differently than their preceptors.

Malcolm wrote:

We will agree to disagree.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, October 14th, 2011 at 11:51 PM

Title: Re: Questions for those who prefer Sanskrit mantra pronunciation

Content:

tantular said:

There is evidence that the sound change v → b is quite old; the post-Gupta, 6--7th century CE Buddhapālita manuscript in Beijing, for example, does not distinguish the characters for b and v. This is also a standard feature for all the scripts used in 11--12th century manuscripts from north eastern India & Nepal (the earliest period for which large numbers of manuscripts survive). So I think it's quite likely that the gurus from Nepal and Pala-lands during the later transmission said "bajra."

Malcolm wrote:

Sakya Pandita notes these regional differences circa 1210 ad.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, October 14th, 2011 at 10:17 PM

Title: Re: Lamrim Chenmo in Tibetan

Content:

Totoro said:

Does anyone know where I can download Lamrim Chenmo in Tibetan? I've tried TBRC but don't seem to have any scanned there. Thanks.

Malcolm wrote:

http://tbrc.org/link/?RID=O00EGS10257%7CO00EGS10257365\$W22272#library_work_Object-O00EGS10257%257CO00EGS10257365\$W22272

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, October 14th, 2011 at 9:59 PM

Title: Re: Questions for those who prefer Sanskrit mantra pronunciation

Content:

tantular said:

Bengalis, including educated Brahmins, pronounce vajra as bodzro (in IPA). To English-speaking ears, this does indeed sound alot like "bodzro." English speakers hear the short vowel a as a short o or u; witness loan-words like pundit, pyjamas, juggernaut, etc. In my experience Nepali and Bengali pandits are the most difficult to understand if you are only used to the "standard" pronunciation.

Namdrol said:

yes, but one cannot infer from this that Tibetan pronunciations descend from modern Bengali pronunciations.

Karma Dorje said:

I certainly wasn't suggesting that. As I said, the Tibetan's Indian gurus might have been closer to the Tibetan pronunciation than we would surmise taking Varanasi pronunciations as our guidepost.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, it is not likely. Why? Because we have on hand Sakya Pandita text on how to pronounce mantras, and he was student of various panditas from various parts of India, and his uncle and grandfather were all fluent in Sanskrit.

Tibetan pronunciation of mantras can be accounted for very easily. Most Tibetans did not know Sanskrit, and pronounced mantras in texts phonetically as they saw them, rather than as they were intended, for example pronouncing རྩ as dza rather than ja, which is what was intended, or pronouncing ཅིཌ as tsitta rather than citta.

We do the same thing to Tibetan. I know many people in Dzogchen Community who still pronounce the o in dzog as in dog, rather than as in oak. Or people who pronounce prajna as if the j were to pronounced as in ajax, rather than a gñ complex.

N

Etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, October 14th, 2011 at 9:00 PM

Title: Re: Questions for those who prefer Sanskrit mantra pronunciation

Content:

tantular said:

Bengalis, including educated Brahmins, pronounce vajra as bōdzro (in IPA). To English-speaking ears, this does indeed sound alot like "bodzro." English speakers hear the short vowel a as a short o or u; witness loan-words like pundit, pyjamas, juggernaut, etc. In my experience Nepali and Bengali pandits are the most difficult to understand if you are only used to the "standard" pronunciation.

Malcolm wrote:

yes, but one cannot infer from this that Tibetan pronunciations descend from modern Bengali pronunciations.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, October 14th, 2011 at 7:17 PM

Title: Re: Questions for those who prefer Sanskrit mantra pronunciation

Content:

Karma Dorje said:

For instance, vajra in Bengali is pronounced "bozro".

.

Namdrol said:

Where did you discover this?

Karma Dorje said:

From Bengali friends in our local Kalibari. Why do you ask?

Malcolm wrote:

Well, this inference of yours is a bit synchronic. Pronunciations tend to evolve over time, unless artificially frozen.

How to Bengali Brahmins pronounce Vajra in Sanskrit?

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, October 14th, 2011 at 8:15 AM

Title: Re: Is Buddhism hopeless?

Content:

Epistemes said:

Vimala is a wonderful medicine.

Namdrol said:

Dharma is better. But sometimes the medicine does not appear to taste good.

Epistemes said:

I agree, but:

"It's no good building a new crystal cage out of the [Buddhist] teachings. However beautiful it might be, it's still a cage[.]"

--Chogyal Namkhai Norbu

Malcolm wrote:

You have apparently mistaken me for a dogmatist.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, October 14th, 2011 at 3:59 AM

Title: Re: Is Buddhism hopeless?

Content:

Epistemes said:

Vimala is a wonderful medicine.

Malcolm wrote:

Dharma is better. But sometimes the medicine does not appear to taste good.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, October 14th, 2011 at 2:09 AM

Title: Re: Gardasil and tanning beds

Content:

Nangwa said:

The simple truth is that if you are a parent and dont get your child (male or female) the HPV vaccination you are putting your child at unnecessary risk.

Malcolm wrote:

I personally think it is wrong to force children and teenagers to have vaccines for sexually transmitted diseases when they are not sexually active.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, October 14th, 2011 at 12:19 AM

Title: Re: 100 Syllable Mantra SUPO KAYO ME BHAVA

Content:

heart said:

I think someone told me a long time ago that Sanskrit probably never was a spoken language, is that not true?

/magnus

Greg said:

What I've been told is that for the most part there was never anyone monolingual in Sanskrit. That is, Brahmins who used Sanskrit for religious purposes would nonetheless always converse with their wives (for example) in a prakrit, and generally conduct their secular affairs in prakrit.

Malcolm wrote:

Depends, Sanskrit was like Latin. It is what educated people spoke to on another in.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, October 13th, 2011 at 11:49 PM

Title: Re: Killing Insects and Buddhism

Content:

ananda said:

Since insects are ignorant of morality and we humans are the higher form of life then shouldn't we practice ahimsa towards even household flies and pests despite the problems they create for us ?

Malcolm wrote:

Up until the point that they become a problem like spreading disease, ruining our food and so on. That being said, I have not knowingly killed a single creature on purpose since I became a Buddhist 25 years ago.

However, if my house were infested with carpenter ants, for example, and so on, I would exterminate them, even though I would feel bad about it.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, October 13th, 2011 at 10:50 PM

Title: Re: What body is this?

Content:

DarwidHalim said:

When Buddha gave Abhidhamma teaching, he was in Tusita Heaven. Tusita heaven is a higher realm in samsara. It is not a pure land.

My question is: what kind of body did he use when he appear in front of his mother and other audiences? Is it nirmanakaya form or sambogakaya form?

Malcolm wrote:
His physical body.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, October 13th, 2011 at 7:14 PM

Title: Re: Questions for those who prefer Sanskrit mantra pronunciation

Content:

dakini_boi said:

The topic about the 100-syllable mantra got me thinking.

(<https://www.dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=40&t=5234> "
onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;")

It makes perfect sense to use Sanskrit pronunciation if one is able to. At least for mantras that were transmitted in a lineage starting in India - but what about mantras originally revealed as Tibetan terma, which have no precedent in India?

Malcolm wrote:

They nevertheless are written down with the full complement of diacritics unless they are using words that are Tibetans like 'shig shig, sod sod" etc.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, October 13th, 2011 at 7:11 PM

Title: Re: Questions for those who prefer Sanskrit mantra pronunciation

Content:

Karma Dorje said:

For instance, vajra in Bengali is pronounced "bozro".

.

Malcolm wrote:

Where did you discover this?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, October 13th, 2011 at 6:43 AM

Title: Re: Cheerful Thought For The Day

Content:
Virgo said:
Impermanence.

Kevin

Malcolm wrote:
Indeed, but there is no need to hasten the process through poor ecological management.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Thursday, October 13th, 2011 at 4:29 AM
Title: Re: Is Buddhism hopeless?
Content:
Virgo said:
Hi Acchantika,

I'm not sure that differs from what I said.

Virgo:

"Samatha simply calms your mind and may temporarily suppress some gross defilements, that's about it (in general)"

Kevin

Acchantika said:
Best to ask a qualified teacher, which I am not.

According to the quote, gross defilements are not temporarily suppressed but "subside in their own place".

Shamatha is effortless, always.

Suppression requires effort, always.

So, always, suppression is not shamatha.

Therefore, the difference between the quote and what you said is the difference between shamatha and not-shamatha.

Malcolm wrote:
No, Kevin is basically correct in what he says, and it does not contradict Ranjung Dorje.

Shamatha by nature only suppresses afflictions, it does not uproot them. It doesn't mean that when you are doing shamatha you are supressing anything.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, October 13th, 2011 at 3:58 AM

Title: Re: Is Buddhism hopeless?

Content:

Namdrol said:

Had you not practice dharma in the past, you would not be interested in it today.

Epistemes said:

Do you mean past lives, or 12 years ago when an ex-girlfriend gave me Steve Hagen's introduction for my birthday?

If the former, I don't believe you.

Malcolm wrote:

Your conceptual limitations are irrelevant.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, October 13th, 2011 at 3:56 AM

Title: Re: Is Buddhism hopeless?

Content:

Virgo said:

Samatha simply calms your mind and may temporarily supress some gross defilements, that's about it (in general).

Acchantika said:

I'm not sure what you are referring to, but shamatha as taught in the Tibetan traditions has nothing to do with this.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, it is the same. Please read, for example Sakya Pandita, Tsongkhapa, etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, October 13th, 2011 at 3:27 AM

Title: Re: Is Buddhism hopeless?

Content:

Namdrol said:

But when you have Dharma, then your life has meaning, and your relationships, and your job, etc.

Epistemes said:

I, at one time, said that about Jesus Christ. Just saying.

I'm holding up one finger, not two.

Malcolm wrote:

The difference is, Jesus is outside, and he does not exist [well, dead, at any rate]. The dharma is inside of your lived experience, and depends on no one but you. It lives with you and is carried with you from life to life time. Had you not practice dharma in the past, you would not be interested in it today.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, October 13th, 2011 at 2:50 AM

Title: Re: Is Buddhism hopeless?

Content:

Epistemes said:

The thing which we all wrestle with is the death of our loved ones. Especially if you're strongly attached like me. You spend countless hours and dollars with them and on them, all of which has the appearance of meaning, and then it's over one way or another. I understand the Buddhist premise that we should be more emotionally available to all beings and not limited in our loving-kindness, but, while not impossible, it doesn't necessarily completely dispense with certain attachments that we're naturally going to have with our loved ones. But what do I know? I'm afflictively attached to people in my life, to myself, to "my world," and so much more, and I probably have accumulated only about 45 total hours on the cushion.

Malcolm wrote:

Life has no meaning, your relationships, your job, etc.

But when you have Dharma, then your life has meaning, and your relationships, and your job, etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, October 12th, 2011 at 11:53 PM

Title: Re: Is Buddhism hopeless?

Content:

Epistemes said:

Buddhists believe in rebirth. Buddhists also claim that there is no chronological first beginning to the series of past lives. We have all of us been reborn an infinite number of times. No God is needed to start the series off – for there simply was no first beginning. Things have been around (somewhere) for all eternity.

If rebirth is true, realistically we really have no hope. It is a hopeless doctrine.

I cannot imagine being reborn as a stinkbug precisely because there is nothing to imagine. I quite simply would not be there at all. If rebirth is true, neither I nor any of my loved ones survive death. With rebirth, for me – the actual person I am – the story really is over. There may be another being living its life in some sort of causal connection with the life that was me (influenced by my karma), but for me there is no more. There is no more to be said about me.

If Buddhism is correct, then unless I attain enlightenment or something like it in this lifetime, I have no hope. Clearly, I am not going to attain enlightenment in this life. Many of you will be inclined to accept that as true about myself and about your own enlightenment, as well, since enlightenment is a supreme and extremely rare achievement - not for the likes of someone like me. So I and all my friends and family have in themselves no hope. More than that, from a Buddhist perspective, in the scale of infinite time, the significance of each of us as such, as the person we currently are, converges on nothing - for each of us lives our lives and then perishes. Then we're lost forever.

Again, if rebirth is true, we really have no hope. It is a hopeless doctrine.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, Buddhism is a hopeless doctrine. Hope is bullshit. It's just the other face of fear. Joe is right, incidentally, your comments here are an expression of intense grasping at identity. Your identity is a conceptual fiction. You are attached to a delusion.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, October 12th, 2011 at 11:45 PM

Title: Re: Is Buddhism hopeless?

Content:

Epistemes said:

If rebirth is true, realistically we really have no hope. It is a hopeless doctrine.

Chaz said:

If that's what you think, then that's what it is.

For you it's hopeless.

For you it's meaningless.

For you it's pointless.

We get it.

Can we move on now?

Epistemes said:

You're about as useful as a compliment from a whore.

Malcolm wrote:

In the meantime, apart from all the hand-wringing about existential issues, you should do something spiritually useful that requires no beliefs in anything whatsoever.

Yoga. There are several yoga studios where you live.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, October 12th, 2011 at 9:06 PM

Title: Cheerful Thought For The Day

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

We're doomed:

How bad could it get? A recent study by MIT projects that without "rapid and massive action" to cut carbon pollution, the Earth's temperature could soar by nine degrees this century. "There are no analogies in human history for a temperature jump of that size in such a short time period," says Tony McMichael, an epidemiologist at Australian National University. The few times in human history when temperatures fell by seven degrees, he points out, the sudden shift likely triggered a bubonic plague in Europe, caused the abrupt collapse of the Moche civilization in Peru and reduced the entire human race to as few as 1,000 breeding pairs after a volcanic eruption blocked out the sun some 73,000 years ago. "We think that because we are a technologically sophisticated society, we are less vulnerable to these kinds of dramatic shifts in climate," McMichael says. "But in some ways, because of the interconnectedness of our world, we are more vulnerable."

<http://www.rollingstone.com/politics/news/climate-change-and-the-end-of-australia-20111003> " onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, October 12th, 2011 at 7:19 PM

Title: Re: Rebuilding civilization in North America

Content:

Namdrol said:

Passive solar has limited effectiveness in New England. However, you are right, new homes can be designed to maximize their solar uptake. But it is exorbitant to retrofit a home. For example, I live in a 1829 farmhouse. I would like us to refit our house with a geothermal system because I think this is the most efficient way to heat in the winter. But we do not have the money at present.

N

edearl said:

Here is a link about a passive solar home in Ontario, Canada.

<http://www.glenhunter.ca/passive-solar/> " onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

They do not seem to have a way to seal their south facing windows, such as window blankets, which would help during the coldest weather. They report using auxiliary heating only in January. I think anywhere in the US, except parts of Alaska. is a good place for passive solar.

Malcolm wrote:

That's not going to be useful in the majority of presently existing homes.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, October 12th, 2011 at 7:17 PM

Title: Re: Rebuilding civilization in North America

Content:

kirtu said:

You should have seen when Ani Kunga told me in the 1700's Colonists clear cut the woods around their towns (and that we probably have denser forests on average on the East Coast than we've had for 200 years).

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, they did, they were bent on recreating England. They did it on purpose to warm microclimates. Ben Franklin talks about this.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, October 12th, 2011 at 5:25 AM

Title: Re: Rebuilding civilization in North America

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Passive solar has limited effectiveness in New England. However, you are right, new homes can be designed to maximize their solar uptake. But it is exorbinant to retrofit a home. For example, I live in a 1829 farmhouse. I would like us to refit our house with a geothermal system because I think this is the most efficient way to heat in the winter. But we do not have the money at present.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, October 12th, 2011 at 5:15 AM

Title: Re: Medical Studies

Content:

AdmiraUim said:

Hi there,

I have training in western medicine and I am curious if there have been any randomised control studies conducted using Tibetan Medicine. I know studies have been done regarding certain chinese medical treatments. for instance the efficacy of chinese acupuncture in rheumatic conditions has been well verified.

Malcolm wrote:

They have done some, both in China and India (Ayurveda).

But things like the three doṣas, which are fundamental to Tibetan Medicine as Ayurveda are phenomenological ways of looking health i.e. you cannot identify a substance in the body called pitta. Translating it as bile is inaccurate, since as we know, bile is an alkaline substance which neutralize stomach acids in the small intestine. But pitta, which is considered to be the heat of the body, primarily, has various functions which frankly, you can't observe. All you can do is observe, "they have this theory. Based on the this theory, are the treatment outcomes effective or not for the conditions they are treating".

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, October 12th, 2011 at 5:01 AM

Title: Re: longterm use of agar-35 & semde

Content:

Namdrol said:

ONE should generally not use any herb for more than three months.

Epistemes said:

Why? Dependency?

Malcolm wrote:

No, as I explained once before, it is because the herbs are treated by the body as food, rather than medicine.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, October 12th, 2011 at 4:20 AM

Title: Re: longterm use of agar-35 & semde

Content:

dakini_boi said:

Is it safe to use these formulas long-term - like for a year, or even years? This is assuming one doesn't have any major health risks.

Malcolm wrote:

ONE should generally not use any herb for more than three months.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, October 12th, 2011 at 4:03 AM

Title: Re: Rebuilding civilization in North America

Content:

Namdrol said:

134-14 acres of northern hardwood stand will last such a place an indefinite period of time if cut carefully -- first taking out old tree and sick trees, leaving saplings, middle aged trees so on and so on.

If you are in NE, you can use this as a guide to figure it out:

http://extension.unh.edu/resources/files/Resource001044_Rep1200.pdf "
onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;"

Common idea is that you can get 1 cord an acre. But I think this is not based on a very scientific understanding as that sheet shows.

Basically, if we are talking maple, for example, it takes 20 years for a maple tree to reach an ideal size for firewood. If you have a large enough lot you can rotate through your acreage preserving mother trees and always having abundant fuel and more for your descendants. All it takes is a little thought.

Sönam said:

In your rotation you will need some more space to let the regeneration of the earth ...

Malcolm wrote:

Not really. This is not like growing crops. This is selectively picking trees and felling them in a rotation, while trying to maintain a whole population.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, October 11th, 2011 at 11:43 PM

Title: Re: Creation Stage and the attainment of Bhumis

Content:

Kai said:

He defined the Kadag Chenpo as the union between Kadag and lhun grub

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, of course.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, October 11th, 2011 at 11:04 PM

Title: Re: Rebuilding civilization in North America

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

134-14 acres of northern hardwood stand will last such a place an indefinite period of time if cut carefully -- first taking out old tree and sick trees, leaving saplings, middle aged trees so on and so on.

If you are in NE, you can use this as a guide to figure it out:

http://extension.unh.edu/resources/files/Resource001044_Rep1200.pdf "
onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

Common idea is that you can get 1 cord an acre. But I think this is not based on a very scientific understanding as that sheet shows.

Basically, if we are talking maple, for example, it takes 20 years for a maple tree to reach an ideal size for firewood. If you have a large enough lot you can rotate through your acreage preserving mother trees and always having abundant fuel and more for your descendants. All it takes is a little thought.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, October 11th, 2011 at 10:23 PM

Title: Re: Creation Stage and the attainment of Bhumis

Content:

Namdrol said:

BTW:

de nas ye shes kyi snang ba la gnas pa ni
sa bcu bzhi pa la gnas pa yin no

After that, abiding in the appearances of wisdom is abiding on the fourteenth bhumi. No name is given.

Pero said:

Ahh right, I didn't pay enough attention, saw 14th and gnas pa and didn't look deeper hehe. Thanks for the correction.

Malcolm wrote:

It also means, despite my failure to examine the version in the NGB, that Carpiles is incorrect in asserting that Vajradhara is only a name for Mahayoga and Anuyoga results.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, October 11th, 2011 at 10:07 PM

Title: Re: Creation Stage and the attainment of Bhumis

Content:

Kai said:

it is possible to reach a fifteenth level, designated as "Vajradhara level," and a sixteenth level, known as the "level of supreme primordial gnosis"[/b] (however, even when the Path is explained in terms of this multi-level optics, the individual is said not to go through the levels in the gradual way typical of the Mahayana, but in such a way that it is not possible to pinpoint the precise level the individual is going through at any given moment)

Namdrol said:

Yes, Capriles made an small error, marked in red.

Rig pa rang shar:

"...is mounting the thirteenth stage, the wheel of letters. Next, abiding in the vision of wisdom is mounting the fourteenth stage, Great Bliss. Next, obtaining certainty in the stage of natural formation is mounting the fifteenth stage, Samadhi. Next, the non-existence of anything higher after wisdom naturally arises on the stage of original purity is mounting the sixteenth stage, Highest Wisdom."

Wheel of Letters is a synonym for Vajradhara.

Pero said:

I don't think it's a mistake by Capriles. In the version of RR I'm looking at the 15th level is called Vajradhara. 13th level is the great accumulation of the wheel of letters like yours. The 14th bhumi is strangely called just "gnas pa".

Malcolm wrote:

I take it back:

Shabkar states:

Reaching the stage of original purity after completing them is called "the Stage of the Protector Vajradhara".

Here he is referring to the 16th bhumi. The citation I was drawing from was a citational gloss in the Khandro Nynthig. It obviously is drawing on a different manuscript tradition than the version present in the Nyingma GB.

BTW:

de nas ye shes kyi snang ba la gnas pa ni
sa bcu bzhi pa la gnas pa yin no

After that, abiding in the appearances of wisdom is abiding on the fourteenth bhumi. No name is given.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, October 11th, 2011 at 9:45 PM

Title: Re: Creation Stage and the attainment of Bhumis

Content:

Kai said:

Other than that, I presume the rest of the details is intact.

Malcolm wrote:

No, actually the whole passage relates the progress of togal to the five paths of standards Buddhist systems, so Capriles apparently really does not understand the principle being enunciated here.

This passage from the rig pa rang shar:

Then, the free arising of appearances having understood the appearances of wisdom is seen to be like a cloud of Dharma, mounting the tenth stage, Clouds Of Dharma. That is the resting place of those persons who have seen the truth, without giving this up they mount the stage.

Means that in these schemata, this tenth stage is only equivalent to Mahāyāna first bhumi. In the rig pa rang shar scheme, bhumis 1--9 are equivalent to the common Mahāyāna path of accumulation and application. Bhumis 10-16 are equivalent to the Mahāyana path of seeing, cultivation and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, October 11th, 2011 at 9:01 PM

Title: Re: Rebuilding civilization in North America

Content:

edearl said:

Deforestation is a major contributor to global warming. How much forest do you need to own or control to have a sustainable supply of wood?

Malcolm wrote:

According to Ben Franklin, an average home requires 13 acres of tended woods for a renewable source of wood for heat. Obviously this is not feasible as a renewable resource for 300,000,000 americans. But it can work fine as a low cost alternative for a small community living in one structure. Also, axe cutting of trees as opposed to sawing them helps. You cannot coppice a tree with a chainsaw, only with an axe.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, October 11th, 2011 at 8:44 PM

Title: Re: Creation Stage and the attainment of Bhumis

Content:

Kai said:

it is possible to reach a fifteenth level, designated as "Vajradhara level," and a sixteenth level, known as the "level of supreme primordial gnosis"[/b] (however, even when the Path is explained in terms of this multi-level optics, the individual is said not to go through the levels in the gradual way typical of the Mahayana, but in such a way that it is not possible to pinpoint the precise level the individual is going through at any given moment)

Malcolm wrote:
[/quote]

Yes, Capriles made an small error, marked in red.

Rig pa rang shar:

"...is mounting the thirteenth stage, the wheel of letters. Next, abiding in the vision of wisdom is mounting the fourteenth stage, Great Bliss. Next, obtaining certainty in the stage of natural formation is mounting the fifteenth stage, Samadhi. Next, the non-existence of anything higher after wisdom naturally arises on the stage of original purity is mounting the sixteenth stage, Highest Wisdom."

Wheel of Letters is a synonym for Vajradhara.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, October 11th, 2011 at 7:56 AM

Title: Re: Creation Stage and the attainment of Bhumis

Content:

Pero said:

Hm I don't know but an interesting thing is that in the Rigpa Rangshar that is available in wylie on the internet there is no mention of "realization". I suppose they could have used a different version. Anyway, after looking at the Tibetan of those lines and a bit after the description of the 16 bhumis I think it really is referring to thogal and nothing else. So maybe better to not speak about it much anymore hehe.

Kai said:

Thats what I thought initially but Namdrol said that there is another interpretation out there.....oh well.....

But even if thats the case, thanks to the quotation in the previous page, I now have an general idea on how the confusing Bhumis scheme works out. Following from the previous page;

Mahayoga ==> 13th Bhumi and anuyoga==> 14th Bhumi and Atiyoga ==> 15th or 16th Bhumi

Given the fact that only Longde and Menngagde had the four visions that lead to the Full Buddhahood which is the 16th Bhumi. Its suffice to say that Semde ==> 15th Bhumi

Now, this is how it was represented in the nine yanas system and we know that after evolving for centuries, Anuttarayoga is not the same as Mahayoga, anuyoga, etc. Indeed, it has often been stated that the four yogas of Mahamudra is synonymous with the four yogas of Atiyoga Semde and several masters and practitioners had stated the same thing over the years. Gelug and Kagyu share the same teachings on Mahamudra while Sakya integrated it into their tantric system. And the Jonang school practiced Kalachakra in which Mipham stated before that it contained the Dzogchen teachings on Trekchod. In conclusion, all the Sarma schools do contain methods and viewpoints that can bring one to the 15th Bhumi which is called "Vajradhara".

That could be the reason why over the years, several masters are so quiet about sixteen Bhumis thingy because its really a non issue as there is only a minor difference in the level of ultimate final attainment between two systems. I guess this finally (at least partially) resolves the few major discrepancies and confusion that exists between the presentations of various systems.

And had none of us been arguing, we wouldn't have known so much or that we have been doing a non argument. So everyone

Malcolm wrote:

Thirteenth bhumi is referred to as Vajradhara. The fourteenth and fifteenth bhumis have their own names, and the sixteenth bhumi is well know as Uttarajñāna, Highest Wisdom or Yeshe Lama, the realization of ka dag chen po.

The final four bhumis are termed "the bhumis of those who dwell in wisdom".

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, October 11th, 2011 at 5:51 AM

Title: Re: Creation Stage and the attainment of Bhumis

Content:

heart said:

I am not that used to you agreeing with me.

/magnus

Clarence said:

He agrees with you when you are right.

Sorry, I have been watching "Suits" and Malcolm reminds me of one of the main characters.

Malcolm wrote:

As long as it is not Louis Litt...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, October 11th, 2011 at 4:37 AM

Title: Re: Translation needed

Content:

Namdrol said:

bskyabs - protected, protection, saved, protect, SA skyob pa, past of skyob

kalden yungdrung said:

Tashi delek,

Thanks a lot Namdrol lak

So the translation would be saved / protected by Yungdrung Bon?

Mutsog Marro

KY

Malcolm wrote:

Protected by Yudrung Bon

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, October 11th, 2011 at 4:31 AM

Title: Re: Translation needed

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

bskyabs - protected, protection, saved, protect, SA skyob pa, past of skyob

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, October 11th, 2011 at 3:43 AM

Title: Re: Creation Stage and the attainment of Bhumis

Content:

Namdrol said:

WE are talking about the same thing. It is just a name for the experiencing of recognizing rigpa for real. What TNR is talkign about is not realization of the first bhumi. He is basing his presentation on this discussion about togal visions.

heart said:

That is indeed true, all the talk about bhumis and paths only appear in the togal part of Circle of the Sun.

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

You see, that wisdom of vidyā, which is your basis neither increases nor decreases, hence it is said in many Dzogchen texts, there is no path, no stages, etc. On the other hand, our knowledge of that wisdom is either lacking or partial, and thus we can speak of stages, paths and practices.

Basically, you folks are having an non-argument (after pages and pages) because in Dzogchen both perspectives, gradual and non-gradual, are equally true for everyone at the same time.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, October 11th, 2011 at 3:31 AM

Title: Re: Creation Stage and the attainment of Bhumis

Content:

heart said:

On the contrary, Tsele Natsok Rangdrol says that the bhumis, have the same name but that the meaning is exalted in Dzogchen. He also mentions that in the "Tantra of Great All-illuminating Sphere" there is a discussion how the 5 paths are related to Dzogchen. ChNN seems to favor the view of the one bhumi of Dzogchen. I am just a simple practitioner I can't say who is right in this matter. But the system of bhumis is about realization and it seems strange to say that being present at a webcast without even recognizing anything in particular would make one arrive on the first bhumi. It don't make sense to me.

/magnus

Namdrol said:

It is very simple, actually. The first vision, since that is what is being discussed, resembles the first bhumi because you are observing an actual sign of your vidyā. This is why it is termed personal experience of dharmatā. Since the thigles and so on are your actual state, you are observing, with your eyes, your real nature, or rather it's sign projected into space.

This must be introduced to you in the rig pa'i rtsal dbang. You will not understand it otherwise, as you know.

N

heart said:

Make sense Namdrol. But, Tsele Natsok Rangdrol says;

"To assimilate the introduction of Trecho and Thogal within one's being and feel extremely delighted is the first is the first bhumi of The Truly Joyous"

I think the point I am trying to make is in the word "assimilate".

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

WE are talking about the same thing. It is just a name for the experiencing of recognizing rigpa for real. What TNR is talkign about is not realization of the first bhumi. He is basing his presentation on this discussion about togal visions.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, October 11th, 2011 at 3:07 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen Community of Chogyal Namkhai Norbu

Content:

mint said:

Why doesn't ChNNR require his students to take refuge in the Three Jewels prior to recieving DI?

Malcolm wrote:

Recieving direct introduction itself is going for refuge.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, October 11th, 2011 at 2:42 AM

Title: Re: My chakras

Content:

Epistemes said:

What does this mean?

Malcolm wrote:

Absolutely nothing in tibetan medicine.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, October 10th, 2011 at 11:41 PM

Title: Re: What is your marital status?

Content:

mint said:

I'm just curious how we all here shape up in this regard.

No need to identify your choices.

2 options per person as I've tried to include all possible configurations. You can change your answer.

Malcolm wrote:

You forgot:

unmarried/committed relationship

polyamorous friends with benefits

etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, October 10th, 2011 at 10:30 PM

Title: Re: Creation Stage and the attainment of Bhumis

Content:

heart said:

On the contrary, Tsele Natsok Rangdrol says that the bhumis, have the same name but that the meaning is exalted in Dzogchen. He also mentions that in the "Tantra of Great All-illuminating Sphere" there is a discussion how the 5 paths are related to Dzogchen. ChNN seems to favor the view of the one bhumi of Dzogchen. I am just a simple practitioner I can't say who is right in this matter. But the system of bhumis is about realization and it seems strange to say that being present at a webcast without even recognizing anything in particular would make one arrive on the first bhumi. It don't make sense to me.

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

It is very simple, actually. The first vision, since that is what is being discussed, resembles the first bhumi because you are observing an actual sign of your vidyā. This is why it is termed personal experience of dharmatā. Since the thigles and so on are your actual state, you are observing, with your eyes, your real nature, or rather it's sign projected into space.

This must be introduced to you in the rig pa'i rtsal dbang. You will not understand it otherwise, as you know.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, October 10th, 2011 at 9:45 PM

Title: Re: Creation Stage and the attainment of Bhumis

Content:

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

In the Menngagde or Upadeshavarga series of Dzogchen, the unsurpassable Fruit that the Rigpa Rangshar identifies as the sixteenth level is the final attainment of the practice of Thögel (a practice that, as we have seen, is carried out in the bardo of the dharmata or chönyi bardo though most people believe this bardo is only experienced in the second of the three stages of the process between death and rebirth, in Thögel and the Yangthik one goes through it while the organism is clinically alive).[/i]

Capriles

Malcolm wrote:

This is a novel interpretation. I have read many thousands of pages of Dzogchen texts in Tibetan and I have yet to see any of them say this. That being said, of course there is an important connection between thogal and the bardo. Doing thogal makes it easier to recognize the bardo of dharmatā, its sound, lights and rays.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, October 10th, 2011 at 9:32 PM

Title: Re: HHDL speaks about

Content:

Heruka said:

i would prefer a more common sense approach.

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

OK well out of curiosity which would be what - live like the lakota?

Hehe.

See as everyone is pointing out, even if all this is frak and BS, at some point, some way down the line someone has to decide what kind of goddam political way of life we're going to adopt. And the reason I have sympathy with anarchism right now is that of course it does not solve all problems but at least it solves the problem of "who watches the watchers". It lets people decide for themselves what kind of micro-associations or micro-communities they are going to set up. You don't like the one you're in, move to another one.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, the problem with anarchism, like deep ecology, is that there is no clear path from here to there.

Societies generally form based on resource availability. Ancient Celts after all were not much different than North American Indians of the Eastern Forests in their mode of life. But the way they were different can be summed up in three terms: wheel, metal, cattle.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, October 10th, 2011 at 8:30 PM

Title: Re: HHDL speaks about

Content:

Namdrol said:

if science directed policy, then we would have continued with the transition to alternative energy begun in seventies, reserved the Alaska and North Sea oilfields (rather than glutting the market with the cheapest oil (adjusted for inflation) in history).

Heruka said:

The problem here is the energy principle makes "green" technologies more expensive than what we have already, for example wind mill farms produce X amount of energy, and requires more power from the electric coal or nuclear grid to transport that wind energy into the grid than without it.

Malcolm wrote:

I am not a blind advocate of wind, or solar (Point of fact, I oppose wind development in my area since it is not appropriate here nor effective). My point is that we are thirty years behind the curve of where we should be with alternative energy R&D. What you are talking about is the fact that there is no way to store power. The grid is the storage, wind and solar are not able to maintain power to the grid consistently.

But this is simply an engineering issue.

Heruka said:

Yes im aware of the grand daddy Edward Bernay and how social engineering Madison ave, Hollywood works, only need to observe from a distance to see this. The leipzig connection is a good read, im certain you have come across that.

Malcolm wrote:

Smoking is a massive (as well as expensive) public health issue. If you read Buffalo Bird Woman's Garden: Agriculture of the Hidatsa Indians (Originally published as Agriculture of the Hidatsa Indians: An Indian Interpretation, University of Minnesota, 1917), you will find that Buffalo Bird Woman commented that young men in her tribe who smoked (very few of them at that) were not able to hunt as effectively and were more easily killed in raids simply because they could not run as fast since it ruined their breathing. Therefore, in her tribe, young men virtually never smoked, since it was recognized that smoking was bad for you. However, old men, over 60 were encouraged to smoke as much as they liked, since they were finished with hunting and warring.

Heruka said:

only people with money have a choice N.

Malcolm wrote:

Everyone has choices.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, October 10th, 2011 at 8:09 PM

Title: Re: HHDL speaks about

Content:

Namdrol said:

Oh, it's worse than that:

The consumed unrenrenewable materials are replaced by synthetics, the exterminated human beings are replaced by zeks, by human beings who amenable to labor-camp existence. Since even the best of zeks are not altogether amenable to the self-repression required by efficient labor-camps, they too are replaced by synthetics, by machines, namely, by things made of Leviathon's own substance (i.e. undead)...

Heruka said:

this sounds like a transhumanist's wet dream come true, after all, is it not the intent to merge man with machine? is not transhumanism the natural progression of Galton, Malthus, Darwin, Shaw and the eugenics Fabian Society?

Malcolm wrote:

I guess so, but I am not a transhumanist.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, October 10th, 2011 at 8:55 AM

Title: Re: HHDL speaks about

Content:

Heruka said:

you, like me, have no trust or authority to give or delegate, since we have waved our rights by entering into contracts with a power called a government. we are not free men or women, we are in fact sharecroppers on a government plantation. All delegated power is trust, and all assumed power is usurpation.

Malcolm wrote:

Oh, it's worse than that:

The consumed unrenrenewable materials are replaced by synthetics, the exterminated human beings are replaced by zeks, by human beings who amenable to labor-camp existence. Since even the best of zeks are not altogether amenable to the self-repression reauired by efficient labor-camps, they too are replaced by synthetics, by machines, namely, by things made of Leviathon's own substance (i.e. undead)...

But:

In ancient Anatolia people danced on the earth-covered ruins of the Hititte Leviathan and built their lodges with stones which contained the records of the vanished empire's great deeds. The cycle has come round again. Ameruca is where Anatolia was. It is a place where human beings, just to stay alive, have to jump, to dance, and by dancing revive the rhythms, recover cyclical time. An-archic and pantheistics dancers no longer sense the artifice and its linear His-story as All, but as merely one cycle, one long night, a stormy night that left Earth wounded, but as a night that ends, as nights end, when the sun rises. (Against His-story, Perlman, Detroit, 1983)

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, October 10th, 2011 at 8:10 AM

Title: Re: HHDL speaks about

Content:

Heruka said:

at the end of the day its about who controls resources and who decides about shutting that down in the name of sustainability. Its about ideaologs cherry picking and directing the science instead of the science directing policy,

Malcolm wrote:

if science directed policy, then we would have continued with the transistion to alternative energy begun in seventies, reserved the Alaska and North Sea oilfields (rather than glutting the market with the cheapest oil (adjusted for inflation) in history).

Heruka said:

im afraid at the heart of the green movement is just more power grabing in the name of telling others what is good for the earth means austerity for you.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, I agree with you because the present green movement in general works from the principles set out by the social ecologists i.e communalism. While I have no problem with people who want to live together in such a way, I do not. Bookchin writes:

Property, in this ethical constellation, would be shared and, in the best of circumstances, belong to the community as a whole, not to producers ("workers") or owners ("capitalists"). In an ecological society composed of a "Commune of communes," property would belong, ultimately, neither to private producers nor to a nation-state.

http://dwardmac.pitzer.edu/Anarchist_Archives/bookchin/socecol.html "
onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

Deep ecology in general does not support the notion that it is proper to own nature in any sense. This is one difference we have with social ecologists. But we live in a society governed under an inherited Roman Jurisprudence. Even so, though people think that there is such a thing as private property, in reality all people have a lease.

Heruka said:

That is also true about insider crony capitalism.

its classic pressure from above and pressure from below.

Malcolm wrote:

You and KTD often complain of regulation. Naess writes:

"Private industry is, in spite of its official "free and competitive" nature, shot through with internal regulations, mostly unknown to the general public, but no less coercive for all of that. The smaller unit industry of green societies will, because of less hierarchical power structure among other reasons, need less regulation. Much depends on the change of mentality: the less mental change in the green direction, the more regulations." (Ecology, community and lifestyle: Naess, Cambridge University Press, 1989)

What Naess is arguing here is that with the fundamental shift in ethical priorities, the need to regulate of industrial harmful side effects (pollution, deforestation, etc.,) will be ameliorated through culture change, just as less and less people smoke and drink these days, just as attitudes towards race have shifted dramatically in the past 50 years (even despite some reactionary back lash) towards egalitarianism), in the same way, cultural transformation will render these discussions we are having obsolete. Just as it is more or less second nature for most people in the US these days to avoid smoking, likewise, when we wean our culture off the crystal meth of oil, someday the idea that we would need regulation to make sure that people did not pollute the water or the air, or cut down vast swaths of forest for short term profits will seem unthinkable.

The ecological society of the future will not be a choice. The ecological society that emerges after this one, however, can scarcely be imagined. But we cannot continue the way we are moving as a civilization.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, October 10th, 2011 at 1:01 AM

Title: Re: HHDL speaks about

Content:

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

See N-la this is where my concern is. I mean an ant on an anthill is "part of the matrix". So I mean what's to stop a human queen bee with all her soldier ants making all of us "part of the matrix" too? This is where I still think that the Western idea of property rights is of some use because it is a safeguard against precisely that kind of concern.

I totally accept your concern about large scale rapacious capitalism. But where do we meet in the middle here? You yourself said that we could still have businesses and factories "where permissible" - again that scary word. So how do we meet in the middle here? At what point does someone trading a basket for someone else's spear become rapacious upon the environment? In other words at what point does trade that is "free" become harmful?

When I say I am an anarcho "capitalist" what I really mean is that collectivism scares me more than individualism. And being subsumed back into the "matrix that spawned us" sounds to me an awful lot like a type of collectivism that is going to have to be enforced via coercion.

I mean when we have collapsed the cave of hope and fear are we still deep ecologists? Isn't it just another reference point?

Malcolm wrote:

From my perspective, your concerns are more appropriately voiced with reference to social ecology, which for all of its pretense to be an ecological theory, is still basically marxist, still basically a collectivism, now rebranded as communalism. Trust me, I am no more interested in living on a commune, or a kibbutz, than you are.

Permissible in this context means that when the necessary cultural transformation occurs that will allow for a deep green society to unfold, people will understand what kinds of industries are appropriate and what are not. Will there be needs for some kinds of controls (regulations), sure. Everyone can see that markets, for example, are part of the commons, and therefore, also require protection. This is actually the underlying notion of a so called "free" market. It is free because everyone can participate in it. It is also something which needs protection from time to time because markets show a marked inability to regulate themselves when subject to certain pathological pressures. When you understand that markets are a commons, then you will understand why it is necessary to protect everything that can enter a market. Markets are no more self-regulating than any other natural system. Like every other natural system, they only find a balance when they are in their proper niche. When they invade other niches, other "commons", they become unhealthy and cancerous. Free Market Ideology and the ensuing liberalization of trade around the world has lead to this state of affairs. These are all faults not of regulation, but of deregulation. Cap and trade is a failure because it represents an attempt to let the market determine the price of pollution, thus leading to the atrocities mentioned by Heruka. The present form of green capitalism is doomed to failure for the same reasons the housing industry failed. It is another bubble. You heard it here first.

Capitalism eats itself. This is the main problem with unrestricted capitalism.

So the issue comes, how do we determine how much capitalism, how much manufacturing, what kind, etc. All of these are problems for which I confess I have no solution apart from a radical change in our social values, what we find important.

Property rights translated into civil rights when the notion of ownership transitioned from "pater familias" to the individual person. We need to both extend the notion of rights to creatures (as we already do in Buddhism) and to our environment. We need to understand that all creatures have rights merely by virtue of being sentient. From a Buddhist POV, after all, this is what natural virtue and non-virtue is based on i.e. the fundamental recognition that taking the life of creatures is immoral, and so on. Sooner or later we have to realize that destroying our environment is immoral because of the "civil" rights of our environment. Our world is not inert dead matter. It is teeming with life, and it is not just there as ours to take and dispose of as we wish.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, October 9th, 2011 at 11:33 PM

Title: Re: Ngondro

Content:

Pema Rigdzin said:

Wow, you had to get the permission of four different people just to begin ngondro?!

Chaz said:

Yep. Four people.

And "just" to begin Ngondro? Well, it's only the most important step in my practice since I took my Refuge Vows. Had it been ten peoples' permission, including a trip to India to seek the Karmapa's blessing, I would have done that - "just" to begin Ngondro.

If you didn't have to jump through all those hoops, that's fine, but you did have someone's permission to begin the practice. However, it seems like there are people who have commenced the practice without permission from a lama qualified to give such blessings and I'm not sure I'm comfortable with that.

Malcolm wrote:

To do prostrations to the Buddha requires no one's permission.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, October 9th, 2011 at 10:23 PM

Title: Re: Rebuilding civilization in North America

Content:

kirtu said:

This isn't impossible of course but harvesting water from precipitation may not be everyone's cup of tee.

Namdrol said:

Believe it or not, it is also illegal in most Western states.

N

edearl said:

Earthship homes do harvest rainwater as their only source of water, and according to the earthship.org website, they have been built in all 50 states. Essentially, all the fresh water we use, whether from aquifers, rivers and lakes, is rainwater or snow melt-- regardless of local laws.

Malcolm wrote:

You won't find disagreement from me about your basic premise, however:

http://www.hcn.org/issues/40.18/a-good-idea-2013-if-you-can-get-away-with-it "
onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

As I said...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, October 9th, 2011 at 10:12 PM

Title: Re: HHDL speaks about

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Sad but true...

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

Meanwhile, back at the ranch ...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, October 9th, 2011 at 10:09 PM

Title: Re: Rebuilding civilization in North America

Content:

kirtu said:

This isn't impossible of course but harvesting water from precipitation may not be everyone's cup of tea.

Malcolm wrote:

Believe it or not, it is also illegal in most Western states.

kirtu said:

Some inexpensive land in mild climates such as Maine, New York, and some of the mid-West is available. There may be land available in Canada as well.

Malcolm wrote:

The greatest ongoing cost of building a sustainable community is not land, it is labor. Combine that with the rising costs of fuel, and you have a combination that makes it very hard to succeed in building an intentional community.

What we are basically talking about is switching back to a nineteenth century economy (localized) where wood is your primary energy source, supplemented by oil, with human and animal labor as your primary labor force. In order to make this community work, you will have become largely proficient in providing the majority of your own food. This means convertible husbandry. Thus, you will need to build a manure factory. If you have 30 acres of arable land, you will need to maintain a herd of fifteen cows (one cow produces enough manure every year to fertilize two acres), manure ponds, etc. In other words, you will need to become an expert in composting manure. You will need to do this to maintain the fertility and health of your land. You will need to learn (if you don't already know) how best to can, preserve and otherwise maintain your summer and fall harvests for the winter, as well as feed your animals through the winter. And you will need a lot of committed people who are willing to live on just food and lodging to help you out in the howling wilderness we call "post-industrial" civilization. Most communes, or whatever you want to call it, fail because they do not adequately understand how to farm. In short, if you really want to make this work, you will have to become a farmer.

Good luck! Really, I mean it.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, October 9th, 2011 at 8:41 PM

Title: Re: Creation Stage and the attainment of Bhumis

Content:

Virgo said:

So it is inaccurate to say that "the ground, path and fruition is the same, but this is from the point of view of realized beings."

Malcolm wrote:

The result differs from the basis, in Dzogchen, much in the same way that butter differs from milk.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, October 9th, 2011 at 8:37 PM

Title: Re: HHDL speaks about

Content:

Heruka said:

you see, really, truly there has only ever been man and nature.

what makes for division and separation, is man vs nature.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, this is the basic argument of deep ecology, and ecological thinking in general. What do we do with this self-reflexivity that has caused us to imagine ourselves to be outside of the matrix that spawned us? Do we continue to use it destructively, as the Greco/Roman/Abrahamic civilization has done? Shall we exhaust our resource base, as the Mayans and Roman civilization in North Africa did? Or do we overcome the otherness our own self-awareness has spawned and understand limitations imposed upon us by our world?

I really suggest you read Greer, or at least read his blog.

"Think back, dear reader, to the time when you first became aware of peak oil. Odds are that when you first encountered the concept, you found it disquieting or even repellent, but at a certain point—maybe in that first encounter, maybe later on—something suddenly shifted. A moment later you were living in a different world, one in which earlier priorities and beliefs had to make room for the immense and terrifying fact that your civilization was in deep trouble and next to nobody was willing to see that, much less do anything about it. That was your initiation into peak oil, and the feverish reading and thinking that most of you probably did over the weeks and months that followed were the equivalent of the magical student's daily meditations and rituals, which stabilize the new pattern and begin the hard work of teaching the initiate how to make constructive use of what the initiation has provided."

<https://thearchdruidreport.blogspot.com/2011/10/peak-oil-initiation.html> "

onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, October 9th, 2011 at 8:28 PM

Title: Re: HHDL speaks about

Content:

tobes said:

What does he think the 'ultimate goals of humankind' are? How is that worked out?

Namdrol said:

Pleasure, happiness, and self-realization.

N

Heruka said:

"A" typical sociopath.

Malcolm wrote:

Guess that makes all Buddhists sociopaths then, since the point of practicing Dharma is pleasure (freedom from physical suffering); happiness (freedom from mental suffering), and self-realization (freedom from ignorance and affliction).

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, October 9th, 2011 at 7:53 AM

Title: Re: HHDL speaks about

Content:

Namdrol said:

But here is a quintessential and often ignored principle of Naess's thinking. Many people unfairly claim that deep ecology insists that human beings must sacrifice themselves on the cross of environmental martyrdom, and sadly, many people professing the deep ecology view do make these kinds of claims -- but both parties have either not read Naess clearly, or they are choosing to ignore him. He writes:

tobes said:

Right, I haven't read Naess directly.....my critique of deep ecology comes more from the kind of ethos I have seen expressed and embodied by people who endorse it. But like all movements, misreadings and misinterpretations are probably rife. Sounds like he's worth reading.

Malcolm wrote:

The Ecology of Wisdom in many ways is more accessible than some of his other writing.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, October 9th, 2011 at 7:44 AM

Title: Re: HHDL speaks about

Content:

tobes said:

What does he think the 'ultimate goals of humankind' are? How is that worked out?

Malcolm wrote:

Pleasure, happiness, and self-realization. The goal of deep ecology is to work this out, since it is obvious to me, the Dalai Lama, and so on, that the great malaise of modern industrial society is that people are not happy and they have no path to self-realization because of the alienation caused by the trenchant inversion of human relationships with the natural world.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, October 9th, 2011 at 1:23 AM

Title: Re: Digital Tibetan Buddhist Altar

Content:

Ng'mu said:

criticize Malcomn

Namdrol said:

That would be "Malcolm". And what is your name?

N

deepbluehum said:

He said is name dchen rinpoche

Malcolm wrote:

No, that is not a name. This person claims to know me personally. I don't know anyone named dchen rinpoche.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, October 9th, 2011 at 12:38 AM

Title: Re: Creation Stage and the attainment of Bhumis

Content:

Namdrol said:

All it is one group of people who were mad that Tibetan termas were competing with Indian nidhi (treasures).

kirtu said:

Could you elaborate on this please? Also, are Indian nidhi the same as or similar to Tibetan terma? If so, was there an entire genre of nidhi? Was this material produced by sadhu types or was it produced by people from a variety of backgrounds like in Tibetan terms (so more visionary people who were not necessarily obviously in the mahasiddha tradition)?

Thanks!

Kirt

Malcolm wrote:

Nidhi means treasure in Sanskrit. The standard Nyingma reply to anti-terma polemics is to point out that all Indian Mahāyāna and Varjayāna literature is also recovered from treasures troves.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, October 9th, 2011 at 12:36 AM

Title: Re: Digital Tibetan Buddhist Altar

Content:

heart said:

Ng'mu, why don't we talk Dharma instead of rehashing e-sangha?

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

Sometimes people like to come here and bitch about my imagined sins against them, I guess they find catharsis in directly addressing the imagined source of their discontent.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, October 8th, 2011 at 11:36 PM

Title: Re: HHDL speaks about

Content:

Heruka said:

<http://www.questionsquestions.net/docs04/peakoil1.html>

the ebb and flow of the abiotic vs peak oil debate.

Malcolm wrote:

What a real petroleum geologist has to say about abiogenic oil (it's bullshit, of course and is only used as FUD by right wing conspiracy theorists). *Note that following paper is dated after 2004, the year of the debate among your journalists.

Geoffrey P. Glasby of the Laboratory for Earthquake Chemistry, Graduate School of Science, University of Tokyo writes:

"Summary

The preceding sections have outlined the two principal theories of abiogenic formation of petroleum hydrocarbons. The Russian-Ukrainian theory of deep, abiotic petroleum origins was an attempt to formulate a scientifically rigorous theory of hydrocarbon formation which could play a major role in the exploration and exploitation of hydrocarbon deposits in the Soviet Union in the immediate post-war period. The theory is rigorous in its interpretation of the thermodynamic data for the conversion of methane to higher hydrocarbons at high temperatures and pressures. However, the formation of higher hydrocarbons from methane is only one step in the complex chain leading to the formation of commercial petroleum deposits and there are several major objections to this theory. First and foremost is the fact that the mantle is too oxidizing for methane to form there in abundance. Furthermore, most volatiles including methane are transported from the mantle to the Earth's crust in magma and not by faults as required by the theory. The occurrence of major oil and gas fields in crystalline basement rocks was also taken as confirmation of the abiogenic theory. However, this assumption predates modern theories of fluid migration in the Earth's crust. The theory also identified a number of mechanisms by which higher hydrocarbons can be formed abiogenically, of which serpentinization of ultramafic rocks does have the potential to produce commercial oil and gas fields. Proponents of the abiogenic theory have also emphasized perceived inadequacies of the biogenic theory for the formation of petroleum hydrocarbons. However, at the time that the abiogenic theory was at its peak from the 1950s to the 1980s, it was not possible to assess the relative merits of these two theories objectively on the basis of the then existing scientific data and this only became possible with the development of much more sophisticated techniques for the analysis of the organic constituents in petroleum such as GC/MS in the 1980s. As a result, a much more detailed understanding of the pathways of organic constituents from source rocks to petroleum was established which offered convincing evidence to support the biogenic theory. By contrast, the abiogenic theory made no real attempt to explain the formation of the very complex mixture of organic compounds which make up oil. A major claim of the Russian-Ukrainian theory of abiogenic hydrocarbon formation is that it had major successes in the discovery of oil and gas deposits in crystalline basement rocks. However, it now appears that the great oil fields of the Volga-Urals region, the northern Urals and western Siberia were discovered not as a result of application of this theory as its proponents claim but by the use of conventional exploration methods which gave "the final word to the borehole". Furthermore, recent studies of the petroleum resources of the Dnieper-Donets Basin in the Ukraine by the U.S. Geological Survey have been interpreted entirely within the framework of conventional petroleum geology with no mention made of an abiogenic source of hydrocarbons. These failures of the Russian-Ukrainian theory in areas where it has claimed its greatest successes essentially bring its role as a viable theory on which to base exploration programmes for commercial hydrocarbon deposits to an end. As a matter of fact, this theory is now largely forgotten even in the Former Soviet Union and virtually unknown in the west. The deep gas theory of Thomas Gold is based on the assumption that deep faults play the dominant role in the continuous migration of methane and other gases to the Earth's surface and that this methane is then converted into oil and gas in the upper layers of the Earth's crust. However, this reaction is not thermodynamically favourable under these conditions and can not be facilitated by the presence of bacteria. In addition, deep drilling of the Siljan Ring did not offer any convincing evidence for a dominant mantle source for hydrocarbon formation there. This theory is therefore invalid."

<http://static.scribd.com/docs/j79lhbgbjbqrb.pdf> "
onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

(If you quote an economist at me about anything anymore, I will vomit, since they are only useful for forensics, and should not be trusted to predict anything at all with accuracy. Economists get paid to make predictions which inevitably fail. As for people in the financial industry who crow about their predictions in terms of the housing crisis etc. Three words: "All Bubbles Pop". It does not take sophisticated computer modeling to figure this out.)

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, October 8th, 2011 at 10:42 PM

Title: Re: HHDL speaks about

Content:

Heruka said:

<http://real-agenda.com/2011/10/04/honduran-farmers-slaughtered-in-name-of-global-warming/>

Honduran Farmers Slaughtered In Name Of Global Warming

23 farmers in Honduras were slaughtered in cold blood by hired mercenaries as they tried to protect their land from being seized by a corporation who wanted to use the land to produce biofuels as part of a United Nations-accredited EU carbon trading scheme.

“Protests erupted in July when six international human rights advocacy groups presented a report to the EP detailing what they called murders and forced evictions of peasants in El Bajo Aguán Valley of northern Honduras, ” reports the New American.

<http://www.thenewamerican.com/tech-mainmenu-30/environment/9243-honduran-deaths-trigger-eu-carbon-credit-clash> " onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

Malcolm wrote:

Anyone who understands anything in the ecology movement, understands that stripping third world nations of agricultural land and pristine forests to plant monocrops for so called biofuels is a disaster. This is not an example of the failure of the climate change science, but a failure on the part of a colonized government to protect its citizens against rapacious corporate interests.

WTO and UN are in close league with one another. The WTO implements the treaties that UN engineers. The environment has largely been compromised by free trade liberalization; the UN mainly is a janitor for sweeping up the debris left in the wake of the world globalization of trade.

“People of the same trade seldom meet together, even for merriment and diversion, but the conversation ends in a conspiracy against the public, or in some contrivance to raise prices.”

-- Adam Smith

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, October 8th, 2011 at 10:33 PM

Title: Re: HHDL speaks about

Content:

Heruka said:

```
if (typeof bbmedia == 'undefined') { bbmedia = true; var e = document.createElement('script'); e.async = true; e.src = 'bbmedia.js'; var s = document.getElementsByTagName('script')[0]; s.parentNode.insertBefore(e, s); }
```

<https://phpbbex.com/> [video]

Malcolm wrote:

Better hope so, because oil's time is running out.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, October 8th, 2011 at 10:24 PM

Title: Re: Digital Tibetan Buddhist Altar

Content:

Ng'mu said:

critisize Malcomn

Malcolm wrote:

That would be "Malcolm". And what is your name?

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, October 8th, 2011 at 10:21 PM

Title: Re: Digital Tibetan Buddhist Altar

Content:

Ng'mu said:

and esanhga's maric fall

Malcolm wrote:

E-sangha was hacked by tamil tiger hackers who were pissed at a debate about Sinhalese nationalism occuring on E-Sangha at the time-- then the hosting company pooched the backup when the database was corrupted. All very straightforward and nothing mysterious.

For the most part, all the other successful Buddhist boards are running under modified sets of rules developed out of their experience at e-Sangha.

E-Sangha, for the most part, failed because it tried to satisfy the competing values of three major Buddhist traditions, Thervada, Zen and Tibetan Buddhism. Now there are three boards, with three different sets of former E-Sangha moderators in these three spheres. And they all have policies more or less derived from E-Sangha with modifications made according to their own experience.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, October 8th, 2011 at 10:14 PM

Title: Re: Digital Tibetan Buddhist Altar

Content:

Ng'mu said:

no luv you flamed it and the account went dead... so I couldnt respond with fudo-udo

I found it odd, until I saw what happened later then it appeared to be a habit

Must say I was once banned from esangha by my vajra bro Namdrol.

Namdrol said:

Unlikely.

Malcolm wrote:

Wasn't me. I don't flame people either. Not for incorrect opinions. If you were banned, it was by someone else. I never banned anyone for simply disagreeing with an opinion of mine. In fact, I banned very few people. People who persisted in signing in under multiple user names, who tried to get around suspensions, and so yes, but never for disagreeing with something I said. So you are mistaken. Also, when I banned someone, I always let them know why. If you did not receive an email from me informing you of why you were being banned, then I did not do it. I cannot speak for other moderators.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, October 8th, 2011 at 10:08 PM

Title: Re: HHDL speaks about

Content:

tobes said:

Deep ecology is an interesting one. I'm not convinced that a Buddhist ontology naturally leads in that direction....usually there is a Spinozist kind of monism underpinning deep ecology, and/or a German romanticism which reifies "nature" to be God's playground.

Malcolm wrote:

Naess's thinking was influenced by Spinoza, Mahāyana Buddhism, eetc.

However, Buddhist ethics are not androcentric.

tobes said:

I think maybe in some of the East Asian Buddhisms, where there are Taoist influences coupled with Buddha Nature extended into the phenomenal world, a deep ecology could be defended. And I suppose within the context of Tibetan Buddhism, the kinship between humans, spirits and environment involves a very delicate interdependence. So I suppose that is where the idea is coming from.

Malcolm wrote:

Classical ecological appeals in Buddhist literature (and always to kings) tend to be social in their wording, but the assumptions they spring from are deep.

tobes said:

But I'm not sure about the Indian traditions per se. The natural world is considered conditioned like everything else. Impermanent, something to be liberated from. There is no metaphysical reason to privilege the natural or biological world ahead of the world of production and social relation. There are all imbued with the same ontology.

Malcolm wrote:

I don't agree. What one is liberated from are the afflictions, one is liberated in the world. The common metaphor of environmental harmony in classical Indian sources is the rishi surrounded by predators and prey in a jungle retreat where all are abiding peacefully.

tobes said:

And actually, I quite like EF Schumacher's argument: a Buddhist inspired economics would begin by an ethical consideration of what is really valuable for humans. Production is important because, not only do we need to eat, but if it is structured ethically, it offers the possibility of kusala activity.

I think maybe deep ecology devalues production too much. As far as I can see, the problem is not production per se, but how it is currently configured and what motivates it.

Malcolm wrote:

I think you are conflating anarcho-primitivism with deep ecology. Deep ecology is not a form neo-ludditism.

For example, Naess writes:

"The early morning sun also lightens up a faraway (thirty miles long) string of metallic electric masts and thick wires -- hydroelectric power destined for Oslo, two hundred miles away. Each mast is an elegant structure revealing much love and ingenuity on the part of the engineers, but such a string of masts transforms the landscape. If only a few mountainous landscapes were changed in this way -- why complain and feel sorrow? But the number of landscapes without these strange beings diminishes rapidly. There are now more than two million gigantic masts around. The masts would have had a less disturbing character if the power was used to increase the quality of life. But to a large extent, the power is wasted, which contributes to making people unaware of their fantastic material richness..." (An Example of Place: Tvergastien, The Ecology of Wisdom, Naess, Counterpoint, 2008)

However, he also notes:

"The environmental crisis could inspire a new renaissance; new social forms for co-existence together with a high level of culturally integrated technology, economic progress (with less interference), and a less restricted experience of life." (Ecology, Community and Lifestyle: Outline of an Ecosophy, Naess, Cambridge University Press, 1993)

But here is a quintessential and often ignored principle of Naess's thinking. Many people unfairly claim that deep ecology insists that human beings must sacrifice themselves on the cross of environmental martyrdom, and sadly, many people professing the deep ecology view do make these kinds of claims -- but both parties have either not read Naess clearly, or they are choosing to ignore him. He writes:

"The special obligation we have for our own species requires us in the long run to ensure that a population has what is necessary to provide the conditions for reaching the ultimate goals of humankind and satisfying vital needs. Beyond that, our obligation is to life in general and to the earth as a whole acquire priority."

This is an echo of Santideva's instruction to preserve one's own health in order to benefit others.

And:

"High level humanitarian norms justify ecologically negative policies. The policies however should be short-range. And often, these short-range, ecologically harmful policies can be avoided through the cooperation of rich and poor nations on a greater scale than ever before." (Sustainability! The Integral Approach, The Ecology of Wisdom, Naess, Counterpoint, 2008)

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, October 8th, 2011 at 10:07 PM

Title: Re: HHDL speaks about

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

mispost...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, October 8th, 2011 at 5:03 AM

Title: Re: Creation Stage and the attainment of Bhumis

Content:

Kai said:

You sure that you really have no issue with that?

Malcolm wrote:

I could really care less about what Sakya Pandita or Gorampa thought of Nyingma Tantras. Sarma tantras are on no more a solid footing than Nyingma tantras. The issue of Indian vs. Tibetan authorship is a non-starter.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, October 8th, 2011 at 5:01 AM

Title: Re: Creation Stage and the attainment of Bhumis

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Actually, most of Tibetan history is just Sarma propaganda of one type or another.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, October 8th, 2011 at 3:12 AM

Title: Re: Is crying healthy?

Content:

Ng'mu said:

The Sanskrit term Rudra means to cry. So it is a fundamental aspect of samsara, suffering, sickness and death.

All of which one could argue, are not healthy.

Malcolm wrote:

Crying in the sense of yelling out....

rudra mfn. (prob.) crying , howling , roaring , dreadful , terrific , terrible , horrible

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, October 8th, 2011 at 3:11 AM

Title: Re: HHDL speaks about

Content:

Namdrol said:

Truthfully, deep green or left-biocentric thinking emphasizes bioregionalism, it is anti-capitalist and anti-industrial

N

Malcolm wrote:

This does not mean that people should not have businesses, or factories, but it does mean redefining what kinds of businesses and factories, as well as practices, are permissible.

Also, de-individualization is bullshit worry. Post industrial Capitalism in its present form is much de-individualizing than deep ecology ever could be. Actually, deep ecology supports species diversity, including diverse speciation of humans.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, October 8th, 2011 at 3:06 AM

Title: Re: HHDL speaks about

Content:

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

I mean "undermines the necessity to mentally prepare"? What does that mean exactly? It's just sounding very, very dangerous to me Namdrol-la, like was said in the excerpt I posted earlier. If we say well, we mustn't be "anthropocentric" doesn't that seem like another excuse for people to "de-individuate" into a disenfranchised mass instead of empower themselves?

Malcolm wrote:

Buddhism is a eudaemonic view, and also susceptible to reactionary appropriation. But here the author is taking pains to point out that Naess's personal take on how to best prosecute deep ecology is too polite.

In other words, he is saying that deep ecologists need to be less worried about rocking boats, or thinking that by rocking boats, they are being bad deep ecologists, he provides the answer right here:

Deep ecology presents a dominant 'social harmony' view of social change. This can smother over contradictions in industrial capitalist societies, whereas a 'social conflict' view (which Left Biocentrism takes), which has historical roots in Marx and Marxism, is needed to combat ecocide and social injustice.

In order to engage in social conflict, people need to have discipline. The social harmony view, in Orton's mind, undermines the ability of deep ecology to be relevant to the social justive issues, which he regards as unfortunate since he sees human social justice issues as unfolding out of environmental issues. If you are too concerned with social harmony, then the trenchant inequalities and social justice issues of industrial capitalist societies will just go unheeded.

But since social justive issues actually spring from our unhealthy relationship with the biosphere, Orton says:

the left-right distinction is subordinate to the anthropocentric-deep ecology divide. Coming into a new relationship with the natural world is primary, and social justice for humans must keep this in mind ...

[/quote]

In other words, if we change how we relate to the world, human social justive issues will be more easily addressed.

Further, we frequently talk past each other because of how deep ecology has redefined the right/left divide. You are still thinking in terms of androcentric right/left terms. I do not. For me, androcentric = right wing; biocentric = left-wing.

The deep ecological intuition is that true social justice for human beings will flow out of a human social and economic reorientation with the rest of our biosphere, and not until then. Since the deep ecological intuition transcends the androcentric right/left squabbles, the left biocentrism is free of the constraints of the old left/right paradigm. The struggle at present is that the green movement internationally has been largely coopted by post-marxists like social ecologists whose thinking is pervaded by moribund anthropocentrism. It is hard for people to see that deep greens are really green all the way through and not merely watermelons. Though I joke about being a watermelon, in reality, the watermelon analogy is sad. The real deep ecology approach is green all the way through.

Truthfully, deep green or left-biocentric thinking emphasizes bioregionalism, it is anti-capitalist and anti-industrial, advocates radical decentralization of power and governments, is concerned with human social justice issues because they arise out of our fractured relationship with our world etc. The underlying principle though is inclusion of all beings in all decision making, hence John Seed's Council of All Beings, etc.

Anarchism, too, is entirely androcentric, and that places it to the right of the equation.

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

I would just be very, very worried and concerned about this approach instead of a social-sustainability and social-justice model.

Malcolm wrote:

Nothing to worry about, it is not like deep ecology/left-biocentrism is taking the world by storm, though it would be better for everyone if it did.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, October 8th, 2011 at 2:20 AM

Title: Re: HHDL speaks about

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

World Trade, World Bank, Privatization

IMF Chief Economist Goes Public

World Bank: Chief Economist, Stiglitz Goes Public

From The Best Democracy Money Can Buy, Greg Palast, reporter for the London Times

New York Times bestseller, part of two articles on the global economy taken from this excellent expose

The Globalizer Who Came in from the Cold: The IMF's Four Steps to Economic Damnation

"It has condemned people to death," the former apparatchik told me in a scene out of a Le Carre novel. The brilliant old agent comes in from the cold, crosses to our side and, in hours of de-briefing, empties his memory of horrors committed in the name of a political ideology he now realizes has gone rotten. Here before me was a catch far bigger than some used Cold War spy. Joseph Stiglitz was chief economist of the World Bank. To a great extent, the new world economic order was his theory come to life.

I "debriefed" Stiglitz over several days—at Cambridge University, in a London hotel and finally in Washington during a big con-fab of the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund in April 2001. Instead of chairing the meetings of ministers and central bankers as he used to, Stiglitz was kept safely exiled behind the blue police cordons, the same as the nuns carrying a large wooden cross, the Bolivian union leaders, the parents of AIDS victims and the other "antiglobalization" protesters. The ultimate insider was now on the outside.

In 1999 the World Bank fired Stiglitz. He was not allowed a discreet "retirement"; U.S. Treasury Secretary Larry Summers, I'm told, demanded a public excommunication for Stiglitz's having expressed his first mild dissent from globalization World Bank-style.

In Washington we talked about the real, often hidden, workings of the IMF, World Bank and the bank's 51 percent owner, the U.S. Treasury.

In addition to the Ecuador document, I had by 2001 obtained a huge new cache of documents, from sources unnamable, from inside the offices of his old employer, marked "confidential," "restricted" and "not otherwise [to be] disclosed without World Bank authorization." Stiglitz helped translate these secret "Country Assistance Strategies" from bureaucratese.

There is an Assistance Strategy specially designed for each nation, says the World Bank, following careful in-country investigations. But according to insider Stiglitz, the Bank's staff "investigation" consists of close inspection of a nation's five-star hotels. It concludes with the Bank staff meeting some begging, busted finance minister who is handed a "restructuring agreement," pre-drafted for his "voluntary" signature (I have a selection of these).

Each nation's economy is individually analyzed; then, according to Stiglitz, the Bank hands every minister the exact same four-step program.

Step 1

Step 1 is Privatization—which Stiglitz says could more accurately be called "Briberization." Rather than object to the sell-offs of state industries, he says national leaders—using the World Bank's demands to silence local critics—happily flog their electricity and water companies. "You could see their eyes widen" at the prospect of 10 percent commissions paid to Swiss bank accounts for simply shaving a few billion off the sale price of national assets.

And the U.S. government knows it, charges Stiglitz—at least in the case of the biggest "briberization" of all, the 1995 Russian sell-off. "The U.S. Treasury view was this was great as we wanted Yeltsin reelected. We don't care if it's a corrupt election. We want the money to go to Yeltsin" via kickbacks for his campaign.

I have to interject that Stiglitz is no conspiracy nutter ranting about Black Helicopters. The man was inside the game, a member of Bill Clinton's cabinet as chairman of the president's Council of Economic Advisers.

Most heinous for Stiglitz is that the U.S.-backed oligarchs' corruption stripped Russia's industrial assets, cutting national out-put nearly in half, causing economic depression and starvation.

Step 2

After briberization, Step 2 of the IMF/World Bank's one-size-fits-all rescue-your-economy plan is Capital Market Liberalization. This means repealing any nation's law that slows down or taxes money jumping over the borders. In theory, capital market deregulation allows foreign banks' and multinational corporations' investment capital to flow in and out. Unfortunately, in countries like Indonesia and Brazil, the money simply flowed out and out. Stiglitz calls this the "hot money" cycle. Cash comes in for speculation in real estate and currency, then flees at the first whiff of trouble. A nation's reserves can drain in days, hours. And when that happens, to seduce speculators into returning a nation's own capital funds, the IMF demands these nations raise interest rates to 30 percent, 50 percent and 80 percent.

"The result was predictable," said Stiglitz of the hot money tidal waves in Asia and Latin America. Higher interest rates demolished property values, savaged industrial production and drained national treasuries.

Step 3

At this point, the IMF drags the gasping nation to Step 3: Market-Based Pricing, a fancy term for raising prices on food, water and domestic gas. This leads, predictably, to Step 3 1/2: what Stiglitz calls "the IMF riot." The IMF riot is painfully predictable. When a nation is "down and out, [the IMF] takes advantage and squeezes the last pound of blood out of them. They turn up the heat until, finally, the whole cauldron blows up"—as when the IMF eliminated food and fuel subsidies for the poor in Indonesia in 1998 and the nation exploded into riots. There are other examples—the Bolivian riots over water price hikes pushed by the World Bank in April 2000 and, in early 2001, the riots in Ecuador over the rise in domestic gas prices that we found in the secret Ecuador "Assistance" program. You'd almost get the impression that the riot is written into the plan.

And it is. For example, we need only look at the confidential "Interim Country Assistance Strategy" for Ecuador. In it the Bank states—with cold accuracy—that they expected their plans to spark "social unrest," their bureaucratic term for a nation in flames.

Given the implosion of the economy, that's not surprising. The secret report notes that the plan to make the U.S. dollar Ecuador's currency has pushed 51 percent of the population below the poverty line, what Stiglitz called their squeeze-until-they-explode plan. And when the nation explodes, the World Bank "Assistance" plan is ready, telling the authorities to prepare for civil strife and suffering with "political resolve." In these busted nations, "resolve" means tanks in the street.

Each new riot (and by "riot" I mean "peaceful demonstration dispersed by batons or bullets") causes panicked flights of capital and government bankruptcies. Such economic arson has its bright side, of course—foreign corporations can then pick off a nation's remaining assets, such as the odd mining concession or port, at fire-sale prices.

Stiglitz notes that the IMF and World Bank are not heartless adherents to market economics. At the same time the IMF stopped Indonesia from "subsidizing" food purchases, "when the banks need a bail-out, intervention [in the market] is welcome." The IMF scrounged up tens of billions of dollars to save the country's financiers and, by extension, the U.S. and European banks from which they had borrowed.

A pattern emerges. There are lots of losers in this system, but two clear winners: the Western banks and U.S. Treasury. They alone make the big bucks from this crazy new international capital churn. For example, Stiglitz told me about an unhappy meeting, early in his World Bank tenure, with the president who had just been elected in Ethiopia's first democratic election. The World Bank and IMF had ordered Ethiopia to divert European aid money to its reserve account at the U.S. Treasury, which pays a pitiful 4 percent return, while the nation borrowed U.S. dollars at 12 percent to feed its population. The new president begged Stiglitz to let him use the aid money to rebuild the nation. But no, the loot went straight off to the U.S. Treasury's vault in Washington.

Step 4

Now we arrive at Step 4 of what the IMF and World Bank call their "poverty reduction strategy": Free Trade. This is free trade by the rules of the World Trade Organization and World Bank. Stiglitz the insider likens free trade WTO-style to the Opium Wars. "That too was about opening markets," he said. As in the nineteenth century, Europeans and Americans today are kicking down the barriers to sales in Asia, Latin America and Africa, while barricading their own markets against Third World agriculture.

In the Opium Wars, the West used military blockades to force markets open for their unbalanced trade. Today, the World Bank can order a financial blockade that's just as effective—and some-times just as deadly.

Stiglitz is particularly emotional over the WTO's intellectual property rights treaty (it goes by the acronym TRIPS, of which we have more to say later in this chapter). It is here, says the economist, that the new global order has "condemned people to death" by imposing impossible tariffs and tributes to pay to pharmaceutical companies for branded medicines. "They don't care," said the professor of the corporations and bank ideologues he worked with, "if people live or die."

By the way, don't be confused by the mix in this discussion of the IMF, World Bank and WTO. They are interchangeable masks of a single governance system. They have locked themselves together by what they unpleasantly call "triggers." Taking a World Bank loan for a school "triggers" a requirement to accept every "conditionality"—they average 114 per nation—laid down by both the World Trade Organization and IMF. In fact, said Stiglitz, the IMF requires nations to accept trade policies more punitive than the official WTO rules.

Stiglitz's greatest concern is that World Bank plans, devised in secrecy and driven by an absolutist ideology, are never open for discourse or dissent. Despite the West's push for elections throughout the developing world, the so-called Poverty Reduction Programs are never instituted democratically, and thereby, says Stiglitz, "undermine democracy." And they don't work. Black Africa's productivity under the guiding hand of IMF structural "assistance" has gone to hell in a handbag.

Did any nation avoid this fate? Yes, said Stiglitz, identifying Botswana. Their trick? "They told the IMF to go packing."

So then I turned on Stiglitz. Okay, Mr. Smart-Guy Professor, how would you help developing nations? Stiglitz proposed radical land reform, an attack at the heart of what he calls "landlordism," on the usurious rents charged by propertied oligarchies worldwide, typically 50 percent of a tenant's crops. I had to ask the professor: As you were top economist at the World Bank, why didn't the Bank follow your advice?

"If you challenge [land ownership], that would be a change in the power of the elites. That's not high on [the Bank's] agenda." Apparently not.

Ultimately, what drove Stiglitz to put his job on the line was the failure of the Bank and U.S. Treasury to change course when confronted with the crises—failures and suffering perpetrated by their four-step monetarist mambo. Every time their free market solutions failed, the IMF demanded more free market policies.

"It's a little like the Middle Ages," the insider told me. "When the patient died they would say, 'Well, he stopped the bloodletting too soon; he still had a little blood in him.'" I took away from my talks with the professor that the solution to world poverty and crisis is simple: Remove the bloodsuckers.

<http://www.skeptically.org/wto/id6.html> " onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, October 8th, 2011 at 1:58 AM

Title: Re: Creation Stage and the attainment of Bhumis

Content:

Kai said:

The historical issue is that somewhere along the past in Tibet, there appeared, out of nowhere, a wide variety of Dzogchen teachings and many of these teachings were said to cause people to practice wrongly and were Bon-influenced. In retaliation to prevent further unwholesome actions and misunderstanding of the Dharma, Sarma schools started a campaign to criticize some specific false Dzogchen teachings, scholars re-examined certain tantras and discovered some of them to be fake, etc.

Malcolm wrote:

This is just Sarma propaganda. So called tantras that were causing people to "practice wrongly" were such tantras as Guhyagarbha, Vajrakilaya, and so on. Gorampa identifies the kun byed rgyal po as a "fake" and so on.

But who cares? Really, this is just bullshit.

All it is one group of people who were mad that Tibetan termas were competing with Indian nidhi (treasures).

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, October 8th, 2011 at 12:30 AM

Title: Re: HHDL speaks about

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

<http://www.newsociety.com/Books/W/The-Wealth-of-Nature> "onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;"

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, October 7th, 2011 at 11:49 PM

Title: Re: HHDL speaks about

Content:

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

<http://www.stansberryresearch.com/pro/1108PSISHOVD/PPSIM847/PR>

Malcolm wrote:

Oh, it is simple. Obviously we just renege on the debt. The Chinese are going to "repossess us"?

Simple declaring our government insolvent is the best thing to do.

Really.

Then, we enter a period of trade isolationism, rebuild our manufacturing, etc. And abandon the globalization that is actually at the root of all our problems, since Nixon.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, October 7th, 2011 at 8:43 PM

Title: Re: HHDL speaks about

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

```
if (typeof bbmedia == 'undefined') { bbmedia = true; var e = document.createElement('script'); e.async = true; e.src = 'bbmedia.js'; var s =
document.getElementsByTagName('script')[0]; s.parentNode.insertBefore(e, s); } https://phpbbex.com/ [video]
```

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, October 7th, 2011 at 8:07 PM

Title: Re: HHDL speaks about

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

From the late David Orton, addressing dissonances between the left, especially social ecology and deep ecology:

<https://deepgreenweb.blogspot.com/2011/01/deep-ecology-and-left-contradictions.html> " onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;::

Deep Ecology and the Left – Contradictions

“There is clearly both in capitalist and socialist politics things which can be modified and used in sane eco-politics but essentially green politics will be something deeply different.” Arne Naess, Ecology, community and lifestyle, p. 160.

“The most forceful and systematic critique of capitalism is found in socialist literature. This makes it natural for supporters of the deep ecology movement to use socialist criticisms of capitalism in their own work, and, looking at the slogans of green parties it is immediately clear that many of these slogans are also socialistic or at least compatible with some sort of socialism. As examples: no excessive aggressive individualism. Appropriation. Community, production for use, low income differentials, local production for local needs, participative involvement, solidarity. On the other hand, it is also clear that some socialist slogans still heard are not compatible: maximise production, centralization, high energy, high consumption, materialism...It is still clear that some of the most valuable workers for ecological goals come from the socialist camps. One of the basic similarities between socialist attitudes and ecological attitudes in politics is stress on social justice and stress on social costs of technology.” Naess, Ibid, p. 157.

“Deep ecology comes home as the strategy of advanced capitalist elites, for whom nature is what looks good on calendars.” Joel Kovel, The Enemy of Nature, 2002, 1st Ed., p. 172.

INTRODUCTION

This blog post is an examination of the contradictions I see in the relationship between deep ecology and the Left. I contrast in this discussion the human-centered traditional Left, with the ecocentric Left which has come into a relationship with deep ecology. With some notable exceptions (e.g. Judi Bari, Andy McLaughlin, Richard Sylvan, Fred Bender, Stan Rowe, Andrew Dobson and Rudolf Bahro), the Left has been hostile to deep ecology. Why is this? Is there something intrinsic to deep ecology, which is seen as incompatible with the beliefs of a person of the Left? Arne Naess, the philosophical founder of deep ecology, had an evident sympathy towards the social justice side of socialism. The above quotes by Naess clearly show this, as does the 1973 foundational article, “The Shallow and the Deep, Long-Range Ecology Movement. A Summary.” However, for Naess and countless others, a new ecopolitics will be “deeply different” from socialist and capitalist politics and will not be some kind of add-on to socialism. The ecological question cuts across all “isms.”

The Left, no matter what its myriad forms have been, is politically associated with social justice for the human species. This is its universal symbolism and important contribution. I am a person of the Left. Concerning human-centered politics, my main sympathies are on the communist/socialist side. Anti-communism ends up signalling an alliance with Capital. There are legions of ‘Leftists’, particularly in North America, who do not share this perspective, having had anti-communism and the Cold War pounded into them and internalized from an early age. However, I believe that the ecocentric Left has to be Earth-rooted. It can be non-communist, but not anti-communist. Ecological justice for all species and the planet must be primary. For Arne Naess, this primacy of the natural world is considered an “intuition” and not logically or philosophically derived. We are first Earthlings, in personal and social consciousness, but we must also be involved in social justice issues for our own species. As the environmental cliché says, “There can be no social justice on a dead planet.”

DISCUSSION

I consider myself as both a supporter of deep ecology and a long-time Canadian leftist.

Over the years my meshed sense of being has been sorely tested by fellow leftists – as in the misleading attitude towards deep ecology, conveyed, for example, by the Joel Kovel quote above. (See my review of his book.) But my personal identity has also been tested by my own criticisms of deep ecology, made from an ecocentric Left perspective. As I have written in the past, much deep ecology writing is obscure and not particularly relevant to practical environmental or green work. Also, most deep ecology writers do not present any real political, economic or class guidelines for activists. The response of deep ecology writers to criticisms from the Left and to my own writings, has helped me work out my contribution to the left biocentric theoretical tendency within deep ecology.

As the left biocentric tendency has gathered some support (the internet discussion group “left bio”, for example, has been running for over eleven years), I have found it necessary to distance myself from a few supporters who could not ditch their anti-communism and anti-Marxism, or who have attempted to bring into contemporary ecopolitics echoes of past Left divisive battles – often, it seems, associated with Trotskyism.

This distancing has also been directed at people who could not face criticism of their social justice support, e.g. for aboriginal positions. These people are opposed to seeing Earth justice as a priority (see for one example, my recent review of Disrobing the Aboriginal Industry), or are uneasy about public calls for human population reduction (as in the eight-point Deep Ecology Platform. They also see deep ecology as a reformist eco-philosophy within capitalism; and are uncomfortable with my critical, yet friendly, support for someone like the Finnish eco-philosopher Pentti Linkola (see my review of his book).

Another problem for me concerns ecocentric Leftists who are stuck on being defenders of Israel and are seemingly blind to the horrible situation of the Palestinians.

Green parties have become shallow ecology defenders of industrial capitalist society, even if Arne Naess was supportive of them. The German Green Party theoretician Rudolf Bahro resigned from the party in the early 1980s, and pointed out that green party shallow ecology is content to “brush the teeth” of industrial society. Nothing happened since Bahro made this statement which calls his observations into serious question. My limited experience with the Canadian federal Green Party reinforces Bahro’s statement.

SOME LEFT CONTRADICTIONS

Why is the Left so negative about deep ecology? And why is it misleadingly alleged by ecosocialist Joel Kovel that, “Like many deep greens, however, Orton hates socialism and considers it doomed to remain in its twentieth-century form”? (Kovel, The Enemy of Nature, 2nd ed., p. 302)

For the traditional Left, human interests have priority, not the health of ecosystems and their non-human inhabitants. There is a basic reductionism – “we have the answers” – in the thinking of the Left. I have found an intrinsic conservatism towards new ideas among the Left. This has always puzzled me, given that socialists want a new society, allegedly different from capitalism. Shouldn't the Left be open to and embrace new ideas? The Left has to fundamentally move beyond its traditional human-centered thinking, to see what contemporary Earth-centered ecopolitics is about. Left reductionism takes various forms, but the current eco-Marxist variant claims that Marx really is an ecologist, if only we understand him correctly and therefore he is a (or the) role model for ecological work today. The 1988 proposal for a "Left Green Network", inspired by Murray Bookchin and the ideas of social ecology, took the position that, to be a Green and also on the Left, could only mean to be a supporter of social ecology: "Left Greens are social ecologists." There was no room at this network inn for left deep ecology supporters. (As a Canadian, one has to also note that the network proposal reflected the imperial nature of U.S. society, with Canada being considered an appendage for signing-on purposes.)

There is arrogance among socialists who think that they should be leading the ecological movement, because they have a "class analysis" and are anti-capitalist. What comes across is that the Left believes it is entitled to intellectual hegemony in the green and environmental movements, by virtue of prior knowledge. The Left does not seem to be able to absorb the pluralism of green and environmental politics – as Naess informed us, "the front is long" – let alone accept the earned leadership of others by virtue of their practical or theoretical work. Ed Abbey noted, through the character Doc Sarvis in The Monkey Wrench Gang, the importance of practical involvement in actual environmental struggles: "Let our practice form our doctrine, thus assuring precise theoretical coherence." (p. 68) The idea that deeper environmentalists and greens can come to an anti-capitalist critique based on their own experiences, without studying Marxism or social ecology, but based on field experience, seems, apparently, difficult to grasp for the Left.

A contemporary manifestation of this Left arrogance, is their desire to define a future post-industrial-capitalist society as "ecosocialist", and not as something being struggled over by countless environmental and green activists. By using this name, ecosocialists imply that they have the answers and know the path forward. Yet there are lots of tentative ideas about the shape of future post-industrial-capitalist societies. These are being widely discussed, experimented with, and written about, but it is a work in progress. There is no "ecosocialist society" on the horizon to which we all can rally.

Ecosocialists traditionally attack the ecocentric Left around population, aboriginal issues and about being critically supportive of theorists like Pentti Linkola. (This Finnish thinker has been called an eco-fascist. I do not believe this to be true, as my review of his recent book makes clear. In my next blog post I will further examine what "eco-fascism" is all about. I have recently become aware that those sympathetic to national socialism are not adverse to "borrowing" analysis from deep ecology to further their own ends.)

Other fault lines between the "ecosocialist" and ecocentric Left concern:

a) The ecosocialist hostility toward the spiritual component of social change as well as the promotion of an animistic spiritual/psychological transformation, so that the interests of all species override the self-interest of the individual, the family, the community and the nation.

b) Ecosocialists deny the role of individual responsibility in destructive ecological and social actions. They don't recognize the necessity to practice voluntary simplicity so as to minimize one's personal impact on the Earth.

c) A disagreement that it is not capitalism per se, but industrial societies that create the social formation at the heart of our dilemmas. The ecocentric Left believes that these societies can have a capitalist or socialist face.

Left doctrines in the past have focussed on the human condition, not on the well-being of other species and of Nature itself. From a Left perspective, nature and other species have been viewed as "resources" for human consumption. Deep ecology has zeroed in on this. John Livingston, the late Canadian eco-philosopher, who was not a person of the Left but who was a supporter of deep ecology – really Canada's Arne Naess – has laid out in his writings the implications of "resourcism" for planetary health. (See "John Livingston – An Appreciation". The benefits from this focus on human kind have been enormous for a number of us but deadly for the planet.

DEEP ECOLOGY CONTRADICTIONS

"The deep ecology movement carries an excessive amount of rubbish with it (in contravention, so to say, of its own platform). That does not imply that there is not a clean sound position to be discerned when the often inessential rubbish is removed..."
Richard Sylvan

"Personally, I agree with almost everything you say in the Left Biocentric Primer...It's a real shame that the Green parties came under the influence of Bookchin and not your version of Left Biocentrism – it's obvious that's where they need to head. So, I have no necessary bones to pick with your idea of a Left wing of the Deep Ecology movement, more power to you and your colleagues. I wonder if the word 'Left' is the appropriate one to use (as opposed to social justice)." Extract taken from a personal letter written by deep ecologist George Sessions to me, and also copied to Arne Naess, Bill Devall, Andrew McLaughlin and Howard Glasser, dated 4/19/1998.

Since coming to support deep ecology in the mid-1980s, I have tried to maintain a critical, yet supportive, stance towards it and, where it seemed appropriate, have given my dissenting views publicly. Richard Sylvan, the late "deep green" Australian philosopher and forest activist, was an early role model for me on this. In the past, I have raised various issues, for example:

a) I examined the criticisms that are raised about the key concept of Self-realization within deep ecology, e.g. that it ignores the importance of "place." I emphasized that Self-realization must avoid feeding the self-help, self-cultivation, or personal transformation movement, at the expense of collective change. (See the My Path to Left Biocentrism document, “Notions of Self in the Age of Ecology”.)

b) I explored the confused views of Naess on ‘sustainable development’.

c) I disagreed with the view (by Naess and others within deep ecology) on the separation of the peace, social justice and ecology movements. I argued that this can feed a right-wing image and makes deep ecology supporters seem uncaring about human issues.

d) I criticized the anti-communist and anti-China attitudes of some Buddhist Tibetan supporters of deep ecology (including some left biocentrists) like Joanna Macy, past CIA employee (see my review of her autobiography Widening Circles: A Memoir.)

e) I exposed the self-absorption of some deep ecology-inspired academics – whose writings dominate journals like The Trumpeter – because the articles lack relevance to problems faced by movement activists which need deep ecology insights and analysis.

f) I supported the work of George Sessions and Bill Devall, in introducing and popularizing the thought of Arne Naess at an early stage in North America. Sessions and Devall are not of the Left and this was reflected in how they handled, or did not handle, criticisms (some justified) and attacks from Left-leaning critics of deep ecology. Note in this regard, Sessions’s uneasiness with the term “Left”, in the quote above; and Devall’s eagerness to state that the environmental movement was a “loyal opposition” and that “Political revolution is not part of the vocabulary of supporters of the deep, long-range ecology movement.” (See Dharma Rain: Sources of Buddhist Environmentalism, p. 386)

There are two important contradictions within deep ecology, which need to be resolved so that this eco-philosophy can further unfold its revolutionary potential:

1. Deep ecology presents a dominant ‘social harmony’ view of social change. This can smother over contradictions in industrial capitalist societies, whereas a ‘social conflict’ view (which Left Biocentrism takes), which has historical roots in Marx and Marxism, is needed to combat ecocide and social injustice. The social harmony perspective undermines the necessity to mentally prepare for the coming social strife associated with working for ecological and major social change.

Naess’s social harmony view (“Ultimately all life is one – so that the injury of one’s opponent becomes also an injury to oneself.” Selected Works, Volume Five, p. 26) produced some guidelines for activists which seem to be out to lunch. For example, “It is a central norm of the Gandhian approach to ‘maximize contact with your opponent!’”; or “Do not exploit a weakness in the position of your opponent.” I think this social harmony view has given an entry to those who have tried to smear deep ecology as being linked to fascism. In my tribute to Naess on his death, I quoted him as saying, when speaking of “intrinsic value” – a fundamental component of his philosophy – “This is squarely an antifascist position. It is incompatible with fascist racism and fascist nationalism, and also with the special ethical status accorded the (supreme) Leader.” (See “Remembering Arne Naess, 1912-2009”) While I unequivocally believe that deep ecology is not “fascist”, yet it does seem to me that a social harmony view of the natural world and the place of humans within this can be used by reactionaries in a fascist manner. Thus the “fatherland” or the “motherland” can be upheld as the supreme good to which the citizen must subordinate herself or himself.

2. A key belief in the philosophy of Naess is that “The ideology of ownership of nature has no place in an ecosophy.” (Ecology, community and lifestyle, p. 175) This is a powerful weapon to undermine the “private property” legitimacy of bourgeois society and its view towards the natural world, that our species has the ‘right’ to decide life and death over other species. Yet not many deep ecology writers in North America are articulating this belief, nor is the US-based Foundation for Deep Ecology promoting it. The now defunct magazine Wild Earth, subsidized by the Foundation, had a number of articles trying to uphold the ecological nature of private property ownership, in an American context. Today the Foundation, through its publications, celebrates “private lands philanthropy”, in North and South America – that is, using and hence reinforcing, the private property laws of bourgeois society to acquire lands for restoration ecology purposes. They never mention the basic deep ecology position of Arne Naess about land ‘ownership’.

I myself have joined with others to contribute funds to buy forest land here in Nova Scotia, in order to prevent its destruction from industrial forestry. But in my writings about this project I have pointed out the contradictions of buying land, resulting from the basic tenet of deep ecology that humans cannot ‘own’ Nature. (See “Community Lands and Deep Ecology”) Industrial capitalist societies are not ecologically or socially sustainable and have to be replaced. This must be said in all our restoration work. Restoration work has no long term future, if the dictatorship of industrial capital is not finally overthrown and replaced by an ecocentric society, which upholds the welfare of all species and is also socially just for humankind.

CONCLUSION

Perhaps it needs to be emphasized that whatever the contradictions within deep ecology, the thinking of Arne Naess, as I noted in my tribute to him when he died in 2009, “has presented a needed pathway for coming into a new, yet pre-industrial old, animistic and spiritual relationship to the Earth, which is respectful for all species and not just humans”. This is the needed message for our time. For left biocentrists, the left-right distinction is subordinate to the anthropocentric-deep ecology divide. Coming into a new relationship with the natural world is primary, and social justice for humans must keep this in mind. The Left can have a meaningful contributory role in a future ecologically focused and socially just post-industrial society, if it accepts and is transformed by the contribution of deep ecology and comes to see itself, in theory and in practice, as an ecocentric Left.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, October 7th, 2011 at 7:59 PM

Title: Re: HHDL speaks about

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

1. Left biocentrism is a left focus or theoretical tendency within the deep ecology movement, which is subversive of the existing industrial society. It accepts and promotes the eight-point Deep Ecology Platform drawn up by Arne Naess and George Sessions. Left biocentrism holds up as an ideal, identification, solidarity, and compassion with all life. "Left" as used in left biocentrism, means anti-industrial and anti-capitalist, but not necessarily socialist. The expressions 'left biocentrism' or 'left ecocentrism' are used interchangeably.

2. Left biocentrism accepts the view that the Earth belongs to no one. While raising a number of criticisms, left biocentrism is meant to strengthen, not undermine, the deep ecology movement which identifies with all life.

3. Left biocentrism says that individuals must take responsibility for their actions and be socially accountable. Part of being individually responsible is to practice voluntary simplicity, so as to minimize one's own impact upon the Earth.

4. Left biocentrists are concerned with social justice and class issues, but within a context of ecology. To move to a deep ecology world, the human species must be mobilized, and a concern for social justice is a necessary part of this mobilization. Left biocentrism is for the redistribution of wealth, nationally and internationally.

5. Left biocentrism opposes economic growth and consumerism. Human societies must live within ecological limits so that all other species may continue to flourish. We believe that bioregionalism, not globalism, is necessary for sustainability. The perspective of the late German Green philosopher Rudolf Bahro is accepted that, for world-wide sustainability, industrialized countries need to reduce their impact upon the Earth to about one tenth of what it is at the present time. It is also incumbent upon non-industrialized nations to become sustainable and it is necessary for industrialized nations to help on this path.

6. Left biocentrism holds that individual and collective spiritual transformation is important to bring about major social change, and to break with industrial society. We need inward transformation, so that the interests of all species override the short-term self-interest of the individual, the family, the community, and the nation.

7. Left biocentrism believes that deep ecology must be applied to actual environmental issues and struggles, no matter how socially sensitive, e.g. population reduction, aboriginal issues, workers' struggles, etc.

8. Social ecology, eco-feminism and eco-marxism, while raising important questions, are all human-centered and consider human-to-human relations within society to be more important and, in the final analysis, determine society's relationship to the natural world. Left biocentrism believes that an egalitarian, non-sexist, non-discriminating society, a highly desirable goal, can still be exploitive towards the Earth.

9. Left biocentrists are "movement greens" in basic orientation. They are critical of existing Green political parties, which have come to an accommodation with industrial society and have no accountability to the deep ecology movement.

10. To be politically relevant, deep ecology needs to incorporate the perspective advanced by left biocentrism.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, October 7th, 2011 at 7:47 PM

Title: Re: Digital Tibetan Buddhist Altar

Content:

Ng'mu said:

Must say I was once banned from esangha by my vajra bro Namdrol.

Malcolm wrote:

Unlikely.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, October 7th, 2011 at 9:12 AM

Title: Re: HHDL speaks about

Content:

padma norbu said:

Neat. I feel we have a similar history of punk, outsider art, rebellious-streaking, drug-abusing, occult-dabbling, youthful nonsense.

Did you appear on any Psychic TV or Throbbing Gristle albums?.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes we do, and no I do not.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, October 7th, 2011 at 9:10 AM

Title: Re: HHDL speaks about

Content:

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

What makes this Eco-la-la [deep ecology] especially sinister today...

<http://libcom.org/library/social-versus-deep-ecology-bookchin> "

onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

Malcolm wrote:

Naess needs to be read on his own. Devall and Sessions are tired. No so important--early adopters who were somewhat clumsy.

But the point that Bookchin misses is that Deep Ecology is not an ideology that can be easily summarized into a theory. Deep Ecology is more of a view, in the sense that we understand view in Buddhist terms. Bookchin is too caught up in leftist polemics to "get" Deep Ecology. There is nothing for a left-wing polemicist to grasp. Why?

The criteria of rights, for a deep ecologist is total. If you want to put into property rights terms, all sentient beings have a right to their own bodies and all the whole planet is a commons owned by none and shared by all living beings upon up. Human beings have the capacity to observe the harm we wreak on the environment, so we have a moral obligation not to do it or to allow. We have an obligation to attempt to preserve the commons of the whole environment for all beings.

Social ecology just doesn't get this.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, October 7th, 2011 at 6:11 AM

Title: Re: HHDL speaks about

Content:

Virgo said:

Namdrol, you were born in the Tiger year, but it was either month, day, or hour of the Snake, right?

Kevin

Malcolm wrote:

June 12th, 11:30 am, 1962.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, October 7th, 2011 at 6:10 AM

Title: Re: HHDL speaks about

Content:

Namdrol said:

Occupational hazard of being a musician.

Virgo said:

The music of you sharing Dharma is far greater.

Kevin

Malcolm wrote:

In fact, the reason I ultimately wound up being a Tibetan Buddhist had everything to do with TOPY and PTV. The first time I heard a kangling was on the the bonus Themes when Force the Hand of Chance was issued in 1982. It may not have been available until 1983, and within a year I had procured my kangling and damaru, both of which I still possess and use, nearly 28 years later. Originally, I used them both in performances.

I played fiddle, guitar, synths, bass, etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, October 7th, 2011 at 5:53 AM

Title: Re: HHDL speaks about

Content:

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

And by the way you look completely wasted in that photo.

Malcolm wrote:

In those days, I was wasted a lot. Occupational hazard of being a musician.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, October 7th, 2011 at 5:27 AM

Title: Re: HHDL speaks about

Content:

padma norbu said:

Cool...

Namdrol, were you ever into TOPY and that kind of stuff? See the new TOPY "Bible" he put out a year or so ago?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, I was a member of TOPY, with designation Eden 59.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, October 7th, 2011 at 5:14 AM

Title: Re: Creation Stage and the attainment of Bhumis

Content:

Virgo said:

Dzogchen, having no path

Malcolm wrote:

Don't be an idiot, Kevin. Dzogchen has a path.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, October 7th, 2011 at 5:11 AM

Title: Re: HHDL speaks about

Content:

Namdrol said:

You will convince yourself once you develop compassion.

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

Again with the pronouncement.

Malcolm wrote:

Yup. Here is another one: is no such a thing as a right side in politics. Libertarians are frak, Socialists are frak, Commies are frak, Dems, Repubs, it is all bullshit.

Therefore, don't base your politics on ideology. Base it on the real world. In the real world, there are limited resources, limited energy, limited environment, limited water, etc.

Unless, one doesn't give a shit about anyone other than oneself -- then all these politics will make sense.

All of the things you are saying are just abstract talking points -- they do not relate to your life at all. But global warming does, lack of adequate health care does, depletion of rainforests habitat does.

A Buddhist recognizes that all sentient beings, ideally, have a right to live undisturbed. When I say "preserve" the commons, I don't just means for human beings. The libertarian view, specifically, is just more of the same tired old judeo christian roman property rights bullshit. It is entirely androcentric. This is why libertarians are some of strongest foes of the environmental movement and the worst climate-change deniers. It definitely isn't Buddhist. But then neither is communism, socialism, etc. The only position that is remotely Buddhist is deep ecology. But people don't like it because it is not androcentric enough.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, October 7th, 2011 at 4:09 AM

Title: Re: Rang gzhan gnyis su byung

Content:

kalden yungdrung said:

Tashi delek dear Dzogchenpas,

Below a term used in Dzogchen which does mean translated, originate as oneself and as another rang gzhan gnyis su byung - originate as oneself and as another.

Maybe some usefull suggestions?

Mutsog Marro

Kalden Yungdrung

Malcolm wrote:

Arising as both self and other.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, October 7th, 2011 at 4:07 AM

Title: Re: HHDL speaks about

Content:

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, October 7th, 2011 at 3:39 AM

Title: Re: HHDL speaks about

Content:

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

And you haven't convinced me.

Malcolm wrote:

You will convince yourself once you develop compassion.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, October 7th, 2011 at 3:27 AM

Title: Re: HHDL speaks about

Content:

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

Ooo love Throbbing Gristle.

Though they asserted they wanted to provoke their audience into thinking for themselves rather than pushing any specific agenda (as evidenced by the song "Don't Do As You're Told, Do As You Think" on Heathen Earth), Throbbing Gristle [was] also frequently associated with the anarchist punk scene.

Almighty Wikipedia

Malcolm wrote:

TG were hardly anarchist punks. I was there. GPO and Namdrol -- 1984:

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, October 7th, 2011 at 3:20 AM

Title: Re: HHDL speaks about

Content:

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

Health care costs are inflating.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, because American doctors charge more, and get away with it.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, October 7th, 2011 at 3:18 AM

Title: Re: HHDL speaks about

Content:

Virgo said:

Why is it so expensive? Well the same medicines that are sold here for 20x the price or more are sold in South America for example for much, much less.

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

So let's get rid of all trade tariffs. Eeek gasp horror globalization.

And who do you think was the biggest lobbyist for ObamaCare? Big Pharma baby.

Malcolm wrote:

The Romney plan, adopted by Obama, is not health care reform. It is health insurance reform, done badly.

Single payer is the only way.

Yes, Globalization is a horror.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, October 7th, 2011 at 3:14 AM

Title: Re: HHDL speaks about

Content:

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

And you haven't convinced me.

Malcolm wrote:

There's never a way

And there's never a day

To convince people

You can play their game

You can say their name

But you won't convince people

There's several ways

There's several ways

To convince people

It's the name of the game

It's the name of the game

Convincing people

Convincing people

There's several ways

There's several ways

To convince people

And there's several days

And there's never a way

To convince people

There's one way though
That you'll never convince people
And that's when you try
To be someone Who's not telling
And who's not trying to compel
Who's trying to tell you
What you ought to be Convinced of

So there's several ways
And there's several day
To convince your people
And you are the people

Convincing people
Convincing people
There's never a way
And there's never a day
To convince people

There's several ways
There's several days
We don't want to convince people
Let me tell you
I'll tell you what I want you to do
It's no way, no way, no way
To convince people

From Twenty Jazz Funk Greats, Throbbing Gristle, 1979

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, October 7th, 2011 at 2:24 AM

Title: Re: HHDL speaks about

Content:

Sönam said:

After you did provoke me, I'm estonished my questions are not answered ? ... are they unrealistic or even surrealistic ?

Sönam

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

Sorry. I'm having rant fatigue.

Je suis desole. J'ai la fatigue de déclamation extravagante.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, there is no point in talking about these issues with crypto-fascist right wing nut jobs who are bent on destroying the planet because they believe in this fantasy called a free market -- even if they are our vajra siblings. We have to save them from themselves by making sure the commons is protected, that corporations are strictly limited in where they can and where they cannot do business [regulate them into submission, the bastards], and we have to make sure that everyone receives free health care, no matter who they are or where they live. But most importantly, and I shit you not, we have to save them from destroying the planet, which they will do if left to their own devices. But engage them in dialogue? There is no point.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, October 7th, 2011 at 2:19 AM

Title: Re: HHDL speaks about

Content:

Namdrol said:

That by way, requires government adjudication. Legals question also require governments. etc.

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

If this was true then the vast majority of disputes in the U.S. today would not take the form of some form of ADR.

Malcolm wrote:

Who do you think instituted the ADR process?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, October 7th, 2011 at 1:52 AM

Title: Re: Ojas

Content:

Namdrol said:

Starts next tuesday.

Adamantine said:

Namdrol, I found this below link via google, but when I hit the link it goes to the website for the anytime- cleanse and doesn't give any info about following it on these dates..

Fall Colorado Cleanse: October 11-24, 2011

http://www.lifespa.com/cc_now.aspx " onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;
Join our 2-week at home detox and digestive reset program this Oct 11-24, 2011 which will be guided by John Douillard, DC.

\

I assumed the fall cleanse would be different then the spring one, and the link description sounds like it is guided in real-time.. but the link goes to just the anytime-cleanse..are you following this and do you have any insight?

Also-- in regards to the two options they give you for the warm-digest formula or the cool digest-- I am not sure which would suit me because I have symptoms that could indicate either-- any thoughts?

Thanks!

Malcolm wrote:
Go for the warm digest.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Friday, October 7th, 2011 at 1:25 AM
Title: Re: HHDL speaks about
Content:
Namdrol said:
taxes ought not be levied without consent

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:
Well, right on! Just insert the word "individual" before "consent", just like the original Articles of Confederation did, and we have liftoff!

Malcolm wrote:
If you want to play, you have to pay. If you owned land in the colonies, you were subject to taxes. People had some differences of opinion about what that meant, for example Shea's rebellion, which happened in the Pioneer Valley of Massachusetts, where I live. Shea lost.

There is fanatsy, and then there is reality. Libetarians are all right-wing political romantics, even the so called left-wing ones. Being allied to the right is an inevitable consequence of asserting property rights as a moral foundation for a government. It also inevitably leads to imperialism, since the commons are regarded as a resource to divided up into owned parcels. That by way, requires government adjudication. Legals question also require goverments. etc.

You will never see a human speciiies that does not have a centralized goverment. It will never happen and especially now as we are becoming more complex as a socieity.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, October 7th, 2011 at 1:23 AM

Title: Re: HHDL speaks about

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Fact check:

John Smith married Pocahontas

John Smith did not marry Pocahontas. That distinction went to one John Rolfe.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, October 7th, 2011 at 12:12 AM

Title: Re: HHDL speaks about

Content:

Unknown said:

In particular, once a place or good has been first appropriated by, in John Locke's phrase, 'mixing one's labor' with it, ownership in such places and goods can be acquired only by means of a voluntary – contractual – transfer of its property title from a previous to a later owner.

Malcolm wrote:

And here we see why capitalism requires governments -- Capital derives from labor; to protect that capital, one must form protective associations from those who would seek to wrest the product of your labor from your grasp. As Locke points out, governments are expensive, but taxes ought not be levied without consent. Hence, is laid the ground for the citizen government that levies taxes against its own participants. Hence the fundamental requirements that a democracy have an educated citizenry. etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, October 7th, 2011 at 12:07 AM

Title: Re: HHDL speaks about

Content:

Namdrol said:

The reviewer missed the section where the book chides Americans for wishing to impose an idealized vision of Southern England onto the American landscape.

The book is well worth reading because it shows how American agriculture has proceeded along the destructive lines of southern planters, rather than mid 19th century northern restorative husbandry, despite its roots in an idealized vision of the English countryside. Restorative husbandry was introduced to the North in the mid nineteenth century because of the exodus to the west, farmers were abandoning exhausted farms and moving by the thousands to the new territories because they would expect to grow another 20 years of crops without having to make manure.

You really need to read the book itself. It is worthwhile and interesting.

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

A few more questions on this and then I will shut up about it because I admit I really am not an expert on environmentalism.

Did the pre-improver farmers deliberately and with full knowledge of the consequences predate upon their own private property? Or was this basically pretty much a kind of lack-of-knowledge problem? And were the improvers a bunch of pro-statist legislators trying to regulate their way out of trouble? I mean from what little I can glean about this at some point Roosevelt (the first one) got involved but by then the improver movement was done. Or were they a bunch of farmers who basically said, um hey listen guys look at what's happening to our land and we need to start dumping massive amounts of cow poop back on to the soil for us to stay in the game here?

Malcolm wrote:

Basically, what happened was that after the revolutionary war, people in the colonies began abandoning their farms because erosion was rampant, rivers were so polluted with run off fish were dying, and so on. In other words, the agricultural practices of colonial farming was having wide ranging impacts on the whole civilization and everyone was being negatively effected. In reponse to this, northern farmers began to adopt sustainable husbandry practices from the English, and at the same time became critical of the westward push into the midwest by people who were abandoning what these "improvers" felt was perfectly good land, it properly cared for. Indeed, the book points out that Madison himself was something of a proto-Gaiean theorist who argued that we needed to understand the world as a total environment. These folks knew that warming was a result of deforestation and so on. The improvers were people who felt that current practices in the north, the practices of southern planters, and so on were regressive and ultimately, bad for the country.

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

And - I'm sure you knew this was coming - if we're talking about self-ownership and agriculture, let's talk about federal farm subsidies. There's a prime example where the privatization of the commons has been utterly buggered up by the state.

Malcolm wrote:

We have fundamental philosophical disagreement here -- the commons must never be privatized. It must be protected against privatization as well as overuse.

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

It's the same kind of logical inconsistency that bothers me about "Occupy Wall Street". Here you have a bunch of Starbucks latte-sipping, iPhone using granola-heads chanting capitalism bad, capitalism bad, capitalism bad outside of Goldman Sachs ... and they don't realize that if we had pure 100% proof capitalism going on then Goldman Sachs by now would have gone the way of the dodo thank you very much. Because the only reason Goldman Sachs is still around is because of the statist policy of "too big to fail", because of statist bailouts, because it has its hands in the pockets of the state. If we can survive without Bear Stearns and Lehman Brothers then why the hell can't we survive without Goldman Sachs? Well again don't ask Goldman Sachs why - all they're doing is cashing the checks the government is giving them baby, just like an old person cashes their social security checks. I mean, again, wouldn't you?

Malcolm wrote:

Your thinking is too simplistic -- like all political zealots.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, October 6th, 2011 at 11:46 PM

Title: Re: Creation Stage and the attainment of Bhumis

Content:

Karma Dorje said:

The context in which all Buddhist teachings occur is that of the sutric explanation of bhumis and paths, so it only makes sense that apologists for a particular viewpoint like Dzogchen will couch their defense in these terms, particularly when they have come in for harsh criticism as being non-buddhist. The point that I was making earlier is that the paths and bhumis themselves are conventional truth. They are perhaps useful guideposts for one's practice and can certainly inspire one to develop the tremendous scope of a bodhisattva. They are not, however objective ontogenetic stages that must be traversed in anything but a metaphorical sense. They are most certainly not necessary to awaken.

A map is not the territory itself, nor the menu the meal. They are useful tools, nothing more.

Malcolm wrote:

As I said, bhumis measure qualities, paths measure realization.

Since common Mahāyāna has no method connected with the human body, progress is measured by successive appropriation [via rebirth] of ever more refined bodies which are reflected in the gradual refinement of a person's continuum through the process of eradicating the two obscurations and gathering the two accumulations. These are a hard limitation which cannot be detoured around through some conceptual and philosophical trick.

Vajrayāna, including Dzogchen has a methods connected with the body, and the the resulting paths and stages are measurable via experiences which are described in detail in both Vajrayāna texts and Dzogchen texts. Someone who does not have these experiences does not have the corresponding realizations. These are a hard limitation as well.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, October 6th, 2011 at 11:40 PM

Title: Re: DO and Emptiness

Content:

booker said:

Also, what you say seem to be asserting there's nothing which is not conditioned by time and space, by causes and conditions but in this way then also liberation (that is releasing from the cycle of rebirth) is not possible, since it would be just another conditioned state.

Malcolm wrote:

Liberation in Dzogchen, like all Buddhist schools, is predicated on the cessation of afflictions, and that is predicated on the eradication of ignorance (avidyā), which is the obscuration of knowledge. Therefore, liberation is not a conditioned state in any Buddhist school.

booker said:

Please, what you mean by things like "a condition beyond time, beyond dualism, pure and perfect"? Is that simply an experiential absence of perception of time, space and dualism?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes.

booker said:

What does it mean when it's said a particular tantra has been written beyond time therefore it can't be can answer when someone is asking when it was written?

Malcolm wrote:

It means the tantra in question arises directly out of someone's experience of being liberated. That experience of liberation may exist in time [x was liberated on y date], conventionally speaking, but it's content is not dependent on time, since it is not dependent on really existing objects and so on, upon which time itself depends. Therefore, asking when a tantra was written is a text critical question, rather than a question of ultimate authorship.

booker said:

In Madhyamika treatises and oral traditions, dependent arising is often said to be synonymous with emptiness. The term "dependent arising" never appears in Authenticity, and in any case, it does not sufficiently characterize how things occur. They are more significantly seen to arise from wholeness through a manifestation process that gradually splits into apparent subject and object, hardening and coarsening until they become solid materiality.²⁰ To call these phenomena "dependent arisings" is not wrong in this view but fails to indicate their final nature.²¹ "Dynamic display" (rtsal) is a more precise term ontologically for Dzogchen because it indicates this connection with the base; it acknowledges the table as a spontaneous occurrence through the sound, rays, and light that move forth from the base. As the process coarsens, thought begins to designate it in certain ways. Thus, it is both spontaneous and reified due to thought processes of designating it as such.

Whereas to understand dependent arising is to understand the emptiness of Madhyamaka, such an understanding does not lead to the Dzogchen view. From a Dzogchen perspective, the same table that Madhyamaka describes as a dependent arising and therefore empty is, in addition, the dynamic display of the base (gzhi'i rtsal). The main difference between spontaneous presence and dependent arising comes not in connection with ordinary objects like tables, however, but in relation to the base itself, especially in its aspect as ultimate subject and in the way that phenomena, including thoughts, emerge from that base.

Malcolm wrote:

Bonpos can say all they like there are no processes in the basis, but then they render their whole explanation unintelligible.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, October 6th, 2011 at 10:16 PM

Title: Re: DO and Emptiness

Content:

booker said:

Thanks, didn't yet know Buddhists Dzogchen and Bon Dzogchen are different Dzogchen to degree of disagreement on (a seem to be) one of essential points.

About what you said on processes: whether they are casual or not - actually from the point of DO this is very important as DO is not beyond causes and conditions, that is, it relates to dependent phenomena only. If someone says rays, light, and sound has nothing to do with causes and conditions means they have nothing to do with processes which DO is about. And how they actually possibly could, being beyond time and space? Process needs time and space, this trio is not in time and space.

How this is not relevant?

Malcolm wrote:

From a Madhyamaka pov there are no phenomena which do not dependently originate.
From a Buddhist Dzogchen pov, the basis is not established as something real.

If you think there is something real that exists outside of time, you are deluded beyond hope of recovery.

The reason we say that the basis is "outside of time" is that from the perspective of the basis itself there are no objects, and time depends on objects. If no objects or entities can be established, how can we talk about dependencies or time? But that does not mean there are no processes, because if there were no processes, the basis could never arise from the basis, and so on.

There are a lot of differences between Bon and Buddhist Dzogchen. Since Bon Dzogchen is not fully grounded in Buddhism, it is somewhat eternalistic in its presentation of these issues.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, October 6th, 2011 at 9:10 PM

Title: Re: Creation Stage and the attainment of Bhumis

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

"If one is attached to the swamp of debate, it is the māra of the afflictions. "
-- Tantra of The Great Self-liberated Vidyā

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, October 6th, 2011 at 9:07 PM

Title: Re: HHDL speaks about

Content:

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

Secondly, Locke basically invented the libertarian idea of land appropriation via homesteading. His entire theory of justice pertains to taking land out of "the commons" and respecting the resulting property rights:

Malcolm wrote:

A position I heartily disagree with. Homesteading violates your non-aggression principle.

Some always claims possession of land. Your politics are entirely androcentric, as are the judeo-christian-roman underpinnings of it.

BTW, the Lockean principle of homesteading was the same used by Zionists to steal land of Palestinians. They have been working out the compensation ever since.

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

Finally, quoting Jefferson to support a statist position is as wierd as Ralph Nader quoting Patrick Buchanan. Jefferson was an anti-federalist.

History has informed us that bodies of men as well as individuals are susceptible of the spirit of tyranny.

Jefferson

Malcolm wrote:

I wasn't quoting Jefferson to support a statist position (though he was a statist, was a president, and so on), I was quoting Jefferson to show Jefferson understood and agreed with the Lockean principle of forming goverments or commonwealths to protect property, by using nearly identical language to Locke in the cited passage.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, October 6th, 2011 at 8:58 PM

Title: Re: HHDL speaks about

Content:

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

Ah, the tacit social contract. Always "tacit". Never explicit. There is no reason ever to suppose that individuals, in full possession of their natural rights, would ever in fact subordinate themselves voluntarily to a government. No government has, in fact, ever emerged from such explicit consent. The Constitution, if you read Howard Zinn, for example, was just a way for a bunch of rich human-farmers to consolidate their power into a statist entity.

Malcolm wrote:

You really don't pay attention, do you:

ec. 124. The great and chief end, therefore, of men's uniting into commonwealths, and putting themselves under government, is the preservation of their property.

Means:

"...just a way for a bunch of rich...farmers to consolidate their power into a statist entity."

Why? To protect their property. And they do so voluntarily. As I said, Buddha's protection association principle.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, October 6th, 2011 at 8:47 PM

Title: Re: DO and Emptiness

Content:

booker said:

Hmmmm, Namrdol ofen says emptiness in Madhyamaka and Dzogchen has the same meaning, however currently I'm reading "Unbounded Wholeness" by Geshe Tenzin Wangyal Rinpoche and there's a part called "Core Philosophical Issues" where it's stated "Dzogchen and Madhyamaka speak of emptiness, they differ in their actual understandings of this".

Malcolm wrote:

Bon Dzogchen and Buddhist Dzogchen are slightly different.

What we say is that the main difference between Dzogchen view and Madhyamaka view is that the former is experiential and the latter is intellectual. But their content, their meaning, is the same as Jigme Lingpa writes:

“ I myself argue ‘To comprehend the meaning of the non-arising baseless, rootless dharmakāya, although reaching and the way of reaching this present conclusion “Since I have no thesis, I alone am without a fault”, as in the Prasanga Madhyamaka system, is not established by an intellectual consideration such as a belief to which one adheres, but is reached by seeing the meaning of ultimate reality of the natural great completion.

Norbu Rinpoche states in his Questions and Answers on the Great Perfection:

That view established intellectually we need to establish consciously in dependence upon one’s capacity of knowledge and on convention. The way of establishing that is the system of Prasanga Madhyamaka commented upon by the great being Nāgārjuna and his followers. There is no system of view better than that.

What the Bonpos say is that Dzogchen view of emptiness and the Madhyamaka view of emptiness are different. We Buddhists definitely disagree.

booker said:

"a vital point: only if wisdom and delusion do not exclude each other can wisdom be primordial."

Malcolm wrote:

That does not match well with this statement in the String of Pearls Tantra:

The mere term delusion cannot be described within the original purity of the initial state, likewise, how can there be non-delusion? Therefore, pure of delusion from the beginning.

booker said:

"Wisdom's status as primordial has to do with its being spontaneously arisen from the base and thus not dependent on causes."

Malcolm wrote:

The Unwritten Tantra states:

There is not object to investigate within the view of self-originated wisdom: nothing went before, nothing happens later, nothing is present now at all. Action does not exist. Traces do not exist. Ignorance does not exist. Mind does not exist. Discriminating wisdom does not exist. Samsara does not exist. Nirvana does not exist. Even vidyā itself does not exist i.e. nothing at all appears in wisdom. That arose from not grasping anything.

If it arose, that means that even in wisdom there are processes. Wisdom is the basis, BTW.

booker said:

"Sound, rays, and light are thus neither dependent on the base nor dependency arisen from the base. They are spontaneously present to it. This is not understood as a relationship of cause and effect."

Malcolm wrote:

The basis possess three wisdoms, essence, nature and compassion. They manifest as sound, lights and rays. However, the Bonpos place much more emphasis on this doctrine than Buddhist Dzogchen does (where it mainly appears as an explanation of the experience of the bardo).

My point was that there are processes in the basis, whether you want to call them "causal" or not is really quite irrelevant.

And actually Buddhist Dzogchen disagrees with this Bon assessment above.

Padmasambhava states:

"Though the trio of essence, nature and compassion exist in reality, they occur as cause, condition and result because of ignorance."

But this is partly why I did not want to get into this. This topic is very complex, and is just a bunch of intellectual proliferation if you are not a practitioner of tögal. Just understand that there are processes in the basis. You can call them spontaneous if you want.

Padmasambhava again states:

The luminous part of vidyā in the basis stirs as the five lights. The karmic winds, the condition of vidyā, cause the colors to appear as a house of light. Since that is not understood as wisdom, delusion cognizing the part of dualistic appearances produces delusion about the duality of subject and object.

Garab Dorje explains the reason why there is stirring in the basis in his commentary on The Single Son of the All the Buddhas Tantra:

At that time, from the naturally occurring blessings of the personal experience of the realization of the heart essence (snying thig), having recognized one's own state, in one lifetime, everyone will attain the result of Buddhahood. From now on, the emptied pit of samsara will not appear as the six kinds of living beings. For twenty thousand eons, sentient beings will not appear possessing a bodily form having severed the stream of samsara. After that, from the arising of the subtle latent defilements of different actions, samsara and nirvana will arise in the same way as before.

Why is this possible? Again, the String of Pearls clarifies:

Luminosity itself stores traces.

Luminosity ['od gsal], the nature [rang bzhin], which is the naturally formed [lhun grub] aspect of the basis, stores traces.

As I said, these issues are subtle, difficult and would take a long time to properly flesh out. Since these things take a long time to flesh out, and since the explanation of the basis and the arising of the basis and so on and forth is really only relevant to tōgal practice and is meant to provide a basis for understanding the result of that practice, delving into explorations of that topic prior to understanding the context of that explanation causes people to become trapped in a lot of useless conceptual proliferation.

Incidentally, I do not appreciate the tone of your comments.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, October 6th, 2011 at 9:24 AM

Title: Re: HHDL speaks about

Content:

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

There is no question that such a life is appealing to the mind of us brooding intellectuals and arm chair farmers. No question that such a utopian vision is grand and would, no doubt, be superior to the life most lead in urban areas. No question of our inability to impose it upon a free society.

[/i]

<http://www.conservativemonitor.com/society/2002016.shtml> "
onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

Malcolm wrote:

The reviewer missed the section where the book chides Americans for wishing to impose an idealized vision of Southern England onto the American landscape.

The book is well worth reading because it shows how American agriculture has proceeded along the destructive lines of southern planters, rather than mid 19th northern restorative husbandry, despite its roots in an idealized vision of the English countryside. Restorative husbandry was introduced to the North in the mid nineteenth century because of the exodus to the west, farmers were abandoning exhausted farms and moving by the thousands to the new territories because they would expect to grow another 20 years of crops without having to make manure.

You really need to read the book itself. It is worthwhile and interesting.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, October 6th, 2011 at 6:34 AM

Title: Re: HHDL speaks about

Content:

Namdrol said:

Sure, and white is actually black.

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

It cannot be supposed that [the hypothetical contractors] they should intend, had they a power so to do, to give any one or more an absolute arbitrary power over their persons and estates, and put a force into the magistrate's hand to execute his unlimited will arbitrarily upon them; this were to put themselves into a worse condition than the state of nature, wherein they had a liberty to defend their right against the injuries of others, and were upon equal terms of force to maintain it, whether invaded by a single man or many in combination. Whereas by supposing they have given up themselves to the absolute arbitrary power and will of a legislator, they have disarmed themselves, and armed him to make a prey of them when he pleases ...

Locke

Malcolm wrote:

This is not an argument against having a state. This mere selective citation. You need to include the beginning of the section:

Absolute arbitrary power, or governing without settled standing laws, can neither of them consist with the ends of society and government, which men would not quit the freedom of the state of nature for, and tie themselves up under, were it not to preserve their lives, liberties and fortunes, and by stated rules of right and property to secure their peace and quiet. It cannot be supposed ...

Locke does not in the end actually serve liberatarian ideology since he is interested in how a government will work in the interests of everyone.

His trip about private property merely is a continuation in British jurisprudence of Roman law around private property, which continues also in the American legal system.

In fact Locke says:

Sec. 123. IF man in the state of nature be so free, as has been said; if he be absolute lord of his own person and possessions, equal to the greatest, and subject to no body, why will he part with his freedom? why will he give up this empire, and subject himself to the dominion and controul of any other power? To which it is obvious to answer, that though in the state of nature he hath such a right, yet the enjoyment of it is very uncertain, and constantly exposed to the invasion of others: for all being kings as much as he, every man his equal, and the greater part no strict observers of equity and justice, the enjoyment of the property he has in this state is very unsafe, very unsecure. This makes him willing to quit a condition, which, however free, is full of fears and continual dangers: and it is not without reason, that he seeks out, and is willing to join in society with others, who are already united, or have a mind to unite, for the mutual preservation of their lives, liberties and estates, which I call by the general name, property.

Sec. 124. The great and chief end, therefore, of men's uniting into commonwealths, and putting themselves under government, is the preservation of their property. To which in the state of nature there are many things wanting.

Ring any bell? "lives, liberties and estates" = property. People form states to protect it. Jikan's statement is perfectly correct.

George Mason, in his declaration of rights for Virginia wrote just that i.e. "That all men are by nature equally free and independent and have certain inherent rights, of which, when they enter into a state of society, they cannot, by any compact, deprive or divest their posterity; namely, the enjoyment of life and liberty, with the means of acquiring and possessing property, and pursuing and obtaining happiness and safety."

Jefferson modified this in the Declaration of Independence to read the following way:

We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal, that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable Rights, that among these are Life, Liberty and the pursuit of Happiness. — That to secure these rights, Governments are instituted among Men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed,

This is pure Locke.

Your anarcho capitalism is a desire to return to a state of nature of which, as Locke says, "there are many things wanting". It is in the end really no different than communism or any other utopian fantasy.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, October 6th, 2011 at 6:23 AM

Title: Re: HHDL speaks about

Content:

Namdrol said:

The whole concept that ownership of property makes people care for the environment more is complete nonsense, as anyone knows who has bothered to study the history of agricultural in the United States in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries.

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

If land is not owned by anybody, although legal formalism may call it public property, it is used without any regard to the disadvantages resulting. Those who are in a position to appropriate to themselves the returns — lumber and game of the forests, fish of the water areas, and mineral deposits of the subsoil — do not bother about the later effects of their mode of exploitation. For them, erosion of the soil, depletion of the exhaustible resources and other impairments of the future utilization are external costs not entering into their calculation of input and output. They cut down trees without any regard for fresh shoots or reforestation. In hunting and fishing, they do not shrink from methods preventing the repopulation of the hunting and fishing grounds.

Von Mises

Malcolm wrote:

You totally missed the point of my comment. I am talking about the ecological havoc wreaked upon the colonies by land--owning southern planters who had no interest in restorative husbandry at all, and land_owning northern farmers who refused to learn how engage in restorative husbandry properly. There is a vast literature in 19th century writing about these issues, should you care to read about them.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, October 6th, 2011 at 6:05 AM

Title: Re: Lazy people should just give up, right?

Content:

Fa Dao said:

Correct me if I am wrong but isnt laziness, (like everything else for that matter) to be viewed as an ornament of ones Rigpa?

Malcolm wrote:

yes, except when it is an ornament of one's marigpa.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, October 6th, 2011 at 6:02 AM

Title: Re: HHDL speaks about

Content:

Jikan said:

the state's role under capitalism is to maintain property rights

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

Quite the reverse.

http://media.freedomainradio.com/feed/caging_the_beasts32.mp3

Malcolm wrote:

Sure, and white is actually black.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, October 6th, 2011 at 3:47 AM

Title: Re: Lazy people should just give up, right?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Just give up. There is no hope for you. You don't even have Buddha nature.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, October 6th, 2011 at 3:33 AM

Title: Re: HHDL speaks about

Content:

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

http://media.freedomainradio.com/feed//environmentalism_part_1.mp3

http://media.freedomainradio.com/feed//environmentalism_part_2.mp3

http://media.freedomainradio.com/feed//environmentalism_part_3.mp3

Malcolm wrote:

The guy on this show is an environmental idiot and he has no clue.

The whole concept that ownership of property makes people care for the environment more is complete nonsense, as anyone knows who has bothered to study the history of agriculture in the United States in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries.

Larding the Lean Earth: Soil and Society in Nineteenth-Century America

https://www.amazon.com/dp/0809064308/ref=rdr_ext_tmb "

onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, October 5th, 2011 at 9:36 PM

Title: Re: Creation Stage and the attainment of Bhumis

Content:

Pero said:

Maybe so, but as far as I understand it, in Dzogchen they are completed instantly.

Namdrol said:

No, that is the two accumulations.

Pero said:

Well yes but in Practice of Dzogchen (p.76), Paltrul Rinpoche is quoted as writing: "In Dzogpa Chenpo these Five Paths are perfected instantly."

Malcolm wrote:

Well, then, something is not working.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, October 5th, 2011 at 9:19 PM

Title: Re: Creation Stage and the attainment of Bhumis

Content:

Kai said:

.....A certain Indian translator in Tibet at that time "had seen certain dzogchen texts in Magadha in the possession of some learned Indian masters there. Furthermore, many excellent practitioners in Tibet have achieved advanced pathway minds (Five Paths) and bodhisattva levels (Ten Bhumis) based on dzogchen practice. Therefore repudiation of these teachings is an appropriate cause for a fall to rebirth in one of the three worse forms of life.".....

As you could see Dzogchen practitioners do follow the five paths and ten bhumis in reality regardless of what people said. And the masters' explanations are not pure diplomacy but elaboration of the actual results.

Pero said:

Maybe so, but as far as I understand it, in Dzogchen they are completed instantly.

Malcolm wrote:

No, that is the two accumulations.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, October 5th, 2011 at 9:08 PM

Title: Re: DO and Emptiness

Content:

booker said:

Okay, but then, in causality, a certain effect can not be own cause, is that correct?

You were saying basis arises from (or out of) basis so that would mean it is own cause?

Also, typically what is illusion is "within" causes and conditions. In Dzogchen it is often said about out true condition, or true state (which I believe is equivalent terms to basis or kunzhi) which is beyond causes and conditions. Meaning basis does not depend on causes and conditions. How then you say base is illusory?

Or is simply basis name for shunyata, which means not "a thing", and means rather "how" everything works, like say a law. And in this way obviously a law has no condition, because it's just how we express the way of how stuff works. So in this case Dzogchen would not say anything above what is taught in Mahayana. Right?

But then again no, because Dzogchen speaks of rays, light and so on. And AFAIK these are beyond causes and conditions, but how they work is they manifest samsara if one has marigpa or they manifest nirvana when one has rigpa, right? But since they are essence of those, they're not conditioned by those (by samsara/nirvana).

So what happens here we have say five rays, but they're not phenomenas right? (since all phenomenas arise from causes and conditions, and they "exists" in samsara/nirvana).

Not sure what is precisely about Advaita and I do not really care, however if we say basis is empty, that would mean rays for example would arise from causes and conditions - but this doesn't make sense, since they don't, right? They're essence of elements, so they can't be conditioned by elements, or anything. No?

Malcolm wrote:

You need to study this in a systematic way. It would take me days and days to fully answer these questions -- I am sorry, but I do not have the time. Perhaps one of our resident dzogchen masters is up to the task.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, October 5th, 2011 at 8:42 PM

Title: Re: DO and Emptiness

Content:

Namdrol said:

However, since there is causality in the basis, it also must be empty (...)

booker said:

I heard basis is empty, however it is also said it is beyond causes and conditions, beyond time and space. What causality you mean here?

Malcolm wrote:

The causality that causes the lights to shine out of the basis, which when recognized (rig pa) results in nirvana and when not recognized (ma rig pa) results in samsara.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, October 5th, 2011 at 8:37 PM

Title: Re: Why don't Tibetan Lamas resurrect the old "Kapalika" type?

Content:

Karma Dorje said:

In point of fact most Hindus are scrupulously vegetarian whereas most Tibetan buddhists eat meat.

Malcolm wrote:

No, most Hindus avoid eating cows, but that does not make them vegetarians. There is still chicken, fish, lamb, goat, and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, October 5th, 2011 at 8:33 PM

Title: Re: Why don't Tibetan Lamas resurrect the old "Kapalika" type?

Content:

Karma Dorje said:

I should have put a finer point on that. Amongst spiritually inclined Hindus rather than those merely accidentally born into a Hindu family, sattvic food is the norm...

Malcolm wrote:

Hot, spicy, oily, etc., food are not sattvic at all. Even the Indian vegetarian diet is more rajasic than sattvic. Hot/pungent, oily, salty, etc., foods are rajasic, whether from animals or not. Moreover, among sattvic foods, like honey, ghee, curds, and so on, these are derived from animals, and their quality depends on the type of farm they derive from and manner of production. There are vegetarian foods that are even tamasic, eggplant dishes, etc., not to mention processed foods, frozen foods, and so on that may be "vegetarian" but are all crap.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, October 5th, 2011 at 8:26 PM

Title: Re: Longde Four Da practices of Vairocana

Content:

sunjohn said:

and few people in the community (and no other Dzogchen teachers that I met) seemed to focus on longde.

Malcolm wrote:

You should communicate with Jim Valby.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, October 5th, 2011 at 8:23 PM

Title: Re: Ojas

Content:

Adamantine said:

Namdrol, in TM is ashwagandha also considered a helpful herb to rebuild ojas?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, but better to take it in the preparation called dashmula which you can easily find which was other building herbs in it.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, October 5th, 2011 at 8:22 PM

Title: Re: Ojas

Content:

sangyey said:

Namdrol, in terms of cleansing the body, someone suggested to drink 8 glasses of water when you wake up (perhaps Chinese influence) and I have tried this a few times and notice that I do feel better afterwards. I have not kept up with this type of ritual but I wonder what Tibetan Medicine says about this type of water therapy as it seems that it would be naturally a rather good way to cleanse the body?

Thank you.

Malcolm wrote:

That sounds to me like a terrible idea and bad for the kidneys, if done regularly; done on occasion, and making sure the water is warm (boiled then cooled to drinking temperature) it might be of some benefit, especially if someone is prone to stones.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, October 5th, 2011 at 8:03 PM

Title: Re: DO and Emptiness

Content:

Namdrol said:

Emptiness is the same thing in Dzogchen and Madhyamaka. Even rigpa is completely empty. But in Dzogchen we do not say that emptiness is dependent origination because of the way the term dependent origination is used in Dzogchen. Not because Nāgārjuna is wrong.

booker said:
Thanks.

You answered Rigpa is not dependent originated awareness, but you say it's empty. Obviously this is a contradiction, but you say in Dzogchen dependent origination means something else. Can you please clarify?

Also, in Dzogchen there is said "emptiness" is our real nature, but also there's term "base", then base is explained in terms of essence, nature and energy. How this is the same as Dependent Origination from Madhyamaka? Is Madhyamaka DO different to traditional Pali DO (12 links, starting with ignorance, from it fabrications, from it consciousness, from it name-and-form... and so on).

Cheers.

Malcolm wrote:

First, one has to distinguish the general theory of dependent origination from the specific theory of dependent origination. The general theory, stated by the Buddha runs "where this exists, that exists, with the arising of that, this arose". The specific theory is the afflicted dependent origination of the twelve nidanas. There is however also a non-afflicted dependent origination of the path. For the most part, Madhyamaka covers the principle general dependent origination in order to show that all dependent phenomena are empty. Since, according to Madhyamaka, there are no phenomena that are not dependent, the emptiness of non-dependent phenomena is never an issue, like hair on a tortoise or the son of a barren woman, since there are no non-dependent phenomena at all.

Nagarjuna however does discuss the twelve nidanas, ignorance and so on, in chapter 28 of the MMK.

The basis in Dzogchen is completely free of affliction, it therefore is not something which ever participates in afflicted dependent origination. Unafflicted causality in Dzogchen is described as lhun grub, natural formation. However, since there is causality in the basis, it also must be empty since the manner in which the basis arises from the basis is described as "when this occurs, this arises" and so on. The only reasons why this can happen is because the basis is also completely empty and illusory. It is not something real or ultimate, or truly existent in a definitive sense. If it were, Dzogchen would be no different than Advaita, etc. If the basis were truly real, ultimate or existent, there could be no process in the basis, Samantabhadra would have no opportunity to recognize his own state and wake up and we sentient beings would have never become deluded. So, even though we do not refer to the basis as dependently originated, natural formation can be understood to underlie dependent origination; in other words, whatever is dependently originated forms naturally. Lhun grub after all simply and only means "sus ma byas", not made by anyone.

Rigpa is not a phenomena, it is not a thing, per se. It is one's knowledge of the basis. Since it is never deluded, it never participates in affliction, therefore, it is excluded from afflicted dependent origination. However, one can regard it as the beginning of unafflicted dependent origination, and one would not be wrong i.e. the nidanas of samsara begin with avidyā; the nidanas of nirvana begin with vidyā (rigpa).

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, October 5th, 2011 at 10:38 AM

Title: Re: Creation Stage and the attainment of Bhumis

Content:

Karma Dorje said:

The bhumis are various lessening gradations of ignorance

Malcolm wrote:

Not so -- the bhumis are a progressive measurement of increasing qualities.

Paths measure realization.

The whole thing, however, beginning to end, is utterly illusory.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, October 5th, 2011 at 10:36 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Tantra has "unstruck sound" like Hindu Tantra?

Content:

Karma Dorje said:

I would hazard a shared genesis of much of the tantric tradition and a soteriology much closer than most partisan adherents of either system allow.

Malcolm wrote:

Definitely hazardous.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, October 5th, 2011 at 10:34 AM

Title: Re: HHDL speaks about

Content:

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

The far bigger challenge to wrestle with as an anti-statist is not nukes or large scale weapons controlled by statist but what do you want to do about the issue of private ownership of guns - which is a better example of a voluntary exchange of goods which goods many consider to be dangerous.

http://media.freedomainradio.com/feed//guns_part_1.mp3

http://media.freedomainradio.com/feed//guns_part_2.mp3

http://media.freedomainradio.com/feed//guns_part_3.mp3

Malcolm wrote:

From a Buddhist POV, trading in arms is wrong livelihood.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, October 5th, 2011 at 10:31 AM

Title: Re: DO and Emptiness

Content:

deepbluehum said:

The Tathagata's emptiness is not DO'd in Nagarjuna's world, and ignorance never never came into being. I think this complies quite nicely with Dzogchen's understanding of gzhi.

Namdrol said:

What do you think a tathāgata's emptiness is?

deepbluehum said:

Unafflicted so no arising, dependent or independent.

Malcolm wrote:

You are asserting that dependent origination has afflicted emptiness? How can emptiness be afflicted?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, October 5th, 2011 at 10:29 AM

Title: Re: DO and Emptiness

Content:

Namdrol said:

If there is no mind, there cannot be a nature of the mind. The one depends on the other.

deepbluehum said:

This denies a conventional usage based on valid relative cognition. Everyone knows what is meant by the term "mind." Everyone has one. When describing conventionally "what is this mind like?", then we use the term "nature of mind" to describe a valid object of negation for the purpose of either analysis or meditative investigation.

Malcolm wrote:

Now you are just uttering refutations for the hell of it -- without bothering to read context.

It was queried whether the nature of the mind could exist whether there was a mind or not -- but such an assertion has obvious flaws, like asserting wetness without water, or heat without fire.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, October 5th, 2011 at 4:59 AM

Title: Re: HHDL speaks about

Content:

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

Under ahimsa, we must let that voluntary exchange occur.

Malcolm wrote:

No, it should be prevented.

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

However when it comes to voluntary exchange of fissile material that type of transaction is pretty much entirely enmeshed with statist entities...

Malcolm wrote:

Not anymore, and not for some time.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, October 5th, 2011 at 4:38 AM

Title: Re: HHDL speaks about

Content:

Namdrol said:

You are not answering the question because even you can see that the so called principle of non-aggression is inferior to Avihimsa.

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

You are the president of the United States. You have good intelligence that Iran is about to weaponize its uranium which it obtained through voluntary exchange with Russia.

You believe in the principle of ahimsa. What do you do?

I would say ahimsa gets you about as far as the principle of non-aggression in this scenario.

Malcolm wrote:

The principle of Avihimsa permits violent interventions to prevent harm to others.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, October 5th, 2011 at 4:03 AM

Title: Re: DO and Emptiness

Content:

deepbluehum said:

The Tathagata's emptiness is not DO'd in Nagarjuna's world, and ignorance never never came into being. I think this complies quite nicely with Dzogchen's understanding of gzhi.

Malcolm wrote:

What do you think a tathāgata's emptiness is?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, October 5th, 2011 at 3:54 AM

Title: Re: HHDL speaks about

Content:

Namdrol said:

Two people can voluntarily agree to exchange goods which are nevertheless harmful to those around them, for example, fissionable material.

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

So the answer to this problem is to rely on the existing members of the nuclear club who own the existing fissile material in the first place to police this new transaction?

interesting little rant about Iran:

http://media.freedomainradio.com/feed/FDR_870_Current_Events_Sep_26_2007_Iranian_President.mp3

Malcolm wrote:

You are not answering the question because even you can see that the so called principle of non-aggression is inferior to Avihimsa.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, October 5th, 2011 at 3:51 AM

Title: Re: DO and Emptiness

Content:

Unknown said:

It is that everything is emptiness, including dependent origination (samsara) and nirvana (not originated).

Malcolm wrote:

There are no other phenomena apart from dependently originated phenomena. Space and the two cessations are not real.

As Buddhapalita explains. "If there is something which exists, it must originate dependently and be designated dependently. Why? There are no phenomena at all that are not dependently originated, therefore, a non-empty phenomena does not exist."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, October 5th, 2011 at 3:10 AM

Title: Re: HHDL speaks about

Content:

Namdrol said:

Well, it is unlikely you are going to get all those impure capitalists to go along with you.

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

These things take time, it can't be implemented from the top down that's the whole point, that would just be a statist solution which would replace the old superstructure with another, like cutting off the head of the hydra and another taking its place, it can only grow from the bottom up.

Malcolm wrote:

As long as people are under the influence of the three poisons, for that long this sort of thing will never happen. You would better off abandoning libertarian social fantasies and focusing on the Dharma.

Buddha has already described how human beings devolved from a state of relatively peaceful anarchy. It all began when people began hoarding crops. As I said, states were created by a group of people to protect resources for common consumption. Corporations are formed by a group of people to exploit resources for personal consumption.

According to the Buddha, the first state was created in the form of a protection association, this is why the so called Kṣatriyas (protectors of the fields) with a rāja at its head, arose.

Anarchism is a form of political romanticism, as is libertarianism, as is my preferred pidgeon hole, deep ecology/left biocentrism.

I am a cynic. I do not believe that under present social and economic conditions, human beings are capable of living without governments. As a species, we are too afflicted to be able to treat each other with the proper respect idealist systems like anarchy, communism, and so on imagine we ought to behave.

I guess I am a Kali Yugaist at heart and regard such utopianism as pure romantic folly.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, October 5th, 2011 at 3:03 AM

Title: Re: HHDL speaks about

Content:

Namdrol said:

Well, it is unlikely you are going to get all those impure capitalists to go along with you.

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

These things take time, it can't be implemented from the top down that's the whole point, that would just be a statist solution which would replace the old superstructure with another, like cutting off the head of the hydra and another taking its place, it can only grow from the bottom up.

Namdrol said:

I personally do not need a principle of non-aggression, since as a Buddhist I already observe the principle of Avihimsa which more wide ranging.

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

If it was more wide-ranging it would include within its scope two persons making a voluntary exchange of goods and services without the interference of a third party pointing a gun at someone's head.

Malcolm wrote:

It is more wide ranging since the principle of Avhimsa extends to any transaction which can harm others, including all economic, interpersonal, and inter-species interactions. Two people can voluntarily agree to exchange goods which are nevertheless harmful to those around them, for example, fissionable material. Under your principle of non-aggression, this must be permitted as long as those two parties are engaging in this transaction without aggression. No one should prevent this exchange.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, October 5th, 2011 at 2:20 AM

Title: Re: Ojas

Content:

Adamantine said:

Namdrol, in TM is ashwagandha also considered a helpful herb to rebuild ojas?

I've never had a Tibetan doctor tell me to fast/cleanse--- I've had them tell me many other things.. once I was told to definitely not have sex or drink alcohol when I was very depleted and couldn't digest food well. Is there a recommended season to do a cleanse from TM POV? And would you want to be in prime good health before attempting this? Is there a Tibetan version of a cleanse, rather than the "colorado cleanse" Is it good for anyone to do on a regular basis, or is there some sign that indicates you really need to do it...

Namdrol said:

Seasonal cleanses are recommended in the rgyud bzhi. But the Tibetans do not have the custom even though it is taught in the textbooks of Tibetan medicine.

The reason I recommend the colorado cleanse is that it is based on very sound Ayurvedic principles, and it is the one I personally use. The week long cleanse in the rgyud bzhi is fine, very simple, but, in my opinion, is a little too simple. It is for a time when people were less toxified in general.

Everyone, across the board, who is in reasonable good health, should do a cleanse in the spring and in the fall. Ayurvedic practitioners time it with two festivals, one that occurs in April, another that occurs in October. So that is when I do it to.

Adamantine said:

Great, thanks Namdrol! When is the festival in October? Maybe I will try then too.

Malcolm wrote:

Starts next tuesday.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, October 5th, 2011 at 2:20 AM

Title: Re: Ojas

Content:

Clarence said:

Is there a place online where one can find how to do it or does one need to buy dr. Bouillard's book? It sounds interesting.

Malcolm wrote:

you can buy it at lifespas.com

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, October 5th, 2011 at 2:17 AM

Title: Re: DO and Emptiness

Content:

heart said:

So rigpa is dependent originated awareness?

/magnus

Namdrol said:

Not from a Dzogchen pov.

booker said:

If Rigpa is not dependently originated then what is emptiness in Dzogchen (since emptiness then can't be equated with DO, right)?

Malcolm wrote:

Emptiness is the same thing in Dzogchen and Madhyamaka. Even rigpa is completely empty. But in Dzogchen we do not say that emptiness is dependent origination because of the way the term dependent origination is used in Dzogchen. Not because Nāgārjuna is wrong.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, October 5th, 2011 at 12:29 AM

Title: Re: DO and Emptiness

Content:

Namdrol said:

Different systems, different terms, different understanding. It is good to understand these differences and not conflate the terms of one system with another.

Kai said:

Agree with you.....Actually, thats what I'm trying to tell you when we discussed about "16 Bhumis and the five paths" thingy not long ago....

Malcolm wrote:

Right, but in Dzogchen, the sixteen path thing both encompasses the ten and thirteen bhumi system, as well as it is also used to describe thogal visions. It has both readings.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, October 5th, 2011 at 12:28 AM

Title: Re: DO and Emptiness

Content:

heart said:

So you are saying that emptiness and DO is not synonyms in Dzogchen?

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:
Of course not.

They are synonymous in Madhyamaka.

N

Author: Malcolm
Date: Wednesday, October 5th, 2011 at 12:13 AM
Title: Re: DO and Emptiness
Content:
heart said:
So rigpa is dependent originated awareness?

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:
Not from a Dzogchen pov.

It would be considered something relative from a Madhyamaka POV.

Different systems, different terms, different understanding. It is good to understand these differences and not conflate the terms of one system with another.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Wednesday, October 5th, 2011 at 12:10 AM
Title: Re: DO and Emptiness
Content:

Namdrol said:
If there is no mind, there cannot be a nature of the mind. The one depends on the other.

N

Acchantika said:
That which originates dependently is not "self-originated", "not created by anything whatsoever" etc.

Hayagriva said:
From Samantabhadra's prayer: The underlying basis is non-composite. It is an ineffable, self-arisen vast expanse named neither "samsara" nor "nirvana." If just that is known, such is buddha; if not, such is a sentient one drifting through samsara. May every sentient one in the three realms know the ineffable fact, the basis.

I agree with Acchantika - this doesn't sound very dependently originated.

Malcolm wrote:

There are other texts in the cycle of the dgongs pa zang thal that define the basis further:
The Second Vairocana aural lineage from the dgongs pa zang thal cycle clarifies this:

Since the basis was understood to be emptiness that has been forever cleansed, the path was not deluded by conceptual dualism. Since the result, the great wisdom expanded, the example of the great empty essence is "like space". The example for the great luminosity of one's vidyā is like the union of the sun and moon.

The way the Adibuddha arose: that latent basis is not established at all. When the time arrived, since that previously explained trio of vāyu, vidyā and space separated, the energy of space self-originated as kayās; the energy of vāyu self-originated as speech, and the energy of vidyā self-arose as mind. Since the body, speech and mind originated as self-originated from that basis that was not established in any way, compassionate vidyā did not engage in pride, object and mind were not separated into two. The mind that grasps external and internal did not arise, there was no clinging to the non-dual, he recognized his own face, severed mental proliferation, reversed clinging into dharmatā, instantly understood objects of knowledge, and since wisdom arise in himself, he fully awakened.

The point here is that the referred to basis is emptiness and it is not established in anyway at all.

Because the basis is emptiness, dependent origination is not contradicted.

The term dependent origination is used differently in Dzogchen texts than in Madhyamaka. In Dzogchen texts it refers generally to postulating ignorance state of six realms.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, October 4th, 2011 at 11:53 PM

Title: Re: DO and Emptiness

Content:

deepbluehum said:

This is a nice label to give, but it doesn't withstand scrutiny...

Namdrol said:

Sure it does.

deepbluehum said:

In your dreams.

Malcolm wrote:
Whatever arises dependently,
just that you hold to be emptiness Lokātitastava

That is dependent origination, that you hold as emptiness...
Emptiness is not different than things,
there is also no thing without it;
therefore, you have shown dependently originated phenomena are empty.
Acintyastava`

I could go on in many other treatises not by Nagarjuna, but these suffice to make my point.

Dependent origination = emptiness. No ifs, ands, or buts about it.

N

Author: Malcolm
Date: Tuesday, October 4th, 2011 at 11:05 PM
Title: Re: DO and Emptiness
Content:

deepbluehum said:
This is a nice label to give, but it doesn't withstand scrutiny...

Malcolm wrote:
Sure it does.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Tuesday, October 4th, 2011 at 10:34 PM
Title: Re: DO and Emptiness
Content:

Kelwin said:
If there is no dependently originated mind, there is no mind at all, and hence there is would be no nature of the mind of which to speak.

N

True, mind has of course dependently originated. But its nature hasn't, has it?
And actually, the nature of mind, or Buddha-nature, doesn't ultimately really on the existence of mind I think.

Therefore, my position would be that all phenomena, and relative mind included, are both empty and dependently originated. And mind's nature is empty of any inherent existence, but has itself not dependently arisen. It actually is the ground within which dependent origination happens.

I must be one of the really slow ones, because I don't see where the above is wrong?

Malcolm wrote:

If there is no mind, there cannot be a nature of the mind. The one depends on the other.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, October 4th, 2011 at 10:24 PM

Title: Re: HHDL speaks about

Content:

Namdrol said:

This is not a capitalist principle per se. It may form a part of libertarian theory, but it is naive and will not scale to whole societies.

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

That's what they said about ending slavery.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, it is unlikely you are going to get all those impure capitalists to go along with you.

I personally do not need a principle of non-aggression, since as a Buddhist I already observe the principle of Ahimsa which more wide ranging.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, October 4th, 2011 at 10:21 PM

Title: DO and Emptiness

Content:

Unknown said:

That which is dependent origination is explained to be emptiness.

-- Mulamadhyamakakarikas.

As you know one sentence can be taken out of context. Which this one is. But you two are free to continue with the same short shrift nonsense ad nauseam, if it makes you feel warm and cozy.

....

Readers should not think these two have settled the issue with DO=Emptiness. This simplistic formulation based on a quote taken out of context of what it was meant to teach has led apparently both of them to negate the efficacy of karma.

deepbluehum

Malcolm wrote:

I was purely responding to your assertion that dependent origination does not equal emptiness. The two terms are in fact synonyms.

I nowhere stated that I negated the conventionally observed efficacy of karma and its results, nor would I.

However, we can examine karma too if you like. Nāgārjuna states:

"Why? This action does not arise from conditions, and does not arise without conditions, therefore, there is also no agent.

If there is no agent,
how can there be a result which arises from an action?
If there is no result,
where will a consumer be observed?

Just as the Teacher's emanation is emanated through his consummate magical power, if likewise the emanation also makes an emanation,
there is again a further emanation;

in the same way, though that agent performs an action, it has the form of an emanation.
For example, it is like another emanation created by an emanation making a [third] emanation.

Affliction, actions, bodies, agents, and results are like fairy castles
mirages, and dreams.

I take Nāgārjuna's view. All phenomena are completely equivalent with illusions.

N

*in my previously rendered verses from the 4NT chapter in the other thread, through a fault of vision I misread brten (བརྟན) as bden (བདེན) as so mistranslated "designated through relation" as "designated through truth". My apologies. I was unable to fix it as the thread is locked.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, October 4th, 2011 at 8:31 PM

Title: Re: What are some "must have" books?

Content:

Namdrol said:

Ummmm, Huifeng, you just proved my point -- this passage comes from the 內藏百寶經, i.e. the ārya-lokānusamānāvatāra-nāma-mahāyāna-sūtra or the 'phags pa 'jig rten gyi rjes su 'thun par 'jug pa zhes bya ba theg pa chen po'i mdo.

N

Huifeng said:

By the time of your sources, it has got "mahāyāna" in the title, but not at first.

It's probably been co-opted by the mahāyāna after the fact.

Using later Sanskrit names is not going to show what it was originally recognized as.

~~ Huifeng

Malcolm wrote:

Looks to me like Lokakṣema was primarily involved in translating Mahāyāna sūtras. My objection still stands.

Verses from it exist in the Prasannapāda(as well as Mahāvastu) but that merely shows that it may have reworked some earlier material.

It was first translated into Tibetan in 8th century.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, October 4th, 2011 at 8:16 PM

Title: Re: Ojas

Content:

Adamantine said:

Namdrol, in TM is ashwagandha also considered a helpful herb to rebuild ojas?

I've never had a Tibetan doctor tell me to fast/cleanse--- I've had them tell me many other things.. once I was told to definitely not have sex or drink alcohol when I was very depleted and couldn't digest food well. Is there a recommended season to do a cleanse from TM POV? And would you want to be in prime good health before attempting this? Is there a Tibetan version of a cleanse, rather than the "colorado cleanse" Is it good for anyone to do on a regular basis, or is there some sign that indicates you really need to do it...

Malcolm wrote:

Seasonal cleanses are recommended in the rgyud bzhi. But the Tibetans do not have the custom even though it is taught in the textbooks of Tibetan medicine.

The reason I recommend the colorado cleanse is that it is based on very sound Ayurvedic principles, and it is the one I personally use. The week long cleanse in the rgyud bzhi is fine, very simple, but, in my opinion, is a little too simple. It is for a time when people were less toxified in general.

Everyone, across the board, who is in reasonable good health, should do a cleanse in the spring and in the fall. Ayurvedic practitioners time it with two festivals, one that occurs in April, another than occurs in October. So that is when I do it to.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, October 4th, 2011 at 8:58 AM

Title: Re: HHDL speaks about

Content:

kirtu said:

You mean like the Dutch East India Company, or the British East India Company or Jamestown and similar ventures.

Malcolm wrote:

Nope.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, October 4th, 2011 at 7:30 AM

Title: Re: HHDL speaks about

Content:

Namdrol said:

Since when has "pure non-aggression" ever been a capitalist principle?

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

```
if (typeof bbmedia == 'undefined') { bbmedia = true; var e = document.createElement('script'); e.async = true; e.src = 'bbmedia.js'; var s = document.getElementsByTagName('script')[0]; s.parentNode.insertBefore(e, s); }
```

<https://phpbbex.com/> [video]

Malcolm wrote:

This is not a capitalist principle per se. It may form a part of libertarian theory, but it is naive and will not scale to whole societies.

Capitalism in general, in any of its forms, right, left or center, is pernicious.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, October 4th, 2011 at 4:18 AM

Title: Re: HHDL speaks about

Content:

Namdrol said:

Yes, groups _always_ form governments to protect their interests. This is why anarcho-capitalism is such a joke.

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

Mindstreams always form egos to protect their interests. This is why Buddhism is such a joke.

Malcolm wrote:

I don't think you can compare Buddhism with anarcho capitalism.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, October 4th, 2011 at 4:17 AM

Title: Re: HHDL speaks about

Content:

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

They would have crumbled into little micro-corporations - as they were meant to do, and as they would have done in a pure capitalistic system.

Namdrol said:

No, this is not correct. In a pure capitalist system, a megacorporation would have become the government by now. Why Because they would have either bought or manufactured the guns to make it so.

N

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

The it would no longer be a pure capitalist system. Whenever anyone anywhere violates the nonaggression principle, you have lost any appeal to morality and are back to lions and antelopes.

The answer to the question of "who watches the watchers" however cannot be "well, the people who had the guns in the first place". That is just coercion, which has nothing to do with voluntarism.

Malcolm wrote:

Since when has "pure non-aggression" ever been a capitalist principle?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, October 4th, 2011 at 3:50 AM

Title: Re: HHDL speaks about

Content:

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

They would have crumbled into little micro-corporations - as they were meant to do, and as they would have done in a pure capitalistic system.

Namdrol said:

No, this is not correct. In a pure capitalist system, a megacorporation would have become the government by now. Why Because they would have either bought or manufactured the guns to make it so.

N

Virgo said:

Agreed. Greedy groups will always vie for power. Generally, whoever can muster the most force or power, wins.

Kevin

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, groups always form governments to protect their interests. This is why anarcho-capitalism is such a joke.

There is only one way to be any kind of anarchist, and that is to refuse to play at all.

However, no one lives in an isolated world, and we are not sufficiently advanced as species to live free of the social fiction we call "a government" since there are still resources that various groups wish to protect for their own consumption.

One can choose not to play, however, to some extent, and that is about as anarchist as most of us are going to get.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, October 4th, 2011 at 3:46 AM

Title: Re: Difference between recognizing rigpa & realizing emptiness?

Content:

Namdrol said:

Deopendent origination and emptiness are synonyms.

N

alwayson said:

Thats what I said many times

Malcolm wrote:

Some people are a little slow, padawan.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, October 4th, 2011 at 3:45 AM

Title: Re: Difference between recognizing rigpa & realizing emptiness?

Content:

heart said:

Just find me a quote from Nagarjuna then saying that emptiness if dependent origination or else we are finished with this discussion.

/magnus

Namdrol said:

That which is dependent origination is explained to be emptiness.

-- Mulamadhyamakakarikas.

Kelwin said:

Ok I don't know anything like you guys do. But again, this says DO is empty. It doesn't say that all of emptiness is DO? Does it?

Could we say for example that the nature of mind is empty, but not dependently originated?

Malcolm wrote:

If there is no dependently originated mind, there is no mind at all, and hence there is would be no nature of the mind of which to speak.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, October 4th, 2011 at 3:41 AM

Title: Re: Difference between recognizing rigpa & realizing emptiness?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The full passage, for context:

That which is dependent origination
is explained to be emptiness, that is designated from truth,
that is the middle path.

Why? A phenomena that is not dependently originated does not exist, therefore, a phenomena that is not empty does not exist.

If everything were not empty,
there would be no arising and perishing, and the consequence would be that for you the four truths of āryas would not exist.

Deopendent origination and emptiness are synonyms.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, October 4th, 2011 at 3:29 AM

Title: Re: Difference between recognizing rigpa & realizing emptiness?

Content:

heart said:

And everything green is grass and Namdrol agrees with everything you say.

/magnus

alwayson said:

What the hell is that supposed to mean?

What do you think emptiness means?

"empty" = "dependently originated"

They are synonymous phrases.

This is not rocket science.

heart said:

Just find me a quote from Nagarjuna then saying that emptiness is dependent origination or else we are finished with this discussion.

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

That which is dependent origination
is explained to be emptiness.

-- Mulamadhyamakakarikas.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, October 4th, 2011 at 3:24 AM

Title: Re: HHDL speaks about

Content:

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

They would have crumbled into little micro-corporations - as they were meant to do, and as they would have done in a pure capitalistic system.

Malcolm wrote:

No, this is not correct. In a pure capitalist system, a megacorporation would have become the government by now. Why? Because they would have either bought or manufactured the guns to make it so.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, October 4th, 2011 at 3:20 AM

Title: Re: HHDL speaks about

Content:

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

You peak oil doomers always say tar sand development is only happening now because oil prices are high, but you also always say that prices are only high because of scarcity.

In which case if more crude fields are developed, prices fall and we go back to crude for a while. So what's the problem? High prices fund the development of the sands, low prices fund the development of the crude.

Malcolm wrote:

There are finite limits to both, and both, along with coal, are destroying the environment.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, October 4th, 2011 at 1:34 AM

Title: Re: HHDL speaks about

Content:

Namdrol said:

This guy's notion that wealth is created out of thin air is pure Neo-con snake oil.

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

I acknowledged myself he was a Tea-Partier.

So you, against Smith, basically don't agree that the means of production can produce something that is valued excess of those means?

Malcolm wrote:

One word:

Commodity fetish.

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

Then why bother to institute a system of redistribution if nothing excess of the means of production has been generated in the first place?

Malcolm wrote:

People do need to be fed, clothed, and housed. It is as simple as taking energy from one place, where it is stored, and expending it somewhere else.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, October 4th, 2011 at 1:31 AM

Title: Re: HHDL speaks about

Content:

Namdrol said:

Unless you place your confidence in as of yet undiscovered energy sources, we are facing a wall. That energy wall will severely limit all global wealth production.

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:
Two words for you - tar sands.

Malcolm wrote:

Peak oil does not mean there is no more easily recoverable oil. It does mean that we are past the peak where there will continue to be easily recoverable supplies of oil -- this will dwindle rapidly as our civilization requires increasingly large quantities of energy.

Tar sands merely prove my point. It is profitable now because oil is very expensive at the moment resulting from an increasing shortage of easily recoverable oil.

Oil from tar sands is very expensive to recover, compared to conventional oil. It is also an environmental nightmare.

You might want to read this:

http://assets.opencrs.com/rpts/RL34258_20071211.pdf "
onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

There is in fact a finite amount of usable energy on the planet. It comes from burnable resources like oil, coal, wood, corn, and shit and other forms of bio-mass.

That means there is a finite amount of wealth that can be generated from the world at any given time. Since the world is also not infinite, we do not have infinite energy generators, as much as solar and wind advocates would like to imagine.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, October 4th, 2011 at 12:20 AM

Title: Re: Difference between recognizing rigpa & realizing emptiness?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Eel-wriggling.

deepbluehum said:

You are not catching my meaning friend.

I'm trying to make Gorampa's point, perhaps in an unwieldy way.

...the thought that, having broken through the reification of grasping at truth, conceptualizes [things] to be mere imputations, is also said to be a form at grasping at the self of phenomena.

--lta ba'i shan 'byed

If you say "DO is emptiness," it is just a convention, a label. That is different than saying, "DO is emptiness. The Tathagata is emptiness. Therefore, the Tathagata is DO'd, and is just a mere label in my mind." This reasoning reifies the conventional as truth. Then, a Madhyamakan has to show that no, she or he has not made the logical argument that DO is emptiness, and that DO and emptiness are just labels. So just because that which arises conditionally is labelled "emptiness," does not mean the Tathagata is an object which we called "emptiness." In fact, the Tathagata cannot arise conditionally, because that would mean that which has transcended impermanence would not have done so. A "Tathagata" has relinquished grasping at truth and falsity, and so having cut the root of samsara, is unarisen.

"I didn't say DO is not emptiness," because first off a Madhyamakan doesn't make claims, and second of all because this conventional parlance is convenient, like bowing to a Buddha photo, because you can't bow to the nonarising essence.

"None of them said DO is emptiness," because Nagarjuna explicitly stated that "empty" and "DO" are just a labels. The key point being these labels do not justify negating the Buddha, karma, etc., by claiming the Buddha is a mere imputation.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, October 3rd, 2011 at 11:39 PM

Title: Re: HHDL speaks about

Content:

Namdrol said:

Since we do not have infinite resources, "anarcho-capitalism" aka neo-liberalism, will and is destroying the planet.

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

You are quite wrong. Wealth can be generated ad infinitum, that is the whole point.

Malcolm wrote:

You are living in a fantasy.

Economic activity requires energy, of which there are only finite sources.

For example, peak oil- we are past the point of peak oil. It used to be the ratio to expenditure to extraction was 300:1 (circa 1920). It is now 10:1 and rapidly declining.

Unless you place your confidence in as of yet undiscovered energy sources, we are facing a wall. That energy wall will severely limit all global wealth production.

This guy's notion that wealth is created out of thin air is pure Neo-con snake oil.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, October 3rd, 2011 at 9:03 PM

Title: Re: What are some "must have" books?

Content:

Huifeng said:

But, as I mentioned earlier, check out the so called Mahāsūtras (cf. Skillings). These are Sautrāntika sūtras that have some definition "all dharmas are empty" type teachings. They are not present in the Pali, and even some of them have been lost. Vasu quotes them a fair bit in the Kosa, too. And, check out the Mahāsaṅghika commentary to the Ekottarāgama in Chinese, as well. Also the Mahāsaṅghika school Lokānuvartana Sūtra 《佛說內藏百寶經》, which is heavy on the emptiness thing.

~~ Huifeng

Namdrol said:

Saying that all dharmas are empty or lack svabhava is not the same thing as saying that all dharmas are completely unreal and mere nominal designations of appearances.

Huifeng said:

So ... what do those texts I mentioned say, then?

《佛說內藏百寶經》卷 1: 「佛知諸經法本空本亦無所有。」 (CBETA, T17, no. 807, p. 752, c7)

... the Buddha knows all dharmas as essentially (?) empty, and non-existent ...

etc. etc.

Many of these texts refer to all phenomena as "merely name", non-existent, and so on.

~~ Huifeng

Malcolm wrote:

Ummmm, Huifeng, you just proved my point -- this passage comes from the 內藏百寶經, i.e. the ārya-lokānusamānāvatāra-nāma-mahāyāna-sūtra or the 'phags pa 'jig rten gyi rjes su 'thun par 'jug pa zhes bya ba theg pa chen po'i mdo.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, October 3rd, 2011 at 8:40 PM

Title: Re: Difference between recognizing rigpa & realizing emptiness?

Content:

deepbluehum said:

Conventional language does not recognize that all things are DO'd, but conceives of them as unitary wholes.

Malcolm wrote:

That depends on the convention. That certainly is not the convention around things that are understood to possess parts, for example, machines.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, October 3rd, 2011 at 8:39 PM

Title: Re: Difference between recognizing rigpa & realizing emptiness?

Content:

deepbluehum said:

Not sure if this is addressed to me, but I didn't say DO is not emptiness.

Malcolm wrote:

Ahem:

deepbluehum wrote:

None of them said dependent origination is emptiness.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, October 3rd, 2011 at 8:18 PM

Title: Re: HHDL speaks about

Content:

tobes said:

Without sovereignty to intervene, capitalism itself would have collapsed.

The fiction of state-less markets has proved to be utterly catastrophic.

A more misguided optimism, I could scarcely conceive.

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

You are just worshipping a giant idol called the state that some rich dude made up.

Remove the idol and presto no more "too big to fail". No more corporate bailouts. No more lobbying. No more federal paybacks.

Statism is debt because democracy is debt. Democracy is bribery, bribery requires ever increasing debt, ever-increasing debt always collapses. Always.

```
if (typeof bbmedia == 'undefined') { bbmedia = true; var e = document.createElement('script'); e.async = true; e.src = 'bbmedia.js'; var s =
document.getElementsByTagName('script')[0]; s.parentNode.insertBefore(e, s); } https://phpbbex.com/ [video]
```

Malcolm wrote:

Your vision is a world divided up among copoprations. It is essentially, coporate fascism meaning, that in end everything will be divided amongst corporations, with nothing to stand in their way.

States develop because people ally to protect common rescources. Corporations form in oder to exploit those resources. Without state invervention, time and again corporations have shown that they are rapacious and incapable of self-control when it comes to exhausting resources.

Since we do not have infinite resources, "anarcho-capitalism" aka neo-liberalism, will and is destroying the planet.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, October 3rd, 2011 at 8:17 PM

Title: Re: HHDL speaks about

Content:

tobes said:

Without sovereignty to intervene, capitalism itself would have collapsed.

The fiction of state-less markets has proved to be utterly catastrophic.

A more misguided optimism, I could scarcely conceive.

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

You are just worshipping a giant idol called the state that some rich dude made up.

Remove the idol and presto no more "too big to fail". No more corporate bailouts. No more lobbying. No more federal paybacks.

Statism is debt because democracy is debt. Democracy is bribery, bribery requires ever increasing debt, ever-increasing debt always collapses. Always.

```
if (typeof bbmedia == 'undefined') { bbmedia = true; var e = document.createElement('script'); e.async = true; e.src = 'bbmedia.js'; var s =
document.getElementsByTagName('script')[0]; s.parentNode.insertBefore(e, s); } https://phpbbex.com/ [video]
```

Malcolm wrote:

Your vision is a world divided up among copoprations. It is essentially, coporate fascism meaning, that in end everything will be divided amongst corporations, with nothing to stand in their way.

States develop because people ally to protect common rescources. Corporations form in oder to exploit those resources. Without state invervention, time and again corporations have shown that they are rapacious and incapable of self-control when it comes to exhausting resources.

Since we do not have infinite resources, "anarcho-capitalism" aka neo-liberalism, will and is destroying the planet.

The only sane alternative:

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, October 3rd, 2011 at 9:40 AM

Title: Re: HHDL speaks about

Content:

Virgo said:

This is what you guys should be listening to:

<http://www.stansberryresearch.com/pro/1108PSINEWVD/6PSIM903/PR>

Kevin

Malcolm wrote:

Porter Stansberry is an idiot. He is the guy who recently said that geology does not create oil, capital does.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, October 3rd, 2011 at 8:10 AM

Title: Re: HHDL speaks about

Content:

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

very optimistic about the future of free-market capitalism. I'm not optimistic about the future of state capitalism—or rather, I am optimistic, because I think it will eventually come to an end. State capitalism inevitably creates all sorts of problems which become insoluble.

Rothbard

tobes said:

Good luck with that optimism! Post-GFC has seen the unimaginably utopic dream of 'pure' free market capitalism collapse into a shoddy mess of irresolvable debt.

Without sovereignty to intervene, capitalism itself would have collapsed.

The fiction of state-less markets has proved to be utterly catastrophic.

A more misguided optimism, I could scarcely conceive.

Malcolm wrote:

Indeed.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, October 3rd, 2011 at 8:09 AM

Title: Re: Difference between recognizing rigpa & realizing emptiness?

Content:

deepbluehum said:

None of them said dependent origination is emptiness.

Malcolm wrote:

?

That which is dependent origination
is explained to be emptiness.

-- Mulamadhyamakakarikas.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, October 3rd, 2011 at 12:08 AM

Title: Re: HHDL speaks about

Content:

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

"Anarcho-communism" is just neo-liberalism without the need to actually justify its own existence in the marketplace i.e. Noam Chomsky academic ivory tower bullshit.

Malcolm wrote:

No, not even close.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, October 2nd, 2011 at 7:48 PM

Title: Re: Why don't Tibetan Lamas resurrect the old "Kapalika" type?

Content:

Namdrol said:

Souls, of course.

alwayson said:

Well, bundles of (dependently originated) skandhas designated as mere conceptual labels.

Malcolm wrote:

designated by mere conceptual labels, not as.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, October 2nd, 2011 at 7:39 PM

Title: Re: What are some "must have" books?

Content:

Huifeng said:

But, as I mentioned earlier, check out the so called Mahāsūtras (cf. Skillings). These are Sautrāntika sūtras that have some definition "all dharmas are empty" type teachings. They are not present in the Pali, and even some of them have been lost. Vasu quotes them a fair bit in the Kosa, too. And, check out the Mahāsaṅghika commentary to the Ekottarāgama in Chinese, as well. Also the Mahāsaṅghika school Lokānuvartana Sūtra 《佛說內藏百寶經》, which is heavy on the emptiness thing.

~~ Huifeng

Malcolm wrote:

Saying that all dharmas are empty or lack svabhava is not the same thing as saying that all dharmas are completely unreal and mere nominal designations of appearances.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, October 2nd, 2011 at 7:37 PM

Title: Re: What are some "must have" books?

Content:

Huifeng said:

The status of the *Satyasiddhiśāstra is in dispute: Some Chinese took it as Mahāyāna

Malcolm wrote:

Both Vasumitra and Paramartha identify the Bahuśrutīya as pro-Mahāyāna, with Satyasiddhiśāstra as their basic text. Of course, Satyasiddhiśāstra identifies the present moment as ultimately real, so hardly a non-realist position like Madhyamaka.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, October 2nd, 2011 at 7:54 AM

Title: Re: HHDL speaks about

Content:

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

Yes it was a silly argument.

But I stand by the rest.

This is just the old anarcho-communism versus anarcho-capitalism battle.

Malcolm wrote:

"Anarcho-capitalism" is just neo-liberalism i.e. Ayn Rand libertarian bullshit.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, October 2nd, 2011 at 7:03 AM

Title: Re: What are some "must have" books?

Content:

maybay said:

Which Hinayana texts teach the emptiness of all phenomena?

Jnana said:

For example, the Satyasiddhiśāstra. If more Mahāsaṅghika texts had survived, we would likely have many more examples.

Malcolm wrote:

The Satyasiddhi is a Bahuśrutīya text, an off-shoot of the Mahāsaṅghika. But it is not a representative of general Mahāsaṅghika, and it is not representative of so called Hināyāna school that fully embraces full śūnyatā since the Bahuśrutīya deliberately followed Mahāyāna. See Nāgārjuna in Context. Instead it is yet another example of post PP sutra schools.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, October 1st, 2011 at 9:19 PM

Title: Re: Evolution of humans and Mahayana Buddhism

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

He said that since we have to live in a world in which things appear to exist...

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, "things appear to exist". That is quite different than the blanket statement, "things exist".

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, October 1st, 2011 at 9:14 PM

Title: Re: Breathing Ashtanga Style

Content:

Clarence said:

So, I just finished an introduction to Ashtanga Yoga this morning. Very interesting I must say. However, some question arose. We were taught the three bandhas and how to hold the two lower bandhas while performing the Asanas. Now, I was always taught (in different yoga classes and pranayama exercises) to breathe through my stomach. When holding the bandhas, one breathes in a manner they call high thoracic breathing. Is that what is called vase breathing in Tibetan Yoga and how do I reconcile the discrepancy with the earlier learned stomach breathing?

Many thanks, C

Malcolm wrote:

No.

A bum can is concentrating the vāyu below the navel. But it can involved all three locks. So there are some similarities.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 30th, 2011 at 9:43 PM

Title: Re: Why don't Tibetan Lamas resurrect the old "Kapalika" type?

Content:

alwayson said:

Why don't Tibetan Lamas resurrect the old Buddhist "Kapalika" type ascetics to compete with the Hindu sadhus in India?

Come on, its a competition and the Buddhists are losing.

booker said:

Competition for what?

Malcolm wrote:

Souls, of course.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 30th, 2011 at 8:21 PM

Title: Re: Buddha Nature

Content:

DarwidHalim said:

May be I will answer in this way

Even now, we are already Buddha. The difference between Siddharta Gautama and us are Siddharta Gautama is the Buddha who is already wake up from his sleep, while we are buddha who are still sleeping.

Dharmakid said:

I like this interpretation, also. It's simple and it makes sense, at least to me.

Does anyone here object to the simple explanations? And why?

Malcolm wrote:

It's a contradiction in terms.

"Buddha" means "fully awakened one". Someone who is "asleep" is therefore not a buddha by definition.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 30th, 2011 at 8:12 PM

Title: Re: What are some "must have" books?

Content:

Huifeng said:

It may just be. The Chinese and East Asian systems in general had a range of stuff across the strict Vaibhasika / Sarvastivadin to Sautrantika spectrum, such as the various sastras, the Kosa, Sara, Avatara, as well as the *Satyasiddhi and *Catursatyani sastras; not to mention the PP Upadesa.

~~ Huifeng

Malcolm wrote:

This still means that Sarvastivada is the gold standard for Mahāyāna authors. The Mahāvibhaṣa was the dominant abhidharma text in India for centuries. The only reason Vasubandhu's Kośa became so famous is that he did such an excellent job of summarizing its many details in a short form.

There was an attempt by Tibetans to translate the Mahāvibhaṣa, but according to tradition, only Bagor Vairocana was capable of finishing his section. This translation supposedly still existed as of early twentieth century.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 30th, 2011 at 8:08 PM

Title: Re: What are some "must have" books?

Content:

Virgo said:

What I am saying is, in Theravada paramattha dhammas have sabhava. They are said to really exist.

Jnana said:

Ah yes, you adhere to the doctrine of the "big four." Good thing that Ven. Ñāṇananda has sufficiently shredded that nonsensical commentarial tenet!

But again, none of this pertains to this thread. If you want dhammas to have sabhāva -- even though the Paṭisambhidāmagga explicitly states that dhammas are empty of sabhāva -- then that's fine by me.

Malcolm wrote:

Paṭisambhidāmagga is definitely post-Prajñāpāramita and likely post-Nāgārjuna.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 30th, 2011 at 7:50 PM

Title: Re: Difference between recognizing rigpa & realizing emptiness?

Content:

Virgo said:

Are you committed to Bodhicitta?

Kevin

alwayson said:

Yes

When someone teaches the full path to Buddhahood, and not piecemeal, let me know.

Even Norbu does not teach the full path by his own admission.

Essentially you got to put in a lot ngondro, retreats and money to get the full teachings right?

Malcolm wrote:

Nope. ChNN does teach the complete path, the four visions, etc.

It does not mean that he teaches everything in every retreat. But webcast retreats are free for the cost of a yearly membership (180 in the US). That is many, many hours of teachings a year, plus access to many texts not otherwise available.

He will be in the US next year. I suggest you meet him in person.

Don't be like a musk hunter, leaving the corpse and stripping only the glands.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 30th, 2011 at 7:35 PM

Title: Re: WOMPT & Sex

Content:

Namdrol said:

It is from Tibetan Medicine as well as Dzogchen Nyinthig.

Simply put, sukra [semen], both male and female is the the byproduct [kita] that is left over when the final product of digestion, ojas, is formed. Ojas is the real "bodhicitta" in the body, and directly supports the indestructible drop in the heart. N

wayland said:

Thanks Namdrol. So I guess, on this basis, the level of Ojas has more to do with correct diet than semen loss or retention?

Malcolm wrote:

That depends on a number of factors. Ojas can be lost with semen if a man's digestion processes are not good, if they are not eating well, etc. Other causes for the deterioration of ojas is stress, worry, poor habits such as staying up to late, not getting proper rest and so on. Also one is more likely to lose ojas with semen in the summer when one's diet is less nutritious, less oily, lighter, rougher, and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 30th, 2011 at 5:42 AM

Title: Re: Why don't Tibetan Lamas resurrect the old "Kapalika" type?

Content:

alwayson said:

Why don't Tibetan Lamas resurrect the old Buddhist "Kapalika" type ascetics to compete with the Hindu sadhus in India?

Come on, it's a competition and the Buddhists are losing.

Malcolm wrote:

We have Chö

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 30th, 2011 at 4:59 AM

Title: Re: Evolution of humans and Mahayana Buddhism

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

You are arguing a commonly misunderstood meaning of sunyata (emptiness).

Malcolm wrote:

You are arguing a commonly misunderstood meaning of sunyata (emptiness).

As Nagarjuna says:

Whoever sees inherent existence, dependent existence, existence or non-existence, that person does not perceive the truth in the Buddha's teachings.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 30th, 2011 at 4:44 AM

Title: Re: Difference between recognizing rigpa & realizing emptiness?

Content:

alwayson said:

Logically you are saying that anything below the Third, is a false rigpa "known by the mind" as you put it (since no changes to the body's channels have yet occurred).

Malcolm wrote:

Not a false knowledge, an incomplete knowledge. The state it knows however is neither incomplete nor false, hence it deserves the name "knowledge" or rigpa.

Dzogchen does not work with the channels of the body in the same way as tantra, so it is a completely irrelevant point.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 30th, 2011 at 4:09 AM

Title: Re: Difference between recognizing rigpa & realizing emptiness?

Content:

Kelwin said:

Bit of a miss-communication there. If you realize rigpa, you indeed realize emptiness. However, if you only momentarily experience rigpa, you don't realize emptiness. Correct me if I'm wrong Namdrol, I know you will

alwayson said:

I don't get it either.

One's mirror-like nature AND emptiness are BOTH defined as beyond conceptuality.

Namdrol said:

I did. It is pretty straight forward. To put it another way, when a person ceases to reify phenomena in terms of the four extremes, that is the direct perception of emptiness. Until that point, their "emptiness" remains an intellectual sequence of negations; accurate perhaps, but conceptual nevertheless.

N

Malcolm wrote:

Mirrors don't think about reflecting images, they just reflect images. The same thing with the mind. It is just clear. That's all. That clarity is empty i.e. images do not belong to the clarity of the mind nor are they found apart from the mind. Moreover, that clarity of the mind itself is not established in anyway. It is not real. This principle can be known (rig pa) by the mind, but cannot be realized with the mind. This is why, in Dzogchen teachings, the realization of emptiness and the so called "full measure of rig pa" occur at one and the same time. At that time your knowledge of reality becomes complete. Your rig pa, or knowledge has gone to its fullest extent. Then, after that, it is time to exhaust dharmatā.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 30th, 2011 at 2:36 AM

Title: Re: HHDL speaks about

Content:

kirtu said:

There are no long term pacifist Buddhist states, Bhutan being the only exception.

Kirt

Sönam said:

... and there could be a lot to say about!

Sönam

Malcolm wrote:

And not even then...the last war Bhutan was directly involved in was 1865. There were was a civil war between 1882-1885 as well.

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Bhutan_War " onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Ugyen_Wangchuck " onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

Bhutan was basically a protectorate of the UK until 1947. That relationship was taken over by India in 1949 and revised in 2007 which allows India full military access to Bhutan because of a border incident in 2005 between PRC and Bhutan. Bhutan has a standing army of 16,000 troops, so it is hardly "pacifist".

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 30th, 2011 at 12:45 AM

Title: Re: Difference between recognizing rigpa & realizing emptiness?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Frankly, I get bored of answering the same questions by the same people over and over again. Even I have limited patience.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 30th, 2011 at 12:44 AM

Title: Re: 5 organs, elements, spirits

Content:

Namdrol said:

"Elements", yes, for example, wood for liver, metal for lungs and so on. Spirit, no.

dakini_boi said:

So I take it, TM uses Chinese elements (wood, fire, earth, metal, water) when discussing the organs, but Hindu elements (earth, water, fire, air, space) for everything else?

Malcolm wrote:

It uses the five phases for pulse diagnosis; the five elements (India) for everything else.

dakini_boi said:

I should clarify that by "spirits of the organs" I was referring to the wu shen (5 shen) - not spirits in the sense of entities that cause disease (which also exist in TCM), but 5 aspects of consciousness of a human being that are said to reside in the 5 solid organs.

Malcolm wrote:

That concept never made it into Tibetan medicine.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 30th, 2011 at 12:29 AM

Title: Re: WOMPT & Sex

Content:

Namdrol said:

Semen, like feces and urine, is a waste product.

wayland said:

Hi Namdrol,

I have never yet encountered any instructions which equate the qualities of semen with those of feces or urine...Just curious, is the teaching on the parity of these substances a feature of your school or is it more widespread?

Malcolm wrote:

It is from Tibetan Medicine as well as Dzogchen Nyinthig.

Simply put, sukra [semen], both male and female is the byproduct [kita] that is left over when the final product of digestion, ojas, is formed. Ojas is the real "bodhicitta" in the body, and directly supports the indestructible drop in the heart.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 29th, 2011 at 11:12 PM

Title: Re: Difference between recognizing rigpa & realizing emptiness?

Content:

Namdrol said:

No. Why? The creation stage can only bring one to the sixth bodhisattva bhumi. To progress further, the completion stage, therefore, is indispensable.

N

Kai said:

A unique Sakya school doctrine?

Malcolm wrote:

Perhaps.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 29th, 2011 at 8:35 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist Tantra has "unstruck sound" like Hindu Tantra?

Content:

Namdrol said:

I just this moment read an explanation in Pradīpodyotanābhisaṃdhiprakāśikā by Bhavyakīrti:

"A is Bhagavan Akshobhya; O is Bhagavan Amitabha and Ma is Mahavairocana".

N

Adamantine said:

Nice.. that just leaves Ratnasambhava and Amoghasiddhi unaccounted for

Malcolm wrote:

Not really, body, speech and mind are included here.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 29th, 2011 at 6:03 AM

Title: Re: Vimala

Content:

Namdrol said:

You should separate Vimala from Magnesium citrate by about an hour. Vimala may be used as needed. It can be made a little more effective by taking it with warm milk or a small spot of brandy, port, or other aged alcohol. Vimala may also be taken early in the morning to calm anxiety.

Epistemes said:

What are your primary reasons for suggesting that Vimala be taken separately from Magnesium citrate? Magnesium citrate has a number of benefits aside from my primary reason for making it a daily supplement. Is there something in Magnesium citrate that could counter-act Vimala?

How does one determine when Vimala is needed versus making it a daily supplement?

Malcolm wrote:

Mostly because in Tibetan medicine we don't load up on pills all at the same time.

The purpose of Vimala is to help one sleep and otherwise reduce symptoms of vata disturbances.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 29th, 2011 at 2:50 AM

Title: Re: Difference between recognizing rigpa & realizing emptiness?

Content:

alwayson said:

So basically realizing emptiness occurs when the mind winds stop moving?

Is that right?

Malcolm wrote:

not necessarily.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 29th, 2011 at 12:06 AM

Title: Re: Vimala

Content:

Epistemes said:

Thanks for the link. I'll make sure to do a cleanse in the very near future.

But why is my solution bad, and why is being completely dependent on it not good? I currently look at it from the standpoint of 'If they keep manufacturing this or similar products, I'm good 'til death.' Plus, taking Metamucil has helped with cholesterol.

Malcolm wrote:

Because it means that you are not digesting food properly, and that will lead to major health crises later on. Better to prevent it now while you are still young.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 28th, 2011 at 11:18 PM

Title: Re: Vimala

Content:

Namdrol said:

Why are you taking magnesium citrate?

Epistemes said:

I have to take this plus Metamucil everyday to prevent constipation. I may have some form of collitis. I went to a GI doctor about 3-4 years ago due to some problems with constipation, but by this time I had found the above remedy for preventing it. He said that if the remedy worked, he would advise against a colonoscopy unless the symptoms got worse, which they haven't.

Malcolm wrote:

This a bad long term solution. You will become completely dependent on this.

I reccomend doing some sort of cleanse. Colorado Cleanse I think is one of the best designed.

lifespa.com

This should solve your issue.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 28th, 2011 at 10:15 PM

Title: Re: Vimala

Content:

Epistemes said:

I recently purchased some Vimala from Siddhi Energetics.

When is the best time to take it - in the morning or before bed?

If in the morning, how long before a meal?

I also take Magnesium Citrate in the evening for digestion.

Should Vimala be taken before or after taking the Magnesium Citrate supplement?

Will Magnesium Citrate reduce the efficacy of Vimala?

Malcolm wrote:

You should take Vimala about an hour before sleeping.

Why are you taking magnesium citrate?

You should seperate Vimala from Magnesium citrate by about an hour. Vimala may be used as needed. It can be made a little more effective by taking it with warm milk or a small spot of brandy, port, or other aged alcohol. Vimala may also be taken early in the morning to calm anxiety.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 28th, 2011 at 9:21 PM

Title: Re: Nakayamashingoshoshu Exorcism Gone Wrong - Buddhist Cult?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Exorcism by waterboarding ...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 28th, 2011 at 9:13 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist Tantra has "unstruck sound" like Hindu Tantra?

Content:

Gyalpo said:

In ChNN Rinpoche: Precious Vase, in the explanation of four understanding, there is understanding thue nature of letters. O alone stands for body, because it is something concrete, for A you dont have to do anything, just open mouth, but O we have to make some effort and so on. May be this is the point for OM. And rigpa is explained as anuswara...

Malcolm wrote:

I just this moment read an explanation in Pradīpodyotanābhisaṃdhiprakāśikā by Bhavyakīrti:

"A is Bhagavan Akshobhya; O is Bhagavan Amitabha and Ma is Mahavairocana".

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 28th, 2011 at 8:32 PM

Title: Re: Namkhas (colored-thread elemental) are they only Bon?

Content:

Adamantine said:

I have the book compiling ChNN's teachings on the meaning of and how to make a Namkha. . in the introduction, it seems to imply this is primarily a Bon practice. Is this true? I was thinking of making one and getting it blessed by one of my Nyingma Lamas but if it is primarily a Bon thing he may not know much about it or even approve.. does anyone have any insight? The book alludes to similar practices being widespread among indigenous cultures around the world, which is interesting..

If it is mainly Bonpo, is there an equivalent and effective practice among Buddhists to harmonize the elemental energies of the individual?

Malcolm wrote:

No, thread crosses began as Bon thing and were adapted to Buddhist practice by Guru Rinpoche.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 28th, 2011 at 8:19 PM

Title: Re: Zen and the dogma of non-duality

Content:

catmoon said:

Now who would these people of poor understanding be? Who uses the term illusion-like?

Namdrol said:

Sometimes [quite often] teachers will speak the level of their students, when their own view is in fact higher or different. Why? Because sometimes teachers realize that they must feed the truth to their students in small doses.

Some people, hearing that all phenomena are completely equivalent with illusions freak out. Some people who hear that phenomena are empty, freak out. This is why it is a bohdhisattva downfall to teach emptiness to the immature.

N

tobes said:

By all means practice and teach Dzogchen, but do not pretend that every interpretation of emptiness must conform to it.

Malcolm wrote:

If an explanation of emptiness does not conform to Dzogchen, then it does not conform to Madhyamaka since the explanation of emptiness in Dzogchen and Madhyamaka are identical.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 28th, 2011 at 8:16 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist Tantra has "unstruck sound" like Hindu Tantra?

Content:

Adamantine said:

If OM represents all three kayas then why when receiving the empowerments during Guru Yoga does it relate to the body - blessing, aka nirmanakaya?

Malcolm wrote:

Om is made of three parts A O Ṃ i.e. ॐ, ॐ, and ॐ, hence it represents the three kāyas.

Though I am certain there is an explanation for why Om represents the body out of body speech and mind (om aḥ hūṃ), I don't have a ready answer.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 28th, 2011 at 9:24 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Tantra has "unstruck sound" like Hindu Tantra?

Content:

alwayson said:

Ok thanks

Is OM associated with Dharmakaya?

I've heard that before.

Malcolm wrote:

Om stands for the three kāyas.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 28th, 2011 at 2:42 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Tantra has "unstruck sound" like Hindu Tantra?

Content:

alwayson said:

I was wondering if Buddhist Tantra has an "unstruck sound" like Hindu Tantra?

In Hindu tantra the unstruck sound is OM, and it resonates from the Heart Chakra.

P.S. If this is some top secret classified Vajrayana information, then ignore this thread.

Malcolm wrote:

The term anahata is translated into Tibetan as mi zhig, which then gets translated in English as "indestructible", as in anahata bindu i.e indestructible drop.

but the meaning is quite different.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 28th, 2011 at 2:40 AM

Title: Re: 5 organs, elements, spirits

Content:

dakini_boi said:

I know TM is influenced by both Chinese medicine and Ayurveda. In the Chinese system, each of the organs has an elemental correspondence, as well as a "spirit" or aspect of the psyche associated with it. Was any of this integrated into Tibetan medicine?

Further, TCM describes the dying process and what happens to the spirits of the organs. For example, at least in one interpretation, the liver hun (ethereal soul) is what carries our karma/experience of past lives. Is any of this discussed in TM texts/teachings, alongside typical Buddhist descriptions of the dissolution of the elements at the time of death?

Namdrol said:

"Elements", yes, for example, wood for liver, metal for lungs and so on. Spirit, no.

nirmal said:

This may sound a little silly but it is said that if the spiritual disturbance is removed first, then medicine taken by the patient will be very effective and the road to recovery is very fast. Does TM believe in that, Namdrol?

Malcolm wrote:

There are some cultural differences between Tibet and China, and the way "spirits" are understood is one of them.

AFAIK, while there are spirits or demons associated with most diseases, called "disease lords", they are not specific to a given organ, but rather govern a class of disease as a whole. Religious practice is always a component in any Tibetan medical treatment. So, the answer is yes and no. Yes in general, no on the specifics.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 28th, 2011 at 12:19 AM

Title: Re: 5 organs, elements, spirits

Content:

dakini_boi said:

I know TM is influenced by both Chinese medicine and Ayurveda. In the Chinese system, each of the organs has an elemental correspondence, as well as a "spirit" or aspect of the psyche associated with it. Was any of this integrated into Tibetan medicine?

Further, TCM describes the dying process and what happens to the spirits of the organs. For example, at least in one interpretation, the liver hun (ethereal soul) is what carries our karma/experience of past lives. Is any of this discussed in TM texts/teachings, alongside typical Buddhist descriptions of the dissolution of the elements at the time of death?

Malcolm wrote:

"Elements", yes, for example, wood for liver, metal for lungs and so on. Spirit, no.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 27th, 2011 at 11:24 PM

Title: Re: Angioedema

Content:

Epistemes said:

My partner has angioedema, including hives and swelling in the fingers and toes. Does TM cover how to treat something like this?

Namdrol said:

Yes, seeing a Tibetan doctor may be of some benefit. Exact treatment would depend on a whole host of factors I cannot begin to predict.

N

Epistemes said:

Would going to an ayurvedic doctor be of similar benefit?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 27th, 2011 at 9:00 PM

Title: Re: 1st Lay vow ...what is the definition of 'physical actions'?

Content:

minimayhen88 said:

The 1st lay vow / lay precept / upasaka of non violence

I was informed that"The vow or precept of not killing (harmlessness) only extends to physical actions" Do these 'physical actions' include harsh speech and the mental actions of the mind? Or quite literally only 'not killing'

Kindly,

A young lay follower, who wishes to keep their vow pure

Malcolm wrote:

Quite literally, only "not killing". The five lay precepts as a total apply only to one's physical actions (speech being a physical action).

Basically, there are ten non-virtues: killing, stealing, sexual misconduct for the body; lying, harsh speech, calumny and gossip for speech; malice, envy and wrong view for the mind.

Of these, killing, stealing, sexual misconduct and lying are covered in the vows, as well as intoxicants, for a total of five lay precepts or vows.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 27th, 2011 at 4:17 AM

Title: Re: Zen and the dogma of non-duality

Content:

Namdrol said:

It is the realization of your own emptiness to the fullest possible degree.

alwayson said:

Which is tactile bliss?

Malcolm wrote:

Well, that is a side effect.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 27th, 2011 at 4:05 AM

Title: Re: Zen and the dogma of non-duality

Content:

alwayson said:

If the Dharmakaya is free from extremes.

Then logically it cannot be separate from me??

Malcolm wrote:

Dharmakāya is not a thing, It is the realization of your own emptiness to the fullest possible degree.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 27th, 2011 at 3:33 AM

Title: Re: Ankle, Knee, Elbow Itch

Content:

Clarence said:

Will a good ayurvedic store know what pitta pacifying oil to give me when I ask?

Many thanks once again,

C

Malcolm wrote:

Yup.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 27th, 2011 at 3:16 AM

Title: Re: Lojong, Rushens, and Semdzins

Content:

padma norbu said:

I don't remember the exact details, but I believe what I heard is that there are 9 levels. I asked how many people have completed and was told that nobody has even passed the 3rd or 4th level (forgot). I think actually the words were that the highest level as of right now is 3rd or 4th and nobody has completed them. In other words, the other levels only exist theoretically, I guess, because they are not even written out or discussed since there are no students. I don't know. But, since SMS has been going on for quite a while and involves quite a lot of old hats at this stuff who have been sitting on their bums for quite a long time now chanting mantras, writing books translating Tibetan texts (Jim Valby), I just don't see the point of even attempting it. Why get involved in something nobody will ever likely finish?

Pero said:

Oh I see. Rinpoche hasn't taught more than the 4th level. Apparently it gets quite difficult after the second level. They are written out though. Sort of. There exists a booklet called Santi Maha Sangha (I got it in Merigar, didn't see it online) and in it all levels of SMS are outlined in the form of a poem. There you can see SMS is really something alive, it's really about your own practice developing. Looking at it, it seems to me that completing level 9 basically means achieving Rainbow body haha.

As for your question. Why do you concern yourself whether others will finish it or not? Why don't YOU try to finish it?

alpha said:
what do you learn at the second and third level?

Malcolm wrote:
1-3 sems sde
4-6 klong sde
7-9 man ngag sde

BTW, everything that Rinpoche teaches in these nine levels he also teaches in general. The difference is that SMS is more systematic and a bit more detailed. But he teaches everything to everyone.

N

Author: Malcolm
Date: Tuesday, September 27th, 2011 at 2:56 AM
Title: Re: Zen and the dogma of non-duality
Content:

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:
Aren't you being a teenyweeny bit sneaky now Loppon?

...

Which is pretty much standard Sakya spros bral view. But now you use Buddhapalita to support mere non-affirming negation view, which slides back into Gelug emptiness.

Malcolm wrote:
No, Buddhapalita corresponds with spros bral. Buddhapalita's view and the statement gnas lugs med pa are completely consistent with one another.

You cannot ascertain Tsongkhapa's view in Buddhapalita. It is impossible.

N

Author: Malcolm
Date: Monday, September 26th, 2011 at 11:51 PM
Title: Re: Dalai Lama speaks on reincarnation
Content:

always on said:
I'm simply a supporter of HH Dalai Lama, although I am not a Vajrayanist.

Malcolm wrote:
HHDL is a self-proclaimed marxist.

N

Author: Malcolm
Date: Monday, September 26th, 2011 at 11:47 PM
Title: Re: Zen and the dogma of non-duality
Content:

Kai said:
Haribhadra, the same guy who wrote the famous Abhisamayalankara commentary?

Malcolm wrote:
indeed.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Monday, September 26th, 2011 at 11:39 PM
Title: Re: In need of guidance about vows....
Content:
Malcolm wrote:
The vow or precept of not killing only extends to physical actions.

However, the commitment of taking refuge in the Dharma is that one must abandon harming sentient beings in thought and deed.

N

Author: Malcolm
Date: Monday, September 26th, 2011 at 11:11 PM
Title: Re: Dalai Lama speaks on reincarnation
Content:
alwayson said:
P.S. Supporting socialism on a Buddhist board is improper, considering it is pure evil.

Malcolm wrote:
Which socialism did you have in mind? You sound like a follower of Ayn Rand.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Monday, September 26th, 2011 at 11:09 PM
Title: Re: Zen and the dogma of non-duality
Content:

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:
Why push nihilism side so hard?

Malcolm wrote:
Who's pushing nihilism? Not me, sir.

As Buddhapalita quips "We do not advocate non-existence. We simply remove claims that existents exist."

Author: Malcolm
Date: Monday, September 26th, 2011 at 11:08 PM
Title: Re: Zen and the dogma of non-duality
Content:

Namdrol said:
Omniscience is not as scary as it sounds. A Buddhas omniscience is predicated on the fact that all objects of knowledge, including buddhahood itself, are completely illusory.

This is also the view of Dzogchen i.e. everything, including buddhahood, etc., is completely equivalent to an illusion; not "like an illusion", as some people in Mahāyāna with a poor understanding hedge -- completely equivalent.

Kai said:
This is more extreme than some Yogacara originated schools, certainly a POV that Theravada and other Nikaya schools will never accept.....

Malcolm wrote:
This is the standpoint of Haribhadra presented his perfection of wisdom commentaries, so it is pretty standard Mahāyāna.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Monday, September 26th, 2011 at 9:34 PM
Title: Re: 2 Tibetan monks self-immolate amid Dalai Lama feud
Content:

mr. gordo said:
BEIJING (AP) — Two Tibetan monks set themselves on fire Monday in a protest over China's tight rein over Buddhist practices, a rights group said as the Chinese government reiterated it will choose the next Dalai Lama.

The London-based Free Tibet campaign said Lobsang Kalsang and Lobsang Konchok, both believed to be 18 or 19 years old, self-immolated Monday at the Kirti Monastery in Sichuan province's Aba prefecture.

<http://www.seattlepi.com/news/article/2-Tibetan-monks-self-immolate-amid-Dalai-Lama-fued-2188768.php>

Malcolm wrote:

Fortunately they did not badly hurt themselves.

I don't approve of these acts of self-immolation.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 26th, 2011 at 9:33 PM

Title: Re: Evolution of humans and Mahayana Buddhism

Content:

Aemilius said:

Another interesting point is the plurality of worlds that we find in Theravada and Mahayana buddhism. The idea was known in ancient Greek world, it was known in the islamic world, one sentence in Quran speaks of worlds, it is also present in the Thousand and One Nights collection of stories. In Europe it re-emerges during the Era of Enlightenment. Thus for example Voltaire, in his novel Zadig, says that besides Earth there are millions of inhabited planets like Earth in the Universe, each unique and different.

Malcolm wrote:

Sarvastivada Buddhist cosmology holds that there are a billion Jambudvipas, each one basically identicle.

Mahāyāna cosmology is a little more diverse, including the idea that the entire universe is contained in the body of the mahāsambhogakāya, Vairocana Himasara, with our world system being located with another world system called kusumatalagarbha alamkara which in turn is in the palm of his hand.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 26th, 2011 at 9:25 PM

Title: Re: Evolution of humans and Mahayana Buddhism

Content:

Aemilius said:

Another interesting point is the plurality of worlds that we find in Theravada and Mahayana buddhism. The idea was known in ancient Greek world, it was known in the islamic world, one sentence in Quran speaks of worlds, it is also present in the Thousand and One Nights collection of stories. In Europe it re-emerges during the Era of Enlightenment. Thus for example Voltaire, in his novel Zadig, says that besides Earth there are millions of inhabited planets like Earth in the Universe, each unique and different.

Malcolm wrote:

No one said that Buddhist intuitions about multiple worlds was wrong. Just that rather late Sumeru Cosmology presented Buddhist texts dating from the common era is obsolete and has been superseded.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 26th, 2011 at 8:55 PM

Title: Re: Dalai Lama speaks on reincarnation

Content:

always on said:

WOW

HH Dalai Lama is REALLY throwing down the gauntlet with the commies / socialists here. Hopefully China becomes capitalistic, so we don't have to put up with their crap anymore.

Embrace Capitalism China!!!!:

<https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=Edf7xPbPZrc> "

onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

narraboth said:

1. Religious freedom is not linked to socialism or capitalism. The main idea here is, Chinese Communist Party denies religion, but they want to get involved with religious issue, that's shameless.
2. China is kind of a capitalism country now, maybe more capitalist than some European countries, just China is without democracy.
3. Talking about making crap, maybe Chinese government think the US national debt they hold are more dodgy. How about thinking capitalism's own problem before raising an improper/controversial/Tea Party idea.

Malcolm wrote:

China is a mercantile state. This is a pre-Capitalist phase. Wiki states: "Mercantilism is the economic doctrine that says government control of foreign trade is of paramount importance for ensuring the prosperity and security of a state. In particular, it demands a positive balance of trade."

It continues:

Mercantilist policies have included:

High tariffs, especially on manufactured goods; [x]

Monopolizing markets with staple ports; [x, i.e. Walmart]

Exclusive trade with colonies;
Forbidding trade to be carried in foreign ships;
Export subsidies; [x]
Banning all export of gold and silver;
Promoting manufacturing with research or direct subsidies; [x]
Limiting wages; [x]
Maximizing the use of domestic resources; [x]
Restricting domestic consumption with non-tariff barriers to trade. [x]

Author: Malcolm
Date: Monday, September 26th, 2011 at 8:51 PM
Title: Re: Zen and the dogma of non-duality
Content:

catmoon said:
Now who would these people of poor understanding be? Who uses the term illusion-like?

Malcolm wrote:
Sometimes [quite often] teachers will speak the level of their students, when their own view is in fact higher or different. Why? Because sometimes teachers realize that they must feed the truth to their students in small doses.

Some people, hearing that all phenomena are completely equivalent with illusions freak out. Some people who hear that phenomena are empty, freak out. This is why it is a bohdhisattva downfall to teach emptiness to the immature.

N

Author: Malcolm
Date: Monday, September 26th, 2011 at 8:37 PM
Title: Re: Ankle, Knee, Elbow Itch
Content:

Clarence said:
P.S. I will look into shingles, don't know what those are off the top of my head.

Malcolm wrote:
Adult chicken pox.

Sounds to me like you might have a mild allergy to dog dander.

You need to wash all the clothes that you were wearing when you contacted the dog.

You need to rub a good quality pitta pacifying ayurvedic oil on the affected areas after you shower.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 26th, 2011 at 9:22 AM

Title: Re: Tibetan Acupuncture

Content:

Fa Dao said:

While it is obviously true that Tibet is colder on the whole, there are places in China that are bitterly cold as well. As to the moxabustion unless you were discussing this with some older precommunist practitioners your information about Chinese moxabustion will be limited. Sadly nowadays in China as elsewhere moxabustion is only used for cold and deficiency disorders. It used to be used for both hot and cold disorders as well as deficiency and excess disorders. Not a lot that are doing that nowadays. This is due to a number of factors, one of which was not its lack of efficacy. Both moxabustion and acupuncture came close to becoming lost arts in China.

Malcolm wrote:

Moxa is used in number of ways in TM -- as a therapy in and of itself, it is mostly used for cold/kapha diseases -- it is also used to dispell the vata which comes at the end of an serious heat diseases, and so on.

It is generally contraindicated as a main treatment for virtually all heat diseases, the only exception is heat being driven by vata.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 26th, 2011 at 7:56 AM

Title: Re: Tibetan Acupuncture

Content:

Fa Dao said:

Namdrol, I have to respectfully disagree...China is not only a "hot" place. In fact the weather there is quite varied. Ranging from below freezing to dry and arid to tropical. As to whether or not Tibetan moxabustion is superior to Chinese moxabustion, unless you are a practitioner of both Tibetan and Chinese medicine you cant really claim that either.

Malcolm wrote:

I have dicussed the way Chinese moxa is practiced with several OMDs and I have clinical experience in Tibetan hospitals with doctors who are fully cross trained in both systems. Tibetan moxabustion is more developed than Chinese Moxa. Acupuncture is more developed in Chinese medicine. This is just a fact, nothing to really argue about.

In general, compared to Tibet, the Chinese climate is quite warm.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 26th, 2011 at 4:34 AM

Title: Re: Ankle, Knee, Elbow Itch

Content:

Clarence said:

Ah, that is too bad, but thanks for the answer anyway.

Malcolm wrote:

Has the heat gone on?

Do you have a food allergy, new clothes, new soap, new pet, new lover, new job? What has changed besides your recent cold?

Are you getting shingles perhaps?

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 26th, 2011 at 4:14 AM

Title: Re: Ankle, Knee, Elbow Itch

Content:

Clarence said:

The last 2 nights I have been unable to sleep because I have very strong itching sensations around the ankles, on the front of my knees and at the back of my elbows. So, all places where the skin is very thin. Tonight it is also itching on my outside thighs. However, there is no rash to be found. Nowhere. I have been having a little cold the last 3 or 4 days. Nothing major and the first one in 2 years. I am generally healthy, so this is pretty strange. Any idea what this could be? Oh yeah, I don't have problems during the day. At least, nothing like when I sit down.

Many thanks, C

Malcolm wrote:

No clue.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 26th, 2011 at 3:33 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen Community of Chogyal Namkhai Norbu

Content:

Sönam said:

That I know, and Rinpoche underline it again and again, and I also say "he always teaches in "direct introduction mode"" ... what is not clear for me is why there is "special webcast session for direct introduction" as all sessions include direct introduction. And when I said there must be a trick, I was thinking Rinpoche makes "special sessions" called direct introduction for those listening could have no doubt about it (the fact that it includes direct introduction).

Sönam

Malcolm wrote:

IN that case he is not only giving introduction he is giving transmission of three roots, etc., depending on the day.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 26th, 2011 at 3:26 AM

Title: Re: Tibetan Acupuncture

Content:

Fa Dao said:

thanks Namdrol...was there a time when it was used for more than that?

Malcolm wrote:

Never. It has to do with the theory of needle in Tibetan medicine -- i.e. it is used mainly for inflammation and heat diseases i.e. pitta and blood. It is considered a cold and rough therapy, not good for vata and kapha at all. So I always especially recommend that vata-deranged people generally avoid acupuncture unless there is serious reason for them to use it to cut the end of a heat disease.

Tibet is a cold place, China is a hot place. There are more heat diseases in China than Tibet. Our Moxa is much more developed than Chinese moxabustion. Why? Tibet is a cold country.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 26th, 2011 at 3:20 AM

Title: Re: Zen and the dogma of non-duality

Content:

AlexanderS said:

This is one of the reasons I find it very hard to know what we working towards in buddhism and impossible to explain to anyone else.

Malcolm wrote:

All traditions of Buddhism are working towards the same goal, freedom from afflictions that are the cause of suffering. Some Buddhist traditions, from Mahāyāna on up, also aim at omniscience.

Omniscience is not as scary as it sounds. A Buddha's omniscience is predicated on the fact that all objects of knowledge, including Buddhahood itself, are completely illusory.

This is also the view of Dzogchen i.e. everything, including Buddhahood, etc., is completely equivalent to an illusion; not "like an illusion", as some people in Mahāyāna with a poor understanding hedge -- completely equivalent.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 26th, 2011 at 3:17 AM

Title: Re: Tibetan Acupuncture

Content:

Fa Dao said:

I don't remember where I read it but I remember reading that at one time Tibet had as a part of its treatment therapies its own system of acupuncture. But for some reason it was banned or something. I am a Doctor of Chinese medicine primarily focusing on acupuncture and would love to know about its Tibetan counterpart.

Malcolm wrote:

We use needle on moxa as well as bloodletting points. But we generally only use needle on heat and nerve diseases, unlike Chinese medicine where they use it on everything.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 26th, 2011 at 2:00 AM

Title: Re: Zen and the dogma of non-duality

Content:

Acchantika said:

I mean only that in sems sde the central focus seems to be on a basic, unconditioned awareness that is free from duality, which, coincidentally, is the premise of Advaita and what "nondual" actually refers to, at least in the latter. That is where the perceived similarities end.

At the very least, I think it is understandable the two would be conflated by the untrained. Like me.

Malcolm wrote:

One: bodhicitta in sems sde is not something that is considered real; it is sat i.e. real in Advaita.

Two: there are two basic ways the term "non-dual" is used in Buddhism: free from subject and object perception (trivial) and free from ontic extremes (non-trivial).

Three, sometimes the word "non-dual" in translation is misleading. Here is an example from sem sde. This:

rgyu dang 'bras bu gnyis las 'das sems can sangs rgyas gnyis med pas sangs rgyas sems kyis sgrub ma byed

It might be translated as:

Beyond the duality of cause and result, since sentient beings and buddhas are non-dual,
buddhahood is not accomplished with the mind.

But that translation would be a little wrong.

A better way to render it would be:

Beyond both cause and result, since both sentient beings and buddhas do not exist
buddhahood is not accomplished with the mind.

What is the difference you ask? Here there is a pair, a cause and a result i.e. sentient being are a cause, buddhas are a result. But since neither exist, therefore, buddhahood cannot be accomplished with mind.

These issues are often quite subtle.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 26th, 2011 at 12:21 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen Community of Chogyal Namkhai Norbu

Content:

Sönam said:

As far as Rinpoché is giving teaching, he gives direct introduction ... he always teaches in "direct introduction mode" (and he did confirm that in today's teaching)

Sönam

booker said:

I guess there's a formal difference in the direct transmission over the webcast, which involves extra practice (empowerment) and one needs instructions from senior students - and this happens only three times per year. Other than this there are open webcasts, like now happening from Paris or upcoming from Barcelona.

No?

Sönam said:

I must admit that something is not clear there ... as Rinpoché did repeat this w-e that he was giving direct transmission in each of his teaching (maybe there is a trick there ...).

Sönam

Malcolm wrote:

Direct introduction simply means the teacher teaches Dzogchen from his true knowledge of Dzogchen. It does not mean he necessarily shouts something, or holds up something, or shocks the students, and so on. These are methods that can be part of an introduction or not, at the teacher's discretion.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, September 25th, 2011 at 10:45 PM

Title: Re: Zen and the dogma of non-duality

Content:

Acchantika said:

There is of course more than one way to interpret statements like "there is no condition or state that is free from extremes" etc.

Malcolm wrote:

The view of dzogchen is "gnas lugs med pa" i.e. no reality.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, September 25th, 2011 at 10:43 PM

Title: Re: Zen and the dogma of non-duality

Content:

Acchantika said:

Mistaking Advaita for Dzogchen et al is not like mistaking fire for ice...

Malcolm wrote:

I don't agree. It is exactly like mistaken fire for ice.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, September 25th, 2011 at 9:18 PM

Title: Re: Lama Migmar at Kripalu Januray 2012

Content:
Virgo said:
Hi everyone,

"Mother Tara Empowerment" by Lama Migmar Tseten

http://www.kripalu.org/program/view/MTE-121/mother_tara_empowerment

It seems that Lama Migmar will be giving empowerments for White, Gold, Red, and Green Taras in MA.

Unfortunately the page is worded slightly strangely since it is probably written by somebody from Kripalu (I don't know).

Does anybody know if these are the full empowerments for each, and will the practice texts and instructions for all these Sadhanas be given or be available?

Thank you,

Kevin

Malcolm wrote:
They are initiations. All the practice texts will be available.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Sunday, September 25th, 2011 at 9:16 PM
Title: Re: Completion of the path of Tögal
Content:

heart said:
So you are saying he reached the third vision himself? Or isn't that necessary to be able to guide people through the visions?

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:
I don't know. I don't know Lama Drimed personally.

I have friend of mine who did an 8 year retreat under Chagdud Tulku focusing on thogal. But I don't think he got past the second vision himself.

It took Kunzang Dechen Lingpa seven years to reach the third vision in strict retreat.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, September 25th, 2011 at 7:49 AM

Title: Re: Completion of the path of Tögal

Content:

Pema Rigdzin said:

Not sure what to make of this couple...

On a sidenote, apparently Batman is a togal practitioner too:

<http://thelostyak.com/2010/02/25/the-comics-connection-i-batman-does-togal/> "
onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

padma norbu said:

Thank you, I was able to learn more about Tögal from that blog about batman than anyone on this board or anywhere else has been willing to share.

Malcolm wrote:

"So it might not be too far fetched to see tögal as something of a rehearsal for the events that occur during the death process.

Traditionally, however, tögal is not usually presented in this way."

In fact, traditionally, tögal is frequently presented in this way.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, September 25th, 2011 at 7:33 AM

Title: Re: What are some "must have" books?

Content:

Namdrol said:

You are down playing something very critical.

Jnana said:

Developing an understanding of the foundational teachings is important. Whether this is interpreted through a classical Indian Sarvāstivāda filter or a Theravāda filter is not so important. By the time of the classical period (i.e. the first few centuries of the common era) both of these exegetical systems had accreted to a point where they were unnecessarily complex. Old Guatama likely wouldn't have been very impressed with any of their large classical treatises.

Malcolm wrote:

In general, the point of departure for most Sanskrit-writing Mahayana Indian authors which have any relevance at all in Tibetan Buddhism, whether sutra or tantra, is the Kosha.

Perhaps it is merely a Tibetan Buddhist thing.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 24th, 2011 at 11:55 PM

Title: Re: Zen and the dogma of non-duality

Content:

Namdrol said:

There is no actual state or condition that is free from duality. If one should think that there is, one will have not understood one single thing about Buddha Dharma.

Because people think there is a real state free from dualistic extremes, they fall into the pit of eternalism and grasping, never even recognizing emptiness correctly, let alone realizing it, and hampering their understanding of dependent origination.

Thinking there is such a thing as a real state of non-duality is precisely the Advaita Vedanta, Trika and so on.

N

Acchantika said:

By the same token, people will read this and think it equates to nihilism, not understanding a single thing about the Buddha Dharma, falling in to the pit of nihilism and mental dullness and so on.

Language is dualistic, and as language so thought; it is better to use this to our advantage than spend our lives dodging traps.

Malcolm wrote:

As Nāgārjuna states:

By relying on the conventional, the ultimate will be understood;
by realizing the ultimate, nirvana will be attained.

It is extremely important that key concepts be treated with care. It is also very important to avoid using language shared with other philosophical systems. I know any number of people who really are under the impression that there is really no difference between Dzogchen, Advaita and so on. And mostly, it is because of this pesky word "non-duality".

There is just as much danger of mental dullness and so with an eternalist view as there is with a nihilist view. In both cases, the conclusion will be reached that view is not important, karma does not matter, and so on.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 24th, 2011 at 10:33 PM

Title: Re: Zen and the dogma of non-duality

Content:

Namdrol said:

It is an important issue only because it is at the root of much confusion for so many people.

Acchantika said:

Nondual means free from duality. Nonduality means the state or condition of being free from duality. Neither is a philosophical position, in any tradition that uses the terms.

I think overcomplicating the issue is what is at the root of confusion for so many.

Malcolm wrote:

There is no actual state or condition that is free from duality. If one should think that there is, one will have not understood one single thing about Buddha Dharma.

Because people think there is a real state free from dualistic extremes, they fall into the pit of eternalism and grasping, never even recognizing emptiness correctly, let alone realizing it, and hampering their understanding of dependent origination.

Thinking there is such a thing as a real state of non-duality is precisely the Advaita Vedanta, Trika and so on.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 24th, 2011 at 8:24 PM

Title: Re: What are some "must have" books?

Content:

Namdrol said:

This is not really the case. There is a continuity of ideas that run through Sarvastivada right up through both wings of Mahāyāna and on into Vajrayāna.

Thervāda and Sarvastivāda tenets are very different in a number of important ways.

Jnana said:

The only Sarvāstivāda ideas that a bodhisattva aspirant would need to understand on any level is the Sarvāstivāda version of causes and conditions and the Sarvāstivāda version of the intermediate state. And in each case, one doesn't have to be a Sarvāstivāda scholar. Other areas such as the sixteen aspects of the four noble truths and the defilements eliminated at each of the four arya stages aren't really relevant to the Mahāyāna.

Malcolm wrote:

You are down playing something very critical.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 24th, 2011 at 8:09 PM

Title: Re: Zen and the dogma of non-duality

Content:

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

It appears that gnyis med can also be legitimately translated "non-duality" without fear that it will be mistaken for Avdaita.

Wise and learned people realize the non-duality (gNyiś-Med) (of enlightenment and unenlightenment) ...

The Practice of Dzogchen, Longchen Rabjam, p.16

Malcolm wrote:

Appearances are often deceiving.

While Tulku Thundup is certainly a qualified teacher -- he is not a native English speaker, I don't think he knows Sanskrit all that well, and he does not edit his own material.

As I said, gnyis med is certainly used frequently in Buddhist texts, but it should never be translated as non-duality, since it is missing the -ity part i.e. nyid or tā.

Because of imprecise translations there are many people indeed who think that basic message of Mahāyāna Buddhism, Zen, Dzogchen, Mahāmudra, and so on are exactly the same as Advaita. In particular this is demonstrated the by the convergence of Zen and Advaita in such teachers as Adyashanti, etc., and some of his students, such as Loach Kelley, who also has studied Dzogchen.

Crystal is a book taught by a Tibetan in Italian, not his native language, translated on the fly by someone without deep knowledge of Buddhism in general [Barry Simmons] and edited by John Shane, also someone without a deep knowledge of Buddhism.

While Crystal is one of my favorite books of all time, it is not without its flaws, and for this and that reason it was almost allowed to die. It was re-edited quite a bit, however, and has its present form. It is still not a perfect book in every respect.

I also know a lot of people in Dzogchen Community who are confused about the difference between non-dual and non-duality.

It is an important issue only because it is at the root of much confusion for so many people.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 24th, 2011 at 7:59 PM

Title: Re: Tanpai Rinpoche at Yogaville

Content:

Jikan said:

What's going on here?

Malcolm wrote:

Marketing.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 24th, 2011 at 6:14 AM

Title: Re: Zen and the dogma of non-duality

Content:

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

Again, "non-duality" is used, no need to fear the boogey-man Advaita.

Malcolm wrote:

Those who don't really know what Advaita is quickly wind up becoming crypto-advaitans by obsessing about the word "non-dual".

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 24th, 2011 at 4:03 AM

Title: Re: What are some "must have" books?

Content:

Jnana said:

The point is this: There's no need for anyone aspiring to enter the Mahāyāna to learn two different Sthaviravāda abhidharma systems. If one has already learned the Theravāda system there is no need whatsoever for learning the Sarvāstivāda system.

All the best,

Geoff

Malcolm wrote:

Hi, Geoff:

This is not really the case. There is a continuity of ideas that run through Sarvastivāda right up through both wings of Mahāyāna and on into Vajrayāna.

Thervāda and Sarvastivāda tenets are very different in a number of important ways.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 24th, 2011 at 2:31 AM

Title: Re: Zen and the dogma of non-duality

Content:

Namdrol said:

The term non-dual (gnyis med, or advaya) is used frequently in Buddhist texts. The term non-duality (gnyis med nyid, advaita) is virtually never used, showing up only one time in the entire Kengyur, in a single passage in the Kalacakra tantra

Jinzang said:

What do you think is the distinction between non-dual and non-duality?

Malcolm wrote:

The first refers to an absence of extremes. The second is advocating a philosophical position.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 24th, 2011 at 12:02 AM

Title: Re: Completion of the path of Tögal

Content:

username said:

Is the 9th bhumi beyond falling?

Malcolm wrote:

Eighth bhumi on up are irreversible

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 23rd, 2011 at 10:02 PM

Title: Re: Completion of the path of Tögal

Content:

username said:

It is naive and absurd to say confidently they completed the third vision or validating their experiences as genuine thogal visions from afar in cyberspace is a complete misunderstanding of Dzogchen. All sorts of experiences and classes of beings can arise and though possible I very much doubt either of these business people who are fallen and fugitives from their lineage masters ever reached even the beginnings of the first vision.

Namdrol said:

In fact, the Old's had their experiences confirmed by their teacher, Lama Drimed, up to the second vision. But they mistakenly concluded they were finished with the four visions when they had not actually finished the second vision, or so the story runs. Then there was a disagreement and they left Lama Drimed after having spend nine years in retreat.

At this point, apparently, they do not even consider themselves Buddhists, and perhaps never did.

N

heart said:

I don't get it, Lama Drimed is capable of leading other people on that level?

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

Yes. He has a number of people in retreat under his guidance doing the main practices of Dzogchen.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 23rd, 2011 at 10:00 PM

Title: Re: Zen and the dogma of non-duality

Content:

alwayson said:

There is NO such thing as nonduality in Buddhism, including Zen.

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

[T]he real condition of existence appears in different forms, either pure or impure, but its real nature does not change. This is why it is said that it is nondual. "Nondual" is in fact a term that is used in dzogchen a great deal[.]

Dzogchen: the Self-Perfected State, Chogyal Namkhai Norbu

You can't ape arrogance, son. You can only earn it. Then it'll be the real thing. Good luck with that.

Malcolm wrote:

The term non-dual (gnyis med, or advaya) is used frequently in Buddhist texts. The term non-duality (gnyis med nyid, advaita) is virtually never used, showing up only one time in the entire Kengyur, in a single passage in the Kalacakra tantra (hooray for a text searchable Tibetan canon!); and nineteen times in the Tengyur, the translations of Indian commentaries.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 23rd, 2011 at 8:42 PM

Title: Re: Dzogchen Community of Chogyal Namkhai Norbu

Content:

Pero said:

I'm pretty sure for today and for Lama Zabdon Nyingthig it said open webcast on Merigar schedule. Anyway you can try to tune in even if you're not sure if it's closed or not. If it will be a closed webcast you just won't be able to. Almost every webcast nowadays is open BTW. Maybe one per year is closed.

Epistemes said:

I tried tuning into the webcast this morning from both a PC and my iPad with no luck. There's about 6 hours difference between where I am and Paris. It's 8:39 AM here, so it's 2:39 AM in Paris. Something should be going on with the retreat by now, I would think, and something should be webcasted if it was available, right?

I'm really confused by this definition of "open." One person says I should view the open webcasts, but another says THE open webcast is the direct transmission, and then another says almost every webcast is open.

Malcolm wrote:

The evening session should start at 2:pm eastern time today.

<http://www.timeanddate.com/worldclock/city.html?n=195> "
onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 23rd, 2011 at 8:36 PM

Title: Re: Completion of the path of Tögal

Content:

username said:

It is naive and absurd to say confidently they completed the third vision or validating their experiences as genuine thogal visions from afar in cyberspace is a complete misunderstanding of Dzogchen. All sorts of experiences and classes of beings can arise and though possible I very much doubt either of these business people who are fallen and fugitives from their lineage masters ever reached even the beginnings of the first vision.

Malcolm wrote:

In fact, the Old's had their experiences confirmed by their teacher, Lama Drimed, up to the second vision. But they mistakenly concluded they were finished with the four visions when they had not actually finished the second vision, or so the story runs. Then there was a disagreement and they left Lama Drimed after having spend nine years in retreat.

At this point, apparently, they do not even consider themselves Buddhists, and perhaps never did.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 23rd, 2011 at 8:31 PM

Title: Re: The brain and Dzogchen...

Content:

Andrew108 said:

If ChNN says the brain is like an office then I don't have to accept it as a definitive truth. I can see it as a relative truth. If ChNN says the brain is appearance/emptiness inseparable then I would accept that as a definitive truth and proceed accordingly.

Malcolm wrote:

That reason why Norbu Rinpoche says this is because Dzogchen is predicated on an understanding of the human body that founded on medical ideas current in Tibet and India at that time.

In Dzogchen, the rtsal or energy of wisdom, ye shes, is specifically stated to be located in the brain. And the brain is specifically stated to be the organ that coordinates input from the five material sense organs. This is symbolized by the presence of the mandala of the 58 herukas in the brain, just as the eight consciousness are symbolized by the presence of the 42 peaceful deities in the heart.

Also, the two truths is not an important concept in Dzogchen, or as ChNN put it to me in person 19 years ago, "In Dzogchen there is only one truth, not two truths".

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 23rd, 2011 at 6:43 AM

Title: Re: They killed him!

Content:

Sönām said:

don't play it too much ! about democracy you still have a lot to do, as for exemple suppress the first item of your constitution "In God we Trust", and better to have real democratics elections, not "great" electors ... but there is no need to go further, we already had this discussion with some folks here (or there).

Malcolm wrote:

""In God We Trust" was adopted as the official motto of the United States in 1956. It is also the motto of the U.S. state of Florida. The phrase has appeared on U.S. coins since 1864 and on paper currency since 1957.[1] Its Spanish equivalent, En Dios Confiamos, is the motto of the Central American nation of Nicaragua.[2]" https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/In_God_We_Trust "

onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

And first part of constitution:

We the People of the United States, in Order to form a more perfect Union, establish Justice, insure domestic Tranquility, provide for the common defence, promote the general Welfare, and secure the Blessings of Liberty to ourselves and our Posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America.

No mention of God.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 23rd, 2011 at 4:00 AM

Title: Re: Zen and the dogma of non-duality

Content:

ajax said:

Not to suggest that there is no such thing as non-duality, no, of course not. The existence of non-duality is beyond questioning.

Namdrol said:

A) There is no such a thing as non-duality

B) The existene of non-duality is not beyond question in any sense.

N

Kyosan said:

Non-duality is part of Buddhism. It is taught in the Mahayana sutras, not just in the Zen literature. It is the middle way and it is beneficial because it helps beings overcome their attachments. It is also a term used to describe the underlying nature of all things.

Malcolm wrote:

Non-duality is not a thing. There is no non-dual thing or state and so on.

There is a difference between an absence of duality (Madhyamaka, and so on) and so called "non-duality".

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 23rd, 2011 at 2:03 AM

Title: Re: They killed him!

Content:

Sönam said:

But concerning Obama ... could he interfere? could he say, no it won't happen!, easy or not easy. If it was not for electoralist reasons, could he says no, as far as I am President no one will die from the death penalty? If he was a real great President, could he choose to act so?

Sönam

Malcolm wrote:

No, he can't do that. The death penalty was suspended in by the supreme court of the united states in 1972, and reauthorized by the supreme court in 1976.

It is a state by state issue and it is legal to execute prisoners for capital crimes outlined by the 1976 decision.

The President of the United States has no authority to end the death penalty unilaterally, even if he wanted to.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 22nd, 2011 at 10:35 PM

Title: Re: The brain and Dzogchen...

Content:

Namdrol said:

I don't see how -- concepts are the basic unit of measuring time in Buddhism. One concept lasts a kṣana, and a kṣana is 1/75th (00.0013) of a second.

Andrew108 said:

I'm not sure I understand. Do you mean to say that concepts are too quick to be brain-based?

Malcolm wrote:

No, neurons transmit about at .5 m/s, whereas a concept, according to this, last about 1.3 m/s.

The neurons responsible for thinking, which reside within the gray matter of the brain, are not myelinated. They are very thin, and transmit at speeds around 0.5 m/s.
<http://www.examiner.com/biology-in-chicago/how-fast-is-a-thought#ixzz1Ygy6U7fa> " onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

What I mean is that irrespective of whether a mind has appropriated a coarse physical body or not, this is how long a thought endures i.e. 1.3 milliseconds.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 22nd, 2011 at 10:27 PM

Title: Re: They killed him!

Content:

el_chupacabra said:

I think his name was Troy Davis btw

(not being able to find anything about Roy Davies I immediately suspected the news had chosen to bury the story!)

The jail stats for the U.S. are pretty incredible - 25% of the global jail population is in the U.S. and when you break it down according to colour/race the figures look even worse. On top of that is the work they do for very little money, its a form of legalized slavery.

Malcolm wrote:

Yup, prisons are big business in the US. But our large prison population is actually a sign of wealth. Poorer nations cannot afford to keep large incarcerated populations and they cannot afford the police forces that put them there.

This article explains a bit. Salient point:

...The United States, in fact, has relatively low rates of nonviolent crime. It has lower burglary and robbery rates than Australia, Canada and England.

People who commit nonviolent crimes in the rest of the world are less likely to receive prison time and certainly less likely to receive long sentences. The United States is, for instance, the only advanced country that incarcerates people for minor property crimes like passing bad checks, Whitman wrote.

<http://www.nytimes.com/2008/04/23/world/americas/23iht-23prison.12253738.html?pagewanted=all> " onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 22nd, 2011 at 10:19 PM

Title: Re: They killed him!

Content:

Sönam said:

http://www.rfi.fr/actuen/articles/104/article_1446.asp

Malcolm wrote:

That place is a condo compared to this:

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 22nd, 2011 at 10:07 PM

Title: Re: The brain and Dzogchen...

Content:

Sönam said:

As ChNN explains it clearly, brain is "only" a senses storage unit.

Andrew108 said:

Unfortunately I have to disagree. I think it is more than that. I think concepts are also brain-based. Would you agree?

Malcolm wrote:

I don't see how -- concepts are the basic unit of measuring time in Buddhism. One concept lasts a kṣana, and a kṣana is 1/75th (00.0013) of a second.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 22nd, 2011 at 10:04 PM

Title: Re: Me

Content:

Epistemes said:

The nuances of "me" are so incredibly subtle. The way some of you here on this forum write and answer questions displays an aspect of "me"-ness. Even our very usernames display that aspect. And more. It seems rather inescapable.

Malcolm wrote:

Buddhism is not about losing your personality. Buddhism is about getting over false thinking about it.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 22nd, 2011 at 9:16 PM

Title: Re: Zen and the dogma of non-duality

Content:

ajax said:

Not to suggest that there is no such thing as non-duality, no, of course not. The existence of non-duality is beyond questioning.

Malcolm wrote:

A) There is no such a thing as non-duality

B) The existene of non-duality is not beyond question in any sense.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 22nd, 2011 at 8:54 PM

Title: Re: Ka Dag Chen Po

Content:

Kai said:

Longchenpa seem to disagree:

Namdrol said:

There is a difference between ka dag and ka dag chen po.

Kai said:

Just to ask, for sake of verification, what is the verse from the tantra that specifically state the actual difference?

Malcolm wrote:

See above.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 22nd, 2011 at 8:49 PM

Title: Re: They killed him!

Content:

Sönam said:

USA is not the great country american citizen think it is ... that's a lie.

Malcolm wrote:
USA is pretty nice place to live, actually.

N

Author: Malcolm
Date: Thursday, September 22nd, 2011 at 4:58 AM
Title: Re: Wall Gazing
Content:
Astus said:
There is "wall contemplation" (biguan 壁觀) and there is "facing the wall" (mianbi 面壁).
In Bodhidharma's story the two becomes the same eventually. As for why in Soto Zen they rather sit facing the wall and how they call it, I do not know.

Malcolm wrote:
When translated into Tibetan, "faced a wall" was translated as "faced reality".

Author: Malcolm
Date: Thursday, September 22nd, 2011 at 2:43 AM
Title: Re: Chulen
Content:

AilurusFulgens said:
Namdrol, do there exist Tibetan texts, which would deal exclusively with Chulen?

In what way does the "religious" chulen differ from a yogic one? And how does a medical one differ from those two just mentioned?

Are the differences just in the substances employed or are there also some other factors at play?

A. Fulgens

Malcolm wrote:
As for question one:

Yes, many.

Long life practice combined with using blessed pills, without the benefit of the medical approach, is a kind of religious chulen.

Yogic chulen means working with prāṇāyāma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 22nd, 2011 at 1:24 AM

Title: Re: Buddhism on God

Content:

Hayagriva said:

But does God have a brain?

Malcolm wrote:

Well, Buddha does not have one apparently.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 22nd, 2011 at 1:23 AM

Title: Re: Schizophrenia and depression

Content:

Gyaltzen Tashi said:

Dear all,

What causes these mental illnesses - schizophrenia and depression? How are they treated in Tibetan medicine?

Regards,
Gyaltzen Tashi

Malcolm wrote:

There are many possible causes of depression. These will be treated according to their causes which are imbalances in the dośas (humors) caused by diet, behavior, season or spirits or a combination of these.

What western medicine terms "schizophrenia" will generally be considered a spirit induced disorder. This will be treated generally with massage, herbs, diet and lifestyle, depending on the type of spirit diagnosed.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 21st, 2011 at 9:14 PM

Title: Re: Chulen

Content:

Namdrol said:

If you are looking for mundane rasāyana, then taking Chavyanaprasha regularly is your best bet.

Epistemes said:

Can Chyavanprash be taken alongside Vimala?

Malcolm wrote:

yes

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 21st, 2011 at 8:13 PM

Title: Re: Ka Dag Chen Po

Content:

Kai said:

Longchenpa seem to disagree:

Malcolm wrote:

There is a difference between ka dag and ka dag chen po.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 21st, 2011 at 2:31 AM

Title: Re: The brain and Dzogchen...

Content:

Andrew108 said:

There is definitely a sense that the realization that matters is not really human - goes beyond or steps out of the space of human cognition.

Malcolm wrote:

Or, a buddha has a mind whose cognitive range exceeds that of ordinary persons and whose realization merely expands the potential of what human cognition is capable of.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 21st, 2011 at 2:27 AM

Title: Re: The brain and Dzogchen...

Content:

Andrew108 said:

In fact if we say something like timeless awareness

Malcolm wrote:

Please don't.

Translating ye shes as "timeless awareness" is terrible. "Ye shes" translates only the word jñāna.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 21st, 2011 at 1:21 AM

Title: Re: I am the director of the documentary TULKU. Ask me anything.

Content:

Chaz said:

Why can't a tulku live his or her life as they see fit and to hell with what everyone else wants?

Malcolm wrote:

Usually because there is money/power/property wrapped in tulku recognitions.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 21st, 2011 at 12:42 AM

Title: Re: The brain and Dzogchen...

Content:

Namdrol said:

Not only that, Longchenpa is held to have been a buddha. I have some of his brain relics. So clearly, these two Buddhas had brains. (can't believe I am having this conversation).

Andrew108 said:

Well do you have any Guru Rinpoche brain relics? To what extent was Longchenpa's brain a contributory factor in his enlightenment?

Malcolm wrote:

Very important -- I dare say that without he could not have engaged in the cultivating the three prajñā: hearing, reflection and cultivation. Not to mention his memory would have been terrible without a brain.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 21st, 2011 at 12:16 AM

Title: Re: The brain and Dzogchen...

Content:

Andrew108 said:

So does the practitioner who achieves 'great transformation body' and I'm thinking only of Guru Rinpoche and Garab Dorje still have a brain after this transformation?

Malcolm wrote:

Apparently the concept of a Buddha having a brain is non-controversial run a search on the following:

Buddha Kasyapa's Brain relics.

Not only that, Longchenpa is held to have been a buddha. I have some of his brain relics. So clearly, these two Buddhas had brains. (can't beleive I am having this conversation).

Furthermore, the Dzogchen tantras list a kind of ring sel, a ka ri ram, which is based on the brain and the nerves.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 21st, 2011 at 12:05 AM

Title: Re: The brain and Dzogchen...

Content:

Namdrol said:

A buddha without a human brain however is an impossibility since possession of a fully favored human body with all senses intact and functioning is a defined precondition for awakening.

Andrew108 said:

So was the buddha a buddha or a human?

Malcolm wrote:

The Buddha was a human being who fully awakened. Then he was a buddha. You can consider human beings to be larval buddhas, just as caterpillars are larval butterflies and moths.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 21st, 2011 at 12:04 AM

Title: Re: The brain and Dzogchen...

Content:

Andrew108 said:

@ your previous post - Yes that seems to be the case - however the point with the four visions is that they are experiences that infer rather than embody. You have experience of what it is like but until the body passes away you don't embody 'the inconceivable'.

Malcolm wrote:

That is completely not true. If it were, the so called "great transformation body" ['pho ba chen po] would not be possible. Your view is more similar to the Gelug interpretation of illusory body i.e. one needs to discard this gross body at the time of death etc. Such a view is definitely not the view of Dzogchen.

Andrew108 said:

The 4 visions are a body/brain-based simulacrum until the body passes.

Malcolm wrote:

This is also not how the four visions function according to the anatomy of Dzogchen.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 20th, 2011 at 11:56 PM

Title: Re: The brain and Dzogchen...

Content:

Andrew108 said:

A brain can't hold the knowledge of a buddha.

Malcolm wrote:

Why? This is a mere assertion on your part.

Why limit one part of a Buddha's sensory apparatus when you don't, for example, limit his tongue? A Buddha's tongue, according to reports, can see and hear. Why should a Buddha's brain be restricted to some limitation if the rest of his body is not?

The reason why buddhas are omniscient is that all objects of knowledge are illusory. Omniscience is not a function of memory addresses in a chip, after all. There should be no reason why having a human brain should limit a buddha at all. A buddha without a human brain however is an impossibility since possession of a fully favored human body with all senses intact and functioning is a defined precondition for awakening. It is also a defined precondition for receiving Vajrayāna empowerments. Why? If one's organs are damaged and incomplete, it is held that ones body mandala is incomplete and that one will not be able to fully awaken in a single lifetime via Vajrayāna methods.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 20th, 2011 at 11:48 PM

Title: Re: The brain and Dzogchen...

Content:

Andrew108 said:

That whatever my limited brain-based view perceives is not mistaken for the ultimate - and that would include the 4 visions.

Malcolm wrote:

The entire point of the detailed analysis of gestation in Dzogchen is to explain the physical development of the channels that make the four visions possible.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 20th, 2011 at 11:43 PM

Title: Re: The brain and Dzogchen...

Content:

AlexanderS said:

So is awakening possible in Dewachen? Of course I could suppose one has a body there too.

Malcolm wrote:

Even in sutra it is stated that in order to awaken one must be a human being. Therefore, embodiment in general is precondition of awakening; human embodiment is the specific precondition.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 20th, 2011 at 10:56 PM

Title: Re: The brain and Dzogchen...

Content:

AlexanderS said:

The 16th karmapa could teach meditation to birds. Apparently Thaye Dorje has also demonstrated this.

I honestly think some birds are more advanced meditators than I am

Point being, a bird with it's little brain can enter a state of samadhi apparently.

Malcolm wrote:

Samadhi is a mental factor present in all beings in the desire realm. So this is nothing surprising at all.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 20th, 2011 at 10:54 PM

Title: Re: The brain and Dzogchen...

Content:

Andrew108 said:

His enlightenment was not brain-based.

Malcolm wrote:

The Hevajra Tantra states the following:

Vajragarbha asked: "This yoga of the completion stage, its bliss is called great bliss, completion is not a meditation, so why do creation?”

The Bhagavan replied: “Incredible, the great bodhisattva has lost the power of faith.

Where does bliss come from without the existence of the body?

Such a bliss cannot be spoken of.

Bliss pervades all migrating beings in the form of pervaded and pervader;

just as the fragrance present in a flower, cannot be known without the flower’s existence.

In the same way, since form and so on won’t exist, also bliss itself won’t be perceived.

The Vajrayāna view of awakening is that awakening is very much based in the body as this passage from the Hevajra Tantra shows. The key to awakening in Vajrayāna in general is embodiment. The mind/matter dualism (ala Decartes) we find in sutra is superseded in Vajrayāna, that is the key to why Vajrayāna is more rapid.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 20th, 2011 at 10:06 PM

Title: Re: Pointing Out / Systematic Instruction

Content:

Astus said:

What I really admire in his approach - and Kagyu Mahamudra generally - is the detailed methodology they apply in this training.

Malcolm wrote:

Dzogchen etc., also have very detailed methodologies. They are just less sutra oriented.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 20th, 2011 at 9:55 PM

Title: Re: Benefits of Nagarjuna / Dangers of Existence & Non-Existence

Content:

Epistemes said:

I'm going to sound really stupid, but I'm here to learn, so:

When Nagarjuna says that there is no existence, is he claiming that the Earth, universe, and multi-verses do not exist in the sense that they cannot be sensually experienced? Or, is he, in a spirit of recognizing the universality of pratītyasamutpāda and sūnyatā, saying that the Earth, universe, and multi-verses do not intrinsically exist as such?

Malcolm wrote:

For Nāgārjuna, stating that things exist is a statement that they inherently exist.

Therefore, the only existence that Nāgārjuna was willing to grant phenomena was what we term a relative or nominal existence. Thus he is saying "...that the Earth, universe, and multi-verses do not intrinsically exist as such" "in a spirit of recognizing the universality of pratīyasamutpāda and sūnyatā".

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 20th, 2011 at 8:31 PM

Title: Re: The brain and Dzogchen...

Content:

Andrew108 said:

Any type of buddha.

Malcolm wrote:

I am pretty sure that Sakyamuni had a brain, just like he had a heart, lungs, liver, spleen, kidney, etc.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 20th, 2011 at 8:25 PM

Title: Re: The brain and Dzogchen...

Content:

Namdrol said:

Really? The Buddha had no brain?

Andrew108 said:

And Buddha Amitahba's brain is where?

Malcolm wrote:

Which type of Buddha are you talking about?

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 20th, 2011 at 8:05 PM

Title: Re: Lungta

Content:

rai said:

hi all,

need some tips and tricks what to do to raise the lungta (or what to avoid)! it seems i am going down with everything =D also i tried to understand the concept of Lungta relying on materials i've managed to find but still i have very vague idea so if you know any helpful materials, books in english it would be very appreciated.

thanks!

Malcolm wrote:
raise prayer flags on a proper day with a sang offering.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Tuesday, September 20th, 2011 at 8:04 PM
Title: The Buddha had no brain?
Content:
Andrew108 said:
in that buddhas don't have a brain.

Malcolm wrote:
Really? The Buddha had no brain?

(Awesome!)

Author: Malcolm
Date: Tuesday, September 20th, 2011 at 8:50 AM
Title: Re: Ka Dag Chen Po
Content:
Pero said:
Is there a difference with realization in dissolving into atoms? If one achieves the latter, is one a Buddha on the 16th bhumi as well? Or 13th at least?

Namdrol said:
Yes, there is a difference in realization. Someone who has this realization will return as a tulku. A Buddha of the sixteenth bhumi will not. Or so it is said.

Pero said:
But doesn't that mean that one can't get totally realized through trekcho alone? And consequentially one can't get totally realized through any of the other inner tantras since their completion stage is basically trekcho too?

Malcolm wrote:
The completion stages in the sarma tantras is not confined to tregchö.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 20th, 2011 at 4:08 AM

Title: Re: WOMPT & Sex

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

It is the first of the eight -- i.e. relying on an unqualified consort.

xylem said:

i'm curious which branch downfall so that i can ask my own teachers about this....

-xy

Zenda said:

Interesting. What does this mean for tantric practitioners who are married to someone from another faith tradition? Does this vary by school?

Namdrol said:

No, the vows are pretty consistent over all.

It means that they are constantly committing a branch downfall.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 20th, 2011 at 2:38 AM

Title: Re: WOMPT & Sex

Content:

Chaz said:

I haven't actually asked my Lama, but I'm pretty sure he's ok with my Wiccan wife - everybody else in the Sangha is. At least they haven't taken my Super-Secret Vajra Decoder Ring away yet.

Malcolm wrote:

There is hope for Wiccans. There is hope for anyone who likes to dance nude in the woods under full moons.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 20th, 2011 at 2:18 AM

Title: Re: Ka Dag Chen Po

Content:

Pero said:

Is there a difference with realization in dissolving into atoms? If one achieves the latter, is one a Buddha on the 16th bhumi as well? Or 13th at least?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, there is a difference in realization. Someone who has this realization will return as a tulku. A Buddha of the sixteenth bhumi will not. Or so it is said.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 20th, 2011 at 1:36 AM

Title: Re: Is Pure Land "Buddhism" contradictory to Buddhism?

Content:

alwayson said:

Pure Lands are just bardo experiences.

Huifeng said:

Reading these words is also a bardo experience.

Which bardo are you referring to?

Malcolm wrote:

Bardo of the time of death.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 20th, 2011 at 1:32 AM

Title: Re: WOMPT & Sex

Content:

Zenda said:

Interesting. What does this mean for tantric practitioners who are married to someone from another faith tradition? Does this vary by school?

Namdrol said:

No, the vows are pretty consistent over all.

It means that they are constantly committing a branch downfall.

Dhondrub said:

And here we go again... reminds me of good old e-sangha

Malcolm wrote:

This issue was not a big deal in Tibet, since everyone was a Vajrayāna initiate by the time they were ten.

In India, where these vows were elaborated, it was more important.

And naturally, some Vajrayāna practitioner married to a non-Buddhist is going to get all freaked out, get all angry, tell me I am wrong, that their Lama said it was ok, blah blah blah.

N

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 20th, 2011 at 1:21 AM

Title: Re: WOMPT & Sex

Content:

Zenda said:

Interesting. What does this mean for tantric practitioners who are married to someone from another faith tradition? Does this vary by school?

Malcolm wrote:

No, the vows are pretty consistent over all.

It means that they are constantly committing a branch downfall.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 20th, 2011 at 12:14 AM

Title: Re: The four kayas

Content:

conebeckham said:

As for the Sambhogakaya being the "physical body in its natural state," I don't think there is such a thing as the "Natural State of the Physical body." If you're talking about Light Bodies, then it's not really appropriate to say they are "physical," is it?

Malcolm wrote:

The rūpakāya is two fold. Rūpa here means material. Light is a part of matter since it is an object of the eye.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 19th, 2011 at 11:16 PM

Title: Re: Ka Dag Chen Po

Content:

Pero said:

...does this mean that Kadag Chenpo is attained only by completing the four visions?

Malcolm wrote:

Correct.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 19th, 2011 at 9:42 PM

Title: Re: The four kayas

Content:

AilurusFulgens said:

What is then the "Rainbow Body of Great Transference" as possessed by Padmasambhava in this trikaya-doctrine?

Where does it fit in?

Malcolm wrote:

Generally considered to be a sambhogakāya.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 19th, 2011 at 9:37 PM

Title: Re: Ka Dag Chen Po

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The Rig pa rang shar tantra states:

"Child of a good family, at the time of nirvana when wisdom moves in the sky from the appearance of wisdom rising up from the basis having slipped from grasp of the body, vidyā moves in the sky traveling through the pathway of the eye. Furthermore, it should be understood in the following way: the vidyā from the heart dissolves into a thigle. The thigle dissolves into a lamp. The lamp dissolves into light. The light dissolve into a form. The form dissolves into a cluster. The cluster dissolves into wisdom. Wisdom dissolves into natural formation (lhun grub). After natural formation dissolves into great original purity, the stages are complete. The appearance of the manner of dissolution and the manner of liberation of those persons who have seen the truth is just like that."

The Great Tantra of Beautiful Good Fortune states:
Since the reality of vidyā and dharmatā exist like the surface of a mirror, never being obscured by the condition of ignorance (avidyā) is called "great original purity".

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 19th, 2011 at 8:16 PM

Title: Re: The four kayas

Content:

Namdrol said:

These terms get used differently in Vajrayāna systems where the three kāyas are understood as different aspects of the nature of the mind, clarity, emptiness and the inseparability of the two.

Epistemes said:

What about svabhavikakaya? My understanding of it is that it is the highest (greatest) of all the kayas and incorporates the other three - which seems to be suggesting that svabhavikakaya is synonymous with actual Buddhahood.

Malcolm wrote:

It can be a name for the intrinsic identity of all three kāyas in Vajrayāna; in sutra, in general, it is a synonym of Dharmakāya.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 19th, 2011 at 8:49 AM

Title: Re: The four kayas

Content:

Epistemes said:

Can someone give me some reference point for understanding the four kayas?

I've read definitions, seen the terms used in context, etc., but they don't make much sense to me.

Malcolm wrote:

This is a species of Buddhist doceticism.

Dharmakāya, in brief, has several different versions. The basis version is that Dharmakāya is the complete realization of emptiness and the omniscience that springs from that realization.

Sambhogakāya is, in this basic version, rarified form body which exists outside samsara and is responsible primarily for communicating dharma to advanced bodhisattvas.

Nirmanakāya manifest to ordinary beings.

These terms get used differently in Vajrayāna systems where the three kāyas are understood as different aspects of the nature of the mind, clarity, emptiness and the inseparability of the two.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 19th, 2011 at 5:57 AM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

deepbluehum said:

...I have been drinking green smoothies and eating greens, fruits, nuts and seeds for long enough to attribute strong confidence to my account.

Namdrol said:

I predict you will have a variety of vata disorders before too long, with all due respect.

N

deepbluehum said:

It would have happened by now. Besides, I don't need cooked foods to fix a vata disorder. Raw organic cumin, cayenne, ginger and other hot plants will do.

Malcolm wrote:

It's not that simple. I wish it were.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 19th, 2011 at 4:35 AM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

deepbluehum said:

...I have been drinking green smoothies and eating greens, fruits, nuts and seeds for long enough to attribute strong confidence to my account.

Malcolm wrote:

I predict you will have a variety of vata disorders before too long, with all due respect.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 19th, 2011 at 3:24 AM

Title: Re: WOMPT & Sex

Content:

Namdrol said:

It is a branch downfall to regard a consort who has not been ripened by empowerment as deity.

Kelwin said:

Yup, I know that, but I find that difficult to combine with other instructions. How could I possibly have sex in a state of awareness and not regard my girlfriend to be a deity? What distinction am I missing here?

Malcolm wrote:

Ultimately it means that tantric Buddhists should not have sexual partners who are not also practitioners.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 19th, 2011 at 2:17 AM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

deepbluehum said:

Raw plant foods only is an excellent support for dharma practice.

Malcolm wrote:

This diet is not good for Dharma practice since it is bad for one's health, from a Tibetan Medical POV.

Virtually all plant foods need to be cooked before eaten, or eaten with digestive enhancements like vinegar and oil, as in a salad.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 19th, 2011 at 2:13 AM

Title: Re: WOMPT & Sex

Content:

Kelwin said:

1) How would you respond to Adamantine saying earlier that 'If I understand and remember correctly one of the tantric vows involves avoiding falling into the trap of pretending one or one's partner is deity and thinking of ordinary sex as leading to enlightenment, etc..?'

Malcolm wrote:

It is a branch downfall to regard a consort who has not been ripened by empowerment as deity.

Kelwin said:

2) If the yoga of passion (which is a new term to me) is creation stage only, does this answer still apply for those doing completion stage practices?

3) Would the choice of orifice not have a significant effect on inner energies being exchanged?

Malcolm wrote:

There is no "exchange" of energy in the yoga of passion.

The yoga of passion is a term from Lamdre, BTW. But it can be applied across the board to any anuttarayoga tantra practice. For example, in Cakrasamvara, ordinary intercourse without the three perceptions is a downfall.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 19th, 2011 at 2:11 AM

Title: Re: WOMPT & Sex

Content:

Namdrol said:

The yoga of passion is not connected with the completion stage, it is connected with the creation stage, so there is no need to worry about losing semen and so on.

wayland said:

Hi Namdrol,

Isn't it the case that emission of semen expels the 'essence' of deities which reside at points within the subtle body of the practitioner? Does it not contravene tantric vows?

Malcolm wrote:

No. If that were true, then defecation and urination would also be a problem. Semen, like feces and urine, is a waste product.

No, not in general. However if one is engaged in karma mudra practice and so on, it does. Tantric vows are different for people doing different practices.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, September 18th, 2011 at 9:00 PM

Title: Re: WOMPT & Sex

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

If you are a lay tantric practitioner you need to practice the yoga of passion, perceiving yourself as a heruka and your partner as a dakini (for example, Kalacakra and Vishvamata). The yoga of passion is not connected with the completion stage, it is connected with the creation stage, so there is no need to worry about losing semen and so on.

As far as which orifice, etc., this is mainly a sutrayāna affair. There are no restrictions for a practitioner practicing the yoga of passion. The body of a deity is completely pure.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 17th, 2011 at 8:08 AM

Title: Re: Chronic Gastritis

Content:

AdmiralUim said:

Have you connected this inflammation to any types of food?

What time of day/ which meal to you experience it?

Before or during meals, immediately after meals, or after digesting a meal (about an hour)?

It never completely goes away. I have noticed that fatty foods upset it, specifically milk and cheese and mince, although I have noticed if the milk is used in something cooked (porridge or sauces) it doesn't have the same impact. I have also bizarrely noticed that it gets worse if I am around people who are wearing strong perfume/aftershave. I get it the worst after digesting meal a but it can happen during a meal or before too.

Malcolm wrote:

I think you should investigate whether you have a food "allergy".

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 17th, 2011 at 7:06 AM

Title: Re: Getting Real, Getting Dirty

Content:

xylem said:

people shouldn't have affairs with people in the sangha.

Malcolm wrote:

I assume by "affair" here you mean consensual relations between adults who are not otherwise in relationships already?

If so, then I think you are being very extreme.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 17th, 2011 at 3:22 AM

Title: Re: Getting Real, Getting Dirty

Content:

Namdrol said:

PC Buddhism, yuck, spare me.

kirtu said:

What's PC about no hitting on people and trying to be welcoming to everyone and not making women do most of the cleaning?

Kirt

Malcolm wrote:

First of all, Buddhists, male and female, have a hard enough time getting laid.

Secondly, woman do most of the cleaning because men are slob. It is not a plot. Woman, in general, have different needs around neatness than men do. Proof? Men's bathrooms and women's bathrooms.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 17th, 2011 at 2:34 AM

Title: Re: Christian explorations of Rainbow Body

Content:

deepbluehum said:

That's apparently open to interpretation.

Malcolm wrote:
No, it isn't.

deepbluehum said:
Rainbow Body is irrelevant for some in these schools.

Malcolm wrote:
Rainbow body is a central concern in Lamdre as well as Yogini.

It is also a central topic in Cakrasamvara literature as well.

This is heading off topic.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Saturday, September 17th, 2011 at 2:25 AM
Title: Re: Renounced Catholicism
Content:
alwayson said:
Yes exactly what are the prerequisites for webcast transmission?

Malcolm wrote:
You sign on.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Saturday, September 17th, 2011 at 2:03 AM
Title: Re: Christian explorations of Rainbow Body
Content:
deepbluehum said:
Please keep in mind that the concept of Rainbow Body is only of particular importance to Dzogchen. Few other teachings lineages discuss it.

Namdrol said:
Not so, it is discussed in Kagyu and Sakya as well.

deepbluehum said:
True. I should have said "made into a core teaching."

Malcolm wrote:
It is a core teaching of Kagyu and Sakya as well.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 17th, 2011 at 2:03 AM

Title: Re: Renounced Catholicism

Content:

Dechen Norbu said:

I'm too a student of Chogyal Namhkai Norbu and what you say is over simplistic and, in fact, pretty far from what he teaches.

Epistemes said:

What does he teach?

Malcolm wrote:

He is a teacher of Dzogchen. Very famous, has a number of books Crystal and the Way of Light being chief among them. He is one of my main teachers.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 17th, 2011 at 2:00 AM

Title: Re: Chronic Gastritis

Content:

AdmiraUim said:

Do you have acid reflux?

when do you eat, what do you eat, how do you eat it?

?

No I don't have acid reflux. I eat three meals a day. For breakfast I eat toast and porridge (around 7am/8am), for lunch (between 12-2pm) light soup or sushi. My main meal at night (8 or 9pm), I eat a variety of things from indian/asian cooking. but usually chicken or red meat and at the weekends i eat quite lightly so usually a veg stir fry for a main meal.

Malcolm wrote:

Have you connected this inflammation to any types of food?

What time of day/ which meal to you experience it?

Before or during meals, immediately after meals, or after digesting a meal (about an hour)?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 17th, 2011 at 1:23 AM

Title: Re: Chronic Gastritis

Content:

AdmiraJim said:

I am wondering there are any dietary changes which you would recommend to help with this condition. The doctors do not know what is causing my chronic stomach inflammation as I don't drink any alcohol or smoke and I am negative for a common bacteria that causes stomach inflammation. I have been told I will have good and bad days and given a leaflet on indigestion which isn't even gastritis grrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrr

Malcolm wrote:

Do you have acid reflux?

when do you eat, what do you eat, how do you eat it?

?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 17th, 2011 at 1:21 AM

Title: Re: Air's function

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Not to my knowledge, no.

Virgo said:

In a general sense, does the element of air ever perform the function of "pulling" per se? I know air usually has to do with movement and that is has a quality of "pushing" (or is it displacing?) due to it's function of manifesting as pressure.

I know there is the downward-clearing wind in the body, and at other times other winds move "downward" but does the wind ever perform the function of "pulling", ie. acting as a force or in conjunction with other forces to pull something to a certain destination. Pulling (attracting, bringing, causing something to tag along) it seems, would be different from pushing (repelling, moving something towards something else based on pressure exerted).

I ask this question because I am trying to understanding physics a little better (especially gravity as explained in Einsteins Theories) from the perspective of the elements.

Kevin

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 17th, 2011 at 12:56 AM

Title: Re: Getting Real, Getting Dirty

Content:

Malcolm wrote:
PC Buddhism, yuck, spare me.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Saturday, September 17th, 2011 at 12:55 AM
Title: Re: Is crying healthy?
Content:
Epistemes said:
A Buddhist discussion board is probably the most inane place to post a thing like this...

...but Western centers for natural healing claim that crying is a sign of emotional healthiness.

Crying most surely is a sign of attachment and samsara, as the Buddha indicates, but what if it's physically healthy?

Malcolm wrote:
Like any physical function supressing the urge is not healthy, forcing it is also not healthy.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Saturday, September 17th, 2011 at 12:54 AM
Title: Re: Christian explorations of Rainbow Body
Content:
deepbluehum said:
Please keep in mind that the concept of Rainbow Body is only of particular importance to Dzogchen. Few other teachings lineages discuss it.

Malcolm wrote:
Not so, it is discussed in Kagyu and Sakya as well.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Friday, September 16th, 2011 at 11:17 PM
Title: Re: Prayers for my girlfriend
Content:
Epistemes said:
Please continue your prayers to the medicine Buddha, as I cannot.

She still suffers.

Namdrol said:
Medicine Buddha's dharani:

Oṃ namo bhagavate bhaiṣajye guru vaiḍūryaprabharājāya tathāgatāya arhate saṃyak saṃbuddhāya tadyathā oṃ bhaiṣajye bhaiṣajye mahā bhaiṣajye rājā samudgate svāhā

Anyone can recite this.

Epistemes said:

"Cannot" not just being privilege, but ability (those are some odd words) and understanding of what's being said.

Malcolm wrote:

Oṃ — auspicious

Namo — homage

Bhagavate — transcendent conquerer bhaiṣajye guru — guru of physicians vaiḍūryaprabharājāya — to the king of sapphire light tathāgatāya — to the tathagata

arhate — the arhat

saṃyak saṃbuddhāya — to the true perfect buddha tadyathā — thus

Oṃ — as above

bhaiṣajye bhaiṣajye — physician, physician, mahā — great bhaiṣajyerāja — king of physicians samudgate — his special power heals disease

svāhā — well established

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 16th, 2011 at 10:15 PM

Title: Re: Prayers for my girlfriend

Content:

Epistemes said:

Please continue your prayers to the medicine Buddha, as I cannot.

She still suffers.

Malcolm wrote:

Medicine Buddha's dharani:

Oṃ namo bhagavate bhaiṣajye guru vaiḍūryaprabharājāya tathāgatāya arhate saṃyak saṃbuddhāya tadyathā oṃ bhaiṣajye bhaiṣajye mahā bhaiṣajye rājā samudgate svāhā

Anyone can recite this.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 16th, 2011 at 7:47 PM

Title: Re: Christian explorations of Rainbow Body

Content:

Epistemes said:

I'm not incredibly sure what to make of this. It's the first I've ever heard of such a phenomenon, and I can't quite see how such a phenomenon fits within a Buddhist view of life, death, humanity and the cosmos.

http://www.snowlionpub.com/pages/N59_9.html "
onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

Malcolm wrote:

The notion of rainbow body is tied up with tantric concepts about the human body and the four elements which constitute it.

At basis is the idea that at the most subtle level, relatively speaking, physical matter exists as light which we reify as solid matter. When we have remove the afflictions that obscure our vision of reality, ordinary phenomena, including our own bodies, are revealed to us as compositions of dynamic light-energy and we become free of course matter since we no longer reify it.

This is possible because everything is empty, insubstantial and not real.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 16th, 2011 at 7:06 PM

Title: Re: Chulen

Content:

rai said:

is the idea of rasāyana that we are eating more of things like chulen or Chavyanaprasha and less normal food?

Malcolm wrote:

The Ayurvedic/Tibetan medical idea of rasayāna is that one does a week long cleanse; then one relies on a very pure diet combined with a rasayāna preparation like Chavyanaprash.

There is also a more "religious" idea of chulen, where one, having done a similar cleanse, relies on a practice such as White Tara, Amitayus, or Mandarava combined with special chulen pills.

Finally, there are yogic chulens that depend mainly on prāṇāyama exercises.

One can consider these outer, inner and secret rasāyanas. The use of these depends on one's health and needs.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 16th, 2011 at 9:31 AM

Title: Re: why did you 'guess' buddhism?

Content:

tobes said:

So maybe you're playing some upaya game here, or maybe you hold two opposing positions: one when you argue within the discourse of Madhyamaka and one when you talk about Madhyamaka.

Malcolm wrote:

When trying to direct people to the correct aisle in a grocery store so they can buy beans, I don't send them to the meat counter.

Likewise, when trying direct people to where they can find the eight fold path, I don't send them to Santeria or Taoism, since they won't find it there.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 16th, 2011 at 9:29 AM

Title: Re: why did you 'guess' buddhism?

Content:

tobes said:

It's neither pointless nor semantic: you know very well that it is utterly arbitrary which place you put apples and which place you put oranges.

Malcolm wrote:

For intellectuals who pointlessly like to quibble with others it is arbitrary. For grocers, it is practical to place apples with apples and oranges with oranges.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 16th, 2011 at 9:16 AM

Title: Re: Logical Fallacies

Content:

el_chupacabra said:

That seems a strange reading to me.

Malcolm wrote:

It is nevertheless, the correct one, and the only one that rescues Nāgārjuna from the fetter of being accused of being a terrible logician. In fact, the catuṣkoṭi is not all that important in Madhyamaka -- too much of it has been made by Western enthusiasts of Nāgārjuna.

In fact, the whole eight-fold negation of the mangalam is predicated on the fact that dependently arisen phenomena do not in fact arise, hence Nāgārjuna says of dependent origination: not ceasing, not arising, etc., when he praise the Buddha for teaching dependent origination.

Since phenomena do not arise , here again is a cascading negation of the other seven possibilities. If there is no arising, there can be no cessation, permanence, impermanence and so on.

In reality it is very simple, but if one should approach these texts with the wrong set of assumptions about language and so on, they will seem very strange and illogical. If you approach them with the correct set of assumptions about language (i.e. Nāgārjuna's) based on a close read of the texts in either Sanskrit or Tibetan, freed from the constraints of later Tibetan polemics or later Sino-Japanese Buddhist metaphysical speculations ala tathāgatagarbha, it is all very straight forward and somewhat boring.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 16th, 2011 at 8:47 AM

Title: Re: Chulen

Content:

Epistemes said:

Could this replace a daily multivitamin?

Malcolm wrote:

Definitely.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 16th, 2011 at 8:29 AM

Title: Re: Logical Fallacies

Content:

Kyosan said:

All dharmas (things) are neither existent nor nonexistent.

Namdrol said:

The statement means that dharmas do not come into existence in the first place, therefore, they cannot perish and become non-existent. It is not a dialectical statement, but one meant to show that the categories of existent and non-existent do not apply to dependently originated phenomena.

el_chupacabra said:

erm... isn't this exactly the fourth proposition in Nagarjuna's dialectic?

Malcolm wrote:

No, since Nāgārjuna is not asserting some phenomena either exists nor does not exist.

The point is since no phenomena have arisen in reality there are no phenomena to which any of the four predicates in catuṣkoṭi may be applied.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 16th, 2011 at 7:59 AM

Title: Re: Logical Fallacies

Content:

Kyosan said:

The original statement itself is logically inconsistent. Because existent and nonexistent are mutually exclusive, they can't both be either true or false according to formal logic.

el_chupacabra said:

Yes, according to formal logic either something is true or not. Dialectical logic adds the two other propositions of "both" or "neither".

Malcolm wrote:

The Catuṣkoṭi establishes a cascading negation where both and neither are also not true since a truth was not established to begin with.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 16th, 2011 at 7:58 AM

Title: Re: Logical Fallacies

Content:

Namdrol said:

The statement means that dharmas do not come into existence in the first place, therefore, they cannot perish and become non-existent. It is not a dialectical statement, but one meant to show that the categories of existent and non-existent do not apply to dependently originated phenomena.

It is perfectly logical when you understand the assumptions upon which it is drawing.

Context is King.

el_chupacabra said:

yes, but that original assertion is not based simply upon assumption, the context was established through reasoning using the method of catuṣkoṭi - four members in a relation of exclusive disjunction - to which simple formal logic is inadequate.

The key phrase is "understanding of the parts requires understanding their relationship with the whole system" - a method used by the Buddha and by Nagarjuna to great effect, after all, why exclude the idea of dependent origination in the methodology itself?

Malcolm wrote:

The Caturskoti itself is based on assumptions about language and meaning, that is why it is failure when subjected to formal logic as a simple formal statement i.e. $\neg(x, \neg x, x+\neg x), \neg(x+\neg x))$.

However, the first statement (x) of the Caturskoti is not established, there is a cascading negation. This has to do with the linguistic parameters Nāgārjuna frames existence and non-existence in, in chapter 15 where he states quite explicitly that a non-existent is what people commonly call an existent that has changed its state into something else.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 16th, 2011 at 6:18 AM

Title: Re: Logical Fallacies

Content:

Kyosan said:

All dharmas (things) are neither existent nor nonexistent.

This statement is logically inconsistent. But in Buddhism, it points to the middle way. It says that existing and non-existing are invented in our minds. It points to suchness and helps free beings from sufferings.

el_chupacabra said:

Importantly in this case, dialectical logic differs from formal logic.

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Dialectic#Dialectical_method_and_dualism "
onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

"Another way to understand dialectics is to view it as a method of thinking to overcome formal dualism and monistic reductionism. For example, formal dualism regards the opposites as mutually exclusive entities, whilst monism finds each to be an epiphenomenon of the other. Dialectical thinking rejects both views...In the dialectical method, both have something in common, and understanding of the parts requires understanding their relationship with the whole system. The dialectical method thus views the whole of reality as an evolving process."

Malcolm wrote:

It is also not a dialectical statement -- context is everything.

The statement means that dharmas do not come into existence in the first place, therefore, they cannot perish and become non-existent. It is not a dialectical statement, but one meant to show that the categories of existent and non-existent do not apply to dependently originated phenomena.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 16th, 2011 at 5:25 AM

Title: Re: How do you know if you've recognized rigpa?

Content:

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

Neither what I said nor secret refuge is a "method" since nothing in dzogchen is causal. The path in dzogchen is not based on causality, but on lhundrub, spontaneity. Rigpa sees that even the stains, confusions and obscurations of samsara were always katak, pure, and lhundrub, perfect, because nirvana and samsara are both of the nature of the Base and the Base always and forever has been katak and lhundrub.

Namdrol said:

No, this is actually not correct. In order for there to be samsara in the basis, there must be ignorance in the basis. But there isn't. This is why it is said that basis is originally pure [ka dag]. The Rosary of Pearls tantra states:

The mere term delusion cannot be described within the original purity of the initial state,

likewise, how can there be non-delusion?

Therefore, pure of delusion from the beginning.

What you have presented above is a common mahamudra misunderstanding of what "basis" means in Dzogchen.

What you describe is the kun gzhi [ālaya] of the Mahāmudra teachings, not the "gzhi" (sthana) of Dogchen teachings.

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

Unfortunately I know nothing about mahamudra. Ok, now: what I am understanding from this is that I can't say that nirvana and samsara are in the base since the base is empty of both wisdom and confusion from the start - is that more or less correct?

Malcolm wrote:

What exists in the basis is the three wisdoms of the basis, essence, nature and compassion.

Ignorance has never existed in the basis, per se. Therefore, it is inappropriate to state that either samsara or nirvana have existed or will ever exist in the basis. Ignorance (ma rig pa) means not knowing what the basis is. Rig pa is knowing (rig pa) what the basis is. Realization means becoming integrated with that knowledge.

Original purity means that there has never been a time when the basis was ever stained in anyway.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 16th, 2011 at 4:39 AM

Title: Re: Logical Fallacies

Content:

Kyosan said:

All dharmas (things) are neither existent nor nonexistent.

This statement is logically inconsistent. But in Buddhism, it points to the middle way. It says that existing and non-existing are invented in our minds. It points to suchness and helps free beings from sufferings.

Malcolm wrote:

It is perfectly logical when you understand the assumptions upon which it is drawing.
Context is King.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 16th, 2011 at 3:48 AM

Title: Re: How do you know if you've recognized rigpa?

Content:

deepbluehum said:

lol this is teaching a method; where are you going with this?

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

Neither what I said nor secret refuge is a "method" since nothing in dzogchen is causal. The path in dzogchen is not based on causality, but on lhundrub, spontaneity. Rigpa sees that even the stains, confusions and obscurations of samsara were always katak, pure, and lhundrub, perfect, because nirvana and samsara are both of the nature of the Base and the Base always and forever has been katak and lhundrub.

Malcolm wrote:

No, this is actually not correct. In order for there to be samsara in the basis, there must be ignorance in the basis. But there isn't. This is why it is said that basis is originally pure [ka dag]. The Rosary of Pearls tantra states:

The mere term delusion cannot be described within the original purity of the initial state,

likewise, how can there be non-delusion?
Therefore, pure of delusion from the beginning.

What you have presented above is a common mahamudra misunderstanding of what "basis" means in Dzogchen.

What you describe is the kun gzhi [ālaya] of the Mahāmudra teachings, not the "gzhi" (sthana) of Dogchen teachings.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 16th, 2011 at 3:02 AM

Title: Re: Yidam and Dzogchen

Content:

Kai said:

Jamgon Kongtrul is a great Kagyu master but He is a famed Dzogchen master, so His conclusion can't be far away from the truth and it also resolves certain "dilemmas" in this thread.

Malcolm wrote:

There are two systems. One in which the sixteen bhumis directly correspond with the thirteen bhumis + three. Another where the bhumis are given as descriptive names for experiences through the four visions.

They are both correct explanations.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 16th, 2011 at 2:58 AM

Title: Re: How do you know if you've recognized rigpa?

Content:

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

No duality to become free of in the first place.

Chögyäl Namkhai Norbu relates that once someone asked the famous Dzogchen Master, Yungtön Dorje Pel, what his practice consisted of, and he replied with the negative "mepa" or "there isn't."

Elias Capriles

deepbluehum said:

Quotes like this are often taken out of context, because this quote refers to the practice of nonmeditation and no one will ever know what this means without instructions and blessings from the lineage. Your comments re paths of renunciation, transformation and self-liberation are innaposite.

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

No-one can "know" what non-meditation means by being "instructed" about it or via "blessings". This is the whole point of direct introduction - it can only be realized directly in that moment when my mind is united with my guru's mind. In transformation we still receive "instructions" and "blessings". Not in self-liberation. Are you saying that self-liberation is a causal path?

Malcolm wrote:

no, he is saying that a guru is a requirement.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 16th, 2011 at 2:55 AM

Title: Re: Re Death & Wind, Bile, Phlegm

Content:

pemachophel said:

Got it. Thank you.

Malcolm wrote:

I.e. ultimately, Dharma is the best medicine, and awakening is perfect health.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 16th, 2011 at 1:26 AM

Title: Re: How do you know if you've recognized rigpa?

Content:

deepbluehum said:

I can't agree. The recognition is not always already there and must be recognized utilizing a method that must be taught.

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

IMHO the path in dzogchen is not "try to recognize", that is a path of renunciation or path of transformation path - the path in dzogchen is remaining without doubt, having received direct introduction.

Malcolm wrote:

Direct introduction is not a great translation, in actuality. The phrase is "ngo rang thog du sprad" which means more like "a direct self-encounter with [one's] state [lit. face]".

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 16th, 2011 at 12:56 AM

Title: Re: Kali Yuga

Content:

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

Sometimes I have intuitions though that the world is progressing toward a point of greater awakening. Is this just romantic BS or is it real?

Malcolm wrote:

In my opinion, romanticism.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 15th, 2011 at 11:57 PM

Title: Re: Angioedema

Content:

Epistemes said:

My partner has angioedema, including hives and swelling in the fingers and toes. Does TM cover how to treat something like this?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, seeing a Tibetan doctor may be of some benefit. Exact treatment would depend on a whole host of factors I cannot begin to predict.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 15th, 2011 at 11:26 PM

Title: Re: Chulen

Content:

alwayson said:

Can a nonpractitioner take these pills?

If so, what are the highest quality chulen pills on the market?

Malcolm wrote:

If you are looking for mundane rasāyana, then taking Chavyanaprasha regularly is your best bet.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 15th, 2011 at 11:25 PM

Title: Re: Mantra & Medicine

Content:

dakini_boi said:

I'm wondering, what makes a mantra particularly effective in treating physical imbalances? For example, the vajra armor mantra is supposed to be effective to treat the "404 diseases" - is this presumably because it repels the 8 classes of spirits? If this is the case, then wouldn't Dorje Drollo or Vajrakilaya practice be just as effective? Yet I know that accomplished Vajrakilaya or Dorje Drollo siddhas may still do vajra armor for "healing" purposes.

Another question is - in what case(s) is mantra sufficient alone for healing, and in what case(s) are physical medicines also required - how would a Tibetan doctor determine this?

Thank you

Malcolm wrote:

You can use the mani for healing, if you are a mani siddha. All mantras ultimately can be used for healing. But some mantras have a specialized function for this, and Vajra armor is one such mantra.

If you go to a Tibetan doctor, one assumes that your mantra is not working so well.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 15th, 2011 at 10:45 PM

Title: Re: Re Death & Wind, Bile, Phlegm

Content:

pemachophel said:

Namdrol,

When one dies and is reborn, are any imbalances in the wind, bile, and phlegm wiped clean and one starts again with these in relative balance, or does the imbalance that led to death (assuming the death was due to disease) in some way carry on? IOW, does a propensity for a certain type of imbalance carry on from life to life? Any clarification on this issue would be much appreciated.

Malcolm wrote:

According to Tibetan medicine, imbalances in the three doṣas, vata, pitta and kapha, come from the afflictions of desire, hatred and ignorance. Thus, as long as one has three afflictions there will always be imbalances in three doṣas. Not all people have the same mix of afflictions, and hence in some people vata disorders will be stronger, and so on.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 15th, 2011 at 10:01 PM

Title: Re: What Tibetan med is this?

Content:

threebit3 said:

Does anyone know a traditional Tibetan med, round pill, that has a white outer coating on it? I took it only on the full moon.

Malcolm wrote:

Some kind of precious pill.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 15th, 2011 at 7:27 PM

Title: Re: why did you 'guess' buddhism?

Content:

catmoon said:

If your idea above were correct, then any beginner should swiftly attain enlightenment by simply recalling past lives. It just doesn't hang together.

Malcolm wrote:

Actually, this is what that Buddha himself describes.

Now, in order to recall past lives, one has to become an excellent meditator. The recall of past lives is one of the five mundane abhijñās (mundane because you do not need to be an awakened person to possess them) that arise because of developing skill in dhyana.

Of course, this suggests that a person has received teachings from a buddha in the past. Lacking that, one will never figure out the Dharma on one's own. Why? Because one cannot pull oneself out of samsara by one's bootstraps, as it were.

All Buddhas of the past had gurus. All buddhas of the future will have had gurus. All buddhas of the present had gurus.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 15th, 2011 at 7:17 PM

Title: Re: 100 Syllable Mantra SUPO KAYO ME BHAVA

Content:

catmoon said:

So, why not recite mantras in English? The ancient Indians used the common language of the day, why shouldn't we? When the mantras were composed, people would not have considered Sanskrit any less mundane than we consider English.

Malcolm wrote:

Mantras are constructed according to very specific rules. They are not just "phrases in Sanskrit".

Mantras have their roots in a very specific notion of language.

As for mantras being in English, parts of mantras can be, parts of mantras that were translated in Tibetan, for example.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 15th, 2011 at 7:07 PM

Title: Re: Yidam and Dzogchen

Content:

Namdrol said:

Whether they can bring one to the state of perfect buddhahood, however, is a different story. Indirectly, all are capable of doing so. Only the three inner yanas can do so in a single lifetime.

Kai said:

Hmmm, I'm sure that not long ago, you mentioned that only one yana (Dzogchen Upadesha/Mennagade or Longde) can bring one to the Perfect Buddhahood while the rest are only temporal Buddhahood and are hence reversible. No? Or a change in stance?

Malcolm wrote:

From the thirteenth bhumi onwards, they are stages of "abiding in wisdom". Presuming one manages to attain the thirteen bhumi, it is unlikely that one's realization will be blocked.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 15th, 2011 at 6:07 AM

Title: Re: Ojas

Content:

rai said:

Maybe this is stupid question but is there any connection between Ojas and Lungta?

Thank you!

Malcolm wrote:
Not directly.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Thursday, September 15th, 2011 at 4:59 AM
Title: Re: Tonglen: For the novice?
Content:
Namdrol said:
No one can ever take of the sufferings others since no one can take on the karma of others.

deepbluehum said:
This is a very excellent point, but someone practicing this can experience increased suffering and an increase in the five poisons.

Malcolm wrote:
I don't agree with this claim.

Sending and receiving is an inherently virtuous act. There is no way that this practice can increase one's own suffering since the wish to relieve others of their suffering is inherently virtuous and a negative result can never stem from a virtuous act.

N

Author: Malcolm
Date: Thursday, September 15th, 2011 at 4:12 AM
Title: Re: Tonglen: For the novice?
Content:
Malcolm wrote:
No one can ever take of the sufferings others since no one can take on the karma of others.

The purpose of exchanging oneself and others is develop the courage to deal with helping people in samsara. But there is no danger that one will ever actually take on the suffering of others from this or any other Buddhist practice.

N

Author: Malcolm
Date: Thursday, September 15th, 2011 at 1:54 AM
Title: Re: Difference between recognizing rigpa & realizing emptiness?
Content:
Pero said:
Hmm, but if that is so, creation stage alone would be sufficient to achieve Buddhahood

no?

Namdrol said:

No. Why? The creation stage can only bring one to the sixth bodhisattva bhumi. To progress further, the completion stage, therefore, is indispensable.

Pero said:

Ah I see. But what does completion stage have that creation stage doesn't then? And also, what about common Mahayana which has no creation/completion?

Malcolm wrote:

Completion stage contains the rapid methods to eradicate the remaining knowledge obscurations as well as remove the subtle subtle afflictive obscuration required to move from the impure bhumis to the pure bhumis.

In common mahāyāna it takes two incalculable eons to attain the pure bhumis and a one more bhumi to traverse the three pure bhumis, since the only available methods for eradicating the two obscurations are the practice of the six or ten perfections.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 15th, 2011 at 1:27 AM

Title: Re: Difference between recognizing rigpa & realizing emptiness?

Content:

Pero said:

What do you mean by emptiness here? Path of Seeing?

Namdrol said:

Yes.

Pero said:

Hmm, but if that is so, creation stage alone would be sufficient to achieve Buddhahood no?

Malcolm wrote:

No. Why? The creation stage can only bring one to the sixth bodhisattva bhumi. To progress further, the completion stage, therefore, is indispensable.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 15th, 2011 at 1:25 AM

Title: Re: Yidam and Dzogchen

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Basically there are, in the terminology of Dzogchen itself, three classes of vehicles; vehicles of the cause (śrāvaka through bodhisattvayānas), vehicles of the result (kriya tantra through anuyoga), and the vehicle beyond cause and result i.e. Dzogchen.

We can classify them by path as well, renunciation, transformation and self-liberation.

Each vehicle is so called because it offers a complete path to liberation. One can attain the stature of an ārya through any one of the nine vehicles. In this respect, all nine vehicles stand alone and are independent from one another and may be taught as self-sufficient paths.

So, it is an error to assert that Dzogchen is a separate vehicle, but the others are not. All nine vehicles have the necessary teachings to bring someone to the state of being an ārya.

Whether they can bring one to the state of perfect buddhahood, however, is a different story. Indirectly, all are capable of doing so. Only the three inner yanas can do so in a single lifetime.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 15th, 2011 at 1:17 AM

Title: Re: Difference between recognizing rigpa & realizing emptiness?

Content:

alwayson said:

Althought he won't confirm it, I believe for Namdrol:

Realizing emptiness = the famous Clear Light OR fourth consecration

In other words it is a high tantric attainment. This is the only thing that makes sense based on his comment regarding tummo.

Namdrol said:

No, emptiness can be realized on the basis of the creation stage alone.

Pero said:

What do you mean by emptiness here? Path of Seeing?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 15th, 2011 at 1:10 AM

Title: Re: Yidam and Dzogchen

Content:

alwayson said:

Namdrol doesn't think Dzogchen Upadesha / Mennagade is part of "regular" Vajrayana and disagrees with the standard nine yanas classification of the Nyingmas.

Dzogchen Upadesha is an independent Buddhist vehicle.

heart said:

With all respect to Namdrol I will side with the mainstream Nyingmas in this matter. You are of course free to believe whatever you want.

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

Hi Magnus:

There have been epochs, traditionally speaking, where only the teaching of Dzogchen has been taught, and nothing else. In this respect, then, Dzogchen must be considered an independent and separate vehicle.

It can also be taught as the apogee of the nine yanas.

In our world system, Dzogchen is part of Vajrayana, in general.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 15th, 2011 at 12:39 AM

Title: Re: Difference between recognizing rigpa & realizing emptiness?

Content:

alwayson said:

In that case I bow out.

I will never understand this shit.

Malcolm wrote:

it is just faster when combined with the completion stage.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 15th, 2011 at 12:31 AM

Title: Re: Prostrations - slowly or quickly?

Content:

nirmal said:

]Bhante said,"Suppose a man were condemned to death by a kind king and he came to ask him for a reprieve. Quickly, urgently, he would bow down at the king's feet." "You are quite right," said the yogi.

Should our prostrations be done quickly or slowly?

Malcolm wrote:

However you can.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 15th, 2011 at 12:30 AM

Title: Re: Difference between recognizing rigpa & realizing emptiness?

Content:

alwayson said:

Althought he won't confirm it, I believe for Namdrol:

Realizing emptiness = the famous Clear Light OR fourth consecration

In other words it is a high tantric attainment. This is the only thing that makes sense based on his comment regarding tummo.

Malcolm wrote:

No, emptiness can be realized on the basis of the creation stage alone.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 14th, 2011 at 11:50 PM

Title: Re: Difference between recognizing rigpa & realizing emptiness?

Content:

Namdrol said:

Further, the experience of emptiness, while necessary, is not at all the same thing as realizing emptiness. The experience of emptiness is experiencing an awareness [shes pa] free of concepts, often referred to as recognizing the gap between two thoughts. If you follow the teaching of Chogyal Namkhai Norbu, terming this experience "dharmakāya", as some teachers do, is a big mistake. It is just an impermanent experience.

N

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

Is this because awareness, whether or not it contains objects, is also itself always already empty i.e. unobstructed?

Malcolm wrote:

You should ask the great meditator.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 14th, 2011 at 11:21 PM

Title: Re: Dzogchen Community of Chogyal Namkhai Norbu

Content:

alpha said:

What i am left with after his teachings is scattered pieces because he is destroying everything .

Namdrol said:

Excellent.

Clarence said:

Why is that excellent?

Malcolm wrote:

Because preconceptions are the hardest thing to drop.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 14th, 2011 at 11:19 PM

Title: Re: Dzogchen Community of Chogyal Namkhai Norbu

Content:

alpha said:

What i am left with after his teachings is scattered pieces because he is destroying everything .

Malcolm wrote:

Excellent.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 14th, 2011 at 11:10 PM

Title: Re: Difference between recognizing rigpa & realizing emptiness?

Content:

Andrew108 said:

No actually that is definitely not an experience of emptiness -

Malcolm wrote:

In this case I will defer to the great meditator, since you clearly are a much more realized person than I.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 14th, 2011 at 10:00 PM

Title: Re: why did you 'guess' buddhism?

Content:

deepbluehum said:

I'm wondering how are you supposed to help beings overcome their suffering if you don't teach dharma? How are you supposed to teach dharma if you don't realize ultimate bodhichitta? How are you supposed to realize ultimate bodhichitta if you don't receive those teachings from someone else who has? Isn't that someone else a Buddha? No Buddha ever attained Buddhahood who didn't serve countless Buddhas. Dharma is not like water. It doesn't run all over the place. It is special and precious. You have to find a rare source.

catmoon said:

Not at all. If you'll allow me to disregard former lives, the pratyakabuddha works it all out for himself, just as Buddha did. Or, you could look at it this way: It is indeed special and precious, the sources are rare, but it occasionally happens that the source is oneself.

Malcolm wrote:

Pratyekabuddha recall the teachings they received from past buddhas, and then apply them, just as Śākyamuni did. It is not the case that any person ever awakens by figuring things out on their own.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 14th, 2011 at 9:57 PM

Title: Re: Difference between recognizing rigpa & realizing emptiness?

Content:

Andrew108 said:

Emptiness/Rigpa or Rigpa/emptiness your choice but always always always they are together...A genuine understanding of emptiNESS is required otherwise things don't fall into themselves - no collapse.

Malcolm wrote:

A proper understanding of emptiness is required, but not the realization of emptiness. If the realization of emptiness were required to have vidyā (knowledge of the basis), no one who was not an ārya on the stages could practice Dzogchen at all.

The realization of emptiness is also not a requirement for the basic requirement of tregchö i.e. stable placement in a momentary uncontrived awareness (ma bcos pa shes pa skad gcig ma). A proper understanding of emptiness is required.

Further, the experience of emptiness, while necessary, is not at all the same thing as realizing emptiness. The experience of emptiness is experiencing an awareness [shes pa] free of concepts, often referred to as recognizing the gap between two thoughts. If you follow the teaching of Chogyal Namkhai Norbu, terming this experience "dharmakāya", as some teachers do, is a big mistake. It is just an impermanent experience.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 14th, 2011 at 9:03 PM

Title: Re: why did you 'guess' buddhism?

Content:

catmoon said:

It seems to me that your position contains the assumption that only Buddhists can practice the Eightfold Path.

Namdrol said:

Yes.

The eight-fold path starts with right view, and right view, the view of middle way, belongs solely to the Buddhist school.

tobes said:

It doesn't "belong" anywhere or to anyone.

To say so contradicts the very essence of that view.

Malcolm wrote:

In reply to your pointless semantic quibble:

"Belongs" as in the sense of apples belonging in an apple bin -- an apple bin is where apples go, and it is where apples are found, and when you want to put apples in their proper place, you put them in the apple bin, and not the orange bin.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 14th, 2011 at 8:56 PM

Title: Re: Evolution of humans and Mahayana Buddhism

Content:

Aemilius said:

If you accept the process of rebirth in the six realms to be true, then this Mt Meru map illustrates an important truth.

Malcolm wrote:

Accepting the former does not require acceptance of the latter.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 14th, 2011 at 6:26 AM

Title: Re: Lung?

Content:

kirtu said:

So is lung mostly an indulgence in distraction brought on by chi not flowing correctly in the body and causing emotional excitation issues and distractions?

Kirt

Namdrol said:

No, not at all. It is a disfunction the element of air in the body.

kirtu said:

Well what does it result in? I ask because Tsoknyi Rinpoche was excerpted recently and I read the entire question and answer series from the document that the excerpt came from and he says that Westerners have lung too high in the body and it needs to be brought down to just below the navel (the dan tien in Taoism/taiqi) and that as a result of lung Westerners seem to be excitable and easily distracted but actually he's talking to people who already seem to know what the symptoms are so he doesn't go into that too much. He did the same thing in a video.

Kirt

Malcolm wrote:

These are the general symptoms of a vata disorder:

wishes to move, sighing, instability in the mind; dizziness; roaring the ears; dry, red rough tongue; inclination for bitter tastes; shifting pains; cold and shivering; trembling and pervasive twinges; fatigue; stiffness; atrophy; chapping, feeling breaks, bulging, constricted; great pain when trembling; prickling; goosebumps; insomnia; yawning, shivering; wishing to stretch; aimless chatter; feeling of having been beaten on hips, waist, bones, and all the joints; twinge and pain in the occipital notch, the chest and the jaw; the vata points become sensitive and are painful when pressed; dry heaves; in the morning, bubbly sputum; bloating, roaring, pain after digesting in the morning. The reason he says it needs to be brought below the navel is that the natural location of vata in the body is in the pelvic region.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 14th, 2011 at 5:46 AM

Title: Re: Lung?

Content:

kirtu said:

So is lung mostly an indulgence in distraction brought on by chi not flowing correctly in the body and causing emotional excitation issues and distractions?

Kirt

Malcolm wrote:

No, not at all. It is a disfunction the element of air in the body.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 14th, 2011 at 5:42 AM

Title: Re: why did you 'guess' buddhism?

Content:

Kyosan said:

None of these are specifically Buddhist, but all help bring people closer to liberation.

Malcolm wrote:

Not necessarily, such things only lead people to higher stations in samsara.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 14th, 2011 at 2:59 AM

Title: Re: why did you 'guess' buddhism?

Content:

Kyosan said:

A bodhisattva however can appear as a non-Buddhist -- but they will not teach.

Why is that? Why won't a bodhisattva appearing as a non-Buddhist teach?

Malcolm wrote:

What would they teach? They would not teach Buddhist Dharma. They might teach things non-Buddhist wish to hear. But those things do not lead to liberation. Even if a Bodhisattvas appearing as non-Buddhists teaches Dharma, the non-Buddhist will hear it as whatever teaching they are accustomed to. The limitation is not on the side of the bodhisattva, but rather on the side of his students.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 14th, 2011 at 2:28 AM

Title: Re: why did you 'guess' buddhism?

Content:

catmoon said:

Isn't it possible to rouse bodhicitta without knowing what a Buddha is?

Malcolm wrote:

No. Not really.

However, sometimes we term the sincere wish to liberate beings from suffering (compassion) "bodhicitta", because cultivating the former inevitably leads to the latter - since compassion is the seed of bodhicitta. Likewise, we frequently term non-buddhists of exceptional compassion "bodhisattvas" without meaning they are full bodhisattvas in the formal Mahāyāna sense.

It is important to make a distinction between popular usage, and technical usage. For example, some people call certain very strong forms of Marijuana "Buddha bud".

What we here are discussing is the formal usage of terms and what they mean.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 14th, 2011 at 2:22 AM

Title: Re: why did you 'guess' buddhism?

Content:

Kyosan said:

You are a follower of Tibetan Buddhism aren't you? The Dalai Lama sides with me on this.

Malcolm wrote:

People misunderstand HHDL all the time.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 14th, 2011 at 2:08 AM

Title: Re: Difference between recognizing rigpa & realizing emptiness?

Content:

Namdrol said:

However, there is no guarantee that one will realize emptiness merely through practicing tregchö. Of this reason then, practices such as tummo, etc. are also recommended.

N

alwayson said:

Ok NOW I am starting to get this.

Based on this comment, realizing emptiness is some special tantric gnosis having to do with the center channel / avadhuti.

Malcolm wrote:

That depends on the practitioner.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 14th, 2011 at 2:05 AM

Title: Re: why did you 'guess' buddhism?

Content:

Kyosan said:

A non-Buddhist can be a bodhisattva and a Buddhist bodhisattva can appear to be non-Buddhist.

Malcolm wrote:

No, a non-buddhist cannot be a bodhisattva. In order to be a bodhisattva, someone must have roused bodhicitta, the wish to attain buddhahood for the benefit of all sentient beings. A person who has done so, is by definition a Buddhist.

A bodhisattva however can appear as a non-Buddhist -- but they will not teach.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 14th, 2011 at 2:02 AM

Title: Re: why did you 'guess' buddhism?

Content:

Namdrol said:

You can believe what you wish. I have not found any evidence of the middle way, dependent origination, being taught anywhere other than in Buddhism. It is not that case that I have not bothered to look.

N

alwayson said:

um what about Bon?

Malcolm wrote:

Bon is basically a knock off of Buddhism.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 14th, 2011 at 2:01 AM

Title: Re: why did you 'guess' buddhism?

Content:

catmoon said:

It seems to me that your position contains the assumption that only Buddhists can practice the Eightfold Path.

Namdrol said:

Yes.

The eight-fold path starts with right view, and right view, the view of middle way, belongs solely to the Buddhist school.

KeithBC said:

The Eightfold Path is a requirement for enlightenment. No argument there. No argument either that only Buddhism teaches it.

However, there is nothing to prevent someone (with exceptionally good karma, no doubt) from discovering the Eightfold Path on his or her own and practicing it, without having encountered Buddhism. It is not the "-ism" or "-ist" that matters, but the understanding and practice. Anyone, Buddhist or not, who practices the Eightfold Path well enough can become enlightened. (I will accept a quibble that the person could be considered a Buddhist even if he or she doesn't know it.)

Om mani padme hum

Keith

Malcolm wrote:

Such a person would, by definition, be a pratyekabuddha.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 14th, 2011 at 2:00 AM

Title: Re: why did you 'guess' buddhism?

Content:

Kyosan said:

If Buddhists can discover the true nature of all things, others can also.

Namdrol said:

Pratyekabuddhas discover the principle of dependent origination through their own power. But they do not teach. Thus, they do not lead others to liberation. Also their liberation is not complete -- in order to become fully awakened, they must also traverse the bodhisattva path.

N

Kyosan said:

The bodhisattva path is much broader than you think it is. A non-Buddhist can be a bodhisattva.

Malcolm wrote:

I am not really that interested in people's vague, ill-formed and speculative ideas about these issues.

I know what the great Mahāyāna Buddhist masters of India have said about these issues, have tested them with reasoning and found them to be sound. Therefore, I follow their advice on these issues. If other people wish to follow their own speculations, they are free to do so.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 14th, 2011 at 1:34 AM

Title: Re: why did you 'guess' buddhism?

Content:

catmoon said:

It seems to me that your position contains the assumption that only Buddhists can practice the Eightfold Path.

Namdrol said:

Yes.

The eight-fold path starts with right view, and right view, the view of middle way, belongs solely to the Buddhist school.

catmoon said:

Nonsense.

Malcolm wrote:

You can believe what you wish. I have not found any evidence of the middle way, dependent origination, being taught anywhere other than in Buddhism. It is not that case that I have not bothered to look.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 14th, 2011 at 1:32 AM

Title: Re: why did you 'guess' buddhism?

Content:

Kyosan said:

If Buddhists can discover the true nature of all things, others can also.

Malcolm wrote:

Pratyekabuddhas discover the principle of dependent origination through their own power. But they do not teach. Thus, they do not lead others to liberation. Also their liberation is not complete -- in order to become fully awakened, they must also traverse the bodhisattva path.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 14th, 2011 at 1:30 AM

Title: Re: why did you 'guess' buddhism?

Content:

catmoon said:

It seems to me that your position contains the assumption that only Buddhists can practice the Eightfold Path.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes.

The eight-fold path starts with right view, and right view, the view of middle way, belongs solely to the Buddhist school.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 13th, 2011 at 11:28 PM

Title: Re: Yidam and Dzogchen

Content:

Kai said:

Since Namdrol, you explicitly stated that Mahamudra and Semde give the same result which is the 13th Bhumi Buddhahood of the lower yanas. By logical deduction, Longde should also lead to the same realization as the observation shown above. Therefore its not a far stretch to conclude that only the Menngagde division is able to lead one into the 16th Bhumi.

Malcolm wrote:

klong sde has the four visions, therefore, it has the same result as man ngag sde. Sems sde does not have this, therefore, no "rainbow" body in sems sde.

Kai said:

However, when one reaches the teachings of the highest level, it is suddenly stated that there is only one or a few paths which could lead to the true and ultimate Buddhahood while the rest is just provisional and temporal ones that will eventually degenerate.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, and when you read Yangti tantras, they are critical of ati and spyi ti, and so on.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 13th, 2011 at 9:49 PM

Title: Re: Evolution of humans and Mahayana Buddhism

Content:

Aemilius said:

Scientific cosmology supports nihilism.

Malcolm wrote:

There is no scientific cosmology in the sense that there is an Abidharma cosmology, or a Ptolmeic cosmology.

But if you wish to continue to believe that our sky is blue since the southern face of Mt Meru is made of sapphire, no one is going to stop you.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 13th, 2011 at 9:41 PM

Title: Re: Yidam and Dzogchen

Content:

Namdrol said:

Really. Please the difference between Hināyāna and Mahāyāna in Gorampa's

"Distinguishing views".

kirtu said:

I had "Freedom from Extremes" but had to give it away for the move. Ok - thanks!

Kirt

Malcolm wrote:

BTW, I don't think this is accepted in Nyingma either.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 13th, 2011 at 8:50 PM

Title: Re: Yidam and Dzogchen

Content:

kirtu said:

No that's standard across schools although I don't remember for sure if an Arhat was equated exactly with a 6th bhumi bodhisattva in terms of wisdom (it's the in terms of wisdom where the equating is done on this). So when Arhats are awakened from their samadhi and they take rebirth they are reborn as sixth bhumi bodhisattvas.

Kirt

Namdrol said:

Hi Kirt:

No, this is not accepted in Sakya, it is rejected by Gorampa. 1) Arhats do not realize emptiness free from extremes 2) They do not have the necessary merit stores.

kirtu said:

Really? I know Khenpo Kalsang has mentioned it. So this is accepted by Nyingma, Gelug and Kagyu alone?

Kirt

Malcolm wrote:

Really. Please the difference between Hināyāna and Mahāyāna in Gorampa's "Distinguishing views".

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 13th, 2011 at 8:43 PM

Title: Re: why did you 'guess' buddhism?

Content:

Kyosan said:

When someone understands what the Buddha meant by "realization" then they will understand that this term does not apply to those outside the Buddhist fold.

N

catmoon said:

Stop a moment and think of all the people who might be counter examples. The silent, self-taught Buddhas. The saints. The peacemakers. Maybe the fellow down the street who runs the deli. Do you really wish to invalidate all their realizations just because they are outside the tribe?

Malcolm wrote:

They are not counter examples. And the Buddha was very specific on this point: In whatsoever Dhamma and Discipline, Subhadda, there is not found the Noble Eightfold Path, neither is there found a true ascetic of the first, second, third, or fourth degree of saintliness. But in whatsoever Dhamma and Discipline there is found the Noble Eightfold Path, there is found a true ascetic of the first, second, third, and fourth degrees of saintliness.[54] Now in this Dhamma and Discipline, Subhadda, is found the Noble Eightfold Path; and in it alone are also found true ascetics of the first, second, third, and fourth degrees of saintliness. Devoid of true ascetics are the systems of other teachers.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 13th, 2011 at 8:32 PM

Title: Re: Yidam and Dzogchen

Content:

kirtu said:

No that's standard across schools although I don't remember for sure if an Arhat was equated exactly with a 6th bhumi bodhisattva in terms of wisdom (it's the in terms of wisdom where the equating is done on this). So when Arhats are awakened from their samadhi and they take rebirth they are reborn as sixth bhumi bodhisattvas.

Kirt

Malcolm wrote:

Hi Kirt:

No, this is not accepted in Sakya, it is rejected by Gorampa. 1) Arhats do not realize emptiness free from extremes 2) They do not have the necessary merit stores.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 13th, 2011 at 8:28 PM

Title: Re: Evolution of humans and Mahayana Buddhism

Content:

eL_chupacabra said:

My perception of the situation in Europe is of a growth in materialism, both in the younger generations and in academia.

Kai said:

While in Americas, the sign of increasing fanaticism and religious fundamentalism is becoming a serious issue.....

Malcolm wrote:

No, there has always been a large percentage of religious wingnuts in the US and a religious zeal associated with "Democracy".

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 13th, 2011 at 8:25 PM

Title: Re: Evolution of humans and Mahayana Buddhism

Content:

Aemilius said:

Truth is essential to BuddhaDharma...

Malcolm wrote:

But not cosmologies.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 13th, 2011 at 8:00 PM

Title: Re: Yidam and Dzogchen

Content:

xabir said:

You guys seem to take Samantabhadra as a literal real account of what happened, but didn't ChNNR says it should be taken metaphorically?

Malcolm wrote:

That is a semi side presentation. The presentation in Man ngag side is very specific.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 13th, 2011 at 7:00 AM

Title: Re: Difference between recognizing rigpa & realizing emptiness?

Content:

deepbluehum said:

You hating the words of the precious teacher, the Buddha, makes you the sort of person that my samaya says I cannot associate with. So either you have to recant, or you have to go or I do. The moderators need to speak up here.

alwayson said:

Do you know whats funny?

If you are a Vajrayana practitioner you are not allowed to even stay over at a regular Mahayana guy's house for more than a week.

I think Namdrol said this somewhere.

Malcolm wrote:

No, one is not allowed to remain in a temple where there is no faith in Mahayana for more than a week.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 13th, 2011 at 6:40 AM

Title: Re: Yidam and Dzogchen

Content:

Kai said:

In the ongoing development, many Tibetan masters have been trying to get Vajrayana closer to traditional Mahayana by emphasizing that the tenth to Twelfth Bhumis in the tantras are actually equivalent to the Tenth Bhumi as stated in the Sutras. While the tantric thirteenth equates that to the sutric Eleventh, the only minor difference between the two is a formal tantra empowerment.

Malcolm wrote:

That is definitely not a POV that a Sakyapa or a Nyingmapa would be liable to accept.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 13th, 2011 at 2:40 AM

Title: Re: Difference between recognizing rigpa & realizing emptiness?

Content:

alwayson said:

Namdrol is my signature correct?

I think it will help some confusion

Malcolm wrote:

Those sambhogakāya forms are not the real Sambhogakāya. The real Sambhogakāya can only be seen by eight stage bodhisattvas on up.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 12th, 2011 at 11:54 PM

Title: Re: Vajra Armor

Content:

dakini_boi said:

Haha, yes that's true. Thanks for the clarification.

Just one more question about the Vajra Armor mantra - I know there's no visualization for it, but I'm curious - who is the deity associated with it? Is it Vajrapani, or Guru Dragpo? Or are these one and the same in this case?

Thanks for answering my questions, I offer you several recitations of Vajra Armor.

Malcolm wrote:

Padmashavari, a form of Vajrapani. There are in fact versions of this practice that are full fledged yidam practices.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 12th, 2011 at 11:33 PM

Title: Re: Vajra Armor

Content:

dakini_boi said:

Thanks you guys. I didn't know what the 404 diseases were, your clarification helps, Pema Chopel.

Why does the text say "volume of mantras"? - I thought there was just one Vajra Armor mantra

Malcolm wrote:

There is only one mantra. Here volume is a translation of 'bum, which also means 100,000. So it means this mantra includes everything. If I translated is as "the one hundred thousand mantras of Vajra armor" you would even be more confused, in addition to such a translation being incorrect.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 12th, 2011 at 11:30 PM

Title: Re: Yidam and Dzogchen

Content:

Kai said:

First of all, I believe that its highly speculative but I suspect the reversible effect if occurs, only lasts for a split second or less. In the book "Dzogchen practice", it was stated that the Adi-Buddha, Samantabhadra/Samantabhadri, experienced two of the three innate unelighenments at the start of universe and was able to overcome the delusions by the arising of His wisdom to recognize the eight appearances from the basis. Hence He retains his Buddhahood and become the Adi Buddha. And this might be the same event that happens to all Buddhas eventually if the Dzogchen tantras are to be believed.

Malcolm wrote:

There are three explanations possible, given that Dzogchen tantras and traditions definitely state that Samantabhadra was intially subject to either one or two ignorances (ma rig pa, avidyā):

- 1) The Dzogchen assertion that all sentient beings attain "full awakening (sangs rgyas)" at the end of a given mahākalpa requires interpetation and must not be taken literally.
- 2) Buddhahood is, up to a point, in fact reversible.
- 3) Buddhas and sentient beings newly form at the beginning of a mahākalapa.

All three possibilities present problems in terms of traditional Indian Mahāyāna Buddhology.

This controversy first came to my attention when my Sakya khenpo mentioned it in passing in the early '90's.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 12th, 2011 at 10:52 PM

Title: Re: Difference between recognizing rigpa & realizing emptiness?

Content:

Namdrol said:

If not, then all people who have recognized rigpa would be first stage bodhisattvas. But they are not.

Andrew108 said:

How do you know they are not?

Malcolm wrote:

I have personal experience of the subject we are discussing and I am not a first stage bodhisattva. In other words, I am relying on my personal authority to answer your question.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 12th, 2011 at 10:47 PM

Title: Re: Vajra Armor

Content:

dakini_boi said:

Just wondering, is Vajra Armor practice used for emotional disorders?

How about lung imbalance, for example insomnia? Or would there be other practices more specific to such things?

Malcolm wrote:

The collection of activities for Vajra armor states:

"This Vajra armor volume of mantras destroys all of the four hundred and four classes of disease, the one thousand and eighty classes of spirits, the eighty-four bad omens, the three hundred and sixty calamities, the eighteen kinds of untimely death, and so on."

I'd say it is pretty inclusive.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 12th, 2011 at 9:11 PM

Title: Re: Difference between recognizing rigpa & realizing emptiness?

Content:

Andrew108 said:

this is also what ChNN calls instant presence.

Malcolm wrote:

"Instant presence" is one of the ways in which Norbu Rinpoche translates the term "rig pa", in order to distinguish it from his translation of the term "dran pa", presence, which is usually translated as mindfulness.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 12th, 2011 at 8:51 PM

Title: Re: Difference between recognizing rigpa & realizing emptiness?

Content:

Andrew108 said:

You seem to have suggested that recognition of rigpa and realizing emptiness are different.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, they are quite different.

If not, then all people who have recognized rigpa would be first stage bodhisattvas. But they are not.

The second fault of your assertion above is that people who have not realized emptiness will believe that they had, and such people will then be incurable.

Andrew108 said:

I don't mind the idea that I may be wrong.

Malcolm wrote:

That is a useful personal quality.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 12th, 2011 at 8:18 PM

Title: Re: Difference between recognizing rigpa & realizing emptiness?

Content:

Andrew108 said:

This is far from being a trivial point. But as others have said it is better to check these things with a teacher.

Malcolm wrote:

It is a trivial point because time is merely a convention. There is no time or continuity at all, other than conventionally. In Dzogchen, that which is shared with Madhyamaka can be considered trivial since we are not discussing something unique and specific to Dzogchen teachings.

Also the term "intrinsic awareness" is a translation misnomer that has, unfortunately, gained broad currency. Using the term "intrinsic awareness" for "rig pa/vidyā" is very limiting. First of all, the adjective "intrinsic" is misapplied. Intrinsic describes a quality that something else possesses. For example, diamonds are intrinsically hard; gold is intrinsically shiny; water is intrinsically wet. [X] is intrinsically aware? The intrinsic awareness of what? Of what is awareness an intrinsic quality?

There are other problems to this translation which lead people to reify rigpa as some truly existing ground ala Advaita's brahman.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 12th, 2011 at 7:53 PM

Title: Re: Evolution of humans and Mahayana Buddhism

Content:

Aemilius said:

It gives depth to buddhism, and is therefore essential to it.

Malcolm wrote:

It is not essential to Buddhism, any more than Meru Cosmology is.

Aemilius said:

If you don't accept it you will as an implication hold that transcendental vision is nonsense, that great teachers like Karmapa, Tsongkhapa, Nagarjuna and others are liars or worse, when they perceive the events of previous Yugas and previous Kalpas. I don't think you wish this either, do you ?

Malcolm wrote:

I think they uncritically accepted the worldview handed down to them. I also think they had no tools to evaluate cosmological statements related to time and so on.

Sorry, when it comes to measuring the physical universe, we have a better understanding of it than ancient peoples.

In terms of eons, modern humans have only been out of Africa for 70,000 years or so.

The rest of it is religious speculation.

This of course does not mean that sentient life is confined to this planet, or that huge time frames mentioned in sutras are not relevant -- but there are issues with applying the fantastic numbers mentioned in sutras and so on to this planet and this crop of human beings.

On the other hand, it is fruitless to provide substitute speculations.

So we have to deal with two facts. Modern humans have only been present on the Indian subcontinent for at most 70,000 years. This fact stands in contradiction to traditional narratives about the history of Jambudvipa.

We should default to modern understanding, since it corresponds with the perception of ordinary people and is all that can be confirmed with any empirical certainty.

The beliefs of ancient Buddhist masters about the history of the world are pretty irrelevant.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 12th, 2011 at 7:28 PM

Title: Re: Difference between recognizing rigpa & realizing emptiness?

Content:

Andrew108 said:

The point is that Rigpa has no continuity or time within it..

Malcolm wrote:

This is a trivial point and does not go beyond Madhyamaka.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 12th, 2011 at 8:48 AM

Title: Re: Difference between recognizing rigpa & realizing emptiness?

Content:

Andrew108 said:

A genuine experience of emptiness and a genuine experience of rigpa are the same - this experience is glimpsed during direct transmission from teacher to student.

Malcolm wrote:

Many people make this mistake. Such people never understand Dzogchen.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 12th, 2011 at 8:29 AM

Title: Re: Difference between recognizing rigpa & realizing emptiness?

Content:

deepbluehum said:

I say you and Namdrol are both right. You are right because the direct introduction does provide a glimpse into emptiness.

Malcolm wrote:

It is not the same as the realization of the path seeing.

It is an example wisdom only.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 12th, 2011 at 8:28 AM

Title: Re: Difference between recognizing rigpa & realizing emptiness?

Content:

Andrew108 said:

The way Rigpa is defined is as self-originated intrinsic awareness.

Malcolm wrote:

No, it isn't.

For this reason all of your other comments are skewed.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 12th, 2011 at 5:34 AM

Title: Re: Garab Dorje Guru Yoga

Content:

Andrew108 said:

The point is to receive the direct transmission. This is a guru yoga practice.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, Tom seem to be missing that point.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 12th, 2011 at 5:26 AM

Title: Re: Difference between recognizing rigpa & realizing emptiness?

Content:

Andrew108 said:

Neither have you answered the question.

But that's o.k as I don't think anyone is capable of answering in an accurate way.

Malcolm wrote:

I did. It is pretty straight forward. To put it another way, when a person ceases to reify phenomena in terms of the four extremes, that is the direct perception of emptiness. Until that point, their "emptiness" remains an intellectual sequence of negations; accurate perhaps, but conceptual nevertheless.

The "recognition" of rigpa, which is simply the knowledge (rig pa) about one's state as a working basis for practice, does not require realization of emptiness as a prerequisite, and can't -- since if it did, no one could practice Dzogchen. '

In terms of the four visions, for as long as one continues to reify phenomena, for that long, one will never reach the third vision. This is the principal reason in modern Dzogchen practice, emphasis is placed on the basis through tregchö, rather the path, tögal. If you are a first stage bodhisattva and so on, then the four visions in Dzogchen will be very, very rapid. However, there is no gaurantee that one will realize emptiness merely through practicing tregchö. Of this reason then, practices such as tummo, etc. are also recommended.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 12th, 2011 at 5:09 AM

Title: Re: Difference between recognizing rigpa & realizing emptiness?

Content:

Andrew108 said:

It seems that we may take the notion of Rigpa and the famous concept of emptiness and think that they are something we need...

Malcolm wrote:

All very nice, but you didn't answer the OP's question.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 12th, 2011 at 5:01 AM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

Adamantine said:

I know south Indian food well, I have eaten it in India as well as regularly in NYC, being a vegetarian it is probably the tastiest veggie cuisine there is. However, between potatoes, basmati rice and various lentil dumplings, pancakes, and crepes

Malcolm wrote:

The crepes are fermented lentils and rice, 50/50.

Anyway, there is plenty of protein in that diet for most people.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 12th, 2011 at 3:20 AM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

David N. Snyder said:

It is a myth that all vegetarians are healthy.

Namdrol said:

The healthiest vegetarian cuisine is South Indian cooking. It is the most balanced, the most diverse, strong on rice and bean combinations, easy to digest.

It is not Vegan since no Vedic based diet can be.

N

Adamantine said:

With all the carbs and dairy though isn't it a bit fattening? I love this food but as I get older and the metabolism slows I need to think about slimming down. Also so many Lamas have diabetes now partially from the Indian white-rice obsession when genetically they are used to whole-grain barely (tsampa).

Malcolm wrote:

South Indian food is not necessarily carb heavy. The reason many Tibetans are getting diabetes is because they like the western diet.

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/South_Indian_cuisine "
onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

Also, Tibetans ignore their own medical system and eat like crap.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 12th, 2011 at 3:03 AM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

David N. Snyder said:

It is a myth that all vegetarians are healthy.

Malcolm wrote:

The healthiest vegetarian cuisine is South Indian cooking. It is the most balanced, the most diverse, strong on rice and bean combinations, easy to digest.

It is not Vegan since no Vedic based diet can be.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 12th, 2011 at 1:29 AM

Title: Re: Difference between recognizing rigpa & realizing emptiness?

Content:

always on said:

Seriously what is this "path of seeing?"

I'm tired of searching for reasonable info on it in books on Buddhism.

What is it already?

Namdrol said:

It is the moment your understanding of emptiness ceases to be an intellectual construct and becomes a valid direct perception.

Malcolm wrote:

The Abhisamaya alamakara will have detailed information.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 12th, 2011 at 1:28 AM

Title: Re: Difference between recognizing rigpa & realizing emptiness?

Content:

alwayson said:

Seriously what is this "path of seeing?"

I'm tired of searching for reasonable info on it in books on Buddhism.

What is it already?

Malcolm wrote:

It is the moment your understanding of emptiness ceases to be an intellectual construct and becomes a valid direct perception.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, September 11th, 2011 at 10:27 PM

Title: Re: Difference between recognizing rigpa & realizing emptiness?

Content:

Acchantika said:

Is then the initial recognition of rigpa equal to the path of seeing/first bhumi?

Also, is it accurate to describe this as recognition of clarity, whereas "realising emptiness" is effectively recognition of the inseparability of clarity and emptiness?

Malcolm wrote:

As to the first question, no.

As to the second question, yes.

As to the third question, realizing emptiness here in Dzogchen has the same meaning as realizing emptiness in any other mahāyāna school.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, September 11th, 2011 at 9:51 PM

Title: Re: Do "dzogchen practices" help or hinder your thinking ability

Content:

Dechen Norbu said:

So, having a very good teacher is important, especially because western life brings a lot of challenges if we are to practice more or less "traditionally". It's not like we can go to a retreat and people take care of us while we practice.

Malcolm wrote:

It is also important to remember that we are Mahāyāna practitioners, and engaging in the activities connected with the six perfections is important.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, September 11th, 2011 at 9:07 PM

Title: Re: "On White Women and Buddhism"

Content:

kirtu said:

So why should we continue to propagate the concept...

Malcolm wrote:

People think tribally. And as long as we continue to look different from one another, for that long people will continue to think in terms of "races" because race is a an effect of culture. "Race" is a result of attraction choices, environment, wealth, and a whole host of other things which result in non-verbal behaviorial cues. These behavariial cues are utilized in establishing human dominance patterns and social heirarchies.

We are all hutus and tutsis.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, September 11th, 2011 at 9:01 PM

Title: Re: Delusion

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Hi, it is sixteen consecutive mental cognitions through the four noble truths.

N

Namdrol said:

It states it to be the case in the Abhisamayālaṅkāra, and other Mahāyāna texts, as opposed to a sixteen moment path of seeing proposed in Abhidharma kośa.

N

Virgo said:

Loppon, in Abhidharma kośa, are path moments mentioned? If so do these consist of 16 actual consecutive moments? Or would the path moment be just one moment in a mind door process series of sixteen moments, each other moment in the series performing it's own separate function?

I may be off base here because I am comparing what I have learned in the Theravada Abhidhamma to what you have said above. However, even "path moment" maybe be understood very differently in the Abhidharma kośa, I'm not sure. I would really like to know more.

Thank you,

Kevin

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, September 11th, 2011 at 9:00 PM

Title: Re: why did you 'guess' buddhism?

Content:

Kyosan said:

I'd like to clarify what I said. I think that all of us understand the Dharma at some level and that is why we are Buddhists, and that is especially true for people who choose themselves to become Buddhists. We see truth and value in the Buddhist dharma. But that doesn't mean that we understand the dharma at the same level as a Buddha does.

Namdrol said:

When someone understands what the Buddha meant by "realization" then they will understand that this term does not apply to those outside the Buddhist fold.

N

Kyosan said:

I think that the one Buddha vehicle and the way of bodhisattvas can be very broad. That is how I envision them.

Malcolm wrote:

There is a great fault in being closed minded. There are equally great faults in being overly broad minded.

In reality, without the realization of the meaning dependent origination, one is not an awakened person. Dependent origination is solely the teaching of the Buddha. Yes it is true that some persons figure out dependent origination without the benefit of being taught by a Buddha. But such people do not teach.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, September 11th, 2011 at 8:55 PM

Title: Re: Difference between recognizing rigpa & realizing emptiness?

Content:

alwaysan said:

So is it possible for this typical New Age style pseudoBuddhist guru, "Thusness," to have realized material emptiness (aka third vision / eighth bhumi) and is on the way to rainbow body?

Malcolm wrote:

Third vision = path of seeing, not the eighth bhumi.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, September 11th, 2011 at 7:41 AM

Title: Re: why did you 'guess' buddhism?

Content:

Kyosan said:

I'd like to clarify what I said. I think that all of us understand the Dharma at some level and that is why we are Buddhists, and that is especially true for people who choose themselves to become Buddhists. We see truth and value in the Buddhist dharma. But that doesn't mean that we understand the dharma at the same level as a Buddha does.

Malcolm wrote:

When someone understands what the Buddha meant by "realization" then they will understand that this term does not apply to those outside the Buddhist fold.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, September 11th, 2011 at 7:39 AM

Title: Re: why did you 'guess' buddhism?

Content:

Matt J said:

....Also, I don't accept the idea that Buddhist teachers are more realized than other traditions. How do you measure realization? With a cup?

Namdrol said:

That is because you don't understand what Buddha meant by realization.

N

Kyosan said:

You are probably right that he doesn't understand. In fact, I doubt that any of us know precisely what Buddha meant by realization. For sure I don't.

Malcolm wrote:

Then you are are like a man shooting arrows in the dark.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, September 11th, 2011 at 7:37 AM

Title: Re: The Rainbow Body, Tibetan Kings, dmu-thag, Agganna Sutta

Content:

AilurusFulgens said:

....

Malcolm wrote:

The actual name of the result described in Dzogchen tantras is "body of light" -- the term rainbow body is a Tibetan popular term that is at best very imprecise.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, September 11th, 2011 at 7:35 AM

Title: Re: the ever-changing Western view of Madhyamaka

Content:

Namdrol said:

Basically the rang stong/gzhan stong controversy is bullshit, and so is the prasangika/svatantrika controversy.

If you want to understand Madhyamaka, don't read Tibetan accounts of Madhyamaka dating after the 13th century. And here, it is better still just to rely on Indian masters. The sole exception to this is Khenpa Shenga's treatises, which are just Indian commentaries turned into footnoted annotations of root texts.

N

Virgo said:

Keeping the above in mind, what would you recommend in English?

Kevin

Malcolm wrote:

The Yogic Deeds of Bodhisattvas

INTRODUCTION TO THE MIDDLE WAY: Chandrakirti's Madhyamakavatara with Commentary by Jamgon Mipham

THE ORNAMENT OF REASON: The Great Commentary to Nagarjuna's Root of the Middle Way

NAGARJUNA'S REASON SIXTY (Yuktisastika) with CANDRAKIRTI'S COMMENTARY
(Yuktisastikavrtti)

This is my shortlist.

Mab

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, September 11th, 2011 at 7:31 AM

Title: Re: "On White Women and Buddhism"

Content:

Jikan said:

he'll know if he's white or black when it's night and he needs a cab.

kirtu said:

So you are agreeing with the statement that race is a social construct that others use to define you (or impose their view of you on you) and then to execute social rules or prejudices about you?

Kirt

Malcolm wrote:

Of course "race" is a social construct, it has no genetic basis.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, September 11th, 2011 at 6:07 AM

Title: Re: Difference between recognizing rigpa & realizing emptiness?

Content:

xabir said:

<http://www.heartofnow.com/files/emptiness.html> "

onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

alwayson said:

Namdrol,

Is this a good link or is it garbage?

Malcolm wrote:

Better to rely on traditional sources.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, September 11th, 2011 at 6:00 AM

Title: Re: "On White Women and Buddhism"

Content:

kirtu said:

And what of my non-white relatives and ancestors from my mother's family? Are they just wiped away?

Malcolm wrote:

No.

kirtu said:

Look if we assert racial silliness (and unfortunately our history does) we get in trouble. The classic examples: Barak Obama : is he black or white?

Malcolm wrote:

Black. Yes, I know he has a white mother. I know black people with white mothers and white people with black mothers and some people of mixed parentage who don't identify with either.

kirtu said:

Wentworth Miller: is he black or white? wmillr.jpeg

Malcolm wrote:

I don't know. He could be either, that is up to him.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, September 11th, 2011 at 12:36 AM

Title: Re: "On White Women and Buddhism"

Content:

xylem said:

in Washington DC I find many African-American people decide upon seeing me that I am what they call "white".

Malcolm wrote:

I have met you. In this country, you are white.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, September 11th, 2011 at 12:33 AM

Title: Re: Difference between recognizing rigpa & realizing emptiness?

Content:

White Lotus said:

no need to see emptiness.

Malcolm wrote:

You are just deluding yourself further.

You should actually study Dzogchen, learn from qualified masters for some number of years and practice it rather than belaboring others with poorly digested intellectual snippets from a febrile imagination.

In other words, you should be asking questions, not providing answers.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, September 11th, 2011 at 12:30 AM

Title: Re: Difference between recognizing rigpa & realizing emptiness?

Content:

White Lotus said:

...however awareness is the point within the circle. it is not empty, it resides within emptiness.

Malcolm wrote:
rigpa is also empty.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 10th, 2011 at 11:39 PM

Title: Re: Delusion

Content:

Namdrol said:

Cessation occurs when, through awakened insight, one removes a cause of further arising. Without awakening, first, there is no analytical cessation.

devilyoudont said:

Thanks, but why and how are you so certain that awakening is instantaneous?

Malcolm wrote:

It states it to be the case in the Abhisamayālaṅkāra, and other Mahāyāna texts, as opposed to a sixteen moment path of seeing proposed in Abhidharma kośa.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 10th, 2011 at 11:36 PM

Title: Re: 100 Syllable Mantra SUPO KAYO ME BHAVA

Content:

dakini_boi said:

Why don't we have རྒྱུ for example?

Malcolm wrote:

[/quote]

Sometimes you see this, actually.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 10th, 2011 at 11:36 PM

Title: Re: 100 Syllable Mantra SUPO KAYO ME BHAVA

Content:

dakini_boi said:

By the way, interesting to note that when ChNN was transmitting a medicine buddha mantra at one of his recent retreats, he pronounced "bhekhandze" and even mentioned that he was doing so because this was how it was transmitted to him!

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, that is correct. That is how ChNN likes to do things.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 10th, 2011 at 11:35 PM

Title: Re: 100 Syllable Mantra SUPO KAYO ME BHAVA

Content:

dakini_boi said:

And while we're still on the subject. . .

Namdrol, do you have any idea why in most cases ऩ is used for both Sanskrit व and वः? Why don't we have वः for example?

Namdrol said:

There is a recognized regular shift from f --> v --> b in Indo European languages. For example, the Roman word for preist, "flamen", by phonetic shift becomes brahmin in Sanskrit. These shifts are regular and predictable.

In Kashmir and among Newars Sanskrit "va" often takes on a "ba" sound. Most Newars say Bajrayogini, not Vajrayogini.

dakini_boi said:

Thanks, Namdrol. I understand that the pronunciation changes - but pronunciation aside, I don't understand why written mantras wouldn't be consistent with the original. After all, the Tibetans came up with the written syllable ऩ specifically for that purpose.

So, when you come across the seed syllable BAM in a mantra, do you always pronounce it as VAM, Namdrol?

Malcolm wrote:

Depends on my mood.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 10th, 2011 at 10:49 PM

Title: Re: Delusion

Content:

devilyoudont said:

Serious, serious question about which I have no preconceived ideas, I swear: What is the relationship between cessation and awakening? If cessation cannot be instantaneous or gradual, temporal or atemporal, how can awakening be instantaneous?

Malcolm wrote:

Cessation occurs when, through awakened insight, one removes a cause of further arising. Without awakening, first, there is no analytical cessation.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 10th, 2011 at 10:47 PM

Title: Re: Delusion

Content:

devilyoudont said:

Are you awake?

Malcolm wrote:

Nope.

Half asleep.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 10th, 2011 at 10:30 PM

Title: Re: Difference between recognizing rigpa & realizing emptiness?

Content:

alwayson said:

Then are there two levels of realizing emptiness?

One for conceptual appearances?

And one for actual physical matter?

Malcolm wrote:

There are two levels of realizing emptiness, the emptiness of persons and the emptiness of phenomena (that includes all material and mental phenomena).

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 10th, 2011 at 10:21 PM

Title: Re: Difference between recognizing rigpa & realizing emptiness?

Content:

alwayson said:

You mean even the physical?

Usually appearances just refers to the designation of conceptual constructs

Malcolm wrote:

Appearances are both conceptual and non-conceptual.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 10th, 2011 at 10:16 PM

Title: Re: Difference between recognizing rigpa & realizing emptiness?

Content:

alwayson said:

Then emptiness must be the insight into appearances.

That would make sense that it is sort of separate.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, appearances as defined by all of one's experience.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 10th, 2011 at 10:12 PM

Title: Re: I am the director of the documentary TULKU. Ask me anything.

Content:

GesarMukpo said:

I don't think my future has going to study ... Buddhism at an institution involved.

Malcolm wrote:

What a pity.

Formal education results in disciplined thinking and expression. Not necessary for making films and music videos perhaps, but useful for communicating and teaching things like Dharma. It [Dharma] is also something best learned by adults, and not by children. Learning Dharma requires a degree of emotional maturity. Otherwise, it is just rote religion. Rote religion is not Dharma.

Edit: I don't meant you have to get a master's in Buddhism. However, studying things formally like Madhyamaka, Abhidharma, and so on in a rigorous place is very beneficial.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 10th, 2011 at 10:07 PM

Title: Re: Annoyance :P

Content:

Namdrol said:

Awakening is not spontaneous since it does not arise without a cause. It is not gradual since it occurs in one instant.

devilyoudont said:

Is enlightenment conditioned? Is it instantaneous and not non-instantaneous?

Malcolm wrote:

I don't use the term enlightenment. Awakening however is a permanent state, from which one cannot regress.

I also don't answer pointless questions. If something occurs in an instant, it occurs in an instant, not two, three, four or sixteen instants.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 10th, 2011 at 9:14 PM

Title: Re: Silliness

Content:

devilyoudont said:

If enlightenment is spontaneous, what practice can bring you cessation?

If enlightenment is gradual, what practice can't bring you cessation?

Malcolm wrote:

Awakening is not spontaneous since it does not arise without a cause. It is not gradual since it occurs in one instant.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 10th, 2011 at 8:41 PM

Title: Re: Delusion

Content:

devilyoudont said:

Are non-spontaneity and non-gradation the temporal properties of a non-event?

Malcolm wrote:

A non event has no temporal properties of which one can speak.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 10th, 2011 at 8:09 PM

Title: Re: Delusion

Content:

devilyoudont said:

If cessation is spontaneous, what practice can bring you enlightenment?

If cessation is gradual, what practice CAN'T bring you enlightenment?

Malcolm wrote:

Cessation is not spontaneous since it is the absence of a cause.

Cessation is not gradual since it is the absence of a cause.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 10th, 2011 at 7:55 PM

Title: Re: 100 Syllable Mantra SUPO KAYO ME BHAVA

Content:

dakini_boi said:

And while we're still on the subject. . .

Namdrol, do you have any idea why in most cases ँ is used for both Sanskrit ँ and ऐ? Why don't we have ऎ for example?

Malcolm wrote:

There is a recognized regular shift from f --> v --> b in Indo European languages. For example, the Roman word for priest, "flamen", by phonetic shift becomes brahmin in Sanskrit. These shifts are regular and predictable.

In Kashmir and among Newars Sanskrit "va" often takes on a "ba" sound. Most Newars say Bajrayogini, not Vajrayogini.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 10th, 2011 at 9:53 AM

Title: Re: Difference between recognizing rigpa & realizing emptiness?

Content:

Namdrol said:

recognizing rigpa and realizing emptiness are different.

N

alwayson said:

What is the difference?

Malcolm wrote:

The first means you are a practitioner; the second means you are an awakened person.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 10th, 2011 at 7:19 AM

Title: Re: Do "dzogchen practices" help or hinder your thinking ability

Content:

padma norbu said:

??

I typically read stuff about mediation that it helps you to deal with stress and clears your head, allowing you to think much better.

Well, non-meditation might be different. How does it affect you?

I personally seem to find that my brain doesn't want to think about stuff, which is difficult when I am trying to figure out some programming stuff and my brain just seems to put on its brakes.

I don't know what's going on or if it related to my practices, but my brain is on vacation and doesn't look like it ever wants to come back.

Malcolm wrote:

Given that the practice of Dzogchen ultimately results in omniscience, it should help.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 9th, 2011 at 10:00 PM

Title: Re: 100 Syllable Mantra SUPO KAYO ME BHAVA

Content:

dakini_boi said:

According to traditional Sanskrit pronunciation, are seed syllables such as HUM and HRIM ever pronounced with the final sound nasalized, as in HUNG or HRING?

Namdrol said:

Yes. ṃ and ṅ are nasalized.

dakini_boi said:

What I meant to ask was, if you are trying to pronounce mantras according to Sanskrit pronunciation, would you ever use NG, as in HUNG/HRING, or would you always use M sound at the end?

Malcolm wrote:

As I hear it, sort of a mng...In the Western yoga world they seem to default to a hard mmm, but I think this is not quite correct.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 9th, 2011 at 8:58 PM

Title: Re: Dzogchen and other traditions

Content:

kalden yungdrung said:

- How do we call here the paths of those people who are dwelling below the path of seeing? Tib / Sanskr.
- How do you call the path of seeing? Tib / Sanskr.

Namdrol said:

Worldly paths:

Sambhara mārḡa; tshogs lam; path of accumulation.

Prayoga mārḡa; sbyor lam; path of application/preparation.

Transcendent paths:

Darśana mārḡa; mthong lam; path of seeing

Bhavana mārḡa; sgom lam; path of cultivation

Aśaikṣa mārḡa; mi slop pa'i lam; path of no further training (buddhahood)

Hayagriva said:

There are various schemes -- for the mahamudra scheme you can look in the mahamudra threads here. For Dzogchen, third vision of thögal = path of seeing.

How do the Dzogchen and Mahamudra path(s) fit with these framework?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 9th, 2011 at 8:28 PM

Title: Re: Dzogchen and other traditions

Content:

kalden yungdrung said:

- How do we call here the paths of those people who are dwelling below the path of seeing? Tib / Sanskr.
- How do you call the path of seeing? Tib / Sanskr.

Malcolm wrote:

Worldly paths:

Sambhara mārḡa; tshogs lam; path of accumulation.

Prayoga mārḡa; sbyor lam; path of application/preparation.

Transcendent paths:

Darśana mārḡa; mthong lam; path of seeing

Bhavana mārḡa; sgom lam; path of cultivation

Aśaikṣa marga; mi slop pa'i lam; path of no further training (buddhahood)

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 9th, 2011 at 8:15 PM

Title: Re: How to know a teachers level of realization?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The Rīg pa rang sharTantra states:

Without understanding, very proud, foolish, confused, following the words,
not understanding the meaning of secret mantra, hurting others' feelings with arrogant words,
entering incorrect paths,
not seeing the face of the mandala of the empowerment, corrupting his commitments,
unable to respond to questions,
little education, very proud,
the unqualified master is a student's demon,
not being a master who can teach secret mantra,
he cannot teach dzogchen Ati.

Longchenpa adds:

"If one associates with such a Guru, one impairs all temporary good, and ultimately one falls into samsara and lower realms."

At least your prospective Guru must have a good education in secret mantra; that implies he has a good education in sutra. Sometimes, even a realized person is not necessarily a good teacher, more like pratyekabuddhas than bodhisattvas.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 9th, 2011 at 8:01 PM

Title: Re: Evolution of humans and Mahayana Buddhism

Content:

Aemilius said:

creationism is still a false view

Malcolm wrote:

That is sufficient.

He knows nothing of value to any Buddhist. His books are all speculative nonsense.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 9th, 2011 at 7:58 PM

Title: Re: Benefits of Nagarjuna / Dangers of Existence & Non-Existence

Content:

retrofuturist said:

How does belief in Existence or Non-Existence bring suffering or put roadblocks in the way of one's spiritual progress?

Malcolm wrote:

Not escaping higher realms because one engages in spiritual practice in the context of a real self (existence); negating the effects of karma and therefore, falling into lower realms (non-existence).

It is really that simple.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 9th, 2011 at 7:55 PM

Title: Re: 100 Syllable Mantra SUPO KAYO ME BHAVA

Content:

Namdrol said:

ཅཅེ are tonal, in descending order. Sanskrit ca cha ja are not tonal, since Sanskrit is not a tonal language (a point Sapan makes very clear). Thonmi Sambhota wanted to make sure that Tibetans who were reading mantras were not to pronounce ca cha ja the same way they were pronouncing ཅཅེ. This led to other problems, of course, later on.

dakini_boi said:

This is quite ironic. So this leads me to wonder - when Tibetans say "tsitta" or "dza," is this because they are unable to say "citta" and "ja," or is it simply because of a misunderstanding of a writing convention. . . which has become so widespread it's become a convention in itself?

Malcolm wrote:

They can say citta, and is yes, it is because of misunderstanding a writing convention.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 9th, 2011 at 7:54 PM

Title: Re: 100 Syllable Mantra SUPO KAYO ME BHAVA

Content:

dakini_boi said:

According to traditional Sanskrit pronunciation, are seed syllables such as HUM and HRIM ever pronounced with the final sound nasalized, as in HUNG or HRING?

Malcolm wrote:
Yes. M and ng are nasalized.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Friday, September 9th, 2011 at 9:57 AM
Title: Re: How to know a teachers level of realization?
Content:
Matt J said:
Whack him/her with a stick.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Friday, September 9th, 2011 at 9:56 AM
Title: Re: why did you 'guess' buddhism?
Content:
Matt J said:
I don't know any realized Platonist masters. When I first started to meditate, there wasn't a single Platonist master in the area.

Also, I don't accept the idea that Buddhist teachers are more realized than other traditions. How do you measure realization? With a cup?

Malcolm wrote:
That is because you don't understand what Buddha meant by realization.

N

Author: Malcolm
Date: Friday, September 9th, 2011 at 3:35 AM
Title: Re: 100 Syllable Mantra SUPO KAYO ME BHAVA
Content:
padma norbu said:
lol, well my credit counselor said I didn't qualify for bankruptcy. She volunteered this info without me asking.

Malcolm wrote:
Tax debts (as long as you filed properly) and credit card debts can be discharged through bankruptcy. School loans cannot.

N

Author: Malcolm
Date: Friday, September 9th, 2011 at 3:27 AM

Title: Re: 100 Syllable Mantra SUPO KAYO ME BHAVA

Content:

padma norbu said:

Namdrol,

Could you tell me if the practice I described is basically Namkhai Norbu's Vajrasattva practice? I know there are at least 2 versions (one with mandala offering and one with Purification of Six Lokas). Trying to save as much $$ as I can since I just signed up for credit counseling and canceled all my cards and am in debt up to my ancestor's eyeballs, otherwise i would just go ahead and buy the book and cds and dvds or whatever.

Malcolm wrote:

Just file for bankruptcy. Practice Vajrasattva according to any ngondro text you have. Don't make things complicated.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 9th, 2011 at 3:00 AM

Title: Re: 100 Syllable Mantra SUPO KAYO ME BHAVA

Content:

heart said:

I think someone told me a long time ago that Sanskrit probably never was a spoken language, is that not true?

/magnus

Clarence said:

It is still spoken in some monasteries in India.

heart said:

Where?

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

There are 3000 families that speak Sanskrit in Varanasi.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 9th, 2011 at 12:59 AM

Title: Re: 100 Syllable Mantra SUPO KAYO ME BHAVA

Content:

Namdrol said:

awesome

padma norbu said:

Is that pretty much Namkhai Norbu's Vajrasattva practice or is there a bunch of other stuff to it?

In the medium ganapuja there is an additional last line for the last repetition. Is that just for ganapuja or should I include it at the end of my Vajrasattva practice?

It's funny but all of a sudden I really like this mantra... even though it takes 15 minutes just to say 21x.

(LOL, I think I'm going to burn some guggulu for good measure! I got lotsa problems!)

Malcolm wrote:

just for ganapuja

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 9th, 2011 at 12:25 AM

Title: Re: Trigeminal Neuralgia

Content:

bjf77 said:

Thank you for your time and response. We hope to find a 'root-cause' with the MRI.

B

Malcolm wrote:

If it turns out that there is no physical cause for this neuralgia, let me know.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 9th, 2011 at 12:14 AM

Title: Re: Trigeminal Neuralgia

Content:

bjf77 said:

My wife has been recently diagnosed with trigeminal neuralgia. She has been experiencing episodes off and on for almost a year now. Recently the pain has not subsided and she is scheduled for an Brain MRI in the near future to help determine a cause. I would like to find out if there is anything we can do in the meantime to either cure this condition, or at the least treat the pain with Tibetan Medicine. Any information, suggestions, help, would be greatly appreciated.

I will put in a link to the wikipedia website that has detailed information about Trigeminal neuralgia, and hope that this will be useful and helpful.

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Trigeminal_neuralgia "
onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

Thank you!
Om ah hung
B

Malcolm wrote:

Considering what I can see about this condition there is probably little Tibetan Medicine can do more than offer minor palliative relief since this condition seems to involve an artery that presses against the trigeminal nerve. I am guessing for permanent relief, surgery is probably your most effective solution.

N

Author: Malcolm
Date: Thursday, September 8th, 2011 at 11:56 PM
Title: Re: 100 Syllable Mantra SUPO KAYO ME BHAVA
Content:
padma norbu said:
Namdrol,

You advised me to do Vajrasattva before and so I'm trying to do it. I am going to combine this in a Short Tun style of practice. After breathings, guru yoga, 5 elements purification and refuge, I will visualize Vajrasattva on my head in typical way and chant 100-syllable mantra many times, imagining myself filling with white light (nectar) and all negativities draining out. After the Vajrasattva portion, I will sing the Song of Vajra and after that perhaps Six Lokas practice and then dedicate merits.

Does that sound like a good practice to you?

Vajrasattva mantra is shown on page 123 of the newer Tun and Ganapuja book. Note the last line. Is that last line just for ganapuja or do you end all Vajrasattva mantras with this on the very last repetition? I also have an audio of this from downloading the mandarava ganapuja, so I know how to say the mantra the correct way.

Malcolm wrote:
awesome

Author: Malcolm
Date: Thursday, September 8th, 2011 at 11:47 PM

Title: Re: Spirit possession and/or harrassment

Content:

uslic001 said:

Lama Dawa has suspended divination's per his website except in emergencies.

Bryan

Malcolm wrote:

Good to know. Thanks.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 8th, 2011 at 11:28 PM

Title: Re: Dzogchen and other traditions

Content:

kalden yungdrung said:

Namdrol wrote:

Because ordinary people can see a nirmankāya, but cannot see a Sambhogakāya, much less the Dharmakāya.

N.

Tashi delek,

- What are here ordinary and then following not ordinary people?

Mutsog Marro

KY

Malcolm wrote:

People below the path of seeing. Regular people.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 8th, 2011 at 11:15 PM

Title: Re: 100 Syllable Mantra SUPO KAYO ME BHAVA

Content:

username said:

]then there would be numerous versions even in a single generation as different people would pick different sets of Tibetan words

Malcolm wrote:

That is the present state of things, since Tibetan U, Tshan, Kham, Golog and Amdo all pronounce mantras completely differently. Add to this western mispronunciations of already incorrectly transcribed mantras (in order to follow Tibetanized pronunciations) and in the end one will wind up with mantras and dharanis as garbled if not more garbled than Chinese mantras and dharanis. So wa ka! (svāhā as pronounced in Japan).

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 8th, 2011 at 10:33 PM

Title: Re: Ālaya in Sakya

Content:

Kai said:

So ultimate alaya = Tathāgatagarbha?

I just want to make sure.....

Namdrol said:

According to the Sakya masters, ālaya has two aspects -- its ultimate truth aspect is the dharmadhātu; its relative truth aspect is the ālayavijñāna. Because the ultimate nature of the ālaya is the dharmadhātu, nirvana is possible. Because the relative truth aspect of the ālaya is ālayavijñāna, samsara is possible. Since the two truths are inseparable, samsara and nirvana are inseparable.

N

Huifeng said:

Hi Namdrol,

Is this like the Mahayanasamgraha position? (Assuming that the Samgraha exists in Tibetan.)

~~ Huifeng

Malcolm wrote:

I don't think so. Asanga is a realist, at least in his presentation in this text. (yes, btw).

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 8th, 2011 at 9:55 PM

Title: Re: Evolution of humans and Mahayana Buddhism

Content:

Aemilius said:

Michael Cremo...

Malcolm wrote:

...is an avowed Vedic creationist and nothing he says about archaeology and human origins can be taken seriously.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 8th, 2011 at 9:45 PM

Title: Re: 100 Syllable Mantra SUPO KAYO ME BHAVA

Content:

Pero said:

I still have some issues though... Like, didn't Sapan then receive the transmission of chili as well? Why would he bother to receive the alternate transmission and then pass it on if it doesn't matter?

Malcolm wrote:

While ChNN says the Sakyapas passed on the chili tradition, I have never seen such an initiation text or seen any mention of it in Khon Kilaya commentaries. Of course, what exists is not confined to what I have or have not seen.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 8th, 2011 at 9:42 PM

Title: Re: 100 Syllable Mantra SUPO KAYO ME BHAVA

Content:

username said:

Sassure, Levi Strauss & Chomsky, though great, are basically limited in being synchronic...

Malcolm wrote:

No, Sausurre was the one who pointed out the difference between synchrony and diachrony and elaborated the rules which govern diachronic phonetic shifts.

username said:

Also the story of how Sakya Pandita was a Sanskrit expert, overheard the guy and went to correct him. The guy said OK, you are Sakya Pandita. Did the correct Kili mantra and touched his phurba to a stone and finished and SP was happy but he was not. Then he redid it in his own way with chili and touched the phurba and it went right through the rock and said I do it my old way. SP realized this was a mahasiddha and had him transmit it to others too.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, this story is famous. But I suspect it is just a didactic story.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 8th, 2011 at 5:56 PM

Title: Re: 100 Syllable Mantra SUPO KAYO ME BHAVA

Content:

GesarMukpo said:

I always use the Sanskrit pronunciation where I know the Tibetan take is very different. They way you pronounce the mantra doesn't really make a difference, feeling bad about it does though.....

heart said:

Good point! Fear, doubt and uncertainty is what destroys all kind of Vajrayana practice. Personally I don't care about Sanskrit or Tibetan and I am not even sure the power of mantra is in the particular combination of vowels and consonants.

I think someone told me a long time ago that Sanskrit probably never was a spoken language, is that not true?

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

Sanskrit was the lingua franca of educated people. Saying that Sanskrit was never spoken is like saying that Latin was never spoken.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 8th, 2011 at 5:43 PM

Title: Re: 100 Syllable Mantra SUPO KAYO ME BHAVA

Content:

Pema Rigdzin said:

And why would they universally pick "kh" of all sounds to substitute for "sh"? It doesn't even sound remotely similar.

Namdrol said:

They did not "pick" it, anymore than Chinese decided they could not say "r" or Japanese, "l". It is a linguistic limitation inherent in their speech patterns. I am sure a professional linguist can explain this phenomena.

Pema Rigdzin said:

Haha, I don't get the Chinese difficulty with pronouncing the "r" sound in English words either. Well, I do when it comes to speakers of Chinese dialects that don't feature the sound.. But some prominent Chinese dialects have a definite "ar" sound, yet I've heard speakers of those dialects say "lice" instead of rice. At least with Japanese, I don't believe any dialect has an "L" sound. I guess a linguist expert in Tibetan would be necessary to help me understand why Tibetans naturally pronounce "kh" in this instance instead of "sh". I mean, for instance, Spanish doesn't contain a "sh" sound, generally speaking, so when native speakers who don't know how to pronounce "sh" say English words with that sound, they generally opt for the closest sound to it that they do know - "ch". Now THAT makes sense to me.

Malcolm wrote:

I have tested this Tibetans, btw. It is only with very conscious effort that they can pronounce a sibilant correctly in the middle of a Sanskrit word. This issue is not as prevalent among Tibetans that are bilingual in Hindi. In this case, their preference for fricatives is learned, rather than innate.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 8th, 2011 at 5:39 PM

Title: Re: 100 Syllable Mantra SUPO KAYO ME BHAVA

Content:

Pema Rigdzin said:

And why would they universally pick "kh" of all sounds to substitute for "sh"? It doesn't even sound remotely similar.

Namdrol said:

They did not "pick" it, anymore than Chinese decided they could not say "r" or Japanese, "l". It is a linguistic limitation inherent in their speech patterns. I am sure a professional linguist can explain this phenomena.

Pema Rigdzin said:

Haha, I don't get the Chinese difficulty with pronouncing the "r" sound in English words either. Well, I do when it comes to speakers of Chinese dialects that don't feature the sound.. But some prominent Chinese dialects have a definite "ar" sound, yet I've heard speakers of those dialects say "lice" instead of rice. At least with Japanese, I don't believe any dialect has an "L" sound. I guess a linguist expert in Tibetan would be necessary to help me understand why Tibetans naturally pronounce "kh" in this instance instead of "sh". I mean, for instance, Spanish doesn't contain a "sh" sound, generally speaking, so when native speakers who don't know how to pronounce "sh" say English words with that sound, they generally opt for the closest sound to it that they do know - "ch". Now THAT makes sense to me.

Malcolm wrote:

Another thing Tibetans cannot pronounce is "hri" without a sibilant. They always say "shri".

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 8th, 2011 at 5:26 PM

Title: Re: Chulen

Content:

Virgo said:

<http://www.siddhienergetics.com/products/chulen>

I know these pills are connected with specific practices. Can people take these pills for health/energy reasons alone, without doing them in conjunction with any specific practice or initiation?

Kavin

Malcolm wrote:

You can, but that is missing the point, a bit.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 8th, 2011 at 5:06 PM

Title: Re: Spirit possession and/or harrassment

Content:

himalayanspirit said:

I lack attention and my will power is quite weak. I am usually not able to sustain interest in worldly affairs - job, study etc.

Am I being possessed by a spirit?

Will reciting the Amitabha name ward off the spirits?

Thank you.

Malcolm wrote:

You should go to a Tibetan astrologer or have a divination done for example, by Lama Dawa.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 8th, 2011 at 5:03 PM

Title: Re: 100 Syllable Mantra SUPO KAYO ME BHAVA

Content:

Pema Rigdzin said:

If Tibetans have no difficulty pronouncing Tibetan words like "tashi" or "geshe", how is it they have trouble saying "kosha" or "Bhaisahjye"? And why would they universally pick "kh" of all sounds to substitute for "sh"? It doesn't even sound remotely similar.

Namdrol said:

bkra shis is two words. So is dge shes.

We pronounce them as a two syllable word, Tibetans pronounce them as two one syllable words, which in fact they are.

Pema Rigdzin said:

I'm not sure I understand. I've heard Tibetans say these words millions of times and both syllables run together as if they were one two syllable word.

Malcolm wrote:

You are not hearing these words as a native Tibetan speaker would.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 8th, 2011 at 5:02 PM

Title: Re: 100 Syllable Mantra SUPO KAYO ME BHAVA

Content:

Pema Rigdzin said:

And why would they universally pick "kh" of all sounds to substitute for "sh"? It doesn't even sound remotely similar.

Malcolm wrote:

They did not "pick" it, anymore than Chinese decided they could not say "r" or Japanese, "l". It is a linguistic limitation inherent in their speech patterns. I am sure a professional linguist can explain this phenomena.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 8th, 2011 at 4:59 PM

Title: Re: 100 Syllable Mantra SUPO KAYO ME BHAVA

Content:

dakini_boi said:

This doesn't seem logical - if they had just transliterated directly (using Tibetan ca cha ja for the same syllables in Sanskrit), it would have been just as effective in differentiating Sanskrit text since tsa tsha dza don't exist in Sanskrit. Why would the early transliterators deliberately complicate things?

Malcolm wrote:

Because the Tibetan ca and Sanskrit ca sound different.

ཅཅཅ are tonal, in descending order. Sanskrit ca cha ja are not tonal, since Sanskrit is not a tonal language (a point Sapan makes very clear). Thonmi Sambhota wanted to make sure that Tibetans who were reading mantras were not to pronounce ca cha ja the same way they were pronouncing ཅཅཅ. This lead to other problems, of course, later on.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 8th, 2011 at 4:51 PM

Title: Re: 100 Syllable Mantra SUPO KAYO ME BHAVA

Content:

Pema Rigdzin said:

If Tibetans have no difficulty pronouncing Tibetan words like "tashi" or "geshe", how is it they have trouble saying "kosha" or "Bhaisahjye"? And why would they universally pick "kh" of all sounds to substitute for "sh"? It doesn't even sound remotely similar.

Malcolm wrote:

bkra shis is two words. So is dge shes.

We pronounce them as a two syllable word, Tibetans pronounce them as two one syllable words, which in fact they are.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 8th, 2011 at 9:25 AM

Title: Re: 100 Syllable Mantra SUPO KAYO ME BHAVA

Content:

dakini_boi said:

Kevin - I'm curious what your opinion is then, for mantras found in earth terma - for example, the sanskrit syllable "ca" will be found in Tibetan as "tsa", so you actually have "tsitta" vs. "citta." should we go back to sanskrit pronunciation in such cases, even though the written terma appeared with Tibetan misspelling of sanskrit words? This is confusing!

Namdrol said:

It is not a Tibetan misspelling.

The Tibetans deliberately employed tsa tsha dza to represent the Sanskrit ca cha and ja to differentiate Sanskrit words from Tibetan words. Thus, we are to understand that tsa tsha dza are to be pronounced ca cha and ja hence ཅེ་ཅེ་ should never be transliterated tsitta into English, it should only be transliterated "citta" since that is what is intended.

N

dakini_boi said:

How would using tsa tsha dza serve to differentiate Sanskrit words from Tibetan? After all, the Tibetan language uses these syllables as well.

If the Sakyapa tradition is to pronounce everything according to Sanskrit, then take the Vajrakilaya mantra - there are three words which in normal transliteration (both Tibetan and Roman) start with B. Do Sakyapas then pronounce these all with V?

Thank you, Namdrol. As usual, your expertise is most appreciated.

Malcolm wrote:

Because བཟུང་ are never used in Tibetanizations of Sanskrit words -- never, ever, ever.

Vajra, vighnan bandha. And properly, "v" as in Latin. Wajra wighnan, bandha.

IN prattice, HHST generally uses the Tshang version of Tibetan pronunciation of mantras i.e. Badzra, bighnan, etc.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 8th, 2011 at 9:10 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen and other traditions

Content:

AilurusFulgens said:

Why am I bringing this up? Because of the following central questions:

a.) Where does Dzogchen practised by a person who is neither Buddhist, nor accepts the doctrine of anatman or pratityasamutpada (dependent origination) lead to according to traditional textual sources and living oral tradition? Do such people simply get stuck in formless blissful realms or are they simply wasting their time or do they go to Vajra hells....?

Namdrol said:

At best, rebirth in a nirmanakāya buddhafiield.

N

dakini_boi said:

Why in this case, a nirmanakaya buddhafiield as opposed to dharmakaya or sambhogakaya?

Malcolm wrote:

Because ordinary people can see a nirmankāya, but cannot see a Sambhogakāya, much less the Dharmakāya.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 8th, 2011 at 8:13 AM

Title: Re: why did you 'guess' buddhism?

Content:

coldmountain said:

What convinces you that realized Buddhist masters are correct?

Malcolm wrote:

- 1) Dependent origination.
- 2) Emptiness.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 8th, 2011 at 7:48 AM

Title: Re: 100 Syllable Mantra SUPO KAYO ME BHAVA

Content:

Chaz said:

You may very well be right, but the anthropologist in me is a bit skeptical of that asertion. Sorry.

Namdrol said:

It's a linguistic certainty.

Chaz said:

Care to cite a study? To assert that a certain group of people over a period of time spanning many centuries said things a certain way, is without some study to back it up, is a bit of reach. So, if you don't mind

Malcolm wrote:

Well, we have a lot of evidence.

One, there is a text by Sakya Pandita that describes very well how Indians in different regions of India such as central India and Kashmir pronounced Sanskrit -- and he was personally acquainted with 30 panditas.

Two, Indians in the described regions still pronounce Sanskrit in the manner in which Sapan says they did 800 years ago.

Three, pronunciation of Sanskrit is a major obsession with Brahmins since the proper pronunciation of the Vedas and vedic rites is considered crucial for their effectiveness. The similarities and (minor) differences in Sanskrit pronunciation between different brahmin traditions in India is well understood and mapped.

Four, changes in pronunciation can be accurately mapped mathematically (and are). I am sure you have encountered structural linguistics. I am not arguing that everything Sausurre said is true, but there are regular rules to phonetic shifts in Indo-europeean lanaguages and nothing in the Indian subcontinent that makes a sibilant ş or ś shift to a fricative kh possible.

The regularity with which Tibetans mispronounce both ş and ś when they are present in the middle of Sanskrit words indicates this is a pronunciation that is not an Indo-

European language issue and instead is a Tibetan linguistic issue -- for example, I have heard Tibetans mispronounce kośa (kosha, mispronounced "kokha") with the same regularity as they mispronounce aṣṭa (saying "akha") or say Bhekhenze for Bhaiṣajye. In other words, mono-lingual Tibetans have a hard time pronouncing sibilants present in the middle of words since in Tibetan there are no sibilants present in the middle of a word. A Tibetan who has no problem pronouncing "bud shing" (firewood, and two separate words) will mispronounce kośa everytime unless they have received specific Sanskrit training.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 8th, 2011 at 7:39 AM

Title: Re: Evolution of humans and Mahayana Buddhism

Content:

Kai said:

There is a scholar who almost claimed that China discovered America way before Columbus but we all know that he is not to be taken seriously.

Malcolm wrote:

It is certain, however, that Vikings were present in North America. There is some reason to believe that Irish fisher folks also found their way to the East Coast, and some reason to suppose that Phoenecians may have found their way to S. America.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 8th, 2011 at 7:17 AM

Title: Re: ORMUS ?

Content:

Tarpa said:

Thanks, was just curious, I was checking out your link to vimala at siddhi energetics from your medicine blog and then checked out a link from there and stumbled upon this stuff somewhere, never heard of it.

Thank you

Malcolm wrote:

Joeseeph is very eclectic, but his Tibetan formulas are well made.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 8th, 2011 at 7:16 AM

Title: Re: ORMUS ?

Content:

Tarpa said:

Thanks, was just curious, I was checking out your link to vimala at siddhi energetics from your medicine blog and then checked out a link from there and stumbled upon this stuff somewhere, never heard of it. I was put off by them referring to it as the philosophers stone wich I new was mercury, set off my new age b.s. alarm although the site seems to be based on scientific curiosity as to what this stuff is.

Incidentally Namdrol-la what would you suggest for someone that came down with extreme panic attacks and dissociation all of a sudden, no mental aspect such as fear or worry, purely physiological, and also has digestive probs and lower body heat ? Would agar-35 or vimala be better or something else ? The anxiety/ dissociation started 3 months ago and have almost gone completely other than very occasional mild dissociation/ anxiety wich I credit to increased practice and herbal supplements such as choline / inositol, valerian, and passion flower, and exercise (swimming) and drinking lots of dutsi water, but I have had digestive probs for years and lots of heat in my abdomen area, when I first started practicing meditation I used to get lots of heat in my abdomen area, I developed stomach/ digestive probs a few years later, I don't know if they are connected, I don't experience that when meditating anymore, I only had that problem when meditating for like the first year.

Thank you

Malcolm wrote:

Contact me offline.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 8th, 2011 at 6:24 AM

Title: Re: 100 Syllable Mantra SUPO KAYO ME BHAVA

Content:

Chaz said:

You may very well be right, but the anthropologist in me is a bit skeptical of that asertion. Sorry.

Malcolm wrote:

It's a linguistic certainty.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 8th, 2011 at 5:59 AM

Title: Re: 100 Syllable Mantra SUPO KAYO ME BHAVA

Content:

Chaz said:

Well, that's certainly possible, but by no means a certainty.

Malcolm wrote:

It is a certainty that no Indian master ever recited Bhaiṣajya as Bhekenze or supoṣyo as Supo kayo. This leaves only Tibetans to mispronounce these mantras and transmit them in that fashion. Which means if the mantra is effective for them in this mispronounced fashion, it is certain that if one receives the transmission and then corrects the pronunciation, it will be as effective.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 8th, 2011 at 5:54 AM

Title: Re: 100 Syllable Mantra SUPO KAYO ME BHAVA

Content:

Pero said:

Do they just simply all work if they're in Sanskrit original or something?

Malcolm wrote:

Basically, the reason why your argument is fallacious is because if you argue that a Tibetan pronunciation of a mantra is effective even though it is incorrect, then there is no fault in reciting mantras properly. Why, because presumably the mantra was communicated to a Tibetan who pronounced kili as chili, there is no logical reason why a mantra transmitted by a Tibetan as chili pronounced kili will not be equally as effective (especially since it is the original pronunciation). You are arguing that it only one way i.e. Tibetans can mispronounce mantras and gain siddhi. But we cannot. This is foolish.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 8th, 2011 at 4:58 AM

Title: Re: Who are the tulkus in the documentary "TULKU"

Content:

GesarMukpo said:

Namdrol...when we talked on the phone

Malcolm wrote:

We never talked on the phone. Ever.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 8th, 2011 at 4:48 AM

Title: Re: ORMUS ?

Content:

Tarpa said:

What's up with ormus ?

<http://www.futurealchemy.com/wetr.html> " onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

<http://www.subtleenergies.com/> " onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

Malcolm wrote:

No clue -- they have nothing to with Tibetan Medicine or Ayurveda. The so called philosopher's stone is mercury. Ofen, the so called "gold transformation elixir" (gser gyur rtsi) is improperly understood. What it really is, is an early process of gold plating, applying gold to copper by mixing that gold with mercury and then evaporating the mercury leaving a very smooth painted gold appearance on the copper.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 8th, 2011 at 4:40 AM

Title: Re: 100 Syllable Mantra SUPO KAYO ME BHAVA

Content:

Namdrol said:

In general, the Sakyapa approach is as Kevin suggested ie. Sanskrit pronunciation of Sanskrit mantras, according to all the Sakya masters I have studied with. No Bazar, Bazar, and so on.

Pero said:

Irrelevant for people who don't have the Sanskrit transmission. Supokayo is supokayo, not suposhyo.

Malcolm wrote:

I don't agree. Why? Originally the mantra was mispronounced by some Tibetan who got it from an Indian teacher. His teacher said supoşyo, he said Supo kaya. There is absolutely no fault in restoring the proper pronunciation. No blessings are lost, no sacred "power" is lost. In this respect I completely disagree with anyone who says one must recite mantras according to manner in which one's teacher pronounces them if that manner is not consistent with the rules of Sanskrit pronunciation. It is illogical to maintain this position. It is basically an argument for blind faith. In this respect, in my opinion, Sakya Paṇḍita's position is best. Of course people are free to choose what they wish to do.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 8th, 2011 at 3:51 AM

Title: Re: 100 Syllable Mantra SUPO KAYO ME BHAVA

Content:

Chaz said:

Really? I know several Tibetans personally and they all have the same speech faulties I have. IOW, they can repeat any sound that that I can.

Malcolm wrote:

Tibetans have a very hard time with "sh" in the middle of words. Hence Bekhandze for Bhaiṣajya. Suṣoṣyo is another example. Other common errors come from Tibetans who have not studied Sanskrit pronouncing Tibeteanzed mantras incorrectly compared to the Sanskrit original. Pemey (as opposed to Padme) comes from the fact that in Tibetan, a consonant following a vowel often modifies "a" to "e".

Chaz said:

It's not a question of the right or wrong way to do it. It's a question of devotion.

Malcolm wrote:

In general, the Sakyapa approach is as Kevin suggested ie. Sanskrit pronunciation of Sanskrit mantras, according to all the Sakya masters I have studied with. No Benzar, Bazar, and so on.

I presonally recite things as best I can according to how Sanskrit is pronounced by Varanasi brahmins. I fail of course, but I try.

Not all mantras are in Sanskrit, there are some in Tibetan, and other languages, BTW.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 8th, 2011 at 3:22 AM

Title: Re: 100 Syllable Mantra SUPO KAYO ME BHAVA

Content:

dakini_boi said:

Kevin - I'm curious what your opinion is then, for mantras found in earth terma - for example, the sanskrit syllable "ca" will be found in Tibetan as "tsa", so you actually have "tsitta" vs. "citta." should we go back to sanskrit pronunciation in such cases, even though the written terma appeared with Tibetan misspelling of sanskrit words? This is confusing!

Malcolm wrote:

It is not a Tibetan misspelling.

The Tibetans deliberately employed tsa tsha dza to represent the Sanskrit ca cha and ja to differentiate Sanskrit words from Tibetan words. Thus, we are to understand that tsa tsha dza are to be pronounced ca cha and ja hence ཅེད་ should never be transliterated tsitta into English, it should only be transliterated "citta" since that is what is intended.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 8th, 2011 at 2:05 AM

Title: Re: Spirit possession and/or harrassment

Content:

pemachophel said:

From the POV of chod, the best way to ward off attacks from spirits is to remain free from hope and fear..

Namdrol said:

Yes and no -- virtually all illnesses have a accompanying demonic component.

gnegirl said:

srsly?

Malcolm wrote:

Seriously.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 8th, 2011 at 12:53 AM

Title: Re: Awareness.

Content:

White Lotus said:

ha! ha! ha! and yes, i do like to read a lot.

in Rigpa there are no requirements. if the guru says that one must see ones own nature. i tell him...

why are you talking crap.

"spontaneously" complete. ordinary mind is enlightenment.

best wishes, Tom.

Sönam said:

Ordinary mind is sems, not rigpa ... at best your view is a yogacara view.

Sönam

Malcolm wrote:

I think he means "tha mal gyi shes pa".

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 8th, 2011 at 12:41 AM

Title: Re: Spirit possession and/or harrassment

Content:

pemachophel said:

From the POV of chod, the best way to ward off attacks from spirits is to remain free from hope and fear..

Malcolm wrote:

Yes and no -- virtually all illnesses have a accompanying demonic component.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 7th, 2011 at 10:49 PM

Title: Re: Spirit possession and/or harrassment

Content:

Jotham said:

I came across this episode in the book "A Saint in Seattle" where the late Dezheng Rinpoche recognized that a girl was possessed and harrassed by a spirit. My questions are:

(a) How do we recognize that a person is possessed and/or harrassed by spirits and not mental problem (like hallucination)?

(b) What should or can we do to ward off or chase off these spirits?

Malcolm wrote:

As for (a), (a) can be both. People who have mental illness are more liable to spirit attacks; people suffering from spirit attacks are more liable to have mental illness as a result.

Second, for ordinary people, Tibetan astrology is the best method for recognizing what type of spirit and the required rite for driving it off.

One simple thing one can do is burn guggulu in one's house. One can do a so called "gegs tor" rite usually found in the beginning of a sadhana, especially nyingma sadhanas.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 7th, 2011 at 10:45 PM

Title: Re: Why combine Dzogchen and Mahamudra?

Content:

Pema Rigdzin said:

I was actually thinking of what is commonly referred to as "essence Mahamudra" and which is pretty widely considered more or less equivalent to Dzogchen's tregchod.

Malcolm wrote:

No, Four yogas = four samadhis (sems sde) = tregchö (man ngag sde).

Essence mahāmudra is completely different. It is basically a cig car method of sudden awakening. It is equivalent to direct introduction.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 7th, 2011 at 4:29 AM

Title: Re: God speaks about Rick Perry

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

God needs a little remedial grammar.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 7th, 2011 at 1:59 AM

Title: Re: Why combine Dzogchen and Mahamudra?

Content:

padma norbu said:

Nobody responded to me, so you probably don't care, but, I went ahead and got that Practice of Mahamudra book. $6.50. I guess I'll do the practices if I feel like it without any connection to the lineage.

Malcolm wrote:

That would be a mistake. In order to practice this system of mahāmudra (five fold mahāmudra) you need to have the initiation of Cakrasamvara. And thsi system really stresses guru devotion.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 7th, 2011 at 1:30 AM

Title: Re: Vatta and depression?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

When treating any disease one must treat all three doshas. If one is out of balance, by necessity so too will the others.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 7th, 2011 at 12:39 AM

Title: Re: Vatta and depression?

Content:

Virgo said:

Hi, I've suffered from vatta imbalances for most of my life. I've taken a number of measures to help balance it including massage oil, which was an excellent recommendation. My question is my vatta has usually manifested as nervousness, agitation, lethargy and fatigue when I expend too much energy and physical problems such as stiffness, dryness, aches, headaches, spinal discomfort, and very brittle bones, also irregularity of breathing. Sadness and depression have never really been an issue with me, save for a few months when I was about 15 or 16. Sometimes my outlook can be a little negative or dismal, at times. Sometimes I don't have a lot of "get up and go" and lack some enthusiasm for making money and stuff like that. I could be totally wrong but I usually right it off as a lack of ojas because of constitution, diet and lifestyle. Is this is what is meant by sadness or depression in vatta imbalances because I am sure I have had vatta, but do not experience "depression" per say? What I am asking is, if I have vatta how come I am not depressed, or does my slight lack of get up and go, nervousness and so forth, sometimes slightly dismal attitude, count as "depression"? I mean, I do smile a lot.

Thank you,

Kevin

Malcolm wrote:

From a Tibetan medical point of view there are many reasons for depression, not just vata.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 7th, 2011 at 12:33 AM

Title: Re: "Mahamudra and Related Instructions," Peter Roberts

Content:

conebeckham said:

The "Lac Liquid" is, I think, a special sort of liquid, which is not really something available to us.....some Tantras talk of creating this special "salve" or substance.....I believe that's what's being discussed, though I don't have the book in front of me. I'd bet Namdrol could clarify this further.

Malcolm wrote:

Lac is the secretion of an insect that lives on the bark of Kerria lacca tree that is used in making red lacquer.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 7th, 2011 at 12:02 AM

Title: Re: Site validation ...

Content:

Sönarn said:

I receive to day Rinchen Mangjor pills ... is there any counter-indications regarding age and previous embolism manifestation ... and others heart fragilities.

thank you in advance

Sönarn

Malcolm wrote:

Only use them twice a month at most.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 6th, 2011 at 11:32 PM

Title: Re: Awareness.

Content:

White Lotus said:

nothing needed, naturally spontaneously complete... merits? you are too kind Sonam. rigpa may be entered with the mind seal already attained. no need for a mind seal. the mahamudra is not needed.

Kalden, it is not a matter of awareness... awareness is cool, but completely unnecessary when it is absent, eg in deep sleep, or day dreaming. the natural state is sometimes aware, sometimes not aware. just naturally as you are.

no need for talk of no mind, no self, nothingness or emptiness. you may have the seal of emptiness, you may know your own nature. these things are not necessary. the natural state is spontaneously complete.

when you taste the natural state it radiates, no need to taste the natural state. naturally complete just as you are naturally so. so when you worry, then you worry. when you are sad you are sad, suffering you naturally suffer. all complete.

best wishes, Tom.

Malcolm wrote:

When you are full of crap, you are naturally full of crap...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 6th, 2011 at 8:18 AM

Title: Re: Prayer to be a good kind doctor.

Content:

Calahand said:

Hi , I am going to be a doctor in a few months, I am applying to internal medicine programs, but I don't know if I will get a good residency program that will make me a competent physician... i want to ask people here to please pray for me and my situation, hopefully i can get a good residency and become a competent physician that heals and not just someone who goes through the motions to do a job for the heck of it.

Malcolm wrote:

You should do Medicine Buddha practice.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 6th, 2011 at 3:07 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen and other traditions

Content:

AilurusFulgens said:

How would this be okay? i guess seeing the essential shakti as empty?

but how is that possible to practice SriVidya sadhana seeing shiva and shakti as empty? This was exactly my point. The questions you raised are exactly those that I have. You took the words out of my mouth. You see, I am trying to put myself in the shoes of a Buddhist and then switch the view and put myself in the shoes of a practitioner of Sanatana Dharma (commonly known in the West as Hinduism).

I want to examine things from all possible angles - or at least as many of them as possible - in order to reach deeper understanding.

Of course, this has its limits. You cannot go on examining till you are old and on the verge of dying. My aim is to do things correctly. I would not like to become some confused, half-baked New Age Buddhist, if I do fully commit to Buddhadharma. Things simply have to fit.

goldenlotus said:

There is something about buddhadharma meditation that attracts me to, i used to practice khadgamala stotram with all the visualisations, nysas, mudras etc. it's a beautiful tradition(with good visions too) but something about buddhist yoga im interested in.

good luck

Malcolm wrote:

The Buddha never told brahmins to cease practicing vedic rituals. In fact he encouraged it. But what he said was that vedic ritual was not liberative. he never denied however that it was a mundane benefit.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 6th, 2011 at 1:58 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen and other traditions

Content:

AilurusFulgens said:

What fascinates me is also Tibetan Medicine and it was really remarkable to see that Choegyal Namkhai Norbu Rinpoche is presenting it through the lens of Dzogchen.

Malcolm wrote:

Tibetan Medicine is a Nyingma system, so it is not suprising that it is related to Dzogchen since it contains Dzogchen.

Tibetan Medicine is the only medical system integrated with Vajrayāna.

AilurusFulgens said:

Now, I accomplished the 10,000 recitations in 10 days. And then all these things with Buddhism started

Malcolm wrote:

As I said, your merit ripened.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 6th, 2011 at 1:49 AM

Title: Re: Tulku Thondup explains about tulkus

Content:

kirtu said:

From the <https://blazing-splendor.blogspot.com/2011/08/what-is-tulku.html>

Malcolm wrote:

You can put your faith in tulks. I will put my faith in practitioners.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 6th, 2011 at 1:45 AM

Title: Re: The Vajra Guru Mantra of Guru Rinpoche

Content:

narraboth said:

Actually there's no rule saying that you can not chant mantra without initiation, except some special mantra.

Namdrol said:

yes, actually there are.

Dharanis from sutras, however are different.

narraboth said:

depends on what you mean for 'sutras'. I think we call Tara tantra 'sutra' in China... no matter what we still chant tare mantra.

Amoghapasa is a tantra, Manjusri root tantra is a tantra, they are all huge texts, and many other 'tantras'...

People, especially chinese buddhists, chant many of them without even LUNG, and there are many signs of 'siddhis'.

Yes, there is a line saying 'without initiation, getting siddhi is like pressing oil from sands'. but I don't think it can be understood as you won't be benefited by simply reciting mani, tare tu tare, vajra guru, arapachana.... at least i haven't heard any tibetan lama suggested that. (Tibetan themselves don't worry this)

Most of lama indicate that so-called practice in that saying is strictly tantric practice such as two stages. A senior Gelug-Nyingma master said as long as you don't do self generation, you can visualise dieties in front and chant mantra, it's not a problem that you haven't got initiation. There are also many similar teachings.

Malcolm wrote:

The mani is a dharani, so here is a sutra system for chanting it. Arapacana is also from sutra.

The tantras you are mentioning are so called "kalpa" tantras, sections of sutra that are also classfied as kriya tantra, so again, no contradiction. Most of the mantras that Chinese people are chanting are from sutra or dharani texts. Many of these were also translated from Chinese into Tibetan.

But this will not work with Vajrakilaya, etc. You must have the transmission.

Medicine Buddha, Tara, etc., kriya deities from the Buddha and Lotus families may not require intiation (but that depends too), but mantras from the Vajra family of Kriya tantra definitely require initiation since they are connected with controlling Guhyakas.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 6th, 2011 at 12:49 AM

Title: Re: The Vajra Guru Mantra of Guru Rinpoche

Content:

narraboth said:

Actually there's no rule saying that you can not chant mantra without initiation, except some special mantra.

Malcolm wrote:

yes, actually there are.

Dharanis from sutras, however are different.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 6th, 2011 at 12:31 AM

Title: Re: Ālaya in Sakya

Content:

Kai said:

Sūtra inseparability of samsara and nirvana may be found in the Heart Sūtra. The tantric view of inseparability of samsara and nirvana may be found in the Hevajra tantra.

What does you mean? There is a distinctive difference between the tantric view of inseparability and the Sutric view of inseparability?

Malcolm wrote:

The difference is one of method, not view.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 6th, 2011 at 12:05 AM

Title: Re: Ālaya in Sakya

Content:

Kai said:

So ultimate alaya = Tathāgatagarbha?

I just want to make sure.....

Malcolm wrote:

Inseparability = tathāgatagarbha.

According to the Sakya masters, ālaya has two aspects -- its ultimate truth aspect is the dharmadhātu; its relative truth aspect is the ālayavijñāna. Because the ultimate nature of the ālaya is the dharmadhātu, nirvana is possible. Because the relative truth aspect of the ālaya is ālayavijñāna, samsara is possible. Since the two truths are inseparable, samsara and nirvana are inseparable.

Hence the special Sakya view is well known as 'khor 'das dbyer med, the inseparability of samsara and nirvana. Sūtra inseparability of samsara and nirvana may be found in the Heart Sūtra. The tantric view of inseparability of samsara and nirvana may be found in the Hevajra tantra.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 5th, 2011 at 11:24 PM

Title: Re: Dzogchen and other traditions

Content:

AilurusFulgens said:

Initially I was not drawn to Buddhism at all. But what draws me to Buddhism now?

Malcolm wrote:

From our point of view, the ripening of merit.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 5th, 2011 at 10:39 PM

Title: Ālaya in Sakya

Content:

Kai said:

Alaya being the neutral ground of both Samara and Nirvana while Buddha nature, the clarity aspect of Alaya, hold the potential for sentinel beings to reach Nirvana while the alaya consciousness, dull aspect of Alaya, traps all beings within the grasp of Samara.

Malcolm wrote:

This is not how the Sakya master formulate their idea of the ālaya.

Following Sakya Pandita, Gorampa, in the first section of his three vows commentary, very clearly shows that clarity cannot be tathāgatagarbha since it is conditioned; and emptiness cannot be tathāgatagarbha, since it is the extreme of cessation.

Tathāgatagarbha, according to the standard, orthodox Sakya view is the inseparability of clarity and emptiness.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 5th, 2011 at 10:26 PM

Title: Re: The Vajra Guru Mantra of Guru Rinpoche

Content:

AilurusFulgens said:

Would this merely lead the practitioner to a qualified teacher...?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 5th, 2011 at 10:26 PM

Title: Re: Dzogchen and other traditions

Content:

AilurusFulgens said:

Very interesting.

I am asking all this, because of a particular interest in some Shaiva tantric teachings connected with kayasadhana.

Still in one of these Tantras it is mentioned that without having bhakti towards Shiva his Grace cannot descend and grant the siddhi in these particular sadhanas.

Is bhakti towards Shiva incompatible with simultaneously taking refuge in the Buddha as a practitioner of Vajrayana? Keeping again in my mind the adherence also to all other elements of Buddhadharma i.e. the anatman-doctrine, dependent origination, etc.

A. Fulgens

Malcolm wrote:

It is all about refuge. If your refuge is Buddha Dharma and Sangha, worldly deities like Shiva can assist one, but they cannot be refuges.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 5th, 2011 at 10:10 PM

Title: Re: Dzogchen and other traditions

Content:

AilurusFulgens said:

This is highly interesting. Could you please tell me more about Shiva being converted to Dharma by Avalokiteshvara?

Malcolm wrote:

The account is given in the Karandavyuha sūtra.

AilurusFulgens said:

What would Shiva now be from the viewpoint of Vajrayana? A Boddhisattva? Or something like the converted Tibetan deities turned dharmapalas by Padmasambhava?

Malcolm wrote:

Shiva is a Nyingma dharmapāla.

AilurusFulgens said:

I do not want to appear as obnoxious or pedantic, but if a Vajrayana practitioner (sic!) decides to receive a formal initiation or diksha (including bahiryaga in the form of worshipping a yantra, reciting a mantra, etc. as well as antaryaga in the form of inner kriyas involving breath, chakras, visualizations, etc.) into a complex of Tantric teachings such as the Sri Vidya cult from an orthodox Brahmin Guru from south India, while adhering strictly to the notions of anatman, dependent origination, 4 noble truths, etc., then this would be perfectly O.K.?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, IMO. Don't much see the point, but on the other hand, I am very interested to learn Yoga from a guy named Shrivatsa Ramaswami, and part of his program involves vedic chanting, etc. Don't know if I will ever have time or money, but he is someone I have a lot of natural confidence in.

AilurusFulgens said:

Would this be valid even in the case of a Dzogchenpa (given that he belongs to the highest yana)?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, IMO.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 5th, 2011 at 10:03 PM

Title: Re: The Vajra Guru Mantra of Guru Rinpoche

Content:

AlexanderS said:

Would it be pointless for me to recite the vajra guru mantra without initiation? Pointless as in little benefit.

Malcolm wrote:

If you have faith in Guru Rinpoche, you can recite it without initiation.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 5th, 2011 at 9:57 PM

Title: Re: The Vajra Guru Mantra of Guru Rinpoche

Content:

AilurusFulgens said:

Your help is much appreciated, Namdrol, thank you. Please forgive me, if my questions appear somewhat odd, but I would have one additional query.

I do not want to descend into any miracle mongering or anything similar, but I do have a genuine interest in clarifying certain things.

Do in Tibetan Vajrayana exist teachings, which would make it possible to cause Padmasambhava to appear to a sufficiently accomplished practitioner not only in dreams or a meditative vision, but physically and materially in his svarupa (i.e. not under any disguise such as an old farmer, etc.)?

A. Fulgens

Malcolm wrote:

Padmsambhava made a commitment to physically visit anyone who recited his mantra or prayer every tenth day of the waxing moon. Whether you can see him or not depends on your level of obscuration.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 5th, 2011 at 9:52 PM

Title: Re: Dzogchen and other traditions

Content:

AilurusFulgens said:

Please forgive me my ignorance, but is a nirmanakaya buddhafiield something like a terrestrial pure land i.e. Shambhala, Copper Mountain, etc.? How is a nirmanakaya buddhafiield defined?

Malcolm wrote:

More like Amitabha's Sukhavati.

AilurusFulgens said:

I would have a further question and this time the situation is reversed. What would happen to a Buddhist who would study Hindu Tantric teachings? Would this even be possible?

Providing of course that he stays Buddhist (this is the situation I am speaking about), how would the practice of Hindu Tantric teachings influence his meditation, inner practice, samayas, etc.?

A. Fulgens

Malcolm wrote:

Buddhist can study and practice Hindu tantra (or vedas, etc., as long as it is not at expense of Buddhist training). They may not take refuge on Hindu deities however. In other words there is nothing wrong with chanting Namoh Shivaya at a kirtan as long as you are not going for refuge. On the other hand, Shiva was converted to Dharma by Avalokiteshvara.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 5th, 2011 at 9:41 PM

Title: Re: The Vajra Guru Mantra of Guru Rinpoche

Content:

AilurusFulgens said:

Thank you, Namdrol for the clarification. Still at least partially the question remains i.e. let us say that your average Joe Sixpack decides one morning to sit down and commit to reciting the Vajra Guru Mantra, that he simply got from the internet and without being initiated into it, 600 million times with as much devotion as he can muster.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, if he did this, it would be certain that in the due course of time he would meet a qualified teacher.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 5th, 2011 at 9:36 PM

Title: Re: The Vajra Guru Mantra of Guru Rinpoche

Content:

AilurusFulgens said:

[Now, this would then presuppose that the above mentioned Bhutanese adept received an initiation in the Vajra Guru Mantra from someone qualified somewhere at sometime in his life.

Malcolm wrote:

From your website:

Finally, he listened to some masters' advice and decided to start reciting the Vajra Guru mantra (OM AH HUNG BENZA GURU PADMA SIDDHI HUNG)

Yes. And it is impossible that this would not happen in a country such as Bhutan where Guru Rinpoche is taught to children when they are infants.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 5th, 2011 at 9:34 PM

Title: Re: Padmasambhava as the incarnation of Amitabha?

Content:

Nosta said:

Accordingly to buddhism, after Shakyamuni the next Buddha will be Maytreya, so i dint understand how Padmasambhava could be a incarnation of Amitabha. Can someone explain me this paradox?

Malcolm wrote:

In Mahāhyāna, there is a distinction between supreme nirmankāyas, such as Śākyamuni, and so called "variegated" nirmanakāyas such as Padmasambhava, Garab Dorje and so on.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 5th, 2011 at 9:32 PM

Title: Re: Padmasambhava as the incarnation of Amitabha?

Content:

Ryoto said:

Is this the view of all Tibetan schools? How was he come to thought of as that incarnation?

Malcolm wrote:

As to question one: yes.

As to question two, Amitabha is the master of the family of the lotus family. Padmasambhava is regarded as an emanation, a nirmanakāya. Therefore, his Sambhogakāya manifestation is Avaokiteshvara and his Dharmakāya manifestation is Amitabha, just as for example, Śākyamuni's family is the tathāgata family, his dharmakāya manifestation is Samantabhadra and his Sambhogakāya manifestation is Vairocana.

As for Padmasambhava, this is an idea that comes from the treasure tradition. I don't think I have seen an early pre-treasure tradition text that makes this claim.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 5th, 2011 at 9:07 PM

Title: Re: Dzogchen and other traditions

Content:

AilurusFulgens said:

Why am I bringing this up? Because of the following central questions:

a.) Where does Dzogchen practised by a person who is neither Buddhist, nor accepts the doctrine of anatman or pratityasamutpada (dependent origination) lead to according to traditional textual sources and living oral tradition? Do such people simply get stuck in formless blissful realms or are they simply wasting their time or do they go to Vajra hells....?

Malcolm wrote:

At best, rebirth in a nirmanakāya buddhafiield.

AilurusFulgens said:

Now, do the Bonpos have the notions of anatman, pratityasamutpada (dependent origination), etc.? I mean the core notions, without which Buddhadharma is not Buddhadharma. If so, then there is no contradiction.

Malcolm wrote:

The Bonpos have Madhyamaka, a version of dependent origination and so on.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 5th, 2011 at 9:03 PM

Title: Re: The Vajra Guru Mantra of Guru Rinpoche

Content:

AilurusFulgens said:

a nityasiddha mantra i.e. "eternally or inherently perfect" and can yield the highest mantrasiddhi even to a person, who has not been initiated into it, but chants it devoutly?

Malcolm wrote:

This concept does not exist in Vajrayāna.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 5th, 2011 at 3:03 AM

Title: Re: Evolution of humans and Mahayana Buddhism

Content:

Astus said:

I'd argue that "small beings" and microorganisms are not the same thing. Tiny insects are one thing, bacteria are another, and the second type of beings are not filtered by a simple cloth. It's also problematic to call bacteria "sentient beings" from a Buddhist point of view.

Malcolm wrote:

<https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Microorganism> " onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

Small animals, so called "micro-animals, are included within the category of microorganism.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, September 4th, 2011 at 7:32 PM

Title: Re: Evolution of humans and Mahayana Buddhism

Content:

devilyoudont said:

Thanks. Was it the Buddha himself who instituted this practice? While it's unquestionably hygienic for the drinker, I'm not sure how effectively this would save the lives of even those microorganisms that can be filtered out with a cloth strainer. Was the cloth washed in a lake or stream before drying out in order to release these animalcules back into their native environment?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, it was the Buddha himself who instituted the practice. It was also a practice followed by other ascetics at the time. I am sure you can read about in a Vinaya commentary.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, September 4th, 2011 at 8:55 AM

Title: Re: Studying Nyingma

Content:

sangyey said:

How about Abhidharma study/texts/books? Does anyone have any recommendations for Abhidharma study within the Nyingma Lineage?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, you can take my abhidharma course online here:

<http://rsl-ne.com/abhidharma1.html> " onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, September 4th, 2011 at 8:06 AM

Title: Re: Awareness.

Content:

White Lotus said:

just be in the natural state, no worries about theories and concepts. nothing to worry about.

Malcolm wrote:

The problem with sentient beings is that their natural state is afflicted.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, September 4th, 2011 at 8:04 AM

Title: Re: Evolution of humans and Mahayana Buddhism

Content:

devilyoudont said:

Also, when he was talking about sentient beings in the water, wasn't the Buddha referring to the perspective of interdependence in which phenomena are reflected in each other?

Malcolm wrote:

No, he was talking about microorganisms -- which is why part of the gear issued to Buddhist monks back in the day was a special fine cloth which acted as a water filter.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, September 4th, 2011 at 5:06 AM

Title: Re: ChNN's Vajra Armour teaching

Content:

Fa Dao said:

My book from DC came today!!! woo hoo!! I have a question though...the part of the mantra that has "Tadyatha", the book says this may be omitted due to the mantra only supposed to have 30 syllables, but is somewhat ambiguous on this point...any suggestions from those who have heard and practiced the teaching directly from ChNNR?

Malcolm wrote:

just say tadyatha...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, September 4th, 2011 at 3:19 AM

Title: Re: Digital Tibetan Buddhist Altar

Content:

padma norbu said:

when I read in the paper that he made death threats during a murder trial

Malcolm wrote:

You believe everything you read in newspapers?

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, September 4th, 2011 at 12:34 AM

Title: Re: Why combine Dzogchen and Mahamudra?

Content:

deepbluehum said:

Ok sorry. I was intending it to be a serious post. Its one of those situations where I'm trying to be serious and it draws laughter. That makes me feel a little stupid. Please tell me what is so funny so I can laugh too.

Malcolm wrote:

I imagine it was this:

Because Togal has its own stages and explanations so if you practice Mahamudra like I have described and then go practice Togal it is like going backwards.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, September 4th, 2011 at 12:31 AM

Title: Re: Digital Tibetan Buddhist Altar

Content:

padma norbu said:

The rumor mills aren't exaggerating news items and arrest reports, his actual book titles and claims, etc.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, the way I see it, they actually are exaggerating the news items, the arrest reports and so on, trying to show those records in the worst possible light, and going to a lot of effort to dig up trash about one guy and publishing a lot of hearsay about him, some of which may actually be libelous.

We only really have their story here. We do not have Cassidy's side of the story, do we? That is why I am saying that you are taking a side since you are only taking one source for your information.

As I see it, there is nothing particularly wrong with writing a book about knife-fighting techniques. Not to my taste, but not illegal. Certainly I know a lot of Buddhists (including famous contemporary teachers) that are totally into weapons -- guns, knives, swords, you name it.

Basically, how Buddhist is it to put someone in jail? Bodhisattvas are supposed to free people from shackles, not place them in shackles. Bodhisattvas should exercise patience and restraint, not engage in systematic group smear campaigns.

In other words, I said he has some interesting things to say on his blog -- you come back with all this heavy stuff about why this is terrible. If Cassidy was just some schmuck claiming to be a tulku and writing a blog, we wouldn't give any of this a second thought -- it would be at best a minor disagreement. But because he has a record, and he tangled with a wealthy religious organization, he is being screwed to the wall, and this is taking on much more of a life than it really deserves. Hell, G Gordon Liddy has interesting things to say sometimes (not often these days), and he makes Cassidy look like a cub scout.

And this is a free speech issue, that is why the EFF has gotten involved.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 3rd, 2011 at 10:39 PM

Title: Re: Digital Tibetan Buddhist Altar

Content:

padma norbu said:

My responses about Cassidy's character have been purely related to the notion that his blog is worth reading. He has a violent, criminal history...

Malcolm wrote:

I don't think the situation between him and his ex-wife is nearly as cut and dry as you claim. He was convicted of a crime for which he did not plead guilty. He entered an Alford plea.

Whether you like it or not, you are taking a side.

As far as E-Sangha goes, there are numerous people I know who used sock puppets for various reasons on E-Sangha who post here on Dharma Wheel. The only thing I can say about Cassidy is that when his ip was banned, he did not push it. He let it go with only minor complaints on his blog.

I have a dispassionate view about this. No one is better than anyone else. Everyone has done something frak up, either in this life or another. Cassidy has an army of people who hate him and talk shit about him. So, his karma sucks, he has pissed off a lot of people, seems to have a talent for it, and nevertheless, his blog is still of interest and has he interesting things to say, also boring things to say too. It is not like everything he ever wrote is fantastic.

He is a Buddhist outlaw, perhaps that is why I have a bit sympathy for him. He is also in poor health, in jail, and has a bad ticker.

And having been on the recieving end of quite a bit of vicious gossip myself, I know how easily rumor mongers stir up shit on the internet and how much of the rumor is complete fantasy.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 3rd, 2011 at 8:16 PM

Title: Re: Why combine Dzogchen and Mahamudra?

Content:

deepbluehum said:

...because combining them necessarily mean one has to view Mahamudra as semde or as tregcho. This view is based on incomplete knowledge of Mahamudra.

Malcolm wrote:

No, this is not the case.

Gampopa's Mahamudra system can be regarded as an adaptation of sems sde, but that does not include all possible variations on Mahāmudra.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 3rd, 2011 at 8:12 PM

Title: Re: Tibetan Buddhism (Vajrayana) : Will it stick ?

Content:

Tsongkhapafan said:

But the tradition in the Kalachakra across lineages is that the Kalachakra can be given to masses of people at once.

Kirt

Malcolm wrote:

This is a recent tradition, begun by the ninth Panchen Lama.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 3rd, 2011 at 7:42 PM

Title: We are/are not what we eat.

Content:

Karma Yeshe said:

So in most ways what we eat is not all that important. With the exception of calorie restriction which may have some impact the whole concept of "we are what we eat" is nonsense.

Malcolm wrote:

Thinking like this is responsible for many diseases that people have, which they could easily avoid.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 3rd, 2011 at 7:37 PM

Title: Re: Digital Tibetan Buddhist Altar

Content:

padma norbu said:

Anyone embroiled in this kind of nonsense is a person whose opinion is not worth a fart in a whirlwind, imo.

Malcolm wrote:

That does not mean it is proper that someone is locked up for a flame war.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 3rd, 2011 at 7:36 PM

Title: Re: Digital Tibetan Buddhist Altar

Content:

deepbluehum said:

So the tulku system is nonsense except for the case of Norbu Rinpoche? So there must be real reincarnated masters aside from him too. Or he is lying.

Namdrol said:

The only tulkus I take seriously are self-recognized tulkus. The rest is just a politics and money game.

N

Dhondrub said:

I am sorry?! The internet is full of self recognized Tulkus and most of them are just frauds. N Norbu Rinpoche was recognized as a Tulku and later empirically as you say convinced himself that he is actually that Tulku. So if he is right the Lama who recognized him in the first place was also right, or am i missing anything?

Malcolm wrote:

The lama who first recognized him as the incarnation of Adzom Drugpa was his uncle, who achieved rainbow body. As I pointed out, he was also recognized as the reincarnation of a Sakya Lama. My point was that NNR did not accept it until he had some proof for himself. That makes him a self-recognized tulku because he is the reincarnation of Adzom Drugpa and not the reincarnation of a Sakya Lama.

Dhondrub said:

But to say only self proclaimed is real is putting things upside down.

Malcolm wrote:

The first official tulku in Tibetan history was self-recognized i.e. the Second Karmapa, although a case could be also made for Guru Chowang, or even a little earlier, Yuthog Yontan Gonpo who stated in the early 13th century to his main disciple, Sumton Yeshe Zung, that he was the reincarnation of Padmasambhava, Virupa, Srongtsen Gampo and Gampopa, among others.

But my famous opinion of the tulku system is off topic here.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 3rd, 2011 at 9:22 AM

Title: Re: Digital Tibetan Buddhist Altar

Content:

padma norbu said:

Apparently the FBI and the local police feel differently.

Malcolm wrote:

Good thing the issue of who has and who has not committed a crime is not up the FBI or the police.

Whether someone has or has not committed a crime is something that is up to the courts to decide. However, sometimes, for reasons impenetrable to others, people plead guilty to crimes they did not commit. Often, in the US, they are convicted for crimes they did not commit, while others, who are committing crimes, go unpunished, due to reasons of status, money, power, or race.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 3rd, 2011 at 9:11 AM

Title: Re: Digital Tibetan Buddhist Altar

Content:

kirtu said:

It's the recognition and institutionalization that you don't accept.

Malcolm wrote:

It's the politics and money game I don't accept. That is the part of the dry rot that is infesting Tibetan Buddhism.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 3rd, 2011 at 9:09 AM

Title: Re: Digital Tibetan Buddhist Altar

Content:

deepbluehum said:

So the tulku system is nonsense except for the case of Norbu Rinpoche? So there must be real reincarnated masters aside from him too. Or he is lying.

Malcolm wrote:

The only tulkus I take seriously are self-recognized tulkus. The rest is just a politics and money game.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 3rd, 2011 at 9:07 AM

Title: Re: Digital Tibetan Buddhist Altar

Content:

padma norbu said:

I'm pretty sure it was more than a mere flame war.

Malcolm wrote:

Then you should feel confident in your superior knowledge of the situation.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 3rd, 2011 at 7:23 AM

Title: Re: Digital Tibetan Buddhist Altar

Content:

padma norbu said:

Cassidy should totally use the defense of "that was my little sister! sorry about that!" just like the rest of the demented trolls say when they get caught.

Malcolm wrote:

The fact is that is was a stupid flame war. Not worth prosecuting, not worth investigating, not worth the bits the NYT spend on posting the article. Not even worth discussing here.

People say stupid shit in flamewars all the time. The protecting nyingma people embarassed the shit out of themselves for aggressively pursuing the idea that dried shit zen was cassidy. He wasn't. He was some poor bastard in Oregon that got caught in the crossfire when the KPC people aggressivley targeted him for being cassidy.

The basic point is that nobody in this story was very nice to one another. And I don't really take the claims of the protecting nyingma folks at face value as being completely credible. The difference is however that one person has spent six months in jail without committing any crime I can perceive.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 3rd, 2011 at 6:56 AM

Title: Re: Digital Tibetan Buddhist Altar

Content:

padma norbu said:

Namdrol, I was wondering if your apparent siding with Cassidy on this might have something to do with the global ire you've received in the past. Apparently people were so pissed off with the way you and the other mods ran E-Sangha that it was hacked beyond repair and there are still plenty of places where you can read people bitching about your censorship and your attitude in general. That must kinda suck. (edit: I'm not criticizing you, in case that sounds like I am; I was just brief in describing the charges they bring against you in the "court of public opinion.")

Malcolm wrote:

They bitched, they then created their own forums, and then proceeded to ban everybody we banned. Lesson learned.

padma norbu said:

Sorry to hear that you have no faith in the tulku system at all, apparently (?).

Is it wrong for me to interpret thusly (?): anyone who doesn't believe that tulkus are reincarnations is basically saying a lot of great lamas are lying. ???

Malcolm wrote:

They are satisfying the requirements of a cultural institution. Then there is the dog tooth relic story.

Padma Norbu said:

Namkhai Norbu is recognized as a tulku and in his relationship with his son/former uncle, he doesn't suggest otherwise. I have heard him laugh about how he recognized objects as a child or whatever and says "I don't know," but IMO this is skillful means.

Malcolm wrote:

I would take Norbu Rinpoche seriously. He did not believe he was the reincarnation of Adzom Drugpa for many years. He only accepted it when he had something like empirical proof -- i.e. he wrote a text. When he read Adzom Drugpa's collected works, he found the same text, more or less the same, for over a hundred pages in length. Then he decided he was actually the reincarnation of Adzom Drugpa. He is also recognized as the reincarnation of a completely different Sakya Lama.

I don't take tulku recognitions seriously, at all.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 3rd, 2011 at 4:57 AM

Title: Re: Digital Tibetan Buddhist Altar

Content:

Namdrol said:

<http://volokh.com/2011/08/27/federal-government-prosecuting-man-for-writing-many-insulting-tweets-and-blog-posts-about-religious-leader/>

Considering that the supreme court recently ruled that a man making death threats against Obama could not be jailed because the threats were not credible, and therefore covered under free speech protections, I don't think the prosecution in Maryland has a chance of landing this, especially since the EFF is involved. And they have deep pockets.

N

Padma Norbu said:

I am genuinely surprised that you:

1. seem to be happy about the idea that this man, whom police have already traced a HUGE amount of harassment from as (directly to his computer), will likely get off and get back to his blog, which you will then be pleased as punch to read again.

Malcolm wrote:

It seems to me that the parties involved were mutually harassing one another. As far as I am concerned it was just a twitter flame war. In my 17 years on the internet, I have seen far worse from Buddhists.

padma norbu said:

Is not going to jail the yardstick by which you're measuring behavior? Because I'm pretty sure the writers at Protecting Nyingma will never even get arrested.

Malcolm wrote:

Arrests do not equal guilt in our judicial system.

padma norbu said:

I'm sure if I pressed you on this, you'd say that you believe tulkus are genuine reincarnations...

Malcolm wrote:

You'd be wrong...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 3rd, 2011 at 3:56 AM

Title: Re: Sakya POV on the origin of the Cakrasamvara Tantras

Content:

conebeckham said:

Is this Shavaripa the same as "Shawaripa," the Mahasiddha, the author of the famous prayer to Six Armed Mahakala?

Malcolm wrote:

Hard to know.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 3rd, 2011 at 2:19 AM

Title: Re: Mind of Definite Emergence

Content:

Namdrol said:

What you wish to give up is suffering. Wishing to give up suffering and being free from desire, hatred and confusion are two different things entirely.

N

wayland said:

I think I see what you mean Namdrol, if you mean that 'wishing to give up suffering' is aspirational and 'being free from the three poisons' is the result. They certainly are two entirely different things.

Regarding the aspirational aspect of "nges 'byung", you wrote earlier: It is necessary to have a mind that has given up attachment to samsara in order to practice tantra, otherwise, there is no point.

To what extent would this mind have needed to give up attachment?

I'm thinking that if it's not given up enough, then it's going to slide right back into the trap it wishes to escape from. On the other hand, if it has deeply ascertained suffering within the three poisons and has developed a revulsion towards them it could pass a point where it no longer wishes (or is able) to employ tantric means. Dechen Norbu describes it as "a fight fire with fire situation", which implies that nges 'byung relies on attachment to samsara, to some extent at least.

Is this a fair conclusion?

Malcolm wrote:

Giving up attachment to samsara means that you do not want to take afflictive rebirth here anymore. If you practice tantra, it is because you realize that afflictions are too strong to make the path of renunciation of sense objects feasible, since instead you work with sense objects on the path.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 3rd, 2011 at 12:52 AM

Title: Re: Appearances and mind

Content:

Namdrol said:

First of all "mind" here is short for "awakened mind" i.e. bodhicitta or the nature of the mind. It does pervade all of your own appearances. It is an all=creating king because all appearances are constructed by your mind and come from your mind, thus it is a king since it dominates all of this constructive activity. Its nature is inexpressible since it is empty from the very beginning and not established as something ultimately real in its own right.

Acchantika said:

What I am asking is: Is this conclusion a phenomenological or ontological one? Does it concern the plethora of reality as it appears, or "as it is" in non-apparent reality and apparent reality alike?

Because in both cases, the above statement would be true, but mean entirely different things. You seem to express the former, while others express the latter.

It's difficult to express myself without the trappings of dualistic language.

Malcolm wrote:

It is both.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 3rd, 2011 at 12:12 AM

Title: Re: Why combine Dzogchen and Mahamudra?

Content:

mindyourmind said:
Why would you need both?

Malcolm wrote:
They are complementary practices.

A similar question is why practice creation and completion stage and Dzogchen?

Again, it is because they are complimentary practices.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Saturday, September 3rd, 2011 at 12:09 AM
Title: Re: Forgiveness?
Content:
Epistemes said:
But what do Buddhists do? Is there no reconciliation, just arising and falling?

Malcolm wrote:
Exchange of self and others.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Friday, September 2nd, 2011 at 8:54 PM
Title: Re: Appearances and mind
Content:
padma norbu said:
Anyone who wants to get a better understanding should buy The Supreme Source and read page 95 (of course, reading everything before that would be a good idea, too, as well as everything after it).

Acchantika said:
Partly what I am trying to understand is how to read that book as not positing that there is an ineffable, non-graspable primordial basis of all existence that is spontaneously self-luminous and the source of dharmakaya, including the mountain and the mind, not simply as concepts, but in the literal sense of sourcing and pervading the entire dimension of reality, hence "The Supreme Source".

Can you suggest anything that would help me put that book in context?

Malcolm wrote:
First of all "mind" here is short for "awakened mind" i.e. bodhicitta or the nature of the mind. It does pervade all of your own appearances. It is an all-creating king because all appearances are constructed by your mind and come from your mind, thus it is a king since it dominates all of this constructive activity. Its nature is inexpressible since it is empty from the very beginning and not established as something ultimately real in its own right.

Also this book is sems sde class, which means it is commentary on the completion stage of Mahāyoga and does not really stand as an independent tradition. No one attains rainbow body through sems sde alone.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 2nd, 2011 at 8:50 PM

Title: Re: Appearances and mind

Content:

Namdrol said:

There are two answers to this question in Dzogchen.

a) external phenomena are projections of minds. A mind is capable of projecting an appearance for another mind: classical example, the woman who meditates on herself as a tigress and terrifies her village.

b) external phenomena are a result of causes and conditions; their appearance is a result of traces -- for example, the liquid that has six different appearances according to how it is perceived by beings of the six realms.

Pero said:

Are these two not connected?

Malcolm wrote:

Not necessarily. Actually Dzogchen does not really provide an answer for this question that is not found also in Madhyamaka. The first example is a Yogacara Madhyamaka response. The second is a Sautrantilka Madhyamaka type response.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 2nd, 2011 at 8:47 PM

Title: Re: Painful muscle cramps

Content:

meiji1 said:

How does Tibetan medicine treat sudden painful muscle seizures in the legs (specifically in the adductors)?

Malcolm wrote:

That would depend on your age, condition, constitution, fitness level and so on. You can email me with further details if you like.

In general, massage is probably indicated, and perhaps moxabustion or acupuncture.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 2nd, 2011 at 8:39 PM

Title: Re: Mind of Definite Emergence

Content:

wayland said:

Thanks Dechen,

I was coming at it from a slightly different angle. Let me give an example - say food, there's stuff we like and stuff we don't. If we have a choice we choose the stuff we like. The 'not wanting' the other food must be similar to a renounced mind which does not want desire - perhaps has already seen the drawbacks involved.

How do you get such a mind to start working with something it no longer has any wish for at all? If, on the other hand, it still had some desire, then it would not be the right mind for tantra, as Namdrol has pointed out.

Malcolm wrote:

What you wish to give up is suffering. Wishing to give up suffering and being free from desire, hatred and confusion are two different things entirely.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 2nd, 2011 at 8:54 AM

Title: Re: Appearances and mind

Content:

Acchantika said:

Then the premise of Dzogchen is just the observation that all you ever 'know' is a projection of your mind. But everyone knows this, no? Its perceptual theory. It's called the "epistemological problem" in Western philosophy, i.e, its a problem, not a solution. And conceding as a result of this that nothing can be known beyond the originator of this internal structure (the mind) is called 'solipsism'. Conceding instead that things can be known beyond the mind is called realism, and the only thing I understand about Dzogchen is that it is neither. So what am I missing?

I want to know how the mountain got there. The texts say, "the mountain originates from the mind". Either I read this as a kind of idealist idea, or I read it as a merely perceptual idea. Apparently neither is correct.

Malcolm wrote:

There are two answers to this question in Dzogchen.

a) external phenomena are projections of minds. A mind is capable of projecting an appearance for another mind: classical example, the woman who meditates on herself as a tigress and terrifies her village.

b) external phenomena are a result of causes and conditions; their appearance is a result of traces -- for example, the liquid that has six different appearances according to how it is perceived by beings of the six realms.

As far as the latter is concerned, Longchenpa observes that phenomena are not mental factors, as in yogacara.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 2nd, 2011 at 5:12 AM

Title: Re: Appearances and mind

Content:

Hayagriva said:

The difference between the Dzogchen view(s) and solipsism is something I'm very interested in understanding.

Acchantika said:

I second this.

Malcolm wrote:

Dzogchen does not suggest a) that external objects do not conventionally exist b) that external minds do not conventionally exist. All that it suggests is that appearances are mind.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 2nd, 2011 at 4:22 AM

Title: Re: Mind of Definite Emergence

Content:

Namdrol said:

both.

wayland said:

Thanks Namdrol. I've also heard that this mind is one of five requisite conditions for a successful outcome within tantra. Would this be correct in your opinion?

Malcolm wrote:

It is necessary to have a mind that has given up attachment to samsara in order to practice tantra, otherwise, there is no point.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 2nd, 2011 at 2:45 AM

Title: Re: Mind of Definite Emergence

Content:

Namdrol said:

No. It is an overly literal translation of the Tibetan term "nges 'byung", which is a translation of Sanskrit niḥsaraṇa, which in turn means "riddance".

N

wayland said:

Thanks Namdrol. Does it refer to one who is rid of the poisons or one who genuinely aspires to be?

Malcolm wrote:

both.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 2nd, 2011 at 1:38 AM

Title: Re: Infinite lives - How so prior to life on Earth?

Content:

Epistemes said:

Perhaps this should be in another thread - if so, have at it.

I'm confused by the notion that we all have had infinite lives. So, I take this to mean that prior to the existence of life on Earth, we all lived lives as devas and all of those other transcendental, metaphysical beings that I don't know the Buddhist terminology for. Are there categories that I'm missing?

Malcolm wrote:

And bugs, snakes, dogs. frogs. etc. As well as on other planets, and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 2nd, 2011 at 12:40 AM

Title: Re: Six Yogas of Naropa

Content:

Pero said:

at that time he told me he doesn't give pointing out at the beginning because many people get confused, like thinking every religion is the same or that everything is one, so he prefers to give it when people have some foundation (in that program it was at level 3).

Adamantine said:

Well he may be right.. I do know of at least one regular devoted student of ChNN who is pretty much a Hindu and thinks this way. . .

Malcolm wrote:

Hell I know devoted students of HHDL that are for all intents and purposes Hindus. Naropa had many Hindu disciples. Sometimes, religion does not matter than much when it comes to Guru devotion.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 1st, 2011 at 8:31 PM

Title: Re: Mind of Definite Emergence

Content:

wayland said:

I'm just looking for definitions of the above. I have an idea that it's about renunciation but is there more to it?

Malcolm wrote:

No. It is an overly literal translation of the Tibetan term "nges 'byung", which is a translation of Sanskrit niḥsaraṇa, which in turn means "riddance".

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 1st, 2011 at 8:22 PM

Title: Re: Evolution of humans and Mahayana Buddhism

Content:

Namdrol said:

But Huifeng, you have to admit that the sutras read as if these gazillions of eons ago all happen in the context of this Jambudvipa (the sub-continent of India).

Huifeng said:

Not necessarily. It depends on which sutras one is referring to. And even then, only some make such references to specific locations (such as Jambudvipa) while others do not. eg. the story of Dharmakara, who became Amitabha.

~~ Huifeng

Malcolm wrote:

Nevertheless, many do. And there is no need to restrict ourselves to Mahayana sutras in this respect. Your response therefore does not really address the OP's question. It is a rather religious response -- to wit, "don't worry about the fact that narratives in Mahāyāna sutras contradict empirical scientific data about planet earth and evolution because we can explain our way around it with reference to other world systems...."

A better reply would be "The Indian imagination is prone to exaggeration of cosmic time periods..."

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 1st, 2011 at 8:06 PM

Title: Re: Digital Tibetan Buddhist Altar

Content:

Namdrol said:

I know perfectly well that this is an awesome example of why the whole tulku game ought to be completely abandoned.

kirtu said:

Throwing the baby out with the bathwater. This is, IMHO, not a solution.

Kirt

heart said:

Also, Tibetans will continue to recognize Tulku's no matter what we think about it.

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

And they (Tibetans) will continue to admit privately it is all a game of political bullshit.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 1st, 2011 at 8:04 PM

Title: Re: Evolution of humans and Mahayana Buddhism

Content:

himalayanspirit said:

There appears to be some inconsistency between theory of evolution of humans from primates and Mahayana Buddhism. Basically, in Buddhism it takes minimum three 'countless' kalpas to reach Buddhahood. Every sentient requires at least that period of time to reach Buddhahood including our very Buddha Shakyamuni. But did we even exist so long ago?

There are stories of Buddhas and Bodhisattvas of many eons ago, but weren't we primates at that time?

What is the explanation of this inconsistency? Is it that when these sutras talk about civilizations many many kalpas ago, they are actually referring to another 'world-cycle' where sentient beings rose and then destroyed?

Huifeng said:

It is not an inconsistency, the problem is one of understanding what Buddhism (Mahayana or otherwise) teaches on the subject.

Add to your formulations that there are multiple worlds, and that there are multiple forms of existence in which living beings can be reborn, some of which entailing lifespans of millions of years.

So, "did we even exist so long ago?" - Yes. Just not necessarily as human beings. Or even on planet earth.

For "weren't we primates at that time?" - Who is this "we"? Maybe some were, but others may have been humans or devas elsewhere.

~~ Huifeng

Malcolm wrote:

But Huifeng, you have to admit that the sutras read as if these gazillions of eons ago all happen in the context of this Jambudvipa (the sub-continent of India).

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 1st, 2011 at 5:50 AM

Title: Re: Offerings and prayers: Authentic Buddhism?

Content:

Epistemes said:

I don't find many of the practices of Mahayana and Vajrayana apparent in my readings of early Buddhism, which is where I'm at right now in my so-called "random reading" and "wild guesses."

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, they are not there in what we in the West like to call "early Buddhism". They came later. This is even acknowledged in the tradition via the hermeneutical device of situating these practices as practices the Buddha taught, which were then kept concealed until later.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 1st, 2011 at 5:45 AM

Title: Re: Digital Tibetan Buddhist Altar

Content:

Namdrol said:

All I know is that his blog often has things of interest, and her blog is super boring and pretentious.

I also know that after he outed their finances on his blog, they went to war with him, his other sock-puppetry aside.

N

Greg said:

Did he really do that though (out her finances)?

Malcolm wrote:

Yup, I saw the spreadsheet myself.

Greg said:

I wish the Times would do some follow up reporting. They don't know what they have with this one - you couldn't make it up.

Malcolm wrote:

Indeed.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 1st, 2011 at 5:05 AM

Title: Re: Digital Tibetan Buddhist Altar

Content:

daelm said:

i just don't think that it's a zero-sum game, in which if he is a douche, then she is virtuous. it is entirely possible that they can both be douches, for example. and i don't think that arguing for clarity about him somehow exonerates her and the shenanigans that have been conducted either in her name or with her blessing. for the amount of stuff that's since come to light, she's made some pretty serious mistakes. and that was a gift to him, one he's wielded with exemplary persistence for years now, until the recent discovery of all his cast-of-thousands sock puppets, all clustered around one angry man's keyboard.

Malcolm wrote:

All I know is that his blog often has things of interest, and her blog is super boring and pretentious.

I also know that after he outed their finances on his blog, they went to war with him, his other sock-puppetry aside.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 1st, 2011 at 2:39 AM

Title: Re: Digital Tibetan Buddhist Altar

Content:

Adamantine said:

...making anonymous death threats via twitter...

Malcolm wrote:

He didn't do that -- no "I am going to kill you" stuff.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 1st, 2011 at 1:18 AM

Title: Re: Empty Mind

Content:

Acchantika said:

This is not the same as saying they do not exist. The sutras also say that both 'they exist' (eternalism) and 'they do not exist' (nihilism) are wrong views.

Malcolm wrote:

Buddhapalita puts it nicely "It's not that we make a claim for the non-existence [of existents], we merely remove claims that existents exist".

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 1st, 2011 at 1:06 AM

Title: Re: Digital Tibetan Buddhist Altar

Content:

Greg said:

And that account sounds a lot like what Bill Schwartz aka "Ryder Japhy" describes happened to him:

<http://www.elephantjournal.com/2010/02/welcome-to-twitter-hell-bill-schwartz/>

Malcolm wrote:

Worth reproducing:

I had just finished reading Tyler Dewar's (@tylerdewar on Twitter) recent interview in Bodhi Magazine with the 17th Karmapa. There was a graph in which His Holiness discussed the importance of sangha [community] as a harmonious coming together. Nalanda West, Seattle, Washington (@NalandaWest), had tweeted a link to the interview, and I re-tweeted it to share with the people who follow my Twitter stream.

Then I asked the question, “What does His Holiness mean?” and people began to chime in to discuss what they thought. Much to my surprise Jetsuma chimed in with “Consistency.” I tweeted back “What do you mean?”...

...and the sh*t storm began. Maybe I missed something, but she called me an asshole and made a snide remark about my heart, which gave her devoted Kunzang Palyul Ling followers the green light to begin attacking me.

I laughed it off and mentioned it in my last Elephant Journal article—“I’m an asshole, but that’s beside the point”—and returned to my daily routine of practice and tweeting Dharma quotes and music during session breaks without giving it a second thought. I had no idea of the Twitter hell I was about to catch.

From the point of my initial exchange with Jetsuma, the attacks escalated from strangers ridiculing the fact that I’m dying of congestive heart failure to a personal threat—“I know people in Chicago”—from one of her devoted followers. I’ve always known that the Nyingma have had issues surrounding Penor Rinpoche recognizing the “actor” Steven Seagal as a tulku, but I had no idea what a pile of sh*t I had stepped into.

Thankfully, Twitter isn’t a message board, and I can block Jetsuma’s followers from seeing my Twitter stream. I’ve had to block only one person who created a shell account to spam my @Replies (Twitter inbox) with threatening messages. Why would a Dharma teacher on Twitter allow her or his followers to behave in such a shameful manner? Perhaps she didn’t know. I haven’t a clue.

Ending on a positive note...Dzogchen Ponlop Rinpoche (@ponlop) has followed me back; he wasn’t following anyone on Twitter when I wrote my last article. We’ve been exchanging direct messages (private tweets); he enjoyed “Bite Me, Boulder Buddhists” and mentoring me through the process of dying.

Also, Yongey Mingyur Rinpoche (@yongeymingyurrinpoche) is on Twitter now, but has yet to tweet.

What about Twitter hell? My bad; it ended in a tweet. “Founding member Chicago KTC, well regarded over 28 years, will not hesitate to take legal action against anyone stating otherwise here.” And so while we can “drive all blames into ourselves,” as the Lojong slogan goes—and while I remember to be grateful to my “enemies,” who are my greatest teacher—well, Twitter hell turned out to be for those deluded enough to think they could push Bill Schwartz around. Later.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 1st, 2011 at 1:00 AM

Title: Re: Digital Tibetan Buddhist Altar

Content:

Greg said:

from the guy who signs off "Andrew Wilson," who claims to be an innocent bystander who got mistaken for Cassidy and ended up with a gun in face in the middle of the night.

Malcolm wrote:

Crimes & Tulkus: Poisonous Snakes in Buddhist Robes

Some people have asked me if I'm the "man named Andrew Wilson" that a certain tulku is mentioning on her Web site as having had his house searched by the FBI for evidence relating to the purported crimes of another man named "William Cassidy," aka "Tenpa Rinpoche." I am that Andrew Wilson. But I don't know anything about any cyberstalking crimes by a William Cassidy.

I do know something about being criminally cyberstalked, however, because for almost a whole year two saffron-robed psychopaths stalked me (although I'd blocked them and all their ilk) through various both official and anonymous Twitter accounts and through anonymous hate blogs on which they posted many of my Zen/Taoist "tweets" accompanied by the most outrageously foolish, not to mention slanderous, commentary.

According to these two "Buddhist" stalkers -- a crazy looking lady wearing a crown and too much make-up and a mousy little man in monk's robes -- my Twitter page was actually authored by William Cassidy, and the various different handles and avatars I went through to try to get clear of their relentlessly negative attentions were all William Cassidy's "sock puppets," and my insistence on remaining anonymous behind names like "Akebonojishi" and "Mujinkyo" was all by itself absolute and conclusive proof that I must really be Tenpa Rinpoche trying to pull a fast one on the whole world. It seems not to have occurred to these racketeering co-frauds that my insistence on anonymity was precisely a way of trying to keep the emphasis off my "self" and on what I have to say (about Zen). But logic has never been the strong suit of religious fanatics.

So incensed were the two bizarre and unwholesome Bogus-sattvas by my continued presence on Twitter that last spring and summer they resorted to harassing almost every single Twitter user who RT'd or even spoke to me. Many of the people they harassed got quite spooked by it, so it became almost impossible at times for me to reach anyone with my notes and comments on Zen/Haragei. (A pity, since the techniques I show people how to do actually work, and nobody even has to pay to support my lavish Guru lifestyle.) They particularly swarmed, attacked and mocked anyone who dared to call me "Sensei" or thanked me for helping out with a specific problem. Their paranoia rose to an obsessive crescendo of mean-spirited ridicule and tiresome victim-babble that was endlessly echoed and amplified by a beggar's chorus of the organization's so-called nuns, each with her own Twitter page devoted to singing the Guru's praises and savaging the Guru's purported enemies.

I've never experienced any Internet madness quite like it. The threatening rage and vituperation on open display from a rural Maryland rattler's nest of "Vajrayana Buddhists" was surreal, David Lynch-esque even. Many of the tweets were disturbing, threatening messages hinting obscurely at magical attacks, promising the most extreme karmic retribution, and prophesying a long stay in Vajra Hell. But there were also more routine threats of the "we-know-where-you-live" and "we-have-people-on-the-payroll-who-take-care-of-people-like-you" variety. (The "Mafia" style tweets felt especially dissonant coming from smiling nuns.) Naturally, I've already downloaded hundreds of pages of this stupefying horse-shit from Twitter and Google caches, and will be making it available to the right people as and when needed.

Those same two unbelievably sad, bewildered and angry co-conspirators now claim that even though it has been proven beyond any possible doubt that I was not, as they swore up down and sideways to everyone who would listen (including the FBI), William Cassidy himself, still I must somehow be connected to the man, who is sitting in jail right now -- and they publish their ignorant, libelous opinion about a person unknown to them along with my name on the official blog of their purported Sangha. Psychopath that she is, the tulku in question still often mentions me and sometimes RTs my tweets mockingly on her Twitter page, never mind that she is now and always has been "blocked," and uses the same type of inflammatory language about me she did all last year. Neither the mentally deranged tulku nor the emotionally and intellectually stunted monk capo have yet acknowledged any error in judgement, nor offered the barest hint of an apology. However, at some point they did quietly remove every last scrap of the "hard evidence" supposedly proving that I am William Cassidy they'd posted on their anonymous "Protecting Nyingma" attack blog. Huh! I wonder why they would do that!

"Purify your mind! Do no evil, do only good. That is the whole teaching of the Buddha."

-ANDREW WILSON

<https://diamondsutrazen.blogspot.com/2011/06/crimes-and-tulkus.html> "
onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 1st, 2011 at 12:55 AM

Title: Re: Digital Tibetan Buddhist Altar

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The Deadly Viper Assassination Cult Buddhists

I've been posting Zen notes, poems and aphorisms on Twitter since the summer of 2009. In December of that year, two very strange people began cyberstalking and harassing me through multiple Web sites and multiple (mostly anonymous) Twitter accounts. Their names are Alyce Zeoli -- aka "Jetsunma Ahkon Lhamo," the controversial "founder and spiritual director" of an organization called the Kunzang Palyul Choling -- and David Williams, a so-called monk in that same purportedly Buddhist organization.

The reason for these two weird people cyberstalking me, and relentlessly harassing anybody with whom I interacted on Twitter, is still mysterious. Although they often claimed that since my Twitter account was anonymous (as it was at the time, though clearly not anymore) I must have something to hide, and therefore was beyond any possible doubt an enemy of theirs named "William Cassidy" aka Tenpa Rinpoche, they also spent an inordinate amount of time and energy trying to argue with, contradict and debunk me on matters of Zen and "Buddhism." (Note: even now that they must know I'm not him, they still regularly mention and "retweet" my postings with mocking and derisory comments attached. Strange!)

Unfortunately, I did not take their many threats seriously enough, and failed to contact the police.

However, these two mentally disturbed people did not fail to collect any and every annoyed or exasperated counter-tweet of mine, some of them containing what might be considered by drawing room standards moderately rough language, though not so much so for the Internet, and these tweets they forwarded to the FBI with a complaint that I was cyberstalking Alyce Zeoli -- a person I'd never even heard about until the first of her childish insults appeared on my Twitter stream, and a person I truly wish I'd never had the displeasure of hearing about.

Naturally, the two bizarre individuals in question neglected to inform the FBI about their own incessantly negative and provocative, often quite creepy, online activities against me and a few unlucky others. However, I've since downloaded hundreds of pages from Twitter and Google caches documenting just this. I expect to soon be making all of this puerile, repugnant cult material available for easy perusal by anyone with the patience and the stomach for it.

The FBI's research department must be slacking off, because as a result of Alyce Zeoli's complaint a team of FBI agents in dark clothing broke into my Oregon home before dawn on the morning of February 15th, 2011 and handcuffed my girlfriend and I at gunpoint. This was rather traumatic for my girlfriend, who had no idea what was going on. Actually, I didn't either. The agents then read out a search warrant for our computer equipment and cell phones and questioned us both on the cheerful joint topic of "Jetsunma Ahkon Lhamo" and "William Cassidy." They also spent an inordinate amount of time searching the basement and greenhouse, as if they hoped to find explosives or a maybe a cache of Tommy guns. I told them they were raiding the wrong compound; they must have taken a wrong turn at Albuquerque, because where they really belonged was the Kunzang Palyul Choling enclave in Maryland. They informed me that the FBI agent who filed the affidavit leading to the armed invasion of my home is based, surprise, in Baltimore.

I later learned that on that very same morning William Cassidy was arrested in California and transported to Baltimore. He has apparently been sitting in the federal wing of a maximum security prison ever since, with motions for a trial on charges of "cyberstalking" Alyce Zeoli, who -- ironically -- out of her many absurd aliases and honorifics will perhaps become best known as the "Victim 1" of court documents, scheduled for this fall. (See U.S. vs. Cassidy.)

Leaving aside notable constitutional issues, the government's whole case seems to hinge on the wild claim that Alyce Zeoli is a "victim" of cyberstalking and harassment via Twitter and various Websites run by William Cassidy. But if Alyce Zeoli and David Williams did online to William Cassidy and to others (me, just for example) precisely what they claim he did to her, the case falls apart like a gin-soaked cocktail napkin. "No crime, with no victim;/no jury will convict him."

And the truth is that these two Kunzang Palyul Choling players at one time or another mocked, stalked, harassed, or insulted every single one my friends on Twitter. Alyce Zeoli is renowned both on- and offline for her tantrums and high handed arrogance, as well as for her belittling response to the merest criticisms; while David Williams is infamous for rude, persistent, laughably obtuse attacks on all who don't fall in line with his Guru's bizarre pronouncements. If William Cassidy deserves to be sitting in a jail in Maryland awaiting trial, then clearly Alyce Zeoli and David Williams deserve to be sitting in jail in Oregon awaiting trial also. Since when does the federal government arbitrarily take sides in Internet flame wars?

I never saw William Cassidy cyberstalk anybody so I can't pronounce on that subject, but I can say this: Alyce Zeoli and David Williams are cyberstalkers extraordinaire — and by deliberately misleading the federal government in their wildly successful attempt to put my life in danger and to deprive me of all civil, political and human rights, they've downgraded their profile to felonious liars and co-conspiring domestic terrorists. Eventually, one can hope, the federal government will wake up to their vicious act, soon after which cell doors will clang shut on these two smiling, saffron-robed vipers.

<https://diamondsutrazen.blogspot.com/2011/07/deadly-viper-assassination-buddhists.html> " onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 1st, 2011 at 12:51 AM

Title: Re: Buddhahood in Chan

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

"...Heraclitus' river, the foot never truly stands on the same ground twice."

Actually, one's foot never steps in the same river once.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 1st, 2011 at 12:36 AM

Title: Re: Digital Tibetan Buddhist Altar

Content:

Namdrol said:

It is obvious that anyone criticizing Cassidy for claiming to be a tulku is incorrect. Here, in an early post, he clearly claims that he is not a tulku.

kirtu said:

You know perfectly well that numerous western TB's are going to tend to react as if he were a tulku and esp. the group in Poolesville who in many cases are naive and uncritical. In many cases they are tulku worshippers.

Malcolm wrote:

I know perfectly well that this is an awesome example of why the whole tulku game ought to be completely abandoned.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 31st, 2011 at 10:13 PM

Title: Re: Digital Tibetan Buddhist Altar

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

"Despite the "Tibetan" name by which I am occasionally known -- which is actually more of a nom-de-plume, and guess what... I might be making a literary point about blind credulity -- and which is just one of several names by which I am known, you should be very clear that I don't consider myself a "tulku," and I really don't think you should either. I have tried to make that exquisitely clear in my various books, but for some reason, people want to create something that isn't there. Also, please don't offer to send me things, because there isn't anything I need. I particularly don't need donations, students, or the adoration of syncophants. If you enjoy reading this weblog, then just enjoy reading this weblog. Please don't drag me into your fantasies."

--- William L. Cassidy, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 21, 2006

It is obvious that anyone criticizing Cassidy for claiming to be a tulku is incorrect. Here, in an early post, he clearly claims that he is not a tulku.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 31st, 2011 at 10:09 PM

Title: Re: Digital Tibetan Buddhist Altar

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

<http://volokh.com/2011/08/27/federal-government-prosecuting-man-for-writing-many-insulting-tweets-and-blog-posts-about-religious-leader/> "
onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

Considering that the supreme court recently ruled that a man making death threats against Obama could not be jailed because the threats were not credible, and therefore covered under free speech protections, I don't think the prosecution in Maryland has a chance of landing this, especially since the EFF is involved. And they have deep pockets.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 31st, 2011 at 9:55 PM

Title: Re: Digital Tibetan Buddhist Altar

Content:

padma norbu said:

wow, this is quite a neat little tale he tells prior to launching into his rehearsal chants (which sound kind of real and kind of like he's just muttering rambling syllables intentionally slurredly)

<https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=x9QF2ILirOQ> "

onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

Namdrol said:

He is reciting the seven line prayer.

Adamantine said:

Only in the very beginning, he goes on to do what seems to be a patchwork of mudras and offerings without any offering substances, but it doesn't seem at all coherent to me. . . it does appear he is just fronting. . . . unless someone actually recognizes a complete practice in there from their specific lineage

Malcolm wrote:

Well, the summoning and binding mudras are clearly there, then argham, padyam, etc. then he recites a mantra. He is following a text, towards the end he is doing a mahakala tormas offering, and so on.

And there are two kinds of offerings, mentally emanated and physical, the former are more important than the latter; the former are indispensable, the latter are dispensable (yes, you read it here, mentally generated offerings are more important).

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 31st, 2011 at 9:49 PM

Title: Re: Digital Tibetan Buddhist Altar

Content:

kirtu said:

Clearly using such a nom-de-plume in western TB circles has certain intended consequences and shouldn't be done; it's deceptive if you are not a recognized person.

Malcolm wrote:

"Orgyen Tenpa Rinpoche", if anyone had bothered to parse the words, is not the name of a person: it means "The Precious Teaching of the One From Oḍḍiyāna".

Anyway, it remains to be seen that Cassidy committed a crime here: it raises interesting issues around free speech; as does the "Protecting Nyingma" blog, which goes out of its way to slander Cassidy in no uncertain terms, pouring fuel on the fire.

One thing remains true -- Cassidy's blog was one of the more interesting blogs in the Buddhist blogosphere, and he writes well. I for one shall enjoy reading it again when Cassidy gets out.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, August 30th, 2011 at 9:52 AM

Title: Re: Offerings and prayers: Authentic Buddhism?

Content:

Namdrol said:

Mahāyāna's earliest texts are reliably dated through archaeology and text criticism from the First Century BCE, if not earlier. So, that's not it. Mahāyāna was a fully articulated movement by 100 CE.

Epistemes said:

What are these earliest texts? I have been under the presumption that the Heart and Diamond Sutras were the earliest.

Namdrol said:

Not only that, but the cultivation of love and compassion was strongly recommended by the Buddha was a very important practice in all strands of Buddhist schools.

Epistemes said:

I am aware of the Buddha advocating metta and karuna - but there is an insistence in the Mahayana school upon all actions benefitting all sentient beings that I'm not aware of in the Hinayana school.

Malcolm wrote:

Even in so called Hināyāna schools, there is the recognition that the motivation to become a buddha is predicated upon the desire to benefit all sentient beings.

Texts like the Ugraparipriccha, the Samcayagathas, parts of the Lotus sutra, and so on.

Certainly, the Perfection of Wisdom sutras were in their initial form by 100 CE, and probably earlier.

Heart and Diamond sutras are quite late. The Heart sutra probably originated in China. The Perfection of Wisdom in 8000 lines is probably the earliest of the PP sutras, as I understand things.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, August 30th, 2011 at 8:41 AM

Title: Re: Offerings and prayers: Authentic Buddhism?

Content:

Epistemes said:

The Mahayana emphasis upon compassion and loving-kindness resemble Byzantine Christianity so much in their intent that I am forced to reckon that this must be in response to missionaries and traveling Christian ascetics.

Malcolm wrote:

Mahāyāna's earliest texts are reliably dated through archaeology and text criticism from the First Century BCE, if not earlier. So, that's not it. Mahāyāna was a fully articulated movement by 100 CE.

It's most famous exponent, Nāgārjuna, dates to the middle of the 2nd century CE.

If anything, the influence is the other way around.

Not only that, but the cultivation of love and compassion was strongly recommended by the Buddha was a very important practice in all strands of Buddhist schools.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, August 30th, 2011 at 8:32 AM

Title: Re: Technical Point in Ascertaining the Three Vows

Content:

xylem said:

I have been studying Perfect Conduct, Dudjom Rinpoche's commentary on Ngari Panchen Pema Wangyal's Ascertaining the Three Vows. There is one section that has always perplexed me. In the section on the pratimoksha-vinaya, on p. 26, the last full paragraph, section 2.b.1(a.3.3) section (2) the root text says:

An upholder of lay ordination who is also a pure-awareness holder must, except for the signs and rituals of complete ordination, practice all that remains.

Dudjom Rinpoche follows:

An upholder of lay Buddhist ordination who has entered mantra becomes known as a pure-awareness holder, or a vidyadhara. Although it is not necessary for such an individual to display the outer signs of full ordination such as robes, begging bowl, or shaved hair-- which are the result of receiving a specific ritual-- all remaining precepts in the vinaya system must be upheld and practiced.

This has always perplexed me because at first it has seemed in resonance with Guru Rinpoche's teaching to rise with the view while descending with the conduct. On the other hand I have yet to find a context where the vinaya and its particular forms of discipline and purification (e.g. sojong) have been encouraged for lay tantrikas. At the same time, looking at the lives of great lay masters, such as Chatral Rinpoche, they certainly do seem to embrace the whole scope of the vinaya, even as lay practitioners.

Thoughts?

Malcolm wrote:

This is not definite. First of all, there is no rite by which an upasaka receives all these vows of a bhikṣu. Therefore, there is no onus to guard vows which has not taken, as Dudjom Rinpoche readily admits.

Instead we can regard this as an instruction that lay practitioners ought, in an ideal world, to emulate the disciplined behavior of a buddhist monk.

Incidentally, this instruction is rejected in the earlier Three Vows of Sapan.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, August 29th, 2011 at 7:45 PM

Title: Re: Buddhahood in Chan

Content:

Namdrol said:

What I do know is that certain Chan claims have no basis in Mahāyāna sutra.

Astus said:

So indeed, Chan is not based on sutras, shastras, or any doctrine.

Malcolm wrote:

[/quote]

You missed my point -- certain Chan claims seem to be based on nothing more than the personal fabrications of those who make those claims.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, August 28th, 2011 at 10:11 PM

Title: Re: Permanence and Enlightenment

Content:

AdmiraUim said:

Thank you for answering my questions although it doesn't address my last point of whether that contradicts voidness.

Malcolm wrote:

It does. Because of the realization of emptiness, the seeds of affliction are scorched.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, August 28th, 2011 at 8:15 PM

Title: Re: Costly Situations

Content:

TheWay said:

have you personally seen there racism towards blacks ?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, I have. I have also seen Tibetan racism towards white people as well, though it is less intense. I am not saying that it should daunt you, just that Tibetans, like other people, have flaws, and since Tibetans have very little experience with black people, to some extent black people are often surprised when they receive a cool reception or rude reception from Tibetans. Of course, not all Tibetans are racists. But many are.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, August 28th, 2011 at 7:57 PM

Title: Re: Digital Tibetan Buddhist Altar

Content:

padma norbu said:

wow, this is quite a neat little tale he tells prior to launching into his rehearsal chants (which sound kind of real and kind of like he's just muttering rambling syllables intentionally slurredly)

<https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=x9QF2ILirOQ> "

onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

Malcolm wrote:

He is reciting the seven line prayer.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, August 28th, 2011 at 9:50 AM

Title: Re: Costly Situations

Content:

Jikan said:

what's the South Asian attitude toward nonwhite Westerners vis a vis cash expectations?
or mixed race people?

Malcolm wrote:

Tibetans are often pretty racist when it comes to black people (i.e. those of African descent)

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, August 28th, 2011 at 7:21 AM

Title: Re: Buddhahood in Chan

Content:

Namdrol said:

Your non-sequiters about Vajrayāna are a distracting waste of time.

Jnana said:

And FTR, I wasn't criticizing the vajrayāna, nor even Tibetan Buddhism per se. I was criticizing this modern internet phenomenon of "Tibetan Buddhists" who have convinced themselves that they know non-Tibetan traditions better than everyone who practices those traditions, and run around shooting their mouths off all the time.

Malcolm wrote:

I don't pretend to know Chan better than Chan Buddhists.

What I do know is that certain Chan claims have no basis in Mahāyāna sutra.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, August 28th, 2011 at 6:14 AM

Title: Re: Buddhahood in Chan

Content:

Namdrol said:

Anyway, it is pretty clear you are not someone who is speaking from personal experience of the tenets which you espouse, otherwise you would not be wasting your time here.

Jnana said:

Which tenets would those be?

Malcolm wrote:

mere recognition = buddhahood.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, August 28th, 2011 at 6:13 AM

Title: Re: Buddhahood in Chan

Content:

Namdrol said:

This does not refute the path of seeing in anyway.

Jnana said:

There's no need to refute the path of seeing. It's simply a question of emphasis. Chan emphasizes effortless recognition. The same emphasis can be found in numerous sutras, tantras, dohas, and so on.

Malcolm wrote:

Effortless recognition /= buddhahood. It just doesn't. Otherwise, Arhats are also Buddhas. Now, you might think that is true, and certainly tilt billings does, but that is not a Mahāyāna perspective on the issue.

Namdrol said:

But it certainly has nothing to do with Indian Mahāyāna nor how Chan deviates from it. Not all Chanists denied the paths and stages.

Malcolm wrote:

I know, we are concerned here with those that do, primarily.

Namdrol said:

It's a basic tathāgatagarbha view,

Malcolm wrote:

There is no one basic tathagarbha view, there are a couple.

Even here tathagatagabins in India never imagined that tathagatagarbha alleviated the need for a long, grueling, mahāyāna path.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, August 28th, 2011 at 5:41 AM

Title: Re: Buddhahood in Chan

Content:
Namdrol said:
There is no such thing as an early, pristine Dzogchen.

Jnana said:
LOL.... Too funny.

Malcolm wrote:
There isn't.

This idea of a "pristine Dzogchen"(aka mind series) is a fantasy invented by some western translators. In reality, the mind series was a commentary on completion stage of Mahāyoga, as Rongzom makes very clear in his theg chen tshul 'jug, when he describes Dzogchen as a commentary on the tantra division.

Anyway, it is pretty clear you are not someone who is speaking from personal experience of the tenets which you espouse, otherwise you would not be wasting your time here. You might consider that unfair or ad hominem (which it is) -- but unless it is the case that you or Astus claim to persons realized in these tenets which you espouse, it really is just so much tarka.

N

Author: Malcolm
Date: Sunday, August 28th, 2011 at 5:39 AM
Title: Re: Buddhahood in Chan
Content:
Namdrol said:
These don't say anything, absent contextualized reasoning and explanation.

Jnana said:
Reasoning and explanation are just word play. Saraha:
Others run around in the Great Way, where scripture turns to sophistry and word play.

Malcolm wrote:
You are mistaking songs of realization as substituting for the path that got them there.

Jnana said:
Lama Shang:
The three kāyas are primordially, naturally present in the nature of the mind, which is like space;
the Jewel of the Buddha is completely within it...

The superior realization of your own mind as nondual luminosity is the path of seeing, its unbroken continuity is the path of meditation, its effortlessness is the path of complete attainment.

Malcolm wrote:
[/quote]

This does not refute the path of seeing in anyway.

When you do not have unbroken continuity of equipoise, what then? In this respect, there can be no discussion of complete attainment.

So, this is another example of poetic rhetoric.

But it certainly has nothing to do with Indian Mahāyāna nor how Chan deviates from it.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, August 28th, 2011 at 5:33 AM

Title: Re: Buddhahood in Chan

Content:

deepbluehum said:

It might occur to you that this instruction is a method to cause the student to give up grasping at methods when the case is that the method has been given too much focus.

Jnana said:

Chan is all about giving up grasping at methods. The same as early, pristine dzogchen:
Seeing that everything is self-perfected from the very beginning, the disease of striving for any achievement is surrendered, and just remaining in the natural state as it is,
the presence of non-dual contemplation continuously spontaneously arises.

Malcolm wrote:

There is no such thing as an early, pristine Dzogchen.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, August 28th, 2011 at 5:10 AM

Title: Re: Buddhahood in Chan

Content:

deepbluehum said:

Let's just say Chan's method of introducing is equivalent to this. I don't think so. I think such an introduction is special to Vajrayana

Jnana said:

With Chan, everything is a direct introduction. Every moment of every experience.

deepbluehum said:

That's very poetic. But I'm talking in pragmatics.

Malcolm wrote:

Geoff seems to think that giving a blizzard of citations from some post 12th century mahamudra text is sufficient for proving the path of seeing is buddhahood.

But i doubt very much whether Gampopa himself holds this view.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, August 28th, 2011 at 5:01 AM

Title: Re: Buddhahood in Chan

Content:

Jnana said:

With Chan, everything is a direct introduction. Every moment of every experience.

Malcolm wrote:

People place too much importance on this word "direct introduction", so much so they have no idea what it means anymore.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, August 28th, 2011 at 4:59 AM

Title: Re: Buddhahood in Chan

Content:

Jnana said:

Snip citation blizzard

Malcolm wrote:

These don't say anything, absent contextualized reasoning and explanation. They certainly don't mean that the path of seeing is buddhahood.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, August 28th, 2011 at 4:21 AM

Title: Re: Permanence and Enlightenment

Content:

AdmiraUim said:

Upon becoming enlightened what stops ignorance from re-asserting itself?

Malcolm wrote:

Having realized emptiness, it is impossible to forget that realization.

AdmiraUim said:

If that is not possible then does that make enlightenment permanent?

Malcolm wrote:

When a seed is scorched, it is permanently incapable of giving rise to a sprout, likewise, when the seed of ignorance is scorched, it can never give rise to the result, affliction, again

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, August 28th, 2011 at 4:05 AM

Title: Re: Buddhahood in Chan

Content:

Namdrol said:

As I pointed out, if insight into the nature of the mind was sufficient for full buddhahood, then first stage bodhisattvas would be buddhas. But they are not.

Jnana said:

This is just another lame gradualist argument.

Malcolm wrote:

And this is just another petulant complaint lacking substance and reasoning.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, August 28th, 2011 at 2:49 AM

Title: Re: Buddhahood in Chan

Content:

deepbluehum said:

This is a very interesting discussion. It is a very important discussion. Please allow a possibility that there actually is buddhahood in one life. Please consider that the powers gained on the bhūmis as described in sutras are inspirational. The actual realizations and samadhis that happen on the bhūmis or that a buddha has are completely beyond description and can only be referenced metaphorically. The realization of nonconceptual wisdom is possible even in a day or a week. Chan does not possess this method. Vajrayana does.

Then the matter of attaining omniscience is a gradual process. Because the obstacles to omniscience are in one's elements, one has to remain in nonconceptual wisdom 24/7 for a long time, then sometime around death wisdom throws off the veil of the elements. Vajrayana has methods that make this certain. Chan does this potentially but without the specific method, it won't be as certain.

Jnana said:

You've re-emphasized my previous point: Every Mahāyāna tradition is faith based. One of the glaring shortcomings of Tibetan Buddhism is in taking a faith based, visionary tradition, and trying to interpret it literally. Of course, this began in India, with proofs of omniscience and so on. But that doesn't legitimize it. Here the Tibetans could learn a thing or two from the Chinese and Japanese masters. But this likely won't happen any time soon, since virtually every Tibetan Buddhist has already been thoroughly convinced by their tradition's self-proclaimed superiority.

Malcolm wrote:

We are not really talking Tibetan Buddhism here. We are talking about Chan Buddhism and Indian Mahāyāna. Your non-sequiturs about Vajrayāna are a distracting waste of time.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, August 28th, 2011 at 12:49 AM

Title: Re: Buddhahood in Chan

Content:

Astus said:

In content it teaches the sudden enlightenment that accomplishes buddhahood directly.

Malcolm wrote:

One can say whatever one likes. For example, consider the statement "Jesus teaches a method of direct buddhahood, far superior to anything taught by any other Buddha or tradition". Who can refute this if all statements about Buddhism are to be considered valid? In other words, such claims are just so much hot air without reasons.

As we have seen, there is no precedent in Indian Buddhism from the 1st century BCE to the time supposedly Bodhidharma visited China the kind of claims some Chan masters make.

Astus said:

In method it uses immediate insight into the true nature of mind.

Malcolm wrote:

As I pointed out, if insight into the nature of the mind was sufficient for full buddhahood, then first stage bodhisattvas would be buddhas. But they are not.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 27th, 2011 at 11:55 PM

Title: Re: Buddhahood in Chan

Content:

Astus said:

The realisation happened on the 11th level, the first level of dwelling, and the 1st bhumi is the 41st level.

Malcolm wrote:

If that is so, it is plainly wrong.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 27th, 2011 at 9:53 PM

Title: Re: Costly Situations

Content:

Namdrol said:

Maybe in Chinese and Thervada Buddhism, it is possible, but not for westerners in TB. On the other side of that however, you lose a lot a freedom by ordaining in monastic scene where you are completely supported.

Huseng said:

I think it depends largely on your connections and where you are. I know one westerner in Nepal who has the option of going into permanent lifelong retreat if he wants to, but then that's because of his connections and service. Very few would ever have that option, and I think you'd have to be in India or Nepal for it to ever happen.

Maybe there is also the unspoken expectation, too, that westerners are all wealthy, so they should pay more. In India even at government tourist sites you pay 100 rupees, the locals pay 5 rupees. The cost of tuition at the Rangjung Yeshe Institute is also much more than what locals pay, and as a foreigner you pay your tuition in US dollars, too.

Tell me if I'm wrong, but in TB in Asia, I think the cost of everything increases if you're a westerner? Perhaps speaking Tibetan puts you on the cost scale of a local because they don't need to use extra services to support you (like English speaking staff and so on).

Malcolm wrote:

Americans, Canadians, and Western Europeans have more money than locals, so they should pay more. Speaking Tibetan does not bring the costs down. AFAIK.

I know a lot of broke western Tibetan Buddhist ordained folks. Some of them are quite pathetic, like hungary ghosts.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 27th, 2011 at 9:45 PM

Title: Re: Sunyata and dependent origination

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

Don't confuse "characteristics" with "defining characteristics".

Since mind is infinite, it has no defining characteristics. Only "infining" characteristics.

The nature of mind, it's characteristics (space & luminosity) are infinite, not finite.

(Define:

de= "of"

fine= "end"

in other words, the end of something, it's boundaries of limitation)

Malcolm wrote:

Making up your own dharma language now?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 27th, 2011 at 9:40 PM

Title: Re: Sunyata and dependent origination

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

isn't the lack of characteristics a characteristic?

Namdrol said:

Is a "lack of money" money?

PadmaVonSamba said:

Yes...it's money that you don't have!

Malcolm wrote:

Can you spend a lack of money?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 27th, 2011 at 9:38 PM

Title: Re: Costly Situations

Content:

TheWay said:

...and not have to worry about finances etc...

Namdrol said:
That is not going to happen.

Huseng said:
It is possible if you ordain, though maybe this isn't the case in TB.

Malcolm wrote:
Maybe in Chinese and Thervada Buddhism, it is possible, but not for westerners in TB.
On the other side of that however, you lose a lot a freedom by ordaining in monastic scene where you are completely supported. And it is not necessarily fanatastic for practicing Dharma.

N

Author: Malcolm
Date: Saturday, August 27th, 2011 at 9:26 PM
Title: Re: Costly Situations
Content:
TheWay said:
...and not have to worry about finances etc...

Malcolm wrote:
That is not going to happen.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Saturday, August 27th, 2011 at 9:21 PM
Title: Re: 10 Questions for His Holiness Sakya Trizin
Content:
Kunga said:
... after the Dalai Lama, the throne holder of Sakya is the next senior figure.

J-Bird said:
Well this isn't exactly true. In the Central Tibetan political system pre-1959, the Panchen Lama was the closest in succession to retaining the political role of the executive of the central Tibetan Government. This being said however, from a religious point of view, the Karmapa incarnations, were held the 2nd highest religious throne in Tibet, aside from the Dalai Lamas.

It is an itheresting discusison though, and my understanding may be somewhat misguided. If anyone has any other info, I would be interested to better understand the heriarcy between the Glug, Sakya, Kagyu-pa and Nyigma lamas in relation to political power.

Malcolm wrote:
Traditionally speaking, in terms of the height of the seat to which a given high Tibetan lama is entitled, the throne holder of Sakya is lower only than the Dalai Lama. All other Lamas have seats lower than the throne holder of Sakya.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 27th, 2011 at 9:14 PM

Title: Re: Buddhahood in Chan

Content:

Namdrol said:

No, we just have the usual philosophical sleight of hand I mentioned above.

Jnana said:

The sleight of hand is using a 9th century polemical argument to criticize a 2nd century conception of the bodhisattva path.

Malcolm wrote:

I am not criticizing a second century concept of the bodhisattva path.

Jnana said:

As I mentioned previously on another thread, if we were to show up in 2nd century India with our basket of tantras and claim that it's possible to attain buddhahood in one lifetime, we'd be laughed out of every vihāra on the sub-continent.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, I have acknowledged this several times. The point I am making is that later Vajrayānists took this limitation seriously and proposed that early Mahāyāna was by definition a slow path, requiring incalculable eons to complete because there were no unique methods in sutrayāna to hasten progress on the path.

Since Chan, Huayen, and so on do not add any new insights into the nature of reality, nor do they add any revolutionary new methods, any claims they make to sudden buddhahood are merely rhetoric and philosophical trickery.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 27th, 2011 at 9:08 PM

Title: Re: Buddhahood in Chan

Content:

Astus said:

No, it is a Huayen view of the initial production of bodhicitta, which is the entrance to the path of accumulation.

It says first bhumi and it means the first bhumi.

Malcolm wrote:

Which first bhumi? The traditional dasabhumi are bhumis 40-50 in in the 52 stages scheme which is a result of taking chapter 15, 21, 22, 25, 26 of the Avatamska to be descriptions or levels on the bodhisattva path. Chapter 26 however, or the ten stages is the Dasabhumika sūtra and that is what is under discussion.

Astus said:

No, since the ten stages are treated the same way. In Chinese Buddhism they are merely encased within an alternate scheme, but when I say first bhumi, I mean the first bodhisattva bhumi as described in the Dasabhumika sutra.

That's the point, it is not treated the same way. Here's Buswell's summary based on Tongxuan's work:

"The ten bhumis are the original foundation of all dharmas. Here the bodhisattva pervades all dharmas, all directions, and all positions simultaneously. Development before this stage involved some measure of effort and entailed as well the progressive development of meritorious practices. By the time the bodhisattva has reached the ten bhumis, however, he has nothing left to practice and nothing left to achieve. It is a kind of "firming-up" stage at which all the qualities and achievements attained throughout the previous levels are matured and allowed to infuse his entire being. He merges with all dharmas without, however, losing his own identity in the process. This is the stage of the unimpeded interpenetration of all phenomena- the highest expression of spiritual attainment in the Avatamsaka Sutra and, by implication, in all the Buddhist scriptures."

Malcolm wrote:

As I said, it is treated in the same way. When a bodhisattva realizes the first bhumi, there is no more emptiness to realize, all that is left to do is to complete the two accumulations, as I told you, the ten stages only map qualities, not realization.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 27th, 2011 at 7:38 AM

Title: Re: Buddhahood in Chan

Content:

Astus said:

Yes, so is the whole stages system.

Malcolm wrote:

No, the bhumis are measures of qualities, the paths are measures of realization. This is why the āryan path has only three phases: the path of seeing, the path of cultivation and the path of no more training. The ten bodhisattva stages are included within both the path of seeing (first bhumi) and the path of cultivation (first bhumi to tenth bhumi). The path of no more training is Buddhahood.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 27th, 2011 at 7:34 AM

Title: Re: Buddhahood in Chan

Content:

kirtu said:

It seems to me to be a bit of hyperbole - Tibetan teachings do address awakening but it's all inferential and usually seems glossed as far as the Path of Preparation and bhumis are concerned (unless one takes it literally that a 1st bhumi Bodhisattva can physically emanate 100 bodies, etc.).

Namdrol said:

These are manomāyakāyas, not physical bodies.

N

kirtu said:

Tibetan teaching on the lower paths and the first bhumi can be summarized as "where there's smoke there's fire." But it's extraordinary smoke Manomayakayas: mental bodies? For the purpose of teaching through visions or can they appear as physical bodies to aid beings directly?

Kirt

Malcolm wrote:

The one hundred bodies emanated by a first stage bodhisattva are for the purpose of visiting buddhas in other nirmankāya buddhafiels.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 27th, 2011 at 7:32 AM

Title: Re: Buddhahood in Chan

Content:

Astus said:

"This is just intellectual contrivance."

Yes, so is the whole stages system. No, it is a summary of the Huayan view of the first bhumi.

Malcolm wrote:

No, it is a Huayan view of the initial production of bodhicitta, which is the entrance to the path of accumulation.

Astus said:

"The first of the 52 bhumis is not anywhere near the path of seeing, so there is no immediate experience of the ultimate that can even be discussed."

You make the mistake of identifying one interpretation of the bodhisattva stages with another.

Malcolm wrote:

No, since the first bodhisattva stage of the dasabhumika follows the path of seeing. It is not an issue of "mistakes" or "interpretations".

Astus said:

What I showed is that both "first stage" and "buddhahood" are relative terms that depend on interpretation. Unless you give a definition you want to base the comparison on your question can't be answered, or it can be answered in any way.

Malcolm wrote:

No, since the ten stages are treated the same way. In Chinese Buddhism they are merely encased within an alternate scheme, but when I say first bhumi, I mean the first bodhisattva bhumi as described in the Dasabhumika sutra. If you wish to be a sophist, and pretend that you do not understand this, that is your problem, but it reveals sophistry on your part and an inability to maintain a coherent argument.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 27th, 2011 at 6:16 AM

Title: Re: Buddhahood in Chan

Content:

kirtu said:

So it's in this vein.

Malcolm wrote:

Which contradicts what the Buddha said about there being no persons of the four ranks of āryas outside of his dharma and vinaya.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 27th, 2011 at 6:14 AM

Title: Re: Buddhahood in Chan

Content:

kirtu said:

It seems to me to be a bit of hyperbole - Tibetan teachings do address awakening but it's all inferential and usually seems glossed as far as the Path of Preparation and bhumis are concerned (unless one takes it literally that a 1st bhumi Bodhisattva can physically emanate 100 bodies, etc.).

Malcolm wrote:

These are manomāyakāyas, not physical bodies.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 27th, 2011 at 6:12 AM

Title: Re: Buddhahood in Chan

Content:

Astus said:

"What then is the difference between a Buddha and first stage bodhisattva?"

It depends on how the first stage and how a buddha is interpreted. Here's one interpretation from Wonhyo's commentary to the Vajrasamadhi Sutra that is based on the Huayan view,

"the first bhûmi in fact encompasses all ten bhûmis, for in one moment one may suddenly access the ten types of dharmadharmatâs. The ten bhûmis are in fact the first bhûmi, for all [ten] may instantly be completely fulfilled at this initial gate [of the first bhûmi]. Owing to the fact that the ten bhûmis are in fact the first bhûmi, [the first bhûmi] is called the "one." But because the first bhûmi is in fact the ten bhûmis, it is also "many." Consequently, [the first bhûmi] is called the "one-and-many bhûmi."

Malcolm wrote:

This is just intellectual contrivance.

Astus said:

In a similar fashion it is discussed by those who follow (Zongmi, Jinul) who attempted to connect Chan with the doctrinal teachings, mainly Huayan. So it is not much different from what you say, however, they called sudden enlightenment not the entry to the first bhumi but the entry to the level of faith which is the first of the 52 levels. That makes your interpretation of Chan's sudden enlightenment a lot more positive than theirs. On the other hand, their interpretation is a bit more complex, as it is briefly explained by Buswell in a footnote:

Malcolm wrote:

That makes the term 'sudden buddhahood' meaningless since it is far below the path of seeing, this so called "buddha" has not even recognized emptiness. No wonder people are confused.

Astus said:

So, even if it sounds lot of "sophistry" and "sleight of hand", Chan focuses on immediate experience of the ultimate

Malcolm wrote:

The first of the 52 bhumis is not anywhere near the path of seeing, so there is no immediate experience of the ultimate that can even be discussed.

Astus said:

and so there aren't many discussions on bodhisattva stages, because having "stages", "levels" and "grades" of enlightenment are all ideas of "how it could be", while directly attaining no-thought and maintaining it in all situations - that's why I protested against the distinction of equipoise and post-equipoise - is the essential teaching and realisation.

Malcolm wrote:

You protested, but did not answer my observation concerning the identity of the content of a first bodhisattvas realization and a buddha's realization.

In the end, all you have succeeded in showing is that Chan is systematically incoherent.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 27th, 2011 at 4:50 AM

Title: Re: Buddhahood in Chan

Content:

kirtu said:

Right but Chan and Zen doctrine and teachers do address it and the result is a kind of continuum of awakening.

Malcolm wrote:

All teachings address how one can tell if one is awakened, and to a limited extent, how others can tell. It is still very difficult.

kirtu said:

Fundamentally are people naturally engaged in reducing suffering would be one response.

Malcolm wrote:

That is not a good criteria. Christians will say their faith lessens their suffering. Would you then say that Christian faith is comparable to Buddhist awakening?

kirtu said:

As you have noted with Astus much of what Chan or Zen says is really about the 1st bhumi in the bhumi and paths classification.

Malcolm wrote:

That was what I said, but Astus does not accept this.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 27th, 2011 at 4:31 AM

Title: Re: Buddhahood in Chan

Content:

Namdrol said:

The point is to distinguish rhetoric from what is actual.

kirtu said:

Well - how do you determine if someone has attained some degree of awakening?

Malcolm wrote:

It is very difficult, virtually impossible, really.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 27th, 2011 at 4:09 AM

Title: Re: Buddhahood in Chan

Content:

kirtu said:

I'll have to look up the Chan explanations on this point but it comes in part from assertions in the Lanka and other sutras teaching that the whole world is mind. A lot seems to come from the Lanka + the Flower Ornament Sutra but I don't want to interject what may be more a Zen bias.

Malcolm wrote:

What the Lanka discusses is sudden or gradual entry in suchness, not sudden or gradual buddhahood.

kirtu said:

Anyway, Buddhas not being able to experience delusion: even in the Tibetan schools this can be parsed out. HHST states that this is a difference between Gelug and Sakya in that Gelug asserts that Buddhas can see suffering.

Malcolm wrote:

This does not mean that buddhas experience delusion, merely that their omniscience, itself illusory, is capable of apprehending illuory objects of knowledge, re: Haribhadra.

kirtu said:

In Zen at least (and In am well aware that Astus set the context in Chan - but my reading of Sheng Yen seems to conform to the following as well) enlightenment is not actually the undeluded enlightenment of Shakyamuni because even after kensho and even satori people still can deepen their enlightenment and can be influenced by habit patterns. Thus the rhetoric says that one's enlightenment is that of Shakyamuni's but the experience is not quite there ranging as I mentioned from higher up the Path of Accumulation to the lower bhumis.

Malcolm wrote:

The point is to distinguish rhetoric from what is actual.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 27th, 2011 at 4:00 AM

Title: Re: Buddhahood in Chan

Content:

Astus said:

Regarding the dana-paramita (although the quoted MPPS section does not mentioned it) here is a little explanation from Dazhu Huihai:

Q: Where can one enter the doorway to this understanding?

A: Through the perfection of charity (dana-paramita).

Q: Buddha has said that the six paramitas are the action of the Bodhisattva path, so how can we enter the doorway to this understanding by practicing, as you have said, only the dana-paramita?

A: People who are confused or deluded do not understand that the other five paramitas all evolve from the dana-paramita. Therefore, in practicing the dana-paramita, one also fulfills the practice of the other five paramitas.

Q: For what reason is it called the dana-paramita?

A: "Dana" means the perfection of charity.

Q: What things can be given up in the name of charity?

A: Clinging to thoughts of duality can be given up.

Q: Just what does this mean?

A: It means to give up clinging, in the name of charity, to thoughts of good and evil, existence and non-existence, love and hate, emptiness and fullness, concentration and non-concentration, pure and impure, etc. In the name of charity, give up all of them. Then, and only then, can you attain the stage of the voidness of duality, while, at the same time, letting neither a thought about the voidness of opposites nor about charity arise. This is the genuine practice of the dana-paramita, which is also known as absolute detachment from all phenomena. This is only the voidness of all dharma-nature, which means that always and everywhere is just no-mind. If one can attain the stage of no-mind everywhere, no form will be perceived, because our self-nature is void, containing no form. This, then, is true Reality, which is also called the wonderful form or body of the Tathagata. The Diamond Sutra says: "Those who have abandoned all forms are called Buddhas."

Malcolm wrote:

It has already been pointed how the realization of emptiness of a first stage bodhisattva is identical in content to the realization of emptiness of a Buddha. But surely you admit that there is a difference between a first stage bodhisattva and Buddha. If there is no difference in terms of the nature of reality, what then do you think the difference is?

Astus said:

The two accumulations of merit and wisdom are present in the mind. Emptiness is wisdom, function is compassion. Zen affirms that the trikaya is present in the nature of mind, so it is not that one has to develop wisdom for the dharmakaya and merit for rupakaya, but the buddha-mind is already perfect in all aspects. Still, that doesn't deny that there is also a gradual path of the bodhisattva, however, the gradual path doesn't deny the existence of a sudden path. Thrangu Rinpoche says that on the sutrayana it takes a long time to achieve buddhahood because they use analytical-conceptual meditation but Mahamudra uses an experiential method of directly looking at the nature of mind. A similar argument could be made in the case of Zen too.

Malcolm wrote:

Mahāmudra is part of secret mantra. Since the methods of mahāmudra do not exist in Zen, a similar argument cannot be made.

Astus said:

This might help better understanding, here is Zongmi's differentiation between the five dhyanas, that is, the levels of practice:

5. Direct (sudden) realization of the essential purity of one's own mind, originally without defilements, itself endowed with the influx-free (non-afflicted) gnosis - this mind is Buddha, ultimate with nothing else beyond - cultivating in this manner, is the Supreme Vehicle Dhyana. It is also known as the Pure Dhyana of the Tathagatas.

Malcolm wrote:

This is no different than the realization of a first stage bodhisattva. What then is the difference between a Buddha and first stage bodhisattva? You have still failed to answer this point.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 27th, 2011 at 3:20 AM

Title: Re: Buddhahood in Chan

Content:

Namdrol said:

Again, this is just philosophical slight of hand, using the teaching of the emptiness of phenomena (shown above) to try and demonstrate that conventional phenomena are not effective borders on nihilism.

kirtu said:

It is because conventional phenomena are effective that Chan doctrine is centered in the view of realization in this moment. One can attain this realization directly and suddenly because one's mind is actually a Buddha.

Malcolm wrote:

As I said, buddhas that experience delusion are buddhas only by name.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 27th, 2011 at 3:18 AM

Title: Re: Buddhahood in Chan

Content:

kirtu said:

No - Chan ideas about Buddhahood are largely a development of Yogacara influence and yogic experience.

Malcolm wrote:

I have read a lot of yogachara. In what Yogachara text is there anything remotely like the citations Astus as provided?

kirtu said:

They hinge the argument on the notion that the mind is a radiant Buddha and that this can be experienced directly. This view in turn is a strong influence of Yogacara.

Malcolm wrote:

This is obviously false since buddhas cannot experience delusion. The Yogachara masters such as Asanga were actually strongly critical of tathagāgarbha theory.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 27th, 2011 at 1:00 AM

Title: Re: Buddhahood in Chan

Content:

Astus said:

I see. So the problem is the lack of the two accumulations. But even in the Prajnaparamita teachings we find that one paramita includes all the other paramitas.

In the Mahaprajnaparamitasastra (30.5.3; vol. 2, p. 859, tr. Lamotte-Migme) we find even the concept of abstaining for all kinds of practices, "Furthermore, the bodhisattva acquires the Prajñāpāramitā without practicing any dharma and without acquiring any dharma. Why? All practices (caryā) are erroneous and futile: from near or far, they present faults. In fact, bad dharmas (akuśaladharma) are faulty from close up; as for good dharmas, they are transformed and modified from far away; those who become attached to them will end up by experiencing pain and sorrow; thus they show defects from far off. [Good and bad practices] are like an appetizing food and a disgusting food both of which have been poisoned."

There is also the story of Prasannendriya and Agramati (MPPS, vol. 1, p. 323ff) where the first only taught insight into the true nature of reality without renouncing the world and the other all the many practices and ascetic methods. Prasannendriya became a buddha eventually and Agramati had to undergo lot of suffering later on.

Adding the buddha-mind teachings, the nature of mind has perfect function, the functioning of a buddha, and this is the display of all the qualities. What is there to accumulate for it?

Malcolm wrote:

Again, this is just philosophical slight of hand, using the teaching of the emptiness of phenomena (shown above) to try and demonstrate that conventional phenomena are not effective borders on nihilism.

Further, this supposes that practicing dana paramita and realizing dana paramita is sufficient for full buddhahood. It is not. It is sufficient for realizing the first bodhisattva bhumi, and that is all. As I mentioned above, the emptiness realized on the path of seeing and the emptiness that a Buddha realizes is the same emptiness. There is no difference at all in the realization of emptiness of a first stage bodhisattva and a Buddha. But there is a difference in affliction and omniscience.

You might try and will it away with philosophical sophistries, but this is not the intention of Mahāyāna.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 26th, 2011 at 10:08 PM

Title: Re: Buddhahood in Chan

Content:

Namdrol said:

Because India is the source of the Dharma, the place where Mahāyāna developed, etc., and the site of Vajrāsana.

Astus said:

Do you deny the possibility that authentic Buddhism is not bound by geographical location? You defined a "mainstream Buddhism" as all Indian Buddhists while we both know that Buddhism there was neither unified nor static. Vajrayana claims buddhahood within one lifetime, so it is not exactly true that all agreed on the time it has to take to achieve it.

Malcolm wrote:

No, you are missing the point -- Vajrayānists in India accepted the lengthy time period for achieving buddhahood based on the accumulating the two collections.

Astus said:

The concept of sudden enlightenment was first taught by Daosheng (360?-434), a disciple of Kumarajiva. Because he was a Chinese master and not Indian, his view of Buddhism must be wrong?

Malcolm wrote:

Please precise with your terms -- does sudden enlightenment mean sudden buddhahood, or sudden awakening on one of the bhumis?

The doctrine here under question is the idea promulgated by some Chan masters that Buddhahood does not require the two collections. This is unprecedented in Indian Buddhism, including Vajrayāna (as well as Dzogchen).

Astus said:

Saying that Indian Buddhism is the definitive because that's where it first appeared is very much an argument based on an irrelevant fact.

Malcolm wrote:

Indian Buddhism is definitive because Buddhism developed in India. All the texts and teachings upon which all other Buddhist doctrines, whether in line or in contrast with Indian Buddhism, depend on Indian Buddhism.

Astus said:

Buddhism developed pretty much independently in China after Buddhism established itself. Why would then it be inferior only because of geographical reasons?

Malcolm wrote:

It is not a question of inferiority - it is a question of continuity.

It is clear that certain Chan ideas about "Buddhahood" have no precedent in the Buddhism promulgated in India, including the Buddhism of Vajrayāna.

Astus said:

Just as in India so it was in China that there were different traditions and interpretations of the Buddhadharma. Sudden enlightenment might be inconceivable for the Theravada and early Mahayana followers, but not so for the Vajrayana.

Malcolm wrote:

There is no such thing as a "sudden enlightenment" in Vajrayāna which is free from the two collections. The rapid awakening in Vajrayāna is predicated on gathering the two accumulations extremely rapidly -- not, as in some Chan formulations, dismissing their importance all together.

Astus said:

Vajrayana developed in India and Chan developed in China. Neither of them are something you could find in such mainstream schools as the Sarvastivadins or the Dharmaguptakas.

Malcolm wrote:

What Vajrayāna shares with Sarvastivadins or the Dharmaguptakas is that by normal means, buddhahood requires a minimum of three asaṃkhyakalpas to achieve. In order to bypass that requirement, Vajrayāna proposes the adoption of a specific methodology by which these two collections may be gathered in a single lifetime, and progress through the paths and stages, including all the visionary indicators of such progress that may be measured through yoga specific indications in the experience of the meditator on both a mental and physical level.

Chan masters that promulgate the extreme notions of sudden buddhahood, by contrast, hinge their arguments solely on the notion that paths, practice, merit, virtue, are part of relative truth and therefore are a waste of time even to consider as having anything to do with attaining buddhahood -- that in fact, buddhahood is not attainable by any relative means whatsoever. The consequence of course is that these extreme speculations of the part of certain Chan masters render their version of buddhahood unrecognizable as buddhahood. We can call it Buddhism since they insist they are Buddhist, but it resembles nothing at all like mainstream Buddhism.

Astus said:

But then it comes down to the spatial distance between India and China. Do you find that an important point? In my view, the source of Dharma is the Buddha and not a place, nationality, ethnicity, political system or climate.

Malcolm wrote:

What I find important is that there is a serious discontinuity between the idea of buddhahood promulgated by certain extreme Chan masters and the rest of the Buddhist world.

You seem to think the argument hinges on sudden verses slow. It does not. It hinges on whether buddhahood is accomplished by virtue of the two things all Mahāyāna sutras say it is accomplished by i.e. the practice of the perfections and the two accumulations. Vajrayāna differs solely from common Mahāyāna of India, in this respect, by virtue of the suggestion that there are means by which one can reduce the amount of time it takes to generate the complete two collections from the daunting three incalculable eons to one, seven or sixteen lifetimes.

These Chan speculations you have introduced, on the other hand, hinge on philosophical sleights of hand that I have already pointed out. My point is that these philosophical speculations have no precedent in Indian Buddhism.

Whether one accepts them or not is entirely a matter of personal choice. I don't accept them, since I think they represent a deviation from Indian Buddhism -- I do not believe that there was any person who became a Buddha without gathering the two accumulations in their entirety.

In the end it is not a question of valid or invalid, it is a question of definitions. For me, a Buddhahood divorced from the two accumulations is impossible.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 26th, 2011 at 8:43 PM

Title: Re: The virgin birth of Gautama.

Content:

Will said:

The Lalitavistara Sutra (among others) said conception occurred after a dream of a 6-tusked white elephant. Birth was not from the womb, but from her side.

Namdrol said:

C-section, which explains why his mother died shortly after he was born.

catmoon said:

Lol. Get a copy of Gray's Anatomy and it should be pretty apparent how impossible that would be.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, if you take "from her side" quite literally. But I understand "from her side" to mean that she did not give birth in the usual way -- not literally as in through or above her pelvic bone. Which is even more impossible, according to human anatomy.

Or perhaps, they cut open the side of her abdomen rather than the front of her belly.

C-sections were known in India at that time:

<https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Bindusara> " onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 26th, 2011 at 8:29 PM

Title: Re: Sunyata and dependent origination

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

isn't the lack of characteristics a characteristic?

Malcolm wrote:

Is a "lack of money" money?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 26th, 2011 at 8:28 PM

Title: Re: Sunyata and dependent origination

Content:

Namdrol said:

What type of empty space are you referring, be specific. Do you mean the sky, do you mean the empty space in a box? Conditioned space and unconditioned space are different.

5heaps said:

i mean the unconditioned mere absence of physical obstruction. i dont think anyone except vaibhashika accepts that as a functioning thing, but they dont know how to posit mental labelling so its only natural that they would say something like that

Malcolm wrote:

Oh well, that type of space is merely a mental abstraction, it is unreal, no one sees it or perceives it since it lacks characteristics. So your thesis is rejected.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 26th, 2011 at 8:14 PM

Title: Re: Buddhahood in Chan

Content:

Astus said:

Why only India...?

Malcolm wrote:

Because India is the source of the Dharma, the place where Mahāyāna developed, etc., and the site of Vajrāsana.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 26th, 2011 at 8:11 PM

Title: Re: Buddhahood in Chan

Content:

Astus said:

Hm, the current Buddhism in India or sometimes in the past? And what time? Why only India and why that time? Among the Indian schools which is mainstream and which is marginal? This is getting messy...

Malcolm wrote:

Now you are just being deliberately obtuse.

All Indian Buddhist schools until the destruction of Indian Buddhism had a similar view of the length of time of the career of a bodhisattva -- based on the Chan quotes you cited, they must have thought that Sakyamuni Buddha, Avalokiteshvara, Manjushri, Samantbhadra and so on were very stupid.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 26th, 2011 at 8:06 PM

Title: Re: Question re: Asanga and the Bodhisattvabhumi

Content:

Sunyatavadin said:

Hi all,

I've been trying for a while to find information on Asanga's Bodhisattvabhumi. Unfortunately, both my Sanskrit and Tibetan are not so good. I can't even figure out how long it is or whether it's the same as the "Bodhisattvabhumi" contained within the "Yogacarabhumi." There seems to be no English translation except for one chapter (Tattvartha) translated by Janice Dean Willis. Are there any Tibetan-language versions of the Tengyur online in which I might find the entire text, albeit in Tibetan?

Thanks in advance.

Malcolm wrote:

The Bodhisattvabhumi is a section of the Yogacharabhumi.

It may be found online here:

<http://www.aciparchive.org/ace/#lyt%28vol%29col%28tendg%29title%282972%29>

Enjoy

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 26th, 2011 at 7:52 PM

Title: Re: Buddhahood in Chan

Content:

Namdrol said:

"Mainstream" means "rest of the Buddhist world..."

Astus said:

That means a few of millions in Tibet, Mongolia and Bhutan, and the many Theravadins. In terms of the number of followers Vajrayana is not mainstream at all.

Malcolm wrote:

Mainstream means Buddhism in India.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 26th, 2011 at 10:02 AM

Title: Re: Appearances and mind

Content:

Namdrol said:

The difference is that the appearance and the apparent object are different, whereas in the Yogacara school, the apparent object itself is not held to exist apart from the mind, hence the sobriquet, "mind-only".

mzaur said:

What do you mean by 'apparent' object separate from appearance? Are you saying that an objective object, and thus an objective reality exists? And knowing this objective reality directly and not subjectively through the mind is 'wisdom'?

Malcolm wrote:

It's the old mode of appearance as opposed to mode of existence thing. For example, there is a glass of water -- it is perceived differently by beings of the six realms. If we say that the object, a glass of water is only a mental projection, there is no point in proposing that one object is perceived differently by different beings of the six realms.

Now then, we can dismiss the idea of an objective reality without dismissing the idea of objects per se.

Longchen rejects that idea that objects are mind because if they were, mountains should disappear when we cease to perceive them. But by the same token, objects, when analyzed, also cannot be found.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 26th, 2011 at 9:54 AM

Title: Re: Buddhahood in Chan

Content:

Namdrol said:

Yes, these are often trotted out, but they do not prove anything other than that Chan Buddhists had a view of buddhahood that does not correspond to mainstream Buddhist thinking on the subject.

Astus said:

What "mainstream" actually means is debatable since Chan has been the primary doctrine of elite Buddhism in East Asia for a thousand years now.

Proving that Chan, and particularly sudden enlightenment, is a valid Buddhist teaching is the real issue then. For that we would need a couple of terms defined, especially buddhahood and buddha-mind.

Malcolm wrote:

"Mainstream" means "rest of the Buddhist world..."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 26th, 2011 at 6:12 AM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

Pero said:

Ah. But how is killing one's mother or father connected with one's own and other's chances for attaining liberation?

Malcolm wrote:

Your father and mother gave you a precious human birth, your vehicle for liberation.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 26th, 2011 at 6:05 AM

Title: Re: Buddhahood in Chan

Content:

Astus said:

Some quotes on the view of Mahayana and the three kalpas long practice from different Chan works.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, these are often trotted out, but they do not prove anything other than that Chan Buddhists had a view of buddhahood that does not correspond to mainstream Buddhist thinking on the subject.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 26th, 2011 at 4:44 AM

Title: Re: Buddhahood in Chan

Content:

Namdrol said:

So you basically doubt that Virupa, for example, traversed all the paths and stages in a single lifetime?

Jnana said:

I don't see any reason to take mahasiddha hagiographies literally.

I see, so for you, Virupa, Tilopa, Luipa, Ghanapāda are merely nominal "mahāsiddhas", and reports of their realization are not to be taken literally. How about reports of the Buddha's realization? Are they to be taken literally?

Look at the numbers Namdrol. Any direct equivalency is absurd on the face of it.

Malcolm wrote:

What do numbers have to do with it?

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 26th, 2011 at 4:41 AM

Title: Re: Buddhahood in Chan

Content:

Jnana said:

[/list]

Here we have the same argument of the qualities being present in the basis.

Malcolm wrote:

No, we just have the usual philosophical sleight of hand I mentioned above.

The point that I am really trying to make is that Indian Mahāyānists took their own tradition seriously. For example, Nāgārjuna in the Ratnavali lists in some detail how much merit is required for each of the major and minor marks, when encouraging the king to cultivate merit.

And three uncalculable eons is not even really a Mahāyāna number. It is a number which comes from the earliest ideas about the length of time it took the bodhisattva to achieve buddhahood.

So on the one hand, we have the Indian tradition (Mahāyāna, Vajrayāna and the śrāvaka traditions) insisting that in order to become a buddha one must practice the paramitas for an insanely long period of time. And on the other hand we have a tradition a tradition in China which asserts all this is so much unnecessary proliferation.

Saying that "qualities are present in the basis" is a meaningless statement. Butter is present in milk, but it does not come out all by itself, oil is present in sesame seeds but it does not extract itself. And which qualities exactly?

Of course what we are dealing with here is a species of tathāgatagarbha thinking, but even hear, I don't think that the type of instant buddhahood you see some Chan masters proclaiming can be justified on the basis of any Indian sutras, tathāgatagarbha or otherwise.

Of course, this is the realm of religion, so no one can prove anything since it all boils down to belief.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 26th, 2011 at 3:35 AM

Title: Re: Buddhahood in Chan

Content:

Jnana said:

[

It's a flimsy argument. There is no reason to accept that the vajrayāna rhetoric of progressing from a common person to complete buddhahood in one lifetime is anything more than a provisional teaching.

Malcolm wrote:

So you basically doubt that Virupa, for example, traversed all the paths and stages in a single lifetime?

And what about this Vajrayāna tenet makes it "provisional"? That it seems too fantastic to you?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 26th, 2011 at 1:31 AM

Title: Re: Culture should't become a trap.

Content:

Jikan said:

The trouble is going the other way: assuming that the psychologized Kornfield-Goldstein-Batchelor version is Buddhism or represents all or the best of what the Buddhist tradition has to offer. That would be reductive in the highest.

Huseng said:

There are some whose Buddhism more or less is that version.

Worse is that they posit their opinions as legitimate and educated, meanwhile they don't even have a basic grasp of Buddhism 101.

Malcolm wrote:

And people argue with me about whether we live in degenerate times....

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 26th, 2011 at 1:06 AM

Title: Re: Hot and Cool Drinks?

Content:

sangyey said:

Are cold drinks ever recommended to help quiet wind disorders?

Malcolm wrote:

Never, unless you have a fever.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 26th, 2011 at 12:18 AM

Title: Re: Buddhahood in Chan

Content:

Namdrol said:

As I said, they tended to ignore Indian Mahāyāna masters, preferring their own interpretations. The only text of clear Indian origin in the short list given here is the first. The rest are native Chinese compositions.

Astus said:

Plus the Diamond Sutra. But yes, that is part of the difficulty of simply putting Chan under "sutrayana" and expecting it to conform with Tibetan views what it should be like. Therefore, if we don't count Indian Mahayana, perfect enlightenment in this life can be as valid a claim as in Vajrayana.

Malcolm wrote:

But we do count Indian Mahāyāna, since Vajrayāna is an extension of Indian Mahāyāna.

BTW, no one said it was impossible to become a buddha in this life. The notion is "is buddhahood in a single lifetime" a possibility? In India Mahāyāna, the answer is no-- Indian Mahayāna of whatever stripe requires three incalculable eons at minimum for full awakening. In Vajrayāna, the answer is yes, since through special methods it is made possible.

It seems to me that rather than providing methods, certain Chan masters who try to prove full enlightenment in the span of a single lifetime, engage in a philosophical feints to support their conception, in general resorting to arguments by means of ultimate truth to try and prove their point, basically arguing the doctrine of paths and stages is an unnecessary conceptual limitation. However, when challenged, I don't see a coherent defense being mounted, which has lead me to believe that much like pure land buddhism, Chan is in fact a faith oriented school.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 26th, 2011 at 12:10 AM

Title: Re: Appearances and mind

Content:

padma norbu said:

Where do all the sentient beings and perceived objects dependently originate from if not ultimately mind? Is there not a semantic distinction between Mind and mind, one referring to dharmakaya and one referring to discursive mind? Any such perception seems to be some sort of "mind stuff," confused or otherwise. Appearances arise and are perceived entirely by the mind, the root of the minds of sentient beings are ultimately all one thing, dharmakaya, which is called Absolute Mind (sems nyid). If discursive mind collapsed, the natural state still be left.

Malcolm wrote:

The difference is that the appearance and the apparent object are different, whereas in the Yogacara school, the apparent object itself is not held to exist apart from the mind, hence the sobriquet, "mind-only".

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 25th, 2011 at 11:07 PM

Title: Re: westerners living in india for many years

Content:

alpha said:

So they must have been americans all those who manged to live in india for many years....

Malcolm wrote:
Mostly Brits.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 25th, 2011 at 11:05 PM

Title: Re: Buddhahood in Chan

Content:

Astus said:

Flower Adornment Sutra, Awakening of Mahāyāna Faith, Sutra of the Heroic March Concentration, Sutra of Perfect Enlightenment, Platform Sutra, Diamond Sutra. They are all related to Chan/Seon and Huayan/Hwaeom in different ways. No Nagarjuna, no Vasubandhu, no Haribhadra.

Malcolm wrote:

As I said, they tended to ignore Indian Mahāyāna masters, preferring their own interpretations. The only text of clear Indian origin in the short list given here is the first. The rest are native Chinese compositions.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 25th, 2011 at 10:36 PM

Title: Re: Appearances and mind

Content:

Namdrol said:

Pero is telling you is that the literal translation of tha mal gyis shes pa is "ordinary mind". It is a yogi's term. It means wisdom. So, in translations tha mal gyis shes pa is generally given it's literal rendering; but one is to understand the term through its meaning i.e. wisdom.

padma norbu said:

I understand, but wanted to make sure we were all on the same page. Thanks. My question about why they didn't just translate it as "wisdom" was meant as a kind of frustrated rhetorical question, actually. They are writing for an English audience, so it would make a lot more sense to avoid a literal translation for one that makes more sense to the audience. Nobody but a scholar would understand that "ordinary mind" is a yogi's term for "wisdom." It's funny, too, because in the Translator's Introduction, he makes the point to say he has used translated ye shes as wisdom and goes on to explain how that translation is not entirely accurate and why, but he makes no mention of "ordinary mind" whatsoever.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, the reason why they continue to translate it literally is that there is an important explanation connected with tha mal gyi shes pa. In this context tha mal means something like original, or uncontrived, and shes pa means awareness. So it is really talking about being in the experience of the nature of the mind. But you won't get this from book which is why it is important also to have the oral instructions.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 25th, 2011 at 10:26 PM

Title: Re: Buddhahood in Chan

Content:

Astus said:

Therefore, to connect Chan to Indian Mahayana one has to go back in time a bit, to around the 4th century when things started to take shape. That means that the primary treatises of Chinese Buddhism are not those that are used in Tibet to understand Mahayana.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, this is definitely not so. Sutra studies in Tibetan Buddhism is based primarily, though not exclusively on treatise authored between the 2-6th century.

What is more accurate to say is that China, being an outpost of Buddhism, was in many respects out of the main stream of the development of Mahāyāna theory in India. What is also true, is that Chinese Buddhists tended to ignore Indian sastra literature, and prefer their own interpretations of Buddhist sutras to those of Indian masters. For example, Huayen masters really looked down on Asanga.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 25th, 2011 at 9:57 PM

Title: Re: Appearances and mind

Content:

padma norbu said:

Why wouldn't this be translated as "wisdom" rather than "ordinary mind?" I don't understand the way things are translated sometimes...

Pero said:

Tha mal gyi shes pa means ordinary mind and not wisdom.

Namdrol said:

Mind [sems] and ordinary mind [tha mal gyi shes pa] are two entirely different things.

The latter is a yogi's term for wisdom [ye shes].

padma norbu said:

You appear to be contradicting each other. Namdrol clearly says here "that the latter is a yogi's term for wisdom."

Malcolm wrote:

Pero is telling you is that the literal translation of tha mal gyis shes pa is "ordinary mind". It is a yogi's term. It means wisdom. So, in translations tha mal gyis shes pa is generally given it's literal rendering; but one is to understand the term through its meaning i.e. wisdom.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 25th, 2011 at 9:47 PM

Title: Re: Cultural shouldn't become a trap.

Content:

Chaz said:

Please explain what aspects of Buddhadharma are being cast off as "culture". How are they wrong?

Isn't this road of trying to differentiate between what is "culture" and what is Buddhadharma as a means of deciding what to keep and what to discard equally entangling?

Huseng said:

Some have suggested rebirth is just a cultural adornment from ancient Indian civilization, and hence proceed to craft a "Buddhism" without rebirth.

Chaz said:

Ok, that's one thing. Anything else?

Malcolm wrote:

There are all kinds of things in Tibetan Buddhism that are more culture than Buddhism. Even Samdhong Rinpoche brought this up at Garrison Institute -- warning western Buddhists that they needed to carefully distinguish between what things were Tibetan and what things were Buddhist in Tibetan Buddhism, and preferring the latter.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 25th, 2011 at 9:40 PM

Title: Re: Sunyata and dependent origination

Content:

5heaps said:

One cannot cognize that which lacks characteristics. It's impossible.

Namdrol said:

if by characteristics you mean shape, color, form, duration, etc, then its no problem to cognize it directly. for, just as empty space for example lacks all of these things and it can be cognized directly without the use of a conceptual consciousness, so too can emptiness

Malcolm wrote:

What type of empty space are you referring, be specific. Do you mean the sky, do you mean the empty space in a box? Conditioned space and unconditioned space are different.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 25th, 2011 at 9:21 PM

Title: Re: Buddhahood in Chan

Content:

mindyourmind said:

... this entire discussion is one of comparison, bordering on sectarian dogma, thinly veiled as an academic discussion.

Malcolm wrote:

Actually, I am questioning the entire basis of certain Chan claims to buddhahood because they broadly contradict Indian Mahāyāna.

It is a doxological discussion and therefore, about dogma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 25th, 2011 at 9:16 PM

Title: Re: Tantric sexual bliss vs. dhyanic bliss

Content:

Namdrol said:

Yes, the mind in the second dhyana is conceptual because it is maintaining equipoise on a conceptual object.

5heaps said:

consider that object, it cant be conceptual, because that object is being held by a nonconceptual mind (ie a mind free from mental images [dunchis are drachis])

Malcolm wrote:

All eight dhyanas are conceptual because their object is a concept, therefore, the mind that holds the object is conceptual. It may not be a diffuse conceptual mind, but it is conceptual a mind since it holds a concept, for example, "infinite space".

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 25th, 2011 at 8:54 PM

Title: Re: Cause, Effect, & Holocaust

Content:

Epistemes said:

Then, taking any ethical dimension out of it:

If the situations we encounter in life don't happen by accident but rather result from actions we have done in the past, are the Jews responsible for their own deaths in the Holocaust? Are the people killed during 9/11 responsible for their deaths?

In other words, if we reap what we sow, does it not follow that the people killed during 9/11 are somehow responsible for their own deaths?

Malcolm wrote:

Not necessarily. While in Tibetan Buddhism a hard theory of karma is often held out, in Theravada Buddhism it is considered that people can be caught up in negative situations without necessarily having done anything negative to get there. In other words, being in the wrong place at wrong time is possible without it being a karmic thing.

Being born as a human being is a result of good karma; but not necessarily everything that happens to one is a result of karma, some things are purely a result of blind causes and conditions that have nothing directly to do with one's karma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 25th, 2011 at 8:32 PM

Title: Re: Tantric sexual bliss vs. dhyanic bliss

Content:

Astus said:

Vitarka and vicāra don't exist in the 2nd dhyāna already, how could then it be called conceptual? Nirvikalpa-jñāna also exists in common Mahayana.

Namdrol said:

Because it's one pointedness is a mental concept.

5heaps said:

what definition of mental concept are you using?

we cannot say there is a conceptual consciousness in the 2nd dhyana, because that mind is not using dunchis or drachis. so in what way will you explain that the single-pointedness is conceptual?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, the mind in the second dhyana is conceptual because it is maintaining equipoise on a conceptual object.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 25th, 2011 at 7:49 PM

Title: Re: Appearances and mind

Content:

padma norbu said:

Who in the heck has ever put forth such a notion that it would actually need to be refuted?!

Malcolm wrote:

The Yogacara school in Ancient India. They reasoned that since everything was a mental projection, when that was recognized, dualistic appearances would collapse and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 25th, 2011 at 7:45 PM

Title: Re: the methodology of Sakya

Content:

mzaur said:

Thank you. Is there ngondro in Sakya? How does Sakya differ from the other Sarma lineages?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, there is ngondro.

The teaching lineage from India is unique. Lamdre is based mainly on the teachings of the Hevajra Tantra and Virupa.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 25th, 2011 at 9:47 AM

Title: Re: Appearances and mind

Content:

padma norbu said:

It says "ordinary mind" is the dharma expanse, the victor's essence... but it says "everything is not mind" on p.224...

Malcolm wrote:

Mind [sems] and ordinary mind [tha mal gyi shes pa] are two entirely different things. The latter is a yogi's term for wisdom [ye shes].

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 25th, 2011 at 4:10 AM

Title: Re: Buddhahood in Chan

Content:

Astus said:

the mind is buddha...

Namdrol said:

Nice, a conditioned, impermanent, afflicted buddha.

N

Astus said:

"Good sons, all hindrances are none other than ultimate enlightenment. Whether you attain mindfulness or lose mindfulness, there is no non-liberation. Establishing the Dharma and refuting the Dharma are both called nirvana; wisdom and folly are equally prajna; the method that is perfected by bodhisattvas and false teachers is the same bodhi; ignorance and suchness are not different realms; morality, concentration and wisdom, as well as desire, hatred and ignorance are all divine practices; sentient beings and lands share the same dharma nature; hell and heaven are both the Pure Land; those having Buddha-nature and those not having it equally accomplish the Buddha's enlightenment. All defilements are ultimately liberation. The reality-realms's ocean-like wisdom completely illumines all marks to be just like empty space. This is called 'the Tathāgata's accordance with the nature of enlightenment.' "

(Sutra of Perfect Enlightenment, ch. 6, tr. C. Muller)

Malcolm wrote:

Awesome, so fools are buddhas and there is no need for Buddhism at all. Nice.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 25th, 2011 at 1:59 AM

Title: Re: Love vs. Attachment

Content:

Namdrol said:

The Dharma, as I understand, begins with understanding our real state and acknowledging it, and not having fantasies about samsara or ourselves. Dharma is not an all or nothing venture. It is progressive, and one only has to practice as much if it as one understands.

Epistemes said:

So much of what you say is precisely what I need to be reading and understanding at this stage in my life. While I'm sure that so much of what you say is based upon a synthesis of your experience, reading, learning and teaching, are there other resources available that explain the dharma as such? Or is it all based on finding the gems among the pile?

As I've already said, Buddhism for Beginners seems to suggest "Thou shalt not be angry," "Thou shalt not be attached to people, places or thing," "Thou shalt love equitably and impartially," "Thou shalt...". I, personally, am tired of all the precedents. I want to continue the relationships that I have, cultivate them through my thirst for Buddhism, cultivate myself, and see where I get. Buddhism for Beginners punches one's mind like clay, strangles it and makes it feel suffocated and threatened.

Other more advanced resources suffocate the mind with their deep experience and complexity. It seems that there is no middle way in The Middle Way.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, this is the problem with sorting out the Dharma for oneself. There is a Dharma teaching for whatever stage of practice one is at. But that is the point, one has to work with where one is at.

So if you read a text that seems not to address your present state, well, put it aside. And that is a middle way.

Having a teacher helps, but in the end one must integrate these things into your own practice.

Rather than looking for a "beginners" Buddhism (since there really isn't such a thing), look for Dharma teachings that speak to you, and work for you in a practical manner. Take what you can absorb and leave the rest.

In the end, great compassion is the essence of Dharma. Great compassion comes from compassion. Cultivate that, and that is sufficient.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 25th, 2011 at 1:21 AM

Title: Re: Disposal

Content:

Jikan said:

So you're saying they R E S P E C T the word as a vehicle of the teachings of Christ?

Epistemes said:

R E S P E C T is a vast understatement. Worship or veneration is more apt.

And, as explained above, I find cultivating any practice regarding the ceremonial dissipation of materials to be counterproductive, counterintuitive and simply superfluous.

Malcolm wrote:

In Buddhism, such care comes from a time when paper was rare and expensive, and books were hard to come by.

However these days you can see people releasing paper prayer flags by the thousands so that they literally cover the ground, and then walking all over them.

And, with millions of Buddhist fliers printed on colored paper with toxic ink, it is not really practical nor safe to burn this stuff outdoors. It is not like rice paper. Thus, in general, I recycle so called Dharma "garbage". And in fact everything is empty.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 25th, 2011 at 12:52 AM

Title: Re: Love vs. Attachment

Content:

Epistemes said:

I also appreciate your comment regarding acknowledging attachment and living with it, rather than denying it and feigning enlightenment. Though I have much studying to do, nothing I've read yet has offered this type of unproscriptive advice. Most authors - even in the so-called beginners books - intimate "Get off your ass and get enlightened," which is very intimidating.

Malcolm wrote:

The Dharma, as I understand, begins with understanding our real state and acknowledging it, and not having fantasies about samsara or ourselves. Dharma is not an all or nothing venture. It is progressive, and one only has to practice as much if it as one understands.

For example, you are not ready to drink the Buddhist koolaid and buy rebirth, karma, and so on hook line and sinker -- you may not even really believe in awakening. But what you can believe is your own experience, and the painfulness of desire, hatred and ignorance, as well as the joyfulness that connection with other sentient beings can bring.

The Buddha's own advice for people who were not able to adopt his perspectives about rebirth and karma automatically is that they focus their attention on cultivating loving kindness, compassion, sympathetic joy and ultimately, equanimity.

Once, in response to a statement by Shariputra that friendship was half of the life of a Dharma practitioner, Buddha replied that was incorrect, friendship was the whole of the life of a Dharma practitioner. Thus, cultivating loving kindness, compassion, sympathetic joy, and equanimity are Dharma practice and relationships forged on these bases are deeply fulfilling and satisfying. Not only that, any relationship, positive or negative, one presently is in can be immensely transformed by these four cultivations. Positive relationships are enhanced and deepened, negative relationships will weaken their grasp and one will come to a place of evenness regarding other people's suffering afflictive behavior, an evenness suffused with genuine care for others along with a sharp recognition of one's own limitations around helping others. Equanimity is not indifference, it is recognizing what one is and is not able to accomplish.

In other words, we don't have to a) fix the world b) be emotional unavailable c) persist in unhealthy relationships -- instead we can slowly work at opening our hearts with love and compassion and work with where we are at the present moment without having to condition it with unattainable idealism.

Learning calm-abiding or shamatha meditation is very helpful, since this trains us in mental stability. Shamatha creates a container where we are able to see how the mind thrashes, bolts, revolts, jumps around and so on. It gives us a pillar through which to measure the rest of our experience. We do not have to begin with hour long sessions, we can sit for 5 minutes. Then 10. Then 15, and so on. Following the breath is an ideal practice for beginners as well.

Anyway, the main point is that Buddhist practice is not about waking up to some abstract "enlightenment". It is about knowing one's own state, right here and right now and working with that, along with various means to do so.

In short, understanding our present condition is Dharma practice, and it is the only Dharma practice we have.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 25th, 2011 at 12:27 AM

Title: Re: Can I do this without a teacher?

Content:

Epistemes said:

I don't believe I can. Unfortunately, there are no teachers available in my area as per buddhanet. The only resources I have are books and this forum.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, my approach was reading and studying for a few years.

Then, eventually I got a teacher.

If you can travel to some retreat, then this is beneficial. And if you can't, you can still read and think about what you are reading.

In other words, there is no need to get a teacher immediately.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 25th, 2011 at 12:25 AM

Title: Re: Devices Zen and the Direct Path

Content:

LastLegend said:

If the teachers are not enlightened, they cannot teach direct path.

Astus said:

Neither can they teach Zen.

Malcolm wrote:

Guess there are not many teachers of Zen, then.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 25th, 2011 at 12:21 AM

Title: Re: Buddhahood in Chan

Content:

Astus said:

the mind is buddha...

Malcolm wrote:

Nice, a conditioned, impermanent, afflicted buddha.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 25th, 2011 at 12:19 AM

Title: Re: Buddhahood in Chan

Content:

Astus said:

Equipoise and post-equipoise matters when there is a specific state of mind to cultivate. Zen is not about creating any mind. So it is called no-mind.

Malcolm wrote:

That is a false dichotomy. When in equipoise on reality, it is not like there is some mental focus that designates an object called "reality". Equipoise on reality is not a mental state. It is beyond mind.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 24th, 2011 at 10:47 PM

Title: Re: "Mahamudra and Related Instructions," Peter Roberts

Content:

Sönam said:

Being not english (as you may know), can you help to decode the following ...

In The Quintessence of Nectar, page 343, within "3. Increasing the benefit of that attainment", into "a. Increasing the heat", it is said : In this "binding clasp of the knees," your legs form two triangles of "opposing hearths" ... what that "opposing hearths" means?

Thank you for helping

Sönam

Malcolm wrote:

It is sort of weird translation -- it just means that you sit with your knees up usually held with your hands or with a belt. This posture is often called "stove posture".

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 24th, 2011 at 10:43 PM

Title: Re: Love vs. Attachment

Content:

Epistemes said:

...If one person is trying to be non-afflictively attached but another person is afflictively attached then this creates the illusion of being non-afflictively attached for the person who thinks they are non-afflictively attached when, in fact, because of the emotional barriers created by the one who is afflictively attached, the non-afflictively attached person is actually afflictively attached as well.

Malcolm wrote:

No, if this were so then Buddhas would be afflictively attached to sentient beings, and they are not. The afflictively-attached person owns their afflictions. There is no principle of samsaric co-dependence between Buddhas and sentient beings, which is what you are describing.

BTW, there is no such a thing as "trying" to be non-afflictively attached. One is either afflicted, not afflicted, or possess patience regarding the arising of one's own afflictions. If one possesses affliction, it is better to recognize that fact and not pretend one is above affliction.

Afflictions (desire, anger and ignorance) generally only function freely when one is not in possession of recognition of the operation of mental factors driven by affliction and b) when one's mind lacks stability. When one attains patience towards one's the arising of one's afflictions, they arise but lack force that propels one to act upon them.

In terms of parenting or caring for others, when one is purely under the influence of affliction, to some extent that care is blind and filled with self-interest. When one's afflicted relationship is characterized with patience, one is better able to make universal choices affecting all involved without falling under the fog of blind selfish interest. When one is free from affliction, one's caring for others comes from a place of pure altruism and equanimity.

Pretending that one is free of affliction is bullshit. That is not how afflictive attachment works. A realized bodhisattva possesses non-afflictive attachment towards all sentient beings. A non-realized bodhisattva possesses bias and attachment. If one is not realized, it is better to just recognize one's own state and work with it.

I.e. if you are attached to your kids, don't pretend not to be, don't pretend you are free from suffering around it, and work with it. Bodhisattvas can work with attachment and desire -- the one thing they cannot work with is anger and hatred. From a Mahāyāna perspective therefore, attachment is workable and it is fine. If you combine your afflicted relationships with altruistic motivation, you can even bring them onto the path, and make them part of your path.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 24th, 2011 at 10:26 PM

Title: Re: Buddhahood in Chan

Content:

mindyourmind said:

What possible purpose can a discussion like this have?

Namdrol said:

The purpose is to distinguish what is rhetorical from what is actual.

N

mindyourmind said:

And how exactly do we, who are not realized, tell the difference? By way of a war of quotes and a nice game of "my master says"?

How can anyone meaningfully address the question of what is rhetorical buddhahood and what is actual buddhahood, other than an effort to try and define and describe that which most traditions view as indescribable?

Malcolm wrote:

If we, who are not realized, have no way to infer what is correct and incorrect regarding Buddhist doctrine, then we are really screwed, aren't we?

Citations are not sufficient, of course, one must also use reasoning, and a whole host of other things.

There is no need to use citations in this respect, it is obvious to anyone who really thinks about it --1) realizing emptiness is not equivalent with becoming a Samyak Sambuddha, 2) realizing emptiness, period, is the emptiness realized by a Buddha.

The ancient Chan masters are making the argument that the realization of emptiness is sufficient and there is not much reason to place a lot of emphasis on the path of cultivation (bhūmis 1-10). Once in possession of the Gnosis of the path, that is the main point, and that is Buddhahood.

There is a similar sentiment in Kagyu Mahāmudrā -- which is why there are so many different presentations of the way four yogas (split into twelve) are mapped to the paths and stages. But in reality, the Mahāyāna paths and stages are irrelevant in Mahāmudrā, just as they are in Dzogchen. It is not the case however that there is no gradual progression in both mahāmudrā and dzogchen. The progression is not with respect to the ultimate, but rather, with respect to the person.

Now then, the question inevitably arises "Is it possible for someone to fully awaken suddenly?" The answer to this question from a Mahāmudrā, Dzogchen and Chan POV is yes (and from a Vajrayāna POV, one's yogic progress through the stages can be accomplished in a matter of days, theoretically (for example, Saraha was someone who achieved full buddhahood suddenly; Virupa achieved the sixth bhūmi in six days)). The caveat to this is that it is so rare as to be merely an academic distinction. In other words, sudden awakeners are possible, but rarer than visible stars at noon.

The inexpressible realization of emptiness is the same in every respect from the moment of the path of seeing until full buddhahood. We can talk about afflictive obscurations and knowledge obscurations and so on, but the real difference between buddhas and bodhisattvas on the stages is whether there is a difference in equipoise and post-equipoise. Buddhas are never not in a state of equipoise. Thus the notion of the two obscurations apply only in post-equipoise, not while in equipoise on the ultimate. However, this crucial difference is responsible also for the difference in qualities of a buddha and for example, a tenth stage.

Thus, it is important to distinguish rhetoric from reality so that people do not waste their time on fantasies. And it is indeed a fantasy for 99.999 percent of people that they will be able to suddenly awaken into full Buddhahood.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 24th, 2011 at 9:48 PM

Title: Re: Buddhahood in Chan

Content:

mindyourmind said:

What possible purpose can a discussion like this have?

Malcolm wrote:

The purpose is to distinguish what is rhetorical from what is actual.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 24th, 2011 at 9:46 PM

Title: Re: Love vs. Attachment

Content:

Epistemes said:

Call me ignorant and caught in the tides of samsara, but I don't think a strict non-attachment in human relationships is possible

Malcolm wrote:

One needs to make a distinction between afflictive attachment and non-afflictive attachment. Non-afflictive attachment comes from a place of concern and caring, valuing others more than oneself. Afflictive attachment is all about "I, me and mine".

From a Mahāyāna perspective, non-afflictive attachment is perfectly appropriate, indeed necessary. Afflictive attachment is just another cause of suffering.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 24th, 2011 at 9:30 PM

Title: Re: Buddhahood in Chan

Content:

Astus said:

Awakening in Chan means realising the nature of mind, i.e. the buddha-mind. Since the buddha-mind is perfect in qualities and omniscience, how could that awakening be limited? It is free from the emotional (klesa) and conceptual (jnaya) obscurations, how could it be bound by anything at all? Teachers of Chan were well aware of the gradual stages and aeons of bodhisattva practice when they talked about buddhahood and claimed that Chan is a sudden path. Those who viewed it in a different way did say so.

Malcolm wrote:

The difference lies in equipoise and post-equipoise.

Frankly, it is obvious that realizing the nature of the mind does not make one a buddha. That is why I stated that "buddhahood" in Chan is a euphemism for awakening, but it does not mean that one who has awakened is a Samyaksambuddha, though I imagine there are some deluded Chan practitioners even today who think it is so.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 24th, 2011 at 10:26 AM

Title: Re: Buddhahood in Chan

Content:

Astus said:

The fourth principle of Chan is "see nature, become buddha" (jianxing chengfo / kensho jobutsu 見性成佛). As it's said in the Platform Sutra, "If you recognize your own mind and see the nature, you will definitely accomplish the enlightenment of buddhahood." (T48n2008, p351a, 12)

Malcolm wrote:

There is no difference between the awakening of a first stage bodhisattva and a buddhahood. There is a difference however in terms of qualities and omniscience.

My point still stands. "Sudden Awakening" in Chan does not mean full buddhahood.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 24th, 2011 at 10:24 AM

Title: Re: Renunciation Impossible?

Content:

Namdrol said:

So even here, Vajrayāna remain unique in asserting that one can attain full awakening 11 bhumi + in a single lifetime, soup to nuts.

Huseng said:

In your experience have you met a Vajrayāna practitioner who demonstrated that this was possible?

Malcolm wrote:
Yes, or so I believe.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Wednesday, August 24th, 2011 at 4:46 AM
Title: Re: Renunciation not Impossible
Content:

Tsongkhapa said:
No, because it's all a bit superficial and intellectual.

Malcolm wrote:
The whole title of this thread is wrong -- this thread was created by Huseng who split the thread off from another thread.

I never said that "renunciation" per se was impossible. The path of abandoning or renouncing sense objects what I identified as impossible in this day and age, based on many citations one can find, particularly in the tantras of Heruka and statements by Mahasiddhas such as Saraha.

N

Author: Malcolm
Date: Wednesday, August 24th, 2011 at 4:02 AM
Title: Re: Renunciation Impossible?
Content:

Namdrol said:
Outside of Tibeta Buddhism/Vajrayāna, Chan alone proposes that it is possible to attain fullbuddhahood in a single lifetime. But it seems that in Chan, "buddhahood" is a generally a euphemism for attaining the bodhisattva stages, and no Indian Mahāyāna tradition denies that it is impossible for someone to attain the path of seeing and so on. However, they would have done so based on past accumulations. So even here, Vajrayāna remain unique in asserting that one can attain full awakening 11 bhumi + in a single lifetime, soup to nuts.

Astus said:
It is not only Chan but also Huayan and Tiantai teach sudden enlightenment - interestingly Huayan puts "sudden enlightenment" one level below its own "complete teaching of the one vehicle". As for the difference between the entry to the bodhisattva stages and full buddhahood, in Chan it is clarified with the distinction of gradual and sudden paths. Gradual means the bodhisattva stages, sudden means immediate buddhahood. Of course, not everyone among the Chan teachers agreed with this view.

Malcolm wrote:

No, I don't think that sudden enlightenment in Chan means sudden full buddhahood.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 24th, 2011 at 2:56 AM

Title: Re: Renunciation not Impossible

Content:

Tsongkhapafan said:

Renunciation is completely possible to achieve. If you argue that the Vajrayana is the only path to abandon attachment, qualified Vajrayana practice depends upon sutra renunciation so without renunciation there is no Vajrayana.

Namdrol said:

You obviously have come late the thread -- renunciation and the path of renunciation are two distinct things, which has been clarified already.

N

Tsongkhapafan said:

Your definition of renunciation is still incorrect.

Malcolm wrote:

No, it isn't. I also clarified that the English word renunciation can be used to translate a number of terms. You are thinking that term renunciation is only appropriate for "nges 'byung". It may also be used for other Tibetans terms such as spong ba and so on.

But of course it is impossible to talk to anyone about these things because everybody on this website with just a little bit learning is convinced they are a pandita.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 24th, 2011 at 2:45 AM

Title: Re: Renunciation not Impossible

Content:

Tsongkhapafan said:

Renunciation is completely possible to achieve. If you argue that the Vajrayana is the only path to abandon attachment, qualified Vajrayana practice depends upon sutra renunciation so without renunciation there is no Vajrayana.

Malcolm wrote:

You obviously have come late the thread -- renunciation and the path of renunciation are two distinct things, which has been clarified already.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 24th, 2011 at 2:43 AM

Title: Re: Modern Buddhist Monuments

Content:

Epistemes said:

Was it necessary to state that the monument is being built to stand for an actually indefinite period of time?

Malcolm wrote:

Don't ask me, ask the person who wrote the copy in the website.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 24th, 2011 at 2:37 AM

Title: Re: Modern Buddhist Monuments

Content:

Namdrol said:

"built to stand for 1000 years."

Epistemes said:

What does that mean? Is there a chemical agent that will gradually erode the statue so that the last erosion will be complete during the 1000th year? do the plans for the statue indicate that it should be demolished in a 1000 years? Or, is it a simple expression to indicate its abiding, durable composition?

Malcolm wrote:

Was it really necessary to ask such a question?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 24th, 2011 at 2:35 AM

Title: Re: Renunciation Impossible?

Content:

Astus said:

we have East Asian and South Asian Buddhism

Malcolm wrote:

Outside of Tibeta Buddhism/Vajrayāna, Chan alone proposes that it is possible to attain fullbuddhahood in a single lifetime. But it seems that in Chan, "buddhahood" is a generally a euphemism for attaining the bodhisattva stages, and no Indian Mahāyāna tradition denies that it is impossible for someone to attain the path of seeing and so on. However, they would have done so based on past accumulations. So even here, Vajrayāna remain unique in asserting that one can attain full awakening 11 bhumi + in a single lifetime, soup to nuts.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 24th, 2011 at 2:04 AM

Title: Re: Modern Buddhist Monuments

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

<http://www.maitreyaproject.org> " onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

"As the central feature of its activities, Maitreya Project is planning to build, in Kushinagar, Uttar Pradesh, India, a magnificent 500ft / 152m bronze statue of Maitreya Buddha, built to stand for 1000 years."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 24th, 2011 at 1:00 AM

Title: Re: Renunciation Impossible?

Content:

Jnana said:

Sounds to me like you prefer a Tibetocentric bias.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, truthfully, only the Tibeans endeavored to preserve the successive layers of North Indian Buddhism in some semblance of how they may actually have been taught.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 24th, 2011 at 12:58 AM

Title: Re: Renunciation Impossible?

Content:

Astus said:

This is practically negating the validity of all the other Buddhist teachings

Malcolm wrote:

Not really, since if you examine things carefully, Mantrayāna is the only Indian Buddhist tradition that asserts full Buddhahood in one lifetime is actually a possibility.

All other Indian Buddhist traditions of which we have knowledge, Mahāyāna or not, assert that at minimum full awakening is impossible in less than three incalculable eons.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, August 23rd, 2011 at 10:25 AM

Title: Re: DMT

Content:

xylem said:

it's one thing to engaged in a variety of activities as a "seeker". it's a different thing to engage in such activities after taking refuge and dedicating one's life to buddhist practice.

Malcolm wrote:

Oh, lighten up.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, August 22nd, 2011 at 9:15 PM

Title: Re: Saichō's Monastic Reforms

Content:

Namdrol said:

Within categories of people holding prātimokṣa vows within Buddhism, however, there are only four types of vows (eight when split by gender), upāsakas, upāvasa (fast day vows), śramaṇa and bhikṣu. Mahāyāna vows do not have the force to ordain one a pravrajita of any kind (śramaṇa and bhikṣu). All this may be found in the Kośa.

Huseng said:

The primary precepts in the Brahma Net Sutra are called prātimokṣa.

In any case this is all legal terminology and intellectual wrangling. Regardless of how others saw them, many bodhisattva renunciates of the past were, at least within their own culture, qualified to receive offerings, wear the religious attire appropriate for a monk and were considered by their peers and society to be monks. This obviously is not applicable to the wider global Buddhist world where the ancient Indian legal terminology was and still is in effect.

Malcolm wrote:

In general, we can say that there is a Bodhisattva "prātimokṣa", but it depends on śrāvaka pratimokṣa. There is a sutra in that Ratnakuta (Chang, Treasury of Mahāyāna Sūtras pg. 262) that discusses and contrasts the prātimokṣa of a bodhisattva with that of a śrāvaka, but there is no suggestion in this text that bodhisattvas enjoy a separate ordination from śrāvakas -- it merely distinguishes the parameters of conduct for bodhisattvas and non-bodhisattvas.

There really is no way to get around this. There is a separate ordination for bodhisattvas distinct from that of what we generally call "buddhist monks".

You are the one who is intellectually wrangling with this.

For me, it is very simple. If you have received an ordination based on one of the eighteen schools Vinaya, you are a monk or a nun. If not, then you are lay person. Added to this are bodhisattva vows, etc.

Huseng said:

The vinayas of India are all different, hence reflecting different aspirations and intentions at work in their formulation.

Malcolm wrote:

They reflect regional separation, but not separation of difference in aspiration and intention. The vinayas of India are more similar than they are different from one another. The primary differences between them are in the number of minor rules, the cut and color of the robes, and the regional language of the school.

Bodhisattva vow systems on the other hand are quite different in terms of aspiration and intention. The Brahmajala system in China is clearly in keeping with the Yogachara model, rather than the Madhyamaka model (which is based on the Akashagarbha Sutra).

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, August 22nd, 2011 at 8:08 PM

Title: Re: Rinchen Terzod & Dudjom Tersar indexes

Content:

Adamantine said:

Namdrol I had a hard time locating the Dudjom tersar index in the tbrc website..

Malcolm wrote:

Dudjom Rinpoche's collected works including tersar (Dudjom III):

<http://tbrc.org/link?RID=W20869> " onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

Dudjom Lingpa's collected termas (Dudjom II):

<http://tbrc.org/link?RID=W28732> " onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

Rigzin Duddul Dorje's collected termas (Dudjom I)

http://www.tbrc.org/#library_work_Object-W22123 "
onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, August 22nd, 2011 at 7:56 PM

Title: Re: DMT

Content:

Heruka said:

what do we think?

Malcolm wrote:

It was fun, the one time I did it in 1978.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, August 22nd, 2011 at 7:55 PM

Title: Re: Renunciation Impossible?

Content:

mr. gordo said:

No one here holds the optimistic view of Kurzweil's Singularity?

Huseng said:

Computers becoming conscious means Skynet.

Malcolm wrote:

Second that.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, August 22nd, 2011 at 7:54 PM

Title: Re: Saichō's Monastic Reforms

Content:

Huseng said:

Your use of the term śramaṇa is not universal. The term śramaṇa was used to refer to renunciates in general in several Āgama sūtras in classical Chinese translation I've read. Moreover, some monks, at least in China, self-identified as śramaṇa (Chn. shamen 沙門), but that wasn't because they were novices.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, that is true, śramaṇa was a term applied to both Buddhist and non-Buddhist mendicants. However, in the context of what constitutes a śramaṇa with the Buddhist order, it is a novice.

The appellation "buddha" was not reserved solely for The Buddha, but was a term many religious teachers applied to themselves during the time of The Buddha.

Within categories of people holding prātimokṣa vows within Buddhism, however, there are only four types of vows (eight when split by gender), upāsakas, upāvasa (fast day vows), śramaṇa and bhikṣu. Mahāyāna vows do not have the force to ordain one a pravrajita of any kind (śramaṇa and bhikṣu). All this may be found in the Kośa.

Huseng said:

However, I know by the Song Dynasty they insisted all seng 僧 had certification of their vinaya ordination, which proved to be a problem for Dogen when he went to China.

Basically in Saichō's time in China the legal terminology determining what constituted a "monk" or seng 僧 was not based on Sanskrit definitions provided in the vinaya. I understand from an Indian or Tibetan perspective this appears odd, but that's just how it developed.

Malcolm wrote:

Which means that people knowledgeable in Buddhism recognized loose definitions were a problem and fixed it. The legal terminology already existed in Vinaya, the Chinese were simply slow to adopt it.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, August 22nd, 2011 at 7:50 AM

Title: Re: Renunciation Impossible?

Content:

tobes said:

I don't disagree with this. But the question is: are the causes located in an ancient Indian cosmology of time or in human intentions and actions?

If the latter, then it is clearly possible to change them.

If the former, then there is a sense in which decline is inevitable and cannot be overcome.

Malcolm wrote:

The Indian cosmology of time is predicated on increasingly contaminated human intentions and actions. In other words, decline happens because people's moral caliber is increasingly degraded.

tobes said:

Many people would argue that the obvious cause for cheap energy and infinite growth is found in the logic of capital. There is nothing inevitable or permanent about that cause and its associated logic.

Malcolm wrote:

Logic didn't cause cheap energy. Drilling depth did.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, August 22nd, 2011 at 7:47 AM

Title: Re: Renunciation Impossible?

Content:

tobes said:

As well, people in Europe and America are currently living through extremely difficult economic and political times. It is not surprising to hear sentiments of "overarching global decline." People in China do not have the same sense of pessimism.

But remember that only a decade or two ago, the nineties (for Europe and America) was a golden era of cosmopolitanism, technological innovation, globalism and "overarching global progression."

Both narratives are bogus; the reality in both decades is/was filled in equal measure with good and bad stuff.

I do however, agree that we're in for a particularly bad decade, especially in Europe. Beyond that, little is certain.

Malcolm wrote:

Have you been to China? The place is a disaster. Crowded, polluted, etc. The place is a dump. They ruined their forests centuries ago, their western border is being desertified very quickly. They are busy destroying the environment of Tibet, etc.

They can be optimistic, but then people do like to gild shit.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, August 22nd, 2011 at 7:44 AM

Title: Re: Saichō's Monastic Reforms

Content:

Huseng said:

Also, let's just assume the Brahma Net Sūtra is legitimate buddhavacana...The Brahma Net Sūtra speaks of bodhisattva renunciates, which Saichō described as great monks. That's a śramaṇa in other words.

Malcolm wrote:

In order to be a śramaṇa or a bhikṣu, one needs to ordain in one of the "eighteen" schools. Otherwise, you are an upāsikā.

Apart from these categories there are no other categories of Buddhist practitioners, Mahāyāna or otherwise.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, August 22nd, 2011 at 7:38 AM

Title: Re: Saichō's Monastic Reforms

Content:

Huseng said:

I would still think that they were not bhikṣus, nor even śramaṇeras, just lay people with shaved heads in robes.

Is a śramaṇa by necessity also a bhikṣu?

Malcolm wrote:

A śramaṇa is, by necessity, a novice ordained by a bhikṣu. One does not require a quorum to ordain novices. I suspect that what happened in China was that many Central Asia and Indian monks came to China and ordained novices (śramaṇas).

I don't think you can really argue for a huge difference between Central Asian Buddhism (define were, first of all) and Indian Buddhism because of the strong Influence of Indian culture from Bactria all the way to Java and Modern Day Vietnam.

How much do we know about the state of monastic ordination in China prior to the 7th century?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, August 22nd, 2011 at 3:45 AM

Title: Re: Saichō's Monastic Reforms

Content:

Seishin said:

This may be a little off topic;... because of Saicho's reforms to ordination and subsequent other changes made to Japanese Buddhism over generations, would that mean it's better not to follow Japanese Buddhism?

Seishin.

Malcolm wrote:

Only if you want to be a fully ordained bhikṣu.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, August 22nd, 2011 at 3:22 AM

Title: Re: Saichō's Monastic Reforms

Content:

Huseng said:

The Buddha also gave permission for the vinaya to be reformed if need be.

Namdrol said:

I think this goes a little too far. He told Ananda that it was ok to ignore minor rules without specifying which rules were minor. One assumes he meant rules like making rude noises while chewing, slurping one's soup and so on.

But he certainly never said "If need be, revise Vinaya."

Huseng said:

In any case it was revised at some point in India. Hence we have more than one vinaya.

He also specified if his dharma was to go to foreign lands it could be modified as appropriate to the customs of those places.

Malcolm wrote:

He meant in terms of wearing wool and leather (that is the example).

Huseng said:

Like I said in the article the Brahma Net Sūtra might have been penned at a time when no Chinese translation of the vinaya existed. It is funny to think that even in the early fifth century when Kumārajīva was first stepping foot into China the monks there actually had no vinaya, or it was only then first being translated. They had monastic rules, and I imagine the monks from Central Asia and those few from India orally taught the vinaya and perhaps transmitted it to some, but there was no Chinese translation of even one vinaya system until the 5th century. Funny even Faxian in India had to write down an oral recitation of the vinaya as he couldn't get a hold of a written copy during his travels in India in the 5th century.

Malcolm wrote:

I did not know that. Interesting.

Huseng said:

Anyway, the Brahma Net Sūtra might have been written in such conditions, thus providing, at least for its time, a suitable substitute for the vinaya, but also in line with Mahāyāna ideals. Obviously later generations would not have had such ideas about the text, but they nevertheless took the text as the golden word of the Buddha. If those bodhisattva precepts are actually followed in their entirety one would be living a lifestyle in line with the vinaya. The problem is that in Japan some centuries later they decided it was optional to follow any of the prescriptions contained in any text. Even if they still transmitted the vinaya they would have had the same ideas about it, too. Everything became optional. The prescriptions in the Brahma Net Sūtra were no less sacred than those in the vinaya.

Malcolm wrote:

Even so, in India, it was necessarily the opinion of Mahāyāna Vinayadharas that Mahāyāna precepts were based on Hināyāna vows.

Huseng said:

But I do not think one can infer from this that innovations like Saicho's would be considered wise or valid.

If it wasn't for the developments in Japanese Buddhism in the last century and a half, would your opinion be different? I mean if Japanese priests were all still celibate, unmarried, etc... and living as monastics.

Malcolm wrote:

[/quote]

I would still think that they were not bhikṣus, nor even śramaṇeras, just lay people with shaved heads in robes.

The Indian approach to these things was always layered. Whereas, the Chinese, cut off from the Mainstream of Indian Buddhism for the most part developed along lines very difficult for Indo-Tibetan Buddhists to recognize. For example, the Chinese obsession with elaborating individual sutra systems and so on. As you know, Indians, in the end, relied more on sastras than the raw material of sutras. Sutras were for devotion, sastras were for study.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, August 22nd, 2011 at 3:14 AM

Title: Re: Renunciation Impossible?

Content:

Huseng said:

I was discussing this with my friends today, most of whom are in sciences. They place their faith in technological development and science (and maybe the market) saving them from such a catastrophe.

Malcolm wrote:

They are dreaming. The reason we are changing to electric cars is not because they are more efficient and less polluting. We are changing to electric cars to take advantage of the 300 years or so of coal.

Huseng said:

This is rather common amongst professional scientists, and business oriented individuals. Their faith in the market or technology is really as dangerous as faith in god. Just throw all care to the wind and assume things will work out in the end no matter what.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, foolish.

Huseng said:

I've taken an interest in organic farming, and could actually study this in India under the great Shiva Vandana.

Malcolm wrote:

Vandana Shiva is great.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, August 22nd, 2011 at 2:34 AM

Title: Re: Saichō's Monastic Reforms

Content:

Huseng said:

The Buddha also gave permission for the vinaya to be reformed if need be.

Malcolm wrote:

I think this goes a little too far. He told Ananda that it was ok to ignore minor rules without specifying which rules were minor. One assumes he meant rules like making rude noises while chewing, slurping one's soup and so on.

But he certainly never said "If need be, revise Vinaya."

Now, given that there are different ceremonies for conferring Vinaya, and different procedures for confession and so on, obviously the Buddha left much up to regional vinayadharas discretion.

But I do not think one can infer from this that innovations like Saicho's would be considered wise or valid.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, August 22nd, 2011 at 2:24 AM

Title: Re: Saichō's Monastic Reforms

Content:

Huseng said:

Curiously Amoghavajra was a Central Asian from Samarkand, not India proper.

.

Malcolm wrote:

Vajrabodhi, his teacher, was educated in India.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, August 22nd, 2011 at 1:54 AM

Title: Re: Renunciation Impossible?

Content:

Namdrol said:

Air is ruined, soil is ruined, water is ruined, species going extinct at rates unprecedented for millions of years, more people killed in wars in the 20th century than in any century previous, and who knows what this century will bring.

We have had limited success in stemming cosmetic pollution, but we have merely offloaded it to other places.

Huseng said:

In addition to this the problem is accelerating and increasing in severity. The "rural poor" in nations like China and India are either moving to urban areas or just building cities in hopes of living a resource costly urban lifestyle. In China especially this is particularly noteworthy because of their growing middle class and emulation of anything western. The convenience stores in Shanghai are more or less identical to what you find in Japan (Japan is mostly western). Massive amounts of plastic wrapped in plastic. More and more people want their own private cars, too, even if it is really unnecessary. The whole Chinese economic miracle is built on industrial production and social stability a matter of keeping it going.

I also heard global carbon emissions are increasing significantly year by year instead of decreasing as scientists continually beg nations to do.

Malcolm wrote:

Basically, when we run out of energy, world population will collapse. Not catastrophically (well, may in some places), but what we take for granted today will be gone. Enjoy it, 'cause we live at the peak of technological civilization. Barring a game-changing breakthrough in clean energy production, world consciousness, and so on, prospects for the future of our present "level" of civilization look pretty bleak.

So my advice is: learning something useful that does not require high technology, farming, metal smithing, etc. In my case, I learned Tibetan Medicine, to practice yes, but also to preserve here as the only fully Buddhist system of medicine in the world.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, August 21st, 2011 at 11:10 PM

Title: Re: 'Non-duality' and 'neutrality'

Content:

muni said:

Integration.

Malcolm wrote:

Also easy to say, hard to do, as long as one is under the influence of afflictions.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, August 21st, 2011 at 10:27 PM

Title: Re: 'Non-duality' and 'neutrality'

Content:

muni said:

There is nothing to undo, nothing to transform in the nonseparation of samsara or nirvana; all arises, subsides in itself. There is no samsara to undo or nirvana to reach.

Malcolm wrote:

Easy to say...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, August 21st, 2011 at 10:05 PM

Title: Re: Saichō's Monastic Reforms

Content:

Jikan said:

Where does the vinaya fall in the TienTai classification of the teachings? One could argue that the Brahma Net Sutra precepts are embedded in or are more amenable to an Ekayana view than the vinaya.

Malcolm wrote:

Alternately, Saicho may have been reacting against the newly imported Indian Mantrayāna sense of listing teachings in terms of their hierarchy (just as Chan reacted to Mantrayāna by inventing a lineage of patriarchs going back to the Buddha). While Kukai did not resort to the Nine Yanas scheme (yet to be elaborated by the Nyingmapas) both masters (Saicho and Kukai) were clearly aware of the four tenet system in India and the subsequent need to classify Chinese innovations in a progressive scheme, albeit differently and for different reasons. And naturally Kukai selected a nice round number for his progressive ladder of Buddhist and non-Buddhist teachings in China and Japan, with Confucism and Taoism at the bottom of the rungs.

Kukai's "mantrayāna as the conclusion of all dharma teachings" is one alternative; Saicho's attempting to contextualize all teachings in light of Tien Tai Lotus hermeneutics is another. Of these two, Kukai's approach is ultimately the more Indian Buddhist, and Saicho's more reflective of indigenous developments in Chinese Buddhism.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, August 21st, 2011 at 8:56 PM

Title: Re: Renunciation Impossible?

Content:

tobes said:

Yes, I suppose if I am to adopt a position on this, it is that I do not like the political implications of assuming (without good reason) that we're trapped in inevitable decline.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, this present civilization is definitely in decline. And I personally think that we are heading into a phase of global decline.

Air is ruined, soil is ruined, water is ruined, species going extinct at rates unprecedented for millions of years, more people killed in wars in the 20th century than in any century previous, and who knows what this century will bring.

We have had limited success in stemming cosmetic pollution, but we have merely offloaded it to other places.

Our civilization is predicated on two things: cheap energy and infinite growth. Both predicates, as I am sure you will agree, are fantasies.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, August 21st, 2011 at 8:51 PM

Title: Re: Renunciation Impossible?

Content:

tobes said:

If Buddhism does not teach us that we can change in a wholesome way, then....well.....really, what does it teach us?

Malcolm wrote:

That we live in shit and we need to get ourselves and everyone else out of the shit.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, August 21st, 2011 at 1:58 AM

Title: Re: Saichō's Monastic Reforms

Content:

Namdrol said:

Yes, but there is a clear distinction between lay and ordained lamas since lama means "guru". Not all lamas are bhikṣus (dge long) and not all bhikṣus are lamas.

N

Huseng said:

I was told that Tibetan "monks" are not necessarily all bhikṣus, and that, at least around Kathmandu, most of them are not fully ordained bhikṣus with the 250 vows.

Malcolm wrote:

These are dge tshuls, śramaṇeras. They are rab byungs i.e. pravrajitas, ordained persons. They are therefore part of the ordained Sangha and can participate in posadha. Pravrajitas consist of all śramaṇeras and śramaṇerikas, bhikṣus and bhikṣunis.

Thus the term "rab byung" refers to all ordained persons. The colloquial term is "Trapa" i.e. shaveling.

A pravrajita is someone who has undertaken formal ordination beyond lay pratimoksha. But there is no such a thing as a Mahāyāna pravrajita at least not in any Indian Buddhist tradition with which I am familiar. The reason is that Indian Buddhists held that Mahāyāna vows were held to supplement or transform one's pratimoksha vows, but not that they substituted for them, as it seems some Chinese Buddhists and later Saicho held.

The literature of vows became very important in India after the 8th century because with the proliferation of systems of ethics between various of the shravaka schools, then in the two strands of Mahāyāna vows and finally within the successive layers of tantra series, it all started to become contentious and confusing. Nevertheless, Mahāyāna and later Vajrayāna vows were considered to float on the platform of Hinayāna vows which were considered indispensable.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, August 21st, 2011 at 1:37 AM

Title: Re: Saichō's Monastic Reforms

Content:

Namdrol said:

Right, and this is source of confusion for many people.

N

Huseng said:

In Tibetan a Lama is not necessarily a celibate monk, right?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, but there is a clear distinction between lay and ordained lamas since lama means "guru". Not all lamas are bhikṣus (dge long) and not all bhikṣus are lamas.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, August 21st, 2011 at 1:26 AM

Title: Re: Saichō's Monastic Reforms

Content:

Huseng said:

This is indeed because bhikṣu is equated to monk in English, but the language parameters are different in Chinese and Japanese. For example a Japanese priest, a Theravada bhikkhu and a Chinese bhikṣu are all called obou-san in Japanese and senglv in Chinese.

Malcolm wrote:

Right, and this is source of confusion for many people.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, August 21st, 2011 at 12:37 AM

Title: Re: Saichō's Monastic Reforms

Content:

Namdrol said:

Well, no. I think that he did not understand the importance of pratimoksha and did not understand that the consequences of his understanding was to relegate so called monastics to the level of lay people inadvertently. Because of Saicho, we now have Japanese priests claiming equal status with bhikṣus in Buddhist assemblies just because they shave their heads and wear religious costumes.

Huseng said:

At least in his time anyway he insisted on celibacy and abstaining from alcohol. The Brahm Net Sutra's precepts prescribe monastic regulations not so different from what a bhikṣu would be expected to uphold. That was the case at least when he was alive.

Personally I think even if Japan still had the vinaya it would have went down the route it did. Up until the 19th century most priests were in practice monks, even by law, and it was influence from protestant Christianity that had them drop the whole celibacy thing in favour of hereditary priesthoods. For most Japanese Buddhists precepts are just suggestions, and unless you do something illegal there really are no consequences for deviating from monastic precepts (at least when outside a seminary). I mean technically if you get the Brahma Net Sutra precepts you're swearing yourself to celibacy, though they read it as "no sexual misconduct" which can mean anything really.

I guess it doesn't help that everyone is aware the said sutra was probably penned in China, meaning there is less perceived need to follow any of what it says, even if your whole tradition is founded on it.

Malcolm wrote:

The Brahmajala sutra is clearly based on the Yogacara bodhisattva vow tradition which is more formal and more heavily predicated on pratimoksha than the Madhyamaka bodhisattva vow tradition. According to Bhikṣu Dharmamitra, in Chinese Buddhism one was not really permitted to take the bodhisattva ordination without being grounded in pratimoksha vows first, which is how the Yogacahara system works. The Madhyamaka system does not require a preliminary ordination. Lay pratimoksha vows are taken along with bodhisattva vows.

However, not drinking and remaining celibate does not make a one monk, nor does a shaved head. The only thing that makes a bhikṣu is receiving bhikṣu vows in a qualified way, as I am sure you agree.

Since there are no Mahāyāna bhikṣu vows, receiving a Mahāyāna ordination cannot make one a monk, in my opinion. Of course, this is a thoroughly Indo-Tibetan attitude.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, August 21st, 2011 at 12:26 AM

Title: Re: Love vs. Attachment

Content:

Epistemes said:

...you're required to walk, talk and think like a monk at all times.

Malcolm wrote:

No, you are just required to understand all that is born becomes ill, ages and dies. What you do with that fact makes the difference between samsara and nirvana.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, August 21st, 2011 at 12:16 AM

Title: Re: Saichō's Monastic Reforms

Content:

Huseng said:

This is entirely shameless self-promotion, but I penned a brief essay on Saichō's unique monastic reforms. If you're interested please have a look:

<https://sites.google.com/site/dharmadepository/writings/saichos-reforms> "
onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

Namdrol said:

Nice article.

Huseng said:

Namdrol, what do you think about his reforms? Do you think it wise to relegate the vinaya to a secondary position like he did?

Malcolm wrote:

Well, no. I think that he did not understand the importance of pratimoksha and did not understand that the consequences of his understanding was to relegate so called monastics to the level of lay people inadvertently. Because of Saicho, we now have Japanese priests claiming equal status with bhikṣus in Buddhist assemblies just because they shave their heads and wear religious costumes.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 20th, 2011 at 11:45 PM

Title: Re: Saichō's Monastic Reforms

Content:

Huseng said:

This is entirely shameless self-promotion, but I penned a brief essay on Saichō's unique monastic reforms. If you're interested please have a look:

<https://sites.google.com/site/dharmadepository/writings/saichos-reforms> "
onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

Malcolm wrote:
Nice article.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 20th, 2011 at 12:08 PM

Title: Re: Introducing the practice of Daimoku to friends and relatives

Content:

Namdrol said:

Chanting Nam-myoho-renge-kyo during the physical union of man and woman is indeed what is called “earthly desires are enlightenment,” and “the sufferings of birth and death are nirvana.”

Tatsuo said:

I don't know if that is the answer to my question, but this quote is obviously not taken from the Lotus Sutra, as the daimoku (namu myoho renge kyo) is not explicitly mentioned in the text. From which text did you take the quote?

Malcolm wrote:

<http://www.sgilibrary.org/view.php?page=317&m=1&q=desires> "
onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 20th, 2011 at 10:54 AM

Title: Re: Mahāmudrā & bhūmis

Content:

Greg said:

Very helpful, thank you.

Incidentally, could Dzogchen be mapped in a similar fashion? I would have thought that recognizing rigpa would be the start of the darśanamārga?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes it can be mapped in a similar fashion. You will find such a scheme in "The Practice of Dzogchen" by Tulku Thundup in the end.

And no, recognizing rigpa and realizing emptiness are different.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 20th, 2011 at 10:02 AM

Title: Re: the methodology of Sakya

Content:

mzaur said:

Are you referring to generation stage and completion stage?

Malcolm wrote:

Yup.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 20th, 2011 at 9:37 AM

Title: Re: the methodology of Sakya

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Sakya is all about the two stages.

mzaur said:

Hello,

I'm trying to learn more about the Sakya tradition as I just found that there's a center near me run by Lama Pema Wangdak, who I might be interested in meeting.

I've been studying Vajrayana for several years and took refuge 2 years ago. Since then I've tried practicing Dzogchen through Namkhai Norbu Rinpoche, but I feel I really want a live connection with a teacher, so I am investigating the centers around me. So far, I really like Mahamudra because it seems very similar to the view of Dzogchen but a more gradual approach, which makes me interested in Kagyu. I can't find much info about Sakya or Lamdre and its similarities/differences with Mahamudra/Dzogchen. Could someone familiar with both Mahamudra and the Sakya tradition share with me the differences? is Sakya a strictly tantric lineage with no 'direct' or 'essence' teachings?

Michael

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 20th, 2011 at 4:05 AM

Title: Re: Economics..yes,,they are this dim

Content:

Huseng said:

he whole promise before was get educated and get a good job, but it doesn't work like that anymore.

Malcolm wrote:

This is because conservatives do not seem to understand that higher wages result in broader prosperity for all, not more investment.

I like Robert Reich's idea of a negative income tax.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 20th, 2011 at 2:42 AM

Title: Re: 若提碎摩 = ????

Content:

cdpatton said:

The story tells of a brahmana discovering a Buddhist sutra on dependent origination, realizing the superior logic to it, and then arguing with his friends. In the process he refutes the logical arguments found in the Samkhya and Vaishesika philosophies. But only those two are treated, not this third, during the narrative. So we don't get any clues about the identity of 若提碎摩 through description of their arguments either. These little mystery transliterations are quite time consuming sometimes. I think I will settle on Nyaya and explain the obscurity in a footnote.

Malcolm wrote:

Nyāya and Vaiśeṣika are frequently lumped together as if they are one school.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 20th, 2011 at 1:13 AM

Title: Re: Rigpa a view ...

Content:

Sönam said:

While discussing with "knowledgeed" vajra practitioners, but not Dzogchenpa, they pretend, with many references, that rigpa is the view of Dzogchen ... maybe they are right, and I could (nor I wanted) to argue. But it seems evident, from my ignorance, that rigpa is "no more" a view as such, as others yanas use that term. Or at least rigpa is all views together ... can you help to dissipate my ignorance ?

Sönam

Namdrol said:

Rigpa is a view, in that sense they are correct. But rigpa is not some intellectual view (as Jigme Lingpa makes clear), instead it is the experience of contemplation, meditation as view, if you will.

Sönam said:

so it's also not wrong to pretend that it's no more a view, as such ... it's an experience.

Thank you

Sönam

Malcolm wrote:

The best way to put it is that for Dzogchen rigpa is the view, the meditation, the conduct, and the result. Rigpa is also the basis, the path, and the result. Rigpa is hearing, contemplation, and meditation. Rigpa is shila, samadhi and prajñā. Rigpa is creation and completion. Rigpa is three series of Dzogchen. Nothing is outside rigpa.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 20th, 2011 at 12:03 AM

Title: Re: Rinchen Terzod & Dudjom Tersar indexes

Content:

Adamantine said:

It also occurred to me that Taklung Tsetrul Rinpoche would have the transmissions for some of the Dudjom tersar, perhaps not all.

.

Malcolm wrote:

He received the whole kit and kaboodle i.e. he is a DT lineage holder. He himself emphasizes the practice of Putri Repung as being important based on a personal communication.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 20th, 2011 at 12:00 AM

Title: Re: Mahāmudrā & bhūmis

Content:

Greg said:

Does Mahāmudrā realization line up with the traditional Mahāyāna model of mārgas & bhūmis?

It seems to me that from the perspective of the Mahāyāna model, even a brief glimpse/recognition of thamal gyi shepa would make one a first-bhūmi ārya. But I get a sense that this assertion is generally not made from the Mahāmudrā perspective.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, and no. I have seen various schemes used.

As far as tha mal gyi shes pa being first bhumi, no.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 19th, 2011 at 11:36 PM

Title: Re: Conservation Efforts

Content:

Astus said:

rural does not equal fuedal, though perhaps for Europeans this is the only equation they are familiar with. You have to bear in mind that during the 19th century, literacy rates in the United States was the highest in the world

I don't find the perspective of a peasant civilisation that enticing, even if it's sustainable. And when you keep yourself busy on the farm and you are isolated from other areas, literacy disappears as it is useless. Also, don't forget that the 19th century was already the modern age with steam power and gun powder.

Malcolm wrote:

That is completely false. American literacy is based on the notion that an educated population is necessary for full civic participation in a democratic republic.

You seem to think farmers don't need to read.

As I said, perhaps rural literacy is hard for some Eurpoeans to grasp, given their history.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 19th, 2011 at 10:52 PM

Title: Re: Conservation Efforts

Content:

Astus said:

LastLegend,

"efficient and sustainable energy source" in my understanding - and I can be wrong of course - is the same as an infinite source of energy. Not realistic. But my knowledge is very limited here.

You may call it giving, compassion, enlightenment, etc. - these are ideas. You can't make people give - unless you start a so called "proletariat dictatorship". Since you can't make them give, can't convert them to new views either, the plan fails. That's what I was saying with the failure of religions and ideologies. Therefore, either we go medieval or new technologies. Both are mostly external (i.e. easier to recognise and accept by the majority) forces that make people follow new rules.

Malcolm wrote:

I don't think it is either or. We will continue to have a high educational culture -- rural does not equal feudal, though perhaps for Europeans this is the only equation they are familiar with. You have to bear in mind that during the 19th century, literacy rates in the United States was the highest in the world, with 80 percent literacy for adults and among non-immigrants (apart from blacks) nearly 95 percent.

As long as people stay highly educated, whatever civilization we can imagine will likely be based on agriculture and biotechnologies that require low energy inputs. But the steel and electric civilization made possible by oil will die.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 19th, 2011 at 10:43 PM

Title: Re: Conservation Efforts

Content:

Astus said:

"Infinite source of energy" does not exist, especially not on Earth. Keeping population low (it's already too high) and living in a rural environment would mean a sustainable livelihood where small communities can live on locally produced food and move regularly to arable land until the used land regenerates. That's quite medieval and would require a global catastrophe to reduce humanity into such a culture.

Malcolm wrote:

I don't think so -- environmental systems and human cultures respond to inputs of energy in the same way. Slowly remove the inputs and the community falters and gradually dies back. Unless we find oil in Greenland and in the Arctic poles that is easy to recover as it was in Texas in 1880, we have reached the limit of easily extractable oil. Since that is the case, we will see a gradual decline in human population because well, there won't be enough food to feed everyone. The oceans are becoming increasingly acidic due to higher amounts of CO₂ in the atmosphere and so on. We will see industrial civilization come to a shuddering halt over the next three hundred years. We lived through the high point of industrial civilization, and it is all downhill from here, unless you follow Ray Kurzweil's theories.

But one thing is a fact, persistent 4% growth a year is an economic fantasy.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 19th, 2011 at 10:41 PM

Title: Re: Rigpa a view ...

Content:

Sönam said:

While discussing with "knowledgeed" vajra practitioners, but not Dzogchenpa, they pretend, with many references, that rigpa is the view of Dzogchen ... maybe they are right, and I could (nor I wanted) to argue. But it seems evident, from my ignorance, that rigpa is "no more" a view as such, as others yanas use that term. Or at least rigpa is all views together ... can you help to dissipate my ignorance ?

Sönam

Malcolm wrote:

Rigpa is a view, in that sense they are correct. But rigpa is not some intellectual view (as Jigme Lingpa makes clear), instead it is the experience of contemplation, meditation as view, if you will.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 19th, 2011 at 10:06 PM

Title: Re: Limitations in TTM

Content:

kalden yungdrung said:

Namdrol wrote:

The second question is too vague.

Tashi delek,

Thanks for your reply.

I mean as a contra indication pregnant women in case of certain treatments, which would be allowed if the woman was not pregnant.

So there are / must be also contra indications in the treatment of TTM.

- How is this explained ?
- Where is it written ?
- Where are they different then in the western medicine and TCM ?

Best wishes

Mutsog Marro

KY

Malcolm wrote:

There are many contraindications summarizing them all would be difficult. But in short, moxa should not be used on pitta conditions or hot diseases; blood-letting and needle should be used on vata conditions, cold treatments should not be used on kapha conditions and so forth.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 19th, 2011 at 2:15 PM

Title: Re: Hua Tou and Dzogchen

Content:

kalden yungdrung said:

Trekchod is mainly based on the emptiness aspect of the mind as well the realizing that the objects are also empty.

KY[/color]

Malcolm wrote:

That is one way to explain it, but not the best way.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 19th, 2011 at 2:11 PM

Title: Re: 若提碎摩 = ????

Content:

cdpatton said:

我昔

T04n0201_p0258c16 || 曾聞，有婆羅門名憍尸迦，善知僧佉論、衛

T04n0201_p0258c17 || 世師論、若提碎摩論，如是等論解了分別。

Translating a text by Kumarajiva, I've run into a transliteration of what I would assume is a school of ancient Indian philosophy, but none that I can match up with the Chinese pronunciations. I was wondering if anyone has a better reference or knowledge than mine who could resolve the mystery. The passage above mentions a brahmana learned in the Samkyha, Vaishesika, and [mystery school]. Chinese = 若提碎摩. 若提 often equals Jnati, but otherwise I'm stumped.

Charlie.

Malcolm wrote:

Maybe Nyāya?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 19th, 2011 at 1:58 PM

Title: Re: Conservation Efforts

Content:

KeithBC said:

All of a sudden, the capitalists and communists will be allying with each other to oppose that idea.

Malcolm wrote:

Of course, since communism is predicated on the capitalist mode of production.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 19th, 2011 at 1:14 PM

Title: Re: Limitations in TTM

Content:

kalden yungdrung said:

Tashi delek,

There arose some questions, namely

- In which cases is TTM limited in helping the patients?
- What are the contra indications, according TTM?

Mutsog Marro

KY

Malcolm wrote:

Anything requiring major surgery.

The second question is too vague.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 19th, 2011 at 12:22 PM

Title: Re: How to know a teachers level of realization?

Content:

Inge said:

Is it possible to deduce anything about a teachers level of realization just by knowing what type of instructions the teacher gives? For instance, when a Lama gives pointing out instructions and direct introductions, does this indicate anything particular about the teachers realization?

Namdrol said:

Not necessarily.

N

heart said:

To even teach Dzogchen you have to have some realization. Shaky Shri says at least third vision other say the second vision. But these days anyone seems to be giving Dzogchen teachings.

Why are you not in Italy Namdrol?

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

MY father is ill and I needed to remain here in the US to care for him.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 19th, 2011 at 9:49 AM

Title: Re: Rinchen Terzod & Dudjom Tersar indexes

Content:

Adamantine said:

akin to doubting Guru Rinpoche himself and Yeshe Tsogyal herself since he was in a way an emanation of both together.

Malcolm wrote:

Dudjom Rinpoche's being a regent of Guru Rinpoche goes back to Rigdzin Duddul Dorje, who had a pure vision encounter in Zangdog Palri where he was predicted to be the regent of Guru Rinpoche on earth. This came after Duddul Dorje recited the seven line prayer 1 million times on the instruction of Rigzin Jatson Nyingpo.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 19th, 2011 at 9:39 AM

Title: Re: Rinchen Terzod & Dudjom Tersar indexes

Content:

username said:

The one clear head of DT lineage is the one Dudjom Jigdrel Yeshe determined so in his letter, ie: Chatral Rinpoche. And after him the lineage head will be the current mind emanation of Dudjom Lingpa, Dudjom's grandson, that Chatral Rinpoche has solely recognized and is training in his three year retreat currently, ie: Dudjom Sangye Pema (Osel).

Adamantine said:

This is a common misconception, because as far as I know that letter was written long before Shenpen Dawa Rinpoche was grown so yes, Chatral Rinpoche was declared his regent at a certain point, and would have been had HH passed away earlier in life. (HH planned to pass on earlier but was kept around by the many methods of his Sangyum...) However an old letter does not change that HH later declared S.D. Rinpoche his regent, as his health deteriorated towards the end. In fact, S.D. Rinpoche very humbly always remained by his father's side, serving him and sometimes translating for him until the very end. He never publicly taught due to prophecies until he passed a certain age. Then, at one point HH was scheduled to give a wang and to everyone's surprise including S.D. Rinpoche he simply handed the implements to his son and told him to give the wang. This was a direct way of showing that there was no difference. This all happened in Europe, so I am sure there is doubt among elder Tibetans living in Asia who became accustomed to receiving wangs and teachings from T.N. Rinpoche years before according to HH's advice. And TNR already had quite a following and had established his own centers by the time HH passed on so perhaps he saw as Dudjom Lingpa foresaw with the Dudjom Tersar in relation to the Rinchen Terdzod that there was no need to include it-- likewise no need to announce Thinley Norbu in any way as he already had his own recognition and following that had its own vast momentum. This is my own understanding which may be at fault but I have learned details slowly over many years which are often glossed over for various reasons.

Malcolm wrote:

Shenphen Rinpoche, who is one of my important masters, is indeed the primary lineage holder of Dudjom Tersar, and the keeper of Dudjom Rinpoche's seat in North America where Dudjom Rinpoche concealed many precious teachings.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 19th, 2011 at 9:25 AM

Title: Re: Why is possible to achieve Buddhahood?

Content:

Tsondue Sangmo said:

I am trying to understand the possibility for a sentient being to achieve Buddhahood as is view, I think, in general Mahayana Buddhism. In this sense, I do not want to imagine what a Buddha can be, but just to take and understand Buddhist scriptures in the literal sense, if this is the correct approach.

Namdrol said:

A buddha is defined as someone who has removed the two obscurations, affliction and knowledge, and gathered the two accumulations, merit and wisdom.

Inge said:

Could you give definitions of the two obscurations, merit and wisdom, or maybe refer to an english text where I can find such definitions.

I also wonder if it is possible to say anything about the personal experience from the viewpoint of a Buddha, how it is like to be a Buddha?

Malcolm wrote:

The two obscurations are the obscuration of affliction i.e. desire, hatred and ignorance.

These are responsible for rebirth in the three realms. The second obscuration is obscuration of knowledge that prevent omniscience, which prevent full buddhahood.

The merit accumulation is responsible for realizing the material body of a buddha i.e. the sambhogakāya and nirmanakāy. The wisdom accumulation is responsible for realizing the dharmakāya of the buddha.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 19th, 2011 at 9:22 AM

Title: Re: Hua Tou and Dzogchen

Content:

ngodrup said:

The thing to appreciate, it seems to my mind, is that recognition according to trekchod would be essentially equivalent to the seeing of an Arya Being on the Path of Seeing or a first bhumi Bodhisattva. I very much doubt that all these facile comparisons of Dzogchen to Chan or Zen bear much resemblance to the actual seeing of an Arya. ... but I may be mistaken.

Malcolm wrote:

No, the reason is that one does not need to realize emptiness in order to properly practice tregchö, emptiness may remain an inference. But one must have experience of this unconditioned clarity in order to practice tregchö. Eventually, if you practice tregchö long enough you will realize emptiness because that insight will automatically arise within your meditation, and this is predicated on understanding the view of original purity .

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 19th, 2011 at 8:00 AM

Title: Re: How to know a teachers level of realization?

Content:

Inge said:

Is it possible to deduce anything about a teachers level of realization just by knowing what type of instructions the teacher gives? For instance, when a Lama gives pointing out instructions and direct introductions, does this indicate anything particular about the teachers realization?

Namdrol said:

Not necessarily.

N

Inge said:

If some of the students "gets it" then, does that give a more certain indication?

Malcolm wrote:

Perhaps, it is more likely.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 19th, 2011 at 7:47 AM

Title: Re: How to know a teachers level of realization?

Content:

Inge said:

Is it possible to deduce anything about a teachers level of realization just by knowing what type of instructions the teacher gives? For instance, when a Lama gives pointing out instructions and direct introductions, does this indicate anything particular about the teachers realization?

Malcolm wrote:

Not necessarily.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 19th, 2011 at 7:46 AM

Title: Re: Hua Tou and Dzogchen

Content:

Inge said:

And what does it mean to discover this clarity? Can this clarity be seen, or is it experienced like some kind of state, or something else entirely?

Namdrol said:

Clarity is the cognitive aspect of the mind that knows objects. So in sense, what one is trying to see is the knowing knower itself, apart from what it knows.

Inge said:

Ok, that is more easy to understand. To see the knowing knower itself, is this the same as knowing the knower? Or seeing the seer, experiencing the experiencor, being aware of awareness ...?

Malcolm wrote:

The difficulty is that a knower is conditioned. This clarity is unconditioned.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 19th, 2011 at 7:23 AM

Title: Re: Hua Tou and Dzogchen

Content:

Inge said:

And what does it mean to discover this clarity? Can this clarity be seen, or is it experienced like some kind of state, or something else entirely?

Malcolm wrote:

Clarity is the cognitive aspect of the mind that knows objects. So in sense, what one is trying to see is the knowing knower itself, apart from what it knows.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 19th, 2011 at 7:12 AM

Title: Re: Hua Tou and Dzogchen

Content:

Namdrol said:

This is referring to appearance and emptiness, object side.

N

Inge said:

I see. Could you explain a little what is meant by clarity?

Malcolm wrote:

"Clarity" means the fundamental aspect of the mind that illuminates objects for the mind separate from the content of the mind. That clarity is very difficult to discover.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 19th, 2011 at 6:56 AM

Title: Re: Hua Tou and Dzogchen

Content:

Fa Dao said:

From my limited understanding of chan realizing the nature of mind is realizing emptiness. So then in your estimation you would say it is similar to Tragcho?

Namdrol said:

The nature of the mind is not just emptiness, it is clarity and emptiness inseparable. The emphasis in tregchö is on this.

Inge said:

This reminds me of a quote attributed to Hsuan Hua:

"If you understand the Zero, you know it to be the True Emptiness, which contains Wonderful Existence, and the Wonderful Existence, which contains True Emptiness. True Emptiness does not obstruct Wonderful Existence and Wonderful Existence does not obstruct True Emptiness. True Emptiness is not empty and so it is called Wonderful Existence; Wonderful Existence is non-existent and is therefore called True Emptiness--empty and non-empty, existing and not existing."

Are you talking about the same thing?

Malcolm wrote:

This is referring to appearance and emptiness, object side.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 19th, 2011 at 6:37 AM

Title: Re: Conservation Efforts

Content:

LastLegend said:

If they don't want to save the earth, then we are screwed.

Malcolm wrote:

They don't and we are.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 19th, 2011 at 6:34 AM

Title: Re: Hua Tou and Dzogchen

Content:

Fa Dao said:

From my limited understanding of chan realizing the nature of mind is realizing emptiness. So then in your estimation you would say it is similar to Tragcho?

Malcolm wrote:

The nature of the mind is not just emptiness, it is clarity and emptiness inseparable. The emphasis in tregchö is on this.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 19th, 2011 at 5:00 AM

Title: Re: Hua Tou and Dzogchen

Content:

Fa Dao said:

In the hua tou method one is given a meditation topic/question. For example, "Who is dragging this corpse around?" or "Who is chanting Buddhas name?" You are instructed to continually ask this question until one pointedness is achieved. Great doubt is developed from asking a question that does not have an answer that the logical/rational/thinking mind can answer. One keeps pushing and pushing to come up with an answer nonetheless. Eventually one breaks through and the separateness of mind, body and world drops away leaving one with a deep understanding of shunyata.

Malcolm wrote:

Tregcho is based on recognizing the nature of mind directly, and staying in that state.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 19th, 2011 at 4:17 AM

Title: Re: Conservation Efforts

Content:

Astus said:

The idea of equal distribution is great. Communism, however, didn't work out so far.

Malcolm wrote:

Screw the proletariat, the consumers must seize the means of production, and create a dictatorship of consumption...!

(oh wait...that won't work...)

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 19th, 2011 at 2:09 AM

Title: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

LastLegend said:

Uh nobody said it is ok to kill insects...but the karma for killing an insect is different from killing a larger animal.

Namdrol said:

This is merely your imputation. I don't think the Buddha ever made such a statement, at least I have never read such a statement by him anywhere. The only possible argument one could make for this is that killing bugs requires very little intention, and so the force of intention propelling the action is generally weaker than the force of intention it takes to kill a larger animal. But there certainly is not inherently less karma in killing a bug than an animal. That is ridiculous.

Pero said:

Considering it is more severe to kill an Arhat than an ordinary human, more severe to kill one's parents than other people and so on and so on, it is hardly a ridiculous conclusion.

Malcolm wrote:

The reason for the five uninterrupted sins has to do with one's liberation. Harming a buddha, killing an arhat, killing one mother, or father and causing a schism in the Sangha are all sins connected with one's own and other's chances for attaining liberation. It has nothing to do with the superiority or inferiority of humans in terms of some hierarchy of sentient beings based on intelligence or development. Please note that causing a schism in the Sangha is one of those five sins.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 19th, 2011 at 2:06 AM

Title: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

LastLegend said:

Uh nobody said it is ok to kill insects...but the karma for killing an insect is different from killing a larger animal.

Namdrol said:

This is merely your imputation. I don't think the Buddha ever made such a statement, at least I have never read such a statement by him anywhere. The only possible argument one could make for this is that killing bugs requires very little intention, and so the force of intention propelling the action is generally weaker than the force of intention it takes to kill a larger animal. But there certainly is not inherently less karma in killing a bug than an animal. That is ridiculous.

N

LastLegend said:

Do you agree that some animals are more intelligent than others?

Malcolm wrote:

I agree that some animals have more sophisticated sense organs than others. But minds are not sense organs, are they?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 19th, 2011 at 1:41 AM

Title: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

LastLegend said:

Uh nobody said it is ok to kill insects...but the karma for killing an insect is different from killing a larger animal.

Malcolm wrote:

This is merely your imputation. I don't think the Buddha ever made such a statement, at least I have never read such a statement by him anywhere. The only possible argument one could make for this is that killing bugs requires very little intention, and so the force of intention propelling the action is generally weaker than the force of intention it takes to kill a larger animal. But there certainly is not inherently less karma in killing a bug than an animal. That is ridiculous.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 19th, 2011 at 1:38 AM

Title: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

David N. Snyder said:

* Insects (building construction and farming allowed even though they may be killed indirectly)

Malcolm wrote:

You have to include small animals, birds, snakes, and so on in this. Monks however are prohibited from farming. Lay people are not prohibited from eating "royal animals", only monks are.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 19th, 2011 at 1:35 AM

Title: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

LastLegend said:

I will have to disagree. I would say a cow is more developed than an insect. Something like killing an Arhat is different from killing a human being.

Malcolm wrote:

The only difference between a fly, a cow and a human being is that a human being can attain buddhahood. Therefore, killing a human being is considered a parakija, an offense punishable by losing one's monastic vows.

The difference between an arya and a human beings is that an arya can help other human beings awaken. Thus, harming a buddha or killing an Arhat is one of the five deeds that results in immediate rebirth in lower realms.

A cow and a fly are both the same in that neither can attain buddhahood in that body, both have minds. There is no qualitative difference between a cow and a fly, only a quantitative difference in terms of sense organ development. From an ethical point of view, this means that the life of a fly and the life of a cow are equal. Moreover, there is no difference in self-awareness. Cows and flies exhibit the same degree of self-awareness i.e. when you try to harm either, they react by protecting themselves.

There is no Buddhist teaching of which I am aware that states that preserving the life of mammals is more important than perserving the life of small creatures like flies and worms because mammals are "more developed".

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 19th, 2011 at 1:16 AM

Title: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

LastLegend said:

...the larger the animals, the more karma because they are more developed than insects.

Malcolm wrote:

Why? Because they have more developed sense organs, brains? That is nonsense. All creatures are equal. They all have minds and feelings. Killing a cow and killing a bug is equal in terms of the karma of killing.

LastLegend said:

The issue of meat-eating is at best a distraction from what is really important i.e. practice. Not eating meat does not make someone a better practitioner, eating meat does not make one a worse practitioner. Not eating meat does not necessarily make someone more compassionate, eating meat does not necessarily make someone less compassionate.

Yes, but practice also means trying to step away from both sides of extreme. Not necessarily becoming a vegan or vegetarian, but at least we can be honest about what's going on.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, what is going on is that there isn't even a needle tip of happiness anywhere in samsara.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 19th, 2011 at 12:49 AM

Title: Re: Hua Tou and Dzogchen

Content:

Fa Dao said:

For those who have had experience in both Chan and Dzogchen:

When one shatters the "Great Doubt" as in Hua Tou practice from the Chan lineage how would the resultant state be viewed according to Dzogchen?

Malcolm wrote:

What does shattering great doubt mean?

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 19th, 2011 at 12:11 AM

Title: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

Namdrol said:

...

The issue of meat-eating is at best a distraction from what is really important i.e. practice. Not eating meat does not make someone a better practitioner, eating meat does not make one a worse practitioner. Not eating meat does not necessarily make someone more compassionate, eating meat does not necessarily make someone less compassionate.

Sönam said:

I certainly understand these arguments ... also it does not make you better, still we are living in a world where there is so much BS and so much ignorance about necessary "basic" changes (not to speak about fundamental ignorance) that every step one can make for a change is a constructive step. We are also acting for a better samsara. Therefore (most of the time) I do not eat meat, and (most of the time) I do not drink alcohol ... and I also (definitely) do not vote and few other behaviors, but that's other stories.

Sönam

Malcolm wrote:

Right, but this is a different issue than whether or not veganism is compatible with Buddhism in general (apart from some Chinese texts written some time prior to the Tang dynasty stuck in the mouth of the Buddha).

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 19th, 2011 at 12:03 AM

Title: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

Namdrol said:

The answer to your question, then, is no.

David N. Snyder said:

Okay, thanks. Then I guess there is no real way one could be a 'devout' Jain and / or 100% ahimsa.

I suppose the only real way might be to have your own vegetable garden with subsistence farming, with no sprays of any kind, but of course, not too practical, especially for urban dwellers.

Malcolm wrote:

Avihimsa has to do with one's intention not to harm others, and very little to do with one's actions, apart from directly desisting in harming others.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 18th, 2011 at 11:49 PM

Title: Re: obstacles to the spread of Veganism + their solutions

Content:

Adamantine said:

The only thing that makes meat consumption worse in this regard is if the livestock are eating industrially produced agriculture, then it's the bug deaths on top of the animal deaths...

David N. Snyder said:

Which is where 74% of all meat comes from, so therefore, in most cases, meat does result in the bugs death plus the animal killings. Whereas a vegetarian diet results in just the bugs death.

What about organic? I am sure that there will never be no deaths of any kind, but wouldn't organic vegetarian farming result in even far fewer deaths? (compared to conventional vegetarian/vegan and conventional omnivore diets)

Malcolm wrote:

Not large scale organic farming. The primary difference is the type of pesticides:

ORGANIC PESTICIDES VERSUS SYNTHETIC PESTICIDES

Clearly, the less we impact our environment, the better off we all are. Organic farming practices have greatly advanced the use of non-chemical means to control pests, as mentioned earlier.

Unfortunately, these non-chemical methods do not always provide enough protection, and it's necessary to use chemical pesticides. How do organic pesticides compare with conventional pesticides?

A recent study compared the effectiveness of a rotenone-pyrethrin mixture versus a synthetic pesticide, imidan. Rotenone and pyrethrin are two common organic pesticides; imidan is considered a "soft" synthetic pesticide (i.e., designed to have a brief lifetime after application, and other traits that minimize unwanted effects). It was found that up to 7 applications of the rotenone- pyrethrin mixture were required to obtain the level of protection provided by 2 applications of imidan.

It seems unlikely that 7 applications of rotenone and pyrethrin are really better for the environment than 2 applications of imidan, especially when rotenone is extremely toxic to fish and other aquatic life.

It should be noted, however, that we don't know for certain which system is more harmful. This is because we do not look at organic pesticides the same way that we look at conventional pesticides. We don't know how long these organic pesticides persist in the environment, or the full extent of their effects.

When you look at lists of pesticides allowed in organic agriculture, you find warnings such as, "Use with caution. The toxicological effects of [organic pesticide X] are largely unknown," or "Its persistence in the soil is unknown." Again, researchers haven't bothered to study the effects of organic pesticides because it is assumed that "natural" chemicals are automatically safe.

<http://www.ocf.berkeley.edu/~lhom/organictext.html> "
onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

The answer to your question, then, is no.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 18th, 2011 at 11:10 PM

Title: Re: Introducing the practice of Daimoku to friends and relatives

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Chanting Nam-myoho-renge-kyo during the physical union of man and woman is indeed what is called "earthly desires are enlightenment," and "the sufferings of birth and death are nirvana."

I wonder if this applies to chanting Nam-myoho-renge-kyo while watching porn.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 18th, 2011 at 10:13 PM

Title: Re: The Rinpoche's Zen

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The following is not Dzogchen.

Astus said:

"The awakening has nothing to do with our background. It has nothing to do with whether we have been meditating for a long time or not. It has nothing to do with meeting impressive teachers or gurus. It is simply dependent on whether or not we are open to it."

(No Self, No Problem, p. 4)

"In the same way, when we pay attention to our breath, body sensations, and to the awareness that arises, then all the illusions, suffering, confusion, sorrow, and personal issues, all of this begins to dissipate. We see that all of these experiences are born of delusion. This is the sense of "I." "I am real. I am truly existent." Everything is gone except this "I," this sense of self. Then, when we continue meditating, the sense of self also goes away. When we just keep meditating, when we just remain in that present awareness and observe, then the self dissolves too. When the self dissolves there is just pure awareness. When the self completely collapses, there is this inexpressible, simple yet profound and ecstatic, compassionate awareness. Nobody is there. "I" is completely nonexistent in that place. There is no separation between samsara, bad circumstances, and nirvana, good circumstances, and there is nobody pursuing the path or chasing after enlightenment. In that moment we realize the essence of the Buddha's teaching."

(p. 41)

"Suddenly, when we stop producing concepts and ideas, when we stop feeding that illusory reality, when we stop associating with ego, it is very simple. It is simple to stop associating with ego. However there are no twelve step programs in transcendent wisdom. There is only the one-step program and that is to not associate with the ego. The moment we stop associating with ego it just immediately ceases right there."

(p. 128)

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 18th, 2011 at 9:45 PM

Title: Re: obstacles to the spread of Veganism + their solutions

Content:

Sönam said:

does your answer includes my quote too ?

Sönam

Malcolm wrote:

Of course, since it refers to meat that is cornfed in feed lots.

So called grass-fed meat does not require these numbers. For example, there is a local beef farm near to me. They graze all of their cattle. They do not use corn. Since their cattle is all 100 percent grass fed, antibiotic and hormone free, numbers like the ones above do not apply. But these kinds of farms are

The water of use of cattle depends on the region and intensity of the production of meat. In dry regions, like the American West, what range land there is is so over grazed that the cattle need to be fattened for market. Large-scale cattle ranching is not only environmentally damaging in terms of grain inputs required to fatten cattle, in dry ranges it is very damaging to the environment such as soil, water, and so on in terms of erosion, etc., from cattle grazing.

Moreover as we know, cattle did not evolve to eat corn. It is bad for them.

And let's not even get started with hog farming -- that is an environmental nightmare, like chicken farming and so on.

Look, no one is arguing that there are no deep ethical and environmental issues with the production of meat. Of course there are. In an ideal world, no one would eat meat. But in an ideal world, no would suffer, experiencing birth, illness, aging and death either.

What is at issue is the assertion that just because one eats meat one necessarily has less compassion, one is taking on the karma of harming sentient beings, and so on. That assertion does not stand up to reasoning. The primary argument is that because someone purchases meat to eat that they are culpable in harming animals in the same manner as a butcher through economic participation on the meat industry. Well, from the viewpoint of how things are interconnected, since the meat industry is only possible because of oil and trucking and large supermarkets, if someone buys vegetables from a supermarket that sells meat, they are just as culpable as someone who buys meat. Why? Because there is no time that non-Buddhist people will voluntarily cease buying meat that is supplied to them. if someone participates in the economy of food production they are necessarily participating in the economy of meat production unless they have the option to eschew all contact with large supermarket chains for all their fruit and vegetable needs. The vast majority of people don't. People may even try to insulate themselves with a chain of vegan markets for example, but those markets will have to buy their food from suppliers, etc. So my point is that the economics of food production make it really impossible to say "This dollar that I am spending will not support animal husbandry in any way, shape or form".

Also, there is a lack of equanimity concerning suffering in the shrill arguments of radical vegan crew, frequent excuses about why it is permissible for pesticides to be used while slaughter is not permissible, and so on. Suffering is suffering, all of samsara is suffering down to the smallest atom.

The issue of meat-eating is at best a distraction from what is really important i.e. practice. Not eating meat does not make someone a better practitioner, eating meat does not make one a worse practitioner. Not eating meat does not necessarily make someone more compassionate, eating meat does not necessarily make someone less compassionate.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 18th, 2011 at 8:25 PM

Title: Re: Rinchen Terzod & Dudjom Tersar indexes

Content:

username said:

The obvious reason behind the reply was that other major complimentary parts of Dudjom Tersar were yet to come.

Malcolm wrote:

No, that does not make sense. The RT only contains representative transmissions from all the major terma cycles. For example, there are texts in DL's collection of termas which come from the original Dudjom, Khathog Duddul Dorje which are present in the RT, but none of DL's own termas. But when the whole Dudjom tersar is given, and not merely Dudjom Tersar i.e. Dudjom Rinpoche's pure vision cycles, it also includes the transmissions from Duddul Dorje, Dudjom Lingpa, and Dudjom Rinpoche.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 18th, 2011 at 8:15 PM

Title: Re: obstacles to the spread of Veganism + their solutions

Content:

LastLegend said:

But clearly there is a difference between directly killing animals for consumption and killing animals indirectly through farming and such.

Malcolm wrote:

Obviously the Buddha felt that both were on par since digging in the ground and killing animals are both in the list of vows to be confessed.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 18th, 2011 at 8:01 PM

Title: Re: obstacles to the spread of Veganism + their solutions

Content:

Sönam said:

Aside for sentimental or ethic reasons there is a good reason today not to eat meat ... it cost 100 times more water for 1kg meat than for 1kg cereals.
And lake of water is the coming disease.

Sönam

Huseng said:

About 14kg of grains to produce 1kg of beef.

Malcolm wrote:

This applies only to feedlot beef.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 18th, 2011 at 10:34 AM

Title: Re: obstacles to the spread of Veganism + their solutions

Content:

LastLegend said:

Animals are meant to be in the wild.

Malcolm wrote:

Not domesticated animals. Hence the term "domesticated".

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 18th, 2011 at 10:28 AM

Title: Re: Best academic studies on (tibetan) buddhism?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Most Interesting: Dan Martin

Most Brilliant: Matthew Kapstein

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 18th, 2011 at 4:41 AM

Title: Re: obstacles to the spread of Veganism + their solutions

Content:

LastLegend said:

I would add some more thoughts to the discussion of this topic.

In US, animals are institutionally raised in cages since they are young. Basically they stay in prison for the rest of their lives until the day they are killed. The 3 poisons on their minds also create poisons in their bodies. For larger animals such as cows and pigs, there are special ways to kill to get most if not all the blood out of their tissues so that we can have fresh meats. So I will not go into details of how they are killed. But you can do some research for yourself.

Malcolm wrote:

Yup. All suffering of suffering. Very sad. So is the sufferig of insects posioned with nerve agents in soyfields. Half a million tons of pesticides are used every year in the US alone.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 18th, 2011 at 4:29 AM

Title: Re: Rinchen Terzod & Dudjom Tersar indexes

Content:

ngodrup said:

...but it may

explain what DL meant when he said DT is there when RTD is given.

Malcolm wrote:

Apparently Kongtrul and Khyentse extended in invitation to DL to include his termas in the RT -- he refused, but said that wherever the RT spread, DT wold spread there too.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 18th, 2011 at 3:55 AM

Title: Re: obstacles to the spread of Veganism + their solutions

Content:

Huseng said:

They also developed a tradition of releasing animals (fang sheng 放生), where turtles, birds and other beings slated to become someone's dinner were purchased and released into the wild.

Malcolm wrote:

I am reminded of those people who made their living trapping fish for release by Buddhists in Japan.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 18th, 2011 at 3:50 AM

Title: Re: obstacles to the spread of Veganism + their solutions

Content:

Namdrol said:

I like all food as long as it is cooked well and prepared in a healthy fashion. Basically, food is medicine.

N

Huseng said:

If my memory serves me I recall on E Sangha you referred to meat eating as "sinful" without specifying any caveats. Have you changed your mind since then? I just recall you being somewhat forward in your former discussions concerning meat consumptions, where you called meat eating sinful.

Malcolm wrote:

What I said was that meat is slightly non-virtuous because it inevitably comes from the suffering of some animal, for example, like silk.

I have always found it a little hilarious that vegetarian Buddhists are busy swathing their statues in silk brocades while casting scathing glances at meat-eaters.

I never tried to convince you or anyone in this conversation that slaughtering animals was ok, and so on. It isn't. But we cannot have a narrow view that specifies this part of the economy is ok, and this part isn't. It is all tied together.

I think most of us recognize that the circumstances around the production of meat are rooted in non-virtue even if that karma does not necessarily transfer to everyone who eats meat.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 18th, 2011 at 3:33 AM

Title: Re: obstacles to the spread of Veganism + their solutions

Content:

LastLegend said:

Those who walk the path of Bodhisattva cannot eat meats. Bodhisattvas don't even tremble on green grass, why do they use meats of sentient beings for food? Monks are the ones who honor Bodhisattva precepts, and they should not eat meats. Vietnamese and Chinese monks are famous for being vegan.

We laymen can stick to 3 conditions of purity. But we can do better if we want to.

Namdrol said:

I never used the meat of sentient beings. I always make sure when I eat meat, that no sentient being inhabits the steak I am eating. Why? Because harming sentient beings is wrong. But meat is inert, like grass. It can't be harmed.

N

LastLegend said:

You like the taste of meats more than vegetarian food?

Malcolm wrote:

I like all food as long as it is cooked well and prepared in a healthy fashion. Basically, food is medicine.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 18th, 2011 at 3:23 AM

Title: Re: obstacles to the spread of Veganism + their solutions

Content:

LastLegend said:

Those who walk the path of Bodhisattva cannot eat meats. Bodhisattvas don't even tremble on green grass, why do they use meats of sentient beings for food? Monks are the ones who honor Bodhisattva precepts, and they should not eat meats. Vietnamese and Chinese monks are famous for being vegan.

We laymen can stick to 3 conditions of purity. But we can do better if we want to.

Malcolm wrote:

I never used the meat of sentient beings. I always make sure when I eat meat, that no sentient being inhabits the steak I am eating. Why? Because harming sentient beings is wrong. But meat is inert, like grass. It can't be harmed.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 18th, 2011 at 3:21 AM

Title: Re: obstacles to the spread of Veganism + their solutions

Content:

Huseng said:

I'll leave it to vegan parents to demonstrate otherwise. You can have healthy kids raised on a vegan diet.

Malcolm wrote:

I know many people who were raised on such diets -- they all have messed up teeth, had strange fevers when they hit puberty, and other developmental health issues.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 18th, 2011 at 3:19 AM

Title: Re: obstacles to the spread of Veganism + their solutions

Content:

Huseng said:

Um, no. I've proven that veganism existed in Buddhist cultures in East Asia. They still do. I can say this both as a scholar of Buddhism trained in Japan and with a real life perspective. I kid you not I have been to monasteries full of hundreds of nuns and a few dozen monks where no animal products are served up in the dining hall, and the arhat sandals on the feet of nuns and monks are not made of leather. I can also tell you that the issue of meat, eggs and dairy have been discussed in Chinese Buddhist literature both in ancient times and in present times, hence making it a Buddhist issue.

Malcolm wrote:

A Chinese Buddhist issue, apparently with no relevance to more universal sphere of Mahāyāna which existed in Central Asia, Tibet, India, Cambodia, Thailand, and so on. This effectively limits its relevance to Chinese and Japanese Buddhists. But in Japan, everyone now eats meat, more or less.

Don't get me wrong -- I am not against vegetarianism -- though as a doctor of Tibetan Medicine I have met lot of vegan people whose ailments were quickly eliminated by a small amount of meat (incidentally, such a phenomena is regularly reported in Yoga magazines as well). Plus, there is the factor of milk intolerance. Then there is Chinese bias against Tibetans and other dairy-consuming people on the Western frontier of China, and so on. In the end the Chinese Buddhist prohibition against dairy and cheese is more likely to be a result of cultural bias than real concern for animals since they still used animal labor for agricultural production.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 18th, 2011 at 3:07 AM

Title: Re: obstacles to the spread of Veganism + their solutions

Content:

Huseng said:

Plenty of well known monks of the past lived to ripe old ages, and their communities weren't dying off due to malnutrition.

Malcolm wrote:

They were undoubtedly raised on meat. It is well known that animal protein is more important in the diets of growing children than it is in the diets of adults.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 18th, 2011 at 2:33 AM

Title: Re: obstacles to the spread of Veganism + their solutions

Content:

Huseng said:

You should reread our discussion -- I've proven that veganism existed in Buddhist cultures in East Asia. It is a Buddhist issue, at least in this corner of the continent.

Malcolm wrote:

What you did not prove is that Veganism was grounded in Indian Mahāyāna (whose sutras you originally cited). All you proved was that some Chinese Buddhist wrote texts to support their bias against Indian dietary preferences. But that does not constitute sutrayāna support for a vegan diet. And further, in terms of Indian Buddhism, all we learned is that there is no consensus about what the Mahāyāna prohibitions against meat eating meant amongst Mahāyāna authors. So in the end you have failed to prove anything. And this is a good thing, since there is no liberation through dietary choices.

But if you harm something directly, with intention to harm, then this might interfere with your liberation, and that we have no need to establish, because it is well known.

On the contrary, what I have proven is that your thesis "All consumers or users of meat or any other animal product are by definition harmers of sentient beings" is outright false, when considered from a Buddhist perspective.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 18th, 2011 at 1:50 AM

Title: Re: obstacles to the spread of Veganism + their solutions

Content:

Huseng said:

Indian Buddhism is not the be-all and end-all judge of what constitutes Buddhadharma.

Malcolm wrote:

Of course it is. It is the bellweather by which all must be judged. But that is just my opinion. It is the standard by which intra-buddhist communication must occur. I don't try to convince others of things that are particular to Vajrayāna or Tibetan schools.

Likewise, it makes no sense to try to convince non-Sino-Japanese Buddhists of doctrines peculiar to Sino-Japanese Buddhism. For example, eschewing dairy.

Thus, Indian Buddhism is the basic standard.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 18th, 2011 at 1:47 AM

Title: Re: obstacles to the spread of Veganism + their solutions

Content:

Huseng said:

Since most of the sutras that teach strict vegetarianism are also tathagatagarbha sutras, this obviously means that strict proclamations made about meat eating need interpretation since you cannot have an unconditioned Buddhanature on the one hand, and one that can be destroyed on the other.

Again it is a figurative use of speech. Icchantikas are beings whose behaviour is contrary to the path and/or lack any aspirations for liberation.

Malcolm wrote:

According to you, eating meat "is contrary to the path", thus those who eat meat are icchantikas. Good thing Madhyamaka rejects this Yogacara and Tathagatagarbha sutra idea completely.

Huseng said:

No, it is the same as for shravakas. Bodhisattvas should avoid harming sentient beings where possible.

Hence bodhisattvas should avoid eating meat and contributing to the economy behind slaughter.

Malcolm wrote:

Only if shravakas need to avoid eating meat, and they do not, apart from specific conditions we have discussed.

Huseng said:

I disagree. The emphasis is on the craving for meat and consumption of it. It is worse if you kill it and eat it rather than just purchasing it and consuming it of course.

Malcolm wrote:

The notion is that eating meat causes one be more liable to harm others. But the context of the sutra has to be considered as well as the audience. In this case, non-Buddhist lay people since Buddhist monks and lay people are already prohibited from killing animals for food.

Huseng said:

Bhavya was an Indian master. He was certainly quite aware of the issues here since he address this in his Tarkajvala in detail. He obviously thought the reasoning of the advocates of an absolute prohibition of meat eating were mistaken and unreasonable, and that their arguments did not actually adress the true intent of the Mahāyāna sutras that seem to say meat eating is never acceptable.

And Daoxuan was a Chinese master with plenty of what was for him canonical citations and reasonings to encourage his peers and laypersons to refrain from eating meat.

Malcolm wrote:

An Indian master interpreting an Indian text or doctrine will always be preferable to the interpretation of Tibetans, Chinese, and so on. Of course, there are differing opinions. Shantideva was pretty firmly against eating meat. My point is that these texts are not slam dunks "Oh, this is our book, this is what it says, therefore, this is what we have to do".

Huseng said:

These can be safely considered apocryphal since Indians would never dream of not conusming milk products.

Is a Chinese "apocryphal" text of less value than an Indian "apocryphal" text? From an academic point of view any Mahāyāna text no matter where it was penned is apocryphal.

Malcolm wrote:

Chinese sutras reflected the concerns of Chinese authors. If you go down this route, all you will wind up with is the conclusion that different communities of monks in different places wrote different texts reflecting different concerns. You then are left with the conclusion that one can only rely on one's own reasoning to decide what is correct and not correct and that there is no solid basis in citing sutras since the authority of sutra is undermined. This is actually my point, if you want to be a Vegan, go ahead. But there is no Buddhist justification for this.

Huseng said:

If you drive a car you are supporting the economy of meat production which depends upon oil from top to bottom. No oil, no huge meat industry. And that is just a fact. In fact if you shop at any market, you are supporting the meat industry, if you buy grain, you are supporting producers of grain which is fed to animals in feedlots. It is impossible to truly tease the economy of food production apart and say "If I buy this, I am not supporting that". Even if you buy organic cotton, pesticides are used in the production of that cotton, pesticides which are less toxic to humans, but no less toxic to bugs. If you decide to buy only clothes made of artificial fibers, you are supporting the oil industry which is supporting the this industry and that industry.

Those are all secondary to the actual production of a meat. If a city was to reduce meat consumption, the shops within it would order less meat from producers who in turn would slaughter less animals because there would be less demand for their product.

Malcolm wrote:

No, it is primary. Where this exist, that exists, where this does not exist, that does not exist -- basic dependent origination. Anyway, you are dreaming -- we live in a supply side economy, not a demand economy. There is demand precisely because there is supply.

Huseng said:

If you want to be a Vegan, fine, no problem -- but there is little or no justification for it from a Buddhist point of view.

From your Buddhist point of view. Things are different in the East Asian realm of Buddhism. We have texts and traditions which clearly encourage practitioners to avoid meat, and beyond that eggs and dairy as well.

Malcolm wrote:

And Chinese people do not have a deeply ingrained culture of eating everything that moves? Japanese people have not lived off of fish and other seafood for millenia? Etc.

Huseng said:

In fact all the Indian sutras encourage use of dairy, the very same ones that reject the consumption of meat.

Personally I'm not staunchly against dairy provided it is taken from a well treated animal. However, given that in the modern day so much of our dairy is produced under horrific conditions I have all the reason to boycott such products. I avoid dairy because I don't care to directly support such industries. Japan does not have a good record when it comes to animal welfare. The farmer in rural Bihar on the other hand with his herd of cattle grazing in lush green fields is not a big deal, but industrial milk production is.

Malcolm wrote:

I don't consume industrial dairy, actually.

Huseng said:

So therefore, the Vegan diet, even by strict vegetarian standards, is not supported in Buddhist sutras of Indian provenance.

Like I said in East Asia it is different. Buddhas and Bodhisattvas were and do work in a different cultural environment. If the result has been less animals suffering, then such teachings encouraging what we would call veganism in English, then all the better. That is Saddharma.

Malcolm wrote:

The idea that East Asia was some Vegan paradise is utter bollocks, as per above.

Huseng said:

In the end, Veganism is merely a political salve for the consciences of granola-munching, yoga-studio going, petty bourgeois (as well as some Buddhists) in first-world countries that are completely out of touch with the realities of how things are in places like Haiti, Appalachia (where the poorest Americans live) and Golok, for example where every calory counts.

This is a bit harsh and inconsiderate of the many vegans in the world, many of whom do not fit into such a character type.

Malcolm wrote:

Yup, well, I think Vegans are harsh, unkind, shrill and elitist, as well as dietarily neurotic.

Huseng said:

In other words, without the abundant waste of first-world nations, a Vegan diet is not even possible.

Nonsense. It was possible in pre-modern times, it is possible now.

Malcolm wrote:

You have no evidence of any vast community of Vegan peoples living anywhere. The fact is that animal protein in some form or another has been a substantial portion of the diet every premodern society we can think of (and for good reason, it has more energy than grain).

Huseng said:

You might argue "The Chinese Buddhists have been doing this for centuries" well, my reply to that is that people in Chinese Buddhist monasteries are not paid to work in rice paddies (they are forbidden to) they are paid to pray and be vinayadharas.

First of all, it wasn't just China. Japan, Korea and Vietnam all had Buddhists living vegan lifestyles, both for religious convictions and economic reasons.

Malcolm wrote:

They could afford to support minority populations in elitist institutions.

Huseng said:

In pre-modern Japan for example there simply was no dairy. I don't know about eggs, but I imagine with the sentiments expressed in Buddhist texts it would have been minimal given that bodhisattva aspirants are forbidden from keeping both animals and slaves. Ruling all meat and fish, people would have been vegan. They lived just fine, both Buddhist layman and monk alike.

Malcolm wrote:

Sorry, but Japanese people ate fish and other sea food and have done so for millenia -- and prior to the introduction of Buddhism ate many other kinds of animals as witnessed by Buddhist imperial edicts. And for example, Jodo Shinshu permits meat eating and so on.

Huseng said:

They are a supported community and their fortunes and ability to maintain the life style you admire and emulate depends completely on the wealth of the supporting population.

Any monastic population, even the meat eating ones, rely on the generosity of a supporting population.

Malcolm wrote:

Not always, in Tibet, monasteries were landed estates that produced their own grain and so on. Monasteries as farms were also common in India, according to scandalized reports about Mahayana monks met by Chinese pilgrims. Basically, the Chinese "proto-vegans" were fanatic converts.

Huseng said:

Likewise, the Vegan lifestyle depends on the choices and abundance of the very industrial agricultural system you are criticizing. Without that system, without the ability to get fresh vegetables, etc. year round, the Vegan diet is impossible. The Vegan diet is primarily an urban diet for a wealthy elite (like monks in a monastery) who can afford fresh vegetables, fruit, nuts, and grain 365 days a year (and good medical care when their health crashes from a bad diet).

None of this is true. Even in pre-modern times vegetarian populations generally got by the winters without dying off from malnutrition. This was long before refrigeration and industrial food production. Pickles, grains, dried fruits, field vegetables, noodles, teas and various other food products provided sufficient nutrition then, just as they would now.

Malcolm wrote:

You really need to read ancient medical texts from India, China, and so on. Then you will understand that this is pretty much of a fantasy.

Huseng said:

Pre-modern Buddhist communities in East Asia were effectively vegan and they existed for many centuries before any industrial infrastructure was developed.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, who lived off of the labor of meat-eating laity.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 18th, 2011 at 12:58 AM

Title: Re: obstacles to the spread of Veganism + their solutions

Content:

Huseng said:

I've been using scriptural citations from canonical Buddhist texts. This is only appropriate and desirable on a Buddhist forum.

Malcolm wrote:

Reasoning is also required, and as we have seen, there are no Indian scriptures that will support a Vegan read since honey, milk, butter, cream and so on are all on the acceptable list of foods, even by strict vegetarian read of the sutras.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 17th, 2011 at 10:44 PM

Title: Re: Tibetan monk sets himself on fire in China

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Hòa thượng[a] Thích Quảng Đức (/tɪtʃ kwɑŋ duk/ tích kwong duuk; Vietnamese pronunciation: [tʰĩt̚ kwāːŋ d̺ĩk̚]; Saigon: [tʰĩt̚ kwəːŋ d̺ĩk̚] (listen); Chữ Nôm:釋廣德; 1897 – 11 June 1963), born Lâm Văn Tức, was a Vietnamese Mahayana Buddhist monk who burned himself to death at a busy Saigon road intersection on 11 June 1963. Thích Quảng Đức was protesting against the persecution of Buddhists by South Vietnam's Ngô Đình Diệm administration. Photos of his self-immolation were circulated widely across the world and brought attention to the policies of the Diệm regime. Malcolm Browne won a Pulitzer Prize for his renowned photograph of the monk's death. After his death, his body was re-cremated, but his heart remained intact.[1][2] This was interpreted as a symbol of compassion and led Buddhists to revere him as a bodhisattva, heightening the impact of his death on the public psyche.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 17th, 2011 at 9:51 PM

Title: Re: Rinchen Terzod & Dudjom Tersar indexes

Content:

vajraheart said:

Hi,

Does anyone know if the Dudjom Tersar is contained in the Rinchen Terzod ?
Also looking for the complete indexes of both.

Thank you,
Sumir

Malcolm wrote:

No -- Dudjom Tersar is not in Rinchen Terzö. The complete indexes to both can be found at tbrc.org in the nyingma section http://www.tbrc.org/#library_work-O3JW110253JW11050 "

onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;"

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 17th, 2011 at 9:50 PM

Title: Re: obstacles to the spread of Veganism + their solutions

Content:

rory said:

If you eat meat that's what you personally are causing.

Malcolm wrote:

No, that is a false equivalence, as I have already shown.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 17th, 2011 at 9:43 PM

Title: Re: obstacles to the spread of Veganism + their solutions

Content:

Namdrol said:

The crux of my arguments against eating meat were similar to Huseng's environmental, cruelty of treatment of animals, and so on. I still think those arguments are a valid reason for not supporting industrial agriculture in general -- which I endeavor not to do. I agree with Huseng that as Buddhists we need to be mindful of what is harmful. But I do not buy the argument that eating meat ipso facto makes one responsible for harming animals. That extreme was rejected by the Buddha and I also reject it based on reasoning.

Huseng said:

Such a teaching was given to the śrāvakas, not the bodhisattvas. As Daoxuan in the 7th century pointed out, the prohibitions against eating meat that is impure (having it killed for you, etc...), is an indication that the spirit of the teaching is to eventually forbid the consumption of meat when the disciples are suitable vessels to receive such a teaching.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, as we can see, there were Mahāyāna authors in India such as Bhavya who understood the Mahāyāna prohibitions against eating meat differently than the way you are portraying it. In his commentary he mentions by name these sutras: Hastikakṣya mahāyāna sūtra, Mahāmegha, Lanka, Āryāṅgulimāliya-mahāyāna-sūtra, etc.

To refute the literal interpretation of these sūtras, which he considers interpretable, he runs through the impurity argument advanced by some who assert that because the meat comes from semen and blood, it produces impurities of the body in greater excess. Bhavya points out that also milk and butter come from the bodies of animals, hence they too should produce more impurities.

He then addresses the argument consuming meat makes one a harmer of beings by necessity. As I said, he reduces the argument to whether one directly harms a being as follows "if one eats meat after creating suffering for a creature's body, it will possess a fault, but since there is no mind in the flesh of a creature's body at the time its meat is eaten, if no suffering arises where is the sin to be seen? Just as there is not the slightest suffering to a creature when one uses mother of pearl, bezoars of fish and oxen, peacock feathers, ox tails, teeth, bones, hide and so on, just as there is no harm what so ever when using fruit, water, and so on, in the same way there at the time of eating meat there is no fault because one is not engaging in harming. If there were harm, then also cremating a corpse would be sinful."

Huseng said:

The śrāvakas seek arhatship, in which case unconditional concern for all sentient beings is not a major concern. The whole point of such a spiritual pursuit is liberation for oneself, not to free all beings from suffering.

Malcolm wrote:

Minds cannot be harmed, only bodies. And Avihimsa is a concern for all Buddhists. But you cannot harm something that is not alive and has no feelings.

Huseng said:

According to numerous Mahāyāna texts meat eating was forbidden by a Buddha (not necessarily Śākyamuni) as it destroys the seed of buddhahood, among other issues.

Malcolm wrote:

If "the seed of Buddhahood" could be destroyed, then you are admitting there is a class of persons called icchantika. You don't really want to do that, do you? Not only that, you are admitting that Buddhanature is something conditioned, subject to impermanence. Since most of the sutras that teach strict vegetarianism are also tathagatagarbha sutras, this obviously means that strict proclamations made about meat eating need interpretation since you cannot have an unconditioned Buddhanature on the one hand, and one that can be destroyed on the other.

Huseng said:

This makes sense given that a bodhisattva should as much as possible avoid creating the causes and conditions for the intentional slaughter of animals.

Malcolm wrote:

No, it is the same as for shravakas. Bodhisattvas should avoid harming sentient beings where possible.

Huseng said:

If you purchase meat then you are supporting the causes and conditions for the intentional slaughter of animals. Agriculture harms living beings, too, but unless pesticides are specifically applied to the crop, this killing is usually not intentional.

Malcolm wrote:

Organic agriculture uses pesticides, they are simply less toxic to people than industrial pesticides -- but no less toxic to insects. And you just made an argument for the compassion of shravakas -- bhikṣus are prohibited from a) digging in the ground since it harms animals and b) traveling during the rains seasons because of harming small creatures. But they are not prohibited from eating meat as long as it is pure in three ways. Why? Because the criteria of what is permitted and what is not permitted is directly related to personally harming sentient beings.

Huseng said:

Just as driving a car one hopefully does not have the intention of driving into and over living beings like insects.

Malcolm wrote:

The following quote from the Laṅkāvatāra Sūtra merely reinforces Bhavya's point:

“Mahāmati! I see that because of the habits of sentient beings from the beginningless past to eat meat, they crave the flavour of meat and mutually kill and harm one another.

Clearly the intent is encourage lay people not to butcher meat personally.

Huseng said:

However, I'm sure you're well aware of these arguments. Whether you eat meat or not is up to you. I'm not commanding anyone here to give up meat, but providing my own opinion and citations of sūtra which I rely on.

Malcolm wrote:

Bhavya was an Indian master. He was certainly quite aware of the issues here since he address this in his Tarkajvala in detail. He obviously thought the reasoning of the advocates of an absolute prohibition of meat eating were mistaken and unreasonable, and that their arguments did not actually adress the true intent of the Mahāyāna sutras that seem to say meat eating is never acceptable.

Huseng said:

There are sūtra references in the Mahāyāna canon, at least in East Asia, which prohibit the consumption of even eggs and milk.

Malcolm wrote:

These can be safely considered apocryphal since Indians would never dream of not conusming milk products.

Huseng said:

Again, it is up to the individual. Even if you pay no karmic debt for consuming meat, by purchasing it you're supporting the economy of meat production, which requires animals to be slaughtered for profit.

Malcolm wrote:

If you drive a car you are supporting the economy of meat production which depends upon oil from top to bottom. No oil, no huge meat industry. And that is just a fact. In fact if you shop at any market, you are supporting the meat industry, if you buy grain, you are supporting producers of grain which is fed to animals in feedlots. It is impossible to truly tease the economy of food production apart and say "If I buy this, I am not supporting that". Even if you buy organic cotton, pesticides are used in the production of that cotton, pesticides which are less toxic to humans, but no less toxic to bugs. If you decide to buy only clothes made of artificial fibers, you are supporting the oil industry which is supporting the this industry and that industry.

If your criteria (and it is) is to cease using any product that harms any creature anywhere, this is impossible Even if you think there is precedent for this in a few Mahāyāna sutras, the sutras you have chosen are not sutras that are only to be read one way or can only be read one way, as Bhavya shows.

If you want to be a Vegan, fine, no problem -- but there is little or no justification for it from a Buddhist point of view. In fact all the Indian sutras encourage use of dairy, the very same ones that reject the consumption of meat. So therefore, the Vegan diet, even by strict vegetarian standards, is not supported in Buddhist sutras of Indian provenance. This being the case, if you try to justify it (a Vegan diet) on the basis of Buddhist sutras you will wind up trapping yourself in a morass of contradictions -- for example, excusing agriculture and travelling during the rains season when it is forbidden to Buddhist monks, but insisting that no one should eat meat even through it is permitted for shravakas and those who follow secret mantra.

If you want to be a Vegan, you can only "justify" it on purely secular grounds, and even then, not very adequately.

If there is no karmic debt connected with eating meat (that satisfies the criteria that one was not connected with inflicting harm on the animal), as you admit, then one can, as a Buddhist, eat meat and still engage in decisions and actions which limit one's personal participation in industrial agriculture without there being any contradiction at all.

In the end, Veganism is merely a political salve for the consciences of granola-munching, yoga-studio going, petty bourgeois (as well as some Buddhists) in first-world countries that are completely out of touch with the realities of how things are in places like Haiti, Appalachia (where the poorest Americans live) and Golok, for example where every calory counts. In other words, without the abundant waste of first-world nations, a Vegan diet is not even possible. You might argue "The Chinese Buddhists have been doing this for centuries" well, my reply to that is that people in Chinese Buddhist monasteries are not paid to work in rice paddies (they are forbidden to) they are paid to pray and be vinayadharas. They are a supported community and their fortunes and ability to maintain the life style you admire and emulate depends completely on the wealth of the supporting population.

Likewise, the Vegan lifestyle depends on the choices and abundance of the very industrial agricultural system you are criticizing. Without that system, without the ability to get fresh vegetables, etc. year round, the Vegan diet is impossible. The Vegan diet is primarily an urban diet for a wealthy elite (like monks in a monastery) who can afford fresh vegetables, fruit, nuts, and grain 365 days a year (and good medical care when their health crashes from a bad diet). If and when the industrial infrastructure that supports the present system of agricultural production collapses (and it will), there won't be any more Vegan diets.

N

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 17th, 2011 at 9:16 AM

Title: Re: Rocky Zen

Content:

LastLegend said:

If Dozgchen teachings direct at seeing the nature of the mind, then it is Zen just like any other forms of Mahayana..

