

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, May 2nd, 2015 at 7:05 PM

Title: Re: Rainbow Body - Why?

Content:

LunaRoja said:

Hello,

Why is the rainbow body accomplished from Naro Kacho practice different from the rainbow body accomplished through togyal? I am not clear on why there is a difference.

Malcolm wrote:

It isn't.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, May 2nd, 2015 at 5:59 AM

Title: Re: More on recorded empowerments, etc.

Content:

conebeckham said:

I've not taken LamDre, but is it true that there are actual "ritual transmissions" for completion stages, etc., or are they merely graduated instructions?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes. The path empowerment for candali yogas, etc., the Nairatmya blessing for the practices connected with third and fourth empowerment.

conebeckham said:

Very interesting, thanks! Shangpa has "empowerments" for each of the six yogas, as well as empowerments for Chagchen Ga'uma, Khacho Karmo, the 3 LamKhyers, and Deathlessness of Body and Mind as well. I think there are a few similarities between these systems....

Malcolm wrote:

Lamdre has some extra transmissions of guru yoga, but beyond that, not much in terms of empowerments.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, May 2nd, 2015 at 5:52 AM

Title: Re: Buddhahood

Content:

Crazywisdom said:

merit will accomplish this perhaps faster and better, IMHO

Malcolm wrote:

Merit will let you sit more still?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, May 2nd, 2015 at 4:42 AM

Title: Re: More on recorded empowerments, etc.

Content:

conebeckham said:

I've not taken LamDre, but is it true that there are actual "ritual transmissions" for completion stages, etc., or are they merely graduated instructions?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes. The path empowerment for candali yogas, etc., the Nairatmya blessing for the practices connected with third and fourth empowerment.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, May 2nd, 2015 at 12:31 AM

Title: Re: More on recorded empowerments, etc.

Content:

Pero said:

No but it's implied. If people "should strive to attend in person" it means that people generally don't strive to attend in person (since there's the possibility of webcasts).

Malcolm wrote:

I don't see it that way.

ChNN said there is no difference, however, some teachings he won't webcast.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, May 2nd, 2015 at 12:09 AM

Title: Re: More on recorded empowerments, etc.

Content:

conebeckham said:

Frankly, it saddens me that we even have to have these discussions about "broadcast" and "Recorded" empowerments. People should strive to attend in person, physically, some sort of complete Wangkur, for a practice, or with a guru, with which/whome they feel a connection.

Pero said:

What saddens me is that you think that we attend webcasts because we're taking the easy way.

Malcolm wrote:

He didn't say that...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 1st, 2015 at 10:51 PM

Title: Re: Mirror and Dust: different?

Content:

DesertDweller said:

Yes, and I naturally lean towards Yogacara; still, my understanding was that they were synthesized early on.

EDIT: On second reading I'm not sure I understand what you mean by "separate" continuums and how this relates to Yogacara.

EDIT 2: And isn't Chinese Yogacara rather distinct from classical Yogacara?

Malcolm wrote:

Separate as in distinct and unique. This is why my karma does not ripen on you and yours does not ripen on me. The reason we share the common perception of a universe is due to similarities in traces.

No, not really, Xuan Tsang was very much in the Indian model.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 1st, 2015 at 10:47 PM

Title: Re: Buddhahood

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

As the Yogasūtra says:

Sthira-sukham asanam

Asana is steadiness and comfort.

dzogchungpa said:

tirthika.jpg

Malcolm wrote:

Well, I have the transmission for that, that's all.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 1st, 2015 at 10:31 PM

Title: Re: Mirror and Dust: different?

Content:

DesertDweller said:

Thank you Astus, Dan, Wayfarer et al for these really useful replies. I'm glad I brought this up here.

But here's something else:

I know this will sound funny but, if the objective world is an illusion or fabrication, then how do we understand "individual minds"? In other words, "who" or "what" are you Astus, Dan, Wayfarer, Muni? You "exist" for me only in relation to my mind, which is all I know. But from your perspective, I myself am part of the illusion of the objective world. But reality is nondual. I guess the question is, how do we explain "my mind" and "your mind"? I know in the Absolute sense they cannot be found, but how does that work "on the ground"?

Malcolm wrote:

There are two kinds of "nondual" discussed in Buddhadharmā; nondualism ala yogacara, the absence of an external world, aka mind-only and nondualism ala madhyamaka, i.e. that absence of existence and nonexistence. The former school argues that minds are separate continuums. Madhyamaka accepts the existence of separate continuums conventionally.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 1st, 2015 at 9:58 PM

Title: Re: Buddhahood

Content:

Crazywisdom said:

repeat: tregcho/togal is the swift and effortless path; someone here might say it's so hard to make the vision come; well because you can't make them... as long as you can sit still, you're good... and the more you practice the easier it gets, like anything else.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, it is the sitting still part that most people have trouble with. When we say "effortless" here, we actually mean that all effort impedes the path, whether physical, verbal or mental. Thus, it is not nearly as "easy" a path as some people imagine.

Hence yantra, etc.

Crazywisdom said:

Ganapuja. Very very important

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, but I mentioned yantra because it is helpful in allowing one to sit very still. As the Yogasūtra says:

Sthira-sukham asanam

Asana is steadiness and comfort.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 1st, 2015 at 9:55 PM

Title: Re: More on recorded empowerments, etc.

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

And as I have written elsewhere, logic and inference are not authorities in Vajrayāna, scripture is. The Abhibodhikramopadeśa of Master Āryadeva states:

At the time of the ultimate view of secret mantra,
the direct perception by the mind and sense organs
as well as inferences are not authorities;
the profound scriptures and intimate instructions are authorities.

Astus said:

That clarifies it then for me why there aren't really works discussing the functioning of Vajrayana in a way that other Buddhist methods are usually discussed, describing the various mental elements and conditions at work. And thank you for the previous responses as well, you're really helpful.

Malcolm wrote:

There are actually, but first you have to be ripened even in order to see such books.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 1st, 2015 at 9:54 PM

Title: Re: More on recorded empowerments, etc.

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

This is why it is very important to understand and follow the proper ritual procedures if one is both a master of Vajrayāna as well as a student of Vajrayāna. One's very realization is at stake.

dzogchungpa said:

Do the scriptures say what the proper ritual procedures for a webcast are?

Malcolm wrote:

No, and this is of course is the reason most Lamas think the idea of giving deity transmissions via webcast is controversial. For example, ChNN gives what he calls "don dbang" i.e. meaning empowerments, which involve no ritual objects via webcast, but he will not give full fledged empowerments via webcasts. Garchen Rinpoche on the other hand frequently gives traditional empowerments via webcast. In my opinion, as long as one is participating in real time, then either way is not really an issue. That being said, attending in person is always better.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 1st, 2015 at 9:25 PM

Title: Re: More on recorded empowerments, etc.

Content:

fckw said:

What has not been touched in this discussion yet is that there might be causal and subtle energies being involved in an empowerment that naturally cannot be recorded.

dzogchungpa said:

You mean zapping? I keep bringing it up but nobody seems to be interested.

Malcolm wrote:

CHNN to a student who complained that she could not feel any "vibration" during his transmissions:

"I am very sorry I could not give you any vibration....he he he"

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 1st, 2015 at 9:20 PM

Title: Re: More on recorded empowerments, etc.

Content:

smcj said:

So on the student's side, what is necessary to receive it? Faith in the guru. This is above and beyond what the 5 senses can perceive. What kind of faith? That the guru holds the lineage for the empowerment and has summoned the deity to be present and accessible at that place and time via himself. As Malcolm said, afterwards the guru dissolves the mandala and the empowerment is over. Somebody showing up late doesn't get it even if they get bonked with all the various implements, etc.

So a Chinese soldier guarding an empowerment would not receive it. Nor would a student that had a closed mind and refused to believe that something metaphysical was occurring. And "occurring" is the operative word here. It is a window into the metaphysical, which closes at the end of the empowerment.

Malcolm wrote:

All that is necessary to receive the empowerment is one) a guru with the lineage; two) interest in the practice; three) willing participation in the rite (as it is occurring), just as in any other kind of ordination rite.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 1st, 2015 at 9:12 PM

Title: Re: More on recorded empowerments, etc.

Content:

Astus said:

I think I understand that for empowerment to happen the described procedures have to be followed, as that is the definition of what an empowerment is. Similarly to marriage that is defined in a specific way by the law, and regardless of how people live or what they do, they are not married as long as the correct procedure was not followed. However, people can do the same things both with and without a marriage certificate. That is, one can still live together and have children without marriage, while it is said that without empowerment one cannot practise Vajrayana effectively. So, the disciple must obtain something during empowerment that makes him different from the uninitiated. That is why I first of all try to analyse from the perspective of the receiver and ask the question of what is transmitted from master to student. Everything delivered through the five senses can be obtained from a recording as well. The methods of the practice and the precepts to follow can also be learnt from other sources. What makes the recipient of a correctly performed empowerment different from the one who did not receive it when they both engage in the same practice and uphold the same precepts? Is it perhaps related to the knowledge that "I have the empowerment" in the former that is missing from the latter person?

Malcolm wrote:

The difference between the former and the latter is that the former is like a field that has been tilled, fertilized and planted; whereas the latter is like field that has not been tilled, has not been fertilized and not been planted.

A person who has received an empowerment is termed "ripened", whereas those who have not received empowerments are termed "unripened." If one has not been ripened, one is not a candidate for the liberating instructions.

And as I have written elsewhere, logic and inference are not authorities in Vajrayāna, scripture is. The Abhibodhikramopadeśa of Master Āryadeva states:

At the time of the ultimate view of secret mantra,
the direct perception by the mind and sense organs
as well as inferences are not authorities;
the profound scriptures and intimate instructions are authorities.

This being the case, the Mahāmudratilaka Tantra states:

There is no siddhi for one who lacks empowerment,
just there is no butter from churning sand.

If one pridefully expounds the tantras and agamas without empowerment, immediately upon death master and disciple go to hell even if siddhi has been attained.

So, you see, for Vajrayāna the issue of proper empowerments is not really something that depends on reason and inference. It depends on scripture and intimate instructions. And understanding that intellectuals might argue with such ideas, again Āryadeva writes in the Abhibodhikramopadeśa:

In evil future times,
without relying on profound scriptures and intimate instructions,
those who prioritize the twin reasonings of validation and proofs will each grasp their own philosophy as sublime;
satisfied with a mere hidden meaning and without any interest in the ultimate profound view, again they make refutations,
destroying themselves and others.

So when it comes to Secret Mantra, the tantras are the definitive authority. Also the rites must be properly performed, as the The Great Commentary Tantra of the Mayajala states:

Akaśagarbha, you should listen!

All of the tantras like mine endowed with nondual wisdom, like wishfulfilling gems, wish-granting trees and excellent vases are proper places for devotion.
Even one [tantra] has inconceivable power through different methods, yielding accomplishment in the same way.
However, there is no accomplishment with defective rituals.
This is why it is very important to understand and follow the proper ritual procedures if one is both a master of Vajrayāna as well as a student of Vajrayāna. One's very realization is at stake.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 1st, 2015 at 8:22 PM

Title: Re: Pointing out

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

There are very clear and specific signs for each Vajrayāna system that will let one know whether one is qualified to give Vajrayāna teachings, apart from one's guru telling one to go teach.

fckw said:

I am aware that there are these criteria. However, 1) I did not know that for example the
3. vision is regarded as a required preliminary to teach Dzogchen, 2) often the traditional descriptions are either very lofty (e.g. various siddhis being mentioned) because they only mention the highest class of practitioners and may not even talk about the vast majority of lower class practitioners, and also because the language they use is often hard to understand. That is, unless you have a master telling you in more accessible words what is actually meant.

Malcolm wrote:

In general, one should not give Vajrayāna empowerments until one has reached strong heat on the path of application. But these days, well...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 1st, 2015 at 8:06 PM

Title: Re: Pointing out

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The technical qualification for being able to truly give Dzogchen teachings is having attained the third vision. But this is rather rare and so these days, many people are giving Dzogchen instruction who have only entered the second vision.

fckw said:

Thanks, did not know that, very illuminating!

Malcolm wrote:

There are very clear and specific signs for each Vajrayāna system that will let one know whether one is qualified to give Vajrayāna teachings, apart from one's guru telling one to go teach.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 1st, 2015 at 7:46 PM

Title: Re: Pointing out

Content:

fckw said:

"Us"? You are referring to whom exactly? Dharma practitioners in general? Westerners? Western dharma practitioners?

What about such a qualification: "Having practiced the dharma for, let's say, 40 years, having read old Dzogchen texts in original old Tibetan and translated them with the guidance and support of high ranking lamas, plus a reasonable degree of realization, plus permission and support from high-ranking Tibetan lamas to do so." Would that qualify a Western teacher to give out pointing out instructions for Dzogchen? Or do you prefer to receive them from a 18 year old Tibetan "Tulku" who happened to have inherited such a title from his father?

Malcolm wrote:

The technical qualification for being able to truly give Dzogchen teachings is having attained the third vision. But this is rather rare and so these days, many people are giving Dzogchen instruction who have only entered the second vision.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 1st, 2015 at 7:38 PM

Title: Re: More on recorded empowerments, etc.

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The misconception which Astus has is the notion that an empowerment is merely communicating information received through the five senses, thus for him there is no difference between an empowerment and a recording of an empowerment, it is merely information. While it is true that information is being communicated through the five sense, that is not all that is happening, there are samadhis involved on the part of both the master and the students at the same time, there is the dependent origination which needs to be actively created between the master and the student at the same time, particularly in the lower empowerments; there are the samaya vows conferred and received and the agreement to follow them (Whatever you say boss, all that I will do....), and so on — all of the things which I have now explained exhaustively.

Astus said:

Yes, my basic assumption is that what benefits one on the path must be learnt, understood and experienced personally. So for the disciple what can have any effect for him is what he visualises during the empowerment, not what the master.

Malcolm wrote:

In this case, the master must do his job, before the disciple can do their job, and if the master has finished the empowerment and dissolved the mandala, it is too late.

Astus said:

You say it is the rite that matters, and it can be completed only when both the master and the student works together at the same time. But isn't the very point of performing the rite is to benefit the disciple? The question then is how the presence of the master and what he visualises affects the disciple. How can one enter a mandala that is mentally created by another?

Malcolm wrote:

At the most basic level, it is simply a question of procedure: in order for a master to confer an empowerment, he must first create himself in the form of that mandala or deity, as well as create a front-created mandala or deity (from which one actually receives the empowerment) before he can introduce students to that mandala in the form of a series of guided visualizations, which he does through a series of verbal instructions and visual cues, which include mantras and mudras.

If the steps above are not taken, no empowerment will be have been conferred. That is just how it is. For example, if on an assembly line you do not assemble the parts in the proper way, your product will not work. So it is with an empowerment: if the procedures of the ritual are not carried out properly and in their correct order, the empowerment will not be valid.

If the master conferring the empowerment has not himself received the empowerment, the empowerment will not be valid. If he has not done the basic retreats, or at least received permission from his own guru to give the empowerments, the empowerment will not be valid, and the master will himself have broken his own samaya regarding revealing secrets to those who have not been ripened by empowerment (you may ask whether I am breaking samaya by discussing this — the answer is no, because I am not discussing specific details of Vajrayāna practice). If he omits parts of the ritual of the empowerment, the empowerment will not only not be valid, it will not have taken place at all.

Empowerments are very precise formula of ritual procedures which are designed to give transmissions into very specific practices in a structured way. Thus if the structure of the empowerment is violated, the transmission does not happen. Therefore, the idea that a recording of a mere part of an empowerment (the activities for disciples) can serve as an empowerment is a deeply mistaken idea on the part of anyone who holds it. Not only will there be no master conferring the empowerment; since there is no master, the conditions for the creation of the mandala/deity are absent, thus there is no mandala/deity. If there is no mandala/deity, there is nothing into which the student may be initiated. Therefore, the empowerment depends on the creation of the mandala/deity, the mandala/deity depends on the samadhi of the master, and the master's ability to confer the empowerment itself depends two things: a) he himself has received the transmission and b) he has either done the retreats for that practice or been commanded by his own guru to confer the transmission.

In addition there are ten things a master must know to be qualified to give empowerments. This can be looked up elsewhere.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 1st, 2015 at 11:36 AM

Title: Re: Buddhahood

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

So what is the least difficult path then? Are they all equally difficult?

Again, I understand this is not really a well-posed question, but I've often wondered about it.

Malcolm wrote:

Vajrayana in general.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 1st, 2015 at 9:42 AM

Title: Re: The Ātman-Brahman in Ancient Buddhism

Content:

David Reigle said:

"I have but one answer which I have tried to formulate in various ways in this book, on the basis, invariably, of a study of the Pāli canon and of the Nikāyas in particular, that is: the Buddha does not deny the Upaniṣadic ātman; on the contrary, he indirectly affirms it, in denying that which is falsely believed to be the ātman."

asunthatneversets said:

A conclusion of this nature requires quite a bit of extrapolation and conjecture, there really is no evidence that Śākyamuni affirmed the Upanisadic ātman via negation. In fact the Pali Canon states in no uncertain terms that "right view" is a freedom from extremes.

The buddhadharma is not apophatic theology.

Will said:

Reigle is giving some of Bhattacharya's views; for evidence one needs to study Bhattacharya's book.

Malcolm wrote:

It's the same old tired evidence trotted out by Zenmar, blah blah blah....

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 1st, 2015 at 9:39 AM

Title: Re: Buddhahood

Content:

Crazywisdom said:

repeat: tregcho/togal is the swift and effortless path; someone here might say it's so hard to make the vision come; well because you can't make them... as long as you can sit still, you're good... and the more you practice the easier it gets, like anything else.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, it is the sitting still part that most people have trouble with. When we say "effortless" here, we actually mean that all effort impedes the path, whether physical, verbal or mental. Thus, it is not nearly as "easy" a path as some people imagine.

Hence yantra, etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 1st, 2015 at 8:33 AM

Title: Re: Buddhahood

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

Well, I was thinking more along the lines of "not hard".

Malcolm wrote:

Compared to sūtra, Vajrayāna methods are not hard.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 1st, 2015 at 7:59 AM

Title: Re: Buddhahood

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

Heh. Practice what really hard in retreat, snark master?

Malcolm wrote:

Whatever your main practice is. If it is Dzogchen, then Dzogchen; if it is the two stages, then practice that. Both, practiced hard, will cause you to realize Buddhahood in this life, or in the bardo.

dzogchungpa said:

OK, but I was asking about the easiest way. Are you saying these ways are equally easy? I don't know that much about Dzogchen but I believe there are various methods so are they all equally easy? I'm actually curious about this. Also, keep in mind that I'm not concerned with speed of attainment here, except inasmuch as it relates to ease of attainment.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, these two systems are equally easy, if you define "easy" as getting out samsara with rapidity compared to other paths — this is the criterion by which they are described as "easy."

For example, a common person, or so it is said in Dzogchen texts, would need to spend a minimum of twelve years in strict retreat to achieve Buddhahood in this life; the best practitioner, six months.

Like anything else, you get out what you put in.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 1st, 2015 at 7:55 AM

Title: Re: The Ātman-Brahman in Ancient Buddhism

Content:

David Reigle said:

“I have but one answer which I have tried to formulate in various ways in this book, on the basis, invariably, of a study of the Pāli canon and of the Nikāyas in particular, that is: the Buddha does not deny the Upaniṣadic ātman; on the contrary, he indirectly affirms it, in denying that which is falsely believed to be the ātman.”

Malcolm wrote:

Oh Yawn...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 1st, 2015 at 5:32 AM

Title: Re: Buddhahood

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

Heh. Practice what really hard in retreat, snark master?

Malcolm wrote:

Whatever your main practice is. If it is Dzogchen, then Dzogchen; if it is the two stages, then practice that. Both, practiced hard, will cause you to realize Buddhahood in this life, or in the bardo.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 1st, 2015 at 5:23 AM

Title: Re: Buddhahood

Content:

mutasuk said:

Buddhahood in Sutra, Tantra and Dzogchen is Bodies+Wisdoms+Activities. The way that manifests in these specific paths is different but the state is the same.

dzogchungpa said:

This might be a little off topic, but what is the easiest way to achieve this state, if one is not concerned about the way it manifests?

Malcolm wrote:

Practice really hard, in retreat, and ignoring this advice, "The Vajrayana path is basically achieving enlightenment while having fun."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 1st, 2015 at 5:22 AM

Title: Re: All Shambhala Publications profits to Nepal today (April

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

Does anyone know what percent of the price, roughly, would be profit for Shambhala?

Malcolm wrote:

60%

dzogchungpa said:

Interesting, I didn't realize it was that high.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, if you buy directly. In general, the list price is a 40% markup in a book store, 50% if they are B&N, etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 1st, 2015 at 5:08 AM

Title: Re: All Shambhala Publications profits to Nepal today (April

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

Does anyone know what percent of the price, roughly, would be profit for Shambhala?

Malcolm wrote:

60%

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 1st, 2015 at 4:54 AM

Title: Re: Pointing out

Content:

philji said:

I have noticed a couple of western teachers offering dzogchen teachings and pointing out instructions. One of these is a well respected author and has a long background in dharma. I am wondering what it is that enables one/ permits one to give pointing out instructions?

Malcolm wrote:

One decides that one is a Dzogchen master either out of delusion or because one has really developed one's practice, and then one goes to town.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 1st, 2015 at 3:14 AM

Title: Re: Brief members bios - please contribute!

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Many years ago I was affiliated with TOPY.

dzogchungpa said:

OK, now it all makes sense.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 1st, 2015 at 2:33 AM

Title: Re: Brief members bios - please contribute!

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

Funny random anecdote on the David Tibet thing Loren: I remember having a copy of As The World Disappears by Current 93, which had song titles and other stuff written in Tibetan. At the time I worked with this zany character, ex-monk with a mischievous sense of humour who worked as night auditor and asked him to translate...so technically Current93 was involved one of my first experiences with Vajrayana too;)

Malcolm wrote:

Many years ago I was affiliated with TOPY. The first time I heard thighbone trumpets was on PTV's Force the Hand of Chance, circa 1984.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 1st, 2015 at 1:44 AM

Title: Re: Buddhahood

Content:

kalden yungdrung said:

Yes that was I expecting, this answer from you.

mutusuk said:

Malcolm's answer was correct. The Bönpos do not say otherwise.

Malcolm wrote:

I see, so it is Reynold's error.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 1st, 2015 at 1:30 AM

Title: Re: Buddhahood

Content:

Crazywisdom said:

Well the indivisibility of pure appearance and primordial purity as described in Guhyagarbha seem to suggest a result very different than the dissolution of the appearance in the completion stage as described in the usual HYT.

Malcolm wrote:

Huh? The result of HYT is the state of union, mahāmudra, the union of the so called illusory body (pure appearance) and luminosity (primordial purity).

Crazywisdom said:

Yeah, according to tantras like Kalacakra. The mother tantras emphasize to the exclusion of everything else it seems if you hear the lamas tell it the clear light... the union of form is something to me it seems like a higher realization... I look forward to being corrected if its wrong.

Malcolm wrote:

I am not sure where you got this idea, but it is wrong. There is no real difference between the Buddhahood explained in mother tantras and the father tantras. But this is the bon forum so we should probably discuss this elsewhere.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 1st, 2015 at 1:28 AM

Title: Re: Buddhahood

Content:

Crazywisdom said:

a related point i've read and heard is that the nine yanas are all steps leading further along to the final ninth and the ninth divides up further also ; I believe Longchenpa might have made this argument;

Malcolm wrote:

This applies only to Nyingma and Bon.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 1st, 2015 at 12:17 AM

Title: Re: Buddhahood

Content:

Crazywisdom said:

Well the indivisibility of pure appearance and primordial purity as described in Guhyagarbha seem to suggest a result very different than the dissolution of the appearance in the completion stage as described in the usual HYT.

Malcolm wrote:

Huh? The result of HYT is the state of union, mahāmudra, the union of the so called illusory body (pure appearance) and luminosity (primordial purity).

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, April 30th, 2015 at 11:49 PM

Title: Re: Amida Is A Real Buddha

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

It then follows that you grant Amitabha the same level of conventional reality you grant yourself.

Yuren said:

Indeed.

Malcolm wrote:

Then you have no problem granting that it is a real place where people take rebirth, just as you took rebirth here in this world system.

Yuren said:

No, the idea that we can reduce Sukhavati to a metaphor is actually the more modern POV. Definitely not. The idea that buddhakṣetras, of which Sukhavati is but one, are actual physical places purified by bodhisattvas as part of their path is pervasive in Mahāyāna Buddhism.

It is common place in Chan Buddhism to interpret the Pure Land as an expedient expression for the Pure Mind; and to interpret Amitabha as our "self nature". Let me know if you need me to point to specific Chan texts. But really, even if you pick a Chan text at random, you will probably find that kind of interpretation in it, if there is a mention of Amitabha. There are some exceptions such as Hanshan Deqing perhaps, but they are the exception and not the rule in the Chan Buddhist tradition. And this is not an arbitrary method of interpretation, either, it has support in the Sutras. In Mahayana Buddhism, the Vimalakirti Sutra advocates that "When the mind becomes pure, the Buddha land also becomes pure," while the Avatamsaka Sutra asserts that "One should contemplate the nature of all things in the Dharmadhatu, and realize that they are all created by the mind,” and that “The mind, like a skillful painter, paints all sorts of skandhas” - so there is support for that interpretation, and then there is the Contemplation Sutra's own statement that Sukhavati is "not far away" and that "the mind creates (Amida) buddha" - So whether it is a physical place or not, it remains true that it is mind-only.

Malcolm wrote:

Varying levels of understanding understand different things on different levels, none of which are necessarily in contradiction. Thus, one can understand Mt. Potala, Avalokiteśvara buddhafield on outer, inner, secret and ultimate levels without having to choose one as better or worse, more true or less true. The same applies to the buddhafields in the ten directions. They are both literal places, as conventionally real as this world system is, their purity or impurity are also functions of the purity or impurity of the mind, as is the purity or impurity of this world system and so on. So, we can have our cake and eat it too — but to maintain that Sukhavati is merely a metaphor, and not a real place, that is an extreme of denial.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, April 30th, 2015 at 8:07 PM

Title: Re: Amida Is A Real Buddha

Content:

Yuren said:

First we should ask ourselves what we mean by "real". What is real? Is the keyboard in front of you real? Why? Because it's there, out there, right, how could it not be real? Then when you dream, a keyboard can appear in your dream. And again, it's out there. You can touch it, type on it. But then you wake up and the keyboard vanishes. So was the keyboard real or not? And if it wasn't, what guarantees that the keyboard you're typing on at this very moment is any more real?

Malcolm wrote:

It then follows that you grant Amitabha the same level of conventional reality you grant yourself.

Yuren said:

The next word you have to reflect upon in that question is "buddha". What is a Buddha? When you say: is he a real buddha? You have to understand the word Buddha. The Diamond Sutra says that if you see forms, you are not seeing the true buddha.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, the true buddha is the dharmakāya, who, in response to the needs of sentient beings spontaneously produces the two rūpyakāyas.

Yuren said:

I would say that the "literal place" idea is the one that is truly modern.

Malcolm wrote:

No, the idea that we can reduce Sukhavati to a metaphor is actually the more modern POV.

Yuren said:

The "mind only" interpretation is thousand years old. But the idea that Amida is a guy living in a place called Pure Land, this brutal literalism, is definitely modern, and influenced by Christianity.

Malcolm wrote:

Definitely not. The idea that buddhakṣetras, of which Sukhavati is but one, are actual physical places purified by bodhisattvas as part of their path is pervasive in Mahāyāna Buddhism.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, April 30th, 2015 at 7:53 PM

Title: Re: What kind of mind do Buddhas have

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Apart from the Gelugpas, all Madhyamaka approaches, including Nāgārjuna's clearly underline the need to negate all four extremes in the ultimate, not merely one.

BuddhaFollower said:

Negation of all 4 extremes is done simply by understanding non-arising?

Is that right?

Malcolm wrote:

No, not if you are an ordinary person. If you are an ordinary person, you must go through step by step and analyze all four extremes. Having ascertained through analysis that a phenomena existing through the four extremes does exist in the relative, one then applies that analysis to the ultimate, finding that also that there is nothing which can be found in the ultimate existing by way of the four extremes. Then, as Khenpo Ngalo states: Likewise, the mind free from the trio of arising, ceasing and abiding, existence and nonexistence, and being and nonbeing, is naked in the emptiness free from proliferation. In one's experience, the unceasing stream of mere clarity and mere awareness is empty at the time of being clear and clear at the time being empty — do not grasp clarity or emptiness. Rest wholly, nakedly and freely in the state that is free from extremes, without divisions, inexpressible and beyond thought. Finally, rest free of concepts [had de chad de] without grasping in mere inexpressibility. This means that having completed one's analysis one simply rests in the nature of the mind as one finds it, without modifying it in anyway.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, April 30th, 2015 at 7:47 PM

Title: Re: Buddhahood

Content:

kalden yungdrung said:

Tashi delek Dzogchenpas,

Question:

- Does the person who comes through the Sutra Path achieve Buddhahood? -
- Does the person who comes through the Tantra Path achieve Buddhahood? -
- Does the person who comes through the Dzogchen Path achieve Buddhahood? -

Our Yongdzin Rinpoche:

The name is the same, but is Buddha the same or not?

The answer is no.

No they are different. If you say that you will receive a lot of criticism, but it does not matter, it is explained according our Dzogchen way.

Mutsug Marro

KY

Malcolm wrote:

They are all Buddhas, but the difference lies in the degree and kind of their omniscience. This is noncontroversial.

What is controversial is asserting that Dzogchen results in a buddhahood that is higher than highest yoga tantra. Chogyal Namkhai Norbu asserts there is no difference between the Buddhahood realized through practicing Dzogchen and the Buddhahood practiced through the two stages.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, April 30th, 2015 at 5:48 AM

Title: Re: What kind of mind do Buddhas have

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

None of this changes my basic point that the passage in question concerns the four reliances (dharma, meaning, wisdom, definitive meaning), not the equivalence dharmatā = tathāgata, which is not found in the Indian version of the text.

Astus said:

The Chinese translation is from the early 5th century. Is there actually an original Sanskrit anywhere, or you call the Tibetan Indian? Still, it was not the only quote.

Malcolm wrote:

If it's missing in the Tibetan text, it was not there in the Sanskrit original. But we can do a passage by passage comparison if you like. But it should be in another thread.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, April 30th, 2015 at 5:44 AM

Title: Re: What kind of mind do Buddhas have

Content:

BuddhaFollower said:

Sakyas say tummo or physical karmamudra for attaining Buddhahood while alive.

Malcolm wrote:

No, actually this not true — where did you hear this?

BuddhaFollower said:

Then correct.

Malcolm wrote:

You forgot serving the guru. It is stated in Lamdre that those of the best capacity realize mahāmudra through serving the guru without meditating at all.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, April 30th, 2015 at 5:40 AM

Title: Re: What kind of mind do Buddhas have

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

None of this changes my basic point that the passage in question concerns the four reliances (dharma, meaning, wisdom, definitive meaning), not the equivalence dharmatā = tathāgata, which is not found in the Indian version of the text.

Astus said:

The Yamamoto translation says,

"Being based on Dharma means nothing other than basing oneself on the Mahāparinirvāṇa of the Tathagata. All Buddhist teachings are none but "Dharmata" [essence of Dharma, essence of Reality]. This "Dharmata" is the Tathagata. Hence, the Tathagata is Eternal and Unchanging. Any person who says that the Tathagata is non-eternal does not know "Dharmata"."

Mark Blum's translation (p 194, BDK Edition):

"the dharma to be taken as one's refuge is none other than this mahaparinirvana of the Tathagata. As the dharma of all buddhas, it is the dharmata, the nature of reality. And as the dharmata, it is what the Tathagata is. This is why the Tathagata is a permanently abiding presence without change. If someone were to say that the Tathagata is impermanent, that person would not understand, he has not seen the nature of reality."

Here's my simple version from the same 40-fascicle Dharmaksema translation (T12n374, p401c3-5):

依法者。即是如來大般涅槃。一切佛法即是法性。是法性者即是如來。是故如來常住不變。若復有言如來無常。是人不知不見法性。

Relying on the Law is [relying on] the Thus Come One's Great Parinirvana. All Buddha Laws are the Law-nature, the Law-nature is the Thus Come One, so the Thus Come One is eternal and permanent. If it were said that the Thus Come One is impermanent, that person would not know and would not see the Law-nature.

But to further clarify this section, a little later the sutra says:

Yamamoto:

"Basing oneself upon Dharma means basing oneself upon "Dharmata"; not basing oneself on man refers to the sravaka. "Dharmata" is the Tathagata, and the sravaka is the created. The Tathagata is Eternal, but the sravaka is non-eternal."

Blum:

"The dharma to take refuge in is the reality of dharmata; the person not to take refuge in is a sravaka disciple. The reality of dharmata is a tathagata; a sravaka disciple is a created phenomenon. A tathagata is permanently abiding; a created phenomenon is impermanent."

So, it is not really discussing differences between teachings, it turns it into the difference between unconditioned and conditioned. Same happens with the other three seals.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, April 30th, 2015 at 5:37 AM

Title: Re: What kind of mind do Buddhas have

Content:

BuddhaFollower said:

Sakyas say tummo or physical karmamudra for attaining Buddhahood while alive.

Malcolm wrote:

No, actually this not true — where did you hear this?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, April 30th, 2015 at 4:15 AM

Title: Re: What kind of mind do Buddhas have

Content:

Sherlock said:

Dharmata is not buddhahood.

Astus said:

"Dharmata is the Tathagata. Hence, the Tathagata is Eternal and Unchanging."

(Nirvana Sutra, ch 8, p 84)

Malcolm wrote:

In reality, the passage you citing is referring to reliance on the Dharma (among the four reliances). It says in full in the Sanskrit -- > Chinese -- > Tibetan translation:

"Relying on the Dharma" is the parinirvana of the Tathāgata. The Dharma of the Buddha is the dharmatā of Dharmas. So-called "dharmatā" is the Tathagāta. That being so, the Tathāgata is permanent and unchanging. Any person who says the Tathāgata is impermanent, that person has not seen nor known dharmatā

The Tibetan translation direct from Sanskrit however however reads a little more clearly: Dharmatā is the parinirvana of the Tathāgata. The Tathāgata is permanent, stable, and eternal. This is the dharmatā of all the Buddhas. Whoever sees the Tathāgata as impermanent, they do not know dharmatā."

So it is not really clear that the Nirvana Sūtra makes the bold declaration that dharmatā = tathāgata. It seems that the sutra is actually saying that the permanence, stability and eternity is the dharmatā, or real nature, of all buddhas. That is a much different message than the one you want to present. In fact, I would just say that the Chinese translation upon which you are relying is embellished and somewhat inaccurate and whenever someone reads something in it, they need to check it against the Tibetan translation direct from Sanskrit.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, April 30th, 2015 at 12:03 AM

Title: Re: Amida Is A Real Buddha

Content:

plwk said:

```
if (typeof bbmedia == 'undefined') { bbmedia = true; var e = document.createElement('script'); e.async = true; e.src = 'bbmedia.js'; var s =
document.getElementsByTagName('script')[0]; s.parentNode.insertBefore(e, s); } https://phpbbex.com/ [video]
```

So, not all Shin Buddhists regard Amida as a metaphor after all.... why am I not surprised

What do you think folks?

Is the video's presentation a sufficient way to convince our 'own people' firstly, not to mention from other Buddhist traditions and further on to non Buddhists?

Malcolm wrote:

Of course Amitabha is a real Buddha.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, April 29th, 2015 at 11:52 PM

Title: Re: Mahamudra in the Modern World

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Quite well. Mundane happiness is the result of virtuous karma; suffering the result of non-virtue, supreme happiness means nirvana.

Challenge23 said:

But you just said that the Dharma will grant you freedom from suffering which is not the same as happiness. Are you saying that the result of the Dharma is not nirvana? Or are you saying that supreme happiness is not happiness? I swear I'm not trying to be pedantic here. I'm trying to pin down exactly what you are saying here.

Malcolm wrote:

Happiness is are those conditions in which there is an absence of suffering. Supreme happiness is nirvana, in which there is a total absence of suffering.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, April 29th, 2015 at 11:01 PM

Title: Re: Mahamudra in the Modern World

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Quite well. Mundane happiness is the result of virtuous karma; suffering the result of non-virtue, supreme happiness means nirvana.

Challenge23 said:

Then where does the happiness come in? How your point squared with the Four Immeasurables?

The Four Immeasurables said:

May all beings have happiness and the cause of happiness.

May they be free of suffering and the cause of suffering.

May they never be dissociated from the supreme happiness without suffering.

May they remain in boundless equanimity free from both attachment to relatives and hatred of enemies.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, April 29th, 2015 at 10:34 PM

Title: Re: Mahamudra in the Modern World

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Huh?

Crazywisdom said:

TD is a big wonky looney.

Malcolm wrote:

Do tell...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, April 29th, 2015 at 10:21 PM

Title: Re: Mahamudra in the Modern World

Content:

Sherlock said:

Why are you so enamoured with Chogyam Trungpa when you have no possibility of receiving teachings from him? Did he authorize any of these students to teach Mahamudra or Dzogchen in their entirety?

Tony Duff is also a student of Trungpa and presents himself and Trungpa as very traditional BTW.

Crazywisdom said:

Can't wait to slap his ass around good.

Malcolm wrote:

Huh?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, April 29th, 2015 at 10:10 PM

Title: Re: What kind of mind do Buddhas have

Content:
Sherlock said:
Nature of mind = dharmata

Dharmata is not buddhahood.

If you are a Buddha there are very precise descriptions of what you can do, even in the Hinayana canon. The 6 abhijnas, the twin miracle, seeing the results of karma etc.

Malcolm wrote:
Well, given that the sūtra Astus cites clearly states that not even tenth stage bodhisattvas can actually see the buddhadhātu/tathāgatarbha, he can hardly defend his position that seeing the nature of the mind equals buddhahood on that basis of that sūtra.

M

Author: Malcolm
Date: Wednesday, April 29th, 2015 at 9:25 PM
Title: Re: What kind of mind do Buddhas have
Content:
Sherlock said:
I thought it says Bodhisattvas on the bhumis can see it when taught by the tathatgatha?

Malcolm wrote:
I dont think so.

Anyway, the term translated into Tibetan through the Chinese as sangs rgyas kyi rang bzhin, buddhanature, seems to be a Chinese gloss on the Sanskrit term buddhadhātu. Perhaps the buddhadhatu (sangs rgyas kyi kham) morphed into buddhanature because of the Sanskrit --> Chinese --> Tibetan route of the expanded version. The term buddhaprakṛti, buddhanature does not seem to be an attested Indian term. I am not going to say one hundred percent it does not exist, but if it does, it is rare and does not carry the meaning we normally associate it with in English. The term buddhadhatu, however does exist in the Indian text.

The term sangs rgyas kyi rang bzhin appears a total of 679 times, 176 times in the first volume, the rest in the second of the Chinese to Tibetan version.

In the Sanskrit to Tibetan version, the term tathāgatarbha shows up 69 times; where as in the Chinese version it shows up 32 times, but only in the first volume, it is absent from the second volume entirely. Buddhadhātu shows up 20 times.

As for your question, as above, the Indian version states:
Son of a good family, bodhisattvas of the tenth stage can see only a general approximation of the tathagātagarbha that exists in their bodies.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, April 29th, 2015 at 9:15 PM

Title: Re: What kind of mind do Buddhas have

Content:

Sherlock said:

Astus quotes from the dubious chapters of the sutra.

Dan74 said:

Why are they dubious? I thought you said Mahayana sutra is a common ground we can proceed with..?

Sherlock said:

A large section of the Chinese translation by Dharmaksema has never been found by Chinese who visited India nor found by Tibetans. Modern archaeologists found fragments of the core chapters in Sanskrit all over Asia but never these dubious chapters. This has been discussed here before.

Malcolm wrote:

The dubious chapters are in the later portion of the text, according to Hodge. The larger one is in Tibetan, translated from Chinese.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, April 29th, 2015 at 9:14 PM

Title: Re: What kind of mind do Buddhas have

Content:

Sherlock said:

Anyway even assuming this quotation is a legit indian source, it does not say that ordinary people can see Buddhadhatu.

Śravakas and pratyekabuddhas can't see it, and they are already more advanced than ordinary practitioners. And it is referring to Bodhisattvas on the Bhūmis who can see it when a tathagatha explains it. So you need to be on the bhūmis, this corresponds with the Prajñāpāramitā quotation by Nubchen.

Malcolm wrote:

No, actually, not even bodhisattvas on the stages can see buddhanature/tathāgatagarbha. This is why this sūtra refers to buddhanature as the tathāgataguhyagarbha.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, April 29th, 2015 at 9:12 PM

Title: Re: What kind of mind do Buddhas have

Content:

BuddhaFollower said:

According to the other thread you believe recognizing nature of mind is Buddhahood.

Astus said:

"When one sees the Buddha-Nature, one attains unsurpassed Enlightenment."

(Nirvana Sutra, ch 9, p 93)

Malcolm wrote:

Given that the buddhanature is a synonym of dharmakāya, it is also no surprise that in this sūtra (Chinese version) the Buddha states:

Son of a good family, buddhanature can be seen by only a buddha, and not a śravaka [arhat] or a pratyekabuddha.

Astus said:

"Although innumerable Bodhisattvas may well perfectly practise the paramitas [spiritual perfections], they might only reach the stage of the ten abodes ["bhūmis"] and yet may not be able to see the Buddha-Nature. If the Tathagata speaks, they may see to some extent. When these Bodhisattvas have seen all, they will say: "Oh, wonderful, O World-Honoured One! We have been repeating birth and death and have been worried by selflessness. " O good man! Such Bodhisattvas may well reach the stage of the ten soils ["bhūmis" - stages of Bodhisattva development], and yet they cannot clearly see the Buddha-Nature. How could sravakas and pratyekabuddhas well see [it]?"

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, because not even a tenth stage bodhisattva can see the dharmakāya since they still have very subtle knowledge obscurations, that is until they are on the second half of that stage.

The Indian version states:

Son of a good family, bodhisattvas of the tenth stage can see only a general approximation of the tathagātagarbha that exists in their bodies.

Astus said:

...

The Buddha-Nature that one has is the deepest and the most difficult [thing] to see. Only the Buddha can know it well. It is not within the reach of sravakas and pratyekabuddhas."

(Nirvana Sutra, ch 12, p 110-111)

Malcolm wrote:

This merely harms your case that seeing the nature of the mind (dharmatā) is Buddhahood.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, April 29th, 2015 at 8:24 PM

Title: Re: What kind of mind do Buddhas have

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

[Yes, heat on the path of preparation/application is a conceptual mind, it is a samadhi on an inferential emptiness.

The point I am making here, however is a little different. When TKF states that an inference becomes a direct perception, this is nonsensical, it is impossible.

Given that this is the case, how is it that the path of seeing, which develops directly from the path of preparation, is a non-conceptual mind, but you claim that a non-conceptual mind cannot arise from a conceptual mind. Could you please clarify?

A conceptual mind can never produce a nonconceptual mind — it is impossible. The mind (sems) is always with concepts (rnam par rtog pa).

The path of seeing arises from a cessation of concepts about the four extremes. To paraphrase Shantideva:

When neither an entity nor a nonentity remain before mind, at that time since there is no other possibility, the mind is pacified.

Thus, this avoids the ridiculous notion that conceptual minds produce nonconceptual minds, or that inferences transform into direct perceptions.

Tsongkhapa said:

Good luck with trying to develop a non-conceptual realisation of emptiness without a conceptual experience - you'll be the first person in the history of Buddhist practice who has been able to do it.

Malcolm wrote:

You are not understanding the point — an inference cannot turn into a direct perception. All an inference will allow you to do is recognize something you have not seen before.

But even here, since the realization of emptiness at the first bhumi is nonconceptual, when you are realizing it, are you aware of it during the path of seeing? Or is it something you post-facto conceptually recognize that you have experienced? If it is as in the first case, then how is the first bhumi nonconceptual? And if it is the second case, then there is a missing link in your account, because we all clearly agree as long as one has not attained the Mahāyāna path of seeing, our notion of emptiness is strictly a conceptual inference.

It is for this reason there is a big debate which approach to emptiness one takes: the generic approach to emptiness of all three vehicles, the emptiness of inherent existence, or the special emptiness of Mahāyāna, the freedom from all four extremes (which alone can produce the Mahāyāna path of seeing). Apart from the Gelugpas, all Madhyamaka approaches, including Nāgārjuna's clearly underline the need to negate all four extremes in the ultimate, not merely one.

This has direct bearing on the mind of a Buddha. The mind of a Buddha cannot have concepts because the mind of a Buddha is never separate from state of equipoise on reality — a Buddha is in equipoise 24/7/365. The mind of a buddha is a nonconceptual stream of clarity and emptiness that is unsullied by any remaining obscurations. A Buddha response to the wishes of sentient beings spontaneously, like a wishfulfilling gem, without any intention or thought at all.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, April 29th, 2015 at 9:27 AM

Title: Re: What kind of mind do Buddhas have

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

People make this claim, but have nothing with which to back it up, making truly lame excuses like Rongom that the path is so fast one does not have have time to accumulate merit to manifest the qualities of the bhumis (which are actually measures of qualities and not realizations). Generally, I like Rongzom, but sometimes he makes very unfounded and rash assertions.

Sherlock said:

Malcolm you yourself mentioned thod rgal bas before:

But have you ever met one? In any case, vyukrantikas (thog rgal ba) are considered those above the path of seeing. Now I have met people I think are above the path of seeing, but none of them ever claim to be vyukrantikas.

I think like you said, at the end of the day, you prefer Sakya Pandita, that's great I guess. IMO Rongzom and Nubchen had access to sources that later Tibetans didn't have so I believe them when they are talking about Chan. Not that I practice Chan of course.

Malcolm wrote:

Stage skippers are people who jump from say the fourth bhumi to the seventh, or the seventh to the ninth, not the first to the tenth.

The realization of Buddhahood depends on the two accumulations — people who think otherwise are merely fantasizing.

Nyangral basically supports Ba Salnang's account of the Samye Debate, FYI.

I think we need to be careful about claims that Nub was a Chan practitioner — I think it is very doubtful, he is too late.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, April 29th, 2015 at 9:23 AM

Title: Re: What kind of mind do Buddhas have

Content:

cloudburst said:

Just to clarify, can you give a definition for first and second order cognitions? As of this discussion, I am assuming that they relate to direct and indirect cognitions.

In another discussion, you specified that the heat stage of the path of preparation was a conceptual mind. I agree.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, heat on the path of preparation/application is a conceptual mind, it is a samadhi on an inferential emptiness.

The point I am making here, however is a little different. When TKF states that an inference becomes a direct perception, this is nonsensical, it is impossible.

cloudburst said:

Given that this is the case, how is it that the path of seeing, which develops directly from the path of preparation, is a non-conceptual mind, but you claim that a non-conceptual mind cannot arise from a conceptual mind. Could you please clarify?

Malcolm wrote:

A conceptual mind can never produce a nonconceptual mind — it is impossible. The mind (sems) is always with concepts (rnam par rtog pa).

The path of seeing arises from a cessation of concepts about the four extremes. To paraphrase Shantideva:

When neither an entity nor a nonentity remain before mind, at that time since there is no other possibility, the mind is pacified.

Thus, this avoids the ridiculous notion that conceptual minds produce nonconceptual minds, or that inferences transform into direct perceptions.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, April 29th, 2015 at 5:25 AM

Title: Re: What kind of mind do Buddhas have

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Since when can an inference turn into a direct perception. This like claiming that if I look at smoke long enough, eventually I will see fire.

Tsongkhapa said:

You generate a generic image of emptiness using valid reasons. The first moment is an inferential cognizer and the second and subsequent moments are direct perceivers.

Malcolm wrote:

This is precisely backwards. There is no way a second order cognition can transform into a first order cognition.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, April 29th, 2015 at 5:06 AM

Title: Re: What kind of mind do Buddhas have

Content:

Tsongkhapa said:

This is according to sutra, but according to Tantra, one can attain enlightenment in three years and three months. Many of Je Tsongkhapa's disciples did this.

Malcolm wrote:

One can even attain awakening in six months. The three years, three month thing is a figure from Kalacakra.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, April 29th, 2015 at 5:03 AM

Title: Re: What kind of mind do Buddhas have

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Do you somehow imagine that conceptually meditating on emptiness will get you to the first bhumi, let alone Buddhahood?

Tsongkhapa said:

Sure! How else are you going to get experience of emptiness? Tsongkhapa is very clear on this point. We first need to develop an inferential cognizer of emptiness which will later turn into a yogic direct perceiver. Without conceptual experience of emptiness we will never have a direct, non-conceptual experience.

Malcolm wrote:

Since when can an inference turn into a direct perception. This like claiming that if I look at smoke long enough, eventually I will see fire.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, April 29th, 2015 at 3:15 AM

Title: Re: What kind of mind do Buddhas have

Content:

Sherlock said:

I am not a Chan person, I just follow Nubchen, Rongzom, Longchenpa, Jigme Lingpa, ChNN

Malcolm wrote:

If one can achieve Buddhahood in a single life via Chan there is no reason to follow Vajrayāna at all, let alone Dzogchen.

You have yet to produce your sutra citations.

Sherlock said:

One can go from 1st bhumi to 10th with Chan. It is based on having achieved 1st bhumi already if not then it is like other sutra.

Malcolm wrote:

People make this claim, but have nothing with which to back it up, making truly lame excuses like Rongzom that the path is so fast one does not have time to accumulate merit to manifest the qualities of the bhumis (which are actually measures of qualities and not realizations). Generally, I like Rongzom, but sometimes he makes very unfounded and rash assertions.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, April 29th, 2015 at 3:12 AM

Title: Re: What kind of mind do Buddhas have

Content:

Sherlock said:

I am not a Chan person, I just follow Nubchen, Rongzom, Longchenpa, Jigme Lingpa, ChNN

Malcolm wrote:

If one can achieve Buddhahood in a single life via Chan there is no reason to follow Vajrayāna at all, let alone Dzogchen.

You have yet to produce your sutra citations.

Sherlock said:

One can go from 1st bhumi to 10th with Chan. It is based on having achieved 1st bhumi already if not then it is like other sutra.

The citation is translated in SMS Level 1 text, 2008 edition.

Malcolm wrote:

What section?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, April 29th, 2015 at 3:10 AM

Title: Re: What kind of mind do Buddhas have

Content:

Sherlock said:

I thought 1st bhumi used to be quite common?

It's more of the progress through the other bhumis that takes 3 kalpas.

On the other hand there are some sutras that say you can instantly go from 1st to 10th bhumi which Chan quotes.

Malcolm wrote:
Sūtras such as?

Sherlock said:
Nubchen just says "the prajnaparamita" so I assume its one version of the Prajnapanita.

Malcolm wrote:
Where does Nubchen say this. Then it is easy find out if the citation really exists in the PP sūtras.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Wednesday, April 29th, 2015 at 3:07 AM
Title: Re: What kind of mind do Buddhas have
Content:
Sherlock said:
I am not a Chan person, I just follow Nubchen, Rongzom, Longchenpa, Jigme Lingpa, ChNN

Malcolm wrote:
If one can achieve Buddhahood in a single life via Chan there is no reason to follow Vajrayāna at all, let alone Dzogchen.

You have yet to produce your sutra citations.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Wednesday, April 29th, 2015 at 2:55 AM
Title: Re: What kind of mind do Buddhas have
Content:

Challenge23 said:
Please forgive me, but I'm a little confused.

If actual buddhahood doesn't happen in the desire realm, then how does any Buddhist method work at all, especially Vajrayana which promises Enlightenment in one desire realm lifetime?

Malcolm wrote:
As to your first question, if you are common Mahāyāna practitioner, you are already know the path is long and so you do not practice with the expectation of achieving buddhahood in this lifetime.

As to your second, Vajrayāna has special methods.

Challenge23 said:

Ahh. That makes more sense. And I didn't see your clarification that you were speaking exclusively about sutrayana practice. I apologize. Thank you.

Malcolm wrote:

Of course Chan people think this is all bullshit.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, April 29th, 2015 at 2:54 AM

Title: Re: What kind of mind do Buddhas have

Content:

Sherlock said:

I thought 1st bhumi used to be quite common?

It's more of the progress through the other bhumis that takes 3 kalpas.

Malcolm wrote:

path of accumulation to 8th bhumi two incalculable eons; 8-10, one incalculable eon.

Sherlock said:

On the other hand there are some sutras that say you can instantly go from 1st to 10th bhumi which Chan quotes.

Malcolm wrote:

Such as?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, April 29th, 2015 at 2:52 AM

Title: Re: What kind of mind do Buddhas have

Content:

Sherlock said:

I thought 1st bhumi used to be quite common?

It's more of the progress through the other bhumis that takes 3 kalpas.

On the other hand there are some sutras that say you can instantly go from 1st to 10th bhumi which Chan quotes.

Malcolm wrote:

Sūtras such as?

Author: Malcolm
Date: Wednesday, April 29th, 2015 at 2:44 AM
Title: Re: What kind of mind do Buddhas have
Content:

Challenge23 said:
Please forgive me, but I'm a little confused.

If actual buddhahood doesn't happen in the desire realm, then how does any Buddhist method work at all, especially Vajrayana which promises Enlightenment in one desire realm lifetime?

Malcolm wrote:
As to your first question, if you are common Mahāyāna practitioner, you are already know the path is long and so you do not practice with the expectation of achieving buddhahood in this lifetime.

As to your second, Vajrayāna has special methods.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Wednesday, April 29th, 2015 at 2:37 AM
Title: Re: Mahamudra in the Modern World
Content:
dzogchungpa said:
Well, I know this is a Mahayana board, but there's a whole section of the book of the twos in the Anguttara Nikaya about happiness or sukham in Pali. It might just be marketing though.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Wednesday, April 29th, 2015 at 2:30 AM
Title: Re: What kind of mind do Buddhas have
Content:

BuddhaFollower said:
What about KDL?

Malcolm wrote:
Through sutrayāna, I should have clarified.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Wednesday, April 29th, 2015 at 2:19 AM
Title: Re: What kind of mind do Buddhas have

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The point still stands, however, no one attains Buddhahood in the desire realm.

smcj said:

Sakyamuni? Padmasmbhava? Bodhidharma?

Malcolm wrote:

The latter two were emanations, I don't know if Bodhidharma was a Buddha or not.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, April 29th, 2015 at 2:12 AM

Title: Re: What kind of mind do Buddhas have

Content:

smcj said:

Unless someone is some kind of emanation (which cannot be externally ascertained), we can assume that having been born in the desire realm, we are very much beginners on the path.

Statistically? Yes. Specifically? No, regardless of whether or not you retroactively deem someone an "emanation".

Malcolm wrote:

The point still stands, however, no one attains Buddhahood in the desire realm.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, April 29th, 2015 at 2:07 AM

Title: Re: Mahamudra in the Modern World

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

A promise of happiness underlies all successful marketing.

dharmagoat said:

Doesn't the Buddha promise happiness too?

Malcolm wrote:

He does not make promises of that kind. But what he does say is that if you follow the Dharma, you can discover total freedom from suffering. If you want to call that happiness, ok. But it is more like describing absence of disease as health.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, April 29th, 2015 at 2:01 AM

Title: Re: What kind of mind do Buddhas have

Content:

BuddhaFollower said:

I'm going to stick with tantra.

Can accomplish whole path in 1 lifetime.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, that is what we practice, but we study sūtra to understand what it is that tantra is seeking to accomplish so rapidly, and also so that we maintain a correct Madhyamaka view. To some extent the latter is not strictly necessary, because even Yogacarins attain full awakening through the sadhana method even though in post-equipoise their view is a little extreme. This being so, there is much hope for both gzhan stong pas and their mirror image, the Gelugpas.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, April 29th, 2015 at 1:56 AM

Title: Re: What kind of mind do Buddhas have

Content:

smcj said:

The point being that, unless we can see someone's individual karma, we do not have enough data to know how those types of teachings apply to a specific case.

Malcolm wrote:

Unless someone is some kind of emanation (which cannot be externally ascertained), we can assume that having been born in the desire realm, we are very much beginners on the path.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, April 29th, 2015 at 1:55 AM

Title: Re: What kind of mind do Buddhas have

Content:

BuddhaFollower said:

I assume these 3 incalculable eons have to be perfect practice as well?

Malcolm wrote:

Right, this assumes the practitioners of the highest capacity.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, April 29th, 2015 at 1:54 AM

Title: Re: What kind of mind do Buddhas have

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

This discusses conceptual analysis, not meditation.

Greg said:

Do you hold that conceptual analysis is never "meditation?"

Malcolm wrote:

Correct, it is only a post-equipoise exercise. One should not engage in conceptual analysis in equipoise.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, April 29th, 2015 at 1:44 AM

Title: Re: What kind of mind do Buddhas have

Content:

smcj said:

Even then it takes three incalculable eons, Chan is no shortcut.

Ah yes, but nobody knows whether or not somebody has already put in 2.9999 eons of work into it already!

Malcolm wrote:

Well, it takes two incalculable eons achieve the eighth bhumi. It takes another eon after that to attain full awakening. Moreover, actual buddhahood does not happen in desire realm, but rather in Akanistha Gaṇḍavyuha in the presence of the Sambhogakāya. Only emanations appear to attain buddhahood here.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, April 29th, 2015 at 1:37 AM

Title: Re: What kind of mind do Buddhas have

Content:

BuddhaFollower said:

Bakmoon, read this thread:

<https://www.dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=40&t=4704&start=0>

Bakmoon said:

That thread deals quite a bit with Tantra, but you don't need Tantra to attain a nonconceptual realization of emptiness. Sutric meditation can also lead to it.

Sherlock said:

Sutrayana takes kalpas to get nonconceptual for most people, unless you have high capacity for Chan.

Malcolm wrote:

Even then it takes three incalculable eons, Chan is no shortcut, they just pretend that since everything is empty, paths and stages do not matter because they are not ultimate.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, April 29th, 2015 at 1:16 AM

Title: Re: What kind of mind do Buddhas have

Content:

Bakmoon said:

Conceptual meditation on emptiness is a necessary precursor to non-conceptual meditation on emptiness though.

Malcolm wrote:

How can a conceptual meditation turn unto a nonconceptual meditation?

Bakmoon said:

It occurs as it is described in the Kashyapa Parivarta Sutra which says: For example, two trees are dragged against each other by the wind and from that a fire starts, burning the two trees. In the same way, Kashyapa, if you have correct analytical discrimination, the power of a noble being's wisdom will emerge. With its emergence, correct analytical discrimination will itself be burned up.

Malcolm wrote:

This discusses conceptual analysis, not meditation.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, April 29th, 2015 at 12:50 AM

Title: Re: What kind of mind do Buddhas have

Content:

Bakmoon said:

Conceptual meditation on emptiness is a necessary precursor to non-conceptual meditation on emptiness though.

Malcolm wrote:

How can a conceptual meditation turn unto a nonconceptual meditation?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, April 29th, 2015 at 12:17 AM

Title: Re: What kind of mind do Buddhas have

Content:

anjali said:

My goodness. Who would have thought that the phrase, "Drop your mind," would be controversial? This seems like a tempest in a teacup.

Tsongkhapafan said:

What's in a word? everything! Everything is mere name, so we need to be very precise in terms of how we use words to convey meaning. 'Drop your mind' is a bit too throwaway from my point of view. Is he encouraging us to abandon conceptual thoughts (bad idea), or deluded conceptual thoughts? (good idea). The difference is very important.

Malcolm wrote:

Do you somehow imagine that conceptually meditating on emptiness will get you to the first bhumi, let alone Buddhahood?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, April 28th, 2015 at 10:51 PM

Title: Re: More on recorded empowerments, etc.

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

For the purposes of an empowerment there are three kinds: a drawn mandala, a powder mandala and a body mandala.

With respect to the first two, there is a procedure of setting out the mandala, i.e. preparing the site, laying it out, coloring it and so on. With respect to the last it is based completely on the samadhi of the master conferring the empowerment, whereas the other two are supports for the samadhi of the master, but primarily as a aid to students of lesser capacity.

dzogchungpa said:

OK, then the question is, in what sense does one "enter" any of these mandalas? The only real explanation of this I see in what you said has to do with "dependent origination" but honestly, for me, this doesn't explain much.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, first what happens is that master leads you to the eastern door, etc. I thought you were paying attention during the empowerment? Or did you just enjoy watching HHST sit there more?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, April 28th, 2015 at 10:09 PM

Title: Re: Mahamudra in the Modern World

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

A promise of happiness underlies all successful marketing.

dzogchungpa said:

OH SNAP!

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, April 28th, 2015 at 10:06 PM

Title: Re: More on recorded empowerments, etc.

Content:

DesertDweller said:

Still, someone should probably ask the Rinpoche. Otherwise don't be surprised if the issue doesn't disappear.

Malcolm wrote:

People's misunderstandings will never disappear completely. This is why the same questions are raised again and again, and the same answers given, again and again.

dzogchungpa said:

Maybe the real question that needs to be answered is: "What is a mandala?"

Malcolm wrote:

For the purposes of an empowerment there are three kinds: a drawn mandala, a powder mandala and a body mandala.

With respect to the first two, there is a procedure of setting out the mandala, i.e. preparing the site, laying it out, coloring it and so on. With respect to the last it is based completely on the samadhi of the master conferring the empowerment, whereas the other two are supports for the samadhi of the master, but primarily as a aid to students of lesser capacity. Whichever the case may be, the mandala is in any case created and then dissolved at the end of the rite. After that it is up to the students to do the daily practice themselves.

So for example, the Vajrakilaya empowerment you attended with HHST has been dissolved — it no longer exists in that space, in that place. The minute HHST was done with the rites of conferring the empowerments, he began to finish the Ganapuja (empowerments are actually a branch of ganapuja activities), offer tormas and in the end he dismissed the wisdom beings in the front created mandala and the vase mandala and dissolved his self-creation thus ending the rite completely apart from the dedication of merits, aspirations and benedictory prayers.

The only sense in which we can say that mandala continues is in the mandala of students who attended the empowerment. But until you yourself do the retreats, and so on, you cannot give that empowerment to someone else. That mandala does not exist on the video as a living entity. It cannot practice the sadhana, it also cannot grant empowerment, etc.

The misconception which Astus has is the notion that an empowerment is merely communicating information received through the five senses, thus for him there is no difference between an empowerment and a recording of an empowerment, it is merely information. While it is true that information is being communicated through the five sense, that is not all that is happening, there are samadhis involved on the part of both the master and the students at the same time, there is the dependent origination which needs to be actively created between the master and the student at the same time, particularly in the lower empowerments; there are the samaya vows conferred and received and the agreement to follow them (Whatever you say boss, all that I will do....), and so on — all of the things which I have now explained exhaustively.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, April 28th, 2015 at 9:50 PM

Title: Re: More on recorded empowerments, etc.

Content:

DesertDweller said:

Why such resistance, though? There is obviously confusion about the issue that could be cleared away with a simple question. It's not some minor technical issue but something which could apparently lead to serious obstructions for the many people who seem to have interpreted his words as meaning that recorded empowerments are possible. Anyway, I hope somebody does ask him when they see him, that's all.

Malcolm wrote:

Frankly — and no disrespect intended towards Garchen Rinpoche — it does not really matter what his answer is.

For example, let us say some one claims "Oh, there is God in Buddhadharma, I heard my guru say so" and even goes so far as to find a quote where this or that guru says there is God in Buddhism. This does not mean that this is correct, or that there is fact the doctrine of God in Buddhadharma, or that we need to take that statement literally.

Let us say for example, that someone claims "My guru says that there is no rebirth and no karma in Buddhism" and even goes so far as to find a quote where this or that guru says there is there is no rebirth and no karma in Buddhadharma. This does not mean that this is correct, or that there is fact no doctrine of rebirth and karma in Buddhadharma.

This is why, in the end, even what one's guru says must be subjected to scrutiny, it must be measured against what is taught in the tantra and the authoritative opinions of masters of the past. If someone who one regards as a guru teaches something that does not correspond with Buddhadharma, one must ignore those statements. Since we subject all the Buddha's words to scrutiny, why should we not do the same with respect to what our gurus say? Why should we abandon our critical thinking merely because we think our guru is a Buddha? We should not.

In particular, when confronted with novelties such as the assertion that people can receive empowerments from recordings of past empowerments, people must use common sense in addition to reason. Who is making this claim? Why is this claim being made?, and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, April 28th, 2015 at 9:12 PM

Title: Re: Religious transference: Nichiren Buddhism and Catholicism

Content:

nichirenista said:

I should probably clarify that I wasn't consciously attracted to Nichiren Buddhism because I consciously thought it was similar to Catholicism. Here is what attracted me to Nichiren Buddhism: The idea that I could get what I want by chanting for it, which is most definitely NOT taught in Catholicism...

Malcolm wrote:

It is also not taught in Buddhism.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, April 28th, 2015 at 8:42 PM

Title: Re: More on recorded empowerments, etc.

Content:

DesertDweller said:

Still, someone should probably ask the Rinpoche. Otherwise don't be surprised if the issue doesn't disappear.

Malcolm wrote:

People's misunderstandings will never disappear completely. This is why the same questions are raised again and again, and the same answers given, again and again.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, April 28th, 2015 at 8:34 PM

Title: Re: More on recorded empowerments, etc.

Content:

WeiHan said:

Is there a similar thread asking if Bikkhu and Bikkhuni ordination can be obtained from recording?

Malcolm wrote:

Of course not, because no one would be so stupid as to imagine they could receive an ordination from a recording. I already addressed this point as well.

WeiHan said:

I was just curious why people so liberally leverage such scrutinizing questions on Vajrayana practices but ignore that other yanas have similar practice.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, it is because most people really do not understand the process of empowerment, even people who have been following Vajrayāna for years — so they get strange ideas in their heads, indulge in fantasies, and generally invent very many strange practices. It has been happening for a long time, which is why Sapan wrote the Three Vows to begin with.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, April 28th, 2015 at 8:21 PM

Title: Re: Mahamudra in the Modern World

Content:

Sherlock said:

Malcolm could you answer this question? Thanks

Malcolm wrote:

The Union of the Sun and Moon Tantra states:

After that, “Nonconceptual Great Muni” made offerings with offerings of non-attachment to the Teacher, Mahāvajradhara; petitioned with a melody of non-invocation, held a thought of non-abiding, rose from the seat that was not laid out, donned a garment that was not fabricated, invoked with a song that was not intoned, and requested with words that were not spoken. Having arisen before those with faith that clears the darkness, in this way he made a request to the teacher with the words of the song of the vajra:

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, April 28th, 2015 at 8:12 PM

Title: Re: More on recorded empowerments, etc.

Content:

WeiHan said:

Is there a similar thread asking if Bikkhu and Bikkhuni ordination can be obtained from recording?

Malcolm wrote:

Of course not, because no one would be so stupid as to imagine they could receive an ordination from a recording. I already addressed this point as well.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, April 28th, 2015 at 7:50 PM

Title: Re: Mahamudra in the Modern World

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Dharma is about how things are, and how things are is sarvadukkham.

dzogchungpa said:

Well, I'm not an expert on either Shambhala or Ray, but from what I understand this is not the Shambhala view, and if I am not mistaken, for Ray the Shambhala view is fundamental.

Malcolm wrote:

A promise of happiness underlies all successful marketing.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, April 28th, 2015 at 7:38 PM

Title: Re: More on recorded empowerments, etc.

Content:

narraboth said:

Even the recording contains all activities that the guru has done or prepared, the actual mandala has gone by the time when students watch or hear it. Unless whenever you watch or listen to the recording, the mandala re-generated, but that doesn't make sense. Live-stream empowerment is different: if the guru includes certain students in the mandala with his visualisation, no matter the student is sitting in the Gumpa, outside of Gumpa, another building or another country, there is a actual mandala AT THAT TIME so it is possible. In non-real-time case, even the guru visualise the uncertain students all in the current mandala, there still won't be that mandala at the time when those people hear it; when there was a mandala and the guru visualised them in, those people do not aware anything thus could not create any link. So it is illogical, not just against the text, for any empowerment that needs a mandala or object to be given with non-real-time recording.

Malcolm wrote:

Correct.

narraboth said:

However, it is totally possible that whenever a student watch a video or hear an audio of empowerment from a truly great master, if he or she generates genuine faith, the master and deity will appear in front of him or her to grant blessing. It will certainly create a link with that deity and master, but it is not the same thing as receiving empowerment in an actual mandala.

Malcolm wrote:

Correct.

narraboth said:

Can it still be called 'empowerment'?

Malcolm wrote:

No.

narraboth said:

Well, if the empowerment people receive in guruyoga by their prayer and visualisation also an empowerment, then why not.

Malcolm wrote:

As you state below, the empowerments in Guru Yoga are a path empowerment one is authorized to do by having properly received empowerment in the first place.

narraboth said:

Whilst it is actually required that students receive 4 empowerments in actual mandala before they can practice guruyoga, although nowadays many masters just give glung of guruyoga no matter what.

Malcolm wrote:

And this is not a correct practice.

narraboth said:

I still think there is a difference between them. I mean, I personally think if people practice guruyoga without actually receiving 4 empowerments, it would be more like a blessing+practicing. Guruyoga is called path empowerment, you can't have path without base. I guess same apply to the case here.

Malcolm wrote:

Exactly.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, April 28th, 2015 at 7:15 PM

Title: Re: More on recorded empowerments, etc.

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

For example, a master has to create the mandala: there is the master's creation of himself as the mandala, the front created mandala, the mandala in the vase and so on and so forth.

Once the ritual has finished, all these mandalas and so on are dissolved so they do not exist anymore since they are not being maintained by the master's visualization, having been dissolved. I explained all of this already in the other thread on this point.

Not only that, but the recording generally only covers the activities for the disciple. All the activities that the master has to do before conferring the empowerment are not recorded.

Thus the recording is incapable of doing recreating these things since a recording has no mind, no volition and so on.

Astus said:

What the master visualises and does before the empowerment does not show for the receiver either when he is present physically or when it is through a live broadcast. How is it any different for the person watching a recording? Whether the master followed the prescribed procedure to give the empowerment or not, it cannot be known by the receiver. Whatever is received by the disciple exists only as physical sensory perception, so anything beyond that does not have any role in receiving the empowerment. But if you say it does, then what and how?

Malcolm wrote:

That is not the point. The point is whether the rite is complete or not with all its parts.

A master does a sadhana, creates a mandala, invites the students into that mandala and closes the mandala.

If the master does not do the sadhana before hand, creating the mandala, even if he reads the portion of the initiation text meant create the students as the mandala, it won't happen. The master must be visualizing himself as that specific deity for which he is giving the empowerment having already properly performed the sadhana himself, before he can give the empowerment. Likewise, during the empowerment, the master must visualize all the students in the form the deity, he must summon the wisdom continuum of that deity to merge with the visualized form of the students he has visualized as the deity, make it firm, and then bestow the various blessings of body speech and mind will maintaining all of this visualization continuously. Also the student from their side must try their best to follow and do the described visualizations at the same time the master is doing them.

Finally, and importantly, at the end of the ritual the master dissolves the mandala completely. Once he finishes his sadhana, the mandala has been dissolved. One cannot receive empowerment into a mandala that has been dissolved, just as one cannot enter a house that has been constructed and then dismantled.

For example, while one can watch a video of a house being constructed and dismantled, one will never be able to enter that house at any time while one is watching the recording. If one the other hand you are there for the raising of the structure, you can enter the structure until it has been dismantled. Likewise, in terms of receiving an initiations, if you are present for the master's creation of the students as the mandala, then you can enter that mandala, but if you are not present in real time, then it does not work. Why? Because the master and the student have to be engaged at the same time in the process of the giving and receiving the empowerment, they have to be in the mandala together. This is impossible with a recording.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, April 28th, 2015 at 9:31 AM

Title: Re: More on recorded empowerments, etc.

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

So if I received a proper empowerment from Garchen Rinpoche, and then he said watching recordings of some of his empowerments can function as an empowerment, I should take that to be true, right?

Even so you have to check whether what your guru says accords with the Dharma, and if not, you need ignore it. Otherwise, one is just becoming someone who has blind faith.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, April 28th, 2015 at 9:21 AM

Title: Re: More on recorded empowerments, etc.

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

One can either follow what the Buddha taught in valid tantras, or one can follow the opinion of the crowd, really, its your choice.

dzogchungpa said:

Aren't you supposed to view your guru as a Buddha?

Malcolm wrote:

This presumes you have received a proper empowerment.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, April 28th, 2015 at 9:11 AM

Title: Re: More on recorded empowerments, etc.

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Some of you people are, understandably, ignorant of what an empowerment entails, what makes an empowerment valid and does not constitute a valid empowerment. It is not something which is subject to the shifting opinions of this or that Tibetan.

Johnny Dangerous said:

That is only true if people accept that you are the sole authority on the subject Malcolm, no offense.

Malcolm wrote:

I suggest you in particular read Sakya Pandita's Three Vows.

One can either follow what the Buddha taught in valid tantras, or one can follow the opinion of the crowd, really, its your choice.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, April 28th, 2015 at 9:03 AM

Title: Re: More on recorded empowerments, etc.

Content:

Konchog1 said:

Hey Malcolm,

Is there any difference in terms of power or at least ease for the master between empowering one student and one thousand?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, their capacity for visualizing each person as the deity.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, April 28th, 2015 at 9:02 AM

Title: Re: More on recorded empowerments, etc.

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Some of you people are, understandably, ignorant of what an empowerment entails, what makes an empowerment valid and does not constitute a valid empowerment. It is not something which is subject to the shifting opinions of this or that Tibetan.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, April 28th, 2015 at 7:19 AM

Title: Re: Mahamudra in the Modern World

Content:

Sherlock said:

Practicing what the guru teaches is the best offering, so when we do guruyoga, sing SoV and dedicate at the end, we are offering.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, because the context of the original teaching of SOV was as an offering.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, April 28th, 2015 at 5:42 AM

Title: More on recorded empowerments, etc.

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Of course, who ever said it was otherwise?

Astus said:

Then there is no difference between a live broadcast and a recording in terms of visual and auditory impressions. Maybe even mass empowerments are similar as well.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, there is a difference, as I told you.

For example, a master has to create the mandala: there is the master's creation of himself as the mandala, the front created mandala, the mandala in the vase and so on and so forth.

Once the ritual has finished, all these mandalas and so on are dissolved so they do not exist anymore since they are not being maintained by the master's visualization, having been dissolved. I explained all of this already in the other thread on this point.

Not only that, but the recording generally only covers the activities for the disciple. All the activities that the master has to do before conferring the empowerment are not recorded.

Thus the recording is incapable of doing recreating these things since a recording has no mind, no volition and so on.

Really, there is no chance a recorded empowerment can actually confer empowerment, it is just not possible.

You see, this is why when people like yourself, who really have zero understanding of Varjayāna weigh in in such topics, your words are a best ignorant and at worst misleading.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, April 28th, 2015 at 3:42 AM

Title: Re: Mahamudra in the Modern World

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

No, that is never the case, it is more like a stamp and its impression. A recorded empowerment can never be a stamp, it can only be an impression. In this case, an inert impression. A student, who receives an empowerment, is an animate living person upon whom an impression has been made, and when they have realized the meaning, they too can make impressions on others.

This is essentially why, for all who reading, the idea that one can receive an empowerment from a recording is a corrupt idea that will destroy lineages if people take it seriously.

Astus said:

How does the stamp meets the wax? Isn't it through the five outer senses?

Malcolm wrote:

Of course, who ever said it was otherwise?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, April 28th, 2015 at 3:20 AM

Title: Re: Mahamudra in the Modern World

Content:

dharmagoat said:

You seem to be saying that misery needs to be instilled in us before we can practice the Dharma. Is that correct?

Malcolm wrote:

No, I am saying it is already there. If you are not recognizing it, it is because you have not really understood what suffering is.

dharmagoat said:

For those that already recognise the hopelessness of saṃsāra and are suffering, might a degree of positivity in the message be encouraging?

Malcolm wrote:

Sachen Kunga Nyingpo says:

If one carefully reflects on the absence of happiness wherever one is born in saṃsara's three realms, whatever one does will become Dharma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, April 28th, 2015 at 3:11 AM

Title: Re: Mahamudra in the Modern World

Content:

dharmagoat said:

You seem to be saying that misery needs to be instilled in us before we can practice the Dharma. Is that correct?

Malcolm wrote:

No, I am saying it is already there. If you are not recognizing it, it is because you have not really understood what suffering is.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, April 28th, 2015 at 3:00 AM

Title: Re: Mahamudra in the Modern World

Content:

dharmagoat said:

Can the message be something between the two extremes of negative and positive? A middle way, perhaps?

Malcolm wrote:

Nope. The Saddharmasmṛtyupasthāna Sūtra states:

Hell beings experience the flames of hell.

Pretas experience hunger and thirst.

Animals experience eating one another.

Humans experience short lives.

Asuras experience conflict and violence.

Devas experience unconcern.

There exists no happiness in saṃsara, even the size of a pinpoint.

Vasubandhu says:

The childish, like a hand,

do not see the suffering of the conditioned, like a hair.

The Āryas, like an eye, always flinch because of them.

Maitreyanatha says:

Just as there is no sweet smell in feces, there is no happiness in the five migrations.

Nāgārjuna says:

The gentle regret this samsara,

the source of many sufferings of impoverishment due to desire, death, illness, aging and so on.

Also one must hear about its flaws.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, April 28th, 2015 at 2:48 AM

Title: Re: Mahamudra in the Modern World

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Well, when you have medicine that tastes really bad, you have to convince people the disease is worse, that's all.

dharmagoat said:

That sounds like a recipe for even more suffering. A double dose of negativity.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, if all you want is someone beaming positive messages at you, try another religion.

Dharma is about how things are, and how things are is sarvadukkham.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, April 28th, 2015 at 2:41 AM

Title: Re: Mahamudra in the Modern World

Content:

WeiHan said:

What assumes a type of mental connection that is bound by time?

Astus said:

That the mental state of the person giving the empowerment influences the receiver's mind, as if there were a direct connection between two mind-streams.

Malcolm wrote:

No, that is never the case, it is more like a stamp and its impression. A recorded empowerment can never be a stamp, it can only be an impression. In this case, an inert impression. A student, who receives an empowerment, is an animate living person upon whom an impression has been made, and when they have realized the meaning, they too can make impressions on others.

This is essentially why, for all who reading, the idea that one can receive an empowerment from a recording is a corrupt idea that will destroy lineages if people take it seriously.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, April 28th, 2015 at 2:40 AM

Title: Re: Mahamudra in the Modern World

Content:

smcj said:

Sorry, there really is no sugar that will mask the taste of rebirth and karma -- it a very strong medicine for a strong disease.

Malcolm, I think I'm just as right wing/hardcore about this subject as you are, but I disagree with your approach. You can't leave people at the bottom of a cliff and say that there is a door to Dharma at the top of the cliff. You've got to give them a way to get there. Simply abandoning them like that could very well be breaking the bodhisattva vow.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, when you have medicine that tastes really bad, you have to convince people the disease is worse, that's all.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, April 28th, 2015 at 2:14 AM

Title: Re: Mahamudra in the Modern World

Content:

smcj said:

You cannot be a Dharma practitioner and yet reject rebirth. Do we really have to have this conversation yet again?

I doubt that someone like Trungpa rejected rebirth in his own practice, yet he did not make a huge issue out of it with his students. If so, then how he chose to guide his students towards Dharma is limited only by his own realization and upaya/skill. Thus there is room for acceptance or rejection of what he did, but based only on how one sees his attainments, not on how much latitude a realized teacher has on guiding their students towards Dharma.

For me, he was not my teacher, so I feel no need to formulate an opinion about whether he was realized enough to use his discretion to adapt things the way he did. But I acknowledge that there is room for that type of thing within the tradition--if needed and by a fully realized teacher.

You do realize that he participated in Dagara initiations with an African teacher named Malidoma Patrice Somé?

He is very open minded, maybe too much so. He has not limited his open-mindedness to the teachings coming from Tibet. That may or may not be a good thing. Personally I leave my comfort Zone at the edges of the Vajrayana.

Malcolm wrote:

Anyway, teachers like this are not for me. And apart from these things, I really don't have an opinion. People are free to follow whatever they want and whoever they want.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, April 28th, 2015 at 2:12 AM

Title: Re: Mahamudra in the Modern World

Content:

dharmagoat said:

I think I need to make it clear again that I am not talking about rejecting rebirth, but rather finding ways to accommodate it.

WeiHan said:

Do you mean evidence for rebirth? Or how it fit into your world view?

dharmagoat said:

Being introduced to it in a way that does not incline one to reject it.

Malcolm wrote:

Sorry, there really is no sugar that will mask the taste of rebirth and karma -- it a very strong medicine for a strong disease.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, April 28th, 2015 at 2:10 AM

Title: Re: Mahamudra in the Modern World

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

You are just having a knee-jerk reaction to one thing he said somewhere though, again, he may departs somewhat from traditional views i'm sure, but he is hugely far from a materialist or secular Buddhist etc.

Malcolm wrote:

I am never said he was either. I simply don't like the way he phrases "rebirth" in his talks and later works as if it is some initiation process. He uses that language over and over again in many places.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, April 28th, 2015 at 2:07 AM

Title: Re: Mahamudra in the Modern World

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

You cannot be a Dharma practitioner and yet reject rebirth. Do we really have to have this conversation yet again?

dharmagoat said:

It is not the same conversation. Your response is the same, that is all.

I think I need to make it clear again that I am not talking about rejecting rebirth, but rather finding ways to accommodate it.

Malcolm wrote:

One can either accept it or not. There is no way to "accommodate it" without a great deal of conceptual proliferation.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, April 28th, 2015 at 2:05 AM

Title: Re: Mahamudra in the Modern World

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

You are just having a knee-jerk reaction to one thing he said somewhere though, again, he may depart somewhat from traditional views i'm sure, but he is hugely far from a materialist or secular Buddhist etc.

Malcolm wrote:

You do realize that he participated in Dagara initiations with an African teacher named Malidoma Patrice Somé?

Johnny Dangerous said:

"...of particular impact in my study with Malidoma was an all-night 'earth burial' which, through its initiatory death and rebirth process, allowed my life to crumble and then arise in a way that established earth and the 'body work' once and for all, as the core of my spiritual life"

Malcolm wrote:

—— Touching Enlightenment

If you look around, you will discover that Malidoma Patrice Somé is fervent advocate of sacrificing animals. I can't say that this was part of Ray's initiation (though I would be surprised if it was not). We all know how the Buddha felt about animal sacrifice.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, April 28th, 2015 at 1:55 AM

Title: Re: Mahamudra in the Modern World

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

If you only have one lifetime, and you want to dedicate yourself to the benefit of sentient beings, it is better done in service as a doctor, nurse, fire fighter, aid worker, etc. rather than pretending to oneself that one is a Dharma practitioner.

dharmagoat said:

Not that they are not mutually exclusive.

As Dharma practitioners, we each do what we can. To think that someone is either a fully-fledged Dharma practitioner or not one at all does seem rather... dualistic.

Malcolm wrote:

You cannot be a Dharma practitioner and yet reject rebirth. Do we really have to have this conversation yet again?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, April 28th, 2015 at 1:49 AM

Title: Re: Mahamudra in the Modern World

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

But if incarnation is viewed as a sort of metaphor

Case closed.

Johnny Dangerous said:

Have you read his books? If not, then no, case not closed..unfortunate use of terms maybe, but you can't know his views from one little snippet of text.

Unless he's revised his views, he's definitely not what you are implying here at all, you think he believes in Dharmapalas..but takes a materialist view of rebirth?

Malcolm wrote:

Ray is very influenced by shamanism. One can have an animistic view of the world and yet not accept rebirth.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, April 28th, 2015 at 1:48 AM

Title: Re: Mahamudra in the Modern World

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

But if incarnation is viewed as a sort of metaphor

Case closed.

Johnny Dangerous said:

Have you read his books? If not, then no, case not closed..unfortunate use of terms maybe, but you can't know his views from one little snippet of text.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes. I understand that in his books he presents a normative view. It is what people actually teach their students that is more salient, for me at any rate.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, April 28th, 2015 at 1:43 AM

Title: Re: Mahamudra in the Modern World

Content:

dharmagoat said:

So, Malcolm, what are your thoughts on Dr. Reggie Ray as a teacher?

Malcolm wrote:

I don't have any opinion about Ray at all, apart from a bit of discomfort about his having decided to introduce brand new "Tibetan" "dharmapāla" he calls "Ritrö Gonpo" based on some vision he had of Kit Carson Peak and an interview where he seemed to dismiss the importance of teachings on rebirth and karma.

More here:

<http://www.soundstrue.com/store/the-protectors.html>

Johnny Dangerous said:

I'd guess you are misreading the rebirth and karma quote..he is quite far from a 'secular Buddhist' or something similar, even a cursory reading of his books will show that. In fact, he often goes off on tangents about how a big part of what Vajrayana changes for westerners is our de-sacralized, materialist worldview. I think he purposely makes his presentation accessible to people who might be waffling, but in terms of his own views he seems pretty solidly like any Vajrayana practitioner.

Malcolm wrote:

But if incarnation is viewed as a sort of metaphor

Case closed.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, April 28th, 2015 at 1:42 AM

Title: Re: Mahamudra in the Modern World

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

If one does not accept rebirth, one has no motivation to practice Dharma, except as an ego trip. It is that simple.

dharmagoat said:

I don't see how a person dedicating to the benefit of all beings what they perceive as their one-and-only life can be considered an ego trip.

Malcolm wrote:

If you only have one lifetime, and you want to dedicate yourself to the benefit of sentient beings, it is better done in service as a doctor, nurse, fire fighter, aid worker, etc. rather than pretending to oneself that one is a Dharma practitioner.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, April 28th, 2015 at 1:14 AM

Title: Re: Mahamudra in the Modern World

Content:

smcj said:

....I solved the dilemma by understanding what was going to make my practice move ahead, and choosing my practice over my doubts.

The underlined part is what most people don't see. Only now am I getting to the point where I can try to say how that is so for myself, and doing it very badly. If you have a coherent presentation of that understanding, I think people would be interested.

Malcolm wrote:

If one does not accept rebirth, one has no motivation to practice Dharma, except as an ego trip. It is that simple.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, April 28th, 2015 at 1:07 AM

Title: Re: Mahamudra in the Modern World

Content:

dharmagoat said:

He is providing a way to engage with Buddhadharma for those that may otherwise dismiss it.

Malcolm wrote:

This is the common apology for such sentiments, but I have never accepted it as valid.

dharmagoat said:

That is understandable if you have never experienced the dilemma yourself.

Malcolm wrote:

On the contrary, I solved the dilemma by understanding what was going to make my practice move ahead, and choosing my practice over my doubts. Then of course, over time, I also discovered the clear rational for why it is irrational to believe that mind stream can arise from material causes.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, April 28th, 2015 at 1:01 AM

Title: Re: Mahamudra in the Modern World

Content:

dharmagoat said:

He is providing a way to engage with Buddhadharma for those that may otherwise dismiss it.

Malcolm wrote:

This is the common apology for such sentiments, but I have never accepted it as valid.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, April 28th, 2015 at 12:45 AM

Title: Re: Mahamudra in the Modern World

Content:

dharmagoat said:

Thanks, Malcolm.

Malcolm wrote:

... an interview where he seemed to dismiss the importance of teachings on rebirth and karma.

dharmagoat said:

Which interview is this? Could you provide a link?

Malcolm wrote:

Some interview, it was several years ago. He said:

The whole belief in past lives is something that Buddhism inherited from Indian Tradition.

And I think, as with many things in Asian Buddhism, we need to take a critical look at this and see...you know, the Buddha said to his own students "...anything that I teach you, don't take it at face value, don't believe it just because even I said it-- you have to look at it and evaluate it within your own framework and see if it makes sense. And if it doesn't make sense, dump it, get rid of it." And I think that incarnation, ah...

reincarnation, as a literal teaching, I don't find it helpful for anybody because it takes your focus away from this life. But if incarnation is viewed as a sort of metaphor for the fact that we humans are on some kind of extremely long spiritual journey that happened before we were born, and it's going to keep on going, then I think it's helpful." Personally, I think such sentiments are misguided.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, April 28th, 2015 at 12:25 AM

Title: Re: Mahamudra in the Modern World

Content:

dharmagoat said:

So, Malcolm, what are your thoughts on Dr. Reggie Ray as a teacher?

Malcolm wrote:

I don't have any opinion about Ray at all, apart from a bit of discomfort about his having decided to introduce brand new "Tibetan" "dharmapāla" he calls "Ritrö Gonpo" based on some vision he had of Kit Carson Peak and an interview where he seemed to dismiss the importance of teachings on rebirth and karma.

More here:

<http://www.soundstrue.com/store/the-protectors.html>

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, April 28th, 2015 at 12:12 AM

Title: Re: Mahamudra in the Modern World

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

There are a number of levels at work here, but the most fundamental is that when you receive an empowerment, you are in fact receiving a number of vows, refuge vows, bodhisattva vows as well as vows of secret mantra. It is not simply "instruction."

dzogchungpa said:

This is interesting. I don't know about secret mantra vows, but can't you take refuge and bodhisattva vows by yourself?

Malcolm wrote:

There is a Mahāyāna system for going for refuge and generating bodhicitta on one's own if one cannot find a master. It is also not at all clear that when one goes for Mahāyāna refuge in this way, one is adopting the five vows of a lay person as well as the bodhisattva vows.

But, one cannot self-ordain as a novice, or a monk, nor can one confer upon oneself any empowerment.

In general one should receive the three vows from a master and then enhance them by renewing them daily. Unless of course you are a very high Dzogchen practitioner like so many people we see on Buddhist internet boards who have transcended the need for mundane things such as paying attention to the state of their vows.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, April 27th, 2015 at 11:47 PM

Title: Re: Mahamudra in the Modern World

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Anyway, this is a stupid conversation — you cannot receive empowerments from a recording of an empowerment, period. End of story. Just like you cannot receive monks vows from a recording, and so on. People who think they have received an empowerment from a recording are just deluding themselves and received nothing whatsoever. Even if they recite mantras and practices they think they have received from a recording there will be no benefit whatsoever, in fact the opposite will be the case.

If you want to receive a vow, any vow, you have to do it in the proper way, and receiving them from a recording cannot be construed as proper at all.

Dan74 said:

Malcolm, could you elucidate why this is so? Or point me to a resource??

From my non-Vajrayana perspective I can easily see how in some instance face-to-faces interaction with a teacher who knows your heart is indispensable, but a lot of other instruction can be received in various formats. What mechanism in empowerments makes it work when it is live and fail when it isn't?

/
dan

Malcolm wrote:

There are a number of levels at work here, but the most fundamental is that when you receive an empowerment, you are in fact receiving a number of vows, refuge vows, bodhisattva vows as well as vows of secret mantra. It is not simply "instruction."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, April 27th, 2015 at 8:15 PM

Title: Re: What kind of mind do Buddhas have

Content:

Tsongkhapafan said:

Buddhas' minds are non-conceptual but they do possess the five all-accompanying mental factors as this is the valid basis upon which mind is imputed. They have omniscience and therefore they also possess the object ascertaining mental factors.

Malcolm wrote:
and what is your citation for this?

Tsongkhapa said:
You know I can't give my citations because of the TOS, however, I will quote Dharmakīrti's definition of mind which is 'that which is clarity and cognising'. Buddhas have minds, minds cognise, cognition requires mental factors, ergo, Buddhas have minds with mental factors. Bliss for example is experienced by mental factor feeling.

Buddha are not like stones.

Malcolm wrote:
Of course you can give your citations. But I meant from Sutra.

When one says that a Buddha has jñāna, but not vijñāna, this does not mean a Buddha is inert, it means the opposite.

Cognition for an ordinary sentient being requires mental factors, but a Buddha's jñāna does not require mental factors.

For example there is a sutra passage cited in the Yogācārabhūmi viniścayasamgrahani that states:

"Bhagavān, how should the mental factors of the tathāgatas be known?"

"Mañjuśrī, the mind (citta, sems), intellect (yid, manas) or consciousness (vijñāna, rnam shes) of tathāgatas are indeed not differentiated in discerning wisdom, but the mind of a tathāgata arises without formations, and should be known to be like an emanation."

"Bhagavān, it being the case the dharmakāya of the tathāgatas is free from all action of formations, on the other hand, do mental factors arise without the action of formations?"

"Mañjuśrī, it is due to past cultivation of method and wisdom.

Mañjuśrī, one awakens [from sleep] because of the power of past formations, but though there are no formations for arising in the concentration on cessation, one arises [from concentration] only through the power of past formations. Just as like the mental factors of sleep and the concentration on cessation, the mental factors of the tathāgatas should be known to be formations of past cultivation of method and wisdom."

"Bhagavān, do the emanations of the tathāgatas have minds or not?"

"Mañjuśrī, Though they do not have minds, they are also not mindless, because minds are neither independent nor dependent."

In other words, the mind of a tathāgata is like an emanation, it appears to function in all the ways that a mind functions, but in reality, there are no present active formations happening. Everything that seems to happen in the mind of a Buddha is based on some past cultivation of method and wisdom on the path.

So Buddhas seem to have minds, but in reality, all they have is wisdom.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, April 27th, 2015 at 6:33 PM

Title: Re: What kind of mind do Buddhas have

Content:

Tsongkhapa said:

Buddhas' minds are non-conceptual but they do possess the five all-accompanying mental factors as this is the valid basis upon which mind is imputed. They have omniscience and therefore they also possess the object ascertaining mental factors.

Malcolm wrote:

and what is your citation for this?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, April 27th, 2015 at 7:42 AM

Title: Re: Dharmata teachings.

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

but they do have two kinds of omniscient wisdom (sarvajñāta jñāna).

BuddhaFollower said:

Which is synonymous with dharmakaya?

Malcolm wrote:

Both.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, April 27th, 2015 at 6:52 AM

Title: Re: Dharmata teachings.

Content:

fckw said:

Does anyone know what sort of practices he teaches? Apparently his background is Nyingma.

dzogchungpa said:

BTW, today he said that the only thing he has been teaching for the last ten years, which he is going to keep teaching for a very long time, is "Drop your mind".

Tsongkhapa said:
Become like a plank of wood - not very constructive!
Buddhas have minds.

Malcolm wrote:
What they have is jñāna, not vijñāna, it's a little different a "mind (citta)."

Buddhas do not have thoughts, they do not minds (citta) or mental factors (caitta), but they do have two kinds of omniscient wisdom (sarvajñāta jñāna).

Author: Malcolm
Date: Monday, April 27th, 2015 at 5:20 AM
Title: Re: Dharmata teachings.
Content:
fckw said:
Does anyone know what sort of practices he teaches? Apparently his background is Nyingma.

dzogchungpa said:
BTW, today he said that the only thing he has been teaching for the last ten years, which he is going to keep teaching for a very long time, is "Drop your mind".

Malcolm wrote:
Well, that makes for short Dharma talks. རང་སེམས་བབས་ཡོད་ཅིང་

Author: Malcolm
Date: Monday, April 27th, 2015 at 3:59 AM
Title: Re: Mahamudra in the Modern World
Content:
DesertDweller said:

Yes, we already know that is your view. But the question, which you haven't really answered, is how do you know that the Rinpoche doesn't think otherwise? It doesn't seem that you really do know. Can anyone clarify?

Malcolm wrote:
Garchen Rinpoche is a very traditional lama, who would never advocate that one can actually receive an empowerment from a chunk of inanimate metal and plastic that makes noise and projects an image.

He himself never said that this was a possibility.

Anyway, it cannot be done. It does not depend on this or that lamas opinion.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, April 27th, 2015 at 3:34 AM

Title: Re: Mahamudra in the Modern World

Content:

DesertDweller said:

Take for instance the issue of recorded empowerments, which I think were deemed acceptable by Garchen Rinpoche.

Malcolm wrote:

Um no...this was an example of enthusiastic over reach on the part of some of his students in one center. Many "innovations" happen this way.

Anders said:

I don't pay close attention, but last time i checked the quotes seemed to indicate the contrary.

How was it established it was students overreaching?

Malcolm wrote:

Because, in the end, when the Khenpo at the center where those students were making that assertion was pressed on the issue, he would not confirm that this in fact was Garchen Rinpoche's point of view.

Anyway, this is a stupid conversation — you cannot receive empowerments from a recording of an empowerment, period. End of story. Just like you cannot receive monks vows from a recording, and so on. People who think they have received an empowerment from a recording are just deluding themselves and received nothing whatsoever. Even if they recite mantras and practices they think they have received from a recording there will be no benefit whatsoever, in fact the opposite will be the case.

If you want to receive a vow, any vow, you have to do it in the proper way, and receiving them from a recording cannot be construed as proper at all.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, April 27th, 2015 at 2:32 AM

Title: Re: Kalachakra Tantra

Content:

EarthMudra said:

so is the Kalachakra Tantra considered Pure Vision?

Malcolm wrote:

What do you mean by pure vision?

EarthMudra said:

it was taught by the Buddha. I guess that answered my question. Thanks Malcolm.

Malcolm wrote:

If you are a Vajrayāna practitioner, then yes you think it was taught by the Buddha. The tantra itself was not actually written down at first, only much later, and there are a couple of versions a long one which we do not have, and the short one which we do have.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, April 27th, 2015 at 2:09 AM

Title: Re: Sakya lam-rim text?

Content:

Sherlock said:

Will you have an Abhidharma course soon?

If I have the money I am interested in participating.

Malcolm wrote:

Oh I don't know. Abhidharma takes about a year, twice month. And that is just a course in how to read the book, not a detailed, cover every point course.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, April 27th, 2015 at 1:12 AM

Title: Re: Sakya lam-rim text?

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

Same.

Malcolm wrote:

PM me your facebook ID's. I closed the group and am in the process of trimming it down.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, April 26th, 2015 at 9:43 PM

Title: Re: Healthy sex life as a householder

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

This has nothing to do with Buddhist Vajrayāna practice, FYI — this is a new age trip based on physical bliss. The aim of Vajrayāna is connate bliss, which is beyond any physical sensation.

Saoshun said:

Do you think you can have physical orgasm for couple days and months? New age do not touch this realm because they use spirituality to hijack woman into sex as excuse. There are various ways to attain body-samadhi which is beyond bliss which is nice state to transform body channels to more subtle things and siddhis, I don't know if this is Vajrayana view, I have only my personal experience. Also practices like this are not only exclusive to Vajrayana, any decent practice with time you develop (with proper instructions) experiences that suppress physical orgasm. (consider having orgasm couple days and months and just having it for couple seconds)

Malcolm wrote:

If it is physical, it is not that interesting, it is just mundane, and this is addressed and dismissed in the tantras such as the Hevajra Tantra:

The first bliss is the hero,
supreme bliss is the yoginī,
the bliss of intense pleasure is certain for all,
the true knowledge is from the method of their pleasure.
The pleasure of of bliss is slight, supreme bliss is more than that,
the bliss beyond bliss is free from attachment,
the remaining one is the connate.
The first is the desire to touch,
the second is the desire for pleasure,
the third is the perishing of passion,
therefore, the fourth can be meditated.
Supreme bliss is called existence,
the bliss beyond bliss is called nirvana,
the middle is mere bliss,
the connate is free of these.

Without desire, and not without desire, nothing perceived in the middle,
Here there is no method and wisdom,
the appearance of true reality, can't be described by another, the connate cannot be found anywhere, but one can understand it in dependence on the Guru, time and method, and from one's merit.
YMMV.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, April 26th, 2015 at 9:27 PM

Title: Re: Mahamudra in the Modern World

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The Sakyong has integrated the Shambhala teachings into the Buddhist path over all, rebranding their lineage as Shambhala Buddhism.

smcj said:

Does it still end up at Vajrayana?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, of course, but rather than Shambhala teaching being a separate path, they are now integrated. So there is a Shambhala ngondro, etc., all culminating in Gesar practice, the so called Werma sadhana, along with other practices authored/revealed by CTR

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, April 26th, 2015 at 8:24 PM

Title: Re: Kalachakra Tantra

Content:

EarthMudra said:

so is the Kalachakra Tantra considered Pure Vision?

Malcolm wrote:

What do you mean by pure vision?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, April 26th, 2015 at 8:21 PM

Title: Re: Healthy sex life as a householder

Content:

Lazy_eye said:

Just to clarify, though, must the partner also be a Vajrayana practitioner?

Malcolm wrote:

For a Vajrayāna practitioner, yes. Reduces the pool of choices a bit though...

Lazy_eye said:

Also, would you say the answer you gave is consistent with all schools of Buddhism

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, I think so. In addition, no minors, spouses partners of others, crazy people. Sex is normal, but it must be conducted responsibly and with care.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, April 26th, 2015 at 8:11 PM

Title: Re: Healthy sex life as a householder

Content:

duckfiasco said:

What does having a healthy relationship with sex mean to you as a householder?

Malcolm wrote:

It means having a woman I like, in my bed, consensually, in a long term relationship.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, April 26th, 2015 at 7:58 PM

Title: Re: Healthy sex life as a householder

Content:

duckfiasco said:

What does having a healthy relationship with sex mean to you as a householder?

Jetavan said:

Fortunately, all the answers are in the "Kamma Dhamma Sutta". Unfortunately, this sutta was considered irrelevant by the early bhikkhus and was not written down.

Fortunately, the upasaka/upasika oral transmission of this sutta has continued into the 21st century. Unfortunately, I cannot share it with anyone just yet. Fortunately, look for it in 2017, at a bookstore near you.

Saoshun said:

If someone wants to have fulfilled sex life I suggest to use tantric methods to prolong orgasm for couple days to couple months and it will develop high level samadhi, but it's need big discipline and already at least medium level achievement of meditation, empty mind, clean prana/chi channels.

Malcolm wrote:

This has nothing to do with Buddhist Vajrayāna practice, FYI — this is a new age trip based on physical bliss. The aim of Vajrayāna is connate bliss, which is beyond any physical sensation.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, April 26th, 2015 at 7:48 PM

Title: Re: Mahamudra in the Modern World

Content:

smcj said:

In that presentation what, if anything, comes after Shambhala? Or is it presented as a path to full enlightenment?

Malcolm wrote:

The Sakyong has integrated the Shambhala teachings into the Buddhist path over all, rebranding their lineage as Shambhala Buddhism.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, April 26th, 2015 at 7:46 PM

Title: Re: is vajrayana budhism a path of renunciation or isn't it?

Content:

pael said:

If it isn't can they be monk or holder of 5 vows?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, of course.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, April 26th, 2015 at 12:37 AM

Title: Re: Gaden mahamudra (kagyu/gelug mahamudra)

Content:

dharmagoat said:

Dōgen lived in Japan in the 13th century,

Malcolm wrote:

What I meant was that Dogen did not seem to think that his Shikantaza was innovative or his own approach.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, April 25th, 2015 at 11:20 PM

Title: Re: Gaden mahamudra (kagyu/gelug mahamudra)

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

... in Soto Zen, for example, "Just sitting" is considered Buddhahood itself.

dharmagoat said:

Could this be a later development in Ch'an/Zen?

Malcolm wrote:

Dogen didn't seem to think so.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, April 25th, 2015 at 11:13 PM

Title: Re: Gaden mahamudra (kagyu/gelug mahamudra)

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

In other words, in Kagyu mahāmudra practice, you have to develop one-pointedness first, then non-proliferation, then one taste, etc. Whereas in Soto Zen, for example, "Just sitting" is considered Buddhahood itself.

dharmagoat said:

I suspect this is an oversimplification of Soto Zen.

"One taste" does occur in the Zen literature, as far as I am aware.

Malcolm wrote:

Talk to some Soto folks.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, April 25th, 2015 at 10:46 PM

Title: Re: Gaden mahamudra (kagyu/gelug mahamudra)

Content:

dharmagoat said:

What do you base that on? I ask so that I may get a better idea of why it is so unlikely.

Malcolm wrote:

There are two places where the term mahāmudra is used; the first is in Yoga tantra, where it refers primarily to the form of the deity. The second is in anuttarayoga tantra where it is described as the siddhi of mahāmudra, an accomplishment, the attainment of Buddhahood.

In other words, the term arises solely in connection with Vajrayāna practice.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, April 25th, 2015 at 10:39 PM

Title: Re: Gaden mahamudra (kagyu/gelug mahamudra)

Content:

Sherlock said:

What makes you even think there is a direct link between Chan and Mahamudra?

dharmagoat said:

The similarity is plain for everyone to see.

Malcolm wrote:

How so? Mahāmudra (as in four yogas of mahāmudra) as practiced in the Kagyu tradition is a gradual approach based as much on the Bhavanakrama as it is the dohas; Chan/Zen is always a sudden approach.

In other words, in Kagyu mahāmudra practice, you have to develop one-pointedness first, then non-proliferation, then one taste, etc. Whereas in Soto Zen, for example, "Just sitting" is considered Buddhahood itself.

DG, have you ever received teachings on any of this? It just seems to me that you are engaging in a lot of proliferation around these issues.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, April 25th, 2015 at 10:34 PM

Title: Re: Gaden mahamudra (kagyu/gelug mahamudra)

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

But given that the term "mahāmudra" never appears in any sūtra...

dharmagoat said:

Is it possible that Mahāmudra was a development of Chinese Mahāyāna that made its way back to India and was then appropriated by Vajrayāna without an acknowledgement of its origin?

Malcolm wrote:

Not a chance.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, April 25th, 2015 at 9:41 PM

Title: Re: Mahamudra in the Modern World

Content:

DesertDweller said:

Take for instance the issue of recorded empowerments, which I think were deemed acceptable by Garchen Rinpoche.

Malcolm wrote:

Um no...this was an example of enthusiastic over reach on the part of some of his students in one center. Many "innovations" happen this way.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, April 25th, 2015 at 9:35 PM

Title: Re: Gaden mahamudra (kagyu/gelug mahamudra)

Content:

qwerty13 said:

This is offtopic, but can somebody explain me in simple way what is the difference between sutra mahamudra and Zen/Chan buddhist practice? Both have prajnaparamita as essential text, but we cant say that Zen/Chan practitioner is actually mahamudra practitioner, or am I wrong?

Malcolm wrote:

In the end it boils down to whether mahāmudra is merely the nature of the mind, in which case there is no difference; or whether mahāmudra is a specific result, a siddhi, of a specific kind of practice, in which case there is a huge difference.

But given that the term "mahāmudra" never appears in any sūtra...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, April 25th, 2015 at 8:47 PM

Title: Re: Mahamudra in the Modern World

Content:

dharmagoat said:

As far as I know, Dr. Ray does not refer to his approach as 'modernist', so it would seem that the use of this term is a red herring as far as this thread is concerned.

Malcolm wrote:

Ummm, I don't think anyone did use it with respect to RR...I was addressing another issue which you introduced with your enthusiasm for "innovation."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, April 25th, 2015 at 8:05 PM

Title: Re: Mahamudra in the Modern World

Content:

DesertDweller said:

So what do we mean by "modernism"?

Modernism: A Roman Catholic movement, officially condemned in 1907, that attempted to examine traditional belief according to contemporary philosophy, criticism, and historiography.

Malcolm wrote:

Remove the "Roman Catholic", and you get my meaning.

Modernism: A movement that attempts to examine traditional belief according to contemporary philosophy, criticism, and historiography.

This is deeply incompatible with Vajrayāna.

Hence we can speak of Buddhist Modernism, people like Stephen Batchelor, etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, April 25th, 2015 at 7:17 PM

Title: Re: Mahamudra in the Modern World

Content:

Fruitzilla said:

I'll read his book, I'm curious enough. The difference between orthodoxy and modernism seems to be mostly about presentation and differences on focus IMHO.

Malcolm wrote:

In Vajrayāna there is no such thing as modernism. There is the lineage, and how the lineage presents the teachings. The lineage is unalterable and without a lineage there is no Vajrayāna to speak of.

Zen, for example, is a sūtrayāna teaching, and this while there is rhetoric about the lineage of patriarchs, ancient buddhas and so on, there is not a universally held idea that the lineage is something inviolable or absolutely necessary. Plenty of people practice Zen without the kind of guru devotion that characterizes Vajrayāna. Also these days many people practice Zen who really do not believe that Zen was actually passed down in a lineage from the time of the Buddha. There is more room for so-called "modernism" in Zen.

But in Vajrayāna, the Vajrayāna teachings are held to come directly from Buddha Vajradhara to our gurus. There is truly little point in trying to practice Vajrayāna if you don't believe this. The second thing is that one should have faith that one's root guru is actually a Buddha, or at least one should try to develop that sincere conviction over time. If one does not have this conviction, it is very difficult to make progress in Vajrayāna practice; but if one has this conviction, it becomes very easy.

Since there is no way to modernize this essential feature of Vajrayāna, Vajrayāna will always resist modernization.

For example, there is a well known story about how Naropa displayed a mandala in the sky to Marpa, and asked Marpa to whom he would prostrate, the guru or the mandala, Marpa, thinking that he saw his guru everyday, but never saw such miraculously manifested mandalas, chose to prostrate to the mandala...big mistake that cost Marpa his family lineage...

So, Mahamudra in the modern world is an impossibility, if by that one means, how can Mahamudra be adapted to fit modern society — it can't, we can only adapt ourselves to Mahāmudra, mahāmudra cannot be adapted to suit us.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, April 25th, 2015 at 9:47 AM

Title: Re: Mahamudra in the Modern World

Content:

dharmagoat said:

It is religious orthodoxy that I avoid, not tradition. I always been inspired by the line of innovators within the Kagyu tradition of Tibetan Buddhism, Tilopa, Nāropa, Milarepa, Marpa...

Malcolm wrote:

How can you possibly believe that these four masters were innovative in any way at all?

dharmagoat said:

Okay, maybe those four can't actually be called 'innovators', but they were transmitting a system that was new to Tibet at the time.

Malcolm wrote:

You Mean Marpa? Vajrayana had already been wide spread in Tibet for 200 years by the time Marpa went to India.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, April 25th, 2015 at 6:49 AM

Title: Re: Mahamudra in the Modern World

Content:

dharmagoat said:

It is religious orthodoxy that I avoid, not tradition. I always been inspired by the line of innovators within the Kagyu tradition of Tibetan Buddhism, Tilopa, Nāropa, Milarepa, Marpa...

Malcolm wrote:

How can you possibly believe that these four masters were innovative in any way at all?

Tilopa (Prajñābhada) was a Nalanda educated Pandita, as was Naropa. Marpa was a faithful student of Naropa, and Mila was his student in turn.

None of these masters innovated a thing.

Not only this, but Tilopa and Naropa are not just a "Kagyu" masters, though these days people certainly seem to have this misconception. They are shared also with Sakya, Gelug and old Kadampa, etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, April 25th, 2015 at 3:15 AM

Title: Re: Mahamudra in the Modern World

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

Ray seems like a good guy to me. If you can ignore Waylon Lewis, this is actually a pretty interesting interview:

Malcolm wrote:

Investigating a Vajrayāna teacher for twelve years seems like a good idea in this case...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, April 25th, 2015 at 2:36 AM

Title: Re: Gaden mahamudra (kagyu/gelug mahamudra)

Content:

cloudburst said:

It seems you are over-reaching here, RJ simply states that the 5DL was critical of the Panchen's interest in the Kagyu and their doctrines. The article itself concerns the fact that there is a debate over whether or not the Ganden mahamudra has any connection with Kagyu at all. Many Gelugpa believe that the mahamudra practices of Je Tsongkhapa were transmitted directly from Manjushri, therefore being critical of the Panchen regarding interest in Kagyu doctrines does not necessarily imply any criticism of so called Sutra Mahamudra.

Malcolm wrote:

Perhaps. You need to follow up and look at Samten Karmey's article where he reviews this issue. It seems pretty clear to me that the Fifth was very influenced by Sakya in this regard. [He was from a Sakya family, wrote important texts on Lamdre and Naro Khachod, etc.].

cloudburst said:

I'm interested, thanks. Do you have the title of the article?

Malcolm wrote:

It is in the footnotes of the first article.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, April 24th, 2015 at 11:52 PM

Title: Re: Gaden mahamudra (kagyu/gelug mahamudra)

Content:

cloudburst said:

It seems you are over-reaching here, RJ simply states that the 5DL was critical of the Panchen's interest in the Kagyu and their doctrines. The article itself concerns the fact that there is a debate over whether or not the Ganden mahamudra has any connection with Kagyu at all. Many Gelugpa believe that the mahamudra practices of Je Tsongkhapa were transmitted directly from Manjushri, therefore being critical of the Panchen regarding interest in Kagyu doctrines does not necessarily imply any criticism of so called Sutra Mahamudra.

Malcolm wrote:

Perhaps. You need to follow up and look at Samten Karmey's article where he reviews this issue. It seems pretty clear to me that the Fifth was very influenced by Sakya in this regard. [He was from a Sakya family, wrote important texts on Lamdre and Naro Khachod, etc.].

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, April 24th, 2015 at 11:37 PM

Title: Re: Mahamudra in the Modern World

Content:

DesertDweller said:

Well, that's an interesting point. Why do you think he might feel that way?

dzogchungpa said:

I don't know, maybe Malcolm can explain it to us.

Malcolm wrote:

He probably means it is not necessary to become an expert on scholastic arguments in the Kośa.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, April 24th, 2015 at 8:44 PM

Title: Re: Wandering in Samsara

Content:

godhead said:

I am very anxious to know as to dzogchen is a part of BUddhism or not?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, Dzogchen is part of Buddhadharma.

godhead said:

If yes then how does it contradict direct words of Guatam Buddha?

Malcolm wrote:

It doesn't, not at all.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, April 24th, 2015 at 7:46 PM

Title: Re: Gaden mahamudra (kagyu/gelug mahamudra)

Content:

cloudburst said:

Malcolm, in another thread you wrote: This sutra mahāmudra of the Panchen Lama was very controversial in Gelug, and still is, to some degree. The 5th Dalai Lama was very opposed to it, in fact.

This seems doubtful to me as the Panchen Lama was a guru of the Fifth. Do you have any support for this claim?

Malcolm wrote:

See Roger Jackson's article in Changing Minds: Contributions to the Study of Buddhism and Tibet in Honor of Jeffrey Hopkins.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, April 24th, 2015 at 2:52 AM

Title: Re: Gaden mahamudra (kagyu/gelug mahamudra)

Content:

qwerty13 said:

I have been reading book "Kagyu/gelug tradition of mahamudra" from here and there and there is one thing that I find difficult to understand. The mahamudra practices that are given in the root text (The main road of triumphant ones) contain two mahamudra methods, sutra and tantra. However nowhere in the text or in the related commentary there is anything said about receiving "pointing -out" instructions. Kagyu traditions have sutra mahamudra and there is a lot of talk about receiving pointing out instruction from qualified teacher.

But nothing is said about receiving pointing-out instructions in context of Gaden mahamudra practice. Why is this? Are they unnecessary here? I thought these are necessary in sutra mahamudra practice.

Malcolm wrote:

The text is the pointing out instruction. It is not a direct introduction like what you receive in Dzogchen. Nor is it an introduction such as you receive in the four empowerments. Of course the fact that the text says:

Meditate next on a profound path of guru-yoga and, after making hundreds of very strong, fervent requests, dissolve your visualized guru into yourself.

This automatically means you must be someone who has received niruttarayoga tantra empowerment. There is no guru without a such an empowerment, so how can one speak of guru yoga? Guru Yoga is a method exclusive to higher tantra, the name of which is not encountered in lower tantra much less sūtra.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, April 24th, 2015 at 2:04 AM

Title: Re: practicing alone

Content:

Yuren said:

No offense meant but Malcolm's orthodox catechism reminds me why I never want to get involved with Tibetan Buddhism, at least its institutional form.

To answer OP's question, Reginald Ray created an audio course on Mahamudra, he even gives Ground Mahamudra Transmission in it.

Malcolm wrote:

Ground Mahāmudra transmission? What a joke! You already have ground mahāmudra, how can someone give you something you already have!

Yuren said:

The idea that transmission cannot work remotely is of course mere superstition.

Malcolm wrote:

The idea that you can receive transmission from a recording is complete nonsense.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, April 24th, 2015 at 1:46 AM

Title: Re: practicing alone

Content:

Tsongkhapa said:

...why wouldn't they seek out a qualified spiritual guide and learn at their feet instead of practising 'internet Dharma'?

Malcolm wrote:

Well, because it is much easier to surf the web while listening... and less obtrusive than surfing the web on your smart phone...

dzogchungpa said:

Oh snap!

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, April 24th, 2015 at 1:36 AM

Title: Re: practicing alone

Content:

Tsongkhapa said:

...why wouldn't they seek out a qualified spiritual guide and learn at their feet instead of practising 'internet Dharma'?

Malcolm wrote:

Well, because it is much easier to surf the web while listening... and less obtrusive than surfing the web on your smart phone...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, April 24th, 2015 at 1:16 AM

Title: Re: practicing alone

Content:

Yuren said:

The orthodox catechism of Malcolm reminds me why I never want to get involved with Tibetan Buddhism, at least its institutional form.

Malcolm wrote:

Right, because our own concepts are just so much better and effective...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, April 24th, 2015 at 1:16 AM

Title: Re: practicing alone

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The special view of Lamdre is called the inseparability of samsara and nirvana. This view can only be meditated upon after one has received the cause Hevajra empowerment. It is meditated upon prior to engaging in the meditations of the creation and completion stage. The way this is meditated is through thirty-two examples which establish phenomena as mind, mind as an illusion and illusion as natureless. Not only this but there is an inseparability of samsara and nirvana of the path and also an inseparability of samsara and nirvana of the result.

M

WeiHan said:

Hi Malcohlm,

I have received Lam Dre but there are just some subtle points which I cannot make the connection and it is not apparent in the teaching. Regarding the above paragraph, do you mean the 32 examples are a method to meditate on the inseparability of samsara and nirvana of the basis. And then there is a method to meditate on this same view when on the path which is called the inseparability of samsara and nirvana of the path. And then the final fruition, realizing the view in actuality is called the inseparability of samsara and nirvana of the result?

I just need the above general clarification. Thanks in advance.

Malcolm wrote:

it is a bit complicated to summarize.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, April 24th, 2015 at 12:30 AM

Title: Re: practicing alone

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Not only this but there is an inseparability of samsara and nirvana of the path and also an inseparability of samsara and nirvana of the result.

M

WeiHan said:

Hi Malcolm,

inseparability of samsara and nirvana of the path inseparability of samsara and nirvana of the result.

What does the above mean?

Malcolm wrote:

You need to take Lamdre and find out.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, April 23rd, 2015 at 11:50 PM

Title: Re: practicing alone

Content:

sherabpa said:

I read you yourself recently advising someone to pay close attention during the vase initiation of Vajrakilaya given by HHST, I think it was. But yeah, I agree it is possible to miss the empowerment entirely while being physically present.

Malcolm wrote:

I advised them to pay careful attention through all four empowerments...

dzogchungpa said:

Yes, starting tomorrow!

Malcolm wrote:

Vajradhara in person:

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, April 23rd, 2015 at 11:40 PM

Title: Re: practicing alone

Content:

sherabpa said:

I read you yourself recently advising someone to pay close attention during the vase initiation of Vajrakilaya given by HHST, I think it was. But yeah, I agree it is possible to miss the empowerment entirely while being physically present.

Malcolm wrote:

I advised them to pay careful attention through all four empowerments...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, April 23rd, 2015 at 11:39 PM

Title: Re: practicing alone

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The only way to extract the butter of mahāmudra is to take the milk of the nature of the mind and churn it with the two stages. Other than that, there is no way to realize mahāmudra.

sherabpa said:

What then is the purpose of guru yoga in Sakya? If it is not to enter directly into the wisdom of mahamudra during empowerment, without any need for the two stages, what purpose does it serve? Is it not the case that the two stages are only for those who do not attain mahamudra in the actual empowerment.

Malcolm wrote:

Guru Yoga can produce a wisdom that resembles the wisdom produced by the two stages, indeed, but really, this is only for the people of highest capacity or who have developed their capacity through much practice. And of course, to be qualified to practice guru yoga, one should have received all four empowerments in a proper way.

Sadhana practice is indeed for those who do not manage to attain buddhahood during the empowerment. People misunderstand empowerments, thinking they are merely a method of introducing this or that practice. Actually, empowerments are meant to cause people to attain buddhahood; failing that, they practice sadhanas with the two stages and guru yoga.

The reality of it is however that very few people in history have attained buddhahood during an empowerment, or even the bhumis.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, April 23rd, 2015 at 11:34 PM

Title: Re: practicing alone

Content:

sherabpa said:

Thanks for responding.

Malcolm wrote:

Of course this ignores the important point that Naropa was already a Vajrayāna practitioner by the time he met Tilopa.

sherabpa said:

Implying this was a prerequisite for his receiving the wisdom blessing of Tilopa. This transmission was not a practice based on previous initiations, but a wisdom empowerment. All that was needed was his devotion to Tilopa. According to Situ, there are many examples in India and Tibet of such transmissions. However, this method was apparently a specialty of Gampopa.

Malcolm wrote:

The point is that the cause empowerment tills the field which makes the student a proper basis. The idea all the previous Varjayāna training and practice that Naropa had undergone had no bearing on his time with Tilopa is simply ludicrous. For example, Amyezhab records in his history of Cakrasamvara, that following his meeting with the old lady who had eighteen characteristics of ugliness, since Naropa doubted whether she was a dakini or not, he did an accomplishment retreat of seven hundred thousand near essence mantras of Cakrasamvara to confirm this. Thus, the idea that Naropa was not a very advanced Varjayāna practitioner when he met Tilopa really is not correct nor is the idea that his previous practice had not prepared him for his time with Tilopa. Also Tilopa aka Prajñabhadra, realized Mahāmudra through the two stages of Cakrasamvara having received it from his guru, Antarapa.

Yes, I am aware that there is a Kagyu tradition that Tilopa was an emanation which is found in Gampopa's brief bio.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, April 23rd, 2015 at 10:29 PM

Title: Re: practicing alone

Content:

BuddhaFollower said:

Is that HYT?

Can we classify the result as Mahamudra?

Malcolm wrote:

Lamdre speaks about a basis, a path and a result.

The basis is the ālaya cause continuum — this is exactly the same thing Kagyus call "ground mahāmudra." It is nothing more nor less than the nature of the mind.

In Lamdre, when ālaya, aka the inseparability of clarity and emptiness, is approached via sūtra methods in the Triple Vision teachings, one meditates upon it via śamatha and vipaśyāna. In the beginning, in terms of śamatha, one uses an external object, a blue flower, then a blue cloth or the sky and finally, one focuses inwardly on the naked clarity of the mind itself. In terms of the vipaśyāna, one establishes that the appearances are mind, the mind is illusory and dependently arisen, and finally that dependent arising is natureless and free from all extremes. When one is capable of resting in the naked clarity of the mind in conjunction with the insight that this clarity is empty and free from extremes, this is called the union of śamatha and vipaśyāna. However, this is merely a sutrayāna meditation and will not lead to Buddhahood in a single lifetime no matter how good a meditation it may be. As the Nalendra Khenpo, Ngawang Lodo states in his Lamp of the Path of Freedom and Omniscience:

In one's experience, the unceasing stream of mere clarity and mere awareness is empty at the time of being clear and clear at the time being empty — do not grasp clarity or emptiness. Rest wholly, nakedly and freely in the state that is free from extremes, without divisions, inexpressible and beyond thought.

But this is not the state of mahāmudra nor is it the realization of mahāmudra.

The special view of Lamdre is called the inseparability of samsara and nirvana. This view can only be meditated upon after one has received the cause Hevajra empowerment. It is meditated upon prior to engaging in the meditations of the creation and completion stage. The way this is meditated is through thirty-two examples which establish phenomena as mind, mind as an illusion and illusion as natureless. Not only this but there is an inseparability of samsara and nirvana of the path and also an inseparability of samsara and nirvana of the result.

Then there is the path method continuum, which is equivalent to so called "path mahāmudra" in the Kagyu system. This refers to the practice of the creation and completion stages.

Finally, there is the result mahāmudra continuum. This refers to the buddhahood that is the result of the two stages. This is equivalent to the result mahāmudra in the Kagyu system.

Now, it may be wondered, "Are these three continuums the same or are they different?" These three continuums are merely names for phases of a single continuum, much like the way Maitreyanath distinguishes between sentient beings, bodhisattvas and buddhas by labeling them respectively impure, pure/impure and pure. And as Jetsun Rinpoche points, the natural perfection of the qualities of buddhahood in the all-basis cause continuum or so called ground mahāmudra does not contradict transformation.

So you see it is not simply enough to realize the nature of the mind and call that "mahāmudra." In order to achieve a result, a path is called for. The only way to extract the butter of mahāmudra is to take the milk of the nature of the mind and churn it with the two stages. Other than that, there is no way to realize mahāmudra.

M

Author: Malcolm
Date: Thursday, April 23rd, 2015 at 9:19 PM
Title: Re: practicing alone
Content:
BuddhaFollower said:
Malcolm, how does Lamdre correlate with Highest Yoga Tantra?

Malcolm wrote:
Lamdre is an intimate instruction on the practice of the Hevajra Tantra.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Thursday, April 23rd, 2015 at 9:02 PM

Title: Re: practicing alone

Content:

sherabpa said:

Pardon me if I missed it, but I don't think anybody mentioned what Situ Panchen says about the situation.

On the point of whether there is a paramitayana mahamudra, he says there are two positions on it from 'our tradition' and neither one is official. The first is that the sutra system is for those who are not suitable to receive empowerments (for whatever reason) and so, by practicing paramitayana, it would prepare them to receive empowerments later on. This is nevertheless called 'sutra mahamudra'. Apart from the name, this is unobjectionable.

The second view is that the wisdom of paramitayana is itself the same as mahamudra. This is the controversial one since it destroys the distinction of paramitayana and mantrayana. Go Lotsawa is a good example of someone who asserted the second view, saying that Gampopa was able to produce mahamudra in people who had not attained empowerments and he provides a couple of scriptural citations to defend against Sapan's criticism.

Situ Panchen does not say whether he think Gampopa held either position but allows for both.

Situ Panchen also points out, perhaps more importantly, that 'empowerment' does not simply mean going through a ritual of some kind, but is essentially the guru's blessing of the transference of wisdom (ye shes pho ba'i byin labs). In this respect, the fourth initiation, that of mahamudra, can occur outside of what is normally understand by the term 'empowerment', i.e. a ceremony involving the four initiations, and indeed Tilopa's initiation of Naropa is an example of this kind of empowerment. Equally, one can sit through any number of elaborate ceremonies, but not have received empowerment, e.g. like a cat or dog. Sapan's claims about mahamudra and empowerment seem to overlook this detail.

Malcolm wrote:

Of course this ignores the important point that Naropa was already a Vajrayāna practitioner by the time he met Tilopa. As to your second claim, this is only possible if you sit there like a stone, and or refuse to participate at all, having something like a picnic instead, watching the ritual like a baseball game or as a form of entertainment, the way some non-Buddhist Westerners these days attend Kalacakra empowerments.

Go Lotsawa's opinion is noted, but it is just that, an opinion by a scholar who lived many centuries after Gampopa.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, April 23rd, 2015 at 8:06 PM

Title: Re: practicing alone

Content:

Astus said:

The difference between the purely sutric method and the Mahamudra method lies in whether there is pointing out the nature of mind or not, as mentioned above.

Malcolm wrote:

There are so many problems with this, I do not have time to even go into it. But according to you then, this instruction from Prajñāpāramita is mahāmudra: There is no mind in the mind, but the original nature of the mind is luminous

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, April 23rd, 2015 at 8:00 PM

Title: Re: practicing alone

Content:

Astus said:

As noted earlier, tantra uses an indirect method with deity yoga and the channels to reach buddha-nature, while Mahamudra goes there directly. .

Malcolm wrote:

This completely false. You really have no idea what you are talking about now. In Vajrayāna, pointing out the nature of the mind, the all-basis (ālaya) and recognizing it, is the foundation for creation and completion stage practice. Mahāmudra is not just the nature of the mind.

If it were as you say, we would have examples of Indian Mahāsiddhas who attained buddhahood on the basis of merely meeting someone and having a discussion, but we don't, training gradually in śāmatha and vipaśyāna.

What we do have are examples of mahāsiddhas, very many in fact, who attained awakening and realized mahāmudra during the process of receiving the four empowerments. We have many other examples of mahāsiddhas who, having received the four empowerments, practiced the two stages and swiftly realized mahāmudra and so attained buddhahood. We have no examples of any Indian mahāsiddhas who did either based on a mere conversation, or through merely practicing śāmatha and vipaśyāna, whether sprinkled with pithy saying from the dohas or not.

So I guess, Tibetans must have much higher capacity than Indians, because according to you, these vaunted Tibetans are capable of realizing Mahāmudra based on sutrayāna conversations, sprinkled with dohas, merely practicing śāmatha and vipaśyāna. But the reality is, no one realized mahāmudra without practicing the two stages, including Gampopa.

Astus said:

Also, the fourth empowerment is generally equated with the pointing out instruction

Malcolm wrote:

Which pointing out instruction? Whose? What precise text? If you intend the means of pointing the "sūtra" mahāmudra system, for example, in Bokar Rinpoche's famous condensation of the 7th Karmapa's long Mahāmudra text, this is in no way shape or form equivalent with the fourth empowerment.

Astus said:

As above, the specialty of Gampopa's Mahamudra is the direct introduction without empowerment.

Malcolm wrote:

It is not a direct introduction, it is a gradual introduction, that takes many sessions, like all sutra-based systems. You yourself admitted that Gampopa's "mahāmudra" was "sutra" mahāmudra.

Now, when it comes to essence mahāmudra, there is an empowerment (the descent of the wisdom vajra empowerment) based in Indrabhuti's famous text, the Jñānasiddhi, and this is in fact a direct introduction, just like the fourth empowerment.

All I can conclude from this discussion, Astus, is that you are not really very clear on the difference between "pointing out instructions", which is gradual, and "direct introduction," which is immediate.

Further, what you seem to fail to understand is that in actual practice, in general the Kagyus all practice creation and completion stage, combine the four yogas of mahāmudra with the completion stage, and practice the main practice of essence mahāmudra, Guru Yoga.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, April 23rd, 2015 at 9:35 AM

Title: Re: practicing alone

Content:

DesertDweller said:

I'm not at all interested in finding a lama, becoming a disciple in the Vajrayana tradition, etc. As I said, I'm coming from a Chan/Zen background and am merely interested in learning "about" Mahamudra as a sort of comparative activity and "enhancement" to my Zen meditation. My ideas about Mahamudra were essentially informed by various comments I have seen from Zen practitioners and teachers to the effect that Mahamudra is sort of like "Tibetan Zen" and is worth "looking into". Taigen Dan Leighton, for example, in his introduction to his translation of Master Honzhi, notes what he perceives to be the great similarities between Silent Illumination meditation and Mahamudra. Others have recommended various Mahamudra books as useful ways of looking at Zen from a different angle that is essentially the same. Now this is what I've been hearing. As to whether Mahamudra and Zen are really the same in essence is something that I'm not qualified to answer with any authority, though to be honest, based on several descriptions of Mahamudra that I have read, I really can't see much difference. I know that Tantric practitioners will squirm at such a statement, and it may open up a whole 'nother can of worms, but that's my honest impression. As for empowerments, etc, as a non-Vajrayana practitioner I can't say I'm at all convinced by the assumption that the highest enlightenment isn't possible without 'em, based on Sutra methods alone. I have nothing against Tantra, but I won't buy into the polemic that it offers some sort of enlightenment that isn't available to someone who just follows the Diamond Sutra, etc.

Malcolm wrote:

We don't squirm, we just understand that you are looking at sugar rather than tasting it.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, April 23rd, 2015 at 8:33 AM

Title: Re: practicing alone

Content:

Tsongkhapa said:

That's where you'd be completely wrong Cone. Don't be so sectarian.

Many people think that Je Tsongkhapa was a great scholar but he was also a great Yogi.

Conebeckham said:

I never said he wasn't a great Yogi. Let me ask you, though--is your Mahamudra tradition that called the "Kagyu/Genden Tradition" or "Kagyu/Geluk" tradition? Or is it that which your New Kadampa tradition calls "Mahamudra Tantra, and which is "ONLY" the result of Highest Yoga Tantra? The Clear Light Mind of Bliss that realizes Emptiness, as I believe it's described?

Malcolm wrote:

It, Genden Mahamudra, begins with the First Panchen Lama, but claims to depend on an oral transmission through Gyalwa Ensapa — which may very well be true, since Samten Karmey found an eighty folio book in Bhutan titled "The Genden Miraculous Volume" that consisted of pithy instructions which comes through Ensapa, a text which seems not to have survived in Tibet.

This sutra mahāmudra of the Panchen Lama was very controversial in Gelug, and still is, to some degree. The 5th Dalai Lama was very opposed to it, in fact.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, April 23rd, 2015 at 8:27 AM

Title: Re: practicing alone

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

It does not in any way shape or form go beyond Prajñāpāramita, and since there is no empowerment, there is no experiential view to be cultivated. As Khenpo Tsultrim Gyatso told me, and as you can confirm by reading Kongtrul, sūtra mahāmudra was invented for those Gampopa deemed unready for Secret Mantra.

conebeckham said:

Malcolm--Khenpo Tsultrim Gyamtso is one of my teachers, and in fact one of my Mahamudra teachers. I will partly confirm your claim--Khenpo-la specifically told me that Sutra Mahamudra wasn't even a "term" until Kongtrul's time, if I recall.

Malcolm wrote:

That is not true, Sakya Pandita definitely rejects a so called "sūtra mahāmudra", and his teacher, Jetsun Rinpoche states quite clearly:

Having accepted Secret Mantra as Dharma, without possessing the ripening path abhisheka and separated from points of the liberating path method, because one does not meet a Lord of Secret Mantra;
also leave Mahāmudra Dharma and go!

conebeckham said:

But the techniques Gampopa used, guiding some students based on instructions without an explicit empowerment, was not felt by Khenpo-la to be "incorrect."

Malcolm wrote:

It is not incorrect, it just wont lead to the realization of actual mahāmudra sans empowerment no matter how fantastic a meditation it is.

conebeckham said:

Khenpo-La himself referred to Maitripa's tradition, and Saraha's instructions. He noted that both of these Mahasiddhas were indeed Tantrikas, but he felt that did not mean that the paths they outlined, and the paths that Gampopa drew from, must be preceded by empowerment.

Malcolm wrote:

If it is not preceded by empowerment, then you can be certain that it will not result in Mahāmudra realization, which is something very precise and specific. And indeed, those mahasiddhas are in accord with that view, as Brunholzl himself also admits.

conebeckham said:

In fact, much of what Gampopa drew from, for this "guidance system," was from the Kadam, as I said earlier, and Brunholzl fleshes this out more completely.

Malcolm wrote:

That is interesting, but it does not change the basic facts. Kagyus in general tend to rely on three authors to argue their claim that there can be a mahāmudra that does not depend Secret Mantra methods, but when you actually examine the texts of what those three authors say — Vajrayāna practitioners writing about Madhyamaka — it is a very slim and contrived argument. And of course Sapan addresses this issue as well. And BTW, this idea is not universally embraced by all Kagyus. For example, the Drikungpas do not really take this approach to mahāmudra at all.

conebeckham said:

Most Kagyupas, in fact, recognize Gampopa as an innovator. All the Kagyu Lamas I've talked with, about this issue, will readily admit this. With pride.

Malcolm wrote:

Sure, why not? He was innovative, it is not so much Gampopa that is the problem as it is how he was variously interpreted — for example, Lama Shang. But for sure, Gampopa's system was unknown to Milarepa, Marpa, Naropa, Tilopa and so on.

And, for what it is worth, these issues need to be hashed out again and again...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, April 23rd, 2015 at 8:02 AM

Title: Re: practicing alone

Content:

BuddhaFollower said:

Malcolm,

Are you are saying Mahamudra is the term for Buddhahood that is the result of Highest Yoga Tantra's 4 empowerments, 2 stages and/or guru yoga?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, in essence.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, April 23rd, 2015 at 4:59 AM

Title: Re: practicing alone

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

Greetings friends.

A question: while it goes without saying that having a teacher is always best, is it possible to study and practice Mahamudra on one's own, at least until such a time as a teacher can be found? Is it a discipline which requires empowerments, etc.? If it is possible to practice without a teacher, what are some helpful resources available online?

Any insight on this will be most appreciated.

Here's the OP's question again.

I intuit the answer here is something like "sure, you can practice Shamatha , but hey, find a teacher".

I don't think (correct me if i'm wrong) the OP really had in mind whether or not he could achieve Mahamudra, or receive blessings in Vajrayana sense by practicing some techniques from Barth's manual or similar. I had to study Vajrayana writings, get empowerments, and ask lots of questions for a year before I even could properly contextualize what "Mahamudra" even means..still not even sure I get some of the nuances behind how the term is used. I believed in the beginning it was simply a type of meditation - and I am assuming that this is how the OP is framing it, since he is not a Vajrayana practitioner.

So it begs the question, what (if any) usefulness could be gleaned from that kind of practice without a teacher? Further, since some of those techniques (following breath, just sitting etc.) have equivalents in other (sutra) Buddhist traditions, and are certainly publicly taught to those without initiation, bot within Vajrayana and outside of it, why would this be different than practicing those?

Basically, to move the thread along...should he not practice at all if he's not going to find a teacher? That is what it sounds like people are saying in places, if that isn't what people are saying, then can the message be clarified for the sake of the thread?

Malcolm wrote:

The answer is no, it is not possible to study and practice Mahāmudra on one's own. Hell, not even the Dharma in general can be practiced without a teacher. Studied, yes; practiced, no.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, April 23rd, 2015 at 4:18 AM

Title: Re: practicing alone

Content:

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

Mahamudra can only exist in the minds of students who have fully committed themselves to the vajrayana path alone...

Trungpa

Malcolm wrote:

It's nice to know that Trungpa and I have the same point of view on this.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, April 23rd, 2015 at 4:17 AM

Title: Re: practicing alone

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Well, which "prajñāpāramitā" is he discussing? The practice of prajñāpāramita? Or the result, Prajñāpāramita?

Astus said:

Gampopa writes: "Setting the mind this way is the unmistakable method of practicing wisdom awareness." (p 249) and where he gives the list of all those things he beings with: "When one is endowed with the meaning of emptiness, there is not a single thing which is not included in this path." (p 252) In the commentaries by Ringu Tulku and Thrangu Rinpoche they both talk about resting in the natural state as taught in Mahamudra.

Malcolm wrote:

Settling mind in what way? In which path is everything included? How is this path introduced, can you just look it up on the internet?

Astus said:

The difference between sutra and tantra in terms of Mahamudra are quite practical: "According to Mahamudra teachers, the sutric Mahayana approach uses external phenomena as the object of vipashyana meditation, whereas the tantric Mahayana approach of Mahamudra uses the mind itself as the object."
(<http://www.lionsroar.com/meditating-on-the-mind-itself/>).

Malcolm wrote:

How is that possible? Have these teachers never heard of Yogacara? And even here, why make a distinction between the tantric Mahāmudra approach and the sūtra Mahāyāna approach if in reality they are both "mahāmudra"?

Astus said:

Also,

"Gampopa said that there are three different paths with different practices, but these three paths have the same nature. These are taking inference as the path, taking blessings as the path, and taking direct experience as the path. Taking inference as the path refers to, for instance, the various reasonings set forth in the Madhyamaka that show that all things are neither single nor multiple. Taking blessings as the path refers to, for instance, meditation upon the body of a deity or the practices involving the subtle channels and subtle energies. Taking direct perception as the path is mahamudra. Mahamudra is pointed out to us, and we recognize it, become accustomed to it, and take direct experience as the path.

We can also classify the different paths into three groups: the paths that abandon the ground, paths that transform the ground, and paths that recognize the ground. The first path of abandoning the ground is the vehicle of transcendent action of the sutra vehicle, in which some things are abandoned and others are remedies for those things to be abandoned. The second path, transformation of the ground, refers to the practices of the Vajrayana in which we purify our body and mind by meditating on our body being a deity. Our body is thus transformed into the pure body of the deity, and our mind is transformed from discursiveness into wisdom. In the third path, recognizing the ground, is mahamudra. We know that we do not need to abandon or transform the ground; rather, we know it as it is. When we know the ground as it is, we recognize all appearances as the magical display of the mind. Thus, mahamudra is a matter of using direct perception as the path. This is also called the quick path."

(Thrangu: Essentials of Mahamudra, p 78-79)

Malcolm wrote:

Drogmi Lotsawa states that the difference between sūtra and tantra is that tantra uses direct perception as the path. This direct perception is the basis of all Secret Mantra meditation and is the experiential view introduced in the very beginning during the empowerment, this is why Secret Mantra is a quick path. But there is no separate means of introducing this experiential view outside of the empowerment, there is no mahāmudra that exists outside of Vajrayāna.

Astus said:

As for the so called Sutra Mahamudra (that actually stands for Gampopa's Mahamudra):

"The meditation of Sutra Mahamudra essentially consists of resting one's mind, free of mental activity, in the state of nonconceptual wisdom. This is the fundamental definition of Sutra Mahamudra: mind resting in the state in which it experiences the dharmadhatu, which is the expanse or nature of all things. This resting is essentially a nonconceptual wisdom beyond all elaboration, or the unity of clarity and emptiness. In this context, one meditates in the following way: The object of one's meditation is luminosity free of any projections; the perceiving subject is the lack of mental engagement; and one meditates without mental engagement. There are many extensive explanations on meditating without mental engagement, found primarily in the teachings of Maitripa and Sahajavajra.

The Sutrayana approach to Mahamudra is seen as a very profound method because it does not require any of the sophisticated and complex tantric rituals, deity yoga visualization practices, or samayas. It is a simple sutra approach, yet it conveys the direct transmission of the tantric essence of awakening."

(Dzogchen Ponlop: Wild Awakening, 31-32)

Malcolm wrote:

It does not in any way shape or form go beyond Prajñāpāramita, and since there is no empowerment, there is no experiential view to be cultivated. As Khenpo Tsultrim Gyatso told me, and as you can confirm by reading Kongtrul, sūtra mahāmudra was invented for those Gampopa deemed unready for Secret Mantra.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, April 23rd, 2015 at 2:57 AM

Title: Re: practicing alone

Content:

Vasana said:

Regardless of whether one can practice Mahamudra without the empowerments and introduction, you can at least, as this thread has mentioned , realize Prajnaparamita, which in turn will lead to 'anuttara-samyak-sambodhi' as mentioned in the Mahāprajñāpāramitā Mañjuśrī parivarta Sūtra.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, but only after one has progressed through the five paths and ten stages, and that takes at minimum three incalculable eons, two just to reach the level of the eighth bhumi.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, April 23rd, 2015 at 1:55 AM

Title: Re: practicing alone

Content:

conebeckham said:

...guard our samayas...

Malcolm wrote:

Have to have received an empowerment to even have those.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, April 23rd, 2015 at 1:44 AM

Title: Re: practicing alone

Content:

conebeckham said:

People talk about "causing oneself harm" by trying to practice Tummo from a book, etc., but the harm of mistaking pith instructions can be potentially as damaging, I think.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, as for example the vast wasteland of the clueless leading the blind on the internet.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, April 23rd, 2015 at 1:40 AM

Title: Re: practicing alone

Content:

conebeckham said:

Well, Dzogchen, at least in theory, also does not rely on the "two stages" --at least in some presentations. Right? I grant you, it's "tantra," and not sutra, and no one ever claimed it was.....but it is an example of a "Vajrayana path" that, at least in theory, relies on Pith Instructions, Pointing Out, etc., sometimes even without the elaborations of The Four Empowerments and the Two Stages.

Malcolm wrote:

Dzogchen absolutely relies on empowerment, which is why it is considered part of Secret Mantra. This why The Mind Mirror Tantra states:

Where will there be accomplishment without relying on the empowerments of secret mantra? For example, it is like a boatman without a paddle, how will one be able to cross to the other side? If the empowerments are fully obtained, all secret mantras not accomplished will be accomplished.

Further, as we know, guru yoga is indispensable in Dzogchen.

conebeckham said:

I just don't see the value in getting hung up on defining whether or not a valid path can be ascribed to Sutra, Tantra, etc.

Malcolm wrote:

I think you be pretty upset if you bought a cd advertised as being the music of a virtuous bass player, and found out it was really bass kazoo they were talking about.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, April 23rd, 2015 at 12:57 AM

Title: Re: practicing alone

Content:

conebeckham said:

Moi? No, I just read stuff.

This is an endless "debate," actually, and all I can say is that I trust the words of my Gurus, and the methods they have transmitted.

Malcolm wrote:

The problem, dear Cone, is that you actually cannot practice sūtra mahāmudra even if you wanted to. You have received too many empowerments.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, April 23rd, 2015 at 12:56 AM

Title: Re: practicing alone

Content:

conebeckham said:

Quoting from "When the Clouds Part," Brunnholz, who quotes from Kongtrul's Treasury of Knowledge:

...In the Tatvavatara composed by the master Jnanakirti, it says: "Another name of mother Prajnaparamita is Mahamudra because it is the very nature of nondual wisdom." Thus, (Kongtrul) not only explains that the prajnaparamita taught in the sutras and the Mahamudra of mantra are synonyms, but he also explains these conventional terms: "As for those of highest capacities among the persons who exert themselves in the paramitas, when they perform the meditations of calm abiding and superior insight, even at the stage of ordinary beings, this grants them the true realization characterized by having it's origin in Mahamudra."

Kongtrul also goes on to note that important sources of this tradition came from the Kadampa lineage, in particular Atisha's "Pith Instructions on the Two Armors of Connate Union Mahamudra." Brunnholzl also notes Karmapa Mikyo Dorje's statement that this system of guidance is based on Atisha's Bodhipathapradipa. However, Mikyo Dorje says: "Nevertheless, in the approach of practice of most heart sons (of Gampopa), the instructions in Mahamudra are taught in such a way that they are preceded by conferring an empowerment. Thus, they hold (Mahamudra) to be the approach that is common to sutra and tantra."

This can be found in Brunnholzl's text, beginning on p. 155. He continues the discussion about Sutra sources.

Malcolm wrote:

This is akin to saying, "Vajravārāhī is another name for Prajñāpāramitā, therefore, I can practice Vajravārāhī without empowerment and I will achieve exactly the same result whether I have the empowerment or not." So are you willing to accept the consequence? If not, then you have to explain the difference between mahāmudra and Vajravārāhī. Why can't there be a "sūtra" Vajravārāhī if there can be a "sutra mahāmudra?"

conebeckham said:

Brunnholzl also refers to Sahajavajra's Tattvadasakatika as a source for the blending of Sutra and Mantra. And of course Maitripa's tradition of "Amanasikara" is seen as the core of Kagyu Mahamudra. Sahajavajra's position is that the "Sutra approach adorned with pith instructions" is inferior to the Secret Mantra approach, but superior to a "straight paramita" approach.

Malcolm wrote:

Right, as I said KB just rehashes Dieter-Matthis' book. Also for example, the Rigpa Rangshar tantra equates Dzogchen with Prajñāpāramitā, so now are we going to say that if we merely practice sutrayāna śamatha and vipaśyāna and sprinkle it with some pithy quotes from sems sde, this constitutes a "sūtra dzogchen"? C'mon...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, April 23rd, 2015 at 12:14 AM

Title: Re: practicing alone

Content:

dharmagoat said:

The important point in this thread is that there has been shown to be a system of Mahāmudrā that does not require empowerments as a prerequisite for practice.

Malcolm wrote:

No such system exists.

conebeckham said:

Read Brunnholzl's latest book on the Uttaratantrashastra and it's connection to Mahamudra for some interesting, and varied, opinions on this matter.

Malcolm wrote:

KB just goes over the same ground that Deiter-Matthis did in his book on the Go Lotsawa's treatment of the Uttarat Tantra.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, April 22nd, 2015 at 11:52 PM

Title: Re: practicing alone

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

If someone asserts there is an actual mahāmudra result outside of the practice of the two stages or guru yoga, that person is mistaken, regardless of their title, position or rank.

Astus said:

Well, that one was Gampopa. See how in the Jewel Ornament of Liberation he included all practices within prajnaparamita <http://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=111558#p111558>.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, which "prajñāpāramitā" is he discussing? The practice of prajñāpāramita? Or the result, Prajñāpāramita? For example, Vajrayāna is included in Mahāyāna, but this does not mean that the methods of Secret Mantra are found in common Mahāyāna. There is no fault in saying that reality called prajñāpāramita and the reality called "mahāmudra" are the same, but one indicates the result of practicing sūtra, and the other indicates the result of practicing Niruttara tantra. Even though mahāmudra is indeed mentioned in Yoga tantra, it does not mean the same thing as the term "mahāmudra" discussed for example by Saraha in his commentary on the Buddhakapala Tantra, and so on.

Astus said:

If the introduction to the nature of mind occurs outside the context of having received the four empowerments, that instruction does not go beyond prajñāpāramita meditation — which is a perfectly fine practice, but it is not mahāmudra. It is something like calling an ordinary geshe a "buddha" in order to arouse faith in his disciples.

...

However, meditating on the intimate instructions of mahāmudra divorced from completion stage practices and or the intense devotion of guru yoga is a slow path even if one has received the four empowerments in a proper way. If one has not received the four empowerments at all, the idea that one is going to realize mahāmudra is a completely hopeless fantasy, like wishing for a stone to be saturated with water because one leaves it in a pond.

If the view and the conduct are identical, how could the result be different because of the empowerments/guru yoga? Although, as above, all the empowerments and guru yoga are included in resting in the natural state, at least according to certain Mahāmudra teachers.

Malcolm wrote:

The intellectual view of sūtra and tantra (freedom from extremes) are identical, but their methods are different, their conduct is different and so on.

Since there is no method of directly introducing this so called "natural state" that can be found in sūtra, one must depend on the methods taught by the Buddha in the tantras. And if one must depend on the methods taught by the Buddhas in the tantras, for what reason can one claim that is beyond or outside the Vajrayāna?

There is only one ritual taught in common Mahāyāna that bears on our discussion in a real sense — that is the ritual of generating relative bodhicitta. Apart from that, the other rituals in Mahāyāna such as the recitations of dharanis and so in do not bear on our discussion.

Secondly, since there is no method in common Mahāyāna for introducing or generating ultimate bodhicitta at all, how can one claim there is a method in sūtra for introducing mahāmudra? Even the word "mahāmudra" does not exist in any sūtra. If you claim there is such a method of introducing mahāmudra outside of a Vajrayāna context, in what sūtra is it taught, what Indian master composed the method?

You might claim, suchness is the same whether we are discussing prajñāpāramitā or mahāmudra, and to that I will readily agree — but the issue is not about reality per se, it is about how that reality is realized, what method is used and where that method comes from. Even the results of sūtra and tantra are not the equivalent. For example, there is no discussion in sūtra of the seven limbs of the three kāyas — this is purely related to the result, mahāmudra. Just as for example, one can find only four wisdoms in sūtra, but there are five wisdoms mentioned in Vajrayāna, in sūtra the word "Vajradhara" is never heard, and likewise, the term "mahāmudra" does not occur even once. If you are going to say there is mahāmudra in sūtra, why stop there? Why not say there is a sutra connate bliss, a sūtra Dzogchen, a sūtra tummo, a sūtra consort practice, none of which require empowerments?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, April 22nd, 2015 at 10:10 PM

Title: Re: practicing alone

Content:

dharmagoat said:

The important point in this thread is that there has been shown to be a system of Mahāmudrā that does not require empowerments as a prerequisite for practice.

Malcolm wrote:

No such system exists.

dharmagoat said:

It would depend on whose scripture you believe. This is where it becomes an interschool squabble.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, you see this is the problem, because there are actually no scriptures which support such a notion. The controversy arose only in the 12th century when people asserted, without any basis at all in the tantras or the sūtras, that there was such thing as a) a mahāmudra that exists in sūtra b) a mahāmudra that is independent of Secret Mantra.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, April 22nd, 2015 at 10:09 PM

Title: Re: practicing alone

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Whose instructions? Which ones?

Astus said:

Wangchuk Dorje, Dakpo Tashi Namgyal, Tsele Natsok Rangdrol, Traleg Kyabgon, Khenchen Thrangu, Tsultrim Gyamtso, Tenzin Palmo, Ken McLeod.

Malcolm wrote:

If someone asserts there is an actual mahāmudra result outside of the practice of the two stages or guru yoga, that person is mistaken, regardless of their title, position or rank.

If the introduction to the nature of mind occurs outside the context of having received the four empowerments, that instruction does not go beyond prajñāpāramita meditation — which is a perfectly fine practice, but it is not mahāmudra. It is something like calling an ordinary geshe a "buddha" in order to arouse faith in his disciples.

If the introduction to the nature of the mind happens on the basis of the four empowerments, that introduction can swiftly lead to the realization of mahāmudra, especially because that introduction is based on the example wisdom the disciple experiences during the ritual of the four empowerments at certain points. When that subsequent introduction is combined with completion stage practices such as kumbhaka or the intense devotion of guru yoga, mahāmudra can be realized rapidly. However, meditating on the intimate instructions of mahāmudra divorced from completion stage practices and or the intense devotion of guru yoga is a slow path even if one has received the four empowerments in a proper way. If one has not received the four empowerments at all, the idea that one is going to realize mahāmudra is a completely hopeless fantasy, like wishing for a stone to be saturated with water because one leaves it in a pond.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, April 22nd, 2015 at 9:39 PM

Title: Re: practicing alone

Content:

dharmagoat said:

The important point in this thread is that there has been shown to be a system of Mahāmudrā that does not require empowerments as a prerequisite for practice.

Malcolm wrote:

No such system exists.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, April 22nd, 2015 at 8:30 PM

Title: Re: practicing alone

Content:

DesertDweller said:

It does sound like purely interschool squabbling to me, and squabbling over semantics. None of which is of interest to me. But you guys can feel free to knock yourselves out.

Malcolm wrote:

It is in fact an important point. For example, if you go to a store and buy a Gucci suit, but you later find out that you have been sold a cheap knockoff, you will not be happy. Likewise, if you receive some information about Dharma somewhere, and then find you have been misled, you will not be happy.

In general, you cannot practice the mahāmudra instructions of the Indian mahāsiddhas without a teacher. Even something like Gampopa's own system of the four yogas of Mahāmudra cannot be practiced without personal guidance from an experienced teacher.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, April 22nd, 2015 at 8:25 PM

Title: Re: practicing alone

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

These two ideas — that there is such a thing as mahāmudra in the sūtras, and that there is a mahāmudra path independent of Vajrayāna — are meritless delusions.

Astus said:

Do you think that the mahamudra instructions regarding seeing the nature of the mind are incorrect?

Malcolm wrote:

Whose instructions? Which ones?

Author: Malcolm
Date: Wednesday, April 22nd, 2015 at 8:22 PM
Title: Re: The Great Mantra
Content:

kalden yungdrung said:
-----OM MA TRI MU YE SA LE DU -----

Malcolm wrote:
The depicted mantra is actually,
A ṃ hūṃ ā a dkar sa le 'od a yang ṃ 'du

Author: Malcolm
Date: Wednesday, April 22nd, 2015 at 6:54 PM
Title: Re: practicing alone
Content:
dharmagoat said:
It sounds a lot like interschool squabbling to me.

Don't we just follow the line of our chosen school? For the purposes of this thread it is Kagyü Mahāmudrā.

Malcolm wrote:
The forum is labeled simply Mahāmudra, not Kagyu Mahāmudra. I checked before responding.

dharmagoat said:
So has this become a Gelug/Sakya vs. Kagyü thing?

Malcolm wrote:
I don't really think of it that way. Just because Sakya Pandita says something does not mean it has to be accepted. One must do one's research and see if what he or anyone says about anything has merit.

These two ideas — that there is such a thing as mahāmudra in the sūtras, and that there is a mahāmudra path independent of Vajrayāna — are meritless delusions.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Wednesday, April 22nd, 2015 at 6:47 PM
Title: Re: Sarvastivada Abhidharma and Theravada Abhidharma
Content:
daverupa said:

I'm trying to remember where I read, recently, the idea that perhaps the Sautrantikas didn't have an official Abhidhamma. I mean, everyone has abhidhamma in terms of their interpretation of Dhamma (up to and including Dharma; the Sautrantikas had some wild ideas despite not having official Abhidhamma books, to say nothing of the craziness of radical Theravadan momentariness & Sarvastivada 'time always exists' silliness...), but not all of the old schools came together to make a Scholastic Abhidhamma for themselves.

Malcolm wrote:

Sautrantikas measured the ideas of other schools in terms of whether they were justified on the basis of the Agamas or not. Where they were, they left them alone, where they were not, they criticized them. The Abhidharmakośa is a collection of mainly Sarvastivadin doctrines, the bhaṣyam is a critical commentary on those.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, April 22nd, 2015 at 6:45 PM

Title: Re: practicing alone

Content:

dharmagoat said:

It sounds a lot like interschool squabbling to me.

Don't we just follow the line of our chosen school? For the purposes of this thread it is Kagyü Mahāmudrā.

Malcolm wrote:

The forum is labeled simply Mahāmudra, not Kagyu Mahāmudra. I checked before responding.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, April 22nd, 2015 at 6:36 PM

Title: Re: practicing alone

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

"practicing Mahamudra" without a teacher...

Malcolm wrote:

...does not exist.

Mahāmudra is not a practice, it is a realization, a realization that comes from either practicing the two stages or guru yoga.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, April 22nd, 2015 at 6:34 PM

Title: Re: practicing alone

Content:

Tsongkhapa said:

...churning water will never produce butter.

Malcolm wrote:

Nor will grinding stone.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, April 22nd, 2015 at 6:33 PM

Title: Re: practicing alone

Content:

Astus said:

From a teaching by <http://www.samyeling.org/about/buddhism-and-meditation/teaching-archive-2/mingyur-dorje-rinpoche/vajrayana-and-empowerment/> (underlines added):

Within the Secret Mantra Vajrayana path there are two divisions. The first one is the path of skilful means and the second is the path of liberation. If we explain further what the path of skilful means is, there are various methods through which to realize directly our nature of mind. It is revealed to us through these various types of practice.

Malcolm wrote:

If it is a Secret Mantra Vajrayana path, it depends on empowerment.

Astus said:

The Vajrayana path can be divided into three sections. There is the development stage, completion stage and path of liberation (kyerim, dzogrim and drollam). Within these three paths one can decide whatever one likes to do, whatever one is feeling positive towards. But the best actually is the path of liberation.

Malcolm wrote:

If it is a Secret Mantra Vajrayana path, it depends on empowerment.

Yes, this is a mistaken tradition that cannot be defended in anyway whatsoever.

You mean you cannot accept the Dakpo Kagyu teaching of the white panacea, the method independent (and superior) of tantra, the path of liberation?

Correct, it is a completely mistaken teaching of Lama Shang.

Johnny Dangerous said:

you can use Mahamudra techniques, but their result and function would be like sutra meditation

If the techniques provided in Mahamudra cannot produce the results promised, how can they be even called Mahamudra?

Malcolm wrote:

The techniques for realizing mahāmudra are just the two stages and guruyoga, apart from that, there are no other techniques for realizing mahāmudra at all.

Johnny Dangerous said:

As for the actual basic methods, although there are many ways of asserting mahamudra, there are two when divided according to the sutras and tantras...

The former refers to the ways of meditating on voidness as directly indicated in the expanded, intermediate and brief (Prajnaparamita Sutras). The supremely realized Arya Nagarjuna has said, "Except for this, there is no other pathway of mind leading to liberation." Here I shall give relevant instruction on mahamudra in accord with these intentions of his and discuss the methods that lead you to know the mind, face to face, in keeping with the exposition of the lineage masters.

Malcolm wrote:

There is no such thing as mahāmudra in the sūtras. The term does not occur in sūtra at all, so how can it be a result in sūtra? This is just calling prajñāpāramitā "mahāmudra, but it is not real mahāmudra.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, April 22nd, 2015 at 6:25 PM

Title: Re: practicing alone

Content:

Tsongkhapafan said:

Mahamudra realisations depend upon the blessings received by relying upon a qualified Vajrayana spiritual guide through the practice of Guru Yoga, therefore it is impossible to gain realisations without having a Guru and without receiving a Highest Yoga Tantra empowerment and practising the two stages sincerely.

Malcolm wrote:

At least we agree on something.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, April 22nd, 2015 at 4:55 AM

Title: Re: practicing alone

Content:

Astus said:

From Mahamudra the Moonlight (2nd edition):

"On the other hand, if one follows venerable Gampopa's system in elucidating Mahāmudrā alone, it is not necessary to bestow the empowerment upon devotees. "

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, this is a mistaken tradition that cannot be defended in anyway whatsoever. Many have tried, none have succeeded, and this is why everyone who wishes to actually realize Mahāmudra has received empowerment and practiced the two stages, including Gampopa, and especially Tilopa, Naropa, Maitripa, Saraha, Shavaripa, you name it, all the Mahasiddhas of the past.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, April 22nd, 2015 at 4:54 AM

Title: Re: Medicine buddha sadhana "Drop of Ambrosia"

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

If you have the empowerment, you have the lung for the sadhana.

topazdreamz said:

Why do you say this? Is it generally understood that if one has the empowerment, one has the lung for any given practice?

Malcolm wrote:

Because during the empowerment the guru recites all the main parts of the sadhana to create the disciple in the form of the deity, as well as the refuge and bodhicitta that we recite with the master, and he gives the transmission of the mantra and so forth.

So yes, in general, if you have the empowerment, you have the lung.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, April 22nd, 2015 at 3:50 AM

Title: Re: practicing alone

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

I don't really see the contradiction Malcolm. He seems to be saying that it is of greater benefit to practice Ngondro is one is going to practice Mahamudra, but also saying that sutra level Mahamudra meditation instruction is available in some sense without them.

Since some teachers seem to teach "sutra Mahamudra", whether they class it as that or not, to me it stands to reason that one is better off doing that than doing nothing at all, whether or not they choose to undertake Ngondro or other tantric practice, get empowerments etc. This is doesn't seem unusual, for basic meditation instruction to be offered independent of any tantric practice. Granted the manual goes beyond that, but part of it is just basic shamatha etc. instruction..and the parts of the manual that go beyond that are labeled as such.

Malcolm wrote:

One cannot practice Guru Yoga in a real sense without empowerment. Ergo, it is a Vajrayāna path.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, April 22nd, 2015 at 3:36 AM

Title: Re: Medicine buddha sadhana "Drop of Ambrosia"

Content:

ratna said:

Since Garchen Rinpoche gave the empowerment from Namchö, the Stream of Lapis would indeed be appropriate. But I think it would be better to receive oral transmission for the sadhana.

R

qwerty13 said:

Yes, the reading transmission would be important for this practice. Well, I just have to keep my eyes open for that opportunity. I really, really love this sadhana.

Malcolm wrote:

If you have the empowerment, you have the lung for the sadhana.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, April 22nd, 2015 at 2:34 AM

Title: Re: practicing alone

Content:

DesertDweller said:

I've been looking at Peter Barth's manual

[http://www.mahamudracenter.org/MMCMemberMeditationGuide.htm#_Toc420995709], and it has actually cleared up quite a lot of confusion, the first being the status of Mahamudra as a complete path in itself, independent of ngondro, tantra, etc:.

Malcolm wrote:

Of course this person directly contradicts himself on the same page: He says: Certainly, Mahamudra can be practiced independent of the path of tantra or in conjunction with the path of tantra, however one chooses.

In the Kagyu lineage and other lineages of Tibetan Buddhism, the ordinary preliminaries are taught prior to meditations of the type included in this manual. These include reflection on and awareness of (1) the precious human existence, (2) impermanence, (3) cause and effect or karma, and (4) the prevalence of suffering (samsara). In addition, special preliminaries are taught as a foundation to tantric Mahamudra and tantric Dzogchen practice. These include (1) refuge and bodhicitta, (2) Vajra Sattva purification, (3) mandala offering, and (4) guru yoga. Dzogchen has its own set of preliminaries which in some schools include reflection on and awareness of the illusory body and the practice of heat yoga (tummo). Interestingly, practices similar to these are advanced practices of the Kagyu and Gelug/Kagyu lineages.

In any case, preliminaries are indispensable to the practitioner. It is commonly noted by teachers that the preliminaries are in no way less important than the main body of teachings. In fact it is said that the preliminaries are (1) helpful at the outset to get one to turn to the dharma, (2) helpful on the path to get one to persist in dharma practice, and (3) helpful at the end to help one complete realization. Thus, their importance should be underscored. Several excellent texts are now available for those who want to follow the Tibetan traditions within the context of individual lineages. Serious students should refer to these.

Vajrasattva is a Vajrayāna practice; mandala offerings and guru yoga are practices unique to niruttarayoga tantra. Without receiving empowerment into a mandala such as Hevajra, Cakrasamvara and so on, there is no Mahāmudra to speak of, much less realize. He declares first that Mahāmudra is an independent path, and then second that that Vajrayāna practices are indispensable for Mahāmudra.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, April 21st, 2015 at 9:10 PM

Title: Re: Rainbow Body - Why?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

After the high lama of Khyungpo Yundrung Palri, Chime Rigzin Rinpoche's mind departed into the dharmadhātu (bon dbyings), his remains remained just like that for the length of four weeks.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, April 21st, 2015 at 8:41 PM

Title: Re: dalai lama refuse rebirth vs bodhisattva vow

Content:

Simon E. said:

He didn't say that he wouldn't be reborn at all.

He said this may be his last birth as the Dalai Lama.

tobias said:

ok,

but how do you interpret that? I mean it is not but point to call this rebirth "Dalai Lama" as long as it's the rebirth of Buddha Chenrezig.

Malcolm wrote:

It means he is putting an end to the political institution of the Dalai Lama.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, April 21st, 2015 at 8:04 PM

Title: Kalacakra war prophecy

Content:
Malcolm wrote:
please see my post on the issue:

<https://www.dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=40&t=17283#p249776>

Author: Malcolm
Date: Tuesday, April 21st, 2015 at 6:52 AM
Title: Re: Did the 84 mahasiddhas practice Ngöndro?
Content:

Gyurme Kundrol said:
If this can be realized, really what use is Ngondro?

Malcolm wrote:
To realize this.

Gyurme Kundrol said:
but just keep our intention towards supreme enlightenment as pure as possible.

Malcolm wrote:
But isn't this a modification? And if you need this, then you need the rest of it.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Tuesday, April 21st, 2015 at 12:08 AM
Title: Re: Rainbow Body - Why?
Content:

Malcolm wrote:
"Rainbow body" is a name for what happens when the elements of body reverts back to their original nature as pristine consciousness as a result of the process of Dzogchen practice or completion stage practice. A key point of Vajrayāna is that there is no buddhahood that is not grounded in the body. Hence, the attainment of rainbow body, or the body of light, is regarded as proof that a practitioner has attained buddhahood. This is never mentioned in sūtra because sūtra has no methods of practice that involve the body as a vehicle for awakening.

Saoshun said:
Okay I agree, but the same things happen in samadhi but samadhi is stepping stone so I guess there must be master or guru who can relate to this point well.

Malcolm wrote:

Rainbow body is a result cultivating a very specific set of practices all of which involve skill in samadhi.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, April 21st, 2015 at 12:07 AM

Title: Re: Rainbow Body - Why?

Content:

Tenso said:

What is the difference between mahayana sambhogakaya and rainbow body?

Malcolm wrote:

The Mahāyāna Sambhogakāya is visible only to 8th stage bodhisattvas on up. While lesser rainbow body is only observable through the sign of the shrinking of the body after death, the so called great transformation body, rainbow body attained while still alive, is visible to everyone. Only a small handful of practitioners have achieved this result. Most practitioners of Vajrayāna, regardless of tradition, attain Buddhahood during the bardo.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, April 20th, 2015 at 11:48 PM

Title: Re: Did the 84 mahasiddhas practice Ngöndro?

Content:

Challenge23 said:

So yeah, Vajrasattva. Not a fan.

Malcolm wrote:

You just need to do more of it.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, April 20th, 2015 at 10:53 PM

Title: Re: Rainbow Body - Why?

Content:

Saoshun said:

Rainbow body is not enlightenment but definitely high level of achievement in form of skandha.

Malcolm wrote:

Umm, no. Rainbow body is the attainment of buddhahood.

Saoshun said:

If we look in the sense of skandhas it's skandha of form which was transformed into light so it cannot be counted as enlightenment as it's pretty logic. When you exhaust skandha of form you can dissolve and consciously be reborn which is great for bodhisattva path

These so-called 'transmutations of vijnana' are only changes of appellation and not a change of substance. - This argument of Hui neng is hard to beat.

But I trust your knowledge Malcolm and hope you can explain why this should be considered as Buddhahood.

Malcolm wrote:

"Rainbow body" is a name for what happens when the elements of body reverts back to their original nature as pristine consciousness as a result of the process of Dzogchen practice or completion stage practice. A key point of Vajrayāna is that there is no buddhahood that is not grounded in the body. Hence, the attainment of rainbow body, or the body of light, is regarded as proof that a practitioner has attained buddhahood. This is never mentioned in sūtra because sūtra has no methods of practice that involve the body as a vehicle for awakening.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, April 20th, 2015 at 8:52 PM

Title: Re: Rainbow Body - Why?

Content:

Saoshun said:

Rainbow body is not enlightenment but definitely high level of achievement in form of skandha.

Malcolm wrote:

Umm, no. Rainbow body is the attainment of buddhahood.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, April 20th, 2015 at 3:27 AM

Title: Re: who is an advanced buddhist and who is a beginner?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

But you do admit conventionally there is a person who practices a path, has realizations, manifests qualities and attains buddhahood correct?

muni said:

Conventional is, but not without absolute.

I again must say, Tsoknyi Rinpoche makes it clear.

Malcolm wrote:

So what is the point of saying, "It is "the one having" these qualities which isn't."

When you make such statements, you are then forced to contradict yourself because you then have admit, "Conventional is."

Which all then results in nothing but pointless verbiage.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, April 20th, 2015 at 3:07 AM

Title: Re: who is an advanced buddhist and who is a beginner?

Content:

muni said:

Yes. It is "the one having" these qualities which isn't.

Malcolm wrote:

Even conventionally?

muni said:

I find this explanation giving a contemplative light on how the idea of "a one" arises as an entity/identity:

<http://www.tsoknyirinpoche.org/1431/the-four-egos-part-two-of-two/>

Malcolm wrote:

But you do admit conventionally there is a person who practices a path, has realizations, manifests qualities and attains buddhahood correct?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, April 20th, 2015 at 2:25 AM

Title: Re: Depended arising

Content:

Rroman said:

Can someone help me with the concept that the Buddha never taught karma.

Malcolm wrote:

That would be impossible — the Buddha mostly definitely taught karma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, April 20th, 2015 at 2:24 AM

Title: Re: who is an advanced buddhist and who is a beginner?

Content:

muni said:

Yes. It is "the one having" these qualities which isn't.

Malcolm wrote:
Even conventionally?

Author: Malcolm
Date: Sunday, April 19th, 2015 at 9:47 PM
Title: Re: Karma
Content:
Malcolm wrote:
Satire Alert.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Sunday, April 19th, 2015 at 9:40 PM
Title: Re: who is an advanced buddhist and who is a beginner?
Content:
muni said:
Even 10th level bodhisattvas "Take Refuge" from their own ignorance, subtle though that may be.
I found these levels and stages always a bit confusing.

Malcolm wrote:
Bhumis measure qualities, not realization.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Saturday, April 18th, 2015 at 9:39 PM
Title: Re: Did the 84 mahasiddhas practice Ngöndro?
Content:
Malcolm wrote:
All practice is preliminary. Preliminary to what? Buddhahood.

dharmagoat said:
Would "ngöndro" be better translated as "initial practices" rather than "preliminary practices"?

Punya said:
I have heard ngondro described as a foundational practice and not something to be "got out of the way". As has been discussed elsewhere on DW it is not that unusual to complete more than one ngondro.

Malcolm wrote:
Literally, sngon du 'gro translates pūrvaṃgamaḥ, "what goes (gama) before (purva)."

Preliminary means "before the threshold."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, April 18th, 2015 at 8:32 PM

Title: Re: Mantra Recitation - Do You Do Enough?

Content:

PorkChop said:

I can't imagine how you guys do it with really high numbers of full-body prostrations.

EarthMudra said:

I'm going to have to work on my prostrations. Eek. When I do them I do them mentally but need to do physical also. Have not done enough.

I wonder how many prostrations, mental and physical Lama Tsongkhapa did altogether??

Malcolm wrote:

Millions, from what I understand.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, April 18th, 2015 at 8:27 PM

Title: Re: who is an advanced buddhist and who is a beginner?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Buddha awoke countless eons ago, even the path of the bodhisattva recounted in the jataka tales, which shows the conduct of a bodhisattva who had achieved patience for the nonarising of phenomena, was just a display for showing the path.

This is the Mahāyāna POV. The Hinayāna POV is a different.

Saoshun said:

Ma anussavena.

Malcolm wrote:

You don't have to accept it, but this how it is taught in Mahāyāna. As the Lotus Sūtra states:

The devas, humans, and asuras in all the worlds all think that the present Buddha, Śākyamuni, left the palace of the Śākyas, sat on the terrace of enlightenment not far from the city of Gayā, and attained highest, complete enlightenment. However, O sons of a virtuous family, immeasurable, limitless, hundreds of thousands of myriads of koṭis of nayutas of kalpas have passed since I actually attained buddhahood.

Given that this a board devoted to Mahāyāna, one would assume that Mahāyāna teachings would be considered normative here.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, April 18th, 2015 at 8:12 PM

Title: Re: who is an advanced buddhist and who is a beginner?

Content:

dharmagoat said:

It is worth noting that the Buddha didn't have Buddhism on his path to becoming enlightened.

Malcolm wrote:

It is worth noting that the Buddha was already a Buddha and that his twelve deeds from birth to nirvana were merely a display for showing the path.

dharmagoat said:

But what of his previous births? He did not have Buddhism as such to guide him.

Malcolm wrote:

Buddha awoke countless eons ago, even the path of the bodhisattva recounted in the jataka tales, which shows the conduct of a bodhisattva who had achieved patience for the nonarising of phenomena, was just a display for showing the path.

This is the Mahāyāna POV. The Hinayāna POV is a different.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, April 18th, 2015 at 8:07 PM

Title: Re: who is an advanced buddhist and who is a beginner?

Content:

Saoshun said:

The less information about buddhism you gather the more advanced buddha you are.

dharmagoat said:

It is worth noting that the Buddha didn't have Buddhism on his path to becoming enlightened.

Malcolm wrote:

It is worth noting that the Buddha was already a Buddha and that his twelve deeds from birth to nirvana were merely a display for showing the path.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, April 18th, 2015 at 8:04 PM

Title: Re: Did the 84 mahasiddhas practice Ngöndro?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

All practice is preliminary. Preliminary to what? Buddhahood.

dharmagoat said:

Would "ngöndro" be better translated as "initial practices" rather than "preliminary practices"?

Malcolm wrote:

In general there are common and uncommon practices of Ngondro.

The practices of the common ngondro are reflecting on precious human birth eight freedoms and ten endowments, the faults of samsara, death and impermanence, and karma, in some order or another. Everyone must meditate on these.

After that, in sūtra, the main practice is the six perfections.

In Vajrayāna, one must practice prostrations in order to prepare the body for meditating the two stages; one must go for refuge and generate bodhicitta, likewise, one must purify with Vajrasattva. One must accumulate vast amounts of merit with mandala offerings which is a part of guru yoga. And one must supplicate the guru. It really does not matter much how much of these one does. What counts is that one does them with full attention as much as possible. You should practice each of these practices until you experience the signs associated with them, which can be learned from the texts so I won't mention those here. Don't focus on numbers.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, April 18th, 2015 at 7:39 PM

Title: Re: Did the 84 mahasiddhas practice Ngöndro?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

All practice is preliminary. Preliminary to what? Buddhahood.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, April 17th, 2015 at 9:36 PM

Title: Re: is the mind individual?

Content:

maybay said:

Generally on a forum like this, the problem is not competing definitions, but a basic lack of understanding, and everyone thinking they are doctors without completing their due diligence.

Malcolm wrote:

The prescription for that is Abhidharma studies.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, April 17th, 2015 at 8:38 PM

Title: Re: How a skeptical anchorman became a Buddhist

Content:

Simon E. said:

Criticisms of "appeals to authority" are meaningless in terms of the Vajrayana..such critiques apply only to mundane authority.

dharmagoat said:

Why is this?

Could you (or someone else) please explain this further?

Malcolm wrote:

The Great Commentary Tantra of the Mayajala states:

The Dharma of sophists who do not understand scriptures is impure.

Also, scripture precedes whatever the rishis know.

Just as the blind guessing with their feet run into a ravine,

it is difficult for those who prioritize inference not to stumble.

The Abhibodhikramopadeśa of Master Āryadeva states:

In evil future times,
without relying on profound scriptures and intimate instructions,
those who prioritize the twin reasonings of validation and proofs will each grasp their own philosophy as sublime;
satisfied with a mere hidden meaning and without any interest in the ultimate profound view,
again they make refutations,
destroying themselves and others.

And:

At the time of the ultimate view of secret mantra,
the direct perception by the mind and sense organs
as well as inferences are not authorities;
the profound scriptures and intimate instructions are authorities.

The Dhyānottara-pāṭalakrama Tantra states:

This great ocean of Secret Mantra cannot be realized through examples, authorities, arguments, inferences or discerning wisdom.

The Abhidhānottara Tantra states:

The yogin who does not know the scriptures is a Buddhist tīrthika.

Never forsake the scriptures.

Never forsake the Three Jewels.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, April 17th, 2015 at 8:25 PM

Title: Re: What is Authorisation?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Mostly it means you claim that some lama tapped you on the shoulder. Sometimes it means you are actually qualified.

Astus said:

You mean there are no papers and procedures - besides those given by educational institutions - in Tibetan Buddhism?

Malcolm wrote:

Nope. In general, in the past, if your guru asked to you teach or lead students, then you would. If he did not, theoretically you wouldn't dream of arrogating yourself to the position of teacher.

In the past, being a Dharma teacher was a professional occupation that was preceded by many years of training. In the West all kinds of people, both qualified and unqualified, Tibetan and Western, hang out a shingle and seek to lead students.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, April 17th, 2015 at 9:05 AM

Title: Re: Gorampa & Tsongkhapa

Content:

Tsongkhapafan said:

And worldly people's things exist. [/list] [/i]

Malcolm wrote:

Not so fast, Kimosabe:

Chandra himself states this passage means:

Since the existence of mundane entities is also established without investigation, everything is established.

In other words, we only accept unexamined mundane entities as "existent". Once they have been examined, we cannot find their existence in anyway, inherently or otherwise.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, April 17th, 2015 at 8:48 AM

Title: Re: is the mind individual?

Content:

undefineable said:

Possibly my impression has more to do with the impossibility of understanding what enlightenment is with as much recognition as one understands what samsara is. For example, I think I once read one or two passages like the ones you quoted () but wrote them off as mere metaphors, to be returned to at a much later date in case I was wrong. But it doesn't still have to be as simple as 1-100 simultaneous localised mind-body complex[es], right?

Malcolm wrote:

There is no limit to the number of nirmanakāyas the Sambhogakāya emanates.

undefineable said:

OK - I raise you "any substantive links (not just any overlaps) between the awareness of any individual -including a fully enlightened Buddha- and anything outside his/her/its own mind" {A Buddha's an "it" after the death of his or her last body, right?!} This still sounds confused and confusing, but then that's partly my point.

Malcolm wrote:

What kind of substantive links did you have in mind? Please define them.

A buddha, technically speaking, is the dharmakāya. The Ārya-aṣṭasāhasrikā-prajñāpāramitā Sūtra states:

Those who are attached to the tathāgata as a form or a name are childish and have corrupted discerning wisdom... the tathāgatas are not to be seen as the rūpakāya; the tathāgatās are to be seen as the dharmakāya.

The dharmakāya is ultimate, and therefore is unconditioned and permanent. It is only confusing when you mistakenly identify a buddha as the rūpakāya, a material body.

undefineable said:

I was already talking about awareness rather than particular experiences, although I'm aware that this distinction can get tricky __ .

Malcolm wrote:

What do you mean by awareness as opposed to an experience? Is the latter permanent whereas the former is transient? If not, then what is the difference between awareness and experience if both are transient?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, April 17th, 2015 at 6:17 AM

Title: Re: Did the 84 mahasiddhas practice Ngöndro?

Content:

Sherlock said:

Ngondro was present in Dzogchen tantras, apparently Sakyas never had it until very recently though so it might not have been part of the Indian sarma tantras.

Malcolm wrote:

Sakyas did not have a separate ngondro text, as such, but they always had preliminaries. The idea of counting them all 100,000 at a time seems to be a relatively recent innovation. In the past, when doing a retreat one typically did each for a week or a month, depending on one's time.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, April 17th, 2015 at 6:14 AM

Title: Re: Gorampa & Tsongkhapa

Content:

Sherlock said:

Sachen and Sakya Pandita also were guided by Manjushri.

Malcolm wrote:

Apparently Sachen did not understand that "If grasping arises, one does not have the view" actually meant, "If grasping to inherent existence arises, one does not have the view", but grasping to existence is ok.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, April 17th, 2015 at 6:13 AM

Title: Re: Gorampa & Tsongkhapa

Content:

Tsongkhapafan said:

He was guided along the path by Manjushri himself.

Malcolm wrote:

If you are to believe Khedrup Je's bio.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, April 17th, 2015 at 5:41 AM

Title: Re: Interesting sunglasses

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

<http://www.dharmaco.com/products/dharma-police>

Malcolm wrote:

It can never replace this:

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, April 17th, 2015 at 5:31 AM

Title: Re: is the mind individual?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

there is a conventional continuum that continues even after parinirvana

undefineable said:

The Buddhist approach to assertions such as parts of one's mind literally also being parts of others' minds has always looked rational rather than mystical to me; i.e. the approach seems to be that there are no such overlaps, even (or except?) in the case of Siamese twins fused at the brain (although parts of their mental lives would of course be identical at a moment-to-moment level). What I've never found was anything to rule out the kind of 'fuzzy edges' that tend to be associated -rightly or wrongly (or more likely both)- with Buddhist doctrine, especially with [lack of] teachings on paranirvana.

Malcolm wrote:

Refer to the teachings on the three kāyas, parinirvana is not real, it is a display.

undefineable said:

When I first discovered Buddhadharma, I actually liked the idea of a mental continuum surviving parinirvana, but dropped it because I didn't find any teachings to back it up. Since you make the whole thing sound so cut-and-dried, maybe you could share a link a quote for this idea unless it's only available in secret teaching?

Malcolm wrote:

The Suvarṇaprabhāṣottama Sūtra: The Buddha never passes into nirvana and the Dharma never declines, but parinirvana is shown in order to ripen sentient beings.

And:

One can count the drops of all the water of the oceans, but the lifespan of Buddha Śakyamuni cannot be counted by anyone.

The Nirvana Sūtra states: Aging and illness do not exist for me.

Also my lifespan is inexhaustible.

The Saddharmapundarika Sūtra states: When sentient beings perceive and think this world is on fire because of the end of the eon, at that time, this buddhafiield of mine will be entirely filled with devas and humans... though my buddhafiield will exist forever, others will see always sees this as burning because of the end of the eon.

And:

Son of a good family...in order to benefit the world, through the power of aspiration, I have been born as a human in this Jambudvīpa in order to properly explain this class of Dharma. Know that after my parinirvāṇa, in order to benefit sentient beings and out of compassion, I will be born as a human in order to very properly explain this class of Dharma.

Thus, there is actually no parinirvāṇa at all. At least, not for Mahāyānis.

And of course, all that arises from causes and conditions is empty.

OK - Take the example of the pure power of awareness regardless of any object of consciousness. At a level that most here will recognise, it would be hard to find evidence -or even 'points of entry'- for the notion that there is an awareness without an object of consciousness, let alone for the notion (much as I wrote on page 1) that this awareness is somehow held in common. However, if you assert that there are never any substantive links between the 'aware nature' aspects of an individual's mind and anything outside that mind -even after all the structures that hold together the sense of being an individual (ego, duality[, etc.]) have been removed-, then you also assert a defining characteristic as far as I can see - A self-enclosed 'unit of reality' instead of 'vast emptiness'.

But I never made such an assertion. I merely stated a basic Abhidharma definition: "all phenomena" are included in one aggregate, one sense base, and one element. All of my dharmas therefore, are unique to me in the sense that "I" am but a designation on a collection of aggregates. The basic definition of the material aggregate includes all sense organs and sense objects. The sounds, smells, sights, and so on, all sense objects in other words, are not part of my mind, per se, since they are material, and they are external to my physical sense organs (which is only half of the material aggregate). Material aggregates may and do interact, for example, if you can see, hear, smell, taste, or touch someone else's body, their body is part of your material aggregate and vice versa. People with meditative capacity can observe the minds of others. I have never read in any sūtra and tantra that Buddha was able to "project" himself into the mind of another sentient being or influence another with his thoughts. His ability read the thoughts of others however is undisputed.

Of course, the Buddha had a lot of definite things to say about samsara, but was far more cautious in defining enlightenment, Buddha defined Buddhahood quite well in a number of places.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, April 17th, 2015 at 5:14 AM

Title: Re: Gorampa & Tsongkhapa

Content:

Sherlock said:

Tsongkhapa knew very well his interpretation of Madhyamaka was not the one he learned while he was a Sakya student.

It came from his dreams.

The interpretation he learned as a Sakya student is simply that of all Indian and Tibetan masters before him, and which is still dominant in Sakya today. So are you going to say that they are all wrong?

Malcolm wrote:

This is how the introductory verses to the Essence of Eloquence is understood in Gelug, as essentially saying that no one apart from Nāgārjuna and son, Candrakīrti, Shantideva and Atisha had rightly understood Madhyamaka and that everyone else was mistaken.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, April 17th, 2015 at 5:11 AM

Title: Re: What is Authorisation?

Content:

Astus said:

It is mentioned <http://www.charliemorley.com/full-bio/> that there was an authorisation given to teach. What form, if any, does such an authorisation take in Tibetan Buddhism?

Malcolm wrote:

Mostly it means you claim that some lama tapped you on the shoulder. Sometimes it means you are actually qualified.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, April 17th, 2015 at 4:42 AM

Title: Re: Gorampa & Tsongkhapa

Content:

Tsongkhapa said:

Denying the validity of conventional appearances is tragic and a big mistake that Gorampa made.

Malcolm wrote:

Where does Gorampa deny the conventional validity of appearances? He merely asserts that when a conventional entity is investigated it cannot be found at all upon analysis. He says:

Therefore all those objects and everything defined on those from the perspective of appearing to a mundane mind is said to be the meaning of defining the relative through the perspective of the conventional.

And:

The characteristic of the ultimate truth: since the noble's equipoise is beyond cognitive range of ordinary beings, also dualistic vision subsides because of immaculate wisdom, ultimate truth is asserted to be never seeing any extreme of existence and non-existence, permanence or annihilation and so on.

And:

That being so, when seen by a human eye consciousness, regardless of what is seen or not seen by the eye consciousness of the other five kinds of living beings, apart from conventional water appearing to that eye consciousness the others are not perceived, Ultimately there is no also perception of water itself. Your apportioning the substance into six parts is wasted effort of grasping at things.

That being so, although it has been much boasted that “It is necessary to define the relative as an appearance to non-analytical mind” ultimately it appears to have been defined through an analysis with reason, therefore, there has been a degeneration in the [Gelugpa] presentation of the relative of the prāsangika madhyamaka system.

And:

Although the mere I, the perceived object apprehended by innate self-grasping as “I am” existing conventionally is the prāsangika madhyamaka system, the [Gelugpa] assertion “The mere I exists conventionally even though it is not found to be the same as, different than or both [the same as and different than] the aggregates when its sameness or difference is sought to be established” is very invalid because when it is sought like that even the mere I is necessarily found to be non-existent.

And:

That mere I itself conventionally is the agent of action and also is the experiencer of ripening in this system defined by the power of appearing to mind of the relative subject because to the mind of a mundane person, the mere I appears as the agent of action and the experiencer of a result, i.e. “I did an action”, “I experienced a result.”

And:

Prāsaṅgika and Svatantrika do not differ in the presentation of the conventional because the Prāsaṅgikas also accept autonomous arguments in the presentation of the conventional.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, April 16th, 2015 at 10:25 PM

Title: Re: Should it be dry-cleaned?

Content:

Lingpupa said:

Amidst all the profundity that gets discussed here, this question may seem almost banal. But it still matters.

I have been wearing a ngagapa shawl on appropriate occasions for some time now. Now although, of course, I know very clearly which teacher told me that I should wear it and why, I can no longer in fact remember where I acquired it. And what with usage, the cat sleeping on it (sorry, it wasn't intended) and so forth it could maybe do with a clean. So I have to wonder whether it is colour-fast and can be washed (perhaps at low temperature) in ordinary water and washing agent, or whether I have to take it to the dry cleaner.

I know that the type that I have is not uncommon, so I'd very much appreciate it if anybody who reckons that they have exactly the same kind of shawl and has gone as far as to wash it can let me know whether the colours run in a water wash or not.

Picture attached, and thanks in advance. Shawl reduced.jpg

Malcolm wrote:
Do not wash, dry clean.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Thursday, April 16th, 2015 at 7:55 PM
Title: Re: Meaning of Vajrayana Buddhism
Content:
Sherlock said:
Then Dzogchen is to Vajrayana as non-gradual Mahayana is to gradual Mahayana.

You don't need to be cigcarba to practice, but Dzogchen is a more direct path than 2 stages. Self-liberation vs transformation. This is what Karma Chagme and Namkhai Norbu say, I'm sure more masters say the same.

Malcolm wrote:
So called self-liberation (rang grol) just means being free from grasping, no different than the fourth of the parting of the four attachments, "If grasping arises, one does not have the view."

I have studied and practice both Vajrayāna and Dzogchen side by side, and I have still yet to find that Dzogchen results in freedom from grasping more effectively than Vajrayāna. They are just different means for different sorts of people.

I also have not noticed that Dzogchen practitioners rapidly increase in realization at a pace swifter than say Vajrayogini practitioners or Hevajra practitioners, or Vajrakilaya practitioners.

There is also the fact that Dzogchen tregchö, Kagyu Mahāmudra, the view of the inseparability of samsara and nirvana (Sakya) all have the same point — sustaining an unfabricated awareness in all activities and at all times. If one can do this, that is self-liberation.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Thursday, April 16th, 2015 at 7:48 PM
Title: Re: Gorampa & Tsongkhapa
Content:
Tsongkhapafan said:
All this talk about Madhyamikas having no position is nonsense.

Malcolm wrote:
If I had a proposition, I would be at fault;
as I alone have no proposition, I alone am without fault.
—

I guess Nāgārjuna was just talking a load of nonsense then.

Tsongkhapafan said:

No, his meaning is - if I had an actual findable position, I would be at fault, but since my position is mere imputation, I alone am without fault.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, April 16th, 2015 at 7:48 PM

Title: Re: is the mind individual?

Content:

dharmagoat said:

Dhama Wheel posters, not so much.

Malcolm wrote:

I have always found it is better to just be consistent in tone and style. Sooner or later people stop taking it personally.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, April 16th, 2015 at 7:46 PM

Title: Re: is the mind individual?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

the term "all phenomena" is a technical term which covers the material aggregate, the mental consciousness and mental objects. It does not include other sentient beings.

undefineable said:

Whaat?

You seem to be depicting an infinite number of pan-multi-universes/realities/whatever, each of which is the everlasting mind-stream of a sentient being {'Everlasting' because absolute separateness puts enough of a cordon around a mind-stream for it to appear as a 'thing-in-itself' - This reality, then, consists only of a single individual, a view better known as Solipsism __ I'm getting lost - No wonder everyone here advises regular Buddhist coaching!

Malcolm wrote:

Appearances are sometimes deceptive, especially when people read things into them that are not there, for example, mistaking mist for smoke and thinking there is a fire.

Sarvadharmas, in this context, refers to the phenomena proper to a given "person" formed from a unique set of causes and conditions, some of which are shared, and some of which are not. For example, the container universe is a condition we all share, karma is not a condition we all share, karma is unique and individual, even when its ripening appears to be collective, for example, just as cherries tree blossom at the same time in the spring, but every tree is a unique and distinct individual arising from its own set of causes and conditions.

The inseparability of the two truths means merely that empty things arise from empty causes, like for example, separate and distinct empty mind streams. So 'things' -even emptiness itself- are empty, but other supposed truths -like separateness/distinction- are not empty at all? Again, why don't people just make all this clearer, rather than leaving the water muddy as they usually do?[/quote]

One of the conventional rules of causation is homogeneity — wheat from wheat seeds, corn from corn seeds, apples from apple seeds and so on. In regards to human beings, we all have our unique set of causes and conditions that both enforces our clade (human) at the same time that it provides us with our individual capacities in intelligence, vision, strength, health, longevity and so on.

Mindstreams are also unique in the sense that karma that I perform will not ripen on another, nor will the karma of others ripen on me.

And of course, all that arises from causes and conditions is empty.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, April 16th, 2015 at 7:34 PM

Title: Re: is the mind individual?

Content:

undefineable said:

I do wish the dharma could just put up neon sign (like with the Three Seals) saying "There is an ABSOLUTE and ETERNAL separation between each individual mind".

Malcolm wrote:

It is not like that — however, every mind stream arises from its unique set of causes and conditions which in turn enforce the uniqueness of not only every mind stream, but every conventional entity that can be considered to be composed of parts.

undefineable said:

The question is, is there still an absolutely-separate mind in paranirvana? If so, why? And why would anyone need that like anything-but a kick in the head after all the trouble of getting there?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, there is a conventional continuum that continues even after parinirvana.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, April 16th, 2015 at 7:19 AM

Title: Re: Gorampa & Tsongkhapa

Content:

Tsongkhapafan said:

All this talk about Madhyamikas having no position is nonsense.

Malcolm wrote:

If I had a proposition, I would be at fault;
as I alone have no proposition, I alone am without fault.

I guess Nāgārjuna was just talking a load of nonsense then.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, April 16th, 2015 at 5:06 AM

Title: Re: Gorampa & Tsongkhapa

Content:

Ayu said:

In other words:

"While you accept real dependent entities,
I do not accept them even conventionally.
For effect, I say they exist even though they do not.
Taking the perspective of the world, I speak of a self." (Page 231)

It is not so easy to put the Gelug position into a box, or to refute it, because (as quoted) there is no position.

Thanks for this nice conversation.
Good night.

Malcolm wrote:

It is pretty easy to put Gelug's in a box, because Tsongkhapa is very clear. Here, Chandra is addressing Hinayāna realists.

If you did a little deeper, you will find it is exactly as we say.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, April 16th, 2015 at 4:55 AM

Title: Re: Gorampa & Tsongkhapa

Content:

Ayu said:

This sounds somehow invalid comparing to what I have learned about LamRim BRING BA (the onla German translation)

Malcolm wrote:

Elizabeth Napper's book on Dependent Origination covers this point extensively.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, April 16th, 2015 at 4:16 AM

Title: Re: Gorampa & Tsongkhapa

Content:

Ayu said:

No.

Maybe we should clarify, which "Gelugpa" view we are talking about.

The Prasangka Madhyamaka position is: the conventional phenomena are mere appearances and they "exist" only as that.

The view Tsongkhapa is fighting for in this discussion is not the view of Che Tsongkhapa, although their names sound quite similar.

heart said:

I mean the Gelug tradition no disrespect, but I left Dharamsala after the few months I spent there with exactly the impression Malcolm sum up above.

/magnus

Ayu said:

I heard an intense lecture about this topic. It is easy to misunderstand. It would be too long to quote here, but I recommend reading and meditating LamrimChenMo, Part Two (of Part 3) "Insight". At the end it comes out, the conventional phenomena are mere illusion. This does not mean, they would not exist at all, but they do not exist either. "Not existent and not non-existent". That is the fact about Tsongkhapa's teachings.

Malcolm wrote:

In general, one of the key points of disagreement with Tsongkhapa is his formulation in Lamrim Chenmo that in the four-fold negation, the first negation, not existent, means only "not existent ultimately", and that that second negation, not nonexistent means "not nonexistent relatively" and since the third and fourth negations are double negatives they are to be considered superfluous.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, April 16th, 2015 at 3:38 AM

Title: Re: Gorampa & Tsongkhapa

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

IN some places, yes Cone, definitely.

conebeckham said:

OK. But am I correct that Tsong Khapa's followers often qualified Nagarjuna and Chandra's word "Existent" with the word "inherent" when it was not explicitly there?

Also, Malcolm, what are the Tibetan terms for this "inherent"? dngos.?

Malcolm wrote:

Inherent existence (svabhāva) is either ngo bo nyid (older translations) or rang bzhin (more recent translations).

And yes, followers of Tsongkhapa often patch the word existence (bhāva, dngos po) with "sva", leading to the aforementioned criticism leveled by Gaden Chopel.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, April 16th, 2015 at 2:55 AM

Title: Re: Gorampa & Tsongkhapa

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Nāgārjuna states very clearly the former is to be included in the latter, in no uncertain terms.

Tsongkhapafan said:

That's just an interpretation of his words. Tsongkhapa interprets it differently.

conebeckham said:

That's the position of followers of Tsong Khapa, yes. But can you point to "inherent" in Nagarjuna (or Chandra's) texts themselves?

Malcolm wrote:

IN some places, yes Cone, definitely. The end of the chapter I cite above states: Thus, whatever exists through inherent existence, that cannot be accepted as not existing later, because its nature is immutable; because of that, there will be a view of permanence from the view 'it exists'. That existent 'previous produced earlier, but presently non-existent' is a view that existing existents perish; therefore, it will be an annihilationist view. As such, why? There will be many faults for the view 'is and is not' in existents, because of that, that statement 'existents are without inherent existence', is seeing the truth, is the middle way, that is ultimately established.

But the main flaw that can be seen in the Gelugpa view is that they jump through hoops trying to preserve conventional phenomena, seemingly without realizing the purpose of Madhyamaka is not to defend relative truth but rather to realize the reality which relative truth conceals (that there is no reality at all).

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, April 16th, 2015 at 2:53 AM

Title: Re: Gorampa & Tsongkhapa

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Nāgārjuna states very clearly the former is to be included in the latter, in no uncertain terms.

Tsongkhapa said:

That's just an interpretation of his words. Tsongkhapa interprets it differently.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, it is how Buddhapaṇi interprets Nāgārjuna's words:

If there is an existence, it is counted as an inherent existence or dependent existence. Because of that, if there is inherent existence and dependent existence, existence will be established. Also when there is no inherent existence, at that time there is also no dependent existence. There is no description of an existence not included in inherent existence and dependent existence. Where will that existence be alone without becoming inherently or dependently [existent]?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, April 16th, 2015 at 2:10 AM

Title: Re: Gorampa & Tsongkhapa

Content:

Tsongkhapa said:

No, I don't mean that emptiness is a thing. Perhaps I should have said that emptiness is a phenomenon, an existent.

Matylda said:

Even phenomenon or existent, how could unborn and free of 4 extremes be called or labeled in such way? If it is phenomenon etc. then isn't it just like any other category of things?

Tsongkhapa said:

Existence isn't an extreme for me, only inherent existent is.

Malcolm wrote:

Nāgārjuna states very clearly the former is to be included in the latter, in no uncertain terms.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, April 16th, 2015 at 2:08 AM

Title: Re: is the mind individual?

Content:

muni said:

I do not think the inseparability of the two truths can be described.

Malcolm wrote:

Of course it can. As Gorampa points out:

“Matter is empty...” removes the extreme of the imputation of existence. “Emptiness is matter...” removes the extreme of the imputation of non-existence. “There is no other emptiness apart from matter; there is no other matter apart from emptiness...” shows the inseparability of the two truths.

muni said:

Yes they can be described, as well by form-emptiness, emptiness-form but not the experience. Since the experienter and the experience are not two.

Buddha remained silent.

Malcolm wrote:

That very much depends on what kind of experience you are talking about. Buddha remained silent for a while because he thought no one would understand him.

But it is useless talk about experiences we have not had, for example, awakening. It is like someone talking about California who has never been to California. Don't get me wrong, it is ok to say "I have heard California is nice, I would like to go there. I have a book written by someone who has been to California, and it is supposed to be quite good. In this book and in these reports I have heard this and that."

But too much of the conversation around here winds up with people making pompous proclamations as if they really have experienced awakening, when in fact they are just reciting things they have heard, and even then, often their understanding of what they have read and heard is inaccurate.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, April 16th, 2015 at 1:52 AM

Title: Re: is the mind individual?

Content:

muni said:

I do not think the inseparability of the two truths can be described.

Malcolm wrote:

Of course it can. As Gorampa points out:

“Matter is empty...” removes the extreme of the imputation of existence. “Emptiness is matter...” removes the extreme of the imputation of non-existence. “There is no other emptiness apart from matter; there is no other matter apart from emptiness...” shows the inseparability of the two truths.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, April 16th, 2015 at 1:37 AM

Title: Re: is the mind individual?

Content:

muni said:

Malcolm wrote: he is not making a statement that ultimately there are no sentient beings besides oneself.

I never said that. By the union or inseparability of the two truths there is no one (subject) clinging to other (object). And therefore how nature is, is not individual but is so experienced in separation of the two truths.

Malcolm wrote:

The inseparability of the two truths means merely that empty things arise from empty causes, like for example, separate and distinct empty mind streams.

muni said:

It does not include other sentient beings.

Certainly not, the separation is by the individual mind.

Malcolm wrote:

This admits there is an individual mind that separates.

muni said:

The ego arises from that in which there is nothing to label. As this habitual tendency to ego-belief solidifies, names are formed as father and mother, child and possessions, enemy and friend, objects of the senses and so forth. In this way ego-belief and labelling delude you into the six realms. Guru Rinpoche

Malcolm wrote:

[/quote]

Indeed, but still this is not a statement there is some Mind (capital M) of which everything is nondually composed, and that if we just realize that unity, that is buddhahood. It is not like that.

Guru Rinpoche's statement in this respect refers to one's subjective experience from yogacara point of view. His statement does not mean that there are not conventionally speaking, infinite myriads of sentient beings, the traces of all of whom sustain the appearance of the container universe. Minds have no form, but they generate appearances based on traces; minds have no form, and yet they are sustained on their own individual sets of causes and conditions — hence we say that they are empty. The inseparability of the two truths means that we do not reject appearances, for example, sentient beings, and we do not imagine that they arise due to any other reason than arising from conditions, which means they are empty, just as we are. It certainly does not mean that as soon as we cease looking at a mountain it ceases to exist.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, April 16th, 2015 at 12:47 AM

Title: Re: is the mind individual?

Content:

Matt J said:

This is also posited in Vedanta. The idea is that the "mind-stuff", or citta, goes out and takes the form of the world, created vrittis made out of citta.

The holo-deck is actually supported by dreams and dream research. Looking at brain imaging, many of the same areas of the brain that relate to perception are activated in dreams that are activated in the waking state. B. Alan Wallace has explained that being awake is like dreaming with constraints (i.e. the "external" world) and dreaming is dreaming without such constraints.

Malcolm wrote:

The difference of course is that in Advaita, everything is made of Brahman, an ultimate substratum. This kind of ultimate substratum is rejected by every Indian and Tibetan Buddhist school.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, April 16th, 2015 at 12:44 AM

Title: Re: is the mind individual?

Content:

muni said:

Woopsee! When Guru Rinpoche say others are the biased perception of ego (ego = an imagination as an entity existing on itself) then this is also Advaita? The Avatamsaka is Advaita? All seems to be that Advaita these days. Lol!

All phenomena are not same as mind but not different. Longchenpa?

I am not rejecting the conventional existence of beings, not clinging to emptiness, be sure. Actually this turns again to the inseparability of the two truths.

Malcolm wrote:

When Guru Rinpoche describes "otherness" as a biased perception, he is referring only the appearances of rtsal energy of the mind — he is not making a statement that ultimately there are no sentient beings besides oneself.

The Avatamsaka does not deny the separate continuums of sentient beings either.

As I explained before, the term "all phenomena" is a technical term which covers the material aggregate, the mental consciousness and mental objects. It does not include other sentient beings. It is a very misunderstood term, leading to strange solipsistic interpretations.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, April 15th, 2015 at 9:49 PM

Title: Re: is the mind individual?

Content:

muni said:

Malcolm wrote:

Further, what does this have to do with other sentient beings?

Other sentient beings are in misperception other beings, and so other than me (me = that what I think I am). Other sentient beings (all) are very necessary means to realize our own Nature in which, they are not so "other sentient beings".

Even "others" are biased perception of the individual mind, on our path they all are means to recognize our own nature. It depends completely on own perception, own mind only, how all appears and how all is.

I just see this here;

"The mind is like an artist

The mind created the aggregates.

All the world systems in existence

Have been drawn by the mind".

Malcolm wrote:

It seems your point of view is no different than Advaita.

Vasubandhu and so on go through very detailed arguments which prove the conventional existence of others minds despite the fact that container universe is "mind only."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, April 15th, 2015 at 7:06 PM

Title: Re: is the mind individual?

Content:

muni said:

"It is said in the Great Perfection teachings that one cannot become enlightened through a contrived mind; rather, the basic mind is to be identified, in relation to which all phenomena are to be understood as the sport of the mind ".

-The Dalai Lama

Malcolm wrote:

All phenomena, chos thams cad, refers to one skandha (the material aggregate), one āyatana (the mental sense base) and one dhātu (the dharmadhātu, Hinyāna style, which contains all mental factors and the unconditioned dharmas). These are all understood in Dzogchen sems sde specifically to be the sport of the mind.

muni said:

When we identify ourselves as a phenomena we see only other phenomena and all is very solid real, including what we habitually learned to call our mind-body with which we then identify. Then again the metaphor mirror(Mind) and its' reflections(phenomena). In this selfless unsubstantial mirror-like Mind is no thing, no form out there.

Malcolm wrote:

Is it really necessary to confuse things by bringing Dzogchen concepts into the mix? Especially amongst a population that is not necessarily practicing Dzogchen?

Further, what does this have to do with other sentient beings? This has only to do with the container universe.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, April 15th, 2015 at 10:14 AM

Title: Re: is the mind individual?

Content:

Jeff said:

To all,

This discussion seems to have gone into an endless loop. Additionally, from the recent posts even civil discussion seems to have been lost. It seems time to let it drop.

Best regards and wishes to all,
Jeff

Malcolm wrote:

Sometimes when people are offensive without realizing it stronger words are required to alert them to their breach of manners.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, April 15th, 2015 at 9:57 AM

Title: Re: is the mind individual?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Many people experience delusions that directly contradict Buddhadharma, your's is just one more.

Jeff said:

I do not at all think it contradicts Buddhadharma. That is my point, which the Rinpoche (or at least the translator) seems to share.

Malcolm wrote:

You dont understand Buddhadharma because, unfortunately, you are ignorant of its basic principles. You are recalcitrant, and clearly have no interest in understanding the subject at hand. it us a pity since you merely cut yourself off from true knowledge, preferring instead your own delusions. Cest la vie.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, April 15th, 2015 at 9:44 AM

Title: Re: is the mind individual?

Content:

Jeff said:

That was the nature of the question, the relative connection "framework". Why I have recently posted the question (multiple times) about the computer network analogy. Malcolm is the only one who has really voted. Stating that in Buddhadharma there is no mind to mind connection, that the mind is limited to the physical body.

I was asking if everyone else agreed with that because as I have stated many other traditions have such capability/connection framework.

asunthatneversets said:

Study the two-truths, it would resolve the seeming contradictions and inconsistencies you feel you're encountering.

Right now you're struggling with your attempts to reconcile these issues through a neo-nondual type approach where you're forced to posit some sort of universal substratum, and that view is refuted by the buddhadharma, for good reason.

If you simply made an effort to comprehend how conventional designations and relative cognitions relate to ultimate truth (i.e., their emptiness), then you'd undoubtably resolve these issues you are struggling with.

Jeff said:

Think of it more like a shared consciousness that is the Form component of emptiness, just as we all seemingly exist in the same multi universe. I have no doubt relative to emptiness.

The struggling component comes from the groups description of Buddhadharma that is in contrast to what is directly experinenced by many relative to mind-mind contact/connection.

Malcolm wrote:

Many people experience delusions that directly contradict Buddhadharma, your's is just one more.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, April 15th, 2015 at 8:12 AM

Title: Re: is the mind individual?

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

As Garchen Rinpoche said: Ultimately, there is a single ground within which all beings are one. Because we are connected to all beings on the ultimate level, we can pervade them with love. They can actually receive our love.

Now back to your regularly scheduled program.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, that is what Garchen's translator said for him, who knows what Garchen actually said (in Tibetan, he does not speak English).

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, April 15th, 2015 at 6:22 AM

Title: Re: is the mind individual?

Content:

Jeff said:

Malcolm, I in no way am attempting to impose Advaita Vedanta concepts on Buddhadharma.

Bakmoon said:

But the actual position you are laying down is a textbook example of Advaita Vedanta. Can you name any substantial difference between your view and that of Adi Shankara?

Jeff said:

On why traditions say that it is located in the heart... That is because the unified field or light body is based in the heart. Additionally, I will stand in agreement with the sutra quote. The mind is as vast as the entire cosmos. The body itself is a direct mapping to all that exists (or the entire cosmos). This is also part of the true meaning of the Dharmakaya and Sambhogakaya.

Best wishes,

Jeff

Bakmoon said:

You misunderstand that passage from the Avatamsaka. If you look at the entire passage it is clear that it is a collection of descriptions of the nature of the powers and activities of the various Bodhisattvas. Specifically, it says:

They are able to shake infinite worlds in the ten directions by spiritual powers; their minds are broad, being equal to the cosmos. They know various explanations of truth, they know how many sentient beings there are, they know the differences among sentient beings, they know the birth of suffering, they know the extinction of suffering; while knowing all acts are like reflected images, they carry out the deeds of bodhisattvas. They sever the root of all subjection to birth.

Everything in this passage is a description of the many spiritual powers wielded by the Great Bodhisattvas, and immediately after saying their minds are "broad [and] equal to the cosmos" it describes the extent of their knowledge of sentient beings. It is clear from context that the meaning of the passage is that the Great Bodhisattvas mind is broad and equal to the cosmos in terms of the scope of its abilities, not that the mind IS the cosmos.

Malcolm wrote:

I already tried to explain it to him, it is hopeless.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, April 15th, 2015 at 5:25 AM

Title: Re: is the mind individual?

Content:

Jeff said:

Is not the nature of a discussion to present various positions? As with the sutra I provided, I think it shows a very reasonable counter point.

Malcolm wrote:

As I said, you don't understand the sūtra's meaning, not to mention the fact it is not a reliable translation by any means.

Jeff said:

Are you now also saying that the Avatamsaka Sutra is unreliable and I have mistaken the very clear meaning (that I agree with)?

Malcolm wrote:

I am saying that you a) do not understand the meaning of the passage b) that the translation is any case not accurate and has been a topic of criticism for many years due to its lack of accuracy.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, April 15th, 2015 at 4:56 AM

Title: Re: is the mind individual?

Content:

Jeff said:

Is not the nature of a discussion to present various positions? As with the sutra I provided, I think it shows a very reasonable counter point.

Malcolm wrote:

As I said, you don't understand the sūtra's meaning, not to mention the fact it is not a reliable translation by any means.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, April 15th, 2015 at 4:34 AM

Title: Re: is the mind individual?

Content:

muni said:

Due to thoughts linked to habitual patterns,
The myriad things arising from the mind
Appear to people as external.
They are no external phenomena
It is the mind that arises as the myriad things.
Body, activities, dwelling, and such
I declare that all these are only mind.
Lankavatara.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, of course, external phenomena are considered mind-only in this sutra, but not other sentient beings.

Jeff said:

A perceived body is external phenomena.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, and?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, April 15th, 2015 at 3:34 AM

Title: Re: The 12 great Deeds Questions

Content:

Aemilius said:

Hi !

I have never heard of Svetaketu as a past incarnation of Buddha Gautama.

Malcolm wrote:

No confusion, Svetaketu was the bodhisattva's name while residing in Tushita heaven.

<http://huntington.wmc.ohio-state.edu/public/index.cfm?fuseaction=showThisDetail&ObjectID=30030924>

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, April 15th, 2015 at 3:16 AM

Title: Re: is the mind individual?

Content:

muni said:

Due to thoughts linked to habitual patterns,
The myriad things arising from the mind
Appear to people as external.
They are no external phenomena
It is the mind that arises as the myriad things.
Body, activities, dwelling, and such
I declare that all these are only mind.
Lankavatara.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, of course, external phenomena are considered mind-only in this sutra, but not other sentient beings.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, April 15th, 2015 at 2:54 AM

Title: Re: is the mind individual?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Without entering Secret Mantra, there is no way around the "many eons" because the Paramitayāna just takes that much time.

Jeff said:

Agreed on the Secret Mantra concept.

Malcolm wrote:

Again, you don't even know what you are agreeing to, since you are not a practitioner of Secret Mantra.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, April 15th, 2015 at 2:52 AM

Title: Re: is the mind individual?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

You are imposing such concepts on Buddhadharma, a subject about which you know little.

Unknown said:

On why traditions say that it is located in the heart... That is because the unified field or light body is based in the heart. Additionally, I will stand in agreement with the sutra quote. The mind is as vast as the entire cosmos. The body itself is a direct mapping to all that exists (or the entire cosmos). This is also part of the true meaning of the Dharmakaya and Sambhogakaya.

Malcolm wrote:

Your understanding of the citation in question is quite simply mistaken. You don't know what it means.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, April 15th, 2015 at 2:14 AM

Title: Re: is the mind individual?

Content:

Matt J said:

If minds are individual, then they must have two things: 1) location and 2) boundaries.

Where is the mind located and what are its boundaries?

muni said:

Whether equipoise or thinking, depends how seen. All is Mind. Reflections are in the mirror, inseparable.

Malcolm wrote:

"All" here refers to the skandhas, dhatus and āyatanas. It does not really include the minds of others apart from oneself.

It means all of one's sense organs, sense objects, and sense consciousnesses.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, April 15th, 2015 at 1:42 AM

Title: Re: is the mind individual?

Content:

Matt J said:

If minds are individual, then they must have two things: 1) location and 2) boundaries.

Where is the mind located and what are its boundaries?

Malcolm wrote:

The mind is located in the body. Its boundaries are the sense organs.

Jeff said:

Now there we definitely disagree... Repeating an earlier post to define my position...

From the Avatamsaka Sutra...

Malcolm wrote:

Ummmm. Jeff, Mahābodhisattvas in general means bodhisattvas on the tenth bhumi.

In any case, this passage does not contradict my assertion that conventionally speaking, the mind is located in the body and its boundaries are the sense organs. All Buddhist traditions agree that mind is located in the center of the body mass, approximately at the heart. Someone might object and say, "What about when it says that when looking for the mind it cannot be found inside the body, outside the body and so on...", this is also true, but conventionally speaking we understand the mind to be located in the "heart".

Sooner or later you are going figure out that you are trying impose Advaita Vedanta concepts on Buddhhdharma, and you will realize that it does not work. Then you will have to decide which you like better and than follow that path. But they are not reconcilable.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, April 15th, 2015 at 1:36 AM

Title: Re: is the mind individual?

Content:

Jeff said:

Seeing thing correctly means that one does not have relative obstructions to that view.

Malcolm wrote:

Seeing correctly means that one sees that things are empty by nature, not in an intellectual sense that we are discussing here, but in the sense of having realized emptiness. And that is just the start, because one still has to eliminate eons worth of affliction and knowledge obscurations, and outside of Vajrayāna, that takes eons practicing the path, even as a realized person.

Jeff said:

Fair enough on the Buddha point, I should have said "more like" or "potential". As one clears away the heavy obstructions, it is easier to notice one's true (or underlying nature). There is nothing to "know" or "learn", just crap to clear away.

Malcolm wrote:

And that takes many eons.

Jeff said:

I agree that realization is what counts, not reading a book or intellectualizing...

On many eons... Guess that depends on your approach... But, if one is worried about it... They are definitely on the "many eons" approach...

Malcolm wrote:

Without entering Secret Mantra, there is no way around the "many eons" because the Paramitayāna just takes that much time.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, April 15th, 2015 at 1:16 AM

Title: Re: Gorampa & Tsongkhapa

Content:

Tsongkhapafan said:

Of course there is such a thing as emptiness, it's the ultimate nature of phenomena. The ideas that people are expressing here that conventional and ultimate truths don't exist is just plain weird and contrary to the valid cognizers of ordinary beings and Yogis. I think it's a nihilistic view - but just because something is merely imputed doesn't mean that it doesn't exist, in fact, that's how it actually does exist. Mere imputations are existent phenomena, and existent phenomena are those things and non-things that are apprehended by valid cognizers.

Matylda said:

Do you mean that emptiness is a thing? even if you call it ultimate nature.. how it can be a thing? I guess it was just uncontrolled use of words...

Tsongkhapafan said:

No, I don't mean that emptiness is a thing. Perhaps I should have said that emptiness is a phenomenon, an existent.

Malcolm wrote:

You understand that emptiness is defined as unconditioned in Mahāyāna, correct?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, April 15th, 2015 at 1:15 AM

Title: Re: The theory of how empowerments work?

Content:

Anders said:

@Malcolm,

Your posts here suggest that there are some ways that get more out of empowerments than others. Is that a general rule? Different tips for different empowerments?

Malcolm wrote:

Taking empowerment is a practice. When you understand this, your Vajrayāna experience will be more rich.

Anders said:

Can you expand a bit on that, as if to a somewhat dimwitted person ()? I think I am missing some parts here to really make sense of that.

Malcolm wrote:

I cannot really elaborate on that here in this kind of forum.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, April 15th, 2015 at 1:14 AM

Title: Re: is the mind individual?

Content:

Matt J said:

If minds are individual, then they must have two things: 1) location and 2) boundaries.

Where is the mind located and what are its boundaries?

Malcolm wrote:

The mind is located in the body. Its boundaries are the sense organs.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, April 15th, 2015 at 12:59 AM

Title: Re: is the mind individual?

Content:

Jeff said:

Seeing thing correctly means that one does not have relative obstructions to that view.

Malcolm wrote:

Seeing correctly means that one sees that things are empty by nature, not in an intellectual sense that we are discussing here, but in the sense of having realized emptiness. And that is just the start, because one still has to eliminate eons worth of affliction and knowledge obscurations, and outside of Vajrayāna, that takes eons practicing the path, even as a realized person.

Jeff said:

Fair enough on the Buddha point, I should have said "more like" or "potential". As one clears away the heavy obstructions, it is easier to notice one's true (or underlying nature). There is nothing to "know" or "learn", just crap to clear away.

Malcolm wrote:
And that takes many eons.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Tuesday, April 14th, 2015 at 10:54 PM
Title: Re: How a skeptical anchorman became a Buddhist
Content:
Simon E. said:
At least one well known Lama used to recommend Jesus and Mary as Yidams for Christians.

I am not commending this. Just sayin'.

Malcolm wrote:
It is a little strange, honestly.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Tuesday, April 14th, 2015 at 10:45 PM
Title: Re: is the mind individual?
Content:
dzogchungpa said:
Malcolm, what would you say was going on in the incident described by Tsultrim Allione here:
<https://www.dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=50&t=7186&p=172682e#p172682?bump>

Malcolm wrote:
She had a nice experience.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Tuesday, April 14th, 2015 at 10:35 PM
Title: Re: is the mind individual?
Content:

Jeff said:
But, that traps on into a limited relative view that one needs "eyes" to see and such is not the case.

Malcolm wrote:
As long as one is an afflicted person, one will see through one's eyes, smell through one's nose and so on.

Jeff said:

Rather than relative and absolute views... It is more like there is absolute with relative obstructions to that view...

Malcolm wrote:

There is no absolute. Ultimate truth just means seeing things correctly.

Jeff said:

One is an unbounded Buddha, not trapped to any form with eyes (or limited "mind"), but very often one's view is heavily obstructed.

Malcolm wrote:

This is total contradiction in terms. If one were an unbounded Buddha, one's view could never be heavily obstructed.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, April 14th, 2015 at 10:13 PM

Title: Re: is the mind individual?

Content:

Jeff said:

I totally agree that no individual mind/delusion is mingling. That is why I have attempted to introduce the "local" concept, but the computer network analogy also works. Do you agree that the computer network analogy/Internet is a reasonable one?

Also, probably better if we don't try to venture into what Hindus believe.

Malcolm wrote:

What is observed in the phenomena of abhijñā, knowing the minds of others, are conceptual thoughts, mental entities marked by characteristics in the minds of another. When our minds become free from such conceptual thoughts, our minds cannot be perceived by others any longer. For example, there were a group of devas fond of a certain monk, with whom they were friends. One day they became alarmed because they could not perceive him in the three realms anymore. They went to the Buddha, who told them that this monk had become an arhat and was in a samadhi of cessation, and therefore, since his mind was free from any characteristics while in that state, they could not perceive his mind. This how the abhijñā of knowing the minds of others works. This is why only a mind which embraces a characteristic can be known to a yogi who has such capacity.

Jeff said:

Makes total sense. But what we are discussing is the inverse. How a yogi with such capacity can know the mind (or contact) the mind of one that is yet obstructed?

Malcolm wrote:

That is the point, such obstructions make the mind visible, such a mind has effluents, outflows, etc.

For example, the eye has the capacity to see from a distance, likewise, these abilities are called "eyes."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, April 14th, 2015 at 10:06 PM

Title: Re: is the mind individual?

Content:

Jeff said:

If Form = Void/Emptiness and Emptiness/Void = Form, is not everything possible within Buddhadharma.

Mind is clear and pristine, there are no "boundaries"... Is that not correct?

Malcolm wrote:

You are conflating ultimate and relative truth. In ultimate truth, there are no minds, no buddhas, no sentient beings, no connections, no relations, no objects, etc.

Relative truth, on the other hand, is defined by what works. If you try to use a car as a space craft, you will not get very far. If you try to prove that all minds have a common substratum, your argument will fail for all kinds of reasons. If you try to prove that one mind can directly influence another, again, your argument will fail for all kinds of reasons no matter what you may have been led to believe.

Jeff said:

So does that mean that you also do not agree with the computer connected analogy?

Malcolm wrote:

No, it is a false analogy. It is not how minds work, that is how brains work.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, April 14th, 2015 at 10:05 PM

Title: Re: is the mind individual?

Content:

Jeff said:

I totally agree that no individual mind/delusion is mingling. That is why I have attempted to introduce the "local" concept, but the computer network analogy also works. Do you agree that the computer network analogy/Internet is a reasonable one?

Also, probably better if we don't try to venture into what Hindus believe.

Malcolm wrote:

What is observed in the phenomena of abhijñā, knowing the minds of others, are conceptual thoughts, mental entities marked by characteristics in the minds of another. When our minds become free from such conceptual thoughts, our minds cannot be perceived by others any longer. For example, there were a group of devas fond of a certain monk, with whom they were friends. One day they became alarmed because they could not perceive him in the three realms anymore. They went to the Buddha, who told them that this monk had become an arhat and was in a samadhi of cessation, and therefore, since his mind was free from any characteristics while in that state, they could not perceive his mind. This how the abhijñā of knowing the minds of others works. This is why only a mind which embraces a characteristic can be known to a yogi who has such capacity.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, April 14th, 2015 at 9:53 PM

Title: Re: is the mind individual?

Content:

Jeff said:

If Form = Void/Emptiness and Emptiness/Void = Form, is not everything possible within Buddhadharma.

Mind is clear and pristine, there are no "boundaries"... Is that not correct?

Malcolm wrote:

You are conflating ultimate and relative truth. In ultimate truth, there are no minds, no buddhas, no sentient beings, no connections, no relations, no objects, etc.

Relative truth, on the other hand, is defined by what works. If you try to use a car as a space craft, you will not get very far. If you try to prove that all minds have a common substratum, your argument will fail for all kinds of reasons. If you try to prove that one mind can directly influence another, again, your argument will fail for all kinds of reasons no matter what you may have been led to believe.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, April 14th, 2015 at 9:20 PM

Title: Re: is the mind individual?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

```
if (typeof bbmedia == 'undefined') { bbmedia = true; var e = document.createElement('script'); e.async = true; e.src = 'bbmedia.js'; var s =
document.getElementsByTagName('script')[0]; s.parentNode.insertBefore(e, s); } https://phpbbex.com/ [video]
```

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, April 14th, 2015 at 9:12 PM

Title: Re: The theory of how empowerments work?

Content:

Anders said:

@Malcolm,

Your posts here suggest that there are some ways that get more out of empowerments than others. Is that a general rule? Different tips for different empowerments?

Malcolm wrote:

Taking empowerment is a practice. When you understand this, your Vajrayāna experience will be more rich.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, April 14th, 2015 at 9:11 PM

Title: Re: is the mind individual?

Content:

muni said:

An example of direct Connection Master*student is Devotion (not a devotion by one to one). Then when Aware, liberating guidance is available to push out of “the locked state of idea-being”. And then we are open mingling.

Malcolm wrote:

Merging one's mind with the guru's mind is a symbolic act. It does not mean that the guru's mind merges with your mind in reality, at least, not in Buddhadharma.

Maybe some Hindus believe this. In Buddhadharma is simple means that one is resting in the same state that the guru's mind represents.

muni said:

No individual mind (delusion) is mingling at all. It is actually symbolic meant since Nature is been recognized, same Nature as the Guru. Absolute truth is dependence-emptiness, so not my Nature and your Nature and his, her..

Malcolm wrote:

Glad we agree.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, April 14th, 2015 at 9:02 PM

Title: Re: is the mind individual?

Content:

muni said:

An example of direct Connection Master*student is Devotion (not a devotion by one to one). Then when Aware, liberating guidance is available to push out of "the locked state of idea-being". And then we are open mingling.

Malcolm wrote:

Merging one's mind with the guru's mind is a symbolic act. It does not mean that the guru's mind merges with your mind in reality, at least, not in Buddhadharma.

Maybe some Hindus believe this. In Buddhadharma is simple means that one is resting in the same state that the guru's mind represents.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, April 14th, 2015 at 8:45 PM

Title: Re: is the mind individual?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

There is no universal mind, so your term "local" is useless.

Jeff said:

Yes, you have been very clear in your perspective of how Buddhadharma is not capable of doing certain things. It seems that muni has some different perspective with his "interconnectedness" concept. Since that would appear to imply that all minds are connected, it raises the question of "how all minds are connected" or "the broader framework for such connections to exist".

Malcolm wrote:

It has nothing to with my perspective, it has to with what Buddha taught.

It is well established by the Buddha that one mind is not capable of influencing another mind directly — in order words, a Buddha cannot exercise his will on the mind of another.

But you don't seem very interested in what the Buddha taught and instead seem more interested in evangelizing your distinctly non-Buddhist concepts here. And I have to question why you would be interested to do so.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, April 14th, 2015 at 8:26 PM

Title: Re: is the mind individual?

Content:

Jeff said:

Because in the example, one mind would be affecting another. If there was not some form of overlap or connection, how would one reach/contact the other mind?

muni said:

Oh very easy by interconnection.

Then Sambhogakaya energy.

The individual mind cannot do such at all. Such is not its' domain but discussion can lead to the wish to practice to realize beyond the limited individual "mind" and so not trust that limited mind or identifying with it.

Interdependence-emptiness. Nothing individual apart and on its' own is other than deluded.

Malcolm wrote: Buddhas and bodhisattvas are unable to influence the minds of others — if they were able to influence the minds of others we all would have woken up eons ago and there would be no samsara.

Guidance, while we have to recognize. No Buddha or Bodhisattva can do it for another.

Jeff said:

I would agree that the individual (or local) mind does not have the capability. But with your "interconnection", it sounds like you believe it is possible and all minds are interconnected in some manner. Is that the case?

Buddha's do not "give". They can only introduce and share additional room to allow one to "drop". The individual sentient being still must be willing to drop the obstructions.

Malcolm wrote:

There is no universal mind, so your term "local" is useless.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, April 14th, 2015 at 8:19 PM

Title: Re: is the mind individual?

Content:

Astus said:

A story by Ven. Shengyan (<http://chancenter.org/cmc/1985/05/15/esoteric-and-exoteric-buddhism/>):

In Taiwan, I have a disciple who has been practicing with me for quite sometime. He has a good command of English, so when a certain Tibetan rinpoche was scheduled to lecture, he was asked to translate. He was very nervous. He had never practiced Tantra, and was afraid that he wouldn't understand what the rinpoche said. In a quandary, he finally decided that if he didn't understand, it was the rinpoche's responsibility to make him understand. With this thought he went to sleep. The rinpoche came to him in a dream, placed his hand on the disciple's head, and said, "You don't have to be nervous.

You will understand everything I say tomorrow. You don't have to worry." He had a wonderful feeling when the rinpoche touched him. The next morning it was the rinpoche who woke him up. My disciple immediately prostrated to the rinpoche and thanked him for entering his dream. Curious, the rinpoche asked, "What happened last night?" The disciple told him, and after a few more questions from the rinpoche, he concluded that it might not have been the rinpoche but a "yidam," a Dharma protector, who came to him.

Later I asked him if he had ever dreamed of me. He said, "Yes, indeed, many times." Then I asked if he thought that it was me who had entered his dreams. He said, "No, because Shih-fu doesn't have a yidam." So then I said to him, "O.K., I will go and find myself a yidam so that the next time you dream of me, you will be sure that it is my yidam that is entering your dream." My disciple objected, "But in Ch'an there is no such thing as a yidam."

Jeff said:

Thank you for the story Astus. Does that mean that you disagree with Malcolm and such is possible in the Buddhadharmā?

Malcolm wrote:

Why don't you try reading the paragraph immediately before these two:

In both traditions it is natural for a practitioner to have unusual physiological and psychological reactions — seeing, hearing, or even dreaming things out of the ordinary. A Tantric practitioner will take what he has seen, heard, or dreamt as signals that the Buddhas and Bodhisattvas are recognizing his practice. A Ch'an practitioner may also have such experiences, but they are not emphasized and are not taken as signals or signs of anything in particular.

Of course, the above statement is also inaccurate. A "Tantric" practitioner will do no such thing. Every practice as specific experiences that are outlined, including dreams, and when a practitioner has such experiences described in the text, it is taken as an indication that their practice is moving ahead.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, April 14th, 2015 at 7:57 PM

Title: Re: The theory of how empowerments work?

Content:

fckw said:

@Malcolm: What do you mean by "taking path empowerment every day"? Isn't this just another way of stating: practice this tantra every day? Or are you referring to a special part of the Hevajra-Tantra?

Malcolm wrote:

I am referring to practicing the Hevajra sadhana everyday in which one takes the four empowerments in an elaborate way everyday.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, April 14th, 2015 at 7:48 PM

Title: Re: How a skeptical anchorman became a Buddhist

Content:

Anders said:

Now the traditional Buddhist may argue that such a thing will never happen for the materialist due to his wrong view on rebirth (or even lack of right view on it), but this is a bit beside the point here imo....

Malcolm wrote:

Not, it is exactly the point.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, April 14th, 2015 at 7:15 PM

Title: Re: Sakya lam-rim text?

Content:

kirtu said:

Malcolm is correct - but until fairly recently "Clarifying the Sage's Intent" had not been published or was not available.

Malcolm wrote:

I am currently doing a lecture on this text and providing a chapter by chapter translation as we go along. I will cover the first of the six perfections on Saturday, 10:00 EST, April 18th. There have been three previous sections that interested parties may listen to.

Those who are interested may join the facebook group:

<https://www.facebook.com/groups/sakyapandita/>

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, April 14th, 2015 at 7:02 PM

Title: Re: is the mind individual?

Content:

Jeff said:

Ok, then could you describe how the guru visits them in this "dream state" (which is in their mind)? If one is manipulating someone's perceptions in their mind, does that not constitute affecting them and directly disagree with what Malcolm stated earlier?

Malcolm wrote:

You might see a guru in your dreams, but it is still your dream and not them "visiting" you in some real sense.

Jeff said:

I think this issue with our discussion may simply that in the nomenclature used here (Buddhism), higher level discrimination is simplified down to one big "Wisdom" category.

Malcolm wrote:

I think the problem with our discussion is that you don't seem to really understand the Dharma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, April 14th, 2015 at 7:46 AM

Title: Re: is the mind individual?

Content:

Jeff said:

Because in the example, one mind would be affecting another.

Malcolm wrote:

This idea is rejected in Buddhadharma. The only way my mind can influence another mind is that another person chooses to listen to what I say, or responds to some physical act I perform.

Jeff said:

So you are saying that my proposed experiment is theoretically impossible? No such thing as remote (energetic) contact and transmission?

Malcolm wrote:

Correct, that is what we have been saying to you now for several pages.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, April 14th, 2015 at 7:46 AM

Title: Re: is the mind individual?

Content:

Jeff said:

And thank you for finally agreeing that Buddhas and bodhisattvas can access and know the minds of others. Now we just need to just get the rest of the group to agree to such a concept.

Additionally, understand how that knowing is really the same as being with or "in" the local mind stream of the sentient being. With such "focus" of a high level being creating the void effect I described earlier.

asunthatneversets said:

Curious why you seem to be so enamored with this whole mind reading/interaction business?

Jeff said:

Not interested in mind reading at all. The topic goes more to the ability (and how) of gurus, Buddhas, Bodhisattvas and Dakini's to "help". Why such tantric (energy) practices lead to faster realization.

Malcolm wrote:

I suggest you properly study Vajrayāna under a qualified master. Then you will find all your questions answered.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, April 14th, 2015 at 7:32 AM

Title: Re: is the mind individual?

Content:

Jeff said:

Because in the example, one mind would be affecting another.

Malcolm wrote:

This idea is rejected in Buddhadharma. The only way my mind can influence another mind is that another person chooses to listen to what I say, or responds to some physical act I perform. It is the same for the Buddha.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, April 14th, 2015 at 7:29 AM

Title: Re: is the mind individual?

Content:

Jeff said:

And thank you for finally agreeing that Buddhas and bodhisattvas can access and know the minds of others.

Malcolm wrote:

"Finally agreeing"? We were never in disagreement about knowing the minds of others. You should look up the word "abhiññā". "Access" provides a problem. Buddhas and bodhisattvas are unable to influence the minds of others — if they were able to influence the minds of others we all would have woken up eons ago and there would be no samsara.

Jeff said:

Now we just need to just get the rest of the group to agree to such a concept.

Malcolm wrote:

They already agree.

Jeff said:

Additionally, understand how that knowing is really the same as being with or "in" the local mind stream of the sentient being. With such "focus" of a high level being creating the void effect I described earlier.

Malcolm wrote:

When one sees a tree, one is not "in the tree", it is the same with knowing the minds of others, one sees the concepts of others much in the manner of the way ordinary people watch tv.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, April 14th, 2015 at 6:53 AM

Title: Re: is the mind individual?

Content:

Jeff said:

So, I would like to theorize an experiment for the group...

If it could be done, would remote energy interaction be considered as experimental proof that minds overlap? Something that could be consciously perceived (energy, vibrations, temperature change or visions). As I have stated is possible for someone at the 7th bhumi.

Malcolm wrote:

Seriously man, no one here, including you, is a seventh stage bodhisattva. If you think you are, you need psychological help.

Jeff said:

I was making no such statement. I was asking a theoretical question as to whether the group would consider that as proof.

Malcolm wrote:

There is no substratum, minds do not "overlap." The reason why Buddhas and high bodhisattvas can know the minds of others, know past lives, etc. is because the nature of everything is emptiness and therefore while there is no universal substratum there is also no impediments because everything is empty. And since everything is empty, Buddha's wisdom is unimpeded in all directions and times.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, April 14th, 2015 at 6:44 AM

Title: Re: is the mind individual?

Content:

Jeff said:

So, I would like to theorize an experiment for the group...

If it could be done, would remote energy interaction be considered as experimental proof that minds overlap? Something that could be consciously perceived (energy, vibrations, temperature change or visions). As I have stated is possible for someone at the 7th bhumi.

Malcolm wrote:

Seriously man, no one here, including you, is a seventh stage bodhisattva. If you think you are, you need psychological help.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, April 14th, 2015 at 6:38 AM

Title: Re: is the mind individual?

Content:

Jeff said:

Ok, so you are saying that it is a definitional/title thing regarding "benefit for oneself" rather than really any sutra saying that a Buddha worries or cares about oneself?

My position is that appearance to those dwelling on the Bhumis, is really the broader energy/light interaction that I have previously described. Additionally, my position is that a Dakini is also sometimes the Sambhogakaya body and directly interacts with high level practitioners.

Malcolm wrote:

The Śrī Maladevi sutra states:

In that respect, the dharmakāya of the tathāgatagarbha is definitely released from the sheath of afflictions. Bhagavān, the so called "tathāgatagarbha" is tathāgata's wisdom of emptiness that cannot be seen by śravakas and pratyekabuddhas. Dharmakāya is just the total realization of emptiness. Nothing more.

Further, The Trikāya Sūtra states:

Kṣitigarbha, tathāgatas are endowed with the three kāyas: the dharmakāya, the sambhogkāya and the nirmanakāya...In that regard, the dharmakāya is visible to the tathagātas. The sambhogakāya is visible to bodhisattvas. The nirmanakāya is visible to ordinary persons on the stage of devotional practice.

Kṣitigarbha, for example, clouds are produced on the basis of an empty sky; rain is produced on the basis of clouds. Likewise, the sambhogakāya appears on the basis of the dharmakāya, and the nirmanakāya appears on the basis of the sambhogakāya.

Jeff said:

Yes, the Dharmakaya being the total realization of emptiness and also being the basis that the sambhogakaya appears on is what I meant by a stable bubble in emptiness (for the sambhogakaya).

Malcolm wrote:

Why don't you just properly study with a teacher rather than grasping at straws?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, April 14th, 2015 at 6:10 AM

Title: Re: is the mind individual?

Content:

Jeff said:

Ok, so you are saying that it is a definitional/title thing regarding "benefit for oneself" rather than really any sutra saying that a Buddha worries or cares about oneself?

My position is that appearance to those dwelling on the Bhumis, is really the broader energy/light interaction that I have previously described. Additionally, my position is that a Dakini is also sometimes the Sambhogakaya body and directly interacts with high level practitioners.

Malcolm wrote:

The Śrī Maladevi sutra states:

In that respect, the dharmakāya of the tathāgatagarbha is definitely released from the sheath of afflictions. Bhagavān, the so called "tathāgatagarbha" is tathāgata's wisdom of emptiness that cannot be seen by śravakas and pratyekabuddhas.

Dharmakāya is just the total realization of emptiness. Nothing more.

Further, The Trikāya Sūtra states:

Kṣitigarbha, tathāgatas are endowed with the three kāyas: the dharmakāya, the sambhogkāya and the nirmanakāya...In that regard, the dharmakāya is visible to the tathagātas. The sambhogakāya is visible to bodhisattvas. The nirmanakāya is visible to ordinary persons on the stage of devotional practice.

Kṣitigarbha, for example, clouds are produced on the basis of an empty sky; rain is produced on the basis of clouds. Likewise, the sambhogakāya appears on the basis of the dharmakāya, and the nirmanakāya appears on the basis of the sambhogakāya.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, April 14th, 2015 at 6:02 AM

Title: Re: is the mind individual?

Content:

Jeff said:

So your position is that a buddha (having a Dharmakaya) is "worried about their own benefit"?

Malcolm wrote:

No. I already explained it as did cone, the dharmakāya is termed "for one's own benefit" because one can only see it when one becomes a buddha. Only buddhas can see the dharmakāya, as has been said now several times.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, April 14th, 2015 at 5:51 AM

Title: Re: is the mind individual?

Content:

Jeff said:

Where in sutra does it say for one's own benefit?

Malcolm wrote:

Everywhere.

Jeff said:

With the realization/formation of the Dharmakaya there is no "one who is worried about their own benefit"? They have dropped all such desires and attachments or there would be no such Dharmakaya. What sutra really says such a thing?

Best wishes.

Malcolm wrote:

Very many. This is because the dharmakāya only appears to buddhas, where as the sambhogakāya appears to high bodhisattvas and the nirmanakāya to everyone else.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, April 14th, 2015 at 5:33 AM

Title: Re: is the mind individual?

Content:

Jeff said:

Thank you for pointing out that the Form Kayas are for the benefit of others, can you please explain how the Sambhogakaya "helps" with the benefit of the others? This seems to be impossible for most here as they believe that the mind cannot be affected by a buddha.

Malcolm wrote:

The sambhogakāya gives rise to the nirmanakāyas in all the different world systems.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, April 14th, 2015 at 5:32 AM

Title: Re: is the mind individual?

Content:

Jeff said:

Where in sutra does it say for one's own benefit?

Malcolm wrote:

Everywhere.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, April 14th, 2015 at 2:12 AM

Title: Re: is the mind individual?

Content:

Jeff said:

it works like this...

Malcolm wrote:

No, it really doesn't. This is just some fantasy you are having.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, April 14th, 2015 at 12:57 AM

Title: Re: Vajrayāna/Dzogchen

Content:

Sherlock said:

Zhangzhung Nyen gyud is Bon Dzogchen from a prior age before Garab Dorje.

Malcolm wrote:

Maybe, I have my doubts.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, April 14th, 2015 at 12:51 AM

Title: Re: is the mind individual?

Content:

Jeff said:

I guess that I have my answer. Thanks.

Malcolm wrote:

We have three dimensions, body, voice and mind. The Buddha's have three kāyas. The nirmanakāya exist because ordinary sentient beings cannot have contact with the sambhogakāya at all because of the afflictions they possess. When they remove those afflictions, then they can see the Sambhogakāya, but this takes many countless eons lifetimes of practice. Finally, when they become a Buddha, they can see the dharmakāya.

Therefore, all transmissions for ordinary people like ourselves occur on an external physical way, through speech and symbols. If we happen to realize the meaning of what is being taught, this is referred to a "mind transmission", but it is not really a transmission in the sense of a message communicated and a message received mentally. It is more in the sense of a message communicated through words and symbols whose inner significance is then realized directly. Anyone who tells you that there is some actually mind to mind transmission in Buddhadharma at the level of our impure perception is either lying or they have no idea what they are talking about.

Buddhas cannot communicate liberation into the minds of others. If they could, there would be no sentient beings left. The Buddha said famously, we cannot wash away suffering, he cannot remove it with his hand, nor can he make us liberated, but he can teach us a path.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, April 14th, 2015 at 12:39 AM

Title: Re: is the mind individual?

Content:

Jeff said:

On putting it in words... In your tradition, is there no such thing as mind-mind transmission?

Malcolm wrote:

Depends on what you mean by mind to mind. What do you mean by mind to mind.

Jeff said:

Direct transmission. Without the need for talking/oral communication. Often sometimes called energy or light transmission.

Malcolm wrote:

Transmission of what, baseball scores, stock tips?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, April 14th, 2015 at 12:34 AM

Title: Re: is the mind individual?

Content:

Jeff said:

Your response seems to imply that you believe that a guru or bodhisattva cannot directly impact (or know about) other sentient beings. Is that correct?

Malcolm wrote:

It implies no such thing. And what does the abhijñā of knowing the mind of another have to do with the question?

Jeff said:

Then how does a guru or bodhisattva impact other sentient beings? How do they access the mind of the being if there is not some medium of overlap?

Malcolm wrote:

Why does there have to be a medium of overlap?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, April 14th, 2015 at 12:32 AM

Title: Re: is the mind individual?

Content:

Jeff said:

On putting it in words... In your tradition, is there no such thing as mind-mind transmission?

Malcolm wrote:

Depends on what you mean by mind to mind. What do you mean by mind to mind.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, April 14th, 2015 at 12:29 AM

Title: Re: is the mind individual?

Content:

Jeff said:

Your response seems to imply that you believe that a guru or bodhisattva cannot directly impact (or know about) other sentient beings. Is that correct?

Malcolm wrote:

It implies no such thing. And what does the abhijñā of knowing the mind of another have to do with the question?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, April 13th, 2015 at 11:03 PM

Title: Re: is the mind individual?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

[quote="Jeff"]

On the translation, is there another version that you would prefer to discuss on the point?/quote]

Jeff, you really need to take a course in Yogacara so you will not be misled by theosophical edits of deprecated translations.

The ālayavijñāna is personal and individual, as anyone who has studied these texts any Buddhist primary language knows.

I can't even be bothered to explain this in detail because it would take much too long. However, you should educate yourself if possible:

http://www.bdk.or.jp/pdf/bdk/digitaldl/dBET_T1593_GreatVehicleSummary_2003.pdf

This text explains very precisely what the ālayavijñāna is.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, April 13th, 2015 at 10:09 PM

Title: Re: is the mind individual?

Content:

Jeff said:

Suzuki and Goddard translation.

Malcolm wrote:

Suzuki and Goddard translation.

hahahahahahaha....

No wonder you are so misled. That piece of crap should be burned.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, April 13th, 2015 at 8:53 PM

Title: Re: Meaning of Vajrayana Buddhism

Content:

Sherlock said:

Dzogchen is to Vajrayana as Vajrayana is to Mahayana.

Malcolm wrote:

No, this is nonsense. Dzogchen has no methods that allow one to attain awakening faster than one lifetime. As Zhigpo Dudtse pointed out, he looked far and wide for cig car bas, but apart from Saraha in India, and Lingrepa in Tibet, he could not find any. Neither of these two persons were Dzogchen practitioners.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, April 13th, 2015 at 8:28 PM

Title: Re: Meaning of Vajrayana Buddhism

Content:

Anders said:

The very quick summary, as I understand it:

Vajrayana exists for two reasons:

- *To provide a different and wider array of means for liberation that allows for more people to get there.

- *To provide radically faster means to Buddhahood than traditional mahayana.

This traditionally involves bonding with a Yidam (fully awakened deity) via a guru and, through these bonds and their blessings, transform affliction into wisdom (as opposed to abandoning affliction with wisdom).

Beyond this, there are also Mahamudra and Dzogchen who focus less on the yidam part (guru devotion still mandatory) and more on being introduced to one's nature by the guru and work with this as a speedy means to buddhahood.

Malcolm wrote:

Mahāmudra and Dzogchen are part of Vajrayāna.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, April 13th, 2015 at 8:12 PM

Title: Re: Sakya lam-rim text?

Content:

Luke said:

Does the Sakya school have its own lam-rim text? Or do they generally just use other schools' lam-rim texts?

Malcolm wrote:

Clarifying the Muni's Intent by Sakya Pandita is our Lamrim text.

The other texts mentioned above are not lamrim texts since they have no account of refuge, the six perfections, ten stages, three kāyas and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, April 11th, 2015 at 10:05 AM

Title: Re: Tsok restrictions

Content:

yan kong said:

I've been going to a small practice group a little bit in the nyingma pema lingpa lineage led by a Bhutanese loppon. I've received no empowerments or initiations or anything from anyone, I'm certainly in the sutrayana area of practice.

Thing is the last time after the teaching on the four noble truths we chanted from a chod practice text (and when I say chanted I mean the loppon tried to teach us the basic rhythm of the text, it didn't seem like an actual practice). Additionally they invited me to one of their Tsoks.

So my question is, should I be doing any of this having received no initiation or empowerment of any kind?

tomamundsen said:

AFAIK, there are no restrictions to tsok. All beings are invited.

Malcolm wrote:

Actually, those without samaya cannot participate.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, April 11th, 2015 at 6:29 AM

Title: Re: Does one need initiation to recite Vajrasattva mantra?

Content:

Punya said:

Because there is no initiation for Vajrasattva outside of Nyingma texts that come from India.

I'm curious what you mean by this Malcolm.

I'm aware of a number of Vajrasattva sadhana in Nyingma which I understand are derived from terma. I'm having trouble framing the question but what is the relationship between the initiation itself and the particular sadhana that a student is then expected to practice.

Malcolm wrote:

Guhyagarbha is that ultimate source of Vajrasattva initiations in Nyingma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, April 11th, 2015 at 3:25 AM

Title: Re: Does one need initiation to recite Vajrasattva mantra?

Content:

kirtu said:

I do not remember a Vajrasattva empowerment of any kind in Sakya...

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, it does not exist.

Challenge23 said:

Interesting. Are you comfortable with speculating with why that is? I was under the impression that all of the schools had the same basic empowerments (such as Medicine Buddha and Vajrasattva) and ceremonies and differed mostly in regards to some of the more advanced concepts and how the basics are presented. For example, all of the schools have a Ngondro but the number of repetitions and exact wording differ from school to school.

Malcolm wrote:

Because there is no initiation for Vajrasattva outside of Nyingma texts that come from India.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, April 11th, 2015 at 1:50 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist MEME. My Favorite

Content:

dharmagoat said:

So as I read it, the scriptures are the authority, but careful understanding of them is required to make them effective.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, that is correct. This is the main reason why my posts generally are supported on citations.

dharmagoat said:

I think we are on the same page now.

Malcolm wrote:

It is also important to provide citations, because if for example, one has not understood something correctly, and uses a citation to support it, another may come along and point out to you why you have made an error.

It is a simple generosity, and you have no idea how much time I spend looking up citations.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, April 11th, 2015 at 1:36 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist MEME. My Favorite

Content:

dharmagoat said:

So as I read it, the scriptures are the authority, but careful understanding of them is required to make them effective.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, that is correct. This is the main reason why my posts generally are supported on citations.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, April 11th, 2015 at 1:11 AM

Title: Re: Poll: Kalacakra war prophecy

Content:

shaunc said:

Even if I was to accept this prophesy as 100% accurate. My question is how will this affect my life or my dharma practise now.

Will said:

Many Kalacakra initiates prepare now to help the Ruler of Shambhala defeat the barbarians at the time of the war. How do they prepare? One must ask a Kalacakra initiate.

Malcolm wrote:

If you receive the empowerment and maintain your samaya, this is sufficient to be reborn in Shambhala at that time.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, April 11th, 2015 at 1:04 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist MEME. My Favorite

Content:

dharmagoat said:

The Bhāvanākrama continues:

With an understanding of the meaning so differentiated, one should meditate on the reality of the pure state and not on its apparent aspect. If one meditates wrongly and fails to clear away all doubts, one will not achieve perfect awareness. As a result, the meditation becomes fruitless, like the meditation of the radical dogmatists.

What is this referring to?

Malcolm wrote:

This translation is a little strange.

After that, based on the meaning differentiated in that way, one should meditate on the true meaning and not on that which is not the true meaning. If one grasps that which is not [the true meaning], one's meditation will be incorrect and since one's doubt will not be removed, also right knowledge [samyagjñānam, one of the eight limbs] will not arise. Therefore, since one's meditation does not become meaningful, it is similar with the meditation of non-buddhist (mu stegs pa, tīrthikas)

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, April 10th, 2015 at 11:59 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist MEME. My Favorite

Content:

dharmagoat said:

The Bhāvanākrama continues:

With an understanding of the meaning so differentiated, one should meditate on the reality of the pure state and not on its apparent aspect. If one meditates wrongly and fails to clear away all doubts, one will not achieve perfect awareness. As a result, the meditation becomes fruitless, like the meditation of the radical dogmatists.

What is this referring to?

Malcolm wrote:

Which translation are you using, and which of the three Bhāvanākramas? I need to look at the Tibetan.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, April 10th, 2015 at 11:23 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist MEME. My Favorite

Content:

dharmagoat said:

The Bhāvanākrama of Kamalaśīla explains:

At the outset one should seek to develop wisdom by listening [to the dharma], for it enables one to grasp the meaning of the authoritative scriptures. Then, with analytical intellect one differentiates between the apparent and the ultimate meaning.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, this is perfect. Of course, one must listen only to a qualified teacher of Dharma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, April 10th, 2015 at 9:18 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist MEME. My Favorite

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Also, one should understand that in Vajrayāna, direct perception and inferences are not authorities. The Abhibodhikramopadeśa of Master Āryadeva states:

At the time of the ultimate view of secret mantra,

the direct perception by mind and sense organs and inferences are not authorities, but the profound scriptures and intimate instructions are authorities.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, April 10th, 2015 at 8:45 PM

Title: Re: Does one need initiation to recite Vajrasattva mantra?

Content:

kirtu said:

I do not remember a Vajrasattva empowerment of any kind in Sakya...

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, it does not exist.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, April 10th, 2015 at 8:41 PM

Title: Re: Hearing other sect's lectures is negative?

Content:

ShakuShodoo said:

The title is very elucidative of this question of mine.

Let us say that I stick to Karma Kagyu tradition...

If I go to a Ch'an monastery, hear it's Masters teachings and seek pearls of wisdom...will I be doing something negative?

Malcolm wrote:

No.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, April 10th, 2015 at 8:41 PM

Title: Re: Gorampa & Tsongkhapa

Content:

Unknown said:

If the scripture is a statement of an earlier Tibetan scholar, they dismiss it [saying]: "One who says something like that is a nihilistic fool." If the scripture is identified as a statement of the Buddha, Nagarjuna, and so on, they patch it with words like "The statement 'does not exist' means 'does not truly exist'" and "Is not nonexistent' means 'is not conventionally nonexistent,'" so that it fits with their own desires. In fact, the only difference is that if they direct refutations at the Buddha, they fear being labeled evil persons with evil views, [whereas] if they are able to refute earlier Tibetans, they are labeled heroic scholars.

Malcolm wrote:

Beautiful words...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, April 10th, 2015 at 8:25 AM

Title: Re: Contradictions in the Mahayana Sutras?

Content:

Dan74 said:

One could of course go on to even more egregious statements, but yes, the Venerable is spreading misinformation.

//_

dan

Malcolm wrote:

People like this dude do not deserve the title "venerable" as there is nothing venerable about him.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, April 10th, 2015 at 7:03 AM

Title: Re: Contradictions in the Mahayana Sutras?

Content:

frankc said:

Ven Dhammavuddho has some videos on youtube talking about some contradictions in the Sutras and giving some criticisms of the Mahayana teachings. Curious to know how a Mahayana Buddhist would explain and defend against the criticisms and contradictions he is talking about. Here are four short videos of an interview with him talking about Mahayana.

<https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=Vkhclyrq8Hs>

<https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=nKO0mM48Hj8>

<https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=os8ZtNjE4zA>

<https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=JsHpUnUT1Us>

Malcolm wrote:

He has no idea what is he talking about.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, April 10th, 2015 at 5:11 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist MEME. My Favorite

Content:

Lazy_eye said:

Yes, of course, but when we are talking about "Buddhism" in a general way, Theravada is relevant. Even though Vajrayana may not teach a "gradual path," it would be incorrect factually to say that the notion of a gradual path is un-Buddhist.

Malcolm wrote:

Vajrayāna does teach a gradual path, it is just much faster.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, April 10th, 2015 at 5:07 AM

Title: Re: Gorampa & Tsongkhapa

Content:

Tsongkhapafan said:

Actually, Tsongkhapa would say that teaching that the ultimate nature of phenomena is lack of inherent existence is Nagarjuna, Aryadeva and Chandrakirti's true intention.

Malcolm wrote:

That is not why other scholars fault Tsongkhapa. They fault him for other things, novel interpretations and internal contradictions in his later writings.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, April 10th, 2015 at 4:47 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist MEME. My Favorite

Content:

Lazy_eye said:

That's obviously different from simply having a high regard for the Buddha, or being drawn to aspects of his teachings. But is that degree of confidence a prerequisite for refuge, in your view?

Malcolm wrote:

There are three kinds of refuge, fear, faith and compassion. The first is hardly refuge at all. One cannot take refuge without faith in the Buddha and his teachings, even if you mouth the words. However, even mouthing the words without faith sets up a cause for the arising of faith even if very weak.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, April 10th, 2015 at 4:10 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen Community of Chogyal Namkhai Norbu

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The irony of my answer seems to have been lost...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, April 10th, 2015 at 2:12 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen Community of Chogyal Namkhai Norbu

Content:

Motova said:

Even if you were to sit on his lap there would be a delay.

Malcolm wrote:

Ummm....?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, April 10th, 2015 at 1:22 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen Community of Chogyal Namkhai Norbu

Content:

oldbob said:

Please to remember that webcast transmission (an officially accepted means of transmission) is not / not simultaneous, but is delayed by several minutes.

dzogchungpa said:

Is it really that much? I didn't know that.

Malcolm wrote:

This is not true. Sometimes, the video buffering can be a bit delayed, but the audio only is very much on track all the time. So people who are super neurotic about digital lag times can elect to follow audio only. Actually, they should really sit in Rinpoche's lap so there is virtually no time between when the air crosses his vocal cords and the sound hits your ear -- who knows, in those microseconds you might miss the transmission...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, April 10th, 2015 at 1:13 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist MEME. My Favorite

Content:

Lazy_eye said:

Hi Malcolm,

How is a "reliable person" defined according to Buddhadharma?

Malcolm wrote:

It would be the Buddha or his disciples. Really, what we are talking about here is citational or scriptural authority. The Samdhinirmocana Sūtra states:

As such, the reasoning of a valid proof is the authority of direction perception; the authority of inference, and the authority of trustworthy citations which is valid through the five valid characteristics.

Those five valid characteristics are:

The characteristic of being supported on a direct perception, the characteristic of being supported on a direct perception which is the basis for that, the characteristic of the application of example in one's own reasoning, the characteristic of perfectly establishment and the characteristic of a scripture proven to be completely valid.

You should look into this sūtra for a more detailed explanation.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, April 10th, 2015 at 12:00 AM

Title: Re: How India Is Squandering Its Top Export

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Then of course there is this lovely little poem written by the Muslim Mahmud al-Kashgari about the invasion of Khotan in the early 11th century:

We came down on them like a flood, We went out among their cities, We tore down the idol-temples, We shat on the Buddha's head!

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, April 9th, 2015 at 11:53 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist MEME. My Favorite

Content:

Bakmoon said:

I've personally never heard anyone say that we should accept the Buddha's teachings just because. In fact, Buddhist epistemology (in contrast with some Hindu epistemologies like Nyaya) rejects the claim that scriptural and traditional authority themselves can serve as valid sources of knowledge apart from inference.

Malcolm wrote:

This is just not factual. There are three sources of authority in Buddhadharma: direct perception (pratyakṣa), inference (anumana) and testimony of reliable persons (śabda).

Bakmoon said:

I thought that in Buddhist Pramana testimony is considered to be a subclass of inference rather than a totally independent source of knowledge.

Malcolm wrote:

It is a totally independent source of knowledge, and indeed Dharmakīrti for example spends an entire chapter devoted to proving why we can for example accept the Buddha as an authority.

But we also have this from the Pabbakotthaka Sutta:

"Excellent, Shariputra. Excellent. Those who have not known, seen, penetrated, realized, or attained it by means of discernment would have to take it on conviction in others that the faculty of conviction... persistence... mindfulness... concentration... discernment, when developed and pursued, plunges into the Deathless, has the Deathless as its goal and consummation; whereas those who have known, seen, penetrated, realized, and attained it by means of discernment would have no doubt or uncertainty that the faculty of conviction... persistence... mindfulness... concentration... discernment, when developed and pursued, plunges into the Deathless, has the Deathless as its goal and consummation."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, April 9th, 2015 at 10:17 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist MEME. My Favorite

Content:

dharmagoat said:

They may ask the question "how is the doctrine of the Buddha superior to all other teachings?"

"Because it is" seems a poor answer.

Malcolm wrote:

That is not the answer of course. Only the Buddha has properly identified suffering, the cause of suffering, the cessation of suffering and the path. That is why Buddhadharma leads to liberation and other Dharmas do not.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, April 9th, 2015 at 10:15 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist MEME. My Favorite

Content:

Bakmoon said:

I've personally never heard anyone say that we should accept the Buddha's teachings just because. In fact, Buddhist epistemology (in contrast with some Hindu epistemologies like Nyaya) rejects the claim that scriptural and traditional authority themselves can serve as valid sources of knowledge apart from inference.

Malcolm wrote:

This is just not factual. There are three sources of authority in Buddhadharma: direct perception (pratyakṣa), inference (anumāna) and testimony of reliable persons (śabda).

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, April 9th, 2015 at 9:45 PM

Title: Re: Vajrayāna/Dzogchen

Content:

shanehanner said:

What are the Dzogchen preliminaries?

Malcolm wrote:

You should learn those from a teacher.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, April 9th, 2015 at 9:37 PM

Title: Re: How India Is Squandering Its Top Export

Content:

Caodemarte said:

In response to the complaint that it was a bit lazy to not specify errors in fact and tone in the cited article I should note (and I really thought I would not have to):

Malcolm wrote:

Thanks for replying.

Caodemarte said:

I doubt it was intended this way but the error in tone is pretty glaring.

Malcolm wrote:

One can't have an error in tone.

Caodemarte said:

In terms of fact, and respectfully, Bodhgaya is not like the Vatican or a Jewish congregation run by Protestants. It is not the organizational or religious HQ of Buddhism or of any Buddhist group. Almost all religions have pilgrimage sites.

Yes, actually it is. Bodhgaya should be administered by an international coalition of Buddhist organizations.

In Buddhism, there is no one fundamental text that all must believe in with a requirement from God for all able believers to perform a pilgrimage to one site as a fundamental duty (let alone a Buddhist equivalent of the Kaaba in Mecca). It is simply incorrect to say that "Bodhgaya is to Buddhists what Mecca is to Muslims."

Malcolm wrote:

In fact, Bodhgaya is more to Buddhists than Mecca is to Muslims — there is no encouragement in the Koran for Muslims to worship at the Kaaba, per se. An ancient pilgrimage site, the Kaaba, eventually became associated with the house built by Ibrahim.

The Buddha, on the other hand, clearly stated that all Buddhists should try to visit the four memorial spots, the site of his birth, awakening, first teaching and nirvana.

Caodemarte said:

"In fact the demise of Buddhism in India is attributable to both the country's major religions, with Islam in effect finishing off what Hinduism began." would seem to be an unforced error or an interpretation, but not a fact.

Malcolm wrote:

Try reading "The Hardships and downfall of Buddhism in India by Verardi. In this book, he recounts a long history the decline of Buddhism in India. Hindu hostility to Buddhism in the Post-Gupta period is well documented, and supported by anecdotal reports of conflicts between Mahasiddhas and their Hindu enemies.

That Muslims delt the death blow to Indian Buddhism in the 12th century is beyond dispute.

Caodemarte said:

"...so Buddhists in Bangladesh, Indonesia, and other places that suffered foreign invasion, or in small, poor countries like Bhutan, might rejoice in China's emergence as a superpower" because China has a lot of Buddhists. Well, no. You could argue that Indonesian Buddhists are mostly Chinese and that some of them take pride in China's rise, but that is hardly because of shared religious values. I guess you could say this is not an error of fact because of the word might, but c'mon.

Malcolm wrote:

DKR is making a rhetorical point, i.e., that marginalization of Buddhists in border countries might well cause them to look north in the growing showdown between China and India.

Caodemarte said:

"Western secular political correctness is on display..." No, Indian policy or sign writing could never be cited as "Western secular political correctness."

Malcolm wrote:

Sure it can — but here again, you are getting caught up in DKR's rhetoric of irony — he knows very well that indignant Indians will react just as you have.

Caodemarte said:

He certainly was quite willing to burn books (except the Quran) or anything that he could not steal, but the motivation given in the article is suggestive of another legendary story about the library at Alexandria, but in any case seems off in this case.

Malcolm wrote:

Considering that reports indicate that the library burned for six months, it seems completely apropos.

Caodemarte said:

The idea that that the Indian government is trying to whitewash history to avoid offending Muslims, especially this one, makes no sense to anyone familiar with Indian politics (please examine why Modi could not get a US visa until recently).

Malcolm wrote:

You do realize that a Mosque abuts the Bodhgaya stupa and it broadcasts its call to prayer loudly and insistently five times a day. There are quite a number of groups who, since Bodhgaya was "rediscovered" in the 19th century, have decided to attach themselves to the Mahabodhi Temple.

But it is a place for Buddhists — not Hindus, not Muslims, etc. In general, the sentiment of the article is correct. The Buddhist epoch in Indian history is most important, and yet most Indians these days know more about the history of England than they do Indian history during that point in time.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, April 9th, 2015 at 10:17 AM

Title: Re: Gorampa & Tsongkhapa

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

btw, since we are just going around in circles, the above is my last response to this issue.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, April 9th, 2015 at 3:39 AM

Title: Re: How India Is Squandering Its Top Export

Content:

Caodemarte said:

I found this article very bad in tone and content. Its many inaccuracies on history and Buddhism (no, Bodhgaya for Buddhists is not the equivalent of Mecca for Muslims) really stand out when the article accuses India of "hiding the truth." I assume the publisher is responsible for the headline comparing Buddhism to a good for export and bears responsibility for that.

Malcolm wrote:

Inaccuracies such as?

Bodhgaya is one of the four main places Buddha told those who follow Buddhadharma that they should visit during their lifetime, the others being Lumbini, The Deer Park and Kushinagara. Of these four, Bodhgaya, Vajrāsana, the Bodhimaṇḍa is the most important.

Frankly your dismissal of the article seems rather lazy since you do not bother to list any so called "inaccuracies."

Buddhadharma was India's best and most enduring export besides which all others pale.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, April 9th, 2015 at 3:11 AM

Title: Re: How India Is Squandering Its Top Export

Content:

Fortyeightvows said:

This article is spot on!

http://www.huffingtonpost.in/dzongsar-jamyang-khyentse/how-india-is-squandering-_b_7008922.html

Malcolm wrote:

indeed...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, April 9th, 2015 at 3:05 AM

Title: Re: is vajrayana budhism a path of renunciation or isn't it?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Conditioned phenomena are intrinsically contaminated and contaminating, that is the point of the passage. That is also Candragomin's point.

This is why sense objects are given up in Hinayāna and Mahāyāna — they are contaminated and contaminating.

Fruitzilla said:

Whoops, I'd better go looking for another tradition then.

Malcolm wrote:

You won't find such a tradition in Buddhadharma outside of Vajrayāna.

Of course, from the standpoint of the emptiness of all phenomena, phenomena are regarded as pure in Mahāyāna, however, this does not apply to people who are not awakened. If you still experience afflictions, this means for you phenomena are contaminated.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, April 9th, 2015 at 2:46 AM

Title: Re: is vajrayana budhism a path of renunciation or isn't it?

Content:

Fruitzilla said:

That all (afflicted) emotions are painful I can understand. Phenomena being contaminated by themselves, and not by our relationship toward them, isn't anything I've come across before this thread.

Malcolm wrote:

Abhidharmakośa:

There are contaminated and uncontaminated phenomena.

Condition phenomena apart from the path are contaminated. Why? They increase contamination.

The material aggregates consists of the five sense organs and five sense objects. All of it is contaminated. Also all mental objects, apart from cessation, space and path dharmas, are contaminated.

This is basic Buddhadharma everyone should know.

Fruitzilla said:

Apart from the strange reasoning and the protestant tone I don't see how this is different from what I stated.

Malcolm wrote:

You said:

Phenomena being contaminated by themselves, and not by our relationship toward them, isn't anything I've come across before this thread.

Conditioned phenomena are intrinsically contaminated and contaminating, that is the point of the passage. That is also Candragomin's point.

This is why sense objects are given up in Hinayāna and Mahāyāna — they are contaminated and contaminating.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, April 9th, 2015 at 2:04 AM

Title: Re: is vajrayana budhism a path of renunciation or isn't it?

Content:

Fruitzilla said:

That all (afflicted) emotions are painful I can understand. Phenomena being contaminated by themselves, and not by our relationship toward them, isn't anything I've come across before this thread.

Malcolm wrote:

Abhidharmakośa:

There are contaminated and uncontaminated phenomena.

Conditioned phenomena apart from the path are contaminated. Why? They increase contamination.

The material aggregates consists of the five sense organs and five sense objects. All of it is contaminated. Also all mental objects, apart from cessation, space and path dharmas, are contaminated.

This is basic Buddhadharma everyone should know.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, April 9th, 2015 at 1:54 AM

Title: Re: Gorampa & Tsongkhapa

Content:

Tsongkhapafan said:

Yes, but this is an erroneous way of seeing the self. Self is not empty of self, it's empty of inherently existent self, otherwise you are negating what exists. You seem to have a problem with conventionally designated things having a conventionally designated nature.

Malcolm wrote:

Things have no natures, conventionally or otherwise. Look, we can say water is wet, but actually, there no water that possesses a wet nature. Water is wet, that is all. There is no wetness apart from water and not water apart from wetness. If you say a given thing has a separate nature, you are making the exact mistaken Nāgārjuna points out in the analysis of movement, i.e., it is senseless to say there is a "moving mover." Your arguments are exactly the same, you are basically saying there is an "existing existence."

Tsongkhapa said:

The self appears, how does it appear, what is its basis for appearance? Of you say that it is not the aggregates, then likewise, then the parts of a table are not the basis for the table's appearance. In both cases we are discussing an identity: self, table. I'm not saying that the aggregates are not the basis for the appearance of self, I'm saying the aggregates are not the self.

Malcolm wrote:

Now you are contradicting yourself, as anyone can plainly see who can read English.

Tsongkhapa said:

Of course the parts of the table are the basis for designating table, but 'table' is the possessor and the parts of the table are the possessions of the table, and as Nagarjuna says, possessor and possessed cannot be one and the same.

Malcolm wrote:

This is precisely because of the above point I referenced. Nāgārjuna clearly shows that characteristics/natures are untenable.

Candrakīrti points out that the possessor does not exist at all, but for the mere purpose of discourse, we allow conventionally the idea that there is a possessor of parts even though no possessor of parts exists. This mistake that we indulge in can act as an agent, for example a car, we can use it as such, but it is empty of being a car — an agent is as empty of being an agent as its actions are empty of being actions.

Tsongkhapa said:

Phenomena do not have intrinsic characteristics even conventionally, so your insistence that they do indicates to me that you have not properly studied the great Indian Madhyamaka masters. Arthakriya, functionality, is not proof of nature-possession.

You've erected a strawman. I have not said at any point that phenomena possess intrinsic characteristics, but they do exist and they do have imputed characteristics and an imputed nature.

Malcolm wrote:

As I said, you have fallen for a pyramid scheme.

Tsongkhapa said:

The taste of tea is different to the taste of coffee because it's a different karmic appearance arising from different causes and conditions. Tea and coffee are different and hold their own natures conventionally.

Malcolm wrote:

And thus you fall again into the trap of realism — where do coffee and tea hold their nature? From their own sides? No, according to what you just said they owe their flavor to karmic appearances and therefore have no nature of their own at all.

Tsongkhapa said:

Conventionally phenomena exist and have their own natures, everyone knows that.

Malcolm wrote:

No, conventional phenomena appear, and because no one knows they they cannot be established according to any of the four extremes (not merely like illusions) they are illusions and they become objects of false cognitions, aka relative truths.

Tsongkhapa said:

To deny something that exists is nihilism, despite what others have said on this thread. You seem to be denying the valid conventional nature of phenomena, therefore this is tantamount to nihilism. This conventional nature is not intrinsic yet it exists and is apprehended by valid cognition.

Malcolm wrote:

One cannot accuse someone of nihilism when they have not advanced the existence of something. Likewise, you cannot accuse someone of stealing merely because they have found an empty bank vault. Your assertion is like accusing someone who discovers a theft of the crime itself even though they are innocent. As Nāgārjuna states: If I had a thesis I would be guilty, but since I alone have no thesis I alone am innocent.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, April 9th, 2015 at 1:30 AM

Title: Re: Vajrayāna/Dzogchen

Content:

Konchok Namgyal said:

You cannot correctly practice Dzogchen without vajrayana, the paths leading to dzogchen are only through vajrayana.

everyone want to practice dzogchen but doesnt want to do the work to get there and there are alot of false teachers of dzogchen.

without the Ngongdro, the blessings and the purification practices, any attempts at Dzogpachenpo are worthless !

Malcolm wrote:

Lots of false teachers?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, April 9th, 2015 at 1:24 AM

Title: Re: is vajrayana budhism a path of renunciation or isn't it?

Content:

Fruitzilla said:

Seriously tough, the stuff about sense objects being poisonous in themselves sounds quite silly to me, and certainly not something I can remember reading or hearing about in my (admittedly not very broad) exposure of Mahayana. And no, I've never heard of Candragomin.

Malcolm wrote:

It is a fundamental point of view about conditioned dharmas (apart from path dharmas) in general shared between Hinayāna and common Mahāyāna, i.e. the second seal:

All contaminated phenomena are suffering.

Now, I understand that basic Buddhadharma is not very popular around here of late, but who can argue with the second seal?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, April 8th, 2015 at 11:21 PM

Title: Re: Gorampa & Tsongkhapa

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Therefore it follows that for you an illusory elephant is not empty of being an "elephant" because it bears the characteristics of an elephant (trunks, tusks, etc.) upon which one may impute the conventional designation elephant.

Tsongkhapafan said:

Correct. There is an appearance of elephant. That is the basis by which worldly people understand elephant as well.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, this is fast track to making yourself a laughing stock — can you ride an illusory elephant? If not, than how is an illusory elephant not empty of an elephant?

Tsongkhapafan said:

Tables hold their own nature? How, where? In their parts or separate from them? Your conclusion does not follow from your premise. A collection of parts designated a "table" is still empty of being a table even though it can be used as one, just as a collection of aggregates is empty of a self even though it can be designated one.

A collection of aggregates is never designated as a self

Malcolm wrote:
Of course it is.

Tsongkhapa said:
- the self is not the body and not the mind. Self is imputed on the basis of body and mind. Chandrakirti and other Prasangika scholars refute that the aggregates are the self even conventionally.

Malcolm wrote:
No one said the aggregates are "the self", even conventionally. Nevertheless, when you see your body, you designate it TKfan and when someone says injurious words to you, your mind reacts as if your self has been injured. But in reality, this is only because you have designated this collection of parts "TKfan." But TKfan is empty of TKfan.

Tsongkhapa said:
The self is not empty of self because it appears and can perform the function of self.

Malcolm wrote:
The self appears, how does it appear, what is its basis for appearance? Of you say that it is not the aggregates, than likewise, then the parts of a table are not the basis for the table's appearance. In both cases we are discussing an identity: self, table.

Tsongkhapa said:
Similarly, the basis, body is not empty of body because it appears and can perform the function of body.

Malcolm wrote:
You are just repeating the same mistake over and over again. It does not matter whether we are talking about a self, table, body, mind, or anything else designated or imputed onto a collection of parts.

Tsongkhapa said:
Not so. No phenomenon has a findable nature other than emptiness but that doesn't mean that conventionally they don't possess the nature of their imputed objects and can perform the function of those objects.

Malcolm wrote:
Phenomena do not have intrinsic characteristics even conventionally, so your insistence that they do indicates to me that you have not properly studied the great Indian Madhyamaka masters. Arthakriya, functionality, is not proof of nature-possession.

Tsongkhapa said:
They do and this is why table is not empty of table.

Malcolm wrote:
They do not [possess the nature of their imputed object], and this is why tables can function as tables. Tables function as tables solely because we designate a collection of parts a table and use it as such. There is no table at all apart from our imputation. The table is empty of a table because a table is solely an imputation from our side. The collection of parts we are designating as a table has not been table from its own side ever and will never be such a table, and therefore is empty of the table we are imputing.

There is no table in absence of the parts either, since there is no basis upon which to impute the table.

Your argument suffers from being conned by the pyramid scheme of realism — the idea that you can just keep borrowing from someone else to pay off your previous investors. Your argument suffers from a hidden flaw of unconsciously resorting to parabhāva, gzhan dngos, dependent existence, which is just a form of inherent existence, svabhāva, rang bzhin.

The only way to correct your error is to accept your investment is a sham and accept your losses. Otherwise, you become like Bernie Madoff, constantly borrowing and making more and more inflated claims to rope in new investors.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Wednesday, April 8th, 2015 at 10:55 PM
Title: Re: is vajrayana budhism a path of renunciation or isn't it?
Content:

Malcolm wrote:
We were not talking about afflictions, we were talking about sense objects. In the common Mahāyāna and Hinayāna they are something strictly to be given up.

srivijaya said:
In what sense could they said to be given up. The sense objects appear in all cases, so it must be more to do with attachment towards them than their mere arising?

Malcolm wrote:
Yes, and in the lower vehicles, the way of dealing with attachment is much the same as how one relates with poison, as the citation from Candragomin illustrates.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Wednesday, April 8th, 2015 at 10:52 PM
Title: Re: Gorampa & Tsongkhapa
Content:
Ayu said:

Maybe from personal angle of view, it makes sense. But that is only perception and naming. As long as it is not clearly defined what is "table" in objective sense, I cannot agree. What more than a name is "table"? Where to find the own nature of it, if you try to consider it beyond a certain perception?

For a man it is a table, for a dog it is a shed, for a fly it is an airport, for an animalcule it is a wide country.

It is no table, if viewed dispassionately.

Tsongkhapa said:

What makes table different from chair? Conceptual designation, function, characteristics that are merely imputed by mind. There is no objective table, but there doesn't need to be for a table to have the merely imputed nature of table. Table has the nature of table and chair has the nature of chair CONVENTIONALLY. Of course no nature can be found upon investigation other than emptiness, I'm not saying it does, but any normal person knows the difference between a chair and a table and the function of each, therefore table is not empty of table and chair is not empty of chair.

We don't have to be talking about the ultimate nature of these things all the time.

Malcolm wrote:

The minute you say that something is not empty, you are talking at the ultimate level. Here tables are empty of tables, but are used as such because a collection of parts is designated as such. If you say that tables are not empty of tables then you have to account for where the table holds a table — if you claim that tables are not empty of being tables because they are being designated as such, tables in fact are still empty of tables because the designation "table" is not a table either.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, April 8th, 2015 at 10:41 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist MEME. My Favorite

Content:

Dan74 said:

In this medium I find it best to assume that the other poster has the best intentions possible.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, April 8th, 2015 at 10:40 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist MEME. My Favorite

Content:

dharmagoat said:

Also, the very efforts made by some to defend the Dharma could be damaging its reputation, particularly in the West.

Malcolm wrote:

Buddha stated that Dharma can only be destroyed from within when his teachings are not properly studied and practiced.

Damage to the reputation of the Dharma can only happen if people do not study and practice properly. If people who are completely unqualified to do so pick up the banner of "Dharma teacher" and mislead people down a false path not taught by the Buddha, then the reputation of the Dharma will be damaged. But if we follow the advice of Sakya Pandita there will be no problem at all:

In brief, since that which has been spoken by the Buddha, gathered by the compilers, meditated by siddhas, explained by paṇḍitas, translated by the translators and known to scholars to be taught by the Buddha, it is necessary to hear, explain, meditate and practice that.

If a teaching which is the opposite of those should arise, since it was not a doctrine of the Buddha, one should not listen to it, explain it, meditate on it nor practice it even if it seems very profound. Although there are other non-buddhist and false teachings that seem to be very good, leave them aside because they are not the doctrine of the Buddha.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, April 8th, 2015 at 8:03 PM

Title: Re: is vajrayana budhism a path of renunciation or isn't it?

Content:

smcj said:

My Gelug mentor put it to me this way; the poisonous afflictions are never to be indulged in--and that is true in all forms of Dharma. In Vajrayana they are transmuted into wisdom. The analogy used was that the anti-venom from a rattlesnake bite is made from rattlesnake venom. If you are bitten you want the anti -venom. You don't want to get bitten again!

Just so when the poisonous afflictions arise you want the medicine of the wisdoms that are made from the afflictions, not more afflictions!

Malcolm wrote:

We were not talking about afflictions, we were talking about sense objects. In the common Mahāyāna and Hinayāna they are something strictly to be given up. In Vajrayāna they are something to be used. When we say that Vajrayāna is a path of nonrenunciation (and if anyone has doubts about this I suggest they go talk to HH Sakya Trizin, Chogyal Namkhai Norbu and so on) we are not saying that it is a path in which one indulges one's afflictions. We are saying that it is a path in which one does not seek to give up sense objects in order to control afflictions.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, April 8th, 2015 at 7:50 PM

Title: Re: Gorampa & Tsongkhapa

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Question: does there exist an appearance of a table or does there exist a table which appears?

Tsongkhapafan said:

To please Michael (and advance the discussion), there exists a mere appearance of table, but table is not empty of table because conventionally it has the characteristics of table. It is empty of inherently existent table, i.e., table is merely a conceptual imputation upon a the valid basis of imputation for table, the parts and the collection of parts. It is not an independent phenomenon as it appears to be.

The definition of element is that which holds its own nature, and this refers to any phenomenon. Table is a phenomenon that holds its own nature. What is its nature? Conventionally it is table and not non-table, so it is incorrect to say that table is empty of table as this is tantamount to saying that conventionally there is no table.

Malcolm wrote:

Therefore it follows that for you an illusory elephant is not empty of being an "elephant" because it bears the characteristics of an elephant (trunks, tusks, etc.) upon which one may impute the conventional designation elephant.

Tables hold their own nature? How, where? In their parts or separate from them? Your conclusion does not follow from your premise. A collection of parts designated a "table" is still empty of being a table even though it can be used as one, just as a collection of aggregates is empty of a self even though it can be designated one. It follows that if tables are not empty of tables then persons are not empty of persons, selves are not empty of selves and you have in one mistaken argument turned the whole of the Buddha's teaching on its head. According to you we must accept that the self actually exists merely on the basis of being designated upon the aggregates, which violates on the basic four seals, "All phenomena are not a self." Such a conclusion is not acceptable to Vasubandu in the Refutation of the Pudgala much less Nāgārjuna, Aryadeva, Bhaviveka or Candrakīrti. Nāgārjuna states:
All living beings are causes and results.
There are no sentient beings at all.
Empty dharmas are entirely produced from dharmas strictly empty;
dharmas without a self and [not] of a self.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, April 8th, 2015 at 10:03 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen Community of Chogyal Namkhai Norbu

Content:

oldbob said:

Everything Malcolm writes is exactly correct, and it is clear that he has a greater understanding of these things, than I do.

There seems to have been a previous robust discussion of this issue, expressing many different viewpoints.

Malcolm wrote:

The only viewpoint that matters in this respect is ChNN's and he has made himself abundantly clear on this issue innumerable times to anyone who has ears to hear him.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, April 8th, 2015 at 1:36 AM

Title: Re: The theory of how empowerments work?

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

OK, I'll make sure to pay close attention to what HHST has to say in a few weeks.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, if he is giving the major two empowerment of Vajrakilaya, then pay special attention during the vase empowerment's eleven sections.

Othewise, try to receive the Hevajra empowerment, then practice it for a few years, taking the path empowerments everyday. You will definitely understand the principal experientially.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, April 8th, 2015 at 1:24 AM

Title: Re: is vajrayana budhism a path of renunciation or isn't it?

Content:

conebeckham said:

Lots of good discussion--but directing this back at the original poster's question: In what way is a hermit's lifestyle, for instance, not deemed renunciation, and in what way is a strict retreat, with a certain amount of austerity, a Vajrayana practice? How are the ideas of austere retreat and the Path of Sensory Pleasures, etc., compatible?

Malcolm wrote:

When you are in retreat you are practicing the creation and completion stages, using all sense objects, real and imagined, as a support for your practice and personal enjoyment.

conebeckham said:

Right, so it only appears as if one is "being austere" from the outside. In reality, Milarepa was having one helluva party, 24/7/365!

Malcolm wrote:

Correct, as illustrated by the story of the geshe who was frustrated when local deities were impatient with him to finish up his tormas offerings so they could go enjoy Milarepa's very abundant tormas. This geshe made elaborate tormas with many costly offerings, but when he arrived at Milarepa's cave to see what the fuss was about, all he saw was water sitting in shards of pottery.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, April 8th, 2015 at 1:17 AM

Title: Re: is vajrayana budhism a path of renunciation or isn't it?

Content:

conebeckham said:

Lots of good discussion--but directing this back at the original poster's question: In what way is a hermit's lifestyle, for instance, not deemed renunciation, and in what way is a strict retreat, with a certain amount of austerity, a Vajrayana practice? How are the ideas of austere retreat and the Path of Sensory Pleasures, etc., compatible?

Malcolm wrote:

When you are in retreat you are practicing the creation and completion stages, using all sense objects, real and imagined, as a support for your practice and personal enjoyment.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, April 8th, 2015 at 12:59 AM

Title: Re: The theory of how empowerments work?

Content:

Luke said:

Hello, could anyone recommend a book which describes the theory of how empowerments work?

I have considered reconnecting with Vajrayana, but first, I want to read some things which will give me more of the necessary background information which I lacked before.

Malcolm wrote:

Put concisely, empowerments arrange a dependent origination between the cause, one's five aggregates and so on, with the result, the five buddha families and so on.

dzogchungpa said:

Could you put it a little less concisely? I'm kind of obtuse.

Malcolm wrote:

Take an major empowerment, pay very, very close attention to what is being said.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, April 8th, 2015 at 12:33 AM

Title: Re: is vajrayana budhism a path of renunciation or isn't it?

Content:

heart said:

Actually there is nothing in the word "renunciation" that suggest that you should avoid exposure to sense objects. That is just one possible interpretation. If you accept that for example that "all activities" are a cause of suffering, then under what stone will you avoid suffering?

Malcolm wrote:

renounce:

renounce |ri' nouns| verb [with obj.]

formally declare one's abandonment of (a claim, right, or possession): Isabella offered to renounce her son's claim to the French crown.

- refuse to recognize or abide by any longer: these agreements were renounced after the fall of the czarist regime.
- declare that one will no longer engage in or support: they renounced the armed struggle.
- reject and stop using or consuming: he renounced drugs and alcohol completely.
- [no obj.] Law refuse or resign a right or position, especially one as an heir or trustee: there will be forms enabling the allottee to renounce.

renunciation:

renunciation |ri,nənsē' āSHən|

noun

the formal rejection of something, typically a belief, claim, or course of action: entry into the priesthood requires renunciation of marriage | a renunciation of violence.

- Law a document expressing renunciation.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, April 8th, 2015 at 12:09 AM

Title: Re: is vajrayana budhism a path of renunciation or isn't it?

Content:

Sherlock said:

Mahayana meditation does not actually make use of sense objects the way Vajrayana does.

Anders said:

Maybe not, but neither can it be characterised as a necessarily renunciate path.

Malcolm wrote:
Yes, it absolutely can.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Wednesday, April 8th, 2015 at 12:09 AM
Title: Re: is vajrayana budhism a path of renunciation or isn't it?
Content:

Anders said:
This gets to be a boring assertion in the long run, since this is also the classic assertion mahayana makes about hinayana.

Malcolm wrote:
It is completely different. Why? Because in common Mahāyāna it is only permitted to use sense objects if you have no attachment to them. The examples of Aryadharmā, Sadāprarudita and so on are examples of āryas on the stages, not common people.

In your example you cite the following:
Manjusri said, "All defilements are equal [in reality]. I have realized that equality through right practice.
But who is Mañjuśrī? A bodhisattva of the tenth stage.

As for this assertion:
The whole point of emptiness in Mahayana is that there is nothing to renounce or be rid of since affliction is empty and samsara and nirvana are not two.
Secret Mantra and Paramitayāna share the same view, where they differ is in method. There is no method of practice in Paramitayāna for ordinary people to practice by taking desire into their path. It simply does not exist. Hence Candragomin, a quintessential Mahāyāna author writes:
Objects and poisons are alike, pleasing just when first tasted...
Moreover, in Mahāyāna one meditates on desire, anger and ignorance via antidotes. This is not the case in Secret Mantra.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Tuesday, April 7th, 2015 at 11:36 PM
Title: Re: The theory of how empowerments work?
Content:
Luke said:
Hello, could anyone recommend a book which describes the theory of how empowerments work?

I have considered reconnecting with Vajrayana, but first, I want to read some things which will give me more of the necessary background information which I lacked before.

Malcolm wrote:

Put concisely, empowerments arrange a dependent origination between the cause, one's five aggregates and so on, with the result, the five buddha families and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, April 7th, 2015 at 10:32 PM

Title: Re: is vajrayana budhism a path of renunciation or isn't it?

Content:

heart said:

English is not my first language but it seems quite obvious that we give up (renounce) ignorance when we abide in wisdom, even if it is effortless. Also, so far I haven't met any vajrayana training that doesn't involve training the mind in renunciation, including Dzogchen. For example the first four lodjong's in the Vima Nyingtik.

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

I did not say there was no preliminary sense of renunciation in Vajrayāna. What I said was is that Vajrayāna is not a PATH of renunciation.

This is the logic. We understand that samsara is a terrible place. We wish to be free of it. We look around, and we see that the path of renunciation is not effective in this day and age because our afflictions are too strong. This is why the tantra says things like the Vajrapañjara-tantra:

Created by passion, the worldly shall be liberated by the same passion.

Or the Guhyasamaja:

The passionate desiring wisdom always rely on the five desire objects

The method of doing this, of practicing a path of non-renunciation, is to practice creation stage and completion stages. Likewise, through the method is a little different in Dzogchen as the Mind Mirror of Vajrasattva states:

This nectar of bodhicitta, one's vidyā, for example, is like a divine precious jewel that warms when left in a cold place, cools when left in a hot place, and gives light when left in a dark place.

In the same way, if one possesses the meaning of realizing this self-originated vidyā, afflictions become the companions of wisdom, even though afflictions arise
they do not obscure when they are under the power of wisdom.

And:

If the king of secret mantra is practiced, afflictions turn into wisdom. For example, when a lamp is lifted in an empty house, darkness turns into light; likewise, when the lamp of wisdom is raised, ignorance transforms into vidyā. When the realization of reality has arisen in one's continuum, all afflictions arise as the companions of wisdom.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, April 7th, 2015 at 9:34 PM

Title: Re: How can long-life prayers benefit lamas?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

It is a kind of dedication of merit.

Luke said:

Ah. So long-life prayers are only effective when they are recited after the completion of a main practice (mantra recitation, sadhana, puja, etc.)?

Malcolm wrote:

Well, I would not say that, but generally that is when they are recited in practice.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, April 7th, 2015 at 9:08 PM

Title: Re: is vajrayana budhism a path of renunciation or isn't it?

Content:

anjali said:

One way to look at renunciation is as giving up the causes of suffering. Sense enjoyments are not the cause of suffering per se.

Malcolm wrote:

For Hinayāna they are the cause of craving, which itself is the cause of samsara. Even in Mahāyāna sense objects are regarded as poisonous, for example Candragomin writes: Objects and poisons are alike, pleasing just when first tasted. Objects and poisons are alike, their result is unpleasant and unbearable. Objects and poisons are alike, causing one to be clouded by the darkness of ignorance. Objects and poisons are alike, their power is hard to reverse, and deceptive...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, April 7th, 2015 at 9:05 PM

Title: Re: is vajrayana budhism a path of renunciation or isn't it?

Content:

heart said:

In vajrayana renunciation is achieved by wisdom and you renounce the whole of samsara, not just some particular bad spot, all of it. So true renunciation is actually freedom from manipulating the world according to your desires and fears. So, in vajrayana renunciation is on an other level, or at least it should be.

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

Here, when we say that Vajrayāna is not a path of renunciation, we mean that, unlike Sūtrayāna, we can use all objects of the sense for our own enjoyment.

heart said:

We use the objects of the senses vividly aware of our true condition which is natural renunciation of ignorance. Rigpa is the renunciation of ignorance.

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

We use the objects of the senses as offerings to ourselves as the deity.

Rigpa is not renunciation of anything. Rigpa is the antithesis of ma rigpa, just as a light, without renouncing darkness, dispels it utterly.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, April 7th, 2015 at 8:51 PM

Title: Re: How can long-life prayers benefit lamas?

Content:

Luke said:

I like the idea of reciting long-life prayers for lamas, but can they actually benefit the lamas we pray for? If so, how?

Malcolm wrote:

It is a kind of dedication of merit.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, April 7th, 2015 at 8:51 PM

Title: Re: Dzogchen Community of Chogyal Namkhai Norbu

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Bob:

It is very straight forward — Rinpoche has stated countless times that if you are not actually participating during a webcast, you do not receive transmission and you do not receive the lung for whatever text he is teaching. The occasional lag time during the streaming is not an issue as long as you are actually participating in a webcast while it is happening, live.

Your anecdote regarding Jigme Lingpa is irrelevant.

Motova said:

What does participating while receiving a lung mean exactly?

Wanting the lung and paying attention?

Malcolm wrote:

It means you have to be listening to the teachings, not multitasking and surfing the internet.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, April 7th, 2015 at 8:32 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist MEME. My Favorite

Content:

Simon E. said:

What is contained in the Sutras is only one part of what constitutes the Vajrayana.

dharmagoat said:

Has wrath ever been described as an enlightened quality elsewhere in the Vajrayāna literature?

Malcolm wrote:

Wrathful deities are wrathful out of their compassion for stubborn sentient beings who are addicted to samsara, much like a parent who yells at children who are playing in the road. Wrathful teachers are the same.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, April 7th, 2015 at 8:23 PM

Title: Re: Dzogchen Community of Chogyal Namkhai Norbu

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Bob:

It is very straight forward — Rinpoche has stated countless times that if you are not actually participating during a webcast, you do not receive transmission and you do not receive the lung for whatever text he is teaching. The occasional lag time during the streaming is not an issue as long as you are actually participating in a webcast while it is happening, live.

Your anecdote regarding Jigme Lingpa is irrelevant.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, April 7th, 2015 at 8:10 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist MEME. My Favorite

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

What people need is the Dharma spoken by the Buddha, not hallmark affirmation cards.

dharmagoat said:

I agree.

People need the Dharma spoken by the Buddha, not by self-appointed dharmapālas.

Malcolm wrote:

The tongue, the Buddha said, is like a two-bladed axe, as likely to cut the speaker as the spoken to

Therefore, you should refrain from commenting, since no one appointed you to speak about the Dharma and you have no recognized qualifications to do so.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, April 7th, 2015 at 8:06 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist MEME. My Favorite

Content:

Dan74 said:

"To do good, to refrain from evil, this is the teaching of 10000 Buddhas."

And as the story goes 'a child of 7 knows this, but a man of 70 doesn't know how to do it. That's what we need the Buddhadharma for - wise action is not easy.

Malcolm wrote:

Refrain from all evil,

perfect [all] virtues,

thoroughly tame one's mind:

this is the teaching of the Buddha.

One is supposed to avoid evil (pappa, sinful) actions because they lead to birth in lower realms. One is to engage in virtuous (kusala) actions because they lead to birth in higher realms. One is to tame one's mind, because this is the path to liberation.

But here there is no mention of being a "good person." The goal of Buddhadharma is not to become "a better person." The goal of the Dharma is to transcend our afflictive state so that it is no longer necessary to engage in positive actions to maintain a birth in higher realms and avoid negative actions which lead to rebirth in lower realms. As long as one is driven by the three poisons, it is not possible to be a truly "good person."

For example, even though we practice the six perfections in order to attain buddhahood with the motivation to become buddhas for the benefit of all sentient beings, as you note below, bodhisattva activity may not be considered the actions of a "good person" when viewed from outside.

Secondly the practice of the six perfections is actually for one's own benefit, not directly for the benefit of others. The four means of conversion on the other hand are directly for the benefit of others. One should understand this distinction well.

For example, the Buddha gave his horse and ornaments to his father, Śuddhodhana, when he self-ordained. The golden bowl given to him by Sujāta was left in the Nairāṇja rather than being given to some poor local villagers. Buddha's disposition of his wealth does not conform to either conservative notions of wealth preservation nor does it conform to liberal notions of social justice. He gave away his horse and gear to his father who did not need them, and left his golden bowl in a stream while there villagers just a stone's throw away who were suffering crushing poverty.

As Sakya Paṇḍita explains:

If wealth of the higher classes was given to the lower classes by the Bhagavan, although slight beneficial conditions for this life would occur, since it would become a cause of lower realms because of not requesting liberation, the Bodhisattva decided he would not give his wealth away.

Or there is the Jataka tale of how the Buddha in his past life as Viśvaṃtara gave away his wife and children to be brahmin's servants when practicing the perfection of generosity — such acts hardly conform to our modern liberal notions of the "good person."

So we really must not allow such tepid notions as "Buddhism is just about being a good person" to go unchallenged.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, April 7th, 2015 at 7:29 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist MEME. My Favorite

Content:

Kim O'Hara said:

You seem to be forgetting that sila is the foundation of samadhi and prajñā, and sila is, in essence, 'being a good person.'

Malcolm wrote:

Śīla does not make one a "good person" in the Kantian moral sense that permeates our understanding of what a "good person" is.

One practices śīla in order to pacify afflictions to create the basis for developing concentration.

Kim O'Hara said:

More importantly, you are ignoring the fact that everyone has to start somewhere and that (often) the starting point is "I like what I know of this path." Without this preliminary orientation - far earlier than going for refuge, which you claimed was the beginning - the individual will not get far enough along the path to even know what taking refuge means. It is unfair and counterproductive to be too rigorous about any over-simplified teaching in those very early stages. Newcomers need accurate advice, sure, but most of all they need support and encouragement.

Malcolm wrote:

What people need is the Dharma spoken by the Buddha, not hallmark affirmation cards.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, April 7th, 2015 at 5:19 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen Community of Chogyal Namkhai Norbu

Content:

Paul said:

I am very interested in the Longsal Longde teachings that are being given soon, however I am in the middle of some other teachings going on at the same time. If I watch the retreat mainly via replay, will I still be able to practice what is being taught, or do I need to be there live for it all? Is there some part I HAVE to see live?

Malcolm wrote:

In general, replays are for being reminded, not for transmissions of lungs or even teachings.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, April 7th, 2015 at 5:17 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist MEME. My Favorite

Content:

Jesse said:

The end result of wisdom, concentration and ethics does lead to being a good human being and also liberation.

Malcolm wrote:

The end result of Buddhadharma is to transcend distinctions like good and evil and so on. "Being a good person" has never been the point of Buddhadharma and never will be. If all you want is to be a "good person" it is better to follow Confucius or Jesus.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, April 7th, 2015 at 5:15 AM

Title: Re: Vajrayāna/Dzogchen

Content:

Astus said:

It might be so that Dzogchen is an integral part of Vajrayana and the 9th vehicle. My statement that it's moving to a generic mindfulness practice is not a reflection on the teachings in the scriptures but how it appears to me among some who follow the Great Perfection, both on- and offline. That is, when it is simplified to the point of "just stay in the natural state". I assume you have noticed this trend as well.

Malcolm wrote:

There are many people who may imagine they are "following Dzogchen teachings" who are doing nothing of the kind.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, April 7th, 2015 at 5:10 AM

Title: Re: is vajrayana budhism a path of renunciation or isn't it?

Content:

heart said:

In vajrayana renunciation is achieved by wisdom and you renounce the whole of samsara, not just some particular bad spot, all of it. So true renunciation is actually freedom from manipulating the world according to your desires and fears. So, in vajrayana renunciation is on an other level, or at least it should be.

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

Here, when we say that Vajrayāna is not a path of renunciation, we mean that, unlike Sūtrayāna, we can use all objects of the sense for our own enjoyment.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, April 7th, 2015 at 12:17 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist MEME. My Favorite

Content:

Simon E. said:

No..actually it is nothing at all to do with Buddhadharma...neither in content nor intention.

Kim O'Hara said:

That's a bit harsh, Simon. The Buddhist path certainly is about "learning how to live [one's] life" and does discourage identification of oneself "as a Buddhist" and places more importance on being a good (wise, compassionate, etc) person than on "being a good Buddhist or knowing Buddhist doctrine".

Malcolm wrote:

The Buddha's path starts with refuge. For example, in the Kalmas sutra:

As if, venerable sir, a person were to turn face upwards what is upside down, or to uncover the concealed, or to point the way to one who is lost or to carry a lamp in the darkness, thinking, 'Those who have eyes will see visible objects,' so has the Dhamma been set forth in many ways by the Blessed One. We, venerable sir, go to the Blessed One for refuge, to the Dhamma for refuge, and to the Community of Bhikkhus for refuge. Venerable sir, may the Blessed One regard us as lay followers who have gone for refuge for life, from today."

The Buddhist path does not in any sense discourage one from thinking of oneself as a "buddhist".

The idea that the Buddha placed more importance on being a "good person" than on the three trainings of śīla, samadhi and prajñā, and the three prajñās of hearing, reflection and meditation is really a very strange and misleading idea. Being a good person will not free one from samsara, which after all is the point of the Buddha's teachings, i.e., to become free from samsara.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, April 6th, 2015 at 10:28 PM

Title: Re: Vajrayāna/Dzogchen

Content:

Sherlock said:

You mean the klong gsal nyi ma 'bar ma does actually say 100,000 times of each practice Malcolm? Or does it state things in terms of time?

How old is Sakya ngondro?

Malcolm wrote:

No, I mean that the recitations of refuge, bodhicitta, mandala offerings are present. The vajrasattva section explains that one should do 100,000 or more.

Other than Vajrasattva it does not specify a number.

The Sakya Ngondro is very modern, like 20th century modern.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, April 6th, 2015 at 8:59 PM

Title: Re: Opinion on this matter

Content:

antiquebuddhas said:

Then what is the point of doing good Karma.

Malcolm wrote:

Attaining a precious human birth in future lives so one can attain liberation if you don't manage it in this one.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, April 6th, 2015 at 8:54 PM

Title: Re: tantric sex real or form of abuse?

Content:

Berry said:

Does this mean that you are knowledgeable about skilful means and the actual practice of tantric sex yourself, srivijaya ?

Malcolm wrote:

I know this is addressed to another, but I will answer — the answer is yes, I have had extensive instructions on this practice, both in assemblies and personally, and so I know what I am talking about.

The term "tantric sex" is a misnomer derived from New Age marketing and teachers. What happens in mudra practice is not recognizable as "sex" as it is normally thought of.

There are very many requirements, the age of the practitioners being among them, 16-26 for both parties, for example.

I already mentioned that both partners must be qualified anuttarayoga practitioners, stable creation stage meditation, and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, April 6th, 2015 at 8:48 PM

Title: Vajrayāna/Dzogchen

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Astus commented in a now locked thread:

Vajrayana is just catching up with Dzogchen being removed from preliminaries and other rituals to turn into another form of mindfulness practice.

This represents a total misunderstanding of what Dzogchen is and what Vajrayāna is.

Dzogchen is not separate from Vajrayāna in any way shape or form. Dzogchen is a part of Vajrayāna Secret Mantra as even a cursory examination of the basic texts of the tradition will indicate.

Further, Dzogchen may not necessarily involve the four hundred thousands famous to us, in fact one of the earliest presentations of that sequence of practice is to be found in the klong gsal nyi ma 'bar ma tantra, which forms the foundation for most of the Nyingthig cycles from the Khandro Nyingthig onward. Moreover, there are a series of preliminary practices in Dzogchen that are indispensable such as the separation of samsara and nirvana, semzins, and so on.

Empowerment is absolutely necessary in Vajrayāna. Dzogchen Atiyoga is merely one of three inner tantra divisions. It is not in any way separate from Vajrayāna at all. Not only, they are hardly "another form of mindfulness practice."

Stick to Zen, Astus, you are out of your depth when commenting on Tibetan Buddhism.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, April 6th, 2015 at 8:35 PM

Title: Re: Gorampa & Tsongkhapa

Content:

Ayu said:

- Svatantrika view ("the object is real, but not independent"). They investigated only the dependency of the conditions of an object.

Malcolm wrote:

Bhavaviveka says:

If there is an autonomous argument, it is only necessary to establish that the given phenomena appear in common to the proponent and opponent because at that time the given phenomena has not been established in common appearance."

On other words, all that is needed is an agreement that indeed a table appears before both parties. They needn't agree on anything else. Thus when Bhavaviveka rejects Buddhapalita's dialectical argument in favor of a procedural argument, he is not saying that we need to accept that there is a seed established by an intrinsic characteristic, he is merely saying that we admit only that we both perceive a seed which then can be analyzed, in this case, of whether it is reasonable that there is arising from self.

The reason why Candrakīrti rejects Bhavaviveka's insistence on a procedural argument rather than a dialectical argument stems from the following:

When the eye and so on is grasped as a given phenomena of the relative, it is not established for the proponent; and when the eye and so on is grasped as a given phenomena of the ultimate, it is not established for the opponent.

In this case, since there is a fundamental disagreement in terms of the basis where one is arguing from, Candrakīrti insists that the opponent merely needs to be overthrown with a dialectical argument. But one thing it is important to bear in mind, Candrakīrti does not go at great lengths to expand his views on this subject in the Prasannapāda. Moreover, Candrakīrti certainly accepts procedural or autonomous arguments when presenting the conventional.

Thus there is no difference in these Madhyamikas Madhyamaka, but there is a difference in how one should debate opponents, and that is all. Gorampa states in his Moonrays:

Therefore the essential point of the difference between Prāsaṅgika and Svatantrika is defined upon whether autonomous arguments are accepted or not accepted in the context of investigating reality, i.e. it is actually in the context of rejecting the arising of the four extremes that autonomous arguments validity or invalidity is negated or proven.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, April 5th, 2015 at 11:50 PM

Title: Re: Dzogchen Community of Chogyal Namkhai Norbu

Content:

oldbob said:

I would obtain the list of the 25 and write to each of them to see how they respond.

Happy Easter / Passover!

ob

alpha said:

Who these people are is not public knowledge.

As far as i know none of them are instructors.

Malcolm wrote:

Jim, Elio, Adriano, Steve Landsberg, etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, April 5th, 2015 at 11:43 PM

Title: Re: tantric sex real or form of abuse?

Content:

Knotty Veneer said:

Is this really so difficult? Any sexual situation that does not involve informed consent is abuse.

Any one asked to take part in karmamudra practices should think long and hard about what they are getting into. Lamas (or whoever) who are seeking karmamudra partners need to be 100% sure that their partner knows what it will entail and will suffer no negative psychological or other damage from engaging in the practice.

If those conditions can not be satisfied then the practice is of no benefit, surely, and is harmful.

TaTa said:

I think this nailed it

Malcolm wrote:

There is no such a thing as karmamudra practice without consent, since the mudra must be an experienced Vajrayāna practitioner who has empowerments, possesses samaya, and has stability in the creation stage.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, April 5th, 2015 at 11:14 PM

Title: Re: Gorampa & Tsongkhapa

Content:

michaelb said:

I've seem that both Malcolm and TKF have visited this page since the last post but neither has chosen to advance the discussion, which is a bit disappointing...

Malcolm wrote:

The ball is in the other court.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, April 5th, 2015 at 10:40 PM

Title: Re: tantric sex real or form of abuse?

Content:

tingdzin said:

If one thinks that real Vajrayana lamas (admittedly increasingly rare) are just ordinary beings, one has never really interacted with one. Further, one should not attempt to practice Vajrayana if one's ideas about such things are so fixed, and one values one's own socially-conditioned notions over the search for experiential truth.

The long threads that inevitably result from sexual topics on this forum show that for most people, even in the so-called liberated West, sex is still an uncomfortable topic; this is one reason these practices were traditionally kept secret. A certain amount of personal and spiritual maturity is required.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, April 4th, 2015 at 1:44 AM

Title: Re: emptiness wisdom, conceptual understanding, stepping sto

Content:

smcj said:

People should be aware that Tibetans scholarship always goes back to the roots and reinterprets the classics. So a Tibetan scholar may go back to an Indian source and say, "What he was really trying to say was..." That "new" interpretation may be at odds with contemporaneous commentary, hence your point. My point is that if the "new" interpretation(s) are made from a vibrant and alive tradition producing enlightened beings, then those interpretations are validated by the enlightened awareness of the modern 21st century masters that hold them. To me there is absolutely no need for a forensic study of Dharma. YMMV

Malcolm wrote:

My point is that there is actually no basis for the whole discussion based on Indian texts; it is very much like the false distinctions made between "svatantrika" and "prasangika"

— these are later categories created by Tibetan scholars with no basis in the Indian texts at all. There were never any "svatantrikas" and "prasangikas" in India, only madhyamakas. I am not a follower of "Prasangika", I am just maintain that the Madhyamaka understanding of emptiness is the best. If there is a "great madhyamaka", then it the Madhyamaka of freedom from extremes, as defined by Atisha in his Bodhimārgapradīpapañjikā:

The suchness known by madhyamikas is free from the four extremes:
not existent, not nonexistent,
not both and neither.

The suchness realized by madhyamikas is free from the four alternatives:
permanence, annihilation,
both and neither.

Beyond such extremes as existence and nonexistence,
free from permanence and annihilation, liberated from consciousness and objects of consciousness, this is a text of the Great Madhyamaka.

We all take it for granted that no one in Tibetan Buddhism attains awakening based on practicing sūtra — that is what tantra is for. But I think these later, and novel, Tibetan interpretations of sūtra doctrines are a distraction, especially when they are not actually found in the writings of Indian masters.

In fact, the whole three turnings trip really comes from a Korean Yogacara master.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, April 4th, 2015 at 1:09 AM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

Dema said:

Is there any truth to this?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, it is all more or less true.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, April 4th, 2015 at 12:55 AM

Title: Re: emptiness wisdom, conceptual understanding, stepping sto

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

I'm not sure I understand. By "sūtras of the definitive meaning", do you mean sūtras that satisfy Vasubandhu's criteria?

Malcolm wrote:

By any criteria at all. I find this remarkable in light of the fact that there is whole industry in Tibetan Buddhism dedicated to proving that tathāgatagarbha sutras are sutras of definitive meaning. What is amazing is that they have no support at all for their contentions based on the very texts they are using.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, April 4th, 2015 at 12:40 AM

Title: Re: emptiness wisdom, conceptual understanding, stepping sto

Content:

smcj said:

But as I have pointed out elsewhere, the Indians hardly took notice of the three turnings, and never turned them into a major hermeneutical topic, nor a rhetorical topic, unlike Chinese and Tibetan scholars in certain quarters.

So the Chinese and Tibetan scholars are less-than the Indian scholars?

Malcolm wrote:

smcj retracted this response while I was writing a reply, so since I spent half an hour working on this I feel compelled to post it anyway

They are less authoritative than Indian scholars by definition.

And as I pointed out, among Chinese and Tibetan scholars, there is absolutely no agreement at all as to what sutras belong to the third turning and what sutras belong the second turning and no one in India, so far as we know (in Tibetan sources at least) ever compiled a list of them.

The clearest definition I have been able to find is from the widely cited commentary on the Āryākṣayamatinirdeśa Sūtra, the Āryākṣayamatinirdeśaṭīkā by Vasubandhu where he says:

Any sūtras that are explained in order to cultivate the characteristics of the noble path or realize the characteristics of the noble path are called "sutras of provisional meaning" because they teach a path which leads to nirvana. Any sūtras called "an entry into the result" are any sūtras that are taught in order to realize the result that has not been accomplished, those are the sutras of the definitive meaning.

Any sūtras called "entry into karma and deeds" are sutras which teach that engaging in virtuous karma produces a pleasing experience and engaging in nonvirtuous karma produces displeasing experience. Those are the sūtras of the provisional meaning. Any sutras said "to be taught in order to exhaust karma and affliction," sutras, which in order to exhaust karma and to exhaust afflictions, teach many methods of exhausting those, are sutras of the definitive meaning... etc.

Vasubandhu gives four other criterias for provisional and definitive sūtras, such as the difference between whether phenomena are taught to be afflictive or pure; whether samsara is to be regard with revulsion or is to be regarded as nondual with nirvana; whether topics are taught in words, letters, and so on such as the jatakas, etc or whether it is a sutra that teaching the profound that is difficult to see and comprehend, the selflessness in phenomena and the imperceptibility of the nature of emptiness; and finally, whether there are many words and meanings with much discursiveness or whether there is very little discursiveness and emphasis on instructions on samadhi.

In Indian texts, in terms of whether given sutras are considered provisional or definitive little or no attention is paid to them in terms of when they were taught by the Buddha — instead all that counts is their content.

Related to this is the fact that there is not one single sūtra or Indian text that links the tathāgatagarbha doctrine to sūtras of the definitive meaning, not a single one! Not even the tathāgatagarbha sūtras themselves. Don't you find this to be amazing?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, April 3rd, 2015 at 11:19 PM

Title: Re: Alcohol

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Alcohol has many listed health benefits, tobacco has none.

dzogchungpa said:

I think tobacco might help some people keep their weight down, not that I'm recommending it.

Also, nicotine might have some benefits:

e,g, <http://discovermagazine.com/2014/march/13-nicotine-fix>, although there are better ways than smoking or chewing tobacco to use it now.

Malcolm wrote:

There are all kinds of unhealthy things one can do for vanity.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, April 3rd, 2015 at 11:17 PM

Title: Re: tantric sex real or form of abuse?

Content:

Jesse said:

So is tantric sex really a method of attaining enlightenment or is it a form of abuse?

<http://www.independent.co.uk/arts-entertainment/i-was-a-tantric-sex-slave-1069859.html>

the above article makes it pretty clear to me.

Jeff said:

Not specifically responding to the article, but there is very definitely a male-female energy loop dynamic that can be created. Kind of like natural polarities that create a "purification loop". This natural loop technique is used in many traditions. This issue/concern is that a tantric master can create such a purification loop without actually engaging in physical sex.

Best wishes.

Malcolm wrote:

Jeff, this has nothing to do with Vajrayāna.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, April 3rd, 2015 at 10:55 PM

Title: Re: tantric sex real or form of abuse?

Content:

smcj said:

This is what I somehow doubt. That it has any legitimate uses.

Malcolm is right about the issue of samaya with this subject. However I think a history lesson is not breaking samaya.

Lama Tsongkhapa's started the Gelug tradition as a reformation movement against what he saw as the corruption of the Vajrayana in his day, this practice

Malcolm wrote:

Honestly, you have no sources for this assertion. It is not true. He never started a reformation. This is just a western myth.

smcj said:

So even the most conservative of the Vajra Masters see the practice as legitimate, but obviously the potential for misuse and misunderstanding is off the charts..

Malcolm wrote:

If someone wishes to learn about these practices, all they need to do is attend Lamdre, which is given every other year, on average.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, April 3rd, 2015 at 10:09 PM

Title: Re: emptiness wisdom, conceptual understanding, stepping sto

Content:

smcj said:

Malcolm's position is, as best as I can tell, that the 2nd Turning is definitive...

Malcolm wrote:

Malcolm's position is that the third turning is a restatement of the second to eliminate doubts about the second and does not in fact refer to any specific sūtras per se identified by when they were taught by the Buddha during his career as some later scholars hold (since all these scholars have wildly different ideas about which sūtras these are and there is no list in any Indian source which indicates which sūtras are to be regarded as provisional and which ones as definitive).

The second turning and the third turning are doctrinally indetical.

smcj said:

The Bhagavan, beginning from the nonexistence of the inherent existence of all phenomena, beginning from their absence of arising, absence of ceasing, being peaceful from the beginning, being parinirvana by nature, turned a second very amazing wheel of Dharma with the form of the description of emptiness to those who had correctly entered into the Mahāyāna. This wheel of Dharma was surpassable, circumstantial, of provisional meaning and became a basis of dispute.

The Bhagavan, beginning from the nonexistence of the inherent existence of all phenomena, beginning from their absence of arising, absence of ceasing, being peaceful from the beginning, being parinirvana by nature, turned a third very amazing wheel of Dharma possessing fine distinctions to those who correctly entered into all vehicles. This wheel of Dharma is unsurpassable, not circumstantial, of definitive meaning and indisputable.

Malcolm wrote:

The sole difference between these two turnings is that in the former case, emptiness was taught, and in the latter case, fine distinctions were taught, but the doctrine of both turnings begin "from the nonexistence of the inherent existence of all phenomena, begin from their absence of arising, absence of ceasing, being peaceful from the beginning, being parinirvana by nature." One might also add, that the third turning was intended for everyone.

All phenomena refers to all conditioned and unconditioned phenomena, FYI.

But as I have pointed out elsewhere, the Indians hardly took notice of the three turnings, and never turned them into a major hermeneutical topic, nor a rhetorical topic, unlike Chinese and Tibetan scholars in certain quarters.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, April 3rd, 2015 at 8:44 PM

Title: Re: Gorampa & Tsongkhapa

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Ucchedavāda, strictly speaking, means asserting that something once existent is destroyed. Since we never once asserted the existence of something, we cannot be accused of asserting that something becomes nonexistent, and therefore, we are free from the charge of being a "chad pa smra ba ", aka an ucchedavādin.

Tsongkhapafan said:

So now you are denying that table has any kind of valid existence at all? When you investigate it is true that you do not find a table within the parts of table. The table that we normally see is not one of the parts, not the collection of parts and is not separate from the parts, however there is an appearance of table to mind and that table exists.

The table that exists is the one that is merely imputed, or the table that is mere name. The inherently existent table (the one that we normally see) does not exist but the one that is mere name and that is one nature with the emptiness of table does.

Denying the valid existence of table is nihilism. It is negating that which does exist.

Malcolm wrote:

Question: does there exist an appearance of a table or does there exist a table which appears?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, April 3rd, 2015 at 8:42 PM

Title: Re: Have you met ONE person...

Content:

abandon-all-belief said:

...that has actual knowledge on their previous lives?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, more than one in fact.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, April 3rd, 2015 at 8:41 PM

Title: Re: tantric sex real or form of abuse?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

This is a topic which involves samaya, and those with samaya should refrain from its discussion.

Knotty Veneer said:

I hear what you are saying but I would be careful Malcolm. You could be accused of trying to shut down debate on this, and by extension, attempting to silence people who have been abused. Karmamudra practices can and have been used as excuses by perpetrators of sexual abuse against women. Samaya considerations should not stand in the way of justice for those abused.

I do know that people have also made false accusations against lamas. And this is reprehensible. But I think, in the end, it is the lesser of two evils. We cannot have a veil of holy silence drawn over this.

Malcolm wrote:

Two separate issues altogether: the issue I am addressing is what is unsuitable for people who hold samaya.

The issue of people promising spiritual rewards in exchange for sex is a completely separate one.

However, the article Jesse posted is full of misinformation and misconceptions. I am not talking about June Campbell's allegations, since I have no way of verifying her claims about her relations with Kalu Rinpoche as true or false. One point however is that Kalu Rinpoche was not a monk, and was under no obligation to be celibate.

I am talking about the information with which the article is framed:

The idea is to "drive the semen upwards, along the spine, and into the head". The more semen in a man's head, the stronger intellectually and spiritually he is thought to be. This entirely silly and not true.

Knotty Veneer said:

More than that, he is said to gain additional strength from absorbing the woman's sexual fluids at the same time as withholding his own. This "reverse of ordinary sex", said June Campbell, "expresses the relative status of the male and female within the ritual, for it signals the power flowing from the woman to the man".

Malcolm wrote:

This is also false information.

Knotty Veneer said:

She then asked them how it relates to the fact that there are no female Buddha images, or to why in Tantric sex images the woman always has her back to the viewer,

Malcolm wrote:

This is also false on three points — Samantabhadri is an example of a female buddha, Tara is an example of a female buddha, as is Prajñāpāramita, as Vajrayogini, Yeshe Tsogyal, Mandarava, etc. There are many yidams where the male deity has its back to the observer, with the mother deity acting as the main deity. The third point is that images of father and mother deities are not "Tantric sex images."

In Vajrayāna there is no such thing as "tantric sex." There are some yogas that might resemble sex to people who do not have instructions or samaya. But we don't talk about them. If people want to learn, they can seek out a qualified teacher.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, April 3rd, 2015 at 7:59 PM

Title: Re: Alcohol

Content:

Adamantine said:

For some people, latent addictive tendencies within neurotic mind may attach to alcohol, and then this is a big obstacle for them if they are practicing Dharma, and should abstain. For some people, latent addictive tendencies within neurotic mind may attach to internet use, sex, idle chatter, etc. etc. It may really not be the same issue for any two people.

Although alcoholism is found in my family, I've never had an issue with it. I may drink casually with friends once or twice a month, but never to the point of drunkenness. I may take a small amount of some tantric "medicine" that involves whisky more regularly. I certainly take some alcohol at the times of tsok offerings. To impose a strict rule on myself never to drink any alcohol would be artificial and useless, maybe harmful. However, I have relatives that should never even have a drop, because it arouses inner demons, and they always get into trouble, or create it. These things are relative, and we need to know our own situation with clarity.

M.G. said:

This seems to be the view of most of my Buddhist teachers and friends. Though I've noticed they reject the idea of moderation and relative harm potential when the topic turns from alcohol to tobacco!

Malcolm wrote:

Alcohol has many listed health benefits, tobacco has none.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, April 3rd, 2015 at 7:55 PM

Title: Re: Tibetan Lotus Sutra discussion

Content:

sherabzangpo said:

I didn't get to the colophon. That clears it up, since it's a collection. Thank you! He lived from 1235–1280.

Given Chogyel Phagpa's political status, it also makes me wonder whether the commentary was not a somewhat 'political' reaction to Chinese political and Buddhist influence in Tibet and Mongolia. The main question though is why he doesn't reference the Tengyur commentary. Perhaps he was even reacting against it (after all it was translated from Chinese at the least), if it had been translated by his time, which presumably it had been, if it was quoted just 10-20 years after his death by the 3rd Karmapa.

Malcolm wrote:

Perhaps he thought it was an inauthentic commentary or a forgery. Other than that, I have no idea.

sherabzangpo said:

Actually Malcolm, what's your take on the authorship?

Malcolm wrote:

It is not listed by Jetsun Dragpa Gyaltsen, but it is listed by the Karmapa and Ngorchen.

This probably means it was translated into Tibetan from Chinese during the Sakya period of rule in Tibet, and perhaps it was attributed an Indian author to establish it as authentic.

sherabzangpo said:

I suppose I could safely attribute it to 'Prithivibandhu/Kuiji' for the moment and refer to it as 'Sri Lankan/Chinese'.

Malcolm wrote:

You can always say "the commentary attributed to..."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, April 3rd, 2015 at 7:48 PM

Title: Re: tantric sex real or form of abuse?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

This is a topic which involves samaya, and those with samaya should refrain from its discussion.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, April 3rd, 2015 at 10:38 AM

Title: Re: tantric sex real or form of abuse?

Content:

Jesse said:

So is tantric sex really a method of attaining enlightenment or is it a form of abuse?

<http://www.independent.co.uk/arts-entertainment/i-was-a-tantric-sex-slave-1069859.html>

the above article makes it pretty clear to me.

Malcolm wrote:

The article above is fraught with so much misinformation and misconceptions that it is useless.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, April 3rd, 2015 at 2:28 AM

Title: Re: Gorampa & Tsongkhapa

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

His mistake is the same as TKfan's assuming that tables are designated on tables, rather than tables being designated on parts.

Tsongkhapa said:

That's a strawman. I never said that tables are designated on tables, you assumed this. Table is imputed on basis of imputation for table and the basis of imputation and the table are never the same, they can't be. Possessor and possessed are always different. Furthermore, saying that tables are empty of tables is a negation too far - you are denying the mere imputation table that actually exists and that's nihilism.

conebeckham said:

What, exactly, is this "basis of imputation for table" if it is not table?

Malcolm wrote:

What TKF stated was:

A table is not empty of being a table because it is conventionally a table - that is what appears to a valid cognizer apprehending a table that is merely imputed upon the basis of table.

He assumes that thing cannot be empty of themselves (intrinsically empty) because he believes this would destroy their conventional value. But this is not a proper Madhyamaka view as we can see from the citation of Candrakīrti above, where Candrakīrti clearly states that there are no possessors of parts, they are unreal, they are simply designations.

The profound point in all of this is that Candrakīrti maintain that rather than a consciousness taking rebirth, which is the position of Bhāvaviveka, what takes rebirth is the mistaken habit of "I-making," which conventionally can act as an appropriator of the aggregates and also can engage in and experience the ripening of actions even though the 'I' does not exist and is not real — it can act and behave as if it were real, in much the same that we drive cars that we have designated upon parts which however, are unreal when they are sought for.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, April 3rd, 2015 at 12:48 AM

Title: Re: Gorampa & Tsongkhapa

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

His mistake is the same as TKfan's assuming that tables are designated on tables, rather than tables being designated on parts.

Tsongkhapa said:

That's a strawman. I never said that tables are designated on tables, you assumed this. Table is imputed on basis of imputation for table and the basis of imputation and the table are never the same, they can't be. Possessor and possessed are always different. Furthermore, saying that tables are empty of tables is a negation too far - you are denying the mere imputation table that actually exists and that's nihilism.

WeiHan said:

That is not nihilism. Reasoning in that way does not deny dependent arising of appearance.

Malcolm wrote:

Ucchedavāda, strictly speaking, means asserting that something once existent is destroyed. Since we never once asserted the existence of something, we cannot be accused of asserting that something becomes nonexistent, and therefore, we are free from the charge of being a "chad pa smra ba ", aka an ucchedavādin.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, April 3rd, 2015 at 12:32 AM

Title: Re: Gorampa & Tsongkhapa

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

His mistake is the same as TKfan's assuming that tables are designated on tables, rather than tables being designated on parts.

Tsongkhapafan said:

That's a strawman. I never said that tables are designated on tables, you assumed this. Table is imputed on basis of imputation for table and the basis of imputation and the table are never the same, they can't be. Possessor and possessed are always different. Furthermore, saying that tables are empty of tables is a negation too far - you are denying the mere imputation table that actually exists and that's nihilism.

Malcolm wrote:

I said it appeared that is what you are saying. You read your own language, and you will see.

We are not denying the existence of the imputation "table," that imputation is clearly being made. We are saying, like Candrakīrti, that no table can be found when the basis for imputing a table, it's parts, is examined. We are saying, like Candrakīrti, that there is no actual thing that possesses parts, for example a self. And if there is no possessor of parts, there are no parts that are possessed, correct? Thus a composite thing is empty of the designation it is being designated with. The designation does not come from its side, it comes from the side of the one making the imputation, right? How is a thing designated? It is designated on the basis of an appearance. An appearance of what? An appearance of parts. Does the thing exist in its parts? No. Does it exist separate from those parts? No. Does it exist in one of those parts? No. Therefore, the thing is just a designation and it is not real. When we say something is not real, this means it is empty. What is it empty of? Itself. There is no table, there is no car, and so on. There is no self that possesses the five aggregates, nevertheless, a self is imputed upon the five aggregates. When the five aggregates are examined a self is not found with the aggregates, separate from them or in any one of them. Hence we know that the self does not exist. It is a mere imputation on a collection of parts. All composite phenomena are the same.

Things like tables, cars and selves are empty of themselves because when their basis of designation is examined, they are not found in their respective bases of designation or separate from them. When something is not found, it is called "nonexistent." In this case, it is not the nonexistence of something which once existed and then became nonexistent, according to mundane convention; in this case the thing sought for was never there from beginning, it never even arose.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, April 3rd, 2015 at 12:20 AM

Title: Re: Gorampa & Tsongkhapa

Content:

WeiHan said:

However, from TD, according to his argument, if table is empty of table and can still function as a table, then table which is empty of car can then function as a car too. He is kind of saying if there is no some essence of a table there, then anything can happen randomly base on mental designation.

Malcolm wrote:

A table does not possess the parts of the car, so it won't work as a car, even you try to drive it.

A table is still empty of a table, however, because when the parts of a table are examined, a table cannot be found.

There does not need to be any essence of a table for a collection of parts to be designated table. Whether the table or car is a conventionally valid table or car purely depends on whether that table or car works or not, whether it is functional [arthakriya, don byed].

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, April 2nd, 2015 at 11:31 PM

Title: Re: Gorampa & Tsongkhapa

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

His mistake is the same as TKfan's assuming that tables are designated on tables, rather than tables being designated on parts.

WeiHan said:

Malcolm,

Is dependent origination the right explanation? Table is empty of car doesn't mean that the table will appear as a car and exhibits the dependently originated appearance of functioning as a car. This is refutation of the fourth lemma of negating non-arising- that thing arises without a cause.

Malcolm wrote:

No, here we are just talking about how things are designated on their parts according to their conventional appearance to a non-deluded mind. For our friends TD and TKF, it appears, based on their statements, that tables appear to a conventional valid cognition automatically.

According to Candrakirti, things are designated upon parts they tentatively "possess". If the thing functions, it is conventionally valid; if not, it is conventionally invalid, for example, the attempt to fill a horse with gas instead of hay.

Knowing that things are not real, are intrinsically empty, while still acting in accordance with worldly convention is the path if a follower of the middle way.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, April 2nd, 2015 at 10:01 PM

Title: Re: Gorampa & Tsongkhapa

Content:

Tenzin Dorje said:

If a table is empty of being a table, it follows that a table is as empty of being a table as a car is [empty of being a table]. It follows absurdly that one could validly impute anything on any basis of designation.

As a matter of fact, if you need a car to go to town, what don't you just impute a car on the table that's in the living room?

kirtu said:

Oh come on! The imputation has to be on a valid basis - Gelug Presentation 101.

Kirt

conebeckham said:

I think he's trying to argue that, Kirt, isn't he? A car and a table are both valid bases--they are both conventionally-appearing phenomena, after all. His mistake is in denying the worldly conventions of non-examined appearing phenomena. If I could drive my table to work, I would--but alas, my table has no engine, wheels, gas tank, etc. On the level of convention, I cannot register my table with the DMV. I can, however, eat dinner on my car. If I must!

Malcolm wrote:

His mistake is the same as TKfan's assuming that tables are designated on tables, rather than tables being designated on parts.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, April 2nd, 2015 at 9:51 PM

Title: Re: Tibetan Lotus Sutra discussion

Content:

sherabzangpo said:

It is actually by Chogyal Phagpa, it is found in volume 15 of the Sa skya bka' 'bum. That's strange, I was pretty sure it was listed as Sachen Kunga Nyingpo.. I found it on TBRC. Perhaps there's two commentaries? Or mistaken attribution? I would give the TBRC references but internet here is slow...

The question in terms of how this Sakya commentary (or commentaries) relates to the Commentary in the Tengyur is about when it was translated. It has no date and no translator, so it's hard to determine (and also makes its 'Sri Lankan' authorship look more suspicious), but it does seem to have a dedication prayer which seems to be by a famous Chinese-sponsored (and/or favored) Tibetan king, Miwang Tobgyel something or other, who lived in the 1700s, which indicates that he had probably had something to do with the translation... It would seem likely that he of all people might have been a 'Chinese Buddhist', so it all makes for a curious Holmes-like story...

Malcolm wrote:

It is by Chogyal Phagpa, as the colophon to the text states. Sachen's works are confined to the first two volumes, of the SKB, Phagpa's works are the final three volumes.

The commentary on the Lotus in the Tengyur is very late. Dan Martin states, "Sa'i-rtsa-lag is the Tibetan form for the name of the Sinhalese commentator Prthivibandhu (active during the reign of King Gopāla; 685-720 ce)." It was translated from Chinese, as the title indicates —དམ་པའི་ཚེས་ལྷན་རྒྱུ་རྒྱུ་ལྷན་པའི་བླ་མ་གྱི་ཐུགས་བརྒྱུད་པ་. This text by Sa'i-rtsa-lag is mentioned by the Third Karmapa, so it was translated into Tibetan no later than the late 13th-early fourteenth century.

There is another text attributed to Sa'i-rtsa-lag, the Pañcaskandhabhāṣya, translated in the Imperial period.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, April 2nd, 2015 at 8:54 PM

Title: Re: Gorampa & Tsongkhapa

Content:

Ayu said:

And hence the charge that Gelugpas are crypto Svatantrikas, as well as being upside down gzhan stong pas.

Everybody should beware of charging ancient masters of anything. To say "I don't really understand it" would be better.

Malcolm wrote:

It's a charge leveled by ancient masters.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, April 2nd, 2015 at 8:52 PM

Title: Re: siddhis--why aren't they used more?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Which position still leaves you a realist, believing that there are inherently existing natural laws that govern physical phenomena. In other words, you accept that physical phenomena exist by virtue of intrinsic characteristics, a common tenet among Hināyāna schools.

Astus said:

I only make a difference between various interpretations. If we say there is a shared physical world then there are certain rules. If we say that perception is the reality we have, then independent laws are nonsense.

Malcolm wrote:

Now you are squirming, having boldly declared no such phenomena as siddhis or ṛddhi-patti can exist.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, April 2nd, 2015 at 8:46 PM

Title: Re: How does 18 early Buddhism School Related to Mahayana?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

To make it more clear to you, Jetsun Dragpa Gyaltsen (12th century) writes:

Further, the bodhicitta of Vairocana in the second chapter of the Guhyasamāja states:

Free from all phenomena;
skandhas, dhātus and āyatanas,
and subject and object abandoned;
because phenomena are equally without self, one's mind, having never arisen from the beginning,
is naturally empty.

In dependence upon which, Master Nāgārjuna wrote the Bodhicittavivaraṇa.

Now, the late Indian and Tibetan tradition have long held that Nāgārjuna I and the siddha Nāgārjuna, the disciple of Saraha, are one and the same person. I personally do not subscribe to this belief, holding instead that there are at the very least two authentic Nāgārjuna's.

Be that as it may, it is a fact that the Bodhicittavivarana is a tantric work associated with Guhyasamaja, and specifically is a commentary on the above passage. I erred above when I stated it concerned the abhisambodhi of Akṣobhya. The Dohakośa of Saraha was written to comment upon that, being this following statement, Jetsun Rinopche writes:

In addition to that, the bodhicitta of Akṣobhya in the second chapter of the Guhyasamāja states:

In the ultimate, phenomena of the three realms are meditated as being unreal, the existents meditated as unreal are not meditated as objects of meditation;
therefore, the real and the unreal are not objects of meditation.

In dependence upon which, Saraha wrote the Dohakośa.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, April 2nd, 2015 at 8:22 PM

Title: Re: siddhis--why aren't they used more?

Content:

WeiHan said:

But we can also see at a different angle. If how the external world sentient beings lived in depends on their karma, then there isn't any objective physical laws. It becomes unnecessary to differentiate that supernormal phenomena can only happen in mind realm but not in physical realm since after all physical realm is a reflection of what is in the mind. In other words, you don't have to say that Buddha can only manifest supernormal abilities in some beings mind stream and not in the physical realm because there are fixed physical laws (this is your previous position), we just have to say "some beings have the karma to see Buddha manifesting supernormal abilities while others don't have the karma.

Astus said:

Yes, some beings perceive one thing, others perceive something else. The problem with supernatural occurrences within the physical realm was raised regarding the original topic of this thread. And there I also wrote that powers exist on the spiritual level. If we say that the world is what we perceive it to be, that it is formed and governed by our mind, then that is the spiritual realm.

Malcolm wrote:

Which position still leaves you a realist, believing that there are inherently existing natural laws that govern physical phenomena. In other words, you accept that physical phenomena exist by virtue of intrinsic characteristics, a common tenet among Hināyāna schools.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, April 2nd, 2015 at 8:12 PM

Title: Re: Gorampa & Tsongkhapa

Content:

Tenzin Dorje said:

If a table is empty of being a table, it follows that a table is as empty of being a table as a car is [empty of being a table]. It follows absurdly that one could validly impute anything on any basis of designation.

As a matter of fact, if you need a car to go to town, what don't you just impute a car on the table that's in the living room?

Malcolm wrote:

Your reason is specious. We don't need to speak of a car being empty of a table at all because we do not (in worldly convention) impute tables on the parts of a car, nor a car on the parts of table. Nevertheless, a table is empty of being a table since when its parts are examined no table can be found, likewise a car is found to be empty of a car since no car can be found when its parts are examined.

The emptiness of cars, tables and selves are alike in so far as the parts upon which cars, tables and selves are imputed are all equally found to be empty respectively of cars, tables and selves. In other words, no car can be found when its parts are examined, no table can be found when its parts are examined, no self can be found when its parts are examined, meaning that anything designated on parts is merely an empty designation with no underlying reality at all.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, April 2nd, 2015 at 6:52 PM

Title: Re: How does 18 early Buddhism School Related to Mahayana?

Content:

Aemilius said:

You can take this approach to other dharma texts too, I suppose, like Dharmapada/Dhammapada.

And say that Dharmapada is actually a collection of oral instructions of Mahamudra precepts, or oral instructions on the six bardos/intermediate states, etc...

One day I actually found a verse in Dh. that is similar to the famous Six Essential Words on Mahamudra by Tilopa.

Words are empty in themselves, Dharma teachings are empty of inherent nature.

Thus Dharmapada can become Tantra and vice versa.

Malcolm wrote:

No, in this case there is a very clear tradition that associates this text with Guhyasamaja.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, April 2nd, 2015 at 11:56 AM

Title: Re: Tibetan Lotus Sutra discussion

Content:

sherabzangpo said:

Also, it turns out there are some native Tibetan commentaries, but I've only found one, by Sachen Kunga Nyingpo...

Malcolm wrote:

It is actually by Chogyal Phagpa, it is found in volume 15 of the Sa skya bka' 'bum.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, April 2nd, 2015 at 5:08 AM

Title: Re: Gorampa & Tsongkhapa

Content:

srivijaya said:

Interesting to read this thread and see what various teachings say is to be negated, or otherwise. In looking at all possible modes of existence/non-existence Buddha proffered no position at all. He never said one was right or the other wrong, or entered into any speculation. "A 'position,' Vaccha, is something that a Tathagata has done away with. What a Tathagata sees is this: 'Such is form, such its origination, such its disappearance;... (<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/mn/mn.072.than.html>) So a view which asserts two truths, one a non-existent "convention" and the other an existent "ultimate", is really saying "both exists and does not exist" - which was described by Buddha as not leading to "disenchantment, dispassion, cessation; to calm, direct knowledge, full Awakening, Unbinding."

I don't think that Buddha refused to engage with this or that view because he didn't like them or thought that they were not refined enough. The problem was in clinging to any kind of view.

Bakmoon said:

This is actually one of the differences between the Gelug understanding of Prasangika Madhyamaka and most non-Gelug understandings (e.g. Gorampa's view). For most non-Gelug Madhyamaka, it is understood that Prasangika Madhyamaka has no actual position of their own but use reductio ad absurdum arguments starting from the positions of others. Within Gelug, it is understood that one can have a position of one's own.

Malcolm wrote:

And hence the charge that Gelugpas are crypto Svatantrikas, as well as being upside down gzhan stong pas.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, April 2nd, 2015 at 5:03 AM

Title: Re: Gorampa & Tsongkhapa

Content:

conebeckham said:

A table is most certainly empty of being a table. The idea that we "graft an inherent existence of table" onto the table is just further conceptual elaboration, and needless.

Tsongkhapafan said:

A table is not empty of being a table because it is conventionally a table - that is what appears to a valid cognizer apprehending a table that is merely imputed upon the basis of table.

Malcolm wrote:

This statement presumes by it's language that tables exist from their own side to act as a basis for imputation.

Tsongkhapafan said:

Table is the opposite of non-table.

Malcolm wrote:

This an incorrect use of apoha, or exclusion. A table is identified as a table because of all things that are not tables, such as pots and so on.

Tsongkhapafan said:

It's senseless to refute the existence of table (which is what you are doing when you say that table is empty of table). What it is empty of is inherently existent table - that is the table that we normally see: a table that exists outside the mind and that can be found upon investigation.

Malcolm wrote:

A table existing outside the mind is a table that exists from its own side.

Tsongkhapafan said:

This does not exist but the conceptual designation 'table' does indeed exist and function.

Malcolm wrote:

If a table that exists outside of the mind does not exist, as you here admit, this means tables are empty of being tables.

Tsongkhapafan said:

The distinction between table and inherently existent table is an important one because otherwise you cannot distinguish between the table that is apprehended by self-grasping ignorance and that does not exist and the table that exists as mere imputation.

Malcolm wrote:

A table that exists as a mere imputation is table that is empty of a table since that table exists as a mere imputation.

Tsongkhapa said:

Of the cart, Chandrakirti says:

[VI.158] Indeed it is not established by the seven ways,
Either in thatness or for the worldly;
But from the point of view of the worldly without analysis
It is imputed here in dependence upon its parts.

[VI.159] It is a part--possessor and a component- possessor.
For living beings a cart is called an `agent',
And for beings it exists as a taker.
Do not destroy conventionalities known to the world.

Do not destroy conventionalities known to the world by saying that table is empty of table!

Malcolm wrote:

Candra says directly after the citation you produced:

How can that which does not exist through seven aspects, be said to exist? The existence of this will not be found by the yogin.
Since he rests with ease in reality, here, the proposition of that [chariot, etc.] is also asserted.
If the chariot is not real, at that time,
nothing has parts, nor are there any parts.
For example, just as when the chariot is burned there are no parts, the parts are [burned] when the possessor of parts is burned with the fire of intelligence.
So here, the reality is that tables, chariots, selves and so on are empty of themselves because they cannot withstand analysis, also their components cannot withstand analysis, and when subject to ultimate analysis they cannot be found. Nevertheless,

A table is precisely imputed on its parts which are empty of being "a table" — it is for this reason that tables are empty of being tables, since they are composed of parts upon which a table is imputed and in which a table will never be found.

When a convention is subject to analysis is it naturally destroyed in the process of analysis in just the same way that a hammer shatters a pot. If you interpret Candra the way you do, you disallow any ultimate analysis — but what Candra states is the following:

"Just a cart is designated in dependent on wheels and so on, wheels and so on are appropriated on that basis, but the chariot is not an appropriator, in the same way, because the self (a mundane convention that is not negated in relative truth), like a chariot, is asserted to be an appropriator."

Candra here makes an important point about all this — the chariot is not an actual appropriator, why? Because it is merely designated on some parts, a wheel and so on. Likewise the self is not a real appropriator because it is designation on some parts. Nevertheless, in terms of the mundane convention in the relative, we do not negate chariots, selves and so on, even though chariots, selves and so on are not real, being mere designations on the basis of some parts. But your mistake is to assume that a chariot is being designated a chariot on the basis of a chariot, and this is utterly wrong.

Candra continues:

The five aggregates, the six elements and the six sense bases are the appropriations of that self because a self is designated on the basis of the five aggregates and so on, just as the wheels and so are the appropriations of the chariot

The self is conventionally asserted to be an appropriator of karma, merit, aggregates and so on, because it is designated on the basis of the five aggregates. As we see above, however, there is actually no self that can act as an appropriator since such a self does not exist, being a mere imputation.

He then continues:

Just as this presentation of the appropriated and the appropriator is a presentation of mundane convention, likewise, it is explained "This action and agent is to be accepted like the chariot." The appropriated is the action, this also is the agent. The so-called "appropriated", the aggregates and so on are the action, and the self is presented as a so-called "agent."

Because this is not real, this is not stable, this is not unstable, this neither arises or perishes.
Here there is no permanence and so on,
there is neither sameness nor difference.

Though this self designated upon the aggregates is not stable, it is also not unstable. In that respect, if the self is unstable, at that time:

The appropriated are not the self,
those are produced and perish.
How could the appropriated turn into the appropriator?

In the same way:

There is no production from the unproduced,
for consequently there will be a fault here,
the self will either be a product or will be produced without a cause.

Thus, there is a contradiction with the śāstra. Because of that, if the aggregates are the self, if it comes to be possess arising and perishing, also it is not asserted as having arising or perishing. Therefore, the consequence that the aggregates "are not the self" will be valid. Because of that, the instability of this [self] is not valid, nor its stability.

Therefore, it is perfectly accurate to say that the self is empty of the self, chariots are empty of chariots, tables of empty of tables. What ever is designated on parts is empty of itself because it is mere designation that cannot be found upon analysis of the parts upon which it is designated. If it were only empty of inherent existence, then selves, chariots, tables and so on could be found in the basis of investigating their parts.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, April 2nd, 2015 at 1:01 AM

Title: Re: Samaya and switching traditions.

Content:

Dragon said:

If you have received DI and consider yourself a Dzogchen practitioner, but go to see different teachers in different traditions, is that considered "switching?" I am going to see The 17th karmapa and the Sakya Trizin this weekend. Both are giving empowerments. I was hesitant attending because of the empowerments (I was looking just for being able to see them in person and listen to them teach, but these were the only ones I could afford to attend and that were close in terms of travel). So what do I do? Is it bad to attend? Do I just not participate in the empowerments then and sit there quietly when the time comes? Or since my intention is to go to broaden my learning and listen to great masters teach as a dzogchen practitioner, it is not considered "switching" since AGY is my practice that unifies everything? I see many dzogchen practitioners signing up to go to other empowerments like I am about to do, so I thought it was normal? Isn't it limiting to see all schools differently anyway and not "as one" when you are practicing dzogchen anyway? Buddha is Buddha is Buddha. What's the big deal?

Malcolm wrote:

Unify everything in Guru Yoga.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, April 2nd, 2015 at 12:16 AM

Title: Re: Samaya and switching traditions.

Content:

Lucjan said:

Nobody has yet posted here any understanding of what the Dzogchen samaya actually is.

Malcolm wrote:

I agree with your statement.

The point of the four Dzogchen samayas is they cannot be broken (which is why they are referred to as the four unbreakable samayas) since they refer to four aspects of one's basis.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, April 2nd, 2015 at 12:12 AM

Title: Re: What beliefs are prerequisite for practicing Zen?

Content:

Astus said:

The Lotus Sutra is quoted mainly because of how the dragon girl transformed to a buddha as an example of sudden enlightenment.

Malcolm wrote:

Which this does not show since she was already a high bodhisattva on the stages.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, April 2nd, 2015 at 12:10 AM

Title: Re: Hashang's view is higher than Kamalashila

Content:

Tsongkhapafan said:

Thanks for your explanation Malcolm, much appreciated. I haven't read Gendun Chopel but I take it his view is Shengtong?

Malcolm wrote:

No, Gendun Chopel was a very brilliant Gelug Lama who questioned a number of Tsongkhap's views.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, April 2nd, 2015 at 12:08 AM

Title: Re: Hashang's view is higher than Kamalashila

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Incidentally, while Nubchen does list ten reason's that the [ston mun] simultaneist path (Chan) is superior to the [tsen min] gradualist path (Madhyamaka), view is not among them. What are the ten? The difference in method, mode of entry, conduct, samadhi, addressing conceptuality, purifying obscurations, accomplishments, accumulations, realizing the two truths and benefitting others.

On the other hand, this is a moot point, because all Tibetan Buddhists are Vajrayāna practitioners. However also in Mahayoga and Anuyoga Nubchen identifies a gradual and sudden approach, with the latter coming from Padmasambhava's man ngag lta ba phreng ba.

Also an interesting tidbit is Nubs assertion that Vimalamitra demonstrates dying in Tibet, but in the future lives in India and not China. And another is that he identifies 12 reasons that Mantra is superior to Chan and Madhyamaka, including view.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, April 1st, 2015 at 10:03 PM

Title: Re: What beliefs are prerequisite for practicing Zen?

Content:

Dan74 said:

I know I am potentially opening a can of worms because of the seeming difference with our Vajrayana brothers and sisters, but I wanted to have a good look at this question in the light of classical and modern teachings of all traditions loosely referred to as Zen (ie Chan, Seon, Rinzai and Soto). Of course personal experience at Zen centres are welcome, but lets not let it devolve into a tug-o-war of opinions.

Malcolm wrote:

It is useful to remember that most people practicing Chan/Son/Zen in the old days were people already well trained in Buddhadharma.

Ancient scholars often understood stories on multiple levels, without one contradicting the other in their minds, despite seeming contradictions in ours.

For example, Rahu is used as a metaphor in the Kalacakra tantra for certain practices that lead to the cessation of ordinary concepts, but the Kalacakra also contains elaborate calculations for calculating eclipses on the presumption that the outer world mirrors the anatomy of the human body and vice versa, with the added assumption that a powerful enough yogin could control external eclipses by controlling his body.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, April 1st, 2015 at 9:33 PM

Title: Re: Hashang's view is higher than Kamalashila

Content:

Sherlock said:

But in any case, non-Nyingmapas have maligned Hashang for centuries without really studying his view, this should stop.

Tsongkhapafan said:

Would you care to clearly elucidate this view? If it involves abandoning conceptual minds because they are regarded as harmful then Hashang's view is wrong and even dangerous.

Malcolm wrote:

What Sherlock is saying is that in general, since the appearance of a history about the arrival of Śāntarakṣita and Padmasambhava to Tibet called the sba bzhed i.e., " The Narrative of Sba ", sometime between the late 9th and early 12th century, many Tibetan scholars such as Sakya Pandita have held views about Chan Buddhism in general based on what is reported in that text.

Sherlock's point is that there is more than one report about the positions of Hashang

Mahayana and in his opinion, those following the Narrative of Sba are giving consideration only to a very one sided point of view of Hashang's actual views, and that Hashang has become a strawman that Tibetan schools use to attack each other with.

In other words, what Sherlock is questioning is whether or not Sba gsal snang's reporting on Hashang's views are actually factual. Many modern scholars think the entire episode was entirely fabricated for political reasons.

Later Nyingmapa's have also expressed hostility at the Sba bzhed literature because it contradicts later terma biographies on many details, such as asserting that Padmasambhava was the actual son of the King of Oddiyāna and so on.

Of course there are some problems with Nubchen's account as well since he has Bodhidharma traveling to Tibet and arriving with one shoe in his hand.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, April 1st, 2015 at 8:19 PM

Title: Re: How does 18 early Buddhism School Related to Mahayana?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, I know, I have the book. But he is mistaken. It is actually a commentary on a specific portion of the Guhyasamaja Tantra, the abhisambodhi of Akṣobhya.

Aemilius said:

I support Lindtner. In Bodhicittavivarana there is a clear argument against the cittamatra views, like those expressed in Lankavatara sutra.

Furthermore, there are some active persons who want to make Nagarjuna seem like a sravakayanist, and who with this hidden intention reject this important work, because it is mainly or solely about the Bodhicitta.

Malcolm wrote:

I am just sharing with you what the text is actually about. There are other texts by Nāgārjuna on Mahāyāna, like the Ratnavali and Suhrlakṣa, which prove that Nāgārjuna was a Mahāyānist.

But there are 300 works in the bstan 'gyur attributed to Nāgārjuna, and it is impossible they are all by him.

The tradition that the Bodhicittavivarana is associated with the Guhyasamaja Tantra is well established, considering the term "bodhicitta" in that tantra is used as a term for ultimate reality. The author who wrote it was the siddha Nāgārjuna who was a disciple of Saraha I, there is really no doubt about this. This text is a prominent text in the Arya tradition of Guhyasamaja.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, April 1st, 2015 at 8:08 PM

Title: Re: siddhis--why aren't they used more?

Content:

WeiHan said:

However, the Buddha's teaching held that whatever outer physical environment we experienced is also a result of our karma (which is somewhat a mind thing). ... If the Buddha can influence the mind of certain people so that he seem to witness a supernatural phenomena from his perspective in the outer world. It is almost the same as saying that the Buddha can influence change in the physical law since whatever physical laws that the world obeys depend on our mind and karma (as for the example of hell and heaven which I given).

Astus said:

And we arrive at the problem that if the Buddha can change others' karma then he can liberate them as well by the same power. Since nothing like that happened, and the whole point of the teaching is that everyone has to accomplish it on one's own, changing others' karma is not possible.

Malcolm wrote:

If the first were true, the second would not necessarily follow since liberation is freedom from afflictions, not freedom from karmavipaka.

In any case the Buddha has already instructed is that he cannot remove our suffering, nor can he hand us liberation, he can only instruct.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, April 1st, 2015 at 7:54 PM

Title: Re: Gorampa & Tsongkhapa

Content:

Ayu said:

If you, michaelb, don't sense the existence to be inherent: congrats. All people are individually different.

michaelb said:

The point is more that 'inherent existence' is not the problem, or certainly not the whole problem. If you just negate inherent existence you are still left with the 'thing' you haven't negated. To use your examples the rose and the table (without their inherent existence) are still there for me to prick my finger on or bump into, and still there to be objects of my clinging.

Tenzin Dorje said:

Aaah! I think I finally understood your view. (yes, I try)

I say although a table is empty of inherent existence, or is empty of being an inherently existent table, it is not empty of being a table. A table is empty of being a horse, a car, a cup, but is not empty of being a table because a table is found by conventional valid cognition. But it is empty of being inherently existent [table] because it is not found by a mind of ultimate analysis.

You say a table is empty of being a table, do you not ?

Malcolm wrote:

Two problems here:

One, tables are empty of being tables. If tables were not empty being tables, conventional tables could withstand analysis, and so too could all things made of parts, such as persons. A table appears/exists, and a table is imputed on its parts, like persons, but it cannot be found to withstand ultimate analysis. In the process of analyzing a table, also the table ceases to be apprehended. This principle is well established even in lower tenet systems such as Abhidharma, where the cognition of a pot ceases the moment it is broken into shards, and so on.

Second, this perspective — that the appearance/existence of conventionally imputed tables can withstand ultimate analysis while their inherent existence cannot — makes it difficult to practice the creation stage, since our so called conventional valid cognition perceives impure appearances and not pure appearances of the mandala and so on. The latter requires training and purification.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, April 1st, 2015 at 12:11 AM

Title: Re: Nichiren Buddhism Vs. Tibetan Buddhism

Content:

rory said:

For sure Tendai is closest to TB.

Rory

Malcolm wrote:

No, Shingon is.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 31st, 2015 at 11:54 PM

Title: Re: How does 18 early Buddhism School Related to Mahayana?

Content:

Aemilius said:

Nagarjuna, who lived two or three centuries before Asanga and Vasubandu, is at least in one place criticizing the Yogacara view, (found that in Christian Lindtner's Master of Wisdom, Writings of Nagarjuna).

.

Malcolm wrote:

You are referring to the Bodhicittavivarana, this late tantric text is associated with the Guhyasamaja Tantra — I have no idea why Lindtner imagines it is by Nāgārjuna I, there is no chance that it is.

Aemilius said:

His grounds sound reasonable for holding it a work of Nagarjuna. Lindtner explains his justifications for two pages in the above mentioned book.

In the earlier editions of Lindtner's Master of Wisdom there was also a translation of Akutobhya. It is most unfortunate that he has decided to remove Akutobhya from his collection of translations of Arya Nagarjuna's works.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, I know, I have the book. But he is mistaken. It is actually a commentary on a specific portion of the Guhyasamaja Tantra, the abhisambodhi of Akṣobhya.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 31st, 2015 at 9:32 PM

Title: Re: Hashang's view is higher than Kamalashila

Content:

Sherlock said:

Nubchen's works were lost to Tibetans until quite recently, the last 80 years or something, and even when they were rediscovered not many people read them.

Malcolm wrote:

Regarding this, actually, we know that Lochen Dharmashrī had a hand written manuscript of the bsam gtan mig sgron, as well as the Jonangpa Jetsun Kunga Nying po (Taranatha). So it seems that this text actually circulated among elite Tibetan scholars all along.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 31st, 2015 at 8:51 PM

Title: Re: "Buddhism" vs. "Buddhadharma"

Content:

Dan74 said:

So only what is put forward by the enlightened can be of any benefit? Maybe we have different notions of 'benefit'.

Malcolm wrote:

Only what is put forth by awakened people is the Dharma. Of ordinary people like you and I start pretending that we can alter the Dharma to suit this or that purpose, this is called "Corrupting the Dharma."

Perhaps the tag 'Buddhist' is more likely to lead people to Buddhadharma? Why worry about the trademark?

It is not a question of being concerned with trademarks, it is a question of honesty.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 31st, 2015 at 8:46 PM

Title: Re: siddhis--why aren't they used more?

Content:

Ayu said:

Yes, but aren't you discussing about who is able to change the karma? Only the person who owns this certain karma can change it in longterm view, isn't it?

As far as I understood, a Buddha or a teacher with siddhis can give a little nudge to the better direction - which might be a great relief. But he cannot change the karma from outside.

Malcolm wrote:

No. I was just answering Astus' question. Karma is unerring, but it is no means something that must ripen in a certain way. For example, the heavy karma of bodhisattvas must ripen, it does not ripen as being reborn in lower realms, but instead, as the Karmavibhanga states:

The one endowed with this Dharma completely purifies in this life even the karma that results in birth in the three lower realms through pain in the eye, ear, nose, tongue or a pain in the head, being afflicted by a pain in the limb or the heart, or being afflicted by a contagious disease, pain in the abdomen, or when traveling to other lands, being killed, bound, beaten, abused, struck, criticized or vision in a nightmare.

Thus karma is unerring, but not immutable.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 31st, 2015 at 8:18 AM

Title: Re: Kadampa Buddhism

Content:

Dema said:

I have been going to a Kadampa temple that's in the area. I really like it and the people and the temple are very nice. but you really need to be a temple supporter to do anything there. or everything cost 5 bucks and for 3 months it like 110 bucks and i dont have that. So if anyone practices this schooling. maybe some books i can read that might help? i would like to get a bit more deeper in the the noble truths

thank you
Dema

Malcolm wrote:

You should check the TOS:

The discussion of or linking to material from groups and individuals that promote them, such as Geshe Kelsang Gyato's New Kadampa Tradition or Tsem Tulku Rinpoche's Kechara are not welcome and will be removed.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 31st, 2015 at 8:16 AM

Title: Re: "Buddhism" vs. "Buddhadharma"

Content:

Dan74 said:

I'd also beg to differ with JD that Buddhadharma becomes nonsensical if rebirth is thrown away.

Malcolm wrote:

Of course it does. The Buddha's whole outline of the path of liberation automatically becomes gibberish without rebirth.

Dan74 said:

I know I don't share many members' distaste for Secular Buddhism. It is not my path, but I see much good on it that people can bring to their lives and lives of those around them.

Malcolm wrote:

Secular Buddhism is a contrivance of the ignorant, and being a product of ignorance, cannot benefit anyone at all.

Dan74 said:

Essentially Humanism with some of the Dharmic techniques thrown in makes the best framework an atheist can embrace and if it was truly embraced, the world would be a much better place and Buddhadharma would be the next natural step, I believe.

Malcolm wrote:

It would be much better if so called Secular Buddhists would leave the term "Buddhist" off their "faith" and replace it with something more honest and apropos, such as "Humanism".

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 31st, 2015 at 8:11 AM

Title: Re: "white metal" mandala plate turning my wrist grey

Content:

Ayu said:

Hello summertime

I saw this phenomenon also when people rubbed their silver coloured mandala sets. It was silver-colour and I don't think it is good to have this on the skin regularly.

I heard, people fixed their sets with transparent varnish.

Also I saw beautifully painted mandala sets. The ornaments were painted with vivid colours. Maybe you'd like to paint it like that.

summertime said:

I'd be concerned about the varnish or paint coming off on my arm, too. Do you happen to know what kind of varnish it is that would be used for this?

Malcolm wrote:

Copper is considered a precious metal, but so called "white metal" is not. Get yourself a copper mandala plate. It will be non-toxic, and of superior material since you cannot afford silver or gold.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 31st, 2015 at 7:00 AM

Title: Re: "Buddhism" vs. "Buddhadharma"

Content:

dharmagoat said:

Could the Buddha's teachings of rebirth and karma be provisional?

Might it be a mistake to interpret them as absolute truths?

Malcolm wrote:

The Buddha himself defined wrong view as rejection of karma and rebirth in many places. They may be part of relative truth, but I would hardly characterize them as provisional.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 31st, 2015 at 5:21 AM

Title: Re: "white metal" mandala plate turning my wrist grey

Content:

summertime said:

Hi, Just recently starting mandala offerings with one of those fancy looking "birthday cake" stacked plates with the auspicious symbols on the side. The vendor told me it was made of "white metal." I'm curious if anyone knows what that is, and why it might be making my wrist turn grey after a while when I rub the plate with it. Anyone else encounter this issue? My main concern is maybe there's lead in the plate. In case it is something in the plate reacting with something on my skin, I'm going to try to be more careful about washing not just my hands but my wrists also.

Malcolm wrote:

Get a copper mandala plate.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 31st, 2015 at 3:58 AM

Title: Re: siddhis--why aren't they used more?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, an idea that you subscribe to by insisting that there are immutable physical laws.

Astus said:

Isn't karma immutable?

Malcolm wrote:

Karma is unerring, but it is not immutable.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 31st, 2015 at 3:56 AM

Title: Re: Gorampa & Tsongkhapa

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

rtogs pa - avabodha This is usually the term rtogs renders in order to communicate "realize."

Tenzin Dorje said:

True. Why then go against what you yourself say is usual translation?

Malcolm wrote:

Because here I do not think rtogs is being used to translate, or has the same sense as 'avabodha'. It is a clumsy way to translate the passage.

Tenzin Dorje said:

Plus, I've indicated a number of translations (such as ascertain, know, understand, and so forth) and since you know what rtogs pa is, we don't need to argue on the translation. It is exactly like the fact that there is no need to argue on the term of "compassion" when we know the Buddhist definition, function, divisions of it, on the pretext that its Latin etymology of it as to do with "to suffer with..."

Malcolm wrote:

The point is that the term rtogs renders any number of Sanskrit terms — in general in Tibetan "rtogs pa" actually means "understand" or "know" (shes pa). When it is used in the sense of "realize", it is being used in the sense of avabodha, but here it is not being used in that sense of avabodha.

A self-sufficient substantial entity would be an inherent existence, from our POV. But Tsongkhapa argues that is not the basis of negation, instead it is the inherent existence which is different than existence. From our point of view, existence is the coarse object of negation[...]

In fact, we say the basis is either phenomena or a person. The subtle object of negation is the same in both cases, though.

It doesn't matter, the subtle object of negation is not the actual object of negation in Madhyamaka, Candrakīrti only introduces it as a formality.

Still, I don't understand what you mean by 'existence is the coarse object of negation'. No one perceives inherent existence, which is a philosophical abstraction. People do perceive existence, and that is what is negated through Madhyamaka analysis because that is what people perceive. But negating existence is not enough, one must also negate nonexistence, both and neither. When one is an ārya, however, one does not need to proceed through the four-fold negation.

The Sakyas maintain that the difference between Bhāvaviveka and Candrakīrti is pedagogical only.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 31st, 2015 at 12:45 AM

Title: Re: Hashang's view is higher than Kamalashīla

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Basically, what it amounts to is the very Chinese Buddhist idea, later widely adopted by Kagyus and Nyingmas, that there were very clear sets of sūtras that could be distinguished by the turning to which they belong.

Nubchen asserts that Hashang depended on these definitive sūtras, and that Kamashīla depended on provisional sūtras.

But here, Nubchen is showing evidence of influence from Chinese Buddhism. It is really nothing more profound than this.

This is fine, but the reality of it is that the Indians never gave any importance to idea of three turnings at all. I don't either, which is why I find Nubchen's notion that Hashang's teachings are higher than Kamalashīla's based on which turning of wheel to which they supposedly adhere to be a completely bogus proposition, DOA. Understandable, but DOA. Accepting Nubchen's POV on this means accepting the distinction between the three turnings as understood in Chinese Buddhism and I simply do not think that is a particularly valid way of understanding sūtras.

narraboth said:

As a Chinese who started from Chinese Buddhism study, I don't think the idea of 'three turning of wheel' was that popular in our tradition. We do say 'five periods' based on Mahāyāna Mahāparinirvāṇa Sūtra: 'Just like from the milk the yogurt is made, from yogurt the raw butter is made....' However, it's not really about which period is superior in view. For example, the first period is âvatamsaka period, the sutra is surely a Mahayana text, just Chinese suggested that it's direct and unrefined as fresh milk, not everyone can digest it.

We do have Sandhinirmocana Sūtra translated though, but I think it's more emphasized by Yogācāra school (in China) rather than Zen school. In Zen school, at least after Song dynasty, the most important sutra is Vajracchedikā Prajñāpāramitā Sūtra. So I am not sure if Chinese give three turnings much importance at all. My feeling as a Chinese is that Tibetan emphasize it more than anyone.

Malcolm wrote:

I am not saying it is popular in the Chinese tradition, I am saying that its source is Chinese.

The idea of ranking sutras in terms of provisionality and definitiveness comes primarily from the Chinese commentary in the Samdhinirmocana Sutra. Chinese Buddhism indeed has a number of schemes where the Buddha's teachings are ranked according to when he is supposed to have taught them, but the source of the idea of three turnings of the wheel elaborated in this way is this commentary that I mentioned by Won-ch'uk, the 'phags pa dgongs pa zab mo nges par 'grel pa'i mdo rgya cher 'grel pa in three volumes. Since this concept is virtually absent from Indian sources, it must be from Chinese sources.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 31st, 2015 at 12:32 AM

Title: Re: siddhis--why aren't they used more?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

I said influence, you said control, there is a world of difference between these two words.

Astus said:

What form of influence do you mean?

Mental influence was already discussed a bit in this thread <http://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=275349#p275349>.

Malcolm wrote:

For example, the traces in the minds of sentient beings are sufficiently strong that they can influence the minds of others in terms of what appearances they see.

A classic example of this is the story of the lady who meditated upon herself as a tiger, causing the other villagers to see a tiger instead of her.

Then there is the famous example of the goddess of the Ganges who transformed herself in the form of Śariputra, and him into her form, much to his dismay.

There is the story of the nāga princess who changed her gender to male also, etc., etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 31st, 2015 at 12:23 AM

Title: Re: siddhis--why aren't they used more?

Content:

Astus said:

...the idea that there is an independent realm of objects beyond/behind experience.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, an idea that you subscribe to by insisting that there are immutable physical laws.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 31st, 2015 at 12:14 AM

Title: Re: siddhis--why aren't they used more?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

You put too much faith in the delusion known as "relative truth," Astus.

Astus said:

Are you on the position that ultimate truth contradicts and/or negates the relative? That dependent origination is something else than emptiness?

Malcolm wrote:

Ultimate truth is the object of a nondeluded cognition, relative truth is the object of a deluded cognition. Deluded and nondeluded cognitions are mutually exclusive.

Anything that dependently originates that is said to be empty, it is true.

But this does not mean that when someone has the ability control the element of air, etc., they cannot fly.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 31st, 2015 at 12:12 AM

Title: Re: siddhis--why aren't they used more?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, so finally you admit it, your view is realist and materialist, as I have been maintaining for some time.

As far as your contention goes that minds cannot influence other minds, this is merely an assertion on your part, and not something you have proven.

Astus said:

As WeiHan pointed out, I don't reject supernatural powers. But I reject being a materialist.

If one mind can control another, how come buddhas cannot make everyone enlightened? Then one person could make another think (and feel, and do) whatever that one wants, rendering the other a mere puppet.

Malcolm wrote:

I said influence, you said control, there is a world of difference between these two words.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 30th, 2015 at 11:35 PM

Title: Re: siddhis--why aren't they used more?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Wait, mass and energy are real? They impose hard, factual limitations? How you can escape the charge of substantialism by making this assertion?

Astus said:

Causality is still accepted as the way phenomena function, isn't it? It's not just anything goes and things appear out of nothing.

Malcolm wrote:

Candrakīrti was walking through the halls of Nalanda, reading a book. He accidentally bumped into a pillar. A clever student spied this and said "Ha, that pillar is not very empty is it!"

Candra stopped, and without a word passed his hand right through the pillar, much to the students astonishment, and then continued on his way..

You put too much faith in the delusion known as "relative truth," Astus.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 30th, 2015 at 11:31 PM

Title: Re: siddhis--why aren't they used more?

Content:

Astus said:

That is, within the realist/materialist view there is no place for magic. Only in the realm of subjective experience.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, so finally you admit it, your view is realist and materialist, as I have been maintaining for some time.

As far as your contention goes that minds cannot influence other minds, this is merely an assertion on your part, and not something you have proven.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 30th, 2015 at 10:42 PM

Title: Re: siddhis--why aren't they used more?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

None of which really explain from a scientific point of view how this mysterious interaction between mind and body works.

Astus said:

Scientifically there are no non-physical objects to investigate or establish a connection with. Otherwise the duality of mind and body in Buddhism is only a conventional term as all phenomena are within the experiential realm and distinguished as form and names as a way to talk about categories of experiences. If we begin to analyse such conventions in Buddhism then we gradually end up with mind-only and emptiness.

Malcolm wrote:

But you asserted as a hard fact that these phenomena [iddhi-pattis, siddhis, etc.] could never be real in a physical sense, which means you must be harboring some residual realism.

Astus said:

The four elements are clearly properties of material entities.

They are called material entities because they exhibit such properties and are experienced with the first five consciousnesses. Supposing a noumenal substance, independent object, beyond the phenomenal level is either a conventional approach or a substantialist philosophy.

Malcolm wrote:

It's odd that you take refuge in tenet systems, and yet harbor residual realism.

Astus said:

Yes, supernormal phenomena are not part of our everyday physical reality, not part of what is commonly called physical - the area of study of physics - and cannot be explained with physical laws.

Malcolm wrote:

But according to you, that does not matter because such laws are merely conventions and are not real in any substantial sense.

Astus said:

They can happen only if conceived within a subjective experiential realm where one doesn't have to account for the conservation of mass and energy (small becomes big, one becomes many, etc.). In other words, the mechanism of supernormal powers cannot be logically described within the confines of the general laws of this physical reality.

Malcolm wrote:

Wait, mass and energy are real? They impose hard, factual limitations? How you can escape the charge of substantialism by making this assertion?

Astus said:

But if you say that buddhas and ordinary beings as well can perform such abilities in the common physical world, then - as referred to before - there are a number of questions not yet answered, beginning with the first post of this thread.

Malcolm wrote:

The common physical world is either substantially real or it is not. If it is not, then there should be no problem accepting such things as iddhi-patis even if they do not normally conform to conventional expectations of 20th century humans. There are certainly plenty of anecdotal evidence of yogis who leave their footprints and handprints in rocks and so on in the Himalayas and certainly plenty of people, even westerners who have observed such events. It is rank substantialism to claim that such events are impossible because some imputed "general laws of this physical reality."

Astus said:

But despite all these things, you have no provided any reason at all that suggests that your acceptance of rebirth is rational and your rejection of iddhi-patis and so on is also rational. Your acceptance of former is actually irrational because you reject the latter. I do not reject supernormal powers. What I find problematic is the idea that they exist within the physical context.

Malcolm wrote:

Right, and you have this problem because you have realist tendencies, not unlike Sarvastivadins. The abhijñās are one thing, of course these are mental abilities, the iddhi-pattis/siddhis are something else again, they are not just mental abilities, though they come from having developed powers over the mind, having done so, they lend the ability to have power over matter, which according what you state above, is either a convention or mind-only.

Astus said:

But instead of answering for the questions and problems pertaining to the view that they manifest as ordinary physical phenomena, there are only evasive responses and irrelevant comments.

Malcolm wrote:

And you have continually engaged in self-contradictions and demonstrated that you are at base a realist.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 30th, 2015 at 9:34 PM

Title: Re: "Buddhism" vs. "Buddhadharma"

Content:

Challenge23 said:

The impression I've gotten from reading people who use the term is that "Buddhadharma" is based upon a highly specific form of Buddhism that is literal and traditional. For example, a "Buddhist" might hear the story about Milarepa flying from point A to point B and think that it was a metaphor, an exaggeration, or any of the myriad interpretations that would end with, "Milarepa didn't really fly from point A to point B". However, someone who believes in "Buddhadharma" would believe that Milarepa did, in fact, fly from point A to point B and anyone who disagrees with them are ignorant.

It reminds me a great deal of the difference in Christianity between Christians and Born Again Christians.

Malcolm wrote:

No, this is not the case. What is the case is that when someone explicitly claims that rebirth, karma and so on are interpretable, when for the Buddha they were clearly ideas he took literally, that person has fallen into wrong view. They may even erect a whole "Buddhism" around this idea, but it will never be Buddhadharma.

Challenge23 said:

Other than exchanging "Milarepa flying from point A to point B" with "rebirth" or "karma" and "ignorant" with "wrong view", I'm not sure where we part ways here. Do you disagree because of the analogy between Buddhadharma and Born Again Christianity? Having grown up with non-denominational and Pentecostal Christians I can tell you it is quite accurate. Both groups believe that their respective sources are the ultimate and final authority, both groups believe that what is in those sources is literally true, and both groups believe that one should reorganize their lives based upon what is in their respective sources upon pain of horrible consequences (really the only difference between Avici Hell and the Christian Hell is that Avici is almost eternal but the Christian Hell is eternal). With that said, I do freely admit that BA Christianity is evangelical (meaning there is a drive to convert others), while Buddhadharma is most definitely not.

Malcolm wrote:

This is not the point:

However, someone who believes in "Buddhadharma" would believe that Milarepa did, in fact, fly from point A to point B and anyone who disagrees with them are ignorant.

This is the point:

However, someone who believes in "Buddhadharma" accepts rebirth, karma, etc., and anyone who disagrees with them is ignorant [about the real nature of Buddha's teachings.]

It is not fundamentalist thing — it is about accurately understanding what the Buddha taught and then deciding whether or not one can accept what he taught. If you can't, then please do not try to twist the Buddha's teachings into something that corresponds with your prejudices.

Further, "Buddhisms" tend to focus on one aspect of Buddha's teachings, they can never encompass the whole of it. I am a Tibetan Buddhist because I follow that path and system, but there is more to Buddhadharma than Tibetan Buddhism, there is Chan, Pure Land, etc. Sometimes "Buddhisms" are distortions of the Buddha's teachings, like Secular Buddhism and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 30th, 2015 at 9:29 PM

Title: Re: Gorampa & Tsongkhapa

Content:

Sherlock said:

Khenpo Zhenga reemphasized Indic studies and freedom from extremes.

Malcolm wrote:

Maybe to Nyingmapas. Gorampa's view is the official view of the Sakya school, and Shenga studied with Sakya khenpos.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 30th, 2015 at 9:28 PM

Title: Re: Gorampa & Tsongkhapa

Content:

narraboth said:

"The works of some other Sakya lamas which criticized Tsongkhapa or seemed at odds with those views were banned from publication entirely within Tibet and were only preserved secretly and re-published openly from Bhutan after 1959."

Malcolm wrote:

Primarily the works of Shakya Chogden.

narraboth said:

Not sure what those 'works' are and how he defines 'Tibet'. I recently read some letters that Papongka Dechen Nyingpo sent to some Chinese, one of them is chairman Liu, the head of Kham province at that time (during ROC's ruling 1912-1949, Tibet and Kham are two different provinces). He suggested Liu to support monastery but be careful about textbooks that contained wrong views, and he said that some people printed and published those wrong view books including Gorampa's commentaries in Dege, which is very bad for Buddha dharma etc.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, a Sakya named Jamyang Lama at Derge gathered all the extant manuscripts of Gorampa's works and had them carved into block prints.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 30th, 2015 at 9:16 PM

Title: Re: Hashang's view is higher than Kamalashila

Content:

tingdzin said:

Well, Guenther discussed this in short pieces a long time ago, and the OP might find what he had to say useful. I don't want to stick my head into the (useless) argument besides that.

Malcolm wrote:

Basically, what it amounts to is the very Chinese Buddhist idea, later widely adopted by Kagyus and Nyingmas, that there were very clear sets of sutras that could be distinguished by the turning to which they belong.

Nubchen asserts that Hashang depended on these definitive sutras, and that Kamashila depended on provisional sutras.

But here, Nubchen is showing evidence of influence from Chinese Buddhism. It is really nothing more profound than this.

This is fine, but the reality of it is that the Indians never gave any importance to idea of three turnings at all. I don't either, which is why I find Nubchen's notion that Hashang's teachings are higher than Kamalashila's based on which turning of wheel to which they supposedly adhere to be a completely bogus proposition, DOA. Understandable, but DOA. Accepting Nubchen's POV on this means accepting the distinction between the three turnings as understood in Chinese Buddhism and I simply do not think that is a particularly valid way of understanding sūtras.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 30th, 2015 at 8:56 PM

Title: Re: Gorampa & Tsongkhapa

Content:

Tsongkhapafan said:

Since these appearances are inseparable from emptiness and are ultimate truths, and they have a non-conceptual realisation of ultimate truth, they also have a non-conceptual realisation of appearances.

Malcolm wrote:

Changing appearances are ultimate truths? Since when?

Tsongkhapafan said:

Conventional truths are manifestations of the self-grasping mind. In truth, all phenomena are mere name or mere appearance, and this mere name is one nature with the ultimate truth of phenomena, not its conventional nature. For a Buddha, forms are ultimate truths because there is no contradiction between how they appear and how they exist.

Malcolm wrote:

You still have not explained how impermanent things are ultimate.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 30th, 2015 at 8:46 PM

Title: Re: siddhis--why aren't they used more?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

It follows then that since rebirth manifests in the material realm, you therefore must also come up with an explanation for it according to natural science. ... The mind clearly interacts with matter every time rebirth occurs. How is this possible? How can a nonmaterial entity interact with a material one?

The material realm is what is within the experience of the five senses. Can the mind be seen, heard, smelt, tasted or touched? Does it have a form, a colour, a spatial or temporal existence? It does not. How could then we say it manifests as a physical object?

No said it manifested as a physical object, merely that it appropriates physical objects, namely a body, in a material realm, in our case, the kāmadhātu.

On the connection between mind and matter, there are the 18 dhatus, abhidharma literature and yogacara works.

None of which really explain from a scientific point of view how this mysterious interaction between mind and body works.

That is, the four elements are solidity/extension, cohesion/fluidity, heat and motion, so they are what is experienced by consciousness and not a separate realm.

The four elements are clearly properties of material entities.

Nevertheless, various experiences are categorised differently, thus the distinction between name and form, feeling and concept, etc. In other words, instead of choosing either that body and mind are one or two, the Buddha taught the five aggregates.

Four aggregates are strictly mental, one of them is strictly material (the rūpa skandha, the material aggregate), comprised of the four elements, out of which the five sense organs are made. Of the four mental aggregates, three of them are mental factors, caittas; while one is the mind, citta/vijñāna/manas.

The Buddha also regularly uses the older Indian term for mind and body, i.e. namarūpa, which in particular refers to the period of time of development in the womb after conception and before the sense organs develop.

That's why regarding superpowers I take the position presented in the Vimalakirti Sutra, that it depends on one's perception, and there is no such power that could be demonstrated for everyone, thus my distinction between physical and spiritual powers. You have not addressed my objection in the slightest, you have not explained to us how it is that consciousness, which is a non-material entity, functions through the sense organs via patches of atoms located on the various physical structures in their respective locations such as the eye, and so on.

Moreover, in the citations you provided, no one doubts that the five abhijñās are mental experiences, but so is the taste of my coffee. Your contention however was that such things as levitation, manomayakāyas, and so on were simply subjective experiences of adepts, were not part of physical reality, and solely the domain of fantasy — even though of course Buddha, and other mahasiddhas displayed these miraculous events to others present.

But despite all these things, you have not provided any reason at all that suggests that your acceptance of rebirth is rational and your rejection of iddhi-pāṭis and so on is also rational. Your acceptance of former is actually irrational because you reject the latter.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 30th, 2015 at 8:32 PM

Title: Re: "Buddhism" vs. "Buddhadharma"

Content:

Simon E. said:

It wouldn't be arrogant at all to see that the Buddha was addressing not merely those who were not his followers, but followers of another teacher whose authority unlike his own, was based on tradition, particular interpretations of scriptures, specious reasoning etc. It would simply be a statement of fact.

dharmagoat said:

And now that the Buddha's teaching is based on tradition, particular interpretations of scriptures, etc., his advice no longer applies?

Malcolm wrote:

People always forget that at the end of this sutta, it is said:

"Marvelous, venerable sir! Marvelous, venerable sir! As if, venerable sir, a person were to turn face upwards what is upside down, or to uncover the concealed, or to point the way to one who is lost or to carry a lamp in the darkness, thinking, 'Those who have eyes will see visible objects,' so has the Dhamma been set forth in many ways by the Blessed One. We, venerable sir, go to the Blessed One for refuge, to the Dhamma for refuge, and to the Community of Bhikkhus for refuge. Venerable sir, may the Blessed One regard us as lay followers who have gone for refuge for life, from today."

And having gone for refuge, they now are taking it on conviction in someone else that there is a path, and a result.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 30th, 2015 at 8:28 PM

Title: Re: "Buddhism" vs. "Buddhadharma"

Content:

dharmagoat said:

These two terms are used interchangeably by some, yet are given distinct meanings by others.

These days the term "Buddhadharma" seems to be reserved for the more historical interpretations of the Buddha's teaching, whereas the modern term "Buddhism" is applied to all interpretations, except perhaps the more unconventional ones.

To be a "Buddhist" means to be an adherent of "Buddhism". What exactly is "Buddhism", and how is it different from "Buddhadharma"?

In a changing world, how does "Buddhadharma" earn its special status?

Challenge23 said:

The impression I've gotten from reading people who use the term is that "Buddhadharma" is based upon a highly specific form of Buddhism that is literal and traditional. For example, a "Buddhist" might hear the story about Milarepa flying from point A to point B and think that it was a metaphor, an exaggeration, or any of the myriad interpretations that would end with, "Milarepa didn't really fly from point A to point B". However, someone who believes in "Buddhadharma" would believe that Milarepa did, in fact, fly from point A to point B and anyone who disagrees with them are ignorant.

It reminds me a great deal of the difference in Christianity between Christians and Born Again Christians.

Malcolm wrote:

No, this is not the case. What is the case is that when someone explicitly claims that rebirth, karma and so on are interpretable, when for the Buddha they were clearly ideas he took literally, that person has fallen into wrong view. They may even erect a whole "Buddhism" around this idea, but it will never be Buddhadharma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 30th, 2015 at 8:26 PM

Title: Re: "Buddhism" vs. "Buddhadharma"

Content:

Simon E. said:

But the heart of Buddhadharma remains experiential, as it has has been. Under the guidance of one who has walked that experiential path further than have we.

dharmagoat said:

We are actually in agreement... I think.

The thrust of my argument all along has been that the spirit of Buddhism (the Buddhadharma?) is by nature experiential, and not theoretical.

That the theory can be a source of obstacles.

Malcolm wrote:

No, theory is not an obstacle, the wrong theory is an obstacle. The eight fold path begins with correct view.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 30th, 2015 at 8:25 PM

Title: Re: "Buddhism" vs. "Buddhadharma"

Content:

dharmagoat said:

While it is true that this discourse was addressed to the non-Buddhist Kalamas, it would be arrogant to assume that it doesn't apply to Buddhists too.

Malcolm wrote:

The Pabbakotthaka Sutta:

I have heard that on one occasion the Blessed One was staying in Savatthi, at the Eastern Gatehouse. There he addressed Ven. Shariputra: "Shariputra, do you take it on conviction that the faculty of conviction, when developed and pursued, plunges into the Deathless, has the Deathless as its goal and consummation? Do you take it on conviction that the faculty of persistence... mindfulness... concentration... discernment, when developed and pursued, plunges into the Deathless, has the Deathless as its goal and consummation?"

"Lord, it's not that I take it on conviction in the Blessed One that the faculty of conviction... persistence... mindfulness... concentration... discernment, when developed and pursued, plunges into the Deathless, has the Deathless as its goal and consummation. Those who have not known, seen, penetrated, realized, or attained it by means of discernment would have to take it on conviction in others that the faculty of conviction... persistence... mindfulness... concentration... discernment, when developed and pursued, plunges into the Deathless, has the Deathless as its goal and consummation; whereas those who have known, seen, penetrated, realized, and attained it by means of discernment would have no doubt or uncertainty that the faculty of conviction... persistence... mindfulness... concentration... discernment, when developed and pursued, plunges into the Deathless, has the Deathless as its goal and consummation. And as for me, I have known, seen, penetrated, realized, and attained it by means of discernment. I have no doubt or uncertainty that the faculty of conviction... persistence... mindfulness... concentration... discernment, when developed and pursued, plunges into the Deathless, has the Deathless as its goal and consummation."

"Excellent, Shariputra. Excellent. Those who have not known, seen, penetrated, realized, or attained it by means of discernment would have to take it on conviction in others that the faculty of conviction... persistence... mindfulness... concentration... discernment, when developed and pursued, plunges into the Deathless, has the Deathless as its goal and consummation; whereas those who have known, seen, penetrated, realized, and attained it by means of discernment would have no doubt or uncertainty that the faculty of conviction... persistence... mindfulness... concentration... discernment, when developed and pursued, plunges into the Deathless, has the Deathless as its goal and consummation."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 30th, 2015 at 7:43 AM

Title: Re: Nun's ordination

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

I'm no scholar, so I don't understand the importance of whether they will be considered as Mulasarvastivada Bhikṣunis by other schools. What is the significance of this? Why does it matter?

Are we likely to see ordination of nuns in this format taken up by the other schools?

Malcolm wrote:

As to the first point, as far as I know, these mixed Sangha ordinations are in themselves somewhat controversial to begin with.

As to your second question, I honestly don't know.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 30th, 2015 at 6:39 AM

Title: Re: Nun's ordination

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

In any case.... how much of a deal is it to the Tibetan schools whether or not they would be considered to have their vows coming from the Dharmaguptaka line or the Mulasarvastivadin line?

Malcolm wrote:

It depends on the school.

tellyontellyon said:

Do people here think their status as fully ordained nuns would be respected? From the article I quoted above, the Karmapa seems to be saying that as the vows come mainly from the monks, even in the dual ordination, so they should be considered nuns in the Mulasarvastivadin line.

Malcolm wrote:

I think their vows will be respected, but I am not really sure they can be considered Mulasarvastivada Bhikṣunis. But, the Karmapa can do as he sees fit.

I think it nevertheless will be considered controversial. But controversy never prevented anyone from doing anything in Tibetan Buddhism.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 30th, 2015 at 5:56 AM

Title: Re: Nun's ordination

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

His Holiness points out that there have been nuns given ordination in Tibet, even though these isolated ordinations didn't end up with a bhikṣuni sangha being formed, so this a historical precedent for nuns being ordained by monks alone even in Tibet.

Malcolm wrote:

It is considered a broken ordination, even when it was performed, and was highly controversial. Such ordainees cannot themselves ordain novices in turn.

tellyontellyon said:

...so I don't think we just just rely on what has been done in the past.

Malcolm wrote:

The consensus has come down this: in order for there to be an order of nuns in Tibetan Buddhism, they must receive a living lineage from other nuns. Luckily, this still exists in Chinese Buddhism, in the Dharmaguptaka order. The main difficulty here is that these nuns are not and never will be Mulasarvastivadin nuns. But on the face of it, that is not what these women care about (i.e. which order into which they are ordained), they want to be bhikṣunis.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 30th, 2015 at 5:52 AM

Title: Re: Understanding a Passage from Chandrakirti

Content:

Bakmoon said:

I have a question about how Madhyamakavatara 6.36 is understood. It reads:
Reasonings prove that arising from self and other
Are illogical in suchness.

Since they also prove that arising is illogical conventionally,

On what basis do you speak of “arising”?

But if arising is refuted conventionally as well as ultimately, how should this be understood to avoid refuting dependent arisings on the level of appearances? I am particularly interested as to how this passage is understood outside of Gelug, especially according to the understanding of Gorampa.

I would like to note here before anything else that I'm not asking this as a polemic and I certainly don't want this to turn into a debate thread about whether Gorampa or anyone else is right or wrong. I'm just trying to grow in understanding here.

To me it seems that the text requires some kind of qualification, but I can't see how the text can really be qualified without doing serious violence to the plain meaning of the text.

Malcolm wrote:

According to Candra's own commentary on this passage, what is being refuted is arising through intrinsic characteristics.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 30th, 2015 at 2:18 AM

Title: Re: Difference between Sakya & Gelug Vajrayogini

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

There are a couple of minor deities included in the Yogini cycle for common siddhis.

WeiHan said:

You mean like for example those in the 13 Golden Dharmas, like Kurukulle from Hevajra etc...?

Malcolm wrote:

Similar.

WeiHan said:

Do you know if one has to be vegetarian if one practices Tara-Kurukulle (one of the 13 Golden Dharmas) since it is not a anutarayoga practice?

Malcolm wrote:

I think it is actually an anuttara practice.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 30th, 2015 at 1:49 AM

Title: Re: Difference between Sakya & Gelug Vajrayogini

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

However, my doubt is that if even mundane siddhis can be easily attained thru this practice, then why does the Sakya need the other Golden Dharmas which bundled together with this practice in the well known "13 Golden Dharmas"? For example, since VY is effective gaining wealth, then do you still need a Red Jambala?

Yogini is a practice for excellent siddhi, the other deities in the 13 are mostly for common siddhis.

WeiHan said:

I saw this quote in your blog

Loppon Rinpoche said:

This alone is the extracted essence of all my Dharma cycles. Since that great Guru did not propagate this intimate instruction, he did not allow me to. It is very important that you emphasize this, practice it secretly, and you will obtain the supreme siddhi of mahāmudrā in this life, and also there is no doubt that whatever ordinary things you wish can be accomplished with the intimate instructions.

Doesn't it also brings "whatever ordinary things you wish" as the Gelug's teaching taught?

Malcolm wrote:

There are a couple of minor deities included in the Yogini cycle for common siddhis.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 30th, 2015 at 12:36 AM

Title: Re: Gorampa & Tsongkhapa

Content:

Tenzin Dorje said:

rtogs

Malcolm wrote:

rtogs pa - pratividdhā

rtogs pa - prativedha

rtogs pa - pratyavagama

rtogs pa - avagamana

rtogs pa - avabodha

rtogs pa - vijñāta rtogs pa - veditvā

rtogs pa - upaparīkṣaṇā

rtogs pa - upaparīkṣā

rtogs pa - upalakṣyatva

rtogs pa - avabodha This is usually the term rtogs renders in order to communicate "realize."

Otherwise, comprehend is better here compare for example:

Sautrantikas present realizing consciousnesses and non-realizing consciousnesses. A wrong consciousness, such as the consciousness apprehending a blue snow mountain, would be a non-realizing consciousness. According to Tsongkhapa, all consciousnesses realize their appearing object. The reason is that we can remember an appearing object of a wrong consciousness, and if there was no realization in the 1st place, one wouldn't be able to remember having seen such and such.

against

Sautrantikas present comprehending consciousnesses and non-comprehending consciousnesses. A wrong consciousness, such as the consciousness apprehending a blue snow mountain, would be a non-comprehending consciousness. According to Tsongkhapa, all consciousnesses comprehend their appearing object. The reason is that we can remember an appearing object of a wrong consciousness, and if there was no comprehension in the 1st place, one wouldn't be able to remember having seen such and such.

Tenzin Dorje said:

Or I simply didn't get why you meant by 'existence'. Please, explain, because geluk usually posit the quality of being 'self sufficient substantially existent' as the coarse object of negation.

Malcolm wrote:

A self-sufficient substantial entity would be an inherent existence, from our POV. But Tsongkhapa argues that is not the basis of negation, instead it is the inherent existence which is different than existence. From our point of view, existence is the coarse object of negation, and that is what is negated in Madhyamaka analysis generally, it, non-existence, both and neither in that order, unless one is an ārya, then one can dispense with the turn by turn negation of the four extremes. The purpose of negating the third extreme is not made irrelevant because it is double negation, as Tsongkhapa argues, but simply because there are those such as Jains and so on who maintain that there are things that are both existence and non-existent.

Tenzin Dorje said:

Do you assert that a Buddha doesn't know all objects of knowledge ?

Malcolm wrote:

[/quote]

While there are significant differences in the way the question of a Buddha's omniscience is handled in Sakya and Gelug. I am not qualified to discuss it, having never studied it in any detail.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 30th, 2015 at 12:13 AM

Title: Re: Difference between Sakya & Gelug Vajrayogini

Content:

Sherlock said:

Vajrayogini was not one of Tsongkhapa's core practices.

Why do Gelugpas prefer it to his heart practices?

Malcolm wrote:

More to the point, Tsongkhapa rejected the whole exegetical foundation around which Yogini practice is elaborated, the ultimate secret category of mother tantras, called 'gsang mtha', based on the oral tradition of commenting on the intention of the Cakrasamvara Tantra that comes from Naropa exclusively through the Guru Abhayakirti (the elder Phaimthing) and through Mal Lotsawa and Sachen.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, March 29th, 2015 at 11:59 PM

Title: Re: The Gelug/Kagyü Tradition Of Mahamudra

Content:

shazan said:

...is there something that I am missing?

Malcolm wrote:

Direct introduction?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, March 29th, 2015 at 11:59 PM

Title: Re: Hashang's view is higher than Kamalashila

Content:

Mother's Lap said:

If it's better than gradual common Mahayana as recognised masters have acclaimed and 3 kalpas is the upper limit for the very best practitioner then what's left is that it's either easier and/or it takes a non-highest capacity practitioner less time to achieve the result but still adhering to the three kalpas time-frame. If someone is going to take 25 kalpas to reach buddhahood via the gradual method then non-gradual may take them 20 instead etc.

Malcolm wrote:

Quite honestly, until a complete and adequate translation of the relevant chapters are produced by someone, Nubchen's actual line of reasoning will remain opaque.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, March 29th, 2015 at 11:25 PM

Title: Re: Hashang's view is higher than Kamalashila

Content:

Sherlock said:

ChNN agrees with Nubchen that ningradual Mahayana is superior.

Malcolm wrote:

Superior exactly how? In what way is it superior? If the view is the same, and the path is the same, what precisely is the superiority of Hashang's perspective to Kamalashila's perspective?

You can't just toss these things out there with no reasons to back them up, otherwise, I will have to suspect you of being a sock puppet of Link and Zelda, and that just does not seem possible.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, March 29th, 2015 at 11:11 PM

Title: Re: Hashang's view is higher than Kamalashila

Content:

Sherlock said:

Claiming Chan is a wrong view is something later Tibetans came up with.

.

Malcolm wrote:

Not really. The account of the defeat of Hashang comes from the Ba bshed, which is contemporary with Nubchen.

Even so, Nubchen argues that Mahāyoga is superior to Chan.

Also, their view was the same. They both had Madhyamaka views as far as I know.

Sherlock said:

Well, is it in the Ba shed fragment from Dunhuang? Ba shed was revised to make the account of Shantaraksita being detained seem less offensive from the version in Dunhuang, probably other things too.

Mahayoga is of course superior to sutra but Chan (at least 9th century Chan) is actually a superior mode of practice to Kamalashila's way even if their view of the ultimate was the same.

The gradual Mahayana path's meditation is pretty similar to Hinayana with the addition of bodhicitta motivation?

But in any case, non-Nyingmapas have maligned Hashang for centuries without really studying his view, this should stop.

Malcolm wrote:

You cannot really say that Hashang's method of practice is superior. Does Hashang's method mean that the three incalculable eons for practicing the bodhisattva path are not necessary or bypassed? If your answer is no, then how is it superior since the path in general is still gathering the gradual accumulations of merit and wisdom through the six perfections? It turns out to be a mere rhetorical superiority. If your answer is yes, than what is the use of Vajrayāna?

Gradual Mahāyāna is nothing like Hinayāna — why would you say such a thing? Have you never studied the Sutrālamkāra, Ratnavali, etc.?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, March 29th, 2015 at 10:27 PM

Title: Re: Gorampa & Tsongkhapa

Content:

Tenzin Dorje said:

Still, to come back to our topic, Je Tsongkhapa asserts that a wrong consciousness realizes its own appearing object. For instance, ignorance realizes not inherent existence (because it is a non-existent and a non-existent can not be realized) but the appearance of inherent. The appearance of inherent existence is the appearing object of ignorance (a wrong consciousness and a conceptual consciousness). As to whether ignorance has a conceived object, it is not clear, but if it has so, it is a terminological division of 'conceived object' because it is non-existent.

According to Tsongkhapa, and that's where it becomes interesting, others schools (including Svatantrika-Madhyamikas) can not properly answer the question "what does ignorance realize ?" because it can not realize a non-existent such as inherent existence, where he answers "it realizes its own appearing object, the appearance of inherent existence". It is indeed Tsongkhapa's understanding that a unique tenet of Prasangika is that 'a wrong consciousness realizes its own appearing object, and is valid in regard to it'.

Malcolm wrote:

Not sure what Tibetan term you mean by "realize", so your point is rather obscure to me because of it.

Tenzin Dorje said:

In this way also, the omniscient mind of a Buddha directly realizes the appearance of inherent existence that is in the continuum of sentient beings. This shows it directly realizes mental images that are the appearing objects of conceptual consciousnesses in the continuum of sentient beings. Now, as you pointed out, I don't know whether Prasangika apart from Tsongkhapa would hold this. I leave that up to you, and it'll make the 'debate' interesting

Malcolm wrote:

In general, the response is that sentient beings do not differentiate between existence and inherent existence. Because this is so, while it is true that Candrakīrti indeed identifies a subtle object of negation, inherent existence, the actual object of negation is the coarse object of negation, existence, because that is what sentient beings actually perceive and are actually deluded by.

Also, the problem with Tsongkhapa's hermeneutics here involve the fact that he is basically stating that while buddhas have no conceptual apprehension of their own, they apprehend the conceptual apprehensions of sentient beings, and that seems like a very strange position. The general position of Candrakīrti seems to be:

The peaceful kāya manifests like a wishfulfilling tree, is nonconceptual like a wishfulfilling gem, always existing for the benefit of the world until migrating beings are liberated, this [kāya] appears free of proliferation

Meaning it is not necessary for buddhas to apprehend the concepts of sentient beings since they act effortlessly without concepts on the behalf of sentient beings like wishfulfilling gems and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, March 29th, 2015 at 9:34 PM

Title: Re: Establishing a Correct Understanding?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The term parabhāva = dependent existence. The term pratīyasamutpāda = dependent origination.

Candra's definition of dependent origination, "...production through the meeting such and such an assembly of causes and conditions is what is called "dependent origination."

Sherab said:

I was expecting more than just definitions as a response to my request for you to elaborate on your objection.

My argument is really quite straightforward.

Assume in the simplest of case that B arise from A. The process of B arising from A is dependent origination. Because of B arising from A, the existence of B is a dependent existence.

What I am arguing here is that dependent existence is inextricably linked to dependent origination. Dependent existence has no meaning without dependent origination in the context of the discussion of my objection to infinitely regressive causal chain.

Continuing with the simple example of B arising from A:

(1) dependent existence per Nagarjuna - Inherent existent $S \rightarrow T \rightarrow U \rightarrow V \rightarrow W \rightarrow X \rightarrow Y \rightarrow Z \rightarrow A \rightarrow B$ (simple causal chain with an inherently existing S as the beginning)

(2) infinitely regressive dependent existence - <no beginning> $\rightarrow X \rightarrow Y \rightarrow Z \rightarrow A \rightarrow B$ (simple causal chain without beginning)

Note that in causal chain (2) there is no inherent existence anywhere in the chain. That is why it is different from causal chain (1) which starts off with an inherent existence, or in your own words, an unconditioned cause.

As a reminder, I have no problem with dependent existence per Nagarjuna. I have problem with infinitely regressive dependent existence.

Unless existence in the tetralemma is defined to cover inherent existence, dependent existence per Nagarjuna AND dependent existence from a beginningless causal chain, there is no true freedom from extremes.

Nagarjuna's definition of existence excludes dependent existence from a beginningless causal chain and since you follow Nagarjuna's definition of existence, the extreme of dependent existence from a beginningless causal chain is not negated.

Did the Buddha negate the extreme of dependent existence from a beginningless causal chain? Yes. But you cannot do this with the tetralemma if the definition of existence excludes dependent existence from a beginningless causal chain.

Malcolm wrote:

You apparently choose to ignore Nāgārjuna's statement, "Where is there an existence not included in inherent existence or dependent existence (another species of inherent existence)."

The process of b arising from a is not dependent origination. There are no single causes in the chain of dependent origination, which is why dependent existence is rejected by Nāgārjuna as species of inherent existence. Dependent origination means arising from a combination of causes and conditions. For example, a sprout arises not merely from a seed, but from soil, moisture, warmth and so on.

The point is that Nāgārjuna is rejecting dependent existence in favor of dependent origination. I really do not see why it is so hard for you to understand this. Since we are just going around in circles, I am going to stop this here. I won't respond to this thread anymore.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, March 29th, 2015 at 9:28 PM

Title: Re: Difference between Sakya & Gelug Vajrayogini

Content:

WeiHan said:

For example, In the Sakya's teaching, disciple was chided for blaming the efficacy of the mantra while it is their own fault for not concentrating well during the mantra recitation.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, this is must be the case.

WeiHan said:

On the contrary, in the Gelug teachings, it promises that even reciting the mantra with weak concentration will bring results and it is the only mantra that has this advantage in this degenerate age.

Malcolm wrote:

The root tantra states that reciting the mantra of the Vajra Queen has certain efficacies, but no where does it say that one may do so with distraction.

WeiHan said:

The Gelug teaching also make comparison with other tantra and practices so as to illustrate the supremacy of this practice while the Sakya teaching do not...

Malcolm wrote:

Again, this is not true.

WeiHan said:

However, my doubt is that if even mundane siddhis can be easily attained thru this practice, then why does the Sakya need the other Golden Dharmas which bundled together with this practice in the well known "13 Golden Dharmas"? For example, since VY is effective gaining wealth, then do you still need a Red Jambala?

Malcolm wrote:

Yogini is a practice for excellent siddhi, the other deities in the 13 are mostly for common siddhis.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, March 29th, 2015 at 9:23 PM

Title: Re: Gorampa & Tsongkhapa

Content:

Tenzin Dorje said:

(Again, what I say is exclusively Prasangika, it's a unique tenet of the Middle Way Consequence school)

Malcolm wrote:

Correction, it is a unique tenet of Tsongkhapa's interpretation of Prasangika.

Since Garamapa lists more than 150 points of contention with Tsongkhapa's presentation of Prasangika Madhyamaka, it is really much better if you qualify your presentation with Tsongkhapa's interpretation since many of his unique interpretations are unknown to Indians as well as Tibetans. I understand that devotees of Tsongkhapa consider this to be a feature, whereas detractors of Tsongkhapa consider these innovations to be bugs in his view.

I myself am not expert enough in Tsongkhapa's writings to say much about them with certainty, but in general, I have personally found Garamapa's criticisms of Tsongkhapa's views regarding sūtra and tantra well founded. On the other hand, I generally accept Tsongkhapa's criticisms of Jonang view as having merit.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, March 29th, 2015 at 12:30 PM

Title: Re: Nun's ordination

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Yeah, it just does not work like that. The Mukasarvastivada bhikshuni ordination is dead and cannot be revived.

Indrajala said:

Their loss then. They have access to scriptures which are supposed to be buddhavacana and would resolve the issue at hand immediately, but then maybe that's too easy a solution for a debate stretching back centuries, as it would make the parties concerned look bad.

Malcolm wrote:

In genral, tibetan vinayadharas are quite resistant to mixing amd matching vinayas.

Tnere simply is no precedent for such a revival in the Mulasarvastivada literature. This is why the Karmapa is having nuns ordained according to the Dharmaguptaka lineage.

Fortunately the Karmapa is satisfied it is intact and valid.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, March 29th, 2015 at 12:21 PM

Title: Re: Nun's ordination

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

There is no such text in the Mulasarvastivada Vinaya. If there were, the question of ordaining bhikshunis would not be an issue and the Tibetans would have restored the bhikshuni ordination six hundred years ago or more.

Indrajala said:

In today's world where Tibetans have access to Indian literature not included in the Tibetan canon, perhaps they can refer to such texts in their discussions and easily resolve their dilemma.

Malcolm wrote:

Yeah, it just does not work like that. The Mukasarvastivada bhikshuni ordination is dead and cannot be revived.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, March 29th, 2015 at 12:13 PM

Title: Re: Nun's ordination

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

No. Otherwise Tibetans would have done this long ago.

Indrajala said:

I don't know if the following scripture is available in Tibetan, but it does state the following:

《大愛道比丘尼經》：「阿難復問佛言：『便當令比丘作[比丘尼]師耶？』佛言：『不也。當令大比丘尼作師。若無比丘尼者，比丘僧可。』」

Mahāprajāpatī Bhikṣuṇi Sūtra: "Ānanda further asked the Buddha, 'Is it then permissible for a bhikṣu to act as a master [to a bhikṣuṇī]?' The Buddha said, 'No. It should be that a great bhikṣuṇī acts as master. If there are no bhikṣuṇīs, then the bhikṣu sangha is permitted [to carry out the ordination].'"

Elsewhere in the Chinese canon the following convention is established:

《沙彌尼離戒文》：「佛告諸弟子：汝慎莫妄度沙彌離，女人姿態難保悅，在須臾以復更生惡意，……自非菩薩、阿羅漢，不可度尼。」

Sūtra on Śrāmaṇerī Precepts (沙彌尼離戒文): "The Buddha spoke to the disciples, 'You must be careful not to carelessly ordain śrāmaṇerī -s. It is difficult to guard against delighting in a woman's charming presence. In a moment one will further produce unwholesome thoughts. ... If one is not a bodhisattva or arhat, ordination of nuns may not be carried out.'"

Thus it is understood in the absence of any living lineage of bhikṣuṇīs, a bhikṣu has the right to ordain new bhikṣuṇīs, but the presiding preceptor should be a bodhisattva or arhat.

I believe a similar understanding exists in Theravada, which legitimized Ajahn Brahm's decision to ordain bhikkunis despite protests from the Thai sangha.

Malcolm wrote:

There is no such text in the Mulasarvastivada Vinaya. If there were, the question of ordaining bhikshunis would not be an issue and the Tibetans would have restored the bhikshuni ordination six hundred years ago or more.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, March 29th, 2015 at 10:56 AM

Title: Re: Nun's ordination

Content:

yan kong said:

Nuns lineage? Did they not revive the Theravadin nuns ordination in Sri Lanka?

Indrajala said:

In the absence of any living lineage of bhikṣuṇīs, a bhikṣu has the right to ordain new bhikṣuṇīs.

Malcolm wrote:

No. Otherwise Tibetans would have done this long ago. This issue has been under discussion since at least the 15th century among Tibetans, and the general consensus has been there is no way to revive the Mulasarvastivada bhikshuni vows.

For example Gorampa Sonam Senge addresses this issue in his sdom gsum kha skong.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, March 29th, 2015 at 8:25 AM

Title: Re: Gorampa & Tsongkhapa

Content:

Tsongkhapafan said:

Since these appearances are inseparable from emptiness and are ultimate truths, and they have a non-conceptual realisation of ultimate truth, they also have a non-conceptual realisation of appearances.

Malcolm wrote:

Changing appearances are ultimate truths? Since when?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, March 29th, 2015 at 8:23 AM

Title: Re: Hashang's view is higher than Kamalashila

Content:

Sherlock said:

Still, it seems some memory of his claim that Hashang Mahayana's view was fine seemed to have survived among Nyingmapas. Even Jigme Lingpa doesn't say that Hashang's view is wrong.

Malcolm wrote:

Much of Nubchen's texts was incorporated into the Kathang De nga.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, March 29th, 2015 at 8:23 AM

Title: Re: Hashang's view is higher than Kamalashila

Content:

Sherlock said:

Claiming Chan is a wrong view is something later Tibetans came up with.

.

Malcolm wrote:

Not really. The account of the defeat of Hashang comes from the Ba bshed, which is contemporary with Nubchen.

Even so, Nubchen argues that Mahāyoga is superior to Chan.

Also, their view was the same. They both had Madhyamaka views as far as I know.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, March 29th, 2015 at 5:56 AM

Title: Re: Nun's ordination

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

The Karmapa has indicated that he is going to start the process of giving nuns full ordination:

<http://kagyuoffice.org/gyalwang-karmapa-makes-historic-announcement-on-restoring-nuns-ordination/>

This is a link to the thread in the Kagyu forum:

<https://www.dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=50&t=18685&p=269756&hilit=nuns+ordination#p269756>

My question is about how this discussion is developing across the other schools of Tibetan Buddhism. Although the Karmapa is taking a lead on this issue, it is not only a Kagyu issue and relates to all schools of Tibetan Buddhism?

Does anybody have any news or feedback about this issue?

I myself am looking forward to the full ordination being available to all nuns in the Tibetan traditions.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, the problem is that they will not be Mulasarvastivadin bhikṣunis, since that ordination never even reached Tibet and died out in India. They will be Dharmaguptaka bhikṣunis, which is not our tradition. It is fine, but we have to be clear what is actually happening. We will have an odd situation where bhikṣus will be ordained according to one Vinaya, and bhikṣunis according to another.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, March 29th, 2015 at 4:54 AM

Title: Re: Xuanzang and Kuiji on Madhyamaka

Content:

Will said:

Lusthaus paper:

https://www.academia.edu/11698064/Xuanzang_and_Kuiji_on_Madhyamaka

Malcolm wrote:

The last sentence of the paper states:

In comparison to Mādhyamikans, Yogācāras are realists.
30+ pages to tell us what we already know!!!

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, March 29th, 2015 at 12:49 AM

Title: Re: Establishing a Correct Understanding?

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

Perhaps I was not clear, what I am asking is, what does 'meeting' mean here?

Malcolm wrote:

"Meeting" means "come together."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, March 29th, 2015 at 12:04 AM

Title: Re: Establishing a Correct Understanding?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Candra's definition of dependent origination, "...production through the meeting such and such an assembly of causes and conditions is what is called "dependent origination."

dzogchungpa said:

I haven't been following this discussion, and maybe I am showing my obtuseness, but what does it mean for an assembly of causes and conditions to "meet"?

Malcolm wrote:

It means that such a meeting produces an effect.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, March 28th, 2015 at 9:45 PM

Title: Re: Establishing a Correct Understanding?

Content:

Sherab said:

You said "Any dependent existence is an inherent existence. No matter how far back in time one imagines, at the start there will be an unconditioned cause." I took this to mean that there is a beginning to a casual chain (even though it is just an appearance). But you are now saying that there is no beginning to a causal chain. So which is your position?

If a logical fallacy such as infinite regression applies to secular reasoning and does not apply to reasoning involving the Buddha Dharma, how can there be any certainty that the Dharma is correct (other than direct experience)?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, in the case of dependent existence, not in the case of dependent origination. My position has been the same all along, which is why, if you examine, I rejected your two typologies of dependent existence. The term dependent existence itself is the problem. This is why I rejected your assertion that dependent origination was a type of dependent existence.

Sherab said:

Please elaborate so that I can understand your objection.

Malcolm wrote:

The term parabhāva = dependent existence. The term pratītyasamutpāda = dependent origination.

Candra's definition of dependent origination, "...production through the meeting such and such an assembly of causes and conditions is what is called "dependent origination."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, March 28th, 2015 at 3:54 AM

Title: Re: siddhis--why aren't they used more?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

One point — you might have to abandon the atomist framework of western science in order to discover other rational means of investigation.

Challenge23 said:

In regards to other rational means of investigation, are you referring to any type of method involving internal inquiry?

Malcolm wrote:

No, I was referring to using other frameworks to understand the nature of matter.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, March 28th, 2015 at 3:44 AM

Title: Re: siddhis--why aren't they used more?

Content:

Astus said:

My orientation towards the topic of supernatural powers is materialist because the idea that they manifest within the material realm requires that. Natural science is what analyses matter, so physical phenomena falls within that area of study.

Malcolm wrote:

It follows then that since rebirth is manifests in the material realm, you therefore must also come up with an explanation for it according to natural science.

Astus said:

Rebirth is the continuation of the mind-stream, and since mind is non-physical it is out of scope for material investigation.

Malcolm wrote:

The mind clearly interacts with matter every time rebirth occurs. How is this possible? How can a nonmaterial entity interact with a material one? What sound reason can you possibly have for rejecting all paranormal phenomena apart from the one that is the most paranormal of all, i.e., a nonphysical entity [a mind] appropriating physical matter [a body].

Surely you must admit that if the mind, a nonphysical entity according to you, can appropriate matter, such as a body and make obvious changes to it, it ought to also be able to make changes to other phenomena by paranormal means and be capable of other paranormal capabilities such as the ability to know other minds (other phenomena of a similar kind).

So why do you hold onto the belief that non-physical entities can supernaturally interact with physical matter in the case of rebirth, and yet reject all other kinds of "supernatural powers" of the mind where the mind interacts with or influences physical matter?

If you state it is because the Buddha taught rebirth in the sūtras, well, the Buddha also taught the abhiññās and the iddhi-pāṭis as well. Why accept a literal interpretation of a supernatural feat [rebirth] explained by the Buddha in one place, and yet reject all other literal interpretations of supernatural feats explained by the Buddha. If you want irrational, your POV is the most irrational of all. And you have no other basis for accepting rebirth other than the fact that it was taught by the Buddha. You certainly do not accept rebirth because you have recall of your past lives, Astus — or do you?

Astus said:

And for more than a hundred years experts of material sciences were unable to find any sound basis for supernormal powers, and not one person could actually https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/List_of_prizes_for_evidence_of_the_paranormal anything paranormal so far, I cannot see any basis for accepting such claims.

Malcolm wrote:

Did it ever occur to you they were examining the wrong people? So far your arguments amount to the same thing as the proverbial frog in the well.

Astus said:

It is another matter that even if there were such powers they would have nothing to do with the path of liberation.

Malcolm wrote:

It is not true they have nothing to do with the path of liberation — on the bodhisattva path their cultivation is considered indispensable.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, March 28th, 2015 at 2:30 AM

Title: Re: Establishing a Correct Understanding?

Content:

Sherab said:

As far as I am concerned, other than teachings pointing to the inexpressible, all teachings are provisional with a pragmatic objective. So we get words like unconditioned, unmade, unborn etc., being used provisionally because actual descriptors are not available in our language. I would argue that words like beginningless are similarly provisional.

Malcolm wrote:

Seriously, Sherab? That is an extremely lame answer: "It is not about emptiness so therefore I can dispense with it as I see fit, even if it means accepting a first cause in contradiction to every principle indicated by the Buddha's teaching of dependent origination."

Your argument is not only unreasonable, it is not even grounded in the texts. It seems you have forgotten the dictum that the ultimate is to be understood on the basis of the conventional truth, in order that nirvana may be realized.

So, I leave you here to your rampant proliferation and hope that someone, somewhere, some day can penetrate that formidably hard carapace in which your brain is trapped with no means of escape.

Sherab said:

You said "Any dependent existence is an inherent existence. No matter how far back in time one imagines, at the start there will be an unconditioned cause." I took this to mean that there is a beginning to a casual chain (even though it is just an appearance). But you are now saying that there is no beginning to a causal chain. So which is your position?

If a logical fallacy such as infinite regression applies to secular reasoning and does not apply to reasoning involving the Buddha Dharma, how can there be any certainty that the Dharma is correct (other than direct experience)?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, in the case of dependent existence, not in the case of dependent origination. My position has been the same all along, which is why, if you examine, I rejected your two typologies of dependent existence. The term dependent existence itself is the problem. This is why I rejected your assertion that dependent origination was a type of dependent existence.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, March 28th, 2015 at 2:17 AM

Title: Re: siddhis--why aren't they used more?

Content:

Gyurme Kundrol said:

If you show it off you attract people who just want to take it from you. In the same way, showing off Siddhi is likely to attract so called "students" who just want power.

Astus said:

It seems we should all feel sorry for film stars, celebrities, politicians, business people, bankers, and in general the rich and powerful.

Malcolm wrote:

Oh indeed, they have the unique suffering of having to defend their wealth, power and position.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, March 28th, 2015 at 2:15 AM

Title: Re: siddhis--why aren't they used more?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Both you and Astus thus far have demonstrated only that you are basically materialists in your orientation towards these questions.

Astus said:

Isn't it you who claim that powers are physical phenomena, like in Harry Potter and Lord of the Rings? How is it anti-Dharma to ask for physical evidence then? And you call it materialism if I say that such powers are not physical manifestations, therefore cannot be observed in any ordinary, natural or scientific way, but rather spiritual. Is the reference to mental phenomena a materialist view?

Malcolm wrote:

I told you where you can find evidence of these things Astus. If you don't want to make the effort to travel to places where there are siddhas, what can I say?

As to your contention that these things are merely mental experiences, well, that does not save you from my charge that your orientation towards these questions is basically materialist. I am surprised in fact that you still accept literal rebirth, or is rebirth just another "spiritual experience", like recall of past lives, knowing the minds of others, seeing into deva realms and so on and so forth?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, March 28th, 2015 at 1:03 AM

Title: Re: Gorampa & Tsongkhapa

Content:

WeiHan said:

Base on the above, that LTKP do not believe that enlightenment is without any conceptualisation...

Malcolm wrote:

Tsongkhapa never issues a retort to Gorampa since the latter was born ten years after the former passed away.

In that respect, Tsongkhapa must have found this hard to understand — The Buddhāvataṃśka Sūtra states:

The buddhas do not engage in thought;
though they have no concept about teaching,
through blessings they appear to teach.

Or the Śraddhā-balādhānāvātāra-mudrā Sūtra:

Mañjuśrī, likewise, in order for the Tathāgata, Arhat, Samyaksambuddha to fully ripen sentient beings, he produces infinite deeds at the same time in all the infinite worlds in the ten directions, but while the tathāgata indeed is without thoughts and is without concepts, nevertheless, because he possesses such unmixed qualities there is no impediment to displaying such effortless deeds

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, March 28th, 2015 at 12:24 AM

Title: Re: siddhis--why aren't they used more?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Which rational means did you have in mind? Define "rational means."

dharmagoat said:

Looking for evidence in one's own experience, looking for evidence in the wider world, considering its plausibility empirically.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, you really only have two options:

- a) mind is based on matter
- b) mind is not based on matter

If a) is true, there should be evidence to prove that matter produces consciousness.

If b) is true, one will never find evidence to prove a no matter how hard one tries.

Now then, the Buddha clearly divides all of reality, material and mental, into six major divisions called dhātus, earth, water, fire, air, space and consciousness. Outside of these six things there is nothing else. All phenomena are composed of some mixture of these six entities. All insentient phenomena are composed of the five elements; all sentient phenomena also include consciousness as part their make up.

Now, in terms of personal experience, there is only one way you can confirm rebirth for yourself that is through developing the abhijñā of recalling past lives and the abhijñā of being able to know the minds of others. Failing the development of these two skills in meditation, one is left with inferences.

The materialist, yes Carvaka, perspective, is to reject inference as a valid form of knowledge, as well as testimony of reliable witnesses.

There is no further point to this discussion. Either you develop these abilities through meditation or you accept rebirth in the third valid form of knowledge accepted by the Buddha, testimony of reliable witnesses. Both you and Astus thus far have demonstrated only that you are basically materialists in your orientation towards these questions.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, March 28th, 2015 at 12:03 AM

Title: Re: siddhis--why aren't they used more?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Who says Buddhadharma demands belief in phenomena that defy investigation? What kind of investigation are we talking about here?

dharmagoat said:

From the point of view of someone with one foot in Bodhidharma and one foot out, the phenomenon of rebirth is extremely elusive, defying attempts to investigate it by rational means.

Malcolm wrote:

Which rational means did you have in mind? Define "rational means."

One point — you might have to abandon the atomist framework of western science in order to discover other rational means of investigation.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, March 27th, 2015 at 11:57 PM

Title: Re: siddhis--why aren't they used more?

Content:

dharmagoat said:

I thought that was the great mystery, the hard problem within all traditions of human thought.

Malcolm wrote:

It may be a great mystery in the West, it is not such a great mystery at all in Buddhadharma.

dharmagoat said:

I would say that this is why Buddhadharma attracts the interest of so many scientifically minded people. It prescribes a course of investigation that purports to solve the mystery of mind, while at the same time demanding belief in phenomena that defy investigation. There is a catch.

Malcolm wrote:

Who says Buddhadharma demands belief in phenomena that defy investigation? What kind of investigation are we talking about here?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, March 27th, 2015 at 11:46 PM

Title: Re: Gorampa & Tsongkhapa

Content:

Jikan said:

I would like to be convinced that later Tibetan Madhyamika does not do this. Can anyone here help me out?

Malcolm wrote:

Later Tibetan Madhyamaka introduces a whole set of concerns never imagined by Indians. The school that most closely adheres to the traditional Indian tradition in Madhyamaka studies is Sakya following Rongton and Gorampa.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, March 27th, 2015 at 11:24 PM

Title: Re: siddhis--why aren't they used more?

Content:

dharmagoat said:

I resist that degree of certainty. Consciousness cannot be understood, let alone reduced to a physical phenomenon.

Malcolm wrote:

If you think consciousness cannot be understood, why bother even trying to discuss such issues? You are wasting your time and mine.

dharmagoat said:

You understand consciousness?

I thought that was the great mystery, the hard problem within all traditions of human thought.

Malcolm wrote:

It may be a great mystery in the West, it is not such a great mystery at all in Buddhadharma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, March 27th, 2015 at 11:04 PM

Title: Re: siddhis--why aren't they used more?

Content:

dharmagoat said:

I resist that degree of certainty. Consciousness cannot be understood, let alone reduced to a physical phenomenon.

Malcolm wrote:

If you think consciousness cannot be understood, why bother even trying to discuss such issues? You are wasting your time and mine.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, March 27th, 2015 at 11:01 PM

Title: Re: Establishing a Correct Understanding?

Content:

Sherab said:

As far as I am concerned, other than teachings pointing to the inexpressible, all teachings are provisional with a pragmatic objective. So we get words like unconditioned, unmade, unborn etc., being used provisionally because actual descriptors are not available in our language. I would argue that words like beginningless are similarly provisional.

Malcolm wrote:

Seriously, Sherab? That is an extremely lame answer: "It is not about emptiness so therefore I can dispense with it as I see fit, even if it means accepting a first cause in contradiction to every principle indicated by the Buddha's teaching of dependent origination."

Your argument is not only unreasonable, it is not even grounded in the texts. It seems you have forgotten the dictum that the ultimate is to be understood on the basis of the conventional truth, in order that nirvana may be realized.

So, I leave you here to your rampant proliferation and hope that someone, somewhere, some day can penetrate that formidably hard carapace in which your brain is trapped with no means of escape.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, March 27th, 2015 at 10:56 PM

Title: Re: siddhis--why aren't they used more?

Content:

Astus said:

Still, no living weather controllers or others to show yet.

Malcolm wrote:

Sure there are, the TGIE always has a weather controller on staff, I simply don't know his name. If you go to Tibet and look for some ngakpas, I am sure you will find someone who will satisfy your curiosity.

Khetsun Zangpo, though recently deceased, was also employed in this capacity by the Tibetan Govt. in Tibet between 1955 and 1959. Apparently, his abilities are well documented in Tibetan.

But you are just an armchair skeptic, lazily waiting from someone to show you a video you can scoff at.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, March 27th, 2015 at 10:47 PM

Title: Re: siddhis--why aren't they used more?

Content:

Sherlock said:

The main point of Carvaka is not caring about rebirth.

dharmagoat said:

False. Read some stuff.

Malcolm wrote:

It is one of the leading arguments of this school.

They held that all of existence can be reduced to the four elements of air, water, fire and earth. All things come into existence through a mixture of these elements and will perish with their separation. Perhaps the most philosophically sophisticated position of Indian Materialism is the assertion that even human consciousness is a material construct. According to K. K. Mittal, the ontology of the Lokāyata is strictly set forth as follows:

1) Our observation does not bring forth any instance of a disincarnate consciousness. For the manifestation of life and consciousness, body is an inalienable factor.

2) That body is the substratum of consciousness can be seen in the undoubted fact of the arising of sensation and perception only in so far as they are conditioned by the bodily mechanism.

3) The medicinal science by prescribing that certain foods and drinks (such as Brāhmighrta) have the properties conducive to the intellectual powers affords another proof and evidence of the relation of consciousness with body and the material ingredients (of food). (Mittal 47)

Just exactly how is your point of view different than the above?

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, March 27th, 2015 at 10:14 PM

Title: Re: siddhis--why aren't they used more?

Content:

Astus said:

What you cited were stories of two deceased people

Malcolm wrote:

Apparently you don't read well, I cited twice one master who had this capacity, someone I knew personally, someone who I watched die, actually.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, March 27th, 2015 at 10:07 PM

Title: Re: Establishing a Correct Understanding?

Content:

Sherab said:

It does follow if from the Buddha's perspective there are infinite regressions and he cannot explain their existence.

Malcolm wrote:

Quite the contrary, he does:

Where this exists, that exists, with the arising of that, this arose.

Sherab said:

What I am arguing here is that for someone to think that infinite regression is acceptable, then he must be assuming that it is also acceptable to the Buddha. If so, then for such a person, he can no longer argue for an omniscient Buddha.

I don't accept infinite regression and I don't think that for a fully enlightened Buddha there is such a thing as linear infinitely regressive phenomena. So for me, I can still argue for an omniscient Buddha.

Malcolm wrote:

Your argument is senseless and supposes that the Buddha argues for first causes, which he explicitly rejects. This is why we frequently see such statements by the Buddha as "beginningless samsara" and "samsara without a beginning." According to you, when the Buddha makes such statements he is lying or by making such statements, he is proving he is not omniscient.

For example, the Ārya-saddharmasmṛtyupasthāna Sūtra states:

In beginningless samsara,
recall the result of positive deeds is happiness, the result of negative deeds is likewise suffering, arising like causes and results,
but do not engaged in false thinking.

Whatever is made by a past cause, likewise it's result will be obtained.

You directly contradict the teaching of the Buddha by rejecting infinite regression of causes because of your conflation of the unsuitability of infinite regress in logical argumentation with the fact that any series of conditioned causes and effects must be beginningless.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, March 27th, 2015 at 8:58 PM

Title: Re: siddhis--why aren't they used more?

Content:

Sherlock said:

You find it hard to accept rebirth because you find a materialist conception of consciousness more convincing than the Buddhist account, no?

dharmagoat said:

Equally convincing, hence the dilemma.

Malcolm wrote:

It is not equally convincing at all. Since you don't seem to understand the Buddhist objections, might I suggest you read Nagel's take down of physicalism? Your assignment is to read Mind and Cosmos: Why the Materialist Neo-Darwinian Conception of Nature Is Almost Certainly False

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, March 27th, 2015 at 8:53 PM

Title: Re: Establishing a Correct Understanding?

Content:

Sherab said:

What's your take on Ud 8.3 where the Buddha said that because there is the unmade, freedom from the made is possible.

Malcolm wrote:

The fourth seal is "Nirvana is peaceful."

This just means that cessation (absence of causes) is possible. There are only four unconditioned phenomena recognized in Mahāyāna Buddhism — space, the two cessations and emptiness.

Sherab said:

I can accept that space is a phenomenon but space as understood in Buddhism seemed very simplistic compared to space as understood in modern science, assuming it can be understood at all.

However, I find it hard to think of cessation and emptiness as phenomena. If you say the state of cessation or the state of emptiness, then yes, I would think the label phenomena makes sense especially if the adjective unconditioned is to be applied.

Malcolm wrote:

Here, the term dharma [phenomena] means bearer of characteristics. That is all a "phenomenon" is. The term "phenomena" for "dharma" is very inadequate, but it is what we have.

Space and the two cessations, as well as emptiness, all are known through their characteristics.

Space is simply the absence of obstruction, and of the two cessations, the first is nirvana, cessation due to insight. The second cessation is simple absence of a cause for arising.

These three things make up the classic trio of unconditioned dharmas [there is also a kind of conditioned space, which is defined as a cavity. But that is not what is being discussed here].

Quite honestly, you need to familiarize yourself with how these things are defined in Abhidharma if you ever hope to understand them in a Mahāyāna context.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, March 27th, 2015 at 8:49 PM

Title: Re: Establishing a Correct Understanding?

Content:

Sherab said:

Actually, this would mean that the Buddha can never claim omniscience because there is always something beyond his range.

Malcolm wrote:

Your last statement does not follow. Merely because you cannot fathom this kind of acceptable infinite regression does not necessarily entail that it is beyond the comprehension of a Buddha's omniscience. Buddhas are omniscient about the three times, there is no limitation on it.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, March 27th, 2015 at 8:16 PM

Title: Re: siddhis--why aren't they used more?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

My suggestion to you is that you get up off your ass, go to Tibet and meet a weather controller, since they still exist there.

dharmagoat said:

And while you are there, invite along some unbiased and reliable witnesses and record a video so that the rest of us can assess it for ourselves. Seriously.

Malcolm wrote:

I have already seen, I don't need to go. As I pointed out, my teacher was employed in Dharmashala for many years as one of the official weathermakers for the TGIE. He was famous for this, well known in the Tibetan community, personally employed for this function by HHDL before he left Dharmashala in the mid '80's for health reasons. He was regularly hired by local farmers in India to make the weather go their way, and even staved off a drought in southern California in the late '80's where he was hired by a friend of mine who owned some Avocado orchards.

But the real point is that you and Astus have turned western conventional truths into ultimate truths by asserting that what you take to be laws of physics and so on to be immutable.

I doubt even if you saw someone control the weather that you could actually see it, recorded or otherwise, similar to a preta being unable to see the liquid in a glass as water.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, March 27th, 2015 at 8:10 PM

Title: Re: Establishing a Correct Understanding?

Content:

Sherab said:

Sure, but it is possible that while achieving buddhahood without receiving Buddha Dharma is nearly impossible, there is still the possibility that out of a gazillion beings subjected to gazillion causes and conditions, over a gazillion kalpas, there could be that one being where all the causes and conditions are perfectly aligned at one moment in time for that being to achieve buddhahood truly all by itself. This is just simply the law of statistics.

Malcolm wrote:

No, such a person would be a pratyekabuddha since they will not have gathered the accumulations necessary for full buddhahood, and second, in order to become a fully awakened buddha, one must have generated supreme bodhicitta, there is no other way.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, March 27th, 2015 at 8:09 PM

Title: Re: Establishing a Correct Understanding?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

No, if this were the case the path would be suffering because it is impermanent.

What the first seal states is: "whatever is conditioned is impermanent." The second seal states: "whatever is contaminated is suffering."

Just because the citta moments are impermanent does not entail they are contaminated.

Sherab said:

What's your take on Ud 8.3 where the Buddha said that because there is the unmade, freedom from the made is possible.

Malcolm wrote:

The fourth seal is "Nirvana is peaceful."

This just means that cessation (absence of causes) is possible. There are only four unconditioned phenomena recognized in Mahāyāna Buddhism — space, the two cessations and emptiness.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, March 27th, 2015 at 6:56 PM

Title: Re: siddhis--why aren't they used more?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

That is because you are blind to it. I already pointed out to twice a master who definitely exhibited the ability control the weather. At this point, I have to concluded you are just too locked into the "scientific" worldview to be open to any such experiences.

Astus said:

What you cited were stories of two deceased people who have supposedly had the ability to change the weather. Stories like that and even more fantastic we have a lot from all over the world. For instance, canonised Catholic saints have performed various miracles, and there are thousands of them, including many from the 20th century. And while in all practical matters the veracity of such stories are at least irrelevant and not much different from superhero films, if someone claims for whatever reason that powers like levitation and weather changing exist, it is not a strong argument to say that only those with faith can perceive supernormal events. Although saying that actually fits what we briefly discussed with Anders here that experiences of siddhis are a matter of mind set, and that matches what I have said from the beginning that powers are not physical but spiritual. Similarly, if I were to argue that there are pegasi, I would have to provide some evidence for that, and excusing the lack of proof would not make my argument any stronger, even if I called unbelievers materialists.

Malcolm wrote:

My suggestion to you is that you get up off your ass, go to Tibet and meet a weather controller, since they still exist there.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, March 27th, 2015 at 8:47 AM

Title: Re: Establishing a Correct Understanding?

Content:

Sherab said:

Explain how tathagatas can be an infinite regression.

Malcolm wrote:

Every tathāgata must have a predecessor from whom they receive a prediction and in front of whom they generate bodhicitta.

Sherab said:

Presumably, Nagarjuna does not know about how Samantabhadra Buddha became a Buddha.

Malcolm wrote:

Also Samantabhadra was once an ordinary sentient being, believe it or not.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, March 27th, 2015 at 7:51 AM

Title: Re: siddhis--why aren't they used more?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

If you do not give rise to faith in the Buddha's teachings, your bodhicitta will never have a chance to develop. As the Avatamska says, faith in the mother of all good qualities. Faithlessness is negative mental factor. You should examine this.

dharmagoat said:

Thanks Malcolm.

Indeed I do. The odd thing is that I did once have faith, but upon examining that faith I came to the conclusion that much of it was delusion.

Malcolm wrote:

You should understand that all that matters is what is conducive to your path. If accepting rebirth is conducive to your path, accept it, and don't look back, spend time rationalizing, obsessing mind/brain relations and so on.

What should matter most to a bodhisattva is attaining Buddhahood, the rest is just a distraction or an obstacle.

You should discard faithlessness as you would avoid poisonous food.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, March 27th, 2015 at 7:47 AM

Title: Re: Establishing a Correct Understanding?

Content:

Sherab said:

Explain how tathagatas can be an infinite regression.

Malcolm wrote:

Every tathāgata must have a predecessor from whom they receive a prediction and in front of whom they generate bodhicitta.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, March 27th, 2015 at 7:46 AM

Title: Re: Establishing a Correct Understanding?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

When the obscuration of affliction and knowledge are eliminated, falling back into samsara is impossible because the stream of cittas is not longer adventitiously contaminated, so how could it become contaminated again? But the Buddha has assured us that liberation is a permanent state of affairs. Your objection was actually a non-sequitor.

Sherab said:

That which is impermanent is suffering. What is a citta that is not impermanent?

Malcolm wrote:

No, if this were the case the path would be suffering because it is impermanent.

What the first seal states is: "whatever is conditioned is impermanent." The second seal states: "whatever is contaminated is suffering."

Just because the citta moments are impermanent does not entail they are contaminated.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, March 27th, 2015 at 7:42 AM

Title: Re: siddhis--why aren't they used more?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

https://www.theguardian.com/artanddesign/2015/mar/25/iceland-construction-respect-elves-or-else?CMP=fb_gu

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, March 27th, 2015 at 7:36 AM

Title: Re: siddhis--why aren't they used more?

Content:

dharmagoat said:

I didn't quite say that I could "freely express bodhicitta". Instead, I was reserving the possibility that the compassion experienced by people such as myself was genuine bodhicitta. But, as you point out, if the aspiration to endure over many lifetimes for the benefit of beings is missing, then it is not the bodhicitta of the bodhisattva.

Malcolm wrote:

Patrul Rinpoche states: It is usual for tears to flow from one's eyes now and again because of biased good will and compassion.

Even though a fool reifies this as bodhicitta, such things are never supreme bodhicitta.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, March 27th, 2015 at 7:32 AM

Title: Re: siddhis--why aren't they used more?

Content:

dharmagoat said:

I don't think anyone 'wants' to be a bodhisattva, it simply presents itself as a way of life to those that have the inclination to follow it.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes and no. There are two kinds "inclination" as you call it — natural and developed. Everyone has the former, but in order to possess the later, one must formally enter the Mahāyāna path. The way to do that is to receive the bodhisattva vows.

dharmagoat said:

I know I have the inclination, but I feel my way has become blocked. I can't believe what I don't believe.

Malcolm wrote:

This is an obstacle well described in Mahāyāna teachings. As Sakya Pandita states:

Bodhicitta is damaged when one is ignorant of the qualities of the buddhas and bodhisattvas, and makes no effort to seek out such qualities for oneself. The antidote for those is cultivating devotion, enthusiasm and so on as much as possible.

If you do not give rise to faith in the Buddha's teachings, your bodhicitta will never have a chance to develop. As the Avatamska says, faith is the mother of all good qualities. Faithlessness is negative mental factor. You should examine this.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, March 27th, 2015 at 7:27 AM

Title: Re: siddhis--why aren't they used more?

Content:

Anders said:

I must admit, I find this 'my compassion is better than your compassion' distasteful. It may be 'correct', but the spirit of the topic feels somewhat violated at this point.

Malcolm wrote:

But Anders, there are grades of compassion discussed in Mahāyāna Sūtras: compassion towards persons, compassion towards phenomena and limitless compassion [which indeed is the sole province of bodhisattvas on the stages].

Moreover, Dharmakīrti clearly enunciates the principle that compassion itself does not have the power to bring about liberation.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, March 27th, 2015 at 5:21 AM

Title: Re: siddhis--why aren't they used more?

Content:

Astus said:

Buddhism today can spread because it promises help with mental problems like stress and such, not because people are interested in the true nature of reality and similar abstract issues. So, if there were actually supernormal powers that people could learn, it would definitely be a big thing. But it's just not happening.

Malcolm wrote:

That is because you are blind to it. I already pointed out to twice a master who definitely exhibited the ability control the weather. At this point, I have to concluded you are just too locked into the "scientific" worldview to be open to any such experiences.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, March 27th, 2015 at 5:18 AM

Title: Re: siddhis--why aren't they used more?

Content:

Fortyeightvows said:

Can it be clarified what the three humors are? I was always under the impression that illness comes from having harmed others.

Malcolm wrote:

Wind, bile and phlegm, or to give their proper Sanskrit names, vata, pitta and kapha.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, March 27th, 2015 at 5:16 AM

Title: Re: siddhis--why aren't they used more?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

According to the Dharma, illnesses arise from the three humors, which in turn arise from the three afflictions, which in turn arises from the innate grasping to self.

Luke said:

If this is true, then why did the 16th Karmapa die of cancer? Surely he did not suffer from the three afflictions or from innate grasping for a self!

Malcolm wrote:

According to the Abhidanottara Tantra:

...to some he appears to have gone to great awakening, to others, victorious over the enemy Māras, to some, he has the nature of a child,
to others, old and infirm,
to some as ill and dying,
to some he appears as Buddha Vairocana, to others as Tāra, Pandaravaśinī and so on...
He tames migrating beings having displayed such emanations as these.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, March 27th, 2015 at 5:03 AM

Title: Re: Karmapa awarded honorary PhD

Content:

Knotty Veneer said:

With any luck he'll be able to assist in the finding of HHDL XV and pass the torch back as soon as possible.

Malcolm wrote:

Why? HHDL has indicated that he is the last.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 26th, 2015 at 11:47 PM

Title: Re: Buddhism and evolution

Content:

Aemilius said:

The Lotus Sutra exists, and it has been taught, in the context of the buddhist view of existence. Thus in modern times you easily read into it meanings that did not exist there originally.

dharmagoat said:

I think it is fair to say that the misogyny did exist there originally. We frequently encounter passages in the Buddhist canon that are disparaging of women.

Malcolm wrote:

Oddly enough, the purpose of such passages is to appeal to women sick of living in patriarchal cultures. The actual point of such passages is to say to women, "If you aspire to be born here, when you are born here you will no longer suffer any gender discrimination because indeed there won't be any."

In reality, these sūtras appealed very widely to women. It is only a modern judgement that they are misogynistic, arising from not understanding the culture in which such sentiments were being expressed.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 26th, 2015 at 11:20 PM

Title: Re: Establishing a Correct Understanding?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

When the obscuration of affliction and knowledge are eliminated, falling back into samsara is impossible because the stream of cittas is not longer adventitiously contaminated, so how could it become contaminated again? But the Buddha has assured us that liberation is a permanent state of affairs. Your objection was actually a non-sequitor.

The reason there is an infinite chain of cittas is that cittas are relative and conditioned, each one is an effect as well as a cause. In this case the infinite regression is a reasonable inference, just as Nāgārjuna specifically allows that an infinite regression of tathāgatas in the past is also reasonable.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 26th, 2015 at 11:12 PM

Title: Re: siddhis--why aren't they used more?

Content:

dharmagoat said:

Thank you for taking the time to write this, Malcolm. It has helped to make your position clearer to me. While I still feel that it is a somewhat stiff and inflexible view... It is more like an XML scheme. An XML schema that does not work is automatically not an XML schema.

I am willing to accept that it is one built on sound logic.

It is built on knowledge of the Dharma. But thanks.

I acknowledge that what I endorse can not rightly be called "Buddhadharma", or even "Buddhism", but I am hopeful that it can still bring benefit to those that have no choice but to adjust the traditional teachings to fit their own specific needs, without compromising the source from which it came.

Malcolm wrote:

The traditional teachings can't be adjusted. Core concepts like rebirth, dependent origination, karma, samsara, liberation are all essential and interrelated concepts which are vital for the very identity of Buddhadharma as a set body of practice and belief.

People can try to adapt the teachings to their life however they see fit, however, this approach, unfortunately, does not go beyond spiritual materialism.

The teaching best suited for people who cannot accept Buddhadharma is the teaching of the four brahma-viharas, described in the Kalamas sutta among other places. Here, Buddha does not pretend that the four brahma-viharas are a path of liberation, but recommends their cultivation to everyone whether they accept rebirth or not. This however is not Buddhadharma per se because the four brahma-viharas are common to all Indian religions and not the sole province of Buddhadharma. In fact the four brahma-viharas are termed "the vehicle of gods and men" precisely because they only assure higher rebirth in samsara and or happiness and contentment in this lifetime.

But let us not confuse the cultivation of such compassion and love in the four brahma-viharas with bodhicitta. They are not the same thing. While the latter indeed does depend on the former, without the sincere wish to attain full buddhahood for the benefit of all sentient beings and the career that entails, the former will never become the latter. Bodhicitta, the wish to become a buddha for the benefit of all sentient beings, is the defining feature of the bodhisattva path, just as emptiness is the defining doctrine of Mahāyāna.

So are the brahma-viharas and śamatha meditation beneficial for everyone, no matter what they believe? Yes, very much so. Should this be called "Buddhism"? No, because these two things are common to all Indian religions.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 26th, 2015 at 10:59 PM

Title: Re: siddhis--why aren't they used more?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

by rejecting rebirth, you automatically destroy any bodhisattva vow you might have made.

kirtu said:

To me, this is too much. Some people will sincerely take the Bodhisattva Vows and sincerely practice but may have issues with so-called transcendental issues. That's okay IMO because if they are practicing sincerely they will develop good roots and purify their minds over time and over lifetimes. We should probably refrain from being dogmatic. Some people will be attracted to practice via so-called "secular" Buddhism.

Kirt

Malcolm wrote:

Someone has to hold the line and insist that things be called by their proper names. It might as well be me since what I observe these days is intense wishywashiness in the name of "compassion", when it is really just marketing to increase membership in Dharma centers and increased book sales. Cynical? Yes. True? Yes.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 26th, 2015 at 8:55 PM

Title: Re: siddhis--why aren't they used more?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Who ever said that lifting tons of heavy rocks was possible for someone who had gained control over the four elements? Attaining control over the four elements does not mean omnipotence. You are venturing into lala land here. Why don't you study the matter and actually find out what these things actually mean.

On the other hand, when the Buddha levitated to the height of fourteen palm trees to prove a point, this means he had gained control over the four elements. And in fact he had forbid monks who had mastered siddhis to demonstrate them.

Astus said:

A few tons of rocks are nothing compared to the powers displayed openly for everyone in the Vimalakirti Sutra and others. Influencing the weather is significantly more difficult then lifting weight.

Vsm. quotes the Patisambhidamagga (p 378):

“What is success through the sciences? Masters of the sciences, having pronounced their scientific spells, travel through the air, and they show an elephant in space, in the sky ... and they show a manifold military array”

I.e. it is no problem to have even an army in the air.

Malcolm wrote:

The latter are examples of conjured illusions, not actual armies and elephants.

Astus said:

In the Samannaphala Sutta (DN 2 / D i 77) the stock passage includes: "he even touches and strokes with his hand the sun and moon, mighty and powerful as they are".

Although I think it is noteworthy that the process begins by the creation of the mind-made body that performs the supernormal powers.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, the manomayakāya is a mental body with intact and completely sense organs that can move here and there and even has autonomy. There is an entire sūtra detailing it in the Majjhima Nikāya.

But that is merely one kind of power, and the iddhi-pattis are not confined to the manomayakāya

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 26th, 2015 at 8:51 PM

Title: Re: siddhis--why aren't they used more?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

You are not a Mahāyānist, by rejecting rebirth, you automatically destroy any bodhisattva vow you might have made. You can't imagine that you will ever go through the rounds of rebirth necessary to accumulate the merit and wisdom necessary to become a Buddha with the three kāyas because you don't accept rebirth, you don't accept the bodhisattva path, and so on. It is joke for you to pretend you are Mahāyānist, seriously.

dharmagoat said:

What if someone were to act exactly as a Mahāyānist does, fulfil the bodhisattva vow inasmuch as it applies to the present lifetime, and keep quiet that they were unable to honestly believe in literal rebirth?

Malcolm wrote:

The bodhisattva vows has two parts, aspirational and engaged.

The aspirational part means generating the motivation to become a buddha for the benefit of all sentient beings. That requires generating an enormous store of merit and wisdom and that cannot be achieved in a single lifetime by virtue of the methods of common Mahāyāna.

A person who does not believe in rebirth is someone who has an obscuration such that they cannot even take refuge in the Dharma, let alone develop the compassion needed to generate the bodhicitta to undertake the long series of rebirths in samsara needed to gather the two accumulations in order to become a buddha.

Whatever kindness, love and compassion you have is still kindness, love and compassion but as it is not kindness, love and compassion attended with bodhicitta, it does not have the force to counter afflictions and so on. It is mundane. Still good, but not a path Dharma.

Since you do not believe in the goal and path of a bodhisattva how could you aspire to practice it? Perhaps you have confused the popular concept of a compassionate person as being a "bodhisattva" with the actual bodhisattva described in Hīnayāna and Mahāyāna.

The engaged part means practicing the six perfections for three eons or more until you have progressed through the paths and stages and entered Buddhahood. Apart from these two, there is no other bodhisattva practice. Vajrayāna may, if one holds the vows perfectly, shorten this time frame to one or several lifetimes at most, but even here, bodhicitta is still tied with the idea of undertaking rebirths for the benefit of sentient beings in order to attain buddhahood.

Even in the Hīnayāna teachings, rebirth is not an optional belief since the four sorts of āryas described in Hīnayāna texts are defined with respect to how many lifetimes it will take such and such a person to achieve arhats ship from the time they enter the stream, and moreover, where they take rebirth before hand. The Buddha's Dharma is inextricably tied up with rebirth as a key and vital concept. Without rebirth, the path has no meaning, there is no liberation to speak of, there is no reason to eradicate the afflictions that cause rebirth and so on. The negative consequences of rejecting rebirth and yet still claiming to practice Buddhadharma are so numerous that I can only barely begin to write them down here.

You see, this is why I make a distinction between "Buddhisms" and Buddhadharma. You can practice your secular "Buddhism" all you like, but it will never be Buddhadharma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 26th, 2015 at 8:23 PM

Title: Re: siddhis--why aren't they used more?

Content:

Simon E. said:

So basically, as Malcolm has suggested your motivation is to substitute a different understanding from that of the Mahayana?

dharmagoat said:

I am asking my fellow Mahayanists to find it in their hearts to make room for the more rational among us.

Malcolm wrote:

You are not a Mahāyānist, much less a follower of the Buddhadharma — by rejecting rebirth, you automatically destroy any bodhisattva vow you might have made. You can't imagine that you will ever go through the rounds of rebirth necessary to accumulate the merit and wisdom necessary to become a Buddha with the three kāyas because you don't accept rebirth, you don't accept the bodhisattva path, and so on. It is joke for you to pretend you are Mahāyānist, seriously.

You are, sadly enough, deluding yourself.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 26th, 2015 at 8:20 PM

Title: Re: siddhis--why aren't they used more?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

No, secular "Buddhism" is not a valid interpretation of what the Buddha taught, aka Buddhadharma...

dharmagoat said:

Your opinion is one of many. Should we conduct a poll?

Malcolm wrote:

Be my guest.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 26th, 2015 at 8:20 PM

Title: Re: siddhis--why aren't they used more?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

As I already pointed out, very few people develop the level of concentration needed to develop the abhijñās, for example. But some people do.

Astus said:

Why are those few not known? The living ones. If they can control the four elements then they should come forward. It would definitely be a greater sensation than the discovery of radio waves. And it could definitely upset the current physicalist worldview. But again, there must be some excuses for them to stay hidden, like the Masters of the Ancient Wisdom in the Himalayas.

But they don't stay hidden. They are right there in plain sight for anyone who wants to go see them. My guru worked as the weather controller in Dharmasala for many years, in the open, and no secret was made of the fact. He was not hiding out.

Actually, it would take only one proper master of elements to demonstrate that there are other ways to raise tons of rocks than heavy machinery. Why don't we see any?

Malcolm wrote:

Who ever said that lifting tons of heavy rocks was possible for someone who had gained control over the four elements? Attaining control over the four elements does not mean omnipotence. You are venturing into lala land here. Why don't you study the matter and actually find out what these things actually mean.

On the other hand, when the Buddha levitated to the height of fourteen palm trees to prove a point, this means he had gained control over the four elements. And in fact he had forbid monks who had mastered siddhis to demonstrate them.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 26th, 2015 at 8:12 PM

Title: Re: siddhis--why aren't they used more?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

If you do not accept rebirth, if you do not accept karma, then you may be practicing some species of secular "Buddhism," but you are not practicing Buddhadharma.

dharmagoat said:

I disagree, and will continue to campaign that what you describe as "secular Buddhism" is one of many valid interpretations of what the Buddha taught.

(Remembering too, that the issue is with literal rebirth, not rebirth per se. Karma is indisputable, but is open to interpretation.)

Malcolm wrote:

No, secular "Buddhism" is not a valid interpretation of what the Buddha taught, aka Buddhadharma. It actually corresponds with what the Buddha specifically taught as wrong view, ucchedavada, i.e. advocacy of annihilation, denial of future lives and rejection of karma.

There is no form of meaningful rebirth outside of the serial appropriation of the addictive aggregates.

Further, and I will remind you, so called secular "Buddhism" is definitely not compatible with Mahāyāna view, since the very denial rebirth (there is only one kind, literal) renders the bodhisattva vow meaningless. Since this is a Mahāyāna forum, where the bodhisattva vow is indispensable, I would suggest that your proselytizing is at best inappropriate and at worst a violation of TOS.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 26th, 2015 at 7:52 PM

Title: Re: Establishing a Correct Understanding?

Content:

Sherab said:

You are making a huge assumption in arguing that by looking back at where a thing come from, you will never come to a point beyond which you cannot find a cause. Theists will disagree with you and say that all causal chains when traced back will lead to the Creator God. Your assumption that there is no inherent cause on any causal chains is just as huge as the assumption of theist that there is an inherent cause, a first cause, at the beginning of all causal chains.

Whereas if you take the straightforward meaning of Nagarjuna's statement that is without an inherent existence there can be no dependent existence, it then follows that since inherent existence is unreasonable, so is dependent existence. This is so much simpler and tighter. No need for mental gymnastics as well.

Malcolm wrote:

It is not an assumption, it is simple observation that all causes that we can observe are themselves effects.

"[W]ithout an inherent existence there can be no dependent existence, it then follows that since inherent existence is unreasonable, so is dependent existence."

Correct. Therefore, as I pointed out before, there is no need to posit then that dependent origination is some kind of existence. This idea that you have advanced therefore is unnecessary, and you yourself have explained it to your own satisfaction in words that differ substantially in no way from mine, i.e., "...without an inherent existence there can be no dependent existence, it then follows that since inherent existence is unreasonable, so is dependent existence."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 26th, 2015 at 7:47 PM

Title: Re: siddhis--why aren't they used more?

Content:

dharmagoat said:

Online I work toward my cause in the most generous, harmless, compassionate, kind, peaceful and joyous way that I am able. I participate in the wider world in the same way. I practice Buddhism as much as any of you.

Malcolm wrote:

If you do not accept rebirth, if you do not accept karma, then you may be practicing some species of secular "Buddhism," but you are not practicing Buddhadharma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 26th, 2015 at 7:45 PM

Title: Re: siddhis--why aren't they used more?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Ironically, you are actually supporting a positivist theory of reality, which holds that physical laws are inherently real and impose inherent limitations which cannot be overcome. This is why I claim you have succumbed to physicalism.

Astus said:

How do you account for the lack of people who can perform supernormal powers, even though there are many who study and practice such methods? In fact, all those people who just want meditation out of Buddhism should have some experiences with siddhis, not to mention a perhaps even larger number of people who directly aim for higher powers. On what reasons can one accept the existence of magic as a physical force?

Malcolm wrote:

Magic is your word, I don't use it.

As I already pointed out, very few people develop the level of concentration needed to develop the abhijñāas, for example. But some people do.

And as far as the control over the four elements go, that is not "magic", that is learning how to control the four elements. When one learns how to control them within one's body, one can gain control over them externally. I have met people who can, for example, control the weather, and were employed in that position by the Tibetan Gvt. for many years, i.e., my guru Ngagpa Yeshe Dorje:

He was able to control the weather quite well really, which is why he kept his job for so many years.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 26th, 2015 at 7:37 PM

Title: Re: siddhis--why aren't they used more?

Content:

Simon E. said:

Can I put a direct question to you Dharmagoat..you are under no obligation to answer of course, and if the mods see it as inappropriate then they will of course take action.

What is your motive vis-a-vis this discussion forum.. Is it to explore Buddhadharma, or is it to dissuade others from an interest in it ? To promote something else in fact ?

Malcolm wrote:

At the end of the day, he is just another materialist trying to adapt Buddhist meditation to a materialist world view.

dharmagoat said:

... So that rational Westerners may be better able to digest the essential teachings of the Buddha and thereby derive greater benefit for themselves and for the world as a whole.

Malcolm wrote:

They won't understand the essential teachings of Buddha since they won't accept rebirth.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 26th, 2015 at 6:49 AM

Title: Re: Establishing a Correct Understanding?

Content:

Sherab said:

From my discussion with Malcolm and Bakmoon, it would appear that there are two species of dependent existences, one based on Nagarjuna's verse mentioned by Malcolm where dependent existence need to start of with inherent existence (call this species 1) and one were most forumers are comfortable with, namely an infinitely regressive dependent existence (call this species 2).

Bakmoon said:

This second species isn't dependent existence though. Dependent existence (parabhāva) refers exclusively to this first sense. That's just how this term has been used historically.

Sherab said:

In my earlier post, I mentioned that "dependent origination is used to negate existence in the four extremes. But dependent origination as an existence is not abandoned. In other words, reliance on freedom from the four extremes does not abandon the view of existence based on the view of dependent origination. "

Bakmoon said:

Within the Gelug understanding it's true that dependent origination can be said to merely exist (I'm not going to debate the validity or non-validity of mere existence) but that's a red herring here because dependent existence isn't the same thing as dependent origination. Dependent existence doesn't refer to conventional causation, but to an existence that depends on an intrinsic existence.

Malcolm wrote:

"Mere existence" is an imputation of existence upon an appearance, but it not really an "existence" per se since it is merely an imputation and is understand that such a mere existence does not exist from its own side (i.e. independently or inherently).

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 26th, 2015 at 2:07 AM

Title: Re: siddhis--why aren't they used more?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

But there is such a explanation, you merely seem immune to understanding it.

Astus said:

And that explanation is what?

Malcolm wrote:

Research kashina meditation.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 26th, 2015 at 1:38 AM

Title: Re: siddhis--why aren't they used more?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Nonsense Astus, your post shows no such things, quite the opposite, it merely shows that you do not take such things literally, and this is normal for those who subscribe to physicalist view of reality. But then, we already know that Zen people are throwing away rebirth, tossing out karma, reducing the Dharma to mindfulness techniques to make us better programmers and managers. In fact, the departure of many Zen and Vipassana teachers from Buddhadharma has hastened rise of so called secular "Buddhism".

Astus said:

I don't subscribe to physicalism, never did in my life. I simply have a logical and an evidential problem with powers.

Malcolm wrote:

Hence your innate adherence to the physicalist world view.

Astus said:

The logical is that even in Buddhism there is no explanation for how the human body could multiply or levitate,

Malcolm wrote:

But there is such a explanation, you merely seem immune to understanding it.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 26th, 2015 at 12:56 AM

Title: Re: siddhis--why aren't they used more?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, people are not properly cultivating dhyāna. But we have modern examples of people, like Dipa ma, who have. There are also a lack of experienced teachers, like Dipa ma's teacher.

And I still think it is a pity that you are going down the secular "buddhist" road.

Astus said:

There is no shortage of accounts of special powers both within and outside Buddhism. But I have not yet heard of any living teacher of some credibility to claim it for him/herself (e.g. Ajahn Sumedho, Hsing Yun, Chokyi Nyima), although they are often accepted as enlightened masters. Scientists cooperate with several meditation teachers to investigate its effects, but there is no record of siddhis.

I don't see how secular it is that you see. I have had this view of magic for a while now (see this from 2012: <http://eubuddhist.blogspot.in/2012/09/buddhist-magic.html>). And as I quote there, it is not without precedent that superpowers are not taken literally in Buddhism.

Malcolm wrote:

Nonsense Astus, your post shows no such things, quite the opposite, it merely shows that you do not take such things literally, and this is normal for those who subscribe to physicalist view of reality. But then, we already know that Zen people are throwing away rebirth, tossing out karma, reducing the Dharma to mindfulness techniques to make us better programmers and managers. In fact, the departure of many Zen and Vipassana teachers from Buddhadharma has hastened rise of so called secular "Buddhism".

Pity you never met Ngagpa Yeshe Dorje.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 26th, 2015 at 12:06 AM

Title: Re: siddhis--why aren't they used more?

Content:

Astus said:

Taking the position that anyone who practises the right type of meditation can manipulate the physical world in a supernatural way raises numerous questions, beginning with the apparent lack of anyone who can actually perform them. Common excuses, like that the Buddha has forbidden it, or that it is a distraction for practitioners, seems to have no relevance in thousands of well known Buddhist stories where we can read about the Buddha, his disciples and later yogis do all sorts of wonderful things. But if you have some explanation for that, please share it.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, people are not properly cultivating dhyāna. But we have modern examples of people, like Dipa ma, who have. There are also a lack of experienced teachers, like Dipa ma's teacher.

And I still think it is a pity that you are going down the secular "buddhist" road.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 25th, 2015 at 11:39 PM

Title: Re: Establishing a Correct Understanding?

Content:

Sherab said:

So if you follow the meaning of existence (inherent and dependent (species 1)) per Nagarjuna, an infinite regression of dependent existences (species 2) is not abandoned. This could explain why like Garfield reading Nagarjuna, concluded that dependent existences that are part of infinitely regressive causal chains are all there is.

Malcolm wrote:

Only if you grotesquely misread Nāgārjuna.

Sherab said:

But you have not explained (to my satisfaction anyway) why dependent existence in this quote of Nagarjuna "If there is no inherent existence, where will there be dependent existence" includes dependent existence that is infinitely regressive. You mentioned about shunting of inherent existence. But I argued (with Bakmoon) that shunting inherent existence to infinity effectively means that there is no inherent existence along any part of the causal chain. And that throws a wrench in Nagarjuna's argument that dependent existence needs inherent existence.

Malcolm wrote:

Any dependent existence is an inherent existence. No matter how far back in time one imagines, at the start there will be an unconditioned cause. Therefore, dependent existence is altogether impossible. Don't blame me, BTW, for your inability to understand what Nāgārjuna is saying.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 25th, 2015 at 10:30 PM

Title: Re: Establishing a Correct Understanding?

Content:

Sherab said:

Perhaps, in the milieu that Nagarjuna was in, people thought that all existing things came from God, an inherent existing thing. So Nagarjuna argued that there is no inherent existing thing nor any thing that dependently originated from the inherent existing God.

Malcolm wrote:

No, in the milieu that Nāgārjuna was in, to which he responding, was a specific milieu in which people thought that all things exist (Sarva asti) and were thus called Sarvastivādins. They asserted that things existed by virtue of intrinsic characteristics, and that further all things existed in the three times simultaneously.

Sherab said:

So if you follow the meaning of existence (inherent and dependent (species 1)) per Nagarjuna, an infinite regression of dependent existences (species 2) is not abandoned. This could explain why like Garfield reading Nagarjuna, concluded that dependent existences that are part of infinitely regressive causal chains are all there is.

Malcolm wrote:

Only if you grotesquely misread Nāgārjuna.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 25th, 2015 at 9:54 PM

Title: Re: siddhis--why aren't they used more?

Content:

Luke said:

If siddhis are real, as many practitioners of Tibetan Buddhism claim, then why aren't lamas visiting hospitals daily and blasting out the miracles and healing tons of people all the time?

If siddhis are real, then I say, "Great! Then find the local cancer ward and get to work!"

Malcolm wrote:

You cannot remove the karma of other sentient beings.

According to the Dharma, illnesses arise from the three humors, which in turn arise from the three afflictions, which in turn arises from the innate grasping to self.

The greatest miracle of all is when someone realizes selflessness because of the Dharma. Who needs demonstration of a siddhi greater than this? The others are just tricks.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 25th, 2015 at 9:10 PM

Title: Re: Establishing a Correct Understanding?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Dependent origination is not dependent existence.

My reply remains the same.

Sherab said:

In the most simple of cases, a dependent existence can lie in a causal chain that starts off with a thing possessing inherent existence (species 1) or it could sit on a causal chain that is infinite regressive (species 2).

Malcolm wrote:

I am objecting to term dependent existence. There is no such thing. Nāgārjuna states

Existence cannot arise from existence, existence cannot arise from nonexistence,

nonexistence cannot arise from existence,

nonexistence cannot arise from nonexistence

where then can there be arising?

Therefore, arising, existing, and so on are all merely conventions.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 25th, 2015 at 8:48 PM

Title: Re: Establishing a Correct Understanding?

Content:

Sherab said:

In my earlier post, I mentioned that " dependent origination is used to negate existence in the four extremes. But dependent origination as an existence is not abandoned. In other words, reliance on freedom from the four extremes does not abandon the view of existence based on the view of dependent origination. "

Malcolm wrote:

See my previous post. Reply unchanged.

Sherab said:

I am surprised. You normally read posts quite carefully.

Malcolm wrote:

You said in your first post:

Sherab said:

From my discussion with Malcolm and Bakmoon, it would appear that there are two species of dependent existences, one based on Nagarjuna's verse mentioned by Malcolm where dependent existence need to start of with inherent existence (call this species 1) and one were most forumers are comfortable with, namely an infinitely regressive dependent existence (call this species 2).

Malcolm wrote:

You said in your second post:

From my discussion with Malcolm and Bakmoon, it would appear that there are two species of dependent existences, one based on Nagarjuna's verse mentioned by Malcolm where dependent existence need to start of with inherent existence (call this species 1) and one were most forumers are comfortable with, namely an infinitely regressive dependent existence (call this species 2).

I replied:

Dependent origination is not dependent existence.

My reply remains the same.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 25th, 2015 at 8:13 PM

Title: Re: Establishing a Correct Understanding?

Content:

Sherab said:

In my earlier post, I mentioned that " dependent origination is used to negate existence in the four extremes. But dependent origination as an existence is not abandoned. In other words, reliance on freedom from the four extremes does not abandon the view of existence based on the view of dependent origination. "

Malcolm wrote:

See my previous post. Reply unchanged.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 25th, 2015 at 8:06 PM

Title: Re: Tibetan language--indispensible in Tantra?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Sanskrit mantras are preserved with perfect accuracy in Tibetan texts. Whether they are pronounced well by Tibetans is another matter altogether.

Shamati said:

Ok. But what about the scriptures? Are the different canons preserved in their original languages? I thought there are many scriptures that are only preserved because of Tibet

Malcolm wrote:

The sūtras and tantras are preserved in Tibetan.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 25th, 2015 at 7:57 PM

Title: Re: Establishing a Correct Understanding?

Content:

Sherab said:

In my earlier post, I mentioned that dependent origination is used to negate existence in the four extremes. But dependent origination as an existence is not abandoned.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, it is. Dependent origination is not dependent existence.

Sherab said:

In other words, reliance on freedom from the four extremes does not abandon the view of existence based on the view of dependent origination.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, it does. Why?

Whatever arises in dependence does not cease, does not arise, does not go, does not come, is not annihilated and is not permanent, is not different and is not identical. In these eight negations no existence, apart from falsely imputed existence, is possible.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 24th, 2015 at 3:56 AM

Title: Re: Why is Tulku system only found in Tibetan Buddhism?

Content:

conebeckham said:

I remember that episode--"As the sands through the hourglass, so are the lives of our rebirths." Remember when Nicole confronted Serena, after the baby was born? "He's NOT the Yangsi! He's NOT!! It's my son!!! MINE!!!"

Good times.

Good times.

May any merit generated by on-line discussion

Be dedicated to the Ultimate Benefit of All Sentient Beings.

Malcolm wrote:

I have a question about this, do you think dzogchungpa passes the Turing test? If not, can one dedicate the merit of a bot?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 24th, 2015 at 3:41 AM

Title: Re: Why is Tulku system only found in Tibetan Buddhism?

Content:

conebeckham said:

Malcolm, thanks for that. Are you aware of any sources that show how it "spread" to the other schools/lineages?

Malcolm wrote:

Like most fads spread, they saw it on TV.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 24th, 2015 at 2:49 AM

Title: Re: Why is Tulku system only found in Tibetan Buddhism?

Content:

PadmeSamadhi said:

One more information is: Karmapa started this.

conebeckham said:

Well, it's true that Karma Pakshi was the first generally-recognized Yangsi, but there are accounts from the prior century of Tibetan Lamas claiming to be the rebirths of prior Tibetan masters, in the Kadam lineage. There's at least one female incarnation line noted, though short-lived, in the 12th century, as well!

Further, the "Tulku System" as it exists now, with the Labrangs, inheritance, etc., was a later development, and didn't start with the second Karmapa. I don't know when it actually developed, but it, like all things "tulku-system-related," must have been retrospective. I'm not sure there's clear documentation regarding the development of the institution.

Malcolm wrote:

No, it began with the third Karmapa in the 14th century and really began taking off in the 15th, and by the 16th was in full swing.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 24th, 2015 at 2:32 AM

Title: Re: Establishing a Correct Understanding?

Content:

Bakmoon said:

If one just cuts out the middle step and tries to negate all conceptuality within the mind then the result is a totally blank mind that doesn't have any insight at all.

srivijaya said:

I guess that comes down to the kind of meditation one practices. With Shamata & Vipassana this should not occur. I also don't think it's wise to set out in any way to forcefully negate conceptuality. Like you say, a blank mind is no help at all. We get plenty of that in deep sleep.

Malcolm wrote:

One need not negate conceptuality, one needs to merely remove its foundation.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 24th, 2015 at 2:31 AM

Title: Re: Establishing a Correct Understanding?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

We do not see independent origination because that which originates non-dependently is not empty, it exists inherently.

srivijaya said:

Theoretically, but in practice this is exactly what beings see and act upon.

Malcolm wrote:

The point is that we do not see anything that arises from itself, other or without a cause. Everything that we see arise we see arising from a cause. All instances of arising that we observe are instances of causal arising.

srivijaya said:

So I guess I completely agree when you say "The view of emptiness is not a view".

Malcolm wrote:

When we investigate causal arising, we are then led to inquire about inherent existence and so on. But no one sees a flower and thinks, "That flower is real because it exists inherently", they think only, "That flower exists, therefore it is real" and do not take it any further.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 23rd, 2015 at 11:31 PM

Title: Re: Mahāyāna sūtras
Content:
coyote said:
I have a few related questions:

Does this apply to Vajrayana also?

Malcolm wrote:
Vajrapani compiled the tantras.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Monday, March 23rd, 2015 at 10:24 PM
Title: Re: Mahāyāna sūtras
Content:
Malcolm wrote:
The traditional account is that they were compiled by Mañjuśrī and Avalokiteśvara on a mountain in south India in a bodhisattvas council.

PorkChop said:
Malcolm, thanks for providing that (again) and fixing my earlier misunderstanding (Avalokiteśvara not Maitreya). I was curious, do you know where I could read more about this account?

Malcolm wrote:
Buton's History of Dharma has a summary of it. It is not extensive, BTW, in general.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Monday, March 23rd, 2015 at 10:24 PM
Title: Re: Where to start?
Content:
Ihrjordan said:
So say I had interest in Dzogchen Buddhism and already have a good knowledge of Theravada, how would any of you advise me to start my journey into practicing and studying Dzogchen? Books I should read, Temples in Massachusetts, practices I can do etc etc Thanks :)

Malcolm wrote:
You should contact Dzogchen Community in Conway, Massachusetts.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Monday, March 23rd, 2015 at 9:39 PM
Title: Re: Mahāyāna sūtras
Content:

coyote said:
Dear all,

I would like to know about the traditional accounts of the origin of Mahāyāna sūtras.

Malcolm wrote:

The traditional account is that they were compiled by Mañjuśrī and Avalokiteśvara on a mountain in south India in a bodhisattvas council.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 23rd, 2015 at 9:19 PM

Title: Re: Establishing a Correct Understanding?

Content:

srivijaya said:

The "why" element still stands though - ie. why cultivate views, which are in any case subsequently abandoned.

Malcolm wrote:

The view of emptiness is not a view since there is nothing in and no emptiness to see. What one does to "see" emptiness is eliminate all views, one by one in turn. There are basically only two views: 1) "it is" and 2) "it is not." But for formal completeness 3) "it is and it is not" and the reverse 4) "it neither is nor is not" are added because some people would argue the third position is the phase of coming into being. No one argues for the fourth position in truth.

This is why the Śāntideva verse I provided for you earlier is crucial:

When neither an entity nor a non-entity remain before the mind...

srivijaya said:

I suppose it's fair to say that everyone has views of one kind or another, so why not deconstruct a few of the more erroneous ones in the mean time.

Malcolm wrote:

All views are variations of only two views, "it is" and "it is not".

srivijaya said:

My concern would be that in imparting an ontological framework,

Malcolm wrote:

There is no ontological framework. Merely the deconstruction of views. We perceive dependent origination. We are able to perceive dependent origination because that which originates dependently is empty. We do not see independent origination because that which originates non-dependently is not empty, it exists inherently. But we see no examples at all of any thing which which inherently exists, we may therefore conclude that everything we see is empty, like a dream, illusion, mirage and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 23rd, 2015 at 9:09 PM

Title: Re: Is this Tibetan?

Content:

Knotty Veneer said:

The image looks like a crude depiction of Padmasambhava/Guru Rinpoche. The text is tibetanized Sanskrit and translates as Vajra Guru.

Whether it is from Tibet or another Himalayan region I wouldn't be able to tell.

Malcolm wrote:

It is an initiation card.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 23rd, 2015 at 9:08 PM

Title: Re: Establishing a Correct Understanding?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

He is saying that a dependent existence just offloads inherent existence onto another thing.

Sherab said:

How did the offload occur?

Malcolm wrote:

Dependent existence merely shunts inherent existence onto the cause.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 23rd, 2015 at 10:07 AM

Title: Re: Establishing a Correct Understanding?

Content:

Sherab said:

I take it that Nagarjuna was saying that the starting point of a chain of dependent existences must come from something inherently existing. Since inherently existing thing is non-functional, it could not possibly start a chain of dependent existences and therefore there can be no dependent existences if inherent existence is an impossibility.

The consequence of accepting this argument is that acceptance of infinite regression of a causal chain is no longer tenable. Even the idea of beginninglessness of something, say the universe, is no longer tenable. I have no problem with this as I never accepted infinite regression as an explanation. I guess those on this forum who accepted the view of infinite causal chain or something beginningless will have to contend with Nagarjuna's argument.

Bakmoon said:

An infinite regress of causes is only a problem if you assume that all causation must derive from a cause that possesses its own innate power to produce an effect. If one particular effect can follow from one particular cause without being produced by an intrinsic power, then in principle there should be no problem with an infinite chain of them.

Malcolm wrote:

Provided these causes and conditions are merely conventions...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 23rd, 2015 at 9:19 AM

Title: Re: I do not accept reality

Content:

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 23rd, 2015 at 6:34 AM

Title: Re: Establishing a Correct Understanding?

Content:

Sherab said:

What is your definition of existence?

Malcolm wrote:

At the outset of this chapter, chapter 15, Nāgārjuna states:

It is not reasonable for inherent existence [svabhāva] to arise from causes and conditions;

an inherent existence that arises from causes and conditions would have been produced,

How can this be correct?

Inherent existences are unfabricated

and do not depend on others.

If there is no inherent existence,

where will there be dependent existence [parabhāva]?

Having already defined dependent existence (parabhāva) as a species of inherent existence (svabhāva), Nāgārjuna states:

Where is there an existence not included in inherent existence or dependent existence?

If there were inherent existence or dependent existence, existence would be established.

An existence that is not an inherent existence is therefore impossible. So, my definition of existence is that "existence" as such is a mere convention and nothing further. Much like a self.

Sherab said:
Thanks for the clarification.

I take it that Nagarjuna was saying that the starting point of a chain of dependent existences must come from something inherently existing. Since inherently existing thing is non-functional, it could not possibly start a chain of dependent existences and therefore there can be no dependent existences if inherent existence is an impossibility.

The consequence of accepting this argument is that acceptance of infinite regression of a causal chain is no longer tenable. Even the idea of beginninglessness of something, say the universe, is no longer tenable. I have no problem with this as I never accepted infinite regression as an explanation. I guess those on this forum who accepted the view of infinite causal chain or something beginningless will have to contend with Nagarjuna's argument.

Malcolm wrote:
He is saying that a dependent existence just offloads inherent existence onto another thing.

However, this does not refute the infinite regression of dependent origination in any way.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Monday, March 23rd, 2015 at 5:57 AM
Title: Re: Buddhism loses all purpose if you don't believe in reinc
Content:
Malcolm wrote:
The ālaya does not store memories, it only stores traces (vāsanā) or bijas.

Sherab said:
I am curious. Where are memories of past lives stored so that certain beings (such as enlightened beings or beings who displayed the ability to recollect past lives) could 'retrieve' them?

Punya said:
I had a chance to ask a respected Nyingma khenpo yesterday about memory. He said memory is relative and while memories from the defiled mind do not fit into the alaya, memories from the neutral mind do. This seems to be consistent with what Traleg Rinpoche said.

He also said memories (from the neutral mind) do carry on into the next life and that this was as habitual imprints left on the alaya.

Malcolm wrote:
I would need a source from him to accept this. What is his source?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 23rd, 2015 at 4:44 AM

Title: Re: Establishing a Correct Understanding?

Content:

srivijaya said:

One may completely accept the doctrine of the two truths - the emptiness of inherent existence etc. and nevertheless be subjected to the forces of desire and aversion with little means to stem an habitual reaction to them. I think this is mainly because the underlying ignorance is not the intellectual ignorance of not knowing a doctrine, rather something more fundamental.

Malcolm wrote:

The underlying ignorance is a knowledge obscuration, not just an afflictive lack of knowledge.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 23rd, 2015 at 2:07 AM

Title: Re: Consciousness, name and form

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

Interesting. Is that a Dzogchen thing or just standard Buddhism or what?

Malcolm wrote:

The notion that the ālayavijñāna is accompanied by a vāyu is even found in Buddhist Ayurveda. Candarānanda's commentary on the Aṣṭāṅgahridayasamhita states:

First, the moment the male's semen and the female's blood, free from the defects of vata, and so on, a consciousness possessing karma and afflictions accompanied by the five very subtle elements of space and so on (which are objects of yoga beyond the range of sense organs) gather and fuse in the uterus, it is called fertilization in the uterus.

What I was specifically referring to was a doctrine which comes from the Vajramāla Tantra, which is a commentary tantra on the Guhyasamāja. And a major source for the functioning of the five or ten vāyus in Vajrayāna completion stage practice.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 23rd, 2015 at 1:52 AM

Title: Re: Deity practice realization?

Content:

PadmeSamadhi said:

I'm not sure if I am asking this correctly, but here it goes:

-When a person achieves the realization of a deity practice?

If someone give me an empowerment, that I practice that for many years and how do I know I have when that realization happened?

I read you could even have one or more siddhis related to that deity, but siddhis may come earlier.

What do we have to realize anyways? What we can not fail so this works?

Thanks in advance.

Malcolm wrote:

You need to ask this question of a qualified guru in the lineage in which you practice.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 23rd, 2015 at 1:21 AM

Title: Re: what is the best realm from which to help beings?

Content:

Simon E. said:

We are not bodies as containers for souls. We are a whole. We arise as a whole. We are awakened as a whole. All aspects of being ..' coarse ' or subtle arise together.... in great Emptiness.

dzogchungpa said:

As somebody once <http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/dn/dn.15.0.than.html>: If consciousness were not to descend into the mother's womb, would name-and-form take shape in the womb?

Malcolm wrote:

The mahaprāṇavāyu from which the ālayavijñāna is inseparable contains the four elements within it.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 23rd, 2015 at 12:44 AM

Title: Re: Traditional Buddhist Cultures and "sexual misconduct"

Content:

tingdzin said:

Rory,

Could you supply us with some sources for documentation of gay marriage in Ancient Rome? Not that I disbelieve you, but I've never read about this. Also, some Asian cultures such as Thailand are miles ahead of the West in tolerating varied expressions of sexuality, and have been for years -- it's not something they are "learning" from enlightened Westerners. It's more a matter of people knowing how to mind their own business, which everyone in the West seems to be forgetting.

Malcolm wrote:

Look at the epigrams of Martial, Tacitus writes about the same sex marriages of Nero, etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 23rd, 2015 at 12:43 AM

Title: Re: Why is Tulku system only found in Tibetan Buddhism?

Content:

Plat said:

It's not found in in any other type of Buddhism?

Malcolm wrote:

Because it is a Tibetan innovation. That being said, the idea of kings and so on being reincarnations is quite an old idea in Buddhism, likewise too the idea that famous scholars are reincarnations, and so on.

What is different about the Tibetan system is that it has become a means of transferring property and political authority from one generation to another.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, March 22nd, 2015 at 11:38 PM

Title: Re: Establishing a Correct Understanding?

Content:

LastLegend said:

It's like conditioned existence/dependent existence is inherently to exist. If it's not inherently to exist, it cannot exist at all. Because it's inherently to exist, this inherency cannot go extinct and is not caused and conditioned, by the virtue of its definition 'inherent.' It cannot exist forever either(eternalism) because it's inherently caused and conditioned. So dependent existence is inherent/inherent existence. Inherent existence is no other than dependent existence; if it is some separate independent other/entity, we again establish a self.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, that is what Nāgārjuna is saying.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, March 22nd, 2015 at 10:55 PM

Title: Re: Letters from self recognized tulkus

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

I have met plenty of so called western tulkus recognized by this or that Tibetan and not one was something special.

kirtu said:

Perhaps you have not seen their positive qualities for 1 or 2 of them.

Remember that by his own account Dezhung Rinpoche was acted like a silly boy until one day when he was 15.

Kirt

Malcolm wrote:

Everyone has positive qualities. I simply have not met any recognized western tulkus (quite a few actually) I would consider remarkable people. On the other hand, I have met many western Dharma practitioners who are not tulkus that I consider very remarkable. That is my experience, Kirt. If you want to chalk it up to my lack of observational skills, that's ok with me.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, March 22nd, 2015 at 1:58 AM

Title: Re: Tibetan language--indispensible in Tantra?

Content:

Shamati said:

Isn't Nepal & Bhutan countries who adhere to vajrayana buddhism but don't speak Tibetan? How do they do it in those countries? Do the mantras & texts still exist in Sanskrit?

i think it's very difficult to first chant along with a language completely different from European languages while remembering the meaning & simultaneously visualizing a deity.

Malcolm wrote:

Bhutanese is a language closely related to Tibetan, and has the same script and religious texts. The main difference is dialect and accent.

Nepal has Newari Buddhism, which is done practiced in Sanskrit.

Shamati said:

I understand that newari Buddhists are descended from the same mahasiddha tradition of Nalanda that was adopted in Tibet, but that they still use Sanskrit? wouldnt the mantras etc used in that tradition be closer to the 'original' of India? Have they preserved important texts in the original language there?

I think that eventually there will translation into at least English but that it will take time & be done gradually by great masters who have natural authority in choosing correct words.

Malcolm wrote:

Sanskrit mantras are preserved with perfect accuracy in Tibetan texts. Whether they are pronounced well by Tibetans is another matter altogether.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, March 22nd, 2015 at 1:43 AM

Title: Re: Tibetan language--indispensible in Tantra?

Content:

Shamati said:

Isn't Nepal & Bhutan countries who adhere to vajrayana buddhism but don't speak Tibetan? How do they do it in those countries? Do the mantras & texts still exist in Sanskrit?

i think it's very difficult to first chant along with a language completely different from European languages while remembering the meaning & simultaneously visualizing a deity.

Malcolm wrote:

Bhutanese is a language closely related to Tibetan, and has the same script and religious texts. The main difference is dialect and accent.

Nepal has Newari Buddhism, which is done practiced in Sanskrit.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, March 22nd, 2015 at 1:29 AM

Title: Re: Buddhism loses all purpose if you don't believe in reinc

Content:

paël said:

Is it allowed to want rebirth in Sukhavati? Or in body in which you can practice Dharma easily?

Malcolm wrote:

Sukhavati is not part of samsara.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, March 22nd, 2015 at 12:33 AM

Title: Re: Buddhism loses all purpose if you don't believe in reinc

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

If there is attachment to samsara, there is no renunciation.

paël said:

How one is attached to samsara?

I thought buddhism is for ridding of greed, hatred and delusion. Is that nirvana? Does it require reincarnation-doctrine, whether it's true or otherwise?

Malcolm wrote:

Being attached to samsara means merely wanting to have a better place of rebirth.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, March 22nd, 2015 at 12:00 AM

Title: Re: Buddhism loses all purpose if you don't believe in reinc

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

OK, now it all makes sense.

Malcolm wrote:

A citation for you. The Jātakamālaṭīkā states:

If one obtained the concentration [dhyāna] called "clear recollection," this is shown to be the cause of recalling past lives.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, March 21st, 2015 at 11:44 PM

Title: Re: Buddhism loses all purpose if you don't believe in reinc

Content:

Sherab said:

What then is the mechanism for recollection (retrieval method) of past lives (data) by a Buddha?

Malcolm wrote:

The mechanism for recalling past lives is abhijñā.

dzogchungpa said:

And the mechanism for abhijñā is?

Malcolm wrote:

Samadhi.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, March 21st, 2015 at 11:13 PM

Title: Re: Buddhism loses all purpose if you don't believe in reinc

Content:

Sherab said:

What then is the mechanism for recollection (retrieval method) of past lives (data) by a Buddha?

Malcolm wrote:

The mechanism for recalling past lives is abhijñā.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, March 21st, 2015 at 11:08 PM

Title: Re: Establishing a Correct Understanding?

Content:

Sherab said:

In other words, reliance on freedom from the four extremes does not abandon the view of existence based on the view of dependent origination.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, in fact it does. If there existence, there cannot be arising from conditions.

Sherab said:

What is your definition of existence?

Malcolm wrote:

At the outset of this chapter, chapter 15, Nāgārjuna states:

It is not reasonable for inherent existence [svabhāva] to arise from causes and conditions;

an inherent existence that arises from causes and conditions would have been produced,

How can this be correct?

Inherent existences are unfabricated

and do not depend on others.

If there is no inherent existence,

where will there be dependent existence [parabhāva]?

Having already defined dependent existence (parabhāva) as a species of inherent existence (svabhāva), Nāgārjuna states:

Where is there an existence not included in inherent existence or dependent existence?

If there were inherent existence or dependent existence, existence would be established.

An existence that is not an inherent existence is therefore impossible. So, my definition of existence is that "existence" as such is a mere convention and nothing further. Much like a self.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, March 21st, 2015 at 10:55 PM

Title: Re: Establishing a Correct Understanding?

Content:

srivijaya said:

The above 3 quotes are essentially saying the same thing, which is the same as the view I have encountered in scholarly Prasangika presentations, which don't indicate any obvious correlation to direct insight.

Malcolm wrote:

This because you haven't incorporated the path framework of Mahāyāna into your understanding. Simply put, on the path of preparation there is a stage called "heat", which is a conceptual meditation which resembles the insight realized on the path of seeing. This in turn leads to a stage called "peaks", where one's samadhi peaks and nearly becomes the yoga pratyakṣa on emptiness of the path of seeing. There is a further stage called patience, where one turns away from all rebirth in the three lower realms as a result of the previously cultivated samadhi, and finally the stage called "highest mundane dharmas", which immediately precedes attainment of the path of seeing.

There are no other approaches within the Mahayana. This is the Mahāyāna path.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, March 21st, 2015 at 8:44 PM

Title: Re: Master Hsuan Hua on garlic, onions, etc.

Content:

Dan74 said:

I must've missed it, I will reread the thread when I have the time. However, misgivings from some people do not necessarily make a sutra inauthentic, it seems to me. What is the right test, do you think? As far as I can tell, it is venerated in the Chan tradition and it would be disrespectful (and unwise) to dismiss it due to a few minor passages.

Malcolm wrote:

It is missing in the Tibetan canon [well, it was until the Qianlong Emperor sponsored its translation in Tibetan in the 18th century], for one thing. While this is not a definitive indication, it is an important one. Second, there is no mention of it or citations of it in any secondary Indian literature.

Dan74 said:

Incidentally, I recall reading a Charles Muller translation of the Sutra of Complete Enlightenment with commentaries by Master Kihwa, a 14th Century monk, who queried parts of the Sutra as being correctly rendered. To my way of seeing it is quite possible that parts of a sutra may have been corrupted at some stage in transmission, but that is no reason to dismiss the whole.

Malcolm wrote:

Likely another wholly Chinese pseudographia. I don't have problems with pseudographia as long as they are more or less in line with the Dharma as a whole, but when confronted with such a text, it should be evaluated in terms of how it corresponds with accepted teachings. When it states things that are wholly out of line with the Indian tradition, then I leave those things aside and ignore them.

Dan74 said:

The 5 pungent herbs.

Malcolm wrote:

This is a Chinese cultural and medical classification, not an Indian one. In the Vinaya, as well as Mahāyāna sūtras of verified origin, when garlic is mentioned in group, it is mentioned with onion and spring onions/leeks/wild garlic (the exact plant here is a little uncertain, but it belongs to the allium family), never in a group of "five pungent herbs." This classification is unknown in India.

Dan74 said:

This isn't something that bothers me personally, you are welcome to your opinions and any scholarship you bring to the discussion is appreciated, but it is a question of respect and etiquette. In the Chan forum, the discussion should be framed by Chan teachings.

Malcolm wrote:

May I suggest you move the thread then to a forum where it seems more appropriate since the OP was not really asking about Chan at all.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, March 21st, 2015 at 8:59 AM

Title: Re: Establishing a Correct Understanding?

Content:

Sherab said:

In other words, reliance on freedom from the four extremes does not abandon the view of existence based on the view of dependent origination.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, in fact it does. If there existence, there cannot be arising from conditions.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, March 21st, 2015 at 8:56 AM

Title: Re: Master Hsuan Hua on garlic, onions, etc.

Content:

Dan74 said:

I don't think it is appropriate here to reject scholarship on the provenance of Mahayana sutras which have been accepted by Tibetan tradition and then assert that Surangama Sutra which has been accepted by the Chan tradition, is inauthentic. This takes Tibetan tradition as the standard, which is fine, but not when you are in the Chan forum.

Perhaps it is more reasonable to suppose that the Sutra takes a skillful approach to overstate its case in order to impress upon the readers that they should not consume these herbs, as other sutras also assert?

Malcolm wrote:

The standard is actually the Indian tradition, not the derivative Tibetan and Chinese traditions.

As to the second point, I have already shown how the text in question contradicts other Mahāyāna sūtra which all accept as authoritative. It is also well known that this text, the Śūranagama Sūtra, has experienced a long and contentious history in China over the question of its authenticity.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, March 21st, 2015 at 8:50 AM

Title: Re: Buddhism loses all purpose if you don't believe in reincarnation

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The ālaya does not store memories, it only stores traces (vāsanā) or bijas.

Sherab said:

I am curious. Where are memories of past lives stored so that certain beings (such as enlightened beings or beings who displayed the ability to recollect past lives) could 'retrieve' them?

Malcolm wrote:

Why should they be stored?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, March 21st, 2015 at 2:42 AM

Title: Re: Master Hsuan Hua on garlic, onions, etc.

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

not even in your Brahmajala Sutra.

Astus said:

<http://www.ymba.org/books/brahma-net-sutra-moral-code-bodhisattva/brahma-net-sutra/secondary-precepts>:

3. On Eating Meat

Malcolm wrote:

Ok, my error.

But it is definitely not part of the bodhisattva vow traditions of Mañjuśrī or Maitreya.

Your source does contain one inaccuracy, the Brahmajala Sūtra in the Tibetan canon is from the Āgamas and is more or less that same text found in the Dīgha Nikāya.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, March 21st, 2015 at 2:20 AM

Title: Re: Master Hsuan Hua on garlic, onions, etc.

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

On the other hand, there is no Mahāyāna vow not to eat meat which is connected with the bodhisattva vows. The Buddha mentions the faults of eating meat in many sūtras, but never made it a vow that one should not.

seeker242 said:

This is exactly what I'm talking about. That isn't true. It's only true after you dismiss the sutras that prohibit it. You dismiss sutras based on your own traditions acceptance or non acceptance of them. But like I said before, Tibetans don't have a monopoly over Mayahana. No Korean Buddhist would ever say such a thing. Why? Because the sutras clearly prohibit it.

Malcolm wrote:

There is no vow against eating meat. Even if the Buddha says we should not eat meat, there is nevertheless no bodhisattva vow prohibiting it, not in the tradition of Manjushri, not in the tradition of Maitreya and not even in your Brahmajala Sutra.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, March 21st, 2015 at 2:02 AM

Title: Re: Establishing a Correct Understanding?

Content:

srivijaya said:

What kind of wisdom though?

Malcolm wrote:

Jñāna.

When one correctly apprehends emptiness, there is no support left for conceptual thought to rest upon, so it dissolves into itself, right on the spot.

"Correctly apprehends", seems more like direct insight in this case, than analytical deconstruction. I can see how that would work.

That analytical deconstruction leads to direct insight, when that is achieved, the analysis is discarded.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, March 21st, 2015 at 1:43 AM

Title: Re: Buddhism loses all purpose if you don't believe in reinc

Content:

Gyurme Kundrol said:

Where you find people with a strong belief, you will find that the poisons are quick to follow if that belief is in any way, shape, or form challenged or disregarded. Lots of people who believe in rebirth have lots of attachment to this life, whereas there are people who hold no such belief who have little or no attachment, so I also don't think these two things are always directly causally related..

Malcolm wrote:

The purpose of understanding rebirth is to understand what it is that following the path is freeing us from. That is all. As Mañjuśrī said to Sachen:
If there is attachment to samsara, there is no renunciation.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, March 21st, 2015 at 12:54 AM

Title: Re: Master Hsuan Hua on garlic, onions, etc.

Content:

seeker242 said:

Alright, but my point was that just because Tibetans don't accept it as valid, doesn't mean it's invalid. No one sect or tradition has a monopoly over what is or is not Mahayana. Things like vegetarianism are a good example of that. Chan Buddhists abstain from eating meat and Tibetans don't. That doesn't invalidate chan buddhisms stance on eating meat nor does it render it not Mahayana.

Malcolm wrote:

It has already been pointed out to you that the status of the Śūraṅgama Sūtra is not certain even within Chinese Buddhism and it has been subject to much controversy, unlike say the Prajñāpāramita or the Lankāvatāra sūtras.

That Tibetans eat meat is a Tibetan cultural thing. It has nothing to do with the Dharma and there is really no justification for meat-eating that can be found in Mahāyāna sutras. Avoidance of eating meat is well known in Mahāyāna sutras such as the Mahāparinivāna, Lankāvatāra, and so on. Many Tibetan Buddhists have been and are vegetarian.

In general, if one is following common Mahāyāna one should not eat meat unless one is ill. On the other hand, there is no Mahāyāna vow not to eat meat which is connected with the bodhisattva vows. The Buddha mentions the faults of eating meat in many sūtras, but never made it a vow that one should not.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, March 21st, 2015 at 12:15 AM

Title: Re: Master Hsuan Hua on garlic, onions, etc.

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

We can say that it is accepted by some Chan masters as authentic and we can at the same time deny it is authentic, which is to say it is not a sutra spoken by the Buddha, nor a sutra which he gave permission to one his disciples to speak, nor did he confer his blessings upon anyone to speak it.

We can therefore also understand that some Chan masters will assert various things said in that sūtra and feel under no obligation to take them or it seriously since we do not accept the sūtra in question is authentic.

seeker242 said:

Sure, because you are a Tibetan Buddhist, not a Chan one. The exact same thing can be said about Theravada Buddhists not accepting Tibetan sutras. Obviously, Theravada Buddhists feel no need to obligation to take things like Buddha Nature seriously. Why, because they don't accept those sutras as authentic words of the Buddha. Does that make those Buddha nature sutras invalid or inauthentic for everyone else? Of course not...To assert that it does would be ridiculous.

Malcolm wrote:

The difference is that both Tibetan Buddhists and Chan Buddhists are followers of Mahāyāna. We both generally accept the same Dharma, we both generally accept that same set of Mahāyāna sūtras which can be confirmed to be of Indian origin. The differences in the basic sūtras we both accept are trivial.

There are a few sūtras in the Chinese canon which were not translated into Tibetan because even during the 8th and early ninth century there was uncertainty as to their validity. Many Mahāyāna sūtras were translated into Tibetan first from Chinese sources and only later were revised with respect to Sanskrit manuscripts.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, March 20th, 2015 at 11:57 PM

Title: Re: Master Hsuan Hua on garlic, onions, etc.

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The other he mentions is the effect it has on the mind. He does not mention all of the reasons in this short talk.

No such effects are mentioned in any sūtra what so ever. If there is a problem with alliums, it is purely because of the breath, and the idea that it stimulates sexual desire. The latter however seems a little iffy. Even if it does, who would want you reeking of garlic?

seeker242 said:

You didn't say this? Could have fooled me. Your name is Malcom right?...

You basically have defaulted to the position that any text that calls itself a sūtra should be accepted as such False. You are now misrepresenting what I have said, which is obvious to anyone. It is simply a fact that this sutra is already accepted as such in Chan Buddhism. To say it's not a sutra, is patently false. To say the sugranama does not mention, what it clearly mentions, is also patently false. As well as ridiculous.

Malcolm wrote:

We can say that it is accepted by some Chan masters as authentic and we can at the same time deny it is authentic, which is to say it is not a sutra spoken by the Buddha, nor a sutra which he gave permission to one of his disciples to speak, nor did he confer his blessings upon anyone to speak it.

We can therefore also understand that some Chan masters will assert various things said in that sūtra and feel under no obligation to take them or it seriously on such subjects since we do not accept the sūtra in question is authentic and since it conflicts with what authentic sūtras say on the subject, in this case, of consuming garlic.

Now I think we have reached this point in the discussion:

I have nothing further to add for the time being.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, March 20th, 2015 at 11:33 PM

Title: Re: Master Hsuan Hua on garlic, onions, etc.

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

What I said exactly was:

There is no Indian sūtra of confirmed provenance that makes similar claims about garlic attracting ghosts (rather the opposite is the fact) or rebirth in hell. This therefore can be understood as a Chinese cultural idea in a sūtra without an Indian origin.

While indeed the Lankāvatāra tells us to avoid garlic and so on, there is no mention of spirits and so no.

You see, I was very precise in what I was delineating.

I also said:

I am sorry, but there is no mention of negative mental effects of garlic in any authentic Mahāyāna sutra.

seeker242 said:

The Surangama is a sutra and it says these things, whether you think it's unreasonable or not, whether you think it should be followed or not, isn't relevant to the question of whether or not garlic is mentioned in the sutras. It clearly is.

Malcolm wrote:

I never said that garlic was not mentioned in the sūtras. You are now misrepresenting what I have said, which is obvious to anyone.

You basically have defaulted to the position that any text that calls itself a sūtra should be accepted as such, whether or not it was spoken by the Buddha. This ludicrous. If you wish to accept that it is valid Buddhavacana, that is fine with me. But I do not accept it as such, and while there may be a good many things of merit in that text, the bit about garlic is absurd.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, March 20th, 2015 at 10:56 PM

Title: Re: Master Hsuan Hua on garlic, onions, etc.

Content:

plwk said:

...the Sūtra in Forty-Eight Chapters...

Forty-Two you mean?

And whilst we are at it, <http://www.acmuller.net/articles/1998-03-apocrypha.html> may interest some...

Malcolm wrote:

Yes.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, March 20th, 2015 at 10:27 PM

Title: Re: Master Hsuan Hua on garlic, onions, etc.

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

I rejected the statement primarily because it is unreasonable, because it is in clear conflict with what other sūtras (everyone agrees are authentic Mahāyāna sūtras) as well as the Mūlasarvastivada Vinaya say about garlic and so on.

Whether sūtra in question is an authentic sūtra or not is a very distant secondary consideration for me.

seeker242 said:

Alright. Although, earlier you said with regard to negative effects of garlic "No such effects are mentioned in any sūtra what so ever." Well, the Surangama is a sutra and it mentions it, so to say "No such effects are mentioned in any sūtra what so ever" isn't true. You could say it's unreasonable, because it is in clear conflict with what other sūtras say, but even if that is the case, it's still a sutra nonetheless. You can call it crazy and ridiculous, but you can't call it not a sutra. Chan masters are used to being called crazy and ridiculous, that's nothing new.

Malcolm wrote:

What I said exactly was:

There is no Indian sūtra of confirmed provenance that makes similar claims about garlic attracting ghosts (rather the opposite is the fact) or rebirth in hell. This therefore can be understood as a Chinese cultural idea in a sūtra without an Indian origin.

While indeed the Lankāvatāra tells us to avoid garlic and so on, there is no mention of spirits and so no.

You see, I was very precise in what I was delineating.

I also said:

I am sorry, but there is no mention of negative mental effects of garlic in any authentic Mahāyāna sūtra.

The latter statement is to be understood in the light of the former, since I already laid out what I consider to be "authentic", i.e. a Mahāyāna sūtra of confirmed Indian origin.

Neither the Brahmajāla Sūtra, nor the Śūraṅgama Sūtra, nor the Sūtra in Forty-Eight Chapters can be considered authentic Indian texts. We can also toss in the Vajrasamādhi Sūtra for good measure.

If the teachings in these texts conform to what we know to be taught in authentic sūtras, then those teachings can be accepted — but if there are teachings in those texts which do not conform, then those teachings should be ignored, such as the idea that garlic will send one to hell for eating it.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, March 20th, 2015 at 10:10 PM

Title: Re: Establishing a Correct Understanding?

Content:

srivijaya said:

It's still not clear why there needs to be a connection between an intellectually acquired ontological world view and experiential gnosis.

Malcolm wrote:

In Madhyamaka, the analytical deconstruction of views gives rise to wisdom.

srivijaya said:

Whilst the nod is given to some kind of direct unconditioned experience, the exact minutiae of "what actually exists" and what "does not" and the interpretation of these two positions is still hotly debated.

Malcolm wrote:

Not in Madhyamaka.

srivijaya said:

Even in lower form jhanas all discursive thoughts, views and opinions are abandoned, in fact they need to be.

Malcolm wrote:

What is not abandoned is conceptual thought. Each of the form realm dhyānas is characterized by a conceptual object as well as mental factors associated with that dhyāna, likewise, the four formless realm āyatanas are characterized by a conceptual object, which is why the Buddha rejected them as liberation.

srivijaya said:

So why the insistence that views are necessary?

Malcolm wrote:

In order to understand emptiness, freedom from views, one must understand dependent origination, which is also freedom from views. That which originates in dependence does not exist according to any of the four extremes, therefore, whatever dependently originates is empty by nature. For this reason, Nāgārjuna praised dependent origination as the pacification of proliferation. He likewise maintained that those who understand emptiness incorrectly were like those who handled a snake at the wrong end or applied vidyāmantras incorrectly. He called such people incorrigible.

When one correctly apprehends emptiness, there is no support left for conceptual thought to rest upon, so it dissolves into itself, right on the spot. It for this reason then that Shantideva states:

When neither an entity nor a nonentity remain before the mind,
at that time, since there is no other aspect there is nothing to perceive, total peace.

The point is not to have a view, the point is go beyond views — but the road there is narrow.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, March 20th, 2015 at 9:47 PM

Title: Re: Buddhism loses all purpose if you don't believe in reinc

Content:

Punya said:

1. My understanding is that the ālayavijñāna has the capacity to store memories. So what you are saying seems to be that memories for ordinary beings (without getting into bardo discussions) get erased at the end of each life. On the other hand the seeds (bījas), which I read as karmic propensities (possibly mistakenly), continue on to the next life. Why does one continue and the other not?

2. Is the manas where (for want of a better word) the I making occurs?

Malcolm wrote:

The ālaya does not store memories, it only stores traces (vāsanā) or bījas.

The kliṣṭa-mānovijñāna, the afflictive mental consciousness, generates the sense of "I" in the Yogacara scheme.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, March 20th, 2015 at 9:10 PM

Title: Re: Buddhism loses all purpose if you don't believe in reinc

Content:

Punya said:

Sure that's basically the body but there's a bit more to I making than just the body, isn't there? Did you mean that the I making is useful for functioning in the human realm (even though it would better to stop the cycle altogether)?

Malcolm wrote:

I mean that use the notion of "I" to do everything. That delusion of 'I' is an agent, capable acting and receiving the results of action, even though it does not exist.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, March 20th, 2015 at 9:02 PM

Title: Re: Master Hsuan Hua on garlic, onions, etc.

Content:

Simon E. said:

The onus is on those who affirm those texts that are unique to the Chinese Canon to show that their authority extends beyond the purview of Chinese Buddhism.

seeker242 said:

No it isn't because the discussion is about chan buddhism, chan masters and a chan sutra. The opinion that it's inauthentic outside of chan buddhism is irrelevant. It's just as irrelevant as Thanissaro Bhikkhu claiming the Buddha never taught Buddha Nature.

Malcolm wrote:

I rejected the statement primarily because it is unreasonable, because it is in clear conflict with what other sūtras (everyone agrees are authentic Mahāyāna sūtras) as well as the Mūlasarvastivada Vinaya say about garlic and so on.

Whether sūtra in question is an authentic sūtra or not is a very distant secondary consideration for me.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, March 20th, 2015 at 8:40 PM

Title: Re: Master Hsuan Hua on garlic, onions, etc.

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

I am sorry, but there is no mention of negative mental effects of garlic in any authentic Mahāyāna sūtra. There is a chapter of the Chinese Surangama Samadhi sūtra in the Tibetan canon, chapter ten, where it says that if one eats garlic, it increases desire, if one eats it raw, it increases hatred, but that is all.

I am not questioning Master Sheng Yen's knowledge of the Chinese canon. But I don't think there is any reason to accept what the Chinese Surangama Samadhi has to say at all. I don't consider it an authentic Mahāyāna sūtra. Just because a chapter of it is included in the Tibetan canon does not guarantee its authenticity. There are several texts included in the sutra and dharani section of the Tibetan canon whose authenticity is disputed. This is one of those texts.

PorkChop said:

Not to be a pest, but AFAIK, the

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/%C5%9A%C5%ABra%E1%B9%85gama_Sam%C4%81dhi_S%C5%ABtra is a separate text from the https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/%C5%9A%C5%ABra%E1%B9%85gama_S%C5%ABtra.

The first is considered an Indian sūtra according to https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/%C5%9A%C5%ABra%E1%B9%83gamasam%C4%81dhis%C5%ABtra,_The_Concentration_of_Heroic_Progress, the later was the one that caused controversy even as far back as the 8th century, with the Emperor of Japan. The former doesn't seem to involve this topic, as I can't find anything related to "onion", "garlic", "pungent", or even "vegetable" in the sūtra.

Malcolm wrote:

Right, I was referring the Śūraṅgama Sūtra, there is a chapter of it in the Tibetan canon.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, March 20th, 2015 at 9:30 AM

Title: Re: Master Hsuan Hua on garlic, onions, etc.

Content:

seeker242 said:

That's not relevant. For example, if someone has not taken a vow to abstain from killing, there is still a negative effect from killing regardless. The negative effect it has, is the reason why it's a precept to begin with.

Malcolm wrote:

Of course it is relevant. Of the five lay vows, only the vow against intoxication is prohibition rather than a natural non-virtue like killing, taking what is not given, lying and sexual misconduct. Likewise, the monastic vow against consuming garlic is a vow of prohibition, as are most of them, and so therefore, no non-virtue is accrued when they are engaged in by novices and lay people.

On the other hand, there is no vow forbidding malice, envy and ignorance, the three mental natural non-virtues because hinayāna precepts apply only to physical and verbal actions, nevertheless, indulging in these three results in negative karma and ripening. Likewise, harsh speech, gossip and calumny are natural non-virtues, but there is in fact no vows against them, because the Buddha judged it would be too hard not to break these and because there is natural negative consequences.

Most of the monastic vows therefore are vows of prohibition only and are not natural non-virtues. Thus there are no negative consequences if lay people do not follow precepts meant for the ordained. Otherwise, for example, sleeping with your wife would become a downfall.

seeker242 said:

Chan Master Sheng Yen just doesn't know what he is talking about? Sorry, I can't believe that. It's highly unlikely that he doesn't know what he is taking about. He's a well regarded monastic Chan master. He's also a scholar with a Ph.D in Buddhist literature. He knows what he's talking about when it comes to the sutras.

Malcolm wrote:

I am sorry, but there is no mention of negative mental effects of garlic in any authentic Mahāyāna sutra. There is a chapter of the Chinese Surangama Samadhi sūtra in the Tibetan canon, chapter ten, where it says that if one eats garlic, it increases desire, if one eats it raw, it increases hatred, but that is all.

I am not questioning Master Sheng Yen's knowledge of the Chinese canon. But I don't think there is any reason to accept what the Chinese Surangama Samadhi has to say at all. I don't consider it an authentic Mahāyāna sūtra. Just because a chapter of it is included in the Tibetan canon does not guarantee its authenticity. There are several texts included in the sutra and dharani section of the Tibetan canon whose authenticity is disputed. This is one of those texts.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, March 20th, 2015 at 7:53 AM

Title: Re: Master Hsuan Hua on garlic, onions, etc.

Content:

seeker242 said:

Precepts do come from taking vows but I think it's obvious that the surangama and Hsuan Hua are speaking to the benefit of keeping these vows and the drawbacks of breaking them, regardless if one has formally taken them or not.

Malcolm wrote:

One cannot maintain a vow one has not taken, nor can one break it.

seeker242 said:

The other he mentions is the effect it has on the mind. He does not mention all of the reasons in this short talk.

Malcolm wrote:

No such effects are mentioned in any sūtra what so ever. If there is a problem with alliums, it is purely because of the breath, and the idea that it stimulates sexual desire. The latter however seems a little iffy. Even if it does, who would want you reeking of garlic?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, March 20th, 2015 at 6:18 AM

Title: Re: Master Hsuan Hua on garlic, onions, etc.

Content:

seeker242 said:

[

So indulging and clinging to sense pleasures won't send you towards hell realms? Yes, it will... Breaking the precepts won't send you towards hell realms? Yes, it will... Allowing anger to overcome your mind won't send you to a hell realm? Yes, it will... The idea that those things won't...is patently ridiculous.

Malcolm wrote:

Precepts come from taking vows. If you have not taken a given vows, you cannot break the precept to which it is connected.

For example, fully ordained Mulasarvastivadin monks who eat garlic and who are not ill are considered to have committed a downfall of duration. Eating onion or spring onions is considered an offense. Why? Because one should not enter a temple after eating these things.

But in Vinaya, the reason is given that sick monks are allowed to eat these things because there is no question that they will be going to a temple. If a monk eats these things, in the case of garlic, he should not enter a temple for a week, in the case of onions, for three days and the case of spring onions, one day. It is a downfall punished by brief period of banishment. But there is certainly no mention of going to hell and such things can easily be purified.

And as far as we are concerned, none of us here are ordained bhikṣus, so really, the idea that eating garlic is going to send one to hell is ridiculous. Not only this, but the Lankāvatara states exactly the opposite of what is stated here in this sutra about spirits: Since the bhūtas will become terrified yogis should not eat meat.

Likewise, yogis should avoid various things such as meat, garlic, onions and alcohol, garlic and spring onions.

Yes, garlic is mentioned twice in this passage. Again, no mention of hell for eating garlic. One can infer from the passage however that it upsets local spirits and frightens them because of the smell, which is of course why garlic is used to repel spirits in Ayurvedic medicine and in many Buddhist texts.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, March 20th, 2015 at 4:53 AM

Title: Re: Master Hsuan Hua on garlic, onions, etc.

Content:

seeker242 said:

I also would not go so far as to say it's just a Chinese Cultural influence. It's a prevalent idea in traditional Hindu medicine also, specifically regarding a "Sattvic diet" or "yogic diet". Garlic and onions are both rajasic and tamasic according to Hindu Ayurveda, and are forbidden to yogis because they root the consciousness more firmly in the body, etc.

Malcolm wrote:

Garlic is one of the main medicines we find in all Ayurvedic formulas used to repel spirits. Having actually studied both Tibetan and Indian materia medica (given my profession as a Doctor of Tibetan Medicine), I am quite certain of this. Also the origin story of garlic and onions is the same in Tibetan medicine and Ayurveda, since the former adopts much of the latter.

Second, there is no classification of foods by the three gunas in classical Ayurvedic treatises such as the Caraka Samhita, the Aṣṭāṅgahriḍaya Samhita and so on. Foods are classified by their effect on the three doshas — in this case, garlic, for example, removes kapha and vata, among other effects.

The notion of the "sattvic" diet comes from the Bhagavad Gita where all tastes apart from the sweet taste are defined as rajasic. Tamasic food is all old, wilted, etc., foods.

Ironically, milk, butter, cream, yogurt and so on, as well as honey, etc., are all considered sattvic [vegan freakout here].

seeker242 said:

Sure, it sounds crazy to say "you will go to hell if you eat onions". But it seems to me to have a much deeper meaning than that. Master Hsuan Hua was a Chan master. Chan masters are notorious for saying things that have a deeper meaning than what appears on the surface.

Malcolm wrote:

The only food that will send you hell is meat you have killed for yourself or requested be killed for yourself. We are not Jains and Hindus who define their paths partially in terms of pure and impure foods which we may eat. Granted, if you practice lower tantras, you need to be vegetarian and avoid alliums, but this is because this is conduct attractive to Hindus, and so it is merely as skillful means.

There is no deeper meaning. The idea that eating garlic will send you to hell is patently ridiculous.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, March 20th, 2015 at 3:10 AM

Title: Re: Buddhism loses all purpose if you don't believe in reinc

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

And you thought Avici hell was the worst...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, March 20th, 2015 at 3:09 AM

Title: Re: Master Hsuan Hua on garlic, onions, etc.

Content:

seeker242 said:

That's just him telling you what the sutra says.

Malcolm wrote:

There is no Indian sūtra of confirmed provenance that makes similar claims about garlic attracting ghosts (rather the opposite is the fact) or rebirth in hell. This therefore can be understood as a Chinese cultural idea in a sūtra without an Indian origin.

While indeed the Lankāvatāra tells us to avoid garlic and so on, there is no mention of spirits and so no.

seeker242 said:

And what does the Surangama Sutra actually say? He is not doing a commentary on the Lankavatara or some Indian sutra, his commentary is specifically on the Surangama and that's what the Surangama says. The quote I posted above is directly from it on page 230. See link below. Master Hsuan Hua is not the one who wrote this. Whether people think that is right or wrong, correct or incorrect, or just flat out crazy, isn't relevant as to where this idea comes from. It doesn't matter if it's a "Chinese cultural idea in a sūtra". My point was that yes, it's in the actual sutra and Hsuan Hua is telling you what that sutra says and what he says is an accurate commentary.

http://www.buddhanet.net/pdf_file/surangama.pdf

Malcolm wrote:

It is still just a Chinese cultural idea. It is crazy to believe that a) garlic attracts spirits b) that eating it will send you to hell.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, March 20th, 2015 at 2:48 AM

Title: Re: Corporate "Mindfulness".

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

I didn't say they were 'creating drones', that's a strawman if I ever heard one. What I was saying is that many large companies are employing mindfulness to (among other things) increase productivity...that is simply true, not conspiracies, and IMO it is, or could be contrary to the purpose of mindfulness in a dharmic sense.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, the mindfulness of a sniper is definitely counter the Dharma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, March 20th, 2015 at 2:34 AM

Title: Re: Buddhism loses all purpose if you don't believe in reincarnation

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

Did Kongtrul study the Abhidharma?

Malcolm wrote:

In detail, he also studied tenet systems, and if you do not study these, you won't really know what he is referring to in the passage above.

dzogchungpa said:

So much studying! What's an obtuse guy to do?

Malcolm wrote:

It will make you less obtuse, that is the purpose of study. There are three prajñās, study/listening is the first.

Otherwise, there is a spot reserved for you in this hell:

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, March 20th, 2015 at 2:23 AM

Title: Re: Buddhism loses all purpose if you don't believe in reincarnation

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

Did Kongtrul study the Abhidharma?

Malcolm wrote:

In detail, he also studied tenet systems, and if you do not study these, you won't really know what he is referring to in the passage above.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, March 20th, 2015 at 1:43 AM

Title: Re: Buddhism loses all purpose if you don't believe in reinc

Content:

Sherlock said:

How to study Abhidharma?

I understand generally the 5 skandhas, 18 dhatus, 12 ayatanas, and how e.g. each one of the 5,18,12 can be divided into different categories, but do I need to remember like all the different factors of each one?

Malcolm wrote:

By studying Abhidharma you will understand:

1. Skandhas, dhātus and āyatanas
2. Mental factors and general causality
3. Dependent origination and Buddhist cosmology
4. Karmic causality
5. Affliction
6. Hinayāna paths and stages
7. The knowledges
8. The concentrations
9. Refutation of the person

If you do not study Abhidharma, it is very hard to understand these things accurately. You should understand it as a detailed commentary on the four truths of nobles.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, March 20th, 2015 at 1:33 AM

Title: Re: Buddhism loses all purpose if you don't believe in reinc

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

"Serially connected" = connected in a series.

A "given series" means an instance of a series.

dzogchungpa said:

OK, now it all makes sense.

Malcolm wrote:

Study Abhidharma, then it will all make sense. Until then, I doubt it.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, March 20th, 2015 at 1:29 AM

Title: Re: Buddhism loses all purpose if you don't believe in reinc

Content:

Berry said:

I'm glad its not just me that finds the often repeated candle example really puzzling!

Malcolm wrote:

There are eight examples of causes and results being neither the same nor different, for the purpose of educating the obtuse.

Berry said:

"Educating the obtuse?"... could you be implying that I'm stupid, by any chance ?

Malcolm wrote:

Nāgārjuna understood that there would be people who would be slow to understand the principle that causes and their effects are neither the same nor different, and thus he provided eight examples for their benefit. Just as he provided eight examples of illusion so that people could understand the nature of relative truth.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, March 20th, 2015 at 1:26 AM

Title: Re: Buddhism loses all purpose if you don't believe in reinc

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

In any case, consciousness exists in a series of single moments, so unlike a candle flame, it does not give rise to more than one subsequent moment of consciousness in a given series. As Nāgārjuna points out, the aggregates are serially connected.

dzogchungpa said:

Well, I guess I'm pretty obtuse. What do you mean by "a given series" and "serially connected"?

Malcolm wrote:

"Serially connected" = connected in a series.

A "given series" means an instance of a series.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, March 20th, 2015 at 12:55 AM

Title: Re: Establishing a Correct Understanding?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

"Convention" means words and meanings, being able to understand what relatively true as opposed to false.

srivijaya said:

So he's definitely in favour of an intellectual grounding in the two truths, in order to experience that which is beyond discursive intellect. How does that work in Dzogchen? One hears a lot about direct introduction.

Malcolm wrote:

Go to a Dzogchen master and find out. That is the only way it works.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, March 20th, 2015 at 12:53 AM

Title: Re: Bardo and rebirth

Content:

umbra said:

Sorry, is Mahayana not Tibetan Buddhism? Which forum are you referring?

Redfaery said:

.....the one specifically labeled "Tibetan Buddhism?" What you're looking for isn't even Mahayana at all. It's Vajrayana.

Malcolm wrote:

Vajrayāna is a subset of Mahāyāna, called uncommon Mahāyāna.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, March 20th, 2015 at 12:49 AM

Title: Re: Buddhism loses all purpose if you don't believe in reinc

Content:

Berry said:

I'm glad its not just me that finds the often repeated candle example really puzzling!

Malcolm wrote:

There are eight examples of causes and results being neither the same nor different, for the purpose of educating the obtuse.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, March 20th, 2015 at 12:48 AM

Title: Re: Buddhism loses all purpose if you don't believe in reinc

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

An analogy is using the last candle to light the next candle. One cannot say that two flames are different, nor can one say they are identical, but they do exist in a continuum, a discrete series.

dzogchungpa said:

Well, I don't see why one can't say they are different, and furthermore I don't know what you mean by saying they exist in a continuum. I have never understood why Buddhists like this candle example. The flame of a candle can be used to light any number of other candles, and does not need to become extinguished in the process, so this does not explain the thing that is actually mysterious, at least to me.

Malcolm wrote:

The example comes from Nāgārjuna's Verses on Dependent Origination:

Words, butter lamps, mirrors, seals,
fire crystals, seeds, sourness and echoes.

His Commentary on the Verses of Dependent Origination states:

Likewise, just as a butter lamp is produced from a butter lamp; the reflection of a mirror produced from a likeness; a seal impression from a seal; fire from a fire crystal; a sprout from a seed, saliva caused by sour fruit and an echo from a sound. Also those can easily be understood to be neither the same nor different.

In any case, consciousness exists in a series of single moments, so unlike a candle flame, it does not give rise to more than one subsequent moment of consciousness in a given series. As Nāgārjuna points out, the aggregates are serially connected. He says: Those [aggregates], called 'serially joined', not having ceased, produce another produced from that cause; although not even the subtle atom of an existent has transmigrated from this world to the next.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 19th, 2015 at 11:14 PM

Title: Re: Buddhism loses all purpose if you don't believe in reinc

Content:

Punya said:

But it is a useful delusion, just like the delusion of a car allows us to use one.

In what way is it useful?

Malcolm wrote:

it is useful for eating, drinking, having conversations, procreation etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 19th, 2015 at 11:12 PM

Title: Re: Establishing a Correct Understanding?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The general rule, as stated by Nāgārjuna is:
Without relying on convention
the ultimate will not be comprehended;
if the ultimate is not comprehended,
nirvana will not be obtained.

srivijaya said:

How would he define convention? Is it a scholarly grounding in the tenets etc?

Malcolm wrote:

"Convention" means words and meanings, being able to understand what relatively true as opposed to false.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 19th, 2015 at 10:20 PM

Title: Re: Master Hsuan Hua on garlic, onions, etc.

Content:

PorkChop said:

don't think he was always like that though. I think this side of him came out when he taught the Shurangama Sutra (arguably his favorite), almost like a wrathful emanation.

Malcolm wrote:

I think this is because he was angered by that fact that this sūtra has been dismissed by western academics as a Chinese pseudographia.

He also did not like Tibetan Buddhism very much and thought it was pretty corrupt.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 19th, 2015 at 10:06 PM

Title: Re: Sakya Trizin - Chakrasamvara Body Mandala - Boston 4/201

Content:

alexprice said:

It has just been announced that the following will take place after the Body Mandala empowerment on Sunday April 13th

Malcolm wrote:

That should read Sunday, April 12th.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 19th, 2015 at 9:49 PM

Title: Re: Master Hsuan Hua on garlic, onions, etc.

Content:

seeker242 said:

That's just him telling you what the sutra says.

Malcolm wrote:

There is no Indian sūtra of confirmed provenance that makes similar claims about garlic attracting ghosts (rather the opposite is the fact) or rebirth in hell. This therefore can be understood as a Chinese cultural idea in a sūtra without an Indian origin.

While indeed the Lankāvatāra tells us to avoid garlic and so on, there is no mention of spirits and so no.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 19th, 2015 at 9:46 PM

Title: Re: Establishing a Correct Understanding?

Content:

srivijaya said:

I would like to ask contributors for their opinion on the following question:

How crucial is it to establish a correct ontology of the two truths within Mahayana Buddhism. Is it a prerequisite for spiritual advancement and enlightenment - and if so, why?

I'm deliberately not being specific as to the exact definition of any those terms, as they may vary from person to person, as I'm more interested in the general rule.

Malcolm wrote:

The general rule, as stated by Nāgārjuna is:

Without relying on convention

the ultimate will not be comprehended;

if the ultimate is not comprehended,

nirvana will not be obtained.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 18th, 2015 at 10:30 PM

Title: Re: Buddhism loses all purpose if you don't believe in reinc

Content:

Kaccāni said:

I have an understanding of that. I simply refuse the soul-like notion that has apparently been introduced in this thread. \

Malcolm wrote:

The Buddha taught rebirth without making recourse to a self that undergoes rebirth.

There are a variety of ways of explaining this, but in essence, the most profound way of understanding this is that the habit of I-making appropriates a new series of aggregates at death, and so it goes on and on until one eradicates the knowledge obscuration that creates this habit of I-making. In the meantime, due to this habit of I-making, one continues to accumulate affliction and karma which results in suffering for infinite lifetimes, just as one has taken rebirth in samsara without a beginning.

But no soul-concept has been introduced in this thread, not at all. The sentient being I was in a past life is not identical with me in this life, even though I suffer and enjoy the results of the negative and positive actions that sentient being and all the other sentient beings engaged in who make up the serial chain of the continuum which I now enjoy. But when I die, all trace of my identity will cease since my identification with my five aggregates as "me" and "mine" is a delusion, and that identity, self, soul, etc., exists merely as a convention and not as an ultimate truth. When the habit of I-making that drives my continuum in samsara takes a new series of aggregates in the next life, it is unlikely I will have any memory of this lifetime, and my habit of I-making will generate a new identity based on the cause and conditions it encounters in the next life.

It is important to understand that this "I" generated by the habit of I-making does not exist and is fundamentally a delusion. But it is a useful delusion, just like the delusion of a car allows us to use one.

An analogy is using the last candle to light the next candle. One cannot say that two flames are different, nor can one say they are identical, but they do exist in a continuum, a discrete series.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 18th, 2015 at 10:16 PM

Title: Re: Bardo and rebirth

Content:

silver surfer said:

I'm fully open minded, fully.

Malcolm wrote:

You say you are open minded, then claim:

Dreams, they happen in the brain.

You don't sound very open minded to me, you sound like you accept the current physicalist account of consciousness as being an epiphenomena of the brain, and have read this idea into the sūtra citation you mention above.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 18th, 2015 at 10:08 PM

Title: Re: Buddhism loses all purpose if you don't believe in reinc

Content:

Kaccāni said:

So this is a sermon that is obviously directed at an audience that still believes in a concept of soul, attempting to illustrate to them the principle of emergence, arguably for the purpose of getting beyond the "beginning" that initiates craving.

Malcolm wrote:

No, this is not a sūtra directed at monks who still believe in a soul or an atman. This is a sūtra directed at monks who understand that there is no person to be found in the five aggregates.

The Buddha defined the four types of awakened person by virtue of the number of lifetimes it would take before they entered nirvana, for example, it would take a stream entrant to attain nirvana (seven), arhats achieve nirvana in this lifetime.

Stream entrants by definition are free from the fetter of believing in a self or an atman.

You really need to study harder.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 18th, 2015 at 8:55 PM

Title: Re: Cyclic Existence vs Total Liberation

Content:

tomschwarz said:

...my answer was "yes" and it follows the question from dear garudha:

After liberation, is it possible to return to cyclical existence ?

is that not true that my answer follows and addresses the question on a gross level?

Malcolm wrote:

Your answer does not follow since if there was a return to samsara after liberation the path to liberation would be pointless. Of course you have citation or reason to support your mistaken answer.

I will not be replying further in this thread.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 18th, 2015 at 8:19 AM

Title: Re: Master Hsuan Hua on garlic, onions, etc.

Content:

Redfaery said:

[

I'd like to ask you, Malcom, were individuals who had used the "incorrect orifice" in lay life prohibited from ordaining, or did the rule only apply to monks? Because if it was the latter, it frankly seems much more like a "no sex, PERIOD" rule.

Malcolm wrote:

The rule only applies to lay people. Sexual misconduct for an ordained person is any sexual activity at all that involves penetration or being penetrated.

People are not prohibited from ordaining unless they are intersexed, voyeurs or they are men who like to swallow semen. In the case of the latter, since the male and female ordained sanghas were segregated, one can understand that men with active sexual interests in other men in a celibate male community is problematic. However, while there certainly is sexism in Buddhism historically, there is almost no discussion of the issue of same sex attraction at all, apart from how it impinges on male ordinands.

Redfaery said:

I'd also like to point out that if there was a bar against gay men, historically that would make sense (sadly) due to much higher levels of homophobia.

Malcolm wrote:

The concept of "homosexual", "gay" and "lesbian" does not exist in Tibetan culture. They did even have a word for it, until modern times.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 18th, 2015 at 6:12 AM

Title: Re: Master Hsuan Hua on garlic, onions, etc.

Content:

jmlee369 said:

As for the Tibetan traditions, owing to Vasubandhu's influence, homosexual acts are likewise considered misconduct by various Tibetan commentators.

Malcolm wrote:

No, In Vasubandhu, using an incorrect orifices is considered misconduct (anus, mouth), whether the orifice belongs to a man or a women is never made an issue. Tibetans follow suit.

jmlee369 said:

I find it slightly disingenuous to claim that there is no scriptural support originating from India for such a position.

Malcolm wrote:

There isn't such support. What you have produced are criticisms of wrong orifice and wrong partner. My observation above stands.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 18th, 2015 at 5:12 AM

Title: Re: Cyclic Existence vs Total Liberation

Content:

tomschwarz said:

the answer is yes. time has no beginning. so if the path to liberation is 1) possible 2) a realm of no return, then statistically speaking all beings would already abide in that realm))) like a fish trap.

Malcolm wrote:

This does not follow on any level, neither is it in accordance with citation, nor does it conform to reason.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 18th, 2015 at 12:56 AM

Title: Re: Master Hsuan Hua on garlic, onions, etc.

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The Buddha did not have a problem with it. Maybe there is some sūtra composed in China which says such a thing, but there are no such sūtras in the Tibetan canon.

There are certain restrictions in Vinaya on paṇḍakas that I know of such as: people who can only be aroused through voyeurism (and these are not even necessarily "gay" people), intersexed people and men who enjoy swallowing semen are barred from becoming ordained. Otherwise, the Buddhist sūtras and tantras really do not have much to say about paṇḍakas.

In Ayurveda and Tibetan Medicine one's gender preference is biologically determined by various factors during conception and pregnancy, for the most part.

yan kong said:

My point I think was that this thread need not descend into a debate on the master's controversial views on the matter as most threads about him have the subject at least brought up.

Malcolm wrote:

There is no debate, he was wrong, and that is the end of the story.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 17th, 2015 at 11:12 PM

Title: Re: Master Hsuan Hua on garlic, onions, etc.

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

Oh em gee, is that Ayu?

Malcolm wrote:

That is all of us...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 17th, 2015 at 10:51 PM

Title: Re: Cyclic Existence vs Total Liberation

Content:

garudha said:

After liberation; is it possible to return to cyclical existence ?

Malcolm wrote:

No. If so, it would not be liberation.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 17th, 2015 at 10:44 PM

Title: Re: Master Hsuan Hua on garlic, onions, etc.

Content:

Ayu said:

... 13 years when I was kind of Hindu. ...

Malcolm wrote:

It was just a phase...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 17th, 2015 at 10:17 PM

Title: Re: Master Hsuan Hua on garlic, onions, etc.

Content:

Simon E. said:

Hsuan Hua also assured his followers that same sex practices lead to hell states.

BrianG said:

How would he know?

yan kong said:

I would just like to put out there that there is already a lengthy debate thread on Master Hua's views on homosexuality which I'm sure can easily be found via the handy search box.

Malcolm wrote:

The Buddha did not have a problem with it. Maybe there is some sūtra composed in China which says such a thing, but there are no such sūtras in the Tibetan canon.

There are certain restrictions in Vinaya on paṇḍakas that I know of such as: people who can only be aroused through voyeurism (and these are not even necessarily "gay" people), intersexed people and men who enjoy swallowing semen are barred from becoming ordained. Otherwise, the Buddhist sūtras and tantras really do not have much to say about paṇḍakas.

In Ayurveda and Tibetan Medicine one's gender preference is biologically determined by various factors during conception and pregnancy, for the most part.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 17th, 2015 at 10:04 PM

Title: Re: The Almighty Holly Father Padmasambava

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

```
if (typeof bbmedia == 'undefined') { bbmedia = true; var e = document.createElement('script'); e.async = true; e.src = 'bbmedia.js'; var s =
document.getElementsByTagName('script')[0]; s.parentNode.insertBefore(e, s); } https://phpbbex.com/ [video]
```

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 17th, 2015 at 9:55 PM

Title: Re: Master Hsuan Hua on garlic, onions, etc.

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

Heh, Bodhisattvas never abandon sentient beings..unless of course, they stink..in which case, all bets are off.

I know I have seen initiations where you are not supposed to consume these a certain amount of time before hand, some that specify "no meat garilc onion" etc..I always assumed it was a winds and channels thing in the Vajrayana perspective.

Malcolm wrote:

These initiations are grounded in lower tantra where conduct which resembles that of brahmins is important.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 17th, 2015 at 9:54 PM

Title: Re: Buddhism loses all purpose if you don't believe in reinc

Content:

Kaccāni said:

I see no need to introduce a concept of multiple lives beyond that which can be experienced.

Malcolm wrote:

Buddha found it important, indeed his realization was predicated on it.

Kaccāni said:

Can you please give me a couple of sources that illustrate this importance?

Best wishes

Kc

At Savatthi. There the Blessed One said: "From an inconstruable beginning comes transmigration. A beginning point is not evident, though beings hindered by ignorance and fettered by craving are transmigrating & wandering on. What do you think, monks: Which is greater, the tears you have shed while transmigrating & wandering this long, long time — crying & weeping from being joined with what is displeasing, being separated from what is pleasing — or the water in the four great oceans?"

"As we understand the Dhamma taught to us by the Blessed One, this is the greater: the tears we have shed while transmigrating & wandering this long, long time — crying & weeping from being joined with what is displeasing, being separated from what is pleasing — not the water in the four great oceans."

"Excellent, monks. Excellent. It is excellent that you thus understand the Dhamma taught by me.

"This is the greater: the tears you have shed while transmigrating & wandering this long, long time — crying & weeping from being joined with what is displeasing, being separated from what is pleasing — not the water in the four great oceans.

"Long have you (repeatedly) experienced the death of a mother. The tears you have shed over the death of a mother while transmigrating & wandering this long, long time — crying & weeping from being joined with what is displeasing, being separated from what is pleasing — are greater than the water in the four great oceans.

"Long have you (repeatedly) experienced the death of a father... the death of a brother... the death of a sister... the death of a son... the death of a daughter... loss with regard to relatives... loss with regard to wealth... loss with regard to disease. The tears you have shed over loss with regard to disease while transmigrating & wandering this long, long time — crying & weeping from being joined with what is displeasing, being separated from what is pleasing — are greater than the water in the four great oceans.

"Why is that? From an inconstruable beginning comes transmigration. A beginning point is not evident, though beings hindered by ignorance and fettered by craving are transmigrating & wandering on. Long have you thus experienced stress, experienced pain, experienced loss, swelling the cemeteries — enough to become disenchanted with all fabricated things, enough to become dispassionate, enough to be released."

Malcolm wrote:

<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn15/sn15.003.than.html>

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 17th, 2015 at 7:19 AM

Title: Re: Master Hsuan Hua on garlic, onions, etc.

Content:

TheSynergist said:

However, the idea that these "5 pungent plants" can result in bad rebirths and ghost attacks is quite a development.

Malcolm wrote:

Actually, garlic is a main ingredient in herbal formulas for repelling attacks by bhūtas, nāgas and so on.

But generally, one is to avoid eating it and onions because they grew from the drops of blood of Rahu mixed with amrita which fell to the earth when Rahu was decapitated. But because Rahu's blood was mixed with amrita, these plants are also medicinal.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 17th, 2015 at 5:54 AM

Title: Re: The Very Idea of Buddhist History

Content:

TheSynergist said:

Let me just say that I very much appreciated the discussion about Nāgārjuna. I myself wasn't sure if Nāgārjuna authored all the texts that are attributed to him and now I'm not alone in my skepticism.

Malcolm wrote:

There is a core body of texts called the collection of reasonings, another collection called the four praises, and then the Ratnavali and the Suhrillekha, which all generally accept are composed by Nāgārjuna I.

Then there are the texts authored by the siddhi Nāgārjuna who likely lived in the early 8th century, the disciple of Saraha senior.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 17th, 2015 at 4:21 AM

Title: Re: Master Hsuan Hua on garlic, onions, etc.

Content:

TheSynergist said:

I recently stumbled across Master Hsuan's commentary on the Shurangama Sutra, which contained this gem:

1) Do you think it's a good idea to abstain from the five pungent plants?

Malcolm wrote:

In the Lankāvatāra is recommended that one desist from eating garlic, and also in the lower tantras. Also Mulasarvastivadin bhikṣus and bhikṣunīs were supposed to avoid eating it, apart from as medicine for various complaints.

It probably has to do with the prohibition of garlic among Brahmins.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 17th, 2015 at 3:30 AM

Title: Re: Bardo and rebirth

Content:

umbra said:

I have read that there are practices one can do while alive, and techniques to employ in the Bardo-state, that gives the ability to choose the next incarnation, but no details ever seem to be given. What are the specific techniques and practices that gives one control to pick the next rebirth?

Malcolm wrote:

No details are ever given because these are Vajrayāna practices which require empowerments and authorization.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 17th, 2015 at 1:46 AM

Title: Re: Buddhism loses all purpose if you don't believe in reinc

Content:

Gyurme Kundrol said:

Unfortunately just putting your foot down and saying "If you don't believe, you aren't practicing Dharma!" is going to turn lots of people off from Dharma. This is exactly what religious institutions do and it's what is driving westerners out of religions by the millions.

Malcolm wrote:

If you wish to follow your own ideas, that is fine. I prefer to follow the advice of Mañjuśrī: If you have attachment to this life, you are not a Dharma practitioner. And will continue to recommend that other people understand and follow this advice.

Loren said:

I agree with you but not everyone is Sachen Kunga Nyingpo and an emanation of Manjushri. We do have to start off with where we are with our own understanding.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, and for that, Atisha's three kinds of persons is a useful place to start.

In order to understand how to become a Dharma practitioner, we need to understand how it is that we are not, and then correct those deficiencies. We should not congratulate ourselves on being Dharma practitioners merely because we have taken an interest in Dharma and gone to visit some Lamas, and maybe even do a little meditation or mantra. If our goal is this life's happiness, we are not practicing Dharma no matter who we are or what high teachings we have taken. Ironically, this is true even if we accept rebirth, have received Dzogchen and Mahamudra teachings, and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 17th, 2015 at 1:37 AM

Title: Re: The Very Idea of Buddhist History

Content:

yan kong said:

Forgive my gross ignorance, but is this the idea of an enduring, unchanging ego of some kind in Buddhism?

Malcolm wrote:

When tathagātagarbha is not correctly understood, then it becomes an incorrect view of self.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 17th, 2015 at 1:34 AM

Title: Re: Buddhism loses all purpose if you don't believe in reincarnation

Content:

Gyurme Kundrol said:

Unfortunately just putting your foot down and saying "If you don't believe, you aren't practicing Dharma!" is going to turn lots of people off from Dharma. This is exactly what religious institutions do and it's what is driving westerners out of religions by the millions.

Malcolm wrote:

If you wish to follow your own ideas, that is fine. I prefer to follow the advice of Mañjuśrī:

If you have attachment to this life, you are not a Dharma practitioner.

And will continue to recommend that other people understand and follow this advice.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 17th, 2015 at 12:15 AM

Title: Re: The Very Idea of Buddhist History

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

We have a body of work, recognized by everyone, east and west, as being Nāgārjuna's authentic work. There are other texts which are under dispute and have been for centuries. Irrespective of the merits of Dharmadhātustava on its own, we really cannot accept it as representative of Nāgārjuna's oeuvre or of his thought even if generations of Indians and Tibetans have accepted it as such.

dzogchungpa said:

These sweaters are just so unravelly, aren't they?

Bakmoon said:

Yes, but the point of a sweater is to wear it, not to pull it apart on purpose.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, I already mentioned this, to no avail apparently.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 16th, 2015 at 11:49 PM

Title: Re: Buddhism loses all purpose if you don't believe in reincarnation

Content:

Loren said:

I don't know. Even a practitioner of lowest capacity can practice the Dharma. (Although I think Queen Maya (don't know if she was middling, or highest) was, like Rahula, very lucky.) She was able to practice the Dharma in the god realm because of The Exalted One.

Malcolm wrote:

If someone's aim is the happiness and so on in this life, they are not even a practitioner of the lowest capacity since they are not following nor practicing the Dharma, even if they go for refuge to the Three Jewels. Their refuge is like trying to hire the Three Jewels as body guards.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 16th, 2015 at 11:47 PM

Title: Re: Buddhism loses all purpose if you don't believe in reincarnation

Content:

Kaccāni said:

I see no need to introduce a concept of multiple lives beyond that which can be experienced.

Malcolm wrote:

Buddha found it important, indeed his realization was predicated on it.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 16th, 2015 at 11:33 PM

Title: Re: The Very Idea of Buddhist History

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

In the context of sutrayāna, which is under discussion here, one's intellectual view must be in accordance with one's in meditation.

In Vajrayāna, the view is experientially introduced, and having a correct intellectual view is less important. In that post I was speaking from the perspective of Vajrayāna. In this post, I am speaking from the perspective of sūtra.

dzogchungpa said:
OK, now it all makes sense.

Malcolm wrote:
Sūtra is based on analysis, whereas Vajrayāna is based on empowerment, that is where the differences lay.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Monday, March 16th, 2015 at 10:09 PM
Title: Re: Buddhism loses all purpose if you don't believe in reincarnation
Content:

Malcolm wrote:
"If one is attached to this life, one is not a Dharma practitioner."

If your goal is to simply end suffering in this lifetime, you are not a Dharma practitioner.

Jesse said:
You really shouldn't make such comments so haphazardly.

Malcolm wrote:
It was a very deliberate comment, not haphazard at all.

If you are only interested in ending suffering in this life, this means you are only interested in happiness in this life. If this is the case, whatever else you may be, you are not a Dharma practitioner.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Monday, March 16th, 2015 at 9:29 PM
Title: Re: The Very Idea of Buddhist History
Content:

Malcolm wrote:
We have a body of work, recognized by everyone, east and west, as being Nāgārjuna's authentic work. There are other texts which are under dispute and have been for centuries. Irrespective of the merits of Dharmadhātustava on its own, we really cannot accept it as representative of Nāgārjuna's oeuvre or of his thought even if generations of Indians and Tibetans have accepted it as such.

dzogchungpa said:
These sweaters are just so unravelling, aren't they?

Malcolm wrote:
Well, this is why we have darning needles.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 16th, 2015 at 9:22 PM

Title: Re: Buddhism loses all purpose if you don't believe in reinc

Content:

Sherlock said:

But the whole path of Buddhadharma depends on reincarnation being the problem to solve.

Anders said:

That is not strictly true. The problem to solve is suffering.

The end of rebirth is central to this because of the implications that to take birth again will inevitably keep lead to suffering, going on indefinitely.

But the end of rebirth is not the central issue per se. And suffering in this life is as relevant as the next.

Sherlock said:

If you don't believe it you are not really taking refuge in the Buddha.

Anders said:

According to whom? If this in IYHO, you should say so.

Malcolm wrote:

"If one is attached to this life, one is not a Dharma practitioner."

If your goal is to simply end suffering in this lifetime, you are not a Dharma practitioner.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 16th, 2015 at 8:45 PM

Title: Re: Letters from self recognized tulkus

Content:

tle said:

Reason, I do like your gradual way of breaking the news to them and will ask around for a psychiatrist who's willing to take the time.

Malcolm wrote:

A psychologist, unless they are in fact a buddhist, will not have the proper background to deal with this delusion. Plus, this is not Tibet or India where the soft approach will have much impact. I have seen a number of self-proclaimed tulkus lead their followers down pretty sordid roads. So, speaking as a westerner who has been in the Dharma for half of my life, and most of my adult life, it is better to nip this in the bud with a direct and decisive approach. Even, then, it is relatively easy to get some Tibetan to say you are a tulku if you happen to display an aptitude for Dharma, and a bit of cash.

For example, i have no memory of any past lives. But I can infer that I was some kind of practitioner in my past life due to the ease with which I met the Dharma and gurus in this life. But I am not a tulku, nor would I permit anyone to give me such a recognition for a couple of reasons.

i have met a number of very sad individuals who have been very damaged by this fantasy, and others who used this fantasy to defraud others, and yet others who in my opinion use this idea that they are a tulku or emanation to expand their influence with the naive.

This is not Tibet or India, where there is a proper structure for educating and training reincarnated lamas, as well as a cultural precedent for it. Every western Tibetan Buddhist has a past life connection with Tibet, so it is better to emphasize this, but discourage the idea that someone is a tulku. As you know, to be a real tulku you should be recognized when quite young.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 16th, 2015 at 7:40 AM

Title: Re: The Very Idea of Buddhist History

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

For example, there is a way of understanding tathāgatagarbha that does not conflict with the main body of Buddhist thinking, and there is a way of understanding it that causes one to have wrong view.

dzogchungpa said:

Like, say,

<https://www.dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=48&t=8318&p=101573#p101573>:

What does it matter if you believe in tathāgatagarbha which is described in so many tathāgatagarbha texts as a self (though, perish the thought, not the SAME self as advocated by the Hindus -- actually, if someone is really, really honest with themselves, they will admit it is impossible to differentiate the sat cit ananda of the Hindus from the atman, sukha, nitya, śuddha of the uttaratantra)?

?

Malcolm wrote:

In the context of sutrayāna, which is under discussion here, one's intellectual view must be in accordance with one's in meditation.

In Vajrayāna, the view is experientially introduced, and having a correct intellectual view is less important. In that post I was speaking from the perspective of Vajrayāna. In this post, I am speaking from the perspective of sūtra.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 16th, 2015 at 6:43 AM

Title: Re: The Very Idea of Buddhist History

Content:

Sherlock said:

You said he was second Buddha earlier confused

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, I did. Refer to Domsum about poetic license.

"...even common Geshess are referred to as Buddhas, what is permissible for poets is not acceptable to scholars..."

or something like that.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 16th, 2015 at 6:37 AM

Title: Re: The Very Idea of Buddhist History

Content:

smcj said:

We have a body of work, recognized by everyone, east and west, as being Nāgārjuna's authentic work. There are other texts which are under dispute and have been for centuries. Irrespective of the merits of Dharmadhātustava on its own, we really cannot accept it as representative of Nāgārjuna's oeuvre or of his thought even if generations of Indians and Tibetans have accepted it as such. It does not necessarily mean it conflicts with Nāgārjuna's thought, but when this text is interpreted in such a way that to clearly does conflict with Nāgārjuna's thought, one cannot say, "This is how I am reading the Dharmadhātustava, and therefore this is what Nāgārjuna also maintained."

For example, there is a way of understanding tathāgatagarbha that does not conflict with the main body of Buddhist thinking, and there is a way of understanding it that causes one to have wrong view.

As I said, I find it difficult to believe the Dharmadhātustava is by the same Nagarjuna. And no, it is not the type of scripture that authenticates itself. If it does not come from an enlightened mind it is not "Dharma". My point being that if someone like Karmapa III sees it as Dharma, then based on his credibility that is good enough for me to accept it regardless of the authorship issue. It's like having a co-signer. At that point it could be traditionally credited to Bozo the Clown for all I care.

Malcolm wrote:

There is all kind of valid Dharma that does not come from people who are quote unquote "enlightened". Even Nāgārjuna was only a first stage bodhisattva.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 16th, 2015 at 6:21 AM

Title: Re: Western Tulku and adequate training.

Content:

kirtu said:

However ultimately Wyatt (and every other western "tulku") have to find the energy and direction from their own inner resources.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, just like normal people, since that is what they are.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 16th, 2015 at 6:15 AM

Title: Re: The Very Idea of Buddhist History

Content:

smcj said:

The original reason I brought this up was to make the point that it really doesn't matter one way or another. The somewhat muddled history hasn't limited anybody's practice in the last 1,000 years! That being the case, what possible difference does it make?

Malcolm wrote:

It matters when someone makes a claim asserting that it represents Nāgārjuna's thought, since he is the second Buddha.

smcj said:

Nagarjuna's "Reasonings" stand on their own merit. It is a case where the work validates itself, just like Shakespeare's plays are not dependent on who wrote them. His "Praises" are another issue.

Other types of teachings are more dependent on being validated by the source. However if (as is the premise of my position) later generations of yogis that have realization confirm the value of the scripture then you can say it receives authentication that way, much like Shakyamuni giving his stamp of approval on something that Ananada said. Therefore the historicity of the source need not be the only source of validation. The validation can be confirmed by a modern master--but only by a master, not an academic.

Malcolm wrote:

We have a body of work, recognized by everyone, east and west, as being Nāgārjuna's authentic work. There are other texts which are under dispute and have been for centuries. Irrespective of the merits of Dharmadhātustava on its own, we really cannot accept it as representative of Nāgārjuna's oeuvre or of his thought even if generations of Indians and Tibetans have accepted it as such. It does not necessarily mean it conflicts with Nāgārjuna's thought, but when this text is interpreted in such a way that to clearly does conflict with Nāgārjuna's thought, one cannot say, "This is how I am reading the Dharmadhātustava, and therefore this is what Nāgārjuna also maintained."

For example, there is a way of understanding tathāgatagarbha that does not conflict with the main body of Buddhist thinking, and there is a way of understanding it that causes one to have wrong view.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 16th, 2015 at 5:37 AM

Title: Re: The Very Idea of Buddhist History

Content:

smcj said:

The original reason I brought this up was to make the point that it really doesn't matter one way or another. The somewhat muddled history hasn't limited anybody's practice in the last 1,000 years! That being the case, what possible difference does it make?

Malcolm wrote:

It matters when someone makes a claim asserting that it represents Nāgārjuna's thought, since he is the second Buddha.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 16th, 2015 at 5:21 AM

Title: Re: Western Tulku and adequate training.

Content:

kirtu said:

I remember the biography of Dezhung Rinpoche saying the younger Khons in the US not being very interested in the Dharma, which is sad.

Remember that HE Dezhung Rinpoche died in 1987. That observation applied to what is now the middle generation in the US and is no longer valid.

Malcolm wrote:

Agreed , Kirt, there are a number of Phuntsog Phodrang Dungseys presently being trained in India. This is actually one of the main reasons HHST and HHJS agreed on the rotational system of Trizins, so all their training would not be wasted.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 16th, 2015 at 2:06 AM

Title: Re: Letters from self recognized tulkus

Content:

ReasonAndRhyme said:

What I never did was directly confront people in the style Malcolm suggested.

Malcolm wrote:

People ask me sometimes, or proffer their idea, and I have two answers:

"I am not an awakened person, so don't ask me", followed quickly by, "You probably are not a tulku, and even if you are, you probably should abandon the idea and be happy you are just a normal, regular person who is no one special."

I have met people who were convinced they were tulkus and one hundred percent miserable that no one had recognized them as such. I have met plenty of so called western tulkus recognized by this or that Tibetan and not one was something special.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 16th, 2015 at 1:42 AM

Title: Re: Letters from self recognized tulkus

Content:

Fortyeightvows said:

What if some of the children really are tulkus?

Malcolm wrote:

Then their qualities will manifest without or without recognition.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 16th, 2015 at 1:05 AM

Title: Re: Letters from self recognized tulkus

Content:

tle said:

I decided when I joined this forum that I wouldn't identify myself so that I could speak my mind.

If you're thinking I'm some famous person you're mistaken. Many of the letters I receive have my name misspelled; which goes to show just how important I am lol.

Someone suggested in PM to refer them to someone else, and give them the run around until they give up. Immediately people who cannot be reached, but have an address to mail to, came to mind. What do you think?

Malcolm wrote:

I don't think you are a famous person, that is not the point, the point is why would people bother sending you such letters?

In general, my opinion is that you just be direct with them and encourage them to give up this delusion.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, March 15th, 2015 at 9:27 PM

Title: Re: Gradual vs. Nongradual

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

So, when I said there is no common ground, this is perhaps a bit of an overstatement, but what I really mean is that Śāntarakṣita is not basing himself on the treatises of the Yogacara masters.

Tom said:

This is still a huge assumption. It is likely that many of the ideas/arguments of Vasubhandu can be traced through to Śāntarakṣita and Kamaliśīla. Research on this to be published in the not too distant future.

Malcolm wrote:

Perhaps, but I am not seeing it. For example, in the Madhyamakālaṃkāravṛtti, there are exactly nine reference to paratantra, for example. Kind of surprising for such a lengthy commentary on an ostensibly Yogacara System, but there are a number of important passages from the Lanka and so on.

So I will wait and see this research.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, March 15th, 2015 at 7:34 PM

Title: Re: Letters from self recognized tulkus

Content:

tle said:

Because of my affiliations I get quite a few letters from around the USA from people who want to be recognized as the reincarnation of this lama or that.

I used to send replies explaining that neither I, nor someone I know, is qualified to recognize this or that lama's reincarnation, the second coming of Jesus, or whatever.

The responses tended to lead to more letters and people showing up at the temple to prove they had miraculous powers so I stopped replying. Every month I usually have a few of these letters to shred, or more often emails to delete, to protect the privacy of people I recognize probably have a mental illness.

This isn't entirely unique to the Western world. In Asia it tends to be parents bringing in toddlers and explaining elephant dreams.

I'd like some outside perspective on this phenomenon as I have been receiving more than one letter a day for the past 2 weeks from a "reincarnation" of protector deity we practice here and their following of 2 or 3 students. They must have spent $40 on postage alone and they just seem to want validation, but I can't give them that.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, who are you to be receiving such letters?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, March 15th, 2015 at 7:31 PM

Title: Re: Nyingma Khenpo in S.F. area 3/21/15-3/22/15

Content:

smcj said:

Sat: Dependent Arising, Emptiness & Modern Life

Sun a.m.: Samadhi & Dzogchen

Sun p.m.: Vajrasattva

<http://www.dechenrang.com/event.html>

I don't know him or what flavor of Nyingma he represents, but Khenpos are generally pretty reliable as scholars and Nyingma Khenpos are rare.

Malcolm wrote:

It is the flavor of my guru , Khenpo Jigmr Phutsog, who was truly an amazing master.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, March 15th, 2015 at 4:33 AM

Title: Re: The Very Idea of Buddhist History

Content:

daverupa said:

Well, as sure as one can be about history, I'm sure you meant.

Malcolm wrote:

I am sure there was not a factory of pandita's churning texts branded "Nāgārjuna", just as I am equally sure there were at least two persons named Nāgārjuna who wrote texts whose identities became conflated, first by Indians, and later, by Tibetans.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, March 15th, 2015 at 4:02 AM

Title: Re: Buddhism loses all purpose if you don't believe in reinc

Content:

Matt J said:

I think this is clearly covered in the Kalamas Sutta.

The Buddha runs through the options, Pascal-wager like, and bets that his path which leads to the end of a "hate-filled" mind works in any event:

"Suppose there is a hereafter and there is a fruit, result, of deeds done well or ill. Then it is possible that at the dissolution of the body after death, I shall arise in the heavenly world, which is possessed of the state of bliss.' This is the first solace found by him.

"Suppose there is no hereafter and there is no fruit, no result, of deeds done well or ill. Yet in this world, here and now, free from hatred, free from malice, safe and sound, and happy, I keep myself.' This is the second solace found by him.

"Suppose evil (results) befall an evil-doer. I, however, think of doing evil to no one. Then, how can ill (results) affect me who do no evil deed?' This is the third solace found by him.

"Suppose evil (results) do not befall an evil-doer. Then I see myself purified in any case.' This is the fourth solace found by him.

Emphasis added.

<http://www.accesstoinsight.org/lib/authors/soma/wheel008.html>

Malcolm wrote:

This not a liberation teaching.

If someone wishes for liberation as taught by the Buddha, then they must understand the teaching of karma and rebirth as it is taught by the Buddha.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, March 15th, 2015 at 2:50 AM

Title: Re: The Very Idea of Buddhist History

Content:

smcj said:

Your analogy is not apt — it is not like there was a Nāgārjuna factory punching out texts branded "Nāgārjuna".

You sure about that?

Malcolm wrote:

Yeah, I am.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, March 15th, 2015 at 2:40 AM

Title: Re: The Very Idea of Buddhist History

Content:

smcj said:

Like I said, I don't care.

I accept the Dharmadhatustava as authentic Dharma with no need to resolve the authorship question. I also don't care that Henry Ford had no part in producing the Mustang, yet I have no problem accepting the Mustang as an authentic Ford product.

Malcolm wrote:

Yogacara of Asanga is authentic Dharma, but I do not accept its ultimate conclusions;

Abhidharma is authentic Dharma, but I do not accept its ultimate conclusions. Dharmadhātustava is an authentic Dharma text, but I certainly don't think we need to accept the claim it is a work of Nāgārjuna's and therefore consider it an authority that we need to take into account in order to take stock of Nāgārjuna's actual views on this and that.

The point is that it is not representative of the thought of Nāgārjuna I, and when it is conflated with Nāgārjuna I's works, it creates interpretive problems and headaches that simply are not necessary and obscure things.

Your analogy is not apt — it is not like there was a Nāgārjuna factory punching out texts branded "Nāgārjuna".

As a text, it is important, especially in a Vajrayāna context, but it should be treated on its own, and not as an emblem of some hidden or esoteric allegiance to the tathāgatagarbha school on the part of Nāgārjuna numero uno.

It is important to understand that Nārōpa thought it was a valid text of Nāgārjuna I, and to understand how that may have shaped his attitude towards things (less radically than you imagine), and so on. But clearly, despite Atisha's enthusiasm for it, he clearly understood it in light of Candrakīrti's approach to Madhyamaka. In other words, we need to understand this text, its importance in formation of certain ideas because it was attributed to Nāgārjuna without conflating the text with Nāgārjuna's actual works.

I have really tremendous respect for KB's scholarship, but somehow, I think he has an emotional relationship with gzhan stong that causes him to err in his estimation of certain texts, even when he writes very clearly on textual issues and brings out facts that very clearly contradict and repudiate the claims that gzhan stong scholars make.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, March 15th, 2015 at 1:34 AM

Title: Re: The Very Idea of Buddhist History

Content:

smcj said:

That is because Nāgārjuna I did not write it. The author of the Dharmadhātustava is the same Nāgārjuna who wrote the Bodhicittavivaraṇa and the Pañcakrama.

I'm working off of Brunnholzl's book where he cites Candrakīrti as having listed the "Praises" (the collection) as being authored by Nāgārjuna, and Atisha specifically credits the Dharmadhātustava to him. Since you disagree, and since this is way way over my head, I'll let you contact Brunnholzl about it directly.

But like I said, I find it difficult to believe it's the same guy too. The point of my post being that I really don't care!

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, Candra lists the praises, but does not detail this one. The earliest reference we have to the Dharmadhātustava being a composition of Nāgārjuna is by Dharmamitra (9th century, disciple of Haribhadra) in his Abhisamayālaṃkārikāprajñāpāramitopadeśaśāstraṭīkā prasphuṭapadā-nāma. Naropa considers it to be a composition of Nāgārjuna's, as does Atisha and Jagaddalanivāsin. However, a commentary on Hevajra Tantra, likely composed in the 12th century, cites a passage from the Dharmadhātustava, saying only that "some ārya said,"..." — this indicates to me some doubt in Indian circles as to the veracity of the source.

So while of course there is a late tradition that this text was composed by Nāgārjuna dating from the ninth century (Dharmamitra), the absence of any reference to it all in earlier Madhyamaka sources, especially Candrakīrti, indicates it cannot be accepted as part of Nāgārjuna's oeuvre. David Ruegg has also cast doubt on its composition, wondering at the fact that significant portions of it are reproduced in Atisha's Dharmadhātudarśanagīti which is included in the rgyud section of the bstan 'gyur, but I think Atisha was just riffing on it.

Given that the fact that 10th-11th century Indians like Naropa and Atisha accepted the Mulamadhyamaka-kārikas and the Pañcakrama side by side as the work of the same Nāgārjuna, I think we can understand that they did not know how to distinguish the authentic works of Nāgārjuna from works by later authors of the same name.

Then there is the fact that the Dharmadhātustava was not translated into Tibetan until the 11th century ((like the Bodhicittavivarana and so on) by Kṛṣṇa Paṇḍita and Lotsawa Tsultrim Gyalwa, and I think we can understand this text was probably composed in early ninth century by the siddha Nāgārjuna. Also, if you examine carefully, you will find only that Candrakīrti mentions four praises as being authentic, these are the Lokakīṭa, Nirupamya, Acintya and Paramārthastavas. This does not mean these four are in fact compositions of Nāgārjuna, merely that they are a restricted list accepted by the middle period Madhyamikas (we can exclude the Madhyamakapradīpa, because Bhāvya and Bhāvaviveka are different people).

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, March 14th, 2015 at 9:21 PM

Title: Re: Gradual vs. Nongradual

Content:

Wayfarer said:

Would this simile be acceptable: 'knowing is to mind as illumination is to light'?

Malcolm wrote:

Basically, what Śāntarakṣita is attempting to point out is that mind is a knower intrinsically, that its capacity for knowing is an innate quality. This is somewhat in distinction with the idea that it is the meeting of a sense organ with a sense object that gives rise to a consciousness of a given object.

One should contrast this with Candarkīrti and Śāntideva's critiques of rang rig to fully understand the issue.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, March 14th, 2015 at 9:17 PM

Title: Re: How does 18 early Buddhism School Related to Mahayana?

Content:

Aemilius said:

Nagarjuna, who lived two or three centuries before Asanga and Vasubandu, is at least in one place criticizing the Yogacara view, (found that in Christian Lindtner's Master of Wisdom, Writings of Nagarjuna).

.

Malcolm wrote:

You are referring to the Bodhicittavivarana, this late tantric text is associated with the Guhyasamaja Tantra — I have no idea why Lindtner imagines it is by Nāgārjuna I, there is no chance that it is.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, March 14th, 2015 at 7:17 AM

Title: Re: Gradual vs. Nongradual

Content:

anjali said:

=

Somehow, though, the phrase "knowing inherent to consciousness" doesn't quite explicitly capture the self-knowing dimension of that inherent knowing.

Malcolm wrote:

It does not know itself, that exactly Śāntarakṣita's point. It is just an inherent knower. If this knower knew itself, it would be susceptible to refutations leveled by Śāntarakṣita against such a self-knower because it would become an object, viz this rebuttal:

Due to the characteristic of rang rig being a mere entity of clarity, if there is an object that becomes the knower while it is being known, since this will consequently harm your claim for two aspects, you also cannot make such an assertion.

In other words, rang rig is merely a term for the clarity of consciousness, just as clarity is merely a term for the rang rig of consciousness. But it is clear from all of the places where Śāntarakṣita and Kamalaśīla deal with the problem of rang rig, they reject the idea that it is a knower that is capable of taking itself as an object — which is the classic madhyamika objection to rang rig. Thus Śāntarakṣita is redefining rang rig for his own purposes as the mere clarity of consciousness in order to differentiate consciousness from insentient phenomena such as rock, chariots, and walls. This must be understood to be distinct from the svasamvedana proposed by the Pramāṇavārttika and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, March 14th, 2015 at 6:02 AM

Title: Re: Gradual vs. Nongradual

Content:

anjali said:

Hmm. Why the "[intrinsic]" in the above quotes? Is that your take on how "reflexive" should be understood? Or is it part of the actual quotations?

Malcolm wrote:

I guess you did not notice this sentence:

malcolm said:

...it is probably bad practice to define Śāntarakṣita's "rang rig", "svasamvedana" as either a "self-cognizing cognition" or a "reflexive knower", it is probably better to understand it as "intrinsic knowing", since that fits with how it is being defined above. Taking a look at Śāntarakṣita's definition of svasamvedana, it takes the form of: The nature of X is Y.

In this case, The nature of X (intrinsic clarity) is Y (the reflexive knowing of consciousness).

X and Y aren't the same thing, in the same sense that mind and the nature of mind are not the same thing.

Malcolm wrote:

It is not talking about the nature of the mind in that sense. However, from a Madhyamaka point of view, one cannot separate a thing from its nature, for example, fire and heat are not two separate things, clarity and consciousness too are not separate things. Here, clarity, the nature of consciousness, is the knowing inherent to consciousness, which is what distinguishes consciousness from inert things like rocks, bricks and walls.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, March 14th, 2015 at 3:30 AM

Title: Re: Gradual vs. Nongradual

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

There is no common ground with Yogacara and Shantarakṣita either.

Greg said:

"No common ground" seems a bit of an overstatement to me, based on the fact that Śāntarakṣita 1) famously claimed in the MA that one should "ride the chariots of the two systems" and 2) he accepts self-cognizing cognition at the level of saṃvṛiti-satya.

Malcolm wrote:

Your second statement should be examined first — which svasamvedana is Śāntarakṣita advocating?

What Śāntarakṣita says in fact about svasamvedana in the root text is only:

Because a tripartite nature cannot be accepted in the nature of one partless [entity], such a reflexive knower
is not an entity that has an action and and agent.

Śāntarakṣita's auto-commentary states:

"Though a reflexive [intrinsic] knower is imputed in relative truth, it cannot withstand an analysis into one or many", thus [the issue] has been settled.

He then defines an acceptable svasamvedana:

That being the case, the nature of intrinsic clarity that does not depend on another clarifier is the reflexive [intrinsic] knowing of consciousness.

Kamalaśīla's Madhyamakālaṃkārapañjikā supports this saying:

The concise meaning is that the function of reflexive [intrinsic] knowing is only to be the opposite of inert substances such as chariots, walls and so on. It is a convention for a clarity that does not depend on anything.

And:

Due to the characteristic of reflexive [intrinsic] knowing being a mere entity of clarity, if there is an object that becomes the knower while it is being known, since this will consequently harm your claim for two aspects, you also cannot make such an assertion. So this is quite a bit different than what most people take svasamvedana to mean. BTW, given this context, it is probably bad practice to define Śāntarakṣita's "rang rig", "svasamvedana" as either a "self-cognizing cognition" or a "reflexive knower", it is probably better to understand it as "intrinsic knowing", since that fits with how it is being defined above.

Then, Śāntarakṣita states:

One should know that external entities do not exist based on mind-only;
based on this approach [tshul] one can truly understand the absence of a self.

And comments:

Based on the approach of mind-only, it is easy to understand the absence of nature [niḥsvabhāva] of I and mine, apprehending subject and apprehended object and so on, asserted as external to a concomitant mind. Since this approach is the non-existence of self-origination, that mind is also understood to be without nature. When this middle path free of all extremes is understood, the freedom from having a nature of one or many is truly understood as the absence of a nature.

In terms of the two approaches, it is true that Śāntarakṣita states:

Having mounted the chariot of the two approaches, holding the reins of reasoning, in just that way therefore, they will obtain the Mahāyāna.

But it never clearly specified that he is combining Asanga and Nāgārjuna's system. In his auto-commentary, all that is said about this is a citation from the Lanka: The Mahāyāna is included in two approaches. The brief explanation follows:

Five dharmas, three natures, eight consciousnesses,
and two selflessness encompass the entire Mahāyāna.

Kamalaśīla's Madhyamakālaṃkārapañjikā does however state pretty clearly that the two approaches are Madhyamaka and Yogacara. He expands on the list given in the Lanka as well.

But which Yogacara is Kamalaśīla referring to? It is pretty clear that Śāntarakṣita is not basing himself upon the Yogacara of Asanga and so on that, but rather the Yogacara of the Lanka and other related sūtras.

So, when I said there is no common ground, this is perhaps a bit of an overstatement, but what I really mean is that Śāntarakṣita is not basing himself on the treatises of the Yogacara masters.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, March 14th, 2015 at 12:44 AM

Title: Re: Gradual vs. Nongradual

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

That is still not a positive affirmation, and also, Della Santina has it a little wrong. The controversy is over how to negate non-Buddhists, which Bhavaviveka started by rejecting Buddhapalita's consequential argument when the latter rejected Samkhya origination from self.

Vajrasvapna said:

I was not talking about the definition of the absolute, both groups defined ultimate truth like emptiness through logic. However, a group accepted that it is possible to express and elaborate on ultimate truth while the other denies this possibility:

"The Indian Svitantrikas who followed Bhavaviveka admittedly differed slightly with respect to what may be termed their ontological interpretations of Buddhist doctrine. Nevertheless, the mode of argument favoured by them was generally uniform.

They believed that the principles of formal logic were not irrelevant to the demonstration of the Madhyamaka philosophy to an opponent. They employed syllogisms whose members were commonly admitted to be established by valid instruments of cognition. The Prasangikas rejected this practice because they maintained that on the occasion of ascertaining the nature of the ultimate truth, neither the subject of inference nor the reason exist for the Madhyamaka. Hence, they concluded it was inconsistent for the Madhyamaka philosophy to admit independent syllogisms, when the ultimate truth was investigated." p. 92 in 'Madhyamaka Schools in India' by Peter D. Santina,

Malcolm wrote:

This still does not amount to a "positive expression of the absolute".

In order to understand the difference between Bhavavivka and Candra, you have to refer to the argument I mention above. Basically, Buddhapalita states:

Therein, some existents cannot arise from themselves because the arising of those would be purposeless and because arising would be without end. Thus, arising would not be necessary for existents existing in and of themselves. If although [such things] exist, [they] still arise, and because there will never be non-arising, that is not desirable there. Therefore, something existent does not arise from self.

Bhavaviveka rejects this because this argument is not formed as a proper syllogism that an opponent would accept. It is a consequence, not a syllogism. He says of this that it is insufficient to turn someone away from the Samkhya view. He says:

[A]nother explains "existents cannot arise from themselves because the arising of those would be purposeless and because arising would be without end." That is not reasonable because no reason [hetu] and example is mentioned, because the faults stated by others will be not dispelled...."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, March 13th, 2015 at 11:20 PM

Title: Re: How does 18 early Buddhism School Related to Mahayana?

Content:

usnisha said:

if Yogacara is originated from Sarvastivada (Asanga and Vasubandhu are from Sarvastivada), From which school Madhyamaka is originated?

Aemilius said:

From Vasubandhu in Abhidharmakosa it seems evident that Yogachara had existed long before the time of Asanga and Vasubandhu. Because Vasubandhu often calls Yogacharins the Ancient Masters. The meaning is that Yogachara was the ancient school when compared to the Vibhassa of Sarvastivada, which was then modern and that Vasubandhu was commenting on.

It is quite certain that the Three turnings of Dharma existed originally, because the Sravakayana had to include a strained explanation for it in their Canon, (i.e. that they all refer to the four noble truths!)

I think that Yogacara and Madhyamaka both originated from the Buddha himself.

Asanga was not a Sarvastivadin, some scholars think that he may have been a Mahishasaka in his youth. Vasubandhu converted to Mahayana due to the influence of Asanga.

usnisha said:

I am quite confused now, Asanga the one who popularize yogacara isn't it ? how is he related to Mahisasaka?

if it is originated from Buddha himself, there should be a trace either from Mahasanghika or Staviras, or maybe from Licchavi Vimalakirti (Vimalakirti is not a bhiksu, but a Highly realized being) or other Boddhisattvas that manifest in human being during the Buddha's lifetime.

and more Interesting if yogacara is originated from ancient time, is it related to Master Patanjali a non-Buddhist and theosophy follower? Patanjali is the one who popularize yoga (= name is similiar), and from my understanding, yoga is a kind of philosophy in india.

Malcolm wrote:

Personally, I see a lot of influence from Samkhya in Yogacara theory.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, March 13th, 2015 at 10:57 PM

Title: Re: How does 18 early Buddhism School Related to Mahayana?

Content:

Wayfarer said:

'Mahayana' is not a school of Buddhism - there are many different 'schools' within Mahayana. Theravada (= Way of the Elders) is much more like a single school. The history and ancestry of the Buddhist lineages is a very complex topic which is made very difficult by the fact that many of the early schools left very few traces of their existence.

There is information on the question, but it takes research and reading to get to it. In terms of popular books which give an outline, I would recommend Buddhism: Its Essence and Development by Conze which is a standard text.

Malcolm wrote:

Mahāyāna schools in India are Madhyamaka and Yogacara, and arguable, Tathagatagarbha.

usnisha said:

if Yogacara is originated from Sarvastivada (Asanga and Vasubandhu are from Sarvastivada), From which school Madyamaka is originated?

Malcolm wrote:

It has been argued that Nāgārjuna was a Sammitiya, and this also makes some sense since the only version of karma that Nāgārjuna admits to liking is the theory of karma is that school.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, March 13th, 2015 at 10:34 PM

Title: Re: Gradual vs. Nongradual

Content:

Vajrasvapna said:

I was talking about the Independent Syllogism: "It is after all our fundamental contention that the essential difference between the Prasatigika and Svatantrika schools lies in their acceptance or non-acceptance of the independent syllogism on the occasion of establishing the ultimate truth. It is, therefore, not our purpose to investigate in detail the ontological considerations which were entered into by Svatantrika philosophers inasmuch as they belonged to the Yogacara or Sautrantika schools. It is our aim in this study to concentrate upon the difference between the Prasatigika and Svatantrika schools with respect to the mode of argument which they adopted in order to explicate the Madhyamaka philosophy." p 75 in 'Madhyamaka Schools in India' by Peter D. Santina.

Malcolm wrote:

That is still not a positive affirmation, and also, Della Santina has it a little wrong. The controversy is over how to negate non-Buddhists, which Bhavaviveka started by rejecting Buddhapalita's consequential argument when the latter rejected Samkhya origination from self.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, March 13th, 2015 at 8:20 PM

Title: Re: Gradual vs. Nongradual

Content:

Vajrasvapna said:

The idea that Shantarakshita separates the two truths is not really correct, because even on the relative level he claimed that everything is not truly existent. The difference, in fact, is that he used positive affirmations to express the absolute...

Malcolm wrote:

He asserts that while some say that the ultimate is non-origination, he prefers to describe it as inexpressible. But this is not a "positive affirmation to express the absolute."

This is all Śāntarakṣita says about the ultimate:

Therefore, the Tathāgatas have said

all phenomena have not arisen because it corresponds with ultimate truth —

this is called "the ultimate truth."

Due to the absence of arising and so on, nonarising and so on are impossible.

Due the negation of that [nonarising], words for it are not possible.

He states quite clearly and plainly that nonarising was taught by the Buddhas because it corresponds with ultimate truth. He then further examines nonarising and establishes it too is impossible in absence of something which arose, and that impossibility is inexpressible, there are no words for it.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, March 13th, 2015 at 7:56 PM

Title: Re: Gradual vs. Nongradual

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

There is no common ground with Yogacara and Shantarakṣita either.

PorkChop said:

Because in the ultimate sense he was a Madhyamika?

The idea of using Yogacara to explain the conventional and Madhyamaka for the ultimate does have a sort of elegance.

Malcolm wrote:

Śāntarakṣita makes absolutely no use of the key Yogacara concepts, the imagined nature, the dependent nature and the perfected nature, or for that matter, ālayavijñāṇ. The term "Yogacara" Madhyamaka, a misnomer, is a Tibetan appellation, it is not an Indian one.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, March 13th, 2015 at 7:44 AM

Title: Re: The Very Idea of Buddhist History

Content:

smcj said:

Off topic; but there are many who assert there were indeed two separate Nāgārjuna: (i) the Siddha Nāgārjuna and (ii) Ācārya Nāgārjuna.

Though their sentiments and expositions are not antithetical at all, not sure how you came to that conclusion.

Have you read it? It reads like a text by Asanga.

Malcolm wrote:

No, it does not really read like a Yogacara text at all either, it reads like a Vajrayāna text, which is in fact what it is.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, March 13th, 2015 at 7:43 AM

Title: Re: The Very Idea of Buddhist History

Content:

smcj said:

Let me use a personal example: I find it very very difficult to believe that Nagarjuna wrote "In Praise of Dharmadhatu" (Skt: Dharmadhatustava).

Malcolm wrote:

That is because Nāgārjuna I did not write it. The author of the Dharmadhātustava is the same Nāgārjuna who wrote the Bodhicittavivaraṇa and the Pañcakrama.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 11th, 2015 at 8:14 PM

Title: Re: How does 18 early Buddhism School Related to Mahayana?

Content:

Wayfarer said:

'Mahayana' is not a school of Buddhism - there are many different 'schools' within Mahayana. Theravada (= Way of the Elders) is much more like a single school. The history and ancestry of the Buddhist lineages is a very complex topic which is made very difficult by the fact that many of the early schools left very few traces of their existence.

There is information on the question, but it takes research and reading to get to it. In terms of popular books which give an outline, I would recommend Buddhism: Its Essence and Development by Conze which is a standard text.

Malcolm wrote:

Mahāyāna schools in India are Madhyamaka and Yogacara, and arguable, Tathagatagarbha.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 11th, 2015 at 7:25 AM

Title: Re: Gradual vs. Nongradual

Content:

PorkChop said:

Malcolm,

Sorry to butt in, but does that quote lend credence to the idea that there's a common ground between Yogacara masters like Asanga & Vasubandhu and Indian Madhyamikas, prior to Śāntarakṣita?

Malcolm wrote:

No, not at all.

PorkChop said:

Oh well. Guess I'll just stick with Śāntarakṣita then. Thanks.

Malcolm wrote:

There is no common ground with Yogacara and Shantarakṣita either.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 11th, 2015 at 7:18 AM

Title: Re: Gradual vs. Nongradual

Content:

PorkChop said:

Malcolm,

Sorry to butt in, but does that quote lend credence to the idea that there's a common ground between Yogacara masters like Asanga & Vasubandhu and Indian Madhyamikas, prior to Śāntarakṣita?

Malcolm wrote:

No, not at all.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 11th, 2015 at 6:14 AM

Title: Re: The Very Idea of Buddhist History

Content:

TheSynergist said:

Seriously? It's hard to think of people more obsessed with worshiping the Buddha than Mahayanists. This is a point I allude to in my recent post, where I talked about how later scriptures play up the Buddha's (yes, the flesh and blood Buddha's) God-like qualities.

Also, bear in mind that the traditional Mahayana account posits that the historical Buddha did in fact teach the Mahayana Sutras, a point Malcolm likes to emphasize.

Malcolm wrote:

Mahāyānists don't worship the Buddha, we respect the Buddha, we are devoted to the Buddha. The Buddha of the Mahāyāna does not have "god-like" qualities anymore than the Buddha of the Hinayāna. He has the same powers, fearlessnesses, and so on. If there is a distinction to be made, it is in the understanding of what a Buddha's omniscience covers.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 11th, 2015 at 4:32 AM

Title: Re: Gradual vs. Nongradual

Content:

Unknown said:

(V)irtually all early Indian Yogacara masters (such as Asanga, Vasubandhu, Sthiramati, and Asvabhava), if they refer to the term tathagatagarbha at all, always explain it as nothing but suchness in the sense of twofold identitylessness. Thus, all Indian Madhyamikas (except for Nagarjuna in his Dharmadhatustava) and virtually all classical Yogacara masters up to the tenth century were not willing to openly embrace the tathagatagarbha teachings as anything other than emptiness...

Malcolm wrote:

When the Clouds Part, BrunnholzL.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 11th, 2015 at 4:16 AM

Title: Re: The Very Idea of Buddhist History

Content:

TheSynergist said:

Just to elaborate on this point, while we might think that uncritically accepting tradition is preserving history, it's not.

Further elaborating, in reference to the Sujato post: later narratives emphasize the "awesomeness" of the Bodhisattva/Buddha (e.g., they are perfect embodiments of pure compassion, they spend aeons and aeons of lifetimes preparing for Buddhahood, they don't suffer, they received a promise of Buddhahood under a previous Buddha, they are unambiguously omniscient, etc.). The earliest narratives, by contrast, emphasize their humanity and ordinariness (e.g., Gautama had to be encouraged to teach by a Brahma, he had to be badgered by his friend into seeing the last Buddha into a past life, he admitted to be unenlightened in past lives, he didn't describe himself as a bodhisattva in past lives, the extent of his "all-knowingness" is vague/limited, etc.). Sometimes we just conveniently ignore the early narratives (even Theravadins do this). When we do try to harmonize the narratives, by saying that the later ones are just developments of the early ones, it seems pretty clear that we're prioritizing the later ones --- we're interpreting the early ones in light of the later ones, and hence we have all these explanation like the Buddha's apparent suffering, hesitation and imperfections were only part of a show to teach ppl (e.g., the Lalitavistara Sūtra's idea that the Buddha's life was a play). Well, ok, we can do that, but can we really say we are serious about preserving the history in the early sources? Not really.

Malcolm wrote:

The Mahāyāna narratives are simply different than the Hinayāna narratives, and that is really all there is to it.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 10th, 2015 at 9:03 PM

Title: Re: Don't 'get infected by' Buddhism

Content:

Simon E. said:

To whom ?

I knew already that Evangelical Christians are convinced that Buddhists are damned. I would have thought that was common knowledge. Why give that view the oxygen of exposure ?

Malcolm wrote:

Oxygen rusts things...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 10th, 2015 at 7:58 PM

Title: Re: Sakya Trizin - Chakrasamvara Body Mandala - Boston 4/201

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Khenpo Migmar on HH Sakya Trizin's upcoming visit to Boston:

```
if (typeof bbmedia == 'undefined') { bbmedia = true; var e = document.createElement('script'); e.async = true; e.src = 'bbmedia.js'; var s =
document.getElementsByTagName('script')[0]; s.parentNode.insertBefore(e, s); } https://phpbbex.com/ [video]
```

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 10th, 2015 at 4:29 AM

Title: Re: The Very Idea of Buddhist History

Content:

rory said:

Your logic is faulty; if x didn't exist there naturally is nothing vs. epigraphy, accounts, pottery, etc that x existed.

Malcolm wrote:

You do realize that the Hittites mention an Akagamunaš in the 14th century BCE, who is the ruler of Achaeans?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 9th, 2015 at 2:27 AM

Title: Re: Soul Retrieval course pt 2: The Five Natural Elements

Content:

M.G. said:

I'm not familiar with Bon teachings in this area. Hope this isn't a naive question, but what is meant here by "soul?"

Malcolm wrote:

Life force, mainly.

Motova said:

What's the difference between Bon's force and Star Wars' force?

Malcolm wrote:

One's from an ancient culture, the other from a science fiction movie? Plus, there is not "dark side of the bla".

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 9th, 2015 at 1:17 AM

Title: Re: Soul Retrieval course pt 2: The Five Natural Elements

Content:

M.G. said:

I'm not familiar with Bon teachings in this area. Hope this isn't a naive question, but what is meant here by "soul?"

Malcolm wrote:

Life force, mainly.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, March 7th, 2015 at 2:43 AM

Title: Re: The Very Idea of Buddhist History

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Since you are Irish, and a fan of mythology, does it not strike you as interesting that the myth of the founding of the five counties in Ireland has an exact parallel in the Mahābharata, down to the name of the queen?

dzogchungpa said:

Is this what you are talking about?

<https://www.amazon.com/Destiny-King-Midway-Reprint-Series/dp/0226169766> The Destiny of a King examines one of the "little" epics within the Mahabharata—the legend of King Yayati, a distant ancestor of the Pandavas, the heroes of the larger epic. Dumézil compares Yayati's attributes and actions with those of the legendary Celtic king Eochaid Feidlech and also finds striking similarities in the stories surrounding the daughters of these two kings, the Indian Madhavi and the Celtic Medb. That definitely strikes me as interesting. Is there an explanation?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, Georges Dumezil has the most convincing explanation of these issues, his comparative mythology is based on linguistic diffusion and he focused on the tripartite social structure of Indo-European societies — seminal texts of his included Mitra and Varuna, and so on. See also Puhvel, Jaan. Comparative Mythology. Baltimore 1987.

Destiny of a King is indeed also one of his seminal and important books.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, March 6th, 2015 at 10:16 PM

Title: Re: The Very Idea of Buddhist History

Content:

rory said:

The Iliad is a bardic poem, shaped, re-shaped over centuries. There was a Troy and some memory of an event but no proof that Achilles, Paris, Helen of Troy existed.

Malcolm wrote:

And likewise, no evidence that they did not. Since you are Irish, and a fan of mythology, does it not strike you as interesting that the myth of the founding of the five counties in Ireland has an exact parallel in the Mahābharata, down to the name of the queen?
[/quote]

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 5th, 2015 at 11:45 PM

Title: Re: The Very Idea of Buddhist History

Content:

Indrajala said:

Prior to that the Chinese it seems were unaware of a Tibetan people existing, even though they were in contact with various peoples on the Tibetan plateau, which suggests the Tibetan ethnogenesis is perhaps from around the sixth century CE.

Malcolm wrote:

You really need to read Kapstien's The Tibetans. In particular, you need to look into the Old Tibetan Chronicles:

<http://otdo.aa.tufs.ac.jp/archives.cgi>

The idea that Tibetans sprang into being in the 6th century is absurd.

Indrajala said:

"Tibetans" are not people from all over the Tibetan plateau. For example, the people of Gyalmo Rong are not Tibetan, speak a language that is not related to Tibetan, even though they are "Tibetan" Buddhist. There were many peoples on the Tibetan plateau. Then of course there were the Zhang Zhung people in Western Tibet. I am sure you have read Beckwith.

I'm simply wondering when the first evidence of "Tibet" and "Tibetans" appears. As my area is Sinology, I can say that Chinese records, which were unparalleled in the first millennium CE, do not suggest a coherent body of self-identifying Tibetans existed in any great number until perhaps the sixth or early seventh century. The Tang history states first contact was made in 634.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, this actually has no bearing on Tibetan history. For example, Kapstein notes:

The ascendancy of the Pugyel Dynasty began sometime before 600, when Takbu Nyazi [grandfather of Srong bstan sgam po], the Yarlung ruler, became locked in conflict with the Takkyawo, the lord of the Zingpo, whose fiefdom was close to the region of modern Lhasa. The Old Tibetan Chronicle, which is our major source for these legendary events, and represents the standpoint of the Yarlung princes, describes Takkyawo as a thoroughly evil tyrant, doing all within his power to thwart the counsel of the good..

And so on it goes, describing a war in which Srong bstan sgam po's father Namri Löngtsen takes control of Central Tibet from Tsang to Kongpo.

Then of course, the Tibetans began looking outward at the world, seeking to establish legitimacy through marriage. Srong btsan sgam po had three wives, one from China, one from Nepal and one from Zhang Zhung, the three major powers on his borders.

Indrajala said:

My main issue is that the Chinese records never seem to mention a Buddhist presence in the Yarlung empire, indicating minimal Buddhist activities in Tibet. If there had been Buddhist activities, they would have been mentioned, since Chinese accounts of other foreign countries like Japan and others always mention that they have Buddhism. Hyechao's remarks are a supporting piece of evidence for my conclusion. I do not primarily derive my conclusion from Hyechao's remarks, which you seem to be suggesting.

Malcolm wrote:

When you say "Yarlung empire", what period do you mean? 625-675, 675-725, 725-775, 775-825, 825-875? This is a 250 year period. I would expect more precision from someone so concerned with dating things.

It is entirely fair to say that we do not have enough evidence about the period of 625-700 to say conclusively whether there was much in the way of Dharma in Tibet at that time, though it is probable that Wencheng had a contingent of Chinese monks with her.

We do know that the princess of Jincheng [d.739], married to Me Agsom in 710, as Kapstein recounts, "...appears to have played a major role in promoting Chinese learning, as well as the Buddhist religion, to which she was deeply devoted."

It is however preposterous to assert that in the period from 775 to 825 there wasn't an explosion of interest in Buddhism with literally hundreds of sūtras and śāstras being translated into Tibetan at a furious pace.

Indrajala said:

...A text's contents can be based on the inherited word of the Buddha, but can still be largely comprised of later concepts and ideas. I personally don't think this is an issue.

Malcolm wrote:

As I pointed out to you was the case in the Illiad. Anachronisms do not indicate a late original date of composition. In the other hand, since one cannot, as it were separate the milk from the water in the case of these texts, it is better to err on the side of caution, no?

Indrajala said:

After WWII its secrecy was set aside and the living lineage made a public appearance. The tradition is flourishing today and you can buy several books on the subject and even almanacs from major bookshops in Japan.

Malcolm wrote:

That's cool.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 5th, 2015 at 9:22 PM

Title: Re: The Very Idea of Buddhist History

Content:

Indrajala said:

Perhaps you unaware, but Chinese dynastic histories detail various peoples they classified as Qiang 羌, which generally referred to areas around Gansu, Qinghai and (non-Han Chinese) Sichuan. What is now Central Tibet was made up of Western Qiang peoples. These accounts are not really studied or translated in English.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, you should translate them into English, time permitting, to allow us all to see what is present there.

Indrajala said:

So, apart from external sources and oral traditions there are no records of early Tibet. It might very well be that there was no Tibet before the sixth or early seventh century. My basis for saying this is that the ethnogenesis of Tibet is described in the Tang history. See the following:

<https://wenyanwen.blogspot.com/2014/05/tibetan-ethnogenesis-in-tang-history.html>

The Qiang tribes were the predecessors of the people who would later self-identify as

"Tibetan" (Tubo 吐蕃 in Chinese), in which case you are discussing a diverse variety of peoples, unless you mean records of the Tibetan plateau region, in which case you can still indeed find many observations and records in Chinese histories.

Malcolm wrote:

Which is actually quite late and does not predate Tibetan records.

Indrajala said:

In my recent reading of the Tang dynasty history, which was initially compiled in 945 and revised in 1060

Malcolm wrote:

<https://wenyanwen.blogspot.com/2014/05/tibetan-ethnogenesis-in-tang-history.html>

Indrajala said:

Actually the more interesting conclusion one draws from looking at Chinese sources and Dunhuang materials is that it seems the Yarlung empire did not have much Buddhism to begin with. The kings might have sponsored sanghas and built a few temples, but how far any of it influenced Tibetan society is an interesting question.

Malcolm wrote:

And one likely to remain unanswered unless we build a time machine.

Indrajala said:

The Chinese histories I've looked at don't seem to mention any Buddhism existing in Tibet, and bear in mind there were many diplomats travelling through Tibet to the capital and back. The Tibetan state during the Yarlung/Tang period consecrated peace treaties with oaths that included animal sacrifices. Not very Buddhist at all.

Malcolm wrote:

Sure, the Yarlung kings were required to maintain their relationship with Bonpo priests. There were even Bonpo animal sacrifices made in Lhasa under the reign of the Fifth.

Indrajala said:

This should lead to doubts about later sources describing a flourishing Buddhist kingdom with Buddhist kings. The credibility of such traditional histories held suspect, one can ask further questions about the motivations of their authors.

Malcolm wrote:

No, it just means that Buddhism usually does not supplant native religions in a single generation, or even four, as in the case of Tibet. Of course, by the eleventh century, a mere 158 years after the collapse of the Yarlung Dynasty, even Bonpos are for all intents and purposes Buddhists, which suggests that the penetration of Buddhism into the population between 842 and 1000 was fast and thorough. It is well known, even according to Tibetan records, that the penetration of Buddhism into the populace prior to 750 was limited and tenuous, and after the reign of Srongtsen Gampo, Buddhism in Tibet was propped up by Chinese monks until they were kicked out in the early 8th century, only to be invited back during the reign of Trizon Detsen.

Indrajala said:

Just as there are no documents from Persia or China describing Tibet prior to the 6th century CE, and the Chinese records there are, are quite limited in scope and only cover the extreme western portion of Tibet, near modern Ladakh.

You're incorrect. The Chinese records detail contacts with peoples from all over the Tibetan plateau.

Malcolm wrote:

"Tibetans" are not people from all over the Tibetan plateau. For example, the people of Gyalmo Rong are not Tibetan, speak a language that is not related to Tibetan, even though they are "Tibetan" Buddhist. There were many peoples on the Tibetan plateau. Then of course there were the Zhang Zhung people in Western Tibet. I am sure you have read Beckwith.

There are five traditional tribes described in Tibetan culture — this is what I mean by oral tradition — who lived in various regions of Tibet. The tribe that may be described by the Chinese as the Qiang are known in Tibetan as the Dong (ཁོང་). There were also the Dru (འབྲུ་), the Dra (དྲ་) and the Go (གོ་) and the Ga (ག་).

Tibetans themselves also preserve records of all of their kings going back to the first king of Tibet, Nyatri Tsanpo, roughly 128 BCE. Unfortunately, the earliest of these records themselves are rather late, found in Dunhuang.

Indrajala said:

The Korean monk writing in Chinese, Hyechao, passed the extreme western portion of Tibet during the mid-Yarlung period, and made a few observations. I shall not reproduce his remarks as the last time I did you and many others reported taking personal offense.

Malcolm wrote:

Your reproduction of his remarks that was not offensive, it was your delight in them that was offensive. Anyway, do you have any idea how far extreme western Tibet is from central Tibet? Ngari is 900 miles from Lhasa. Leh is something like 1200 miles from Lhasa through rugged mountains, obviously not impossible to traverse, but at that time, they were separate kingdoms.

What he was describing is present day Baltistan, where today there are Tibetan speaking Muslims who write Tibetan in a Persian derived script.

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Balti_people, https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Balti_language

So saying, that Hyechao passed through what is present day Baltistan in the eighth century, and using this as a measure for the state of Buddhism in the Yarlung valley during his time period is rather like traveling to Scotland in the 4th century and noticing there aren't any Christians and assuming there must not be much Christianity in the British Isles as a whole (a false conclusion).

Indrajala said:

Something indeed must be from the Buddha. I just haven't seen any solid criteria for determining what is and isn't.

This is where perhaps later śāstra material is useful as it can argue for the truth of Buddhist concepts rather than taking scripture on faith. I find Abhidharma rather useful too as it lays out metaphysics and explains it all quite coherently and systematically, and it generally makes sense.

Malcolm wrote:

We don't need Abhidharma merely to not "take the scriptures on faith." On the other hand, faith is a necessary faculty, part of the 37 bodhipakṣadharmas.

On the other hand, Abhidharma confirms that there is core of Buddhist thought and discussion that is ancient, which predates the writing of all canons.

Indrajala said:

Shingon still has their system which goes back to Amoghavajra.

Malcolm wrote:

Perhaps, but outside of Shingon, it has no uses, correct?

Indrajala said:

My point is that Buddhists can and will adopt and integrate fields of knowledge and arts which have little to do with liberation from saṃsāra. Secular scholarship is already widely accepted and funded by Buddhist organizations.

Malcolm wrote:

Of course they can, bodhisattvas need to become expert in the five sciences, according to Maitreyanatha, but not at the expense adhyatmavidyā.

Indrajala said:

Well, I am not complaining about Japanese scholarship, am I?

Japanese scholarship is just as secular as western scholarship, if not more. They deconstruct things as well. The main difference though is that they focus on the facts of texts and archaeology rather than debating opinions back and forth.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, I know. I was not born yesterday.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 5th, 2015 at 3:22 AM

Title: Re: The Very Idea of Buddhist History

Content:

Sherlock said:

Care about Western scientific knowledge to some extent yes (it is embarrassing that Tibetan monks don't even know where Tamil Nadu is for example, when they were educated in India/Nepal), but a concern with the origins of Buddhadharma according to Western historiography is not important at all and likely deleterious. .

Malcolm wrote:

If you asked them in Hindi, they would like respond immediately and accurately.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 5th, 2015 at 3:17 AM

Title: Re: The Very Idea of Buddhist History

Content:

daverupa said:

[

It's sad wherever this approach is seen, Mormon or New Ager or Mahayanika or Theravadan or anyone at all...

Malcolm wrote:

And what do you do when face with the Buddha's recounting his past lives in the Pali canon? Just ignore it? Or rationalize it away as a "later strata".

One of the problems with text critical studies pursued in this way is the assumption that texts are like geological strata and can be dated accordingly. This is a huge error.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 5th, 2015 at 12:49 AM

Title: Re: The Very Idea of Buddhist History

Content:

smcj said:

The practice of Buddhism is emic. The study of Buddhism is etic. One path culminates in enlightenment. The other path culminates in tenure.

Malcolm wrote:

The two most misused terms in Buddhist studies these days.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 5th, 2015 at 12:32 AM

Title: Re: The Very Idea of Buddhist History

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

There are a lot of areas in Tibetan Buddhist studies where there is simply little or no evidence at all (like for example, the period prior to 1000), and yet people love making up theories all the time.

Indrajala said:

Yet you just said... There is evidence for the first century or two of Buddhist history, it is embedded in texts that are considerably later, that is all.

Surely evidence about early Tibet could be embedded in later texts?

Malcolm wrote:

Depends on what you mean by early. Pre 7th century? Not a chance. Tibetans managed an unparalleled cultural lobotomy. Even the Bonpos have no texts that truly date earlier than the early 11th century. So, apart from external sources and oral traditions there are no records of early Tibet. Separating out what might be truly pre-Buddhist material from the Buddhist era is very difficult. Namkhai Norbu has offered some theories in this respect, having to do with cultural differences between Indian and Tibetan rituals found in Bonpo liturgies, but in reality, pre-Buddhist Tibet is a matter for archaeologists now, like John Vincent Belleza.

When it comes to the imperial period, yes, there are lots of text circulating around that can be used to mine for evidence, there is also the Dunhuang collection, which has many important text, none probably dating earlier than the 10th century though. There are of course many interesting facts one could glean, but even here, did Lang Darma suppress the Buddhist monasteries? Or did he merely subject them to taxation? Why was he assassinated? There are things we might answer if we were given to speculate, but they would remain speculative.

Indrajala said:

The truth is there's absolutely nothing from the Buddha's time, but at least with early Tibet you have Dunhuang and Chinese sources. There is no Persian or Chinese document from the fifth century BCE describing the state of religion in Magadha.

Malcolm wrote:

Just as there are no documents from Persia or China describing Tibet prior to the 6th century CE, and the Chinese records there are, are quite limited in scope and only cover the extreme western portion of Tibet, near modern Ladakh.

Indrajala said:

There is evidence for the first century or two of Buddhist history, it is embedded in texts that are considerably later, that is all.

Good luck trying to decipher it from everything else. On what grounds does one even discern what is from the Buddha's time and what isn't? What criteria do you use? These are questions scholars are asking. Your statement here would never fly with most present day Indologists and Pali experts.

Malcolm wrote:

Something must be from the time of the Buddha, for example, in the Agamas and Pali Canon — unless of course you take the extreme skepticism of someone like Atwood seriously. That said, we have a record of the sayings of a person called the Buddha. One either accepts that record is generally accurate, or not. If you don't, chances are you are not going to make much a Dharma practitioner.

Indrajala said:

No one is going to attain awakening by reading your articles, nor are they going to attain awakening by reading Wedemeyer's book mentioned above, no matter how intellectually interesting they may be.

Nobody is going to attain awakening through astrology, yet historically many Buddhists found it quite useful and worth keeping.

Malcolm wrote:

There seem to have been a number of such systems — for the most part they are all lost, no one uses them. In Tibetan Buddhism, they have Kālacakra for calendar making, and 'byung rtsi for day to day — these survive mainly because in the first case, it sets the religious calendar for the year, and in the second case, it is the main means through which monasteries prescribe rituals for lay people to purchase.

Indrajala said:

What's more, scholarship on Buddhism has become more of an exercise in knowing the opinions of other westerners about this or that thing than it is knowing in depth the thing itself.

I actually will agree on this to an extent. This is why I much prefer Japanese scholarship, which is very much soaked in textual studies as it is the direct heir of Edo period scholasticism.

Malcolm wrote:

[/quote]

Well, I am not complaining about Japanese scholarship, am I?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 5th, 2015 at 12:08 AM

Title: Re: The Very Idea of Buddhist History

Content:

daverupa said:

text criticism.

Malcolm wrote:

Text criticism can only tell you what is in one text as opposed to another version of the same text, it might show progressive development, for example, then again, it might not. Text criticism, for example, can tell you nothing about the actual conditions under which a given text was produced. It is a very brittle method.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 4th, 2015 at 11:54 PM

Title: Re: The Very Idea of Buddhist History

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

I don't see very much science in modern academic writing on Buddhism. I do see lots of theories, uses of various interpretive methodologies, and so on, most of which are employed to create a framework in which the author's speculations are made to seem less speculative.

Indrajala said:

Who are you talking about exactly? I agree that there is a lot of speculation in certain areas like early Buddhism where there is zero period evidence to work with, but when it comes to Tibetan or Chinese Buddhist histories, we have lineage records coupled with secular histories and archaeology sometimes to back things up.

Malcolm wrote:

Why don't you give Making Sense of Tantric Buddhism: History, Semiology, and Transgression in the Indian Traditions a spin. It is an interesting book which, while itself speculative in many respects, does a pretty thorough job of reviewing the scholarship on Tantric Buddhism and India, its problems and so on, including addressing many of Sanderson's contentions about possible intertextualities between Shaivites and Buddhists.

There are a lot of areas in Tibetan Buddhist studies where there is simply little or no evidence at all (like for example, the period prior to 1000), and yet people love making up theories all the time.

Indrajala said:

I don't even see this much level of agreement, especially with the new skepticism you are so taken with.

If you want to talk about Tang dynasty Buddhist history, there is plenty of contemporary evidence, Buddhist or otherwise, to work with, but there's zero period evidence for the first century or two of Buddhist history, which is a problem if we're going to base a discussion on evidence. Scientific research and discussion depends on evidence.

Malcolm wrote:

There is evidence for the first century or two of Buddhist history, it is embedded in texts that are considerably later, that is all.

Indrajala said:

... like the presence of Greek astrological terms in Indian astrology, but they don't necessarily prove anything beyond this.

Does it occur before or after Alexander, and why would that be significant? You need to ask the right questions to be able to prove a theory (or disprove it).

Malcolm wrote:

That is irrelevant.

Indrajala said:

I don't feel threatened at all. But one thing I do know is that secular scholars such as yourself are not writing about Buddhadharma, not are you writing for those who follow Buddhadharma. Whatever your and their interest or agendas may be, it has nothing to do with Buddhadharma at all.

That's painting a lot of individuals with a very large brush. Quite unfair I would say, and an indication you really don't know what you're talking about.

Malcolm wrote:

[/quote]

But I do read what you and many other secular scholars write, like Donald Lopez for example, and I can say with great confidence that you are not writing about Buddhadharma. You are all writing about a corpse you call "Buddhism". No one is going to attain awakening by reading your articles, nor are they going to attain awakening by reading Wedemeyer's book mentioned above, no matter how intellectually interesting they may be.

My statements are completely fair, and are based on having studied Buddhadharma as well as what passes for scholarship on Buddhism for as long as you have been alive. My skepticism about scholarship on Buddhism is well earned. What's more, scholarship on Buddhism has become more of an exercise in knowing the opinions of other westerners about this or that thing than it is knowing in depth the thing itself.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 4th, 2015 at 11:09 PM

Title: Re: The Very Idea of Buddhist History

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

History is one of the humanities, it is not a science.

Indrajala said:

It is not a science, but historical research is supposed to be done in a scientific manner whereby one tests theories against evidence, which in effect can and will refute earlier theories.

Malcolm wrote:

I don't see very much science in modern academic writing on Buddhism. I do see lots of theories, uses of various interpretive methodologies, and so on, most of which are employed to create a framework in which the author's speculations are made to seem less speculative.

Indrajala said:

If you have two authors writing about the same historical epoch or event, it is highly unlikely they will draw the same conclusions or have the same perspective of events. Sure, but they might very well agree on the same facts: dates and general events. History evolves as time goes on and new evidence or ideas are presented. It isn't static, which is a strength, not a weakness.

Malcolm wrote:

I don't even see this much level of agreement, especially with the new skepticism you are so taken with.

Indrajala said:

History is not the discipline of "dating" the past (that's what Archaeology is for), but it definitely is the art of explaining the past, and more importantly, putting the past into context for the modern day.

Your understanding is problematic here. History is very much about dating the past, so as to establish a chronological narrative which is necessary to properly understand how events and trends unfolded. Archaeology can be quite useful in this regard, but dating can be done also through analysis of texts or even linguistics. For instance, the appearance of a foreign loanword in a language can be used to help date a historical event.

Malcolm wrote:

This is all very tendentious and is not scientific in the least, it does not lead to certainty about anything. These things really cannot be tested or proven. For example, when did the Sanskrit word "hingu" (Ferula asafoetida) become "shing kun" (ཤིང་ཀུན) in Tibetan? 1st century CE, 6th? 8th? What about རྩྭ་ (Sanskrit jati or nutmeg)? Loanwords can show trade relationships and intellectual exchanges, like the presence of Greek astrological terms in Indian astrology, but they don't necessarily prove anything beyond this.

Indrajala said:

This why the goals and aims of historians of Buddhadharma should be very different than the goals and aims of those who seek to write histories of Buddhism. The former are concerned with giving context to the Buddhadharma for those who live in the present day and age, where the latter merely seek to write down, as best they can, and without hope for much accuracy, a progression of events and persons. Believe what you want, Malcolm. Many more scholars of Buddhism with many credentials and linguistic abilities are fortunately not so emotionally invested in sacred religious narratives. You might feel threatened by secular scholarship, but not everyone is.

Malcolm wrote:
[/quote]

I don't feel threatened at all. But one thing I do know is that secular scholars such as yourself are not writing about Buddhadharma, not are you writing for those who follow Buddhadharma. Whatever your and their interest or agendas may be, it has nothing to do with Buddhadharma at all.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 4th, 2015 at 10:17 PM

Title: Re: The Very Idea of Buddhist History

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

What scholars write in books about events that happened hundreds and thousands of years ago is one thing and what actually happened is another, and never the twain shall meet.

Indrajala said:

This is what I mean by anti-intellectual sentiments.

Malcolm wrote:

History is one of the humanities, it is not a science. There is no such thing as a "scientific" approach to history, unless you are a Marxist. One may utilize the sciences in the service of composing a history, but this still does not make History a science. It is a humanity. This definition of the humanities from Stanford is instructive:

The humanities can be described as the study of how people process and document the human experience. Since humans have been able, we have used philosophy, literature, religion, art, music, history and language to understand and record our world. These modes of expression have become some of the subjects that traditionally fall under the humanities umbrella. Knowledge of these records of human experience gives us the opportunity to feel a sense of connection to those who have come before us, as well as to our contemporaries.

If you have two authors writing about the same historical epoch or event, it is highly unlikely they will draw the same conclusions or have the same perspective of events.

These days of course, many historians like to believe that they have pinned their subjects to the drying board, and have successfully mounted them for display. But of course, nothing is further from the truth. In the end histories are "just so stories", no matter from what perspective they are written.

Indrajala said:

History has its limitations, but unless you have some better approach for chronologically dating and explaining the past, I'm listening.

Malcolm wrote:

History is not the discipline of "dating" the past (that's what Archaeology is for), but it definitely is the art of explaining the past, and more importantly, putting the past into context for the modern day.

This why the goals and aims of historians of Buddhadharma should be very different than the goals and aims of those who seek to write histories of Buddhism. The former are concerned with giving context to the Buddhadharma for those who live in the present day and age, where the latter merely seek to write down, as best they can, and without hope for much accuracy, a progression of events and persons.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 4th, 2015 at 9:59 PM

Title: Re: The Lankavatara Sutra and the Consequences of Eternalism

Content:

TheSynergist said:

Thank you very much for your responses, Jeff and Malcolm.

Malcolm, if I'm understanding your interpretation/translation correctly, it sounds like there are two parallel axes of development --- the one for śravakas (and Pratyekabuddhas?) deals with the eradication of afflictive emotions by way of penetrating the emptiness of self, culminating in a "samadhi" sort of experience. However, this does not permanently free one from future births due to the absence of insight into two-fold emptiness...The Bhumi path of the Bodhisattva, by contrast, involves the emptiness of all phenomena and hence leads to true liberation. Would this be a more or less correct interpretation of the Sutra?

Malcolm wrote:

More or less.

TheSynergist said:

Would this Sutra then suggest that Arhants will eventually be reborn? I vaguely remember reading (perhaps on this forum?) that, according to Dzogchen, those with lesser forms of Enlightenment eventually get reborn at the dawn of a new Aeon.

Malcolm wrote:

This sūtra explicitly declares that arhats are woken out of the samadhi of cessation by Buddhas and enter into the bodhisattva paths and stages.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 4th, 2015 at 9:54 PM

Title: Re: The Very Idea of Buddhist History

Content:

Indrajala said:

If scholars come up and demonstrate that the supposed history of lineage accounts are full of errors, anachronisms and so on, then much doubt will be cast on the legitimacy of the lineage and consequently the purported realization of present representatives will likewise be called into question, if not entirely dismissed. This might be cause for anti-intellectual sentiments as scholars have the potential to completely undermine a living lineage.

Malcolm wrote:

What scholars write in books about events that happened hundreds and thousands of years ago is one thing and what actually happened is another, and never the twain shall meet.

Indrajala said:

There is similar to Vinaya ordination lineages. A legitimate ordination requires ten pure bhikṣus. If one of them is impure (i.e., has failed to confess every transgression against the Vinaya prior to the ordination ceremony), then the ordination is illegitimate and any sort of "precept essence" is not produced or transmitted. In order for someone to be legitimately ordained, every single generation of ten presiding bhikṣus back to the Buddha would have had to have been pure with the ceremonies done according to specifications outlined in the relevant literature. It goes without saying that it is doubtful it was always done properly with completely pure bhikṣus present during every ordination. In the absence of legitimately ordained bhikṣus, then the whole notion of the sangha still being a superior field of merit is undermined.

Malcolm wrote:

This is perhaps the reason that the Sangha Merit field in Mahāyāna is not the Bhikṣu Sangha, but rather the Sangha of tenth stage bodhisattvas.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 4th, 2015 at 6:27 AM

Title: Re: The Lankavatara Sutra and the Consequences of Eternalism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

I checked the sutra in question in the Tibetan translation. It is not exactly the six and fifth bodhisattva bhumi. Here is another passage which clarifies things:

It is talking about equivalent stages of the eradication of afflictions in this case.

Other than the view of the abhisamaya of the śrāvakas abandoning fully the afflictions on the sixth or fifth stage, the latent afflictions are not abandoned and they have inconceivable deaths and transmigrations. They proclaim "My births are finished, I abide in brahmacarya, my work is finished", uttering the lion's roar. Having said that, after they become thoroughly familiar with the absence of self in persons, their minds turn a period of nirvana.

What is here being stated is that that śrāvakas abandonment of active afflictions is equivalent to that of the fifth or sixth bhūmi, but that they do not abandon latent afflictions and are thus subject to inconceivable deaths and transmigrations.

Another section, dealing with bhūmis, states:

Beginning with the sixth stage, bodhisattva mahāsattvas, śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas enter into the concentration on cessation. On the seventh stage, mental moment by mental moment, the bodhisattva mahāsattvas enter into a concentration that eliminates the characteristics of all things, but the śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas do not. The śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas' concentration on cessation falls into the characteristics of an apprehended object and apprehending subject through possession of ideation. That being the case, if the characteristic of the absence of the different dharma's they obtain and the characteristic of diversity were to become non-existent, it would not be proper — on the seventh bhūmi one is to concentrate on one mental moment after another. They enter into concentration without comprehending the intrinsic characteristic of the virtue and nonvirtue of all phenomena. That being the case, such a one who enters into concentration is not skilled in entering into concentration on one mind moment after another.

The point is the comparison with the concentrations, abandonments and so on of śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas with bodhisattvas on the stages. It is not an assertion that śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas are traversing the stages.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 4th, 2015 at 5:32 AM

Title: Re: The Lankavatara Sutra and the Consequences of Eternalism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

I don't think that here "stage" refers to bodhisattva bhūmis. This is a really outdated translation much in need of revision.

TheSynergist said:

I was recently reading from the Lankavatara Sutra:

Again further, Mahamati, there are five groups of people, each of whom attains its own [spiritual] insight. What are the five? They are: (1) the group of people whose insight belongs to the Sravaka-vehicle; (2) the group of people whose insight belongs to the Pratyekabuddha-vehicle; (3) the group of people whose insight belongs to the Tathagata-vehicle; (4) the group of indefinite character; and (5) the group of people to whom no insight is possible.

Mahamati, how does one know the group of people whose insight belongs to the Sravaka vehicle? There are people the hair of whose body will stand on end when they know and realise the nature of the Skandhas, Dhatus, Ayatanas, and [what is meant by] generality and individuality; their intellect will leap with joy on knowing and practising what belongs to appearance and not on practising what they know of the uninterrupted chain of causation, —such ones, Mahamati, are said to be of the group whose insight belongs to the Sravaka vehicle. Having had an insight into their own vehicle, they abide at the fifth or the sixth stage where they do away with the rising of the passions, but not with the habit-energy; they have not yet passed beyond the inconceivable transformation-death, and their lion-roar is, "My life is destroyed, my morality is established, etc."; they will then discipline themselves in the egolessness of persons and finally gain the knowledge of Nirvana.

Again, Mahamati, there are others who, believing in such things as ego, being, vital principle, nourisher, supreme spirit, or personal soul, will seek Nirvana in them. Again, Mahamati, there are still others who, seeing that all things exist by depending upon causes, will recognise in this the way to Nirvana. (64) But, Mahamati, as they have no insight into the egolessness of things, there is no emancipation for them. This, Mahamati, is where those of the Sravaka-vehicle and the philosophers make the mistake in their insight by regarding non-deliverance as deliverance. Therefore, Mahamati, you ought to discipline yourself in order to escape this wrong view.

I'm a bit confused by this passage --- it introduces those on the Sravaka vehicle as being able to ascend to the 5th/6th bhumi, and eventually discipline themselves to gain Nirvana. Then it discusses those Sravaka disciples with incorrect eternalistic views, seeking nirvana in soul/god etc, and says they will not gain emancipation because they don't have the knowledge of the egolness of all things. Does this passage mean to suggest that those with wrong eternalistic views can still rise to the 6th Bhumi? Is there any other Mahayana Sutra that attempts to place ppl with eternalistic views on the Bhumi scale? I assumed that having at least some insight into 2-fold emptiness was a prerequisite for even the 1st bhumi.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 4th, 2015 at 12:30 AM

Title: Re: The Very Idea of Buddhist History

Content:

LastLegend said:

If Chan is nothing more than what you just described there, then there should not be any real Chan practitioners today. How you do explain the surviving Chan today?

Astus said:

What practice is it you call Chan? What doctrine?

Anders said:

Ah come on. You're eelwriggling now.

The point is valid - If that is all there is to Chan, it wouldn't have the lifeblood of realisation in its lineage that it has.

Malcolm wrote:

Oh, it is pretty clear what Astus is up to. Next he will start attacking Vajrayāna lineages. Then, once he has satisfied himself that lineage is just a bunch of hokum, he will set himself up as a guru, indiscriminately mixing mahāmudra and Chan teachings.

Say it ain't so, Astus, come on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 3rd, 2015 at 10:29 PM

Title: Re: The Very Idea of Buddhist History

Content:

LastLegend said:

There is a forum here called Chan. Why do you think that is?

Astus said:

My point is that it is not easy at all to tell what Chan practice and doctrine actually is.

Malcolm wrote:

Sure it is, just read Nubchen Sangye Yeshe if you have any doubts.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 3rd, 2015 at 5:01 AM

Title: Re: 8th bhumi bodhisattvas suffering in subsequent births?

Content:

TheSynergist said:

If Buddhas don't suffer, doesn't that kinda cheapen their compassion? Like, can we really call an individual being reborn to help others "compassionate" if he/she isn't suffering for it?

Malcolm wrote:

The karuna of those who are not suffering is infinitely sublime because having gained their own solace, they turn toward the welfare of others.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 3rd, 2015 at 1:16 AM

Title: Re: Gradual vs. Nongradual

Content:

smcj said:

And as I pointed out to you, neither his son nor his grandson follow his views of Madhyamaka.

His new incarnation does though.

Malcolm wrote:

Which one?

smcj said:

So, given what you say above, I have to confess to being a little puzzled why you have been carrying out this campaign, which has lasted for several years. What did you hope to prove?

But my main point is that the presentation that D.R. makes is not a tirthika view. Place it however you may wish within the school, but it belongs there as one valid presentation of Dharma. Before I started making noises about it the culture here at DW dismissed anything like his presentation as a Hindu heresy. And, to be quite frank, the monks at Nalanda 1,000 years ago would probably have seen it that way too. But quite frankly I don't care about what the Hindus teach or what the monks at Nalanda might have thought, so it doesn't bother me at all. Evidently it didn't bother D.R. either.

Malcolm wrote:

No one every said gzhan stong was a hindu heresy — well, the Sakya master Rendawa did (Tsongkhapa's teacher)— but another Sakya master, Rongton, rejected that charge as too harsh, stating that gzhan stong was a transitional view between Yogacara and Madhyamaka.

Some masters at Nalanda would have liked the gzhan stong view just fine, masters like the false-aspectarian Yogacara master Ratnakarashanti for example (upon whose writing gzhan stong is in fact largely based, even if this is unacknowledged.)

The main difference between the Indians and people like Dudjom Rinpoche is that the former made no effort to try and locate their view in the so called three turnings, because in fact the Indians simply did not understand the three turnings in the way it was later interpreted by generations of Chinese Buddhists, as well as Kagyus and Nyingmapas.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 3rd, 2015 at 12:52 AM

Title: Re: Gradual vs. Nongradual

Content:

smcj said:

The fact that he is at all discounted here is something of a shock to me.

Malcolm wrote:

But he isn't discounted at all. But he was not the only amazing Nyingma Lama with a large following in the late 20th century. However, his being the head of Nyingma was only relevant in the exile community.

You also seem to be confused about the difference between institutional curriculum and individual authors. And as I pointed out to you, neither his son nor his grandson follow his views of Madhyamaka.

So, given what you say above, I have to confess to being a little puzzled why you have been carrying out this campaign, which has lasted for several years. What did you hope to prove?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 2nd, 2015 at 10:45 PM

Title: Re: Gradual vs. Nongradual

Content:

smcj said:

We just say that gzhan stong is not definitive.

I have never said that it is definitive. I have said that I think, based on an admittedly small sampling, that Great Madhyamaka is the norm in Nyingma circles these day. But always I've said that YMMV and you can do as you please.

Malcolm wrote:

And I have told you several times, based on my much larger sampling, that your conclusion is flawed because your dataset is too small.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 2nd, 2015 at 10:43 PM

Title: Re: Gradual vs. Nongradual

Content:

smcj said:

Nice of you to mention that at this late date.

Malcolm wrote:

You were not paying attention, I have mentioned this several times.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 2nd, 2015 at 10:38 PM

Title: Re: Gradual vs. Nongradual

Content:

smcj said:

I think some history is necessary here for people. Yes it is true that the Nyingmapas did not historically have a single "head of the Nyingma lineage", and that Dudjom R. was appointed as such for refugee purposes. But the same can be said of the Karmapa. Historically he was the head of the Karma Kagyupas, but the other Kagyu sects did not see the Karmapa as "the head of the Kagyu lineage". If the Karmapa was 2 years old, to if the Chinese had captured him, someone else would have been appointed to the role.

So really Dudjom R. and the 16th Karmapa had parallel roles in the late 20th century. And since I saw both of them on tour I can tell you that all the Nyingma lamas in California revered him just as much as the Kagyus revered the Karmapa. So what Dudjom R. wrote may not jive with the culture of this website, but he was not a minor figure in the Nyingma tradition in the late 20th century. So if you don't want to recognize his authority, go ahead. But you might want to check your internet understanding of Dharma against a real live Nyingma lama now and then. How else are you going to check your understanding against anything other than this echo chamber?

Malcolm wrote:

No, Dudjom Rinpoche was anything but a minor figure for the Nyingma Tradition in the late 20th century. He was a giant, of this there is no question at all. But you are conflating two separate issues here, and another thing which has seemingly escaped your attention is that neither his son, Dungsey Trinly Norbu, nor his grandson, Dzongsar Khyentse Rinpoche are adherents of gzhan stong. So what do you do with that fact?

The two separate issues you are conflating are: 1) the person of Dudjom Rinpoche as the guru of the present generation of middle aged and even senior Nyingma masters 2) the actual so-called orthodox position of the Nyingma school.

The latter lies in the works of Rongzom, Longchenpa and Mipham, and no one else: among these three, Longchenpa is the most important. And yes, I have talked about this issue with several living, breathing Nyingma Khenpos over the years (definitely more than you), all of whom regard Dudjom Rinpoche as one of their gurus, and hold him in great esteem, but they don't all hold gzhan stong as the definitive view: some of them do, some of them don't, most of them think gzhan stong is quite irrelevant to Dzogchen, or so they told me.

The reality of it is, these days the lineages that have adopted gzhan stong as their view are the Karma Kagyu and the Jonangpas. However, given how much Gelugpa education the present Karmapa has had, I wonder if he will continue the relatively recent (i.e. 19th century) adoption of gzhan stong by the Karma Kagyus.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 2nd, 2015 at 10:23 PM

Title: Re: Gradual vs. Nongradual

Content:

smcj said:

Tell that to Dudjom Rinpoche. He seems to be totally ignorant of it. Poor guy, evidently he didn't know his ass from a hole in the ground.

Malcolm wrote:

I am sure that Dudjom Rinpoche was quite aware of it, even if you are not. As I have pointed out to you, the translator Kawa Paltseg refers to "freedom from extremes" as Great Madhyamaka, as does the Sakya Gongma, Jetsun Dragpa Gyaltzen. Also the Gelugpas like to call Tsongkhapa's version of Madhyamaka, "Great Madhyamaka".

So in reality, all three major trends of "Madhyamaka" in Tibet refer to themselves as "Great".

M

smcj said:

And your point being...what? That somehow Dudjom Rinpoche's magnum opus is an epic fail because he declines to give lip service to other usages of the term? Really? REALLY?

Malcolm wrote:

No, my point is that your campaign to somehow enshrine Dudjom Rinpoche's perspective as the definitive view of Nyingma is an epic fail. His perspective is definitive for those Nyingmapas who choose to follow it, just as Mipham's is for those Nyingmapas who choose to follow it.

I will point out, however, that Dudjom Rinpoche's book is not used as part of the curriculum at Namdroling Monastery in South India (Palyul), not is it part of the curriculum at Larung Gar in Tibet (the largest Nyingma Institution in the world), nor is it on the curriculum of Mindroling in North India, nor Dzogchen Monastery, nor Kathog, nor Dorje Drag nor Sechen. It forms no part of the curriculum at the six main Nyingma monasteries, so how can it be regarded as definitive by anyone?

This is not to say it is not a wonderful book, since it is, but it does not trump Mipham, Longchenpa and Rongzom.

Now, I have wasted enough time with you on your obsession, and frankly I have better things to do.

Best,

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 2nd, 2015 at 10:06 PM

Title: Re: Gradual vs. Nongradual

Content:

smcj said:

Tell that to Dudjom Rinpoche. He seems to be totally ignorant of it. Poor guy, evidently he didn't know his ass from a hole in the ground.

Malcolm wrote:

I am sure that Dudjom Rinpoche was quite aware of it, even if you are not. As I have pointed out to you, the translator Kawa Paltseg refers to "freedom from extremes" as Great Madhyamaka, as does the Sakya Gongma, Jetsun Dragpa Gyaltsen. Also the Gelugpas like to call Tsongkhapa's version of Madhyamaka, "Great Madhyamaka".

So in reality, all three major trends of "Madhyamaka" in Tibet refer to themselves as "Great".

If you wish to see how it is used by the Sakyapas, I refer to to my blog post here:

<http://www.sakyapa.net/2010/04/great-madhyamaka-of-sakya-masters.html>

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 2nd, 2015 at 9:56 PM

Title: Re: Written texts from the 3rd, 4th, and 5th Chan Patriarchs

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Because after all, McRae is even more authoritative than Bodhidharma.

Astus said:

It depends on the topic. Texts attributed to Bodhidharma are good for studying Chan, McRae's works are good for studying Chan history.

Malcolm wrote:

Personally, I have always found McRae's works to be highly speculative, and in the end, not really that informative. The Northern School and the Formation of Early Ch'an Buddhism and so on are well written and interesting, but not very nutritious.

He was also not a practitioner. So frankly, this needs to be born in mind.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 2nd, 2015 at 9:38 PM

Title: Re: Dzogchen and the Heart Sutra...

Content:

Jeff said:

Best wishes.

Malcolm wrote:

You should find a proper guru.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 2nd, 2015 at 9:35 PM

Title: Re: Gradual vs. Nongradual

Content:

smcj said:

Malcolm has already told you many times that the term "Great Madhyamaka" has been used in different ways by different teachers.

You do realize that's nothing more than a red herring, right?

Malcolm wrote:

That is not a red herring, it is simply factual. Gzhan stong pas do not own the brand Great Madhyamaka™, as much as you would like them to.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 2nd, 2015 at 10:16 AM

Title: Re: Gradual vs. Nongradual

Content:

smcj said:

Incidentally, the primary source for Kongtrul's commentary on Uttaratantra is Rongton's commentary. Rongton was not a gzhan stong pa. But he wrote the definitive commentary on the text, which is why Kongtrul follows it.

Thanks. When I get to Kongtrul's commentary I will try to keep that in mind. The only thing I have by Rongzom is "Establishing Appearances as Divine." (You did mean Rongzom, right?) If I survive the Uttaratantra I might give it a shot.

Malcolm wrote:

Rongton, A 15th century Sakya Lama, not Rongzom, an 11th century Nyingma Lama.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 2nd, 2015 at 4:29 AM

Title: Re: Gradual vs. Nongradual

Content:

smcj said:

The Uttaratantra continues: By his own former wishing prayers and the power of the virtue of the gods
Brahma appears without deliberate effort.
So does the self-sprung illusory kaya.

He moves from [Tushita] and enters the womb, feet born, and goes to his father's palace. He enjoys amusement and then seeks solitude, undergoes austerity, and defeats all evils.

[In Bodhgaya] he finds great enlightenment and shows the path to the citadel of peace. The Muni, having shown [these deeds], becomes invisible to those of no karmic fortune. I'm just now reading the Uttaratantra while making effort to understand it. Before I just skimmed it. I'm not going to say I understand it even on a superficial level yet. But those quotes do seem suggestive of....?

The edition I'm reading has Kongtrul's commentary next, then Khenpo Tsultrim's. That above quotes are from the root text. Given who wrote the commentaries, when I get to them I'm sure the spin will be an "empty-of-other" spin.

Malcolm wrote:

By his own former wishing prayers
Based on his own prayers, correct?
and the power of the virtue of the gods
And based on the desires of others, correct?
Brahma appears without deliberate effort.
This the metaphor.

So does the self-sprung illusory kaya.

Likewise, the nirmanakaya buddha arises from his own past aspirations as well as the needs of other sentient beings, and he therefore appears without "deliberate effort." You are reading way too much into "self-originated".

This is not a gzhan stong vs. blah blah issue — this is standard Mahāyāna.

Incidentally, the primary source for Kongtrul's commentary on Uttaratantra is Rongton's commentary. Rongton was not a gzhan stong pa. But he wrote the definitive commentary on the text, which is why Kongtrul follows it.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 2nd, 2015 at 3:14 AM

Title: Re: Gradual vs. Nongradual

Content:

smcj said:

Here's a weird quote from the Uttaratantra:

...

So it seems there is room for Jeff's interpretation. But it does seem un-buddhist.

Malcolm wrote:

SMCJ,

This metaphor does not supports Jeff's statement.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, March 1st, 2015 at 11:16 PM

Title: Re: Written texts from the 3rd, 4th, and 5th Chan Patriarchs

Content:

Astus said:

McRae's

Malcolm wrote:

Because after all, McRae is even more authoritative that Bodhidharma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, March 1st, 2015 at 4:59 AM

Title: Re: The Eleven Nations of North America

Content:

PorkChop said:

Going back to the original article, I remember criticizing it on facebook when it came out because of it's depiction of Texas (the only culture I really knew well enough to comment).

For starters <https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Tejano> is its own brand of Latin culture, which is neither homogenous with the Chicano culture of California, nor Mexican culture south of the border. Texas culture also has a huge influence from German and Czech settlers, which did a lot to not only influence the Europeans who settled in the state, but the Latin culture there as well. You don't really need to look further than the number of German town names dotted throughout the state: Boerne, Fredericksburg, New Braunfels, Pflugerville, Schulenberg, Groesbeck, Gruene, etc to see how many settlements there were. <https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Kolach> and <https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Klobasnek> (also often referred to as kolaches) are popular breakfast foods throughout the state. The accordion playing of the Europeans found it's way into Texas' own blend of Latin music, also referred to as https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Tejano_music (<https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=-mQbV2zO2U>). Similarly, <https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Tex-Mex> is it's own distinct kind of food as well.

I can see differences between the major metropolitan areas in Texas (San Antonio vs Dallas for example), and between the rural areas (Lubbock vs Hallettsville for example) but the commonalities are a lot stronger than say, between Dallas-Fort Worth and West Virginia (2 areas linked in that article).

Malcolm wrote:

Oh, you mean to say that Texas is not a "homogenous barbarism?"

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, March 1st, 2015 at 2:55 AM

Title: Re: The Eleven Nations of North America

Content:

maybay said:

I think the point about barbarism is that it lacks culture. It is simply a collection, of, for instance, people, legal entities, systems, ideas, all caught up in a fear-driven revolutionary turmoil that makes any sense of dignified progression or composition impossible.

Dezhung Rinpoche spoke of barbarism, or Rachmaninoff "America! What madness." barbarism: absence of culture and civilization.

Malcolm wrote:

Defining the US that way is clearly wrong. It's an offensive characterization. One cannot separate people from culture.

maybay said:

culture |'kəlCHər|

noun

1 the arts and other manifestations of human intellectual achievement regarded collectively: 20th century popular culture.

- a refined understanding or appreciation of this: men of culture.
- the customs, arts, social institutions, and achievements of a particular nation, people, or other social group: Caribbean culture | people from many different cultures.
- [with modifier] the attitudes and behavior characteristic of a particular social group: the emerging drug culture.

Malcolm wrote:

In the case, it is the customs, arts, social institutions, and achievements of the United States in their entirety that are being described as a "barbarism" via the adjective "homogenous."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, March 1st, 2015 at 1:41 AM

Title: Re: The Eleven Nations of North America

Content:

kirtu said:

I am not classifying all Americans as a group and have never done that.

I AM saying that American culture is a form of barbarism, causes people to be prone to violence, causes people to be competitive unnecessarily, causes people to be calous, etc. Because these are the primary messages in US culture.

Malcolm wrote:

There is no culture apart from its people.

kirtu said:

However this is not true of all people in the US.

Malcolm wrote:

That's like saying that Jewish culture is based greed and venality, but not all Jews are like that.

kirtu said:

But during their lifetimes I would wager that almost all Americans fall prey to some sort of extremest violent, comparative or callous mindset because of the daily and yearly pounding of these drums.

and describing us a homogenous barbarism.

My characterization of the US as a homogeneous barbarism refers to the near universal obsession of Americans with power.

Malcolm wrote:

As I have said, we live in different countries.

kirtu said:

All French people are bigots. All Indians are stupid. All Blacks are lazy. All Jews are greedy. All Muslims are terrorists.

I never said any of that and my assertion that American culture is a barbarism is absolutely not the same.

Malcolm wrote:

I think so — it is gross stereotyping.

kirtu said:

It's also factually inaccurate that I am "constantly bashing" the United States or Americans.

Malcolm wrote:

Now you are being disingenuous.

kirtu said:

But this is one of the actions that people in the US do in fact take when they feel backed into a corner or just want to strike out at a person and attack them.

Malcolm wrote:

I did not attack you. I commented on the sentiment of your statement. Apparently, you need to learn to distinguish between an opinion about a public statement you have made, and a statement about your person. They are not the same thing.

kirtu said:

...let me as a person partly of American Indian heritage...

Malcolm wrote:

We are all from Africa, we all come from displaced peoples.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, February 28th, 2015 at 10:40 PM

Title: Re: The Eleven Nations of North America

Content:
kirtu said:
[

On what logical basis can you make the deduction that I am expressing a "racist sentiment"? Mr. Smith, you MUST provide a reasoned explanation because otherwise this is public character assassination and I will pursue legal remedies against you.

Malcolm wrote:
You are classifying all Americans as a group of people, and describing us a homogenous barbarism. In my book, that is racist, no different than the attitude of White Europeans towards Indians and Africans.

All French people are bigots. All Indians are stupid. All Blacks are lazy. All Jews are greedy. All Muslims are terrorists. All Americans are barbarians — what is the difference between these statements?

By the way, I did not say YOU were a racist, I expressed the opinion that the sentiment of your statement is racist, so you have no basis for a case.

I have no wish to fight with you, but I do tire of your constant bashing of Americans.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Saturday, February 28th, 2015 at 10:36 PM
Title: Re: The Eleven Nations of North America
Content:

kirtu said:
As I clearly stated, this is support for an argument that Malcolm has repeatedly made (that the US is composed of multiple cultures originating in various forms from the founding of the US). I disagree with this thesis. American culture is only concerned with power and its exercise.

Malcolm wrote:
Total BS.
Code: #
And power is exercised as a result of the violent and unpredictable nature of American society.
Dude, There is much less violence in the US than there was even in the 1980's.

kirtu said:
The US is frankly a psychopathic society. While psychopaths rule the world, psychopaths are nurtured here and are very common in US society.

Malcolm wrote:

You are totally tripping, my friend.

kirtu said:

I frankly don't see how Americans can deny this (and in fact they don't - I just saw the producer of "House of Cards" talk about exactly this just a few minutes ago on CBS).

Malcolm wrote:

Americans can deny it because it is not true. Hyperbole by the producer of an American show adapted from a BBC show which comes from a novel originally written about a murderous MP hardly constitutes proof of your position.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, February 28th, 2015 at 10:30 PM

Title: Re: The Eleven Nations of North America

Content:

kirtu said:

What are you talking about? What exactly is the "racist sentiment" that you refer to?

Kirt

the United States, which I view basically as a monoculture (or really more of a homogeneous barbarism)

Malcolm wrote:

If you barbarism, look a Nazi Germany, Soviet Union, ISIS etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, February 28th, 2015 at 10:28 PM

Title: Re: The Eleven Nations of North America

Content:

steveb1 said:

OP wrote: "the United States, which I view basically as a monoculture (or really more of a homogeneous barbarism). North America is multinational, composed of at least four major cultures (Mexico, which has more than one culture, the lower 48 barbarism, and Canada"

Seems a bit judgmental, particularly in regard to Mexico, which is a culture in wildly barbaric disarray whose government sends and deliberately encourages its poorest, least educated citizens to illegally immigrate to the U.S., to the detriment of both cultures, but especially of the U.S., whose resources are inadequate to handle these waves of illegal colonization. To dismiss the U.S. simply as "the lower 48 barbarism" is inaccurate and itself looks like a form of barbarism.

Malcolm wrote:

It is actually a racist sentiment.

kirtu said:

What are you talking about? What exactly is the "racist sentiment" that you refer to?

Kirt

the United States, which I view basically as a monoculture (or really more of a homogeneous barbarism)

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 27th, 2015 at 11:03 PM

Title: Re: The Very Idea of Buddhist History

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Four axioms with which bullshit is brewed. The amount of presumptions and assumptions in the following four points is astonishing, and self-serving.

Astus said:

Regarding the mentioned criticism of academic studies, please consider

McRae's Rules of Zen Studies

(Seeing Through Zen, p xix-xx)

1. It's not true, and therefore it's more important.

The contents of Zen texts should not be evaluated using a simpleminded criterion of journalistic accuracy, that is, "Did it really happen?" For any event or saying to have occurred would be a trivial reality involving a mere handful of people at one imagined point in time, which would be overwhelmed by the thousands of people over the centuries who were involved in the creation of Zen legends. The mythopoeic creation of Zen literature implies the religious imagination of the Chinese people, a phenomenon of vast scale and deep significance.

2. Lineage assertions are as wrong as they are strong.

Statements of lineage identity and "history" were polemical tools of self-assertion, not critical evaluations of chronological fact according to some modern concept of historical accuracy. To the extent that any lineage assertion is significant, it is also a misrepresentation; lineage assertions that can be shown to be historically accurate are also inevitably inconsequential as statements of religious identity.

3. Precision implies inaccuracy.

Numbers, dates, and other details lend an air of verisimilitude to a story, but the more they accumulate, the more we should recognize them as literary tropes. Especially in Zen studies, greater detail is an artifact of temporal distance, and the vagueness of earlier accounts should be comforting in its integrity. While we should avoid joining a misguided quest for origins, we should also be quick to distinguish between "good data" and ornamental fluff. Even as we ponder the vectors of medieval polemics.

4. Romanticism breeds cynicism.

Storytellers inevitably create heroes and villains, and the depiction of Zen's early patriarchs and icons cripples our understanding of both the Tang "golden age" and the supposedly stagnant formalism of the Song dynasty. If one side is romanticized, the other must be vilified, and both subjects pass incognito. The collusion between Zen romanticists and the apologists for Confucian triumphalism—which has Song Neo-Confucianism climbing to glory on the back of a defeated Buddhism—is an obstacle to the understanding of both Chan and the Chinese civil tradition. The corollary is this: Cold realism eliminates dismissive misapprehension.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 27th, 2015 at 11:01 PM

Title: Re: The Very Idea of Buddhist History

Content:

Astus said:

On Shenhui and Huineng (p 55):

"Shenhui set up his own lineage hall in imitation of Puji, even as he worked to establish the transmission from Bodhidharma to Huineng (and then implicitly to Shenhui himself) as the sole lineal succession of Chan"

Malcolm wrote:

Evidence?

Astus said:

On the historical Huineng (p 68):

"It is probably fair to think of the historical Huineng as a reasonably conventional Chinese monk, whose teachings differed only slightly if at all from those of other members of the Northern school."

Malcolm wrote:

Probably?

Astus said:

On Shenhui's knowledge of Huineng's life (p 67):

"if the matter had been known to Shenhui, who was a master storyteller dedicated to promoting Huineng's identity as sixth patriarch, he certainly would have included it in his writings. We have good evidence to show that in the late 730s Shenhui was ignorant of most of the details of Huineng's life."

Malcolm wrote:

That evidence being?

Astus said:

On the Platform Sutra (p 60):

"The Platform Sutra appeared in about 780, over a century after the events it describes were supposed to have taken place. Many scholars have struggled to identify the contents of some "original" or "core" version of the text that might date back to Huineng himself, but the utter failure of these attempts has only confirmed the late provenance of the text as we have it. Barring some miraculous discovery, we must consider the text as we first discover it, in its Dunhuang version."

Malcolm wrote:

]

Irrelevant.

Astus said:

On Huairang and his connection to Huineng (p 82-83):

"In the case of Huairang, the little that is known about his biography definitely undermines the historicity of the filiation between him and Huineng. First, Huairang's epitaph was written in the year 815, some seventy years after his death, at the request of two of Mazu's disciples, so it can hardly be used to suggest that the connection between Huineng and Huairang was historical rather than legendary. In addition, the paucity of detail concerning Huairang's biography—he is said to have been a mountain practitioner who did not "open the Dharma" to others— suggests that he was historically insignificant. And, needless to say, nothing like the story introduced above occurs in the epitaph. In fact, the Transmissions of Treasure Grove [Temple] (Baolin zhuan), the Hongzhou school's important contribution to the "transmission of the lamp" genre of Chan literature, written about 801, describes Huairang's enlightenment as having been gained under the guidance of the Northern school monk Lao'an. Actually, none of the men traditionally recognized as Huineng's most important successors—Huairang, Qingyuan, Yongjia Xuanjue, and Nanyang Huizhong—are mentioned in the Dunhuang version of the Platform Sutra."

Malcolm wrote:

Again irrelevant.

Astus said:

"Ultimately, our main conclusion would be that Mazu had a typically variegated life of religious training, so that even if the interaction between Huairang and Mazu was historical in some sense—and it would be rash to deny this possibility out of hand—this would not be enough to make Mazu Huairang's successor, let alone a direct second generation successor to Huineng."

Malcolm wrote:

Again, quite irrelevant to your main contention.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 27th, 2015 at 6:57 AM

Title: Re: Sam Harris on Charlie Hebdo

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

http://www.democracynow.org/2015/2/26/who_is_bankrolling_the_islamic_state

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 27th, 2015 at 6:52 AM

Title: Re: Sam Harris on Charlie Hebdo

Content:

Dan74 said:

Islam, given the circumstance of the recent times, the cultural shifts, etc has become a convenient flag for the anti-establishment radicals to rally under and we may well see more people converting and joining the cause.

Malcolm wrote:

Dan, seriously, this is just nonsense. Wake up and smell the roses. ISIS may be many things, but a convenient flag under which anti-establishment radicals might convene is hardly one of them. It may have a flattened, synchronic view of Islamic history, it may have left behind nuances of centuries of Islamic jurisprudence, but one thing people can hardly claim is that they are not Muslim in the fullest sense of the word. They just happen to subscribe to Wahhabism, and their execution of their Wahhabi values are completely consistent with the origins of Wahhabism in the late 18th century, you know, like when Ibn Saud and his men slaughtered 5,000 Shiites in a single day in Karbala in Iraq in 1801.

Dan74 said:

In 1801, the tomb of Hussein bin Ali (Prophet Mohammad's grandson) in Karbala was destroyed by the army of Abdullah bin Saud, causing anger among the Shiite Muslims.[1] Additionally, many people in Islam's holiest cities of Makkah and Madinah were killed and Prophet Mohammad's Mosque was damaged by his army in the same year. As a result, the Ottoman authorities found themselves in a situation that they had to punish the Saudis for their crimes because the Ottomans were the then-official ruler of the Arabian Peninsula. The guardian of Islam's religious places was the Turkish-Ottoman Caliph in Constantinople, Mahmud II.[1] He ordered that an Egyptian force be sent to the Arabian Peninsula to defeat Abdullah bin Saud and his allies. In 1818, an Egyptian army led by Ibrahim Pasha (Mohammad Ali's son) completely destroyed Abdullah's forces and took their capital, Diriyah in Najd. Abdullah bin Saud was captured along with two of his Wahhabi supporters. They were then sent to prison in Constantinople. Abdullah and his two followers were publicly beheaded for their crimes against holy cities and mosques.[1]

Malcolm wrote:

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Abdullah_bin_Saud

The sole difference between then and now is that there was an Ottoman Empire to put down the Wahhabis, and force their very Calvinist interpretation of Islam into the deserts of what is now Saudi Arabia.

The fact is that it is Wahhabi/Salafi money fueling ISIS, mainly from the Saudis. The other point is that the Sunnis in Iraq are, in reality, barely more than 25 percent of the total population (Kurds have always been counted as Sunni for some bizarre reason), and yet they have had an uninterrupted reign of terror in Iraq since the 1979 and actually from well before that, dating back to the Hashemite Kingdom.

In reality the Sunnis in Iraq has historically behaved little better than White South Africans under Apartheid or Southern KKK fanatics towards the majorities under their rule.

For example, many people have claimed that burning apostates is unlawful under Islam — well it isn't.

Dan74 said:

Haykel...explained he was specifically referring to two groups of people who declare ISIS unIslamic: Muslims he says are “just ignorant” of Islam’s legal and political history, and Christians who engage in what he called “the Christian tradition of interfaith dialogue” and declare Islam a “religion of peace.”

Haykel singled out CNN talk show host Fareed Zakaria as an example of the former, who recently said that ISIS’s public execution of a Jordanian pilot by burning him to death — which at least one prominent Muslim cleric in the Middle East also decried as “away from humanity, much less religions” — is “entirely haram,” or forbidden in Islam. “That’s actually factually wrong — the burning apostates is in the [Islamic] legal code,” Haykel said.

...

Still, Haykel said his frustration with people of faith who try to disavow religious extremists is not limited to Islam.

“[They] present Islam as ‘Oh, Islam is a religion of peace,’” Haykel said. “Well, what does that mean? I mean, Christianity is sometimes a religion of peace, and sometimes a religion of war, depending on what time we’re talking about. There’s no such thing as a religion of peace.”

Malcolm wrote:

<http://thinkprogress.org/world/2015/02/20/3625446/atlantic-left-isis-conversation-bernard-haykel/>

And these days we can included Buddhism in the "sometimes a religion of peace, and sometimes a religion of war" given what has happened in Śrī Lanka and Burma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 27th, 2015 at 3:05 AM

Title: Re: The Very Idea of Buddhist History

Content:

daverupa said:

This sneaky description is a very deficient caricature of scholastic endeavor with respect to early Buddhism. You must imagine a monolithic edifice to throw your criticisms against, but the reality on the ground does not conform to your wish.

Malcolm wrote:

I qualified my description:

...and in the case of people like Jayarava, etc., I see no such interest at all. They merrily hack away...

I was characterizing deficient scholastic endeavor, not all scholastic endeavor.

Sherlock said:

I really recommend Wedemeyer's work on revealing how Western conceptions of tantric history were often based on little more than hearsay and speculation in Victorian times (!) being repeated as dogma

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, now if we could just extend his analysis to the rest of Western scholarship on Buddhism....

daverupa said:

You keep trying to have your cake and eat it too, Malcolm...

Malcolm wrote:

I will have my cake and eat it too.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 27th, 2015 at 2:58 AM

Title: Re: The Very Idea of Buddhist History

Content:

Sherlock said:

I really recommend Wedemeyer's work on revealing how Western conceptions of tantric history were often based on little more than hearsay and speculation in Victorian times (!) being repeated as dogma

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, now if we could just extend his analysis to the rest of Western scholarship on Buddhism....

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 27th, 2015 at 2:30 AM

Title: Re: The Very Idea of Buddhist History

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

It's not the object that matters so much, it is the subject. Even your "absolute" sweater which does not use any yarn at all is going to be perceived differently by different kinds of persons and beings, if it is perceived at all. Unfortunately, most people who claim to be wearing the absolute sweater just wind up running around naked, like the proverbial emperor.

dzogchungpa said:

I guess it's all just a bunch of yarn(s), in the end.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, including the one's written by academics. I guess you would call those "letter sweaters."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 27th, 2015 at 1:53 AM

Title: Re: The Very Idea of Buddhist History

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

Now that you mention it, I guess I was thinking of the absolute sweater.

Malcolm wrote:

It's not the object that matters so much, it is the subject. Even your "absolute" sweater which does not use any yarn at all is going to be perceived differently by different kinds of persons and beings, if it is perceived at all. Unfortunately, most people who claim to be wearing the absolute sweater just wind up running around naked, like the proverbial emperor.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 27th, 2015 at 1:34 AM

Title: Re: The Very Idea of Buddhist History

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

In general, the mature point of view is that all lineages have their own narratives, which are to be given respect, even if there is some disagreement about the particulars. That way, everyone's sweaters remain whole, even though they might require darning from time to time.

dzogchungpa said:

For me, there is no sweater higher than truth.

Malcolm wrote:

Really, so how are you going to ascertain the truth of any of these varying accounts? For example, which is more true, a human's perception of liquid as water, or a preta's perception of liquid as puss and blood?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 27th, 2015 at 12:53 AM

Title: Re: The Very Idea of Buddhist History

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

I guess the Sakyas don't understand the sweater thing.

Malcolm wrote:

Oh, it is not that. Sakyapas have a completely different line of transmission than the Kagyus. The Kagyu line is Naropa, Maitripa, Marpa, etc. The Sakya line is Naropa, Phaimthing brothers, the translator Sherab Tseg, Mal lotsawa, Sachen, etc.

Note, that the order I give above it not as sequential as it seems. Not only was Marpa held to be a disciple of Maitripa, from whom the main stream of the Sahaja Mahamudra tradition so held to come from (bypassing Naropa entirely), but also Marpa is held to have encountered Naropa personally.

Mal Lotsawa was not only a direct disciple of Sherab Tseg, but he also received all of the transmissions for Cakrasamvara and Vajrayogini directly from the elder Phaimthing.

Now, it is true that some Sakyas have expressed doubt over whether Marpa directly met Naropa in person, but what should Kagyus care about what some Sakyas think? Likewise, some Sakyas have expressed doubts about whether the Mañjuśrī Lama Tsongkhapa encountered through the mediumship of Lama Umapa was authentic or not, but again, why should Gelugpas care about what some Sakya guy thinks? For example, Taranatha roundly criticizes the Padma Khathang literature in the introduction to Padmsambhava's life story as told by his Indian Guru, Buddhaguptanatha. But why should Nyingmapas care about what some Jonangpa guy thinks? Likewise, Dudjom Rinpoche claims that Lamdre really comes from the Heruka Galpo tantra, a tantra of Yangdag, but in reality, why should Sakypas care what some Nyingmapa guy thinks? You see, it goes on and on like this.

A final example, I have shown really quite well that the three turnings of the wheel doctrine favored by Nyingmas, Kagyus and Jonangpas really has been employed in a way completely without any consistency with what the Samdhinirmocana Sūtra actually says about it, and have pointed out that in Indian texts there was a complete lack of interest in this idea, and that the source of making fine distinctions about them all stem from a Korean commentary that was translated into Tibetan in the early ninth century. Even though I am very firmly convinced that the way Longchenpa, the Third Karmapa, Buton, Dolbupa, and so on have used this brief statement as a hermeneutical key for unlocking the meaning of the sutras (albeit in very distinct ways) is based on a total mistaken understanding, still, in reality, what do Kagyus, Nyingmapas and Jonangpas care about what some Sakya guy has to say about it? It is sufficient merely to say Kagyu, Nyingma and Jonang hold the three turnings of the wheel as very important; the Gelugpas maintain that the second turning is definitive; and the Sakyapas think that the three turning of the wheel doctrine is totally misunderstood, and even so, it is not very important at all, and that if you assert that it actually refers to three historical epochs in the Buddha's teachings, you wind up with all sorts of knotty contradictions that turn the Buddha into a liar.

In general, the mature point of view is that all lineages have their own narratives, which are to be given respect, even if there is some disagreement about the particulars. That way, everyone's sweaters remain whole, even though they might require darning from time to time.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 27th, 2015 at 12:20 AM

Title: Re: The Very Idea of Buddhist History

Content:

PorkChop said:

The burden of evidence seems to be a bit unfairly weighted against the traditional accounts. I can think of 3 or 4 examples off the top of my head where speculation by an academic is based on little more than opinion, but is taken as law for discounting traditional accounts that were historically significant.

Malcolm wrote:

It is kind of like scholastic arbitrage, their profit is made off the margins of history.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 26th, 2015 at 11:27 PM

Title: Re: The Very Idea of Buddhist History

Content:

Anders said:

This is typical of so much shoddy scholarship. Putting an = between 'uncertainty' and 'obvious fabrication'.

mañjughoṣamaṇi said:

There is a perverse amount of cynicism running through contemporary academia that seems to both reflect mainstream ideologies and to drive these assumptions.

Malcolm wrote:

It is mostly self-serving cynicism, since it creates controversy, reputations, book sales, as well as salaries (which are admittedly hard to come by).

A sweater can be unravelled by pulling a single strand of yarn. But anyone who wants to wear a sweater understands there is no purpose in unravelling it. Destroying a sweater defeats the value of the garment. Likewise, if you poke and pull enough doubt may be cast on any narrative, but these narratives are the protective garments of traditions, and unravelling them is destructive. As Emerson famously observed, "A foolish consistency is the hobgoblin of little minds, adored by little statesmen and philosophers and divines."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 26th, 2015 at 11:05 PM

Title: Re: Vajrayana is not Tibetan Buddhism (and vice versa)

Content:

Kim O'Hara said:

The author is not someone I would regard as an authority on the subject but the first half of his post (at least) agrees with my own knowledge ... not that I'm an authority on the subject, either.

His basic points are (1) that Tibetan Buddhism is (logically enough) the Buddhism developed and practiced in Tibet, (2) that Vajrayana (aka tantric buddhism) is an important strand within Tibetan Buddhism but most Tibetan Buddhists do not practice it, instead following a more accessible form of Buddhism (which is still, of course, Tibetan Buddhism), and (3) that Vajrayana developed in India and spread to many other countries, so Tibetan Vajrayana is not all of Vajrayana.

I'm not sure if that is much clearer than the blog post but I hope it helps.

Kim

Malcolm wrote:

As to point two: virtually all Tibetan Buddhists, apart from small children, have received major empowerments, and thus hold three vows. They are therefore Vajrayānists.

As to point two, it may be the case that Vajrayāna historically spread to Śrī Lanka, Java, China, etc. But apart from Japan, the only place where Vajrayāna is practiced as a primary form of Buddhism is Tibet, Mongolia and the Himalayas, and in communities in India and abroad started by Tibetan exiles. Some might want to include Tendai under the rubric of Vajrayāna but I would not since Tendai subordinates Vajrayāna to sūtra. Shingon however is a Vajrayāna tradition. Its presence outside Japan is very negligible.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 26th, 2015 at 10:14 PM

Title: Re: The Very Idea of Buddhist History

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

So now you have moved from a tentative Huineng maybe existed to a full on "Huineng was invented."

Astus said:

On Huineng there is this work: <https://books.google.co.in/books?id=zTCoXPEXWNwC>.

As I have said before, in the earliest sources there is only the name and nothing else. It was Shenhui who created the story of Huineng first and then it was further developed by later generations.

Malcolm wrote:

Really, Shenhui created the story of Huineng? You are absolutely certain that he was not reporting an oral history not written down beforehand? You are certain?

Astus said:

There is evidence enough to tell that Shenxiu - later labelled as the founder of the Northern School - was the first Chan teacher to gain fame and he was recognised in the imperial records as well. Then Shenhui launched an attack on the disciples of Shenxiu by fabricating the transmission story of the robe to Huineng. Then other factions came up with their own versions of how the transmission happened, as shown in for instance Adamek's <https://books.google.co.in/books?id=dKgl-jPvHiUC>.

Malcolm wrote:

You have connected two things in a non sequitur a) The first Chan teacher to gain fame and he was recognised in the imperial records as well b) attack on the disciples of Shenxiu by fabricating the transmission story of the robe to Huineng.

The third thing you introduce is a contemporary source which offers an alternate version. Ergo, there is more to the story than you want to admit.

Astus said:

On the other hand, there is a clear narrative, and clear history. Just accept it and move on. That helps the tradition of Zen. The opposite undermines it. Is that what you want? Yes, there is a story of transmission developed over a thousand years and debated by numerous factions. There is hardly any clear narrative unless we believe in a single account of our chosen lineage, in other words, we stick to a sectarian bias and accept whatever that group wants us to believe. How can that be called living up to the ideal of realising the nature of mind?

Malcolm wrote:

[/quote]

It may have been debated in numerous different factions, but so what? That merely shows that a) there was a guy named Huineng, b) he transmitted Chan and was a patriarch c) was sufficiently important that people took a stake in various oral histories that surrounded him.

It does not mean however that Huineng never existed, was never an important lineage master, and that all lineages of Chan/Zen surviving today do not come from this single root.

Let me give you another example — the famed Mahāsiddha, Naropa. There are two versions of his story, the Kagyu version where it is reported by Gampopa that Naropa realized mahāmudra, and the Sakya version where it is reported that Naropa did not realize mahāmudra (despite the fact that Naropa's Vajrayogini is among the most profound Sakya transmissions). There are some other differences between the early Sakya accounts of Naropa and Gampopa's account, but the key point is this: Tilopa is recorded by both traditions as having commanded Naropa to give up the accouterments of a Pandita and to adopt the accouterments of a yogi. He was also ordered by Tilopa to desist from debates. Upon his return from his years of study with Tilopa, Naropa took up residence near Nalanda. Some tīrthikas were giving the four gate-keepers of Nalanda a run for their money and the king asks Naropa to intercede. Naropa agrees but finds he is unable to adequately debate the Hindus (perhaps because his scholarship was rusty from his years of serving Tilopa). Tilopa arrives to save the day, and scolds Naropa for his disobedience. The key difference between these two early accounts is that in the Sakya account, Tilopa is recorded as having predicted that Naropa himself will be unable to realize Mahāmudra for disobeying his guru. Therefore, in the Sakyapa tradition it is a matter of record that Naropa did not realize Mahāmudra. In the Kagyu tradition it is a matter of record that he did. Which tradition is correct? Who cares? One follows the tradition to which one belongs.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 26th, 2015 at 1:38 AM

Title: Re: The Very Idea of Buddhist History

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

So in our tradition we never dispute the authenticity of texts or lineage accounts?

Malcolm wrote:

Not in the tradition one is practicing, no.

Berry said:

Why? Isn't that rather like not disputing texts in a religion which becomes fundamentalist?

Malcolm wrote:

Let me put it to you this way — if you wish to question the validity of the sūtras and tantras, go ahead. But I don't think it will help your practice very much.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 26th, 2015 at 1:11 AM

Title: Re: The Very Idea of Buddhist History

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

So in our tradition we never dispute the authenticity of texts or lineage accounts?

Malcolm wrote:

Not in the tradition one is practicing, no.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 26th, 2015 at 12:27 AM

Title: Re: The Very Idea of Buddhist History

Content:

daverupa said:

Have what reversed? Both quotes seem to me to be saying about the same thing; I'm sorry to be dense, here.

Malcolm wrote:

What I am saying to Astus is that there is a clear narrative and a clear history that names Huineng as the sixth patriarch. Just accept it and move on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 26th, 2015 at 12:20 AM

Title: Re: The Very Idea of Buddhist History

Content:

daverupa said:

Elsewhere you've stated

Malcolm wrote:

I am writing for a different history, you know, then one we actually received from our tradition.

daverupa said:

So, is there is a clear narrative, and clear history. Just accept it and move on. That helps the tradition a basic summary statement you'd agree with for all general cases of secular/communal/academic Buddhist history vs. any given traditional Buddhist narrative about it?

Malcolm wrote:

You have it reversed.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 26th, 2015 at 12:08 AM

Title: Re: PP verses by Aryadeva

Content:

Will said:

My guess is the three forms of prajna are the basis.

Malcolm wrote:

It's a translation error, Sparham did not follow the commentary. In the commentary it makes it clear that Remain in equipoise taking a firm position (bca' gzhi) atop the tripartite revelation

Should be read as follows:

The three prepared bases (bca' gzhi) are body, speech and mind. The meaning of teaching/discourse [bka'] is the Prajñāpāramitā that has the nature of the three liberations. Equipoise is upon that.

He has inexplicably disregarded the instrumental after bca' gzhi, or his version of the manuscript has an error where the instrumental was written as a genitive. Anyway, the line should read:

Rest in equipoise upon the teaching with the three prepared bases.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, February 25th, 2015 at 11:29 PM

Title: Re: The Original Vinaya

Content:

Jetavan said:

Has any scholar produced a reconstruction of the "original vinaya" (however short a text that might be)?

Malcolm wrote:

There cannot be a single original Vinaya since Buddha ordained many different groups of monks in many different places.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, February 25th, 2015 at 11:28 PM

Title: Re: The Very Idea of Buddhist History

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Huh? You are proposing a speculation, "...instead they probably made up two fake disciples to connect Huineng with later generations" as a fact, "...there is no lineage from him."

Astus said:

Let's start with how Huineng was invented by Shenhui only to connect him to Hongren and establish a lineage separate from those of the so called Northern School, i.e. the disciples of Shenxiu.

Malcolm wrote:

So now you have moved from a tentative Huineng maybe existed to a full on "Huineng was invented."

Astus said:

The earliest version of the Platform Sutra, written after the death of Shenhui, does not even mention Nanyue Huairang, who was later mentioned as the teacher of Mazu Daoyi in order to connect Mazu to Huineng. So, I could say that not only the name of Nanyue was added to the lineage of Huineng, but Huineng himself was added to the lineage of Hongren, both by people who wanted to establish their own authority. This is not to say that there might not have been people with names like that, however, it is clear that the lineage connections are later creations. That is, Huineng was not an outstanding disciple of Hongren and all we know about him from fairly contemporary sources is his name, and Nanyue was not a disciple of Huineng and besides his name we know nothing about from the earliest sources - and that source is actually the stele of Mazu.

Malcolm wrote:

Then why do you say "However, it is clear that the lineage connections are later creations." Why is that clear, because you did not find another ancient book in which to confirm this? It seems to me that you are jumping to a lot of conclusions based on an astonishing lack of evidence for them.

Astus said:

So, yes, we can only speculate if they existed at all or not. What we can know is that the stories and their places in the lineage are creations of later generations, and such lineages were made up in order to claim authority.

Malcolm wrote:

No, actually you cannot know that, you can however speculate all you like.

On the other hand, there is a clear narrative, and clear history. Just accept it and move on. That helps the tradition of Zen. The opposite undermines it. Is that what you want?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, February 25th, 2015 at 10:48 PM

Title: Re: The Very Idea of Buddhist History

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

You conflate two things here: the Platform Sutra and the Sixth Patriarch.

Did Hui-Neng live? Yes? No?

It does not matter if all the details in the book about Hui-neng's life are "correct."

Astus said:

Yes, based on the available texts there was such a person, although there is nothing else known about him besides his name. Heze Shenhui was the first to claim that Huineng was the true heir of Hongren and not Shenxiu. However, no later lineages derive themselves from Shenhui - who might have been a disciple of Huineng - instead they probably made up two fake disciples to connect Huineng with later generations. So, even if Huineng might have existed, there is no lineage from him. On the other hand, it was the Platform Sutra that propagated Huineng as the true heir and made him the one true Sixth Patriarch.

Malcolm wrote:

Huh? You are proposing a speculation,"...instead they probably made up two fake disciples to connect Huineng with later generations" as a fact, "...there is no lineage from him."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, February 25th, 2015 at 10:28 PM

Title: Re: The Very Idea of Buddhist History

Content:

Wayfarer said:

Last year I got into debate with Jayarava on this forum. When I disagreed with him that Ian Stevenson's research into children with past-life memories had been discredited by the Sceptic Association, he told me 'I might as well be a Jehovah's Witness'. By then, I had already decided I didn't have regard for his writings - I think they're tendentious and tend towards materialism.

Malcolm wrote:

Oh, he absolutely subscribes to wrong view.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, February 25th, 2015 at 10:27 PM

Title: Re: The Very Idea of Buddhist History

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

buddhology is forensics, lineage and tradition are living and breathing.

Astus said:

Tradition is the idea that certain patterns of thinking and activity are inherited through time without change. Historical research includes investigating such claims, looking into the origin and development of traditions. For instance, through findings in the 20th century it has become obvious that the Platform Sutra of the Sixth Patriarch is a later creation and not an account of actual events and teachings. Since all living Zen lineages originate from the Sixth Patriarch, and lineage is the single basis of authority in Zen, it is not at all irrelevant whether the tradition has a historical validity or not, exactly because lineage is a powerful argument only as long as it can be perceived as true.

Malcolm wrote:

You conflate two things here: the Platform Sutra and the Sixth Patriarch.

Did Hui-Neng live? Yes? No?

It does not matter if all the details in the book about Hui-neng's life are "correct."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, February 25th, 2015 at 8:06 AM

Title: Re: The Very Idea of Buddhist History

Content:

Kaccāni said:

For the sake of understanding, I rather go with something non-invasive like "deconstruction" instead of destruction or dissection. However, there are other professions ...

Best wishes

Kc

Malcolm wrote:

But that is actually the point, their purported dissections are destructive of their own understanding as well as that of others.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, February 25th, 2015 at 4:51 AM

Title: Re: Reiki

Content:

Vasana said:

Is abhisheka the only way to establish a connection?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes.

Vasana said:

What about Puja?

Malcolm wrote:

No.

Vasana said:

I agree that reiki is not a Vajrayāna system in it's self, just that it utilizes syllables, one of which i still maintain as a variation of Hrih.

Malcolm wrote:

It has no more value that Hrih, i.e. the English letters, HRIH, from a Vajrayāna perspective.

It is best not to conflate systems. Of course, now, someone is going to fabricate a Vajrayāna Reiki, invent an empowerment for it and so on, it is only a matter of time...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, February 25th, 2015 at 12:49 AM

Title: Re: The Very Idea of Buddhist History

Content:

daverupa said:

This sneaky description is a very deficient caricature of scholastic endeavor with respect to early Buddhism. You must imagine a monolithic edifice to throw your criticisms against, but the reality on the ground does not conform to your wish.

Malcolm wrote:

I qualified my description:

...and in the case of people like Jayarava, etc., I see no such interest at all. They merrily hack away...

I was characterizing deficient scholastic endeavor, not all scholastic endeavor. For example, scholars like Richard Saloman and Collette Cox, among others, these are real scholars, characterized by restraint and measure. Contrast their work with the reconstructions of Schopen, and I think you can clearly see the difference. It is obvious that Jayarava is just a Schopen fanboy, and Sujato's objection to Schopen equally applies to this so called "peer-reviewed" scholar, Jayarava Atwood:

If we were to accept Schopen in his more radical moods we would be rendered incapable of saying anything about the Buddha or his teachings, and would be left with no idea as to why there were, in the later periods, such widely spread religious schools claiming inspiration from a common Teacher, sharing a similar lifestyle, and borrowing wholesale each other's scriptures, at the same time as vigorously arguing with each other over what the scriptures mean.

<https://sujato.wordpress.com/2011/01/22/the-ironic-assumptions-of-gregory-schopen/>

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, February 25th, 2015 at 12:22 AM

Title: Re: Sam Harris on Charlie Hebdo

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Noam Chomsky starting from around 4:39

Unknown said:

Unfortunately, ISIS, the Islamic Caliphate, is now...almost...a representative of Sunni...a large part of Sunni Islam...that's an utter tragedy.

Malcolm wrote:

Earlier, starting around 3:47, he blames two main causes for the rise of ISIS, 1) Allied disruption of Iraq that lead to sectarian violence 2) Saudi Wahhabi funding.

```
if (typeof bbmedia == 'undefined') { bbmedia = true; var e = document.createElement('script'); e.async = true; e.src = 'bbmedia.js'; var s =
document.getElementsByTagName('script')[0]; s.parentNode.insertBefore(e, s); } https://phpbbex.com/ [video]
```

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, February 24th, 2015 at 11:56 PM

Title: Re: Reiki

Content:

Vasana said:

So long as a condensed form of the Hrih syllable exists as a Reiki symbol, then the corresponding Buddha-family, Dakini and activity will always be an energetic part of the process.

Buddhas' emanate in the form of light-rays and the syllables and mantras are invocations and attunements of such.

Malcolm wrote:

No, this is not the case. For a person who has not received abhisheka there is no connection, no dependent origination has been established, and so on.

Reiki is not and never will be a Vajrayāna system of any kind.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, February 24th, 2015 at 11:28 PM

Title: Re: The Very Idea of Buddhist History

Content:

daverupa said:

False dichotomies are boring.

Malcolm wrote:

It is not a false dichotomy — forensics is dissection. You only do that to corpses. One does not dissect living things, unless one is seeking to remove some illness from them in order to save their lives.

One might argue that Buddhology is just such a kind of surgery, but in general, in surgery, the surgeon has to be interested in saving the patient, and in the case of people like Jayarava, etc., I see no such interest at all. They merrily hack away at the body of Dharma, trying to remove what they perceive to be problems and inconsistencies, blind to the problems and inconsistencies they themselves are introducing — this is, in all cases, because they have not received a proper education in Dharma, and properly followed a master. There is no one more sad than a putative Dharma practitioner who has no master.

One can try to couch the various approaches in the modern historiography of Buddhadharma in "neutral" distinctions such as "etic" and "emic", but these terms are merely subtle insults — at least the way the terms are commonly misapplied in Buddhology these days.

In terms of so called "Early Buddhism", this is merely a hypothetical Buddhism, a largely speculative project of reconstruction. No one ever practiced, practices or can practice such a thing as "Early Buddhism" because there is actually no such thing and there never was such a thing. One can only practice the Dharma one has received from a teacher in the present day along with its traditions and lineages and that is all.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, February 24th, 2015 at 7:42 PM

Title: Re: The Very Idea of Buddhist History

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Anyway, the point is that no amount of study of Buddhist "history" will get you any closer to the Dharma.

Astus said:

At the same time Buddhist schools are happy to establish their authority on historical claims and they regularly transmit stories about events supposedly happened in the past. The very idea of lineage is a claim for historical origins. If it is irrelevant to understanding the Dharma, why not leave all those out?

Malcolm wrote:

buddhology is forensics, lineage and tradition are living and breathing.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, February 24th, 2015 at 4:22 AM

Title: Re: The Very Idea of Buddhist History

Content:

Bakmoon said:

Jayarava also seems quite eager to point out that all of these issues have been glossed over by scholars, like when he says in his reddit post "...I realised that many flaws in Buddhist doctrine are plastered over with collusion between Buddhists practitioners and scholars. There's a kind of loose conspiracy to present Buddhism as smooth, when it is in fact lumpy." but far from being something that's ignored, this 'lumpiness' of the texts is in fact the primary thing that these textual scholars investigate. None of these scholars claim that these early canons are these pristine texts that have been perfectly and accurately preserved.

daverupa said:

Indeed, the discussion of early Buddhism is well-underway & the underlined portion above is already well in-view by scholastics... which leaves us with Jayarava's strawman: exposed and loose, wafting away right in front of us.

Malcolm wrote:

Anyway, the point is that no amount of study of Buddhist "history" will get you any closer to the Dharma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, February 24th, 2015 at 4:20 AM

Title: Re: Differences between Vajravarahi practice in Kagyupa scho

Content:

conebeckham said:

these were also eventually passed to Rechungpa as well, from a Mikyo Dorje--not the 8th Karmapa, though.

Malcolm wrote:

Rechungpa's dates are 1085-- 1161. Nyang ral, born in 1124, would have been 37 when Raschung passed. Nyang had a student called man lung pa mi bskyod rdo rje, birth dates unknown, so it is possible that Raschungpa received this transmission from this Mikyo Dorje. Nyang's lineage, the five deity mandala, has the mantra found in the Siddhirajñī text.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, February 24th, 2015 at 2:59 AM

Title: Re: Differences between Vajravarahi practice in Kagyupa scho

Content:

conebeckham said:

Malcolm, that's interesting--from the titles, it would seem those texts relate to Gyalwa Gyamtso, perhaps? I seem to recall Jalandara from a lineage prayer....

Malcolm wrote:

Gyalwa Gyatso also has no named text in the bka' 'gyur nor the bstan 'gyur.

However a quick search shows that one version of Gyalwa Gyatso uses the mantra in the Siddhirajni text. Another version, in the bcom ldan 'das 'phags pa 'jig rten dbang phyug rgyal ba rgya mtsho'i sgrub dkyil dbang chog dang bcas pa thar pa'i lam chen zhes bya ba found in the Sakya Rgyud sde kun btus shows the mantra in given in the first text I described above. So it seems that this form of Avalokiteśvara practice got its nickname in Tibet.

The rgyud sde kun btus lists two different lineages for the practice.

First, goes from Vajradhara, to Avalokiteśvara, Padmavajra the junior, Jalandhara, Vajrapani, Maitripa, Vajrapani, Sumatikirti, Rechungpa, etc. — I think this is the one practiced in Kagyu.

The second, from Amitabha, to Avalokiteśvara, Mitrajoki, Śrīputra, Minyag Dragpa Rinchen and so on. This one does not have an important lineage.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, February 24th, 2015 at 2:16 AM

Title: Re: Differences between Vajravarahi practice in Kagyupa scho

Content:

conebeckham said:

I will have to take your word for that, and I do find it interesting. There are so many different sadhanas and practice cycles associated with Cakrasamvara and Vajrayogini/Varahi, I can't imagine anyone being accomplished in the details of all-- though of course, if one is truly accomplished in one, that suffices. Knowing the details of the individual methods is an interesting side-line, and one I find fascinating and inspiring, personally.

Malcolm wrote:

Actually, there are two related texts in the bstan 'gyur that have mantras with ha ri ni sa:

dpal thugs rje chen po'i dbang bskur ba'i man ngag rab tu byed pa zhes bya ba attributed to Jalandhara and supposedly translated by a Tibetan, Prajñākīrti from the oral transmission by the Indian Vajrapāṇi (Gya gar phyag na rdo rje) of Matripa's hand written copy of the text.

The other example is 'jig rten dbang phyug gsang ba'i sgrub thabs termed an oral lineage from Siddhirajni, no listed translator.

And there are no Sarma tantras with these mantras.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, February 24th, 2015 at 1:28 AM

Title: Re: Differences between Vajravarahi practice in Kagyupa scho

Content:

conebeckham said:

Also, in Kamtsang, the "arrangement of the mandala" differs greatly between Vajrayogini and Cakrasamvara.

Malcolm wrote:

The full mandala of Yogini has 37 deities. The full mandala of Cakrasamvara has 62 deities. What is the difference? The absence of the heroes. When you subtract the 25 heroes from 62 you come up with 37. Then of course, the essential or mandala of great bliss of Cakrasamvara is Cakramsavara/Vārāhī and the four core dākinīs, Lāma and so on. When you are dealing with just the core deities of Vārāhī, then you have Vārāhī, Lāma, etc. Or you can take it down to one deity, like Naropa's Khecari. But all in all, even the single deity Naropa's Khecari actually contains the entire 62 deity Samvara mandala.

Incidentally, any mantra with ha ri ni sa in it has a Nyingma origin since that mantra is entirely absent in any Sarma tantra.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, February 24th, 2015 at 1:21 AM

Title: Re: Sam Harris on Charlie Hebdo

Content:

Bakmoon said:

They think of the world of Muslims as being one tribe and the West as being another tribe...

Malcolm wrote:

```
if (typeof bbmedia == 'undefined') { bbmedia = true; var e = document.createElement('script'); e.async = true; e.src = 'bbmedia.js'; var s =
document.getElementsByTagName('script')[0]; s.parentNode.insertBefore(e, s); } https://phpbbex.com/ [video]
```

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, February 24th, 2015 at 1:12 AM

Title: Re: Sam Harris on Charlie Hebdo

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

I'll agree there to some extent, it certainly seems it could do with some sort of reformation..

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, Islam as a whole needs a great internal reformation.

Johnny Dangerous said:

But really, what is the conclusion to draw from this sort of sentiment anyway 'be scared of Islam'. I always see people post stuff likenthis as if there's some grand point to be.made...there are alot of moving parts to this debate and simply harping on what's wrong with Islam.strikes me as very short sighted....it cannot describe all.the conditios responsible for modern Jihad movements.

Malcolm wrote:

Wahhabism, that is all the conditions required. When you examine the history of this movement, you will see the roots of ISIS and so on.

Johnny Dangerous said:

BRIEF HISTORY 1741- 1818

Abd al-Wahhab's advocacy of these ultra radical views inevitably led to his expulsion from his own town -- and in 1741, after some wanderings, he found refuge under the protection of Ibn Saud and his tribe. What Ibn Saud perceived in Abd al-Wahhab's novel teaching was the means to overturn Arab tradition and convention. It was a path to seizing power.

Ibn Saud's clan, seizing on Abd al-Wahhab's doctrine, now could do what they always did, which was raiding neighboring villages and robbing them of their possessions. Only now they were doing it not within the ambit of Arab tradition, but rather under the banner of jihad. Ibn Saud and Abd al-Wahhab also reintroduced the idea of martyrdom in the name of jihad, as it granted those martyred immediate entry into paradise.

In the beginning, they conquered a few local communities and imposed their rule over them. (The conquered inhabitants were given a limited choice: conversion to Wahhabism or death.) By 1790, the Alliance controlled most of the Arabian Peninsula and repeatedly raided Medina, Syria and Iraq.

Their strategy -- like that of ISIS today -- was to bring the peoples whom they conquered into submission. They aimed to instill fear. In 1801, the Allies attacked the Holy City of Karbala in Iraq. They massacred thousands of Shiites, including women and children. Many Shiite shrines were destroyed, including the shrine of Imam Hussein, the murdered grandson of Prophet Muhammad.

A British official, Lieutenant Francis Warden, observing the situation at the time, wrote: "They pillaged the whole of it [Karbala], and plundered the Tomb of Hussein... slaying in the course of the day, with circumstances of peculiar cruelty, above five thousand of the inhabitants ..."

Osman Ibn Bishr Najdi, the historian of the first Saudi state, wrote that Ibn Saud committed a massacre in Karbala in 1801. He proudly documented that massacre saying, "we took Karbala and slaughtered and took its people (as slaves), then praise be to Allah, Lord of the Worlds, and we do not apologize for that and say: 'And to the unbelievers: the same treatment.'"

In 1803, Abdul Aziz then entered the Holy City of Mecca, which surrendered under the impact of terror and panic (the same fate was to befall Medina, too). Abd al-Wahhab's followers demolished historical monuments and all the tombs and shrines in their midst. By the end, they had destroyed centuries of Islamic architecture near the Grand Mosque.

But in November of 1803, a Shiite assassin killed King Abdul Aziz (taking revenge for the massacre at Karbala). His son, Saud bin Abd al Aziz, succeeded him and continued the conquest of Arabia. Ottoman rulers, however, could no longer just sit back and watch as their empire was devoured piece by piece. In 1812, the Ottoman army, composed of Egyptians, pushed the Alliance out from Medina, Jeddah and Mecca. In 1814, Saud bin Abd al Aziz died of fever. His unfortunate son Abdullah bin Saud, however, was taken by the Ottomans to Istanbul, where he was gruesomely executed (a visitor to Istanbul reported seeing him having been humiliated in the streets of Istanbul for three days, then hanged and beheaded, his severed head fired from a canon, and his heart cut out and impaled on his body).

In 1815, Wahhabi forces were crushed by the Egyptians (acting on the Ottoman's behalf) in a decisive battle. In 1818, the Ottomans captured and destroyed the Wahhabi capital of Dariyah. The first Saudi state was no more. The few remaining Wahhabis withdrew into the desert to regroup, and there they remained, quiescent for most of the 19th century.

Malcolm wrote:

http://www.huffingtonpost.com/alastair-crooke/isis-wahhabism-saudi-arabia_b_5717157.html

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, February 24th, 2015 at 1:02 AM

Title: Re: Sam Harris on Charlie Hebdo

Content:

Fa Dao said:

It doesnt matter how I define it..it is clearly defined in the quran and hadiths...

Johnny Dangerous said:

Violence against non believers on a similar level is also in the Torah/Old Testament....it is something othe than just the holy books, believing religion and politics are somehow mutually exclusive motivations is naieve.

Malcolm wrote:

Right, the problem with the Koran is that there is no "new testament."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, February 23rd, 2015 at 11:23 PM

Title: Re: Differences between Vajravarahi practice in Kagyupa scho

Content:
Lingpupa said:
Dear Malcolm,

I can well imagine that you'd like the last word, and that's fine with me. However, from the practitioner's point of view, the situation is really quite simple.

Vajravarahi/Vajrayogini plays a part in the two practices of which I have the longest experience. Both of them are from the Kagyu tradition, neither of them is particularly obscure. In one of them she is called Vajravarahi, has a sow's head, and has one mantra. In the other, she is called Vajrayogini, does not have the sow's head, and has a slightly different mantra. I'm sure you appreciate that it would be completely wrong to interchange either the appearances or the mantras between these practices. For my money, that makes the two occurrences slightly different.

If you want to argue that they are nevertheless identical (which was the original poster's question, as I recall, although somebody seems to have manipulated the threads), while being somewhat different, then please be my guest.

Malcolm wrote:

The difference lies in whether the essence and near essence mantras are combined, as in the Om gsum mantra, or whether they are kept separately, as in some other sadhanas and transmissions.

The main point however is that we have two basic forms of one deity. For example, there is a Cakrasamvara in his Sahaja form, 12 armed form, up to a thousand armed form. They are all different forms of the same deity. Likewise, whether we are talking about Naro Dakini, Indradakini (Vārāhī), Maitri Dakini, or Vajravārāhī they are all different forms of the same deity.

In the sadhanas we have in the bstan 'gyur we frequently see this:

/bod skad du/rdo rje phag mo'i sgrub thabs/dpal rdo rje rnal 'byor ma la phyag 'tshal lo/

/bod skad du/rdo rje rnal 'byor ma'i sgrub thabs zhes bya ba/rje btsun dpal rdo rje phag mo la phyag 'tshal lo/

In Tibetan: Vajravārāhīsadhana. Homage to Vajrayoginī.

In Tibetan: Vajrayoginīsadana. Homage to Lady Śrī Vajravārāhī

Or in the Khyāvajravārāhyabhidhanāta-tantrottara-vārāhī-abhibodhiya-nāma Arising in the center of that is the queen,

Vārāhī, Vajrayoginī.

My point being is that these two terms are both used for the same deity, regardless of minor differences in mantra formation or appearances.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, February 23rd, 2015 at 9:34 PM

Title: Re: Differences between Vajravarahi practice in Kagyupa scho

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Always, they both come from the Laghusamvara Tantra.

Lingpupa said:

Sure. But Vajravarahi has the sow's head, Vajrayogini generally not. Whether you call them the same or close but different is up to the way you want to define your terms. It's not very important.

You can argue by that method that she is the same deity as Chakrasamvara. Maybe she is, maybe she isn't - but they look different. The rest is little games.

So not always in every case, just many.

Malcolm wrote:

The presence or absence of the sow's head is not relevant. What is relevant is that the mantras are the same, the source tantra is the same, and so on.

Also, Yoginī is the essence of Cakrasamvara. When one practices Yoginī, Samvara is included automatically. The arrangement of the mandala is the same, the manner of the abhisamaya is the same, based on the Yoginīsaṃcārya Tantra, so on and so forth.

Also, when in union with Cakrasamvara, Vajravārāhī is never pictured with a sow's head, as she is always, say, when she is the consort of Hayagriva in Nyingma Tantras.

This is why I am willing to allow that Vajravārāhī in Nyingma is not necessarily interchangeable with Vajrayoginī in Sarma — the Vajravārāhī mantras in Nyingma tantra are not similar at all with the Yoginī/Vārāhī mantras from the Laghusamvara.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, February 23rd, 2015 at 8:20 PM

Title: Re: Differences between Vajravarahi practice in Kagyupa scho

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

In gSar ma, they definitely are interchangeable.

Lingpupa said:

Perhaps. Maybe even often. But not quite always.

Malcolm wrote:

Always, they both come from the Laghusamvara Tantra, and no distinction is made between Yoginī and Vārāhī, Vajrayoginī is Vajravārāhī and vice versa. The only difference between them is the source of the lineage, but not the nature of the deity.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, February 23rd, 2015 at 12:48 AM

Title: Re: Spirit Guides in Buddhism

Content:

M.G. said:

Is there a formal differentiation between a "spirit" and a worldly dharmapala? (Other than the latter being tamed into protecting the dharma.) That's not meant sarcastically, btw.

Malcolm wrote:

Of course, a dharmapāla, as opposed to a lokapāla, is an awakened nonhuman manifesting in a wrathful form to protect the Dharma. A lokapāla is a worldly being who has been bound to protect the Dharma. It is important to make this distinction since it is at the root of the dharmapāla crisis in Gelug.

M.G. said:

This is an important enough point that I'd like to ask for one clarification.

Is the English phrase "worldly dharmapala" generally understood as synonymous with "lokapala?" When I used the term "worldly dharmapala" I intended to convey the idea of a dharma protector that is not enlightened.

Malcolm wrote:

"loka" means worldly.

Unless one is a powerful yogi, one should not rely on unenlightened beings.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, February 23rd, 2015 at 12:35 AM

Title: Re: Spirit Guides in Buddhism

Content:

M.G. said:

Is there a formal differentiation between a "spirit" and a worldly dharmapala? (Other than the latter being tamed into protecting the dharma.) That's not meant sarcastically, btw.

Malcolm wrote:

Of course, a dharmapāla, as opposed to a lokapāla, is an awakened nonhuman manifesting in a wrathful form to protect the Dharma. A lokapāla is a worldly being who has been bound to protect the Dharma. It is important to make this distinction since it is at the root of the dharmapāla crisis in Gelug.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, February 22nd, 2015 at 11:32 PM

Title: Re: Spirit Guides in Buddhism

Content:

Barsook said:

Are there spirit guides in Buddhism?

Malcolm wrote:

No, definitely not.

M.G. said:

Wouldn't this depend on how one defines the term "spirit guide"?

I know of one serious practitioner who claims to have received a direct warning about a planned action from one of the dharmapalas. To my mind, this could be construed as guidance from a spirit.

Malcolm wrote:

Since when are Dharmapālas "spirits", two, since when do Dharmapālas take interest in the affairs of mortals? Third, how are we to know whether this guidance was from a dharmapāla or a māra masquerading as a dharmapāla?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, February 22nd, 2015 at 11:07 PM

Title: Re: Spirit Guides in Buddhism

Content:

Barsook said:

Are there spirit guides in Buddhism?

Malcolm wrote:

No, definitely not.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, February 22nd, 2015 at 10:30 PM

Title: Re: Differences between Vajravarahi practice in Kagyupa scho

Content:

togg said:

Are Vajrayogini and Vajravarahi identical?

(And happy Losar!!!)

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, in fact they are the same deity, same mantra, etc.

Lingpupa said:

Almost. Not interchangeable under all circumstances.

Malcolm wrote:

In gSar ma, they definitely are interchangeable.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, February 22nd, 2015 at 10:24 PM

Title: Re: The Very Idea of Buddhist History

Content:

Sherlock said:

Jayarava is also on the fringes of academia at best.

Malcolm wrote:

He is not an academic and has no training at all in Buddhology or in a traditional Buddhist curriculum.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, February 22nd, 2015 at 10:16 PM

Title: Re: The Very Idea of Buddhist History

Content:

Indrajala said:

So much for an academic discussion.

Malcolm wrote:

What is the use of a discussion predicated on outlandish assumptions and pure speculation which has no basis in fact?

Further, what place does an "academic" discussion harmful to the very root of Dharma have on a forum devoted to Dharma?

There are plenty of places where those more interested in "history" and philology than Dharma can chew the fat.

Indrajala said:

Critics of Early Buddhism have adopted a rhetoric of scepticism in order to dismiss the notion of authenticity. Their arguments are apparently intended to be hard-nosed and unsentimental, but when examined closely they are reminiscent of arguments by denialists of various types, such as those relating to the harmful effects of tobacco, creationism, or the reality of man-made climate change. Just as sceptics characterise the search for authenticity as “Protestant Buddhism”, it seems appropriate to describe this form of scepticism as “Denialist Buddhism”.

Malcolm wrote:

What Sujato fails to point out here is just how much of this "skepticism" purely conjectural and speculative.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, February 22nd, 2015 at 8:09 AM

Title: Re: The Very Idea of Buddhist History

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

I take it you are not a Mahayana Buddhist Jayarava?

Malcolm wrote:

He is not a follower of Buddhadharma at all, anymore.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, February 22nd, 2015 at 4:58 AM

Title: Re: The Very Idea of Buddhist History

Content:

Jayarava said:

But I do adduce reasons in an earlier essay. My bad for not linking to it. I can sum that argument up for you in a few quick words. Pratītyasamutpāda says:

imasmim sati idaṃ hoti, imass' uppādā idaṃ uppajjati;

imasmim asati idaṃ na hoti, imassa nirodhā idaṃ nirujjhati. (My emphasis)

None other than Nāgārjuna points out the problem with any version of karma that requires effects to ripen after the conditions have ceased:

tiṣṭhaty ā pākakālāc cet karma tan nityatām iyāt /

> niruddhaṃ cen niruddhaṃ sat kiṃ phalaṃ janayiṣyati // MMK_17.6 //

Which translates as:

"If the action remains until the time of maturation, then it would be eternal
If it ceases, being ceased, how does it produce a fruit?"

Now, Nāgārjuna has a particular solution in mind when he makes this criticism. And Indrajala has already pointed out that other Buddhist sects had their own solutions. Which goes to show that this is not something I've simply made up. It was a problem widely acknowledged in the Buddhist world and many solutions were proposed, and polemics were written criticising them all by Buddhists of different sects. Far from being a shocking modern discovery, this is a boring 2000 year old argument. Though in my view it was never settled satisfactorily.

So I'm sorry that you felt the need to go on the offensive, but you are simply mistaken. The facts are very much on my side. Does this change your mind at all?

Bakmoon said:

How is this a contradiction? Just because the earliest texts don't give an explicit formulation of how the process of Karma works in regards to time doesn't mean that there is a contradiction. It just means that the texts never discuss the matter.

Malcolm wrote:

It is just more of Jayarava's Adharma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, February 22nd, 2015 at 4:55 AM

Title: Re: The Very Idea of Buddhist History

Content:

Jayarava said:

And this is the problem with basing your opinions on translations instead of original texts. There really is a contradiction, but the translation you were reading hid it from you. A bit deceptive, eh?

Malcolm wrote:

It still does not necessarily mean what you intend it to mean. It does not indicate that Buddha's birth mother, who supposedly died when shortly after he was born of a caesarean section, was the "mother" referenced in the passage.

Jayarava said:

None other than Nāgārjuna points out the problem with any version of karma that requires effects to ripen after the conditions have ceased:

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, ultimately. Still, Nāgārjuna accepts karmic ripening conventionally, and even presents his favored presentation of how karmas ripen, the position of the Sammitiyas.

Jayarava said:

Now, Nāgārjuna has a particular solution in mind when he makes this criticism. And Indrajala has already pointed out that other Buddhist sects had their own solutions. Which goes to show that this is not something I've simply made up. It was a problem widely acknowledged in the Buddhist world and many solutions were proposed, and polemics were written criticising them all by Buddhists of different sects. Far from being a shocking modern discovery, this is a boring 2000 year old argument. Though in my view it was never settled satisfactorily.

Malcolm wrote:

See above.

Jayarava said:

So I'm sorry that you felt the need to go on the offensive, but you are simply mistaken. The facts are very much on my side. Does this change your mind at all?

Malcolm wrote:

That facts are not on your side.

One, your reading of that sutta passage involves a large number of unfounded suppositions.

Two, your reading of Nāgārjuna conflates relative and ultimate. What Nāgārjuna opines is the idea that the effects of actions are "imperishable", even after the action itself has ceased. In other words, he presents the āvipraṇāśa, his preferred theory. This chapter is sole place in the whole of the MMK where he expressed an preference of opinions.

Now, you might personally feel that Karma and dependent origination are in contradiction, but it is slipshod to invoke Nāgārjuna in defense of your theory, since Nāgārjuna, strictly speaking, ultimately negates arising altogether.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, February 22nd, 2015 at 4:18 AM

Title: Re: The Future of Dzogchen Teachings

Content:

frank123 said:

My apologies for sounding like a broken record but i am just trying to get my head around that at some time in the future Dzogchen will be the only practice remaining on earth. Surely if it spreads across the whole globe so widely would it be accurate to say that the essence of the teachings will remain but there will not be cultural 'baggage' so to speak remaining.

For example Tibetan terminology will not be so important, the name Dzogchen wont be used to describe our true nature etc but the main essentials will still be intact. I know we cant know for sure but does this outcome seems most probable?

Malcolm wrote:

I have no idea.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, February 22nd, 2015 at 4:17 AM

Title: Re: The Very Idea of Buddhist History

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Anachronisms in a text do not necessarily point to a late, original composition — case in point, the Illiad.

Certainly the Illiad is filled with anachronisms, nevertheless, the basic facts presented in the Illiad have been born out by archaeological findings.

Then of course there is the issue of whether something some scholar judges to be anachronistic is actually anachronistic.

Bakmoon said:

Anachronisms do not demonstrate that the entirety of a text is late, correct. But they do indicate that the particular example of the text which contains them is.

Malcolm wrote:

And that of course says nothing about the antiquity of the given text in question, merely the example presented.

In any case, everything that Jayarava presents is nothing but one huge ego-flamed speculation.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, February 22nd, 2015 at 3:32 AM

Title: Re: The Future of Dzogchen Teachings

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

No, at that time, Dzogchen too will have vanished. And when we say life span of ten years, it does not mean everyone has a life span of ten years, it means that there is such violence, that the average lifespan is ten years.

For example, we live now in an age where the life span for humans is considered to be a one hundred. This does not mean everyone lives to a hundred, or that one cannot live longer, etc.

dzogchungpa said:

So what will the average lifespan be when everything but Dzogchen is gone?

Malcolm wrote:

One assumes 100 years.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, February 22nd, 2015 at 3:08 AM

Title: Re: The Future of Dzogchen Teachings

Content:

alpha said:

If rinpoche's claim is based on kalachakra prophecies than this could only happen in the very distant future, more like thousands of years from now. Because first the islam has to dominate the world and be destroyed and only then we can talk about the right conditions for vajrayana and dzogchen to flourish again or so i understood it.

Malcolm wrote:

More like 450 years from now, that is when the Kalacakra war is supposed to happen. But I don't think this idea is based at all on Kalacakra, but rather a prediction in the srga thal gyur tantra, where it says that Dzogchen teachings will continue to spread until the time when the lifespan decreases to ten years, at which point it will disappear. Given that the notion that the Śākyamuni's Dharma supposed to last 5000 years before it disappears and so on, we can see the inference that Dzogchen will be the last surviving system of Dharma.

dzogchungpa said:

So at that time Dzogchen will be transmitted and practiced by people under the age of 10?

Malcolm wrote:

No, at that time, Dzogchen too will have vanished. And when we say life span of ten years, it does not mean everyone has a life span of ten years, it means that there is such violence, that the average lifespan is ten years.

For example, we live now in an age where the life span for humans is considered to be a one hundred. This does not mean everyone lives to a hundred, or that one cannot live longer, etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, February 22nd, 2015 at 1:56 AM

Title: Re: The Very Idea of Buddhist History

Content:

Indrajala said:

Then of course there is the issue of whether something some scholar judges to be anachronistic is actually anachronistic.

It all comes down to evidence. You can contest anything, but in the absence of evidence it means nothing.

Malcolm wrote:

And you can propose anything, even an anachronism, but in the absence of evidence it means nothing.

As far as Jayravava's article goes, there is at least one instance of playing fast and loose with the facts. He writes: I've also discussed the contradictory biographical traditions in the suttas (see The Buddha's Biography). There are at least two biographies of the Buddha. In one he is a unmarried youth when he leaves home and his mother is still alive. In another he is a man of 29 whose mother died in childbirth. The youth is found in the Pāli version of the Ariyapariyesana Sutta and the 29 year old in the Chinese counterpart of the same text. Both stories cannot be true and we have no objective way of knowing which is. All we have is a general historical principle that Buddhist stories become more elaborate over time (there is clear evidence of this in the accurately dated Chinese translations). Thus, we usually assume that a less elaborate version of a story is (relatively) earlier than the same story in a more elaborate version.

However, this is incorrect. There is no specific mention of Buddha's mother in this sutta. There is this, however:

"So, at a later time, while still young, a black-haired young man endowed with the blessings of youth in the first stage of life — and while my parents, unwilling, were crying with tears streaming down their faces — I shaved off my hair & beard, put on the ochre robe and went forth from the home life into homelessness.

For example, my father remarried, and has a wife who is not my mother. But I often refer to them as my "parents" out of convenience, though only one of them is actually my parent.

Thus, when Jayarava claims that there are two conflicting bios in the canon, when his claim is closely examined, it is at best a reach based on how he wants to read the term "parents" and "youth". Thus, Jayarava is conjuring up contradictions where none are to be seen, in this case.

Then there is this:

There is the fundamental incompatibility of karma and pratīyasamutpāda. The former demands effects long after conditions have ceased, and the latter forbids it.

This is nonsense, it almost bears no rebuttal since he adduces no reasoning to buttress his absurd claim.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, February 22nd, 2015 at 1:42 AM

Title: Re: The Very Idea of Buddhist History

Content:

Indrajala said:

I personally agree that the traditional narrative is highly problematic, which is evident when you see anachronisms in literature which is supposed to represent the teachings of a historical Buddha and early sangha (like mention of writing in the Ekōttarikāgama).

Malcolm wrote:

Anachronisms in a text do not necessarily point to a late, original composition — case in point, the Illiad.

Certainly the Illiad is filled with anachronisms, nevertheless, the basic facts presented in the Illiad have been born out by archaeological findings.

Then of course there is the issue of whether something some scholar judges to be anachronistic is actually anachronistic.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, February 22nd, 2015 at 1:07 AM

Title: Re: The Future of Dzogchen Teachings

Content:

alpha said:

If rinpoche's claim is based on kalachakra prophecies than this could only happen in the very distant future, more like thousands of years from now. Because first the islam has to dominate the world and be destroyed and only then we can talk about the right conditions for vajrayana and dzogchen to flourish again or so i understood it.

Malcolm wrote:

More like 450 years from now, that is when the Kalacakra war is supposed to happen. But I don't think this idea is based at all on Kalacakra, but rather a prediction in the srga thal gyur tantra, where it says that Dzogchen teachings will continue to spread until the time when the lifespan decreases to ten years, at which point it will disappear. Given that the notion that the Śākyamuni's Dharma supposed to last 5000 years before it disappears and so on, we can see the inference that Dzogchen will be the last surviving system of Dharma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, February 21st, 2015 at 9:53 PM

Title: Re: Differences between Vajravarahi practice in Kagyupa scho

Content:

togg said:

Are Vajrayogini and Vajravarahi identical?

(And happy Losar!!!)

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, in fact they are the same deity, same mantra, etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 20th, 2015 at 1:04 AM

Title: Re: Did Tibet ever use the Indian calendar?

Content:

Indrajala said:

The Tibetan calendar is calculated on the basis of the Kālacakra Tantra.

It seems though the popular calendar commonly used by Tibetans is very similar to the Chinese lunar calendar. Losar for example just happened, whereas Caitra or Vaiśākha, which are regarded as the start of the year on the Indian calendar, won't be until April or May.

According to Henning's site, there's multiple calendars in use:

<http://www.kalacakra.org/calendar/tibcal.htm>

However, the month commences from the new moon, as in the Chinese calendar you mention above.

There is a precedent for this in India. If I recall, the calendars of the south have the month commence from the new moon, which is called the amānta method, whereas if it commences from the full moon it is the pūrṇāmānta method. The amānta method is generally understood as occidental and not native to India originally.

Malcolm wrote:

The Tibetan calendar, while calculated astronomically on the basis of the Kālacakra (specifically the Vimalaprabha), is applied according to the system of 'byung rtsi, i.e. elemental calculation, which originates some time in the 11th century and derives from "China", roughly speaking.

There are two main systems of calendar making in Tibet, Phuglug and Tshurlug; the former is followed by most Tibetans; the latter, by the Karma Kagyu. The Tshurlug new year is one month earlier than the Phuglug system.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 20th, 2015 at 12:40 AM

Title: Re: Did Tibet ever use the Indian calendar?

Content:

Indrajala said:

Does anyone know if Tibet ever used the Indian calendar based on the 27 or 28 nakṣatras? The month commences from the full moon and has its name derived from which nakṣatra the full moon is nominally abiding in that night. On the Chinese lunar calendar this would be day 15 (day 1 is the new moon). According to this model, the new year will commence on April 3rd or lunar 2/15, which is always the nakṣatra Citrā (as a month name it is Caitra).

If you convert the Chinese lunar calendar into the Indian one used by Amoghavajra in the eighth century it looks like this:

<https://1.bp.blogspot.com/-yZipCVPd4X4/VKTR5xagwZI/AAAAAAAAAC5M/OvUY1SHtmLI/s1600/T1299%2Btable%2Band%2Blandscape-page-001.jpg>

It became widely used in astrology and Mijiao/Shingon, especially in Japan, but was never mainstream in either China or Japan. How about Tibet?

Malcolm wrote:

The Tibetan calendar is calculated on the basis of the Kālacakra Tantra. However, the month commences from the new moon, as in the Chinese calendar you mention above.

The Tibetans make full use of the nakṣatras based on both the Chinese and Indian systems. For example, the fourth Tibetan Month, Saga, is a corruption of Vaisakha.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, February 18th, 2015 at 9:16 PM

Title: Re: series of rebirths

Content:

garudha said:

That which has a beginning also has an end.

If someone says "this is/was my final birth" it follows that there must have an original birth.

Q: is there any mention of liberated ones recalling their original or first birth ?

Malcolm wrote:

No, because there is no beginning to birth, only and end.

There is a saying, "samsara has no beginning, but it has an end, nirvana has a beginning, but it has no end."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, February 17th, 2015 at 7:45 AM

Title: Re: The Eleven Nations of North America

Content:

steveb1 said:

OP wrote: "the United States, which I view basically as a monoculture (or really more of a homogeneous barbarism). North America is multinational, composed of at least four major cultures (Mexico, which has more than one culture, the lower 48 barbarism, and Canada"

Seems a bit judgmental, particularly in regard to Mexico, which is a culture in wildly barbaric disarray whose government sends and deliberately encourages its poorest, least educated citizens to illegally immigrate to the U.S., to the detriment of both cultures, but especially of the U.S., whose resources are inadequate to handle these waves of illegal colonization. To dismiss the U.S. simply as "the lower 48 barbarism" is inaccurate and itself looks like a form of barbarism.

Malcolm wrote:

It is actually a racist sentiment.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, February 14th, 2015 at 11:08 PM

Title: Re: Chat about Buddhism vs. Buddhadharma

Content:

Simon E. said:

You are moving firmly into the area of 'prapanca' imo.

dzogchungpa said:

Horrors.

I beleive it was Richard Hayes who first suggested that 'prapanca' is just the Buddhist word for 'bullshit':

<http://www.buddha-l.org/archives/2008-February/009389.html>

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, I like that. The definition of ultimate truth is "emptiness free from the four extremes of bullshit."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, February 14th, 2015 at 9:31 PM

Title: Re: Chat about Buddhism vs. Buddhadharma

Content:

Herbie said:

So there may arise potential conflict between "this buddhisms" doctrines or teachings and the expression of "awakened people".

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, for example, the conflict between Hinayāna and Mahāyāna, and the conflict between Yogacara and Madhyamaka, and so on. A great deal of the hermeneutics in Buddhism involves negotiating the disparity between "buddhisms" and Buddhadharma.

Herbie said:

"awakened" or "awakening" seems to be the key concept.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, Buddhadharma means "The realization and teaching of those who are awake."

Herbie said:

So the question as to the difference between "Buddha dharma" and "Buddhism(s)" has just been shifted to the question of identifying "awakened people" and since the ways of expression of "awakened people" cannot be determined by any buddhism how can "awakened people" be identified?

Malcolm wrote:

That is something we all have to work out on our own.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, February 14th, 2015 at 7:24 AM

Title: Re: Building a modern and/or western Buddhism

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

Malcolm, your upāya is indeed inconceivable.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, February 14th, 2015 at 4:29 AM

Title: Re: Building a modern and/or western Buddhism

Content:

daverupa said:

<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/kn/ud/ud.6.02.than.html> as well.

Malcolm wrote:

Given Dzogchungpa's ecumenical tendencies (there is a cure for that, BTW), I thought it was apropos.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, February 14th, 2015 at 3:26 AM

Title: Re: Building a modern and/or western Buddhism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

"Buddhisms" may contain Buddhadharma or not. It really depends on whether a given school of "Buddhism" produces awakened people or not.

dzogchungpa said:

How can you tell if a given school produces awakened people or not?

Malcolm wrote:

Matthew 7:16

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, February 14th, 2015 at 2:46 AM

Title: Re: Building a modern and/or western Buddhism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Can you specify/define what "buddhadharma" stands for?

"Buddha Dharma" is a) the realization of a buddha and his or her expression of that realization.

Herbie said:

OK, thanks.

But then those who claim that "Buddhism" or "all kinds of Buddhism" are not "Buddha Dharma" should have that knowledge directly from a Buddha and should have been able to understand the expression of that Buddha meaning exactly this. Because if they have that knowledge from a "buddhist" teaching (a teaching of any kind of "all kinds of Buddhisms") then "Buddha Dharma" would be included in "Buddhism" and would not be different from "Buddhism".

Malcolm wrote:

"Buddhisms" may contain Buddhadharma or not. It really depends on whether a given school of "Buddhism" produces awakened people or not.

In other words not everything branded as "Buddhism" is Buddhadharma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, February 14th, 2015 at 2:15 AM

Title: Re: Building a modern and/or western Buddhism

Content:

Herbie said:

For me buddhism is manifesting in buddhists, buddhist traditions and institutions and the terms that stand for the concepts of the buddhist system of thought. Therefore I take the term "buddhadharma" as a synonym for "buddhism".

Malcolm wrote:

They are not— the various kinds of "Buddhisms" may elect to disinclude various aspects of Buddhadharma and often do.

Herbie said:

From your perspective you are certainly right.

But I understand my term "buddhism" as the heading for all "kinds of buddhisms". Also when I am exploring I rely on my 5 senses therefore I have to take the 2 terms as synonyms. Otherwise I feel I would indulge in some sort of speculation.

Malcolm wrote:

You have another sense, the mind.

Herbie said:

Can you specify/define what "buddhadharma" stands for?

Malcolm wrote:

"Buddha Dharma" is a) the realization of a buddha and his or her expression of that realization.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, February 14th, 2015 at 12:29 AM

Title: Re: The Mahayana idea of karma and vegetarianism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The Madhyamaka stance, represented by Bhavaviveka, is that eating meat that is pure in three ways is permissible since there is no consciousness in the flesh of an animal who has been dead for some time

daverupa said:

...but there is consciousness in the flesh of an animal who has been dead for some lesser time?

Malcolm wrote:

Dave, the point eating meat not pure in three ways mean that you are somehow involved in afflicting suffering and engaging in killing. Basically, what Bhava is saying, is that a) because you were not involved in killing, seeing or ordering meat killed for you, you were not involved in killing b) since it takes a while to dress meat, but the time the (pure in three ways) meat reaches you, there is no fear of being involved in the animals suffering since its consciousness has long since departed its body, whether it is 30 seconds, 10 minutes, half an hour or three days.

daverupa said:

Also, how does this difference of opinion you mention relate to the following passage in the Surangama Sutra:

I use my spiritual power of compassion to provide you with illusory meat to satisfy your appetite.

Malcolm wrote:

It does not relate at all — this text never existed outside of China. We have some evidence that Indian Mādhyamikas more or less absolutely disregarded Yogacara and Tathāgatagarbha sūtras, or where they did give them attention, it was only to explain how their followers had utterly misunderstood them.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, February 14th, 2015 at 12:10 AM

Title: Re: The Mahayana idea of karma and vegetarianism

Content:

Vajrasvapna said:

While some Mahayana masters continue using a Hinayanist view to explain karma and blame people for eating meat.

Malcolm wrote:

The problem with your statement here is that meat-eating is not prohibited in Hinayāna.

The Madhyamaka stance, represented by Bhavaviveka, is that eating meat that is pure in three ways is permissible since there is no consciousness in the flesh of an animal who has been dead for some time, and thus one is not responsible for their suffering at all. Those who follow the Yogacara Sūtras and Tathāgatagarbha Sūtras disagree with this point of view vehemently.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 13th, 2015 at 8:55 PM

Title: Re: Building a modern and/or western Buddhism

Content:

Herbie said:

For me buddhism is manifesting in buddhists, buddhist traditions and institutions and the terms that stand for the concepts of the buddhist system of thought. Therefore I take the term "buddhadharma" as a synonym for "buddhism".

Malcolm wrote:

They are not—the various kinds of "Buddhisms" may elect to disinclude various aspects of Buddhadharma and often do.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 13th, 2015 at 2:36 AM

Title: Re: Ati yoga deity sadhana

Content:

narraboth said:

Can you quote what did Namkhai Norbu Rinpoche actually say about 'no transformation to diety'?

Malcolm wrote:

He has given over 500 retreats, he has made this statement literally thousands of times.

narraboth said:

That doesn't mean people outside of his sangha would know what and how exactly he said.

Malcolm wrote:

"if there is any transformation at all, it is anu level..."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 12th, 2015 at 11:00 PM

Title: Re: Believing in a Christian God

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

If Jeff wants to believe that his esoteric Christianity has the same message as Buddhadharma, that is his trip, and his conceptual confusion — but we should stop wasting our time with this.

Sherab said:

When a non-Buddhist takes the trouble to come onto a Buddhist forum to present his view, I usually will respond to show where I disagree with them. When his reply does not address my points, that would mean that he has no reply to my response and is now arguing for arguing sake. At that point, I will disengage since he is either being evasive or intellectually dishonest.

Jeff said:

Sherab,

Is there some point that I have not responded to? Also, I consider myself a follower of Buddha and have stated many times before that in my experience I have found his teachings to be correct. While the OP was about a Christian perspective, we could also be having this discussion with certain taoist and Kashmir Shaivism lineages. A Primordial lineage is a primordial lineage. The challenge in these discussions is that the group seems to be limited to text or verbal descriptions. With the clarity to directly perceive energy/light/transmissions it would be easier to demonstrate the relative lineages.

Best,

Jeff

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, Jeff, you are a perennialist, holding that all the world's religions hold the same essential truth. Most of us here are exclusivists, holding that the truth was only held and expressed in Buddhadharma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 12th, 2015 at 10:51 PM

Title: Re: Believing in a Christian God

Content:

Jeff said:

Anyone who has realized emptiness knows that there is nothing that was "created" in the first place.

Malcolm wrote:

There is no teaching of śūnyatā, emptiness, outside of the doctrine of Śākyamuni Buddha. Even where the term "emptiness" be used, it is not the emptiness taught by the Buddhas of the three times.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 12th, 2015 at 10:50 PM

Title: Re: Believing in a Christian God

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

If Jeff wants to believe that his esoteric Christianity has the same message as Buddhadharma, that is his trip, and his conceptual confusion — but we should stop wasting our time with this.

Jeff said:

Malcolm,

I did not start this thread and have responded in the context of the OP. If you are not interested in the OP, why post here?

Best,
Jeff

Malcolm wrote:

Because someone might read your posts and become confused.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 12th, 2015 at 10:49 PM

Title: Re: Believing in a Christian God

Content:

Jeff said:

Thank you for acknowledging that in these contexts refuge is similar to the concept of surrender.

Malcolm wrote:

I did not acknowledge that.

Jeff said:

Also, I completely agree that Buddha does not equal Jesus. As I have stated a few times before primordial Buddha is equivalent to the Holy Father.

Malcolm wrote:

You are hopelessly confused about Buddhadharma because you read someone else's hopelessly confused misinterpretation of what "adibuddha" means.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 12th, 2015 at 9:56 PM

Title: Re: Believing in a Christian God

Content:

Sherab said:

In Buddhism, any surrender is only expedient and temporary. The final goal is liberation from all dependencies, i.e., true independence. And you take your place as a Victorious One and become a source of refuge for others who have yet to achieve liberation.

In Abrahamic religions, surrender is absolute and eternal, and any free will you have is subject to the free will of Big Daddy.

Jeff said:

Where do you come up with that? Remember the most high is not some Zeus like old man. A couple of actual quotes from the bible for you...

Psalms 82:5-6

5 They know not, neither will they understand; they walk on in darkness: all the foundations of the earth are out of course. 6 I have said, Ye are gods; and all of you are children of the most High.

John 14:10-12

10 Do you not believe that I am in the Father, and the Father in Me? The words that I speak to you I do not speak on My own authority; but the Father who dwells in Me does the works. 11 Believe Me that I am in the Father and the Father in Me, or else believe Me for the sake of the works themselves. 12 "Most assuredly, I say to you, he who believes in Me, the works that I do he will do also; and greater works than these he will do, because I go to My Father.

Sherab said:

Christians like to claim that the creator is beyond space and time. Since the created are created within space and time, the created will always be lower than the creator. If you think that you can be equal to the creator, your Christian friends will think that you have come under the influence of Satan. So Big Daddy still rules over you whether you like it or not. Your free will is an illusion.

In Buddhism, the belief in a Creator God is considered as irrational. The Buddha himself taught that there is no Creator God. The Buddha taught that the Creator God is deluded in thinking that he (the Creator God) is a creator of the world and the beings therein.

When we follow the path shown by the Buddha, we will one day become Buddha ourselves. We will become equal to the teacher, Buddha. We will be truly free and independent.

Malcolm wrote:

If Jeff wants to believe that his esoteric Christianity has the same message as Buddhadharma, that is his trip, and his conceptual confusion — but we should stop wasting our time with this.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 12th, 2015 at 9:33 PM

Title: Re: Ati yoga deity sadhana

Content:

narraboth said:

Can you quote what did Namkhai Norbu Rinpoche actually say about 'no transformation to deity'?

Malcolm wrote:

He has given over 500 retreats, he has made this statement literally thousands of times.

narraboth said:

3. ati: generate directly from rigpa yeshe

Malcolm wrote:

He would still consider this anuyoga because there is generation.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 12th, 2015 at 9:32 PM

Title: Re: Believing in a Christian God

Content:

Jeff said:

"Buddha alone shows the path to liberation"... No other hope and no other way... That is the definition of surrender to Christ.

Malcolm wrote:

Ok, well, you take refuge in Jesus. I will continue to take refuge in the Buddha. However, please do not confuse these two, your refuge is not mine, mine is not yours.

Jeff said:

On paths to liberation...

1 John 1:12-13

12But as many as received him, to them gave he power to become the sons of God, even to them that believe on his name:13Which were born, not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God.

Just remember that the most high is emptiness, not the Zeus guy that everyone here is so attached to. Is not a buddha sort of a "son of emptiness"?

Malcolm wrote:

Emptiness is not god.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 12th, 2015 at 7:34 PM

Title: Re: Believing in a Christian God

Content:

Jeff said:

In Refuge, does not "one give them-self over to something"? Also, are you saying that nowhere in Dharma texts does it talk about "yielding or giving up power or control". Dropping things like anger and fears?

Malcolm wrote:

Dropping anger and fear gives one control; becoming free of the three afflictions gives one the eight kinds of mastery.

When one takes refuge in the Buddha, one is not giving oneself over or surrendering to the Buddha. One is recognizing that Buddha alone shows the path to liberation. When one takes refuge in the Buddha's Dharma, one is recognizing that Buddhadharma alone is the path to liberation. When one takes refuge in the Aryasangha, one is recognizing that the Aryasangha alone can aid one on the path to liberation.

dzogchungpa said:

Re surrender, have a look at chapter 3 of "Cutting Through Spiritual Materialism".

Malcolm wrote:

Can you tell me which Tibetan word is used for "surrender"? I have never encountered it used in a Tibetan or Indian Dharma book and I have read thousands.

I don't read basic Dharma texts in English very often anymore, though I do recall from when I did that Trungpa was definitely into the concept of surrender. I think those Tibetans like their Western students to "surrender"; but I think it has a bit more to do with the Cakravartin model of defeating and then converting people to the Dharma.

There is an idea of entrusting oneself (gtad pa) to the Three Jewels or the Guru, but that is a bit different in my view.

For example, when I entrust my money to a bank for safe keeping I do not surrender to the banker. When I entrust myself to the Three Jewels or my guru for the shelter of refuge, I am not surrendering to them. When someone "surrenders" they are placing themselves at the mercy of another. That is not how I understand my relationship with the Three Jewels nor my Gurus — that is a despotic model, quite common in Christianity, Judaism and Islam, and perhaps even Hinduism, but I think it is pretty foreign to Buddhadharma, no matter what Tulku Urgyen and Tsoknyi Rinpoche translators may have said when translating for them.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 12th, 2015 at 4:31 AM

Title: Re: Believing in a Christian God

Content:

Jeff said:

Sounds like the key is surrender.

Malcolm wrote:

No, the key is victory. The word surrender is never used in Dharma texts. Through taking refuge, one becomes victorious over both samsara and nirvana.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, February 10th, 2015 at 3:21 AM

Title: Re: The Mahayana idea of karma and vegetarianism

Content:

daverupa said:

Can you pick something out from that site that's pertinent here? So far, the Ven.'s summary statement, while trenchant, seems to be in the ballpark.

Astus' comments suggest the same.

Malcolm wrote:

This statement:

According to such texts, the bad karma you accumulate by eating meat is not due to your meat-eating leading more animals to be killed...

Is directly contradicted by the Buddha here, in the Lanka:

If people were to refrain from eating meat, Mahamati, animals would not be slain. For the majority of innocent beasts are slaughtered for the sake of money; few are killed for other reasons.

daverupa said:

...rather, it's because the bad karma entailed in the slaughter of the animal you are presently eating is somehow magically present in the meat itself and will attach itself to you by virtue of your eating it

Malcolm wrote:

Such a sentiment is not found in those Mahāyāna texts.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, February 10th, 2015 at 2:29 AM

Title: Re: CG Jung was indeed a Fascist. Discuss.

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Fascism started out as a left wing movement. Mussolini was the editor of the Socialist newspaper Avanti for 15 years, a life long socialist, until the Socialist Party in Italy split over participating in WWI against Germany.

Sherab Dorje said:

Started out as, but then developed into a proponent of Corporatism.

Malcolm wrote:

So did communism, look at China.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, February 10th, 2015 at 1:27 AM

Title: Re: CG Jung was indeed a Fascist. Discuss.

Content:

treehuggingoctopus said:

Greg, I agree that we just cannot afford to tolerate fascism in any form -- and I agree that it is far better to err here on the side of caution.

But Jung is dead. However gross his political sympathies were, his writings are not fascist, nor supportive of fascism -- even though fascists may well want to hijack them for their own purposes, just as they have tried to hijack Nietzsche and dozens of other intellectuals. In any case, I honestly do not know what could be gained by exhuming Jung's (already fairly rotten) corpse and putting a 'fascist scum' sticker onto it. There are far more dangerous -- and living! -- characters running around to deal with, aren't there?

Sherab Dorje said:

The discussion has gone beyond Jung and into the realm of defining how Fascism (or Fascist movements) develop. If anything Jung is a great example of how easily one slides back and forth between conservatism and Fascism. He also is a shining example of how conservatives share many more commonalities with Fascists, than democrats.

Malcolm wrote:

Fascism started out as a left wing movement. Mussolini was the editor of the Socialist newspaper Avanti for 15 years, a life long socialist, until the Socialist Party in Italy split over participating in WWI against Germany. In reality, fascists and communists are more similar than they are different.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, February 9th, 2015 at 11:41 PM

Title: Re: CG Jung was indeed a Fascist. Discuss.

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Greg, it is time for you to put this on:

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, February 9th, 2015 at 2:43 AM

Title: Re: CG Jung was indeed a Fascist. Discuss.

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

It was pretty genuine, a lot of intellectuals like Louis Ferdinand Celine and so on were enthusiastic fellow travelers on the Right who were worried about the rise of communism.

Sherab Dorje said:

I am talking about popular support, not "thumbs up" from right wing intellectuals and heads of industry. Don't confuse the twenty teens with the nineteen thirties.

I am not confusing them in the slightest. I am pointing to similarities. Of course we do not have the backdrop of WWI and the general despair associated with that debacle (16 million dead, 21 million wounded) but what you fail to understand since you are a safe distance from this phenomenon, is that Fascism was never defeated in Europe.

Franco continued to rule until he died in 1975. Salazar ruled until 1968 and was then followed by Caetano until 1975. Greece had the junta. Etc...

Even in the "democratic" countries of Italy and Germany power was still concentrated in the hands of Fascist and Nazi supporters. France had a defacto military dictatorship under de Gaulle until 1969. Winston Churchill (another military officer) until 1955 and don't even get me started on the so-called "Communist" regimes.

Malcolm wrote:

Oh, I understand quite well that Fascism never died in Europe.

But my point is simply that like anything, both right and left had their "millions of supporters."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, February 9th, 2015 at 2:13 AM

Title: Re: CG Jung was indeed a Fascist. Discuss.

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Before Hitler came to power, Mussolini was the darling of the European right, who saw in Fascism a coherent response to Bolshevism. Hitler was able to cash in the European Right's enthusiasm for Fascism, without it, the Vichy Republic could not have happened, not to mention Franco, and so on.

Sherab Dorje said:

Again, I do not disagree with you in general, but you still have not answered the question as to whether their appeal was genuine or contrived.

Malcolm wrote:

It was pretty genuine, a lot of intellectuals like Louis Ferdinand Celine and so on were enthusiastic fellow travelers on the Right who were worried about the rise of communism.

Sherab Dorje said:

Seeing how it worked here in Greece I would wager heavily on the contrived option. Movements like these need to be bankrolled and encouraged/advertised. Who does the bankrolling and encouragement? Mr average Joe Blow? I personally saw Golden Dawn go from an extreme and unknown fringe group to parliament in a matter of 4-5 years. Keep in mind that Golden Dawn has existed since 1985. Their direct ties with the (then) ruling New Democracy party and various high-flying business men are common knowledge here in Greece.

Malcolm wrote:

Don't confuse the twenty teens with the nineteen thirties.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, February 9th, 2015 at 1:33 AM

Title: Re: Believing in a Christian God

Content:

Herbie said:

Either this is your belief or you are joking.

Sherab Dorje said:

Oh... another rebirth denying "Buddhist"?

Malcolm wrote:

Probably not as Herbie introduced himself the following way:
I have joined this forum because I am interested in unconventional linguistic expressions and corresponding psycho-philosophy.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, February 9th, 2015 at 1:05 AM

Title: Re: Believing in a Christian God

Content:

Redfaery said:

Still, I'm pretty inclined to think that he runs a paradise, just as other gods of desire do. I've seen how faith in him has inspired members of my family and others around me to do truly compassionate things. I mean, I cannot imagine that my grandfather is not in the Christian God's heaven right now. There is simply no other place where he'd be.

Malcolm wrote:

Or he is just a rgyal po spirit.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, February 8th, 2015 at 10:38 PM

Title: Re: The Mahayana idea of karma and vegetarianism

Content:

Boomerang said:

It's quite simple. There is no need to rationalize why one eats meat. By compassion, it is quite clear that one should refrain from eating meat unless by eating meat you are really saving the animal, but that's not the case most of the time.

What if you could purify the dead animal's karma by eating it and reciting a mantra?

Malcolm wrote:

Such methods do exist in Vajrayāna.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, February 8th, 2015 at 10:37 PM

Title: Re: The Mahayana idea of karma and vegetarianism

Content:

plwk said:

Has Bhante Dhammanando accurately described on the Mahayana view of karma in the practice of vegetarianism? What do you think?

Malcolm wrote:

No, he has not. He has made a botch of it.

<http://www.shabkar.org>

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, February 8th, 2015 at 10:21 PM

Title: Re: CG Jung was indeed a Fascist. Discuss.

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

Yes, but I think those that actually supported him (ie were not bullied, harangued, threatened and beaten into supporting him) were an extremely small minority.

Malcolm wrote:

Before Hitler came to power, Mussolini was the darling of the European right, who saw in Fascism a coherent response to Bolshevism. Hitler was able to cash in the European Right's enthusiasm for Fascism, without it, the Vichy Republic could not have happened, not to mention Franco, and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, February 8th, 2015 at 9:55 PM

Title: Re: CG Jung was indeed a Fascist. Discuss.

Content:

steveb1 said:

Like millions of Europeans, Jung saw in Hitler more than a mere demagogue, but a real promise and potential - a dynamic force for progress and unity.

Sherab Dorje said:

What absolute nonsense. Millions of Europeans stood against Hitler, Mussolini, Franco, etc... from day one. Millions of Europeans saw him as a threat from the very beginning. You are just engaging in apologetics.

Malcolm wrote:

Well the truth is that millions of Europeans saw "...a real promise and potential - a dynamic force for progress and unity." And millions of other Europeans "...stood against Hitler, Mussolini, Franco, etc... from day one. Millions of Europeans saw him as a threat from the very beginning."

So you are both right.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, February 8th, 2015 at 6:40 AM

Title: Re: Is it possible to be Buddhist and Hindu?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

I came to the conclusion that the "modern academic critical approach to historiography" with regards to Buddhist texts and the history of Dharma in India is fatally flawed because it is shot with conjecture through and through and rife with speculation.

dzogchungpa said:
Not to mention all the disgruntlement.

Malcolm wrote:
Guys like Davidson and Lopez are definitely disgruntled.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Sunday, February 8th, 2015 at 2:00 AM
Title: Re: Gradual vs. Nongradual
Content:
Vajrasvapna said:
Bodhicitta is a term that etymologically means enlightened mind, so, again, the text states that only the enlightened mind can be the cause of Buddhahood.

Malcolm wrote:
No, here it means cittopāda, "generation of the thought."

Also the term bodhicitta does not really mean "enlightened mind" per se. One, bodhi means "awaken", not illuminate. Second, here citta means thought, hence the term "bodhicitta" in this sutrayāna context means "the thought to awaken." Hence the passage means tending to that thought to awaken through proximity and effort, one attains any of three results of the path.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Sunday, February 8th, 2015 at 1:34 AM
Title: Re: Is it possible to be Buddhist and Hindu?
Content:

Malcolm wrote:
There are all kinds of things wrong with that...but mainly the piling of conjecture on top of speculation...

Adamantine said:
I guess part of the fun of the dharma chat-room wheel-of-existence is that over time you may get to see someone who once argued against a view you expressed, eventually come to share it. I recall arguing this very point on Esangha, and at the time you appeared to strongly support the modern academic critical approach to historiography as being the most valid in some way. Or maybe I misunderstood you then, or am misunderstanding now. . .

Malcolm wrote:
I came to the conclusion that the "modern academic critical approach to historiography" with regards to Buddhist texts and the history of Dharma in India is fatally flawed because it is shot with conjecture through and through and rife with speculation.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, February 8th, 2015 at 12:43 AM

Title: Re: CG Jung was indeed a Fascist. Discuss.

Content:

Jikan said:

I'm bumping this old thread because I was recently reminded just deeply Jung and those who take inspiration from him (Campbell, Bly, &c) are associated with certain trends in Dharma practice. And because I forgot to rebut the categorical claim made above that there is no evidence for Jung's fascist-ness, which is documented in McLynn's biography, Carl Gustav Jung. Here's a summary from an LA Times review of the book:

Jung was profoundly anti-Semitic. The facts concerning his thorough-going prejudice against Jews has become one of the most contentious issues in Jungian scholarship today. McLynn addresses it clearly and straightforwardly. In explaining how some analysts deal with Jung's collaboration with the Nazis, he writes that others "in a kind of version of 'politics should have nothing to do with sport,' say that it is beyond the competence of a psychotherapist, even one of genius, to decide on what is right and wrong in politics, and that Jung followed the correct therapeutic procedure in trying to remain above the fray. But the issue of the society [Society For Psychotherapy, of which Jung was president] and the journal [Zentralblatt, the journal sympathetic to Nazi policies edited by Jung] will not go away. Many of the post-1934 articles in the Zentralblatt go far beyond routine Swiss bourgeois anti-Semitism and contain virulent attacks on the Jews coupled with eulogies of Hitler [while he was still in power]. . . . Jung knew all about the later articles and did nothing. Since he could not claim ignorance, as these articles were edited in Switzerland, he tried after World War II, to shift the blame onto C.A. Maier [his deputy editor], claiming that he did all the editing."

McLynn paints an even darker picture of Jung's Nazi sympathies when he discovered that "in 1936 Jung threatened resignation as president [of the Society For Psychotherapy] when the Dutch tried to prevent Nazi sympathizers joining the society. As a calculated snub to his critics, in the same year he appointed Hermann Goering as co-editor of the Zentralblatt. . . ."

<http://articles.latimes.com/1997/oct/12/books/bk-41812>

Malcolm wrote:

The movie about Jung made him out to be an absolute ass.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, February 7th, 2015 at 6:14 AM

Title: Re: Is it possible to be Buddhist and Hindu?

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

Again, from Jackson's introduction: Unfortunately, there is very little way of knowing whether a particular text attributed to a particular siddha—even if that siddha was a historical figure—actually was written by that siddha, so the notion of a “corpus” of texts unambiguously belonging to a specific figure must be regarded with considerable suspicion....

Jackson must be REALLY disgruntled.

kirtu said:

It's just Jackson taking the critical academic stance. There's really nothing wrong with that.

BTW - what is this intro from?

Kirt

Malcolm wrote:

There are all kinds of things wrong with that...but mainly the piling of conjecture on top of speculation...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, February 7th, 2015 at 5:55 AM

Title: Re: Is it possible to be Buddhist and Hindu?

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

Jackson must be REALLY disgruntled.

Malcolm wrote:

Sure, since he is interested in generating historical narratives rather than merely receiving them. People who set out to write history are usually pretty disgruntled.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, February 7th, 2015 at 5:52 AM

Title: Re: Is it possible to be Buddhist and Hindu?

Content:

conebeckham said:

This is tangential to this thread, but: Ghantapa didn't trace his lineage of Cakrasamvara from Saraha, if I recall. I think Luipa did trace back to Saraha, via Savaripa.

Malcolm wrote:

Ghantapāda both traces his lineage to Luipa, and he was also a direct disciple of Vajrayogini, hence I said, "directly and indirectly."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, February 7th, 2015 at 4:30 AM

Title: Re: Is it possible to be Buddhist and Hindu?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Yeah, I don't know what Saraha was smoking when he taught the Cakrasamvara Tantra Mandala to Nāgārjuna, or wrote the commentary on the Buddhakapala Tantra.

Sherab Dorje said:

I'm not even going to pretend to understand what you are trying to say here!

Malcolm wrote:

What I mean is that the largely disgruntled scholars in the Western Academy pride themselves on iconoclasm and seek out [and often interpolate] examples of iconoclasm in their studies of Indo-Tibetan Buddhism. Of course, while Saraha is mostly famous to us as the author of various Dohas, he was also great tantric master who is responsible for the promulgation of a number of tantric mandala traditions, Cakrasamvara not least among them, of which he stands at the head. In other words, Saraha was the person who first promulgated Cakrasamvara among humans in this epoch and so all lineages of Cakrasamvara practice must in some way or another trace their lineage to him directly or indirectly.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, February 7th, 2015 at 2:36 AM

Title: Re: Gradual vs. Nongradual

Content:

Jeff said:

I apologize if there was confusion in my above meaning. I had meant it is the context of reaching/realizing. Regarding the universe manifesting what is needed, I had meant the combined cause and effect of the needs of sentient beings.

Malcolm wrote:

One does not surrender to the flows of cause and effect. One sees reality, emptiness, suchness, etc.

Buddhas indeed respond to the needs of sentient beings.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, February 7th, 2015 at 2:18 AM

Title: Re: Gradual vs. Nongradual

Content:

Jeff said:

Malcolm,

It is a matter of perspective. "Full Buddhahood" requires one to surrender to the flows of cause and effect.

Malcolm wrote:

No, "full buddhahood" means being free from causes and effects.

Jeff said:

Or you could say that that the universe manifests a buddha and the kaya form relative to the need.

Malcolm wrote:

No, you couldn't.

Jeff said:

You are taking my above statement out of context. I was describing the process of getting there, not the state itself.

And, yes... I could.

Malcolm wrote:

You said, "...requires one to surrender to the flows of cause and effect."

No.

As for your other statement, the universe does not "manifest" a buddha...etc. The universe is something composed of defiled, conditioned phenomena.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, February 7th, 2015 at 1:47 AM

Title: Re: Gradual vs. Nongradual

Content:

Jeff said:

Malcolm,

It is a matter of perspective. "Full Buddhahood" requires one to surrender to the flows of cause and effect.

Malcolm wrote:

No, "full buddhahood" means being free from causes and effects.

Jeff said:

Or you could say that that the universe manifests a buddha and the kaya form relative to the need.

Malcolm wrote:

No, you couldn't.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, February 7th, 2015 at 12:49 AM

Title: Re: Gradual vs. Nongradual

Content:

Vajrasvapna said:

This false consequence is often bandied about, but it is not convincing. Why is this so?

1) What is awakening? It is the direct perception of suchness, the dharmadhātu, etc.

This is the direct cause of buddhahood. When that suchness is directly perceived (first bhumi, etc.), it is no longer possible to return to a state of ignorance about it just as a seed singed by fire can no longer produce a sprout.

Although it appears to be, a seed is not an unchanging entity. After a long time, it may lose the ability to germinate, besides, it only becomes a sprout under certain conditions, water, appropriate soil and light. However, if the sprout is really a 'result', then why it is not static and can grow into a plant or tree? On the other hand, if you throw the seed on fire; it becomes dust. The dust, in turn, continues an interdependent transformation process.

Malcolm wrote:

And this reply is just a non-sequitar.

Vajrasvapna said:

In other words, a consciousness singed by wisdom is no longer capable of giving rise to afflictive ignorance. The proximate or indirect causes of buddhahood are the trainings in the paths and stages.

Your argument does not contradict my statement, causality exists only in a conventional manner; because of interdependence.

Malcolm wrote:

Causality does not exist because of interdependence. Interdependence exists because of causality.

Vajrasvapna said:

And wisdom itself burns the stains of the luminous mind as in this quote attributed to Nagarjuna explains: Just as the stains on a fireproof cloth

That is sullied by various stains

Are consumed when the cloth is placed in fire

While the cloth itself is not,

Likewise the stains of the luminous mind

Are consumed in the fire of wisdom;

They are not luminous.

All the sutras on emptiness

Taught by the Victor

Counteract negative emotions;

They do not harm that element [of luminosity].

Malcolm wrote:

And this luminous mind to which Nāgārjuna (maybe, since the Dharmadhātustava is a very late text and is unattested in the Madhyamaka texts even as late as Candrakīrti and Śāntarakṣita) refers, is this itself relative or ultimate? In any case, regardless of your answer, the same text observes:

When one is free from the snare of afflictions in essenceless saṃsāra,
because of that there is buddhahood, which turns into the ambrosia of all embodied beings.

In the same way, from all seeds arise a result that resembles the cause, what wise person would be able to prove there is a fruit without a seed?

So, on the contrary, "Nāgārjuna" argues in this text that indeed buddhahood arises from causes. He further says:

Just as without a seed of sugar cane, sugar cannot be produced.
When someone tends the sugar cane seed,
from proximity and effort,
molasses, sugar, and refined sugar will arise from that,
Having tended bodhicitta,
from proximity and effort there is arhatship, the realization of conditions, (i.e. pratyekabuddhahood) and buddhahood arising and produced from that.

Vajrasvapna said:

So you believe that the ālaya is a truly existing entity, since it is the cause of enlightenment?

Malcolm wrote:

The ālaya is empty and from the perspective of the ultimate, it is the dharmadhātu; it is clarity and from the perspective of the relative, it is the ālayavijñāna — these two are inseparable.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 6th, 2015 at 10:29 PM

Title: Re: Gradual vs. Nongradual

Content:

Vajrasvapna said:

The text of the Diamond sutra states that bodhisattva accumulate merit with detached actions, keeping their minds free of concepts of a truly existing entity. Although the text of the Diamond sutra does not say it directly, what is implied is that the Buddha body of merit is already present, the sambhogakaya; so actually the bodhisattva not accumulate any merit. An example, if you have a covered sculpture, the fact that you go slowly discovering the sculpture does not mean that the body of the sculpture was not already there. So bodhisattva will gradually revealing the body of merit already present.

Malcolm wrote:

Is Buddhahood a state one realizes, or a phenomena one passively observes? If Buddhahood is something that already exists within a sentient being, there is no reason for the experience of samsara. The Uttaratantra is very profound, but understood incorrectly, it is results on one adopting a tirthika view of atman. Viewed another way, it becomes a definitive teaching on the nature of reality. It really depends on how it is understood.

Omniscience has causes and conditions. Even you admit it this in your example. Reality is already there, but unless one removes obscurations to perceiving it, it will never be perceived. Reality is not buddhahood. Buddhahood is the result of seeing reality fully.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 6th, 2015 at 10:23 PM

Title: Re: Gradual vs. Nongradual

Content:

Vajrasvapna said:

Another way to prove it, if Buddhahood is produced by cause and effect, this means that enlightenment would be conditioned, so it would not be a permanent state and liberation would not be possible.

Malcolm wrote:

This false consequence is often bandied about, but it is not convincing. Why is this so?

1) What is awakening? It is the direct perception of suchness, the dharmadhātu, etc. This is the direct cause of buddhahood. When that suchness is directly perceived (first bhumi, etc.), it is no longer possible to return to a state of ignorance about it just as a seed singed by fire can no longer produce a sprout. In other words, a consciousness singed by wisdom is no longer capable of giving rise to afflictive ignorance. The proximate or indirect causes of buddhahood are the trainings in the paths and stages.

2) Second, the state of perfect buddhahood, unsurpassed perfect complete awakening (anuttarasamyaksambodhi) is itself defined through the eradication of the two obscurations: the afflictive obscuration and the knowledge obscuration. When these two are eradicated it is not possible for someone to possess them again. Even if their consciousness remains a relative conditioned entity, it is a pure relative conditioned entity characterized by unimpeded knowledge of unconditioned reality. The mind, a conditioned relative entity, does not disappear at buddhahood. If it did, that would be nihilism; nor does it turn into an unconditioned entity itself, because that would involve a contradiction in kind — a conditioned entity cannot become an unconditioned entity and vice versa — as well as eliminating the possibility that there is a continuum between a sentient being and Vajradhara. This is the reason that Sachen Kungpa Nyingpo states in his Nyagma when defining the ālāya cause continuum:

"Tantra", because it is the garland of self-knowing from a sentient being through buddhahood, the uninterrupted awareness of the mind itself.

Jetsun Dragpa Gyaltsen further notes on this passage:

Because all concepts and suffering are complete in the meaning of ālāya, it is the cause continuum.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 6th, 2015 at 8:38 PM

Title: Re: Is it possible to be Buddhist and Hindu?

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

I think the Saraha quote is pretty definitive, irregardless of what Jackson would like to believe.

dzogchungpa said:

Yeah, that Jackson is a real nut. Again, from his introduction: If there is a type of negation in Saraha, Kanha, and Tilopa that seems rather less mitigated by paradox or multiple levels of discourse, it is that related to the three siddhas' attitudes toward social and religious convention, which are aptly summarized by Groucho Marx's famous claim, in Horse Feathers, "Whatever it is, I'm against it." In all three collections of dohas, but especially those of Saraha, there hardly is an Indian personage or practice of social or religious importance that is not subjected to mockery or critique. In the first fifteen verses of his Treasury, Saraha takes on, in succession, brahmin ritualists (S1–2), who are denounced for their pointless recitations and sacrifices; mendicant ascetics (S3–5), who are mocked for their deceit, hypocrisy, and greed; Jain renouncers (S6–9), who are ridiculed for their obsession with physical austerities; Buddhist monastics (S10), who are chastised for their dress-up games, their intellectualism, and their attempt to desiccate the mind through meditation; Mahayanists (S11), who are described as sophists and verbal gymnasts; tantrikas (S11, 14), who are said to be obsessed with mantras, mandalas, and mystic initiations and practitioners of all kinds (S14–15) who are lampooned for believing that offering lamps or food, going on pilgrimage, or immersing themselves in sacred rivers can purify them of defilement. In other places, Saraha criticizes the self-deception of the alchemists (S51), the absurdities of devoted meditators (S19–20, 22–23, 33, etc.) and the pretensions of scholars (S68, 76, 93) and makes evident his distaste for distinguishing pure and impure on the basis of caste (S46, 56b). Saraha also repeatedly addresses his listener as a "fool" and refers disparagingly to "bestial" or "childish" people who simply don't understand what is right in front of them. In a similar vein, but less extensively, Kanha and Tilopa, at various points in their dohas, criticize intellectuals (T8), scholars of sacred literature (K1, 29), people who make offerings to deities and visit pilgrimage spots (T19–21), and tantric ritualists obsessed with “chants, oblations, / and mandala rites” (K29). The social and religious outlook of all three is perhaps best captured in Saraha’s injunction: “Throw off / conventional nonsense” (S55).

Malcolm wrote:

Yeah, I don't know what Saraha was smoking when he taught the Cakrasamvara Tantra Mandala to Nāgārjuna, or wrote the commentary on the Buddhakapala Tantra.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 6th, 2015 at 8:36 PM

Title: Re: How does movement arise?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

[quote="LastLegend"]I don't think "meditation" is even mentioned in Sutras (correct me if I am wrong). /quote]

You are quite wrong. There is reams of material in the sūtras on meditation [bhavana], concentration [dhyana] and samadhi practices.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 6th, 2015 at 7:57 PM

Title: Re: Gradual vs. Nongradual

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Well, here is a point. Buddhahood is synonymous with omniscience, but as Kamalashila points out, omniscience must arise from causes otherwise it would arise at all times in anyone.

Vajrasvapna said:

Kamalashila was right, Buddhahood continually arise in all beings.

Malcolm wrote:

Kamalashila's point is rather the opposite, in fact. The sūtra you cite would have been unknown to him, since it never existed in India.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 6th, 2015 at 3:20 AM

Title: Re: Yidam and Dzogchen

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The Vairocanābhisambodhi Tantra states: Guhyapati, there are two forms of the deity: pure and impure. The pure form has the nature of realization, free from all characteristics. The impure form possesses characteristics such as color and shape.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 5th, 2015 at 9:34 PM

Title: Re: Gradual vs. Nongradual

Content:

Sherlock said:

I don't have the book with me now but I think it was in "Four Contemplations of Dzogchen Semde".

Also another point is maybe that the idea of "nongradual realization" came up in response to practitioners who thought Buddhahood was something created?

Malcolm wrote:

Well, here is a point. Buddhahood is synonymous with omniscience, but as Kamalashila points out, omniscience must arise from causes otherwise it would arise at all times in anyone.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 5th, 2015 at 7:57 PM

Title: Re: Gradual vs. Nongradual

Content:

Sherlock said:

The way ChNN quoted that semde text, it seems like it is used as a general reference to students who don't necessarily go through every stage sequentially and sometimes make big leaps but get complacent. He said rimgyispas are better students.

Malcolm wrote:

Which retreat are you referring to?

Anyway, it was a more general question not in reference to any specific teacher's teaching.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 5th, 2015 at 7:43 PM

Title: Re: Gradual vs. Nongradual

Content:

Sherlock said:

Well, what about the idea of thodrgalpa and rimgyispa? Thodrgalpas are not cigcarbas but they proceed erratically compared to rimgyipas.

Malcolm wrote:

But have you ever met one? In any case, vyukrantikas (thog rgal ba) are considered those above the path of seeing. Now I have met people I think are above the path of seeing, but none of them ever claim to be vyukrantikas.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 5th, 2015 at 7:30 PM

Title: Gradual vs. Nongradual

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Having studied widely amongst the four schools, one often comes across controversies about gradual paths vs. nongradual paths, but in all my years I have never met anyone who could claim they woke up nongradually. Is nongradual realization merely a polemical fantasy?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 5th, 2015 at 7:05 PM

Title: Re: Monastic vows

Content:

Adamantine said:

No, but then why the need to disrobe, just convention?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, I think it mostly convention. A Vajrayāna practitioner is supposed to follow his or her pratimokṣa vows according to the conventional perception of others. Thus, if they conventionally commit a defeat, well, this is also a breakage of samaya, since one of the samayas is to uphold the lower trainings. The karmic effects of the latter might be purifiable through Vajrasattva, but not the public's perception of you.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 5th, 2015 at 11:18 AM

Title: Re: Monastic vows

Content:

Adamantine said:

Is it indeed considered possible to purify one's break of vinaya vows using Vajrayana methods?

Malcolm wrote:

Of course.

Adamantine said:

But it isn't possible to purify a Parajika with Vajrayana methods? I'm just confused on that point I suppose. Because Tibetan monks still have to disrobe in that case.. Is it that it's possible to purify in an ultimate sense, but according to conventional custom one must still disrobe?

Malcolm wrote:

Is there something excluded from all faults and downfalls?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 5th, 2015 at 10:08 AM

Title: Re: Monastic vows

Content:

Adamantine said:

Is it indeed considered possible to purify one's break of vinaya vows using Vajrayana methods?

Malcolm wrote:

Of course.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 5th, 2015 at 10:01 AM

Title: Re: Is it possible to be Buddhist and Hindu?

Content:

Boomerang said:

Buddhism is hard to understand. Maybe I should switch from the Green Tara mantra to the Vajra Guru mantra.

Adamantine said:

I'm not sure how that relates to Sherab Dorje's provocation, but if you do aspire to meet and study with a realized Buddhist tantric master, reciting the Vajra Guru mantra with pure heartfelt aspiration would be good temdrel (auspicious interdependent connection) and it could help you develop the right causes and conditions for that meeting.

Boomerang said:

I meant that I don't understand Madhyamaka, so I should recite the Vajra Guru mantra to find teacher to help me understand.

Malcolm wrote:

No, you should recite the heart sutra. Also, there are many online resources which will help you understand Madhyamaka — but you might want to start with all that "lowly" dualistic stuff first, like Abhidharma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 5th, 2015 at 2:09 AM

Title: Re: Is it possible to be Buddhist and Hindu?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

It is unlikely that Virupa was anything other than the rough and tumble, tīrthika defeating Mahāisiddha the legends recount:

dzogchungpa said:

You really seem to identify with Virupa.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, sure, he was one of the most important Mahāisiddhas and also the patron saint of drinkers.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 5th, 2015 at 1:59 AM

Title: Re: Is it possible to be Buddhist and Hindu?

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

Speaking of "Tantric Treasures", here's a passage from Jackson's Introduction: The figures found in these lists are generally acknowledged to be "Buddhists." Certainly, the legends surrounding them and the words attributed to them have influenced countless Buddhists in India, Nepal, and Tibet for a thousand years; but in their original setting, it is not always easy to separate them out—whether in terms of terminology, rhetoric, or practice—from similar figures in non-Buddhist, especially "Hindu" traditions. They seem quite closely related to Saivite ascetics like the Pasupatas and Kapalikas; tantrikas like the Kashmiri Saivas and Bengali Saktas; or the wonder-working Nath siddhas and Rasa siddhas. More broadly, there are general similarities between ideas and practices found in Buddhist siddha writings and those of other Indian yogic and ascetic communities—from such "textualized" movements as those reflected in the Yoga Sutra of Patanjali and the Samnyasa Upanisads to such seemingly timeless and "unwritten" groups as the Nagas, Kanphatas, and Aghoras. Nor can their possible connections with similar sorts of groups in, for instance, Persia, central Asia, or China be overlooked; the resonance, and possible historical connections, between Indian siddhas and Chinese Chan masters or Taoist immortals suggest an especially intriguing, if uncertain, path for further research. What is more, it is entirely possible that, as suggested long ago by Agehanada Bharati, most of the siddhas actually were pre- or nonsectarian wandering yogins, who appropriated various religious terms without intending to promote a particular religion—yet willy-nilly were appropriated by those very sectarian traditions that they resisted or ignored.

Malcolm wrote:

It is unlikely that Virupa was anything other than the rough and tumble, tīrthika defeating Mahāisiddha the legends recount:

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, February 4th, 2015 at 9:44 PM

Title: Re: Is it possible to be Buddhist and Hindu?

Content:

Nirrtix said:

Anyhow, I am curious about this.

odysseus said:

It's a NO – it's not possible.

Nirrtix said:

I am also curious about what many of you think about how some think about the Hindu belief that Buddha is an Avatar of Vishnu.

odysseus said:

Well, for me – it's an honour by the Hindus.

Malcolm wrote:

Not really, the way they put it is that Buddha was an avatar sent to deceive the asuras by teaching them a false doctrine.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, February 4th, 2015 at 8:12 PM

Title: Re: Is it possible to be Buddhist and Hindu?

Content:

Herbie said:

What I find most fascinating about these opinions, views and discussions is that the participants seem to believe that there is objectivity involved in terms to which there is no correlate that could be seen, heard, tasted, smelled or touched.

Malcolm wrote:

If anything is objective, the realization of buddhas and bodhisattvas is objective. That is what is under discussion.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, February 4th, 2015 at 3:15 AM

Title: Re: Is it possible to be Buddhist and Hindu?

Content:

Boomerang said:

I feel that Hinduism is like an alternate form of the Sravaka path, the difference being that they don't follow Buddha's teachings.

daverupa said:

Did you just say "non-Buddhist Buddhism"?

Malcolm wrote:

I think one can say that the path presented in such texts as the Yoga Sūtras is in many respects similar to the path outlined in the Agamas/Nikayas, but since the view is based in the Sāṃkhya system, it does not lead to the same result. Indeed, Sāṃkhya occupies a position very much like Abhidharma in Hinduism. Very few people practice it literally, but its core concepts are pervasive, especially in nondual Hindu systems like Advaita and Shaivism.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, February 4th, 2015 at 2:05 AM

Title: Re: Is it possible to be Buddhist and Hindu?

Content:

Boomerang said:

Yup. Where Buddhism teaches bodhicitta, Hinduism teaches "know your place and don't complain." In that context, bodhicitta is only developed by happenstance.

Malcolm wrote:

It is not developed at all unless you decide to become a Buddha for the benefit of all sentient beings.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, February 4th, 2015 at 1:57 AM

Title: Re: Is it possible to be Buddhist and Hindu?

Content:

Boomerang said:

2. Never said Buddhism and Hinduism are the same thing. Never said they had the same goal. I only said that ineffable nondual realizations can't be qualified and contrasted, because contrasting them implies they can be described, and nonduality is indescribable.

Paul said:

The part in red is where you make your mistake. You incorrectly say that because something non-dual it is beyond description and discussion and then you conflate two different nondualisms simply because they are non-dual. As has been shown extensively, what is being referred to as being 'non-dual' in Buddhism and other systems is completely different. There is zero reason to conflate them.

Boomerang said:

I said nonduality is beyond scriptures, and Malcolm responded by quoting scriptures. This is what I mean by confusing nonduality with a concept of nonduality. We'll have to agree to disagree.

Malcolm wrote:

I am confused about neither.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, February 4th, 2015 at 1:56 AM

Title: Re: Is it possible to be Buddhist and Hindu?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

What are the spiritual goals of Buddhadharma?

Mahayana Buddhism = Bodhisattva

Advaita Vedanta = Stop reincarnating

The spiritual goal of Mahāyāna Buddhadharma is buddhahood, the attainment of the three kāyas. Bodhisattvas are those who strive for this goal in order to liberate all beings from samsara. In the process, all afflictions that cause rebirth in samsara are eliminated and power over birth is attained at the eighth bhumi.

From the point of view of Buddhadharma, Advaitans never achieve cessation of rebirth because they do not eradicate the innate clinging to atman, therefore, no matter how profound their samadhi or understanding may be, it is not a cause of freedom from samsara, and at best they attain rebirth in the unconsciousness deva realms.

Boomerang said:

I agree with that. To put it another way, I feel that Hinduism is like an alternate form of the Sravaka path, the difference being that they don't follow Buddha's teachings. So I think Advaita Vedanta is valid the same way Theravada Buddhism is valid.

Malcolm wrote:

It is good that you noticed that relative bodhicitta is absolutely lacking in the Hindu path. Second, you only need to understand ultimate bodhicitta is lacking in the Hindu path, and once having understood that, you will understand why even Advaita will not lead to cessation of rebirth, thus rendering it lower than Hinayāna Buddhism, which does lead to the cessation of [afflictive] rebirth.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, February 4th, 2015 at 1:08 AM

Title: Re: Is it possible to be Buddhist and Hindu?

Content:

Boomerang said:

It is difficult for some to understand the difference between nonduality and a concept of nonduality. For such people, it's probably best for them to follow one religion and actively avoid syncretism. I'm very grateful to be a person who hasn't encountered that difficulty. However, I don't really see my views as syncretic. I'm able to hold contradictory views, because I understand that no concept possesses inherent truth or falsity. I never realized how far out that is until I participated in this thread.

Sherab Dorje said:

So you have realised non-duality and are thus capable of mixing and matching and then coming here and preaching to us? And, I never really "took refuge" in a Hindu god. I see them as benevolent entities who have mastered a certain paradigm of spirituality. My overall spiritual goals are more in line with Buddhism than Hinduism.

So you are neither a Buddhist nor a Hindu yet you know that Buddhism and Hinduism are the same thing?

Boomerang said:

1. Never preached anything. If in doubt, re-read the thread.
2. Never said Buddhism and Hinduism are the same thing. Never said they had the same goal. I only said that ineffable nondual realizations can't be qualified and contrasted, because contrasting them implies they can be described, and nonduality is indescribable. Again, re-read the thread.

Love.

Malcolm wrote:

Nondualisms are quite describable. If they weren't, you would not know about them.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, February 4th, 2015 at 1:07 AM

Title: Re: Is it possible to be Buddhist and Hindu?

Content:

Boomerang said:

And, I never really "took refuge" in a Hindu god. I see them as benevolent entities who have mastered a certain paradigm of spirituality. My overall spiritual goals are more in line with Buddhism than Hinduism.

Malcolm wrote:

What are the spiritual goals of Buddhadharma?

Boomerang said:

Mahayana Buddhism = Bodhisattva

Advaita Vedanta = Stop reincarnating

Malcolm wrote:

The spiritual goal of Mahāyāna Buddhadharma is buddhahood, the attainment of the three kāyas. Bodhisattvas are those who strive for this goal in order to liberate all beings from samsara. In the process, all afflictions that cause rebirth in samsara are eliminated and power over birth is attained at the eighth bhumi.

From the point of view of Buddhadharma, Advaitans never achieve cessation of rebirth because they do not eradicate the innate clinging to atman, therefore, no matter how profound their samadhi or understanding may be, it is not a cause of freedom from samsara, and at best they attain rebirth in the unconsciousness deva realms.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, February 3rd, 2015 at 11:38 PM

Title: Re: Monastic vows

Content:

philji said:

Can anyone explain why it is that in the Theravada tradition they strictly follow vows including not eating after noon, not touching money etc whereas Tibetan monks do not except in certain occasions. Is it that the Bodhisattva and tantric vows take precedence?

Ayu said:

For the sake of understanding better this topic, I asked a tibetan buddhist novice nun (from Austria) yesterday.

She said, no, there are not different rules in Theravada and Mahayana - at least not to an considerable extent. The reasons why all the tibetan monks and nuns are eating dinner, for example, or wearing sweaters under their robes in winter and all this, are individually. Some have exeption because of health issues, or other reasons.

Mainly you can see that the rules are accomodated to the certain circumstances.

For sure these ordained confess regularly and hold the right view to the best of their capacity.

In my point of view this doesn't reduce the respect they deserve to the slightest.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, there are different rules, Theravadins do not have a system of Mahāyāna ordination, Tibetan Buddhism does; Thervada does not have a system of Vajrayāna vows, Tibetan Buddhism does. The receipt of these higher vows alters how the lower vows are practiced. Please Sapan's Clear Differentiation of the Three Codes or Kontgrul's Buddhist Ethics.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, February 3rd, 2015 at 8:14 PM

Title: Re: Is is possible to be Buddhist and Hindu?

Content:

Boomerang said:

And, I never really "took refuge" in a Hindu god. I see them as benevolent entities who have mastered a certain paradigm of spirituality. My overall spiritual goals are more in line with Buddhism than Hinduism.

Malcolm wrote:
What are the spiritual goals of Buddhadharma?

Author: Malcolm
Date: Tuesday, February 3rd, 2015 at 8:03 PM
Title: Re: Is it possible to be Buddhist and Hindu?
Content:
Boomerang said:

I agree. I knew the conversation was over after Malcolm responded to my statement that nonduality is beyond scriptures by...quoting scriptures. I strongly disagree with his belief that nondual realizations can be qualified and contrasted. Nonetheless, I feel that he deepened my understanding of what it means to take refuge in the Buddha, and I'm grateful for that.

Malcolm wrote:
Sure they can — you just have not looked deeply enough into the differences between what Hindus mean by nonduality (advaita) and what Buddhists mean by nondual (nondual) — and this is why it is puzzling to you. You are, in essence, a victim of bad translations and ignorant commentators since you are not reading these things in any primary language.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Tuesday, February 3rd, 2015 at 5:30 AM
Title: Re: Is it possible to be Buddhist and Hindu?
Content:
Malcolm wrote:

I thought it was an outgrowth of Theosophy.

Sherlock said:
Exactly. Theosophy is late Victorian New Age; Perennialists are the right-wing end of the spectrum who didn't like the other Theosophists. Today, a lot of support for perennialism still mainly comes from the right, Evola-reading "Traditionalists".

Malcolm wrote:
I always associated perennialism with Aldous Huxley and Huston Smith, etc.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Tuesday, February 3rd, 2015 at 5:07 AM
Title: Re: Is it possible to be Buddhist and Hindu?
Content:
Sherlock said:
Perennialism is bullshit.

Boomerang said:

Good for you. Now let's try to stay on topic. The thread isn't titled "Let's take potshots at other religions."

Sherlock said:

Perennialism is not a religion. It comes from the fevered dreams of right-wing New Agers who don't want to be with the other New Agers.

Malcolm wrote:

I thought it was an outgrowth of Theosophy.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, February 3rd, 2015 at 4:44 AM

Title: Re: Is it possible to be Buddhist and Hindu?

Content:

Sherlock said:

Perennialism is bullshit.

Boomerang said:

Good for you. Now let's try to stay on topic. The thread isn't titled "Let's take potshots at other religions."

Malcolm wrote:

What you seem to be failing to understand is that if you have gone for refuge to the Buddha, you have eschewed other refuges. If you go for refuge to other gods having once gone for refuge to the Buddha, Dharma and Sangha, you void your refuge in the Three Jewels including losing all the vows that come with going for refuge, you return to the state of an ordinary person, and the virtue that you perform is no longer elevated by refuge in the Three Jewels.

Buddhadharma is a path, and aside from the fact of whether the goals of Buddhadharma and Sanatana Dharma are the same(they're not), one cannot tread two paths at the same time. One must walk on one or the other. One cannot walk on both. It would be very much like trying to stand on two horses at the same time.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, February 3rd, 2015 at 3:11 AM

Title: Re: Is it possible to be Buddhist and Hindu?

Content:

daverupa said:

Boomerang, you seem to have an inability to recognize some simple facts on the ground with respect to the Dhamma; your attempt to be inclusive and syncretistic is perhaps laudable, but at the same time tragically misguided, ensuring that you're bound for inaccurate understandings.

Malcolm wrote:

It's tragic, really.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, February 3rd, 2015 at 3:10 AM

Title: Re: Is it possible to be Buddhist and Hindu?

Content:

Boomerang said:

In the end, what I learned from this conversation is that it's easy for Hindus to see Buddhism as valid, but the reverse is less common. It was a splendid opportunity for spiritual growth, and I thank you all for participating with me.

Malcolm wrote:

Hinduism is "valid" as far as it goes for the attainment of worldly ends and mundane happiness, but in general those who follow Buddhadharma do not think that Hindu means to liberation actually result in liberation.

Boomerang said:

Uh huh. Swami Vivekananda said that although Buddhism and Jainism deny the importance of God, they teach their practitioners to become God, which is just as good in the end.

Love.

Malcolm wrote:

Umm... no. The Buddha taught people how to become buddhas. Mahāvira taught people to starve themselves to death.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, February 3rd, 2015 at 2:24 AM

Title: Re: Is it possible to be Buddhist and Hindu?

Content:

Boomerang said:

In the end, what I learned from this conversation is that it's easy for Hindus to see Buddhism as valid, but the reverse is less common. It was a splendid opportunity for spiritual growth, and I thank you all for participating with me.

Malcolm wrote:

Hinduism is "valid" as far as it goes for the attainment of worldly ends and mundane happiness, but in general those who follow Buddhadharma do not think that Hindu means to liberation actually result in liberation.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, February 2nd, 2015 at 9:19 PM

Title: Re: Loving kindness

Content:

philji said:

Thanks Malcolm. Is there a translation that is useable?

Malcolm wrote:

I generally translate byams pa as love, i.e. the wish for another to have happiness. If you love someone, you want them to be happy, correct?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, February 2nd, 2015 at 8:11 PM

Title: Re: Loving kindness

Content:

philji said:

What would be the closest tibetan word(and literal translation),for Metta. Is it Jampa ?

Malcolm wrote:

yes, རྒྱལ་པོ་ or byams pa, pronounced jampa.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, February 1st, 2015 at 8:19 PM

Title: Re: Monastic vows

Content:

philji said:

I am really enjoying and gaining knowledge about this whole issue, which was my original intention in posting. However I do feel that being mndful of not making fun of and not slandering the sangha is very , very important something maybe we need to be mindful of here.

Malcolm wrote:

You need to keep in mind that Jeff was deeply disappointed by his experience with the monastic Sangha in Asia — he wrote about it constantly.

Part of the post removed as an ad hom argument. Participants can look up Indrajala's prior posts and/or blog to look into his views and biases, if they wish to.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, February 1st, 2015 at 7:13 PM

Title: Re: Monastic vows

Content:

lama tsewang said:

i dont think its a good thing to make fun of the teachings

Indrajala said:

No, I'm serious. What is a pāyattika and what is the result to be experienced if not confessed?

Malcolm wrote:

Hell.

However, you do realize that if you are practitioner [and in general all Tibetan monks are], you confess all your misdeeds and downfalls of the three vows daily with Vajrasattva?

Moreover, the bodhisattva approach to following the vows can be flexible as the Buddha states in the Ārya-vinayaviniścayopālipariṣcchā-nāma-mahāyāna-sūtra:

The training of a bodhisattva who has entered into Mahāyāna is said to be modifiable.

The training of those in the śravakayāna is said to be unmodifiable.

This sūtra also clarifies other issues you seem to be obsessed with.

So again, while it is important to receive and maintain the three vows, the flexibility towards pratimokṣa vow in the Mahāyāna approach to the vows that is not present in the Hinayāna approach to the pratimokṣa vow, in addition to the fact that Mahāyāna vows constitute a separate and more important class of vows, even while taking the pratimokṣa vows as a foundation.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, February 1st, 2015 at 6:50 AM

Title: Re: Monastic vows

Content:

Indrajala said:

Edit 7 [...]

Malcolm wrote:

You are going to have to explain to me how eating dinner is evil and unwholesomeness.

Indrajala said:

My point is really that almost nobody really believes in things so dogmatically...

You are quite wrong — however, the Buddhas have also provided many means of purifying infractions of vows, especially in Vajrayāna, because in this degenerate age the lower vows in general are very hard to maintain purely.

... Edit 8 [...]

Malcolm wrote:

A Mahāyānist in general should be consuming food with the motivation to achieve buddhahood for the benefit of sentient beings — so as long as that is the case, there is no problem with eating dinner, whether lay or ordained.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, February 1st, 2015 at 6:21 AM

Title: Re: Monastic vows

Content:

Indrajala said:

So, as a monk or even layperson it is actually quite risky, if you really believe in the words of the vinaya, to suggest that "Mahāyāna Bhikṣus needn't be so concerned with these details, since their motivation for practice is more important than adhering to this or that rule."

Malcolm wrote:

As Nagolo Khenchen states in his The Lamp of the Path of Freedom and Omniscience: Therefore, even though one takes life and does not practice celibacy, such actions can be permissible, but engaging in these actions for one's own benefit through desire, hatred and confusion is not permitted for anyone. Likewise, making offerings to the Three Jewels and making donations to beggars by stealing the property of the greedy, lying in order to protect sentient beings against being killed and so on, calumny to separate others from nonvirtuous friends, using harsh speech to place those in the Dharma with forceful methods who cannot be swayed with gentle speech, protesting hidden flaws by giving instruction and so on, are permitted.

As I said, the general POV in Tibetan Buddhism is that the ten nonvirtues are permissible if they are to benefit others.

Indrajala said:

So, you state, "One's abiding in a state of virtue or non-virtue derived from receiving any of the three vows is not dependent upon whether anyone else knows about it or not. It is dependent upon whether or not one has taken proper efforts to guard one's vows carefully." However, the whole meaning of "guarding one's vows" and what exactly that is supposed to require is a topic with many diverse opinions historically, and some positions would suggest being incorrect is literally going to send you to hell (wrong view and all that).

Basically, most people just make up their own mind on such issues regardless of what scriptures and Buddhist theorists say, and hope to get on in life.

Malcolm wrote:

Basically, nothing you cite contradicts anything that I have said — and more to the point, it does not contradict the general TIBETAN BUDDHIST point of view on the matter.

Indrajala said:

...some positions would suggest being incorrect is literally going to send you to hell (wrong view and all that).

Malcolm wrote:

This would be the general Tibetan Buddhist viewpoint. The Bodhicaryāvatara states:

Those who wish to guard their discipline must guard their minds strictly.

If one does not guard the mind,

one will not be able to fully guard one's training.

Drunk wild elephants do not cause as much harm as the harm of Avici caused by the unrestrained elephant of the mind.

If the elephant of the mind is always restrained with the rope of mindfulness,

all fears will not exist and all virtue will come into one's hand.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 31st, 2015 at 7:11 PM

Title: Re: Monastic vows

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Second, this is how it is explained by Vasubandhu.

Indrajala said:

No. I'm simply saying you have your own interpretation, and it is not definitive nor the final word on the matter. .

Malcolm wrote:

It is obviously not merely my opinion, since I provided a quotation from Sapan, Vasubandhu, etc. You on the other hand have provided no citations at all, so we can truly say you are merely voicing your own subjective opinion without any reference to any established authority.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 30th, 2015 at 11:34 PM

Title: Re: Monastic vows

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

In reality it does work out like that, if you happen to believe in karma.

Indrajala said:

This is just your interpretation of karma. It is a subjective religious belief.

Malcolm wrote:

This is not a secular humanist forum, this is 1) a Mahāyāna Buddhist forum 2) The Tibetan Buddhism subforum.

Second, this is how it is explained by Vasubandhu.

Now, you might have decided that Buddhadharma is a bunch of religious nonsense, and have no further interest in it apart from getting a degree in Buddhology so you can feed yourself, but I think it is fair to say that most of us participating here take these "subjective religious beliefs" quite seriously.

Indrajala said:

As far as lunch and dinner are concerned, since all Tibetan monks are Mahāyānists, Mahāyāna Bhikṣus needn't be so concerned with these details, since their motivation for practice is more important than adhering to this or that rule.

What a convenient way to move around the goal posts. Here you are preaching the need to guard one's vows carefully, but then make a convenient exception.

Malcolm wrote:

In his discussion of the pratimokṣa vows of Mahāyāna system, Sapan states:

Here, these observances that are concerned with the elements of evil and unwholesomeness are mostly kept as in the Disciple's system, while certain desireless offenses are treated in accord with that of bodhisattvas.

Behavior that, in the view both systems, would cause worldlings to lose faith is strenuously guarded against; a lapse is allowed in the Individual Liberation discipline if the Great Vehicle if it induces worldlings to virtue.
-- Rhoton, 2002, SUNY, pg. 46.

In other words, bhikṣus eating dinner is not an issue for a Tibetan Buddhist monastery. Handling gold and money is not an issue as long as it is for the benefit of the Dharma, so on and so forth.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 30th, 2015 at 10:45 PM

Title: Re: Monastic vows

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

One's abiding in a state of virtue or non-virtue derived from receiving any of the three vows is not dependent upon whether anyone else knows about it or not. It is dependent upon whether or not one has taken proper efforts to guard one's vows carefully.

Indrajala said:

Meanwhile in reality it doesn't work like that. Monasteries serve lunch at 12:00pm on the dot and dinner in the evening.

Malcolm wrote:

In reality it does work out like that, if you happen to believe in karma.

As far as lunch and dinner are concerned, since all Tibetan monks are Mahāyānists, Mahāyāna Bhikṣus needn't be so concerned with these details, since their motivation for practice is more important than adhering to this or that rule. Nevertheless, the act of receiving the three vows in itself is a virtue, and one should endeavor as best one can to uphold the three vows, and purify one's downfalls immediately and daily. This is how we practice vowed conduct in Tibetan Buddhism. I don't really care how they do it in other schools, but this question was posed in the Tibetan Buddhist forum.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 30th, 2015 at 10:11 PM

Title: Re: Monastic vows

Content:

Indrajala said:

Precepts are just social conventions.

Malcolm wrote:

From a Tibetan Buddhist point of view, based on how we read the Abhidharmakośa:
Morality, good conduct, action and discipline
-- Abhk 4:16a-b, Pruden

Thus the vows are actually a form of action which has results — positive ones when followed, negative ones when broken.

One's abiding in a state of virtue or non-virtue derived from receiving any of the three vows is not dependent upon whether anyone else knows about it or not. It is dependent upon whether or not one has taken proper efforts to guard one's vows carefully.

Phil, you need to read Kongtrul's Buddhist ethics.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 30th, 2015 at 9:22 PM

Title: Re: Monastic vows

Content:

philji said:

Can anyone explain why it is that in the Theravada tradition they strictly follow vows including not eating after noon, not touching money etc whereas Tibetan monks do not except in certain occasions. Is it that the Bodhisattva and tantric vows take precedence?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, there is rather large Mahāyāna literature devoted to the comportment of Mahāyāna bhikṣus, one of which can be read in Chang's Compendium of Ratnakuta sutras. In this literature, the Buddha makes it very clear how the conduct of a Mahāyāna bhikṣu contradicts the conduct of a bhikṣu who has not entered Mahāyāna.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 29th, 2015 at 7:03 PM

Title: Re: Is it possible to be Buddhist and Hindu?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

It will also depend on how much of ChNN's work one has actually read — for example, there are detailed refutations of nonbuddhist tenets in his Precious Vase, in the section on the view.

muni said:

Since Awaken masters' action-speech is for our inner awakening. If these tenets keep us conditioned, dual, it's a blessing to throw a light on it.

Malcolm wrote:

The entire point of studying these tenet systems is to remove our doubts, and therefore, our concepts. The purpose of such study is not to increase our concepts.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 29th, 2015 at 6:37 PM

Title: Re: Is it possible to be Buddhist and Hindu?

Content:

muni said:

Since many consider Chogyal Namkhay Norbu Rinpoche as their master, I like to share this quote. How this text will be perceived depends on the variety of us.

Malcolm wrote:

It will also depend on how much of ChNN's work one has actually read — for example, there are detailed refutations of nonbuddhist tenets in his Precious Vase, in the section on the view.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 29th, 2015 at 6:26 PM

Title: Re: Is it possible to be Buddhist and Hindu?

Content:

Ayu said:

It has a very different message than what was said some time before in this thread. I think, especially as a buddhist it is important to cultivate tolerance on one side - and stability in practice on the other hand.

Malcolm wrote:

I never entertained the notion that followers of Buddhadharma should not learn from teachers of other schools. While we have a rich analysis of the tenets of others schools, sometimes they seem a little like parodies of them. So it is useful to hear a Yoga master teach on Samkhya and Yoga, an Advaita master teach on Advaita and so on.

Nevertheless, one does this in order to understand how these tenets are different from Buddhadharma, in addition to understanding their commonalities.

For example, I myself spent six weeks learning Yoga, the Yoga Sutras, Samkhya and so on from a well respected disciple of Krishnamacarya a couple of years ago. It was a valuable experience because now I can say that I really understand the system of the Yoga Sūtras, Samkhya, and so on, and how they are distinct from Buddhadharma. To study with a tirthika teacher is not the same as going for for refuge in something other than Buddhadharma. As bodhisattvas, we are supposed to study everything, particularly adhyatmyavidyā, the inner sciences. Of course, the classical inner sciences in Dharma are Prajñāpāramita, Madhyamaka and so on, but we can also consider the study of non-Buddhist tenet systems to be part of that study. Of course there is a danger, if one is not discerning, that one will become confused — but as long as one is clear about where one's refuge lies, there there will not be a problem in the end.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 29th, 2015 at 5:40 PM

Title: Re: Is it possible to be Buddhist and Hindu?

Content:

M.G. said:

... I was thinking about whether there might be practical things of value members of one tradition could learn from the other. I actually do have one Hindu friend who studied meditation with a Buddhist teacher, simply because the quality of instruction was so high.

Kim O'Hara said:

That's a good question and it's one that I would answer in the affirmative. For instance, I have been going along to yoga classes recently for the physical training in much the same way your friend went to Buddhism for meditation. The (very small) bit of Hinduism in the yoga is not any obstacle to my Buddhist practice at all. Nor was the Taoism in the Tai Chi which I took up a few years ago, for that matter.

Malcolm wrote:

There is no problem with learning anything. Just don't forget where your real refuge lies.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 29th, 2015 at 9:49 AM

Title: Re: Is is possible to be Buddhist and Hindu?

Content:

dreambow said:

So what if Advaita can be traced back to the 8th century? You can still say its based on Shankaras direct experience of awakening. I don't believe he is necessarily copying anyone....anymore then some say Buddhism is based on Jainism and subsequent 'scriptures as I believe the Buddha and Mahavira were contemporaries.

If a great teacher is speaking from his own enlightenment, whether you call it empty or a plenum, it matters little about influence. Its just what it is.

Malcolm wrote:

Clearly you are not a practitioner of Buddhadharma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 29th, 2015 at 5:11 AM

Title: Re: Is is possible to be Buddhist and Hindu?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Why not? He is a high lama from an ancient Karma Kagyu tulku lineage.

Doesn't mean I am interested...

Adamantine said:

Thought treasures were more of a Nyingma specialty

Malcolm wrote:

These days Karma Kagyus are Nyingma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 29th, 2015 at 4:41 AM

Title: Re: Is is possible to be Buddhist and Hindu?

Content:

Sherlock said:

Please quote me a master who has spent time seriously studying Hindu tantra and Buddhist tantra (i.e. studios and retreats in both) whp says their fruit is the same. This guy seriously studied both and is very clear that they are different:

<http://www.byomakusuma.org/Ratnashri/RatnashriBio.aspx>

Adamantine said:

Interesting dude.. is Karma Thinley Rinpoche qualified to validate a terma cycle?
<http://www.biomakusuma.org/Ratnashri/RatnashriTerma.aspx>

Malcolm wrote:

Why not? He is a high lama from an ancient Karma Kagyu tulku lineage.

Doesn't mean I am interested...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 29th, 2015 at 3:41 AM

Title: Re: Is is possible to be Buddhist and Hindu?

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

I am not a scholar, but what I meant was that I have seen reputable scholars cast doubt on the idea that the historical Buddha explicitly taught a two truths doctrine. I can look up references if you like. Maybe I'm wrong, is it a slam dunk that he did?

Malcolm wrote:

It all depends on what you mean by "reputable."

In any case, it is a certainty that Buddha taught the two truths in Mahāyāna,

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 29th, 2015 at 3:38 AM

Title: Re: Is is possible to be Buddhist and Hindu?

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

I am not a scholar, but what I meant was that I have seen reputable scholars cast doubt on the idea that the historical Buddha explicitly taught a two truths doctrine. I can look up references if you like. Maybe I'm wrong, is it a slam dunk that he did?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 29th, 2015 at 3:08 AM

Title: Re: Is is possible to be Buddhist and Hindu?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

So, yes, AFAIC, it really is about what can be expressed words, and this is why the Buddha taught two truths, not merely one.

dzogchungpa said:

Honestly, it's not clear to me that the Buddha taught two truths, but you can believe what you like.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 29th, 2015 at 2:32 AM

Title: Re: Is it possible to be Buddhist and Hindu?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Well, as you know, I am not a big fan of Advaita. And the Dakshinamurti stotra specifically rejects emptiness, so really, why should I or anyone connected with Buddhadharma take it or Ramana seriously at all?

anjali said:

I can only answer for myself. Emptiness is not the only aspect of the Buddhadharma.

Malcolm wrote:

Emptiness is the essence of Buddhist realization.

anjali said:

To the extent that I recognize any aspect of the Buddhadharma in another teaching, to that extent I respectfully take it seriously.

Malcolm wrote:

Indeed, the Buddha said that whatever is well-spoken is his teaching. We are here concerned about that which is not well-spoken.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 29th, 2015 at 2:25 AM

Title: Re: Is it possible to be Buddhist and Hindu?

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

Well, maybe it's not about what can be expressed in words.

Malcolm wrote:

As Nāgārjuna famously points out:

The ultimate meaning cannot be explained without relying on convention;

nirvana cannot be attained without realizing the ultimate meaning.

So, yes, AFAIC, it really is about what can be expressed words, and this is why the Buddha taught two truths, not merely one.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 29th, 2015 at 1:58 AM

Title: Re: Is it possible to be Buddhist and Hindu?

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

Well, I guess it depends on what you meant by "take seriously", but you seemed puzzled by the fact that someone connected with Buddhadharma would take RM seriously, and I thought they could explain it to you.

Malcolm wrote:

I am deeply puzzled by this — I can only conclude it stems from some sort of wishful thinking that is propped up on perennialist tendencies [god, now I sound like a marxist].

I see no evidence at all from anything that Ramana said or wrote that his view is anything other than stock Hinduism of the Advaitan variety. I have no doubt he was a remarkable person, but at this point, since he died 65 years ago, longer than most of us have been alive, why would I accept anything that anyone says about him that differs from what is found in his texts?

I guess I do not understand what is profound in Ramana's teachings. I find the Buddha profound, I find Nāgārjuna profound, etc. But when I read the works of Hindu masters I always find them to be a bit off in one regard or another. So, admittedly, I find it really hard to understand why people who have been introduced to the teachings of Buddhadharma find Ramana profound.

Seriously, I find Vasubandhu more profound than Ramana. In the case of Dzogchen, it is particularly hard to understand why people find Advaita profound given that Śāṅkara is named in the Rīg pa rang shar tantra among the sixty wrong views to be rejected, and given that Advaita is refuted in Santaraksita's Tattvasamgraha and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 29th, 2015 at 1:22 AM

Title: Re: Is it possible to be Buddhist and Hindu?

Content:

LastLegend said:

But since it's Mahayana we are not trying to attain any result.

Malcolm wrote:

Speak for yourself.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 29th, 2015 at 12:47 AM

Title: Re: Is it possible to be Buddhist and Hindu?

Content:

Adamantine said:

What's more, for us Buddhists it is good to remember that there are plenty of nonvirtuous people in Buddhist clothes, and many virtuous people in non-Buddhist clothes.

Malcolm wrote:

To quote the Buddha:
Though an Indian trumpet flower has wilted,
it is unrivaled by other common flowers.
Though one of my followers has broken his discipline
he is unrivaled by common tīrthikas.
— Daśacakraṣṭigarbha-nāma-mahāyāna-sūtra

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 29th, 2015 at 12:45 AM

Title: Re: Is it possible to be Buddhist and Hindu?

Content:

LastLegend said:

This meaning is the reason the Tathagata always says, 'You monks! Know that my expounded Dharma is like the bamboo raft. The honored Dharma must be relinquished, how much more so what is not the Dharma? [/i]

Malcolm wrote:

People who give up rafts in the middle of a flood often drown...

LastLegend said:

Yes.

That's why we should not go near the flood much less get on the raft.

Malcolm wrote:

Ummmm....it's a little for that....

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 29th, 2015 at 12:23 AM

Title: Re: Is it possible to be Buddhist and Hindu?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

In point of fact, even the virtue of tīrthikas is not a cause for liberation because their virtuous is not transformed by the fact of taking refuge, so it remains ordinary, what need to mention bodhicitta or samaya which are entirely lacking outside the Buddhadharma.

Adamantine said:

Yes, I think I address it a bit on the following post ^^^. I agree, but I also think it helpful to address the positive qualities of other traditions and point out that some of the virtuous practices could in fact be adopted. . not just always belittle them as inferior heretics. For some people's karmic imprints, they will be attracted to these other traditions in this life. . if in dialogue with them, we make aggressive and bombastic claims of their tradition being inferior, or negative, etc. they may develop negative impressions of the Buddhadharma which would be bad imprints for them to carry in future lives. If we are more open and generous, but still honest and clear, they may have positive impressions that could lead them to the Dharma more readily in this or future lives. HH the Dalai Lama seems to do a great job of this, no?

Malcolm wrote:

I have not belittled anything. I have merely pointed out that the ideas and notions about liberation and freedom between Hinduism and Buddhism are not even slightly commensurable.

For example, if you have a mountain in the east, and another in the west, do you tell someone that by climbing a mountain in the east, they will ascend the same peak as the mountain in the west?

All I have said is that Hinduism and Buddhism have a different basis, therefore the path is different and the result is different. I have not instructed anyone which mountain they should climb — merely that one cannot climb two mountains at once, and also that one cannot expect to reach the peak of one mountain by climbing another.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 29th, 2015 at 12:15 AM

Title: Re: Is it possible to be Buddhist and Hindu?

Content:

LastLegend said:

This meaning is the reason the Tathagata always says, 'You monks! Know that my expounded Dharma is like the bamboo raft. The honored Dharma must be relinquished, how much more so what is not the Dharma? [/i]

Malcolm wrote:

People who give up rafts in the middle of a flood often drown...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 29th, 2015 at 12:03 AM

Title: Re: Is it possible to be Buddhist and Hindu?

Content:

Adamantine said:

No, it doesn't make that claim, of course. But it seems that Jigten Sumgon encouraged being open to virtuous practices from any tradition, which has precedent, and is relevant to the OP.

Malcolm wrote:

The OP asked if you could a Buddhist AND a Hindu at the same time.

I replied no, and there is nothing in your reply to him that addresses that issue.

In point of fact, even the virtue of tirthikas is not a cause for liberation because their virtue is not transformed by the fact of taking refuge, so it remains ordinary, what need to mention bodhicitta or samaya which are entirely lacking outside the Buddhadharmā.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 28th, 2015 at 11:14 PM

Title: Re: Is it possible to be Buddhist and Hindu?

Content:

LastLegend said:

Nagarjuna would say don't know don't care if asked who is conquering who what? Upon my own analysis, I can't reach definite conclusion or assertion about who or what.

Malcolm wrote:

Fortunately, in this respect, we do not depend on our own analysis, but rather, the Buddha's teaching. The Parinirvana Sūtra states:

One who seeks refuge in the Buddha is a true upāsaka
and should never seek refuge
in other gods.

If one seeks refuge in the sublime Dharma,
be free from thoughts of harm and killing.

If one seeks refuge in the Sangha,
do not associate with tirthikas.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 28th, 2015 at 8:41 PM

Title: Re: Is it possible to be Buddhist and Hindu?

Content:

Adamantine said:

On another note, this article is interesting re: Jigten Sumgön's views on 'outsider' traditions: <http://dgongs1.com/2015/01/21/one-for-the-islamophobics/>
Jigten Sumgön's general approach to spiritual views, conducts, and practices is one that attempts to perceive something in terms of what its nature is. In this sense he acknowledges that (1.19) there exists much that is virtuous by nature to be practised in [the systems of] the non-Buddhists too. This stands in contrast to a general opinion according to which "the complete view, conduct, and practise of the non-Buddhists is only something to be abandoned."

One of Jigten Sumgön's most basic positions is simply that whatever is virtuous by nature has a joyful result. Such virtue, however, is not confined to the realm of Buddhism alone. As he had pointed out in vajra-statement 1.1, the Buddha did not “invent” his own Dharma, but revealed the ultimate true nature as it is — and that nature exists as it is, independent of whether someone reveals it or not. Therefore, whoever acts in accordance with that nature will receive the respective appropriate results, no matter whether that person is a Buddhist or not, or whether that person has realised “the definite meaning that perceives the truth” or not. In fact, Rigdzin Chökyi Dragpa explains that even animals will enjoy the joyful fruits if they are “temporary [in] possession of ... virtuous things to be practised,” such as loving kindness for their offspring.

Malcolm wrote:

This does not mean that tīrthikas have the same realization as those who practice Buddhadharma — it merely means that whoever practices virtue experiences rebirth in higher realms.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 28th, 2015 at 8:31 PM

Title: Re: Is it possible to be Buddhist and Hindu?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

...why should I or anyone connected with Buddhadharma take it or Ramana seriously at all?

dzogchungpa said:

Why don't you ask Elio and Adriano?

Malcolm wrote:

Why would I?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 28th, 2015 at 6:11 AM

Title: Re: Is it possible to be Buddhist and Hindu?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Ramana's statement was not qualified. It was a blanket assertion "Silence (of whatever kind) is the perfect upadesha...", and since this is clearly a defective statement, I don't agree with it. It had no context, unlike the silence of Vimalakirti — whose silence was an answer itself.

anjali said:

Ramana's statement had context, I just didn't provide it. The context is the guru-disciple relationship, and the highest "teaching" of a realized master.

It's from http://bhagavan-ramana.org/ramana_maharshi/private/tw/tw569.html. Specifically, the quote is from discussion about the Dakshinamurti Stotra, Brahma's four sons (who were seekers) and Siva (as their guru). They desired guidance for realisation of the Self. They were the best equipped individuals for Self-Realisation. Guidance should be only from the best of Masters. Who could it be but Siva - the yogiraja. Siva appeared before them sitting under the sacred banyan tree. Being yogiraja should He practise yoga? He went into samadhi as He sat; He was in Perfect Repose. Silence prevailed. They saw Him. The effect was immediate. They fell into samadhi and their doubts were at an end.

Silence is the true upadesa. It is the perfect upadesa. It is suited only for the most advanced seeker. The others are unable to draw full inspiration from it. Therefore they require words to explain the Truth. But Truth is beyond words. It does not admit of explanation. All that is possible to do is only to indicate It.

To provide additional context regarding silence (Talk 231): Silence is never-ending speech. Vocal speech obstructs the other speech of silence. ... The silence of Dakshinamurti removed the doubts of the four sages. Mouna vyakhya prakatita tatvam (Truth expounded by silence.) Silence is said to be exposition. Silence is so potent. For vocal speech, organs of speech are necessary and they precede speech. But the other speech lies even beyond thought. It is in short transcendent speech or unspoken words, para vak.

Also Silence is ever-speaking; it is a perennial flow of language; it is interrupted by speaking. These words obstruct that mute language. There is electricity flowing in a wire. With resistance to its passage, it glows as a lamp or revolves as a fan. In the wire it remains as electric energy. Similarly also, silence is the eternal flow of language, obstructed by words. What one fails to know by conversation extending to several years can be known in a trice in Silence, or in front of Silence - e.g., Dakshinamurti, and his four disciples. That is the highest and most effective language.

Of course, you probably don't care what Ramana has to say on the subject of silence. The point of all this was that the silence of a realized master is the best of upadesas for disciples who can hear it.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, as you know, I am not a big fan of Advaita. And the Dakshinamurti stotra specifically rejects emptiness, so really, why should I or anyone connected with Buddhadharma take it or Ramana seriously at all?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 28th, 2015 at 6:08 AM

Title: Re: Is it possible to be Buddhist and Hindu?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Frankly, it amazes me that people think view does not matter when it comes to awakening, or that awakening does not have causes and conditions.

dzogchungpa said:

OK, perhaps you can explain what you meant by <https://www.dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=48&t=15030&p=209120#p209120>: The Dzogchen perspective is that a liberation based on causes and effects is incoherent.

Malcolm wrote:

Why do you assume I am always speaking from a Dzogchen point of view?

On the other hand, even the Prajñāpāramita sūtras maintain that all phenomena are in a state of liberation from the beginning. Awakening is realizing that. Such a state of liberation may not depend on causes and conditions, but awakening to that fact is gradual and depends on causes and conditions.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 28th, 2015 at 5:42 AM

Title: Re: Is it possible to be Buddhist and Hindu?

Content:

dreambow said:

Malcolm, I think it's best not to have an overly narrow outlook. I believe when Ramana Maharshi mentions silence, he means to quieten the mind. He says 'iru' be or just be. Of course this message is for the ripe only. Just as the Buddha said his message was for those 'with only a little dust in their eyes'

Malcolm wrote:

Frankly, it amazes me that people think view does not matter when it comes to awakening, or that awakening does not have causes and conditions.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 28th, 2015 at 4:30 AM

Title: Re: Is it possible to be Buddhist and Hindu?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Silence has a context. ...

anjali said:

No doubt. The knowing silence of a Buddha is not the ignorant silence of a sentient being. From what I can tell, you don't take issue with the words per se of the quote by Ramana on silence, but with how they are understood?

Vimalakirti's knowing silence was an answer to Manjushri's question, and was therefore a teaching. From a certain perspective, Vimalakirti's silence is the true and direct upadesa, as all other verbal teachings merely point to that knowing silence. Also, Vimalakirti's silence was the only answer that could be considered free of fault or defect. ("If you open your mouth, you are mistaken.") Thus, Vimalakirti's knowing silence is the perfect upadesa.

Malcolm wrote:

Ramana's statement was not qualified. It was a blanket assertion "Silence (of whatever kind) is the perfect upadesha...", and since this is clearly a defective statement, I don't agree with it. It had no context, unlike the silence of Vimalakirti — whose silence was an answer itself.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 28th, 2015 at 2:44 AM

Title: Re: Is it possible to be Buddhist and Hindu?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

[quote="monktastic"]When a Nyingmapa does more or less the same to all of Theravada, it's because we're right.

And so it goes.[/quote]

I forgot to mention, Theravadins are not generally interested in buddhahood, rather, they tend to be interested in arhatship.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 28th, 2015 at 2:19 AM

Title: Re: Is it possible to be Buddhist and Hindu?

Content:

monktastic said:

Somehow it's hard (or just not fun?) to accept that the same might be true for other traditions.

Malcolm wrote:

Oh, I accept that is true — but what I do not accept is that the basis, path and result of Advaita, or any other nonbuddhist tradition is the same as the basis, path and result of the Buddhist tradition.

I don't need to tell nonbuddhists their result is included in ours. The result they are seeking is completely different than buddhahood.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 28th, 2015 at 1:52 AM

Title: Re: Is it possible to be Buddhist and Hindu?

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

Honestly, it is hard to take any of this stuff literally.

Malcolm wrote:

Faith is the mother of all good qualities...

— Buddhāvataṃśka Sūtra

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 27th, 2015 at 11:58 PM

Title: Re: Is it possible to be Buddhist and Hindu?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Compare with Vimalakīrti:

Mañjuśrī, when something is baseless, how can it have any root? Therefore, all things stand on the root which is baseless.

dzogchungpa said:

I don't know about this Vimalakīrti, but here's something from ChNN: Through Dzogchen we can really understand what God is and we don't have to worry if there is a God or not. God always exists as our real nature, the base, for everybody.

Malcolm wrote:

It is hard to take this literally when Vimalakīrti's commentary on the sūtra that gyur states:

"Great" means that the Great Perfection is free from a basis; but because it is a basis, it is convention for abiding; because it is a path, it is convention of expression; and because it is a result, it is convention of nature.

This seems very consistent with Vimalakīrti's statement:

Mañjuśrī, when something is baseless, how can it have any root? Therefore, all things stand on the root which is baseless.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 27th, 2015 at 11:51 PM

Title: Re: Is it possible to be Buddhist and Hindu?

Content:

daverupa said:

Basically (& allegedly, though really it's well-demonstrated) Vedānta lifts/steals/creatively acquires quite a bit from Mahāyāna, and then goes off the rails with it while trying to hide that fact. Good times.

Malcolm wrote:

Indeed, it is the case that Gaudapada rather indiscriminately borrows various kinds of arguments from Mādhyamaka and Yogācāra in his refutation of sātākāryavādins [Sāṃkhya, etc.] and asātākāryavādins [Vaiśeṣika and so on]; but since he does so without reference to dependent origination and emptiness, and with reference to brahman, etc., he, and his followers like Śaṅkara, indeed "go off the rails."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 27th, 2015 at 11:29 PM

Title: Re: Is it possible to be enlightened, but not teach Buddhism

Content:

Konchok Namgyal said:

Dipankara was fully enlightened Buddha and did not teach.....

Malcolm wrote:

What makes you think this?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 27th, 2015 at 10:16 PM

Title: Re: Is it possible to be Buddhist and Hindu?

Content:

anjali said:

Care to elaborate which parts you disagree with? Here is the quote reformatted for easier discussion. Feel free to slice and dice.

Silence is the true Upadesa (teachings).

It is the perfect upadesa.

It is suited only for the most advanced seeker.

The others are unable to draw full inspiration from it.

Therefore they require words to explain the truth.

But truth is beyond words. It does not admit of explanation.

All that it is possible to do is to indicate it.

Malcolm wrote:

Silence has a context. In this case, we have to examine Ramana's silence in the context of his speech:

The seer and the object seen are like the rope and the snake. Just as the knowledge of the rope which is the substrate will not arise unless the false knowledge of the illusory serpent goes, so the realization of the Self which is the substrate will not be gained unless the belief that the world is real is removed.

http://www.sriramanamaharshi.org/wp-content/uploads/2012/12/who_am_i.pdf

This is the meaning of Ramana's silence. Compare with Vimalakirti:

Manjusri, when something is baseless, how can it have any root? Therefore, all things stand on the root which is baseless.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 27th, 2015 at 10:11 PM

Title: Re: Is it possible to be Buddhist and Hindu?

Content:

Boomerang said:

Manjusri replied, "Good sirs, you have all spoken well. Nevertheless, all your explanations are themselves dualistic. To know no one teaching, to express nothing, to say nothing, to explain nothing, to announce nothing, to indicate nothing, and to designate nothing - that is the entrance into nonduality."

Then the crown prince Manjusri said to the Licchavi Vimalakirti, "We have all given our own teachings, noble sir. Now, may you elucidate the teaching of the entrance into the principle of nonduality!"

Thereupon, the Licchavi Vimalakirti kept his silence, saying nothing at all.
How is this any different than what I've been saying the whole time about nonduality being beyond words?

Malcolm wrote:

Superficially, it is not — but when you penetrate the Vimalakirti-nirdesha a little deeper you find:

Vimalakirti: Manjusri, when something is baseless, how can it have any root? Therefore, all things stand on the root which is baseless.

This the meaning of Vimalakirti's silence.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 27th, 2015 at 10:23 AM

Title: Re: Is it possible to be Buddhist and Hindu?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

I remain unconvinced that Ramana's silence is Vimalakirti's.

anjali said:

Of course. Aside from whether Ramana's silence is Vimalakirti's silence, taken at face value, do you disagree with the quote?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, as a matter of fact, I do.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 27th, 2015 at 9:14 AM

Title: Re: Is it possible to be Buddhist and Hindu?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Then the crown prince Manjusri said to the Licchavi Vimalakirti, "We have all given our own teachings, noble sir. Now, may you elucidate the teaching of the entrance into the principle of nonduality!"

Thereupon, the Licchavi Vimalakirti kept his silence, saying nothing at all.

anjali said:

Who could ask for a better teaching on nonduality?! As Ramana Maharshi has said, "Silence is the true Upadesa (teachings). It is the perfect upadesa. It is suited only for the most advanced seeker. The others are unable to draw full inspiration from it. Therefore they require words to explain the truth. But truth is beyond words. It does not admit of explanation. All that it is possible to do is to indicate it. "

Malcolm wrote:

I remain unconvinced that Ramana's silence is Vimalakirti's.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 27th, 2015 at 8:06 AM

Title: Re: Is it possible to be Buddhist and Hindu?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Sure it is, in two notable places in the Pali canon:

"'Everything exists': That is one extreme. 'Everything doesn't exist': That is a second extreme. Avoiding these two extremes, the Tathagata teaches the Dhamma via the middle: [

This is precisely the so called "nondualism" discussed in Mahāyāna.

anjali said:

Indeed. By way of comparison, here is an exchange between Vivekananda and Ramakrishna, who are as "Hindu" as it gets: NARENDRA [Vivekananda] (to a disciple present:) "'Worldly people, who are engrossed in sense-objects, say that everything exists— asti. But the Mayavadis, the illusionists, say that nothing exists— nasti. The experience of a Buddha is beyond both 'existence' and 'non-existence'

RAMAKRISHNA: "This 'existence' and 'non-existence' are attributes of Prakriti. The Reality is beyond both."

Malcolm wrote:

What Ramakrishna says above is a pure Advaitan spin on Samkhya. He is referring here to the Advaitan interpretation of Purusha, aka Brahmin.

So no, Ramakrishna does not "get it", as it were. There is no reality beyond the extremes of existence and non-existence, and this of course is the meaning of the famed silence of Vimalakirti in the non-duality chapter:

When the bodhisattvas had given their explanations, they all addressed the crown prince Manjusri: "Manjusri, what is the bodhisattva's entrance into nonduality?"

Manjusri replied, "Good sirs, you have all spoken well. Nevertheless, all your explanations are themselves dualistic. To know no one teaching, to express nothing, to say nothing, to explain nothing, to announce nothing, to indicate nothing, and to designate nothing - that is the entrance into nonduality."

Then the crown prince Manjusri said to the Licchavi Vimalakirti, "We have all given our own teachings, noble sir. Now, may you elucidate the teaching of the entrance into the principle of nonduality!"

Thereupon, the Licchavi Vimalakirti kept his silence, saying nothing at all. As we can see, this passage reflects the Buddha's teaching on the inexpressibility cited in the Sutta Nipata.

Further, the Samputa Tantra states:

Not empty, not non-empty,
there is also nothing to perceive in the middle.

Thus we can see that Ramakrishna's statement does not correspond to the Buddha's teaching.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 27th, 2015 at 7:05 AM

Title: Re: Is it possible to be Buddhist and Hindu?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

I respect Bhiku Bodhi, but he is very off base in this article because he lumps Mahāyāna together with Advaita.

daverupa said:

Well, he lumps up any school of thought which speak of non-duality of any kind, and then discusses how non-duality is simply not presented over the course of the threefold training.

Malcolm wrote:

Sure it is, in two notable places in the Pali canon:

"'Everything exists': That is one extreme. 'Everything doesn't exist': That is a second extreme. Avoiding these two extremes, the Tathagata teaches the Dhamma via the middle: [

This is precisely the so called "nondualism" discussed in Mahāyāna.

Also:

One who has reached the end has no criterion [3]

by which anyone would say that — for him it doesn't exist.

When all phenomena are done away with,[4]

all means of speaking are done away with as well.

Please compare these two statements with what I have written above.

daverupa said:

This isn't to say that Mahayana and Advaita are discussing the same non-duality, but perhaps this thread demonstrates how the use of that ideation causes certain problems vis-a-vis presenting the Dhamma accurately to e.g. Advaita folk, and perhaps indicates a different tack to be taken.

Malcolm wrote:

The issue is that some western scholars, mainly David Loy, decided to label Mahāyāna a form of nondualism because the term "nondual" is used on occasion, and indiscriminately conflated this with Advaita, Kashmiri Shivism and so on.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 27th, 2015 at 3:40 AM

Title: Re: Is it possible to be Buddhist and Hindu?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

I respect Bhiku Bodhi, but he is very off base in this article.

daverupa said:

Specifically...?

Malcolm wrote:

Specifically because he lumps Mahāyāna together with Advaita.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 27th, 2015 at 3:04 AM

Title: Re: Is it possible to be Buddhist and Hindu?

Content:

Sherlock said:

Buddhist texts say advaya, not advaita. "Not two" instead of "nondual"

<http://www.byomakusuma.org/Teachings/MadhyamikaBuddhismVisAVisHinduVedanta.aspx>

Boomerang said:

Advaita means not-two in Sanskrit.

Malcolm wrote:

Actually it means "not-twoness", the tā suffix causes it to have a slightly different meaning that advaya, "nondual".

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 27th, 2015 at 2:43 AM

Title: Re: Is it possible to be Buddhist and Hindu?

Content:

Boomerang said:

Yes, these are all my personal opinions.

Malcolm wrote:

These are not my personal opinions — they are the opinions of very many generations of Buddhist scholars and yogis.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 27th, 2015 at 2:42 AM

Title: Re: Is it possible to be Buddhist and Hindu?

Content:

Boomerang said:

The nonduality (brahman) realized by Advaitans is not the same nonduality (śūnyatā) realized in Buddhadharma. Brahman and śūnyatā are not the same thing at all. Advaitans such as Shankara reject śūnyatā completely, as well as rejecting dependent origination and so on.

The concept of Advaita's nonduality is not the same as Buddhism's concept of nonduality. It's wise for a teacher to discourage a student from mixing both together. Mixing them would likely lead to confusion. Still, none of this has any bearing on nonduality itself. Nonduality is beyond "this is" and "this is not," like those scriptures I quoted earlier say.

Malcolm wrote:

There is no "nonduality" that stands alone by itself, somewhere else, or even here.

As I said before, "nondual" is a technical term in Buddhadharma that has many uses. Principally speaking, it refers to an individual's state of consciousness free from subject and object or it refers to the absence of relative dualities such as samsara/nirvana, being/nonbeing, pure/impure, nondual/dual, etc. In the latter case, this absence of dualities itself is predicated on emptiness free from extremes.

Even so, nonduality is a meaningless expression without reference to plurality, so even nonduality cannot bear analysis. For this reason Nāgārjuna, when commenting on his Praise of the Three Kāyas states when commenting on this line, "Not one, not many, becoming the basis for the very abundant benefit of myself and others."

For "not one, not many..." and so on, one and many means one and many i.e., both are nondual. Many means plural. Conventionally speaking "I prostate" to that which is the dharmakāya, neither one nor many. If it is asked "For what reason do we say though it is not one, it is also not many?" Due to that, since it is said "non-arisen from the beginning", that which never arose from the beginning cannot have a phase of being one or many; like space, its nature is completely uninterrupted. Since all phenomena arise in the same way, therefore, what arises where? That which becomes a form of diversity is not seen by anyone, i.e. just as grains of rice arise from rice seed, likewise, whatever arises from emptiness is not permanent nor annihilated. Why? Free of all concepts, the victors see that to be empty and illusory.

The point I am trying to get you to understand is that "nonduality" spoken of by the Buddha, Nāgārjuna, Asanga and so on is nothing like the nonduality spoken of by Shankara, etc. Now of course, many speculate — on the basis of Gaudapada's Agamasāstra's fourth section — that Shankara was influenced by Mahāyāna Buddhism. If so, Shankara surely spends a lot of time in his commentary on the Brahma Sutras trying to prove that he is not influenced by Mahāyāna.

In the above comment, an important point must not be overlooked. Here Nāgārjuna is equating all phenomena's mode of arising with the mode of arising of the non-arisen dharmakāya — which is to say that phenomena do not arise. It is the perception of the nonarising of phenomena which leads to the ultimate attainment of the dharmakāya. That perception of the nonarising of phenomena is the perception of emptiness.

Moreover, Nāgārjuna invokes the principle of likeness of causes and effects — i.e. just as rice arises from rice seed, likewise, just as emptiness is neither permanent or annihilated, whatever arises from emptiness is neither permanent or annihilated, the Buddhas perceive that to be empty and illusory, without any vikalpa, conceptuality or imagination.

There is no permanent substrate which accounts for the arising of phenomena ultimately, and relatively, all phenomena arise because of cause and conditions — dependent origination — rather than from a creative principle such as Īśvara and so on.

Then of course there is also the fact that Advaita heavily depends on Sāṃkhya, the Sāṃkhya notion of puruṣa as we can see in the Tattvabodhi and other texts, this is yet another reason why the principle of nonduality in Buddhadharma and Advaita are not commensurable and so do not lead to the same realization.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 27th, 2015 at 1:29 AM

Title: Re: Is it possible to be Buddhist and Hindu?

Content:

Boomerang said:

Maybe I should clarify. The reason I think Advaita Vedānta and Mahāyāna Buddhism's systems are somewhat compatible is that Mahayana Buddhism has the concept of Buddha-nature. I've given some quotations that show similarity between descriptions of Buddha-nature and of the self in Advaita.

Malcolm wrote:

Such equations between tathāgatagarbha and the atman of the tīrthikas are explicitly rejected by the Buddha in the Lankāvatara sutra and so on.

Boomerang said:

But anyways, the conceptual systems aren't what really matter. It's nonduality the matters, because nonduality can't be objectified. And if it can't be objectified, you can't say that one nonduality is different than another.

Malcolm wrote:

Of course you can say that understandings of the term "nondual" are not commensurable. "Nondualism" in Buddhadharma is predicated on dependent origination. Madhyamaka is the ultimate nondual teaching of the Buddha. However, without the view of dependent origination it is not possible to realize emptiness.

Boomerang said:

Some people think that I'm cherry picking scriptures, but the main reason I think it's possible to be Hindu and Buddhist is that they have a commonality beyond scripture: ineffable nondual realization.

Malcolm wrote:

The nonduality (brahman) realized by Advaitans is not the same nonduality (śūnyatā) realized in Buddhadharma. Brahman and śūnyatā are not the same thing at all. Advaitans such as Shankara reject śūnyatā completely, as well as rejecting dependent origination and so on.

Boomerang said:

I read a scientific paper on people who've had non-symbolic realizations in a variety of traditions. The study showed that people who have only had one realization tend to be dogmatic, and view their realization as the ultimate and only true enlightenment. The first realization gives you a grounded feeling like you've seen the most real reality there could ever be. For people who have had several realizations, that feeling of certainty gets blown out the water, and in turn, they are more open-minded to different theories of enlightenment.

Malcolm wrote:

As I pointed out, there is only one realization in Buddhadharma that is worth a damn, and that is the realization of emptiness aka śūnyatā. The realization of śūnyatā between a bodhisattva and a buddha is only a matter of degrees, but not substance.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 27th, 2015 at 1:18 AM

Title: Re: Is it possible to be Buddhist and Hindu?

Content:

Bhikkhu Bodhi said:

One of the most challenging issues facing Theravada Buddhism in recent years has been the encounter between classical Theravada vipassana meditation and the "non-dualistic" contemplative traditions best represented by Advaita Vedanta and Mahayana Buddhism. Responses to this encounter have spanned the extremes, ranging from vehement confrontation all the way to attempts at synthesis and hybridization. While the present essay cannot pretend to illuminate all the intricate and subtle problems involved in this sometimes volatile dialogue, I hope it may contribute a few sparks of light from a canonically oriented Theravada perspective.

daverupa said:

Some interesting context, helpfully pointing out some areas where Mahayana & Advaita Vedanta are more in-line with each other than with Theravada. It's an interesting whirl.

Malcolm wrote:

I respect Bhiku Bodhi, but he is very off base in this article.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 26th, 2015 at 10:19 PM

Title: Re: Is it possible to be enlightened, but not teach Buddhism

Content:

Simon E. said:

But not all non Buddhist teachings contradict all Buddhadharma. Perhaps you can give examples of Buddhas and Bodhisattvas giving teachings that contradict Dependent Origination for example...

Malcolm wrote:

There are common teachings, such as the four brahma viharas and so on, then there are uncommon teachings such as dependent origination, emptiness and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 26th, 2015 at 10:57 AM

Title: Re: Is it possible to be Buddhist and Hindu?

Content:

smcj said:

You know, Kalu Rinpoche did not speak English.

No he didn't. But he was extremely conversant with the various presentations on emptiness and was generally thought of as a major Shentongpa. That quote is entirely in keeping with his style of teaching.

Malcolm wrote:

No one conversant with Buddhist teaching would maintain the possibility that something could both exist and not exist at the same time. Hence, it must be an error of translation.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 26th, 2015 at 9:24 AM

Title: Re: Is it possible to be Buddhist and Hindu?

Content:

monktastic said:

<http://www.iol.ie/~taeger/mahamud/mahamud.html>

The third Karmapa, (Rangjung Dorje), wrote a prayer of aspiration for the realization of Mahamudra in which he said, "It is not existent because even the Buddha could not see it, but it is not nonexistent because it is the basis or origin of all samsara.(6).and nirvana.(7)." It does not constitute a contradiction to say that mind neither exists nor does not exist; it is simultaneously existent and nonexistent.

Malcolm wrote:

It is a contradiction, this is why it is rejected explicitly by the Buddha and by Nāgārjuna. The four extremes are existent, nonexistence, both and neither. Nāgārjuna rejects these in many texts, as does the Buddha in many sutras.

monktastic said:

(Emphasis mine). What I pasted is a direct quote from Kalu Rinpoche. At the very least, the fact that we can so easily refute masters from our own tradition gives me some indication of how seriously to take refutations of others.

Malcolm wrote:

You know, Kalu Rinpoche did not speak English.

I am often amazed at how often bad translations are given canonical status.

To sum up — it is a specific point of fact that in Buddhadharma all four extremes are refuted. It is impossible for a mind to both exist and not exist. Do you really want a citation blizzard?

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 26th, 2015 at 9:19 AM

Title: Re: Is it possible to be Buddhist and Hindu?

Content:

Boomerang said:

Advaita doesn't teach that everything ultimately comes from one source.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, in fact it does. At the level of māya, Advaita supports creation of the universe by Íśvara.

Boomerang said:

I'm not going to give you a crash course in Advaita. I've been doing that for 2 days now and it hasn't done much. If you want to understand the difference between relative reality and absolute reality, message me and I'll recommend some books.

Malcolm wrote:

It may surprise you to know that I have in fact taken teachings from actual Advaitans. I do understand the difference between what Advaita [e.g. Shankara] says on a relative level and what it says on the ultimate level. Both perspectives are dissatisfactory from a Buddhist POV. Neither, from a Buddhist POV is predicated on dependent origination.

Boomerang said:

I already said that there can be no objectivity in a nondual reality, but I don't think you understood.

Malcolm wrote:

I did understand. It is a dodge. The Advaita POV is summed nicely in "One without a second." In Buddhadharma on the other hand, "nonduality", depending on which nonduality one is speaking of, is a subjective experience confined to a person's mindstream. Of course there is an objective nonduality, called "śūnyatā". Śūnyatā is rejected by Advaita [e.g. Shankara].

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 26th, 2015 at 7:53 AM

Title: Re: Is it possible to be Buddhist and Hindu?

Content:

Boomerang said:

Advaita doesn't teach that everything ultimately comes from one source.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, in fact it does. At the level of māya, Advaita supports creation of the universe by Íśvara.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 26th, 2015 at 7:51 AM

Title: Re: Is it possible to be Buddhist and Hindu?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Then of course there is the issue of refuge, which I brought up above. Hindus might think they can take refuge in Shiva and the Buddha, for example. But a real Buddhist would never make this mistake.

Boomerang said:

You're certainly entitled to that opinion, and I have no desire to change your mind. I'm only participating in this thread so that everyone knows that it is possible to be Hindu and Buddhist, regardless of what some people may think. Personally, I never took refuge in Shiva, but I do pray to Ganesha, as he's a popular symbol of nonduality in Advaita Vedanta.

There are scriptures that say Buddhists can only take refuge in the Buddha. I have no problem with that, because every symbol of nonduality is a symbol of Buddha's wisdom.

Malcolm wrote:

You did not address the issue I raised.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 26th, 2015 at 7:50 AM

Title: Re: Is it possible to be Buddhist and Hindu?

Content:

Boomerang said:

I cannot be objectified. I neither exist nor do I not exist...

Sherab Dorje said:

Fourth extreme, according to Nagarjuna.

monktastic said:

Well shoot, I guess someone should have told Kalu Rinpoche (sorry, can't use quote functionality on this device). Or maybe it's just impossible to speak about without falling into a trap.

<http://www.iol.ie/~taeger/mahamud/mahamud.html>

The third Karmapa, (Rangjung Dorje), wrote a prayer of aspiration for the realization of Mahamudra in which he said, "It is not existent because even the Buddha could not see it, but it is not nonexistent because it is the basis or origin of all samsara.(6).and nirvana.(7)." It does not constitute a contradiction to say that mind neither exists nor does not exist; it is simultaneously existent and nonexistent.

Malcolm wrote:

It is a contradiction, this is why it is rejected explicitly by the Buddha and by Nāgārjuna. The four extremes are existent, nonexistence, both and neither. Nāgārjuna rejects these in many texts, as does the Buddha in many sutras.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 26th, 2015 at 7:09 AM

Title: Re: Is it possible to be Buddhist and Hindu?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The only resemblance between Advaita and Buddhadharma is that we both seek to solve the same problem — avidyā. What we understand vidyā to be is completely different.

Is Buddhist nonduality something that humans are able to perfectly describe through language? Is Advaita nonduality something that humans can perfectly describe through language?

First of all, the way the term is used in Buddhadharma and Advaita are very different.

For example, the Tarkajvāla, a famous commentary on Nagarjuna's MMK states:

Therefore, that which is the inner earth element, that is the external earth element, that is the meaning of nondual.

Or:

When that yogin dwells in the experience of nonconceptual discerning wisdom [prajñā] and experiences nonduality, at that time, ultimately, the entire reality of objects of knowledge are as follows, of the same characteristics, like space, appearing in the manner of a nonappearance since their characteristics are nonexistent, therefore, there isn't even the slightest thing that is not empty, so where could there be emptiness? Since there are no mental discriminations, there is no conceptual clinging of mutual dependence."

Or the Kaumudī, a famous Buddhist tantric commentary, states:

Because of the absence of inherent existence, the nondual essence of all phenomena is emptiness.

It also is understood, as Dzogchenpa point out, as a consciousness devoid of subject and object, as the Ḍākinīvajrapañjara[-mahā]tantrarājasya pañjikā[-prathamapaṭala-]mukhabandha-nāma

One is a nondual consciousness.

Two is an apprehending subject and an apprehended object.

These quotes are not exhaustive, but they show that "nondual" in Buddhadharma is really quite different than Advaita.

Boomerang said:

Thank you for the quotations. Here's a quotation from one of my favorite Advaita websites. It's quite similar to your final one:

Reality is you, whole and complete non-dual consciousness. This is the essence of Vedānta's teachings.

The ways Buddhism and Advaita use the term consciousness aren't exactly the same, but similarities like this are what I'm talking about when I say I can see the same nondual core in both religions. And that's why I'm Buddhist and Hindu. The two religions have more similarities than their attitude toward avidya. You clearly know much more about Buddhism than me, but I think I know more about Advaita than you. Otherwise you wouldn't have even used that last quotation, or made that earlier statement about Advaita positing absolute existence after I said existence and non-existence are mithya.

Malcolm wrote:

The point is that in Buddhadharma, nondual consciousness is subjective and personal, not objective and universal. You can't simply cherry pick what you like.

Then of course there is the issue of refuge, which I brought up above. Hindus might think they can take refuge in Shiva and the Buddha, for example. But a real Buddhist would never make this mistake.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 26th, 2015 at 7:04 AM

Title: Re: Is it possible to be Buddhist and Hindu?

Content:

Boomerang said:

This also shows that you don't understand Advaita Vedanta. I don't mean to sound condescending, but you're simply mistaken.

Malcolm wrote:

Mistaken about what? That the view of Buddhadharma and the view of Advaita are not commensurate?

The Dakshinamurti itself criticizes the view of emptiness.

Deham pranam api indriyanyapi chalaam,
Budhim cha soonyam vidhu,

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 26th, 2015 at 6:48 AM

Title: Re: Is it possible to be Buddhist and Hindu?

Content:

Sherab said:

In Advaita Vedanta, non-duality meant being one. In Buddhism, non-duality simply means not two and not being one.

Boomerang said:

Your understanding of Advaita Vedanta is faulty. I've been speaking against this understanding for a few days now, for example, in this post:

<https://www.dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=77&t=18560&start=80#p268881>

The way Advaita Vedanta works, a student will be taught a series of concepts which progressively introvert the mind. When one concept has done its job, it will be discarded and replaced by another. The student's mind becomes subtler and subtler until eventually all ignorance falls away and nonduality is realized. The people in this thread are picking out individual concepts that are used in the Advaita sadhana, and confusing them to be the whole system.

Malcolm wrote:

Not really, I cited the Dakshinamurthi for you in full and it is clearly at odds with Buddhadharma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 26th, 2015 at 6:30 AM

Title: Re: Is it possible to be Buddhist and Hindu?

Content:

Boomerang said:

60 Commentaries on philosophies constitute a thick jungle in which a roaming mind may easily get lost, in its own delusion. Therefore, true seekers of Brahman should, through right efforts, come to experience the Real Nature of the Self.

61 For him who has been stung by the cobra of ignorance, the only remedy is the knowledge of Brahman. Of what use are the Vedas and the scriptures, mantras and medicines to such a victim of poison?[/i]

With that, I don't think there's much more I can contribute to the thread. Love to all.

Malcolm wrote:

Once again, here Advaita and Buddhadharma are absolutely incommensurate, and as I pointed out, it is only Hindus who imagine that Advaita and Buddhadharma are talking about the same thing, i.e., knowledge of Brahman.

The only resemblance between Advaita and Buddhadharma is that we both seek to solve the same problem — avidyā. What we understand vidyā to be is completely different.

Boomerang said:

Is Buddhist nonduality something that humans are able to perfectly describe through language? Is Advaita nonduality something that humans can perfectly describe through language?

Malcolm wrote:

First of all, the way the term is used in Buddhadharma and Advaita are very different.

For example, the Tarkajvakla, a famous commentary on Nagarjuna 's MMK states:

Therefore, that which is the inner earth element, that is is the external earth element, that is the meaning of nondual.

Or:

When that yogin dwells in the experience of nonconceptual discerning wisdom [prajñā] and experiences nonduality, at that time, ultimately, the entire reality of objects of knowledge are as follows, of the same characteristics, like space, appearing in the manner of a nonappearance since their characteristics are nonexistent, therefore, there isn't even the slightest thing that is not empty, so where could there be emptiness? Since there are no mental discriminations, there is no conceptual clinging of mutual dependence."

Or the Kaumudī, a famous Buddhist tantric commentary, states:

Because of the absence of inherent existence, the nondual essence of all phenomena is emptiness.

It also is understood, as Dzogchungpa point out, as a consciousness devoid of subject and object, as the Ḍākinīvajrapañjara[-mahā]tantrarājasya pañjikā[-prathamapaṭala-]mukhabandha-nāma

One is a nondual consciousness.

Two is an apprehending subject and an apprehended object.

These quotes are not exhaustive, but they show that "nondual" in Buddhadharma is really quite different than Advaita.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 26th, 2015 at 3:46 AM

Title: Re: Is it possible to be Buddhist and Hindu?

Content:

Boomerang said:

60 Commentaries on philosophies constitute a thick jungle in which a roaming mind may easily get lost, in its own delusion. Therefore, true seekers of Brahman should, through right efforts, come to experience the Real Nature of the Self.

61 For him who has been stung by the cobra of ignorance, the only remedy is the knowledge of Brahman. Of what use are the Vedas and the scriptures, mantras and medicines to such a victim of poison?[/i]

With that, I don't think there's much more I can contribute to the thread. Love to all.

Malcolm wrote:

Once again, here Advaita and Buddhadharma are absolutely incommensurate, and as I pointed out, it is only Hindus who imagine that Advaita and Buddhadharma are talking about the same thing, i.e., knowledge of Brahman.

The only resemblance between Advaita and Buddhadharma is that we both seek to solve the same problem — avidyā. What we understand vidyā to be is completely different.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 26th, 2015 at 3:43 AM

Title: Re: Is it possible to be Buddhist and Hindu?

Content:

smcj said:

The thing is, smcj, you do not need to diss Nagarjuna at all: insofar as I know, all Shengtongpas do claim to follow and be in perfect accord with Nagarjunian Madhyamaka. You would be the first one to disagree.

From "Progressive Stages of Meditation on Emptiness" by Khenpo Tsultrim, p.66:

This non-conceptual Wisdom Mind is not the object of the conceptualizing process and so is not negated by Madhyamaka reasoning. Therefore, it can be said to be the only thing that has absolute and true existence.

(formatting mine)

Nagarjuna's Madhyamaka is provisional and Great Madhyamaka is definitive according to Dudjom R. You guys have to stop holding up Nagarjuna as definitive if you're going to accept the supremacy of the 3rd Turning as does Dudjom R.

Malcolm wrote:

But I don't accept the three turning scheme the way you, Dudjom Rinpoche, Khenpo Tsultrim Gyatso and so on present it at all. I prefer another scheme, in my opinion more profound, which is taken from the Sandhividyākarana-tantra:

The pleasing single vajra word becomes many different [words] from the perspective of the mentalities of trainees.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 26th, 2015 at 2:49 AM

Title: Re: Is it possible to be Buddhist and Hindu?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

You say:

Boomerang said:

You and Malcolm are arguing against a straw man Advaita.

Malcolm wrote:

Then you say:

In a nondual reality there can be no such thing as objective existence.

This is the Advaita we are arguing against:

This world is unreal like the image of a city in the mirror, it exists inside. Due to the power of Maya it looks as if it is manifested outside like in dream we see things outside ourselves. Salutations to Sri Shiva in the form of preceptor, who, at the time of self realization, makes one aware that Atma is without second (i.e. one).

Like a tree inside a seed this world is not manifested initially. Later on it gets manifested due to Maya in space, time and various forms. Salutations to Sri Shiva in the form of preceptor who like a magician, through his yogic powers, transforms it by his own will.

Who inspires to discriminate between the real 'I' and its imagined, unreal meaning; who imparts direct knowledge of 'You are That' as said in Vedas to his dependents; without direct connection with whom, it is impossible to cross this ocean of birth and death, salutations to Sri Shiva in the form of preceptor. ||3||

Who emanates from eyes and other sense organs like the light of a lamp kept in a vessel with multiple pores; by whose grace, I know that this light only illumines the entire world, salutations to Sri Shiva in the form of preceptor. ||4||

Those who consider themselves as body, life force, sense organs, dynamic intelligence or nothing are deluded like women, kids, blinds and dull-minded. Who ends this great anxiety due to the play of Maya, salutations to Sri Shiva in the form of preceptor. ||5||

The unborn, unaware self is properly covered due to Maya like Sun and Moon eclipsed by Rahu. It shines forth once all barriers are removed. Who makes it realize that you are one with that slept self, salutations to Sri Shiva in the form of preceptor. ||6||

Self is ever present in various stages of body like childhood, etc., various stages of mind like waking, etc. and unattached. Who always resonates like 'I am That', who reveals himself happily and beautifully on remembering, salutations to Sri Shiva in the form of preceptor. ||7||

Self sees this world in many forms of himself like action and cause, servant and owner, teacher and disciple, father and son, etc. By whose power, Maya; Self looks to be wandering in dream and waking, salutations to Sri Shiva in the form of preceptor. ||8||

Whatever is seen in this moving and non-moving world is made up of eight forms of Shiva - Earth, Water, Fire, Air, Space, Sun, Moon and Self. On contemplation, there is nothing beyond him, salutations to all pervading Sri Shiva in the form of preceptor. ||9||

'You are Self of all' is realized by your worship, listening about you, thinking over you, meditating and singing for you. You, the almighty God, are experienced with all your unstoppable grandeur, in eight forms. Salutations to Sri Shiva in the form of preceptor. ||10||

— Dakshinamurti Stotram

<https://sites.google.com/site/vedicscripturesinc/home/srishankaracharya/dakshinamurtistotram>

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 26th, 2015 at 1:39 AM

Title: Re: Is it possible to be Buddhist and Hindu?

Content:

smcj said:

As in a non-duality, yes.

Sherab Dorje said:

So if one posits an objectively existent reality (ultimate or relative), then can one be said to be expressing a non-dual view? Somehow, I think not.

smcj said:

Lol, tell that to a Vedantan.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, and thus this is a crucial distinction between Buddhism and Vedanta in general. There may be some Buddhists who err in reifying the ultimate indeed, but they are rescued by the fact that there are higher views than those that reify the ultimate as "real" and eventually they will graduate to those when they accumulate sufficient merit to see the error of extreme views.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 25th, 2015 at 11:18 PM

Title: Re: Is it possible to be Buddhist and Hindu?

Content:

smcj said:

but it's a Great Madhyamaka

Malcolm wrote:

Mahāmadhyamaka is a term that has a complicated history. Gzhan stong does not have the trademark on it.

For example, Jetsun Dragpa Gyaltzen writes in his Great Song of Experience:

Freedom from extremes is beyond knowledge, expressions and objects,

Madhyamaka, Cittamatra and so on, expressions in words are proliferations...

That view of Great Madhyamaka is bliss without delusion because it is not a proposition.

This was written 100 years before Dolbupa was even born. In fact the Gelugpas also refer to Lama Tsongkhapa's view as Great Madhyamaka and so on.

Of course, if you examine, you will find the early Nyingma, Kadampa, Sakya and Kagyu uses of the term more consistent with how the term is used in Indian texts. For example Atisha writes extensively about Mahāmadhyamaka. So what does he say? In his Bodhimārgapradīpapañjikā-nāma, his autocommentary on the Lamp of the Path of Awakening, the foundation text for all Lam Rim:

To explain the essence of Master Nāgārjuna's teaching, that is comprehended to be the great madhyamaka [dbu ma chen po] beyond existence and nonexistence, the meaning of Prajñāpāramitā, and it is also taught the same way in the texts of other scholars. As such, it is the intention of Guru Bodhibhadra, and Jetsun Kusulupa. That nectar of Ārya Nāgārjuna satisfied Āryadeva, Candrakīrti, Śāntideva and Bodhibhadra, and a little of it was also sprinkled on me. With four great arguments all phenomena are proven to be nonarising — one should abide in the philosophical conclusion of the great madhyamaka through following the masters of the past.

One never finds the term "great madhyamaka" being used by the Yogacara authors.

One place where the term is used, and I believe is in fact its origin, is that it is used frequently to describe the completion stage in tantric commentaries. But again, its description is not out of line with mainstream Indian Madhyamaka. For example, in the Śrīhevajranāmatantrārthasamgraha:

"After that, explain the meaning of the great madhyamaka free from all extremes...."

Or in the Śrīsaṃputatilaka-nāma-yoginītantrarājasya ṭīkā-smṛitisaṃdarśanāloka-nāma:

"Full expansion of qualities" means buddhahood comes from Mantrayāna and great madhyamaka.

Or the Bhagavadd-hevajrasādhana-abhisamayakramāarthaprasanna-nāma:

Meditate upon the great madhyamaka free from all signs.

Or the Śrī-kālacakropadeśayogaṣaḍaṅgatantrapañjikā-nāma:

The nature of completion is called "great madhyamaka".

The Śrī-ḍākārṇavamahāyoginītantrarājasyaṭīkāvoḥitaṭīkā-nāma:

"Madhyamaka" is the essential Dharma and the great Madhyamaka of the Mahāyāna free from the four extremes is the awakening of the fortunate.

Or the Samājābhisamayālaṃkāravṛtti:

Having manifested the great madhyamaka that is immaculate like space...

The Upadeśaniścaya-nāma-śrīguhyasamājavṛtti states:

The neutral recitation is meditating body, speech and mind in the state of great madhyamaka — beyond all extremes of signs, because it isn't anything at all, it is called "neutral".

The Āryamañjuśrīnāmasaṃgītiṭīkāśārābhisamaya states:

"Due to being free it is like a reflection" — a mere reflection to which there is freedom from clinging, or even being free from the mere designation "reflection" is the great madhyamaka free from the four extremes. For which it is also said:

The diversity is not permanent,
nor is its annihilation proposed;

neither permanent nor annihilated, also not both — liberated from all four extremes that is the reasoning of a mādhyamika.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 25th, 2015 at 10:19 PM

Title: Re: Is it possible to be Buddhist and Hindu?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

[quote="smcj]Since the transcendent (beyond cause and effect) Wisdom Mind is unborn and never comes into existence it is not subject to the same deconstruction and can be said to be real.

[/quote]

From a Madhyamaka perspective, something that never comes into existence is a nonexistent, and cannot be considered real by Madhyamaka definitions. It is therefore also not immune to Madhyamaka analysis. In this respect too, "wisdom mind" is no different than all the other phenomena that do not arise (which is all of them), and therefore are not real.

The classical Tibetan refutation of gzhan stong is the Madhyamaka refutation of the unconditioned in the MMK:

If arising, abiding and perishing are not established, the conditioned is not established. If the condition has never been established, where will the unconditioned be established?

The classical Tibetan refutation of the charge of "rang stong" is the following statement from the MMK:

If there were some thing subtly not empty, there would be some thing to be empty, but as there is no thing that is not empty, where is there some thing to be empty?

Finally, the rejection of that the world has a nature:

Whatever is the nature of the tathāgata, that is the nature of the world.

As tathāgata has no nature, also the world has no nature.

In reality, following the opinion of Rongtong Sheja Kunrig, gzhan stong is a kind of transitional view between classical yogacara and madhyamaka, and is in fact little more than a variant of the false-aspectarian yogacara mainly promulgated by Ratnakarashanti.

When I spoke with Khenpo Tsultrim Gyatso, he did not admit, nor was I pressing the point, that Advaita and gzhan stong were identical: the point was that both systems were structurally similar only in that they asserted the relative was completely unreal and the ultimate completely real. Even though he agreed with this characterization, he strongly emphasized at that time that despite this similarity, Advaita does not have buddhahood as a result. I add this just so you are clear about what I asked, and what he replied.

The other thing that plagues gzhan stong is that unlike classical Indian Madhyamaka, of which two clear trends can be observed — gzhan stong, being largely a Tibetan innovation, has a plethora of interpretations.

Finally, as to the term "mahāmadhyamaka". As I have pointed out several times now, the earliest use of the term in a Tibetan text is by the Nyingma author Kawa Paltseg, the translator from the early 9th century. In his Explanation of The Stages of the View he refers to Mahāmadhyamaka as:

Freedom from the two extremes in the ultimate is asserted to be mahāmadhyamaka

The of course we have Naropa's statement in the Abbreviation of the View, translated by Marpa Lotsawa, which paraphrases the Hevajra Tantra:

That thing, samsara,
that is nirvana,
that is mahāmadhyamaka.

Now, I am not very sure why some Kagyus have abandoned the view of Naropa and Marpa, but it sure seems that they have, because the above sentiment is impossible in gzhan stong, where nirvana is by definition empty of samsara, not identical with it.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 25th, 2015 at 6:50 AM

Title: Re: Is it possible to be Buddhist and Hindu?

Content:

monktastic said:

I have heard it suggested that there is indeed more than one realization that can be appropriately called "nondual," and which feels absolutely final. The idea that "because they're both nondual, they are the same insight," or that they give rise to the same degree of freedom, is no longer so obvious to me.

For someone like me, the best way to evaluate whether two insights are the same, or whether one is "higher" than the other, is to ask people who feel that they've experienced both. For example, among people who have experienced the insight that "I am a separate body in a world of other bodies," and "the world and I are one," nobody seems to consider the former a deeper insight. This gives me some confidence.

If there are people who have experienced both "all is Brahman" (or "there is only Brahman"), and "even Brahman is empty," then maybe I can learn something about which of those views is more "accurate" (despite the fact that this word itself means progressively less along the path). I have come across a few individuals (both from a Vedanta background and a Buddhist background) who supposedly have experienced both insights, and their thoughts about whether these insights are the same (and just being expressed from different angles), or one is more freeing, is informative to my practice.

I'd rather not share much about what I learned (for a few reasons), but thought I'd share that this was something interesting for me to investigate.

Boomerang said:

I wouldn't really recommend asking an awakening person to describe their personal experiences. There are some things that can't be explained in words. Could you use words to explain what it's like to experience smells or hear sounds? Furthermore, a person could tell you one thing one day, have a deeper awakening, and then completely change their tune.

Malcolm wrote:

Ummm, no, not in Buddhadharma. The content of awakening is the same between a first stage bodhisattva and a buddha — the only things that differentiates the awakening of bodhisattvas and buddhas is that a bodhisattva still has obscurations of affliction and omniscience to remove, and a buddha does not. Otherwise, there is no difference in the emptiness they realize. They realize the same emptiness.

For this reason, for example, Maitreyanatha describes sentient beings, bodhisattvas and buddhas respectively as impure, impure/pure, and pure.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 25th, 2015 at 6:01 AM

Title: Re: Is it possible to be Buddhist and Hindu?

Content:

Adamantine said:

Isn't the main point to take away here that both traditions acknowledge that their methods - interred in philosophical language or not- are merely conditional devices to hook disciples in the right direction, but which shouldn't be confused with the actual realization/destination which is beyond the capacity of language (or conceptual mind) altogether?

I've heard that Hindus tend to fall away from the fruit in the direction of Eternalism, and Buddhists in the direction of Nihilism.. Of course the proper way of Buddhadharma is beyond either extreme.. But realistically, most of us here are falling in one direction or another.. Let's take stock and look at this soberly.

Boomerang said:

That sums up my opinion. Once nonduality is realized, it becomes apparent that none of the conceptual tools used up to that point are inherently true or false. That's why I feel comfortable saying that Advaita Vedanta and Buddhism are both legitimate even though they disagree on various points. Nagarjuna and Shankara were both masters of skillful means.

Malcolm wrote:

"Nonduality" in Buddhadharma is the simple fact that the two predicates of things, "existence" and "nonexistence", are false. That is all and nothing more.

That is not how Shankaracarya understands "nonduality", which is that the nondual state is "one without a second", i.e. existent.

Given that this is so, "nonduality" in Buddhadharma and Advaita are not even remotely commensurate.

Those who think so either do not understand a) Buddhadharma b) Advaita c) Both. In general, it is usually Advaitans who do not understand Buddhadharma who make the mistake of equating the treatment of nonduality in Buddhadharma and Advaita. One thing is for sure, the ancient Indian Buddhist masters were not confused about this distinction.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 25th, 2015 at 5:58 AM

Title: Re: Is it possible to be Buddhist and Hindu?

Content:

smcj said:

So he predicates the entire question on the idea that, according to Dzogchen, there is a some sort of ultimate ground of being that is not dependent on the minds of being.

Malcolm wrote:

No, he doesn't. But since you don't understand Dzogchen, you remain immune to correction on this critical point.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 23rd, 2015 at 1:04 PM

Title: Re: Is it possible to be Buddhist and Hindu?

Content:

Boomerang said:

I see no difference between the Advaita concept of Brahman/Atman and the Buddhist concept of Dharmadatu/Buddha-nature.

Malcolm wrote:

This means you have not understood what "dharmadhātu" means.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 20th, 2015 at 10:53 PM

Title: Re: Single Son

Content:

naljor said:

Hi all,

where can I find Tibetan text of short version of the Single Son of all the Buddhas tantra or English translation?

Malcolm wrote:

There are many short versions - do you mean the one from the Khandro Nyinthig?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 20th, 2015 at 10:25 PM

Title: Re: Being introduced to the nature of mind -- ?

Content:

conebeckham said:

དོན་མཉམ་ or "samanyartha" are the words I believe we're discussing.

Malcolm wrote:

These are unreal, if that is what he means, then no.

cloudburst said:

yes, don spyi.

I was confused when you wrote

malcolm said:

Can the vajra master give the student an "introduction to the nature of mind" and have it be a qualified instance of that, even if the insight generated in the student is only one that is a generic image?

This is precisely what is called "the example wisdom."

Malcolm wrote:

I was answering yes to "Can the vajra master give the student an "introduction to the nature of mind" and have it be a qualified instance of that..."

It is not a universal, since universals cannot be perceived experientially since they do not exist.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 18th, 2015 at 8:10 PM

Title: Re: Sources for 'Early Mahayana'

Content:

Indrajala said:

The Brahman heartland was the Kuru-Pañcāla region highlighted in red. Gandhāra, Bactria and much of what is now Afghanistan was not. The northwest (referring to these latter regions) was especially cosmopolitan after Alexander, having plenty of Greek and Persian influences and peoples, many of whom were to adopt Buddhism and not use Sanskrit initially. If these had been Brahmanical strongholds as you misunderstand them to be, then they would have used Sanskrit from the start. However, we find Buddhists using languages like Bactrian and Gāndhārī instead. There are inscriptions of refuge verses found in Bactrian fashion using Bactrian script:

Malcolm wrote:

I am not talking about Bactria [Afghanistan], I am talking about Pakistan, around the Indus river valley east. In other words, the eastern side of the the Hindu Kush.

I never said either that Buddhists began using Sanskrit from the beginning, merely that a push to Sanskritize is evident from the beginning.

The Sarvastivadins wrote their canon down in Sanskrit, and this more than anything accounts for the widespread adoption of the Sarvastivada Abhidharma by most schools who were not connected with the proto-Theravada.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 18th, 2015 at 8:05 PM

Title: Re: Sources for 'Early Mahayana'

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

We see a move towards Sanskritization even during the Buddha's day. For example, there is a passage [I believe it is the Majjhima Nikāya] recounting how two Brahmin disciples of the Buddha derided another monk who only knew vernacular for being unable to distinguish between long and short vowels when he recited the Sūtras.

Indrajala said:

Even if that is referring to Sanskrit phonetics, it isn't a historical record, and was probably inserted much later on because too many monks were not reciting things in the desired fashion.

Malcolm wrote:

Of course it is a historical record, don't be daft — your assertion that it is an interpolation is entirely arbitrary.

Indrajala said:

These two earned the censure of the Buddha for sure, but we can see the roots of Sanskritization even in the Nikayas from this example.

The Pali cannon is also a late period development (see Schopen quote above), and according to Norman it was a translation of something else.

So, your point doesn't stand.

Malcolm wrote:

Of course the points stands, because the same story is preserved in other canons.

Indrajala said:

When the Sarvastivadins set their canon down, they set it down in Sanskrit for the obvious reason I stated — it was the language of the educated all across India.

Was it Sanskrit from the first day or did they adopt it later on?

Malcolm wrote:

It was set down in Sanskrit, from day one.

Indrajala said:

In particular, if you hold that Sarvastivada come from the region of what is now Pakistan and the Punjab, this is the traditional homeland of the Vedas and according to the accounts you follow, a Brahmanical stronghold.

You misunderstand the geography. Let's look at the map:

Malcolm wrote:

No, I don't. Let's look at a map — https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Indo-Aryan_migration_hypothesis#mediaviewer/File:Early_Vedic_Culture_%281700-1100_BCE%29.png

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 18th, 2015 at 8:00 PM

Title: Re: Being introduced to the nature of mind -- ?

Content:

prsvrnc said:

“In the original mahamudra tradition, the earliest masters literally sang the disciples into enlightenment with poems called dohas. The mind's natural condition was directly pointed out by the master, who then gave instructions to negate any artificial activity during meditation. Realization of the mind's awakened wisdom was a consequence of these pointing-out and nonmeditation instructions. This is ESSENCE MAHAMUDRA.

Later in the tradition, mahamudra practitioners first learned to refine the ordinary mind through mastering traditional generation-stage and completion-stage tantric practices, and then they took up mahamudra either concurrent with or following completion-stage practice. This is TANTRIC MAHAMUDRA.

Still later in the tradition, practitioners first refined the ordinary mind through mastering standard concentration and special insight meditation, and after some degree of mastery had been achieved, mahamudra was then introduced. This is SUTRA MAHAMUDRA.

Thus, mahamudra can be a sutra, tantra, or essence practice, depending on which practices are used to refine the coarse and subtle levels of the mind before essence instructions are given to address the very subtle mind.”

^^ AHH, I think this does clarify my Q. Mahamudra, then, I think singularly refers to realization at level of very subtle mind. in other words, a direct cognition of emptiness at level of first arya brumi, then, is not a mahamudra realization, even though it is realizing the nature of mind on one level.

Malcolm wrote:

From where are you taking the above quote? The person who wrote it seems to be unaware that the dohas are the songs of realization gained through practicing the two stages. Mahāmudra in reality only refers to the result of the two stages or guru yoga.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 18th, 2015 at 7:56 PM

Title: Re: Is it possible to be Buddhist and Hindu?

Content:

Ayu said:

If somebody feels to have a good connection to Hinduism, is it possible to practice it together with Buddhism?

Malcolm wrote:

I already answered this question.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 18th, 2015 at 6:08 AM

Title: Re: Being introduced to the nature of mind -- ?

Content:

conebeckham said:

དོན་མཁྱེན་ or "samanyartha" are the words I believe we're discussing.

Malcolm wrote:

These are unreal, if that is what he means, then no.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 18th, 2015 at 5:44 AM

Title: Re: Tibetan language--indispensible in Tantra?

Content:

Konchok Namgyal said:

It was explained to me like this :

Even though you should do these practices in Tibetan you should also understand what it is you are saying.

The blessings flow through the language much as they do through the lineage.

especially the Mantras, the intonation and vibration of them effects body, speech and mind.

Malcolm wrote:

If you are a translator, you should practice in Tibetan.

If you are with a Tibetan Lama doing a group practice, you should practice in "Tibetan", even if it sounds awful (it does).

If you are by yourself, you should practice in English, because just as mantras pronounced improperly will only delay your practice; just as mumbling your sadhanas will delay your practice; chanting liturgies in phoneticized "Tibetan" only results in making sounds which at best only vaguely resemble Tibetan, sounds which you do not understand, nor will be understood by anyone who is a Tibetan speaker, and thus you will merely cause obstacles for yourself.

This does not mean one should not take pains to learn Tibetan, which is the only proper way to learn how to pronounce it. This does not mean that certain prayers like the seven line prayer, the Migtsema, the short Barceh Lamsel and so on should not be recited in Tibetan — of course they should -- it is easy to learn how to properly pronounce a few lines of Tibetan. This does not mean one can practice a chod liturgy in English (attempts have been made but they all suck). But as a general rule English speakers who do not know Tibetan should practice in English apart from the above noted exceptions, that at least is my opinion.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 18th, 2015 at 4:39 AM

Title: Re: Being introduced to the nature of mind -- ?

Content:

cloudburst said:

According to your understanding, is that initial experience mediated by means of a generic image?

Malcolm wrote:

In the sense that words are abstractions, I suppose so. The words indicate the meaning of that experience.

cloudburst said:

We may have a different understanding of the meaning of generic image... for example, in my understanding, even example clear light in the mind of a tantric practitioner on the path of accumulation would be mediated by a generic image.

Since you said the experience of the word empowerment itself was the example wisdom, I am wondering if you believe this experience itself is mediated by a generic image, in a way similar to the experience of a yogi's example clear light.

thanks.

Malcolm wrote:

What is the underlying Tibetan or Sanskrit word you are using for "generic image"? What I am saying is that the example wisdom is a pratyakṣa, not an analysis.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 18th, 2015 at 2:49 AM

Title: Re: Being introduced to the nature of mind -- ?

Content:

cloudburst said:

Does that include initial recognition being through means of a generic image?

Malcolm wrote:

There is no difference between the fourth empowerment and direct introduction. They both involve inductions of specific experiences.

The fourth empowerment is an introduction based on the induction of a specific experience in the student, likewise, so is direct introduction.

Though it is called the "word empowerment", the actual fourth empowerment is not truly contained within words such as "this is like space...", etc. But when combined with this or that specific experience, the fourth empowerment/direct introduction introduces the student to the nature of their minds experientially, and then it can be called the word empowerment because the nature of that experience has been described to them in a way that they understand the experience that they have had. That experience itself is the example, wisdom, not the words.

cloudburst said:

According to your understanding, is that initial experience mediated by means of a generic image?

Malcolm wrote:

In the sense that words are abstractions, I suppose so. The words indicate the meaning of that experience.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 18th, 2015 at 1:41 AM

Title: Re: Tibetan language--indispensable in Tantra?

Content:

Lobsang Damchoi said:

Would like to pose a question--this is primarily for Westerners who do solo practice of the higher tantras on a regular basis, but I'm interested in anyone's views: your genuine gut feelings, as well as whatever advice you may have received from teachers.

Is it a really serious disadvantage to one's personal progress and realization if one practices in the vernacular? I know lamas frequently mention the blessings of using Tibetan. But, IMHO Westerners have something that may compensate in some measure: a strong, almost visceral connection to the sound of Sanskrit. (At least it seems to be true in my case.) And Sanskrit is, after all, the original for most of the tantras we practice. If one is going to learn a 2nd, 3rd or 4th language for dharma practice, why not Sanskrit (if it's a practical alternative based on surviving sources)?

Also, is it really practical, where there are many complex referents and highly detailed imagery, to expect that the Tibetan will have the same practicality and power as one's native language?

In a recent book the author compared doing tantric sadhanas in a non-Tibetan language to being blind -- is it really that bad? Should I hand in my tantrika card until I'm fluent in Tibetan?

Malcolm wrote:

You should practice in the language you understand, rather than be a parrot.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 18th, 2015 at 1:34 AM

Title: Re: Sources for 'Early Mahayana'

Content:

Indrajala said:

The custom towards adopting Sanskrit was initially localized around the more heavily Brahmanical areas.

Malcolm wrote:

We see a move towards Sanskritization even during the Buddha's day. For example, there is a passage [I believe it is the Majjhima Nikāya] recounting how two Brahmin disciples of the Buddha derided another monk who only knew vernacular for being unable to distinguish between long and short vowels when he recited the Sūtras. These two earned the censure of the Buddha for sure, but we can see the roots of Sanskritization even in the Nikayas from this example.

When the Sarvastivadins set their canon down, they set it down in Sanskrit for the obvious reason I stated — it was the language of the educated all across India. In particular, if you hold that Sarvastivada come from the region of what is now Pakistan and the Punjab, this is the traditional homeland of the Vedas and according to the accounts you follow, a Brahmanical stronghold.

Plus, a very large proportion of monks in the time of the Buddha were bhramins, and so on and so forth.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 18th, 2015 at 1:08 AM

Title: Re: Is it possible to be Buddhist and Hindu?

Content:

Nirrtix said:

Even if a sort of blend of the beliefs?

Jetavan said:

<http://threeroyalwarriors.tripod.com/index.html>.

Malcolm wrote:

Thus is a very strange website, based on some serious misconceptions.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 18th, 2015 at 12:55 AM

Title: Re: Being introduced to the nature of mind -- ?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

There is no difference between the direct introduction of Dzogchen and the fourth empowerment, none whatsoever.

M

cloudburst said:

Does that include initial recognition being through means of a generic image?

Malcolm wrote:

There is no difference between the fourth empowerment and direct introduction. They both involve inductions of specific experiences.

The fourth empowerment is an introduction based on the induction of a specific experience in the student, likewise, so is direct introduction.

Though it is called the "word empowerment", the actual fourth empowerment is not truly contained within words such as "this is like space...", etc. But when combined with this or that specific experience, the fourth empowerment/direct introduction introduces the student to the nature of their minds experientially, and then it can be called the word empowerment because the nature of that experience has been described to them in a way that they understand the experience that they have had. That experience itself is the example, wisdom, not the words.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 18th, 2015 at 12:00 AM

Title: Re: Being introduced to the nature of mind -- ?

Content:

cloudburst said:

Malcolm, it seems that you are saying that vidya is the same as example wisdom.

Mother's Lap said:

How does example wisdom correlate/differ with vidya?

Malcolm wrote:

It is the same.

cloudburst said:

Further, example wisdom is an insight, by means of a generic image, into the nature of the mind generated through the introduction by a vajra master.

prsvrnc said:

Can the vajra master give the student an "introduction to the nature of mind" and have it be a qualified instance of that, even if the insight generated in the student is only one that is a generic image?

Malcolm wrote:

This is precisely what is called "the example wisdom."

cloudburst said:

would this be a fair assessment of what you are saying?

Malcolm wrote:

There is no difference between the direct introduction of Dzogchen and the fourth empowerment, none whatsoever.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 17th, 2015 at 11:52 PM

Title: Re: Is it possible to be Buddhist and Hindu?

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

Well, the point is that 'Buddhist' and 'Hindu' are words, and you're arguing about what people should take them to mean.

Malcolm wrote:

They are signifiers that indicate where you find your refuge.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 17th, 2015 at 11:03 PM

Title: Re: Is it possible to be Buddhist and Hindu?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

One cannot go for refuge to the Buddha and also go for refuge to some other god.

Sherlock said:

You can make offerings to different deities but taking refuge in the three jewels means you recognize that there is no other way to liberation except Buddhadharma. If you think some other path leads to liberation and you go after that, then you break your refuge vows.

Ayu said:

I heard long Lamrim-lectures about the meaning of taking refuge to Buddha, taking refuge to Dharma & taking refuge to Sangha. I never heard this excluding statements. Maybe my ears were closed, but this sounds rather christian like: "You should not have any god besides Me." (?)

Malcolm wrote:

It says in the Vinayakārikā:

If who has gone for refuge to the Buddha should serve one with a different aspect,
the lucidity of their minds shall become disturbed, and based on that where can there be a result?

The Parinirvana Sūtra states very unambiguously:

One who seeks refuge in the Buddha
is a true upāsaka
and should never seek refuge
in other gods.

If one seeks refuge in the sublime Dharma,
be free from thoughts of harm and killing.

If one seeks refuge in the Sangha,
do not associate with tīrthikas.

Ayu said:

In our course there is one follower of Kriya-Yoga as Lamrim-student since four years. Our Geshe doesn't force her to convert. She attends also initiations and is like a full member of our sangha.

But I suppose, she didn't take refuge, because her heart beats for Kriya Yoga, it's her home.

Malcolm wrote:

Without taking refuge, you cannot enter Mahāyāna, let alone Vajrayāna. If this person never took refuge, she never received bodhisattva vows, and never received samaya, and in short, never received an initiation or an empowerment at all. Of course, what is likely the case is that she took refuge, etc., but damages her refuge continually through confusion. This common, which is why the Buddha spoke about it and why it is reflected in the Vinakarika I cited above.

Ayu said:

On the contrary I heard it is rather dangerous to cut off all your own roots to follow buddhist path in an artificial manner. One should keep in contact with ones own roots and all the aspects of ones being.

Malcolm wrote:

It is one thing to respect the religion of your ancestors, it is quite another to be confused about refuge.

The issue of Gorakṣanātha was raised. It is true he is counted among the 84 siddhas. It is said he was raised in a Buddhist family and later converted to Shaivism. It is a little unclear what his story is. But this anomaly sheds light on Hathayogapradipika's criticism of the Buddhist siddha Nagabodhi, showing that in such yogic circles there was definite tension between Hindus and Buddhists.

In the example of Mahasiddha Virupa, it was unclear to everyone whether he was Buddhist or Hindu. In order to find out, he was dragged in front of the King of Benares. When it was ascertained he was a Buddhist, he was condemned to death, bound in chains and flung into the Ganges. Houdini-like, he escaped. There are other episodes in his biography which illustrate that Buddhist siddhis circulated among non-Buddhists as part of their vrātya, their yogic discipline, to challenge their own realization. In another episode of Virupa's life, after having been invited to be the leader of a royal panel of non-Buddhist panditas, when it was discovered the book to which he prostrated was the Prajñāpāramitā in 8000 lines, the king (a different one) ordered him to bow to a Shiva linga. Virupa replied that it was inappropriate for an elder brother to prostrate to the younger, and warned the king that it was not going to go well. The king insisted that Virupa prostrate to this linga, and after he prostrated to it, it shattered, eliciting a complaint from Shiva himself. Virupa was so skilled at conversion through magical displays, eventually Avalokiteshvara interceded and asked Virupa to cease terrifying people with his powers.

We can understand from all this that it is not appropriate for those who have sought refuge in the Three Jewels to seek refuge elsewhere. So the answer to the question "Can one be a Buddhist and a Christian", "can one be a Buddhist and a Hindu", "can one be a Buddhist and a religious Jew" is no. Just as one cannot serve two kings, but must bear allegiance to one above any other, likewise, one cannot belong to Buddhadhama and so some religion and expect any kind of result from the former, as it clearly states in the Vinaya stanza above.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 17th, 2015 at 9:38 PM

Title: Re: Major empowerments

Content:

Punya said:

I can't really explain the context of this but if someone asked you to supply a list of any major empowerments you have received what are they likely to mean? What would normally constitute major and minor empowerments?

I assume Kalachakra and Lamdre are major empowerments but can someone give some examples in each of the main Tibetan traditions?

Thanks Punya

heart said:

In the Sarma tradition it seems it have to be a 2 day empowerment to be considered major. This is not really the case in the Nyingma tradition, it is a lot more complex matter.

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

A dbang chen in gsar ma and snying ma are the same. Guhyagarba is one example, there are many others.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 17th, 2015 at 5:01 AM

Title: Re: Is it possible to be Buddhist and Hindu?

Content:

Nirrtix said:

Even if a sort of blend of the beliefs? I know that some beliefs in Buddhism you can believe in god or gods, both are Karma based, and have some similar teachings.

I know this may seem like an odd idea, but Thich Nhat Hanh a Zen Mon wrote Living Buddha Living Christ, and thought both were compatible. I believe it is on the Buddhist side at least.

Anyhow, I am curious about this.

I am also curious about what many of you think about how some think about the Hindu belief that Buddha is an Avatar of Vishnu.

thank you,
Nirrtix

Malcolm wrote:

One cannot go for refuge to the Buddha and also go for refuge to some other god.

The Hindu idea that Buddha is an avatar of Vishnu is a pernicious legend, since it portrays Buddha as emanating solely for the purpose of tricking the asuras and leading them astray.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 17th, 2015 at 4:39 AM

Title: Re: Being introduced to the nature of mind -- ?

Content:

Mother's Lap said:

So Sarma 4th empowerment also leads to a buddhahood that does not return to the cause?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, of course.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 17th, 2015 at 3:59 AM

Title: Re: Being introduced to the nature of mind -- ?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

It is the practice of the an example wisdom introduced at the time of empowerment. This leads to buddhahood in one life, or seven or at most sixteen.

The level of insight experienced in Vajrayāna completion stage practices involve the experience of levels of mind more subtle than is possible in sutra meditation of plain śamatha and vipaśyāna, which is another reason why it is more rapid than sutra meditation.

Mother's Lap said:

How does example wisdom correlate/differ with vidya?

Malcolm wrote:

It is the same.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 17th, 2015 at 2:53 AM

Title: Re: Being introduced to the nature of mind -- ?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

There really is no mahāmudra that can be spoken of outside of tantric practice. Sutra mahāmudra is using dohas to illustrate and prepare one for the true result mahāmudra realized via the practice of the two stages. The word "mahāmudra" does not occur in even one single sūtra.

Sherab Dorje said:

The term "Sutra Mahamudra" is normally used to delineate the gradual approach from the sudden.

As for Mahamudra, some say that it is equivalent to Tathagatagarbha, and there's plenty of mention of that in the Sutras.

But this leads me to ask the question: Do you believe that the nature of mind can only be uncovered via Tantra? Do you think that the level of insight needed to experience the state, does not exist in Sutta and Sutra techniques?

Malcolm wrote:

The term "sūtra" mahāmudra, according to Kongtrul and even Gampopa himself, is used for the teaching given to those people who are incapable of practicing Vajrayāna for this or that reason but who are nevertheless interested in Mahāmudra. They are taught śamatha and vipaśyāna, the experience of which is clarified by quotes from dohas, etc.

But without the example wisdom as well as the profound dependent originations arranged by the guru at the time of empowerment, this sūtra mahāmudra cannot go beyond the common practice of the six perfections.

There are many terms for the state of buddhahood in various systems. The meaning is the same, but the means differ, and the length of time to the result as well.

The means of realizing mahāmudra is the two stages and or guru yoga. It is the practice of the an example wisdom introduced at the time of empowerment. This leads to buddhahood in one life, or seven or at most sixteen.

It takes three incalculable eons at minimum to progress to buddhahood via the sūtra path.

The level of insight experienced in Vajrayāna completion stage practices involve the experience of levels of mind more subtle than is possible in sutra meditation of plain śamatha and vipaśyāna, which is another reason why it is more rapid than sutra meditation.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 17th, 2015 at 1:29 AM

Title: Re: Being introduced to the nature of mind -- ?

Content:

prsvrnc said:

Here is another question I'll look for (to get the specifics with regard to): How does one distinguish between the nature of mind that is felt to be realized during an initiation and the Mahamudra "introduction to mind" that is given separately? (Yes, perhaps the latter is also a form of an "initiation" — I'm just trying to get the vocab and references, straight.)

Malcolm wrote:

There is no difference. Some schools, notably the Sakyapas, maintain that such direct introductions however merely reinforce the example wisdom introduced during empowerment.

prsvrnc said:

I think something that is related is the fact that shamatha and vipashana are cultivated one time around relative to sutra teachings, and then another pass of the same type of cultivation occurs when tantra is officially entered. This correlates with generation and completion stage respectively. The nature of mind is identified twice, so to speak -- one time with the course level of mind, upon which one becomes an arya bodhisattva and enters the first ground; the second time is with the subtle mind of clear light at the end of the isolation of mind wherein one enters path of seeing in tantra and achieves the illusory body. So, Mahamudra is going to be practiced differently, depending upon what level of "nature of mind" one is intending to access -- i.e., whether with the course or subtle mind.

Malcolm wrote:

There really is no mahāmudra that can be spoken of outside of tantric practice. Sutra mahāmudra is using dohas to illustrate and prepare one for the true result mahāmudra realized via the practice of the two stages. The word "mahāmudra" does not occur in even one single sūtra.

prsvrnc said:

Can the vajra master give the student an "introduction to the nature of mind" and have it be a qualified instance of that, even if the insight generated in the student is only one that is a generic image?

Malcolm wrote:

This is precisely what is called "the example wisdom."

prsvrnc said:

My guess is that being introduced to the nature of mind isn't necessarily a one time occurrence but probably has a decisive start but occurs repeatedly until... well, buddhahood. But that is just my educated guess.

Malcolm wrote:

It is a one time occurrence, in a real sense, that must be repeatedly cultivated until buddhahood.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 16th, 2015 at 9:30 PM

Title: Re: Spirits - are these considered to be formless beings?

Content:

mutsuk said:

yep, sorry, 'byung po indeed

Malcolm wrote:

Here, however the direct translation of 'byung po as elementals is a little misleading. They are not spirits like undines, salamanders and so so connected with the element water, fire, etc. They are rather autochthonic entities, that is the sense of "bhuta" here.

They are formless in that they do not have physical bodies, though the rich representation of them, especially in Tibetan astrological and medical paintings, represents an attempt to show their class by giving them recognizable attributes.

As tingzin notes there is a bit of slippage between the term deva and lha, but when classified in Tibetan medicine and Ayurveda, the deva-bhutagraha is still a formless spirit which causes the person affected to wear white, be obsessed with purity, to speak in Sanskrit and so on. There are many such "deva" possessed people in Hindu ashrams and yoga centers around the world.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 16th, 2015 at 9:23 PM

Title: Re: Sources for 'Early Mahayana'

Content:

Indrajala said:

Johannes Bronkhorst, Buddhism in the Shadow of Brahmanism Handbook of Oriental Studies (Leiden: Brill, 2011), 46.

He suggests that it was the mundane matters related to dealing with brahmanized royal courts that is what drove Buddhists to adopt the language of a community often hostile to them:

They did not do so because they liked Sanskrit, or because they liked the Brahmins whose language it was. Nor did they do so for some inherent quality that this language supposedly possesses. They did so because they needed to defend their interests at the royal courts in Sanskrit. They had to use Sanskrit at the courts because Brahmins had been able to secure themselves a central place at the courts by way of their indispensable skills, not because rulers had supposedly "converted" to Brahmanism. This, as far as I can see, is the most plausible explanation of this otherwise puzzling change of language.

Malcolm wrote:

It is not puzzling in the least. Buddhists in India switched to Sanskrit because it was the language of educated persons.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 16th, 2015 at 9:21 PM

Title: Re: Sakya Trizin - Chakrasamvara Body Mandala - Boston 4/201

Content:

alexprice said:

Lama Migmar and the Sakya Institute for Buddhist Studies are happy to announce this special event in the Boston area on the weekend of April 11-12, 2015.

For the first time in the West, HH Sakya Trizin Rinpoche will bestow the Chakrasamvara Body Mandala empowerment on the afternoon of Sunday April 12. This event is restricted to those who have already received the Chakrasamvara major two-day initiation from HH or another a Sakya-lineage lama. If you attended the Chakrasamvara initiation with HH in Boston in May 2011, you are qualified to attend. Registration for this event is now open at <http://sakya.net>.

Malcolm wrote:

It has to be the Ghantapada five-deity major empowerment, not just any Chakrasamvara major empowerment. Not even Luipa or Krishnacarya's tradition will count.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 16th, 2015 at 8:13 PM

Title: Re: Spirits - are these considered to be formless beings?

Content:

prsvnc said:

How are spirits classified in Tibetan Buddhism?

asunthatneversets said:

What we usually think of as "spirits" in the west are called bhutas in India... I'm not sure what the Tibetan translation of that term would be.

mutsuk said:

This is 'byung ba in tibetan (elemental forces).

Malcolm wrote:

'Byung po, i.e. Elementals

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 16th, 2015 at 1:37 AM

Title: Re: Vijnana vs. Rigpa

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

I always seem to get into trouble when I post something from SDR.

Malcolm wrote:

Revise that to:

I always seem to get into trouble when I post something.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 16th, 2015 at 12:29 AM

Title: Re: Vijnana vs. Rigpa

Content:

alpha said:

Yes.All of that.

In my case it was.

Every day goes by i look at myself and say:"Nope.I am none of that".

Maybe i got it all wrong...who knows...

Malcolm wrote:

If you cultivate love, compassion and bodhicitta, you have not gotten anything wrong.

Without these three things, Vajrayāna is just an ego trip.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 15th, 2015 at 11:20 PM

Title: Re: Vijnana vs. Rigpa

Content:

alpha said:

It's a personal opinion based on what i have been doing so far.

I feel like an old person who coming to the end of his life is full of regrets.

I just feel like i wasted my time.

Malcolm wrote:

You regret what you have been practicing? Dharma is a waste of time?

???

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 15th, 2015 at 10:24 PM

Title: Re: Vijnana vs. Rigpa

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

Rachmiel, I was thinking about this thread and it occurred to me that you might find the following teachings useful:

<http://www.tersar.org/teachings-4/teachings-archive/>

alpha said:

Totally depressing and hopeless

Malcolm wrote:

What and why?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 15th, 2015 at 1:26 AM

Title: Re: Contradiction in Mahayana philosophy

Content:

White Lotus said:

after the five senses are dissolved it is seen that there never were five senses,

Malcolm wrote:

Ummmm....can't dissolve what never was....

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 14th, 2015 at 6:42 PM

Title: Re: Pema Khandro?

Content:

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 14th, 2015 at 9:36 AM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

Jikan said:

I don't particularly see how this practice differs from someone eating meat from an animal that is specifically killed for him or her.

.

Malcolm wrote:

It isn't.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 14th, 2015 at 6:51 AM

Title: Re: Building a modern and/or western Buddhism

Content:

Lazy_eye said:

None. My point is that it's overly reductive to define the goal of the Buddhist path solely in terms of the ending of birth. If that were the case, a rock would also have met the (single) criterion; it was never born to begin with.

The way I see it -- and I realize this likely reflects lack of understanding on my part -- the goal of the Buddhist path is nirvana, and what brings about nirvana is the ending of ignorance. The ending of samsaric birth is a concomitant result; we are reborn into samsara as a result of ignorance, so when ignorance is overcome, the rebirth cycle stops.

It's a question of putting things in the right sequence.

Malcolm wrote:

You have to put in the Buddha's perspective — what is samsara? Rebirth. What causes rebirth? Ignorance. What ends ignorance? Awakening. What is the result of awakening? Nirvana. What is nirvana? The end of samsara. What is the end of samsara? The end of rebirth.

When the mind was thus concentrated, purified, bright, unblemished, rid of defilement, pliant, malleable, steady, & attained to imperturbability, I directed it to the knowledge of recollecting my past lives. I recollected my manifold past lives, i.e., one birth, two... five, ten... fifty, a hundred, a thousand, a hundred thousand, many eons of cosmic contraction, many eons of cosmic expansion, many eons of cosmic contraction & expansion: 'There I had such a name, belonged to such a clan, had such an appearance. Such was my food, such my experience of pleasure & pain, such the end of my life. Passing away from that state, I re-arose there. There too I had such a name, belonged to such a clan, had such an appearance. Such was my food, such my experience of pleasure & pain, such the end of my life. Passing away from that state, I re-arose here.' Thus I remembered my manifold past lives in their modes & details.

"This was the first knowledge I attained in the first watch of the night. Ignorance was destroyed; knowledge arose; darkness was destroyed; light arose — as happens in one who is heedful, ardent, & resolute.

"When the mind was thus concentrated, purified, bright, unblemished, rid of defilement, pliant, malleable, steady, & attained to imperturbability, I directed it to the knowledge of the passing away & reappearance of beings. I saw — by means of the divine eye, purified & surpassing the human — beings passing away & re-appearing, and I discerned how they are inferior & superior, beautiful & ugly, fortunate & unfortunate in accordance with their kamma: 'These beings — who were endowed with bad conduct of body, speech & mind, who reviled the Noble Ones, held wrong views and undertook actions under the influence of wrong views — with the break-up of the body, after death, have re-appeared in the plane of deprivation, the bad destination, the lower realms, in hell. But these beings — who were endowed with good conduct of body, speech, & mind, who did not revile the Noble Ones, who held right views and undertook actions under the influence of right views — with the break-up of the body, after death, have re-appeared in the good destinations, in the heavenly world.' Thus — by means of the divine eye, purified & surpassing the human — I saw beings passing away & re-appearing, and I discerned how they are inferior & superior, beautiful & ugly, fortunate & unfortunate in accordance with their kamma.

"This was the second knowledge I attained in the second watch of the night. Ignorance was destroyed; knowledge arose; darkness was destroyed; light arose — as happens in one who is heedful, ardent, & resolute.

"When the mind was thus concentrated, purified, bright, unblemished, rid of defilement, pliant, malleable, steady, & attained to imperturbability, I directed it to the knowledge of the ending of the mental fermentations. I discerned, as it had come to be, that 'This is stress... This is the origination of stress... This is the cessation of stress... This is the way leading to the cessation of stress... These are fermentations... This is the origination of fermentations... This is the cessation of fermentations... This is the way leading to the cessation of fermentations.' My heart, thus knowing, thus seeing, was released from the fermentation of sensuality, released from the fermentation of becoming, released from the fermentation of ignorance. With release, there was the knowledge, 'Released.' I discerned that 'Birth is ended, the holy life fulfilled, the task done. There is nothing further for this world.'

"This was the third knowledge I attained in the third watch of the night. Ignorance was destroyed; knowledge arose; darkness was destroyed; light arose — as happens in one who is heedful, ardent, & resolute.

<http://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/mn/mn.019.than.html>

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 14th, 2015 at 5:38 AM

Title: Re: Building a modern and/or western Buddhism

Content:

Lazy_eye said:

The sutras I've looked at (Avatamsaka for instance) don't seem to present Buddhahood as oblivion.

Malcolm wrote:

This is because the Mahāyāna perspective on Buddhahood does not present parinirvana as a total cessation of a Buddhas' continuum. Cessation and annihilation, btw., are entirely different.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 14th, 2015 at 5:35 AM

Title: Re: Building a modern and/or western Buddhism

Content:

Lazy_eye said:

A rock or other inanimate object is not subject to rebirth, so is it a Buddha?

Malcolm wrote:

This a pretty silly question but...

Does a rock or an other inanimate object have a mind? No. Therefore, upon what basis could they awaken?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 14th, 2015 at 2:05 AM

Title: Re: Building a modern and/or western Buddhism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, absolutely. Look at the number of references in the Pali canon where, upon attaining arhatship, arhats declare with joy, "this is my final birth..." and so on.

Lazy_eye said:

Indeed, they do make these declarations, but the non-occurrence of future births could be seen as a product of the Dharma's primary goal: the cessation of dukkha.

daverupa said:

The fact of there being arahants without psychic powers showcases that knowledge of the cessation of dukkha is not co-extensive with knowledge of individual past lives or knowledge of the falling & re-arising of beings according to kamma generally; it can be an inferential claim & not necessarily a psychic-knowledge-claim.

Malcolm wrote:

It nevertheless is the point of declaring that one will not again take rebirth.

The cessation of dukkha means there are no more causes for it to arise. Birth and death are the primary forms of dukkha.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 14th, 2015 at 2:03 AM

Title: Re: Building a modern and/or western Buddhism

Content:

Lazy_eye said:

...therefore, can we say that the happiness of an arahant or buddha consists only of knowing no future lives will occur?

Malcolm wrote:

Considering that even arhats are under the power of ripening karma from past lives, yes.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 13th, 2015 at 11:41 PM

Title: Re: Building a modern and/or western Buddhism

Content:

Lazy_eye said:

It seems to me (and please understand that I'm just a rather low-level student of the Dharma), that the significance of rebirth is directly linked to the meaning of nirvana. Nirvana is described in the suttas as "the highest happiness"; we also see it referred to as "permanent freedom" and so on. But does this "highest happiness" consist solely of the knowledge that one will never undergo another birth?

If so, it would be hard to argue with your statement.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, absolutely. Look at the number of references in the Pali canon where, upon attaining arhatship, arhats declare with joy, "this is my final birth..." and so on.

Lazy_eye said:

A materialist could achieve "nirvana" by coming to terms with the eventuality of death.

Malcolm wrote:

Hence the moral and intellectual poverty of the so-called "Secular Buddhist" approach.

Lazy_eye said:

Of course, this in itself is a complicated question, because most people don't desire oblivion at all; we fear death and desire further life. So part of Buddhism's appeal, for at least some secular Westerners, might be that it helps us with the suffering created by that fear (and the related desire). I'm not saying there aren't potential problems with this approach.

Malcolm wrote:

Hence Dharma Lite(tm)

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 13th, 2015 at 10:38 PM

Title: Re: Building a modern and/or western Buddhism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Well, there is a slight problem here — links consciousness — sensation are all results, results of what? craving, addiction and becoming are causes, but causes of what?

We can see in this life that craving leads to addiction, which leads to sad outcomes, but that is all — and that is not uniquely Buddhist.

Lazy_eye said:

Well, I would argue this is sufficient to make a reasonable inference as to the general principle, thus providing a basis for developing śraddhā -- i.e., the conviction that the Buddha's path is indeed the way to the ending of dukkha.

Malcolm wrote:

But this is not why people come to Dharma. Most people come to Dharma because they have heard that meditation will make them more calm and relaxed. It is "accidental" if they wind up Buddhist, because Yoga very much claims the same things as Buddhism, reduce clinging, becoming more calm, ending rebirth, etc.

Lazy_eye said:

What would you identify as being uniquely Buddhist?

Malcolm wrote:

His view of and method for liberation from the cycle of rebirth we know as samsara.

Without rebirth, and Buddha's specific view of rebirth, it just isn't Buddhadharma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 13th, 2015 at 8:28 PM

Title: Re: Is Dzogchen only accidentally Buddhist?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

No.

MalaBeads said:

That might be the first time I actually understood the Loppon's role.

Thank you, Malcolm.

Malcolm wrote:

You are quite welcome.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 13th, 2015 at 8:18 PM

Title: Re: Building a modern and/or western Buddhism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

..There is a long tradition in Western discourse about the benefits of not clinging to the things of this life.

There are other approaches being free of clinging to this life found in nonbuddhist contemplative traditions.

Lazy_eye said:

In Buddhism, though, non-clinging is understood within the context of dependent origination -- is anything like that found in the other contemplative traditions you mention?

Malcolm wrote:

Samkhya presents a kind of dependent origination which collapses when it is discovered that one is clinging to what is not the self because of mistakenly making differentiations in what is not self due to the transformation of the three gunas. A species of this view is presented in the Yoga Sutras and much of the language of the Yoga sutras is shared with so called "Early Buddhism."

Lazy_eye said:

I guess we are asking the question "what is uniquely Buddhist about Buddhism"? It seems to me that it must be the knowledge gained by the Buddha during the third watch of the night.

Malcolm wrote:

Buddha understood the view of dependent origination through recalling his past lives in the second watch. In the third watch he applied it through to the three realms and finally entered Vajropama samadhi.

Lazy_eye said:

If we accept the "three times" interpretation of D.O., then at least part of the process is observable in the present lifespan. To say nothing of other interpretations that see the twelvefold chain as just one particular presentation of idapaccayata.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, there is a slight problem here — links consciousness — sensation are all results, results of what? craving, addiction and becoming are causes, but causes of what?

We can see in this life that craving leads to addiction, which leads to sad outcomes, but that is all — and that is not uniquely Buddhist.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 13th, 2015 at 7:20 AM

Title: Re: Building a modern and/or western Buddhism

Content:

Lazy_eye said:

Doesn't one have to know, understand and be receptive to Mahayana doctrine in the first place in order to be compelled by bodhicitta?

Malcolm wrote:

Nope. Just as for me, what compelled me was hearing about Mahāyāna emptiness. I accepted the view of emptiness long before I accepted the other parts of the Buddhas teaching.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 13th, 2015 at 4:50 AM

Title: Re: Building a modern and/or western Buddhism

Content:

Lazy_eye said:

So, in effect, you had developed a strong conviction in karma and rebirth, and a concern about your well-being in future lives, before taking refuge. Everything up to that point was preparatory -- allowing the conditions to develop that eventually resulted in your taking refuge.

Malcolm wrote:

More or less.

Lazy_eye said:

Do you think this is somewhat unusual for a Western practitioner or is it actually more common that I am making it out to be?

Malcolm wrote:

I know many others for whom philosophy was their doorway in, like me. For others still, it was Mahāyāna bodhicitta that drew them, and so on.

Lazy_eye said:

Well, Hume taught selflessness and impermanence. Suffering is obvious to everyone. So what makes Buddhadharma compelling?

What makes you think Buddha's explanation of the cause of suffering are compelling to westerners? What about them is empirically verifiable?

The practice of non-clinging ("letting go") leads to reduction in dukkha; clinging invariably leads to suffering in the shorter or longer run.

Malcolm wrote:

And there is a long tradition in Western discourse about the benefits of not clinging to the things of this life.

Lazy_eye said:

Understanding anicca and anatta helps with the practice of non-clinging.

Malcolm wrote:

There are other approaches being free of clinging to this life found in nonbuddhist contemplative traditions.

Lazy_eye said:

On a related note, good sila and cultivation of the brahmaviharas leads to happier states of mind.

Malcolm wrote:

These are found also in the Yoga Sutras.

Lazy_eye said:

I'm not very familiar with Hume other than what I learned in high school ("if you drop the ball there's no guarantee it will hit the ground"). Did he teach not-self and impermanence in ways similar to the Buddha, and did he provide a practice or a path?

Malcolm wrote:

His teaching on the non-existence of the self is strikingly similar.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 13th, 2015 at 3:20 AM

Title: Re: Building a modern and/or western Buddhism

Content:

Lazy_eye said:

I didn't say anything about a one lifetime model, though. My claim was that anicca, anatta, dukkha and the causes of dukkha can be observed within the scope of one lifetime.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, Hume taught selflessness and impermanence. Suffering is obvious to everyone. So what makes Buddhadharma compelling?

What makes you think Buddha's explanation of the cause of suffering are compelling to westerners? What about them is empirically verifiable?

Frankly, I came to the Dharma because of hearing the Heart Sutra, and then taking an interest in Madhyamaka. It was only later, after having studied Buddhadharma for some time that I really absorbed the fact that I was a suffering sentient being and formally took refuge and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 13th, 2015 at 2:38 AM

Title: Re: Building a modern and/or western Buddhism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Personal responsibility, compassion and kindness are the hallmarks of a real Dharma practitioner.

Lazy_eye said:

Agree, but these qualities are important in the other major religions too. In and of themselves they don't provide a reason to choose Buddhism.

Malcolm wrote:

Not in the same way.

Lazy_eye said:

The question of faith is crucial — why do we have faith in the Buddha? He taught a path where we are responsible for our own liberation.

We all have a number of choices available: faith in Jesus, faith in Mohammed, faith in Buddha. There has to be some reason for making the choice, otherwise faith rests on an unstable foundation. Because there's always the possibility that one's faith might have been misplaced. After all, there are devout Christians and devout Muslims, though from a Buddhist standpoint they are wrong. From their standpoint Buddhists are wrong. How can we know? And the stakes are higher in monotheism: a Christian might end up in the Buddhist hells due to wrong view, but not permanently.

My argument would be that the Dharma does offer a reasonable basis, because what the Buddha said about dukkha and its causes can be verified empirically. So we proceed from there.

Malcolm wrote:

No, actually we cannot "empirically" verify the of the cause of dukkha, because dukkha is caused by karma, and karma itself is caused by affliction. There is no dukkha that is not caused by karma. There are no means by which dukkha may be measured. Liberation itself is defined as freedom from affliction, and that too cannot be measured, so there is nothing at all "empirically verifiable" in Buddhadharma. The idea that there is, is a hangover from an earlier period of Western perceptions of Buddhism.

You might argue, Buddha said that the cause of dukkha is clinging, but here clinging itself is just affliction which gives rise to an action that results in suffering. If you restrict yourself to a one lifetime model, there is no reason to select Buddhadharma over a secular twelve steps program...

Empirical verification depends on the observable quantification of a data set. No one has ever empirically verified that Buddhadharma

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 13th, 2015 at 1:02 AM

Title: Re: Building a modern and/or western Buddhism

Content:

LastLegend said:

It can be faith based. It can be based on rational approach, but this one is grasping firmly to wanting to know. One firmly believes the truth of the physical world based on the 5 senses. I think we are taking truth for granted here. We are acting like we are going to die if we can't know. Well we can't know anyway. Can we draw a certain complete conclusion/understanding about our nature and nature of reality using rational thinking?

Lazy_eye said:

I don't know.

All forms of Buddhism, as far as I know, stress the importance of trusting the Buddha. There are even some suttas which say, essentially, that trust and affinity for the Buddha can lead to stream entry even if one hasn't perfected sila. So I'm not denying its importance.

I'm just saying that since established faiths already exist in the West, faith may not be the most likely entry point into the Dharma. After all, if you already have that capability, why not just go to church? Logistically it's a lot easier -- there are plenty of churches everywhere but Buddhist centers or temples can be hard to find. I recall even the Dalai Lama has said that the locally established religion should be a good choice for most people.

So the appeal of the Dharma to (some) Westerners must in many cases be due to some other, distinctive qualities -- not the faith aspect specifically, since that can be found elsewhere.

Malcolm wrote:

The question of faith is crucial — why do we have faith in the Buddha? He taught a path where we are responsible for our own liberation. This is why Dharma appeals to the West. Personal responsibility, compassion and kindness are the hallmarks of a real Dharma practitioner.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 12th, 2015 at 9:38 PM

Title: Re: Indo-Tibetan sutra commentaries?

Content:

Will said:

Were such shastras written? In the prajaparamita group, not counting the short ones like Heart sutra, did any Tibetan or Indian write a comprehensive line by line commentary on the 8K or 18K or 25K sutras?

How about the Avatamsaka or Lotus or Maharatnakuta - any full commentaries on these?
Any other sutra commentary examples?

Malcolm wrote:

Not line by line, but definitely there are comprehensive commentaries on the long PP sutras by Indians.

And there is an eight volume commentary on the Abhisamālaṃkāra by Yagton, the longest, most comprehensive commentary on Prajñāpāramita ever written before or since.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 11th, 2015 at 2:40 AM

Title: Re: Why doesn't DJK accept offerings?

Content:

maybay said:

Dzongsar Khyentse Rinpoche, great lama, but won't accept offerings. Why not? Does he feel like we're projecting something onto him. Isn't that what happens anyway?

How should I feel about something like my own birthday? Should I call blind ritual and get tough about being used as a moral pivot for my sister's party-going? Buddhist, Lama, thoughtful reserved people. We're like pillars of society. Why reject that? I don't get it.

Malcolm wrote:

Sure he will accept offerings, just make it to one of his charitable organizations.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 10th, 2015 at 9:00 PM

Title: Re: Building a modern and/or western Buddhism

Content:

Kim O'Hara said:

In terms of my temple metaphor, you and Simon (and a few others) seem to want to barricade yourselves inside a section of the temple and stop anyone else changing it - but you are inside, with your 20th century western baggage, and that changes it already.

Malcolm wrote:

The essence of the Dharma lies in how it is practiced and explained. Of you change the explanations and practices of the awakened, you are no longer practicing Buddhadharma. There is no reason to change anything, and the Dharma is not changed merely because it is being practiced 2500 years after the nirvana of the Buddha.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 10th, 2015 at 2:29 AM

Title: Re: Buddhism's view on developmental disabilities

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The result of afflictive karma is always suffering. Suffering is always painful, whether mental or physical.

Greg said:

That is not what is at issue.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, actually it is. Illnesses are a part of suffering. For example, the Buddha clearly states in the Cula-kamma, that illness in this life is a karmic result of physically harming others. There are also plenty of examples from the Avadanas and so on where specific deformities are taught to be the result of karma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 9th, 2015 at 11:47 PM

Title: Re: Buddhism's view on developmental disabilities

Content:

LastLegend said:

Not all pain is directly related to karma but all indirectly related to karma. Having this karma physical body, one is subject to pain, heat, cold, stress, sickness, old age, and death.

Paul said:

This. Pain is due to a body, a body is due to karma (and karma is due to ignorance).

Greg said:

As I understand it, you are asserting that the sutra passage is merely asserting that karma is always an indirect cause of physical pain insofar as it precipitates having a body in the first place, but it can also sometimes be a direct cause of physical pain. But that reading doesn't really make sense, because karma is never a direct cause of physical pain without some kind of mediating cause (eg a bile disorder). So it doesn't make sense to list it with those other causes as if it was just one possible cause among several.

Malcolm wrote:

The result of afflictive karma is always suffering. Suffering is always painful, whether mental or physical.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 9th, 2015 at 11:14 AM

Title: Re: Buddhism's view on developmental disabilities

Content:

Qianxi said:

There's a sutra (<https://suttacentral.net/en/sn36.21>) about the possible causes of pain: bile disorders, phlegm disorders, wind disorders, an imbalance of the three, change of climate, careless behaviour, assault, and karma. The implication being that previous karma is only one of several possible explanations for physical pain.

Malcolm wrote:

Vasubandhu asserts the Sautrantika position that disturbances of the elements of the body, which in turn comprise vatta, pitta and kapha, are vipaka.

Greg said:

Vasubandhu's assertion seems to be clearly at odds with SN 36.21.

Malcolm wrote:

In your opinion, not in mine.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 8th, 2015 at 9:15 PM

Title: Re: Building a modern and/or western Buddhism

Content:

Kim O'Hara said:

That's a fair comment, but I (at least) am willing to persist since, in the larger scheme of things, this kind of dialogue is how we will (ever so slowly) fashion a Buddhism for the modern Western world.

Malcolm wrote:

I think the Buddhadharma we have is perfectly fine. As long as we rely on it, everything will be just fine.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 8th, 2015 at 9:13 PM

Title: Re: Buddhism's view on developmental disabilities

Content:

Kim O'Hara said:

That level of knowledge, sure. But can we know for sure why child X was born deaf or child Y was born into a family of drug-users and criminals?

And if we can't, then all we can do is respond as best we can to the circumstances we find in front of us - using our knowledge of the workings of karma to guide our present and future actions.

Malcolm wrote:

In terms of what kind of family one is born into, wealth, poverty, class, etc., this is definitely solely a result of karma. The Buddha says in the Ārya Āyusman Nanda Garbhāvākraṇṭi Nirdeśa:

Then, the Bhagavan said this to Āyusman Nanda, “Nanda, when a sentient being wishes to enter the womb, if causes and conditions are perfect, a body will be appropriated.

However, if [the causes and conditions] are not perfect, a body will not be appropriated.

If one should ask that sentient beings does not possess the conditions, it is as follows.

Though a man and a woman have the mental factor of desire, and the intermediate state aggregate is present and seeking a womb, should that male and female have sexual intercourse too soon or too late or not have intercourse at that one time; or should there be some diseases in the body of either [the male or the female], there will be no ‘entry into the womb’. If family line of the male and the female are noble and their merit is great, but the intermediate state aggregate has small merit, or should the the intermediate state being have a noble family line and great merit, [65] but the male and female have small [merit] or though they both have merit, but if the accumulation of karma is not mutual, then there will be no ‘entry into the womb’.”

In terms of birth defects and so on, this can be karmic; this can also be a result of various factors in the pregnancy, genetic defects, etc. Without clairvoyance it is difficult to know.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 7th, 2015 at 11:28 PM

Title: Re: Buddhism's view on developmental disabilities

Content:

Kim O'Hara said:

I would therefore prefer to set the question aside, as we were advised to by the Buddha, since it's un conjecturable.

Malcolm wrote:

Not so. Why? Affliction --> action --> suffering.

Kim O'Hara said:

If I'm correct in my belief that we can't know the workings of karma, then all we can do (as good Buddhists) is to respond as skillfully and compassionately as possible to whatever situation we see in front of us.

Malcolm wrote:

Of course we can know the workings of karma — the Buddha spend a significant amount of time teaching about it. In essence it may be summed up the following way:

Affliction --> action --> suffering.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 7th, 2015 at 6:54 AM

Title: Re: Buddhism's view on developmental disabilities

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

What we are talking about is that fact that the painful sensations that ripen on the body are result of negative deeds in the past, etc.

Qianxi said:

There's a sutra (<https://suttacentral.net/en/sn36.21>) about the possible causes of pain: bile disorders, phlegm disorders, wind disorders, an imbalance of the three, change of climate, careless behaviour, assault, and karma. The implication being that previous karma is only one of several possible explanations for physical pain.

Malcolm wrote:

Vasubandhu asserts the Sautrantika position that disturbances of the elements of the body, which in turn comprise vatta, pitta and kapha, are vipaka. Assaults can only be result of previous karma, such as when Buddha informed Angulmala that his being beaten by the mob was a ripening of his past karma. If you do not have the karma to be assaulted by someone, they can never harm you no matter how hard they try. Change of climate too can be a result of karma, because the appearance of the container universe is a reflection of our karma. If course, careless behavior, such as injuring one's toe, this I would not say is a direct result of karma.

In Alexander Berzin's

http://www.berzinarchives.com/web/en/archives/sutra/level4_deepening_understanding_path/types_phenomena/overview_cause_effect/transcript.html (also http://www.berzinarchives.com/web/en/archives/sutra/level4_deepening_understanding_path/types_phenomena/causes_conditions_results.html) of Vasubandhu's list of five kinds of result one is "Man-made results (skyes-bu byed-pa'i 'bras-bu, Skt. purushakaraphalam)"

Qianxi said:

Man-made results are what we usually associate with physical cause and effect. I banged my foot against the chair and the result of that is that I experience pain. There's a karmic cause for why I would feel unhappy and why I experience banging my foot, but the actual cause and effect relationship of the banging of the foot and the pain is a man-made result.

Malcolm wrote:

He goes on to say that unhappiness resulting from pain is always the result of karma rather than 'man made'

Qianxi said:

If we experience unhappiness, it is definite that it is the result of destructive behavior – and that's at least a five or six hour discussion of why that is the case, but we don't have time for that. It's one of the basic principles of karma.

Malcolm wrote:

I'm not very convinced by the distinction between 'pain' and 'unhappiness', but it's interesting that that seems to be the position.

Sherab Dorje said:

And still nobody has answered why some people are affected by these "other factors" while others are not.

Malcolm wrote:

I think the answer is that everyone is affected by non-karmic factors all of the time.[/quote]

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 7th, 2015 at 5:29 AM

Title: Re: Buddhism's view on developmental disabilities

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

...Yes, this all described in detail in the Kosha

daverupa said:

I'm not so sure it's well-described, however:

Malcolm wrote:

It is a pretty good indicator. The happiness we are experiencing in this life is a result of positive karma we did in the past; the suffering, the result of negative karma. Likewise, the positive karma we cultivate in this life will bear fruit as happiness in future lives; the negative karma, as suffering. It is unerring.

daverupa said:

But one can then read:

AN 3.61 said:

“Bhikkhus, I approached those ascetics and brahmins who hold such a doctrine and view as this: ‘Whatever this person experiences—whether pleasure, pain, or neither-pain-nor-pleasure—all that is caused by past deeds...

daverupa said:

which seems to suggest otherwise. So this discordance is not as eye-roll-worthy as you might think, especially since kamma is not the sole causal factor that affects beings.

Malcolm wrote:

Dave, what the Buddha is criticizing is the following:

When I ask them this, they affirm it. Then I say to them: ‘In such a case, it is due to past deeds that you might destroy life, take what is not given, indulge in sexual activity, speak falsehood, utter divisive speech, speak harshly, indulge in idle chatter; that you might be full of longing, have a mind of ill will, and hold wrong view.'

This a kind of determinism, and is not what we are talking about. What we are talking about is that fact that the painful sensations that ripen on the body are result of negative deeds in the past, etc. You can consult the Koshabhaśyam where Vasubandhu states "the essential element of vipaka is sensation...A sensation, the result of retribution of a bad action, is painful." In fact, Vasubandhu goes on to say that mental suffering is not actually a karmic ripening, per say, but arises from the physical ripening of karma on the body such that it produces a state which gives rise to mental suffering.

Rather than making wild and inappropriate accusations about how the Tibetan Buddhist understanding of karma differs from "the early material", have the humility to admit that you know very little about anything concerning Tibetan Buddhism and that you are not very interested to learn. The fact is that such things as the antarabhāva and so forth are grounded in sutras in the Agamas, making it just as "early", to invoke your favored interpretive fetish, as any thing in the Pali Canon.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 6th, 2015 at 11:49 PM

Title: Re: Buddhism's view on developmental disabilities

Content:

Lazy_eye said:

It might be illuminating for Malcolm or others who have had extensive contact with Tibetan or other Buddhist cultures to tell us what they have observed in terms of attitudes towards the disabled, to what extent those attitudes are informed by belief in karma-vipaka, and to what extent Buddhists are or are not helping to promote acceptance, tolerance and equal rights.

Malcolm wrote:

I have never observed anything but kindness towards disabled people, have never heard any talk about their being "at fault" for their disability. On the other hand, I have heard many Tibetans describe their own suffering in this life as a result of their own misdeeds in past lives, quite cheerfully and without any rancor.

Hell, even the Tibetan penal system in Lhasa took karma into account, assuming that in many cases it was pointless to administer a punishment for this or that crime, because the criminal was going to suffer in future lives for crimes committed in this life. This attitude lent itself to rather lenient treatments of many kinds of crimes. See Rebecca French's book on Tibetan law and jurisprudence.

I think that part of the issue is that people raised in western cultures spend a lot of time dealing with issues of "guilt", and spend a lot of time trying to avoid feelings of guilt.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 6th, 2015 at 9:28 PM

Title: Re: Buddhism's view on developmental disabilities

Content:

Concordiadiscordi said:

I agree that interdependent co-origination may be invoked as a meta-perspectival bulwark in such respects (it can be used to explain pretty much anything at a highly abstract and generalized level), but the specifics remain open to debate.

Malcolm wrote:

Dependent origination [not interdependent] and karma are two separate topics, often conflated together.

Concordiadiscordi said:

I would rather look to recent developments in the sciences and disciplines of non-linear complexity for sophisticated insights into the precisely contingent and often ambiguous nature of concrete causal dynamics/operations

Malcolm wrote:

None of them go beyond, "Where this exists, that exists, with the arising of that, this arose", etc.

Concordiadiscordi said:

Spiritually conservative justifications for disability and inequality founded upon vague notions derived from arcane texts and hearsay qualify as nothing but assumed dogma.

Malcolm wrote:

First, there is nothing vague about the Buddha's teaching on karma, it is very precise. Positive actions lead to positive results for oneself in this life and future lives, negatives actions lead to the opposite.

You either believe in Buddha's teachings on karma or you don't. If you don't, it is hard to consider yourself a follower of Buddhaharma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 6th, 2015 at 10:02 AM

Title: Re: Buddhism's view on developmental disabilities

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

It is a pretty good indicator. The happiness we are experiencing in this life is a result of positive karma we did in the past; the suffering, the result of negative karma. Likewise, the positive karma we cultivate in this life will bear fruit as happiness in future lives; the negative karma, as suffering. It is unerring.

daverupa said:

Just to be comprehensive:

MN 57 said:

Puṇṇa, there are four kinds of action proclaimed by me after realising them for myself with direct knowledge. What are the four? There is dark action with dark result; there is bright action with bright result; there is dark-and-bright action with dark-and-bright result; and there is action that is neither dark nor bright with neither-dark-nor-bright result, action that leads to the destruction of action.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, this all described in detail in the Kosha

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 6th, 2015 at 6:20 AM

Title: Re: Buddhism's view on developmental disabilities

Content:

SD said:

I was not engaging in, nor would I engage in, discrimination against people with special needs.

Kim O'Hara said:

Good! That is the most important thing here.

If you can also say that you do not and would not compound someone's suffering by telling them that it was all their own fault because they did something wrong in a past life, we have no disagreement over speech or behaviour.

Kim

Malcolm wrote:

If you wish to understand how karma is understood in Tibetan Buddhism, read chapter four of the Abhidharmakoshaśāstra.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 6th, 2015 at 4:42 AM

Title: Re: Buddhism's view on developmental disabilities

Content:

Fruitzilla said:

Maybe a reason life-to-life karma is often portrayed as non-linearly in the suttas.

Malcolm wrote:

Karma is not presented nonlinearly in the suttas. The effects of karma do not dissipate until they ripen.

There are various factors which indicate whether a given karma will ripen in this life, or another, or are long delayed (such as karmas of a being in the rupadhātu created in the kama-dhātu which cannot ripen in the rūpadhātu and so on).

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 6th, 2015 at 4:38 AM

Title: Re: Buddhism's view on developmental disabilities

Content:

Lazy_eye said:

The point is that the statement in question is (from POV of the nikayas) a misinterpretation

Malcolm wrote:

No, it is not a "misinterpretation", it is an understanding that is found in the sutra I cited for you.

Lazy_eye said:

-

It simply doesn't stand up to scrutiny. Our present lives are not necessarily a reliable indicator of our subsequent lives;

Malcolm wrote:

It is a pretty good indicator. The happiness we are experiencing in this life is a result of positive karma we did in the past; the suffering, the result of negative karma. Likewise, the positive karma we cultivate in this life will bear fruit as happiness in future lives; the negative karma, as suffering. It is unerring.

Lazy_eye said:

we could be living non-virtuously yet still find ourselves reborn in a happy destination because the negative kamma hasn't ripened yet, or because there is some positive kamma that continues to exert influence.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, as everyone who has bother to study the subject in detail knows.

Lazy_eye said:

A person might accrue heavy "death-proximate" kamma at the very end of a virtuous life, with the vipaka manifesting in the next. You just don't know.

Malcolm wrote:

Such a person would be a fool, and obviously not know the difference between cultivating positive karma and avoiding negative karma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 6th, 2015 at 2:47 AM

Title: Re: Buddhism's view on developmental disabilities

Content:

Lazy_eye said:

Wrong sutta, buddy. I was referring to the <http://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/mn/mn.136.nymo.html>. You are quoting from the <http://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/mn/mn.135.nymo.html>

As the titles suggest, the Maha presents a fuller exposition of the subject:

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, I am aware of that fact. The point is that the statement you are criticizing is justified on the basis of the words of the Buddha from a sutra you accept as valid. Just admit it, and move on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 6th, 2015 at 1:08 AM

Title: Re: Buddhism's view on developmental disabilities

Content:

Lazy_eye said:

The debate is not between "Buddhists" and "materialists." As Zhen Li and others have shown in their posts, a strongly deterministic view of karma is at odds with the nikayas. The statement "if you want to know your past life, look at your present circumstances, if you want to know what your future life will be, look at your present life" directly contradicts the <http://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/mn/mn.136.nymo.html>.

Malcolm wrote:

No, in fact it does not:

2. "Master Gotama, what is the reason, what is the condition, why inferiority and superiority are met with among human beings, among mankind? For one meets with short-lived and long-lived people, sick and healthy people, ugly and beautiful people, insignificant and influential people, poor and rich people, low-born and high-born people, stupid and wise people. What is the reason, what is the condition, why superiority and inferiority are met with among human beings, among mankind?"

3. "Student, beings are owners of karmas, heirs of karmas, they have karmas as their progenitor, karmas as their kin, karmas as their homing-place. It is karmas that differentiate beings according to inferiority and superiority."

And:

"Here, student, some woman or man is one who harms beings with his hands or with clods or with sticks or with knives. Due to having performed and completed such karmas, on the dissolution of the body, after death, he reappears in a state of deprivation... If instead he comes to the human state, he is sickly wherever he is reborn. This is the way that leads to sickness, that is to say, to be one who harms beings with one's hands or with clods or with sticks or with knives.

<http://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/mn/mn.135.nymo.html>

This is exactly the intent of the statement, "if you want to know your past life, look at your present circumstances, if you want to know what your future life will be, look at your present life."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 4th, 2015 at 8:30 PM

Title: Re: Buddhism's view on developmental disabilities

Content:

Sherlock said:

Genetic or developmental defects are negative karma ripening.

Really, what is so objectionable about this idea?

Sherab Dorje said:

To a Buddhist it is not objectionable. To a materialist on the other hand...

Kim O'Hara said:

What worries me about it, as one who tries to be compassionate, is how people may act as a result of believing that developmental disabilities are the result of negative karma.

To say that X deserves his/her disability and therefore shouldn't receive any special consideration or help is a failure of compassion.

"That's his/her karma and s/he just has to deal with it."

Does that sound at all familiar?

I've heard similar things far too often.

Malcolm wrote:

It's a statement of fact, we are all owners of our own karma.

Kim O'Hara said:

...the person in front of me is a suffering human being and the only response I can justify is compassion.

Malcolm wrote:

Ants are also worthy of compassion, they also are bearers of their own karma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 3rd, 2015 at 7:24 AM

Title: Re: Buddhism's view on developmental disabilities

Content:

Arjan Dirkse said:

For me karma is a word for cause and effect, nothing more, nothing less.

Disease or developmental disabilities do not have some misdeed from a previous life as their cause, the cause is in most cases just a genetic or developmental defect, or just bad luck (although there are conditions like lung cancer or obesity which can be caused by the actions of the patient). To link all ailments with some kind of "sin" is toxic and irrational. I wish Buddhism would be rid of it.

Malcolm wrote:

The words for cause and effect are hetu and phala.

Vipaka however is a very specific kind of effect of a very specific kind of cause, namely "karma", which is in fact a positive, negative and neutral volition with corresponding positive, negative and neutral results (vipaka) in this life or some future lifetime which does not dissipate until it meets its cause for ripening, or someone attains liberation, whichever comes first.

If Buddhism were to jettison the teachings of the Buddha because someone finds this or that teaching of the Buddhas uncomfortable, dissatisfactory or not to their liking, it would no longer be "Buddhism" but would become something else instead.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 3rd, 2015 at 12:57 AM

Title: Re: Buddhism's view on developmental disabilities

Content:

Fruitzilla said:

For example, I've come across the idea that karma is the cause of all observable phenomena in the universe multiple times.

Malcolm wrote:

In general we hold to the simple principle that the present universe and everything in it down to the smallest observable particle arose as a result of the combined karma of all the sentient beings it contains.

The variety of the world comes from karma

-- Vasubandhu.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 2nd, 2015 at 11:55 AM

Title: Re: Buddhism's view on developmental disabilities

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

...giving what is beneficial [lit. medicinal]... Those ten factors result in many illnesses, this karma results in many illnesses.

xabir said:

Sorry I'm confused here. Why is giving what is beneficial a karma resulting in many illnesses?

Malcolm wrote:

It was a typo, should be "not beneficial".

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 1st, 2015 at 10:16 PM

Title: Re: Buddhism's view on developmental disabilities

Content:

Lazy_eye said:

Seems to me that any statement to the effect that "this disability was caused by non-virtuous conduct" (or other specific cause) clearly represents an attempt to delineate the precise workings of kamma, something only a Buddha would know.

Malcolm wrote:

The Karmavibhanga states:

Brahmin child, there is karma that results in a short life. There is karma that results in a long life. There is karma that results in many illnesses. There is karma that results in few illnesses. There is karma that results in an unattractiveness of complexion. There is karma that results in beauty.

There are many such teachings where the Buddha indicates that karma is involved in directly involved in illnesses, some we would term "genetic" illnesses. The Buddha continues:

In that respect, if it is asked what are the karmas resulting in many illnesses, there are ten factors that result in many illnesses: striking out with fists and palms etc.; believing it is proper to strike out with fists, palms, etc.; praising striking out with fists and palms, etc.; inflicting pain on one's father or mother; inflicting pain on an ārya; being happy when an enemy is afflicted with illness; being unhappy when an enemy recovers from an illness; giving what is beneficial [lit. medicinal], eating food without permission to eat. Those ten factors result in many illnesses, this karma results in many illnesses. Therefore, we can see from this that martial artists should be very careful.

Anyway, there are numerous statements by the Buddha about karma being the cause of physical defects and illness. You can accept this or not.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 1st, 2015 at 9:42 PM

Title: Re: Buddhism's view on developmental disabilities

Content:

Zhen Li said:

Actually, the Buddha argued that it is well known by the world that there are simply biological causes for some things.

It is an incorrect view to hold everything to be the result of karma. Only in a round about metaphorical way can you say everything is a result of karma. Now we don't rely upon theories of bile, but the principle of a biological (non-intentional) cause for diseases is the same.

Sivaka Sutta said:

There are cases where some feelings arise based on bile [i.e., diseases and pains that come from a malfunction of the gall bladder]. You yourself should know how some feelings arise based on bile. Even the world is agreed on how some feelings arise based on bile. So any brahmins & contemplatives who are of the doctrine & view that whatever an individual feels — pleasure, pain, neither-pleasure-nor-pain — is entirely caused by what was done before — slip past what they themselves know, slip past what is agreed on by the world. Therefore I say that those brahmins & contemplatives are wrong. ...

Bile, phlegm, wind, a combination,
Season, uneven, harsh treatment, and through the result of kamma as the eighth.

Malcolm wrote:

And the cause of vata, pitta and kapha respectively are rāga, dveṣa and moha. Therefore, the indirect causes of all disease are the three afflictions. Also the three doṣas in turn are the condition for the arising of three kleśas.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 30th, 2014 at 3:13 AM

Title: Re: Lojong: A Vajrayana Practice

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The seven points of mind training require Guru Yoga as a preliminary, etc. The instructions generally assume that one is practitioner of Secret Mantra.

Johnny Dangerous said:

I didn't realize this. I see Lojong taught at what seems to be a sutra level of instruction though..isn't that also the case?

Malcolm wrote:

Well, take this from Gyalsey Thogme's famed commentary of the seven points of mind training:

First, the preparation: having started with going for refuge and generating bodhicitta, offer supplications to one's deity and Guru...

And:

The supreme method is endowed with four yogas.

First, the yoga of gathering accumulations is when suffering arises for oneself: if suffering arises for oneself, since the thought arises "I will be glad if this suffering does not exist", at that time if you do not wish suffering and wish for happiness, think "This is a sign of breaking the cause of merit." One must make offerings to the three jewels, praise the Sangha, offer tormas to elemental spirits, and so on, in brief, having made an effort to gather accumulations through the three doors of body, speech and mind, go for refuge and create bodhicitta, offering mandalas to the Guru and the Three Jewels and so with fervor.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 30th, 2014 at 12:10 AM

Title: Re: Is Dzogchen only accidentally Buddhist?

Content:

Saoshun said:

Shunyata concept I think is before buddhism.

Malcolm wrote:

No.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, December 29th, 2014 at 10:42 PM

Title: Re: Lojong: A Vajrayana Practice

Content:

Jikan said:

If so, then what to make of Norman Fischer's approach to lojong?

<http://www.shambhala.com/training-in-compassion.html>

or rather, more generally, the penetration of this practice outside of a Vajrayana context?
Is it still the same practice, or...?

Malcolm wrote:

As with everything, it is more effective when it is combined with guru yoga and so, the experience arise more rapidly and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, December 29th, 2014 at 3:17 AM

Title: Re: "Did Machik Really Teach Chod?" by Sarah Harding

Content:

sherabpa said:

blo sbyong is actually mixed with Vajrayāna.

Interesting claim; there are arguably some vajrayana affinities in the 7 points of mind training with vajrayana, but apart from that, I don't see anything in Geshe Langthang's lojong or the Sakya Parting from the Four Attachments. Even in the don bdun ma, there is no initiation or anything of that nature. Could you elaborate?

Malcolm wrote:

The seven points of mind training require Guru Yoga as a preliminary, etc. The instructions generally assume that one is practitioner of Secret Mantra.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 28th, 2014 at 10:14 PM

Title: Re: Karma Fruit of Worldwide Abortions

Content:

Dan74 said:

This discussion may be of interest too, seeing that it takes a more compassion and less rigid position than many of the posts here seem to imply:

....

But then again, it may be more satisfying to just stick to our soapboxes...

Malcolm wrote:

First we have to decide whether abortion is himsa or ahimsa. Abortion can hardly be called ahimsa, can it? In fact abortion is the deliberate harming of one sentient being by another, in this case the harming of a child by its mother.

Every sentient is deserving of the same level of compassion no matter what they have done or what class of sentient being they are.

On the other hand, Mahāyāna ethics are more important than rigid adherence to the letter of a vow. But to undertake an action on the basis of Mahāyāna ethics, self-interest has to be absolutely absent from one's thinking.

Because abortion is himsa, harming a sentient being, it cannot be condoned by those who follow Buddhadharma in general. On the other hand, there are always special cases where there may be greater harm in prohibiting an abortion than permitting one, such as examples of severe birth defects, threat to the life of the mother and so on, impregnation through rape, incest, and so on.

So, in general, the position of Buddhadharma is that abortion is harming another sentient being as well as taking life. In general it is not only a serious breach of pratimokṣa vows to have an abortion or to encourage someone to have an abortion (and in the case of monk, results in a defeat), but it is also serious bodhisattva downfall to either have an abortion or to encourage someone to have an abortion apart from special instances.

On the other hand, there is the political fact of separation of church and state, which is necessary in any functional so-called "democracy". Though as a follower of Buddhadharma, I am personally opposed to abortion, I am also opposed to legislating religious doctrines into law. So it is something I leave to the courts and legislature to decide as a matter of social policy.

And finally, just because we followers of Buddhadharma are opposed to abortion in a general way does not mean we should adopt the angry and confrontational rhetoric of the "pro-life" movement. We should have compassion for everyone, since that's what we Mahayanis aim to do, i.e have impartial compassion for all sentient beings.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 28th, 2014 at 9:06 PM

Title: Re: Karma Fruit of Worldwide Abortions

Content:

Berry said:

So are you saying that if I sympathise with another woman having an abortion after she was beaten and raped by someone who murdered her parents, that I will "bear the karma of all the abortions that have ever been performed during their lifetime, and this leads them to have shortened lives, and so on " i.e. my lifetime ?

Malcolm wrote:

Sympathizing with someone for being raped and beaten is one thing. Taking a human life is another. If you approve of an abortion in only a special case, than you only bear the karma of that special case, and in this case it is also a weak karma, since it will likely be attended with regret and so, which prevents it from being a perfect karma.

Berry said:

That appears to be rather a mistaken and speculative viewpoint when reading what the Buddha had to say in this sutta which was already mentioned earlier in the topic:

Malcolm wrote:

The workings of karma are explained in many sutras.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 27th, 2014 at 10:13 PM

Title: Re: Trekchod

Content:

Saoshun said:

Can someone make hierarchy or list of trekchod practices?

Malcolm wrote:

There is only one practice, the four cho zhags.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 27th, 2014 at 9:59 PM

Title: Re: Recognising reincarnations

Content:

kirtu said:

In general only high lamas give empowerments in Sakya. However I know of one Sakya khenpo in the US who is not the head of a lineage who does in fact give empowerments as well as a Sakya lama (a khenpo) in Europe who also gives empowerments. But basically in Sakya almost all the time only high lamas (basically certain members of the Khon family or lineage heads of the Ngor or Tsar lineages) give empowerments. In other words Sakya khenpos do not generally give empowerments.

Malcolm wrote:

And one should remember that the khenpos of Ngor are all from four traditional families, Luding, Thartse, Phande and one other whose name escapes me. Lama Kunga from SF is from the Thartse branch.

The khenpos of Tshar lineage also usually do give empowerments, but then there is also the Chogye Trichen incarnations as well as the Zimwok incarnations.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 27th, 2014 at 9:49 PM

Title: Lojong: A Vajrayana Practice

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

I've even read Mahayana Lojong trainings - a number of em in fact...which involve visualization of sectioning one's body, turning it into Nectar etc...It seems to be common enough. One in particular I can remember is in the context of Tonglen, but the visualization is not so far off from Chod or the Kusulis accumulation near as I can remember, just with no yidam involved.

Malcolm wrote:

blo sbyong is actually mixed with Vajrayāna.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 27th, 2014 at 8:02 AM

Title: Re: "Did Machik Really Teach Chod?" by Sarah Harding

Content:

conebeckham said:

there's no contradiction here between the question she poses and the genuine

"authenticity" of the Lujin practice.

Jikan said:

Agreed completely, and I hope I didn't imply otherwise in my posts in this thread.

Malcolm wrote:

You are all forgetting that so called lus sbyin, aka kusuli accumulation offering, has its roots in the Hevajra Tantra:

Having given the gift of the body afterwards begin conduct.

The practice was already widespread. Machilk's tradition merely "Tibetanized" it with nice melodies and a big drum.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 27th, 2014 at 12:03 AM

Title: Re: Karma Fruit of Worldwide Abortions

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

For all?

Malcolm wrote:

I didn't say that. What I am pointing out is that fact that everyone who agrees with abortion and supports it bears the karma of all the abortions that have ever been performed during their lifetime, and this leads them to have shortened lives, and so on. I don't think it is a very strong karma, honestly, because most people have sincere regrets about it, and very few people feel satisfaction from the action.

But if you are opposed to abortion, then you are free from this consequence, even weak ones.

Collective ripening only befalls those who have engaged in similar actions.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 26th, 2014 at 9:57 PM

Title: Re: Karma Fruit of Worldwide Abortions

Content:

Will said:

Kim, Most parts of the buddhadharma I know nothing about, so I am hoping that some deep practitioner will know of some guru or teaching that goes beyond Vasubandhu's mainly individual understanding.

Malcolm wrote:

Vasubandhu does describe collective karma in two ways, one he mentions the example of a soldier. If a group of one hundred soldiers kills a person, everyone on is that group bears the weight of the action times the number of people who participated in it, or even approved of it.

Secondly, an example of collective karma is our world. It came about because we all have similar actions, leading to not only the formation of this world, but our birth upon it.

"The variety of the world comes from action."

Thus, the action of killing, abortion being killing, leads to shortened lives, etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 23rd, 2014 at 9:42 PM

Title: Re: Dakini question

Content:

drodul said:

To which Buddha family does Sengdongma, the Lion-faced Dakini, belong?

Malcolm wrote:

Akṣobhya family.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 20th, 2014 at 10:15 PM

Title: Re: Frugal living

Content:

Tenso said:

Many people here as Buddhists will agree that living a frugal life is the way to go. The thing is that there are many people who spend their entire lives being frugal and end up being very miserable in old age, then they say they could of done this or that in their younger days.

My question is, is it better to have a steady work life and being able to do things one will enjoy or is it better to be a frugal cheap Buddhist who has never worked much in their lives and end up being unsatisfied wishing they could of made more money allowing them to enjoy their lives more? Not talking about having enough money to afford material possessions but having enough to travel the world, experience new and different things etc.

Malcolm wrote:

The Buddha himself does not recommend this for lay people. Quite the opposite, he encouraged lay people to work hard and be prosperous. A wealthy lay Sangha is a Sangha that can support the Dharma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 20th, 2014 at 3:09 AM

Title: Re: the lesser yogi and the greater yogi

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The term "non-abiding nirvana" does not exist in sūtras, true, but it is a concept used to explain how nirvana explained in Mahāyāna sutras is different than Hinayāna nirvana.

...

Which I showed exists in the sutras such as the Lotus and so on, not merely in the Maitreyan corpus.

Astus said:

The term is not in the early sutras and it is used in Yogacara works to explain the state of the buddhas. That is, before Asanga there was no such explanation for what the sutras contain, and the sutras themselves don't actually specify.

Malcolm wrote:

Of course they do.

Astus said:

The criticism of Hinayanist nirvana-as-total-cessation is present in Mahāyāna everywhere.

Yes. And the idea of total cessation is rejected even in the Nikayas, not only in Mahayana sutras. It is actually among the set of questions not answered by the Buddha.

Malcolm wrote:

Nevertheless, it is prevalent in many śrāvaka texts. The criticism leveled by Mahāyāna are not the words of the Buddha, but rather the teachings and understanding of his śrāvaka disciples. Please understand this distinction.

Astus said:

Since when were Buddhas ever inactive in Mahāyāna?

They do talk of parinirvana, and what people should do after the Buddha's demise, how stupas should be revered, etc. What sutras do you know that discuss the buddhas activities after their parinirvana? Besides the Lotus Sutra that does not actually say that as mentioned above already.

Malcolm wrote:

The Lankāvatara, for example, which clear indicates that the actual Buddha is the sambhogakāya, and the nirmanakāya appears here just for show.

Astus said:

This is not what happened at all. No matter which Mahāyāna path one follows, one still has to gather the two accumulations via the bodhisattva path.

I see a significant difference between ideas that one should stay a bodhisattva indefinitely and that one can reach buddhahood even in this life. I don't see early Mahayana sutras emphasising that one should become a buddha, rather they talk about being a proper non-returning bodhisattva, someone who realises that there is actually nothing to attain, thus could become a buddha any time but chooses not to. Such a choice is nonsense if a buddha is simply a better bodhisattva.

Malcolm wrote:

[/quote]

Bodhisattvas vow to become Buddhas to teach others. That is the best way to assist sentient beings. To do that, they embark on a career that lasts eons in order to gather the merit and wisdom necessary to do this. This is all detailed very explicitly in the Ratnavali, chapter three.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 20th, 2014 at 2:56 AM

Title: Re: the lesser yogi and the greater yogi

Content:

Dan74 said:

As I recall the great spat between yourself and several Zen teachers at E-Sangha came about initially due to their position on non-permanent nirvana, on nirvana as an extreme, are you now upholding the view you were previously fighting against? Or have I misunderstood?

Malcolm wrote:

You misunderstood. They were talking about a temporary nirvana.

And that is not what the argument was about, actually. The argument was "are Zen priests the equivalent of bhikṣus?" The reason is that Zen priests seem to feel they are entitled to all the privileges and recognitions to which a bhikṣu is entitled. My point of view was and is that they are lay bodhisattvas.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 18th, 2014 at 3:05 AM

Title: Re: the lesser yogi and the greater yogi

Content:

Mkoll said:

Essentially, to answer the question posed by the OP in the subject of the first post, the Mahayana opinion of Theravada is that it is not the complete teaching of the Buddha.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, this point of view is stated quite unequivocally by Nāgārjuna in the Ratnavali.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 17th, 2014 at 10:04 PM

Title: Re: the lesser yogi and the greater yogi

Content:

TRC said:

However, the interesting point of why Sariputra is the butt of the joke here is actually based on a misapprehension, and this is the misunderstanding that Sariputra was the author of the Abhidharma, in which the Heart Sutra is clearly critiquing. Of course the Abhidharma was a later addition and not reflective of the early suttas and at times quite at odds with them (dharma's having substantial existence, etc). So this again is an example how prejudices can become reinforced over time and then become as if fact, based on misapprehensions.

Malcolm wrote:

In the Sarvastivāda, the dominant intellectual tradition in Indian Buddhism, Śariputra is indeed the author of some of the seven seminal Abhidharma texts.

Again, in the Mahāyāna sūtra, the Buddha indicates that he did not teach everything fully, not that what he taught in those śrāvaka sūtras was false.

TRC said:

As you correctly point out LastLegend, "of course Sariputra understood", there is no doubt. However, others studying the Heart Sutra obviously read this misunderstanding into it, as we can see here by Malcolm's response.

Malcolm wrote:

Are you familiar with the Vimalakīrti Nirdeśa sūtra? If so, you should be really offended, since you seem to enjoy taking offense at Mahāyāna.

TRC said:

While we are on the subject of the heart Sutra, who is considered to be the author?

Malcolm wrote:

Why, the Buddha, of course. It is through his entering samadhi that Avalokiteśvara was empowered to speak on his behalf.

TRC said:

Also, I'm still waiting a sound rebuttal explaining how the Kaccayanagotta Sutta is not directly pointing to the emptiness of all phenomena, that practitioners of early Buddhism aren't supposed to be able to realise.

Malcolm wrote:

It is a teaching on dependent origination, not directly about emptiness. And since the dependent origination being discussed is the dependent origination of a person's continuum, explicitly it only concerns the selflessness of persons and not the selflessness of phenomena. It primarily concerns the notion of the permanence or annihilation of the self, two extremes the world is addicted to. This is why the preface to the famous passage states:

By & large, Kaccayana, this world is in bondage to attachments, clingings (sustenances), & biases. But one such as this does not get involved with or cling to these attachments, clingings, fixations of awareness, biases, or obsessions; nor is he resolved on 'my self.' He has no uncertainty or doubt that just stress, when arising, is arising; stress, when passing away, is passing away. In this, his knowledge is independent of others. It's to this extent, Kaccayana, that there is right view.

In fact the passage is cited by Nāgārjuna in the chapter 15 of the MMK, his take down of Sarvastivāda substantialism, the notion that underneath appearances there is a prakṛiti, an unchanging nature which never changes, leading to the doctrine that all effects exist in their causes because of their misunderstanding of the Buddha's statement "everything exists in the three times."

The idea that this passage points to the heart of Madhyamaka is an idea advanced primarily by David Kalupahana. But we have very good reason to disregard Kalupahana's understanding because he completely disregarded Buddhapaṇita and Candarakīrti's identification of which passages were stated by the opponent and which passages were to be considered Nāgārjuna's.

This passage is cited by Nāgārjuna because it cannot be rejected by his śrāvaka opponents, not because it is an end all be all statement that is the heart of Madhyamaka. There are many more salient passages in Mahāyāna sūtras which are much more explicit than this passage detailing the "middle way." He cites it because both schools hold it to be the Buddhavaśana, and that is all.

In my opinion, your view of the the śrāvaka canon has been completely influenced by Madhyamaka [this is very common these days, since the Pali commentarial literature totally lacks any discussions of profound emptiness]. It is a pity you don't recognize that your own understanding of the śrāvaka canon actually comes from Mahāyāna.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 17th, 2014 at 9:31 PM

Title: Re: the lesser yogi and the greater yogi

Content:

TRC said:

Still perpetuating the myth I see. Firstly though, you still have not addressed the quote from the Heart Sutra that refers specifically to the aggregates and consequently the falsehood it depicts of an arahant's realisation. Secondly, as has already been quoted by a more balanced Mahayana practitioner in this thread, it is quite evident that emptiness of all phenomena is penetrated and understood in the early discourses. In fact it goes to heart of the Madhyamika view, that of the middle way between existence and non-existence.

Malcolm wrote:

The Buddha's teachings are one thing, what śrāvakas realize is another.

TRC said:

So here it is again:

"By & large, Kaccayana, this world is supported by (takes as its object) a polarity, that of existence & non-existence. But when one sees the origination of the world as it actually is with right discernment, 'non-existence' with reference to the world does not occur to one. When one sees the cessation of the world as it actually is with right discernment, 'existence' with reference to the world does not occur to one."

See, this is pointing directly to all phenomena ("the world") as empty. It's extremely explicit, it doesn't come more direct!

Malcolm wrote:

This was addressed already by a previous citation of the Buddha:

Mahāmati, also others rouse a mind that wishes for nirvana having perceived that all things depend on a cause. However, Mahāmati, because they do not perceive the selflessness in phenomena [for them] there is no freedom.

TRC said:

And here is the Buddha now pointing directly to his doctrine (not Nagarjuna's – his MMK was a commentary on the Buddha's already established understanding of emptiness) on which he's realisation of the middle way is founded on, which is of course no less than dependent arising.

Malcolm wrote:

No one is questioning the Buddha's realization.

TRC said:

So from the same <http://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn12/sn12.015.than.html> we have:

"'Everything exists': That is one extreme. 'Everything doesn't exist': That is a second extreme. Avoiding these two extremes, the Tathagata teaches the Dhamma via the middle: From ignorance as a requisite condition come fabrications. From fabrications as a requisite condition comes consciousness. From consciousness as a requisite condition comes name-&-form. From name-&-form as a requisite condition come the six sense media. From the six sense media as a requisite condition comes contact. From contact as a requisite condition comes feeling ..."

Malcolm wrote:

Again:

Mahāmati, also others rouse a mind that wishes for nirvana having perceived that all things depend on a cause. However, Mahāmati, because they do not perceive the selflessness in phenomena [for them] there is no freedom.

TRC said:

So basically who cares about the commentarial texts when you have a good grasp of the early discourses? It's all there (well for those who want to see at least), why would you rely on second-hand interpretations?

Malcolm wrote:

It is clear that the śrāvakas did not understand selflessness of phenomena from Buddha's teachings in the Nikayas/Agamas.

TRC said:

Also, you still haven't addressed whether Zhiyi goes on to warn of getting stuck on the seventh bhumi, nirvana. Perhaps you don't know?

Malcolm wrote:

I have not read the text in question. I generally confine myself to studying Indian texts and their Tibetan commentaries.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 17th, 2014 at 10:53 AM

Title: Re: the lesser yogi and the greater yogi

Content:

TRC said:

Now you mention the Prajñāpāramitas. It seems to me, at least from my reading of the Heart Sutra, that it has a very fundamental and gross misinterpretation and misrepresentation of the awakening of the arahant. That is, it is evident that Avalokiteśvara proceeds to lecture Sariputra on the emptiness of the aggregates.

Malcolm wrote:

I assume you are referring to the various statements in Mahayāna that śrāvakas do not realize emptiness of phenomena. Indeed, the Buddha states in the Lankāvatara sūtra: Mahāmati, also others rouse a mind that wishes for nirvana having perceived that all things depend on a cause. However, Mahāmati, because they do not perceive the selflessness in phenomena [for them] there is no freedom.

And:

Mahāmati, because liberation has a single taste, the abandonment of the obscuration of affliction of pratyekabuddhas and śrāvakas might not be a difference, but they do not abandon the knowledge obscuration. The knowledge obscuration is purified through the difference of seeing the selflessness in phenomena.

Now then, on the other hand, the Buddha is not at fault here, because as Candrakīrti famously states in his auto-commentary on the Madhyamakāvatara:

Someone might think, "If the selflessness of phenomena is taught in śrāvakayāna, the teaching of Mahāyāna would be pointless." That line of thought should be understood to contradict reason and citation. The selflessness in phenomena is not the only Mahāyana teaching. If it is asked why, there are the bodhisattva stages, the perfections, aspirations, great compassion and so on, as well complete dedication, the two accumulations and the dharmatā of inconceivability, As it is said in the Ratnavali:

The aspirations of bodhicitta and the total dedication of practice is not explained in the śrāvakayāna, so where will bodhisattvas [be explained]?
The topic of the bodhisattva practice are not explained in [their] sūtras, but are explained in the Mahāyāna sūtras.
Therefore, they are upheld by the wise.

In order to clarify the selflessness of phenomena it is also reasonable that it is a teaching of Mahāyāna because it is held that it is extensively explained. The selflessness of phenomena is only briefly indicated in the śrāvakayāna. As the Ācārya said:

You have said that there is no freedom without realizing signlessness; therefore, you have taught that fully in the Mahāyāna.

One can object, "But Candrakīrti says the selflessness in phenomena is taught the śrāvaka canon." Indeed he does say this, but I must point out that not even the names "selfness of persons" and "selflessness of phenomena" are ever heard in śrāvakayāna commentarial texts. Who has ever heard of something that can be understood without it being given a name? The fact that these two emptinesses are not identified in the commentarial literature of the śrāvaka canon is sufficient evidence to show that even the idea of two-fold emptiness is completely foreign to their understanding of Dharma. If they cannot even name it, how can they realize it? It is like assuming that someone will arrive at a destination they have never heard of, which is not on any map, and has no identifying features, and to which they have no intent to go — in short, even if they arrive in such a place they will not recognize it as a destination at all and will continue to move on since they are not looking for such a place to begin with.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 17th, 2014 at 8:21 AM

Title: Re: the lesser yogi and the greater yogi

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Very simply put, Mahāyāna regards nirvana as an extreme to be avoided.

TRC said:

So nirvana is an extreme to be avoided? Why would Zhiyi be saying this then:

“As for the dharma of nirvāṇa, there are many paths of entry into it.
However, if we discuss those which are crucially essential, they do not go beyond the two dharmas of calming and insight.”

Meditation Essentials by Kalavinka Press

Going by this and other conflicting and self-contradicting opinions I’ve read, it seems to me Mahayana doesn’t really have a clear position about nirvana, and yet here it is dispensing its ill-informed definitions of what the Buddha described as nirvana in the early discourses.

Malcolm wrote:

Nirvana is something to be attained, in the sense that of course all afflictions should be ultimately eradicated (this occurs at the seventh bhumi), it is however not a state in which a bodhisattva should remain, and thus it is also an extreme to be avoided, as the Buddha points out in the Prajñāpāramita sutras and as Asanga also points out in the Mahāyānasamgraha. The Ārya-mahābherihārakapariivarta-nāma-mahāyāna-sūtra states:

"Kāśyapa, apart from the present intentional words are "parinivana of the tathāgata", the tathāgata is permanent, stable, peaceful, eternal and is not annihilated even in parinirvana...though to some he shows the parinirvana he is not annihilated."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 17th, 2014 at 6:58 AM

Title: Re: the lesser yogi and the greater yogi

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Very simply put, Mahāyāna regards nirvana as an extreme to be avoided. Thus the way nirvana is explained by the Buddha in Mahāyāna is markedly different than the way he explained it to śravakas. Therefore, the nirvana explained in Mahāyāna sutras, an extreme to be avoided, is different than the nirvana explained in the Agamas and Nikāyas, where it is presented as the ultimate desiderata.

Dan74 said:

I've never come across Nirvana described as 'an extreme to be avoided', Malcolm. Could you share some relevant sutra quotes please?

Malcolm wrote:

Āryaṣṭadaśasahasrika-prajñāpāramitā-nāma-mahāyāna-sūtra:

...and never remain in either samsara or nirvana

Asanga remarks in the Mahāyānasamgraha.

"Totally abandoning the conceptuality of a bodhisattva who has not seen the truth, totally abandoning both extremes of samsara and nirvana, totally abandoning the apprehension that it is sufficient merely to abandon the obscuration of affliction..."

Dan74 said:

I remember the sravaka's or arahat's attainments described in these terms, as ultimate quiescence and not the true Nirvana, but the issue here AFAICT is

1. do these descriptions accurately represent the Theravada or Pali Canon position?
2. is this the description of Mahayana Nirvana or is there another notion of Nirvana in the Mahayana?

Malcolm wrote:

It is, when a Buddha experiences parinirvana, according to that Hinayāna schools, that's it for Buddha.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 17th, 2014 at 2:16 AM

Title: Re: How do defilements etc originate from primordial purity

Content:

jules said:

ok so the question would then be how does the non-recognition come about from pure awareness?

Malcolm wrote:

Initially this awareness is not self-aware. This is all very carefully explained in the explanation of the basis in Dzogchen. But you need to learn this from a teacher in the proper way.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 17th, 2014 at 1:26 AM

Title: Re: How do defilements etc originate from primordial purity

Content:

jules said:

how do ignorance, defilments, adventitious stains, bad karma etc arise from primordial purity. it seems illogical.

Malcolm wrote:

It is fairly straightforward and logical — though the mind is primordially pure, when it does not recognize it's own primordial purity it becomes entrapped in duality of self and other, and then the afflictions, karma and so on ensue.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 16th, 2014 at 11:44 PM

Title: Re: the lesser yogi and the greater yogi

Content:

TRC said:

Very simply put, Mahāyāna regards nirvana as an extreme to be avoided. Thus the way nirvana is explained by the Buddha in Mahāyāna is markedly different than the way he explained it to śrāvakas. Therefore, the nirvana explained in Mahāyāna sutras, an extreme to be avoided, is different than the nirvana explained in the Agamas and Nikāyas, where it is presented as the ultimate desiderata.

Clarence said:

Are there any other differences between Mahayana and Shrivakayana in how they view Nirvana besides whether or not it is a desirable result? Do their definitions of Nirvana differ or just the way they view "it"?

Malcolm wrote:

Differing definitions of Nirvana exist among various śrāvaka schools, as well as between Mahāyāna and śrāvakas in general. Madhyamaka, for example, maintains that nirvana is emptiness.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 16th, 2014 at 9:20 PM

Title: Re: the lesser yogi and the greater yogi

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, but you have no proof for this, indeed, no proof that there is an "early" Mahāyāna when it comes to sūtras. The term "non-abiding nirvana" does not exist in sūtras, true, but it is a concept used to explain how nirvana explained in Mahāyāna sutras is different than Hinayāna nirvana.

TRC said:

Here we have nirvana which is beyond all concepts and you're dividing it up into the nirvana of Hinayana and the nirvana of Mahayana. For real ... dividing up the indivisible? Do you not see the absurdity of this line of reasoning in regards to Dharma?

Malcolm wrote:

Very simply put, Mahāyāna regards nirvana as an extreme to be avoided. Thus the way nirvana is explained by the Buddha in Mahāyāna is markedly different than the way he explained it to śrāvakas. Therefore, the nirvana explained in Mahāyāna sutras, an extreme to be avoided, is different than the nirvana explained in the Agamas and Nikāyas, where it is presented as the ultimate desiderata.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 16th, 2014 at 2:49 AM

Title: Re: the lesser yogi and the greater yogi

Content:

Astus said:

Where this discussion has started was that I have stated that early Mahayana favoured staying a bodhisattva

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, but you have no proof for this, indeed, no proof that there is an "early" Mahāyāna when it comes to sūtras. The term "non-abiding nirvana" does not exist in sūtras, true, but it is a concept used to explain how nirvana explained in Mahāyāna sutras is different than Hinayāna nirvana.

Astus said:

and one of the reasons for that was the lack of the concept of non-abiding nirvana of buddhas.

Malcolm wrote:

Which I showed exists in the sutras such as the Lotus and so on, not merely in the Maitreya corpus.

The criticism of Hinayanist nirvana-as-total-cessation is present in Mahāyāna everywhere.

Astus said:

Once buddhas got the same active position as bodhisattvas, the goal has moved to attaining buddhahood.

Malcolm wrote:

Since when were Buddhas ever inactive in Mahāyāna?

Astus said:

Then almost everyone started to regard the bodhisattva path too long and arduous and various means to attain buddhahood swiftly occurred.

Malcolm wrote:

This is not what happened at all. No matter which Mahāyāna path one follows, one still has to gather the two accumulations via the bodhisattva path.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, December 15th, 2014 at 10:14 PM

Title: Re: the lesser yogi and the greater yogi

Content:

Astus said:

So, the chapter actually tells us that on the one hand the Buddha eternally abides in no birth, that is the ultimate reality that can be seen by anyone who practises correctly. On the other hand, the longevity is the result of the merit from the bodhisattva cultivation that eventually expires. Or, the two sides actually stand for the same, that is, suchness as the Buddha's true nature.

Malcolm wrote:

What is nirvana actually? It is the cessation of afflictions that cause rebirth in the three realms.

Since the merit cultivated on the bodhisattva path is limitless, its effects will be limitless. Or are you saying there is some limit to objectless dedications and so on that is not mentioned in the sūtras.

In short, it is very clear that in Mahāyāna the nirvana enjoyed by the Buddha does not entail the absolute cessation of his continuum. Further, there are the five certainties of the Sambhogakāya, and in terms of the two rūpakāya, the Sambhogakāya is definitive, whereas the nirmanakāya shows up here and there like the illusion of an illusionist.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 14th, 2014 at 9:24 PM

Title: Re: Which Buddhist tradition has treated women the best?

Content:

rory said:

So are any women the heads or hold top positions in either Sakya or Nyingma. I pointed out that in modern Japan there is equal opportunity at the entry running a temple level, but once it comes to top power positions, it's all male.

Malcolm wrote:

HE Jetsun Kusho is the most senior woman in Tibetan Buddhism.

rory said:

H.E. Sakya Jetsun Chimey Luding Rinpoche, the highest and most thoroughly trained female Buddhist teacher in the West, was born into the Drolma Podrang, or Tara Palace of the Sakya Khon family in 1938, the year of the earth tiger. She began her dharma studies at the age of five. His Holiness Sakya Trizin was born when she was six years old. According to the tradition in her family, she took novice ordination when she was "old enough to scare crows away" at the age of seven. When she was ten years old, she made her first retreat. She meditated on the form of Vajrapani known as Bhutadamara, and in one month completed one million recitations of the short mantra, HUM VAJRA PHAT, and one hundred thousand recitations of the long mantra. In her eleventh year, her father, Kunga Rinchen, sent her on her first teaching assignment. She spent the fourth through the tenth Tibetan months among the nomads on the northern plains of Tibet, giving transmissions and teachings on Phowa, or transference of consciousness, as well as conducting tormas offerings, performing lhasang, or incense offerings, and giving other teachings and empowerments. The third woman in the history of Tibet to have transmitted the Lam Dre (the Path and Fruit) teachings, a fully accomplished guru and lineage holder, she is known for her teachings on Vajrayogini and is considered an emanation of that yidam of enlightened feminine energy.

Malcolm wrote:

http://www.sakya-retreat.net/sakya_he.html

There are very few Sakya lineage holders. She is one of them. Her younger brother has two sons, her own son and brother, as well as her brother in law, of her cousin, HH Dagchen Rinpoche, and a couple of the grandchildren are the others.

Of course she has no say or interest in the monastic community, because she is a layperson. She has been acting as a lineage holder in the Sakya school since she was a teenager and gave the Lamdre teachings at Sakya.

The Sakyas have always trained promising young women to be lineage holders. There have been many such women in the history of the Sakya School right down to Drogmi Lotsawa's own disciples in the 11th century.

There is the Shugseb lineage. This is a women's lineage connected with the Longchen Nyinthing once headed by Shugseb Jetsunma:

She was nominally connected with the Drugpa Kagyus, but Shugseb is considered an independent lineage.

rory said:

She founded the Shugseb nunnery, which is South west of Lhasa. There she established a firm body of disciples, lineage of teachings. She also encouraged the women to become ordained and be accomplished and mastered in Dzogchen realization. Her firm and main seat Shugseb and its nuns became a great example for all the female practitioner.

Malcolm wrote:

<http://www.drukpa-nuns.org/index.php/shugseb-jetsun>

There is also Khandro Rinpoche:

rory said:

Her Eminence Mindrolling Jetsün Khandro Rinpoche was born as the eldest daughter of Kyabje Mindrolling Trichen Gyurme Künzang Wangyal, the 11th throne holder of the renowned Mindrolling lineage, one of the six main Nyingma lineages of Tibetan Buddhism. Throughout its history, some of the greatest masters of their time have been born within the Mindrolling lineage including the unique lineage of female masters known as the Jetsünma line, a remarkable Mindrolling tradition.

Malcolm wrote:

<http://www.khandrorinpoche.org/jetsun-khandro-rinpoche/biography/>

There are others too.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 14th, 2014 at 1:58 AM

Title: Re: Mahayana opinions of Theravada?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

"History" is a uniquely western concept.

daverupa said:

Reams of Chinese texts demonstrate the opposite.

It is pretty useless for understanding Buddhadharma.

History is addressed by all who approach the Buddhadharma; there are various approaches to history, however, a text-critical approach being one. The Mahayana approach is different; but, history is not Western, and narratives about the past permeate Mahayana, put to great effect. It is hardly without use here.

Malcolm wrote:

The idea that accounts of the past ineluctably fix facts in time in a material way is based on a uniquely Western point of view. That perspective really is not found in Indian and Tibetan thinking. I can't speak to Chinese culture, but I rather doubt it. Annals are not history, in the way in which we now understand the term and use it. When we say something is "historical", we mean that "it happened just that way."

Text critical approaches don't tell us nearly as much you imagine.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 14th, 2014 at 12:42 AM

Title: Re: Mahayana opinions of Theravada?

Content:

daverupa said:

Instead of seeing texts as historical documents with a context in the spread and development of Buddhism from the historical Buddha, Mahayana takes the texts as factually describing a trans-historical source that encapsulates the historical Buddha within a different context that relativizes history into a broader cosmological scheme.

Malcolm wrote:

"History" is a uniquely western concept. It is pretty useless for understanding Buddhadharma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 14th, 2014 at 12:32 AM

Title: Re: Which Buddhist tradition has treated women the best?

Content:

Tenso said:

My vote for the most pro woman tradition in Buddhism will go to Japanese PL. I'm reminded of the story when Honen encounters a hooker and teaches her the path of nembutsu who then goes on to dedicate her life to it and attains birth. And this was also in ancient samurai Japan when women had zero rights. Is there any other tradition that can beat that?

Malcolm wrote:

Sure, Yeshe Tsogyal being raped by bandits and converting them to Dharma in the process. The number of realized women and women lineage holders in Tibetan Buddhism far outstrips any other tradition.

Loren said:

Nyingma or all the traditions?

Malcolm wrote:

I don't know about Gelug or Kagyu, but there have been many outstanding women masters in both Sakya and Nyingma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 13th, 2014 at 10:55 PM

Title: Re: Which Buddhist tradition has treated women the best?

Content:

Tenso said:

My vote for the most pro woman tradition in Buddhism will go to Japanese PL. I'm reminded of the story when Honen encounters a hooker and teaches her the path of nembutsu who then goes on to dedicate her life to it and attains birth. And this was also in ancient samurai Japan when women had zero rights. Is there any other tradition that can beat that?

Malcolm wrote:

Sure, Yeshe Tsogyal being raped by bandits and converting them to Dharma in the process. The number of realized women and women lineage holders in Tibetan Buddhism far outstrips any other tradition.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 13th, 2014 at 10:11 PM

Title: Re: No one will be turned away

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, I imagine this is because when Khenpo Jigphun came here 1993, he returned to Tibetan with more than $80,000 and some people criticized him heavily for this.

dzogchungpa said:

I find that kind of strange, it's not even that much money. Was he criticized for being overly aggressive in soliciting offerings or what?

Malcolm wrote:

He was criticized for coming here just to raise funds. Khenpo Jigphun wound up being the target of a lot of misplaced jealousy in Tibet.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 13th, 2014 at 10:08 PM

Title: Re: Why is Oral Sex Considered Sexual Misconduct?

Content:

WuMing said:

I think all of the Tibetan Buddhist schools regard oral and anal sex as inappropriate. This goes back to the Indian Buddhist tradition, e.g. the Abhidharmakosha (not entirely sure anymore about that text), or Ashvaghosha and Atisha. In Tibet one finds it in Gampopa's Jewel Ornament of Liberation which is the Kagyu tradition. In Patrul Rinpoche's book Words of my perfect teacher one can find it as well (Nyingma).

The reason might be that having sex using these inappropriate body parts (mouth or the anus) can only come from desire.

Malcolm wrote:

I think it has more to do with hygiene. Tulku Urgyen was once heard to remark "Why would anyone want to put their mouth there?"

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 13th, 2014 at 9:55 PM

Title: Re: Mahayana opinions of Theravada?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Furthermore, if what you say is the case, how do can you reconcile that with the fact that Śakamuni Buddha in fact attained Buddhahood eons and eons ago?

Astus said:

And the Nirvana Sutra has a similar chapter as well on the Buddha's adamant body. I don't see why there is a need for reconciliation. It is one of the first examples of transferring the eternal dharmakaya to an eternally active buddha, although it still says that Shakyamuni never goes extinct (nirvana), that is, it is either this shore or the other.

Malcolm wrote:

However, you grandly claimed a few posts ago that non-abiding nirvana was a "late" development. But we see here that the Buddha taught it. So?

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 13th, 2014 at 3:37 AM

Title: Re: Mahayana opinions of Theravada?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Such teachings as this are the basis for the term "non-abiding nirvana."

Astus said:

No question about that, that from one developed the other. My point is rather that first it was the bodhisattva that was perceived as a being possessing the active force to stay in samsara, while buddhas eventually attained parinirvana, although before that they did teach and were superior to bodhisattvas. The Mahaprajnaparamitasutra says that once a bodhisattva attained irreversibility, he has a choice whether to stay with beings until the end or go for buddhahood. However, if buddhas were superior and could have also stayed with beings, then choosing to remain a bodhisattva is indeed pointless. Nevertheless, Mahayana has a number of such bodhisattvas who intentionally stick around, although interestingly (or logically) some of them are regarded as buddhas in Vajrayana (e.g. Chenrezig and Kuntuzangpo).

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, Astus, I understood your point and dispute that this is the case.

The shift in bodhicittas account for this. Furthermore, if what you say is the case, how do can you reconcile that with the fact that Śakamuni Buddha in fact attained Buddhahood eons and eons ago? Doesn't the Saddharmapundarika say in fact:
Inconceivable tens of billions of eons ago which cannot be measured,
I attained supreme awakening,
and I have also been explaining the Dharma...
I have demonstrated nirvana, describing the method in order to tame sentient beings,
but at that time I never passed into nirvana, but have been teaching Dharma here.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 13th, 2014 at 1:06 AM

Title: Re: Mahayana opinions of Theravada?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

This is a very rash assertion — you are posting the opinion of one modern scholar as a fact when he himself in the very quote you cite is clearly guessing. This exemplifies exactly what is wrong with modern Buddhology.

Astus said:

I don't see how it is incorrect what the quote says. Can you find the term in a PP sutra or early Madhyamaka? Just did a quick search for it (無住涅槃) in the Great PP Sutra (大般若波羅蜜多經) and no match. Then I continued and found the followings (Taisho volume, number of texts): 16 (2), 18 (2), 19 (7), 20 (4), 25 (3), 26 (2), 30 (1), 31 (8), 32 (3), 33 (5), 34 (2), 35 (2), 36 (1), 38 (1), 39 (3), 40 (5), 42 (2), 43 (3), 44 (2), 45 (4), 46 (1), 48 (1). Here's a guide to what the various volumes contain:

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Taish%C5%8D_Tripitaka.

Malcolm wrote:

The term is mentioned in the Mahāyānaprasādaprabhāvana

The Āryaśālistambaka-mahāyānasūtraṭīkā by Nāgārjuna, preserved in the bstan 'gyur mentions it twice.

In any case, let us suppose that the technical term "non-abiding nirvana" is first found in the Maitreyan corpus. It is irrelevant that term is not found Madhyamaka since the treatises of Nāgārjuna are almost wholly focused on faults concerning the view and at this time notion of the Buddha having achieved Buddhahood in the distant past. In the perfection of wisdom sutras and so on the idea of the dharmakāya manifesting an illusory form body to help sentient beings is fully present. For example the PP in 8000 lines states:

The Tathāgata is not seen in the rupakāya. The Tathāgata the dharmatākaya. Son of a good family, dharmatā does not come or go. Son of a good family, likewise, the Tathāgata does not arrive or leave. Son of a good family, for example, an illusionist's host of elephants, horses, chariots or infantry soldiers do not come or go. Son of a good family, in the same way the form of the Tathāgata does not come or go. Such teachings as this are the basis for the term "non-abiding nirvana."

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 12th, 2014 at 10:14 PM

Title: Re: Is Dzogchen only accidentally Buddhist?

Content:

Soap-Bubble said:

P.S. One nice argument here was connected to thodgal and how mandalas and deities spontaneously manifest.

Malcolm wrote:

They do not spontaneously manifest — they manifest only with great effort, diligence and understanding. If they spontaneously manifested everyone would see them all the time and without any causes or condition and without any progression or order. But this does not happen, which is why the visions are laid in the order that they are.

Likewise, one only moves through the following progression, first one can see the nirmanakāya, then the sambhogakāya and in the end, dharmakāya -- this is the same whether one is a common Mahāyāna practitioner or a Dzogchen practitioner. The path of Dzogchen is not in reality something other than a Mahāyāna path. It is a Mahāyāna path practiced according to techniques and methods not shared with common Mahāyāna, and so therefore is part of secret mantra, as Dzogchen tantras proclaim again and again. There is no Dzogchen outside of Mahāyāna.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 12th, 2014 at 9:54 PM

Title: Re: No one will be turned away

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

Interesting.

I just received a Vajrakīlaya empowerment from Khenpo Sodargye and at the end it was announced that he had taken a vow not to receive any offerings on his tour of the States, so no offerings were made.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, I imagine this is because when Khenpo Jigphun came here 1993, he returned to Tibetan with more than $80,000 and some people criticized him heavily for this.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 12th, 2014 at 9:20 PM

Title: Re: Mahayana opinions of Theravada?

Content:

Astus said:

As I have posted above, the option for non-abiding nirvana (and the trikaya doctrine) is a somewhat later development.

Malcolm wrote:

This is a very rash assertion — you are posting the opinion of one modern scholar as a fact when he himself in the very quote you cite is clearly guessing. This exemplifies exactly what is wrong with modern Buddhology.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 12th, 2014 at 9:16 PM

Title: Re: Mahayana opinions of Theravada?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The reality is that there are three different kinds of bodhisattva motivations spoken of in the sūtras, king-like, captain-like and shepherd-like. There really is no evidence to suppose that the shepherd-like motivation existed first, and the other two were taught later. The way this is taught in the Mahāyāna itself is that the King-like bodhicitta is for those with average capacity, with the shepherd-like motivation being for those of best capacity.

Astus said:

My knowledge is limited, but I have not yet encountered those three kinds of motivations in East Asian Buddhism, only Tibetan. Could you specify in what sutras, or even shastras (preferably those already translated to English) it is explained?

Malcolm wrote:

They are nicknames for the bodhicittas respectively of the path of accumulation, the seventh bhumi and the eighth as presented in the Sutra-alamkara.

They are very commonly discussed in Tibetan Literature, and the nicknames seem to originate with Gampopa.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 11th, 2014 at 11:31 PM

Title: Re: Is Dzogchen only accidentally Buddhist?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

ChNN himself has said many times there is no such thing as "pure Dzogchen."

Soap-Bubble said:

I was making a distinction between the simplified body of practices and the state. Which one do you think ChNN refers to?

Malcolm wrote:

Even the "state", whatever you mean by that, is not "pure" Dzogchen. Buddhahood might be "pure" Dzogchen.

But as long as we are on a path, our Dzogchen is not "pure."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 11th, 2014 at 10:27 PM

Title: Re: Is Dzogchen only accidentally Buddhist?

Content:

Soap-Bubble said:

I believe that this tendency of "pure dzogchen"

Malcolm wrote:

ChNN himself has said many times there is no such thing as "pure Dzogchen."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 11th, 2014 at 9:58 PM

Title: Re: Mahayana opinions of Theravada?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

the motivation of the bodhisattva path is infinitely superior to the motivation to become an arhat

Astus said:

By "bodhisattva career" I meant the aeons of walking the path and even delaying buddhahood intentionally. There is a difference between how buddhahood is interpreted in early and late Mahayana, and it is early Mahayana that focused on becoming a bodhisattva, while late Mahayana is focused on attaining buddhahood as soon as possible.

Malcolm wrote:

If you accept that there is such a thing as an "early" or "late" Mahāyāna, I imagine you could contrive such an explanation. The reality is that there are three different kinds of bodhisattva motivations spoken of in the sūtras, king-like, captain-like and shepherd-like. There really is no evidence to suppose that the shepherd-like motivation existed first, and the other two were taught later. The way this is taught in the Mahāyāna itself is that the King-like bodhicitta is for those with average capacity, with the shepherd-like motivation being for those of best capacity.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 11th, 2014 at 9:32 PM

Title: Re: No one will be turned away

Content:

Ayu said:

If somebody has deep devotion s/he should not be forced to say: "I cannot attend the teaching, because it is too expensive."

Malcolm wrote:

On the other hand people do forget that Milarepa had to say just that....and more than once.

Sherlock said:

He paid with his labour.

Malcolm wrote:

Don't you remember the episode where he had no money to give Marpa, and Dagmema gave him a piece of turquoise for the fee? When Marpa found out he was livid and threw Milarepa out.

The of course there is the famous examples of Drogmi and Rwa. They both had set fees for teachings, this much for the empowerment, this much for the intimate instruction, this much for the sadhana explanation and so on. In Tibet, prior to the institutionalization of Vajrayāna lineages, the habits of gurus were to set fees. Don't you recall that Longchenpa was depressed he could not attend the Vima Nyinthig empowerment given by Kumararaja? So Kumararaja secretly gave him the empowerment fee so he could attend. The Dorje Gotrab root text specifies it should not be given to anyone who does not fork over gold. ChNN joked about this, when he first gave the lung for the whole text.

After Vajrayāna was institutionalized then it became common for teachings like the Nyingthig Yazhi, Lamdre and so on to be freely given. But even here, Kunzang Dechen Lingpa stated that while he was able to attend the Rinchen Terzod for free, he never received any instructions on the practices it contained because he could not afford to pay for them. So the perception that Dharma was free or sponsored in Tibet is somewhat true, and also somewhat false. It is more complicated than most people realize.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 11th, 2014 at 9:25 PM

Title: Re: No one will be turned away

Content:

Ayu said:

If somebody has deep devotion s/he should not be forced to say: "I cannot attend the teaching, because it is too expensive."

Malcolm wrote:

On the other hand people do forget that Milarepa had to say just that....and more than once.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 11th, 2014 at 8:53 PM

Title: Re: Which Buddhist tradition has treated women the best?

Content:

Dan74 said:

In Tonga I'm told, every (extended) family used to have a matriarch, typically an old unmarried aunt, who would be consulted on all important decisions and mediate in all the disputes. But the Christian missionaries saw an end to such a prominent role for women. Hooray for Western civilisation!

Malcolm wrote:

This is actually how things are in Tibet. The brother's sister wields all the matriarchal power.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 11th, 2014 at 8:46 PM

Title: Re: Mahayana opinions of Theravada?

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

it makes them the Sravaka vehicle. I shouldn't need to defend that notion on this forum.

Astus said:

That's right, sravakas are important. If one can save oneself, that's already great. I think that those of us exposed to Mahayana teachings (sutra and tantra) can be a little fooled by the rhetoric about how superior the bodhisattvayana is. Although here I might add that the majority of popular Mahayana lineages don't emphasise the bodhisattva career, instead they promise buddhahood in this life or the next.

Malcolm wrote:

The purpose of becoming a buddha is to help others. The purpose of becoming an arhat is to help yourself. There is nothing wrong with the latter, but it cannot be compared with the former. Therefore, whether one attains buddhahood in this life, the next left, or in three incalculable eons, the motivation of the bodhisattva path is infinitely superior to the motivation to become an arhat.

Further, the bodhisattva path is emphasized in Vajrayāna, without bodhisattva motivation is not possible to attain buddhahood. Quite frankly, of all the Mahāyāna traditions out there today, Tibetan Buddhism emphasizes bodhicitta the most.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 11th, 2014 at 7:47 AM

Title: Re: Mahayana opinions of Theravada?

Content:

daverupa said:

I don't seek to have the Mahayana view defended, but I do want it clearly stated.

The foundation isn't just Nikayas/Agamas, it's Agamas + certain other Mahayana texts that are the actual baseline foundation. The claim about Ni/Ag being the foundation snagged my mind a bit as it passed because saying that they are foundational is incomplete, and thus inaccurate: the practical foundation employed by Mahayana folk necessarily encompasses more than that (as does Theravada, but in quite different ways).

So, the picture I see emerging from this discussion is that the e.g. Agamas aren't foundational on their own, they are incorporated with other texts which then as a group comprise the practical Mahayana foundation. Thus, Early Buddhism forms part of the foundation for both, and other things make up the remainder of the textual mass in each case.

Malcolm wrote:

The whole edifice of the Buddha's teaching in the Agamas are the foundation for Mahāyāna. It does not mean that there are no teachings in the Agamas that are regarded as contextual/provisional, to be applied or not as the situation may warrant it. The same is the case with the relationship between Mahāyāna and Secret Mantra — the whole of Mahāyāna and the Agamas are the foundation upon which Secret Mantra rests, but this does not mean that there are no teachings in the Agamas and Vaipulya sūtras that are regarded as contextual/provisional to be applied or not as the situation may warrant it. For example, the 37 bodhipakṣadharmas, found in the Agamas and Vaipulya sūtras, are also found in Tantras. Mandalas are, from one point of view, little more than exercises in reciting various parts of Abhidharma in the form of deities.

One way to look at it is that the Agamas are the milk, the Vaipulya sūtras are the cream, and the Tantras are the butter.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 11th, 2014 at 3:58 AM

Title: Re: Mahayana opinions of Theravada?

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

I think you misunderstood the "foundation" bit.

daverupa said:

Can you expand? Malcolm says, at least in cases of Vinaya, that this foundation is to be superseded as necessary.

Malcolm wrote:

I was specifically referring to personal liberation vows and where they are contradicted by bodhisattva vows.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 11th, 2014 at 3:17 AM

Title: Re: Mahayana opinions of Theravada?

Content:

Bakmoon said:

I would hazard an answer by saying that things exist in a findable way in the sense that one can perceive appearances, but not further. I say this based on my own understanding of Acariya Dhammapha's subcommentary on the Atthasalini in which he says that there is nothing apart from the properties of a dhamma.

Malcolm wrote:

These properties, I assume he is using the lakṣhana (Skt. Lakṣana) are precisely the kind of realism criticized by the Buddha in Mahāyāna as dharmātman.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 11th, 2014 at 2:23 AM

Title: Re: Mahayana opinions of Theravada?

Content:

Bakmoon said:

My point is that it is misleading to say that the Mahayana path is not a part of the Theravada tradition because many people would understand that to mean that the Theravada tradition doesn't have a set of Bodhisattva teachings rather than understanding it to mean that the Bodhisattva path as presented in the Theravada tradition is different from the Mahayana teachings on the same.

Malcolm wrote:

The Mahāyāna path is not part of the tradition of Theravada. Theravada may have teachings on the path of the bodhisattva, but they are not commensurate with the teachings on the bodhisattva in Mahāyāna in anyway.

For example, in Theravada bodhisattvas are barred from stream entry, in Mahāyāna they can achieve streamentry, and so on, the list of differences is endless.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 11th, 2014 at 2:17 AM

Title: Re: Mahayana opinions of Theravada?

Content:

Bakmoon said:

I thought that it is the position of Je Tsongkhapa that the object of negation is only intrinsic existence and not mere existence. I understand that outside of Gelugpa this position is seen as non-standard, but I think it's a bit harsh to say that saying that phenomena merely exist is a rejection of the emptiness of phenomena.

Malcolm wrote:

Do you understand what "mere existence" means?

Bakmoon said:

I can't give a perfect definition of it, but from looking at how the term is used in the context of Je Tsongkhapa's writings I take it to mean that it is a conventional kind of existence different from intrinsic existence and is not findable under rational analysis.

Malcolm wrote:

Is any kind of existence findable from the perspective of Theravada teachings?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 11th, 2014 at 2:02 AM

Title: Re: Mahayana opinions of Theravada?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

It is not all of a piece.

When we examine the purpose of merit accumulation, we can ascertain the differences.

There are significant differences between how the bodhisattva path is understood by the Nikaya schools and how it is understood in Mahāyāna.

Devotionalism in Mahāyāna and the Śrāvaka schools is not a path, as it is Vajrayāna.

Bakmoon said:

I agree.

Malcolm wrote:

Mahāyāna bodhicitta simply does not exist in the Agamas, nor does the Mahāyāna path.

Bakmoon said:

That's true of the main body of the Four Nikayas for example, but the Bodhisattva path is talked about somewhat in the latter portions of the Khuddaka Nikaya in the Jatakas, Cariyapitika, and the Buddhavamsa, and it is talked about in more detail in the classical commentaries, both on these texts, and in several commentaries on the main Suttas such as in the commentary on the Samannaphala Sutta and the Ghatikara Sutta.

Bodhicitta isn't specifically identified under a single name and doctrine, but I think the concept is there in the commentaries. For example, Acarya Dhammapala in his commentary on the Cariyapitika writes:

The aspiration, made by one endowed with these eight factors, is in denotation the act of consciousness (cittuppaada) occurring together with the collection of these eight factors. Its characteristic is rightly resolving to attain the supreme enlightenment. Its function is to yearn, "Oh, may I awaken to the supreme perfect enlightenment, and bring well-being and happiness to all beings!" It is manifest as the root-cause for the requisites of enlightenment. Its proximate cause is great compassion, or the achievement of the necessary supporting conditions. Since it has as its object the inconceivable plane of the Buddhas and the welfare of the whole immeasurable world of beings, it should be seen as the loftiest, most sublime and exalted distinction of merit, endowed with immeasurable potency, the root-cause of all the qualities issuing in Buddhahood. Simultaneous with its arising, the Great Man enters upon the practice of the vehicle to great enlightenment (mahaabodhiyaanapa.tipatti). He becomes fixed in his destiny, irreversible, and therefore properly gains the designation "bodhisattva." His mind becomes fully devoted to the supreme enlightenment in its completeness, and his capacity to fulfill the training in the requisites of enlightenment becomes established. For when their aspiration succeeds, the Great Men correctly investigate all the paaramiis with their self-evolved knowledge which prefigures their future attainment of omniscience. Then they undertake their practice, and fulfill them in due order, as was done by the wise Sumedha when he made his great aspiration.

Like the aspiration, great compassion (mahaakaru.naa) and skillful means (upaayakosalla) are also conditions for the paaramiis. Therein, "skillful means" is the wisdom which transforms giving (and the other nine virtues) into requisites of enlightenment. Through their great compassion and skillful means, the Great Men devote themselves to working uninterruptedly for the welfare of others without any concern for their own happiness and without any fear of the extremely difficult course of conduct that great bodhisattvas must follow. And their nature is such that they are able to promote the welfare and happiness of beings even on occasions when they are merely seen, heard of, or recollected, (since even the sight, report, or thought of them) inspires confidence. Through his wisdom the bodhisattva perfects within himself the character of a Buddha, through his compassion the ability to perform the work of a Buddha. Through wisdom he brings himself across (the stream of becoming), through compassion he leads others across. Through wisdom he understands the suffering of others, through compassion he strives to alleviate their suffering. Through wisdom he becomes disenchanted with suffering, through compassion he accepts suffering. Through wisdom he aspires for nibbaana, through compassion he remains in the round of existence. Through compassion he enters sa.msaara, through wisdom he does not delight in it. Through wisdom he destroys all attachments, but because his wisdom is accompanied by compassion he never desists from activity that benefits others. Through compassion he shakes with sympathy for all, but because his compassion is accompanied by wisdom his mind is unattached. Through wisdom he is free from "I-making" and "mine-making," through compassion he is free from lethargy and depression.

There is also a passage from the Buddhavamsa which describes how the Buddha in his previous incarnation as Sumedha took the Bodhisattva vow, but I'll have to take some time to find the passage.

Malcolm wrote:

Such discussions also exist amongst the Sarvastivadins, for example the Abhidharmakosha discusses the career of the bodhisattva. But this is really not the same as the Buddha's teaching on the bodhisattva path in Mahāyāna. For one, the concept of an awakened bodhisattva is never found in any Theravada texts at all.

Not only that, but unlike the śravaka schools, in Mahāyāna there are specific rites to undertake bodhisattva vows and commitments to which one must adhere. In other words there is a Bodhisattva vinaya that is distinct from the śravaka vinaya and supercedes where the former contradicts the latter. It is probable that śravaka understanding the bodhisattva path was influenced by Mahāyāna sūtras.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 11th, 2014 at 1:44 AM

Title: Re: Mahayana opinions of Theravada?

Content:

Bakmoon said:

I thought that it is the position of Je Tsongkhapa that the object of negation is only intrinsic existence and not mere existence. I understand that outside of Gelugpa this position is seen as non-standard, but I think it's a bit harsh to say that saying that phenomena merely exist is a rejection of the emptiness of phenomena.

Malcolm wrote:

Do you understand what "mere existence" means?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 11th, 2014 at 12:59 AM

Title: Re: Best Yidams to Remove Obstacles

Content:

Clarence said:

Which Deity would you recommend to remove obstacles?

Many thanks, C

Malcolm wrote:

Depends on the obstacle.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 10th, 2014 at 10:48 PM

Title: Re: Mahayana opinions of Theravada?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

... things like tathāgatagarbha, Mahāyāna bodhicitta, two-fold emptiness, gathering the two accumulations, the bodhisattva path, the nature of buddhahood and omniscience. What the Buddha taught in uncommon Mahāyāna Secret Mantra on top of the framework of common Mahāyāna is the special method to realize Buddhahood in a single lifetime.

daverupa said:

With Theravada, there's merit donations and merit-as-currency, protective charms, devotionals and venerations, the Jatakas housing Bodhisattva Path ideations alongside comparisons of Bodhisattva with Buddha... it's all of a piece, Malcolm. Theravada brings the same sort of stuff to the Agama/Nikaya table as does Mahayana, which is to say, stuff not already on the table.

Malcolm wrote:

It is not all of a piece.

When we examine the purpose of merit accumulation, we can ascertain the differences.

There are significant differences between how the bodhisattva path is understood by the Nikaya schools and how it is understood in Mahāyāna.

Devotionalism in Mahāyāna and the Śrāvaka schools is not a path, as it is Vajrayāna.

Mahāyāna bodhicitta simply does not exist in the Agamas, nor does the Mahāyāna path.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 10th, 2014 at 9:41 PM

Title: Re: Off topic: Mahayana opinions of Theravada?

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

Not quite the same, as I believe in the Mahayana Arya Sangha is defined as people who have realized emptiness to some degree, and are on the bhumis (maybe i'd have to verify the bhumis thing) not even a thing in Theravada. Though I did not know that was the case in Theravada.

Bakmoon said:

In the Theravada the eight kinds of Ariyas refers to the Sotapanna, Sakadagamin, Anagamin, and Arahant, each divided into path and fruit. I'm not sure how this maps up with the ten Bhumi model, but in the Theravada school one must attain Nirvana in order to become a Sotapanna, which seems to line up with the path of seeing, although I'm not totally sure how the details on that work.

Malcolm wrote:

It does not line up with the ten Bhumi model because what is seen and what is abandoned by seeing differ.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 10th, 2014 at 9:26 PM

Title: Re: Mahayana opinions of Theravada?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

This kind of emptiness was not taught by the Buddha in the Agamas and Nikayas, but was only taught by the Buddha in Mahāyāna sūtras.

daverupa said:

This is saying that the Sravaka stuff is not a foundation; so there seems to be a disagreement on this matter among Mahayana folk?

Malcolm wrote:

The foundational teachings the Buddha provided in the Agamas/Nikayas are things like 12 links of dependent origination, the four truths of nobles, skandhas, āyatanas and dhātus, liberation from samsara and so on. What the Buddha taught in common Mahāyāna on top of the framework provided in the Agamas and Nikayas were things like tathāgatagarbha, Mahāyāna bodhicitta, two-fold emptiness, gathering the two accumulations, the bodhisattva path, the nature of buddhahood and omniscience. What the Buddha taught in uncommon Mahāyāna Secret Mantra on top of the framework of common Mahāyāna is the special method to realize Buddhahood in a single lifetime.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 10th, 2014 at 8:54 PM

Title: Re: Celibacy & Enlightenment

Content:

sdw said:

Just a note: 'Lay' does not mean non-celibate, it means a person who is not ordained, or not part of the clergy, an amateur as opposed to a 'professional'. One would not refer to great Lamas such as Dud'jom Rinpoche, for example, as 'lay'.

Malcolm wrote:

One would refer to them as upāsakas, laymen. In this context, when it comes to the difference between being an upāsakaḥ as opposed to a bhikṣu or śramaṇera, the former is "lay," the latter are ordained. Thus both are clergy, but one are lay clergymen and the other are ordained clergymen.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 10th, 2014 at 8:45 PM

Title: Re: Mahayana opinions of Theravada?

Content:

Bakmoon said:

Obviously this doesn't mean that Theravada lines up with everything in the Madhyamaka tenet system, as there are a lot of important differences in how these teachings are laid out and in particular a lot of differences in how the two truths are understood, and emptiness is explained in much more detail in Madhyamaka texts, but I do think it's fairly clear that the Theravada school (at least in its classical formulation in the commentaries as opposed to the later abhidhamma manuals) accepts the emptiness of all phenomena in addition to the emptiness of persons.

Malcolm wrote:

I am afraid you have not understood the "emptiness of phenomena" because you state: Phenomena are real in that they arise, yes, but not real in the sense of possessing intrinsic existence.

What is the emptiness of phenomena? The emptiness of phenomena is the absence of extremes in phenomena such as arising, ceasing, existence, nonexistence, permanent, impermanent and so on. This kind of emptiness was not taught by the Buddha in the Agamas and Nikayas, but was only taught by the Buddha in Mahāyāna sūtras.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 10th, 2014 at 5:51 AM

Title: Re: Is Dzogchen only accidentally Buddhist?

Content:

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 10th, 2014 at 1:30 AM

Title: Re: Mahayana opinions of Theravada?

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

Here's a quote from Douglas Duckworth I pulled from the Nirvana wiki:

The Lesser Vehicle does not result in the practitioner becoming a complete buddha; rather, the aim is to achieve a personal nirvana that is the total extinction of existence.

The Great Vehicle, however, does result in becoming a complete buddha. A buddha remains actively engaged in enlightened activity to liberate beings for as long as samsara remains. Thus, those who accomplish the Great Vehicle do not abide in samsara due to their wisdom that sees its empty, illusory nature. Further, unlike those who attain the nirvana of the Lesser Vehicle to escape samsara, they do not abide in an isolated nirvana due to their compassion. For these reasons, in the Great Vehicle, nirvana is said to be “unlocated” or “nonabiding” (apratiṣṭhita), staying in neither samsara nor nirvana.

The above covers the big differences as I understand them, which includes the central role of Bodhicitta in full enlightenment.

Kasina said:

Fascinating.

Within Theravada, criticism is oft thrown at those who claim nibbana as a state outside of all existence.

What's your take on that?

Malcolm wrote:

Nonabiding Nirvana simply means that a Buddha never actually remains in the nirvana for ever, always acting on behalf of sentient beings.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 9th, 2014 at 9:23 PM

Title: Re: Is Dzogchen only accidentally Buddhist?

Content:

Sherab said:

Personally, I highly doubt that Namkhai Norbu Rinpoche intended the first interpretation.

Malcolm wrote:

Thanks.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 9th, 2014 at 5:34 AM

Title: Re: Is Dzogchen only accidentally Buddhist?

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

what I "said" originally when I started the thread was a quote from ChNNR. Why don't you respond to that?

Malcolm wrote:

I have no need to.

gad rgyangs said:

ok I'll take that as agreement with what he is saying.

Malcolm wrote:

We do not understand him the same way, hence I responded to you, but not the original citation.

In order to be a Dzogchen practitioner, rather than a Dzogchen intellectual, you must always do three things: take refuge in the Buddha, maintain ultimate bodhicitta, and dedicate your merit. This is the essence of the practice of Buddhadharma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 9th, 2014 at 5:03 AM

Title: Re: Is Dzogchen only accidentally Buddhist?

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

he is clearly separating the "essence of the teachings" from the "culture or tradition" (buddhism) and stating that one must understand "the true meaning of a teaching through one's own culture" or you may confuse "the external form of a religious tradition and the essence of its message"

Malcolm wrote:

I am sorry, but I do not believe that he is saying that the essence of Dzogchen is separate from Buddhadharma.

gad rgyangs said:

here he is clearly saying that you do not have to be a buddhist to practice dzogchen, and to insist otherwise is "limited thinking" and can "create serious obstacles to true knowledge"

Malcolm wrote:

No, but by becoming a Dzogchen practitioner one becomes a practitioner of Buddhadharma. There is no way around this. Dzogchen is Prajñāpāramita, etc. It is not Paramshiva, Brahman, etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 9th, 2014 at 4:14 AM

Title: Re: Is Dzogchen only accidentally Buddhist?

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

all you have said so far is basically "it can't be what he really thinks because it is different from what I think"

Malcolm wrote:

I haven't said anything of the sort. I have not been responding to what ChNN says, rather I am responding to what you say.

gad rgyangs said:

what I "said" originally when I started the thread was a quote from ChNNR. Why don't you respond to that?

Malcolm wrote:

I have no need to.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 9th, 2014 at 2:20 AM

Title: Re: Is Dzogchen only accidentally Buddhist?

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

all you have said so far is basically "it can't be what he really thinks because it is different from what I think"

Malcolm wrote:

I haven't said anything of the sort. I have not been responding to what ChNN says, rather I am responding to what you say.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 9th, 2014 at 1:36 AM

Title: Re: Is Dzogchen only accidentally Buddhist?

Content:

treehuggingoctopus said:

this thread being another example that even long term practitioners (gad rgyangs is one, isn't he?) either apparently fail to understand that absolutely crucial term (if mutsuk is right) or at least cannot properly express what they understand.

gad rgyangs said:

the only things I have said about rigpa are: it is an awakening. the recognition it gives is unmistakable, unshakable, and irreversible. I also said it is knowledge of our real nature or condition. I don't think any of these statements are controversial, but if any of it is unclear I would be happy to try and clarify.

Malcolm wrote:

The experience of rigpa is reversible, even if you have developed some rigpa in this life, when you die, who knows where you will end up in the next life?

Oh, sure, you can argue that the mind is not affected by any of the six realms, being inherently pure, but it is frankly stupid to claim that recognition of your state is realization. No Dzogchen tantra states that.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 9th, 2014 at 1:28 AM

Title: Re: Is Dzogchen only accidentally Buddhist?

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

getting back to topic:

although i started this thread with very clear quotes of Namkhai Norbu, people are arguing with me as if they were my opinions. Go figure.

Malcolm wrote:

Perhaps that is because there are some people who think that you have not presented to the totality of Rinpoche's view with this citation edited from a talk translated into another language (from Italian to English) a quarter of a century ago.

gad rgyangs said:

then it should be simple for you to provide a counter-quote from a more recent publication of his in which he repudiates what he said in the quote I posted.

Malcolm wrote:

I don't think you are presenting this citation in its proper context, and I don't think one can encapsulate all of Rinpoche's thoughts into an internet soundbite.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 9th, 2014 at 12:28 AM

Title: Re: Is Dzogchen only accidentally Buddhist?

Content:

treehuggingoctopus said:

And it seems there is no easy way out: can we honestly understand the world of the Tibetan metaphor without any 'fusion of horizons'?

Malcolm wrote:

Please be precise, which metaphors are you talking about? At this point people are complaining about putative unspecified abstractions. For example, I don't what metaphors you are referring to as "Tibetan metaphors".

treehuggingoctopus said:

I did mention the subject-object split, but I think you can take pretty much any term from the twilight language of Dzogchen/Tantra - rig pa, for instance, this thread being another example that even long term practitioners (gad rgyangs is one, isn't he?) either apparently fail to understand that absolutely crucial term (if mutsuk is right) or at least cannot properly express what they understand.

Or the shes pa vs rnam shes vs ye shes trio, especially when explained in terms of their English 'equivalents', i.e., awareness, consciousness and wisdom.

For a still better effect try explaining the Atiyoga section of Precious Vase to a newbie to Vajrayana.

Malcolm wrote:

If you want to understand these terms it is simple:

shes pa is jñāta, rnam shes is vijñāna, and yeshe is jñāna, perhaps best way to to understand this is that latter two are subsets of the first, as is clearly explained in the sgra thal gyur tantra.

rig pa (vidyā, vedana) is a function of shes pa.

These are not metaphors, they are technical terms.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 9th, 2014 at 12:05 AM

Title: Re: Is Dzogchen only accidentally Buddhist?

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

I am saying rigpa is an awakening, which would be the same for any being anytime anywhere, "realization" as you are using it seems to be a buddhist cultural construct.

Malcolm wrote:

You are not qualifying rigpa here in any. Your statement is equivalent to saying "the mind is awakening". It is a meaningless statement.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, December 8th, 2014 at 11:55 PM

Title: Re: Is Dzogchen only accidentally Buddhist?

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

You think rigpa means realization.

where did I say that exactly?

Malcolm wrote:

Several places above. Read your own posts.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, December 8th, 2014 at 11:55 PM

Title: Re: Is Dzogchen only accidentally Buddhist?

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

Once you recognize your real nature, there is no turning back, or rather falling back (asleep).

Malcolm wrote:

Sure you can -- this why Vimalamitra's "vidyā that apprehends characteristics" is defined as clear non-conceptual consciousness [shes pa] contaminated by many cognitions, so it is in fact very possible to turn back, fall away — people do it most of the time.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, December 8th, 2014 at 11:51 PM

Title: Re: Is Dzogchen only accidentally Buddhist?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

No, rigpa is not precisely awakening at all. This is a total misconception, and this misconception is why there are so many flakey screw ups who think they are Dzogchen masters.

gad rgyangs said:

recognition of our real condition does not make one a "Dzogchen Master", especially since even people who have never heard of "dzogchen" or even "buddhism" have that condition, and may recognize it outside those traditions.

One cannot state that rigpa in its unripened state for example, is awakening. The whole reason that basis is called "the basis" is because it has yet to be realized, that is why it is called "the basis."

rigpa is knowledge of the basis, experientially. The rest is optional.

Malcolm wrote:

Rigpa is just a name for the mind — sometimes that mind knows its own state, sometimes it doesn't. When one has that kind of experience one is merely a practitioner on the path, slowly improving, applying one's understanding to the introduction.

Realization is when that knowledge is permanent and not fleeting, leading to the abandonment of the two obscurations.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, December 8th, 2014 at 11:48 PM

Title: Re: Is Dzogchen only accidentally Buddhist?

Content:

mutsuk said:

I am who I am. You are just fantasizing about rigpa without a clear understanding of what it is. Rigpa is not an awakening. You are mixing plenty of levels.

gad rgyangs said:

I am speaking about awakening. If you don't like the term "rigpa" then you can call it something else, but what I am talking about is precisely what is called "rigpa" in the Dzogchen tradition.

Malcolm wrote:

Rigpa is not in itself awakening. This is why "unripened vidyā" appropriates bodies for rebirth, as Vimalamitra clearly explains. Vidyā is just a name for the nature of the mind, which is why Vimalamitra describes vidyā as "knowing (rig) and clear (gsal)."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, December 8th, 2014 at 11:40 PM

Title: Re: Is Dzogchen only accidentally Buddhist?

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

define "realization"

Malcolm wrote:

See above: realization = rtogs pa = avabodha (awakening).

gad rgyangs said:

and rigpa is precisely awakening. The rest is gravy, take it or leave it as one wishes.

Malcolm wrote:

No, rigpa is not precisely awakening at all. This is a total misconception, and this misconception is why there are so many flakey screw ups who think they are Dzogchen masters.

One cannot state that rigpa in its unripened state for example, is awakening. The whole reason that basis is called "the basis" is because it has yet to be realized, that is why it is called "the basis."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, December 8th, 2014 at 11:30 PM

Title: Re: Is Dzogchen only accidentally Buddhist?

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

that (non-regressive knowledge of Buddhahood (Bodies and Wisdoms)) is precisely an example of cultural metaphor, found in India, Tibet and points east. It is also, for virtually (or actually) everyone who believes it, just a theory. If you can produce someone who fits this description, please do, I'd be most interested to speak with them.

Malcolm wrote:

So buddhahood is a cultural metaphor? Then so is rigpa and your argument then becomes entirely self-defeating.

gad rgyangs said:

nope. rigpa is a name for something that is not culturally conditioned, since it would be the same for any sentient being from any culture, not only on this planet, but anywhere in any dimension.

Malcolm wrote:

The same goes for Buddhahood. Anyway, rigpa is just a name for the mind.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, December 8th, 2014 at 11:30 PM

Title: Re: Is Dzogchen only accidentally Buddhist?

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

rigpa is not an understanding, it is precisely an awakening.

Malcolm wrote:

No, the progression is introduction --> recognition --> realization, not recognition --> realization.

You are missing a step. These three steps is very precisely detailed in many Dzogchen tantras and treatises.

gad rgyangs said:
define "realization"

Malcolm wrote:

See above: realization = rtogs pa = avabodha (awakening).

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, December 8th, 2014 at 11:29 PM

Title: Re: Is Dzogchen only accidentally Buddhist?

Content:

gad rgyangs said:
rigpa is not an understanding, it is precisely an awakening.

mutsum said:

Then you strictly have no understanding what rig-pa is. Not one inch. Sorry to say.

gad rgyangs said:
so say you. and you are who exactly, to be telling people what they do or do not understand?

Malcolm wrote:

She is comparing what you say with what the texts say and finds your presentation inconsistent with the textual tradition, therefore, she is telling you that she thinks you have no idea what you are talking about.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, December 8th, 2014 at 11:21 PM

Title: Re: Is Dzogchen only accidentally Buddhist?

Content:

gad rgyangs said:
that is precisely an example of cultural metaphor, found in India, Tibet and points east.

mutsum said:

No it precisely is not. Bodies and Wisdoms are the way the Fruit manifests itself.

It is also, for virtually (or actually) everyone who believes it, just a theory.
It is a theory for people who do not practice. During the practice of the path, you have signs indicating that one experiences Bodies and Wisdoms, this is why Thögel is so crucial to Dzogchen. If you can produce someone who fits this description, please do, I'd be most interested to speak with them.
Yongdzin Rinpoche.

Malcolm wrote:
And Norbu Rinpoche.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Monday, December 8th, 2014 at 11:17 PM
Title: Re: Which Buddhist tradition has treated women the best?
Content:
Malcolm wrote:
Nonsense — Yeshe Tsogyal was prolific. There are many, many texts attributed to her.

Astus said:
Attributed to her as a terma? I don't consider that the same as being the actual author, although it is not negligible that she stands as an example of a female master.
This is also not so: Niguma, Sukhasiddhi, Siddhirajni, Laxminkara, etc., are just a few of the women authors whose works are prominent in Vajrayāna, who are also considered founders of lineages.
Machig is a historical person, and there is no reason to believe she did not author much of what has been attributed to her.
More recently there is Sera Khandro, Tara Lhamo and so on, twentieth century female authors.
They may be rare, but you are overstating the case by a considerable margin.
What level of use/importance do the writings (not the transmissions) of those four Indian female authors carry? What I could gather with a brief search is that the actual founder of the Shangpa Kagyu was Khyungpo Naljor, a male monk, who studied with two of the four yoginis. Don't get me wrong, I'm not saying that this is all irrelevant, but it seems to me that women had no better situation in Tibet than anywhere else. And even if there were some Indian woman siddhas, in their society they were not recognised as anyone important.

Malcolm wrote:
You are confusing institutions with lineages.

The founder of a Vajrayāna lineage is not the Tibetan who collected some Indian teachings and started an institution, but the awakened master who had the capacity to directly communicate with Vajradhara and pass that transmission along. These four women had that capacity which is why they all stand at the heads of lineages of Vajrayāna transmission.

These four women, five when including Macig, were recognized as important in their own milieu, which is why we have their teachings and texts with us today, which are regularly cited and commented upon to the present day.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, December 8th, 2014 at 11:12 PM

Title: Re: Is Dzogchen only accidentally Buddhist?

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

that (non-regressive knowledge of Buddhahood (Bodies and Wisdoms)) is precisely an example of cultural metaphor, found in India, Tibet and points east. It is also, for virtually (or actually) everyone who believes it, just a theory. If you can produce someone who fits this description, please do, I'd be most interested to speak with them.

Malcolm wrote:

So buddhahood is a cultural metaphor? Then so is rigpa and your argument then becomes entirely self-defeating.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, December 8th, 2014 at 11:09 PM

Title: Re: Is Dzogchen only accidentally Buddhist?

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

rigpa is not an understanding, it is precisely an awakening.

Malcolm wrote:

No, the progression is introduction --> recognition --> realization, not recognition --> realization.

You are missing a step. These three steps is very precisely detailed in many Dzogchen tantras and treatises.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, December 8th, 2014 at 11:02 PM

Title: Re: Is Dzogchen only accidentally Buddhist?

Content:

treehuggingoctopus said:

And it seems there is no easy way out: can we honestly understand the world of the Tibetan metaphor without any 'fusion of horizons'?

Malcolm wrote:

Please be precise, which metaphors are you talking about? At this point people are complaining about putative unspecified abstractions. For example, I don't what metaphors you are referring to as "Tibetan metaphors".

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, December 8th, 2014 at 10:59 PM

Title: Re: Is Dzogchen only accidentally Buddhist?

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

although i started this thread with very clear quotes of Namkhai Norbu, people are arguing with me as if they were my opinions. Go figure.

Malcolm wrote:

Perhaps that is because there are some people who think that you have not presented to the totality of Rinpoche's view with this citation edited from a talk translated into another language (from Italian to English) a quarter of a century ago.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, December 8th, 2014 at 10:57 PM

Title: Re: Is Dzogchen only accidentally Buddhist?

Content:

mutuk said:

This is not enough, you are mixing recognizing rigpa and realization.

gad rgyangs said:

define "realization"

Malcolm wrote:

She is saying you are confusing a shes pa, an understanding (jñatā), with a rtogs pa, an awakening (avabodha).

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, December 8th, 2014 at 10:41 PM

Title: Re: Is Dzogchen only accidentally Buddhist?

Content:

treehuggingoctopus said:

It is interesting to note that this is so much a red flag topic that few people in the thread actually respond to the issues gad rgyangs pointed out in his second post...

Malcolm wrote:
It was addressed by kyle with an avalanche of nos.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Monday, December 8th, 2014 at 9:58 PM
Title: Re: Is Dzogchen only accidentally Buddhist?
Content:
MalaBeads said:
(who btw, I disagree with).

.

Malcolm wrote:
With what are you disagreeing?

Author: Malcolm
Date: Monday, December 8th, 2014 at 8:57 PM
Title: Re: Which Buddhist tradition has treated women the best?
Content:
Astus said:

As far as I'm aware, there is not one school or tradition that has a female lineage, nor is there any outstanding (or even not so outstanding) treatise by a woman author.

Malcolm wrote:
Nonsense — Yeshe Tsogyal was prolific. There are many, many texts attributed to her.

Astus said:
All the founders, thinkers and leaders are men. Some may cite here Machig Labdron, however, she is not much more than the legendary transmitter in Tibet of a practice that was only later canonised by male teachers (we are talking about women's social status here, not "religious stories of the past").

Malcolm wrote:
This is also not so: Niguma, Sukhasiddhi, Siddhirajni, Laxminkara, etc., are just a few of the women authors whose works are prominent in Vajrayāna, who are also considered founders of lineages.

Machig is a historical person, and there is no reason to believe she did not author much of what has been attributed to her.

More recently there is Sera Khandro, Tara Lhamo and so on, twentieth century female authors.

They may be rare, but you are overstating the case by a considerable margin.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, December 8th, 2014 at 8:45 PM

Title: Re: Mahayana opinions of Theravada?

Content:

Bakmoon said:

I would like to add a bit to what Dan74 said in terms of the Pali texts teaching the emptiness of phenomenon in addition to the emptiness of persons. One of the clearest Suttas on this subject in my opinion would be the Phena Sutta, in which the Buddha talks about the emptiness of the five aggregates:

Malcolm wrote:

The emptiness of the five aggregates is just the emptiness of the person. The emptiness of phenomena is more than that, and includes the emptiness of unconditioned dharmas and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, December 8th, 2014 at 8:03 AM

Title: Re: Is Dzogchen only accidentally Buddhist?

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

What ChNNR is saying is that we, as westerners, need to find ways to express with our own metaphors the essential thing that is called "dzogchen" (not the cultural tradition, but the meaning of the word "dzogchen", the natural state). We can either mine the western tradition for metaphors that are either pointing to the same thing or are at least amenable to appropriation, or invent new ones. Probably both.

Malcolm wrote:

No, he is not saying that, and I have heard him explain many times when doing deity yoga, for example, we need to use the images that come to us because they are connected with transmission.

but maybe you want a yidam that looks like this:

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, December 8th, 2014 at 6:42 AM

Title: Re: Is Dzogchen only accidentally Buddhist?

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

I've got time.

Malcolm wrote:

For example, he used to give old Tibetan Lamas a hard time for not giving serious teachings to Tibetan Lay people, then he discovered that a lot of Tibetan lay people are not interested in Dharma, just blessings. He once speculated that Garab Dorje might be the same person as Zhangzhung Garab, but now, he has abandoned that idea, etc. He used to insist that people only call him Norbu, now he pretty much insists that people use his proper title, and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, December 8th, 2014 at 4:04 AM

Title: Re: Is Dzogchen only accidentally Buddhist?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

it means that there is no method of experiential introduction in sutra.

Astus said:

You mean the lack of empowerment outside Vajrayana? So it's not that you disregard insight meditation, elements of what is used in Dzogchen, Mahamudra and Lamdre, is it?

Malcolm wrote:

The key difference between sutra and tantra is empowerment.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, December 8th, 2014 at 4:03 AM

Title: Re: Is Dzogchen only accidentally Buddhist?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Also ChNN's own views have changed over the years, he was much less conservative when those books were edited out of talks he gave in Italian.

dzogchungpa said:

Can you be more specific about how his views have changed?

bump

Malcolm wrote:

It's too long to discuss.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, December 8th, 2014 at 3:16 AM

Title: Re: Is Dzogchen only accidentally Buddhist?

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

Dzogchen consists of one thing essentially: recognition of the natural state/our real condition/rigpa.

Malcolm wrote:

All of Buddhadharma consists of this. Dzogchen is no different.

You are making a tempest in a teapot with this whole business of "culture", focusing on the wrong thing.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, December 8th, 2014 at 3:14 AM

Title: Re: Is Dzogchen only accidentally Buddhist?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

because it is an intellectual based on analysis, it is not experientially equivalent with Mahāmudra and Dzogchen.

Astus said:

I think I don't fully understand what you mean here. Is it that Madhyamaka does not include experiencing emptiness, or is it that their practice results in something different than what they actually teach?

Malcolm wrote:

it means that there is no method of experiential introduction in sutra.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, December 8th, 2014 at 3:11 AM

Title: Re: Bye.wa

Content:

pemachophel said:

So is bye.wa.chu.sum, 13 times 10 million, i.e., 130 million?

Malcolm wrote:

yes.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, December 8th, 2014 at 2:25 AM

Title: Re: Is Dzogchen only accidentally Buddhist?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

As far as tregchö goes, there is really no difference between tregchö, Kagyu Mahāmudra and the meditation the view of the inseparability of samsara and nirvana — all three have the same point and all three depend on the experiential view imparted during empowerment.

Astus said:

Thank you for your answers. You did not mention anything about the view reached in Madhyamaka, as I take the unity of samsara and nirvana here means Lamdre. Is that because you take it to be a purely intellectual thing, or for some other reasons?

Malcolm wrote:

Madhyamaka is philosophically the same as the view of Mahāmudra and Dzogchen, but because it is an intellectual based on analysis, it is not experientially equivalent with Mahāmudra and Dzogchen.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 7th, 2014 at 11:53 PM

Title: Re: Is Dzogchen only accidentally Buddhist?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

In the end, I am afraid that the Sakya master, Dezhung Ajam (a disciple of Adzom Drugpa) was right, many people who claim to be Dzogchen practitioners are like people whose bodies are separated from their heads — in other words, their "Dzogchen" is just intellectual theory. Sadly, we see many such discussions in the internet in various forums by various people that are completely ungrounded. These people, sadly, merely block their own realization. What a pity.

Clarence said:

Apologies for ignoring the rest of your excellent post at the moment but I would like to focus on this for now. Based on the above, what would you recommend people do then? Of course, do what their Lamas tell them to do but besides that? Focus on Tantric practice and forget about Dzogchen?

I am genuinely curious as your opinion holds a lot of weight to a lot of people here.

As usual, many thanks,

Malcolm wrote:

If you are a person in the DC, you should go through the precious vase, step by step and practice everything in it, even if you have no intention of pursuing SMS — then you will have a solid basis for understanding the rest of the teachings.

If you are someone following another master, do your ngondro and whatever else he or she tells you to do.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 7th, 2014 at 11:51 PM

Title: Re: Is Dzogchen only accidentally Buddhist?

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

I don't see ChNNR denying in those quotes, or anywhere else, that Dzogchen first appeared within Buddhism, so I'm not sure why you are arguing as if he did?

Malcolm wrote:

I am not arguing with CHNN. I am pointing out that people often use ChNN citations to reinforce their own intellectual trips, taking them out of context, removing them from the thousands of other things he has said over the years.

Also ChNN's own views have changed over the years, he was much less conservative when those books were edited out of talks he gave in Italian.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 7th, 2014 at 11:48 PM

Title: Re: Is Dzogchen only accidentally Buddhist?

Content:

Astus said:

1. If Dzogchen necessarily includes teachings on the channels and such, does it mean that (a) public books on Dzogchen are actually sutra level teachings on emptiness and mindfulness, (b) whoever teaches/practises Dzogchen without deity yoga and/or togal only uses the name Great Perfection but not the real transmission, and (c) semde and longde, since they don't have togal as far as I'm aware, are not really Dzogchen or just preliminaries?

Malcolm wrote:

Some public books with the name Dzogchen in the title are just sutra level teachings on emptiness and mindfulness, but politeness restrains me from naming which ones.

Sems sde at minimum requires introduction through the so called empowerment of the potentiality of vidyā (of which there are 18 connected with the dohas of 18 ancient masters), and is part of the completion stage of Mahāyoga and Anuyoga — the bodhicitta texts do not actually give much detail on the method of practice, being mainly concerned with theory and view. So called sems sde is primarily about the basis. Because the basic texts of sems sde provide little information on how it is to be practiced, there are three different systems of Sems sde practice in Tibet, each with its own preliminaries. For example, the Nyan lugs systems of Sems sde requires the regular four uncommon foundations and so on.

Longde requires initiation into the system of Ngondzog Gyalpo, and is connected with that yidam.

Astus said:

3. If the teaching on the natural state is no different from the Prajnaparamita sutras - that is, you seem to agree to the unity of Dzogchen, Mahamudra and Madhyamaka in terms of the ultimate view - is it your understanding that Dzogchen is a unique way because of its togal instructions and nothing else?

Malcolm wrote:

There are a number of things which make Dzogchen distinct, thögal is one, but there are others, the explanation of the generic basis is another, the specific preliminary practices related to thögal such as 'khor 'das ru shan and so on are others, and the general requirement for some kind of introduction either through the fourth empowerment of Mahāyoga, the ati yoga empowerment found in Anuyoga or the empowerment of the potentiality of vidyā.

As far as tregchö goes, there is really no difference between tregchö, Kagyu Mahāmudra and the meditation the view of the inseparability of samsara and nirvana — all three have the same point and all three depend on the experiential view imparted during empowerment.

I also want to point out that like the rest of Vajrayāna, Dzogchen practice, path and realization completely depends on the Guru. Guru Yoga is absolutely central to Dzogchen. Without guru yoga and devotion to a realized master, no progress at all is possible in Dzogchen, none whatsoever.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 7th, 2014 at 9:38 PM

Title: Re: Summary of Tendai esotericism/Taimitsu

Content:

Malcolm/Claim 7 said:

As I understand his texts, he basically argues that only Mantrayāna leads to Buddhahood in this very body, a position also maintained in Tibetan Buddhism.

jake said:

Yes, Kukai does make the claim that those with sufficient capacity can be students of the Mantra vehicle and achieve Buddhahood in this very body. I assume this is your proposed definition for what makes a teaching “superior.”-see claim 2. (Though I suggest it is a problematic definition though remain open to the point it may be my [lack of] understanding that is problematic).

Malcolm wrote:

The point is that other teachings do not have this capacity, that is what Kobo Daishi is claiming, consistent with a long tradition.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 7th, 2014 at 9:33 PM

Title: Re: Is Dzogchen only accidentally Buddhist?

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

there was an interesting post here for a few minutes that then got erased that was saying that it was not accidental, because of all the religions of this planet, only Buddhism had a basic perspective that was a fertile ground for Dzogchen to appear in. It is a very interesting question if that is the case or if other religions or philosophies could have birthed the Dzogchen view, or did in fact give rise to similar understanding? For example, is Heidegger's Seinsfrage a step towards Dzogchen in a western tradition? Are some of Meister Eckhart's late sermons expressing what amounts to a Dzogchen view? I don't think these are easy "yes" or "no" questions (although I expect an avalanche of "no"s any minute...)

In any case, the quotes from Namkahi Norbu are pretty clearly saying that one does not even have to be a "Buddhist" to practice Dzogchen, in which case the cultural phenomena called "Buddhism" becomes a kind of chrysalis from which Dzogchen emerges but is perhaps not needed once it does so. That is not to say that those still attached to the cultural forms have not fought, and do not fight, tooth and nail to stop the butterfly from emerging and leaving behind the casing...

Malcolm wrote:

The Dzogchen teachings are not something found outside of Buddhadharma for the simple reason that they are a Dharma that was taught by the Buddhas no amount of intellectual posturing can change this fact. Does this mean that someone has to sign up with a card that says "Registered Buddhist" like it is a political party? No, of course not.

These days a sort of intellectual "Dzogchen" is very fashionable — but it generally arises from a misconstrual of the Dzogchen tradition divorced from the matrix in which it emerged, the religious culture of Tibet from the 9th to the 12th century. During this four centuries, Dzogchen teachings were gradually promulgated in the context of Secret Mantra. One thing that ChNN also says is that there is no such a thing as "pure Dzogchen." What he means by this is that there is no practice of Dzogchen divorced from the rest of the Buddhist path (Bonpos are just Buddhists with a differing historical narrative regarding the origins of their teachings). He also states in very plain language that the result of Sūtra, Tantra and Dzogchen are the same — the same buddhahood. He never makes this claim with regard to Christianity, Hinduism, Taoism and so on. Of course another intellectual fashion of the current day is that imagine that somehow there are teachings equivalent to Dzogchen in schools outside of Buddhadharma. This assertion is laughable. Beyond this, Dzogchen texts themselves take great pains to site their own teachings within the horizon of Buddhadharma, and outside the horizon of the teachings of this and that tīrthika school.

The only thing radical about Dzogchen in the end is that a few people might have the capacity recognize their own stated and live in that knowledge 24/7 obviating the need for any further path — but those of us who did not recognize that state and entered into delusion must labor away at our two obscurations, even though, as it is clearly stated in the Prajñāpāramitā that when we reach the final result we will realize that there was nothing to accomplish and nothing to remove all along. In the meantime however, we soldier on because while we are under the the power of karma and afflictions there is a basis of purification and a reason for purification. This is recognized also in Dzogchen teachings, thus the reason there are so many purifications practices, purification practices for body, speech, mind and so on. The entire first chapter of the Dimension of Sound (sgra thaḥ gyur) tantra consists of nothing but purification practices, including creation stage and completion stage practices, and the entire first volume of Vimalamitra's commentary to this text consists of nothing more than elaborating all these practices in detail.

As to the notion that direct introduction is sufficient, this is a gross error of understanding. As the famed Semde master Zhigpo Dudtse points out, the only chigcharwas (instantaneous realizers) he knew of were Saraha and Lingje Repa (neither of them even Dzogchen practitioners), but that while he had sought out some other examples, he did not know of any while not ruling out the possibility that they existed. But it seems these days everyone is a chigcharwas. Further, if you are not practicing the profound teaching of thögal, one has no way of working with pure vision apart from the two stages. It is for this reason then that Tregchö is always combined with deity yoga in Dzogchen practice. As such, the practice of most so called Dzogchen practice is no different than what the Sakyapas, Gelugpas and Kagyus do, even though Nyingma sadhanas are gussied up with many fancy high sounding words. The plain reality is that most people do not have the capacity or time to practice Dzogchen in a serious way. This being the case, for example, ChNN strongly advises everyone to practice the short thun, which is an anuyoga sadhana combined with ati guruyoga. He explicitly says no one can remain in samadhi (contemplation) all the time, and so therefore, in order to do something useful, we have all these secondary practices which support samadhi, which create a container for it.

As to the importance of tradition. There is no Dzogchen without lineage. A Dzogchen book without a live transmission is like a cellphone without a battery, it won't receive any calls. Dzogchen, as ChNN says again and again, does not live in a book, it lives in the transmission between teacher and student. That transmission is oral, symbolic and experiential. All of the different methods of empowerment, elaborate and so, are all methods of communicating that knowledge orally, symbolically and experientially. That knowledge is no different than what is communicated through the four empowerments of the Sarma schools. While the four Dzogchen empowerments may be more detailed, and in some sense they may be a bit more profound in details, a beginner cannot comprehend this. Without a great deal of understanding of Vajrayāna, the teaching of Dzogchen is completely opaque.

The teaching of Dzogchen is not confined to paeans of praise about our natural state. It consists of detailed instructions about the human body, its channels, functions and so on, all of which require ripening through empowerment. If Dzogchen were only about our natural state, it would not go beyond the Prajñāpāramita sūtras.

As one of the Dzogchen tantras puts it — Mahāyoga is the ground, Anuyoga is the sky, and Atiyoga is the sun and moon which illuminates both. Dzogchen is called the pinnacle not because Mahāyoga and Anuyoga are unnecessary, but because, as Rongzom points out, it is needed for making other practices fruitful. This is not different than the Lamdre contention that the experiential view of the inseparability of samsara and nirvana that comes from empowerment must be meditated prior to engaging in the two stages.

In the end, I am afraid that the Sakya master, Dezhung Ajam (a disciple of Adzom Drugpa) was right, many people who claim to be Dzogchen practitioners are like people whose bodies are separated from their heads — in other words, their "Dzogchen" is just intellectual theory. Sadly, we see many such discussions in the internet in various forums by various people that are completely ungrounded. These people, sadly, merely block their own realization. What a pity.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 7th, 2014 at 6:35 AM

Title: Re: Lama and trust

Content:

quince said:

He knew I hadn't.

Malcolm wrote:

Where is this Sakya Lama?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 7th, 2014 at 12:10 AM

Title: Re: Lama and trust

Content:

quince said:

You are absolutely right. I love dharma, but somehow it is very difficult to accept that i might never have a family and become a mother, i am really sorry to bring that up.

Malcolm wrote:

Why would you never have a family or be a mother? One can be a householder and a Dharma practitioner.

quince said:

I didn't find a partner. I know one can practice and have a family, otherwise all practitioners would be monks and nuns, right?

Malcolm wrote:

I see. Well, I cannot help you with that. But if you are interested in the Dharma, it provides everything you need.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 6th, 2014 at 11:42 PM

Title: Re: Prayer to the Dzogchen Masters

Content:

Punya said:

The asian practice of sponsoring the teachings so they are really cheap to attend is also worrisome for the same reason although I know others disagree.

Malcolm wrote:

It is very excellent if someone sponsors a teaching. This creates a lot of merit for everyone. Since this generally is not our custom in the west, however, the system of fee for service was invented. But it is not the best way.

Also the sponsorship system is loaded with potential abuse, since sponsors always get preferential treatment of one kind or another. This is true everywhere, even in Dzogchen Community.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 6th, 2014 at 11:37 PM

Title: Re: Lama and trust

Content:

quince said:

You are absolutely right. I love dharma, but somehow it is very difficult to accept that i might never have a family and become a mother, i am really sorry to bring that up.

Malcolm wrote:

Why would you never have a family or be a mother? One can be a householder and a Dharma practitioner.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 6th, 2014 at 11:36 PM

Title: Re: Lama and trust

Content:

quince said:

I haven't received any major empowerment, which is good, because I would have broken the vows many times.

Malcolm wrote:

Then you are not really qualified to do the Sakya Ngondro anyway — no wonder you are having obstacles in your practice. The Sakya Ngondro practice depends on having received the cause Hevajra Empowerment. You cannot even practice the refuge practice without this empowerment.

However, you should not feel you are not qualified to receive major empowerments. It is not hard to maintain one's vows, one does so by reciting Vajrasattva 21 times every day. There is tremendous blessing from the vows. It is better to receive them and break them, then to have never received them at all.

You can however meditate on the topics of the Three Visions, and you can do any of the other kinds of the Dharma practice such as making offering, reciting sutras like the Heart Sutra and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 6th, 2014 at 10:22 PM

Title: Re: Powa hole in the skull and Guru Yoga

Content:

frank123 said:

Is it possible to develop Powa signs like the hole in the posterior fontanelle from practicing Dzogchen Guru yoga?

Malcolm wrote:

No.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 6th, 2014 at 9:26 PM

Title: Re: Lama and trust

Content:

Ayu said:

How does spiritual practice disturb a nice & calm life? One can do it all nicely and calmly

quince said:

Well as i said ever since i started the ngondro all i have is this obstacles and this is meaningless.

Malcolm wrote:

Samsara is a bigger obstacle than Ngondro. Let me ask you as question, have you received any major empowerments such as Hevajra and the like, and if so from whom?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 6th, 2014 at 6:00 AM

Title: Re: Summary of Tendai esotericism/Taimitsu

Content:

Queequeg said:

Ah.

I'm curious - my reading of this is that there isn't any disagreement about Kukai's views on esoteric v. exoteric paths. However, there is a question about the relative merit of the various teachings of the Buddha themselves ie. are we to read Kukai's 10 stages as asserting relative merit of the texts associated with the various states of Mind? Or does Kukai's judgment stop short of that?

Malcolm wrote:

As I understand his texts, he basically argues that only Mantrayāna leads to Buddhahood in this very body, a position also maintained in Tibetan Buddhism.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 6th, 2014 at 5:31 AM

Title: Re: Lama and trust

Content:

quince said:

Yes, why?

Malcolm wrote:

Today I just finished the rough draft of the very long commentary on the Ngondro according to the Sakya school.

I also did a Sakya ngondro. You should finish your ngondro. However, perhaps you have not done enough Vajrasattva. This commentary states that if you recite 400,000 then you really purify everything. Why? Because in the Kali Yuga, you have to do four times as many mantras.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 6th, 2014 at 5:28 AM

Title: Re: Summary of Tendai esotericism/Taimitsu

Content:

Queequeg said:

Nothing much here except a comment from the peanut gallery...

I think it's possible that there's merit to both Indrajala's and Jake's views...

My reading of Kukai - in translation by Hakeda coincides with Jake's arguments. That said, based on my knowledge of medieval sectarian rhetoric, at least from the Tendai side, Kukai's 10 Stages was certainly interpreted as a judgment of the relative merit of the various sutras, with an unmistakable bias attributed in favor of the esoteric books. I'll add, though, Kukai seems to have been walking a very fine line...

I suspect that modern scholarship on Kukai may not coincide with the manner in which he was interpreted by Shingon sectarians in the past. Japanese medieval sectarianism in general, especially when aristocratic patronage was on the line, drew out the worst in everybody. The almighty ¥ has a way of causing us to degrade ourselves... Is that better or worse than pride and attachment to one's creed? I haven't been able to parse that one out yet. (trying to lighten the mood, boys.)

Malcolm wrote:

I don't agree. Kobo Daishi was clearly an advocate of the superiority of Mantrayāna.

Queequeg said:

LOL. You mind elaborating on exactly what you disagree with? So, you're saying Jake's wrong? Or that Tendai did not interpret Kukai as passing judgment. Or that you disagree with my suspicion...?

Malcolm wrote:

I don't agree with Jake's arguments.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 6th, 2014 at 4:51 AM

Title: Re: Summary of Tendai esotericism/Taimitsu

Content:

Queequeg said:

Nothing much here except a comment from the peanut gallery...

I think its possible that there's merit to both Indrajala's and Jake's views...

My reading of Kukai - in translation by Hakeda coincides with Jake's arguments. That said, based on my knowledge of medieval sectarian rhetoric, at least from the Tendai side, Kukai's 10 Stages was certainly interpreted as a judgment of the relative merit of the various sutras, with an unmistakable bias attributed in favor of the esoteric books. I'll add, though, Kukai seems to have been walking a very fine line...

I suspect that modern scholarship on Kukai may not coincide with the manner in which he was interpreted by Shingon sectarians in the past. Japanese medieval sectarianism in general, especially when aristocratic patronage was on the line, drew out the worst in everybody. The almighty ¥ has a way of causing us to degrade ourselves... Is that better or worse than pride and attachment to one's creed? I haven't been able to parse that one out yet. (trying to lighten the mood, boys.)

Malcolm wrote:

I don't agree. Kobo Daishi was clearly an advocate of the superiority of Mantrayāna.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 6th, 2014 at 4:49 AM

Title: Re: Lama and trust

Content:

quince said:

Ngondro is turning me upside down and no support.

But i will try taking small parts of Parting from the 4 attachments to work. Thanks for the idea.

Malcolm wrote:

Are you practicing under a Sakyapa teacher?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 6th, 2014 at 1:50 AM

Title: Re: Lama and trust

Content:

quince said:

I just can't do it. I can't help anyone. i don't have the strenght to even continue my own simple practice. i cant apparently purify my bad karma. my life, work is too intense busy.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, start from the beginning, four thoughts, etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 6th, 2014 at 1:11 AM

Title: Re: Lama and trust

Content:

quince said:

It's all too complicated. And sad. Just want it all gone.

Malcolm wrote:

It is not at all complicated. Do you wish to be free of samsara and save sentient beings or not?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 6th, 2014 at 1:10 AM

Title: Re: Lama and trust

Content:

quince said:

If i lack devotion what could i do... I did everything that Lama told me. Do i have to struggle for lacking devotion?

Malcolm wrote:

If one lacks devotion, but there is no real fault in the teacher, then you must examine your own mind. In any event, the best thing to do is continue with your practice. You have not finished gathering accumulations.

It is also fine if you take teachings from other qualified teachers, either in your lineage or from some other lineage.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 6th, 2014 at 12:52 AM

Title: Re: Lama and trust

Content:

Ayu said:

@Malcolm: I wrote "in my point of view". There are not only good teachers out there in this world and a little bit scepticism seems to be healthy, sometimes. I'm sorry to say that.

Malcolm wrote:

Since it is very difficult to find a perfect teacher these days, the instruction is to find one whose qualities outweigh their faults by a large margin. This is not hard.

As long as one chooses one's teachers with reasonable care, then the fault of lack of devotion can only come from one's own side.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 5th, 2014 at 10:29 PM

Title: Re: Lama and trust

Content:

quince said:

Hi, i was wondering how much you seek the advise of your Lama? I mean do you ask him for advice for your personal life not related to dharma practice?

Also, did somebody here doubted their Lama judging by the condition of sangha members around you?

Do you think faith is possible without trust? Can one change Lama in the middle of ngondro? Anyway i dont see him anymore he would hardly remember me. He closed our center here. Wouldnt be a big deal to change, would it?

I would really appreciate your input. I dont trust my Lama anymore and i cant continue with ngondro and i still have mandala offering and Guru yoga to do. Stopping practice feels very bad, but i just cant force myself to continue. Cant stop neither. Please advice.

Ayu said:

In my point of view my ngöndro is not only connected with the lama but also especially with the Buddhas. It is possible to "change" the teacher and also to have more than one lama.

And it is quite good to continue a practice when hindrances occur - if it is really dharma practice.

(Edit:) And however it is possible. On the other hand dharma practice should not be a stress.

Malcolm wrote:

One's gurus is the only connection with the Buddhas one has, therefore they are even more kind the Buddhas.

However, there is an instruction by the founder of the Jonang monastery, Chöje Kunpang: "Sometimes, one meditates on a Guru in whom one has no faith, dissolve all gurus in whom one has faith into him. Sometimes, one meditates on a Guru in whom one has faith, dissolve all Guru in whom one has no faith into him. One should have the faith that all of one's Gurus are the same."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 5th, 2014 at 8:27 AM

Title: Re: what makes Buddhist deathlessness not eternalism?

Content:

conebeckham said:

I am just using Kongtrul's text, as cited a few posts back, but he doesn't provide specific references to the original sources for those quotes.

In any case, I have no problem, personally, with a Three Turnings schema, even if it does not originate with the Indian texts. I rely on Rangjung Dorje, mainly, for such explications. I know there's some polemic content in Kongtrul, as well, but I have no problem with that either.

Malcolm wrote:

I don't have a problem with it either, per se, but I do think it makes for some very sloppy and groundless hermeneutics.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 5th, 2014 at 7:21 AM

Title: Re: what makes Buddhist deathlessness not eternalism?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Frankly, this is just not true. It is found only in one, the Saṃdhinirmocana sūtra.

Including Nagarjuna, if I recall.
Nope. Nagārjuna wrote nothing ...

conebeckham said:

Kongtrul cites Nagarjuna's བསྟན་ཚུལ་. Which I know you'll find problematic. He also cites Aryadeva's རྣལ་འབྱོར་སྟོན་པ་བཞི་བརྒྱ་པའི་བསྟན་བཅས།

Malcolm wrote:

Cites it how? It is well known that some consider the dharmadhatustava to be a "third turning" text but there is no internal evidence in the text itself to presume that this is so. The 400 only has one mention of the word 'khor lo, and it refers to a fire wheel. I would really need to see the citations in question.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 5th, 2014 at 5:09 AM

Title: Re: what makes Buddhist deathlessness not eternalism?

Content:

lorem said:

Just the whole idea of the three turnings is pretty central to everything I've ever been taught.

Malcolm wrote:

It is important to the Nyingmapas and the Kagyus. It is not important at all to the Sakyapas since early on the Sakyapas have found the whole idea of the interpretation of the three turnings as being applicable to different phases of the Buddha's teaching career in clear contradiction with statements by Maitreya and so on as well as with reason. I am not sure whether the Gelugpas pay it much mind.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 5th, 2014 at 4:56 AM

Title: Re: Enthogens: Intoxicants?

Content:

Concordiadiscordi said:

Well, we might all be kidding ourselves into believing all sorts of things. For instance, who is to say that you have not merely been deluded into believing your own opinion? This polemic could be rallied against anybody without getting us anywhere. I still do not agree with you.

Malcolm wrote:

The difference is that I am following the opinion of the Buddha, while you are merely following your own intellectual fabrications.

Concordiadiscordi said:

Hmmm... whatever puts you to sleep at night...

Malcolm wrote:

Of course you know very well you cannot produce even a single statement by the Buddha where he extols the value of any kind of drug for the path. However, he uses people who use datura frequently as examples of delusion.

Now, given that this is a Buddhist website, it should be obvious to you that even people who have a lot of experience with various kinds of drugs are most likely to flat out disagree with you about the usefulness of drugs on a Buddhist path.

As far as the broad majority of people here are concerned your point of view about this topic is confusion steeped in ignorance wrapped in conceit.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 5th, 2014 at 4:36 AM

Title: Re: Enthogens: Intoxicants?

Content:

Concordiadiscordi said:

Well, we might all be kidding ourselves into believing all sorts of things. For instance, who is to say that you have not merely been deluded into believing your own opinion? This polemic could be rallied against anybody without getting us anywhere. I still do not agree with you.

Malcolm wrote:

The difference is that I am following the opinion of the Buddha, while you are merely following your own intellectual fabrications.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 5th, 2014 at 4:21 AM

Title: Re: Enthogens: Intoxicants?

Content:

Concordiadiscordi said:

I don't agree with your assessment, Malcolm.

All paths are equally boundless and inexhaustible, but one can only see so far as the eye of one's practice will permit. Hence, it is not necessarily the case that entheogens promise little more than a dead end for Buddhist practitioners; rather, you have merely ceased to recognise their potential relevance for your practice.

Malcolm wrote:

You can disagree if you like, but I have met a lot of drug addled people who are just kidding themselves into believing they are practitioners of anything that resembles the path of the Buddhas.

The belief that taking drugs is part of the path of awakening is deeply rooted in ignorance. People who persist in this belief are most ignorant of the ignorant and are truly likely to take rebirth in the animal realm, at best.

Now, if you are a practitioner who occasionally trips for fun, but understands this as merely a distraction, well, then there is no real problem as long as you don't hurt anyone.

Of course, habitually taking drugs is definitely a violation of the vow against being intoxicated — there is simply no way around it.

Whatever is meditated with confusion causes the attainment of confusion by the confused.
— Jñānasiddhi by Indrabhūti

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 5th, 2014 at 3:41 AM

Title: Re: what makes Buddhist deathlessness not eternalism?

Content:

lorem said:

Seems like something to ask someone like Karma Thinley Rinpoche or another Tibetan. I bet you could have an interesting talk with them about it.

Malcolm wrote:

Tibetans rarely study these things.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 5th, 2014 at 2:43 AM

Title: Re: what makes Buddhist deathlessness not eternalism?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

This is not an assignation of sutras, nor does it belie my general point, which is that this sutra, the Saṃdhinirmocana merely clarifies that the second turning because it was a subject dispute.

conebeckham said:

Fair enough, but the "Three Turnings" notion is supported in several original Indian source texts.

Malcolm wrote:

Frankly, this is just not true. It is found only in one, the Saṃdhinirmocana sūtra.

conebeckham said:

Including Nagarjuna, if I recall.

Malcolm wrote:

Nope. Nagārjuna wrote nothing about it.

conebeckham said:

But it seemed you questioned the entire "Three Turnings" Scheme....

Malcolm wrote:

I do, because there is nothing substantive about it at all in Indian texts. It is only mentioned once in the entire Yogacarabhūmi. Other than that, the Yogacarins totally ignore it.

The Indians really did not discuss the issue of the three turnings at all, especially not the Indians you would most expect, namely the Yogacara authors, Maitreya, Asanga, Vasubandhu, etc. Not even the later Yogacara authors bring it up.

The only sustained discussion of the issue is the massive commentary on the Saṃdhinirmocana sūtra preserved in the bstan 'gyur by the Korean master Wen Tshegs (Wönch'ūk, 613-696). He starts his text saying:

The sovereign of Dharma taught the wheel of Dharma in three aspects. The first of those was turned in the Deer Park in Varanasi for those who were devoted to the śrāvakayāna, and the causes and results of nirvāṇa were fully taught. This is the Dharmawheel of the four noble truths.

The second was the teaching of the Ārya Prajñāpāramitā in sixteen gatherings such as Vulture Peak and so on to those who were devoted to the Bodhisattvayāna.

The third, the teachings of the Saṃdhinirmocana sūtras and so on in pure buddhafiels such as Padmagarbha and so on and impure buddhafiels, to those devoted to all yānas, is the Dharmawheel of the Mahāyāna of the definitive meaning. This is to be known as the intention of the teaching of the doctrine of the Tathāgata.

Since there is nothing like this statement by any Indian scholar in any extant text, I must conclude that certain Tibetan scholars (whether they know it or not) rely solely on a 7th century Korean Buddhist discussion of this issue in order to justify their classification of this and that class of sūtras as definitive or provisional. But in reality these justifications cannot be made the basis of the extant Indian source texts in both sūtra and śāstra. Of course, not having studied this 1000 folio, three volume text in detail, I cannot say whether it presents Indian sources for this idea or not. But I didn't see any citations of Indian masters when during the several times I have done close words searches on the text when he discusses the three turnings.

Interestingly this text defines the Avatamsaka and the Prajñāpāramitā [under the influence of the Avatamsaka] both as part of the third turning, but it defines the Nirvāṇa Sūtra as the second turning. He further states that the second vehicle only removes imputation [vikalpana], whereas the third turning clarifies the three svabhāvas, and so on.

Given that he defines the Nirvana as second turning and provisional and given that he devotes only a single sentence to a discussion of tathāgatagarbha, I think it is safe to conclude that for Wen Tshegs, tathāgatagarbha is part of the provisional second turning. It would be interesting to understand how it is that the ten Tathāgatagarbha sūtras came to be regarded by some Tibetans as the essence of the third turning given this fact, because there is surely no evidence from Indian sources that they are to be treated as such.

See this link about Wen Tsheg's text and how it came to be translated into Tibetan:

<https://journals.ub.uni-heidelberg.de/index.php/jiabs/article/download/8793/2700>.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 5th, 2014 at 12:57 AM

Title: Re: Enthogens: Intoxicants?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Once this is understood, then they are nothing more than recreational drugs, intoxicants.

lorem said:

For Buddhists I would say the majority yes. Other religions use them as "tools". Of course this is a Buddhist forum but to straight label something is kind of rude. My father-in-law was in Native American Church and consumed peyote pretty regularly and it was not recreational.

malcolm actually said:

Once this is understood, then they are nothing more than recreational drugs, intoxicants.

If one is a Buddhist practitioner, they are a dead end. YMMV.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 5th, 2014 at 12:56 AM

Title: Re: Enthogens: Intoxicants?

Content:

Kunzang Tobgyal said:

Hey Malcolm,

What do you think about the idea of one ayahuasca trip being the equivalent of twenty years of therapy? Do you think from a therapeutic point of view it could be helpful?

Malcolm wrote:

Not a big fan of either.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 5th, 2014 at 12:01 AM

Title: Re: Enthogens: Intoxicants?

Content:

Concordiadiscordi said:

Indeed, I feel that it may be largely due to our deep entrenchment in the materialistic worldview that such ordeals as are entailed by entheogens are typically conceived of as exotic by most.

Malcolm wrote:

Having taken everything, you name it, I have ingested a lot of it (Acid, Mushrooms, buttons, DMT, Ecstasy,,etc.) entheogens only offer one insight, the mind is not an immutable entity. Once this is understood, then they are nothing more than recreational drugs, intoxicants.

If one is a Buddhist practitioner, they are a dead end. YMMV.

Shouldn't there be a great drug thread, like the rebirth and vegetarian thread?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 4th, 2014 at 11:24 PM

Title: Re: what makes Buddhist deathlessness not eternalism?

Content:

Sherab said:

Is example wisdom from rnal 'byor mngom sum while actual wisdom is from rang rig mngom sum?

Malcolm wrote:

No, an example wisdom is not a yogapratyakṣa, that exists in the path of seeing on up, but it is nonconceptual.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 4th, 2014 at 10:08 AM

Title: Re: what makes Buddhist deathlessness not eternalism?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, when it comes to gzhan stong. However, the notion of the three turnings of the wheel and the way the sutras are divided up appear to come from the Chinese tradition via this commentary I mentioned.

In any case I am of the understanding that this presentation is not of Indian origin, but of a later Tibetan development, which is good enough for me. They need not have studied it at Nalanda for me to accept it.

This presentation, as above, is apparently a Chinese idea.

conebeckham said:

From the མདོ་སྟོན་དཀོངས་པ་པེས་པར་འགྲེལ་བའི་མདོ་:

"First, the four truths,

In the middle, the absence of characteristics,

Finally, the turning that excellently and thoroughly distinguishes [the provisional from the definitive. And the completely false from the actual and genuine.]"

Is that not an Indian text?

Malcolm wrote:

This is not an assignation of sutras, nor does it belie my general point, which is that this sutra, the Samdhinirmocana merely clarifies that the second tuning because it was a subject dispute.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 4th, 2014 at 8:16 AM

Title: Re: what makes Buddhist deathlessness not eternalism?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

As Drogmi Lotsawa says, sūtra relies intellectual analysis, whereas Vajrayāna relies on direct perception.

Sherab said:

Can one has direct perception before reaching the path of seeing?

Malcolm wrote:

Below the path of seeing, example wisdom; above the path of seeing, actual wisdom. Both can be directly experienced. But an intellectual analysis is never an example wisdom.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 4th, 2014 at 12:00 AM

Title: Re: Enthogens: Intoxicants?

Content:

seeker242 said:

However, Buddhism is not like that.

Sherab Dorje said:

Or more to the point: Buddhism is not Shamanism.

lorem said:

Monday night (Dec 1) His Holiness did say that Tibetan Buddhism kept some of Bon and vice-versa. So there may be an argument for shamanistic traditions present in "Tibetan Buddhism"

Malcolm wrote:

HHDL meant things like smoke offerings, rituals like thread crosses, prayer flags, ransom rites, and so on, mundane rites for health and prosperity and harmonizing the environment. Also some Bonpo gods were converted into protectors like Dorje Legpa and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 3rd, 2014 at 8:11 AM

Title: Re: what makes Buddhist deathlessness not eternalism?

Content:

Sherlock said:

I think Dudjom Tersar actually has limited popularity in the culturally Tibetan areas. Longchen Nyingthig is still the most popular terma cycle across Kham, Dudjom lamas are not especially famous there.

Malcolm wrote:

Dudjom Tersar is wide spread in southern Tibet like Konpo, Po, Pemakod as well as Bhutan and in the exile community.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 3rd, 2014 at 1:30 AM

Title: Re: what makes Buddhist deathlessness not eternalism?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

you have for several years pushed this idea that the gzhan stong is the official view of the Nyingma school.

smcj said:

True. That has been, and as of this posting still is, my understanding. That could change in a couple of months when I have a chance to check in with my teachers.

Malcolm wrote:

As I have pointed out to you, that understanding is false. For example, in the largest Nyingma Monastery in the world, Lharung Gar in Golok Sertha, Mipham's presentation is considered to be the modern representative of Nyingma view. In modern day Dzogchen monastery, both in and out of Tibet, as well as Namdrol Ling in South India, whose curriculum is studied? Khenpo Shenga's, who was totally opposed to gzhan stong and who preferred Gorampa. So your perspective is skewed and uninformed.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 3rd, 2014 at 1:26 AM

Title: Re: what makes Buddhist deathlessness not eternalism?

Content:

smcj said:

It was meant to impugn his presentation of Dharma.

Malcolm wrote:

First, you have no idea what I "meant" since you are not in my mind. So it is pretty damn rude for you to make this comment.

The term was meant to point out that his presentation not part of the main trunk of the presentation of Nyingma view (i.e. Rongzom, Longchenpa, Mipham).

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 3rd, 2014 at 12:49 AM

Title: Re: what makes Buddhist deathlessness not eternalism?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Of course. I have made that clear for many years. When someone practices Vajrayāna, intellectual constructs like Madhyamaka are of little use. As Drogmi Lotsawa says, sūtra relies intellectual analysis, whereas Vajrayāna relies on direct perception.

smcj said:

I am a regular poster here, and I have never heard you say that before. It is my understanding as well. The internet lends itself to discussion of Madhyamaka and such, not so much to Vajrayana perception, and so I think that there is an over emphasis on these discussions. It is a flaw of the medium.

Malcolm wrote:

Then you have not been paying attention.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 3rd, 2014 at 12:49 AM

Title: Re: what makes Buddhist deathlessness not eternalism?

Content:

Unknown said:

The term "outlier" is not an insult. I think you are getting a little hysterical about all of this.

It is a pejorative.

Malcolm wrote:
It certainly is not.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 3rd, 2014 at 12:39 AM

Title: Re: what makes Buddhist deathlessness not eternalism?

Content:

smcj said:

Ngapa Yeshe Dorje was a yogi and did not care about intellectual topics like Shentong, same with KDL.

So it is possible to be a yogi and not care about Madhyamaka or Shentong, right?

Malcolm wrote:

Of course. I have made that clear for many years. When someone practices Vajrayāna, intellectual constructs like Madhyamaka are of little use. As Drogmi Lotsawa says, sūtra relies intellectual analysis, whereas Vajrayāna relies on direct perception.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 3rd, 2014 at 12:35 AM

Title: Re: what makes Buddhist deathlessness not eternalism?

Content:

smcj said:

SMCJ, you are merely demonstrating your lack of knowledge and history.

Maybe I don't know my ancient history so well. But in the more recent history, like the last 24 hours, you've called the guru to several of your gurus an outlier. How's that work? Were they mistaken when they took him to be their guru? When you do your lineage prayers, isn't he someone you pray to?

Malcolm wrote:

The term "outlier" is not an insult. I think you are getting a little hysterical about all of this. The agenda is all yours, i.e, you have for several years pushed this idea that the gzhan stong is the official view of the Nyingma school. Well, it is among one of several Madhyamaka interpretations current among Nyingmapas, but it is by no means the main one.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 3rd, 2014 at 12:32 AM

Title: Re: what makes Buddhist deathlessness not eternalism?

Content:

Sherlock said:

Smcj, have you actually received any Dzogchen teachings before and practised them? If not why do you keep wanting to talk about Dzogchen?

smcj said:

No, I do not have a Dzogchen practice. However I am a Shentongpa, as was Dudjom R., and that perspective is regularly dismissed in these discussions, mostly due to Malcolm's conservatism. That is not what I understand to be the normal presentation among Nyingma lamas. It is his own pet project to roll back Buddhist tenets to what was accepted in ancient India. I believe people are being misled by this overly conservative agenda.

As everyone here can see, Malcolm has issues with Dudjom's presentation.

Not really. Dudjom Rinpoche is the guru of several of my gurus.

So therefore your own gurus should be outliers too, right?

Malcolm wrote:

Well, people tend to make up their own minds about what Madhyamaka view they are going to follow, but in general, Ngapa Yeshe Dorje was a yogi and did not care about intellectual topics like Shentong, same with KDL. Otherwise, not one of the many other Nyingma Lamas I have studied with are shentongpas.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 3rd, 2014 at 12:15 AM

Title: Re: what makes Buddhist deathlessness not eternalism?

Content:

smcj said:

That is not what I understand to be the normal presentation among Nyingma lamas.

Malcolm wrote:

Um, how many Nyingma lamas have you actually studied with?

The fact is that Nyingma monasteries tend to follow whatever Madhyamaka view is dominant in their region. Nyingmapas from Amdo like Shabkar and Jigme Lingpa in general follow Tsongkhapa's presentation, as is still the case today. Nyingmapas from Central Tibet (Mindroling and Dorje Drak) also tend to follow the Gelug presentation since these monasteries are very close to Gelug spheres of influence. Dzogchen Monastery follows Sakyapa approach since they follow Khenpo Shenga and his famous 13 treatises presentation. Phalyul tries to follow Mipham, but Mipham is very similar to Sakya. Nyingmas from Kongpo like Dudjom R, and Khathok monastery tend to follow Shentong, because a) Rigzin Tsewang Norbu was from Khatok and it was from here that he spread Shentong spread into Kagyu anyway.

SMCJ, you are merely demonstrating your lack of knowledge and history.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 2nd, 2014 at 8:27 PM

Title: Re: what makes Buddhist deathlessness not eternalism?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

... The Mind Mirror of Vajrasattva states:

The sugatagarbha exists intrinsically in all sentient beings. That exists just as sesame seeds are permeated with oil. Its basis — it is based on the material aggregate. It's location — it is located in the center of the heart.

Sherab said:

Since the sugatagarbha exists intrinsically in all sentient beings, and since it is based on the material aggregate, and since there exists the formless realm, therefore beings in the formless realms in reality have some kind of material or form?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, in the Dzogchen tradition formless realm beings are considered to have subtle material bodies.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 2nd, 2014 at 8:25 PM

Title: Re: what makes Buddhist deathlessness not eternalism?

Content:

smcj said:

Dudjom R. did not simply make stuff up that was not part of the tradition.

Malcolm wrote:

Did it ever occur to you that Dudjom Rinpoche is an outlier? Because in point of fact, his book is not part of the main curriculum of Nyingmapa Khenpos — it is more influential among westerners.

Lotus_Bitch said:

What texts and who's commentaries are studied in Nyingma shedras?

Malcolm wrote:

Primarily Khenpo Shenga and Mipham.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 2nd, 2014 at 8:24 PM

Title: Re: what makes Buddhist deathlessness not eternalism?

Content:

smcj said:

Dudjom R. did not simply make stuff up that was not part of the tradition.

Malcolm wrote:

Did it ever occur to you that Dudjom Rinpoche is an outlier?

smcj said:

Nope. I saw how well regarded he was during his life. Plus, usually people that are called "head of the lineage" are pretty mainstream. The thought never crossed my mind that he was anything other than a standard bearer for the tradition. (At least you didn't call him a tirthika!)

Malcolm wrote:

By outlier, I mean someone whose views are not actually standard. In fact, the Nyingmapa curriculums are either developed around Mlpham or around Khen Shenga's 13 treatises.

smcj said:

As everyone here can see, Malcolm has issues with Dudjom's presentation.

Malcolm wrote:

Not really. Dudjom Rinpoche is the guru of several of my gurus.

smcj said:

In fact my impression that Dudjom R is out of step with Longchenpa comes from Malcolm, not my own reading. (Malcolm is more conservative than Dudjom.)

Malcolm wrote:

Again, this is an error of interpretation on your part.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 2nd, 2014 at 9:54 AM

Title: Re: what makes Buddhist deathlessness not eternalism?

Content:

smcj said:

Dudjom R. did not simply make stuff up that was not part of the tradition.

Malcolm wrote:

Did it ever occur to you that Dudjom Rinpoche is an outlier? Because in point of fact, his book is not part of the main curriculum of Nyingmapa Khenpos — it is more influential among westerners.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 2nd, 2014 at 8:27 AM

Title: Re: what makes Buddhist deathlessness not eternalism?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

True existence itself is an object of conceptuality, so this reasoning is very unsound.

Sherab said:

As I understand it, all nouns refer to two possibilities, the entity itself (ngo bo) and the conceptuality of the entity itself (snang ba). [The words within () are what I think are the equivalent in Tibetan.] To say then that true existence itself is an object of conceptuality is to pre-conclude that true existence only exists as a conceptuality. I don't think this is valid.

Also just because true existence as understood by a conceptuality appears as an impossibility, does not mean that true existence cannot exist in a way different from what is understood by a conceptuality. One gets a sense of this when one enters into the world governed by the laws of quantum physics.

Malcolm wrote:

Such a true existence is cognitively closed to us and exists as a mere speculation.

There is no such thing as a cognition in absence of a subject and an object.

When the Buddha taught that "not seeing" is the real seeing, I thought that there are two possible ways of understanding this. One is that he was talking about not seeing an object. The other is that he was talking about a seeing that is not the usual seeing, i.e., he was talking about a seeing that does not require a separation into a subject and an object that some people labelled as "non-dual" cognition.

He was talking about being in a state free from extremes.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 2nd, 2014 at 8:23 AM

Title: Re: what makes Buddhist deathlessness not eternalism?

Content:

smcj said:

So Dudjom R. had no problem utilizing the 3 Turning paradigm to explain and define how Dzogchen is superior to the other yanas. Since he saw it as appropriate, so do I.

Malcolm wrote:

Ironically, following the interpretation of the three turnings as explained by a Korean master, but never by any Indian master, including Maitreya, Asanga, and so on and so forth.

smcj said:

I thought you said earlier that he followed the explanation of Kongtrul R.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, when it comes to gzhan stong. However, the notion of the three turnings of the wheel and the way the sutras are divided up appear to come from the Chinese tradition via this commentary I mentioned.

smcj said:

In any case I am of the understanding that this presentation is not of Indian origin, but of a later Tibetan development, which is good enough for me. They need not have studied it at Nalanda for me to accept it.

Malcolm wrote:

This presentation, as above, is apparently a Chinese idea.

smcj said:

BTW, for anybody that doesn't know, when Tibetans come up with some way of looking at this stuff they are obliged to go back and re-interpret the major authors as if to say, "See, this is what they meant all along." So you'll have completely divergent interpretations of what should be standard texts. Nagarjuna and Asanga will be quoted and interpreted completely differently depending on who is grinding the ax at the time. That's just the way Tibet was.

Malcolm wrote:

The point is to understand who influenced whom, when and why. For example, Longchenpa states that Prasangika is the definitive view (as did Jigme Lingpa), but the third turnings sutras, by which he understood the ten tathāgatāgarbha sūtras, were the definitive sūtras. The ironic or interesting thing, is that the way Dzogchen texts treat the tathāgatagarbha is totally at odds with how it is treated in these ten sutras. So it becomes clear that Longchenpa used the sūtra tathāgatagarbha doctrine in order to defend the validity of the Dzogchen tantras. Also of interest is that tathāgatagarbha does not really get mentioned much in the so called sems sde or klong sde, as far as I can determine. There is an interesting passage in the srog 'khor lo (wheel of life): If one becomes stuck in limitations, it is the sugatagarbha.

On the other hand the Mind Mirror of Samantbhadra states:

The diverse miraculous display arises from state of inseparability, the ultimate sugatagarbha.

This in fact has a secret meaning. If you have received complete Dzogchen teachings, you will understand it, if not then I am sorry.

But reconcile this passage with the way sugatagarbha is taught in sūtra — The Mind Mirror of Vajrasattva states:

The sugatagarbha exists intrinsically in all sentient beings. That exists just as sesame seeds are permeated with oil. Its basis — it is based on the material aggregate. It's location — it is located in the center of the heart.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 2nd, 2014 at 6:33 AM

Title: Re: what makes Buddhist deathlessness not eternalism?

Content:

smcj said:

So Dudjom R. had no problem utilizing the 3 Turning paradigm to explain and define how Dzogchen is superior to the other yanas. Since he saw it as appropriate, so do I.

Malcolm wrote:

Ironically, following the interpretation of the three turnings as explained by a Korean master, but never by any Indian master, including Maitreya, Asanga, and so on and so forth.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 2nd, 2014 at 5:22 AM

Title: Re: i can't stop whinging and backstabbing

Content:

straightpunk said:

taranaki, new zealand

Malcolm wrote:

<http://fpmt.org/centers/new-zealand/> " onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

Check out google, there are several dharma centers. You may have to take a drive to Auckland from time to time for teachings, but in general FPMT has many online offerings as well.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 2nd, 2014 at 3:48 AM

Title: Re: Bye.wa

Content:

pemachophel said:

In the Nithartha on-line Tib-Eng dictionary, it gives "11 million" (JV) for bye.wa.sa.ya. When I just look up sa.ya, it says "million." If I just look up bye.wa, I don't get anything. My question is, what does bye.wa.gsum mean? 33 million?

Thanks.

Malcolm wrote:

30 million.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 2nd, 2014 at 3:39 AM

Title: Re: what makes Buddhist deathlessness not eternalism?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

There is no such thing as a cognition in absence of a subject and an object.

smcj said:

So you're saying non-dual awareness is a fiction?

Malcolm wrote:

Depends on what one means by nondual.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 2nd, 2014 at 3:20 AM

Title: Re: what makes Buddhist deathlessness not eternalism?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The problem really is what does not (sic) mean to be omniscient? To have realized the dharmakāya? If the dharmakāya is some truly existent wisdom mind that cannot be cognized by anyone...

smcj said:

I think the idea is that it cannot be cognized in a dualistic way, meaning taken as an object by a subject.

Malcolm wrote:

There is no such thing as a cognition in absence of a subject and an object.

smcj said:

...then it should always arise at all times in everyone without error.

I've heard that idea put forward before. In fact, isn't it standard Dzogchen perspective?

My personal spin is that enlightenment, when achieved, is retroactive. Once you become enlightened you can see that it was there all along. The story of Asanga and Maitreya comes to mind, where after 12 years of meditation Maitreya finally appears to Asanga. Asanga asked him where he'd been all that time, to which Maitreya replies, "I've been here the whole time. You just couldn't see me." Nice parable.

Malcolm wrote:

[/quote]

Dzogchen teaching make a clear distinction between the basis (the time of non-realization) and the result.

The real issue which causes argument is whether tathagatāgābha, a.k.a., the dharmakāya at the time of the basis, is something that is naturally perfected or something which requires development. In general, the Sakyapas for example argue that the natural perfection of the qualities of awakening in the person does not conflict with transformation in the same way the natural presence of the quality in milk which produces butter does not mitigate or render unnecessary the process of transformation which produces butter (churning). Longchenpa for example argues that while the two accumulations have always been perfected, they need to be reaccumulated in the same sense that a gem that has been lost in a swamp needs to be polished in order to restore its former luster.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 2nd, 2014 at 2:51 AM

Title: Re: what makes Buddhist deathlessness not eternalism?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

True existence itself is an object of conceptuality, so this reasoning is very unsound.

smcj said:

Could be a little awkward. I like this take on it better:

Malcolm wrote:

Our nature, suchness, does not arise; therefore, it does not cease. This is what it means to be deathless, that which is beyond arising and ceasing, suchness is indestructible.

The problem really is what does not mean to be omniscient? To have realized the dharmakāya? If the dharmakāya is some truly existent wisdom mind that cannot be cognized by anyone, then it should always arise at all times in everyone without error.

If not, then it suggests that omniscience, like everything, else, arises from causes. The difficult question is this: If omniscience arises from causes, why does it not cease?

Various answers to this problem have been tendered.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 2nd, 2014 at 2:19 AM

Title: Re: what makes Buddhist deathlessness not eternalism?

Content:

smcj said:

Madhyamaka has jurisdiction over the phenomenal universe. Shentong jurisdiction is that which cannot be taken as a subject by consciousness, the unborn, etc.

That is a patent fallacy. Gzhan stong simply says the three kāyas are innate, however this is the implication of traditional Madhyamaka as well. When it comes down to it, gzhan stong really does not offer anything that cannot be found in traditional Madhyamaka.

Khenpo Tsultrim, the go-to guy for Shentong in modern day Karma Kagyu, has this to say:

Progressive Stages of Meditation on Emptiness, p.66: This non-conceptual Wisdom Mind is not the object of the conceptualizing process and so is not negated by Madhyamaka reasoning. Therefore, it can be said to be the only thing that has absolute and true existence.

It is important to understand that this true existence does not mean that it can be conceptualized. If it were even the most subtle object of the conceptual process, it could be refuted by Prasangika reasoning. The non-conceptual Wisdom Mind is not something that even supreme wisdom (Skt. prajna) can take as its object. Anything that can be an object of consciousness, however pure and refined, is dependently arising and has no true existence.

Malcolm wrote:

True existence itself is an object of conceptuality, so this reasoning is very unsound.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 2nd, 2014 at 1:18 AM

Title: Re: what makes Buddhist deathlessness not eternalism?

Content:

smcj said:

You won't hear that from the sects that accept the 3rd Turning of the Wheel as being definitive over the 2nd Turning.

.

Malcolm wrote:

There is basically a single mention of three turnings of the wheel in the sūtras, found in the Samdhinirmocana sutra. All it says there is that the wheel turned for Mahāyānis is the meaning to be understood by all yānas, nothing more and nothing less. Why does it say this? Because Mahāyāna was disputed by the Śravakas, so the Buddha turned the Mahāyāna wheel a second time so there would be no mistakes or ambiguity. It really is just an Ekayāna teaching.

I really don't know where some Tibetans got the idea that it referred to Yogacara literature, but there is absolutely no justification for that interpretation that can be derived from Indian commentaries in the bstan 'gyur. I know this because I have looked for this doctrine there extensively. There is virtually nothing about the three turnings of the wheel to be found in the bstan 'gyur.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, December 1st, 2014 at 11:16 PM

Title: Re: mala broke

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The best thing for mālas is fifteen pound braided fishing line. It will not break even after many years of use. For example, one mala I have was restrung with this kind of line in 1994. It is still fine.

Do not use monofilament line. etc.

Also it is easy to find this kind of line in yellow, red and so on.

M

lorem said:

Cool. I restrung my wrist mala with monofilament and yeah much stronger but no longer works as wrist mala--but good for counting when i was at work.

Why the braided line?

Malcolm wrote:

It is more flexible and it is stronger.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, December 1st, 2014 at 10:57 PM

Title: Re: Independent Research on Chogyam Trungpa

Content:

Jikan said:

I'd like to know if there's a sober assessment out there someplace.

Malcolm wrote:

I haven't seen one. He is either lionized or demonized.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, December 1st, 2014 at 10:20 PM

Title: Re: mala broke

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The best thing for mālās is fifteen pound braided fishing line. It will not break even after many years of use. For example, one mala I have was restrung with this kind of line in 1994. It is still fine.

Do not use monofilament line. etc.

Also it is easy to find this kind of line in yellow, red and so on.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, December 1st, 2014 at 9:34 PM

Title: Re: Independent Research on Chogyam Trungpa

Content:

Jikan said:

I think Trungpa was more influential to the institutionalization of Buddha Dharma in the US than HHDL was until the early 1980s, and made a deeper impression into US culture at that time than HHDL did at that time.

.

Malcolm wrote:

CTR certainly made an big impression in pop culture, but his arrival in the US was nothing like Padmasambhava's arrival to Tibet. And I still think over all HHDL has had a more lasting impact, and even arguably an earlier one through Thurman, Hopkins, etc.

In the end, CTR produced Shambhala, which is a silo, like most Dharma centers.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, December 1st, 2014 at 9:22 PM

Title: Re: Benefits of anthropomorphizing elements and aggregates?

Content:

anjali said:

Two seemingly different approaches (deity yoga vs direct looking), both involve transformation/training in pure vision, and both are effective if properly practiced. Am I missing something? KTR mentions the path of means. Is this distinction I'm exploring in the two different approaches really about the difference between path of means and path of knowledge?

Malcolm wrote:

This is the path of self-liberation. Great if you can do it...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, December 1st, 2014 at 9:06 PM

Title: Re: i can't stop whinging and backstabbing

Content:

Punya said:

My apologies for whatever part I played in your decision to attend this group's session straightpunk. We can't talk about nkt here but I did have this to say in relation to another group recently.

straightpunk said:

Thanks for the quote, no need to apologize, you didn't know what class i was attending and i still felt good getting out there and doing it with all my anxiety issues and so forth, which i actually overcome with (among a few other things) the help of your encouragement to do something that might help with my progress.

Malcolm wrote:

Where do you live?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, December 1st, 2014 at 9:08 AM

Title: Re: Benefits of anthropomorphizing elements and aggregates?

Content:

anjali said:

It seems that the same realizations are necessary in both approaches. If this is a correct assessment, is there any reason to believe that one method is particularly more efficacious than the other?

Malcolm wrote:

The sūtra approach never works with pure vision. Hence the efficacy of the Vajrayāna approach.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, December 1st, 2014 at 9:06 AM

Title: Re: Independent Research on Chogyam Trungpa

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Total hyperbole. HHDL is far more influential and important in the spread of Dharma in the US than Trungpa will ever be.

Jikan said:

He surely is now.

Malcolm wrote:

He always was.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, November 30th, 2014 at 9:52 PM

Title: Re: Benefits of anthropomorphizing elements and aggregates?

Content:

anjali said:

Is it really necessary to anthropomorphize the elements (or aggregates, or afflictions) as deities to learn to recognize the elements as not separate from our buddha-nature?

Take, for example, the affliction anger and it's Buddha, Akshobhya. (Sangye Chenma is Akshobya's consort.) How does visualizing Akshobhya and doing self-generation/completion practice benefit the practitioner more than just directly arousing a sense of anger and investigating it's emptiness, and learning to experience it as an expression of the mind's nature--without the deity yoga?

Malcolm wrote:

Deity yoga cuts our afflictive relationship with the five aggregates and so on. That is why it is necessary, even for Dzogchen practitioners. This is because we cannot remain in a state of instant presence 24/7. Therefore, we use the path of transformation until we can.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Sunday, November 30th, 2014 at 7:31 AM
Title: Re: i can't stop whinging and backstabbing
Content:

straightpunk said:
What center was this?
It wasn't at a center, there are no centers here, it was just a class that has been coming to town for the last four months or something. It is called "Modern Buddhism & Meditation for a Happier Life". It's the best thing i could find without having to drive forever.

Malcolm wrote:
This an NKT sponsored course. Run a search on New Kadampa Tradition.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Sunday, November 30th, 2014 at 6:15 AM
Title: Re: i can't stop whinging and backstabbing
Content:

straightpunk said:
So i finally went to a community Buddhist teaching, it was very Tibetan but modernized i think. The teaching started off with this Buddha prayer meditation where the lady turned on a tape and sung, this was very uncomfortable and almost had me running out of the room, but i managed to keep an open mind and not be so judgy. After that we moved on to the teaching of some old monk (i can't remember his name) and the teaching of how anger solves nothing and patience is the antidote. It was all very relevant to me, also all about how it leads to talking about people to other people (backstabbing).
It was reassuring and good to talk to other people about these things, i threw some questions out there which i got some nice answers. The actual talking with real life people about Buddhism and these situations was great and don't regret it at all, but i don't think i got much more out of it than i have out of books and probably this forum as well...probably less
I will look out for other classes and attend them if i can, and i would love a teacher, but when asking about finding a teacher at the end of the class it doesn't sound like i would have much luck.

Malcolm wrote:
What center was this?

Author: Malcolm
Date: Sunday, November 30th, 2014 at 4:59 AM
Title: Re: Independent Research on Chogyam Trungpa

Content:

Jikan said:

I'm looking for recommendations for history or biography assessing Trungpa Rinpoche's impact on Buddhism in North America, North American culture overall, or Buddhism overall. It's not hard to find observations like this one:

Sam Bercholz said:

To see Trungpa Rinpoche is a very difficult thing because we only see this person who walked this land and taught, gave hundreds of talks, and so on. In terms of a wider perspective of history, Trungpa Rinpoche's arrival into North America in 1970 is equivalent to Padmasambhava's arrival into Tibet hundreds of years before that ... Trungpa Rinpoche's arrival in America, and what he did in those seventeen years is one of the most incredible things in Buddhist history.

Jikan said:

http://www.chronicleproject.com/stories_131.html "

onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;" onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

I don't doubt it. I'd just like to see an assessment coming from an outsider looking in, with more of a birds-eye perspective. Preferably something that has survived peer-review.

Thank you in advance for any recommendations.

Malcolm wrote:

Total hyperbole. HHDL is far more influential and important in the spread of Dharma in the US than Trungpa will ever be.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, November 30th, 2014 at 4:09 AM

Title: Re: Benefits of anthropomorphizing elements and aggregates?

Content:

lorem said:

Okay sacred outlook. The Vidyahara, The Heart of the Buddha

Reflection.

EDIT

Some books to read for people who are interested. Thanks guys!

Malcolm wrote:

Something like that, but I more had in mind a text by the great Dzogchen master, Shabkar Tshogdrug Rangdrol that definitely should be translated, The Emanational Volume of Pure Vision, part of his Cycle of Nine Emanational Books that exists in four volumes in his collected works.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, November 30th, 2014 at 3:24 AM

Title: Re: Benefits of anthropomorphizing elements and aggregates?

Content:

lorem said:

The victors, the peaceful and wrathful deities.

<https://www.amazon.com/Magic-Dance-Thinley-Norbu/dp/0877738858>

Is the OP question why don't we just work with the elements directly?

Malcolm wrote:

It is because they are the impure vision. Even in Dzogchen it is necessary to work with pure vision.

lorem said:

tag nang? What Tibetan word for pure vision are you using here?

Malcolm wrote:

dag snang.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, November 30th, 2014 at 3:11 AM

Title: Re: Benefits of anthropomorphizing elements and aggregates?

Content:

lorem said:

The victors, the peaceful and wrathful deities.

<https://www.amazon.com/Magic-Dance-Thinley-Norbu/dp/0877738858>

Is the OP question why don't we just work with the elements directly?

Malcolm wrote:

It is because they are the impure vision. Even in Dzogchen it is necessary to work with pure vision.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, November 30th, 2014 at 1:55 AM

Title: Re: Benefits of anthropomorphizing elements and aggregates?

Content:

Astus said:

Buddhas are perfectly enlightened beings. Ordinary beings are made of elements and aggregates. That all beings are made of buddhas is a statement connecting the beginning (samsara) with the end (nirvana). It is not that one should see a toenail as a buddha with arms, legs and a golden aura.

Malcolm wrote:
Not in sūtra...

Author: Malcolm
Date: Sunday, November 30th, 2014 at 1:54 AM
Title: Re: Rebirth (split topic: "Ornament o.t. Great Vehicle Sutra
Content:
Punya said:
By what mechanism can a cognitive error continue or manifest? And as far as I can tell, you haven't answered my last question. (Sorry I have to go out now but I'll be back later to read your answer.)

Malcolm wrote:
Through the mechanism of grasping at a self.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Saturday, November 29th, 2014 at 11:30 PM
Title: Re: Teachers and credentials (OT: Before teaching...)
Content:

lorem said:
I listen to Malcolm. Although I did allude to the fact that if he has concerns about the Gandenpas seeing Dorje Setrap as a wisdom protector he should talk to someone authoritative in the Geluk tradition and have it clarified.

Malcolm wrote:
There is nothing to clarify on this score, HHDL even states that Setrap is a mundane protector of the gyal po class, like Pehar, to whom he is subordinate, or Ta'og.

lorem said:
Okay then I will need to search for where he states this. And if so it is interesting that it has not been clarified.

Malcolm wrote:
It has been clarified — Setrab is the wrathful emanation of Brahma, so it is not possible for him to be a wisdom protector. The Dalai Lama spoke about this in several lectures concerning protectors, clarifying that even if it is held that Setrab is an emanation of Amitabha, it is no more appropriate to regard him as a wisdom protector than it is to regard the Gyalpo Ku-nga as wisdom protectors, who are held to be emanations of the five Buddha families.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, November 29th, 2014 at 10:44 PM

Title: Re: Retreat: English or Tibetan?

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

didn't the tibetans translate the sadhanas in the sadhanamala and other sources from sanskrit into tibetan? why would it be better for a native english speaker to do them in tibetan?

Malcolm wrote:

If one is interested to improve one's Tibetan, recite it in Tibetan. If you don't care about improving your Tibetan, recite it in English.

Aesthetics are a secondary concern.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, November 29th, 2014 at 10:08 PM

Title: Re: Retreat: English or Tibetan?

Content:

Losang Rabjor said:

Hello,

I am about to enter into my first retreat and although I can read Tibetan and do my short sadhana in Tibetan, the long version is a bit difficult to follow.

Would it be smart to do the long sadhana in English or try to push through with the Tibetan version?

I was told by a friend that doing the long practice in Tibetan would be of better use because doing the sadhana four times a day would greatly speed up my familiarity with the long practice. Any ideas? What about starting the retreat in English and slowly transitioning to the Tibetan version?

Thanks ahead of time for your input.

Malcolm wrote:

If you understand the visualizations, then do it in Tibetan. Even better, before your retreat, translate it into English, then do it in Tibetan.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, November 29th, 2014 at 5:54 AM

Title: Re: Rebirth (split topic: "Ornament o.t. Great Vehicle Sutra

Content:

Punya said:

Malcolm said: Sentient beings are cognitive errors propelled through birth after birth by the root obscuration of I-making.

The Gelugpas (and maybe others) say it is the "mere I" that continues from life to life and that this "mere I" is not the "I" in this life eg Johh who lives in Britain and is a university professor etc etc or the "I" of the previous life eg Maria who lived in Spain and is a catholic nun etc etc. What does this "mere I" (or whatever other label is appropriate) consist of (the term cognitive errors doesn't make any sense to me), what is the "I" in the "mere I" that needs to be abandoned (its obviously much more subtle than the "I" of this life) and how is it explained that the "mere I" takes its specific karmic propensities from life to life and not some other "mere I"s propensities.

Malcolm wrote:

Sentient beings are a cognitive error in the sense that the "mere I" is the mistaken habit of "I making", i.e. a sentient being is nothing more nor less than this cognitive error.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 27th, 2014 at 10:56 PM

Title: Re: Before teaching to somebody...

Content:

lorem said:

I listen to Malcolm. Although I did allude to the fact that if he has concerns about the Gandenpas seeing Dorje Setrap as a wisdom protector he should talk to someone authoritative in the Geluk tradition and have it clarified.

Malcolm wrote:

There is nothing to clarify on this score, HHDL even states that Setrap is a mundane protector of the gyal po class, like Pehar, to whom he is subordinate, or Ta'og.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 27th, 2014 at 9:44 PM

Title: Re: Book recommendations about rebirth, reincarnation

Content:

Greg said:

Nonetheless, the names of the Kings and so forth did appear to beings at one time.

Malcolm wrote:

The idea that Buddhas cannot know conventional things independently of the sense cognitions of sentient beings must be false because those cognitions themselves are relative.

Greg said:

But Buddhas do not know the hair color of the son of a barren woman because there is nothing to know. The thing in question is utterly nonexistent, having never even appeared. How is karma across lifetimes any different?

Malcolm wrote:

It is clearly different in so far as a) the Buddha clearly taught such ripening was unerring and b) your analogy is clearly false. Intentions (karmas) are obviously not like barren women.

Greg said:

As for your second point, that is like saying sky flowers have no intrinsic nature that prevents them from blooming in the sky. It is an essentially meaningless assertion that explains nothing.

Malcolm wrote:

The problem is that you are looking for a medium of transference, and Madhyamakas in general reject that there is one, apart from a dharma called a nondissipation (avipraṇāśa, chud mi za ba, which Nāgārjuna states as an opinion he prefers and defends), which functions like a debt. For example, when you borrow money or incur a debt, there is no actual medium that conveys that debt from one moment to the next. But when you owe a debt, everyone agrees that you must pay up when it is demanded of you. When it is paid, the note still exists, even though it can no longer be enforced. Likewise, when one engages in a karma, even though the act itself has ceased, a dharma called a nondissipation is created. This is why the Buddha says:

"The action of corporal beings does not dissipate even in hundreds of eons."

Nāgārjuna himself states:

Emptiness and non-annihilation,
samsara and impermanence,
the Buddha explained
the phenomena [chos] of nondissipation of karmas.

Even though karmas cease upon acting, their effect do not dissipate unless this nondissipation is removed by the path, or by moving into a dhātu where a given nondissipation is left behind because it can function in that sphere.

And this all comes about because karmas, like everything else, have no inherent nature. For which reason Candrakīrti simply says that karmas ripen because there is no nature which prevents their ripening due to fact of nondissipation.

Thus karmas are not like barren women, and do engender progeny called nondissipation.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 27th, 2014 at 10:19 AM

Title: Re: Book recommendations about rebirth, reincarnation

Content:

Greg said:

How can you have saṃvṛti that only appears to aryas? Isn't the definition of saṃvṛti that it is the false perception of the deluded?

Malcolm wrote:

Nothing is outside the omniscience of a buddha, including relative truth. They have the capacity to know the karma of others. They have all six abhijñās, so of course they know the karma of sentient beings.

Greg said:

Saṃvṛti is by definition the false perception of the deluded, and nothing else. The omniscience of a buddha includes the saṃvṛti that sentient beings perceive--because that is the only thing saṃvṛti is. Sentient beings are not having false perceptions of the workings of karma across lifetimes, so there is nothing for the omniscience of a buddha to know. The fact that karmic action at a distance can't be accounted for in prasaṅgika is clearly a weak point in the system.

Malcolm wrote:

As for the first point, well, this obviously not the case despite the definition of saṃvṛti — for example, when the Buddha says "When so on so live in such and such time, his clan name was x, the king's name was Y...", such information is not available to ordinary people. If we accept what you are claiming, someone at some time must have this idea in their minds in order for it to be known by the Buddha, thus you are placing firm restrictions on what a Buddha may know. A Buddha knows all things both in terms of their nature and their characteristics.

Secondly, karma has no intrinsic nature which prevents its ripening at a time in the future. Therefore, this is not weak link you suppose.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 27th, 2014 at 3:21 AM

Title: Re: Ancient continents, a topic for meditation

Content:

lorem said:

I could be wrong but with him the knowledge just arose, the transcendental wisdom as such, the seeing was there.

Malcolm wrote:

Yeah, you are wrong. When the Buddha was engaged in recalling his past lives, he had not yet woken up. Through remembering his past lives, he understood karma and dependent origination. Through applying the view of dependent origination he attained buddhahood.

lorem said:

Okay go halvesies. To recall past lives means he was already bodhisattva (first bhumi?). Different than us pondering.

Malcolm wrote:

No, even Hindu meditators can recall many past lives without being realized people.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 27th, 2014 at 3:20 AM

Title: Re: Book recommendations about rebirth, reincarnation

Content:

Greg said:

How can you have saṃvṛti that only appears to aryas? Isn't the definition of saṃvṛti that it is the false perception of the deluded?

Malcolm wrote:

Nothing is outside the omniscience of a buddha, including relative truth. They have the capacity to know the karma of others. They have all six abhijñās, so of course they know the karma of sentient beings.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 27th, 2014 at 2:06 AM

Title: Re: Book recommendations about rebirth, reincarnation

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The prasangika perspective on karma is that it is like a debt.

In terms of rebirth, what takes rebirth is the habit of imputing an unreal "I". This habit not only can create karma but can receive its ripening, just as by using the imputation car we can both drive it and crash it.

Karma is likened to a debt. This is Nagārjuna's preferred relative truth version of karma. Also Candrakīrti accepts this.

Greg said:

Still, that is just a another, alternate metaphor, not an explanation. When it comes to saṃvṛti, my understanding is that prasaṅgikas simply accept the conventions of deluded beings as dependently arisen mere appearances. But an action performed by a sentient being in one lifetime, which comes to fruition three lifetimes later, is not something that appears to anyone. So how can it be differentiated from an utter nonexistent like the son of a barren woman?

Malcolm wrote:

But such karma does appear to someone, i.e, buddha or someone with similar capacity of wisdom. It may not appear to you, but relatively speaking, many things do not appear to you which appear to others of higher or more refined faculties.

The actual dharma in question is called an avipranaśa, an "indestructable".

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 27th, 2014 at 1:01 AM

Title: Re: Book recommendations about rebirth, reincarnation

Content:

Greg said:

I never felt like I encountered a persuasive explanation of karma & rebirth from a Prasaṅgika perspective. At the level of saṃvṛti, karmic seed and ripening separated by lifetimes does not appear. At the level of paramārtha it does not exist. Therefore, like the horns of a rabbit, it must be completely wrong.

Malcolm wrote:

The prasangika perspective on karma is that it is like a debt.

In terms of rebirth, what takes rebirth is the habit of imputing an unreal "I". This habit not only can create karma but can receive its ripening, just as by using the imputation car we can both drive it and crash it.

lorem said:

Isn't potential?

Malcolm wrote:

Karma is likened to a debt. This is Nagārjuna's preferred relative truth version of karma. Also Candrakīrti accepts this.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 27th, 2014 at 12:45 AM

Title: Re: Book recommendations about rebirth, reincarnation

Content:

Greg said:

I never felt like I encountered a persuasive explanation of karma & rebirth from a Prasaṅgika perspective. At the level of saṃvṛti, karmic seed and ripening separated by lifetimes does not appear. At the level of paramārtha it does not exist. Therefore, like the horns of a rabbit, it must be completely wrong.

Malcolm wrote:

The prasangika perspective on karma is that it is like a debt.

In terms of rebirth, what takes rebirth is the habit of imputing an unreal "I". This habit not only can create karma but can receive its ripening, just as by using the imputation car we can both drive it and crash it.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 27th, 2014 at 12:39 AM

Title: Re: Ancient continents, a topic for meditation

Content:

lorem said:

I could be wrong but with him the knowledge just arose, the transcendental wisdom as such, the seeing was there.

Malcolm wrote:

Yeah, you are wrong. When the Buddha was engaged in recalling his past lives, he had not yet woken up. Through remembering his past lives, he understood karma and dependent origination. Through applying the view of dependent origination he attained buddhahood.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 26th, 2014 at 8:26 AM

Title: Re: Did the historical Buddha taught Vajrayana Tantra?

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

It may not be "for common consumption" as a teaching, but it isn't hidden info either, at least not the basic presentation...it exists in a number of non-restricted books and teachings AFAIK.

Malcolm wrote:

In reality, it is something connected with empowerments. So it really should not be discussed so much in a public place, regardless of how many books it may be published in.

Johnny Dangerous said:

I'd say the cats out of the bag on that one, since we could immediately find available teachings on Google, i've heard podcasts that discuss it, etc. Are you suggesting we just stop talking about it?

Malcolm wrote:
Yeah, pretty much.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Wednesday, November 26th, 2014 at 8:23 AM
Title: Re: Did the historical Buddha taught Vajrayana Tantra?
Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

It may not be "for common consumption" as a teaching, but it isn't hidden info either, at least not the basic presentation..it exists in a number of non-restricted books and teachings AFAIK.

Malcolm wrote:

In reality, it is something connected with empowerments. So it really should not be discussed so much in a public place, regardless of how many books it may be published in. As Sachen states:

In general, Secret Mantra makes dependent origination into the path. Since all dependent originations are arranged at the time of the empowerment, in the beginning it is very important to obtain completely the four empowerment from the guru. That empowerment is not merely a symbol, not merely an introduction and not merely a blessing.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Wednesday, November 26th, 2014 at 8:12 AM
Title: Re: Did the historical Buddha taught Vajrayana Tantra?
Content:

odysseus said:

Otherwise, no comment about Malcolm ´s elite club aspirations. lol

Malcolm wrote:

Vajrayāna is not an elite club, anyone can join, but it once having joined, there are many things that ought to be kept secret and for very good reason. Things like the arrangement of the five aggregates into the five families and so on are not principles that are for common consumption. As I said, if you are really interested, take it seriously, find a qualified master such as HH Dalai Lama, HH Sakya Trizin, HH Karmapa, etc., or someone whom they have appointed as a person qualified to lead students on the Vajrayāna path and begin your studies in the proper way.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Wednesday, November 26th, 2014 at 8:08 AM
Title: Re: Did the historical Buddha taught Vajrayana Tantra?
Content:

odysseus said:

OK, just please leave my scepticism aside for now, untill I find a teacher to properly clarify this. But for now, this direct comparison seems to me an impossibility right now. Yes, I see the connotations, but I won't take these assertions for granted just like that.

Malcolm wrote:

Look, if you want to understand these things, you need to find a teacher, receive empowerment, take it seriously.

You clearly don't have any knowledge of Vajrayāna, which is fine, but your objections are coming from a place of complete ignorance about it. There are many teachings in Vajrayāna which are not shared with common Mahāyāna. Rather than flatly saying that well informed people are wrong, use a little humility and understand that you don't know everything.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 26th, 2014 at 8:01 AM

Title: Re: Did the historical Buddha taught Vajrayana Tantra?

Content:

odysseus said:

Nice schematic. But to me it looks like another way of putting everything into analytical order, like a mathematical equation.

To add it up, it's another misinterpretation of the Dhyani Buddhas.

Come up with something better before anyone can convince me that there's an obvious logical relationship between the five heaps and the five transcendent buddhas.

BTW, who said there's now 5 poisons? There's the notion of 3 poisons only (wanting, anger and unknowing). And what is Padma- and Karma-buddha-family really?

jmlee369 said:

From the Gelug Lama Chopa:

དོར་ཇེ་ཀུའི་ཀླུང་ཚུལ་གྱིས་བཞུགས་པའི་ཕུང་པོ་རྩ་མ་དག་བདེ་གསལ་གསུང་། dor je kyil trung tshül gyi zhug päi phung po nam dag de sheg nga

Sitting in the vajra-position, enhaloed by a five-colored rainbow.

Totally pure, your skandhas are the five sugatas

Is Panchen Losang Chokyi Gyaltsen authoritative enough of a source, or do we need to pull up the text of the Guhyasamaja Tantra for you?

Malcolm wrote:

This person obviously has no knowledge of Vajrayāna, so why are you risking your samayas by trying to inform someone who has not been ripened?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 25th, 2014 at 8:12 PM

Title: Re: what makes Buddhist deathlessness not eternalism?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The other thing which comes to mind is exactly why pursue another path, if one has reached the culmination of the first, unless the second path is more profound?

M

Karma Dorje said:

Sorry, missed this earlier. We have discussed this on other threads and in person: my view is that there is much that is explicit in Buddhadharma that is either implicit or missing in other paths. As such it is the most complete and direct approach to realization. Because emptiness is discussed explicitly and at length, it avoids many of the pitfalls of other paths that emphasize the awareness aspect.

For someone who has reached the goal of any of these paths, I think we can agree that all that remains is working for the welfare of others. Some bodhisattvas have renovated their own tradition, others developed new religions in places where there were none. Still others bring the view of realization to paths that either lack it completely or where it has become obscured.

Why continue to practice another path alongside one that is already complete?

Pretty much any symbol system can be used to convey the path by a mahasiddha (and many may have been the projects of prior bodhisattvas in the first place).

One can form connections to countless beings that may not have the karma to practice Buddhadharma directly and thereby hook them into eventual practice of a liberating path.

Certain practices (for example bhakti) can aid in character development.

The associated beings propitiated may bring particular temporal benefits.

Incorrigibility is entertaining.

I am sure that's not an exhaustive list, but this is the gist of why I continue to practice more than one path at the same time.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, your comments are rather self-defeating then.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 25th, 2014 at 8:10 PM

Title: Re: what makes Buddhist deathlessness not eternalism?

Content:

Son of Buddha said:

The concept of Moksha in the Hindu Religion is mainly of two types. These are personal and impersonal. Moksha is defined as the loving, eternal union with God and considered the highest perfection of existence. In Advaita philosophy Moksha is union with the oneness which Advaita advocates.

Malcolm wrote:

First, Advaita is not union with oneness. The Advaita model is that oneself is Brahmin, and always has been, described through the four Mahāvakyas:

Consciousness is Brahman

I am Brahman

That thou art

This Atman is Brahman

Son of Buddha said:

Ramanuja, an 11th century hindu philosopher, believed in the principle of vishishtadvaita (qualified non-dualism). According to Ramanuja, the individual soul is not identical with god. So, a devotee may worship god even after liberation or moksha. Moksha can be attained through bhakti (devotion), which involves the constant remembering of god or the surrender of the individual self to god.

Malcolm wrote:

Not exactly — in this philosophy, everything is part of Brahman and Brahman in the form of Ishvara is part of everything. Thus they refer to three principles which are all part of Brahman: Ishvara (Parabrahman), the sentient beings (chit-brahman) and the insentient Universe (achit-brahman). Ishvara and the personal self are identical. While not the best source, it tallies with my personal studies, thus Wiki states:

Rāmānujā chooses to take the position of universal identity. He interprets this passage to mean the subsistence of all attributes in a common underlying substratum. This is referred to as samānādhikaranya. Thus Rāmānujā says the purport of the passage is to show the unity of all beings in a common base. Ishvara (Parabrahman) who is the Cosmic Spirit for the pan-organistic body consisting of the Universe and sentient beings, is also simultaneously the innermost self (Atmān) for each individual sentient being (Jīvā). All the bodies, the Cosmic and the individual, are held in an adjectival relationship (aprthak-siddhi) in the one Ishvara.

<https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Vishishtadvaita> " onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

So the idea that each individual can attain a personal "Enlightenment" is something that can be found in Hinduism

Again, it is not exactly like that. Irregardless of the beliefs of the masses, the dominant philosophy of the six darshanas is Vedanta, and among the forms of Vedanta, Advaita is the dominant form.

Son of Buddha said:

There are no differences between one Buddha and another in terms of realization; there are differences in terms of aspirations, and so on., which give rise to differences in sentient beings karmic connections with this buddhfield and that, and so on. In short, everyone who becomes a Buddha starts out as a sentient being, and there is a unique rosary of clarity that continues from the time of being a sentient being through the attainment of Vajradhara which forms the relative basis for Buddhahood.

But doesn't this type of view impute a individual self upon Buddhahood? essentially the individual self(person) is actually the one who is attaining Buddhahood, wouldn't this make the individual person/self the "attainer" and Enlightenment just a "object" that is attained by the person/self?

Malcolm wrote:

[/quote]

Relatively speaking, the Buddha states many times "When I attained awakening...", "Before I attained awakening" and "After I attained awakening" and so on. Ultimately of course there is no one who attains buddhahood, etc., and as Haribhadra points out in the Aloka Prajñāpāramitā commentary, the entire path, from beginning to end, is illusory. So this is why we must understand this through the two truths. For this reason it is said that the basis is the two truths, the path is the two accumulations, and the result is the two kāyas.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 25th, 2014 at 8:46 AM

Title: Re: what makes Buddhist deathlessness not eternalism?

Content:

Son of Buddha said:

Isn't this the same Idea as the Hindu notion that everyone has an individual soul or personality that will attain Moshka?

Malcolm wrote:

Hindus don't really have that idea.

Son of Buddha said:

also doesn't this create a duality between Buddha's? Do Buddha now all have different individual personalities? I was always taught that there is no difference between Buddha's and the only reason they have individual names is because we gave them different names to distinguish one Buddha manifestation from another, but to view them as different "Buddha's" is to create a duality in Enlightenment.

Malcolm wrote:

There are no differences between one Buddha and another in terms of realization; there are differences in terms of aspirations, and so on., which give rise to differences in sentient beings karmic connections with this buddhfield and that, and so on. In short, everyone who becomes a Buddha starts out as a sentient being, and there is a unique rosary of clarity that continues from the time of being a sentient being through the attainment of Vajradhara which forms the relative basis for Buddhahood.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 25th, 2014 at 8:43 AM

Title: Re: Did the historical Buddha taught Vajrayana Tantra?

Content:

Matylda said:

I am very reluctant to write about it, but yes indeed there is such thing within zen tradition. However it is reserved for "graduate" priests, so to say... And there is clear vision of dharmakaya, sambhogakaya and nirmanakaya as well, what is done mostly in 100day retreat which is a requirement to perform certain rituals later. Rereat may or may not be strict, however the room of the retreat person by no means could be entered by anyone else. Due to certain visual set up of special altar etc. As for the lineage... its origin is mostly tendai, some lineages come from shingon and for example in soto zen it is reserved for people who did receive dharma transmission and have sizeable training already.

Dharma transmission includes things like abhisheka and proper procedure including the use of abhisheka water, empowering the water, mantras mudras etc. etc. and taking the proper form at that time... I mean non-human form..

Malcolm wrote:

This is Mantrayāna.

Matylda said:

Well,still I guess it is not vajrayana practice...

Malcolm wrote:

As I said, then these are proper Mantrayāna practices.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 25th, 2014 at 7:44 AM

Title: Re: what makes Buddhist deathlessness not eternalism?

Content:

conebeckham said:

Well, is the "Nature of Consciousness" itself dependently arisen? Or not? Does it belong to the subset, even if it is not?

Sherab said:

I understand it, ye she is not dependently arisen.

Malcolm wrote:

that depends on which ye shes...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 25th, 2014 at 5:18 AM

Title: Re: what makes Buddhist deathlessness not eternalism?

Content:

Karma Dorje said:

For me, the choice of heeding decades of personal instruction from my guru

There are clearly distinctions between one contemplative discipline and another. They are not anywhere nearly as yawning a chasm as intellectuals make them out to be.

Malcolm wrote:

Asserting that one's guru is/was awakened is of course a desiderata for any disciple, but you can understand our reluctance to accept this merely on your word, having never met the fellow in question, and given that your reportage is completely at odds with centuries of discourse and polemics on both sides by masters also supposedly realized in each of their respective traditions. The choice one faces is do we believe what you assert, or do we believe our own tradition?

M

Karma Dorje said:

I am not suggesting that you should accept anything at all on my say so. I am merely stating what my incorrigibility stems from. You can believe whatever you like this week. I think you overstate the usefulness of polemics against other contemplative disciplines to beginners on the path, who by and large don't want to hear what they view as mere dogmatism, particularly when there is quite obviously so much in common with other paths.

Malcolm wrote:

First, I was not suggesting you were incorrigible, that was pointed at someone else.

It is not polemics that are the point, but freeing ourselves of conceptual constructs and their pitfalls, clearly identified. The point is not to criticize others, though this point is often lost, the point is to clearly set out the view to be realized in relief, by examining the views to be discarded one by one, step by step, lower to higher, beginning with annihilationism then all views of self and all realist views, until we discover the true meaning of freedom from proliferation ourselves.

Most of us have neither sufficient faith that devotion to a guru can be our sole remedy, no matter how realized they are, nor are we sufficiently intelligent that we can avoid erroneous views without study. Therefore, for the plodders amongst us, like myself, a careful program of study in what are incorrect paths and correct paths, lower paths and higher paths, slower paths and faster paths is a necessity, not just a desiderata. In the meantime, we cultivate the best we can, devotion to gurus we do have, since this indeed is the fastest way to liberation.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 25th, 2014 at 4:51 AM

Title: Re: what makes Buddhist deathlessness not eternalism?

Content:

Karma Dorje said:

For me, the choice of heeding decades of personal instruction from my guru

There are clearly distinctions between one contemplative discipline and another. They are not anywhere nearly as yawning a chasm as intellectuals make them out to be.

Malcolm wrote:

Asserting that one's guru is/was awakened is of course a desiderata for any disciple, but you can understand our reluctance to accept this merely on your word, having never met the fellow in question, and given that your reportage is completely at odds with centuries of discourse and polemics on both sides by masters also supposedly realized in each of their respective traditions. The choice one faces is do we believe what you assert, or do we believe our own tradition?

The other thing which comes to mind is exactly why pursue another path, if one has reached the culmination of the first, unless the second path is more profound?

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 25th, 2014 at 4:09 AM

Title: Re: Did the historical Buddha taught Vajrayana Tantra?

Content:

lorem said:

1) If you were a higher-level bodhisattva you could just enter the mandala of a deity, i.e. Tilopa and most likely Lama Shang.

Malcolm wrote:

Nope.

lorem said:

2) You do the practice with the permission of the lama to habitualize yourself until you get the empowerment and then it will ripen--hopefully into full bloom because of the prior "heavy lifting".

Malcolm wrote:

Nope. You and the lama in question just go to lower realms, as is clearly taught by the Buddha in the Mahāmudratilaka tantra among others.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 25th, 2014 at 1:24 AM

Title: Re: what makes Buddhist deathlessness not eternalism?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Those of incorrect understanding are the tirthikas i.e. all views grasping to extremes and grasping to a self.

lorem said:

Okay so you mainly are referring to Hinduism and Jainism.

I was referring to the idea of a collective unconsciousness, which I guess is more new-age then nondual.

Malcolm wrote:

From a Buddhist perspective, there is no such thing as a collective unconscious. This is just more transpersonal bullshit.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 25th, 2014 at 1:16 AM

Title: Re: what makes Buddhist deathlessness not eternalism?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The real problem is that people who come to Buddhadharma do not properly study these non-buddhist tenets, and in doing so, often unwittingly import these views into their practice, for example, imagining the basis (gzhi) is something Brahmin and so on, and concluding the Dzogchen, for example, has the same meaning as Advaita.

lorem said:

Might be clearer to say Nondualism schools are not Dzogchen. There are of course other schools also but I feel a lot of what you're saying is referring to the modern nondualism/neo-buddhist. (??)

Malcolm wrote:

Dzogchen is a part of Buddhadharma. It's basic theory is the same as the rest of Buddhadharma, i.e, suffering arises because of the false grasping to a self.

For example, the Tantra of Self-Arisen Vidyā states:

Further, samasara is as follows:

false view and eternalist view.

The false vehicle is as follows:

held to be three hundred and sixty beliefs in a self.

And:

Likewise, the countless views of a self are included in two. Those are included in both the eternalist view and annihilationist view. Countless views of self come from those two. Likewise, son of a good family, because you have avoided entering a false path, I have summarized the views of a self and demonstrated them.

And:

The true Dharma is free from a self,
free from the extremes of the taints of afflicted minds and so on.

And:

...since there is no appropriation, a self does not exist.

And:

All the objects and conditions of the six consciousness depend on grasping something;
if there is no one-sided grasping, there is bliss free from objects grasped as "mine", empty of phenomena grasped as a self,
and liberated from objects grasped as permanent.

The Tantra of Self-Liberated Vidyā states:

If one conceives of a self, it is a delusion of Māra.

And:

The one great root māra is the concept that grasps a self.

The Union of the Sun and the Moon Tantra states:

"Beyond extremes" is not apprehending a self in things.

And:

Those of incorrect understanding are the tirthikas i.e. all views grasping to extremes and grasping to a self.

Etc., I could go on and on....but I won't.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 25th, 2014 at 12:47 AM

Title: Re: what makes Buddhist deathlessness not eternalism?

Content:

lorem said:

Please define "maintain a tenet system". Thx.

Malcolm wrote:

Those who have an organized set of views and doctrines about liberation and so on, as opposed to those who are without a tenet system, i.e, the uneducated.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 25th, 2014 at 12:46 AM

Title: Re: what makes Buddhist deathlessness not eternalism?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Quite frankly, all of my studies, with Tibetan lamas fluent in Sanskrit educated by Indian Paṇḍitas in the six darshans at Varanasi and with Hindu teachers, have done nothing but reinforce my conviction that the mountain Hindus are climbing is a complete different mountain than the one the Buddha pointed out that we should ascend.

When there are discussions about things like the basis, suchness and so on, some people who are incapable of seeing the ultimate distinctions between Buddhist and tīrthika views keep on introducing their confusion into these conversations necessitating again and again a rehash of the same points. Not for them, of course, because they are clearly incorrigible, but for the benefit of those who are beginners or who have not had the benefit of a solid education in Dharma yet.

smcj said:

You seem passionately insistent that they are different, yet you never articulate what that difference is. You'd do yourself and everyone else a favor by explaining your understanding of the situation.

Malcolm wrote:

You yourself can carefully study Yoga, Samkhya, Advaita, Nyāyā, Vaiśeṣika and Mimamsa and compare them with Vaibhaṣika, Sautrantika, Yogacara and Madhyamaka as I have done.

I have done the heavy lifting, why should I do it for you?

But in reality it boils down to this. There are basically two kinds of views among tīrthikas: eternalist and annihilationist. Among those who follow Buddhadharma there are the three realist tenets, Vaibhaṣika, Sautrantika (one can include the views of the other Nikaya schools here) and Yogacara (a species of nondual realism), and then there is Madhyamaka, the sublime Middle Way, the crown jewel of the Buddha's teaching.

The real problem is that people who come to Buddhadharma do not properly study these non-buddhist tenets, and in doing so, often unwittingly import these views into their practice, for example, imagining the basis (gzhi) is something Brahmin and so on, and concluding the Dzogchen, for example, has the same meaning as Advaita.

As far as rebutting these incorrect views, I have in fact done so for years, at length, in many places.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 25th, 2014 at 12:35 AM

Title: Re: what makes Buddhist deathlessness not eternalism?

Content:

Jikan said:

Hi Malcolm,

It might also be helpful for beginners to clarify just what is meant by the term "tirthika" in Buddhist discourse, because it's easy for an outsider looking over my shoulder (like the one looking over my shoulder a few minutes ago) to suspect that this is a straw-man term without historical basis. How would you rebut such a comment?

I'd always been thought that "tirthika" indicates a category in which certain kinds of positions may be lumped, not necessarily a specific school of thought or social institution or tradition

many thanks

edit:

for context, I think this issue is more extensive than one might expect... here's an example of a newly-relevant-again thread

<http://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=40&t=16819> "
onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;" onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

Malcolm wrote:

It means literally "ford-crosser" and is a term applied to non-Buddhists who maintain a tenet system.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 25th, 2014 at 12:21 AM

Title: Re: Did the historical Buddha taught Vajrayana Tantra?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

If there is visualization of oneself as a deity, or you invite a deity in front of you, than this is exactly what yidam practice is.

Astus said:

Do you mean that visualisation practices like those found in the Pratyutpannasamadhi Sutra and the Amitayurdhyana Sutra count as yidam practice?

Malcolm wrote:

I clarified this — and no.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 24th, 2014 at 11:53 PM

Title: Re: Did the historical Buddha taught Vajrayana Tantra?

Content:

Astus said:

I did not mean yidams are used in practice by followers of Zen or other schools, it's just that I did not see people questioning the validity of it (except for some I have only heard of who despise Tantric/Tibetan Buddhism for some reason, but they are hardly if ever known among Western Buddhists).

Meido said:

Exactly. Again, my only statement was that Zen does not negate the existence of ishta-devata (meaning, that it does not negate the validity of such practices...which is what I took the OP's assertion to be). Shumon Mujintoron is one text that devotes some discussion to a Japanese Zen (Rinzai) view of Tendai and Shingon practices in particular, and it clearly asserts their validity as Buddhadharma (though naturally within its own hierarchy of traditions).

I am not completely unfamiliar with yidam practice. I mentioned the Marici blessing amulets only as an example of everyday Zen engagement with deities that figure in such practices (and mostly because I was literally working on their prep at that moment). The ceremony for empowering these involves mantra, mudra and embodiment as the deity. But I do not call this yidam practice, and since Zen generally doesn't use kanjo but rather takes seeing nature to be the necessary entry into practice, I do not call such things "Vajrayana", whatever their origins.

Sorry for Zen distraction in the Tibetan forum. Had meant to express support, actually.

~ Meido

Malcolm wrote:

If there is visualization of oneself as a deity, or you invite a deity in front of you, than this is exactly what yidam practice is. However, the difficulty lies in how this transmission is communicated from one generation to another. If there is no need for empowerment, i.e., if the idea is that one can simply pick up a text, recite mantras, perform mudras, and so on, this really does not qualify.

I appreciate your expression of support, and understood it as such, but in order to prevent confusion these distinctions must be made.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 24th, 2014 at 10:23 PM

Title: Re: Did the historical Buddha taught Vajrayana Tantra?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Yes of course, Astus, this was never disputed.

Astus said:

Just meant as an extension of Meido's response.

Malcolm wrote:

As above, one cannot consider blessing protective amulets as falling under the heading of Vajrayāna practice, much less Yidam deity practice.

Actually, the term yi dam lha (iṣṭadevatā) is comparatively rare in Indian tantras, is more common in Indian commentaries, while of course it is ubiquitous in Tibetan writing. Nevertheless, my point was that a yidam is a path. That path is not common to common Mahāyāna such as Zen, while of course there is nothing barring anyone from practicing any of the divisions of tantra.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 24th, 2014 at 9:21 PM

Title: Re: Beginning a Ngöndro

Content:

Dharmaswede said:

Dear Malcolm,

Is this translation finished? If so, is it available?

Thank you.

Best Regards,

Jens

Malcolm wrote:

I am in the process of translating the Sakya Ngondro commentary. It has a very extensive section on the four common preliminaries.

I am very nearly done with the translation, and it should be ready for publication sometime next year. Not sure who is going to publish it but since it is being sponsored directly by HH Sakya Trizin, I am sure there will be no problem finding a publisher. When it is published, it will likely be about 350 pages long.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 24th, 2014 at 9:16 PM

Title: Re: Did the historical Buddha taught Vajrayana Tantra?

Content:

Astus said:

From the perspective of East Asian Mahayana - to what Zen belongs to - the validity of Vajrayana is rarely if ever questioned. There is even a "Secret Teaching Division" (volumes 18-21) in the https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Taish%C5%8D_Tripitaka that includes all kinds of Tantric texts. In China many Vajrayana works were translated, especially during the Yuan (Mongolian) dynasty, as the court favoured Tibetan Buddhism. In Japan the Shingon school has existed since the 9th century. So, Tantric teachings and methods are recognised as valid in Mahayana beyond Tibet.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes of course, Astus, this was never disputed.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 24th, 2014 at 9:09 PM

Title: Re: what makes Buddhist deathlessness not eternalism?

Content:

Karma Dorje said:

Oh look, another thread on Hinduism vs. Buddhism on Dharmawheel! How positively scintillating.

Malcolm wrote:

This turn in the conversation is not about Buddhism vs. "Hinduism", it is about the fact that the tīrthikas are not talking about the same thing we are, do not have the same understanding of the basis we do and do not share the same result we achieve, not to mention their path and ours is completely different.

I understand that you have a different point of view, but I do not agree with your point of view on this score in anyway.

Quite frankly, all of my studies, with Tibetan lamas fluent in Sanskrit educated by Indian Paṇḍitas in the six darshans at Varanasi and with Hindu teachers, have done nothing but reinforce my conviction that the mountain Hindus are climbing is a complete different mountain than the one the Buddha pointed out that we should ascend.

When there are discussions about things like the basis, suchness and so on, some people who are incapable of seeing the ultimate distinctions between Buddhist and tīrthika views keep on introducing their confusion into these conversations necessitating again and again a rehash of the same points. Not for them, of course, because they are clearly incorrigible, but for the benefit of those who are beginners or who have not had the benefit of a solid education in Dharma yet.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 24th, 2014 at 9:03 PM

Title: Re: Rebirth (split topic: "Ornament o.t. Great Vehicle Sutra

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Hence, unconsciousness devas as well as the four kinds of formless beings have no sensory experience at all.

We really have no way of examining the consciousness of beings in other realms than animal realm and human realm.

Ambrosius80 said:

Sure we do, abhijñās.

There are so many problems with this theory...but I don't have time to address them. I have justified each of my claims with reasoning, quotes from Buddhist texts, and using science as help. Lets turn the tables: prove to me that you have formed your own point of view after observation and analysis, instead of just reading from books and blindly believing what you have been told. I can guarantee that whatever reasoning you provide, I in turn will find a flaw in it. Why is that? Because there is no correct or wrong point of view, just different outlooks on the same issue. I see no reason to continue arguing like this, considering so far we have had almost exactly the same beliefs, but have used different methods to approach them.

Malcolm wrote:

We do not have anything like the same beliefs. You assert that consciousness is a form of matter, asserting that is composed of electrons (how many, — one, two, three, etc.?). The Buddha asserts that consciousness is a dhātu separate from the four elements and space. The Buddha asserts that matter such as it is, is a mental reification, you assert matter is real, and forms the basis of consciousness and so on, thus your view does not even reach Yogacara, let alone Madhyamaka.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 24th, 2014 at 5:53 AM

Title: Re: Translation Award for Ven. Bhikkhu Bodhi

Content:

Zhen Li said:

There also just aren't as many western Mahayana monks as compared to Theravadan ones. The Zen folks translate their Zen writings sometimes, and Tibetan folks translate what matters to them (i.e. not usually non-Vajrayana Mahayana texts like Sutras in Tibetan).

Malcolm wrote:

Ahem....

<http://84000.co> " onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

You will find many Mahāyāna sutras here, more "every" day.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 24th, 2014 at 5:51 AM

Title: Re: Rebirth (split topic: "Ornament o.t. Great Vehicle Sutra

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

No, actually there is one consciousness that acts through them serially. When you study the dhātu chapter of the kośa carefully you will observe that this is case. These six are just names for one consciousness when it acts through a given sense.

Ambrosius80 said:

But still, without our senses, we would not be conscious.

Malcolm wrote:

Hence, unconsciousness devas as well as the four kinds of formless beings have no sensory experience at all.

Ambrosius80 said:

As for my theory, I have never denied the possibility of a network of electrons forming outside a brain, anchoring to something other than brains, or even forming to another dimensions.

Malcolm wrote:

There are so many problems with this theory...but I don't have time to address them.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 24th, 2014 at 5:37 AM

Title: Re: Did the historical Buddha taught Vajrayana Tantra?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Guhyasamaja traces its line to Śakyāmuni Buddha. Kalacakra was taught by the Buddha in the Dhanyakataka Stupa at Amaravati at the same time he taught Prajñāpāramitā at Rajagriha.

Vajradhara is the sambhogakāya, all nirmanakāyas are emanations of the sambhogakāya.

Bakmoon said:

Thank you for your correction Malcom. I think I remember something about the Kalacakra lineage now that you mention it.

I've heard in other places that the Guhyasamaja Tantra was received by the Mahasiddha Indrabhuti from Vajradhara. Is this referring to a different lineage of the Guhyasamaja Tantra or something?

Malcolm wrote:

No, the story runs that Buddha intuited that Indrabhuti I was interested in the Dharma, so he flew there. Indrabhuti said "I am very interested in practicing Dharma but I need a method of awakening that will not require me to give up my duties as a king and husband (he had 500 wives)." Legend then has it that the Buddha bestowed upon him the Guhyasamaja empowerment during which Indrabhuti fully awakened.

Most people do not understand that abhiśeka is a method of awakening. It is only if someone does not awaken fully or at all during the empowerment that it is necessary to practice sadhana.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 24th, 2014 at 5:12 AM

Title: Re: what makes Buddhist deathlessness not eternalism?

Content:

Karma Dorje said:

The same as saying one dharmakaya for all Buddhas.

Malcolm wrote:

It's really not the same thing at all.

Why? Because when it is said there is only one dharmakāya it means that realization of all Buddhas is the same, not that the continuum of all sentient beings is the same; just like saying that the nature of all fires is heat; nevertheless, every buddha's continuum is distinct and separate. This is not the case with Advaita which insists there is only one purusha for everyone, i.e. that the continuum of all sentient beings is the same.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 24th, 2014 at 4:56 AM

Title: Re: Did the historical Buddha taught Vajrayana Tantra?

Content:

Fortyeightvows said:

Malcom, is it possible to explain a bit of what distinguishes guru veneration from guru yoga? While observing samaya of course. I feel your explanation may help help my practice. You can't have the second without the first I suppose. I think it would be fair to say that veneration is one part of guru yoga.

Malcolm wrote:

Guru yoga is a practice connected with the vajra body.

Of course there are other kinds of gurus, but for this reason and that devotion to them will not constitute a rapid path for realizing mahāmudra or dzogchen in one lifetime.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 24th, 2014 at 4:55 AM

Title: Re: Did the historical Buddha taught Vajrayana Tantra?

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

For sure the Therveda that is popular in the west seems to have been scrubbed of syncretic and esoteric elements. A lot of times when I see people reference Theraveda, it almost seems like what they are talking about is actually (usually western) Pali Canon text criticism version of it, rather than as it's practiced anywhere else.

Bakmoon said:

As a practicing Theravadin myself I find this tendency to be rather annoying. It reeks of protestant Christianity in its mindset and methodology simply being transplanted into Buddhism which to me just seems like a disaster. I think textual criticism can help shed light into certain circumstances, but as the saying goes "when all you have is a hammer, the whole world looks like nails."

Plus, all of the Anuttara Yoga Tantra lineages I've ever heard of trace themselves back to the Buddha Vajradhara or to Samantabhadra Buddha, not to Shakyamuni Buddha, so I don't see what the big deal is.

Malcolm wrote:

Guhyasamaja traces its line to Śakyāmuni Buddha. Kalacakra was taught by the Buddha in the Dhanyakataka Stupa at Amaravati at the same time he taught Prajñāpāramitā at Rajagriha.

Vajradhara is the sambhogakāya, all nirmanakāyas are emanations of the sambhogakāya.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 24th, 2014 at 4:49 AM

Title: Re: what makes Buddhist deathlessness not eternalism?

Content:

Karma Dorje said:

[qsubset of anything. Paramatman is jiva freed from confusion.

Malcolm wrote:

Is there one parātman or many? If there is one, it is transpersonal, if it is many, then what is the difference between Saṃkhya and Advaita?

In reality, Shankara argues there is in reality only one purusha, not many, as in the Saṃkhya system. He makes this abundantly clear in his Yogasutra commentary, as did Ramaswami when he taught us the Yoga sutras, confirming everything I thought about Advaita. Also his teacher of Advaita was the Sankaracarya of Kanchi, the old one, Chandrashekarendra Saraswati, not the new one.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 24th, 2014 at 4:44 AM

Title: Re: Rebirth (split topic: "Ornament o.t. Great Vehicle Sutra

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

You are mistaken sense perceptions for consciousness. They are not the same thing.

Ambrosius80 said:

But according to Buddhist belief, there are six forms of vijñānas; eye consciousness, ear consciousness, nose consciousness, tongue consciousness, body consciousness and mind consciousness. Psychedelics distort most of them, if not all. "Consciousness" is formed by all of them together.

Malcolm wrote:

No, actually there is one consciousness that acts through them serially. When you study the dhātu chapter of the kośa carefully you will observe that this is case. These six are just names for one consciousness when it acts through a given sense.

In any case, the formless realm beings have no brain, so according to you, they cannot be conscious, much less exist.

Of course, if you just want to make up your own Dharma that's fine, but we won't have anything left to discuss since I am a follower of Buddha's Dharma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 24th, 2014 at 3:58 AM

Title: Re: Did the historical Buddha taught Vajrayana Tantra?

Content:

lorem said:

Okay so you are saying the guru practice at the beginning of Jamgon Kongtrul's The Great Path of Awakening is actually a veneration because it is lacking some elements of the full guru sadhanas?

Malcolm wrote:

Kongtrul indicates that at the beginning of practicing mind training, one should do guru yoga as a preliminary. However, he does not detail how that is to be done.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 24th, 2014 at 3:39 AM

Title: Re: Did the historical Buddha taught Vajrayana Tantra?

Content:

BrianG said:

Since we've established that Theravadian esoteric practices don't come from Vajrayana sources, I don't see why that would matter.

Malcolm wrote:

Guru Yoga is a very specific practice, with a very specific theory, with a very specific source. Calling some kind of guru veneration "guru yoga" indicates a lack of understanding of what the yoga in "guru yoga" means.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 24th, 2014 at 2:17 AM

Title: Re: Rebirth (split topic: "Ornament o.t. Great Vehicle Sutra

Content:

Ambrosius80 said:

Nowadays we know as a fact that consciousness is linked to the brain, as is evident when scientists have studied the effects of psychedelic drugs on humans, for example. The visions and hallucinations are caused because the drugs affect certain areas of the brain. That's why they are also called consciousness-altering drugs.

Malcolm wrote:

You are mistaken sense perceptions for consciousness. They are not the same thing.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 24th, 2014 at 1:52 AM

Title: Re: Did the historical Buddha taught Vajrayana Tantra?

Content:

BrianG said:

You left out guru yoga.

Malcolm wrote:

Which requires an HYT empowerment.

BrianG said:

HYT is a Tibetan classification, and has no meaning outside of Tibetan Buddhism.

Malcolm wrote:

Guru yoga is only taught in the Guhyasamaja tantra on up.

It is not actually a Tibetan classification, the classification into four tantras comes from the Vajramāla tantra, etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 24th, 2014 at 1:42 AM

Title: Re: what makes Buddhist deathlessness not eternalism?

Content:

smcj said:

This is the gist of the matter. You reject any Tibetan author that suggests anything of the sort. You have a right to do that. However since this is a public forum it is appropriate to voice dissenting opinions backed by authoritative quotations.

Malcolm wrote:

There aren't any Tibetan authors that do say anything of the kind. They all take great pains to distinguish their views from tīrthika views like Advaita. There are many westerners however who do not understand what they are reading and thus jump to incorrect conclusions, and therefore conflate tīrthika views like Advaita with Buddhadharma, such as yourself. Even the gzhan stong pas (especially the gzhan stong pas) go through great lengths to distinguish their view from the views of non-Buddhists such as Shankara. You do a disservice to them everytime you assert the contrary (based on no evidence whatsoever). Even the Bonpos spend a great deal of time differentiating their views from Advaita and so forth.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 24th, 2014 at 1:40 AM

Title: Re: what makes Buddhist deathlessness not eternalism?

Content:

smcj said:

So evidently Kongtrul disagrees with you, as do others.

Malcolm wrote:

No, actually he does not, you just do not understand what he is saying.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 24th, 2014 at 1:30 AM

Title: Re: what makes Buddhist deathlessness not eternalism?

Content:

Karma Dorje said:

That depends entirely on who is teaching, but of course they are not equivalents. They each derive from their own particular context. However, the terms point to the same basis.

Malcolm wrote:

No, they do not. The basis in Dzogchen and Mahāmudra teachings is not transpersonal, it is personal.

Karma Dorje said:

What is the Sanskrit term you are taking as "transpersonal"? The basis of tantric and vedantic path is always personal.

Malcolm wrote:

Brahmin is transpersonal. In others words, all jivātmans (personal selves) are just subsets, if you will, of parātman (ultimate or transpersonal self). The distinction between the two is merely apparent in other words.

This is not compatible with Dzogchen or Mahāmudra, let alone Buddhadharma, on any level.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 24th, 2014 at 1:25 AM

Title: Re: Did the historical Buddha taught Vajrayana Tantra?

Content:

BrianG said:

You left out guru yoga.

Malcolm wrote:

Which requires an HYT empowerment.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 24th, 2014 at 12:45 AM

Title: Re: what makes Buddhist deathlessness not eternalism?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The basis in Dzogchen and Mahāmudra teachings is not transpersonal, it is personal.

smcj said:

Since you are authorized to teach about Dzogchen you are 100% entitled to put forward that position. There is plenty of commentary to support it and anyone that wants to see it that way is not in error to do so. However as has been discussed in another thread there is no consensus to that effect, specifically among later tibetan authors.

Malcolm wrote:

You don't understand the later Tibetan authors, sorry to say. The only lack of consensus is among westerners who really do not have a grasp of difficult tantric subjects, written in intentional language (i.e. coded), who are also unfamiliar with the broad range of the textual tradition and rely on tiny slices of translations of varying qualities and differing terminologies with which to form their views.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 24th, 2014 at 12:44 AM

Title: Re: Did the historical Buddha taught Vajrayana Tantra?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Secret Mantra is something very specific. None of these Thai practices bear any relationship to Secret Mantra.

BrianG said:

The protection chakra/body mandala I posted above has a Sri Lankan version as well.

So what you're saying is that these practices weren't derived from previous Vajrayana practice. Which is what I thought was likely due to the region's long history of Vajrayana practice(archaeological evidence supports Hevajra practice reaching it's historical peak during the Khmer empire).

That means there must have been a separate esoteric transmission just for SE Asia, which doesn't make much sense to me.

Malcolm wrote:

Correct, what I am saying is that these practices have no clear cut path to the presence of Vajrayāna SE Asia. They are not Vajrayāna practices, whatever else they may be.

The exoteric practice of protection amulets, protective visualizations and so on are wide spread in the Indian culture sphere. That does not make them related to Vajrayāna or even lower Secret Mantra.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, November 23rd, 2014 at 11:31 PM

Title: Re: Did the historical Buddha taught Vajrayana Tantra?

Content:

BrianG said:

My guess is that you are probably resistant to this being called "tantric", due to the lack of an empowerment. Fair enough. Perhaps "derived from tantra, but not tantra" is more accurate.

Malcolm wrote:

I don't think so. Calling these things "tantric" comes from an ignorant and anachronistic use the term from the early 20th century. In other words, the term really has no meaning. There was never any tradition in India that called itself "tantric". There are many traditions in India that followed manuals (tantras), from Ayurveda (in whose texts is found the the earliest use of the term) to Yoga, Kauala, so on and so forth.

Secret Mantra is something very specific. None of these Thai practices bear any relationship to Secret Mantra.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, November 23rd, 2014 at 11:16 PM

Title: Re: The state of Buddhism in the world

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Yes and lots of "political education" too, more of that than Dharma education, that is for sure.

Indrajala said:

In any case, the PRC is a lot more easy on Buddhist institutions in general than ever before. That's my point. There's no religious freedom of course.

Malcolm wrote:

That very much depends on where you are and of what value your monastery is to tourism. It is business, it is not support for Tibetan Buddhism in Tibet for Tibetans. It is for the bourgeois entertainment of curious Chinese tourists. And this phenomena happens in cycles, as it has since the early '80's. A period of relative relaxation, then a crack down, etc. People still flee Tibet to study in India because frankly, they can get a better education in Dharma, though arguably, if they are fortunate to come from a wealthy family, they can get a better secular education in China at this point.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, November 23rd, 2014 at 11:04 PM

Title: Re: The state of Buddhism in the world

Content:

Indrajala said:

They're also even paying for monasteries to be renovated in Tibet (a Tibetan Sakya monk in Nepal told me this)..

Malcolm wrote:

\

For tourism in historic regions.

Indrajala said:

He also mentioned pensions and healthcare support for monastics.

He was pretty honest. He said Sakya monks and monasteries don't get any heat from the authorities, and in fact are getting a lot of material support from the government, especially in recent years.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes and lots of "political education" too, more of that than Dharma education, that is for sure.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, November 23rd, 2014 at 10:48 PM

Title: Re: The state of Buddhism in the world

Content:

Indrajala said:

They're also even paying for monasteries to be renovated in Tibet (a Tibetan Sakya monk in Nepal told me this)..

Malcolm wrote:

\

For tourism in historic regions.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, November 23rd, 2014 at 10:13 PM

Title: Re: Did the historical Buddha taught Vajrayana Tantra?

Content:

BrianG said:

... which certainly has Tantric elements -

Malcolm wrote:

This has more to do with Ayurveda and Yoga than Vajrayāna. It is more accurate to say that certain kinds of Thai Buddhism have yogic elements, rather than "tantric" elements.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, November 23rd, 2014 at 10:10 PM

Title: Re: Rebirth (split topic: "Ornament o.t. Great Vehicle Sutra

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

There is no brain at the time of conception, but in order for there to be conception, a consciousness seeking rebirth must be present. Further, consciousness is not "born", one can find no origin for it at all., like all conditioned things, each stream of consciousness is beginningless.

Ambrosius80 said:

But this just supports my theory about the quantum teleportation of electrons. When one being dies, the electrons in its brain could well end up in the brain of a few weeks old fetus in the womb. There is no beginning or end to this cycle, just one candle lighting another on its last light. I am not saying that its is the brain which "creates" consciousness, I am saying that brain is the vessel that holds it in our bodies as it travels around. And there may be other ways than brains to "store" consiousness.

Malcolm wrote:

This is not how the Buddha taught it. Consciousness is a serially arising monadic entity. It appropriates a physical basis. Its seat is the in center of the body, not the brain.

Ambrosius80 said:

Karma means intention and what follows from intentions.

In other words, a causal event chain. I think we both have the same idea about karma, but just use different words to express it.

Malcolm wrote:

In Buddhadharma, cause and condition is distinct teaching from karma. The way it is taught is as follows: first cause and condition is taught, then dependent origination, then karma, and finally affliction. They should be understood in this order. If you want to understand this all properly, you need to read the Abhidharmakośabhaṣyam by Vasubandhu.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, November 23rd, 2014 at 9:31 PM

Title: Re: Rebirth (split topic: "Ornament o.t. Great Vehicle Sutra

Content:

Jikan said:

Does it follow that the brain, the central nervous system and the rest of the body are epiphenomenal to consciousness, and not the reverse?

Malcolm wrote:

Even if a zygote is formed, without consciousness and its attendant praṇā-vāyu, the zygote will not quicken and develop.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, November 23rd, 2014 at 9:25 PM

Title: Re: Did the historical Buddha taught Vajrayana Tantra?

Content:

mikenz66 said:

Here are some references to Tantric practices in Thailand, etc.

<http://www.dhammadawheel.com/viewtopic.php?f=13&t=10503> "

onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;" onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;" onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;"

onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;" onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;"

<http://www.dhammadawheel.com/viewtopic.php?f=13&t=6599> "

onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;" onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;" onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;"

onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;" onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;"

Mike

Malcolm wrote:

None of this is "tantric". To be a "tantric" practitioner, one must be introduced the path by empowerment (abhiśeka).

BrianG said:

There are empowerments -

<http://www.lersi.net/lersi-mask-initiation/>

Malcolm wrote:

This is not a qualified Vajrayāna abhiśeka, this is a blessing. It is not a path.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, November 23rd, 2014 at 9:04 PM

Title: Re: Rebirth (split topic: "Ornament o.t. Great Vehicle Sutra

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Buddha nature does not "come to be", it is innate.

Ambrosius80 said:

In other words born at the same time with consciousness, which is upheld by the brain.

Malcolm wrote:

There is no brain at the time of conception, but in order for there to be conception, a consciousness seeking rebirth must be present. Further, consciousness is not "born", one can find no origin for it at all., like all conditioned things, each stream of consciousness is beginningless.

Ambrosius80 said:

Up to a point, yes. But there are many things science cannot explain, rebirth, karma, rainbow body, etc.

Karma as a word means a causal event chain.

Malcolm wrote:

Karma means intention and what follows from intentions.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, November 23rd, 2014 at 9:00 PM

Title: Re: what makes Buddhist deathlessness not eternalism?

Content:

Karma Dorje said:

That depends entirely on who is teaching, but of course they are not equivalents. They each derive from their own particular context. However, the terms point to the same basis.

Malcolm wrote:

No, they do not. The basis in Dzogchen and Mahāmudra teachings is not transpersonal, it is personal.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, November 23rd, 2014 at 8:57 PM

Title: Re: Did the historical Buddha taught Vajrayana Tantra?

Content:

mikenz66 said:

Here are some references to Tantric practices in Thailand, etc.

<http://www.dhammadownload.com/viewtopic.php?f=13&t=10503> "

onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;" onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

<http://www.dhammadownload.com/viewtopic.php?f=13&t=6599> "

onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;" onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

Mike

Malcolm wrote:

None of this is "tantric". To be a "tantric" practitioner, one must be introduced the path by empowerment (abhiśeka).

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, November 23rd, 2014 at 8:54 PM

Title: Re: Did the historical Buddha taught Vajrayana Tantra?

Content:

Mkoll said:

I'm not an scholar or certified expert of Theravada, but from my somewhat extensive study there is no recognition of the existence of Yidams because that concept is foreign to Theravada. Similarly, it's like asking why Theravada doesn't recognize the existence of something like guru yoga. They simply aren't present.

BrianG said:

Certain sects of Theravada Buddhism in Thailand practice guru yoga. This may have even been common before the reforms of King Mongkut, in an attempt to make Thai Buddhism seem "modern" to avoid colonization by the west.

Malcolm wrote:

Guru yoga is a very specific practice which comes from anuttarayoga tantra, it does not even exist in Yoga tantra. That said, since anuttarayoga tantra did exist at one time in Thailand, etc., it is possible some kind of degenerate guru yoga tradition persisted in Thailand.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, November 23rd, 2014 at 1:42 PM

Title: Re: Did the historical Buddha taught Vajrayana Tantra?

Content:

Kim O'Hara said:

The OP's questions are only being partially and indirectly addressed so far. Here they are again, numbered for ease of reference:

Samanthabhadra said:

(1) Why do Theravada and Zen Buddhists do not recognize the existence of Yidams? (2) Are these Yidams symbolic creations of the human mind or do they literally exist? (3) Did the historical Buddha taught the Vajrayana Tantra? (4) If not then is Vajrayana really Buddhistic?

Kim O'Hara said:

(1) seems to have been answered by Meido, saying that Zen schools do in fact recognize the existence of Yidams. No response on Theravada, though.

(2) hasn't been answered at all.

(3) has been answered in the negative by Mkoll, with some dissenting responses.

(4) hasn't been answered at all.

Kim

Malcolm wrote:

The answer to two is no and no. The answer to four is yes. Meido's answer is problematic, and I am not sure what he imagines a "yidam" is, blessing protection amulets is not a path. A yidam is a path. 3 was answered in the following way "not in the Pali canon"; but Pali canon is not inclusive of all that the historical Buddha taught (whose history is the salient question here).

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, November 23rd, 2014 at 12:25 PM

Title: Re: what makes Buddhist deathlessness not eternalism?

Content:

Jikan said:

Yes, but Brahman is said to have the characteristics of sat-chit-ananda. (being-consciousness-bliss)

Does suchness have those same characteristics?

Karma Dorje said:

Empty essence, cognizant self-nature, compassionate responsiveness.

Of course, we can continue to play comparative religion here, but what's the point. Isn't it against the ToS?

Malcolm wrote:

Sat cit ananda really are not equivalents to essence, nature and compassion.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, November 23rd, 2014 at 9:12 AM

Title: Re: what makes Buddhist deathlessness not eternalism?

Content:

anjali said:

It's not possible to know Nirguna Brahman as a separate entity.

Sherab said:

If by this, Nirguna Brahman is a some all encompassing consciousness, then I have a problem with it.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, that is what Nirguna Brahman is. Not only is it all-encompassing, nothing but it exists.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, November 23rd, 2014 at 9:07 AM

Title: Re: Rebirth (split topic: "Ornament o.t. Great Vehicle Sutra

Content:

Ambrosius80 said:

The consciousness of living things is basically electrons rushing through axons in the brains...

Malcolm wrote:

This is not really compatible with Buddhadharma.

Ambrosius80 said:

I don't see why, as the two are not conflicting each other in any way. I am just giving a theory how buddha-nature comes to be.

Malcolm wrote:

Buddha nature does not "come to be", it is innate.

Ambrosius80 said:

The way I see it, when religion begins to compete with science or the other way around, things tend to crash and burn. As His Holiness has stated many times, Buddhism and science are so similar they can work together just fine.

Malcolm wrote:

Up to a point, yes. But there are many things science cannot explain, rebirth, karma, rainbow body, etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, November 23rd, 2014 at 8:29 AM

Title: Re: Rebirth (split topic: "Ornament o.t. Great Vehicle Sutra

Content:

Ambrosius80 said:

The consciousness of living things is basically electrons rushing through axons in the brains...

Malcolm wrote:

This is not really compatible with Buddhadharma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, November 23rd, 2014 at 8:24 AM

Title: Re: Did the historical Buddha taught Vajrayana Tantra?

Content:

Samanthabhadra said:

Why do Theravada and Zen Buddhists do not recognize the existence of Yidams?

Meido said:

Just to point out that this is not so when it comes to Ch'an/Zen.

~ Meido

Malcolm wrote:

Chan/Zen schools don't really use iṣṭa-devatās, as they do in Shingon or Tendai, or Vajrayāna in general, it is not part of your path.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, November 23rd, 2014 at 7:08 AM

Title: Re: Did the historical Buddha taught Vajrayana Tantra?

Content:

Mkoll said:

Malcolm's answer is coming from someone partial to Vajrayana.

An answer from someone partial to Theravada, like me, is that Vajrayana Tantra teachings are not part of Theravada teachings: it's not mentioned in Theravada texts, AFAIK. Simple as that.

Malcolm wrote:

And neither is Mahāyāna, hence my answer.

Mkoll said:

Right, your answer could only come from someone more partial to Vajrayana than Theravada or Mahayana (edit) in that it's part of the Vajrayana "party line," if you will.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, but it is also true, from our perspective.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, November 23rd, 2014 at 6:54 AM

Title: Re: Renouncing Theravada

Content:

Jata Bharadvaja said:

Hello everybody, I've recently been at what I can only describe as a cross road really. I've slowly lost faith in the Theravada tradition, I've been seeing and reading about things such as monks owning pubs selling alcohol, doing fortune telling, magic tricks, barely meditating (if at all), getting into fist fights, doing sing song chanting etc.

Sherab Dorje said:

Damn dude, if that's the reason you want to leave the Theravada tradition I predict that your stay with Vajrayana will be even briefer! Everything you just listed is part of our daily practice!

Malcolm wrote:

Everything but the fist fights, this is Mahāyāna after all...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, November 23rd, 2014 at 6:48 AM

Title: Re: Did the historical Buddha taught Vajrayana Tantra?

Content:

Mkoll said:

Malcolm's answer is coming from someone partial to Vajrayana.

An answer from someone partial to Theravada, like me, is that Vajrayana Tantra teachings are not part of Theravada teachings: it's not mentioned in Theravada texts, AFAIK. Simple as that.

Malcolm wrote:

And neither is Mahāyāna, hence my answer.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, November 23rd, 2014 at 4:17 AM

Title: Re: Did the historical Buddha taught Vajrayana Tantra?

Content:

Samanthabhadra said:

Why do Theravada and Zen Buddhists do not recognize the existence of Yidams?

Malcolm wrote:

Lack of merit and pure vision.

Faith in Buddhadharma is rare.

Faith in Mahāyāna is rarer still.

Faith in Vajrayāna is even more rare than that.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, November 23rd, 2014 at 1:05 AM

Title: Re: Rebirth (split topic: "Ornament o.t. Great Vehicle Sutra

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

The only thing that surprises me is that so many people have convinced themselves that they actually know exactly what everything is and how it stands.

Malcolm wrote:

I just know what the Buddha and my gurus have taught. YMMV.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, November 22nd, 2014 at 9:54 PM

Title: Re: what makes Buddhist deathlessness not eternalism?

Content:

Sherab said:

Did the Buddha said anywhere that suchness is dependent arising? Or emptiness is dependent arising?

Malcolm wrote:

Āryāṣṭadaśasahasrika-prajñāpāramitā-nāma-mahāyāna-sūtra:

Dependent origination should be known as emptiness.

Ārya-mahāvajrameruśikharakūṭāgāra-dhāraṇī

Due to being imputed, imputation is also empty. Due to arising from causes and conditions, dependent origination is also empty. Due to being generated by adventitious causes and conditions, production is empty of self. In that respect, dependent origination is empty of intrinsic characteristics. Whatever is empty of intrinsic characteristics is characteristicless. Whatever is characteristicless, that is suchness. Whatever is suchness, that is unmistaken suchness. Whatever is unmistaken suchness, that is isn't anything other than suchness. Whatever isn't anything other than suchness, that is samadhi. Whatever is samadhi, that is realization. Whatever is realization, that is emptiness. Whatever is emptiness, that is sublime insight. Whatever is sublime insight, that is calm-abiding. Whatever is calm-abiding, that is complete freedom [vimokṣa]. Whatever is complete freedom, that is the middle way. Whatever is the middle way, that is without a first limit and without a second limit, cannot be apprehended, is not an apprehender, is not annihilated, is not permanent, does not arise, does not cease, is without thought, is without concept, is not independent, is not dependent, does not come, does not go, is without total affliction, without purification, does not cohere, does not separate, that is sublime insight. Whatever is sublime insight, that is without aggregates, without elements [dhātus], without sense organs, without sense gates [āyatanas], without objects, is not designated as an object, is without karma, without the result of karma — whatever is without karma and without the result of karma, that is unsurpassed perfect awakening.

Here we can clearly see the Buddha stating that since dependent origination is empty, it is without characteristics, and whatever is without characteristics is suchness.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, November 22nd, 2014 at 4:33 AM

Title: Re: what makes Buddhist deathlessness not eternalism?

Content:

Matt J said:

One might argue this is saguna Brahman (with gunas, or characteristics), not nirguna Brahman (without qualities, or characteristics).

Malcolm wrote:

Suchness is emptiness. Brahmin is not empty.

As the Buddha states in the Śatasāhasrika-prajñāpāramitā:

Suchness empty of suchness is the emptiness of suchness. Whatever is emptiness, that is suchness. There is no emptiness apart from suchness. Suchness is emptiness, emptiness is suchness.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, November 22nd, 2014 at 4:11 AM

Title: Re: Rebirth (split topic: "Ornament o.t. Great Vehicle Sutra

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

In terms of secular ethics it is well established that enlightened self-interest the best approach, i.e., in securing the needs of others, one secures one's own needs. The old,

"I'll scratch your back, then you scratch mine."

Sherab Dorje said:

Okay, so according to this theory criminal fraternities are ethically sound.

Malcolm wrote:

No, not at all. Mutually helping each other secure needs and wants is what enlightened self-interest means. As one expands one's sphere more people and beings are included, until in this model, every beings needs and wants are met since it is recognized we inhabit the same sphere and all of our wellbeing depends on everyone else's.

In practice, it does not work out that way, because people are not so enlightened that working in their own self-interest actually functions this way — this the great weakness in the secular ethical model. Sooner or later selfishness trumps insight. Nevertheless, this is a working theory in secular ethics.

There are other secular ethical models, such as Kant's moral imperative and so on, which do not require belief in rebirth or religious authority of any kind. Western ethical philosophy is quite rich, and can't be reduced to the catechistic moralism of Christianity.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, November 22nd, 2014 at 2:14 AM

Title: Re: Rebirth (split topic: "Ornament o.t. Great Vehicle Sutra

Content:

lorem said:

Wouldn't that be giving up on yourself and other sentient beings? (Who want's to get to the top? The only place is down)

Sherab Dorje said:

If there is no life (for me) after this one, then why would I give a damn?

Malcolm wrote:

In terms of secular ethics it is well established that enlightened self-interest the best approach, i.e., in securing the needs of others, one secures one's own needs. The old, "I'll scratch your back, then you scratch mine."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, November 22nd, 2014 at 12:08 AM

Title: Re: Hairs

Content:

???? said:

How Tibetans cope with the problem of hair loss?

What traditional possibilities exist? Proper diet, or special herbs?

How to do to hair stopped falling out?
and what to do to appeared more of them?

Malcolm wrote:
reduce salt intake, oil the scalp, etc.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Friday, November 21st, 2014 at 11:51 PM
Title: Re: Rebirth (split topic: "Ornament o.t. Great Vehicle Sutra
Content:

lorem said:
EDIT I believe in rebirth but don't think you totally need to to practice the path.

Malcolm wrote:
You totally need to [accept rebirth] to practice the path. Otherwise, there is no point at all to the Buddhist path, none.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Friday, November 21st, 2014 at 10:43 PM
Title: Re: Rebirth (split topic: "Ornament o.t. Great Vehicle Sutra
Content:

Jesse said:
i I think rebirth is hard for people to accept mainly because;

1. it's extraordinarily hard to grasp it intellectually, if it's possible at all.
2. If you meditate on it and view it through a detached viewpoint -- "Who is there to be reborn?" Will likely be most peoples response.

All thing's are inter-dependently arisen, yet all those arisen thing's are still empty, not one thing has a self, so this delusion that we are independent beings of some permanent nature is why rebirth is hard to grasp.

All sentient beings are just made up of empty non-self stuff, yet we still exist. So essentially I think you could say we are that empty non-self stuff, and at the same time nothing at all, we are phantoms. Phantoms will continue to arise, and cease thinking they were something other than empty inter-dependent stuff.

ps. I think my brain melted writing that.

Malcolm wrote:
Sentient beings are cognitive errors propelled through birth after birth by the root obscuration of I-making.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 21st, 2014 at 5:35 AM

Title: Re: Rebirth (split topic: "Ornament o.t. Great Vehicle Sutra

Content:

Leo Rivers said:

It is important to recognize that every traditional form of Buddhism carries with it a distinct and in many areas mutually exclusive presentation of the relationship of all the others. Buddhisms are not the same. Yet Dzog Chen and the Forest Monk Tradition are very different yet surprisingly on the same track.

Malcolm wrote:

Both Dzogchen as well as Thai Buddhism (apart from Buddhadasa) accept rebirth as integral to Buddhadharma.

Leo Rivers said:

Doesn't Samsara recognition, the Bodhisattva Vow, the practice of the path of calming and insight and a recognition of the empty nature of self and phenomena comprise sufficient credentials?

Malcolm wrote:

The Buddha in numerous places considers rejection of rebirth (punarbhava) to be a wrong view. It is considered a wrong view in all Buddhist traditions worthy of the name.

Leo Rivers said:

Egads, the Perfection of Wisdom insight as presented nuked the Abhidharma.

Malcolm wrote:

No. The Prajñāpāramitā, and the school that developed around it, merely clarified the notion of emptiness on top of the basis of Buddha's Abhidharmapitika.

Leo Rivers said:

And explanations of turnings of the wheel really don't much please or invite everyone to gather under one tent.

Malcolm wrote:

First, the three turnings teaching was not important in India, judging from the lack of discussion about it by Indian masters. If you carefully read the Saṃdhinirmocana, the first turning is for śravakas, the second turning for Mahāyanis, and the third turning, which is merely a recapitulation of the second, is for everyone. In reality, the third turning teaching is actually an Ekayāna teaching, which is why it garners so little attention from Indian commentators.

Leo Rivers said:

Finding a "core Buddhism" which all agree certifies a Buddhist as a Buddhist is an idea that holds water only if you don't run the numbers. But I will avidly give an open ear and mind to any efforts in this regard.

Malcolm wrote:

There are certain tenets of Buddhhadharma that are constant in all streams of Buddhhadharma. Rebirth, dependent origination, karma and so on are such tenets, whether we are talking about Theravada or Sarvastivada or Dzogchen and Mahamudra, as well as everything in between.

Leo Rivers said:

On "MATERIALISM"

Many people bring the word "materialism" unwittingly with the Marxist or AntiMarxist emotional baggage to spiritual discussions.

Malcolm wrote:

When I use the term materialism, I am referring the followers of the rishi Brihaspati, the Carvaka school, specifically, and generally, to all those who imagine that upon their physical death their mind stream utterly ceases having no further causes and conditions which can support it.

Leo Rivers said:

The 5th Century Greek physical theory of Democritus of atomos "indivisible", and re-contexted in India means and seems to mean one thing.

Materialism as (politically and rhetorically) depicted in the Pali suttas as being a sub-set of annihilationism/ucchedavada and later Marxist anti-religionist "materialism means and seems to mean another.

Malcolm wrote:

One who denies rebirth is an ucchedavadin and a materialist. Marxists also reject rebirth, etc. They are also ucchedavadins. There are many stripes ucchedavadins. Also, the ancient Carvakas wrote much of the political literature of ancient India (Kautilya, for example).

Leo Rivers said:

I am not a Marxist. Their "materialism" isn't truly scientific. It is politics. As an atheist I am not anti-religion. My "atheism" is a secondary issue to someone who believes all the phenomena witnessed in the cosmos are the outcome of natural processes, cause and effect. Sound familiar?

Malcolm wrote:

The rejection of rebirth amounts to a rejection of karma, among other things, such as the serial ripening of actions performed now on a serial, albeit impermanent, mind stream in the future. There is really no way to reconcile rejection of rebirth with the Buddha's Dharma. Further, the rejection of rebirth entails that consciousness newly arise, as indicated by your term "new beings", etc., again, completely inconsistent with the Dharma the Buddha taught in all vehicles, not merely one.

It is fine if someone does not believe in rebirth, but I question whether they can truly call themselves followers of the Buddha. You ask, "Doesn't Samsara recognition, the Bodhisattva Vow, the practice of the path of calming and insight and a recognition of the empty nature of self and phenomena comprise sufficient credentials?"

Without rebirth, there is no samsara worthy of the name, there is no cyclic existence, no 'khor ba, there no possibility that one, having been born a human being, can take rebirth in a higher realm or a lower realm, at death one simply ceases. One's birth as a human being is merely random and not connected with any accumulation of merit and so on.

Without rebirth, the bodhisattva vow is just empty verbiage, "From now until I reach the bodhimaṇḍa, the seat of awakening...", etc. Moreover, secular altruistic ethics are just fine, and are certainly more appropriate for people who do not have a deep felt faith commitment to the Dharma. There is thus no need to flatter oneself that one is a "secular" bodhisattva. Certain kinds of beliefs, such as the belief that one's consciousness is extinguished either at nirvana, in the case of śravakas, or at death, in the case of materialists are deeply incompatible with the bodhisattva aspiration.

Without rebirth, there is no transcendent insight to speak of because the purpose of insight in Buddhadharma is to burn away the traces of affliction which cause one to be reborn in samsara again and again and to cultivate omniscience in order to benefit other sentient beings from now until we reach the bodhimaṇḍa. This is the only reason we are cultivating insight into emptiness. David Hume recognized the empty nature of self and phenomena. But his insight is mundane and not transcendent, it neither eradicates obscurations nor does it lead to gathering the accumulation of wisdom, pristine consciousness (jñāna). His thought is not Buddhadharma, because Hume, at the end of the day, was a materialist. There is no point in even mentioning śamatha, because śamatha is simply one-pointedness of mind, and even animals have it.

My point is simple, physicalism, materialism, etc., whatever one wants to call it, is not compatible with Buddhadharma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 21st, 2014 at 4:48 AM

Title: Re: what makes Buddhist deathlessness not eternalism?

Content:

frank123 said:

I have heard various teachers of Buddhadharma use terms like deathlessness and indestructible etc to talk about our nature. What makes this not eternalism? what is between eternalism and nihilism?

Malcolm wrote:

Our nature, suchness, does not arise; therefore, it does not cease. This is what it means to be deathless, that which is beyond arising and ceasing, suchness is indestructible.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 20th, 2014 at 6:15 AM

Title: Re: Ornament of the Great Vehicle Sutras

Content:

Will said:

At last, a clear translation of the Mahayana-sutra-lamkara! Dr. Doctor and the Dharmachakra Trans. Committee have done a wondrous thing.

Paul said:

Which of the Doctor brothers did this?

Will said:

Still have not read too deeply into it, so the only quibble I have is the use of 'wakefulness' for jnana. The conventional use of wisdom or knowledge or understanding conveys the flavor better. Yes, they are probably trying to point out how the 'awareness' of this type of jnana is so very different from conceptional notions, but being 'awake' hardly conveys anything to non-buddhas.

Paul said:

I think 'wakefulness' is used because it is used in the Rangjung Yeshe Books texts as a term for mind essence, ie Chokyi Nyima Rinpoche's 'Present Fresh Wakefulness'.

Malcolm wrote:

Wakefulness (bodhatā) for jñāna is a huge stretch.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 20th, 2014 at 5:16 AM

Title: Re: Ornament of the Great Vehicle Sutras

Content:

Leo Rivers said:

There may be so-called "Buddhists" who have doubts about or even reject rebirth, but there is no valid Buddhadharma that does.

Transfer of Merit accomplished by social transactions plants the seeds of wholesome transformation in the aggregate basis - this means every new being picks up discursive awareness within a global field in which everyone who has ever lived life's karma is spoken for.

Malcolm wrote:

This is just annihilationism. "Every new being" means that in your view there are beings that pass out of existence, this is just a view of self, albeit, an annihilationist/physicalist view.

It is definitely not what the Buddha taught.

Leo Rivers said:

In fact, in that there is no self, it is only the illusion of a self that admits a choice of conduct for ill or good will.

Malcolm wrote:

The view you espoused above is just a view of self, an annihilationist/physicalist view.

Leo Rivers said:

It is working as a finite being, not going into quiescence, that is the sacrifice of self [the self benefit of enjoying complete peace] for others. Remember - a secular Buddhist treats Buddhist models as provisional, man made things amenable to re-working, identical in process to natural sciences.

Malcolm wrote:

There is no such things as "secular Buddhism" — merely false views and correct ones. In this respect, the view espoused above is an annihilationist/physicalist view. Therefore, false.

Leo Rivers said:

It is not rejecting principles that you are really objecting to, I suspect. It is rejecting the divine [unquestionable and final] basis of those principles. I do not deify the man Gautama any more than I deify Einstein.

Malcolm wrote:

No, actually it is your rejection of these basic principles which I find objectionable — not in so far as you are not entitled to them, but in so far as that you amazingly think your rejection of these principles can be included within the meaning sphere called "Buddhadharma" as something other than delusions.

Specifically, in the context of the text under discussion, its authors would find your claim that your views are found within Buddhadharma a very curious claim, since they are clearly actually Lokayati/Carvaka.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 20th, 2014 at 1:05 AM

Title: Re: Ornament of the Great Vehicle Sutras

Content:

Leo Rivers said:

All pre-Modern Buddhisms likely accept re-incarnation. For me the Bodhisattva Vow to practice to benefit all beings makes personal reincarnation irrelevant - who caused my pre-birth circumstances or inherits my consequences is beside the point. The point is to transform the basis of my character and the mutually experience world of karmas.

Malcolm wrote:

The bodhisattva vow is predicated on the principle of person rebirth or reincarnation. Without rebirth, there is no karmic world, so to speak, because there is no karma-vipaka.

Further, without rebirth, there is no way to accumulate the two accumulations necessary to achieve buddhahood, nor is there any point in making such an aspiration.

There may be so-called "Buddhists" who have doubts about or even reject rebirth, but there is no valid Buddhadharma that does. So called "Buddhists" are those who at least nominally follow Buddhadharma, but when people reject the very basic principles upon which Buddhadharma is founded, what is the point of calling them Buddhists, much less followers of Buddhadharma?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 18th, 2014 at 11:02 PM

Title: Rebirth (Collection thread)

Content:

Leo Rivers said:

I kind of think of myself as An Old Testament Mahayanist.

Malcolm wrote:

Pretty strange self-perspective coming from someone who rejects rebirth.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 18th, 2014 at 5:52 AM

Title: Re: Four reminders in the Mahayana?

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

Reading Indestructible Truth by Reginald Ray, I came across this, and found it intriguing:

Reginald Ray in Indestructible Truth said:

...[in the Mahayana]the four reminders evolve into 1) a view of the sacredness of being 2) the immanence of death in the midst of life as a blessing 3) Karma as a vehicle for compassion, and 4) Suffering as ego's response to the energy of awareness.

Johnny Dangerous said:

Is this Ray's own extrapolation of the notion of the evolution of the Four Reminders into the Mahayana path, or is this a traditional teaching on them I have missed? It jives with me for sure, but I have never seen these notions specifically presented as coming from the Four Reminders.

Malcolm wrote:

This is Ray's own trip.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 18th, 2014 at 12:32 AM

Title: Re: Machig Lapdron: Shakyamuni Bodhisattva?

Content:

lorem said:

Yeah sambhogakaya beings can appear to samsaric beings just not in their sambhogakaya form.

Malcolm wrote:

That means sambhogakāyas cannot appear to ordinary beings, hence nirmanakāyas.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 14th, 2014 at 11:08 PM

Title: Re: The Truth of the First Noble Truth

Content:

Pringle said:

So just to clarify my own thinking with regards to the three types of Dukkha

1) Dukkha Dukkha - This would be the suffering caused by pain, such as 'ouch i just stubbed my toe'

2) Viparinama Dukkha - This is the suffering of change due to all things being impermanent, as such even if something is giving us pleasure now, such as being in a relationship, then this will ultimately end up as suffering like when the relationship ends

3) Sankhara Dukkha - The suffering all condition phenomena. This is due to the very nature of 'things' as being part of conditioned phenomena. So even though this really tasty food gives me pleasure now, because of the impermanence inherent in the food, it is not a lasting pleasure, and as such will only result in suffering once the taste goes due to my craving the food.

so how far of the mark am I? I get the feeling im possibly getting Viparinama and Sankhara dukkha slightly confused, but not sure where the confusion lies. They both seem very similar to me, in the sense that its due to the impermanence of things that cause the suffering (due to the attachment/craving to things).

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, you are getting these two confused. The third is the fact that things just fall apart and so therefore cannot be considered a source of happiness.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 14th, 2014 at 10:37 PM

Title: Re: The Truth of the First Noble Truth

Content:

brendan said:

@Malcolm

The claim is that Buddha's are omniscient....so there for they are aware of _any illness_ for _any_ sentient being (Buddhist or non- Buddhist).....and they have the medication for any of these illnesses....?

Malcolm wrote:

Right. What is your question?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 14th, 2014 at 10:29 AM

Title: Re: The Truth of the First Noble Truth

Content:

brendan said:

Malcolm, this is your quote "All benefit that comes to us is the blessings of the Buddhas".

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, because the buddhas only wish the best for sentient beings, it is therefore any benefit that befalls them is a blessing of the buddhas.

brendan said:

This is also a quote, "Yes, and there is nothing Buddhas can do about that"...So how can there even be a cognition of a wish?

Malcolm wrote:

There may be nothing Buddhas can do to intervene when sentient beings are blindly acting out of affliction and cause themselves needless injury, nevertheless, even though samsara is a terrible place, it is still possible to generate roots of virtue. All positive things that sentient beings do generate such roots, and the Buddhas teach only virtue, therefore, all positive things that happen to sentient beings are a blessing of the Buddhas because the Buddhas bless all roots of virtue as such. Every teaching, every word, which encourages sentient beings to generate virtue is the word of the Buddha, and it does not matter in which religion or secular philosophy it is found — all of them are the teaching of the Buddha, the ultimate root of such teachings come out of the very basis which gives rise to Buddhahood itself, cultivating the root of virtue and generating compassion for sentient beings. Buddhas have limitless compassion so of course they automatically "wish" the benefit of sentient beings.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 14th, 2014 at 6:56 AM

Title: Re: The Truth of the First Noble Truth

Content:

brendan said:

Malcolm, this is your quote "All benefit that comes to us is the blessings of the Buddhas".

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, because the buddhas only wish the best for sentient beings, it is therefore any benefit that befalls them is a blessing of the buddhas.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 14th, 2014 at 6:04 AM

Title: Re: The Truth of the First Noble Truth

Content:

brendan said:

Malcolm, Buddhas are beyond doctors.

Malcolm wrote:

Buddhas are called "great physicians" for the very reason I state. And like doctors who can only treat patients who do what they say, Buddha can only help sentient beings who follow the path that they teach. As it is said:

The munis do not wash sins away,
nor remove suffering with their hands.

brendan said:

Malcolm, not doing what they say and not following the path is also a illness.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, and there is nothing Buddhas can do about that.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 14th, 2014 at 4:53 AM

Title: Re: The Truth of the First Noble Truth

Content:

brendan said:

Malcolm, Buddhas are beyond doctors.

Malcolm wrote:

Buddhas are called "great physicians" for the very reason I state. And like doctors who can only treat patients who do what they say, Buddha can only help sentient beings who follow the path that they teach. As it is said:

The munis do not wash sins away,
nor remove suffering with their hands.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 14th, 2014 at 4:39 AM

Title: Re: The Truth of the First Noble Truth

Content:

brendan said:

Read the accomplishments. Anyway you are a moderator so I'm sure you are aware of the claims of what Buddhas have accomplished.

Malcolm wrote:

Maybe you should read them more carefully.

brendan said:

Malcolm, Buddhas are said to be able to manifest as anything...or as many atoms in the universe.

There is still suffering...and thanks for all your hard work and time in translating.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, and nevertheless because of our own afflictive and karmic obscurations not only are we unable to see them, but we still continue to suffer.

For example, a person with jaundice cannot see white things as white, only as yellow and so on. Buddhas offer us the medicine to cure this condition, but if we do not take it, then like the sick person who does not follow their doctor's instructions, then we have only ourselves to blame for not getting well.

In the end, brendan, we are responsible for our own liberation, there are no Buddhas to lift us out of samsara like mewling kittens being moved to a safe place by mother cat. This does not mean however that Buddhas are not all around us, benefitting us all the time in ways we cannot or will not perceive.

All harm that comes to us is a result of our afflicted vision. All benefit that comes to us is the blessings of the Buddhas — if we train with this attitude, then our attitude will improve remarkably.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 14th, 2014 at 4:05 AM

Title: Re: Useful Events Website: dharmalist.org

Content:

Punya said:

Congratulations to all involved. May the dharma flourish!

(No reason why Dharma Wheel and Dhamma Wheel couldn't be listed there as well.)

Malcolm wrote:
They will be.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Friday, November 14th, 2014 at 12:55 AM
Title: Re: The Truth of the First Noble Truth
Content:

brendan said:
Read the accomplishments. Anyway you are a moderator so I'm sure you are aware of the claims of what Buddhas have accomplished.

Malcolm wrote:
Maybe you should read them more carefully.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Friday, November 14th, 2014 at 12:53 AM
Title: Re: The Truth of the First Noble Truth
Content:

brendan said:
So why did you suggest I pray to Tara.

Malcolm wrote:
Very simply put, taking refuge in sublime beings such as Buddhas and tenth stage bodhisattvas is meritorious because they are pure, uncontaminated and free of all afflictions. This alone eliminates traces of obscuration.

brendan said:
Mahayana Buddhas apparently have accomplished the 10 Bhumis the 6 Perfections etc...im sure you know the stages of accomplishments in 10 Bhumis as you are a translator.

Malcolm wrote:
Do you suppose that perfecting dānapāramitā, the perfection generosity means that you have removed all the poverty there is in the three realms? Of course it does not mean that. Śāntideva addresses this qualm in the Bodhicaryāvatāra where he points out that the Bodhisattva perfected the perfection of generosity through his wish to give all virtuous things to everyone, not because he was actually able to do so. Mahāyāna is based on one's intention.

Since you are someone who has entered Mahāyāna already, it is really better if you go back to the beginning and study the teachings under a qualified teacher in a proper way. This cynicism, doubt and lack of faith is harmful to you.

brendan said:

Not to mention what the other Bhumis of Vajrayana and Dzogchen...their accomplishments are said to be for more advanced.

Malcolm wrote:

The bhumis in Vajrayāna are merely subtle refinements in omniscience, that is all, there are no special powers that Vajradhara as that a buddha on the eleventh bhumi lacks.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 13th, 2014 at 8:45 AM

Title: Re: The Truth of the First Noble Truth

Content:

brendan said:

The claims are that Buddha/Dharma does eliminate all suffering (or course via Dependent Origination)...but considering the claims..moving the goal posts (lack of a better term) seems a very appropriate term.

Malcolm wrote:

Can you present such claims, something found in a sūtra, for example?

brendan said:

Considering the claims of Vajradhara, Garab Dorje, Buddhas etc..at what point is their view of Dependent Origination and their claims of accomplishment not poetic licence and machism.

Malcolm wrote:

Which claims? Can you bring them forward?

BTW, you have seemed awfully disappointed in Buddhadharma now for many years, and for some strange reason, you seem to only comment on my posts.

brendan said:

They clearly claim they can eliminate suffering albeit via dependent origination...so if they can do it why not just do it....why all the torture? It seems more like poetic license and machoism. Not disappointed just find the hypocrisy a bit funny..sorry for replying to some of your posts.

Malcolm wrote:

No, this is not correct. Buddha taught that one can eliminate one's own suffering through understanding dependent origination. He never claimed to be able to remove the suffering of others. In fact, he stated in many places in both Hinayāna and Mahāyāna sutras that he had no ability to remove the suffering of others. So, you are perceiving a hypocrisy where none exists.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 12th, 2014 at 8:18 PM

Title: Re: The Truth of the First Noble Truth

Content:

brendan said:

Yes, of course. As long as sentient beings are afflicted, they will continue to suffer. Who could expect anything else. It is not the Buddha's fault that sentient beings continue to cultivate afflictions. No one ever claimed the Buddha was able to remove the suffering of sentient beings through fiat.

It's just Dependent Origination to suit one's point of view. What's the point of being omniscient having achieved limitless compassion, kindness etc.

Malcolm wrote:

Buddhas are omniscient, not omnipotent. The criteria for even being able to meet Buddhadharma are rather slim, themselves requiring long stores of merit.

brendan said:

So what is Vajradhara or Garab Dorje or the Mahayana Buddhas doing this very instant!

Malcolm wrote:

Helping some sentient being somewhere. Does this mean they are surgically removing that being's suffering? No, of course not. Are they teaching Dharma? Yes, since that is primary way Buddhas help sentient beings in samsara.

brendan said:

They claim they have perfect omniscience (so they know exactly what is happening this very instant), they claim they have perfect compassion, kindness, generosity etc (so they have the tools to help any sentient being). They claim they can remember every one of their past lives (so they clearly know all the problems).....so what more to practitioners have to do.

Malcolm wrote:

They have to practice the path, just as the buddhas before them did.

brendan said:

Next you will be suggesting I pray to Tara lol.

Malcolm wrote:

It would probably be more beneficial for you than making disappointed complaints about Buddhadharma on the internet.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 12th, 2014 at 8:12 PM

Title: Re: The Truth of the First Noble Truth

Content:

brendan said:

The claims are that Buddha/Dharma does eliminate all suffering (or course via Dependent Origination)...but considering the claims..moving the goal posts (lack of a better term) seems a very appropriate term.

Malcolm wrote:

Can you present such claims, something found in a sūtra, for example?

brendan said:

Considering the claims of Vajradhara, Garab Dorje, Buddhas etc..at what point is their view of Dependent Origination and their claims of accomplishment not poetic licence and machism.

Malcolm wrote:

Which claims? Can you bring them forward?

BTW, you have seemed awfully disappointed in Buddhadharma now for many years, and for some strange reason, you seem to only comment on my posts.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 12th, 2014 at 6:28 AM

Title: Re: The Truth of the First Noble Truth

Content:

brendan said:

How can anyone claim they have achived the 3rd Noble Truth?.....There is still suffering....so claiming that suffering has ended seems silly.

Also space is limitless so how can suffering end?

Malcolm wrote:

It is not a claim that all suffering ceases, merely that one's suffering can cease.

brendan said:

I understand that...and there is still suffering.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, of course. As long as sentient beings are afflicted, they will continue to suffer. Who could expect anything else. It is not the Buddha's fault that sentient beings continue to cultivate afflictions. No one ever claimed the Buddha was able to remove the suffering of sentients beings through fiat.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 12th, 2014 at 12:45 AM

Title: Re: Dalai Lama Quotation: No Crazy Wisdom Masters

Content:

Jikan said:

In the mid-1990s, someone referenced the current Dalai Lama as saying that he knew of no contemporary crazy wisdom masters. I've never been able to track this reference down or verify it. Here's as close as I've come.

<http://www.tricycle.com/letters/letters-editor-winter-1993?page=0,1> "

onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;" onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

Does anyone have anything that might clarify what HHDL had to say on this issue, when he said it, and what the context was? Many thanks.

Malcolm wrote:

http://info-buddhism.com/Questioning_Advice_of_Guru_Dalai_Lama.html "

onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 11th, 2014 at 8:46 PM

Title: Re: Half Of Brits Say...

Content:

Kim O'Hara said:

Siddhartha Gautama, surely?

Malcolm wrote:

Strictly speaking, from a Mahāyāna point of view, they start with the Dharmakāya, which transcends time and space. Nevertheless, from a relative point of view Śakyamuni began our present dispensation and he is the teacher of all who follow Buddhadharma in whatever form it may be.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 11th, 2014 at 8:22 PM

Title: Re: The Truth of the First Noble Truth

Content:

brendan said:

How can anyone claim they have achieved the 3rd Noble Truth?.....There is still suffering....so claiming that suffering has ended seems silly.

Also space is limitless so how can suffering end?

Malcolm wrote:

It is not a claim that all suffering ceases, merely that one's suffering can cease.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 11th, 2014 at 10:00 AM

Title: Re: The Truth of the First Noble Truth

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

Thanks for the response, I don't doubt people find you entertaining or informative, i've certainly learned a lot from your postings and answers myself.

I still wonder though, if you are truly as blunt in person re:Dharma as you are online, or is the context too different to even say?

Malcolm wrote:

Actually, yes.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 11th, 2014 at 9:41 AM

Title: Re: The Truth of the First Noble Truth

Content:

Jikan said:

I

Following up on Johnny D's question: do you think the idea of being "straight up" works internationally?

Malcolm wrote:

One just has to be honest and transparent, warts and all.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 11th, 2014 at 9:39 AM

Title: Re: The Truth of the First Noble Truth

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Quite frankly, people either have the merit to see the truth of the Dharma, or they don't. All attempts at proselytizing Dharma are doomed to failure. Therefore, the best way to be with people about the Dharma is to be straight up.

Johnny Dangerous said:

Do you teach in person, as in group Dharma talks, etc. or just online Malcolm?

If so, i'm curious how people react to your "straight up" style in person. Sorry if the question is invasive, just trying to be "straight up" myself.

I also find the above a strange statement, in that most folks I know, and myself have seen our views transform as time goes on..in fact, I think i've seen yours change even in the time i've been here, or at least you changed your views on things like whether you call yourself a "Buddhist" or not.

Malcolm wrote:

I don't call myself a Buddhist, but for the convenience of others I am a "Buddhist". I practice Buddhadharma.

I have taught both online as well as in person settings. As far as I know, people like listening to me blather on about the teachings because they continue to ask me to teach. Believe it or not, people find me not only informative, but also extremely entertaining. I don't promote myself very much because there are many people out there with much more merit than I who are much better teachers because of it. I also don't often accept such invitations mainly because I am busy trying to make a living as text translator (oral translators get all the glory, but we do all the work) and as a doctor of Tibetan Medicine so I don't have so much time.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 11th, 2014 at 9:11 AM

Title: The Truth of the First Noble Truth

Content:

Jikan said:

I think this is relevant for a Buddhist board because people come here for Buddhism, whether they're interested in learning on the Dharma's terms or on their own (for now).

Malcolm wrote:

You can't learn Dharma on your own terms. It just doesn't work.

The point of the Dharma is to a) overcome the ignorance that is rooted in self-grasping so that b) one can help sentient beings achieve buddhahood.

If a doesn't happen, b never will. Therefore, it is best to be clear what Dharma is and what it is not.

Jikan said:

I agree on all these points. I can confirm that trying to learn Dharma on my own terms was a disaster for me, and I'm thankful to the people who skillfully set me right.

The question remains: how to best engage with people who have enough interest in Buddhism to show up on a discussion board with the word "Buddhist" in the banner, but are either just starting out or are heavily laden with--shall we say--unrealistic expectations?

Malcolm wrote:

Quite frankly, people either have the merit to see the truth of the Dharma, or they don't. All attempts at proselytizing Dharma are doomed to failure. Therefore, the best way to be with people about the Dharma is to be straight up.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 11th, 2014 at 8:55 AM

Title: Re: The Truth of the First Noble Truth

Content:

Jikan said:

I think this is relevant for a Buddhist board because people come here for Buddhism, whether they're interested in learning on the Dharma's terms or on their own (for now).

Malcolm wrote:

You can't learn Dharma on your own terms. It just doesn't work.

The point of the Dharma is to a) overcome the ignorance that is rooted in self-grasping so that b) one can help sentient beings achieve buddhahood.

If a doesn't happen, b never will. Therefore, it is best to be clear what Dharma is and what it is not.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 10th, 2014 at 10:52 PM

Title: Re: The Truth of the First Noble Truth

Content:

treehuggingoctopus said:

I am actually fairly convinced we all have our little moments of heresy. I do, for sure. The ego is a tricky bastard. No wonder newcomers reject, and vehemently so, such dogmas as rebirth. Please note that the fact they keep talking about it means there may be some space for realignment. If they kept their mouths shut there would be none.

[snip]

Hence we really should be careful when we post, and be particularly attentive to the way we post. If arrogance is a shortcoming of those heretical newcomers, it is at the very least as often our shortcoming as well. And if we want to help, we must do it properly, otherwise the whole thing will tragically backfire.

Jikan said:

I'd like to underscore the importance of these two points. Really, this is the rationale for keeping an online Buddhist discussion board going (first point), and a caution with regard to being helpful about it (second point).

Malcolm wrote:

The Dharma is relatively straight forward. If you study properly, you can easily understand it. If you don't well, we often see the results of that here online.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 10th, 2014 at 4:17 AM

Title: Re: The Truth of the First Noble Truth

Content:

Jikan said:

What about people who haven't been taught, or who have studied a bit on their own but have become convinced they don't need to be taught--or worse, that becoming a student would hinder their progress? These are people who have serious aspirations and must be approached with respect, even though their expectations have created some obstacles for learning.

Malcolm wrote:

Their arrogance outweighs their "serious" aspiration.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, November 9th, 2014 at 8:04 PM

Title: Re: Tilopa's Six Advices

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

Malcolm, If Samaya only truly comes with HYT empowerment, what are the "commitments" often attached to (presumably non-hyt) jenangs..are those not the same thing functionally as samaya?

Malcolm wrote:

There are samayas associated with the yoga tantra, but you do not receive them from a jenang, but only an abhisheka associated with that class. A person without a full HYT or YT empowerment does not possess them. A Jenang in general only comes with bodhisattva vows and a commitment to practice a mantra.

Johnny Dangerous said:

I have to admit at this point in my early Vajrayana "career" I do not get how relationships with the guru works exactly...

Malcolm wrote:

You received empowerment from a Guru. You then work with the transmission you received. If you have questions, you go and ask. Guruyoga is a special practice of highest yoga tantra, like mandala offerings. It is a way of summoning the blessings of the guru and integrating them with your mindstream. It exists in an indirect way as the master of the family in deity yoga.

Johnny Dangerous said:

I think you guys are being too hard on Rachmiel. As a newer practitioner I found some of the more hard-nosed "it must be like X or it's useless" advice I got on here was really counter productive..no offense, I know you guys know what you are talking about, and I appreciate the sentiment.. but your bedside manner really leaves something to be desired for someone new to the path, or someone having doubts about this or that etc.

Malcolm wrote:

Simple texts like the one that is the subject of this thread would never be bandied about in such a reckless manner. Doing so ruins the potential impact of the text, and its blessings, not to mention that fact that it is something that someone should hear in a proper way from a guru. Such behavior really contradicts the principles of Secret Mantra in general, to which this text belongs, since it comes from the Secret Mantra portion of the bstan 'gyur.

Johnny Dangerous said:

I've also been under the impression that plenty of people, including historical dudes, have more than one guru...so not sure how/why it would matter that Rachmiel has more than one teacher, is it just his reluctance that you're jumping on?

Malcolm wrote:

This does not apply to me. I have more than one guru, many more.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, November 9th, 2014 at 6:17 AM

Title: Re: The Truth of the First Noble Truth

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

it may seem a small thing, but when you use a locative construction like "in samsara" it cannot help but bring a whiff of reification. You know very well samsara is not a place that a sentient being finds itself in, its a state of mind. So wouldn't it be better to say "I am just as deluded that there is happiness in my samsaric mind"? Thats harder to say perhaps because its owning your state of mind rather than projecting, but it has far more potential for change. Its much easier to imagine a state of mind changing than a universe.

Malcolm wrote:

Pointless quibble.

It is a state, thus locative is perfectly appropriate.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, November 9th, 2014 at 5:16 AM

Title: Re: The Truth of the First Noble Truth

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

As Maitreya says, there isn't even a pinprick of happiness in the three realms.

M

gad rgyangs said:

wow, must be gloomy at your house.

Malcolm wrote:

Nope. I am just as deluded that there is happiness in samsara as the next guy.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, November 9th, 2014 at 4:49 AM

Title: Re: The Truth of the First Noble Truth

Content:

Queequeg said:

Does a Buddha experience happiness?

Malcolm wrote:

From the point of view of Mahāyāna, buddhas experiences only pleasurable mental sensations, i.e., bliss, and no painful physical sensations. A Buddha is also totally free of clinging. All painful feelings of the body are the ripened result of negative karma. Buddhas have no obscuration of karma. All pleasurable feelings of the mind are the ripened result of positive actions.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, November 9th, 2014 at 4:26 AM

Title: Re: Tilopa's Six Advices

Content:

rachmiel said:

This is well-suited for my style of learning, though I wish I could have a bit more direct contact with him.

Sherab Dorje said:

I can only begin to imagine what Tilopa would have done to you if you went and said this to him. It would probably make Naropa's beating with a sandal look like childs play!

rachmiel said:

What issue do you think Tilopa would have had with what I said?

Malcolm wrote:

Nothing, he just would not have you as a student. But this does not mean other teachers won't. And they will even cater to your expectations and neurosis out of their compassion. Whether that will benefit you of course, depends on the teacher, and how well they can help you see through the very neurosis that prevents you from making deep bond with a guru.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, November 9th, 2014 at 4:22 AM

Title: Re: The Truth of the First Noble Truth

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Ultimate truth however is just the object of a correct cognition, that is how it is defined, that is all it is. When sentient beings do not have that, they suffer; when they do they don't.

gad rgyangs said:

I have never seen a sentient being that didn't suffer at least some of the time, regardless of what kind of cognitions they have or don't have. It is part of the job description.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, being a sentient being involves suffering. The question before is whether suffering [duḥkha] can be considered pervasive, extending even to conditioned phenomena. The Buddha thought so, and labeled this the suffering [duḥkha] that pervades the conditioned [saṃskāraduḥkhatā]. He identified the suffering of change [vipariṇāmaduḥkhatā] as any pleasant condition such as health, happiness, and so on that was impermanent. Why? So that people could understand what duḥkha was. As Maitreya says, there isn't even a pinprick of happiness in the three realms.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, November 9th, 2014 at 12:20 AM

Title: Re: The Truth of the First Noble Truth

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The secret name of the suffering of change is sukha.

gad rgyangs said:

then its a truly delicious masochism.

Malcolm wrote:

Only if you are attached to happiness.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, November 9th, 2014 at 12:19 AM

Title: Re: The Truth of the First Noble Truth

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The idea that our sense cognition are automatically perceptions of "suchness" has been refuted many times by the Buddha in many sutras, so no need to repeat them here.

gad rgyangs said:

suchness is not dependent on one's cognitions or one's recognition in any way. That's the beauty of it. true and false cognitions are just clouds passing in the sky.

Malcolm wrote:

Ultimate truth however is just the object of a correct cognition, that is how it is defined, that is all it is. When sentient beings do not have that, they suffer; when they do they don't.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, November 8th, 2014 at 11:29 PM

Title: Re: The Truth of the First Noble Truth

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

all anyone ever experiences is ultimate truth, they just don't recognize it.

Malcolm wrote:

Just that nonrecognition is relative truth because it is by definition a false cognition grounded in ignorance.

gad rgyangs said:

...which is itself already ultimate truth.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, not really, not according to the definition. But you know this, and you have your problems accepting Buddhist teachings and have for years, as anyone who follows your posts knows.

The idea that our sense cognition are automatically perceptions of "suchness" has been refuted many times by the Buddha in many sutras, so no need to repeat them here.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, November 8th, 2014 at 11:26 PM

Title: Re: The Truth of the First Noble Truth

Content:

treehuggingoctopus said:

If happiness is interspersed with dukkha, another level of dukkha will be our gut feeling that the happiness we are enjoying is bound to end, that it is not consummate and perfect, that simultaneously there are endless beings who lack that happiness, etc.

gad rgyangs said:

If dukkha is interspersed with happiness, another level of happiness will be out gut feeling that the suffering we are undergoing is bound to end, that it is not consummate and horrible, that simultaneously there are endless beings who lack that suffering, etc.

Malcolm wrote:

Any being who possesses afflictions which causes rebirth in samsara is suffering by definition even if they are experiencing the most intense possible mundane bliss. Why? Because they will inevitably exhaust their merit and take rebirth in lower realms.

The secret name of the suffering of change is sukha.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, November 8th, 2014 at 11:20 PM

Title: Re: Tilopa's Six Advices

Content:

lorem said:

But I still think he was right. If you have a genuine need for it the dakinis and dharmapalas will help.

Malcolm wrote:

No, they will not. If you are not a Vajrayāna practitioner (meaning that you maintained your samaya), they will not even heed you, let alone help you.

M

lorem said:

I think samaya though may be a little more complicated than just a definition. Case by case. I think that's why exceptions are allowed.

There is an online teaching by HH Holiness that might clarify a little but I know you hold your view on samaya.

EDIT Not everything is as it appears

Malcolm wrote:

They are not my views. In any case, you can also read Kongtrul's Buddhist Ethics, where different approaches to samaya are evaluated and harmonized, but not one claims that one can hold samaya without an HYT empowerment of some kind. Empowerment is the sole entryway to Vajrayāna, this has been proclaimed in one voice by all the scholars of India and Tibet.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, November 8th, 2014 at 11:16 PM

Title: Re: Tilopa's Six Advices

Content:

lorem said:

But I still think he was right. If you have a genuine need for it the dakinis and dharmapalas will help.

Malcolm wrote:

No, they will not. If you are not a Vajrayāna practitioner (meaning that you maintained your samaya), they will not even heed you, let alone help you.

M

lorem said:

I think samaya though may be a little more complicated than just a definition. Case by case. I think that's why an exception was allowed for H H Trijang Rinpoche.

Malcolm wrote:

Without empowerment, you cannot receive samayas. You need to read Sapan's Three Vows and Tsongkhapa's commentary on the Vajrayānamūlapatti. If you have no samaya, no wisdom protector from the tantras will give you aid, though of course, worldly protectors found in sūtra, etc., will.

I don't know what exception you are referring to regarding Trijiang Rinpoche.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, November 8th, 2014 at 10:59 PM

Title: Re: The Truth of the First Noble Truth

Content:

treehuggingoctopus said:

My question (not a rhetorical one!) was: is the suffering that we experience as we are resting in rigpa dukkha?

Malcolm wrote:

Dukkha is dukkha, it does not go away with awakening. Even if our dukha vanishes (and it can), there is still the dukha of others — and this the basis of Mahāyāna, the reason why in Mahāyāna there is the notion of a non-abiding nirvana where awakened people do not simply check out in a nirvanic cessation.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, November 8th, 2014 at 10:44 PM

Title: Re: Tilopa's Six Advices

Content:

lorem said:

But I still think he was right. If you have a genuine need for it the dakinis and dharmapalas will help.

Malcolm wrote:

No, they will not. If you are not a Vajrayāna practitioner (meaning that you maintained your samaya), they will not even heed you, let alone help you.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, November 8th, 2014 at 10:34 PM

Title: Re: The Truth of the First Noble Truth

Content:

treehuggingoctopus said:

Malcolm, the question I was trying to ask is: When we are resting in rigpa, there is no dukkha, right? Mahasukkha and dukkha cannot co-exist, can they?

Malcolm wrote:

Maybe for as long as it takes for an ant to crawl up the bridge of our nose.

Otherwise, who are we kidding? Well, ourselves for one, and definitely others.

The reality is that as long as we have impure vision, we are witnessing and experiencing suffering, both of ourselves and others. What is the basis for compassion in every Buddhist practice? The suffering or dukha of sentient beings. Does having pure vision mean having a fantasy about everything being pure? No, even if we have pure vision 24/7 we still must keep in mind that sentient beings including ourselves are under the power of affliction and karma.

Will we live forever? No. Will we get sick, die, etc. Yes. Will we be suffering? By definition, yes. Even if we are able to go beyond it through meditation, the very fact of conditioned existence is that it is suffering from top to bottom. Dzogchen is not a get out of jail free card. Dzogchen is the path of seeing how ignorance creates this state we live in, and then how to escape it. This is one of the reasons why in Dzogchen the prison metaphor is used so often.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, November 8th, 2014 at 10:05 PM

Title: Re: The Truth of the First Noble Truth

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Here is your "Dzogchen tawa"

treehuggingoctopus said:

What about the nonconceptual one?

Malcolm wrote:

It's no different than sūtra, in this respect. Only the path is different, but not the basic principles, as the Self-Arisen Vidyā Tantra indicates:

If someone does not dwell in words and does not dwell in names, that is Prajñāpāramitā,
the transcendent state of buddhahood.

And:

Migrating beings are led with the noose of the method to prajñā through concrete objects.

Therefore, it is the Prajñāpāramitā.

The vast dhatū of Samantabhadra arises in the dharmatā of unceasing play.

The dhātu of prajñā, the transcendent state, lacks attachment, the nature of grasping.

Since it is nonconceptual, it is beyond speech and thought.

For example, like a magical apparition in the sky,
it is said to be free from the Dharma of expression.

Also the Mind Mirror of Samantabhadra:

Therefore, prajñāpāramitā cannot be spoken of, thought of, or expressed; not arising, unceasing, beyond thought, clearly knowing pure beneficial conduct.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, November 8th, 2014 at 9:20 PM

Title: Re: The Truth of the First Noble Truth

Content:

treehuggingoctopus said:

What about the Dzogchen tawa?

Malcolm wrote:

Here is your "Dzogchen tawa"

The generic basis is called "the basis of delusion" [28b] because of ignorance and contamination.

Further, the object of knowledge itself appears tainted because memory and thought arise in the mind.

The essence itself is contaminated by concepts because the grasping aspect of the six minds is unceasing.
Further, dharmakāya is bound by apprehension due to being associated with subtle atoms.

Further, luminosity forms traces due to the impure perception of the four conditions

And:

Having been joined with the ripening of karma,
one takes bodies good and bad,
one after another like a water wheel,
born into each individual class.
Having crossed at the ford of self-grasping,
one sinks into the ocean of suffering and one is caught by the heart on the hook of the three lower realms.
One is bound by oneself; the afflictions are the enemy.

— String of Pearls Tantra

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, November 8th, 2014 at 8:57 PM

Title: Re: The Truth of the First Noble Truth

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

all anyone ever experiences is ultimate truth, they just don't recognize it.

Malcolm wrote:

Just that nonrecognition is relative truth because it is by definition a false cognition grounded in ignorance. Thus, while pretending to disagree, you actually agree.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, November 8th, 2014 at 6:01 AM

Title: Re: The Truth of the First Noble Truth

Content:

Queequeg said:

Is it correct to understand that "sentient being" is a technical term? If yes, what is the Sanskrit/Pali term?

Malcolm wrote:

Sattva/satta

Queequeg said:

Can you explain how things possess the two natures? My understanding is that dharma are empty, and so whether they are seen as they truly are or not is really located in the mind. Is there a sense in which the perception of thing is really the subject and object "meeting" half way?

Malcolm wrote:

Things have relative nature, how they appear as objects of [deluded] perceptions of an ordinary person; they have an ultimate nature, which is what an ārya perceives in equipoise, and what a buddha perceives at all times.

Candrakīrti's explanation in the Madhyamakāvatāra, Introduction to Madhyamaka, can be perused with great profit.

No offense, but I find the writings of the Chinese masters too obtuse and round about in general.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, November 8th, 2014 at 5:06 AM

Title: Re: The Truth of the First Noble Truth

Content:

Queequeg said:

Is it possible for a dharma to simultaneously be defiled and undefiled? What I mean by that is, and I don't mean to offend by this example, a śramaṇa and an deeply deluded person encounter a beautiful deity who is teaching Buddhadharma. The Śramaṇa sees the deity as a teacher and benefits from the teachings; the deluded person is overcome by lust for the deity compounding their delusions.

Or is that example flawed? Can you point out how.

Malcolm wrote:

Let me ask you, do you know what a path dharma is? If you don't, please review the 37 bodhipakṣa dharmas.

Queequeg said:

Is it possible to be a sentient being and not suffer, or is that an inherent quality of a sentient being?

Malcolm wrote:

As long as sentient beings have afflictions which motivate actions, they will suffer. However, when a sentient being is free of those afflictions, they are not really called sentient beings anymore. They are called āryas. Freedom, mokṣa, means being free of afflictions that cause rebirth in saṃsāra, that is all it is. For as long as one takes afflictive rebirth in saṃsāra, for that long one will experience suffering.

Queequeg said:

Am I correct to understand that the ordinary person's experience is wholly exclusive of the ultimate truth? Is the obscuration something that blocks experience of ultimate truth, or is it something in the constitution that precludes the capacity?

Malcolm wrote:

Ordinary people never experience ultimate truth, if they do, they are not longer ordinary, having become āryas. Ultimate truth can be reasoned out, and inferred, and this is why it can be realized. However, ultimate truth is just the object of a correct cognition, just as relative truth is likewise the object of a false cognition. Since ordinary sentient beings never have direct correct cognitions, they never experienced ultimate truth, ever, even though all things possess two natures, one relative, the other ultimate. But if someone does have a direct intuition of ultimate truth, that person has become a first stage bodhisattva [in the original Indian ten stage system, not the later Chinese 52 stage system].

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, November 8th, 2014 at 4:51 AM

Title: Re: Tilopa's Six Advices

Content:

rachmiel said:

Thanks for clarifying that.

lorem said:

It's empowerments that Lama Zhang didn't think you needed. He would watch an empowerment and then imitate it with results.

Malcolm wrote:

You will note that Lama Zhang does not have a lineage, nor a surviving school. Yes, his texts survive, but mainly as a curiosity.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, November 8th, 2014 at 1:43 AM

Title: Re: Tilopa's Six Advices

Content:

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, November 8th, 2014 at 1:40 AM

Title: Re: The Truth of the First Noble Truth

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

"conditioned existence" is not reducible to 'suffering', despite what some buddhist traditions may say.

Malcolm wrote:

You mean, "...despite what the Buddha said."

Good luck with that.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, November 8th, 2014 at 12:40 AM

Title: Re: The Truth of the First Noble Truth

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Response: it very much depends on what you mean by identical. Fire and water are identical in so far as they are both conditioned, they are not identical in so far as their properties are concerned.

Jikan said:

OK. Let's assume we have a dozen ordinary sentient beings, then. What do they have in common? Their afflictions--they are all equally afflicted (equal in kind), but unequally afflicted (unequal in quality).

But let's assume that one out of those dozen is not ordinary at all, but is a realized being. What differentiates that being from the other eleven, if anything? If different, what is the nature of that difference? If the same, are all twelve equally realized or equally samsaric or...?

I'm putting it this way because I think the divergences in view we see in this thread go back to these questions, and a little more clarity wouldn't hurt.

Malcolm wrote:

This is elementary, this is why the Uttaratāntra states:

Wayward common people

see the opposite of the truth;

while tathāgatas are without proliferation, unmistaken about how things are.

Respectively, the impure, the pure and impure, and the very pure,

are called sentient beings, bodhisattvas and tathāgatas.

Thus the difference between sentient beings, bodhisattvas and buddhas is their respective insight in the nature of reality, and that is all.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, November 8th, 2014 at 12:06 AM

Title: Re: The Truth of the First Noble Truth

Content:

Jikan said:

I agree with Queequeg that there's a lot more going on in Zhiyi's discussion of the Four Truths than just emptiness--and that the "lot more" is the most interesting part. I just wanted to highlight that it was there and not negated in the perfect teaching.

A few questions follow from that. First: Are beings who have completely realized the perfect teaching identical to those who have not realized it--who don't "get it"?

If not, what differentiates beings who have fully integrated the view of the perfect teaching from ordinary sentient beings who are stuck to the wheel--reproducing it in themselves and through their actions?

If they are already identical, then what?

{I'm not calling Queequeg out with these questions--I mean them for everyone to discuss or not.}

Malcolm wrote:

Response: it very much depends on what you mean by identical. Fire and water are identical in so far as they are both conditioned, they are not identical in so far as their properties are concerned.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 7th, 2014 at 11:01 PM

Title: Re: Different Kinds of Shentong

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Phase four comes about when Rigzin Tsewang Norbu a Nyingma abbot, tertön and scholar who lived in the 18th century sought to revive Kalacakra and received Kalacakra from the Jonangpas surviving in central Tibet. He passed them onto Situ Panchen, who established both the gzhan stong view as well as the Dro system of Kalacakra at Palpung.

The basis difference among these different species of gzhan stong has to do with how whether one follows in the footsteps of Jonang, or Shakya Chogden.

M

conebeckham said:

Well, The current interest in Shentong is almost entirely due to the writings of Kongtrul, so I'd say that is Phase Five--in some sense, the phase we are currently in. Of course, he was disciple of Situ Panchen at Palpung. When it's taught these days, Kongtrul's texts and commentaries are the ones that are most often used in the Kagyu lineage, at least.

But I believe, also, Khyentse Wangpo was a Shentongpa, was he not?

Also, Kongtrul is considered to be the Tulku of Jetsun Taranatha (amongst others, of course).

It would be interesting to explore further any relationship between the presentation of Shentong and the Tantric view espoused in Kalacakra, too.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, but Kongtrul largely follows Shakya Chogden, and not Dolbupa and Taranatha, even though he gives lip service to both of the former, what he actually presents is more consistent with Chogden.

Some people might say that Khyentse was a gzhan stong pa, but I wouldn't. His take on the treatises of Maitreya is that they concerned luminosity and the treatises of Nāgārjuna concerned emptiness. Since these two are actually synonymous from a Sakya point of view, I don't think you can call Khyentse a gzhan stong pa. He instead presents the Sakya position in a text called The Madhyamaka Instructional Manual that Harmonizes the Two Traditions, "meaning Nāgārjuna and Maitreya.

When considering the point of view of Maitreya, he states that in this system, the wisdom at the time of the basis, the luminous original nature of the mind, is the basis of samsara and nirvana. He says:

"The non-recognition of that, which manifests the appearances of dualistic delusions along with their latent traces, is this connate ignorance that is the root of the samsara. Therefore, it is very important to cut the root of this and and dissolve it into the dharmadhātu."

He identifies this wisdom or pure consciousness, the luminous nature of the mind, as the dharmadhātu. In reference to the much discussed moon metaphor, he states:

"The luminous original nature of the mind free from free from dualism is clear like a moon disc, is non-conceptual and exists in one's heart."

He never discusses this in terms of the three natures and so on, which is characteristic of gzhan stong in general, and the basis for most criticism of gzhan stong, incidentally.

When he does talk about gzhan stong, he discusses it in a series of texts I call "Three Madhyamaka views." he says:

The is the position of the great omniscient Jonang pa is discussed briefly, ultimate truth is without arising or perishing, unconditioned and beyond dependent origination. Relative truth has the character of arising and perishing, depends on cause and conditions and is conditioned.

When he presents the Sakya view, it is identical to his presentation in The Madhyamaka Instructional Manual that Harmonizes the Two Traditions.

So while Khyentse was broadminded, and so on, his own views are in line with the Sakya Gongma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 7th, 2014 at 7:14 PM

Title: Re: The Truth of the First Noble Truth

Content:

Queequeg said:

What is the view of the Mahayana Mahaparinirvana Sutra in Indo-Tibetan circles?

Malcolm wrote:

It depends. Those who follow classical Madhyamaka tend to regard it as a secondary text. The main interpretation of it found in the Uttarantra is what is followed by most Tibetans. There is a lot of debate about how that former text is to be understood.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 7th, 2014 at 7:06 PM

Title: Re: The Truth of the First Noble Truth

Content:

Queequeg said:

Is it a false assumption that the Buddha's spiritual struggle took place at a particular historical time and place in which there was, more or less, this idea of the cycle of samsara? I have a very hard time imagining that his teachings would have arisen without the particular circumstances of his lifetime. Certainly possible.

Bakmoon said:

Just because something is developed within a particular context doesn't automatically mean that it is limited to that context.

Malcolm wrote:

This would have to suppose that this thing that is developed can be distinguished from its causes and conditions... and that's not possible, right? That's basic madhyamika.[/quote]

Buddha notes that he did not invent the Dharma, but that he merely rediscovered it. Causes and conditions were favorable for a Buddha to arise to teach that Dharma, but principles like the 4NT are universal.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 7th, 2014 at 7:24 AM

Title: Re: The Truth of the First Noble Truth

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

existence is purity, bliss, self, and eternal.

Queequeg said:
Have you encountered this doctrine before?

Malcolm wrote:
Yes, in nonbuddhist schools who suffer from wrong views.

There are many eternalist positions in Chinese Buddhism that would never have come to pass if the Chinese understood the range of nonbuddhist views in India. But because they did not, many of these eternalist doctrines developed with Chinese Buddhism, especially with regards to the tathāgatagarbha teachings.

Whether you are accurately reflecting Chih I's views is another matter altogether but claiming that existence is pure, etc., is laughable and shows that a bit of study of Abhidharma might be in order here.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Friday, November 7th, 2014 at 7:01 AM
Title: Re: The Truth of the First Noble Truth
Content:
Queequeg said:
existence is purity, bliss, self, and eternal.
Good luck with that.
What do you mean?

Malcolm wrote:
What I mean is that existence [bhāva] impure, suffering, nonself and impermanent. Seeing the impure as pure and so on is a large part of the fact that sentient beings are caught in samsara.

So good luck with the conceptual proliferation that existence is purity, bliss, self, and eternal.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Friday, November 7th, 2014 at 6:33 AM
Title: Re: The Truth of the First Noble Truth
Content:

Queequeg said:
On the dukkha of fabrication - If there is no one around when a tree falls in the forest, does it make a noise?

Malcolm wrote:
Whether there is someone around or not, the impermanence of trees, rocks, houses, planets, suns, galaxies and universe is all suffering of the conditioned.

As to your other point, that idea that all one's activities while a common sentient being are buddhaactivities leads to such corruptions as the Japanese Buddhist involvement in WWII.

While it is certainly true that Buddhas only see other Buddhas, we can't even perceive most sentient beings, let alone any Buddhas. Why? We have impure vision because we are contaminated with afflictions.

Queequeg said:
existence is purity, bliss, self, and eternal.

Malcolm wrote:
Good luck with that.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Friday, November 7th, 2014 at 4:46 AM
Title: Re: The Truth of the First Noble Truth
Content:

Bakmoon said:
There's another point I'd like to make as well. You say:
As for the three aspects of dukkha - it doesn't alter my point - all three aspects have to do with subjective experience.
Just because something is subjective in the sense of being experienced doesn't mean that it is subjective in the sense of being purely a matter of personal opinion. If this weren't the case that would mean that one couldn't say anything objective whatsoever about anything involving the mind. If someone were to claim that it is not objectively true that emotions exist because they are part of personal experience, would anyone take them seriously? It can be objectively true that something is a part of experience, and that doesn't make it any less objective.

Malcolm wrote:
Another additional point is that they are the truths of nobles, not noble truths, because this is the truth that all awakened people see regardless of where they are on the path and regardless of which bodhicitta aspiration they have formed.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Friday, November 7th, 2014 at 4:12 AM
Title: Re: The Truth of the First Noble Truth
Content:

Queequeg said:

As for the three aspects of dukkha - it doesn't alter my point - all three aspects have to do with subjective experience.

Malcolm wrote:

No, the third form of suffering has nothing to do with personal experience, it has to do with fundamental nature of conditioned phenomena that are phenomena which belong to the path. In other words, only dharmas that belong to the path are conditioned-undefiled. All other conditioned phenomena are defiled by definition, hence they are dukkha.

Queequeg said:

Calling everything Dukkha is not an attempt to describe the world in the manner of scientific inquiry.

Malcolm wrote:

When you are sick, you go to a doctor, he finds the cause. Since there is a cause, the illness can be pacified. There is a treatment for it.

The four truths of nobles are precisely such a heuristic. When you are a sentient being, you are suffering. The Dharma explains why, and how to remove it, promising that one can transcend the causes of that state.

However if you don't take your medicine nor listen to the Buddha, your illness will not be cured nor will you ever be free of suffering.

Queequeg said:

As such, it's not that the True Aspect of Reality (Paramartha Satya) is essentially dukkha, but because of a fundamental nescience, our experience of the True Aspect of Reality is dukkha. Maybe I'm missing something, but I don't think any of you fine pious folk would disagree.

Malcolm wrote:

There is no way an experience of ultimate truth causes suffering. But ordinary people never have that experience, that is why they suffer. When they do have that experience, as bodhisattvas in the first bhumi, their suffering still exists, but for them it is now like a dream or an illusion. Further, they can then eradicate the obscurations to full buddhahood.

Queequeg said:

My understanding is that this is accounted for in the acknowledgment of Pratyekabuddhas who come to right view without Dharma taught by the Buddha.

Malcolm wrote:

Pratyekabuddhas always have come into contact with a buddha's teaching, but they aspire to achieve nirvana in a place where a buddha has not taught.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 7th, 2014 at 3:32 AM

Title: Re: Different Kinds of Shentong

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Phase four comes about when Rigzin Tsewang Dorje, a Nyingma abbot, tertön and scholar

mutsuk said:

You mean Kah thog Rig 'dzin Tshe dbang nor bu (1698-1755), right ?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, that was a typo...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 7th, 2014 at 2:48 AM

Title: Re: Different Kinds of Shentong

Content:

Bakmoon said:

Besides the Jonang school, the Kagyu school also has Shentong teachings, and also some Nyingmapas follow some form of Shentong (I've heard in some places that Ju Mipham was a Shentongpa for example, but I don't know how true that is). Could someone give a summary of how Shentong is presented and what the major differences between them of Shentong are in these different traditions?

Malcolm wrote:

The origins of gzhan stong lie in the master Tsan Kawoche. He received teachings on the six limb yoga of Kalacakra from Somanatha (though apparently the translator was not good, and he did not understand Sanskrit). The lineage of instructions of this view eventually came down to Dolbupa, who gave the first formal voice to gzhan stong teachings. They were very popular for roughly 150 years and stimulated a lot of controversy because of Dolbupa's very literal reading of many passages in sutra and tantra and unique approach to Buddhist history.

His views were hotly contested by many scholars in Sakya especially, and also in Gelug.

This is phase one.

Phase two begins with Shakya Chogden, a Sakya scholar (15th century) who took a revolutionary (for Tibet) approach to Madhyamaka and tried to reconcile the views of the Yogacara and Madhyamaka, in some of his writings declaring them both definitive.

This is phase two.

Phase three consists of Jonang Taranatha's reply to various formulations of gzhan stong view, as well as rejecting arguments against Dolbupa in particular.

This is phase three.

Phase four comes about when Rigzin Tsewang Norbu a Nyingma abbot, tertön and scholar who lived in the 18th century sought to revive Kalacakra and received Kalacakra from the Jonangpas surviving in central Tibet. He passed them onto Situ Panchen, who established both the gzhan stong view as well as the Dro system of Kalacakra at Palpung.

The basis difference among these different species of gzhan stong has to do with how whether one follows in the footsteps of Jonang, or Shakya Chogden.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 6th, 2014 at 11:35 PM

Title: Re: can buddhist smoke american spirit organic cigarettes

Content:

LastLegend said:

I will not argue, I will smoke and I will quit one day. I don't care what you say or what anybody says. Can you be more Zen than that?

Malcolm wrote:

Well, if you like inhaling Lead and Polonium 210 and spreading it around for other people to inhale, go for it —, but it hardly seems like bodhisattva activity to me to knowingly spread radioactive contaminants where other people can inhale them.

LastLegend said:

How many people are exposed to radioactivity in cigarettes?

According to the American Lung Association, there are about 48 million adult smokers in the U.S., and 4.8 million adolescent smokers. This means that the U.S., population, directly exposed to radioactivity in cigarette smoke, is approximately 53 million.

According to the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, 80 percent of adult tobacco users started smoking as teens; 35 percent had become daily smokers by age 18. Thirty nine percent of adult smokers smoke one pack of cigarettes per day, and 20% smoke more than a pack a day.

Smoking is the number one cause of preventable death in the U.S., with 443,000 deaths, or 1 of every 5 deaths, in the United States each year. And, there are 123,000 lung cancer deaths annually attributed to smoking cigarettes. Nearly 1 of every 5 deaths is related to smoking, more than alcohol, car accidents, suicide, AIDS, homicide, and illegal drugs combined.

In addition to smokers, those exposed to secondhand or side-stream smoke have been shown to risk disease as well. In some studies, it has been found that side-stream or secondhand smoke is two to five times more concentrated in some carcinogens than the mainstream smoke inhaled by a smoker. Each year, approximately 3,400 nonsmoking adults die of lung cancer as a result of breathing the smoke of others' cigarettes. Environmental tobacco smoke also causes an estimated 46,000 deaths from heart disease in people who are not current smokers. Secondhand smoke contains over 4,000 chemical compounds, including 69 known carcinogens such as formaldehyde, lead, arsenic, benzene, and radioactive polonium 210.

How does radioactive material get into a cigarette?

The tobacco leaves used in making cigarettes contain radioactive material, particularly lead-210 and polonium-210. The radionuclide content of tobacco leaves depends heavily on soil conditions and fertilizer use.

Soils that contain elevated radium lead to high radon gas emanations rising into the growing tobacco crop. Radon rapidly decays into a series of solid, highly radioactive metals (radon decay products). These metals cling to dust particles which in turn are collected by the sticky tobacco leaves. The sticky compound that seeps from the trichomes is not water soluble, so the particles do not wash off in the rain. There they stay, through curing process, cutting, and manufacture into cigarettes. Lead-210 and Polonium-210 can be absorbed into tobacco leaves directly from the soil. But more importantly, fine, sticky hairs (called trichomes) on both sides of tobacco leaves grab airborne radioactive particles.

For example, phosphate fertilizers, favored by the tobacco industry, contain radium and its decay products (including lead-210 and polonium-210). When phosphate fertilizer is spread on tobacco fields year after year, the concentration of lead-210 and polonium-210 in the soil rises.

Malcolm wrote:

<http://www.epa.gov/radiation/sources/tobacco.html>

So I guess it really depends on how much you care about yourself and how much you care about others.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 6th, 2014 at 10:31 PM

Title: Re: Residing in the ground of being

Content:

rachmiel said:

From having attended his retreats, read his books, watched his videos I can say that the only kinda sorta problem I have with Anam Thubten's approach is that he tends to use carrots to inspire his students. Enlightenment is the biggest and juiciest. Ground of being could be another.

Malcolm wrote:

The basis is our actual state. Buddhahood is the full realization of that state. The path is the slow integration of that state into our experience until we are done.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 6th, 2014 at 9:20 PM

Title: Re: The Truth of the First Noble Truth

Content:

Queequeg said:

You might even find compelling resolutions to problems that have persistently surfaced over the centuries in Buddhist discourse.

Malcolm wrote:

Such as?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 6th, 2014 at 9:08 PM

Title: Re: The Truth of the First Noble Truth

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Then you may not have taken the Buddha's teachings entirely to heart.

Queequeg said:

How is something like that constructive?

Malcolm wrote:

It is a question we should be constantly asking ourselves.

Queequeg said:

...The whole world is marked by suffering/suckiness. What does that mean precisely, except that one is proposing a universal framework in which to subjectively view everything. Dukkha, Dukkha, Dukkha... Take everything and see it as this single flavor of suck. Problematize everything. Why? Because you can't have a solution without a problem.

Malcolm wrote:

Three kinds of suffering were identified by the Buddha: the suffering of suffering, the suffering of change and the suffering of the conditioned. The first refers to the actual experience of pain and misery, etc. The second refers to the impermanence of all positive circumstances. The third refers to the very impermanence of condition phenomena itself. Do you see anything left out?

Queequeg said:

...what he was selling only really is effective if you agree to see things the way he wants you to see them.

Malcolm wrote:

Hence my comment about whether or not you have really taken the Buddha's teachings to heart, no excuses, no ifs, ands or buts.

Queequeg said:

I'm not an expert on Pali or Sanskrit, so I have no idea if dukkha actually refers to a quality of subjective experience, but the term "suffering" certainly does.

Malcolm wrote:

Dukha has its roots in the notion of a wheel that does not turn properly on its axle.

Queequeg said:

If everything is suffering, then photosynthesis is suffering.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, it is — it is part of the suffering of the conditioned and the suffering of change.

Queequeg said:

We're considerably expanding the meaning of suffering when we characterize a process in a plant as suffering. How about convection currents in the ocean? That's suffering, too? How about atomic fusion?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, all conditioned phenomena apart from path dharma are suffering or conducive to suffering — this is why the Buddha says "all contaminated phenomena are suffering".

Queequeg said:

Bringing all this under the category of "Suffering" is then redefining this term that is commonly understood to refer to a particular mode of experience into a reference to the perpetual motion of everything. But that's not really what the Buddha was talking about - he was addressing people's experience of the perpetual motion, and specifically addressing the dissatisfaction in having to deal with all this change.

Malcolm wrote:

However you want to translate dukkha is fine, but generally, it is translated as "suffering", which means "to bear from below", with the obvious allusion. When you look at the Monier-Williams, it has a range of meaning of uneasy, uncomfortable, unpleasant, difficult, pain, sorrow, trouble, etc. Whether you call it suffering, pain, etc., it has the same meaning — there is no happiness anywhere in the three realms. The only way to be truly happy is to be free from afflictions that cause rebirth in samsara.

Queequeg said:

If you don't start out thinking this is suffering, though, there is no suffering to neutralize.

Malcolm wrote:

And so worldly people continue to take rebirth in samsara because they do not recognize suffering as suffering.

Queequeg said:

There are plenty of people who never expected anything of life and wouldn't call it suffering.

Malcolm wrote:

"Ignorance is bliss".

A so called "Buddhist" school that abandons the core tenets the Buddha taught is no longer Buddhist.

Where did the Buddha demand faith in rebirth? I don't recall it.

A number of places, do your research.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 6th, 2014 at 6:16 AM

Title: Re: Residing in the ground of being

Content:

monktastic said:

What was this about? Eckhart Tolle?

"[Candice O'Denver] is not an eckhart, or a hafiz, or a maharshi."

"I have no idea, but these three are clearly spiritual geniuses."

(Links redacted in advance to That Forum That Shall Not Be Named)

Malcolm wrote:

Oh, yes, sure, in their respective traditions, of course. I did not mean that I personally derive any spiritual sustenance from these people.

Once again, context is everything.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 6th, 2014 at 5:25 AM

Title: Re: Residing in the ground of being

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

This was before he actually met K, I think.

Malcolm wrote:

Considering how he reacted to Krishnamurti, we can only imagine how he would have reacted to Eckhart, but I doubt it would have been good.

dzogchungpa said:
Nice.

I do believe a certain Gemini once said that Eckhart was clearly a spiritual genius.

Malcolm wrote:
That was not me. I have never read him.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Thursday, November 6th, 2014 at 4:58 AM
Title: Re: Residing in the ground of being
Content:
dzogchungpa said:
This was before he actually met K, I think.

Malcolm wrote:
Considering how he reacted to Krishnamurti, we can only imagine how he would have reacted to Eckhart, but I doubt it would have been good.

The point of course is that the one person's opinion of another persons the former does not know is rather hollow and not really indicative of anything about the latter.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Thursday, November 6th, 2014 at 4:20 AM
Title: Re: Residing in the ground of being
Content:
treehuggingoctopus said:
(Btw, while I am generally inclined to believe that it is much better to leave the core Dzogchen terms untranslated, it may be worth recalling here that Tillich took Urgrund from Boehme who had taken it from Eckhart and other Rheine mystics. And if you read Eckhart closely, his Urgrund is not quite the Absolute of an eternalist. Nor is his 'being' necessarily 'real' in the sense Prasangikas find offensive. Just saying.)

dzogchungpa said:
From http://www.chronicleproject.com/shenpen_hookham.html: I remember telling Trungpa Rinpoche at Samye Ling, at a personal interview, that I didnt know anything about Buddhism, so what should I read. He suggested I read Krishnamurti and Meister Eckhart.

Malcolm wrote:
Funny, considering his opinion of Krishnamurti...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 6th, 2014 at 4:18 AM

Title: Re: Residing in the ground of being

Content:

treehuggingoctopus said:

And for those who lack that fundamental trust but need to obtain, or discover, or even experience, Something that comes with emphasis and a capital S, the disappointment will probably not be ecstatic, alas.

Thanks for the quote - which also shows that as far as Anam Thubten's notion of Urgrund goes, he is far from having fallen prey to an eternalist heresy, doesn't it?

Malcolm wrote:

You will note that I never supposed that AT held such a view, merely that he naively uses a term from Christian theology which should not be used in Dzogchen specifically, and Buddhism in general.

treehuggingoctopus said:

I wasn't accusing you - or anybody else, for that matter - of claiming that AT holds eternalist views. Just happy to know he does not.

(Btw, while I am generally inclined to believe that it is much better to leave the core Dzogchen terms untranslated, it may be worth recalling here that Tillich took Urgrund from Boehme who had taken it from Eckhart and other Rheine mystics. And if you read Eckhart closely, his Urgrund is not quite the Absolute of an eternalist. Nor is his 'being' necessarily 'real' in the sense Prasangikas find offensive. Just saying.)

Malcolm wrote:

Oh, it is not the GERMAN that has the negative connotations, it is the ENGLISH that does.

"Urgrund" in German, as I understand it, does not necessarily have the same connotation as "ground of being" does in English. I am making a comment about English usage. The term "ground of being" really is not attested to before the translation of Tillich into English.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 6th, 2014 at 3:58 AM

Title: Re: Residing in the ground of being

Content:

treehuggingoctopus said:

And for those who lack that fundamental trust but need to obtain, or discover, or even experience, Something that comes with emphasis and a capital S, the disappointment will probably not be ecstatic, alas.

Thanks for the quote - which also shows that as far as Anam Thubten's notion of Urgrund goes, he is far from having fallen prey to an eternalist heresy, doesn't it?

Malcolm wrote:

You will note that I never supposed that AT held such a view, merely that he naively uses a term from Christian theology which should not be used in Dzogchen specifically, and Buddhism in general.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 6th, 2014 at 2:01 AM

Title: The Truth of the First Noble Truth

Content:

Queequeg said:

So here is the problem I have with the First Noble Truth -it must be taken as an irreducible claim, along with a number of further assumptions, none of which I'm not entirely convinced about. "birth is suffering, aging is suffering, illness is suffering, death is suffering; union with what is displeasing is suffering; separation from what is pleasing is suffering; not to get what one wants is suffering; in brief, the five aggregates subject to clinging are suffering"

Malcolm wrote:

Then you may not have taken the Buddha's teachings entirely to heart.

Queequeg said:

For one, suffering here is a qualitative, subjective characterization, which while a compelling one to an extent, is not necessarily true for everyone. There are many people who, though not enlightened by Buddhist standards, have reflected on their life, settled in equanimity, and come to a conclusion about all this - "Its life." Neither good, nor bad. It just is what it is. With that conclusion, they go on living in many different ways, taking the joys and sorrows, triumphs and tragedies, in stride. With the First Noble Truth undermined, the rest of it falls apart.

Malcolm wrote:

This is all just a mass of suffering.

Queequeg said:

We can add a footnote and say that suffering is a technical description of the unpleasant experience of perpetually changing circumstances, but that's still undermined by, "Its life." This is not even to mention people who have come to understand their own consciousness through the discoveries of neuroscience which is presenting a pretty compelling case that consciousness and everything that we think we are is a meta phenomena of brain circuitry. In this kind of context, "Life is Suffering", seems like an arbitrary assertion.

Malcolm wrote:

Buddha did not say "life is suffering", he said "sarva dukkham", everything is suffering.

Queequeg said:

Some thinkers have posited that you can't have Buddhism without belief in this model of samsaric existence. I don't agree. Notwithstanding, a teaching that falls apart when certain unprovable assumptions are set aside is at a severe disadvantage in a claim to Truth. I don't think all Buddhist schools of thought are susceptible to this problem.

Malcolm wrote:

A so called "Buddhist" school that abandons the core tenets the Buddha taught is no longer Buddhist.

Queequeg said:

I previously referred to Nagarjuna and how he opened questions about the Four Noble Truths. He does a delicate dance in the Madhyamikakarika concerning people who use sunyata to undermine the Four Noble Truths. Maybe some people better versed in Madhyamika thought can correct me, but his response is appeal to the middle which is a dialectic tension settling on what amounts to the four noble truths as an expedient means (upaya). Are upaya Truths with a capital T? There's a whole body of discourse on this, and as best I can tell, there is no categorical answer Yes or no. Its "Yes, but..." or "No, but..."

Malcolm wrote:

He addressing the idea of inherency, not suggesting that it is all "upaya".

Queequeg said:

And then without even going deep into all the vertiginous logic of Madhyamika, we have pithy doctrines like "Samsara and Nirvana are coextensive." or "There are not two worlds, pure and impure." What does that mean for the Four Noble Truths?

Malcolm wrote:

Nāgārjuna address this as well "Samsara and nirvana, these two do not exist, instead, Nirvana is thorough knowledge of samsara."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 6th, 2014 at 12:09 AM

Title: Re: Interview with Khenchen Rigdzin Dorje

Content:

lorem said:

Okay from Golden Letters looks like Dzogchen showed up in Tibet 3,600 years ago.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, this is what Bonpos believe, but since there are no Bonpo historical texts that can be dated earlier than early 11th century, (which make claims about things which happened four millennia ago) Bon claims about this are highly problematical.

In any case, this kind of thing comes down to a question of belief and religious authority.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 5th, 2014 at 11:34 PM

Title: Re: Help identifying prayer, Garchen Rinpoche Vajrakilaya 20

Content:

kng said:

Hi dharma friends

I would like to ask for your help in identifying prayer that is being sung from 02:25:25

Code: #

<http://www.ustream.tv/recorded/27098978>

I would be very happy to have text of that prayer but I will be also very thankful for only identifying it.

Thank you

heart said:

Melody sounds like the dewachen prayer

(http://www.tibetanlanguage.org/images/Free_Study_Aids/dewachen_prayer.pdf " onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;" onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;), but it is translated to english and probably longer.

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

The Drikung in the US seem to use that melody all over the place.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 4th, 2014 at 11:27 PM

Title: Re: Residing in the ground of being

Content:

lorem said:

For anyone who ever stumbles on this thread we do love others and their religious beliefs.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, we have a soft spot in our hearts especially for those who engage in animal sacrifice (we do actually, but not for the practices themselves, but because such practices are filled with ignorance and lead people to lower realms).

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 4th, 2014 at 10:14 PM

Title: Re: Residing in the ground of being

Content:

Sherlock said:

Monism is eternalism, one of the mundane views Padmasambhava warned against in Garland of Views.

Malcolm wrote:

Pshaaaw, that is that old-fashioned Dzogchen, who would want anything to do with that? We like this new-fangled Dzogchen even if it is just warmed-over Hinduism.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 4th, 2014 at 7:31 PM

Title: Re: Residing in the ground of being

Content:

smcj said:

This is a monistic presentation of reality. In some quarters this is heresy to the hilt. Q.E.D.

Malcolm wrote:

It really isn't.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 4th, 2014 at 7:29 PM

Title: Re: Trungpa, Tathagatagarbha, and "True Self"

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

full glass.jpg

I really don't know why people are wasting their time and energy.

Malcolm wrote:

Agreed, I'm out.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 4th, 2014 at 7:27 PM

Title: Re: Trungpa, Tathagatagarbha, and "True Self"

Content:

Son of Buddha said:

The False Self is the imputation of various false concepts to the True Self(saying the True self is an object, or personality)SO if one believes the True Self to be an object the size of the thumb....ect then This is called the false self/unholy self.

Malcolm wrote:

This terminology simple does not exist in this sutra and is of your own invention.

Son of Buddha said:

Glorious Great Seal Drop Tantra

Malcolm wrote:

This passage, from chapter seven of the Mahāmudratilaka tantra, concerns the completion stage and is not to be taken literally.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 4th, 2014 at 9:24 AM

Title: Re: Residing in the ground of being

Content:

smcj said:

But that doesn't mean that contemporary Nyingma orthodoxy (as per the Big Red Book) doesn't embrace it.

Malcolm wrote:

It doesn't. Since you don't read Tibetan texts, you really don't have any idea what "Nyingma" orthodoxy is. And it would be Rongzom, Longchenpa and Mipham, in that descending order.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 4th, 2014 at 9:21 AM

Title: Re: Residing in the ground of being

Content:

asunthatneversets said:

So what then differentiates your view from Advaita Vedanta or Samkhya yoga?

smcj said:

Little.

Malcolm wrote:

Thats' why I think you really do not understand Dzogchen, nor gzhan stong for that matter, much less Yogacara, Madhyamaka and so on.

But it is ok to be an eternalist, it's better than being a nihilist.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Tuesday, November 4th, 2014 at 6:34 AM
Title: Re: About the demon Mara
Content:
pemachophel said:
Thanks Malcolm for posting this.

Malcolm wrote:
Sure, this is an excellent little text, I mean to publish it some day.

Sherab Dorje said:
Do you mind if I steal it and translate it into Greek?

Malcolm wrote:
Yes, since it is not complete. It is just a fragment.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Tuesday, November 4th, 2014 at 6:32 AM
Title: Re: Residing in the ground of being Content:
smcj said:
My dilettante's understanding is that this is a fairly modern interpretation/presentation of Dzogchen. If you want to stick with a more classical presentation that's ok too.

asunthatneversets said:
What is the basis for this theory of Atiyoga modernity leaning towards gzhan stong?

smcj said:
Well for one thing the whole "empty of other" view, regardless of sect, seems to have been a Tibetan development. It seems to have gained traction in the last few hundred years. Guy Newland has some YouTube videos that go over all that.

Malcolm wrote:
gZhan stong became popular in Karma Kagyu in the 18th century in eastern Tibet because Situ Panchen was disciple of the abbot of Kathog, Rigzin Tsewang Norbu, who advised the former to adopt gzhan stong because it was more positive and therefore it would extend Situ Panchens' life. Because it was adopted by this powerful Karma Kagyu lama, gzhan tong was revived at Palpung near Dege, where Kongtrul studied. But of course this was not the gzhan stong of the Jonangpas, but was a rather modified version largely influenced by the Sakya master Serdog Panchen.

gzhan stong is not a heresy per se. It is regarded by many people as a mistaken way of presenting the two truths of Madhyamaka via the three natures of Yogacara.

Personally, I don't care what sutrayāna view people hold (Yogacara or Madhyamaka), because that is not the view with which Vajrayāna practitioners attain realization. The view Vajrayāna practitioners attain realization with is the experiential view inculcated during empowerment. It really does not matter much what one's intellectual predilections are (unless you are a Gelug, then it matters very much, as far as they are concerned) when it comes to Mahāyāna tenets (Yogacara or Madhyamaka) since they are somewhat irrelevant to the actual practice of Vajrayāna.

The real point in all of this is that there are some people who follow gzhan stong views who reify jñāna as something which truly exists, and this deeply contradicts Dzogchen view, as indicated by the opening passages of the Unwritten Tantra states:

Hey, hey, apparent yet non-existent retinue: listen well! There is no object to distinguish in me, the view of self-originated pure consciousness; it did not exist before, it will not arise later, and also does not appear in anyway in the present. The path does not exist, action does not exist, traces do not exist, ignorance does not exist, thoughts do not exist, mind does not exist, wisdom does not exist, samsara does not exist, nirvana does not exist, vidyā itself does not even exist, totally not appearing in anyway.

But you really cannot understand this without studying and practicing under a real master.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 4th, 2014 at 6:05 AM

Title: Re: Residing in the ground of being

Content:

smcj said:

I understand Malcolm's resistance to all this. He sees it as a classic heresy.

Malcolm wrote:

I don't think it as a heresy at all. I just think that you really don't understand Dudjom Rinpoche's perspective at all because you have an emotional adherence to a philosophical view common these days among Karma Kagyus.

For example, the doctrine of tathāgatagarbha is found in both sūtra and Dzogchen. However, if you compared the actual doctrine of tathāgatagarbha in Dzogchen compared to that of sūtra you would scratch your head in astonishment.

Even though the teaching of tathāgatagarbha in Dzogchen radically goes beyond how it is presented in sūtra, nevertheless, the tathāgatagarbha sutra citations are used (especially by Longchenpa) as a preliminary step for preparing (intellectual) people to understand tathāgatagarbha in Dzogchen.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 4th, 2014 at 4:28 AM

Title: Re: Residing in the ground of being

Content:

smcj said:

As you know, since we have already discussed it elsewhere, Dudjom R. said that Madhyamaka was great for an intellectual approach to emptiness, and Great Madhyamaka/Shentong was good for discussing emptiness from a meditational/experiential perspective.

Malcolm wrote:

But it is still sutra.

smcj said:

According to D.R., Great Madhyamaka is not subject to intellectual analysis the way Prasangika Madhyamaka is, and is approached through faith. If you wish I will find the quote. It is a Google search away. But since you know about it already I don't see the reason to make the effort.

Malcolm wrote:

Have you actually examined the presentation of the two truths through the three natures advanced by gzhan stong pas? It is utterly absurd to claim that gzhan stong is immune from the charge of being an intellectual tenet system. If faith in gzhan stong is required, it is because very few people actually understand it, despite the legions of people who claim allegiance to it.

smcj said:

here is no "direct introduction" in Shentong.

Malcolm wrote:

That makes it intellectual and analytical.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 4th, 2014 at 1:56 AM

Title: Re: Residing in the ground of being

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

I already explained this to you as well. He is not saying that the gzhan stong presentation of Madhyamaka is equivalent to Dzogchen. He is actually saying it is deficient and inferior.

smcj said:

Well, he does continue, and it is a little more nuanced. p.300 continues...:

Therefore, the conclusive intention of the the Two Promulgators actually abides without contradiction in the nature of the Great Perfection. This intention comprises the unaltered intention of the "Collection of Madhyamaka Reasoning", which consist of the commentaries on the intermediate promulgation by the sublime and supreme Nagarjuna; and his [Collection of Eulogies} including the "Eulogy to the Expanse of Reality", and the commentaries by the regent Maitreya, the sublime and supreme Asanga, and his brother [Vasubandhu] and so forth, which together form the intention of the final [promulgation]. If one were to ask why this is the case, it is because these masters did not claim anything other than the profound abiding nature of natural reality, and because the Great Perfection itself is none other than that.

(underlining mine)

In the footnotes it says the "Two Promulgators" are Nagarjuna and Asanga. Also I believe "Eulogy to the Expanse of Reality" has been translated into English as "In Praise of Dharmadhatu", which is a Shentong book.

As a Karma Kagyu I interpret what he just said to be akin to Kongtrul's position that any understanding of Shentong has to be predicated on an understanding of Madhyamaka, meaning that phenomena need to be seen as self-empty before you can see them as "images on the magic mirror".

Malcolm wrote:

1) It is not so simple to say that Dharmadhātustava is a 'gzhan stong' book, just like one cannot declare the Uttaratantra a "gzhan stong" book. For example:

Having abandoned concepts and investigation, the absence of the inherent existence of phenomena itself is meditated as the dharmadhātu.

2) It is also not erroneous to state that the reality the Buddha describes in the sutra is the same reality presented in Dzogchen.

3) Therefore, your attempt to prove that Dudjom R's presentation subsumes his understanding of Dzogchen under gzhan stong is not proven, far from it.

What is at stake here is how that "natural reality" is to be experienced and realized. All approaches to the middle way in sutra, no matter whether you take Nāgārjuna or Maitryanatha's approach are analytical and intellectual, that is the problem with sprosbral, gzhan stong, dge lug madhyamaka and so on — they are all analytical, philosophical approaches to reality. This is ultimately the difference between sutra and tantra, as the great translator Drogmi pointed, the view of sutra is intellectual, the view of mantra is experiential. Even if gzhan stong were the most refined, most detailed, highest, most sublime approach to sūtra, it would be still be intellectual and analytical and therefore quite coarse and inferior compared to the experiential view of mantra.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 4th, 2014 at 1:05 AM

Title: Re: Residing in the ground of being

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

As I pointed out to you, when it comes to the nine yānas, each yāna has it's own view.

smcj said:

Yes! On pages 294-300 he goes through the lower 8 yanas and their views. What I just quoted on p. 300 is his view of Dzogchen specifically as juxtaposed with--and superior to--the lower 8 yanks. That view is what makes Dzogchen superior! (Hence the title of the chapter: Superiority of Atiyoga.)

Malcolm wrote:

I already explained this to you as well. He is not saying that the gzhan stong presentation of Madhyamaka is equivalent to Dzogchen. He is actually saying it is deficient and inferior.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 4th, 2014 at 12:49 AM

Title: Re: Residing in the ground of being

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Of course, Dudjom Rinpoche followed his own teachers in this respect, and he embraced the Karma Kagyu presentation of gzhan stong when it comes to the view of Madhyamaka.

smcj said:

Exactly. Like I said before; it is a more modern development.

Malcolm wrote:

What you are conflating however is Dudjom R.'s sutrayāna views with his Vajrayāna views. As I pointed out to you, when it comes to the nine yānas, each yāna has it's own view. In the Bodhisattvayāna Madhyamaka is considered the highest view. Then of course we can disagree about what Madhyamaka means, but it is very plainly stated in all Dzogchen texts that the view of Dzogchen surpasses the views of the eight lower yanas.

So while Dzogchen masters can argue about the various merits of this or that interpretation of Madhyamaka, in the end their view will be Dzogchen and not Madhyamaka, no matter whether they prefer gzhan stong Madhyamaka (Dudjom R, Kongtrul), Gelug Prasanga (Jigme Lingpa) or Pre-Gelug Prasanga (Longchenpa, etc.) Gorampa (Khenpo Shenga, etc.) and the views of the eight lower yanas will always be subordinate to the view of Dzogchen in their eyes.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 4th, 2014 at 12:36 AM

Title: Re: Residing in the ground of being

Content:

smcj said:

From "The Big Red Book", the chapter on "Superiority of Atiyoga" (a.k.a. Dzogchen), p.300:

Now concerning this natural expression of the Great Perfection: The Sugata, during the intermediate promulgation of the transmitted precepts (a.k.a self-emptiness) did not reveal the structure of the fundamental reality, though he did extensively teach the inconceivable, abiding nature without referring to symbols of elaborate conception. And, during the final promulgation (a.k.a other-emptiness), though he did reveal the structure of the fundamental reality, he did not teach the characteristic path through which it is actualized.

(formatting mine)

So yes, Dudjom R. did not claim that his Great Madhyamaka/Shentong view was a path. It was just a view.

Malcolm wrote:

That is not what this passage means. It is not a reference to so called rang stong and gzhan stong.

It is a reference to the fact that tathagātagarbha teachings (a vital part of Dzogchen), according to Longchenpa, are part of the so called third turning of the wheel (a turning so important that it garners virtually no comments at all from the Indian authors preserved in the bstan 'gyur).

However, as I have pointed out, when the sole source (Samdhinirmocana sutra) for the notion of three turnings is actually examined, it is merely a restatement of the doctrine of the second turning in unequivocal terms.

However, Longchenpa never explains the tathagatagarbha according to the gzhan stong system, and he clearly explains the three own natures as belong to cittamatra which he considers inferior to Madhyamaka.

When he treats the issues of Madhyamaka and the tathāgatagarbha, he clearly states in the sgrub mtha' mdzod that Prasanga Madhyamaka is the definitive view of Mahāyāna and that the Tathāgatagarbha sūtras are the definitive sutras.

Of course, Dudjom Rinpoche followed his own teachers in this respect, and he embraced the Karma Kagyu presentation of gzhan stong when it comes to the view of Madhyamaka.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 4th, 2014 at 12:04 AM

Title: Re: Residing in the ground of being

Content:

lorem said:

Sky-gazing. Yell PHAT really loud and forceful then rest

alpha said:

No,... dont do that.

Malcolm wrote:

Seriously. This place is becoming like a sandbox for children.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 4th, 2014 at 12:04 AM

Title: Re: Residing in the ground of being

Content:

smcj said:

Of course. But his Great Madhyamaka/Shentong view was his presentation/interpretation for discussing meditational experiences. He said that self=emptiness was for intellectual applications. He did not limit his Great Madhyamaka interpretations to Mahayoga and Anuyoga meditational experiences. It is his Atiyoga positions too.

Malcolm wrote:

It was his presentation for sutra level meditational experience only. The funny of course is that the meditation experience under discussion is actually identical to the so called rang stong experience. It is only is post-equipose intellectual discussion that one differentiates these two approaches (which actually have no validity outside the gzhan stong presentation).

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 3rd, 2014 at 11:48 PM

Title: Re: Residing in the ground of being

Content:

Lotus_Bitch said:

Dudjom Rinpoche had a preference for shengtong, but clearly, as was quoted in my post: he distinguishes the view of Dzogchen from sutra.

smcj said:

Of course.

He was an adherent of shengtong on the level of sutra only.

So you're saying that he backtracked to Yogacara with his Dzogchen view? Care to cite?

Malcolm wrote:

What I am saying is that there are different interpretations of sutra level Madhyamaka. His preference is gzhan stong, just as Jigme Lingpa's was Tsongkhapa's view. However, in terms of their ultimate view, both Dudjom Rinpoche and Jigme Lingpa were Dzogchenpas.

You are suffering from an idea promulgated amongst many non-Nyingmapas that there is no difference in view between sutra and tantra, and that the view of sutra that you have is the same view that you apply in tantra. But this is not true in the Nyingma school, where each of the nine yanas has its own view.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 3rd, 2014 at 10:47 PM

Title: Re: Trungpa, Tathagatagarbha, and "True Self"

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

Provisional, according to you.

Malcolm wrote:

Provisional according to the the Buddha in the Akṣayamati-nirdeśa sutra.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 3rd, 2014 at 9:45 PM

Title: Re: Trungpa, Tathagatagarbha, and "True Self"

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

What sense does it make to establish suchness as a "self", someone's identity?

Son of Buddha said:

I didn't establish the True Self as someones Identity, nor do the Sutras.

Malcolm wrote:

First of all, the term "true self" as opposed to the "false self" does not occur in any Buddhist text. It is a pop Hindu terminology.

Son of Buddha said:

So if Substantial means that which is truly real, Truly existent, not illusory, Then yes Enlightenment/True Self is Substantial.

Malcolm wrote:

Substantial in this case means self held by non-Buddhists immediately preceding the passage you cite:

"...The self maintained by vulgar children is held to be the size of a thumb, the size a white mustard seed or the size of an atom. Since such a self was not mentioned by the Tathāgata, even though he explains that there is no self in phenomena, it is not that there is truly no self. The "self" is any dharma that is true, pure, permanently existing, independent, unchanging and undying, that is what is called "self", just as that great physician is skilled in using milk as medicine."

So, here the Buddha is not teaching a substantial self like the some other nonbuddhists do, as I said before.

The other important point is that Buddha taught selflessness in order to tame nonbuddhists. If you run around saying that Buddha taught a self, then how will nonbuddhists be able to distinguish the self they taught from the suchness as the real nature of phenomena? This is why even still, despite what provisional texts like the Nirvana sutra say, the central teaching of the Buddha is selfless of persons and phenomena.

People who run around saying that Buddha taught "enlightenment" as the "true self" really do a disservice to sentient beings who have not been cured of wrong views of the self. In fact the Buddha did not teach self or selflessness as a definitive teaching.

The Nirvana sutra's use of the term "self" is a play on words, where the meaning of atman as a transmigrating self (rejected by the Buddha) is contra posed with the meaning of atman as "nature" (emptiness, suchness, etc.). If however, one suggests that the meaning of this is all the qualities of Buddhahood fully exist from the beginning with the continuums of sentient beings, rather than as an inherent potential, then your position is no different than non-buddhists who assert a substantial self.

And anyway, we have already seen that the the Buddha defined self as jñāna, meaning the nature of consciousness itself.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 3rd, 2014 at 8:42 PM

Title: Re: Residing in the ground of being

Content:

smcj said:

From p.8 of the "Early Buddhism and Mahayana" thread:

dzogchungpa said:

Was Dudjom Rinpoche a gzhan stong pa?

Malcolm wrote:

He was a gzhan stong pa, yes. But not really in the same way that Dolbupa was.

Yes, of course Dudjom R. promoted the Kongtrul version of the gzhan stong view, but that has nothing to do with Dzogchen. There is no "gzhan stong" Dzogchen. There is only Dzogchen, and it has its own view.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 3rd, 2014 at 5:24 AM

Title: Re: Residing in the ground of being

Content:

lorem said:

Just real quick what are the metaphysical thoughts Buddha said not to try to ponder?

Mkoll said:

Since no one's answered you, I'll give it a go from my more Theravada-inclined perspective. I'm aware this is the Nyingma forum, and I'm not sure if the Nyingma tradition also upholds these teachings.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, it does. A total of three hundred and sixty incorrect positions are listed in such text as the Rigpa Rangshar, but only sixty of them are presented explicitly.

Mkoll said:

Further, samasara is as follows: [53/b]

false view and eternalist view.

The false vehicle is as follows:

held to be three hundred and sixty beliefs in a self.

Three hundred are explained to be in the dhātu:

sixty are explained in the following way:

1) the Samkhya who speak falsely

2) the Vaiśeṣikas who advocate intrinsic causation

Kumārila the great and the advocates of deviation holders of the treatises of Aviddhakarṇa

the Guhyas who rely on five fires

6) those who burn their bodies with sesame oil soaked ignited cotton

7) (and of) trident asceticism.

8) (There is) the asceticism of offering and gatherings

9) The asceticism of removing the flesh from the body

10) the conduct of appearing like a dog

Likewise, through a slight clairvoyance, of how the blessings of the buddhas appear,

there is the practice of false asceticism.

The partial views are like so:

the view of a creator taking the creator as the path

13) those who show the meaning of eternalism

14) those advocate unchanging permanence

15) those who advocate conditional permanence

16) those who advocate the cause as permanent

17) those who advocate the result as permanent

18) those who assert the path depends on permanence

- 19) those who assert conduct as eternal [54/a]
- 20) those who assert annihilation in which there is no ultimate eternity
- 21) those who have the aspect of eternalists

- 22) those who place importance on inauthentic evil mantras
- 23) those who place importance on fortune-telling and divination
- 24) those who place importance on insignificant magic
- those who rush into debate
- those who practice asceticism
- 27) those who are attached to this world
- 28) those who are attached to their own activities
- 29) those who wear wool
- 30) those who wear cotton robes of invincibility
- 31) those who make insignia important
- 32) those who advocate depending on actions
- 33) those who refute others with their knowledge
- 34) those who advocate annihilation without a cause
- 35) those who advocate total voidness
- 36) those who advocate the view of the interrupted cause and interrupted result
- 37) those who advocate the interrupted path and interrupted wisdom
- 38) those who advocate great permanent annihilation
- 39) those who advocate the annihilationism of path, the permanent annihilation of the result
- 40) those who advocate the annihilationist view of false thinking
- those who advocate the great void of annihilation.

- 42) There are the Vedantins advocating secrecy
- 43) the tīrthikās who deviate in equal ways
- 44) the tīrthikās of mental appearances
- 45) the tīrthikās who grasp deluded vision
- 46) tīrthikās who generate hatred
- 47) tīrthikās whose claim mind has shape [54/b]
- 48) tīrthikās who say grasping is meaningless
- 49) tīrthikās of deviant claims,
- 50) tīrthikās who say permanence is meaningless,
- 51) Kani and 52) Mātsarya
- 53) Bhasira and 54) Kaśīśa
- 55) Saṃbhira and 56) Dhasiṅg
- 57) Kati and 58) Sangha
- Śaṅkari and 60) Dheśaka.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 3rd, 2014 at 5:19 AM

Title: Re: Residing in the ground of being

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:
—Thig-le kun-gsal chen-po'i rgyud

Malcolm wrote:
<http://greatmiddleway.wordpress.com/2014/11/02/the-ground-of-all/> [/quote]

There is a reason why sems sde is considered inferior to man ngag sde.

Some Dzogchen tantras assert that the youthful vase body exist in the human body with tiny little eyes and so on. As I said, it is not easy to understand Dzogchen (not least of all because there are three main traditions, and each tradition has its own tantras and lineage, etc.) and differentiate veiled rhetorical statements like the one cited here from the actual core of the teachings. Then of course, you have to ferret out why Longchenpa cites this text in his ngal gso skor gsum and so on. It is not sufficient to cherry pick a citation from a book loaded onto the web without attribution.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Monday, November 3rd, 2014 at 4:22 AM
Title: Re: Residing in the ground of being
Content:

alpha said:
Does this mean that Elio has erroneous views ?

Malcolm wrote:
I didn't say that.

alpha said:
Ok.You didnt ...
But do you agree with his views from the paragraph above ?

Malcolm wrote:
Not %100, mainly because it is a somewhat incomplete explanation and lacks important nuances, such as the fact that all the appearances of Mt. Meru, houses, trees, etc., arise from ignorance, from NOT recognizing one's basis.

In any case, getting at such nuances is really impossible here since a) a lot of people are just invested in their own trips and do not want to really understand Dzogchen b) they should really be understood from a qualified teacher.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Monday, November 3rd, 2014 at 3:54 AM
Title: Re: Residing in the ground of being

Content:

alpha said:

Does this mean that Elio has erroneous views ?

Malcolm wrote:

I didn't say that.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 3rd, 2014 at 1:33 AM

Title: Re: Residing in the ground of being

Content:

smcj said:

At the risk of being a bore and reposting the same quotes over and over:

Malcolm wrote:

You are just repeating over and over again your misconstrual of teachings you have never received and never practiced.

Over and out.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 3rd, 2014 at 12:51 AM

Title: Re: Residing in the ground of being

Content:

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 3rd, 2014 at 12:42 AM

Title: Re: Residing in the ground of being

Content:

smcj said:

As I have already written, there are many Dzogchen masters that have a different presentation/intepretation.

Malcolm wrote:

Actually, they don't. But you really do not understand what you are reading because you are not very familiar with this tradition.

smcj said:

Well, be that as it may, you do. And elsewhere here at DW you've admitted that Dudjom R. held a Great Madhyamaka/empty of other view of Dzogchen.

Malcolm wrote:

I did no such thing. Dudjom Rinpoche, like Jigme Lingpa (an adherent of Tsongkhapa's interpretation of Madhyamaka) before him, did not conflate his preferred interpretation of Madhyamaka with Dzogchen and there are very important reasons for this.

Dudjom Rinpoche, like Jigme Lingpa, Longchenpa and so on before him, states very clearly that tenets like Madhyamaka and so on obscure the meaning of Atiyoga when he introduces the superiority of Atiyoga in the big red book.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 3rd, 2014 at 12:06 AM

Title: Re: Residing in the ground of being

Content:

smcj said:

As I have already written, there are many Dzogchen masters that have a different presentation/intepretation.

Malcolm wrote:

Actually, they don't. But you really do not understand what you are reading because you are not very familiar with this tradition.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, November 2nd, 2014 at 11:51 PM

Title: Re: Residing in the ground of being

Content:

smcj said:

...

Malcolm wrote:

SMCJ, you simply do not understand what you are reading,

I will leave you this this statement by one of the most important masters of the Dzogchen tradition, Nyima Bum (12th century):

As such, because the basis, one's unfabricated mind, arose as the essence of the sole reality, there is no need to search elsewhere for the place etc., i.e. it is called self-originated pristine consciousness [ye shes].

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, November 2nd, 2014 at 11:04 PM

Title: Re: Interview with Khenchen Rigdzin Dorje

Content:

lorem said:

Even Dolpopa and Tsongkhapa. Does it really matter from the side of a practitioner? I actually like Dolpopa's view but Tsongkhapa's rings true also. I've never thought it nihilistic as such. Just not conceptually available and who can describe the undescrivable. Can't be put into words.

asunthatneversets said:

Tsongkhapa and Dolbupa represent both the main gsar ma views; (i) gelug, and (ii) gzhan stong. The rnying ma view that Khenchen Rigdzin Dorje is discussing is (iii) spros bral, which is different from Tsongkhapa's Gelug and Dolbupa's gzhan stong.

Malcolm wrote:

Huh?

Most Madhyamakas before Tsongkhapa's time were spros bral pas, and the Sakya school still is representative of that view, as is Mipham and Khenpo Shengga (who both studied Madhyamaka with Sakyapas).

I would not say that the main gsar ma view is represented by Gelug and Jonang approaches, since the Kagyus in general (Karma, Drugpa, Drikung, etc.) are all over the place when it comes to how they understand Madhyamaka.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, November 2nd, 2014 at 10:56 PM

Title: Re: Residing in the ground of being

Content:

rachmiel said:

Something existed before sentient beings and mind entered the scene.

Malcolm wrote:

Short answer, no.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, November 2nd, 2014 at 10:51 PM

Title: Re: A closer look into empowerments

Content:

Malcolm's said:

Any way, sutras do not require lungs.

lorem said:

Yes I agree but seen several instances of Gelukpa giving them.

Recording is still up for debate IMHO.

Malcolm wrote:

As to the first point, there is a lung for the whole of the bka' 'gyur and the bstan 'gyur, even so, sūtras do not require a lung to be read. Tantras, on the other hand, generally do, or at least one has to have had a major empowerment otherwise you are not supposed to even look at them, much less things like vajras and bells.

As to the second point, one cannot receive a lung from a recording. Why? Because mantras and so on cannot be transmitted this way. Believing that you can receive a lung from a recording is similar with believing that you can get light from a lamp without plugging it into a wall. There is no direct living connection with the source. This is why lungs and empowerments from recorded media are not valid means of transmission.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, November 2nd, 2014 at 10:29 PM

Title: Re: A closer look into empowerments

Content:

lorem said:

The MP3 recording I feel is up for debate. Was Sutra yes. Was a lung. I was participating.

Malcolm wrote:

One cannot received a lung from a recording. Any way, sutras do not require lungs.

A lung is an authorization to read; no one needs permission to read a sūtra or even to recite the dharanis found therein.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, November 2nd, 2014 at 10:10 PM

Title: Re: Residing in the ground of being

Content:

rachmiel said:

Does Buddhism discuss -- or even acknowledge -- that which is not of mind? Does it have a cosmology, an explanation for the nature of all that is?

Malcolm wrote:

Depends on what you mean. Buddhism maintains that the universe comes about again and again because the collective karma of all sentient beings.

In terms of the actual nature of things, Mahāyāna Buddhism explains that everything is empty, without self.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, November 2nd, 2014 at 9:14 PM

Title: Re: Residing in the ground of being

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

And the nature of that which is not our minds ... is Buddhism interested in that?

Not sure what you mean.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, November 2nd, 2014 at 8:52 PM

Title: Re: Trungpa, Tathagatagarbha, and "True Self"

Content:

Anders said:

So basically, no good reason other than "The Buddha said it."

Malcolm wrote:

But the Buddha did not say it, because the Buddha, as Trungpa correctly observes, never taught any self that could be substantially established and merely used the term "self" as a rhetorical device.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, November 2nd, 2014 at 8:36 PM

Title: Re: Residing in the ground of being

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

There is no need to point to a moon that is right in front of your face. In other words, your approach is too intellectual. It is not grounded in experience. Animals have choiceless awareness, that is not what we are trying to discover.

rachmiel said:

What are we trying to discover?

Malcolm wrote:

The nature of our minds.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, November 2nd, 2014 at 8:27 PM

Title: Re: A closer look into empowerments

Content:

lorem said:

I would kneel down before His Holiness the Dalai Lama and Karmapa and swear that I received transmission of the Golden Light Sutra from Ven Kirti Tsenshab Rinpoche in the awake and dreaming states from MP3 audio.

Malcolm wrote:

It's a sūtra, it does not have a formal transmission as in Vajrayāna.

lorem said:

I just remember H E Garchen Rinpoche saying that no matter what anyone thought on this subject to please leave his students alone or something similar.

Malcolm wrote:

No one is hassling Garchen Rinpoche's students and I personally have nothing but the highest respect for Garchen Rinpoche, having received empowerments from him in person.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, November 2nd, 2014 at 8:25 PM

Title: Re: A closer look into empowerments

Content:

Jikan said:

We thought it appropriate that Khenpo's email should basically have the last word.

Malcolm wrote:

In this case it was an evasion, and I can understand why, since the correct answer is actually no, one cannot receive an empowerment from a recording.

Privileging someone's answer because of their title, in absence of any clear scriptural precedent or reasoning is pretty lame.

T. Chokyi said:

It would follow then that you can't give or receive a transmission in the dream state either, yet Nyala Rinpoche Rigdzin Changchub Dorje told CHNN when CHNN asked for transmission that he had been given the transmission already by dream, it was given in a dream before they met, only thing is CHNN had his own doubts about receiving it that way why? because it was not "his dream". CHNN gives this true story many times during Open Webcast as you know.

Malcolm wrote:

The key difference, of course, is that a recording is an inert pattern stored on a hard disk somewhere, and Chanchub Dorje was a fully realized person. The Buddhas see sentient beings as Buddhas, but we still need to do our own work and wake up to our own nature. The Buddhas cannot "give" us empowerments that we are not aware of. Empowerments are not given, they are received. That means active participation by two people at the same time. And as you know, ChNN himself has stated numerous that empowerments and introductions and even lungs cannot be received from recordings.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, November 2nd, 2014 at 8:19 PM

Title: Re: Trungpa, Tathagatagarbha, and "True Self"

Content:

Son of Buddha said:

As we can see, we do not need to take the Buddha literally on the point of the self, because if we did, we would be left with the negative consequence that we should all have all the perfect qualities of buddhas and bodhisattvas present fully formed in our mind streams. Anyone can see this is not so.

This naturally pure basic constituent of a one-gone-thus, ultimate truth, thusness, has no previously existent flaws of afflictions to be removed because freedom from all adventitious defilements. from. the start is its nature, And similarly it does not have the least factor of qualities of purification to be set up because the status of the ultimate qualities of the powers and so forth being spontaneously established from the start and being indivisible is its nature.

The Buddha Nature is the very nature of all living beings, for the Buddha this nature is Fully realized(Pure Enlightenment with no flaws nor marks of the 3 poisons, greed anger or ignorance)

For Samsaric beings This very nature(Buddha Nature) resides in all of us in its pure "form" naturally perfect(our true nature our true self), yet it is obscured by adventitious defilements that make up and constitute a living samsaric being.

So what it comes down to is (1) Enlightenment in its perfect state with no defilements obscuring it.(BuddhaHood) and (2) Enlightenment in its perfect state with defilements obscuring it(Samsaric beings)

The thusness that itself abides as the fruit of purification in a buddha abides as the basis of purification in sentient beings, and the thusness that itself abides as the basis of purification in sentient beings abides as the fruit of purification in a buddha because with respect to the thusness of sentient beings and of buddhas there is not the slightest difference of entity, just as there is not the slightest difference in entity in the space pervading all of where there are and are not clouds. Hence, the naturally pure thusness is, due to the person, together with defilement and also without defilement and is, due to the person, the basis of purification and also the fruit of purification. Consequently, it is necessary to become skilled in the profound essentials of flawless non-contradiction.(Dolpopa)

Malcolm wrote:

What sense does it make to establish suchness as a "self", someone's identity?

Nāgārjuna:

Whatever is the nature of the Tathāgāta, that is the nature of the world;

Since the Tathāgata has no nature,
the world too has no nature.

You can say, as Candrakīrti does, that this naturelessness is a nature, you can say that tathāta, śūnyatā, dharmatā, etc., are all pure, free of affliction from the beginning, etc. But since they are not substantially established, calling them a "self" is merely a Buddhist rhetorical device to frame the substantially established self of the non-Buddhists as a falsity.

Son of Buddha said:

So Trungpa is perfectly in accord with the Buddha because the way some people these days present the teachings of the Buddha in the Nirvana sūtra is quite distorted, presenting the teaching of the Nirvana Sutra in the manner of the worldly interpretation of permanence, bliss, self and purity and leading others astray.

M

Define what the worldly interpretation of this view is?

Malcolm wrote:

[/quote]

As above, that the self taught in the Nirvana sūtra is a substantially established self, rather than a mere rhetorical device.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, November 2nd, 2014 at 2:16 AM

Title: Re: Polygamy / Polyandry & Buddhism

Content:

Zhen Li said:

So what's the conclusion? Is Polygamy and Polyandry acceptable in Buddhism?

Malcolm wrote:

Completely acceptable. Buddha had many wives, and in some parts of Central Tibet, several brothers will marry one woman.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, November 2nd, 2014 at 1:51 AM

Title: Re: Residing in the ground of being

Content:

rachmiel said:

A pointer needs to signify on some level for the pointee, or it is of no use. If you point at the moon, I need to have a clue that you are pointing to ... the moon, rather than pointing arbitrarily, to nothing that I can see/feel.

Malcolm wrote:

Then for you it is useless to discuss this on the internet. You need to find this out directly from your teacher. If it is important to you, then you will make the effort, otherwise, you are wasting people's valuable time.

rachmiel said:

Woah! Your pointer doesn't happen to speak to me. Plenty of others do. If I'm wasting your valuable time, please feel free to not invest any more in this thread.

Malcolm wrote:

There is no need to point to a moon that is right in front of your face. In other words, your approach is too intellectual. It is not grounded in experience. Animals have choiceless awareness, that is not what we are trying to discover.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, November 2nd, 2014 at 1:23 AM

Title: Re: Residing in the ground of being

Content:

rachmiel said:

What I meant was: I didn't understand Malcolm's pointer. "Don't correct thoughts" doesn't do anything for me, it just sits there.

Malcolm wrote:

That is what it is supposed to do (the mind), it just sits there without being altered or corrected in anyway.

rachmiel said:

A pointer needs to signify on some level for the pointee, or it is of no use. If you point at the moon, I need to have a clue that you are pointing to ... the moon, rather than pointing arbitrarily, to nothing that I can see/feel.

Malcolm wrote:

Then for you it is useless to discuss this on the internet. You need to find this out directly from your teacher. If it is important to you, then you will make the effort, otherwise, you are wasting people's valuable time.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, November 1st, 2014 at 11:30 PM

Title: Re: Residing in the ground of being

Content:

rachmiel said:

Good one!

What I meant was: I didn't understand Malcolm's pointer. "Don't correct thoughts" doesn't do anything for me, it just sits there.

Malcolm wrote:

That is what it is supposed to do (the mind), it just sits there without being altered or corrected in anyway.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, November 1st, 2014 at 11:29 PM

Title: Re: Residing in the ground of being

Content:

rachmiel said:

Please elaborate.

Malcolm wrote:

For example, when sitting in meditation, you hear someone mowing the lawn, you don't try to block out the sound, you do not try to focus on your breath for example, to lessen the distraction, you don't follow the distraction of the lawn mower, you just sit there without trying to change your thoughts or block your thoughts. In other words, you leave your mind unmodified. When you do so the distraction of the sound of the lawn mower will disappear.

For example, you smell nice incense in the shrine room, you do not you don't try to block out the smell, you do not try to focus on your breath for example, to lessen the distraction, you don't follow the distraction of the scent, you just sit there without trying to change your thoughts or block your thoughts. In other words, you leave your mind unmodified. When you do so the distraction of the scent will disappear.

etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, November 1st, 2014 at 10:33 PM

Title: Re: Residing in the ground of being

Content:

rachmiel said:

How does one "leave mind alone?"

Mind is all we see, know, experience ... right?

Malcolm wrote:

You don't try to correct your thoughts.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, November 1st, 2014 at 10:13 PM

Title: Re: Sapan and Gampopa

Content:

lorem said:

Why do he and others hold the view that pointing out instructions are valid only if one has abhisheka?

Malcolm wrote:

That is not what he is saying. He is saying that pointing out instructions do not have the ability to ripen one to practice mahāmudra in absence of a proper Abhisheka.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, November 1st, 2014 at 9:30 PM

Title: Re: Trungpa, Tathagatagarbha, and "True Self"

Content:

Son of Buddha said:

Chapter 11 Nirvana Sutra

Malcolm wrote:

States the following:

Child of a good family, "buddhanature" is ultimate emptiness. Ultimate emptiness is "wisdom." In that respect, "empty" is not perceived to be either empty or not empty. Through discerning wisdom [prajñā] all that is empty, not empty, permanent, impermanent, suffering, bliss, self and non-self is seen. "Empty" is all samsara. "Not-empty" is parinirvana. Samsara is in the range of the selfless, "self" is parinirvana. To see everything as empty; but not see what is not empty is not "the middle path." To not see everything as in the range of the selfless, but not see the self is not "the middle path". "The middle path" is buddhanature.

Of course, now we need to understand what wisdom, jñāna, is according to this text. After giving a description of various samadhis, the Buddha then earlier in the text:

"Wisdom" is to be understood as the buddhanature that exists in all sentient beings".

Further, when we consider the four categories of permanence, bliss, self and purity, the Buddha states:

For the worldly there is permanence, bliss, self and purity. Also for the transcendent there is permanence, bliss, self and purity. Worldly Dharmas are expressible, but meaningless. Transcendent Dharmas are expressible and also meaningful.

If it is asked why that is so, since Worldly Dharmas possessing four distortions, the meaning cannot be realized. If it is asked how so? Their perception is distorted, their mind is distorted and their view is distorted, and because of these three distortions, the worldly see bliss as suffering, see the permanent as impermanent, see the self as not a self, and see the pure and impure, thus these are distortions. Because of distortions the worldly speak the words [permanence, bliss, self and purity] but do not understand the meaning.

In that respect, if it is asked what the meaning is, the selfless is "samsara"; self is the "Tathāgata"; impermanent is the śravakas and pratyekabuddhas; permanent is the dharmakāya of the Tathāgata. Suffering is all tīrthikas; bliss is parinirvana; impurity is conditioned phenomena; purity is the pure dharmas of the buddhas and bodhisattvas. Therefore, this is undistorted.

As we can see, we do not need to take the Buddha literally on the point of the self, because if we did, we would be left with the negative consequence that we should all have all the perfect qualities of buddhas and bodhisattvas present fully formed in our mind streams. Anyone can see this is not so.

So Trungpa is perfectly in accord with the Buddha because the way some people these days present the teachings of the Buddha in the Nirvana sutra is quite distorted, presenting the teaching of the Nirvana Sutra in the manner of the worldly interpretation of permanence, bliss, self and purity and leading others astray.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, November 1st, 2014 at 3:54 AM

Title: Re: Residing in the ground of being

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

Appears to be this:

http://www.tbrc.org/#!rid=O2MS813%7CO2MS813C2O0183\$W2MS813

Malcolm wrote:

Correct, but not everyone has access to TBRC.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, November 1st, 2014 at 3:30 AM

Title: Re: Residing in the ground of being

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

What is the name of the Tibetan text, and is it available online somewhere?

Malcolm wrote:

This is from the section on the view I cited. Enjoy.

The passage is on the third page at the very end of the section on view, right before he quotes Sakya Pandita.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, November 1st, 2014 at 3:18 AM

Title: Re: Residing in the ground of being

Content:

treehuggingoctopus said:

Good enough for me. Is it Seize questions à un maître dzogchen?

Malcolm wrote:

no clue, i read it in Tibetan

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, November 1st, 2014 at 3:09 AM

Title: Re: Residing in the ground of being

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The view established intellectually we need to establish consciously in dependence upon one's capacity of knowledge and on convention. The way of establishing that is the system of Prasanga Madhyamaka commented upon by the great being Nāgārjuna and his followers. There is no system of view better than that.

--ChNN, Questions and Answers on the Great Perfection

treehuggingoctopus said:

Malcolm, is the text you are quoting from available anywhere? Has it been published?

Malcolm wrote:

In French only.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, November 1st, 2014 at 2:21 AM

Title: Re: Residing in the ground of being

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Your primordial state [basis] is yours.

alpha said:

If the primordial base is individual to each sentient being how is it possible that methods like hum sgrub of dorje drollo work and why do they work ?

Or why do we come across so many expressions in the dzogchen tantras like the essence of all the sugatas is none other then the essence of your own primordial state? If is none other is shared which is heresy. Is there a way of thinking about individual bases without falling into the error of thinking about it as an separate entity ? I know it is empty but if is empty then it can only be shared and empty.

Malcolm wrote:

The essence of all fires is heat. That does not mean all fires are the same.

The basis is not an entity at all, which is the point.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, November 1st, 2014 at 1:24 AM

Title: Re: Residing in the ground of being

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

I understand that you have a kind of nominalist, anti-"mystical" bent but, honestly, when I read this passage, from "On The Nature Of Samantabhadra: A Conversation with Chögyal Namkhai Norbu", the epilogue to "The Supreme Source": Question: But if all beings are Samantabhadra, can we say that there are infinite Samantabhadras?

Answer: We could also think that there are infinite Samantabhadras, but when we are in the state of Samantabhadra, what does "infinite" mean? This is already a limited viewpoint. The true condition is beyond numbers. If we think in terms of an "individual being" this means that we are limiting, and consequently everything becomes complicated. If we want to understand, then we must not limit.

Question: In every tantra there is a dialogue, such as the dialogue between dharmakaya and sambhogakaya in the Kunjed Gyalpo tantra. What is the real meaning of this?

Answer: It is a way of communicating knowledge. The transmission of knowledge comes from the state of rigpa that has never been stained and has never been hindered. This is the Adibuddha, or "primordial Buddha," Kunjed Gyalpo.

Question: Is the state of Adibuddha, or Kunjed Gyalpo, something universal, present in all beings?

Answer: The state of Kunjed Gyalpo is knowledge, and in knowledge there is not even the concept of "one and two," otherwise we have already entered into dualism. Also the concept of "individual" presupposes dualistic vision. But Samantabhadra is beyond all this, isn't he?

it just doesn't seem to be the same view.

Malcolm wrote:

Your primordial state [basis] is yours. Your rigpa is yours. It does not belong to someone else, was not created by Samantabhadra, God, Chance, or anything else. As long as one persists in reifying the basis, for that long one will never understand Dzogchen teachings.

BTW:

The view established intellectually we need to establish consciously in dependence upon one's capacity of knowledge and on convention. The way of establishing that is the system of Prasanga Madhyamaka commented upon by the great being Nāgārjuna and his followers. There is no system of view better than that.

--ChNN, Questions and Answers on the Great Perfection

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, November 1st, 2014 at 1:09 AM

Title: Re: Shang Rinpoche dharma transmission and lecture in Melbou

Content:

Ayu said:

In the Lamrim teaching from Che Tsongkhapa (11th century)

Malcolm wrote:

Late 14th, early fifteenth, actually.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, November 1st, 2014 at 12:51 AM

Title: Re: Residing in the ground of being

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Put another way, all fires are similarly hot, but there is no "ground of fire" from which all fires arise.

dzogchungpa said:

It is kind of interesting how they're all so similar though, don't you think?

Malcolm wrote:

Similar causes and conditions result in similar effects. If you see your real nature, the six realms are the six dhatus of Samantabhadra, if you don't, the six dhātus of Samantabhadra are the six realms. As Nāgārjuna states in the MMK:

Samsara is not a little bit different than nirvana, nirvana is not a little bit different than samsara;
whatever is the limit of nirvana, that is the limit of samsara.
A little difference between those two does not even have the slightest existence.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, November 1st, 2014 at 12:29 AM

Title: Re: Residing in the ground of being

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

If there is a mind for every sentient being, there is a basis for every sentient being. This is why the basis is defined as being beyond one or many. It is beyond being one, since there is a diversity of sentient beings; it is beyond being many, since the basis is generic, and exists the same way in each sentient being.

dzogchungpa said:

So, basically, you're saying that "the basis" is just a way of referring to the fact that sentient beings are sentient?

Malcolm wrote:

The basis [primordial state] is a way of describing how we become buddhas by recognizing our real state or sentient beings by not recognizing that state, as well as describing how our real nature is whether we recognize it or not.

As described above, the term "ground of being" was coined by Tillich as a term for God. Hence it is not a proper term to be used in Buddhadharma at all.

Put another way, all fires are similarly hot, but there is no "ground of fire" from which all fires arise.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, November 1st, 2014 at 12:17 AM

Title: Re: Residing in the ground of being

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

As a marginalia in the rig pa rang shar tantra states:

"The original basis" is undetermined and can appear in any way. It is not impeded in anyway, has no fixed nature, its essence is unchanging, it is unperturbed by nature, the luminosity of wisdom. Also that light is able to appear as everything and is capable of performing functions. It is empty of a self and what belongs to a self, the dharmin of unchanging emptiness is not determined in clarity. Further, the ultimate essence that does not change in a defined instant is beyond words.

This is a perfect definition.

"Dharmin" means the subject of a reasoned discussion. A "defined instant" means an instant predicated on having arising, ceasing and abiding (and such instants are rejected even in Yogacara).

So it means here that the basis, one's own unfabricated mind, has no fixed form or nature and is essentially timeless since time is also not established.

dzogchungpa said:

I still don't understand what "not determined in clarity" means. Also, it doesn't say the basis, which I assume = the ultimate essence, is timeless but rather that it is "beyond words". Also, while we're at it, there's one of these bases for each sentient being, right?

Malcolm wrote:

It means that the emptiness of the mind is not fixed in the clarity of the mind.

The whole passage concerns a definition of the original basis, thog ma gzhi.

If there is a mind for every sentient being, there is a basis for every sentient being. This is why the basis is defined as being beyond one or many. It is beyond being one, since there is a diversity of sentient beings; it is beyond being many, since the basis is generic, and exists the same way in each sentient being.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, October 31st, 2014 at 11:51 PM

Title: Re: Residing in the ground of being

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

As a marginalia in the rig pa rang shar tantra states:

"The original basis" is undetermined and can appear in any way. It is not impeded in anyway, has no fixed nature, its essence is unchanging, it is unperturbed by nature, the luminosity of wisdom. Also that light is able to appear as everything and is capable of performing functions. It is empty of a self and what belongs to a self, the dharmin of unchanging emptiness is not determined in clarity. Further, the ultimate essence that does not change in a defined instant is beyond words.

This is a perfect definition.

dzogchungpa said:

It might be perfect, but I don't understand it. What do the phrases "the dharmin of unchanging emptiness is not determined in clarity" and "the ultimate essence that does not change in a defined instant" mean?

Malcolm wrote:

"Dharmin" means the subject of a reasoned discussion. A "defined instant" means an instant predicated on having arising, ceasing and abiding (and such instants are rejected even in Yogacara).

So it means here that the basis, ones own unfabricated mind, has no fixed form or nature and is essentially timeless since time is also not established.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, October 31st, 2014 at 11:27 PM

Title: Re: About the demon Mara

Content:

pemachophel said:

Thanks Malcolm for posting this.

Malcolm wrote:

Sure, this is an excellent little text, I mean to publish it some day.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, October 31st, 2014 at 11:24 PM

Title: Re: Residing in the ground of being

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

As a marginalia in the rig pa rang shar tantra states:

“The original basis” is undetermined and can appear in any way. It is not impeded in anyway, has no fixed nature, it’s essence is unchanging, it is unperturbed by nature, the luminosity of wisdom. Also that light is able to appear as everything and is capable of performing functions. It is empty of a self and what belongs to a self, the dharmin of unchanging emptiness is not determined in clarity. Further, the ultimate essence that does not change in a defined instant is beyond words.

This is a perfect definition.

dzogchungpa said:

It might be perfect, but I don't understand it.

Malcolm wrote:

It is referring to your own unfabricated mind.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, October 31st, 2014 at 11:00 PM

Title: Re: Residing in the ground of being

Content:

rachmiel said:

I'm glad to hear that you have been able to maintain a strong relationship with your Guru all these years while seeing him so infrequently. Knowing that this is possible for another person makes me think it could work for me.

Malcolm wrote:

It is not really necessary to have a close personal relationship with one's teacher. It is useful however to travel now and again to serve him or her. As the Mahāsiddha Virupa states "The guru is the profound path."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, October 31st, 2014 at 7:44 PM

Title: Re: About the demon Mara

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

From Replies to Nyang Tingzin Zangpo:

Again Guru Rinpoche said:

"There are as many Dharma practitioners as stars in the sky, but few are without the obstacles of māra, like the sun and moon. If one is without the obstacles of māra, it would be easy to attain liberation in a single year. Therefore, necessary to recognize māra and overthrow him.

In the beginning, when one is staying in the city of samsara's suffering, also one's faith in Dharma is slight; carried away by the "māra of laziness", one is angry at enemies, loving to friends, one thinks of mutual satisfaction, one is distracted by mundane activities, one is not mindful of death. Because of the activities of deluded appearances one remains in procrastination. That is called "māra".

The method of overpowering that māra is to seek out a qualified Guru, the cause of unimpaired faith. Meditate on death and impermanence, the cause of unimpaired diligence. Having established one's priorities, flee towards the Dharma.

At that time, māras turning one's thinking in the wrong direction will arise. Some will manifest as one's kin and companions, "Don't practice Dharma" they will say and will cause obstacles by various means. Some will manifest as terrifying enemies or manifest as competitors and property. Since the human life of deceptions is exposed, slipping away day after day, and in the end one sinks deeper into the mire of samsara. To subdue it, having entrusted one's mind to the jewel of the Guru, it is necessary to have the resolve not to seek advice from secular counselors. [8/a]

When one arrives in the presence of the Guru, the māra who accompanies doubts arises. The sign of his entry is to not perceive the qualities of the Guru. Even subtle faults are perceived. Incorrect views regarding his practice of interpretable deeds arise.

Thinking it is necessary to go to hell after giving whatever donations were received to the Dharma is a māra. To subdue it, develop the thought of the Guru as a Buddha.

At that time, the māra of turning away from Dharma arises. One will think of women, wealth, business, be deceitful and hoard. The sign of the entry of that māra is one will give up one's Dharma clothes, companions, and Dharma practice. One will not wish to listen to Dharma. One's behavior will be mundane and one will have attachments and aversions. One will be greatly attached to evil alcohol. One will turn one's back on the teachings of the Buddha. To subdue it, develop perseverance towards the Dharma, sublime of the sublime. One should be diligent whatever profound Dharma to which one is inclined. Remain very far away from women and irreligious activities. It is important to think about the liberation accounts of one's predecessors.

At that time, the māra of being jaded about hearing different Dharmas will arise necessarily. The sign of his entry is one speaks proudly "I made this request for this Dharma." There isn't an intellectual understanding because one has not understood the meaning. Because one understands empty words alone, one explains secret words in public. Despite whatever profound meaning is explained, one thinks "I have heard it before" and certain knowledge does not arise. One does not reach perfection in Dharma, that is called a māra. To subdue it, one must engage in hearing and contemplation as before again and again, and truly integrate the meaning of Dharma.

At that time, māra of seeking many qualities enters. Since one understands qualities, māra is disguised as benefactors and students. On their arrival, one doesn't engage in practice. One becomes conceited about one's learning, and one sees oneself as important. One becomes attached to wealth. Obstacles preventing one from traveling the path of Dharma are created. The method of subduing it is, stay in mountain retreat for a long time, and change all other activities which will not realize the Dharma.

At that time, the māra of tenets will arrive. Having arrived as a Dharma of five poisons with the biases of oneself and others, give up the jealousies of tenets, train in unbiased pure vision.

At that time, when meditating on the deity, the māra of having doubts about the deity enters. Concepts about taking and putting down the deity, and is it good or bad arise. [9/a] Wishing to subdue demons with power, with completing the approach, hurrying the activities, practicing subjugation and evil mantras, to tame the māra of animosity with the wisdom deity, whatever deity one meditates, do not meditate with or without characteristics, but develop only the inner radiance of awareness and be steady in one's commitments of the three doors.

If one is freed from that māra, once again when one is meditating the channels and winds, the māra of introducing obstacles to practice arises, creating obstacles to spiritual practice, even slight suffering is unbearable. One stops that practice and later one is apprehensive of doing it. For that, meditate on the faults of samsara and one will be free from obstacles.

If one is free from that, again, enhancing great bliss, the dākinī māra arrives. Having accepted mantra, the woman bears children. Since one cannot care for them, various non-virtues occur. Cut the snares of attachment to her, what one does not have one needn't protect.

If one is free from that, when meditating emptiness, the māra of emptiness arising as an enemy occurs. “Nothing is accomplished” and one confuses good deeds and misdeeds. One will have not faith in the Three Jewels. One will not arouse compassion for sentient beings. For that, one should increase virtue and purify misdeeds. One should train in pure vision, devoted faith, dependent origination and inseparable emptiness and compassion.

Further, the māra of compassion arising as an enemy is that without oneself being liberated one rushes to help migrating beings, and delay in accomplishment, etc., occurs. So to avoid that, develop aspirational bodhicitta and be relaxed about engaged bodhicitta.

If one is free from that, the māra of predictions arising as an enemy occurs. Impersonating one’s deity or Guru, when such predictions occur in one’s experience or in dreams as “Help migrating beings!” and “One will become accomplished if one has helped migrating beings”, etc., for that dissolve the wisdom being, if it remains clearly, it is the deity or Guru. But if it does not remain clearly, it is a māra and an obstacle. One should determine that with certainty.

If free from that, because the māra of ascetic conduct arises as an enemy, one wanders continually in towns, some are drunks, others show crazy behavior, others are lewd, behavior which is not correspond with the sublime Dharma occurs. To counter act that, [10/a] stay in one place, meditate on candali, be impartial towards the eight dharmas.

Otherwise, the obstacles of māra while one has not obtained perfect Buddhahood are endless, and also the explanations which follow. Having given up material things, if one practices one pointedly, no kind of obstacle or māra will affect one.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, October 31st, 2014 at 7:26 PM

Title: Re: Residing in the ground of being

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

No. Dzogchen does not assert an underlying monistic 'ground of being'.

smcj said:

You may be right. But you've got to admit that a lot of the time it looks like a duck, walks like a duck, and quacks like a duck.

Malcolm wrote:

No, but it is true that a lot of westerners spend a lot of time surgically altering swans into ducks.

As a marginalia in the rig pa rang shar tantra states:

“The original basis” is undetermined and can appear in any way. It is not impeded in anyway, has no fixed nature, it’s essence is unchanging, it is unperturbed by nature, the luminosity of wisdom. Also that light is able to appear as everything and is capable of performing functions. It is empty of a self and what belongs to a self, the dharmin of unchanging emptiness is not determined in clarity. Further, the ultimate essence that does not change in a defined instant is beyond words.

This is a perfect definition.

The problem with most of these conversations about the Dharma on the internet, is that we are looking at these teachings, especially a teaching like Dzogchen, through an incredibly narrow aperture, assuming that the one glint we see of the teachings represents the whole.

We are also in a time where foreign teachers try to communicate with students using terms in English without an educated background in Western Philosophy, and Theology and so imply things they have no intention of implying.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, October 31st, 2014 at 8:00 AM

Title: Re: Residing in the ground of being

Content:

rachmiel said:

A quick zoom over to Wikipedia revealed this:

Some Mahayana and Dzogchen traditions of Buddhism, however, do assert an underlying monistic 'ground of being' or tathagatagarbha, which is stated to be indestructibly present in all beings and phenomena.

Malcolm wrote:

No. Dzogchen does not assert an underlying monistic 'ground of being'. This is why Dzogchen spends so much time refuting such a ground.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, October 31st, 2014 at 5:55 AM

Title: Re: Residing in the ground of being

Content:

smcj said:

Kongtrul was famous for being a Shentongpa. I think what he said should be assumed to be from the "empty of other" perspective.

Malcolm wrote:

No, what he says should be understood from the Dzogchen perspective, since it is about Dzogchen. Kongtrul did not subordinate his understanding of Dzogchen to gzhan stong. If anything, it is the opposite.

smcj said:

As I posted earlier in this thread: Jamgon Kongtrul "Treasury of Knowledge: Book 1 'Myriad Worlds'" p.204:

What is the fundamental nature of the original, primordial ground of being, before buddhas appear by realizing it and before sentient beings appear by not realizing it? To answer this, the tradition of Great Perfection states that...

For those reading this that are not familiar with that particular book, it is Kongtrul's dissertation on the different cosmologies for the universe. He starts with Mt. Meru and the like, and ends up with a description of "how the universe is" from the Dzogchen perspective. The above quote would be hard to characterize as anything other than Great Madhyamaka/Shentong, and it is specifically predicated on Dzogchen. So I don't buy that he saw Dzogchen as being anything other than an "empty of other"/Great Madhyamaka/Shentong perspective.

Kongtrul is one authority. He is not the only authority. Other equally prestigious authorities disagree. That's 100% ok. The only "correct way to see it" is whatever way a qualified teacher decides a specific student needs to hear about it. I know of teachers that tell one student one thing and another student something else entirely. You're not going to get that kind of customized presentation here on the internet. But in any case, like it or not, the "empty of other" school of thought does exist within Tibetan philosophical tradition.

Malcolm wrote:

The term "ground of being" appears nowhere in the text.

The text uses the term "ye thog gzhi", i.e. "primordial, original basis."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, October 31st, 2014 at 5:08 AM

Title: Re: Residing in the ground of being

Content:

smcj said:

Kongtrul was famous for being a Shentongpa. I think what he said should be assumed to be from the "empty of other" perspective.

Malcolm wrote:

No, what he says should be understood from the Dzogchen perspective, since it is about Dzogchen. Kongtrul did not subordinate his understanding of Dzogchen to gzhan stong. If anything, it is the opposite.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, October 31st, 2014 at 4:18 AM

Title: Re: Residing in the ground of being

Content:

Jikan said:

Malcolm, going back to the OP here for context:

When this teacher is using the phrase "ground of being," is he simply using an inappropriate term to translate something (ka dag, say)? Or do are you saying this is a symptom of a misunderstanding on this teacher's part--that he's slipped over into eternalism?

Malcolm wrote:

As for the first part, definitely yes; as for the second, possibly — it rather depends on what he understands about Vedanta in general.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, October 31st, 2014 at 3:57 AM

Title: Re: Residing in the ground of being

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

So is this referring to Dharmadhatu or Dharmakaya?

Malcolm wrote:

ka dag = dharmakāya of the basis.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, October 31st, 2014 at 3:51 AM

Title: Re: Residing in the ground of being

Content:

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, October 31st, 2014 at 3:50 AM

Title: Re: Residing in the ground of being

Content:

smcj said:

From Jamgon Kongtrul "Treasury of Knowledge: Book 1 'Myriad Worlds'" p.205:

The primordial purity of the original ground is the domain of a practitioner of the path (of Great Perfection) who is free from the erroneous biases of conceiving (the ground) in various artificial ways and who has the correct (understanding) of the ground a primordial purity.

Malcolm wrote:

Ka dag is simply defined as emptiness free from extremes as he says here:
(The primordial purity of the ground) wholly transcends words, concepts, and formulations, and surpasses the limitations of existing or not existing.

smcj said:

The nature of the ground is primordially pure.

Malcolm wrote:

I.e. it is emptiness free from extremes.

Existing neither as cyclic life nor perfect peace, it remains primordially empty.

smcj said:

Personally I like the english word "premise" better than "base" or "ground", but that's just me.

Malcolm wrote:

The word is sthana (basis, support) in Sanskrit, not pratijñā (premise)

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, October 31st, 2014 at 3:41 AM

Title: Re: Residing in the ground of being

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

Btw, I have heard Anam Thubten use the word "brahman" in this context.

Malcolm wrote:

Tibetans are also not immune to misconceptions. Sad, considering how carefully Dzogchen texts dismantle Advaita, etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, October 31st, 2014 at 2:47 AM

Title: Re: Residing in the ground of being

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

There is no "ground of being" described in any Buddhist text. The term is not appropriate in Buddhist discourse, and was imported into Dharma by mistake.

The term is a Christian theological term coined by Paul Tillich.

I wrote elsewhere on this site:

In terms of the origins of the term, it was indeed coined by Tillich to show that "God must be called the infinite power of being which resists the threat of nonbeing."

[Systematic Theology, Vol. pg. 64] You can see why such borrowing is tempting, "The ground of being has the character of self-manifestation; it has logos character"

[Systematic Theology, Vol.1 pg. 158]

A large problem for people who are approaching Dzogchen is that they fall back into classical western philosophical categories. Indeed, Günther wrote once that Dzogchen essentially is not different than Parmenides's theory that whatever was contingent as non-being and whatever is permanent is being. Tillich writes:

"The Orphics, the Pythagoreans, Anaximander, Heraclitus, and Parmenides were driven to their philosophy by the awareness that the world they encountered lack ultimate reality. But only in Plato does the contrast between existential and the essential being become an ontological and ethical problem. Existence for Plato is the realm of mere opinion, error, and evil. It lacks true reality. True being is essential being and is present in the realm of eternal ideas, i.e., in essences. In order to reach essential being, man must rise above existence. He must return to the essential realm from which he fell into existence, In this way man's existence, is standing out of potentiality, is judged as a fall from what he essentially is. The potential is the essential, and to exist, i.e., to stand out of potentiality, is the lost of true essentiality...In God there is no difference between essential and existential being. This implies the split is not ultimately valid and that is has no relevance for the ground of being itself. God is eternally what he is. [Systematic Theology, Vol.2 ppg. 21-22]

Examining this kind of presentation that the term "ground of being" arose out of, it is easy to see why those who are not trained in Indo-Tibetan scholastics as well as Western Philosophy will be very attracted to terms like "ground of being" in relationship to the term "basis" or gzhi.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, October 31st, 2014 at 1:21 AM

Title: Re: Samaya in Vajrayāna

Content:

Fortyeightvows said:

how far do you take that?

I strive to keep samaya, especially since many people have their own feeling about tibetan buddhism and vajrayana it is better to do so. but what about things like images of one's yidam on the home shrine? or books on the bookshelf?

Malcolm wrote:

I do not allow people without empowerment in my shrinerroom.

I keep my images covered when common people are around as much as possible.

HE Ratnavajra gave me an image once with explicit instructions never to show it to someone who had not had the empowerment itself. So I largely try to observe this principle myself.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, October 31st, 2014 at 12:44 AM

Title: Re: Practice of Setrap

Content:
lorem said:
EDIT:

about Shri Devi. 2 armed Queen of War Sickle Is Sarasvati and Marpa 4 armed Vetali is Lakshmi.

I guess in dharmakaya all the same but that would be saying 6-arm, 4-arm, and Bernagchen are all the same. (Chenrezi, Samantabhadra, Vajrapani)

Malcolm wrote:
Yes, they are. Their aspect only differs in terms of their appearance to us based on our own deluded perceptions and needs.

But in reality the wisdom continuum of buddhas are all the same.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Friday, October 31st, 2014 at 12:26 AM
Title: Samaya in Vajrayāna
Content:
lorem said:
Okay. Makes sense. Berzin's samaya is to clarify. Our's is not. I dig that.

EDIT: But as Buddhism comes to the West it may change. Internet society very open about things and the whole social justice aspect very strong in psyche/culture(?)

EDIT 2: Yes. Four-faced Mahakala could not be shown, only in Brahmin form, but Geluk changed that.

Malcolm wrote:
As for the second point, no, the Gelugp's didn't change that. One still should never display the form of Caturmukha Mahākala.

Samayas don't change just because the teachings are brought from one culture to another — for example, the samayas did not change their character because Tibetans imported Vajrayāna from India. Therefore, we should not expect them to be mutable just because we live in the West.

Samayas are something taught in the tantras. Regardless of what others may do, I encourage people to follow them according to how they have been understood.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Friday, October 31st, 2014 at 12:03 AM
Title: Re: The tantric vow not to disparage women
Content:

lorem said:

They are totally set out in detail on the Berzin site. Not secret.

EDIT: you visit someone and they have thangkha uncovered or see shrine basically know pretty much everything about their practice (to some extent just making a point)

Malcolm wrote:

Right, nevertheless, they are actually secret and should not be discussed, just as pictures of yidams and so on should not be exposed to those without empowerment and so on.

Some people actually care about samaya, though these days, most seem to think it is optional.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, October 30th, 2014 at 11:24 PM

Title: Re: The tantric vow not to disparage women

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

We are not really supposed to talk about tantric vows.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, October 29th, 2014 at 8:57 PM

Title: Re: Yeti-Bigfoot

Content:

reddust said:

I know this a silly question. I was wondering what the Tibetans think of their Bigfoot called Yeti?

Malcolm wrote:

"Yeti" is the Tibetan name for the very rare Himalayan brown bear, and that is all.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, October 29th, 2014 at 4:43 AM

Title: Re: Practice of Setrap

Content:

Konchog1 said:

Some say Palden Lhamo is worldly, others say otherwise.

Malcolm wrote:

Śrī Devi is a wisdom protector.

Konchog1 said:

While on the topic, is there a difference between all the Sri Devis? For example, the Sri Devi popular among the Gelug, and the Sri Devi of Marpa? Are they the same deity or different?

Malcolm wrote:

Same devi, different manifestations. All wisdom devatās have the same continuum, i.e., the dharmakāya.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, October 29th, 2014 at 4:37 AM

Title: Re: Practice of Setrap

Content:

Konchog1 said:

Some say Kalarupa is worldly, others say otherwise.

Some say Palden Lhamo is worldly, others say otherwise.

As for oracles, I have heard the same. I have also heard that worldly protectors like Pehar don't have oracles because they are too powerful, and entering a medium's body would kill the person.

lorem said:

Damchen is Manjushri.

Palden Lhamo is 10th level bodhisattva

Nechung Oracle is Pehar.

Konchog1 said:

I had heard Nechung was Dorje Drakden, a minister of Pehar.

Similar to how Palden Lhamo has no oracle, but there is an oracle for the Tenma goddesses in her retinue.

Malcolm wrote:

The Tenma are worldly.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, October 29th, 2014 at 4:35 AM

Title: Re: Practice of Setrap

Content:

Konchog1 said:

Worldly or not is an interesting issue.

Some say Kalarupa is worldly, others say otherwise.

Malcolm wrote:

Kalarupa is a worldly manifestation of Yamantaka.

Konchog1 said:

Some say Palden Lhamo is worldly, others say otherwise.

Malcolm wrote:

Śrī Devi is a wisdom protector.

Konchog1 said:

As for oracles, I have heard the same. I have also heard that worldly protectors like Pehar don't have oracles because they are too powerful, and entering a medium's body would kill the person.

Malcolm wrote:

Pehar has oracles.

Very confusing.

Konchog1 said:

As for Setrap,

Malcolm wrote:

Setrap has an oracle, therefore, worldly. Setrap was introduced by Nyan Lotsawa, it is a new school protector, no relationship nor samaya with Guru Rinpoche.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, October 29th, 2014 at 3:23 AM

Title: Re: Practice of Setrap

Content:

qwerty13 said:

I give you more background. Once I started to seriously think about dropping this practice I felt pain around my heart area and various other locations in my body. Nothing very serious, but I really felt for a moment that everything is not right. It's not like little painful tingling, but worse, more like something turning painfully couple of times inside my heart area. I had to stop for a moment to let the feeling go away. After the pain went away, I felt myself little weak for a couple of minutes. But after that I started to feel that I am returning to "normal" state. This may not be entirely related, but Alexander Brezin says in his web archive that if one disparages one's teacher or breaks up with him/her in a negative way (negative way: not keeping polite distance, but just running away with remorse) then it can cause autoimmune diseases, mental and physical suffering.

So that came to my mind when I was feeling these symptoms.

.

Malcolm wrote:

Setrap is a gyalpo. People who do Gyalpo practices often suffer from anxiety, paranoia and in particular, snying lung.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, October 24th, 2014 at 6:15 AM

Title: Re: claim about Fifth Dalai Lama

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

No he is not calling for the slaughter of actual children, this is not his intention. All protector cycles have prayers with imagery just as violent. It is part and parcel of the rhetoric of violence that permeates the religious imagery of protector practices and smad las rites in general. I could cite (and won't) innumerable gore-filled examples where samaya breakers and their off-spring are subject to just as fierce imprecations.

Vajrasvapna said:

A prayer to harm the persons who break their vows is something other than a prayer to cause harm to innocent children and servants. The children were a threat to Buddhism or just to the power of the Dalai Lama and his order?

Malcolm wrote:

The prayer was directed not at people, but spirits causing people to act against their samaya, hence the reason it was addressed to Tsi'u mar.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, October 19th, 2014 at 9:28 PM

Title: Re: So what is the Tathagatagarbha?

Content:

Sherab said:

In short you are merely saying that the conditioned and the unconditioned being mere conventional designations are in the end illusions or unreal. And so, sentient beings, the tathagatagarbha and even the trikaya are all illusions or all unreal. That is rather extreme don't you think?

Malcolm wrote:

It is less extreme than the converse, i.e., that sentient beings, tathāgatagarbha and the three kāyas are true existents or real.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, October 19th, 2014 at 9:55 AM

Title: Re: So what is the Tathagatagarbha?

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

Honestly, I don't see what 'atmaparamita' could mean then. Here is Mipham's description of it, from "Gateway To Knowledge" Vol 4: Transcendent sublime identity is the attainment of the transformation into the very wisdom that encompasses all of existence and peace, the nature of all phenomena. This transcends the extreme of provisional insubstantiality-differentiated from the substantial existence of self in terms of the mere non-existence of self-and in so doing, utterly quells all such conceptual complexities.

This great identity is the wisdom body of space-like equality, which exercises mastery over all phenomena. It is the transformed locus of the entire unfathomable and matchless ocean of undefiled qualities such as the ten powers and the ten masteries. It is the sublime basis for spontaneously accomplishing the two benefits.
('atmaparamita' = "transcendent sublime identity")

Malcolm wrote:

The transcendent sublime nature is the attainment of the transformation into the very wisdom that encompasses all of existence and peace, the nature of all phenomena. This transcends the extreme of provisional insubstantiality-differentiated from the substantial existence of self in terms of the mere non-existence of self-and in so doing, utterly quells all such conceptual complexities.

This great nature is the wisdom body of space-like equality, which exercises mastery over all phenomena. It is the transformed locus of the entire unfathomable and matchless ocean of undefiled qualities such as the ten powers and the ten masteries. It is the sublime basis for spontaneously accomplishing the two benefits.[/quote]
('atmaparamita' = "transcendent sublime nature")

"Identity" is a little different than a "self", even so.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, October 18th, 2014 at 10:57 PM

Title: Re: So what is the Tathagatagarbha?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Translating "atma" as "self" in this context is a misfortunate error when in fact the term simply means "nature" in this context as numerous usages prove.

dzogchungpa said:

So, what would you say the difference between "self" and "nature" is in this context?

Malcolm wrote:

"A self" is a bearer of identity, a nature is something like heat for fire.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, October 18th, 2014 at 10:23 PM

Title: Re: So what is the Tathagatagarbha?

Content:

Son of Buddha said:

Oh your right my bad I posted the wrong thing.....

Queen Srimala Sutra

13. Intrinsic Purity of the Mind

"Lord, samsāra is based on the Tathāgata-garbha. It was with reference to the Tathāgata-garbha that the Lord pointed out and explained, '[It is] without limit in the past.' Since there is the Tathāgata-garbha, there is reason for speaking of 'cyclical flow' (samsāra).

Therefore the Tathāgata-garbha is the support, the holder, the base of constructed [Buddha natures] that are non-discrete, not dissociated, and knowing as liberated from the stores [of defilement]; and furthermore is the support, the holder, the base of external constructed natures that are discrete, dissociated, and knowing as not liberated.

Malcolm wrote:

Samsara does not equal conditioned phenomena. Why? Because if it did, there could be no pure conditioned phenomena such as path dharmas. People frequently confuse these two things much to their detriment. In other words, all conditioned phenomena are impermanent, but not all conditioned phenomena are impure.

Furthermore, indeed all conditioned phenomena are intrinsically pure, and it is just this intrinsic purity of the mind that sutras refer to as tathagātagarbha. It is this purity which is the basis for all buddhaqualities. Translating "atma" as "self" in this context is a misfortunate error when in fact the term simply means "nature" in this context as numerous usages prove. Tagathāgarbha is indeed pure, permanent, blissful, and a nature, but it is not a thing per se., it is also not a "self" and using that term and applying too tathāgarbha is just confusing. Further, claiming it is source of impure conditioned phenomena is also a category error. On the other hand, rhetorically samsara can be "based" on tathāgarbha since the non-recognition of one's real state does result on wandering in samsara.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, October 18th, 2014 at 5:33 AM

Title: Re: So what is the Tathagatagarbha?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The term "ground" (gzhi, sthana) is much misunderstood.

dzogchungpa said:

Could you clarify its meaning for us?

Malcolm wrote:

From a version of introduction to my forthcoming book:

...the generic basis [spyi gzhi], which is initially defined by Vimalamitra in the section on the nidānas as “one’s own unfabricated mind” [rang sems ma bcos pa]. This crucial point made in the text should not be ignored, for it would appear that Vimala’s stance contradicts the modern tendency to interpret the generic basis as a transpersonal entity of some kind, leading to the proposition that “the universe is an intelligent entity” and so on.

And:

...what is intended by the term “original basis” [ye gzhi] is a pristine empty cognizance or nous. By the use of the term ye shes as a key descriptor for the basis, Dzogchen texts are referring to a noetic potentiality of consciousness which is innate even when defined as “originally pure” or empty, for otherwise it would become very difficult to account for the arising of buddhas and sentient beings in the second topic, the arising of delusion.

And:

The third hard question is the issue of the temporality of the basis. Since time does not apply to the original basis, we must regard the use of terms such as “original,” “primordial” and so on as indicating a state in which time is irrelevant, rather than an actual conventional historical epoch or starting point existing countless infinities of eons ago. From such a perspective the placing of the original basis on a temporal spectrum is therefore a didactic myth. The net effect of this understanding is that the basis is the state of phenomena as they appear, in that all phenomena, both external and internal, appear out of an empty noetic potential.

And

dzogchungpa said:

Having defined the basis, what is being described is a description of reality just as it is. Buddhas are those who unerringly recognize this, and specifically, the idealized buddha known as Samantabhadra recognizes this not only in absence of a teacher, but without ever becoming a sentient being.

Malcolm wrote:

And:

The third topic defines sugatagarbha as no other than the basis present in sentient beings. In other words, the sugatagarbha defines how the basis is instantiated in sentient beings, and how vidyā exists in the body.

And:

Only the seventh position is considered to be flawless, in that the basis is defined as “great originally purity” (ka dag chen po):

Dharmatā, original purity, is free from all proliferation. Since it is unaffected by ignorance, it is free from all obscurations.

In reality, the basis really just refers to the union of the two truths:

The Mahāyānapathakrama by Subhagavajra states: So called “tantras” are tantras because of connection, and further, because they connected the basis, the method and the result. When divided, there are two kinds— tantras of words and tantras of meaning. Words are sounds. There are three in meaning— the tantra of the basis, the tantra of method and the tantra of the result. Now then, the tantra of the basis is the nature of the two truths; the method is the two stages; and the result is the two kaṃyas, the dharmakāya and rūpakāya. Therefore, since the result is obtained when the method is cultivated in dependence on the basis, a tantra is so called because it connects.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, October 18th, 2014 at 4:41 AM

Title: Re: So what is the Tathagatagarbha?

Content:

conebeckham said:

"Beyond dualistic experience, reality's original nature

Is free from all formulation, the innate character of luminosity."

Jamyang Khyentse Wangpo

Malcolm wrote:

Right the innate characteristic of gsal ba is spros bral, but that does not make gsal ba a "source".

The term "ground" (gzhi, sthana) is much misunderstood.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, October 18th, 2014 at 4:12 AM

Title: Re: So what is the Tathagatagarbha?

Content:

Son of Buddha said:

Brahmans held that self was the 5 aggregate body and that 5 aggregate body was permanent.

Malcolm wrote:

No, this is a completely incorrect misrepresentation of what "brahmins" held.

Son of Buddha said:

No its not, it was common teachings back in the Buddhas day which is why the Buddha spent so much time teaching that the 5 aggregates were not self.

Malcolm wrote:

People in general tend to believe that the body is the self -- however, at this times, brahmins held many beliefs, traditionally numbered 62.

Son of Buddha said:

Malcolm

There is no difference between this view and the view of Advaita, which holds that Brahman, not ever non existent, uncreated, unconditioned, permanent, bliss, eternal, pure, True Self, etc. is the ground for phenomena.

So.... and the View of Advaita is considered to be copied straight from Buddhism (even hindu rivals at that time pointed that out)

Malcolm wrote:

This does not address the problem that I pointed out. Also, Gaudapada did not copy Buddhist views so much as borrow Buddhist arguments to refute the dualist views of other nonbuddhists. Shankara of course hotly rejected the idea that he was borrowing Mahāyāna and there is little resemblance between what is actually taught in Mahāyāna and Advaita.

Son of Buddha said:

In reality created, conditioned, impermanent, non-eternal and so on phenomena cannot have an uncreated, unconditioned, permanent ground (because a series is impossible, etc., all the faults which belong to positing a permanent creator, etc.) Those Buddhists who hold such a view have erred into eternalism.

So maitreya was an eternalist?

Maitreyas Differentiation of the Middle and the Extremes say:

"Not existent, and not non-existent,"

Malcolm wrote:

This is not a citation affirming any sort of a ground at all.

Son of Buddha said:

and moreover the thought of all the statements in a great many stainless texts of the middle way of being devoid of the extremes of existence and non existence is that:

*Since all dependently arisen conventionalities do not really exist, when one realizes this, one does not fall to an extreme of existence and is released from the extreme of superimposition.

* Since the ultimate noumenon that is beyond dependent arising is never non-existent, when one realizes this, one does not fall to an extreme of non-existence and is released from the extreme of deprecation.

Malcolm wrote:

These are not citations asserting some existent, permanent ground.

Son of Buddha said:

There is no problem, Samsara is beginningless As is Enlightenment. I stated Enlightenment is the ground and foundation for Samsara not that Enlightenment created samsara, For as long as Enlightenment has been the illusion of Samsara that mirrors Enlightenment has been. (the unconditioned/conditioned aspects of samsara is taught in the Queen Srimala Sutra)

Malcolm wrote:

The "ground" of samsara is ignorance, not enlightenment. It may be the case that there is no suchness to discover outside of samsara, but in that case, this does not make suchness a "ground" per se out of which phenomena arise. The root and basis of samsara is just the non-recognition of how things are. But this does not mean that there is some unconditioned enlightened pleroma out of which the phenomena of samsara and nirvana are produced.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, October 18th, 2014 at 2:26 AM

Title: Re: So what is the Tathagatagarbha?

Content:

Son of Buddha said:

Brahmans held that self was the 5 aggregate body and that 5 aggregate body was permanent.

Malcolm wrote:

No, this is a completely incorrect misrepresentation of what "brahmins" held.

Son of Buddha said:

In the Buddhist Sutras the Tathagatagarbha is said to be the ground/foundation for all phenomenon, not ever non existent, uncreated, unconditioned, permanent, bliss, eternal, pure, True Self, beyond dependent arising, what is truly real and not illusion and permanent Wisdom.

Malcolm wrote:

There is no difference between this view and the view of Advaita, which holds that Brahman, not ever non existent, uncreated, unconditioned, permanent, bliss, eternal, pure, True Self, etc. is the ground for phenomena.

In reality created, conditioned, impermanent, non-eternal and so on phenomena cannot have an uncreated, unconditioned, permanent ground (because a series is impossible, etc., all the faults which belong to positing a permanent creator, etc.) Those Buddhists who hold such a view have erred into eternalism.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, October 18th, 2014 at 1:46 AM

Title: Re: So what is the Tathagatagarbha?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Buddhaqualities may be inherent in the dharmakāya, but only buddhas can see the dharmakāya, just as only buddhas can see tathagātagarbha. Thus one cannot evade the two accumulations, whether it takes three incalculable eons as in common Mahayāna, or on one lifetime, as in Secret Mantra.

Astus said:

That may be so. But it would be hard to find any existing Mahayana school of the common type. Tiantai, Huayan and especially Chan teaches a sudden path, while Pure Land teaches liberation in the next life. Only those who deny buddha-nature, i.e. the followers of Xuanzang, talk about a minimal three aeons.

Malcolm wrote:

They can teach whatever they like, but all the schools you mention are sutrayāna schools and are thus common Mahāyāna, teaching no methods not found in sūtra.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, October 18th, 2014 at 12:40 AM

Title: Re: So what is the Tathagatagarbha?

Content:

Astus said:

[Practically speaking, since the buddha qualities are inherent, it becomes possible to skip aeons of accumulating merit, so we have all the "enlightenment in this body" teachings as the mainstream of Mahayana.

Malcolm wrote:

Buddhaqualities may be inherent in the dharmakāya, but only buddhas can see the dharmakāya, just as only buddhas can see tathagātagarbha. Thus one cannot evade the two accumulations, whether it takes three incalculable eons as in common Mahayāna, or on one lifetime, as in Secret Mantra.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, October 17th, 2014 at 5:33 AM

Title: Re: claim about Fifth Dalai Lama

Content:

kirtu said:

It would be less difficult in an academic paper because it can be treated from a religious studies perspective. You are a smart man. You can figure it out.

Malcolm wrote:

I have other more pressing things to do, and I don't write academic papers.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, October 17th, 2014 at 4:04 AM

Title: Re: claim about Fifth Dalai Lama

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

I would have to explain too many details, many of which are bound by samaya (for example, how to explain to an outsider the ritual language of extreme violence found in so many protector petitions?).

cloudburst said:

How would one explain this? People seem relieved that it is just a prayer to a protector, but the fifth Dalai Lama would have believed this to be a real entity who could be influenced by his prayers, just like a warlord. Given this, isn't it just as disturbing that this religious man is calling for children to be slaughtered? How can we understand his intention?

Malcolm wrote:

No he is not calling for the slaughter of actual children, this is not his intention. All protector cycles have prayers with imagery just as violent. It is part and parcel of the rhetoric of violence that permeates the religious imagery of protector practices and smad las rites in general. I could cite (and won't) innumerable gore-filled examples where samaya breakers and their off-spring are subject to just as fierce imprecations.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, October 16th, 2014 at 11:36 PM

Title: Re: Mahakala Practice Mahayoga

Content:

lorem said:

I would give them the benefit of the doubt but hard for me to check accuracy when I can't read the sources but thought they were holding to a Sakya/academic view.

Malcolm wrote:

I give them the benefit of the doubt, but in a project as large, and given that it is only one person, it is not surprising that there are errors here and there, and some of them are rather large especially when writing about non-Sakyapa art.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, October 16th, 2014 at 11:20 PM

Title: Re: claim about Fifth Dalai Lama

Content:

Greg said:

I don't think the point is particularly to change Nichols' or Sperling's mind, I think the point is to have a published correction in a reputable source that is accessible to everyone. Plenty of people would be persuaded by this.

Malcolm wrote:

I am not a reputable source. You would need someone like Thurman for that.

M

Greg said:

Thurman has his own credibility problems, but yes an academic would probably be ideal. However, if the Times published your letter to the editor, that would be worthwhile.

Malcolm wrote:

Seriously, I am not the right person for the job.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, October 16th, 2014 at 11:00 PM

Title: Re: claim about Fifth Dalai Lama

Content:

Greg said:

I don't think the point is particularly to change Nichols' or Sperling's mind, I think the point is to have a published correction in a reputable source that is accessible to everyone. Plenty of people would be persuaded by this.

Malcolm wrote:

I am not a reputable source. You would need someone like Thurman for that.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, October 16th, 2014 at 8:16 PM

Title: Re: claim about Fifth Dalai Lama

Content:

kirtu said:

Yes it is. If the academics get something egregiously wrong it is in fact the job of translators and Dharma teachers to correct the issue. You could publish a paper in something like the Journal of Buddhist Ethics along with a few other translators/Western Dharma teachers. Or you could write an article concerning the misinterpretation and publish it in a magazine like Tricycle. But this kind of misinterpretation needs to be addressed.

Kirt

Malcolm wrote:

Sorry Kirt, but no. Here is why -- I spent years correcting Dogyal advocates and so no — did I convince anyone of anything? No.

Further, in order to correct someone like the writer of the op-ed, I would have to explain too many details, many of which are bound by samaya (for example, how to explain to an outsider the ritual language of extreme violence found in so many protector petitions?).

And as far as correcting Sperling goes, that also is just a waste of time since he won't listen.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, October 16th, 2014 at 6:27 PM

Title: Re: Mahakala Practice Mahayoga

Content:

cck123 said:

Hi,

i got a jenang for an Six armed Mahakala from Rinchen Terdzo (ThukChen Pema GyuTrul Drawa Cycle, not Shangpa Chagdrupa) and thought this should be an Mahayoga/Anuttarayoga empowerment.

On Himalayanart.com there is mentioned that Six armed Mahakala is a Kriyayogatantra practice, which would mean that there a very different commitments for practicing/reciting the Mantra.

Can you help me with some info? Do i need to be vegetarian for reciting the Mantra? Or are there no commitments with jenang?

Best wishes

Chris

Malcolm wrote:

It is highest yoga tantra. Himalayan art has many errors.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, October 16th, 2014 at 8:27 AM

Title: Re: Re Tsen God

Content:

pemachophel said:

Anyone know anything about a Protector named Tsen God (not God)?

Malcolm wrote:

Btsan rgod just means wild brtsan.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, October 16th, 2014 at 8:13 AM

Title: Re: claim about Fifth Dalai Lama

Content:

Jikan said:

We're talking about an article in a book from 1996, right?

1996?

Surely this has been corrected in the scholarship already.

Malcolm wrote:

Nope.

Jikan said:

If so, then Buddhist Studies is an anemic discipline indeed.

Malcolm wrote:

Just spread very thin...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, October 16th, 2014 at 5:57 AM

Title: Re: claim about Fifth Dalai Lama

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Sperling conflates two distinct epochs in the Fifth's life, disturbances in Tsang that also tally with disturbances caused by Dogyal, and the events of Tsang war in 1640.

Moreover, Sperling does not state to whom he sent these instructions, but it is clear when the letter is read in full it was sent to Tsi'u dmar. Now of course it is too late, because this misinformation now shows up on many web sites.

kirtu said:

But since your fingers are not broken you can inform Kristof and Sperling (and in the later case in an academic forum) of the errant reading.

Kirt

Malcolm wrote:
Not my job.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Thursday, October 16th, 2014 at 5:57 AM
Title: Re: claim about Fifth Dalai Lama
Content:
Jikan said:
We're talking about an article in a book from 1996, right?

1996?

Surely this has been corrected in the scholarship already.

Malcolm wrote:
Nope.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Thursday, October 16th, 2014 at 5:01 AM
Title: Re: claim about Fifth Dalai Lama
Content:

Greg said:
According to Sperling it is 5DL's report of the instructions that he sent to a military force directing them to attack Tsang. Hard to see how that is purely rhetorical.

Malcolm wrote:
It is not such a letter. It is a letter of petition to Tsi'u dmar po to quell disturbances in Tsang.

It states:

"Pleased to composed a letter of vajra words of the Yakṣa Tsi'u dmar po, the general of the arrogant ones appointed by the great master of Glorious Oddiyāna, the union of all the buddhas, as the protector of the doctrine and the profound treasures in the valleys surrounded by the Himalayas, headed by the temple of Zab Yangs Migyur Lhundrup (Samye)..."

It ends with:

"Please pacify all the negativities of this time such as the illness, wars and famines of Pur rgyal and Tibet, and increase happiness, fully increase the doctrine of scripture and realization, effortlessly accomplish the wishes of me, the Vidyādhara..."

etc.

As I said, these lines are rhetorical.

This kind of scholarship is very irresponsible on Sperling's part.

Greg said:

It certainly looks less bad if it is in fact a supplication to a dharmapāla and not an actual directive to smash babies off of rocks. And that is certainly extremely sneaky and misleading of Sperling to phrase things the way he did. But the fact that he actually did orchestrate a military campaign is probably enough for Kristof's point to stand.

Malcolm wrote:

By 1660 (the date of the above cited letter), the Fifth was firmly in control of Tibet.

Sperling conflates two distinct epochs in the Fifth's life, disturbances in Tsang that also tally with disturbances caused by Dogyal, and the events of Tsang war in 1640.

Moreover, Sperling does not state to whom he sent these instructions, but it is clear when the letter is read in full it was sent to Tsi'u dmar. Now of course it is too late, because this misinformation now shows up on many web sites.

In 1640, he was only 23 and fully controlled by the regent, Sonam Chophel, who waged war against the King of Tsang in the Fifth's name.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, October 16th, 2014 at 4:18 AM

Title: Re: claim about Fifth Dalai Lama

Content:

Greg said:

According to Sperling it is 5DL's report of the instructions that he sent to a military force directing them to attack Tsang. Hard to see how that is purely rhetorical.

Malcolm wrote:

It is not such a letter. It is a letter of petition to Tsi'u dmar po to quell disturbances in Tsang.

It states:

"Pleased to composed a letter of vajra words of the Yakṣa Tsi'u dmar po,the general of the arrogant ones appointed by the great master of Glorious Oddiyāna, the union of all the buddhas, as the protector of the doctrine and the profound treasures in the valleys surrounded by the Himalayas, headed by the temple of Zab Yangs Migyur Lhundrup (Samye)..."

It ends with:

"Please pacify all the negativities of this time such as the illness, wars and famines of Pur rgyal and Tibet, and increase happiness, fully increase the doctrine of scripture and realization, effortlessly accomplish the wishes of me, the Vidyādhara..."

etc.

As I said, these lines are rhetorical.

This kind of scholarship is very irresponsible on Sperling's part.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, October 16th, 2014 at 12:32 AM

Title: Re: Mindfulness is powerful, But keep religion out of it

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

So he's an expert on Dzogchen too? Anything else?

Malcolm wrote:

He was a student of Tulku Orgyen's. His affection for Dzogchen has been consistent, despite the fact that his materialism is utterly at odds with Dzogchen view.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, October 15th, 2014 at 7:53 PM

Title: Re: Taking and giving/Tonglen/Chöd/New Age

Content:

Concordiadiscordi said:

Perhaps it isn't possible to gauge the value, significance, purpose, or reach of tonglen.

Malcolm wrote:

The supreme training of bodhicitta,
the bodhicitta of exchanging oneself with others,
is said to be the essence of the teachings.

-- Sakya Pandita

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, October 15th, 2014 at 7:48 PM

Title: Re: claim about Fifth Dalai Lama

Content:

drodul said:

Nicholas Kristof writes in a recent column that the Fifth Dalai Lama ordered children to be massacred in 1660 (<http://mobile.nytimes.com/2014/10/09/opinion/nicholas-kristof-the-diversity-of-islam.html?referrer=> " onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;" onclick="window.open(this.href);return false; .) What, if anything, is he talking about?

Malcolm wrote:

It's purely rhetorical.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, October 15th, 2014 at 6:20 AM

Title: Re: Understanding why ISIL beheads

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Dude....

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Oil_reserves_in_Iraq " onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;" onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;" onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;" onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;"

Most of oil in Iraq is controlled by Kurds or Shiites, that is all there is to it.

Son of Buddha said:

Even the oil fields in shiite area DO NOT BELONG to the shiites, the oil is ran through a PIPELINE, to oil refineries to be processed from benzine for commercial use these refineries are almost exclusivly under sunni control.. Saddam set it up this way to keep the Sunnis in control of everything.

The actual refined product never touches shiite hands.....even the crude oil never touches shiite hands cause it goes down the pipeline to the Sunnis.

Which is why the largest oil refinery in Iraq is the Bajji oil refinery in Sunni control.

Malcolm wrote:

The Shiites control that oil, and that is a fact. It is how the Iraqi Gvt. (Shiite) makes its money. The refinery you mention? Also controlled by Iraqi Gvt. until a few months ago.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, October 14th, 2014 at 11:37 PM

Title: Re: Understanding why ISIL beheads

Content:

Son of Buddha said:

A reasonable exit from Iraq was given and he didn't blow it, Iraq was stable for many years and they were properly set up to take care of themselves..... the fact is the blame rests solely on the Iraqi Gov, which has a 250,000 standing Army with tanks, heavy armored vehicles and airforce, and yet they lost half their country to 5000 invaders with pickup trucks.

Malcolm wrote:

Obama did blow it, he did not listen to his advisors for political reasons (responding to the American populace's war fatigue); the Iraqi Govt. was and is a joke, and the proof of this is that the Iraqis let go of half of Iraq to a brigade of bandits in pickup trucks.

Son of Buddha said:

Your joking right?

It doesn't matter what advisors told Obama cause Mr Obama was only responding to the Iraq government demand that all American troops be out of their country by 2011, only thing Obama did was accept the Iraqi governments demands for FULL sovereignty and the end of all US occupation of Iraq..... of course this also worked out for Obama cause he got to play it off as if he was the one who caused all of the American troops to be brought home. When in fact it was the Iraqi gov's demands.

Yes the Iraqi gov is weak..... But they are a sovereign nation and it was about time the US treated them like one..... THEIR elected gov as a sovereign nation voted and said we want all American troops out of our country by 2011..... it doesn't matter if it was right or wrong choice....it was their choice....and it was about time for their choice to be honored

Malcolm wrote:

It was a short sighted decision, Obama blew it.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, October 14th, 2014 at 11:33 PM

Title: Re: Understanding why ISIL beheads

Content:

Son of Buddha said:

Geographically the Sunnis control most of the oil in Iraq(baji).

Malcolm wrote:

No, the Sunni are mostly located away from the oil regions.

Son of Buddha said:

The vast majority of the oil fields are the northern Sunni triangle, the southern oil fields in the Shiite areas have their oil run through pipelines that must be sent to the northern refineries for processing.....hence the largest oil refinery in Iraq is the Sunni controlled Baiji oil refinery on route cherry near what was FOB Summeral.

Malcolm wrote:

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Oil_reserves_in_Iraq "

onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;" onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

Most of oil in Iraq is controlled by Kurds or Shiites, that is all there is to it.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, October 14th, 2014 at 7:09 AM

Title: Re: Appropriateness of openly discussing sunyata

Content:

Bakmoon said:

I think it would be very inappropriate to talk about the teachings of emptiness with someone who doesn't have the correct background to understand it correctly. One should understand dependent origination first. I also think that to begin learning Madhyamaka one of the first things to go over and establish very clearly is the meaning of prajnapiti, meaning provisional designation or imputation. I think that explaining emptiness in terms of prajnapiti is the best way to lay it out for a beginner because it allows you to lay out the meaning of different teachings in a very explicit way, and it is easy to use prajnapiti to describe emptiness in a way that is clearly distinct from both absolutism and nihilism, even to a beginner.

Malcolm wrote:

It depends, I learned about emptiness (via the "Heart Sutra") before I knew what dependent origination was, and it filled me with tremendous joy. In, fact, experiencing joy upon hearing of emptiness is a sign described the Prajñāpāramita sūtras of someone who has previously entered the Mahāyāna.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, October 14th, 2014 at 2:10 AM

Title: Re: Buddha Sakyamuni's Negative Karma

Content:

haha said:

No doubt Buddha does not have any negative karma.

But

Even though there is no negative karma (in relation to Sakyamuni Buddha's mental continuum), other people to whom he interacted in his past and present lives were not free from negative emotions. It seemed that those people to whom he had not positive relation they suffered from jealous, hatred, anger with him. How could that be the skillful means? Many people at the time of Sakyamuni Buddha became envious with his fame and because of that they tried to defame him. Even tried to hurt him physically. How could it be the skillful means?

Karma related with his own mental continuum
Karma related with other people's mental continuum

Malcolm wrote:

The sutra above actually discusses how Devadatta's actions are related to the Buddha's skillful means.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, October 13th, 2014 at 8:01 PM

Title: Re: Understanding why ISIL beheads

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

BTW, there is a solution after all...fielding an all-women army:

A women fighter explained "This is not a myth but reality. I personally met IS fighters face-to-face. Women fighters infringe on their psyche. They believe they won't go to paradise if they are killed by women. That is why they flee when they see women. I saw that personally at the Celaga front. We monitor their radio calls. When they hear a woman's voice on the air, they become hysterical."

<http://www.ibtimes.com/syria-kurdish-women-protection-units-wage-battle-against-isis-kobani-1703501> " onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

<http://www.ibtimes.co.uk/syria-isis-jihadis-terrified-fanatical-kurdish-women-soldiers-who-will-deny-them-place-paradise-1468887>

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, October 13th, 2014 at 7:53 PM

Title: Re: Understanding why ISIL beheads

Content:

Son of Buddha said:

Geographically the sunnis control most the oil in Iraq(baji).

Malcolm wrote:

No, the Sunni are mostly located away from the oil regions.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, October 13th, 2014 at 7:52 PM

Title: Re: Understanding why ISIL beheads

Content:

Son of Buddha said:

A reasonable exit from Iraq was given and he didn't blow it, Iraq was stable for many years and they were properly set up to take care of themselves..... the fact is the blame rests solely on the Iraqi Gov, which has a 250,000 standing Army with tanks, heavy armored vehicles and airforce, and yet they lost half their country to 5000 invaders with pickup trucks.

Malcolm wrote:

Obama did blow it, he did not listen to his advisors for political reasons (responding to the American populace's war fatigue); the Iraqi Gvt. was and is a joke, and the proof of this is that the Iraqis let go of half of Iraq to a brigade of bandits in pickup trucks.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, October 13th, 2014 at 7:49 AM

Title: Re: Understanding why ISIL beheads

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The problem is really a political one, not a military one. If NATO chose to, they could douse these people with overwhelming force. However, it would cause WWII because inevitably NATO troops would clash with the 100,000+ Iranian troops that are already in Iraq.

Kirtu said:

Where are you getting 100,000 Iranian troops in Iraq? The BBC and Guardian are reporting 2000 troops specifically to fight IS. This may be the revenge of Saddam Hussein (Saddam Hussein may have been correct that Iran wants to end Iraq as a political entity). However if Iranian troops are there only to combat IS then there is no reason why this would inevitably cause a confrontation with NATO troops.

Kirt

Malcolm wrote:

I mispoke — I mean on the border. However, there are clear Iranian interests at stake because the Shiites control most of the oil in Iraq. If anyone has a stake in oil in Iraq, it is Iran.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, October 13th, 2014 at 7:41 AM

Title: Re: Understanding why ISIL beheads

Content:

Nemo said:

Allowing war profiteers to subvert your good intentions into meaningless mass murder is not skillful either.

You are letting a man with a hammer fix your car. There will be lots of banging and it will sound like something is getting done. But if you know anything about cars it's dumb.

Malcolm wrote:

There are always war profiteers, there always has been, there always will be — it is the nature of the chaos of armed conflict itself.

I am not letting anyone do anything — I voted for Obama the first time because he promised us a reasonable exit from Iraq — but he blew it, and this is the price we are paying now.

Anyway, I vote Green and will continue too for the foreseeable future.

Still, we have no solutions for a situation that is growing increasingly worse by the day.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, October 13th, 2014 at 7:19 AM

Title: Re: Understanding why ISIL beheads

Content:

Nemo said:

I'm so tired of wars...

Malcolm wrote:

Me too...

Karma Dorje said:

Then perhaps it is best not to promote it on a public board, no matter how well-intentioned you may be. You don't influence policy posting here, but your authority as a Buddhist expert may confuse some/many who read your point of view but don't understand the nuance. Worse it can bring out negativity or give cover to negativity in others who do not have as firm a grasp on their own emotions. It's hard to see anything positive come out of promoting military action on a Buddhist forum even if you are correct in your estimation of what is necessary to do.

Malcolm wrote:

I don't think positing a pacifist stance in regards to the present mideast situation is skillful. It is easy to say "No war!!!"

But when people are being killed by truly evil people, who have nothing but evil intentions in their hearts even towards their own, well, what can we do? Throw up our hands and claim it is not our problem?

The problem is really a political one, not a military one. If NATO chose to, they could douse these people with overwhelming force. However, it would cause WWII because inevitably NATO troops would clash with the 100,000+ Iranian troops that are already in Iraq.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, October 13th, 2014 at 7:11 AM

Title: Re: Buddha Sakyamuni's Negative Karma

Content:

Mkoll said:

That's one point of view, but it is not the Mahāyāna point of view.

Malcolm wrote:

Don't leave us hanging in suspense! What is the Mahayana POV?[/quote]

The Mahāyāna POV is that a Buddha is completely free from karmāvarana, the obscuration of karma. In the Ārya-upāyakaśālya-nāma-mahāyāna-sūtra, The Buddha explains that even though tathāgatas have no karmic obscurations which can be karmavipaka, they demonstrate karmavipaka otherwise sentient beings will not be able to relate to them. He says:

Because of causes and conditions, an acacia thorn pierced the Tathāgata's foot. That too is the Tathāgata's skillful means, but is not the ripening of karma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, October 13th, 2014 at 6:09 AM

Title: Re: Buddha Sakyamuni's Negative Karma

Content:

haha said:

@ Queen Elizabeth II

Thank you for the link.

Towards the end of the commentary it is indeed stated emphatically:

Kammapiṭikaṃ nāma Buddhāpi na muñcati.

The Buddha was surely not free from the connection with that deed.

Kammapiṭikaṃ evarūpaṃ Lokattayasāmim-pi na vijahati.

The Lord of the Three Worlds surely could not abandon the connection with that deed.

And the moral is, of course, that neither can we, so we had better be careful about the deeds we choose to perform.

Malcolm wrote:

That's one point of view, but it is not the Mahāyāna point of view.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, October 13th, 2014 at 5:54 AM

Title: Re: Understanding why ISIL beheads

Content:

Nemo said:

I'm so tired of wars...

Malcolm wrote:

Me too...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, October 13th, 2014 at 3:40 AM

Title: Re: Understanding why ISIL beheads

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Such distinctions are lost on most people who have not made a special study of the ecology movement.

The very fact that Murray Bookchin was an old left radical has crippled the growth of the Green Party in the US, since most of his followers are in control of it, and they talk more about labor rights than the environment.

Sherab Dorje said:

Like I said: armchair conservative.

Malcolm wrote:

Nope, just a follower of Naess, but as Naess said "The front is long...", meaning that there is a lot of room for different points of view in the ecology movement.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, October 13th, 2014 at 3:27 AM

Title: Re: Understanding why ISIL beheads

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

I traveled to Turkish Kurdistan during the peak of the Turkish military crackdown on the PKK. It was not a pretty sight.

Malcolm wrote:

The PKK are Marxist-Leninists. No wonder the US would not help them, and giving credence to Nemo's contention, may even have organized black ops against their commanders.

Sherab Dorje said:

Were Marxist-Leninists. Read the ROAR articles I linked to <http://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=47&t=17682&start=60#p256992>. Haven't been Marxist-Leninists for a long time now. You may even be pleasantly surprised to see what they have become (vibra-massage model armchair).

Malcolm wrote:

Such distinctions are lost on most people who have not made a special study of the ecology movement.

The very fact that Murray Bookchin was an old left radical has crippled the growth of the Green Party in the US, since most of his followers are in control of it, and they talk more about labor rights than the environment.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, October 13th, 2014 at 3:13 AM

Title: Re: Understanding why ISIL beheads

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

I traveled to Turkish Kurdistan during the peak of the Turkish military crackdown on the PKK. It was not a pretty sight.

Malcolm wrote:

The PKK are Marxist-Leninists. No wonder the US would not help them, and giving credence to Nemo's contention, may even have organized black ops against their commanders.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, October 13th, 2014 at 3:07 AM

Title: Re: Understanding why ISIL beheads

Content:

Nemo said:

We needed Turkish bases for Iraq. We had to do some favours. Just like how right now Canadian special forces are on the ground spotting for American airstrikes. What happens and what is in the news are different things Malcolm.

Malcolm wrote:

You did not clarify whether you were talking about Turkish Kurds or Iraqi Kurds. Nevertheless, this is merely hearsay at this point.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, October 13th, 2014 at 2:58 AM

Title: Re: Understanding why ISIL beheads

Content:

Nemo said:

That is a nice story, but I was a medic.

In the Canadian Armed Forces, not the US Armed Forces.

In regards to ISIS doubling down on failed policies is not a way out. Bringing only murder by aerial bombardment to the table is ludicrously simplistic. And as you see with the Turks completely ineffective. I am in favour of not releasing the dogs of war until there is a real plan. Murder first ask questions later has only created more problems. Destroying grain storage facilities is sick. We will starve more kids than ISIS will behead.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, I am not in favor of continuing the US policies w/regards to the Middle East of the past 70 years either.

I have also agreed that arial bombardment is ineffective and have pointed out that Americans generally do not want to be involved in another war in Iraq, hence the Obama Administration's "strategy".

But I also recognize that NATO/UN should not allow these folks free reign.

Incidentally, your strategy of isolating ISIS hoping they will run out of food, armaments and spare parts will also result in famine, etc. You think they will feed children first? Unlikely.

As far as there being a US program to assassinate Iraqi Kurdish commanders, I won't believe it until I see some proof.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, October 13th, 2014 at 2:50 AM

Title: Re: Understanding why ISIL beheads

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

Actually you do, for military vessels. That's why you don't see Russia (for example) cruising around the Mediterranean with aircraft carriers. They limit their outings to the Black Sea.

Malcolm wrote:

This is because they require Turkey's permission to pass through the Bosphorus Straights.

But the US does not need to ask any one for permission to sail the Mediterranean Sea. Landing in ports is a different matter.

Sherab Dorje said:

Etc... So, you see, my armchair is situated uncomfortably close to the reality of ISIL. A 45 minute boat trip away, to be exact.

Malcolm wrote:

Right, so you really think that without NATO you are safe? Greece and Balkans have been on the front line of the conflict between the West and the Middle East for centuries. If the shit really hits the fan, it is back to NZ for you.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, October 13th, 2014 at 2:39 AM

Title: Re: Understanding why ISIL beheads

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

And supporting US foreign policy is the favorite pastime of armchair conservatives...

Malcolm wrote:

I am not a conservative, I am not a republican, I am not a democrat. I am a registered Green.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, October 13th, 2014 at 2:19 AM

Title: Re: Understanding why ISIL beheads

Content:

Nemo said:

The Kurds will be very reluctant to accept our help. When I was in we were spending huge amounts of resources to assassinate their commanders.

Malcolm wrote:

Honestly, I don't know what planet you live on.

Nemo said:

Eventually more murder is not the answer Malcolm. Americans were always the most blood thirsty. Body counts were more important than strategy. 22 American soldiers are committing suicide daily. Drowning in guilt from all the murder. It has to stop. More of the same failed policies is evil.

Malcolm wrote:

Allowing ISIS to continue unchecked is also evil. So what do you suggest? Passivity?

BTW, the suicide rate for US soldiers was 20 a day until 1999. However, suicide rates amongst soldiers who never deployed to Iraq is higher than those who did deploy.

Nemo said:

Among key findings: while suicide rates for soldiers who served in Iraq and Afghanistan more than doubled from 2004 to 2009 to more than 30-per-100,000, the trend among those who never deployed nearly tripled to between 25- and 30-per-100,000.

Malcolm wrote:

<http://www.usatoday.com/story/news/nation/2014/03/03/suicide-army-rate-soldiers-institute-health/5983545/>

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, October 13th, 2014 at 2:15 AM

Title: Re: Understanding why ISIL beheads

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

But anyway, it is quite obvious that the US wants Syria for two reasons:

1. Oil

Malcolm wrote:

I have already rebutted this objection.

Sherab Dorje said:

2. Sea access to the Middle East via the Mediterranean (without having to ask for favors/permission from anybody). It is much easier and cheaper for them, plus they don't run the hazard of being flanked by Iran.

Malcolm wrote:

We already do not have to ask any one permission to sail in the Mediterranean. It is part of international waters.

Sherab Dorje said:

Coz really, all of this (plus the bases in Turkmenistan) seems to me to just be part of the grand plan to encircle and destroy Iran.

And you reckon that American foreign policy is not pro-active?

Malcolm wrote:

As I said, American foreign policy is hapless and bumbling. There is no grand design. But vilifying the US is the favorite pastime amongst armchair radicals...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, October 13th, 2014 at 12:06 AM

Title: Re: Understanding why ISIL beheads

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

Turkish Kurds are claiming that the Turkish state supports ISIL. Thing is that Turkey's unwillingness to support the Kurds in Kobane will open a new chapter in their civil war. "Funny" thing is that Kemalists, that tried so hard to crush Kurdish Nationalism as personified by the PKK, will now become friends with the PKK, united against their common enemy the (until now liberal Islamicist) Justice and Development Party.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, that is what they claim. Pretty much of a CF all around. This, frankly, is why at this point the UN really needs to get involved. NATO ought not try to handle this alone.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, October 12th, 2014 at 11:28 PM

Title: Re: Understanding why ISIL beheads

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

On the basis of this, it would mean that Iraq and Syria would be united with the common denominator being occupation and administration by the US (military).

I suggest you examine the history of the Ba'ath party in Iraq and Syria and their (failed) attempt at creating a Pan-Arabic state. That is what I was referring to.

Of course, if the US had offered air support and anti-tank weapons to the only secular force in the region (apart from Assad): the Kurds of Kobane,

We did, do and will do — the main problem in Kobane is the Turks refusing to allow Kurds into Syria to fight ISIS, as far as I understand. Airstrikes are out of the question now because ISIS is in the town.

But, obviously, the US wouldn't want to be seen supporting democratically minded, autonomous, secular forces, would they? That would be completely out of character.

Malcolm wrote:

<https://www.theguardian.com/world/2014/oct/09/turkey-isis-syria-kobani-control-jack-kirby> " onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;"
onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

The main problem is that the Turks want Assad deposed, etc., and refuse to get involved without such assurances. In short, it is a political clusterf, not really a military problem.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, October 12th, 2014 at 10:42 PM

Title: Re: Understanding why ISIL beheads

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

At this point, national boundaries are a little besides the point since at one time the Ba'athists were intent on uniting Iraq and Syria anyway.

Sherab Dorje said:

Under American rule?

Malcolm wrote:

Huh? Again, the real question is what should be done?

The Obama administration has mounted an ineffective campaign of arial bombardment because there really is no will on the part of the American people to be entrenched in another war in Iraq.

On the other hand, the hawks in the Pentagon, Panetta, and others insist that we have no choice.

The Saudis and Turks seem happy to sit idly by.

The Israelis cannot get involved because it will ignite WWIII.

So, again, anyone have any solutions other than merely flogging the dead horse of US Governmental turpitude?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, October 12th, 2014 at 10:31 PM

Title: Re: Understanding why ISIL beheads

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Greg: do you want the US to put troops on the ground?

Sherab Dorje said:

Are you asking me if I want the US to invade Syria too?

Malcolm wrote:

There are a couple of approaches — the pacifist approach, advocated by Geoff and Nemo, which will allow ISIS to murder lots of people without any restraint; the interventionist approach in which ISIS is stopped but there of course will be more killing or ???

At this point, national boundaries are a little besides the point since at one time the Ba'athists were intent on uniting Iraq and Syria anyway.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, October 12th, 2014 at 9:13 PM

Title: Re: Understanding why ISIL beheads

Content:

Nemo said:

Did you also notice that both the sources Karma Dorje is quoting are former soldiers Malcolm?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, I am very familiar with both citations, for years.

As far as I can tell, you and Geoff are advocating "hands off," just allow ISIS to do their thing.

Greg: do you want the US to put troops on the ground?

It seems to me the US will be criticized for whatever it does.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, October 12th, 2014 at 5:47 AM

Title: Re: Understanding why ISIL beheads

Content:

Karma Dorje said:

How is it a conspiracy theory to point out that some people are getting extraordinarily wealthy from the constant war preparation?? Where is the money going?

Malcolm wrote:

If you imagine that it is an intentional plan by some nefarious cabal, that is a conspiracy theory.

Karma Dorje said:

How is it a conspiracy theory to point out that the Iraq War was waged with 9/11 as a pretext despite Iraq having no connection with the attack nor any WMD??

Malcolm wrote:

I agree with you of course that the Al Qaeda connection and WMD threat was a pretext, and a shallow one at that. This why I opposed the Iraq war (both of them).

It was Bush family personal business waged on a global scale. We ought to make it illegal for two members of the same family to serve as president in the same generation.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, October 12th, 2014 at 4:55 AM

Title: Re: Understanding why ISIL beheads

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

On the other hand, it should be noted that most of the countries where there is intense political instability are in regions of the world where animal sacrifice is still deeply ingrained in the culture.

Sherab Dorje said:

They still practice animal sacrifice here in Greece, just with a Christian veneer. Here on Lesbos the main one is held in honour of a local form of the Archangel Michael (in his role as general [Taxiarchis] of the heavenly forces) who is considered the protector of the island.

Taxiarchis.jpg

It is a unique icon as Orthodox Christians do not use statues or sculptures at all (unlike the Catholics). It is said to be moulded from clay mixed with the blood of the monks that were slaughtered in the monastery by pirates during the period of the Ottoman occupation of Greece.

Malcolm wrote:

There is a lot of political instability in Greece.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, October 12th, 2014 at 4:54 AM

Title: Re: Understanding why ISIL beheads

Content:

Karma Dorje said:

It was never the point to pay for the war with oil. Why do that when you can simply tax the middle class and/or print money? They weren't looking to steal the reserves outright. They wanted a non-OPEC oil producer with sufficient reserves to keep the taps on and smooth out oil shocks. When you measure cost, it is a zero sum game. If the US gov't is out USD $1.1 trillion then someone else has it on their balance sheet. So who is this? It's a simple matter of cui bono to understand the war rationale. As the 'Rebuilding America's Defenses' paper lays out, 9/11 provided the pretext for a muscular expansion of hard power into a region important for access to petroleum.

Malcolm wrote:

More conspiracy theories. I don't it.

Sorry, this is too much like conspiracy theory thinking to me. I don't believe this. There is no US policy of perpetual war.

Surely you can distinguish de facto policy from stated aims. The US arms budget dwarfs the rest of the world many times over and has since WW2. It has constantly been in use.

<http://www.infoplease.com/timelines/militaryoperations.html> "

onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;" onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;" onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;"

The military budget was vastly reduced under Clinton. Yes, there are hawks in the US government, but there after the cold war ended, we began to wind down our military until 9/11.

When you are talking about control of the world's resources, you don't just sort of bumble along and react.

Yes, often we do. We have bumbled along without clear planning and foresight and have done exactly what you suggest, from Iran/Contra to 9/11.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, October 12th, 2014 at 4:50 AM

Title: Re: Understanding why ISIL beheads

Content:

Karma Dorje said:

If it was just Kristol, it would be of little consequence. You need to look at the important players:

Malcolm wrote:

All you have done is pointed out a Republican set of policies. Republicans do not represent all of us. Therefore, once again I reject your claim that these policies are US policies in toto. They represent a portion of thinking in the right wing of our political spectrum.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, October 12th, 2014 at 4:16 AM

Title: Re: Understanding why ISIL beheads

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

In reality, while the ISIS folks are pernicious and should be stopped dead in their tracks by an international coalition, there really are more pressing issues at stake, such as climate change and so on. What is required all around is a perspective grounded in what is good for the biosphere as a whole, not merely we human beings who inhabit it.

Sherab Dorje said:

All these issues are related.

Malcolm wrote:

Indeed, but it won't be solved by coddling or ignoring petroleum-poor Iraqi Sunni militants who want to relieve Shiites and Kurds of the reserves they hold. In fact, it will just make things worse all around, as far as I can see.

Given that oil in addition to deforestation and coal are three main causes of climate instability, it strikes me that we need a world wide hydrocarbon policy that works to every country's advantage.

On the other hand, it should be noted that most of the countries where there is intense political instability are in regions of the world where animal sacrifice is still deeply ingrained in the culture.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, October 12th, 2014 at 3:58 AM

Title: Re: Understanding why ISIL beheads

Content:

Karma Dorje said:

One doesn't need a clearance to analyze why an organization operates the way it does. Particularly when you can look at steering documents like the a Project for a New American Century penned by the very people driving US policy. Outside of the bubble of the US education system and the media echo chamber it is pretty clear what is going on. The question is really whether one agrees with it or not.

Personally, I don't agree with it and hence I have remained an expat for forty plus years.

Mkoll said:

Sure, one can analyze and speculate all one wants.

Sherab Dorje said:

Or one can just go with the hook, bait and sinker option.

Malcolm wrote:

This is what one side always says of the other. Hardly a position born of equanimity.

In reality, while the ISIS folks are pernicious and should be stopped dead in their tracks by an international coalition, there really are more pressing issues at stake, such as climate change and so on. What is required all around is a perspective grounded in what is good for the biosphere as a whole, not merely we human beings who inhabit it.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, October 12th, 2014 at 3:47 AM

Title: Re: Understanding why ISIL beheads

Content:

Karma Dorje said:

One doesn't need a clearance to analyze why an organization operates the way it does. Particularly when you can look at steering documents like the a Project for a New American Century penned by the very people driving US policy. Outside of the bubble of the US education system and the media echo chamber it is pretty clear what is going on. The question is really whether one agrees with it or not.

Personally, I don't agree with it and hence I have remained an expat for forty plus years.

Malcolm wrote:

Kristol and so on may have driven the Bush administration's policies, but they hardly have been driving American policy for the past forty years.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, October 12th, 2014 at 1:25 AM

Title: Re: Understanding why ISIL beheads

Content:

Karma Dorje said:

The fifth largest proven reserves at 140 Billion barrels? Easily accessed and easily processed light sweet crude unlike offshore and tarsands oil? Dismissing this component of the calculus for war is curious but not serious.

Malcolm wrote:

Iraq, pre war, produced 2 million barrels a day. Now it is producing 2.8 per day roughly, earning Iraq $89 billion dollars last year.

US investment in the war? Well, the first one sanctioned Iraqi Oil on behalf of Kuwaitis — so that was money tossed away.

The second one? The DOD spend 757.8 billion. Brown University reported that the war cost 1.1 trillion. Well, as you can see, Iraq does not pump enough oil to pay for the US adventure there.

Karma Dorje said:

The policies are very much predicated on Pax Americana which of course hearkens to the Pax Romana. I don't understand why you would argue this uncontroversial point.

Malcolm wrote:

I contest it because I do not think this point of view about the goals of American foreign policy is correct.

Karma Dorje said:

The USSR was an ally during the war and Stalin wanted friendly relations with the West that were rejected by the UK and US after the war as they thought they could better expand their spheres of influence by an adversarial relationship.

Malcolm wrote:

That is one reading of history, there are others.

Karma Dorje said:

The same thing played out after Castro's revolution in Cuba. The US has had a policy of perpetual war preparation and war since WWII.

Malcolm wrote:

Sorry, this is too much like conspiracy theory thinking to me. I don't believe this. There is no US policy of perpetual war.

Karma Dorje said:

I would argue that there have been few things as foolish and wasteful in humankind than a cold war that need not have been, but for the imperial impulse and the greed and power hunger of a few American and British men.

Malcolm wrote:

As if there was no imperial impulse and greed on the part of Stalin and Mao...

Karma Dorje said:

And so it goes in samsara, the rapacity and aggression that the US has advanced its cause by all these years have now hollowed out its middle class, offshored its jobs and left it heavily in debt. Quel dommage.

Malcolm wrote:

Or, the partition of the global economy caused by the cold war created a climate where the US was the main player, since everyone owed us money and we had the infrastructure to meet the world's industrial needs until the '70's.

There are a lot of ways to look at these historical events.

I still maintain that our foreign policy is and has been reactive for the most part, rather than proactive, unlike communist countries like USSR and PRC, etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, October 11th, 2014 at 11:50 PM

Title: Re: Understanding why ISIL beheads

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

Once they own the oil then it is no longer foreign, cf Iraq.

Malcolm wrote:

There is not enough oil in the ground there to make it worth it. The notion that we went to war (twice) in Iraq for oil is basically ludicrous.

Sherab Dorje said:

As for the second, again, no. We are not interested in global hegemony, our nation collectively is basically interested only in maintaining our own materialist living standard.

And the only way to guarantee this is through global hegemony.

Malcolm wrote:

People in the US, unlike say the British Empire or Rome, do not think of ourselves in imperial terms. Rightly or wrongly, we make think we are the best country in the world, but in reality, we, as a nation, have no interest in empire building.

Sherab Dorje said:

The US is selfish, but unlike what people who have no experience with our nation or people think, we are not proactive in our policy, but reactive. 200 years of US Foreign Policy shows this.

I disagree. I think that US foreign policy has been very proactive, especially from the closing term of WWII and onwards.

Malcolm wrote:

[/quote]

Again, our foreign policy was motivated in reaction to the spread of Communism, that is all. Our present global position is an artifact of that. Since the fall of the Soviet Union, US policy has been floundering in a cesspool of indecision and bad decisions. The red threat gave us a focus. In its absence, we don't know what to do.

In reality, the true "imperialism" coming from the US is corporate hegemony, but actually, the corporations owe now more allegiance to the US than any other nation.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, October 11th, 2014 at 10:28 PM

Title: Re: Understanding why ISIL beheads

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

Which all points to the fact that, here on planet earth, the US is doing everything possible to destabilise the Middle East in order to (ultimately) grab its oil reserves and achieve global hegemony.

Malcolm wrote:

As for the first item, no. US energy policy is aimed at freeing ourselves from dependence on any foreign oil. Hence fracking.

As for the second, again, no. We are not interested in global hegemony, our nation collectively is basically interested only in maintaining our own materialist living standard. The US is selfish, but unlike what people who have no experience with our nation or people think, we are not proactive in our policy, but reactive. 200 years of US

Foreign Policy shows this.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, October 4th, 2014 at 9:20 PM

Title: Re: What is "hinayana"? What is it not?

Content:

Mkoll said:

So you're absolutely, 100% certain?

Malcolm wrote:

I have verified to the best of my ability that the statements made the Buddha in Mahāyāna sutras actually apply to śravakayāna texts, otherwise, I would not waste my time defending Mahāyāna. I have done so using inference and textual study, as well as having been a practitioner for half of my life [I am 52, I started practicing Dharma, not just studying it, when I was 26]. Thus I am as certain that Buddha taught Mahāyāna as you are that he didn't.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, October 4th, 2014 at 12:57 PM

Title: Re: What is "hinayana"? What is it not?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

There are also very important differences between the awakening of hinayāna practitioners and mahāyāna practitioners, but you seem to want to erase all of this. Well, that is a mistake.

Mkoll said:

Do you know that via personal experience?

Malcolm wrote:

Personal experience (direct perception) is not the only criteria of valid knowledge. There is also inference and valid testimony. In this case I am basing myself on valid testimony of the Buddha's statements.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, October 4th, 2014 at 12:27 PM

Title: Re: What is "hinayana"? What is it not?

Content:

Crazywisdom said:

You are skipping the point I made. These levels and stages, realizations however many folds are beside the point. Buddha has cut a path beyond this from the start. The sangha is not the whole story there are several stories of yogis who got enlightened from one instruction. So doctrines and stages has its place but it's not of universal application.

Malcolm wrote:

The Buddha was the one who taught the paths and stages to begin with, both in Hinayāna and Mahāyāna.

There are many levels to awakening, awakening, bodhi. There are also very important differences between the awakening of hinayāna practitioners and mahāyāna practitioners, but you seem to want to erase all of this. Well, that is a mistake.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, October 3rd, 2014 at 9:06 PM

Title: Re: Understanding Buddhism without Western Materialism

Content:

Hickory Mountain said:

Or, taking a different angle on my inquiry, what aspects (as specifically as possible) of a Buddhist worldview come into conflict with a Western materialist worldview?

Malcolm wrote:

Rebirth, rebirth, rebirth.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, October 3rd, 2014 at 1:41 PM

Title: Re: What is "hinayana"? What is it not?

Content:

retrofuturist said:

Greetings Malcolm,

Malcolm wrote:

...it is a downfall to study Hinayāna texts at the expense of Mahāyāna studies, for example.

retrofuturist said:

What is a "hinayana text"? How is that defined?

Is it the suttas/agamas, or is it the works of authors of particular schools? Or both? etc.

Maitri,

Retro.

Malcolm wrote:

It means the sutras in the agamas.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, October 3rd, 2014 at 6:55 AM

Title: Re: What is "hinayana"? What is it not?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Even here, however, when this fault is committed if one criticizes Vajrayāna with hostility the fault is great; if one criticizes Mahāyāna with hostility the fault is medium; if one criticizes the śravakayā, the fault is minor.

TRC said:

I really don't think most contemporary Mahayana/Vajrayana practitioners would buy the double-standard prescribed here.

Malcolm wrote:

They [Vajrayāna practitioners] would had they properly studied the commentaries on Vajrayāna samaya written by our lineage masters. These criteria are not my invention.

As far as Mahāyānists go, had they properly studied Buddha's Mahāyāna Sutras they would have seen in such texts as the Bodhisattva Vinaya that it is a downfall to study Hinayāna texts at the expense of Mahāyāna studies, for example.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, October 3rd, 2014 at 6:53 AM

Title: Re: What is "hinayana"? What is it not?

Content:

Crazywisdom said:

It's obviously relevant. Why? Because Suttas have discussions about luminosity and discussions about all sorts of stages or accumulations. So does Dzogchen, a Mahayana thing. So from a method standpoint, all this Mahayana bluster about bhumis and accumulations is dispensable. If Dzogchen points out luminosity as innate and away from two accumulations and so do Suttas, then buddhas qualities are accounted for not via accumulations but via the innate. Thus, Moggallana and Sariputta's having fallen short of Buddha's level is nothing to do with Mahayana and only to do with their failure to grasp the import of luminosity. In fact, Mahayana also fails to understand this import which is why Dzogchen goes higher in bhumis. This is the most important area for a Buddhist to scrutinize. It's the deepest topic in Buddhism.

Malcolm wrote:

The clarity of the mind is certainly important, but don't mistake the clarity of the mind discussed in the suttas for the luminosity of Mahāyāna.

All the suttas say about luminosity is that the clarity of the mind is not affected by afflictions, nothing more and nothing less.

Even the suttas however maintain that Buddha qualities arise as a result of the merit of length of eons of the Buddha's career as a bodhisattva.

All you have done here is support the fact that Mahāyāna has a more profound analysis of emptiness as well the luminous nature of the mind, none of which are required for stream entry — the only requirement for which is the understanding and realization of the selflessness of the person, not even an understanding of the selflessness of phenomena is required for stream entry in Hināyāna, whereas for Mahāyāna stream entrants, aka first stage bodhisattvas, it is indispensable to realize two-fold emptiness. Even if a hināyāna stream entrant realizes twofold emptiness, this still does not equate with a bodhisattva's realization of the same because a hināyāna stream entrant by definition lacks bodhicitta.

In short, CW, you are confusing and conflating many things, and are creating a kind of goulash out of the teachings.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, October 3rd, 2014 at 5:11 AM

Title: Re: What is "hinayana"? What is it not?

Content:

Crazywisdom said:

For dZogchen two accumulation happens at time of initiation. When luminosity is introduced. Then this is whole path. Suttas have this.

Malcolm wrote:

No, there is not even a mention of the two accumulations in the agamas And nikayas. Why? Because in Hinayana, the Bodhisattva is held to be an ordinary sentient being, lacking all qualities of wisdom until he attains buddhahood under the bodhitree.

So, in fact your contention is simply incorrect.

Crazywisdom said:

One doesn't need two know about any of that at time of intro.

Malcolm wrote:

That is completely irrelevant to the present conversation.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, October 3rd, 2014 at 5:09 AM

Title: Re: Historical Buddha

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The corresponding texts could have been recorded by different disciples hearing a discourse by the Buddha; further more, disciples can even hear completely different discourses being spoken by the Buddha at the same time with the same tongue. Hence, the single vajra word is heard differently by different disciples, as the Guhyasamaja tantra states.

Bakmoon said:

I'm willing to accept the possibility of corresponding texts being independent recollections of the same event. I've been open to it since the beginning which is why I prefer to use the term common source rather than proto-text, to leave the door open to such a scenario.

My major point is this: Even in this case, there is still a common source between these two corresponding texts, and that common source is the Buddha himself rather than a proto-text.

If the corresponding texts are the result of a proto-text dating prior to sectarian division then one can conclude that the proto-text dates back prior to the split, but if the corresponding texts are independent compositions referring to a single event then one can make the much stronger and more solid conclusion that the texts actually date from the time when the Buddha was still in living memory. In both of these cases, that of independent texts and that of descent from a proto-text, the final conclusion is that the source of these texts, whether it be a proto-text or the Buddha himself, can be conclusively dated prior to the splitting between the sects.

Comparative methodology uses the split between the sects as the boundary of the absolute latest the common source between texts must date to, leaving the possibility of them being composed well before that, which in any case, allows one to date a large portion of common material in the Nikayas/Agamas to significantly prior to 100 BCE.

Malcolm wrote:

Buddha could emanate a hundred different emanations and teach a hundred different people a hundred different things at the same time. For this reason, the attempt to confine Buddhist agamic/nikaya sutras to single events in history is fraught with all kinds of problems. Not to mention that fact that like any teacher, the Buddha, I am sure, would teach the same general thing again and again to different groups of students (or even the same group) in the same place. The notion that two similar texts in the nikayas which clear differences necessarily begin in a single historical event is hugely speculative.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, October 3rd, 2014 at 4:44 AM

Title: Re: What is "hinayana"? What is it not?

Content:

TRC said:

No, quite simply you disagree with Ray, is all this amounts to.

Malcolm wrote:

The Buddha's statements about Hināyāna in Mahāyāna sutra can be read by all who care to learn Sanskrit, Chinese or Tibetan. The same goes for Indian Mahāyāna masters who wrote about the issue extensively.

TRC said:

He as a Vajrayana practitioner has a different view point and clearly he does not believe that the eighteen early schools are Hinayana.

Malcolm wrote:

In his persona as a western scholar, Ray also does not believe that either Mahāyāna or Vajrayāna are Buddha's word in general (what he actually believes I have no idea). His academic writings clearly show that he accepts the Western academic consensus that Buddha did not teach Mahāyāna, Secret Mantra or Vajrayāna irrespective of his personal adherence to these traditions in his own practice.

TRC said:

Furthermore, to think that when Ray wrote his publication that he was not aware the early Indian Mahayana texts claimed the early schools were Hinayana, would be negligible to nil.

Malcolm wrote:

He is certainly aware of these things, that he chooses to ignore them renders his opinion very fanciful.

TRC said:

Therefore, Ray is quite deliberately making a strong statement by disagreeing with them. Why would he do that? Perhaps with the benefit of hindsight, he is seeing through the sectarian rivalry that gave birth to the 'Hinayana' term. Seeing it for what it is – sectarian rivalry and the subsequent incorrect evaluation of Theravada being equivalent to Hinayana.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, and so therefore, Ray is wrong, no ifs and ands or buts. He might be attempting to redefine the term, but to claim that the Buddha of the Mahāyāna canon did not use the term hinayāna to refer to those schools who eschewed the bodhisattva path is clearly an exaggeration at best.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, October 2nd, 2014 at 6:27 AM

Title: Re: What is "hinayana"? What is it not?

Content:

Crazywisdom said:

For dZogchen two accumulation happens at time of initiation. When luminosity is introduced. Then this is whole path. Suttas have this.

Malcolm wrote:

No, there is not even a mention of the two accumulations in the agamas And nikayas. Why? Because in Hinayana, the Bodhisattva is held to be an ordinary sentient being, lacking all qualities of wisdom until he attains buddhahood under the bodhitree.

So, in fact your contention is simply incorrect.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, October 2nd, 2014 at 2:39 AM

Title: Re: What is "hinayana"? What is it not?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, Buddha actually demonstrated to Moggallana how limited Moggallana's abhijna was.

Emptiness as presented in the nikayas and agamas is not as in depth as Buddha's teaching of emptiness in the Perfection of Wisdom. Not only does the Buddha explain this in Mahayana, he also explains this in the Hevajra tantra, the Samputa tantra and Kakacakra, what need to mention Dzogchen?

The Buddha discusses the nature of an Arhats awakening in many Mahayana sutras.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, October 2nd, 2014 at 1:57 AM

Title: Re: What is "hinayana"? What is it not?

Content:

Crazywisdom said:

The search doesn't go back far enough. So I can't find it. So I ask what makes this a concrete thing that Arhats are sixth Bhumi. There are lamas who say this, but based on what?

According to this Arhats are 8th Bhumi. <https://en.m.wikipedia.org/wiki/Bh> " onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;" onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;" onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;"
onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;" onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;" onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;"
onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;ūmi (Buddhism)

Malcolm wrote:

Both Arhats and 8th stage bodhisattvas are free from the klesha obsuration, but similarity ends there. They are not equivalent in terms of qualities, merit and many other factors, not to mention the fact that Arhats do not realize emptiness free from extremes, as Gorampa clearly explains.

Crazywisdom said:

That's what I mean. So says, Gorampa or some other Tibetan guy. Is there a sutra or Maitreya book that says how far Arhats go? So far we have the Mahayana scholars pinning the tail on the donkey. And there's nothing in the Suttas that indicates they don't realize emptiness free from extremes. This is a Mahayanist fiat based on a debate with a subject that posited permanent bits in the aether. As far as qualities, Buddha was a big proponent of Mahamoggallana's qualities for example.

Malcolm wrote:

The Buddha, in the Pali Canon, demonstrated Moggallana's abhijñā was quite limited compared to his own, Moggallana asked Buddha where his mother had taken rebirth.

The simple fact is that profound emptiness is not taught anywhere in the śrāvaka texts.

Btw, it is the Buddha who explains the differences in the awakening of Arhats and bodhisattvas on the stages, not merely Mahayana scholars like Nagarjuna, though that should suffice for those who practice Mahayana.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, October 2nd, 2014 at 1:28 AM

Title: Re: What is "hinayana"? What is it not?

Content:

daverupa said:

I'm basically framing Mahayana as an Abhidhamma, now, or rather heap of various Abhidhammas. Why not?

Malcolm wrote:

That is simply not an accurate portrayal of Mahayana.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, October 2nd, 2014 at 1:26 AM

Title: Re: What is "hinayana"? What is it not?

Content:

Crazywisdom said:

The search doesn't go back far enough. So I can't find it. So I ask what makes this a concrete thing that Arhats are sixth Bhūmi. There are lamas who say this, but based on what?

According to this Arhats are 8th Bhūmi. <https://en.m.wikipedia.org/wiki/Bhumi> "onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;" onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;" onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;ūmi_(Buddhism)

Malcolm wrote:

Both Arhats and 8th stage bodhisattvas are free from the klesha obsuration, but similarity ends there. They are not equivalent in terms of qualities, merit and many other factors, not to mention the fact that Arhats do not realize emptiness free from extremes, as Gorampa clearly explains.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, October 2nd, 2014 at 1:21 AM

Title: Re: What is "hinayana"? What is it not?

Content:

Crazywisdom said:

You know some Mahayanists say the Arhat is 10th not 6th Bhumi.

Malcolm wrote:

No one says this.

Crazywisdom said:

You yourself said there was a Sakya lama who Put Arhats at 10th Bhumi

Malcolm wrote:

I never said this, and there is no Sakya master who makes such a claim.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, October 1st, 2014 at 4:58 PM

Title: Re: What is "hinayana"? What is it not?

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

There are also a few seemingly Theravada -leaning folks...

daverupa said:

Well, I labored for a long time under misapprehensions of common ground. Don't worry, Malcolm and others have seen to it. It's a linguistic happenstance, apparently.

Malcolm wrote:

There is a common ground, four noble truths, dependent origination, rebirth, karma and so on. Mahāyāna has all of this, and in addition, it also details the bodhisattva path, profound emptiness, and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, October 1st, 2014 at 4:56 PM

Title: Re: Historical Buddha

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

No, the content is similar, but not parallel. Which suggests different communities collected different traditions of what the Buddha said, and organized them later on.

Bakmoon said:

Just to be clear, you are making the point here that the corresponding texts could have been composed by two different disciples hearing a discourse by the Buddha, correct? I don't want to misrepresent your position.

Malcolm wrote:

The corresponding texts could have been recorded by different disciples hearing a discourse by the Buddha; further more, disciples can even hear completely different discourses being spoken by the Buddha at the same time with the same tongue. Hence, the single vajra word is heard differently by different disciples, as the Guhyasamaja tantra states.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, October 1st, 2014 at 7:11 AM

Title: Re: What is "hinayana"? What is it not?

Content:

Crazywisdom said:

You know some Mahayanists say the Arhat is 10th not 6th Bhumi.

Malcolm wrote:

No one says this.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, October 1st, 2014 at 2:37 AM

Title: Re: What is "hinayana"? What is it not?

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

Are stream enterers "bound" to be liberated within seven lifetimes? If so, what "binds" them to this fate?

Malcolm wrote:

The Buddha stated it so in several suttas:

http://www.accesstoinight.org/lib/study/into_the_stream.html

Sherab Dorje said:

Can a stream enterer not develop a Bodhisattva motivation after entering the stream? If not, why not?

Malcolm wrote:

This is an interesting question and is a subject of some debate. The general Theravadin view is that once you have gained stream entry, nothing can turn you aside from the liberation of an arhat within seven lifetimes.

Sherab Dorje said:

Is there any evidence of a Bodhsattva choosing to achieve personal liberation at some point during their "career"?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, because of the harsh castigation of such people in Mahāyāna sutras.

Sherab Dorje said:

Is there any evidence that shows that a stream enterer cannot divert from the Arhat path onto the Bodhisattva path?

Malcolm wrote:

As I said, this is a subject of much discussion.

Sherab Dorje said:

We hear of Arhats being "turned on to" the Bodhisattva Path, so it seems their fate is not written in stone.

Malcolm wrote:

This is only after they enter the samadhi of cessation.

Sherab Dorje said:

Isn't the awakening of an Arhat congruent with one of the Bodhisattva stages anyway?

Malcolm wrote:

Only in terms of the elimination of the klesha-avarana. No accumulation of merit is required for the awakening of stream entrants — arhats. Gathering merit in Hinayāna is primarily a job of lay people to attain higher rebirth in samsara. There is no sense one accumulates merit to attain awakening, but the attainment of stream entry itself is considered in Theravada to be the highest merit.

In Mahāyāna merit is accumulated in order to attain the rūpakāya of a buddha. Wisdom is accumulated in order to realize the dharmakāya of a buddha.

Further, while arhats and seventh stage bodhisattvas are equal in terms of elimination of kleśas, they are not equivalent in merit; a seventh stage bodhisattva not only surpasses an arhat in merit, but also in realization. However, even someone who newly has entered Mahāyāna surpasses an arhat in merit, merely for having the actual wish to attain complete buddhahood in order to liberate all sentient beings.

Moreover, there are clear differences in the content of awakening of the Hinayāna path of the seeing and the Mahāyāna path of seeing — this in fact is the subject of the Abhisamaya-alāṃkara, which details the hidden intent of the Prajñāpāramita sūtras.

Sherab Dorje said:

So who here can say, based on experience, that the Sravakayana is not just another stage on the Mahayana path anyway?

Malcolm wrote:

If you want to contextualize the Hinayāna path in relation to the Mahāyāna path, that is fine with me, but I don't think that sits well with Theravadins who generally argue that the awakening in Theravada is every bit as profound and deep as awakening in Mahāyāna. Mahāyānists of course, disagree.

Sherab Dorje said:

I guess that's why the Vajrayana talks about not denigrating followers of the Shravaka and Pratyekabuddha Yana. Right?

Malcolm wrote:

[/quote][quote]

The sixth root samaya, not to criticize the yānas means that one should not engage in criticizing any of the yānas with hostility, even non-Buddhist teachings. It basically means saying "this or that yāna is not Dharma," this or that is not the teaching of the Teacher, this is not Vinaya, this is not the word of the Buddha, etc. It means that Vajrayānists must accept all of the Hinayāna, Mahāyāna and Secret Mantra canon as our own [it also means that those who have taken Vajrayāna samaya and nevertheless maintain that Mahāyāna sūtra and tantras are not actually the teaching of the Buddha have completely broken their samaya]. It does not however mean that we are forbidden from distinguishing higher paths from lower paths and so on. Even here, however, when this fault is committed if one criticizes Vajrayāna with hostility the fault is great; if one criticizes Mahāyāna with hostility the fault is medium; if one criticizes the śravakayā, the fault is minor. And of course, any Vajrayāna practitioner should recite Vajrasattva daily in case she or he makes some mistake without realizing it.

As long as we never make the claim that Hinayāna is not capable of liberating a person, we are free from samaya fault of criticizing Hinayāna, even if the term itself means "inferior" vehicle. But if someone says to someone "You will not be able to become liberated through following a Hinayāna school such as Theravada, etc." this indeed is samaya downfall.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, October 1st, 2014 at 12:28 AM

Title: Re: What is "hinayana"? What is it not?

Content:

TRC said:

I don't know of any Theravadin who would say that the Buddha did not teach compassion and wisdom. It's absolutely fundamental. If they are Theravadins, then they have not been within a mile of the Pali discourses. They simply could not form this view if they had. Are you sure that this is not a misunderstood view from the Mahayana that you are projecting onto Theravada practitioners? I have seen similar comments before from Mahayana quarters, which could only be described as ill-informed.

Malcolm wrote:

Indeed, Buddha universally teaches love and compassion.

TRC said:

I think there is another myth that should be dispelled pronto too: Mahayana practitioners do not have a monopoly on motivation for the liberation of other beings (Dan74 has already alluded to this). I know all the rhetoric that gets plastered around about the superior motivation of Mahayana, but it has absolutely no bearing to the reality on the ground. It is just not borne out on a day to day basis, and this is really the ultimate test. Quite simply the proof is in the pudding, and I see no evidence of this. If anyone has actual evidence, in the here and now, of the results of the superior motivation of Mahayana practitioners over and above those who are being referred to as Hinayana practitioners, please present it. If you can't, then it just remains in the rhetoric and sectarian posturing basket IMHO.

Malcolm wrote:

The difference lies in the understanding of the motivation for practice, and the consequences which follow the achievement of final nirvana. In short, it is generally held in the Hinayāna schools that once someone enters parinirvana, their stream ceases. They simply are not there.

There is the second issue, already raised, that if someone attains stream entry, within seven lifetimes they will achieve nirvana, permanent cessation.

TRC said:

So to tie this back into the discussion, the term/label Hinayana (toward Theravada) is simply incorrect. And because it is incorrect it is therefore a pejorative term. This is where the offense is because it does not apply to the Theravada tradition.

Malcolm wrote:

No, it is not incorrect because the aspiration to the path of arhatship or pratyekabuddhahood satisfies all of the criteria by which a given path is labeled hinayāna. In short, if your goal is to become an arhat, you are a hinayāna practitioner.

TRC said:

The words of a mature Vajrayana practitioner support this view:

"... 'Hīnayāna' refers to a critical but strictly limited set of views, practices, and results. The pre-Mahāyāna historical traditions such as the Theravāda are far richer, more complex, and more profound than the definition of 'Hīnayāna' would allow. ...The term 'Hīnayāna' is thus a stereotype that is useful in talking about a particular stage on the Tibetan Buddhist path, but it is really not appropriate to assume that the Tibetan definition of Hīnayāna identifies a venerable living tradition as the Theravāda or any other historical school ..."

Ray, Reginald A (2000) Indestructible Truth: The Living Spirituality of Tibetan Buddhism, p.240

Malcolm wrote:

Ray is quite simply wrong — no ifs, ands or buts. All "eighteen" śravaka schools are routinely termed "hinayāna in Indian Mahāyāna texts. These descriptions have very little to do with criteria established by Tibetans (unlike, for example, the distinction between so called prasanga and svatantra, gzhan stong/rang stong, etc. in Madhyamaka). Tibetans are merely following Indian Mahayānistas in their taxonomies.

Even the presentation of the bodhisattva path amongst the śravaka schools is presented from a hinayāna perspective, with a goal to discourage people from forming that aspiration, with a view that the path of the arhat is more practical, more attainable, and involves less suffering for the practitioner.

To put it plainly, all Tibetan Buddhists belong to a hinayāna, or śravakayāna school, Mulasarvastivada. If their practice is based solely on Vinaya, or Abhidharmakośa, etc., and their goal is to become an arhat or a pratyekabuddha, they are hinayāna practitioners.

To make it even more plain — it is the aspiration or bodhicitta to become an arhat or a pratyekabuddha which is labeled "hinayāna," that and various schools which present that as the ideal path. It is considered especially negative for bodhisattvas to abandon Mahāyāna bodhicitta out of depression or defeatism and turn towards the bodhicitta of arhats or a pratyekabuddhas. But it does happen, as in the case of people who take bodhisattva vows, but then give up Mahāyāna for this reason or that and enter Theravada.

The day that someone can show me that the primary aspiration of Theravada and most Theravadins is to become a fully awakened buddhas with thirty major and eighty minor marks, with all the ten powers, four fearlessnesses and the eighteen unique qualities of a Buddha, then at that time I will cease to consider Theravada a hinayāna school like the Mulasarvastivadins, Dharmaguptakas, and such extinct schools as the Mahasamghikas, and so on.

But thus far, no one has ever demonstrated to me that Mahāyāna bodhicitta exists in Theravada in general. The issue is not really about love and compassion — we understand that Arhats have limitless love and compassion for sentient beings for as long as they are not in a state of cessation. But when they enter cessation, they abandon sentient beings and that is their primary flaw, among other flaws well described even by such authors as Vasubandhu in the Kośa, such as the possession of non-afflictive ignorance and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 30th, 2014 at 9:49 AM

Title: Re: Tantric and late Indian Buddhist philosophy

Content:

conebeckham said:

There most certainly CAN be the use of channels and winds in Mahamudra, in some way, even in a path that does not utilize deity yoga or the stages of creation and completion.

Astus said:

The only point I wanted to bring to this topic with mentioning Mahamudra was about the development of Buddhist philosophy in India. The gradual integration of Vajrayana to a monastic environment resulted, among other things, in the "blending of Sutra with Tantra". It also seems to me a natural evolution of things that there appeared some who were critical of Vajrayana and, according to their claim, they superseded even HYT.

Malcolm wrote:

This is a claim made by some Tibetans only.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 30th, 2014 at 3:28 AM

Title: Re: What is "hinayana"? What is it not?

Content:

Mkoll said:

TBH, it really doesn't bother me much. I understand the context in which the term is used and I'm used to seeing it.

I'm just saying I think it'd be better off for Buddhists as a whole not to use the term.

But clearly I'm in the minority here.

Malcolm wrote:

You will likely convince most followers of common Mahāyāna not to use that term. But the term Hinayāna is very much built into the way Tibetan Buddhists talk about Buddhism in general.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 30th, 2014 at 2:51 AM

Title: Re: What is "hinayana"? What is it not?

Content:

Mkoll said:

I think the issue is the term itself. You wouldn't like to see people call Mahayana/Vajrayana "The Apocryphic Vehicle". And I wouldn't like to see people calling Theravada "The Inferior Vehicle".

They're both bad terms because in reality, there are very few of us who even live perfectly up to the ideal of Buddha's teaching that is shared in common between Theravada, Mahayana, or Vajrayana. Moreover, neither term is true. So belittling any other school via giving it a derisive label really has no place anywhere but sectarian rivalry.

Malcolm wrote:

Unfortunately, when asked the question why it is preferable to desire to be a buddha over an arhat or a pratyekabuddha, the answer is that the awakening of an arhat or a pratyekabuddha is inferior to that of a buddha and so is their path. Likewise, when answering the question of why one would choose Vajrayāna over Mahāyāna even though the result and motivation is the same, again the answer is that the Mahāyāna path is inferior to the Vajrayāna path.

And from the perspective of Dzogchen, all the eight lower yānas are inferior, mostly in terms of lack of directness in the time it takes a beginner to realize complete buddhahood.

So there you have it.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 30th, 2014 at 12:03 AM

Title: Re: Tantric and late Indian Buddhist philosophy

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

First of all, what do you mean by a "direct" Mahāmudra path? What are its characteristics, and so on. Then we will see whether or not it is part of Vajrayāna or not.

Astus said:

Direct in the sense that it does not require empowerments or other practices, only the instructions of the teacher pointing out the nature of mind.

Malcolm wrote:

Yeah, this is not just not true Astus, the basic practice of this approach to Mahāmudra is guru yoga. It may not involve the two stages per se, but it does involve practices such as Vajrasattva, mandala offerings and so on which are characteristic of Vajrayāna practice, i.e., there is still purification and gathering accumulations. And more importantly, there is the practicing of integrating one's mind with the mind of the Guru based upon so called "direct introduction."

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 29th, 2014 at 11:08 PM

Title: Re: Tantric and late Indian Buddhist philosophy

Content:

conebeckham said:

Just guessing but I assume Astus refers to what Kagyupas call the Thar Lam path of Mahamudra, from Saraha, Savari, and Maitripa....that of, for example, the Gangama Upadesa, etc.

Malcolm wrote:

Sure, perhaps. But I wanted to see what Astus thought. Thar lam Mahamudra is still Vajrayāna since it involves Vajrasattva, Mandala offerings, Guruyoga and so on., all of which are unique Vajrayāna practices which are indispensable to that path.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 29th, 2014 at 10:55 PM

Title: Re: Tantric and late Indian Buddhist philosophy

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

since everyone he cites was already a well schooled Vajrayāna master, his argument is quite weak.

Astus said:

If they were competent Sutra and Tantra teachers, wouldn't that rather strengthen the validity of their assessment of the direct Mahamudra path?

Malcolm wrote:

First of all, what do you mean by a "direct" Mahāmudra path? What are its characteristics, and so on. Then we will see whether or not it is part of Vajrayāna or not.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 29th, 2014 at 10:17 PM

Title: Re: Tantric and late Indian Buddhist philosophy

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

But the fact of the matter is that Maitripa promulgated a cycle of Vajrayogini teachings which is preserved to this day in both Kagyu and Sakya. Saraha wrote a famous commentary on the Buddhakapala tantra, and is credited with being the first master to promulgate the Cakrasamvara tantra and so on. Maitripa also bestowed many empowerments and teachings on Marpa.

Astus said:

They don't exclude each other. Kagyu has a large number of Tantric teachings besides Mahamudra, just as Gampopa taught both path of means and path of liberation. What the mentioned article attempts to show is that "not-specifically-Tantric" Mahamudra existed already in India, and those who taught it considered it beyond both Sutra and Tantra like Gampopa.

Malcolm wrote:

Right, and since everyone he cites was already a well schooled Vajrayāna master, his argument is quite weak.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 29th, 2014 at 10:09 PM

Title: Re: Tantric and late Indian Buddhist philosophy

Content:

Jikan said:

I've heard the esoteric practices of Japan referred to as Vajrayana in everyday speech more than once.

Malcolm wrote:

But it is not accurate and the term never once occurs in any tantras considered Yoga tantra on down; whereas the term guhyamantra occurs in all kinds of tantras down to the Susiddhikara, generally considered to be the root tantra of the kriya tantras. It even occurs in Vinaya texts, PP in 8000 lines, Avatamska, Ratnakuta collection, and so on. The term guhyamantra, like vidyāmantra, is found in texts much earlier than what Western academics consider to be the "tantric" phase of Indian Buddhism (post 8th century).

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 29th, 2014 at 8:53 PM

Title: Re: Tantric and late Indian Buddhist philosophy

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

No, Astus. First, there is no such thing as a "sahajayāna" — this is fabricated term. Maitripa taught standard Vajrayāna, as did these other masters, complete with creation stage and completion stage.

Astus said:

A number of teachings by the mentioned Indian masters show something else. See for instance:

http://www.academia.edu/5614409/Mathes_2006_Blending_the_Sutras_with_the_Tantr as_The_Influence_of_Maitripa_and_his_Circle_on_the_Formation_of_Sutra_Mahamudr a_in_the_Kagyu_Schools

Malcolm wrote:

This is how Kagyus want to understand things, attempting to justify their "sutra mahāmudra".

But the fact of the matter is that Maitripa promulgated a cycle of Vajrayogini teachings which is preserved to this day in both Kagyu and Sakya. Saraha wrote a famous commentary on the Buddhakapala tantra, and is credited with being the first master to promulgate the Cakrasamvara tantra and so on. Maitripa also bestowed many empowerments and teachings on Marpa.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 29th, 2014 at 8:19 PM

Title: Re: What is "hinayana"? What is it not?

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

Why would stream entry be an obstacle to Mahayana motivation?

Malcolm wrote:

The point is that if you make the bodhisattva aspiration, according to conventional Theravadin doctrine, you are denied stream entry, and must remain a normal afflicted person. In their system, a bodhisattva can only become a realized person in their last lifetime, when they become a sammasambuddha.

Sherab Dorje said:

Quite the contrary. I believe that habituation of the mind stream via intentional action overrides the effect of a five minute ritual and cutting a couple strands of hair.

Malcolm wrote:

The rite is merely symbolic, refuge is in the heart. The intent to go for refuge indeed can shut the door to lower realms, especially Mahāyāna refuge.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 29th, 2014 at 8:16 PM

Title: Re: Understanding why ISIL beheads

Content:

Sherab said:

The doctrines of radical Muslims are actually mainstream.

Malcolm wrote:

No, I don't think so.

<http://lettertobaghdadi.com>

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 29th, 2014 at 8:12 PM

Title: Re: Tantric and late Indian Buddhist philosophy

Content:

Astus said:

Didn't what could be called Sahajayana, i.e. Mahamudra teachings, come later, as a further development from Vajrayana? Because it seems to me that it's distanced itself from the energy system established in HYT, and moved closer to established sutra teachings. Well, at least some teachers taught that way ((Saraha), Maitripa, Jnanakirti, Sahajavajra).

Malcolm wrote:

No, Astus. First, there is no such thing as a "sahajayāna" — this is fabricated term. Maitripa taught standard Vajrayāna, as did these other masters, complete with creation stage and completion stage.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 29th, 2014 at 5:46 AM

Title: Re: Tantric and late Indian Buddhist philosophy

Content:

Jikan said:

Very banal historical question that may be relevant: when did the word "vajrayana" actually come into use? What did it describe when it did come into use?

Malcolm wrote:

mid-8th century, highest yoga tantra practice.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 29th, 2014 at 3:37 AM

Title: Re: Tantric and late Indian Buddhist philosophy

Content:

Anders said:

Thanks a lot. Is the principle basically similar then to how the lotus position facilitates firmness of mind, or how one can regulate the mind by regulating the breath? That is to say, basically re-arranging bodily energies to effect the mind. Emphasis on principle, as I imagine the permutations, both theoretical and practical, go a lot further than this.

Malcolm wrote:

The Vajrayāna view is that vāyus of the body are the mind, basically.

kirtu said:

And what are vāyus?

Kirt

Malcolm wrote:

Literally, vāyu means wind in the trio of nāḍī, vāyu and bindu.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 29th, 2014 at 2:42 AM

Title: Re: Tantric and late Indian Buddhist philosophy

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Conventionally, Vajrayāna is usually understood to indicate HYT, whereas guhyamantra includes lower tantra.

Indrajala said:

You said, "However, you will find that among all the four main Tibetan Buddhist schools, in general this is view that is understood."

Does this equally apply to all Indian forms of Vajrayāna as they existed in India?

Malcolm wrote:

You mean amongst all followers of the niruttaratantras?

Yes, I think so. For example, commentary tantra of the Guhyasamaja, the Sandhivāyākaraṇa states:

Bodhicitta becomes vāyu,
its form exists in space,
it is the life of all sentient beings,
it is the nature of the five with ten names, renowned as the twelve links,
its nature becomes three,
the bodhicitta called "vāyu"
this is the chief of consciousness.

Further, another commentary tantra, the Vajramālā, makes it very clear that even between the births, the all-basis consciousness is also inseparable with the mahāprāṇavāyu.

In other words, Vajrayāna texts treat our consciousness in terms of its embodiment in a manner very distinct from lower tantra and sutra.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 29th, 2014 at 2:15 AM

Title: Re: Tantric and late Indian Buddhist philosophy

Content:

Anders said:

Thanks a lot. Is the principle basically similar then to how the lotus position facilitates firmness of mind, or how one can regulate the mind by regulating the breath? That is to say, basically re-arranging bodily energies to effect the mind. Emphasis on principle, as I imagine the permutations, both theoretical and practical, go a lot further than this.

Malcolm wrote:

The Vajrayāna view is that vāyus of the body are the mind, basically.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 29th, 2014 at 1:52 AM

Title: Re: Tantric and late Indian Buddhist philosophy

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

I am not including Shingon, nor lower tantra. However, you will find that among all the four main Tibetan Buddhist schools, in general this is view that is understood.

Indrajala said:

You should state such things as otherwise your blanket statements are highly problematic.

Malcolm wrote:

Conventionally, Vajrayāna is usually understood to indicate HYT, whereas guhyamantra includes lower tantra.

The term vajrayāna primarily shows up only in niruttarayogatantras. So actually, my statement is perfectly accurate and not at all a blanket term, it is highly focused and precise.

Go ahead, do a word search for rdo rje theg pa here and see what titles emerge:

<https://www.istb.univie.ac.at/kanjur/xml3/xml/> " onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 29th, 2014 at 1:46 AM

Title: Re: What is "hinayana"? What is it not?

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

Personally i believe that the important distinction is not the reference to Theravada vs non-Theravada traditions but that concerning motivation. There are plenty of people following Mahayana traditions with a hinayana motivation and there are plenty of Theravadins following their path yet holding a Mahayana motivation.

Malcolm wrote:

One cannot have a Mahāyāna motivation if one has not generated it. That means, for Theravadins, permanently eliminating their chances for stream entry, according to their own concepts. If one is someone who is genuinely generated the Mahāyāna intent for awakening, one won't be interested very much in Theravada naturally.

Sherab Dorje said:

Personally i don't buy the whole "taking refuge as a guarantee against rebirth in the three lower realms" schtick.

Malcolm wrote:

You consider the Buddha's teachings "schtick"?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 29th, 2014 at 12:59 AM

Title: Re: Tantric and late Indian Buddhist philosophy

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

It means that in Vajrayāna,...

Indrajala said:

That is rather essentialist and not really nuanced, as if "Vajrayāna" is a single entity.

Malcolm wrote:

I am not including Shingon, nor lower tantra. However, you will find that among all the four main Tibetan Buddhist schools, in general this is view that is understood.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, September 28th, 2014 at 11:12 PM

Title: Re: Sroglung?

Content:

Katharina108 said:

Two years ago I suffered a terrible shock trauma related to violence. Since then I have often panic attacks at night or during daytime. It is so terrible, I can not even move. It is a huge pressure and tightness in my chest. In particular, sound is a very big trigger. When I hear a loud noise, such as the banging of a door or people yelling, suddenly I can suffer from immense fear and panic attacks. I can relive my source experience I had and I don't feel frightened. It is not that I try to suppress my memories at all. Now I have this kind of physical condition of these panic attacks. They can have all kinds of objects: Noise, bad news etc and they are very irrational. Even though I know this, it is like a terrible condition, that I can't stop and just 'happens'. Before my traumatic experience I did not have any problems and I never experienced these sensations. I don't want to take western drugs. I think it may be a heavy lung condition. I read this article:

<http://www.rinpoche.com/teachings/causes.htm> "

onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;" onclick="window.open(this.href);return false; and the symptoms I have are described as 'srog-dzin lung'.

What is the common treatment for this? Is it the same as what people sometimes call lung disease or is it another kind of disorder?

I am thankful for every input,
Kath

Malcolm wrote:

Common treatments include massage, herbs such as Agar 35, and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, September 28th, 2014 at 9:55 PM

Title: Re: Tantric and late Indian Buddhist philosophy

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Vajrayāna treatment of embodiment.

Anders said:

Could you give a quick rundown on this?

Malcolm wrote:

It means that in Vajrayāna, the key to awakening lies in human anatomy, not in philosophical speculation. It means that all the qualities of the basis, path and result are complete in the human body, and do not need to be gathered elsewhere. It means that, according to Vajrayāna, that the mind is a function of the body and its anatomy. It means that the classic dualism of namarūpa does not mean that nama and rūpa are inherently different, as philosopher's like Dharmakīrti would have it, but rather than there is no state in mind is dissociated from matter. In this respect, Vajrayāna is monistic, though of course in practical discussion, the substance dualism of sūtra dominates even Vajrayāna discussion, obscuring this point for the most part. But when you read texts like the Khandro Nyinthig, or the rdo rje lus sbaś bśhad by Yanggongpa, it becomes clear that the dualistic approach to mind/body in sūtra and abhidharma is abandoned by Vajrayāna in so far as it explains all of samsara and nirvana are present in the body.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 27th, 2014 at 11:33 PM

Title: Re: Understanding why ISIL beheads

Content:

TRC said:

keeping their war economy ticking along as well as more covertly and surreptitiously realising their larger geopolitical agendas.

Malcolm wrote:

War economies only work if you have someone to sell arms to (France and Britain in the two World Wars, for example). In this case, our government has no buyers in the region, apart from Israel. Iraq "buys" weapons from us, but we will never see a penny from those arms that we've "sold" them. All this costs the US Taxpayer billions.

Karma Dorje said:

Yes, but the people in power obviously don't care about the US taxpayer. One can't understand what is happening there by thinking that the American oligarchs have the best interests of the American people at heart. The war economy is a way of transferring wealth from the middle class to the wealthy. The US doesn't need to export to accomplish this. They simply need to use all the weaponry they have been producing and replace what they have expended.

Malcolm wrote:

It not all a conspiracy, contrary to popular belief.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 27th, 2014 at 11:03 PM

Title: Re: Contesting constant non-dual awareness of Shakyamuni

Content:

Jesse said:

I've always felt when saying Buddhas are omniscient, it makes it feel like an un-attainable goal. (enlightenment.) because seriously, omniscience is in the realms of a god, not normal people. It just makes Buddhism feel pretty pointless eh?

kirtu said:

Omniscience isn't attained until after the 10th bhumi.

So we can develop compassion, lovingkindness, generosity, patience, ethical discipline, etc. to a maximum in this body. That is doable and certainly not pointless.

Kirt

Malcolm wrote:

Factually, tenth stage bodhisattvas are basically omniscient, despite having a slight obscuration. This is why Maitreya states that the wisdom beyond the ninth bhumi is a stage of buddhahood.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 27th, 2014 at 9:44 PM

Title: Re: What is "hinayana"? What is it not?

Content:

daverupa said:

And, for what it's worth, a comparison of motive appears: "Save All Beings" <--> "A Shower Of The Way" } similar, and yet different. Maybe some hay is to made here, ecumenically.

Malcolm wrote:

You misunderstand then — "becoming a buddha to benefit all sentient beings" means becoming a buddha in order to show all sentient beings the way to buddhahood. It does not mean "saving" sentient beings in any sort of Christian sense. An arhat entering cessation can inspire by example, but cannot benefit beings beyond his or her lifespan. A buddha on the other hand can always emanate nirmanakāyas.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 27th, 2014 at 9:36 PM

Title: Re: Understanding why ISIL beheads

Content:

TRC said:

I don't mean the production of arms necessarily for profit, but the huge permanent industrial military complex that the US is now dependent on, and which is fact one of the driving factors keeping America engaged in conflict. That's the war economy I'm referring to.

But yeah you're right, it is a massive cost to the tax payer, and that's the paradox that this dependency has become (as all dependencies are). It's the monkey on America's back that has its roots back in the cold war 1950s and is now hugely detrimental to the US nation (and the world) on so many levels. That's greed, hatred and delusion for you though.

Malcolm wrote:

The US is engaged in conflicts for many reasons, and a lot of them go back to the failed policies of the breakup of the British Empire, like this one.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 27th, 2014 at 9:05 PM

Title: Re: Understanding why ISIL beheads

Content:

Karma Dorje said:

It's not an assumption. It's a matter of public record. The US trained the fighters that would later become ISIS in Jordan.

Malcolm wrote:

That is a bit of an exaggeration — yes, a few dozen men trained in 2012 by the US in Jordan later joined the Islamic State, but you make it sound as if the whole command structure of IS was trained by the US and that is not true. Actually, the command structure of the IS is composed mostly of former Baathist officers.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 27th, 2014 at 8:23 PM

Title: Re: Understanding why ISIL beheads

Content:

TRC said:

keeping their war economy ticking along as well as more covertly and surreptitiously realising their larger geopolitical agendas.

Malcolm wrote:

War economies only work if you have someone to sell arms to (France and Britain in the two World Wars, for example). In this case, our government has no buyers in the region, apart from Israel. Iraq "buys" weapons from us, but we will never see a penny from those arms that we've "sold" them. All this costs the US Taxpayer billions.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 27th, 2014 at 8:21 PM

Title: Re: Contesting constant non-dual awareness of Shakyamuni

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The knowledge obscuration is necessary for buddhahood, since dharmakayā means omniscience.

garudha said:

Not clear. Do you mean something like "Enlightenment can only occur in the context of ignorance", perhaps you're simply (perhaps justifiably) glorifying dharmakayā, or are you saying that a Buddha is personally not Omniscient?

Malcolm wrote:

No, what I mean is that in order to attain buddhahood, one must remove two obscurations, the kleśa-avarana and the jñeyā-avarana, respectively, the obscuration of affliction and the obscuration of knowledge. Arhats and Pratyekabuddhas, as well as seventh stage bodhisattvas, have completely removed the former; only Buddhas are completely free of the latter.

I think that most of the confusion you are expressing in this thread is a result of not having properly studied the nature of three kāyas. There are any number of resources you can consult to further educate yourself.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 27th, 2014 at 10:03 AM

Title: Re: What is "hinayana"? What is it not?

Content:

plwk said:

<http://www.tbsa.org/arahant.htm>

Jikan said:

From that article:

In brief, a Theravada Buddhist can become a Buddha, or a Pacceka-Buddha, or an Arahant according to his choice. So Theravada Buddhism is for all three paths and not for the path to Arahantship only.

According to at least one contemporary Theravada source, there are some who indeed aspire to Buddhahood among those who identify as Theravada Buddhists. It's for this reason that I stated above that the term "hinayana" doesn't correspond directly to contemporary Theravadin practitioners, regardless of what the doctrine has had to say in the past. (what this means for the direction of Theravada doctrine and practice is a separate issue--perhaps a good topic for a thread at our sister site, DhammaWheel.)

Malcolm wrote:

I already addressed this issue. Theravada is a Hinayana school, despite the fact Theravadins can choose to become Mahayanists if they like.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 27th, 2014 at 10:02 AM

Title: Re: What is "hinayana"? What is it not?

Content:

plwk said:

<http://www.tbsa.org/arahant.htm>

Jikan said:

From that article:

In brief, a Theravada Buddhist can become a Buddha, or a Pacceka-Buddha, or an Arahant according to his choice. So Theravada Buddhism is for all three paths and not for the path to Arahantship only.

According to at least one contemporary Theravada source, there are some who indeed aspire to Buddhahood among those who identify as Theravada Buddhists. It's for this reason that I stated above that the term "hinayana" doesn't correspond directly to contemporary Theravadin practitioners, regardless of what the doctrine has had to say in the past. (what this means for the direction of Theravada doctrine and practice is a separate issue--perhaps a good topic for a thread at our sister site, DhammaWheel.)

Malcolm wrote:

I already addressed this issue. Theravada is a Hinayana school, despite fact Theravadins can choose to become Mahayanists if they like.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 27th, 2014 at 5:19 AM

Title: Re: Contesting constant non-dual awareness of Shakyamuni

Content:

garudha said:

If Arhats, Pratyekabuddhas, and the Bodhisattvas are in the "incomparable rightly completed enlightenment",

Malcolm wrote:

The citation does not say that. You are not reading it correctly.

garudha said:

Yes I was taking bits out of context. Thanks for your statement. I have now gone over it again...

1a. I tried to read the Sutra from my own preconception of what it's trying to convey.

1b. I then find, within the text, contradictions which tell me my preconception is incorrect.

2a. I tried to read the Sutra from my how I imagine it would read if my preconception is incorrect.

2b. I then find, within the text, contradictions which tell me my preconception is correct.

Yes, I comprehend that Arhats & Pratyekabuddhas must contemplate the "nescience entrenchment" which should be eliminated, purified or to become nonexistent.

The purification of this "central channel" results in Buddha-hood, as I have heard, so I do not deny that Shakyamuni Buddha's true-state is inconceivable to me.

Therefore I must defer judgement. However; I personally doubt that this "central channel" can be cleansed via mind-only learning alone. I think the whole-body-including-brain must be in a healthy condition for real progress to occur. I therefore view any experience of non-duality - which does not take into account the whole being of a person - as much a head trick for all the good striving for it would do.

I sincerely believe that cleaning the floor is as decent a meditation, on the road of progress towards "non-duality", as cleaning out ones karma.

Malcolm wrote:

The knowledge obscuration is necessary for buddhahood, since dharmakayā means omniscience.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 27th, 2014 at 5:04 AM

Title: Re: What is "hinayana"? What is it not?

Content:

Jikan said:

That's an interesting passage, but it doesn't necessarily speak for itself. How does it rebut (does it rebut?) what I have been arguing? How is it warranted as evidence for this purpose? Help me understand what you're trying to say here.

Malcolm wrote:

It's obvious what dave is saying: following the Mahāyāna path is the wrong way to get to Rajagriha, and the Buddha does not approve that Mahāyāna message, but he is not responsible for us wayward Mahāyānists.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 27th, 2014 at 5:02 AM

Title: Re: What is "hinayana"? What is it not?

Content:

Jikan said:

Yes, precisely: and who (or what) intercedes in this case? (still referring to the same parable): Buddhahood, in one way or another.

Malcolm wrote:

A buddha, not an abstract principle, "buddhahood".

Jikan said:

The doctrine that Buddha is leading all beings to the state of Buddhahood saturates East Asian Dharma. It's not so uncommon to see it in Indo-Tibetan Buddhism either.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, arhats, etc. Also. The criticism is two fold; one hinayāna practitioners have an inferior motivation; two, the Hinayāna canon does not teach the Mahāyāna path.

Jikan said:

That's why I say that the distinctions among the yanas, which vary by tradition, are just provisional or conventional distinctions.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, knowing that the canon of the Śravakas will not lead to complete awakening, who would follow it? This is why the distinction is extremely important and should be emphasized. Who wants to hang out in the cessation of samadhi for incalculable eons?

Jikan said:

Sure, but what do you make of the parable of the magic city in the same sutra?

Malcolm wrote:

I addressed by pointing out the fact that arhats need to being roused from samadhi to enter Mahāyāna.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 27th, 2014 at 4:31 AM

Title: Re: What is "hinayana"? What is it not?

Content:

Mkoll said:

You believe the Buddha wrote those texts?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, I believe that the Buddha spoke the Mahāyāna, like all sutras, however, they were written down much later.

Mkoll said:

That's a red herring anyway. I'm not talking about the tactfulness of words used in ancient texts, I'm talking about the tactfulness of words used actively by modern people now, in 2014.

Malcolm wrote:

Not a red herring, it is actually very much to the point — the point being is the division of teachings into Hinayāna and Mahāyāna is very much a mainstream part of how Buddhism is explained in Mahāyāna, where the aspiration to awaken without including the aspiration to achieve full Buddhahood for the benefit of all sentient beings is considered inferior [hina]. There is really no way around it. We can say "śravakayāna" and "pratyekabuddhayāna", but in this case what is the difference? In śravakayāna and pratyekabuddhayāna there is no motivation to awaken beyond considering only one's own benefit. When we compare the two, the śravakayāna and pratyekabuddhayāna motivations are inferior to the motivation of the bodhisattvayāna, hence śravakayāna and pratyekabuddhayāna constitute the hinayāna, and that is all there really is to it. One try and explain it all away with speculations about textual history, but in reality, those of us with commitment to Mahāyāna understand things in this way.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 27th, 2014 at 4:00 AM

Title: Re: Contesting constant non-dual awareness of Shakyamuni

Content:

garudha said:

If Arhats, Pratyekabuddhas, and the Bodhisattvas are in the "incomparable rightly completed enlightenment",

Malcolm wrote:

The citation does not say that. You are not reading it correctly.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 27th, 2014 at 3:41 AM

Title: Re: What is "hinayana"? What is it not?

Content:

Mkoll said:

Notice how I use the words "publicly" and "public"?

Malcolm wrote:

This is a Mahāyāna forum, correct? The term is used pervasively by the Buddha in Mahāyāna texts, correct? So you would prefer us to use euphemisms?

Basically, the terms śravakayāna and pratyekabuddha yāna are equated by the Buddha again and again with hinayāna.

We can use the term "mainstream" if you like, but this is still just a euphemism for the term hinayāna.

Basically, "hinayāna" is the Buddha's term for śravakayāna and pratyekabuddhayāna. So take it up with him.

Mkoll said:

Saying "mainstream" or "śravakayāna" instead of "hinayāna" would be more tactful.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, you tell the Buddha to be more tactful in his Mahāyāna texts. What was he thinking?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 27th, 2014 at 3:00 AM

Title: Re: What is "hinayana"? What is it not?

Content:

Mkoll said:

Notice how I use the words "publicly" and "public"?

Malcolm wrote:

This is a Mahāyāna forum, correct? The term is used pervasively by the Buddha in Mahāyāna texts, correct? So you would prefer us to use euphemisms?

Basically, the terms śravakayāna and pratyekabuddha yāna are equated by the Buddha again and again with hinayāna.

We can use the term "mainstream" if you like, but this is still just a euphemism for the term hinayāna.

Basically, "hinayāna" is the Buddha's term for śravakayāna and pratyekabuddhayāna. So take it up with him.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 27th, 2014 at 2:00 AM

Title: Re: What is "hinayana"? What is it not?

Content:

Mkoll said:

A tactless term with pejorative connotations that those who know better shouldn't use publicly, unless their goal is to increase sectarianism and division between people.

Wikipedia said:

The word Hīnayāna is formed of hīna (हीन):[5] "little," "poor," "inferior," "abandoned," "deficient," "defective;" and yāna (यान):[6] "vehicle", where "vehicle" means "a way of going to enlightenment". The Pali Text Society's Pali-English Dictionary (1921–25) defines hīna in even stronger terms, with a semantic field that includes "poor, miserable; vile, base, abject, contemptible," and "despicable."

...

According to Jan Nattier, it is most likely that the term Hīnayāna post-dates the term Mahāyāna, and was only added at a later date due to antagonism and conflict between bodhisattvas and śrāvakas. The sequence of terms then began with Bodhisattvayāna, which was given the epithet Mahāyāna ("Great Vehicle"). It was only later, after attitudes toward the bodhisattvas and their teachings had become more critical, that the term Hīnayāna was created as a back-formation, contrasting with the already-established term Mahāyāna.[11] The earliest Mahāyāna texts often use the term Mahāyāna as an epithet and synonym for Bodhisattvayāna, but the term Hīnayāna is comparatively rare in early texts, and is usually not found at all in the earliest translations. Therefore, the often-perceived symmetry between Mahāyāna and Hīnayāna can be deceptive, as the terms were not actually coined in relation to one another in the same era.[12]

According to Paul Williams, "the deep-rooted misconception concerning an unfailing, ubiquitous fierce criticism of the Lesser Vehicle by the [Mahāyāna] is not supported by our texts." [13] Williams states that while evidence of conflict is present in some cases, there is also substantial evidence demonstrating peaceful coexistence between the two traditions.[13]

Mkoll said:

I like Mr. Williams' idea of "peaceful coexistence." Using the term "hinayana" in public does not move towards that end.

Malcolm wrote:

This all presumes that these speculations by Nattier have any merit.

The term hinayāna is used over and over again in the Mahāyāna canon to describe pejoratively the goals, motivations and practices of those who aspire to the awakening of śravakas and pratyekabuddhas. It occurs in the PP Sutra in 8000 lines, repeatedly in the Ratnakuta collection, in the general sutra section of the bka' 'gyur, as well as many tantras.

Contrary to popular PC sentiment, the term is used over and over again in Indian Mahāyāna commentarial literature.

In order to understand Indian Mahāyāna you have to understand the use of the term hinayāna and how it is universally used.

If you are a not a Mahāyāna practitioner, you don't need to pay the term any heed. If someone is interested to read Mahāyāna, they are simply going to have to deal with the presence of this term in our canon.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 27th, 2014 at 1:26 AM

Title: Re: Contesting constant non-dual awareness of Shakyamuni

Content:

garudha said:

Do you find significant fault with the statement "The Mind if all Buddhas is Eternal Buddha" ?

Malcolm wrote:

It is not as it Śakyamuni were one thing and dharmakāya was another. All three kāyas are inseparable.

But the The Lion's Roar of Queen Srimala sutra mentions Arhats and Pratyekabuddhas are in the incomparable rightly completed enlightenment which is the absoluteness of the One Vehicle.

garudha said:

"Lord, the Arhats and Pratyekabuddhas ...

Malcolm wrote:

This passage does not mean what you think it means. It is stating that arhats and so on mistake their realization for a final realization, but that nevertheless, their path is included in the "ekayāna". It is basically the same sentiment as in my signature. All Dharmas are included in the Dzogchen Teachings, but Dzogchen is the supreme teaching which surpasses them all.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 27th, 2014 at 1:05 AM

Title: Re: Dancing with Women in Buddhist Temple

Content:

plwk said:

It is clearly a dance during what is known as a feast offering, in which singing and dancing are encouraged at a certain point in the ritual.

Ah...is this standard for all feast offerings to use such music & dancing or upon discretion of the presiding umze or lamas?

Malcolm wrote:

It is at the discretion of whoever is in charge.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 27th, 2014 at 1:04 AM

Title: Re: Contesting constant non-dual awareness of Shakyamuni

Content:

garudha said:

So (indirectly) this sutra states that there is a possible enlightenment which does not involve seeing the Tathagatagarbha. What do you make of these "Self-Enlightened" ones who have not seen and what could their attainment be like ?

Malcolm wrote:

These are pratyekabuddhas, and they do not realize complete buddhahood.

garudha said:

"Lord, the Tathagatagarbha is neither self nor sentient being, nor soul, nor personality. The Tathagatagarbha is not the domain of beings who fall into the belief in a real personality, who adhere to wayward views, whose thoughts are distracted by voidness. Lord, this Tathagatagarbha is the embryo of the Illustrious Dharmadhatu, the embryo of the Dharmakaya, the embryo of supramundane dharma, the embryo of the intrinsically pure dharma.

Malcolm wrote:

So it seems, to me, that Tathagatagarbha refers to Eternal Buddha.

[/quote]

Tathāgatagarbha is a synonym for the unrealized dharmakāya, etc. As I said, the mind of all buddhas is the dharmakāya. They have no other mind.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 26th, 2014 at 10:10 PM

Title: Re: What is "hinayana"? What is it not?

Content:

Jikan said:

...which is to say that, in the end, there is no "hinayana," just slower and faster practitioners, or rather practitioners with more or less capacity in this lifetime. That may sound triumphalist, but there it is.

Malcolm wrote:

No, as I explained, there is a Hinayāna, because it has to do with the motivations of the practitioner.

Without intercession, there is no way an arhat will enter Mahāyāna, for example. It is not like an arhat enters cessation and then suddenly realizes his or her path is incomplete.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 26th, 2014 at 9:31 PM

Title: Re: What is "hinayana"? What is it not?

Content:

Jikan said:

Am I alone in thinking that contemporary Mahayana Buddhism makes a much bigger deal out of the distinctions among vehicles than earlier Buddhists did? and maybe a bigger deal than it need be?

I think Shakyamuni was on the right track in the Lotus Sutra, when he taught that while there appears to be a multiplicity of vehicles to suit the needs of deluded beings, there's really only one vehicle: the Buddha vehicle

Malcolm wrote:

The ekayāna teaching is taught from the the point of view of Mahāyāna; but it does not address the individual bodhicittas of śravakas, and so on. It may be the case that in the end that arhats are woken up from the samadhi of cessation and set on the bodhisattva path, but it does not mean that there are those who think the path of the bodhisattva is too difficult, egotistical, and so on., and who therefore select a lesser awakening.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 26th, 2014 at 9:28 PM

Title: Re: What is "hinayana"? What is it not?

Content:

Jikan said:

I'm not comfortable with the habit of using the term "hinayana" to describe the practice & doctrine of Theravadin practitioners, because it doesn't always correspond. It's not adequate. This has been discussed a bit already in this thread.

Malcolm wrote:

Mahāyāna describes a motivation behind one's wish for awakening. Simply put, if your actual motivation for awakening does not included the desire to become a Buddha for the benefit of all sentient beings, that motivation is hina, inferior. Not only this, it also describes a view of emptiness, an attitude towards śīla that prioritizes the benefit of others over concern for the "purity" of one's discipline, and so on.

Now, just as a Mulasarvastivadin (like all Tibetan Buddhist, upasakas to bhikṣus) can be a Mahāyānista, so can a Theravadin.

But Theravada proper is still a Hinayāna school, as is Mulasarvastivada, because one cannot obtain buddhahood through that school's teachings and because the bodhicitta to become a buddha does not exist in its canon. Yes, it is true that there is an extracanoncal approach to the Bodhisattva path borrowed from Mahāyāna, but even here it is constrained by a variety of concepts such as the idea that one can only be a bodhisattva if one is predicted by a Buddha and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 26th, 2014 at 8:21 PM

Title: Re: Dancing with Women in Buddhist Temple

Content:

plwk said:

```
if (typeof bbmedia == 'undefined') { bbmedia = true; var e = document.createElement('script'); e.async = true; e.src = 'bbmedia.js'; var s =
document.getElementsByTagName('script')[0]; s.parentNode.insertBefore(e, s); } https://phpbbex.com/ [video]
```

What do you think people?

Malcolm wrote:

It is clearly a dance during what is known as a feast offering, in which singing and dancing are encouraged at a certain point in the ritual.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 26th, 2014 at 9:08 AM

Title: Re: Inequality

Content:

kirtu said:

The list of countries I provided are successful social democracies. They have bottled and harnessed the capitalist genie in order to keep it working for the people rather than creating a tyrannical economic system where lower classes are deprived of opportunity and in some cases the bare necessities of life (as we see in North Korea on the one hand and in the US currently).

Malcolm wrote:

All boats rise in a high tide. When the oil economy that is propping up the world economy tanks, it will be a different story for everyone...

BTW, I know people in Norway, and all other countries you mention, it is not the cup of tea you imagine.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 26th, 2014 at 9:05 AM

Title: Re: Inequality

Content:

kirtu said:

That's a juvenile response. You introduced the incorrect strawman "so you prefer" etc. Your assertion is nonsense.

Kirt

Malcolm wrote:

Kirt, I don't include the economies you mention under the rubric of "planned" economies. Now, there is no need for you to get all hostile about the fact that I consider all the economies you mentioned to be free market economies. As I said, "free" does not mean "unregulated".

A genuine Socialist economy will be planned to the teeth — and history shows these economies are abject failures.

An unfortunate fact of Social Democracies (and the US is no exception here) is that they permit corporations to externalize many social costs of running their business onto the public sector, which appears to keep prices low, but in reality just cause a mess to be cleaned up later.

Now, I understand you have a deep hatred for the country in which you live, and I feel sorry for you in this respect — it must be painful to be so unhappy, feeling forced to live in a country you despise so deeply. I wish you the speediest possible exit to the country of your choice, where you may enjoy the kind of prosperity everyone deserves, merit permitting.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 26th, 2014 at 8:12 AM

Title: Re: Inequality

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

I see, so you prefer always failing planned economies then? Because you can't show me one that has not catastrophically failed.

kirtu said:

I absolutely can: Sweden, Norway, Denmark, Finland, the Netherlands, Germany, Austria and Switzerland. There are other nations as well. Since WW2 the economies of these nations have not failed. They have been through difficult times but haven't collapsed. They keep capitalism under control rather than let it run rampant.

Malcolm wrote:

I never said that they were planned economies.

Ummmm yes you did, the above statement was in response to this statement of mine:

I see, so you prefer always failing planned economies then? Because you can't show me one that has not catastrophically failed.

"Free" does not mean "unregulated".

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 26th, 2014 at 4:29 AM

Title: Re: Inequality

Content:

kirtu said:

I absolutely can: Sweden, Norway, Denmark, Finland, the Netherlands, Germany, Austria and Switzerland. There are other nations as well. Since WW2 the economies of these nations have not failed. They have been through difficult times but haven't collapsed. They keep capitalism under control rather than let it run rampant.

Kirt

Malcolm wrote:

These are not planned economies by any standard. They are well-regulated free market economies. Venezuela, Cuba, Pre-capitalist Russia, China, former Soviet Bloc countries etc. are what I have in mind when I mention "planned economies" When talking about planned economies, I am not sure we are discussing or mean the same thing.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 26th, 2014 at 4:03 AM

Title: Re: Contesting constant non-dual awareness of Shakyamuni

Content:

garudha said:

According to Doctrine of Buddhism such feelings are non-existent and cannot be apprehended.

asunthatneversets said:

That should say: "According to Doctrine of Buddhism such feelings are ultimately non-existent and cannot be apprehended."

However if we grasp at the ultimate then all we end up doing is advocating for a nihilist view.

Jigme Lingpa calls this type of view 'being sealed by a definitive view of emptiness', it can potentially be a major deviation if uncorrected.

garudha said:

Ahhh! You found the perfect book for me. Thanks so much

Malcolm wrote:

You have to understand, the dharmakāya is the mind of the Buddha, that is nondual by definition. As it says in the Avatamska:

The owner of the pure nondual dharmakāya tames all migrating beings who abide in dualism with the thunderous clouds of emanations.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 26th, 2014 at 3:58 AM

Title: Re: Inequality

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Markets require proper regulation.

kirtu said:

The Nov 2007 collapse proved that regulators generally don't know what they are doing. Other incidents (Madoff for example) have demonstrated this as well.

Kirt

Malcolm wrote:

I see, so you prefer always failing planned economies then? Because you can't show me one that has not catastrophically failed.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 26th, 2014 at 3:44 AM

Title: Re: Inequality

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

There is a difference between a regulated market and planned economies. The former fail when regulations fail, as in the 2007 debacle; the latter always fail.

Markets require proper regulation.

What I am skeptic of is that notion that economies can be planned. Many have tried, all have failed.

kirtu said:

French mixed market economy has been through many changes but France is still around. 5th largest economy last time I looked. China still does not have an unconstrained market economy and is 2nd. The US with the 1st largest nominal economy and close to unconstrained markets (certainly the worship of that) failed in November 2007 resulting in a substantial loss of wealth, millions of people lost everything as a result (including me) and the de facto slave class in American, a class with virtually no economic opportunity, swelled. I personally will be voting with my feet when I recover.

While Marxism did fail, the Marxist criticism of capitalism is basically valid. Capitalism can only lead to cycles of boom and bust (*a fact acknowledged by all economists I know). The difference is that capitalist economists since the Keynes Revolution have articulated a philosophy and method to contain that damage and manage the cycles. This was overturned by Chicago School fanatics who are essentially running the economy of the US at the behest of Ayn Randian fanatics in Congress and in the Fed. More recently Nassim Nicholas Taleb has demonstrated the weakness of impotence of statically driven economics under the condition of an unusual event. Taleb is a student of Mandelbrot (who was also one of the teacher's of many of the Chicago School and who was certainly associated with the Chicago School through the 60's) and was a very successful mathematical financier who focuses on unusual or Black-Swan events in his speculation.

You could respond that modern finance has used (Taleb would say overused) statistics to minimize risk but they have used other mathematical models as well (causing the infamous Black-Scholes collapse in the 90's). While professors Merton and Scholes rightly won the Nobel Prize for their achievement in pricing, most people using their tools and other tools in financial mathematics don't know what they are doing and are just turning a crank (called sausage machine mathematics). Market economies are also open to collapses which is one reason that social democracies keep it under control.

Kirt

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 26th, 2014 at 2:54 AM

Title: Re: Inequality

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Communalism and non-Marxist species of socialism are not necessarily so, but the willingness of Marxists to resort to violence generally supplants other non-aggressive socialisms unless those socialisms are supported by a healthy market economy.

kirtu said:

Which is the actual case in all social democracies. However your skepticism regarding religious communism is excessive. In fact your skepticism regarding all forms of communism is also. Otherwise the Indian state of Kerala would not exist (indeed, by American standards it is not supposed to exist but nevertheless does [admittedly a friend of mine from Kerala dismisses the local Communist party there as just another political party like the Democrats ...]).

Kirt

Malcolm wrote:

Having been to Kerala, yes, the Communist Party there is mainly regarded as a nuisance. They are just as corrupt as any other party in India.

As far as religious Communism goes, Communism is sort of a religion.

What I am skeptic of is that notion that economies can be planned. Many have tried, all have failed.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 26th, 2014 at 1:52 AM

Title: Re: Contesting constant non-dual awareness of Shakyamuni

Content:

garudha said:

Therefore: there is no enlightenment that could be attained by samsaric beings because (i) there are no differentiated samsaric beings (ii) there are no differentiated Buddhas (iii) there are no defilements to cleanse.

Malcolm wrote:

From the point of view of Buddha (nondual), yes; from the point of view of sentient being (dual), no.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 26th, 2014 at 12:42 AM

Title: Re: Dudjom Lineage Rigdzin Dupa: First English Translation

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

still wondering why no one ever sent me a copy of this since I made a donation for it...anyway, NBD.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 26th, 2014 at 12:14 AM

Title: Re: Contesting constant non-dual awareness of Shakyamuni

Content:

garudha said:

Now this is a big problem for me because you're implicating that sentient beings -- whose minds are NOT in a state of constant non-dual awareness---...cannot achieve effortlessness until they attain this mythical "non-dual awareness".

Malcolm wrote:

Correct, they cannot. Why? Because they are conditioned by affliction.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 25th, 2014 at 11:16 PM

Title: Re: Bodhisattva's remorse

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

Any practice we engage in has to be premised on spontaneity, and not based in feelings/thoughts of hope and fear.

Malcolm wrote:

Any practice we do should be based on the motivation of attaining awakening for the benefit of others. Only Buddhas truly act spontaneously, we are not capable of that.

Sherab Dorje said:

I believe that we are capable of spontaneous acts of love, generosity, compassion, etc... Our enlightened nature sees to that. Now it is, of course, true that our negative habitual tendencies can override this natural display, and that cultivating the right motivation helps us habituate our behaviour in a positive direction, but to say that only Buddhas truly act spontaneously is a gross exaggeration.

Malcolm wrote:

In this respect "spontaneous" means free from objects. We are not capable of that, not even a bodhisattva on the stages is capable of that, since they have a very subtle obscuration that causes them to have dualistic perception, albeit on a very subtle level.

Our compassion, etc., no matter how "spontaneous" it is, is always tainted with objectification.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Thursday, September 25th, 2014 at 10:19 PM
Title: Re: Historical Buddha
Content:
Bakmoon said:
but in a debate context it does

Malcolm wrote:
Not really, but anyway, if your goal is to become a samyaksambuddha, you will not find any path to realize that result in any Hinayāna canon.

The reasonings supporting this position may be found in Mahāyānasūtrālaṃkāra, chapter 1.

M

Author: Malcolm
Date: Thursday, September 25th, 2014 at 10:16 PM
Title: Re: Historical Buddha
Content:
Malcolm wrote:
Nonsense, Mahāyāna sutras began to be written down around the same time as Hinayāna sutras, i.e. during the first century BCE and probably earlier.

Bakmoon said:
What about the fact that the Mahayana Sutras often talk about matters in the Sravakayana texts but the converse is never happens? If all the texts are records of the same person teaching that seems rather odd coincidence to me. .

Malcolm wrote:
As it says in the Guhyasamaja, the single vajra word is heard variously by different disciples.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Thursday, September 25th, 2014 at 8:17 PM
Title: Re: Inequality
Content:

treehuggingoctopus said:
Well, I'm happy to have you share your views on the matter. However, what you wrote doesn't in the least mean that socialism/comunism are unavoidably materialist.

Malcolm wrote:
Communism/Marxist Socialism is based on the theory of dialectical materialism.

Communalism and non-Marxist species of socialism are not necessarily so, but the willingness of Marxists to resort to violence generally supplants other non-aggressive socialisms unless those socialisms are supported by a healthy market economy.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 25th, 2014 at 9:59 AM

Title: Re: Historical Buddha

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

I hope you are not asking someone to justify the Mahayana view on what constitutes "Hinayana" on a Mahayana site.

daverupa said:

Certainly not. It simply needed clear saying, which Malcolm has accomplished. Please remember this thread is his creation; the discussion has played out in relatively short order, and is now a handy reference going forward.

Malcolm wrote:

At least we don't slaughter each other like the Shiites and Sunnis.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 25th, 2014 at 8:30 AM

Title: Re: Historical Buddha

Content:

daverupa said:

But only one is incomplete? That's the assessment I'm asking about, not contemporaneity.

Malcolm wrote:

Mahāyāna teaches the entire path of full awakening, profound emptiness, and so on, features lacking in all Hinayāna canons (which teach only the awakening of an arhat, superficial emptiness, and so on and so forth) blah blah blah, things you don't believe anyway.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 25th, 2014 at 7:28 AM

Title: Re: Historical Buddha

Content:

daverupa said:

We're not using the historical Buddha and that Dhamma which was preserved by the early Sangha as our foundation for learning & practice & assessment of teachings since the Dharma they [the monastics] preserved from the Buddha was not complete.

Ah, well then. How has this been assessed?

Malcolm wrote:

By our tradition, which asserts the Mahāyāna canon is a teaching which is contemporaneous with the Hinayāna canon.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 25th, 2014 at 3:27 AM

Title: Re: Historical Buddha

Content:

daverupa said:

either we're using the historical Buddha and that Dhamma which was preserved by the early Sangha as our foundation for learning & practice & assessment of teachings, or we're not.

Malcolm wrote:

We're not, since the Dharma they [the monastics] preserved from the Buddha was not complete.

daverupa said:

we can nevertheless say what isn't early enough to be considered a candidate for inclusion in the earliest historical strata...

Malcolm wrote:

Nonsense, Mahāyāna sutras began to be written down around the same time as Hinayāna sutras, i.e. during the first century BCE and probably earlier.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 25th, 2014 at 2:06 AM

Title: Re: Historical Buddha

Content:

Bakmoon said:

That would be true if it were only the structure that is parallel. But in fact the contents are in fact parallel.

Malcolm wrote:

No, the content is similar, but not parallel. Which suggests different communities collected different traditions of what the Buddha said, and organized them later on.

Bakmoon said:

The bulk of Sutras found in each Agama and Nikaya have a parallel Sutra in that collection's counterpart, many of these parallel Sutras have significant textual differences,

Malcolm wrote:
Exactly...

Bakmoon said:
The available evidence points towards the common ancestor model

Malcolm wrote:
No, I don't think so:
Interestingly, built into the traditional account of the First Council is the story of one monk who arrived late. He asked the others what he had missed. When they told him how they had formalized the Buddha's teachings, he objected. He insisted that he himself had heard the Buddha's discourses and would continue to remember them as he had heard them.
http://www.lindaheuman.com/stories/Tricycle_Magazine_Whose_Buddhism_is_Truest.pdf

Author: Malcolm
Date: Wednesday, September 24th, 2014 at 7:58 PM
Title: Re: Historical Buddha
Content:

Bakmoon said:
In my personal experience some kinds of Buddhist communities there really isn't nearly as clear of a line dividing the traditional Buddhists and secular Buddhists.

Malcolm wrote:
Sure there is: the line is rebirth and its acceptance.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Wednesday, September 24th, 2014 at 7:56 PM
Title: Re: Historical Buddha
Content:

Bakmoon said:
The copy model is just contradicted by the textual evidence in front of us.

Malcolm wrote:
Not if the copy was a copy of a canonical taxonomy rather than content, this would lend the illusion of an ur-canon from which there was deviation, when in fact no ur-canon ever existed, contrary to legend.

Bakmoon said:
Of course there are limits to inference, that's why there's a difference between reasonable inferences and unreasonable ones. To reject the use of reasonable inference based on evidence in accepting a position on the grounds that it isn't a definitive proof is to me a very radical skepticism which in any case isn't the point. For most things in life isn't sensible to demand absolute incontrovertible proof, but that doesn't mean that we therefore know almost nothing. Is the common source model absolutely 100% certain? No, but that's where all the evidence points, and it certainly makes the common source model a very sensible and reasonable conclusion based firmly on the evidence, and certainly not mere "...[S]peculative conjecture."

Malcolm wrote:

But instead, here we see that in the case of the origin of the Hināyāna canons, there is very little evidence. So what you are left with a sort of forensic analysis that in the end can tell you nothing at all about the decomposing corpse on the ground in front of you, except perhaps how it died.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 24th, 2014 at 7:43 AM

Title: Re: Historical Buddha

Content:

Bakmoon said:

Where have I claimed that? I think that we can use comparative methodology to say that some parts are older than others, but I never claimed to be able to definitively put anything back all the way to the time of the Buddha.

Malcolm wrote:

Going to play that card, eh? That simply means you don't think anything reported in the Pali Canon was said by the Buddha.

Bakmoon said:

Like I mentioned before, about 80% of the Suttas in the Majjhima Nikaya are also found in the Madhyama Agama. Are you claiming that it is reasonable to suppose this is because the collection that became the Madhyama Agama simply copied texts from the Majjhima Nikaya?

Malcolm wrote:

It is reasonable to suppose that when one group of redactors decided to give this and that name to sections of their canon, other groups of redactors chose to model their redaction likewise.

Bakmoon said:

If so, then why aren't the texts the same as in the Majjhima Nikaya? They are the same in terms of substantive content, but textually many of them are quite different.

Malcolm wrote:

Because what was borrowed could merely have been an organizational scheme, not every text within that scheme.

Bakmoon said:

I suppose it is possible that just before the Canons were written down in Sri Lanka and the surviving Gandhari texts were penned that there was a massive borrowing of texts between them and then both the Sri Lankans and the Gandhari's decided to add and subtract a good amount of material all at once from their borrowed texts, but that sounds a lot more speculative and conjectural than saying that the reason why the texts have both strong similarities and significant textual differences is that they are descendents from a common source.

Malcolm wrote:

If you follow Salmond's reasoning, the notion that there was one ur-canon creates more questions than it answers.

Bakmoon said:

2) Like it or not, there is a very large difference between propositions which reasonably inferred from the evidence at hand and propositions which are not. If just after hearing a gunshot person A is found shot in a room with a gun with the fingerprints of person B who was found near by, unless there is some evidence to the contrary, we reasonably can infer that person B shot person A, and this certainty is sufficient to sentence a person to prison.

Malcolm wrote:

This kind of reasoning has put quite a large number of innocent people on death row. Whoops! There are clear limits to inferential reasoning.

Malcom said:

Not all, the ordination lineages all sprang from different people, Mulasarvastivada from Rahula, Theravada from Upali, and so on.

That's true of the ordination lineages of individual persons, but there were several different schools of Buddhism in India, each associated with their own canon. The Vinaya Pitikas of these schools indicate that it took time for them to split up. The Vinayas and the Dipavamsa (which is basically just an addendum to the historical material in the Theravada Vinaya) agree that there were different schools and they split up over time, although they disagree about which groups split from which and in what order.

Malcolm wrote:

[/quote]

Why accept any of these accounts as veridical, since they, like the speculations of western scholars, are all contradictory?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 24th, 2014 at 2:25 AM

Title: Re: Historical Buddha

Content:

Bakmoon said:

That's moving the goal posts. I never claimed that it is possible to make a detailed non-speculative layering of the entire canon. You made the claim that all we can know about the Pali Canon is that it dates to about the first century BCE, and everything beyond that is "...[S]peculative conjecture.":

Malcolm wrote:

You have been asserting from the start that some parts of the tripitika are definitely the Buddha's own words and some parts are not.

Bakmoon said:

We can reasonably know a lot about the texts prior to the first century BCE. By comparative analysis, we know that those Suttas which have parallels in the Agamas must date at the very latest to the point which the two transmission diverged.

Malcolm wrote:

No, we cannot really know this. For example, it is possible that at one point or another one group borrowed the terminology for their canon from another group and included different sets of texts. There is no reason to assume a common origin for each canon at all — that is a conjecture, which however reasonable it may seem, cannot be proven.

Bakmoon said:

Since the Theravada, Dharmaguptaka, and Sarvastivadin texts have so much overlap, we must conclude that the common core must date at the very latest to the time before these three schools separated, and that is significantly earlier than 100 BCE.

Malcolm wrote:

I am not sure we can theorize there is a common core, as above. The common theory is that there was the first council, and all Hināyāna sutras were compiled there. In general, one does not dispute this account. However, did this really happen in this way? We simply don't know beyond the assertion that it happened.

Bakmoon said:

The different Vinayas of these three schools disagree about exactly who split from who in what order, but it is quite clear that the point when all three were one was much earlier than 100 BCE.

Malcolm wrote:

Not all, the ordination lineages all sprang from different people, Mulasarvastivada from Rahula, Theravada from Upali, and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 23rd, 2014 at 9:59 PM

Title: Re: Name of the practice associated with the Guhyagarbha Tan

Content:

kirtu said:

There is also a 100-deity practice. I mention it because as I have seen it introduced, the practice is not obviously associated with Shitro (i.e. one could practice it without doing what most people associate with Shitro practices).

Kirt

Bakmoon said:

Could you explain the distinction please? I always thought that Shitro refers to the use of the 100 deities as a body mandala, but from what Malcom said it is also a Deity Yoga practice with the 100 deities as the mandala. What's the difference between Shitro and the 100 deity practice?

Thank you for your time.

Malcolm wrote:

Shitro is not necessarily a body mandala, for example, the Shitro practice connected with the Gongpa Zangthal cycle of teachings. Two mandalas are taught in Guhyagarbha, the peaceful mandala, which is very similar to Guhyasamaja, and a wrathful mandala. They can be practiced together or separately. In the Guhyagarbha major empowerment, they are granted on two separate days and are separate empowerments. In terma systems, they are generally granted on the same day.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 23rd, 2014 at 7:02 AM

Title: Re: Historical Buddha

Content:

Bakmoon said:

the Illiad, and the Odessey...

Malcolm wrote:

are not oral traditions and never were. They are written accounts.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 23rd, 2014 at 6:58 AM

Title: Re: Historical Buddha

Content:

Bakmoon said:

In the early years when the stories and teachings were just passed down through plain speech rather than chanted texts and the Sutras were first being composed, the texts could very well have been open to including new material for a time before becoming set.

Malcolm wrote:

This is conjecture.

Bakmoon said:

At any rate, you still haven't given me how your traditional understanding can give a parsimonious explanation of texts that have been transmitted with significant variances.

Malcolm wrote:

Different students understand different things and repeat them accordingly.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 23rd, 2014 at 5:06 AM

Title: Re: Historical Buddha

Content:

Bakmoon said:

The only reasonable conclusion to draw from this is that a substantial number of such variant Sutras are not different Sutras spoken by the Buddha at different times, but in fact variants of an original Sutra which has undergone editing, either through memory, interpolation, or through expanded explanation (like you mentioned, these began as oral texts, and a distinctive feature of oral texts is that they remain open and flexible to change over time).

Malcolm wrote:

Actually, the reality is that oral transmissions tend to resist change more readily than texts. Case in point, the Vedas.

As for the differences, who is to say that Buddha did not teach this in one way to one group of folks, and another way to another group of folks?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 23rd, 2014 at 5:02 AM

Title: Re: Historical Buddha

Content:

Malcom said:

Or, you can conclude that different groups of monks preserved different sets of sutras, some of which match, and some of which don't. There is no reason, for example, to presume that agamic sutras describing the bardo are not as ancient as other sutras merely because they are not found in the Pali canon — indeed, there is no reason to suppose that Buddha did not teach the antarabhāva merely because the antarabhāva is not well described in the Pali canon. This is merely one example.

Bakmoon said:

I have two point to make in response to this.

Malcolm wrote:

You are objecting to something I am not claiming. My assertion is that you cannot claim that this set of suttas is earlier than some other. I am asserting you cannot layer date these canons successfully.

Bakmoon said:

2) Nowhere have I claimed that the Pali Canon is somehow privileged vis a vis the other early canons. It is merely one of the Canons that has been passed down to today. If something seems to be a later addition into the Pali Canon as demonstrated by comparative analysis with the other early Canons then I personally don't regard it as being Buddhavacana. Similarly I do not automatically reject things only found in the Sutras from the Agamas. Since you brought up the convenient example of the antarabhāva, I might as well mention my take on it.

I have no problem with an antarabhāva. I think that a lot of these kind of distinctions are just about how you write up your definitions, so what one group might call the antarabhāva another might classify as just being part of the life it comes after. A lot of it is semantics. I personally think there is something like an antarabhāva whatever way you want to classify it or call it just from how rebirth is described, near death experiences, etc... I honestly don't know if the Agamas have anything to say on it, but if they do and there is evidence to indicate that it is of sufficient antiquity, then I would be willing to treat the antarabhāva as being buddhavacana.

Malcolm wrote:

When it comes to the Śrāvaka canons, my main point that we have very little reason to reject this part of the canon in favor of that part of the canon [as does daverupa for example] on the basis of some supposed antiquity that we can only conjecture about.

These texts are rooted in oral transmission, as you mention, they were recited by professionals who selected portions of sutra, abhidharma and vinaya to recite. They were written down. We do not have any proof or evidence of when the Agamas were written down Sanskrit for example, but it was definitely post-Ashoka. The unique conditions of the Pali canon meant that it was preserved to modern times in a more or less complete way, and we can clearly identify those parts that were committed to writing in the first century BCE and those parts that were added later. Because of the desolation of Indian Buddhism first by Turks, later by Hindus and Muslims, we have a much less complete record of the canon as it stood, also hampered by the fact that Tibetan Imperial policy decreed that there was little point in further translating Hinayāna texts beyond those sutras that had been translated already --thus the vast majority of Hinayāna material in Sanskrit that was translated into Tibetan is the Mulasarvastivadin Vinaya. China lucked out in so far as much that was translated into Chinese was translated fifth century and earlier, when India was still largely dominated by Buddhists politically.

For example, the Sarvastivadins considered the Abhidharmapitika was something embedded with the Sutra pitika, being the focus of advanced discussions of the Dharma by the Buddha. In this respect, then, Abhidharma was something to be extracted, a basket with a basket, there are other organization schemes as well. Its expression was the treatises attributed to Arhats concerning various topics. In other words, for whatever reason, different sets of vinaya lineages preserved different traditions about the origin, content and authorship of Abhidharma traditions. We have very little evidence apart from similar and dissimilar texts, and we cannot now understand the precise conditions that lead to the various discrepancies we find in origination legends and so on.

People imagine they can nail down Mahāyāna and Vajrayāna too, but this is equally fraught. I have been studying Buddhist texts, both in the western academic tradition for nearly thirty years and as a practitioner of Vajrayāna for 25. I have decided for myself, based on reading many thousands of books and articles that at this point, that the academic tradition in the west about Buddhism (the burgeoning hermeneutic around that so influential on people like David Keightley) largely consists of western academics who spout opinions as unfounded certainties, when in fact their work largely consists of conjectural reconstructions which cannot be grounded in anything anyone truly can regard as factual.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 23rd, 2014 at 2:08 AM

Title: Re: Historical Buddha

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

There were many groups of monks, we cannot assume they did not hold different oral transmissions. This accounts for differences as well as similarities.

Bakmoon said:

Of course they had different oral transmissions. That's the whole basis of comparative methodology. But the point is if you trace the oral transmissions back, they cross and have a common source, and you can conclude that material which is found in several different oral transmissions must be from before the different oral transmissions divided.

Malcolm wrote:

Or, you can conclude that different groups of monks preserved different sets of sutras, some of which match, and some of which don't. There is no reason, for example, to presume that agamic sutras describing the bardo are not as ancient as other sutras merely because they are not found in the Pali canon — indeed, there is no reason to suppose that Buddha did not teach the antarabhāva merely because the antarabhāva is not well described in the Pali canon. This is merely one example.

Bakmoon said:

If you look at the Pali Nikayas and the Chinese Agamas, the similarities are literally undeniable. Just look at how they are organized for example: There is a Digha Nikaya, Majjhima Nikaya, Samyutta Nikaya, and an Anguttara Nikaya, and in the Agamas there is a Dirgha Agama, Madhyama Agama, three Chinese translations of the Samyuktagama, and two translations of the Ekottara Agama. The titles are literally translations of each other.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, of course, but this does not mean that every single text spoken by the Buddha was preserved at the first council. What I am suggesting is that there has always been so called "extra-canonical" teachings, i.e., sutras that for one reason or another were not collated during the first council but which were variously preserved by differing groups of monks in different geographical locations. When emissaries returned from the first council, monks merely added their own traditions their canon and this accounts for differences in the various Sravaka canons. Further, other differences may be accounted for by differences in memory, and so on.

Bakmoon said:

If you actually look inside of them you find that the individual Suttas and Sutras match up in terms of content. I highly urge interested readers to take a look at Suttacentral.net for themselves. They've listed all of the parallels and such that you can see for yourself.

Malcolm wrote:

This is not a point of contention.

Bakmoon said:

One of these is from the Pali Majjhima Nikaya, and the other is from the Chinese translation of the Madhyama Agama. Do you really mean to tell me that it is mere "conjectural speculation" to say that these two texts are almost identical because they stem from a "putative original" text?

Malcolm wrote:

No, what I mean to tell you is that it is entirely conjectural to imagine that the Sutta Nipatta is "early" and that various suttas in the Digha Nikaya are "late", and so on.

Of course, we one can try to conjecture which suttas were taught early in the Buddha's career, and which were taught later in his life, but this is also a difficult thing. A lot of suttas have no location given, and we only have a general idea of where Buddha went and at what time in his career.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 22nd, 2014 at 11:51 PM

Title: Re: Historical Buddha

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

You are missing my general point, there is really no effective way to layer date oral transmissions. We have an event in Buddhist history (as far as the Pali canon is concerned), i.e. it was committed to writing in the first century BCE. We can speculate many things about the written texts we find there, but it is all speculative conjecture. It is not "history".

Bakmoon said:

You have stated the underline portion several times but you have failed to make an argument in favor of it. It is a bare assertion. Can you make an argument to back up this point? Why do the principles of textual analysis not work for oral texts?

Malcolm wrote:

Simply put, there is nothing to which a date may be assigned.

Bakmoon said:

And it was not just the Pali canon that was written down. The Sarvastivadin, Dharmaguptaka, and many other canons survive in large fragments. These schools separated prior to when these were written down, and when we compare these texts, they have material in common. From this we can deduce that the material held in common must date prior to the separation.

Malcolm wrote:

There were many groups of monks, we cannot assume they did not hold different oral transmissions. This accounts for differences as well as similarities.

Bakmoon said:

And there is also internal evidence we can use. Different parts of the Pali canon have different dialectical variants, some of which are very similar to the colloquial speech found in the area of Maghadha, and others with a distinct influence from Sanskrit.

Malcolm wrote:

This only tells us about this body of texts in the 1st century CE, it tells us nothing about a putative "original" canon.

Bakmoon said:

We can see different parts of the Canon with different features, and some texts seem to reference or comment on others. Furthermore, these internal correspondences can be line up with the comparative analysis and we find that the chronologies match. It may not be as certain as digging up manuscripts complete with dates, but we can have reasonable certainty about some of the dating.

Malcolm wrote:

No, we really can't, not beyond conjectural speculation.

Bakmoon said:

Also a matter to consider is to see how the material in the texts matches up with what we know archaeologically from the period. The Nikayas/Agamas give a clear depiction of what life was like back then. It depicts India as being a collection of various states vying for power with one another, a barter economy, and many other such things. Remember that the Buddha passed into Parinirvana at a transitional time in the history of India when things were undergoing great social change. The fact that the texts aren't filled with anachronistic portrayals of daily life also can be used to establish validity. Just because we don't have absolute certainty about absolutely everything we say doesn't mean that the entire thing is baseless speculation. There is such a thing as reasonable inference.

Malcolm wrote:

According to people like Schopen, the texts are filled with anachronisms.

But this all avoids the point I am making, we are really not in a position to say which portion of the body of texts first written down in the first century BCE is older or which is younger. Of course, you can use conjecture, and you can claim it is reasonable, but your reasonable conjecture is easily negated by someone else's reasonable conjecture. If nothing else, the history of Buddhology is nothing more than the story of one reasonable conjecture being negated by another reasonable conjecture.

Your assumption is based on a materialist approach to text criticism. Other [i.e. traditional] historical approaches fully accept that Buddha taught the Vibhanga and so on in toto.

How is it materialism? I gave a carefully presented argument with premises and conclusions as why the Abhidhamma doesn't date back to the time of the Buddha himself, and instead of criticizing the initial premises or finding a flaw in the deduction from them, the response is "Your argument comes from materialism."

The fundamental principle upon which you base your argument is material texts, none of which materially date earlier than the first century BCE, and were all written down at the same time, so you have nothing more and a series of conjectures you have formed which stands in contradiction to the traditionally asserted origin of the texts themselves. If there is a flaw in my initial premises, then let it be pointed out. If there is an error in my deductions from said premises, then let my reasoning be refuted. But if neither the premises nor the deductions are flawed, then my argument ought to be accepted. You have basically claimed that your argument stands solely on inference, what is "reasonable", but those reasonable inferences are also predicated on a series of judgments about Indian history that are themselves conjectures.

And since we are examining the validity of comparative and internal textual analysis, let's examine the validity of these traditional historical approaches. I have explained how comparative and internal textual analysis works and its methodology. What is the methodology of the historical approach you are using?

I accept the traditional accounts as they stand and operate from those sets of premises. The Theravada tradition puts the Abhidhamma back to the time of the Buddha, but I think the Sarvastivadin tradition says it was composed by latter disciples, not the Buddha himself. If your approach is to simply follow a chronology passed down by tradition the issue becomes "Do we follow the Sarvastivadin account, the Theravada account, the Dharmaguptaka account, etc..."

[/quote]

The Abhidharma and the Abhidhamma Pitika cannot be equated. They are separate traditions coming from separate schools.

If you are a Theravadin, you follow the Theravadin account of the origin of Abhidhamma, if not then not. It is really quite straight forward and involves no conjecture at all.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 22nd, 2014 at 9:47 PM

Title: Re: Historical Buddha

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

You are making a fundamental error that most people grounded in TEXT make, i.e, assuming that we can analyze what were orally transmitted teachings that were organized before they were written down into bodies of knowledge as if they were TEXTS.

Bakmoon said:

First of all, just because something is transmitted orally doesn't mean that it is not a text. It's just an oral text rather than a written text. It's a strange use of terminology for most people, but especially in India which has a long tradition oral memorized transmission they work very much like written texts.

Can you back up your claim that orally transmitted texts cannot be analyzed? The principles of textual analysis are rather basic postulates such as "If two textual transmissions have material in common, it is most likely derived either from a common source" or "If text A is commenting on text B, then B is older and A is younger". Sure, they are used most often in written texts, but can you demonstrate that there is a fundamental difference between oral texts and written texts that renders this inapplicable? You have asserted this claim and done nothing to back it up.

Malcolm wrote:

You are missing my general point, there is really no effective way to layer date oral transmissions. We have an event in Buddhist history (as far as the Pali canon is concerned), i.e. it was committed to writing in the first century BCE. We can speculate many things about the written texts we find there, but it is all speculative conjecture. It is not "history".

Bakmoon said:

The underlined part doesn't make sense to me. It is true that the Vibhanga and its analogues is based on the Suttas taught by the Buddha combined with explanations and definitions, but that just means that the Vibhanga and its analogues is based on what the Buddha said. It doesn't mean that the Vibhanga and its analogues were spoken by the Buddha, much less the entire Abhidhamma pitika.

Malcolm wrote:

Your assumption is based on a materialist approach to text criticism. Other [i.e. traditional] historical approaches fully accept that Buddha taught the Vibhanga and so on in toto.

Bakmoon said:

That's an argument from silence.

Malcolm wrote:

No, it is clearly described in the canon that there are three pitikas, not merely two. But according to the modern approach, the third pitika does not exist.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 22nd, 2014 at 8:27 PM

Title: Re: Historical Buddha

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Let me ask you, do you think Abhidhamma was taught by the Buddha. If not, why?

Bakmoon said:

Do I believe that the Abhidhamma Pitika was spoken by the Buddha? No. The clearest reason for this lies in comparative analysis of the different early canons. There are large differences in content in the canonical Abhidharmic literature of the various early schools. If you look to the portions that actually do match up with one another you find that much of the material in the Vibhanga and its analogues is held in common between the different traditions, and that material is simply a collection of several of the more comprehensive suttas from the Nikayas and Agamas fleshed out with more stock passages, lists of synonyms, and definitions.

As you get further away from this common core material in Abhidharmic literature, the level of textual differences increase between the different versions in different canons. The common sense explanation for this is that the Vibhanga and its analogues are earlier than the other material in the Abhidhamma. And also, if the earliest material is simply a modification of already existing Suttas, it stands to reason that it was composed after these Suttas. From plain common sense, it seems that the Abhidharmic literature developed over time as a systematization and a refinement of earlier material, so no, I don't think it goes back to the Buddha himself.

Malcolm wrote:

You are making a fundamental error that most people grounded in TEXT make, i.e, assuming that we can analyze what were orally transmitted teachings that were organized before they were written down into bodies of knowledge as if they were TEXTS.

The second thing that is telling is that you reject the account of the origin of ABHIDHAMMA because its origin legend (i.e. Buddha taught to the devas and summarized it for Śāruputra) is not shared with Saravastivadins and so on, who have a very different Abhidharma tradition. This rejection is grounded on a tradition of materialist text criticism that originates with Baruch Spinoza, more or less, which generally rejects all so called "supernatural" accounts.

Moreover, you contradict yourself here: "if the earliest material is simply a modification of already existing Suttas" and "I don't think it goes back to the Buddha himself".

Even if Abhidhamma is a compendium of passages from sutta, an interpretive scheme, if you hold those suttas were taught by the Buddha, then Abhidhamma goes back to the Buddha. And further, there is no reason to imagine that Buddha did not himself indicate what sort of interpretive scheme should be applied since we have a clear tradition that Buddha taught three pitikas, not merely two.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 22nd, 2014 at 5:09 AM

Title: Re: Historical Buddha

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, I simply operate with a different understanding of history than what is accepted by people like daverupa, who basically default to a western materialist read of history.

Bakmoon said:

How is it materialism to use comparative and internal analysis to date texts? I think a lot of it is plain common sense.

Malcolm wrote:

Let me ask you, do you think Abhidhamma was taught by the Buddha. If not, why?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 22nd, 2014 at 4:40 AM

Title: Re: Historical Buddha

Content:

Bakmoon said:

Since both Daverupa and I accept historical methodology,

Malcolm wrote:

I also accept historical methodology, it just happens to be a different history and a different method.

Bakmoon said:

I'm sorry, I think I phrased that rather sloppily. I didn't mean to imply that you reject historical methodology. By historical methodology there I meant the use of comparative and internal textual analysis to date texts.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, I simply operate with a different understanding of history than what is accepted by people like daverupa, who basically default to a western materialist read of history.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 22nd, 2014 at 3:47 AM

Title: Re: Historical Buddha

Content:

Bakmoon said:

Do you mean to say that according to Tantra, it is wrong to learn Sutra as the basis of one's understanding because it is complete? I always thought that in those schools which teach that Tantra has a distinct view that it is a modification and an expansion of the teachings of Sutra, not a simple rejection and replacement.

Malcolm wrote:

It is not wrong to learn sutra, but since each Vajrayāna system is complete within itself, a practitioner does not necessarily need to become expert in the MMK, Cittamatra, Abhidharma and so on.

Someone who plans to be a teacher on the other hand needs to learn all these things.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 22nd, 2014 at 3:44 AM

Title: Re: Historical Buddha

Content:

Bakmoon said:

Since both Daverupa and I accept historical methodology,

Malcolm wrote:

I also accept historical methodology, it just happens to be a different history and a different method.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 22nd, 2014 at 2:38 AM

Title: Re: Historical Buddha

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

How is it different from the Theravadins who pray the to four kings and so on for protection?

Berry said:

Do they ? Which prayer is that, then ?

Malcolm wrote:

<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/dn/dn.32.0.piya.html>

Berry said:

In fact, asking someone to protect you is not necessarily theistic.

Mmm, maybe not if one asks another human being for protection from an angry husband - but its theistic if you're asking an invisible deity.

Malcolm wrote:

Then even Theravada is theistic:

<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/dn/dn.32.0.piya.html>

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 22nd, 2014 at 1:43 AM

Title: Re: Historical Buddha

Content:

Bakmoon said:

But Mahayana Buddhism treats the Buddhas and Bodhisattvas very differently than how a theist thinks about God

Berry said:

As far as I'm aware, there are Mahayana Buddhists who pray to deities, Buddha's & Bodhisattvas to protect them & look upon them favorably in times of difficulty. How is this different to the prayers of a theist ?

Malcolm wrote:

How is it different from the Theravadins who pray the to four kings and so on for protection?

In fact, asking someone to protect you is not necessarily theistic.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 22nd, 2014 at 1:42 AM

Title: Re: Historical Buddha

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The Śravaka canon is not the standard by which Mahāyāna is to be judged, if anything, it is actually quite the opposite. Those teachings in the Śravaka canon which are contradicted by the Buddha in Mahāyāna are to be set aside.

Bakmoon said:

That's only true for someone who has already accepted the validity of the Mahayana scriptures. For someone who has not yet accepted their validity and is still examining them such an argument is a bare assertion.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, as is accepting Buddhadharma in general as valid compared with say the claims of Islam.

Bakmoon said:

Just because something is incomplete doesn't mean that it can't be used as a standard of teaching and interpretation. In Vajrayana the Sutra path in general is seen as being an incomplete system for the attainment of Buddhahood as well. What would the response be if someone came into a shedra and refused to study the Bodhicharyavatara or any of the other Sutra level Shastras claiming that it is wrong to take Sutric texts as the basis of understanding because Sutra is incomplete? I have the sense it wouldn't go over well.

Malcolm wrote:

They would tell you you are in the wrong place, not that your assertion is necessarily false. Shedras are for training teachers, they are not places where everyone must go. If you are a teacher, you must have a broad understanding. If you are a tantric practitioner you only need to understand the system you are practicing.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, September 21st, 2014 at 11:17 PM

Title: Re: Historical Buddha

Content:

daverupa said:

So, this is what I mean, Bakmoon. Do you see the difference?

Malcolm wrote:

Different history, different facts.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, September 21st, 2014 at 8:26 PM

Title: Re: Historical Buddha

Content:

Bakmoon said:

I already mentioned this in my first post, but I think it really is a good example so I'll use it again. I think that the Prajnaparamita Sutras and the Madhyamaka Shastras are very much in accordance with the early scriptures. They don't contradict any doctrines of the Nikayas/Agamas and they fit very nicely with the underlying worldview of the scriptures.

Malcolm wrote:

The Śravaka canon is not the standard by which Mahāyāna is to be judged, if anything, it is actually quite the opposite. Those teachings in the Śravaka canon which are contradicted by the Buddha in Mahāyāna are to be set aside.

Otherwise, as Nāgārjuna notes in the Ratnavali, the Śravaka canon is incomplete and one cannot realize buddhahood through following its teachings since there is no presentation of the bodhisattva path, two-fold emptiness and so on.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, September 21st, 2014 at 8:19 AM

Title: Re: Name of the practice associated with the Guhyagarbha Tan

Content:

Bakmoon said:

What is the name of the practice associated with the Guhyagarbha Tantra? For example, the Chakrasamvara Tantra is associated Chakrasamvara, the Hevajra Tantra is associated with Hevajra, so what is the practice that goes with the Guhyabarbha Tantra? I know that Zhitro is based on the same Mandala but I sort of have the impression that Zhitro is a body mandala rather than a self generation practice? Or does the Guyhagarbha Tantra not have a self generation deity yoga practice associated with it?

Malcolm wrote:

Zhitro.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 20th, 2014 at 6:22 AM

Title: Re: Is Tibetan Buddhism world-denying?

Content:

Jikan said:

So, what do you think? Fair assessment or no?

Malcolm wrote:

Utterly clueless when it comes to Tibetan Buddhism...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 18th, 2014 at 10:27 PM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Sorry, as I said, I have followed a well-planned, nutritionally balanced vegetarian diet (for years), and it is not good for my health. I just happen to be one of those persons who need some amount of animal protein my diet.

gad rgyangs said:

<http://www.ncbi.nlm.nih.gov/pubmed/19562864>

It is the position of the American Dietetic Association that appropriately planned vegetarian diets, including total vegetarian or vegan diets, are healthful, nutritionally adequate, and may provide health benefits in the prevention and treatment of certain diseases. Well-planned vegetarian diets are appropriate for individuals during all stages of the life cycle, including pregnancy, lactation, infancy, childhood, and adolescence, and for athletes. A vegetarian diet is defined as one that does not include meat (including fowl) or seafood, or products containing those foods. This article reviews the current data related to key nutrients for vegetarians including protein, n-3 fatty acids, iron, zinc, iodine, calcium, and vitamins D and B-12. A vegetarian diet can meet current recommendations for all of these nutrients. In some cases, supplements or fortified foods can provide useful amounts of important nutrients. An evidence-based review showed that vegetarian diets can be nutritionally adequate in pregnancy and result in positive maternal and infant health outcomes. The results of an evidence-based review showed that a vegetarian diet is associated with a lower risk of death from ischemic heart disease. Vegetarians also appear to have lower low-density lipoprotein cholesterol levels, lower blood pressure, and lower rates of hypertension and type 2 diabetes than nonvegetarians. Furthermore, vegetarians tend to have a lower body mass index and lower overall cancer rates. Features of a vegetarian diet that may reduce risk of chronic disease include lower intakes of saturated fat and cholesterol and higher intakes of fruits, vegetables, whole grains, nuts, soy products, fiber, and phytochemicals. The variability of dietary practices among vegetarians makes individual assessment of dietary adequacy essential. In addition to assessing dietary adequacy, food and nutrition professionals can also play key roles in educating vegetarians about sources of specific nutrients, food purchase and preparation, and dietary modifications to meet their needs.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 18th, 2014 at 3:40 AM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

if you eat meat as a regular part of your diet, it might be a good exercise to ask yourself why.

Malcolm wrote:

Because I become ill if I don't, having tried to to refrain from eating meat countless times, including eating a so called "balanced" vegetarian diet, I simple get ill. I am more susceptible to infections, colds, etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 13th, 2014 at 2:41 AM

Title: Re: Dudjom Lineage Rigdzin Dupa: First English Translation

Content:

miranda said:

@ Pema Tsultrim

I am based in France, and would like to order a copy of the Dudjom RD , for which I received wang and lung from Tulku Teglo. I send several mail on your website with no answer. I suggest to add 20$ for the shipping charge (which is usually around 15$) please let me know if it is ok for you and I shall send the 40$ as donation on your website.

Waiting to read from you soon, PM or here...

Jean-Marc B

Tsultrim T. said:

Jean-Marc,

If you dont hear anything soon let me know and I might be able to arrange for a copy to be sent to you.

Malcolm wrote:

I also paid for a copy, but no copy was forthcoming...anyway, it is not a big deal.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 12th, 2014 at 1:55 AM

Title: Re: Turning water into wine(Chogyam Trungpa)

Content:

boda said:

But I do know the role of the guru.

Malcolm wrote:

Well please explain it to us then, so we can see where you are coming from, shel.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 12th, 2014 at 12:22 AM

Title: Re: Bodhisattva's remorse

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

Any practice we engage in has to be premised on spontaneity, and not based in feelings/thoughts of hope and fear.

Malcolm wrote:

Any practice we do should be based on the motivation of attaining awakening for the benefit of others. Only Buddhas truly act spontaneously, we are not capable of that.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 11th, 2014 at 11:43 PM

Title: Re: Turning water into wine(Chogyam Trungpa)

Content:

Motova said:

Alcohol and sex is trumped by picking a successor who spread aids around the sangha and raped a person. Why would a realized person pick someone as number two who would do such things? Speaking as someone who is totally new to Buddhism and Tibetan Buddhism, after reading about number two I totally avoid any of Chogyam Trungpa's material because I have zero confidence in who he was.

Malcolm wrote:

CTR is not responsible for Thomas Rich's actions.

Motova said:

He is responsible for putting a severely deranged person in a seat of authority who was capable of many gross actions. If you don't have any ability to stop this, then you shouldn't be put on a throne and be called a guru. If he was supposedly enlightened enough to frak, drink alcohol, and snort coke without any attachment then you'd think he'd be able to appoint a virtuous regent. Number two is where it all comes down to; it's the highlight of his dharma career. If Thomas Rich was his best student, then that says a lot about CTR's abilities and teachings.

Malcolm wrote:

Dylan, it is a long complex story. What matters is this:

According to Diana Mukpo, wife and widow of Trungpa, he ultimately became disillusioned with Tendzin as his heir, and during his final illness he called Tendzin "terrible" and "dreadful", and indicated that he would have gotten rid of Tendzin had he a suitable candidate with which to replace him.[24] Rick Fields, the editor of Vajradhatu's publication the Vajradhatu Sun, wrote that he resigned from his editorial position after Ösel Tendzin and the Board of Directors stopped him from publishing news of the events.

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/\" onclick=\"window.open\(this.href\);return false;\" data-bbox="114 259 730 292">Ösel_Tendzin

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 11th, 2014 at 9:02 PM

Title: Re: Turning water into wine(Chogyam Trungpa)

Content:

Motova said:

Alcohol and sex is trumped by picking a successor who spread aids around the sangha and raped a person. Why would a realized person pick someone as number two who would do such things? Speaking as someone who is totally new to Buddhism and Tibetan Buddhism, after reading about number two I totally avoid any of Chogyam Trungpa's material because I have zero confidence in who he was.

Malcolm wrote:

CTR is not responsible for Thomas Rich's actions.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 11th, 2014 at 8:40 PM

Title: Re: Turning water into wine(Chogyam Trungpa)

Content:

TRC said:

Well my response would remain the same regardless of who made the claims.

Malcolm wrote:

I think we already established the Vajrayāna is not your cup of tea.

TRC said:

What has that got to do with it?

Malcolm wrote:

Everything.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 11th, 2014 at 8:27 PM

Title: Re: Turning water into wine(Chogyam Trungpa)

Content:

boda said:

You are not following Mr. Dangerous. Alcoholism is not necessarily a moral issue. It is classified as a disease.

The question is not about morality but consensus. Is there a consensus among Buddhist practitioners that a realized person may be an alcoholic? I will venture to guess that there is not. How about you?

Malcolm wrote:

There is a consensus among Vajrayāna practitioners that mere appearances, alcoholism included, may not bear any relation to a person's actual realization. We don't really care what other Buddhists might think. Given that this is the case, there is really no common basis for a discussion.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 11th, 2014 at 9:49 AM

Title: Re: Turning water into wine(Chogyam Trungpa)

Content:

TRC said:

Well my response would remain the same regardless of who made the claims.

Malcolm wrote:

I think we already established the Vajrayāna is not your cup of tea.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 11th, 2014 at 9:37 AM

Title: Re: Turning water into wine(Chogyam Trungpa)

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Whether or not all his interactions with people were positive is hardly the point. He was a realized person. He cannot be judged on the same standard as everyone else.

TRC said:

Well I happen to think he can. And in fact I'm going to set a higher standard of judgment if he claimed to be realised.

Malcolm wrote:

He, as far as I know, never made any such claim at all. But other high Lamas such as Dudjom Rinpoche, Dilgo Khyentse, and so on have made such claims on his behalf.

Then of course there is Drugpa Kunley, Do Khyentse, etc., many Tibetan masters that would hardly externally match your standards of moral conduct for that matter Virupa, Tilopa, Padmasambhava and so on also wouldn't.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 11th, 2014 at 9:31 AM

Title: Re: Turning water into wine(Chogyam Trungpa)

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The perhaps the dissonance belongs to you, and not to them. Have you bothered to consider this?

TRC said:

I have no dissonance about Trungpa, that's the point. I don't need to reconcile the paradoxes that exist which others seem to need to. He gave some profoundly deep teachings, which had good results in certain circumstances. His addictions and proclivities led to less than good results in other circumstances. I can accept both dimensions without having to shoehorn it all into being a skilful teaching method, and that all his outcomes were positive - as they clearly weren't. It's others that need to do that.

Malcolm wrote:

Whether or not all his interactions with people were positive is hardly the point. He was a realized person. He cannot be judged on the same standard as everyone else.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 11th, 2014 at 9:29 AM

Title: Re: Turning water into wine(Chogyam Trungpa)

Content:

boda said:

A requisite of giving up is having first tried.

Malcolm wrote:

What you seem to be looking for is a quote by CTR along the lines of "I use womanizing and drinking as Dharma methods..."

Of course, you will not find such a quote. But you can certainly find many statements by him which indicate that like his teacher, Khenpo Gangshar, he was interested in pushing his students beyond their limitations. For example, we know that Khenpo Gangshar actively encouraged monks and nuns to leave retreat, have sex, and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 11th, 2014 at 9:03 AM

Title: Re: Turning water into wine(Chogyam Trungpa)

Content:

boda said:

then why did he never say so himself?

Malcolm wrote:

He did say so himself, many times, just read any of his discourses on the role of the guru.

boda said:

Trust on this level means one cannot maintain one's ego. One cannot maintain one's basic existence as "myself." This self has become completely dedicated, it has completely opened up in surrendering to the world created by the guru. The world that the guru creates is not particularly a pleasant one. It might be very unpleasant, horrific. It might also be beautiful at the same time. The reason the world created by the guru tends to be an irritating one is that the guru goes beyond the role of spiritual friend at this point and begins to act as a dictator. He minds your business completely; he minds every inch of your life. Your guru has the ability to do such a thing, because he knows every inch of your life, of your state of consciousness. He knows the tiniest fragments of your subconscious gossip, he knows all the little freckles in your mental functions. The guru has a complete understanding of all this. Therefore you are highly exposed, fully exposed. For this reason, the tantric tradition is considered very dangerous. The traditional format is that you can either make love to your guru as a divine being or kill him. The analogy is that of a snake in a bamboo tube. When you put a snake in a bamboo tube, the snake has to face either up or down. Relating with the guru is very powerful, too powerful. It is too much having somebody mind your business in that fashion. From that point of view, it is extremely

Malcolm wrote:

Trungpa, Chogyam (2010-09-28). The Lion's Roar: An Introduction to Tantra (Dharma Ocean Series) (Kindle Locations 930-940). Shambhala Publications. Kindle Edition.

boda said:

Maybe I need reading glasses but I don't see where it says he used his drinking or womanizing as a teaching method.

Malcolm wrote:

I give up.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 11th, 2014 at 9:02 AM

Title: Re: Turning water into wine(Chogyam Trungpa)

Content:

boda said:

People do a lot of things for reasons other than teaching, and with no methodology whatsoever.

TRC said:

Yes this is the point that people get confused about. Because they can't reconcile the paradox of Trungpa's more profound teachings with his obvious fallibility and (self-) destructive behaviour, they prefer to characterise this behaviour as a skilful and premeditated teaching method, to help ameliorate their dissonance.

Malcolm wrote:

The perhaps the dissonance belongs to you, and not to them. Have you bothered to consider this?

TRC said:

Obviously Trungpa was suffering. His alcohol addiction was an overt manifestation of craving/clinging, which is of course the immediate cause of suffering.

Malcolm wrote:

He would never have denied that he was an ordinary, suffering person:

The guru is immediate. For one thing, he is a human being like yourself. He has to eat food and wear clothes like you do, so it's a direct relationship. And the fact that the guru has basic human survival needs makes the situation more threatening. Do you see what I mean? It is more threatening because you can't dismiss the guru as being outside of our thing, someone who can survive without our human trips. The guru does thrive on human trips. If we need food, the guru also needs food. If we need a love affair, the guru also needs a love affair. A guru is an ordinary human being, but still powerful. We begin to feel personally undetermined, because the guru minds our trips too closely and too hard.

Trungpa, Chogyam (2010-09-28). The Lion's Roar: An Introduction to Tantra (Dharma Ocean Series) (Kindle Locations 3136-3140). Shambhala Publications. Kindle Edition.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 11th, 2014 at 7:38 AM

Title: Re: Turning water into wine(Chogyam Trungpa)

Content:

boda said:

then why did he never say so himself?

Malcolm wrote:

He did say so himself, many times, just read any of his discourses on the role of the guru.

boda said:

Trust on this level means one cannot maintain one's ego. One cannot maintain one's basic existence as "myself." This self has become completely dedicated, it has completely opened up in surrendering to the world created by the guru. The world that the guru creates is not particularly a pleasant one. It might be very unpleasant, horrific.

It might also be beautiful at the same time. The reason the world created by the guru tends to be an irritating one is that the guru goes beyond the role of spiritual friend at this point and begins to act as a dictator. He minds your business completely; he minds every inch of your life. Your guru has the ability to do such a thing, because he knows every inch of your life, of your state of consciousness. He knows the tiniest fragments of your subconscious gossip, he knows all the little freckles in your mental functions. The guru has a complete understanding of all this. Therefore you are highly exposed, fully exposed. For this reason, the tantric tradition is considered very dangerous. The traditional format is that you can either make love to your guru as a divine being or kill him. The analogy is that of a snake in a bamboo tube. When you put a snake in a bamboo tube, the snake has to face either up or down. Relating with the guru is very powerful, too powerful. It is too much having somebody mind your business in that fashion. From that point of view, it is extremely

Malcolm wrote:

Trungpa, Chogyam (2010-09-28). The Lion's Roar: An Introduction to Tantra (Dharma Ocean Series) (Kindle Locations 930-940). Shambhala Publications. Kindle Edition.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 11th, 2014 at 6:48 AM

Title: Re: Turning water into wine(Chogyam Trungpa)

Content:

boda said:

You're answering a different question, Malcolm, which is your prerogative.

I asked how you knew that it was a "teaching method." If you know what a teaching method is, and you know that Chogyam Trungpa used alcoholism and womanizing as a teaching method, explain how you know this. Or you can answer a different question if that's easier for you.

Malcolm wrote:

I explained this to you — I know many, many of his direct students. He would often times use sexual situations as a teaching method, as well as alcohol. He even used LSD etc.

Trungpa used any method he could to reach people who were hard to reach. He also used these to create situations so that people could go beyond their limitations, which after all is the job of a real teacher of Dzogchen and Mahamudra.

For example, sometimes he would randomly have his driver pull into a stranger's driveway, and have the student get out and knock on the door, he did many things like this all the time. He would burst into people's rooms in the middle of the night at his seminars, and if you were sleeping alone, without a partner, he would demand to know why and then fix you up with someone.

In any case, it hardly matters now what he did. He has passed on, and a teacher like him will not be seen again for a long while.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 11th, 2014 at 6:46 AM

Title: Re: Turning water into wine(Chogyam Trungpa)

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The quality of a tree should be known by its fruit, not buy the appearance of its bark.

TRC said:

Perhaps the quality of a tree should be known by all its characteristics, not just the ones we have a preference for.

Malcolm wrote:

I don't know about you, but when I eat fruit, I don't care much about the appearance of the tree as long as the fruit tastes good.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 11th, 2014 at 5:38 AM

Title: Re: Turning water into wine(Chogyam Trungpa)

Content:

boda said:

What do you mean in saying that Trungpa "uses the methods he does"? Are you suggesting that his drinking and womanizing was a method in his teaching?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, most definitely.

boda said:

How do you know? Please explain yourself, if, you can.

Malcolm wrote:

I know because I know many of his students. For them, his womanizing and drinking helped them go beyond the limitations of spiritual materialism and concretely understand the meaning of Dharma. His students are some of the best Dharma practitioners there are in Tibetan Buddhism. A great many of them have a concrete understanding of Dzogchen and Mahamudra.

The quality of a tree should be known by its fruit, not buy the appearance of its bark.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 11th, 2014 at 4:59 AM

Title: Re: Turning water into wine(Chogyam Trungpa)

Content:

boda said:

What do you mean in saying that Trungpa "uses the methods he does"? Are you suggesting that his drinking and womanizing was a method in his teaching?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, most definitely.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 11th, 2014 at 4:56 AM

Title: Re: Turning water into wine(Chogyam Trungpa)

Content:

boda said:

In my experience there is not even a consensus on what "the Buddhist Dharma produces,"

Malcolm wrote:

Of course there is such a consensus — Buddhadharma, practiced properly, leads to the reduction and elimination of afflictions which cause birth in samsara, i.e. freedom.

In Mahāyāna, one can also traverse the path to omniscience.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 11th, 2014 at 4:09 AM

Title: Re: Inequality

Content:

Jikan said:

Further, we should avoid rejoicing in the works and accomplishments of those who make their business on the ten nonvirtues

Malcolm wrote:

I guess we start with Hollywood then...

Sherab Dorje said:

Or ourselves.

Malcolm wrote:

Is there an echo in here...?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 11th, 2014 at 2:40 AM

Title: Re: Inequality

Content:

Jikan said:

Further, we should avoid rejoicing in the works and accomplishments of those who make their business on the ten nonvirtues

Malcolm wrote:

I guess we start with Hollywood then...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 10th, 2014 at 9:35 PM

Title: Re: Inequality

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

In order for the world to be a pure land, we do not have to do anything except realize it as such. But there is no way to create an outer material utopia.

Sherab Dorje said:

I do not think that ending starvation and malnutrition is utopian in the slightest. We have ample resources to do so. Utopian would be to believe that every single person on this globe can live an American middle class lifestyle. This is just not going to happen. Anyway, I did not talk about a utopian situation, I specifically stated "somewhat better". Ending starvation and malnutrition (something that is 100% possible) will make the world "somewhat better". If you really want to create such a place, then you have to convince every person to strictly avoid the ten nonvirtues. Since you cannot force others to avoid the ten nonvirtues, all you can do is start with yourself. You won't see me disagreeing.

Malcolm wrote:

Greg, there are a number of obstacles to this happening: 7 billion in fact.

There is no way to effect such an outcome without establishing a command economy, and we know where that leads:

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 10th, 2014 at 9:14 PM

Title: Re: Inequality

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

We make this world, not God, not chance, not fate. We make it, through our actions.

We can make it somewhat better, we can make it somewhat worse or we can transform it into a Pure Land. It is 100% up to us.

Malcolm wrote:

In order for the world to be a pure land, we do not have to do anything except realize it as such. But there is no way to create an outer material utopia.

If you really want to create such a place, then you have to convince every person to strictly avoid the ten nonvirtues. Since you cannot force others to avoid the ten nonvirtues, all you can do is start with yourself.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 10th, 2014 at 9:09 PM

Title: Re: time for a long sleep.

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Don't waste this precious human birth now that you met the Dharma.

Jesse said:

Often times it doesn't feel very precious, more like a curse, after a curse after a curse.. That's how depression is though.

Malcolm wrote:

It is the most precious possession you have, not easily gained, and easily lost. Use it well.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 10th, 2014 at 11:11 AM

Title: Re: time for a long sleep.

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Don't waste this precious human birth now that you met the Dharma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 10th, 2014 at 4:46 AM

Title: Re: Vinaya schools & Precept Schools

Content:

Christopherxx said:

Thanks Malcolm

I know you are really knowledgeable about dzogchen and probably the other traditions within vajrayana.

Do these vehicles/traditions ordain under the vinaya of their regions or do they have precepts or vows or?

You mentioned two systems of commitments

I am guessing the two sets of bodhisattva vows are the brahma net sutra and the asanga set?

Malcolm wrote:

No, the Bhramajala sutra system is largely the as Asanga's and it does not exist in Tibet.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 10th, 2014 at 4:27 AM

Title: Re: Vinaya schools & Precept Schools

Content:

Christopherxx said:

From what I have been able to gather the Tibetan monks ordain under and follow a version of the vinaya.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, the Mulasarvastivada vinaya.

Christopherxx said:

Chinese monks (Although I am not sure which schools) ordain under and follow the vinaya. If someone could fill us in on which Chinese schools that would be cool.

Malcolm wrote:

Dharmaguptaka.

There are two traditions of bodhisattva vows followed in Tibet, Madhyamaka and Yogacara.

There are also two general systems of tantric commitments as well.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 9th, 2014 at 11:34 PM

Title: Re: Historical Buddha

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

To tell you the truth, personal preferences are based on habit, which is based on karma anyway, which ultimately arises from ignorance, so...

Malcolm wrote:

Only negative karma arises from ignorance.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 9th, 2014 at 11:12 PM

Title: Re: Historical Buddha

Content:

daverupa said:

I must have been confused.

Malcolm wrote:

People who follow Wiki to the exclusion of other sources usually are.

daverupa said:

So actually, I accept your term "historical", but the scare quotes must be included.

Malcolm wrote:

Padmasambhava was a historical person.

His name appears in the colophon of many texts in the collection of ancient tantras.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 9th, 2014 at 8:50 PM

Title: Re: Historical Buddha

Content:

Indrajala said:

There's more to life than religious pursuits.

Malcolm wrote:

Now that you are no longer a bhikṣu, indeed. But for a bhikṣu, there is nothing beyond religious pursuits.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 9th, 2014 at 8:46 PM

Title: Re: Historical Buddha

Content:

daverupa said:

The historical Buddha is a communal fact (else e.g. the Etruscans are apparently just a hypothesis, since all ancient history is just speculation, at that point). It is the historical guy.

Malcolm wrote:

So is Guru Rinpoche (a communal fact), just not in your community. He is also a "historical" guy, a Buddha, etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 9th, 2014 at 8:43 PM

Title: Re: Historical Buddha

Content:

Mkoll said:

Kamma is intentional action

(<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/an/an06/an06.063.than.html#part-5>:

"Intention, I tell you, is kamma. Intending, one does kamma by way of body, speech, & intellect."). You could have chosen to follow Zen or Chan Buddhism. You could have waited until you found a Theravada or Nyingma teacher. You could have even chosen to not find a Buddhist sect at all. But you didn't. You made a series of choices and acted (intentional actions) on them and that led to you following Kagyu.

What you've written so far here gives me the impression of being overly deterministic.

Malcolm wrote:

He means karma-vipāka, and it is not overly deterministic — if he had the karma to follow Theravada, etc., he would have met them first, etc. It's about connections, tendrel.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 9th, 2014 at 7:27 AM

Title: Re: Difference between Sakya & Gelug Vajrayogini

Content:

Wayne Verrill said:

I apologize for the long delay in responding to the last post under this topic, but the matter has just come to my attention. The actual title of Sonam Tsemo's book appears on Volume 3, page 146, line 3 in the Sa-skya bKa'-'bum edition and on Volume 1, page 574, line 3 of the Lam-'bras Tshogs-bshad edition. The translation of this section is in the Epilogue on page 531. The actual Tibetan term is rnal-'byor mig, which literally translates as Yoga Eye. The fact that this is the title is confirmed by many commentators who refer to the root text by this name. Since Yoga Eye is a bit awkward in English, I took the liberty of changing it to Yogini's Eye, justified on the basis of the Hevajra Tantra being identified as a Yogini Tantra (see pages 290-297 in the translation). This issue was actually referred to on page 5 of the Translator's Introduction. .

Malcolm wrote:

It's "eye of yoga" as the Tibetan bears out, and it is not the common title of the text, rgyud sde spyi nram is the common title. The full title of course is rgyud sde spyi'i nram par gzahag pa bzhugs so.

The line in question says "rgyud sde spyi'i rnam par gzhag pa rnal 'byor mig", i.e. " The General Presentation of the Divisions of Tantra is the eye of yoga...", etc.

So I have to disagree with your contention that "Eye of Yoga" is the title in that line, rather, it is a descriptive of what the text is supposed to do, i.e. provide an eye on yoga.

Further, Jetsun Dragpa Gyaltsen refers to this text simply by the name rgyud sde spyi'i rnam par gzhag pa in the the rgyud sde spyi'i rnam par gzhag pa dang rgyud kyi mngon par rtogs pa'i stong thun sa bcad.

The Hevajra Tantra is not merely an Yogini Tantra, it is also a yogatantra, for this reason Loppon Rinpoche explains that Hevajra is non-dual tantra based on this passage from Vajrapañjara:

The Hevajra yogatantra was explained by the Victor first.

Later the yoginītantra similarly is for the conversion of women.

Loppon Rinpoche adds:

True, it may be called “dākinītantra”. That does not contradict a nondual method and discriminating wisdom tantra because discriminating wisdom tantra is necessary in nondual tantra.

When Lowo Khenchen [rgyud sde spyi rnam gsal byed sogs, pg. 18], defines the reason for the name rgyud sde spyi'i rnam par gzhag pa, he states, " Loppon Sonam Tsemo's composition has four synonyms: 1) The tantra division 2) the general presentation 3) an introduction to all tantras 4) the eye of yoga."

However, that does not justify "the yogini's eye" as a title. In fact, the formal title given in the colophon is actually, The General Presentation of the Tantra Divisions, an Introduction to all Tantras.

If you were to retitle the book, The Eye of Yoga would be a better choice, in my opinion.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 9th, 2014 at 6:16 AM

Title: Re: Historical Buddha

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Academics don't take practicing Buddhists seriously, especially Tibetan Buddhists.

dharmagoat said:

Understandable really. Devotion and objectivity are poles apart.

Malcolm wrote:

The real problem is that non-practicing academics do not really understand the meaning of Dharma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 9th, 2014 at 4:42 AM

Title: Re: Historical Buddha

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

Which is why I (a non-academic) asked daverupa this question back on page 2.....is valid and interesting, especially for those that emphasise the practice of Dharma, rather than its scholastic study. I would be interested in knowing how you reconcile the two poles of scholarship and practice, when they come to the point of conflicting. ...and never got an answer. Anybody else supporting an academic standpoint can also feel free to answer.

Malcolm wrote:

Academics don't take practicing Buddhists seriously, especially Tibetan Buddhists.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 9th, 2014 at 4:37 AM

Title: Re: Tantric and late Indian Buddhist philosophy

Content:

Mother's Lap said:

Sorry, I couldn't remember if it was your translation or not.

Malcolm wrote:

It's good to keep track of these things.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 9th, 2014 at 4:14 AM

Title: Re: Tantric and late Indian Buddhist philosophy

Content:

Mother's Lap said:

Rongzompa:

Now then, in the sravaka system, phenomena do not have the nature of a self. Since is also asserted there is no identity existing in any phenomena, all phenomena are established to be empty and without self, but nevertheless since [all phenomena] are asserted as the nature of subject and object, the category "natureless" is not understood.

Since in the yogacāra system the nature of subject and object are not asserted, the natureless is established; at that time there is no difference between naturelessness and emptiness and selflessness. Nevertheless, since they assert the dependent, arising from cause and conditions, the category of “established as non-arising” is not understood.

Since in the madhyamaka system the ultimate is understood as free from proliferation, non-arising is established. At that time there is no difference between non-arising, naturelessness, [67/b] emptiness and selflessness. Nevertheless, since they assert a true relative truth, the category of “established as homogenous” is not understood.

Since in the system of secret mantra asserts the two truths to be inseparable, homogeneity is established. At that time there is no difference between homogeneity, non-arising, naturelessness, emptiness and selflessness. Nevertheless, due to anxiety about not being able to practice uniform behavior and not being able to remove that anxiety quickly, for that purpose they undertake ascetic hardships. Therefore, the category “all phenomena are established to be non-dual” is not understood.

Because the system of dzogchen understands four things for all phenomena— understanding what is to be abandoned; understanding what is to be taken up; understanding what can be left in equanimity; and understanding what can never be actualized, it establishes all phenomena as non-dual. At that time there is no difference between non-duality, homogeneity, [68/a] non-arising, naturelessness, emptiness and selflessness. Since that is so, because this establishment of all phenomena as non-dual is the heart of all intimate instructions, therefore, [dzogchen] is “the heart of all intimate instructions”

Malcolm wrote:

When you cite my translations, you should credit me with them.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 9th, 2014 at 1:43 AM

Title: Re: Tantric and late Indian Buddhist philosophy

Content:

Greg said:

I'd be interested to hear what people think about the idea that a general survey of "Indian Buddhist Philosophy" can dispense with vajrayāna thought completely.

Malcolm wrote:

A bad one.

Greg said:

What would you include, at a minimum?

Malcolm wrote:

All kinds of things, Vajrayāna treatment of embodiment, the impact of the Indian medical tradition on meditation and yoga practices, etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 9th, 2014 at 1:24 AM

Title: Re: Tantric and late Indian Buddhist philosophy

Content:

Greg said:

I'd be interested to hear what people think about the idea that a general survey of "Indian Buddhist Philosophy" can dispense with vajrayāna thought completely.

Malcolm wrote:

A bad one.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 9th, 2014 at 12:40 AM

Title: Re: Inequality

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

And I could care less about rightist interpretations of Buddhist social structures.

Malcolm wrote:

The relationship of the monastic Sangha is not the same as the political relationship between a ruler and the people.

Sherab Dorje said:

Yes Malcolm, you're right!

Malcolm wrote:

The point being that the notions of power in political analysis do not actually apply the relationship of the monastic Sangha and the laity.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 9th, 2014 at 12:11 AM

Title: Re: Inequality

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

And I could care less about rightist interpretations of Buddhist social structures.

Malcolm wrote:

The relationship of the monastic Sangha is not the same as the political relationship between a ruler and the people.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 8th, 2014 at 11:53 PM

Title: Re: Inequality

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Lay people are "subordinate" because their highest merit depends on their support of the Sangha without whom they do not enjoy the same chance for higher rebirth and so on.

Buddha makes it very, very clear, that the ideal is to become ordained and that lay people are inferior.

Sherab Dorje said:

You completely missed my point.

Malcolm wrote:

No, actually I did not. I chose not to address it because I could care less about leftist interpretations of Buddhist social structures.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 8th, 2014 at 11:37 PM

Title: Re: Inequality

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

And, it also depends on on the laity having a subordinate and supporting position since the Sangha is not self-supporting and never was.

Sherab Dorje said:

Subordinate? Are you sure about that? It seems to me that when you are dependent on somebody for your survival, then they are not subordinate to you, quite the opposite actually. They have power over you.

Malcolm wrote:

Lay people are "subordinate" because their highest merit depends on their support of the Sangha without whom they do not enjoy the same chance for higher rebirth and so on.

Buddha makes it very, very clear, that the ideal is to become ordained and that lay people are inferior.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 8th, 2014 at 11:22 PM

Title: Re: Vinaya is a later fabrication

Content:

kirtu said:

It was quite successful in the Western world for some 1700 or so years...

Malcolm wrote:

It never went over so well in the US, the Calvinist roots of American culture had little use for it.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 8th, 2014 at 11:13 PM

Title: Re: Inequality

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

Actually , I just remembered that Buddhism proposes the most radical form of social and economic levelling: the monastic sangha.

Malcolm wrote:

It is actually a meritocracy: your place and authority are determined by your years in. And, it also depends on on the laity having a subordinate and supporting position since the Sangha is not self-supporting and never was.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 8th, 2014 at 9:48 PM

Title: Re: Inequality

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

Of course it is. Somehow I find it difficult to believe that a world full of Buddhas would have social inequality.

Malcolm wrote:

Do you see a world full of Buddhas? It is easy to make an aspiration, far more difficult to carry it out effectively.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 8th, 2014 at 9:27 PM

Title: Re: Inequality

Content:

Zhen Li said:

...there's no levelling impulse in it naturally outside of the equality of everyone in Buddha Nature.

Sherab Dorje said:

Gee, is that all? I have to disagree though, there are countless examples of oaths taken by Buddhas and Bodhisattvas to place everybody on the same level of enlightenment. It doesn't get more "leveling" than that.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, but that is not a "social" leveling.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 8th, 2014 at 8:29 PM

Title: Re: Historical Buddha

Content:

daverupa said:

So your view is that there is no way to parse stratification? It seems, despite academic opinion in general, that academic work nevertheless is making inroads here.

Indrajala said:

In this case are we talking about actual early Buddhism or how the early sangha was portrayed and understood by well-developed Buddhist sects centuries after the Buddha's death?

Malcolm wrote:

He feels that we can analyze the Pali Canon/Agamas and ferret out an accurate representation of early Buddhist life. So do you actually, which is why you spend so much time railing against contracts and saunas.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 8th, 2014 at 8:06 PM

Title: Re: Inequality

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

In all these arguments people continually forget about the influence of current karma in order to justify the status quo (ie samsara). karmic outcomes are not fixed, they can be changed, otherwise our view of karma does not differ from the largely fatalistic "Hindu" view.

Malcolm wrote:

It depends on what kind of outcome, i.e., ripened results we are talking about. For example, we cannot fix the outcomes of some dominant results, i.e., being born in a place frequently afflicted by famine. We cannot alter our lifespan, we have limited control over our health (we all age, sicken and die). If we are born with defective sense organs, there is nothing we can do about this. If we are born as an animal, hell being or a preta, there is nothing to be done about it until we have exhausted that karma.

If one is a born as a deva or an asura, there is little motive to practice virtue.

If you are a human being, you can do something about the circumstances of your life, up to a point.

But most humans , ignorant of the force of karma, just continue to spiral into lower realms. So, it may not be the case that karmic outcomes are "fixed", but they might as well be considering the very little that people do to change such results by practicing virtue in this lifetime.

BTW, even hearing the name Bhaisajyaguru Buddha comes about as a result of past karma...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 8th, 2014 at 6:03 AM

Title: Re: Inequality

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Inequality comes from one's karma, and that's the end of it.

Sherab Dorje said:

And it is sustained by karma, and that's the end of that.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, one's own and no one else's.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 8th, 2014 at 4:02 AM

Title: Re: Inequality

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Inequality comes from one's karma, and that's the end of it.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 8th, 2014 at 2:05 AM

Title: Re: Historical Buddha

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

And then there are people like Witzel who are better scholars.

Indrajala said:

The relations between Mesopotamia and the Indus Valley Civilization are difficult to ascertain and clarify.

One good book in part addressing the subject is The Shape of Ancient Thought by Thomas McEvilley.

Malcolm wrote:

We can understand that they engaged in a great deal of trade, like all ancient peoples.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 8th, 2014 at 1:14 AM

Title: Re: Historical Buddha

Content:

Indrajala said:

Malati J. Shendge,...

Malcolm wrote:

...has very little mainstream academic support for her theories.

Indrajala said:

Indian academia is a rough place.

Malcolm wrote:

And then there are people like Witzel who are better scholars.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 8th, 2014 at 1:08 AM

Title: Re: Historical Buddha

Content:

Indrajala said:

Malati J. Shendge,...

Malcolm wrote:

...has very little mainstream academic support for her theories.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 8th, 2014 at 1:01 AM

Title: Re: Historical Buddha

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

According to Schopen, there is no evidence, so your statement is rather meaningless.

Indrajala said:

To clarify, the earliest evidence for monasteries we have is late. Schopen:

The earliest “monasteries” that are known in India – and none of these are pre-Aśokan – are not “monasteries” at all. They are either only barely improved, unorganized, natural caverns or caves, or poorly constructed and ill-organized shelters built of rubble and other cheap materials. Communities living in these environments could not have produced our elaborate vinayas, nor would they have had any use for them. Since such communities had no steam rooms (jantāka), for example, how could they possibly have generated elaborate rules governing their construction and use?

Gregory Schopen, “The Good Monk and His Money in Monasticism of 'the Mahāyāna Period'" in Indian Monastic Buddhism Collected Papers on Textual, Inscriptional and Archaeological Evidence (New Delhi, India: Motilal Banarsidass Publishers Private Limited), 1-2.

Malcolm wrote:

Again, this is entirely speculative. For example, the Vinaya-kṣudraka-vastu clarifies that jentākas [bsro khang] are to be built by lay people for monks. Jentākas are not hard to construct. They are round. They are built by lay people. They do not need to be permanent structures. They are part of Indian health culture. They are mentioned in Ayurvedic texts such as the Caraka Samhita, the Jivasūtra, and so on. So I put it to you that when he claims the early Sangha had no access to jentākas he is full of it, and is ignoring the evidence in front of his face. A stream bath does not have to be built of marble to be effective.

Indrajala said:

Look, when it is reported in Vinaya that monks can use leather shoes if they travel to the Himalayan regions, we do not need to have a sample of carbon-dated leather shoes found in Magadha or somewhere else to understand that some monks wore leather sandals even during the time of the Buddha.

That's not what scholars are really looking for. They're wondering about the monastic steam rooms and legal financial contracts as outlined in Vinaya literature when there is no evidence monks, in the Buddha's time at least, had such bathing facilities or the Magadha economy was mature and literate enough to merit the use of ecclesiastical financial contracts.

Malcolm wrote:

Of course monks has access to bathing facilities. They bathed, just like other human beings. Honestly, this kind of thing really lacks common sense.

I have already voiced by objection to the specious notion that there was no literacy in India during the time of the Buddha.

Indrajala said:

There are some very serious self-imposed limitations when one decides that archaeology is what we are going to base our understanding of the life and time of the Buddha.

As I'm sure you understand, the concern is really that the literature as we have it seems to reflect a post-Buddha time period, especially with respect to financial transactions, literacy, complex monastic facilities (steam rooms, etc.) and so forth. We might speculate that some of it really goes back to the Buddha's time, but who knows.

Malcolm wrote:

[/quote]

Given that we do not really have much archaeological evidence at all from the post-Harrappan, pre-stone working era of Indian civilization [roughly 1500 BCE to around 250 BCE, it is little facile to claim what primitive Viharas were like and what facilities were provided by their lay hosts.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 8th, 2014 at 12:08 AM

Title: Re: Historical Buddha

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

But Schopen's perspective is really nonsensical since there is plenty of evidence in Sutra as well as Vinaya to paint a portrait of what life was like during the time of the Buddha. There simply is no good and valid reason to discount it.

Indrajala said:

It doesn't necessarily correspond well with archaeological evidence.

Malcolm wrote:

According to Schopen, there is no evidence, so your statement is rather meaningless.

Look, when it is reported in Vinaya that monks can use leather shoes if they travel to the Himalayan regions, we do not need to have a sample of carbon-dated leather shoes found in Magadha or somewhere else to understand that some monks wore leather sandals even during the time of the Buddha.

Deciding that every detail of what is in Vinaya and Sutra must be corroborated with some plastic artifact is absurd, really absurd.

There are some very serious self-imposed limitations when one decides that archaeology is what we are going to base our understanding of the life and time of the Buddha.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, September 7th, 2014 at 11:14 PM

Title: Re: Historical Buddha

Content:

Indrajala said:

He complains that the consensus is, as Schopen has argued, that we cannot know anything with certainty about early Buddhism given the sheer lack of evidence

Malcolm wrote:

But Schopen's perspective is really nonsensical since there is plenty of evidence in Sutra as well as Vinaya to paint a portrait of what life was like during the time of the Buddha. There simply is no good and valid reason to discount it.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, September 7th, 2014 at 10:59 PM

Title: Re: Historical Buddha

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

One cannot do that without some serious conjectural speculation.

Indrajala said:

The chronology of Buddhism is largely established based on historical and literary evidence.

Malcolm wrote:

And very little of that conflicts with traditional accounts of the chronology of Buddhadharma, until we come to guys like Schopen, etc.

Indrajala said:

Sometimes it is pretty straightforward to make time frames given purported prophetic references to historical figures, such as Kaniṣka (c.78-144) of the Kuṣāṇa dynasty in northern India.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, sometimes it is.

Indrajala said:

The early history of Buddhism is problematic of course.

Malcolm wrote:

That is the subject at hand.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, September 7th, 2014 at 10:34 PM

Title: Re: Historical Buddha

Content:

plwk said:

Basically, we have no accurate records of the historical Buddha.
Not even from the Jains' and Brahmins' sides huh...

Indrajala said:

We need to first establish the textual chronology.

Malcolm wrote:

One cannot do that without some serious conjectural speculation.

Even more to the point, one cannot date the accuracy of information merely based on when it seems to appear in some written form. Allow me to give you an example — the first collection of Appalachian old world ballads compiled in the 1920's. It turns out that the orally transmitted Appalachian versions of many ballads are in fact earlier than the versions of the same ballads as recorded by Sir Walter Scott, published in 1803. For example, Barbara Allen.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, September 7th, 2014 at 10:17 PM

Title: Re: Historical Buddha

Content:

plwk said:

Basically, we have no accurate records of the historical Buddha.

Not even from the Jains' and Brahmins' sides huh...

Malcolm wrote:

It's pure academic nihilism.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, September 7th, 2014 at 10:12 PM

Title: Re: Historical Buddha

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

And hence for modern scholars, there is no historical Buddha, not even Shakyamuni, which is why some folks (J. Atwood, for example) seriously propose his non-existence.

Indrajala said:

We can assume he existed, but say nothing beyond that given the lack of evidence from that period. Once you understand the evidence-based chronology of Buddhism, you see the earliest possible reference to Buddhism in history is Aśoka's (r. 268–232 BCE) edicts, and even this is contested by some.

Malcolm wrote:

Thanks Jeff, I have understood the "evidence" based approaches to Buddhist history for many years. I understand all the arguments and so on.

I think that the methodology of the Schopens and Bronkhorsts of the world is inadequate, and because they are not practitioners, of little value to those practicing Buddhadharma. It is precisely this "contested by some" that reinforces my conviction that Buddhology just a collection of conflicting opinions. Of some idle interest occasionally, but not worth talking seriously — a means of distraction for professors who earn a living from teaching survey courses on religion to undergrads.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, September 7th, 2014 at 9:57 PM

Title: Re: Heart Sutra -- why study it?

Content:

longjie said:

Pratyekabuddhas do not seem to have their own turning in the Samdhinirmocana Sutra. According to the relevant sutra passage, the first turning is for the sravakas, the second turning is for the bodhisattvas, and the third turning is for all vehicles.

Malcolm wrote:

Indeed, which is why it is surprising that Asanga makes the equation that he does, which was my point — the paltry sources in the Indian canon that do treat the subject of the three turnings do not do so with anything approaching doctrinal consistency. It therefore really too much to claim that the idea of the three turnings of the wheel really was an important doctrine in the Indian Mahāyāna scene since there are fewer references to it than there is to the idea of tathāgatagarbha.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, September 7th, 2014 at 9:53 PM

Title: Re: Historical Buddha

Content:

Indrajala said:

Basically, we have no accurate records of the historical Buddha.

Malcolm wrote:

And hence for modern scholars, there is no historical Buddha, not even Shakyamuni, which is why some folks (J. Atwood, for example) seriously propose his non-existence.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, September 7th, 2014 at 5:25 AM

Title: Re: Historical Buddha

Content:

daverupa said:

I'm not going to provide a bulwark to the whole field of history and textual criticism in the face of fundamentalist incredulity, Malcolm.

I know historical facts are threatening to the whole endeavor of Mahayana/Vajrayana simply because they demonstrate the lack of historicity vis-a-vis the historical Buddha, but while the M-V-Dharma experiences this threat, and Traditional Theravadan Commentary does as well, the Dhamma remains unmolested.

In any event, your "all or nothing" strawman is fallacious, as I already mentioned. Parsing stratification is not as simplistic or random as you want to portray it.

Malcolm wrote:

Your historical "facts" are merely a bunch of suppositions supported on nothing.

Texts are not like sedimentary layers of rock, though many imagine that is how it is.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, September 7th, 2014 at 4:34 AM

Title: Re: Historical Buddha

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

What I am saying is that we cannot deduce from some inferred sedimentation that DN 14, for example, is a spurious sutra and that therefore, the six past buddhas to which it refers are not historical.

daverupa said:

We sure can.

Malcolm wrote:

You can speculate all you like, but speculations are not facts. The fact is that we have a text, and a wide tradition that holds that the Buddha taught on the existence of six prior Buddhas. We can consider these earlier Buddhas historical in just the same we we consider the Buddha historical.

Otherwise, the consequence is that we cannot trust any of the information in the sutras at all, or worse, we must place ourselves in the hands of modern self-appointed "experts" upon whose speculations it will be decided for us what sutras are to be considered valid and what are to be considered spurious.

It is exactly this kind of "scholarship" which is basically harmful to Dharma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, September 7th, 2014 at 4:32 AM

Title: Re: Historical Buddha

Content:

daverupa said:

Make a thread about DN 14; we can discuss it's use of the term 'bodhisatta' and how this use seems to have additional layers of meaning that are missing from the term elsewhere in the Canon.

Malcolm wrote:

This is all completely speculative.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, September 7th, 2014 at 4:29 AM

Title: Re: Historical Buddha

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

So if I understand what you are saying, we are to understand DN 14 as a later interpolation that does not represent the voice of the Buddha in any way shape or form, that this sutta is entirely a fabrication?

daverupa said:

The earliest texts are stratified, and reflect ~150+ years of permutation; the "all-or-nothing" approach is of course untenable, but that's a strawman built on a false dichotomy.

Malcolm wrote:

That begs the question, a text is one thing, information another. What I am saying is that we cannot deduce from some inferred sedimentation that DN 14, for example, is a spurious sutra and that therefore, the six past buddhas to which it refers are not historical. Either the Buddha taught on the existence of six past Buddhas (and many more actually, such as Dipamkara) or he did not. If he did not, the sutra and all reference to six past Buddhas must be regarded as interpolations as you have already suggested. But the fact is that you cannot give a rational account for the sophisticated and exhaustive presentation of the six past buddhas apart from your rather tepid suggestion that some author or authors within 150 years of the Buddha entirely fabricated the six past buddhas based on a misunderstanding of their own language and cultural references. Seems rather far fetched to me.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, September 7th, 2014 at 3:24 AM

Title: Re: Heart Sutra -- why study it?

Content:

Vajrasvapna said:

In the 3th turning teachings, the Buddha taught about a no-conditioned self...

Malcolm wrote:

No, actually he didn't. For example, in the Yogācārabhūmi viniścayasaṃgrahāṇī, Āryāśaṅga considers that the three vehicles being discussed by the three turnings are really śrāvakayāna, pratyekabuddhayāna and the mahāyāna, he then quotes the relevant section of the Samdhinirmocana that is the sole mention of a three turnings of the wheel in all the sūtras of the bka' 'gyur.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, September 7th, 2014 at 3:08 AM

Title: Re: Historical Buddha

Content:

daverupa said:

The problem is that traditional accounts show historical development, including the Buddhavamsa, including even the Nikayas & Agamas. Your suggested approach seems to require that this be ignored altogether, with blinders and earplugs if necessary.

Malcolm wrote:

It's not a problem at all. Further, attempts at forming a chronology for this or that text are completely speculative.

We only know this as a historical fact: some three hundreds years after the Buddha's parinirvana, his teachings were written down. This included both Mahāyāna and Hinayāna scriptures.

The reason they were written down, according to all traditional accounts, is that there was some fear that future generations would be unable to maintain them as oral transmissions and so they were committed to text.

It's entirely natural for narratives to be edited and otherwise subjected to some kind of organization, but that organizational activity tells us almost nothing about the contents of the information being organized or how old it might be.

When it comes to such things as the four or seven Buddhas prior to Śākyamuni, while it is true in the MN of Ñāṇamoli/Bodhi, isisattamassa is read as "best of seers" at M i.386, it cannot be denied that DN 14 presents a coherent account of the seven past Buddhas. So if I understand what you are saying, we are to understand DN 14 as a later interpolation that does not represent the voice of the Buddha in any way shape or form, that this sutta is entirely a fabrication?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, September 7th, 2014 at 2:18 AM

Title: Re: Historical Buddha

Content:

daverupa said:

The point is whether historical methods render any accurate information, because it is on this basis that the phrase 'historical Buddha' has meaning in the first place - the OP, here, and thus directly to the point.

Now, I consider that historical methods do render accurate information. You seem to think otherwise, calling it a flawed materialist enterprise. So, it seems you must - to avoid hypocrisy - conclude that historical methods in general are flawed, their conclusions are thereby flawed, and therefore that e.g. history is a mere materialist hypothesis.

Malcolm wrote:

I think that there is a certain approach to history which is rooted in such materialism, and I think modern Buddhology more or less has fallen into that ideological perspective, pretending, as it does, that it will present us with a more objective account of Buddhadharma than has already been presented in traditional accounts like the Buddhavasmsa, for example.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, September 7th, 2014 at 1:35 AM

Title: Re: Historical Buddha

Content:

daverupa said:

None?

Malcolm wrote:

Not really, no.

Mediterranean history is not really relevant to our aborted discussion, AFIC, that is why I did not respond to Lazy Eye's query.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, September 7th, 2014 at 1:34 AM

Title: Re: Historical Buddha

Content:

daverupa said:

One can easily see the "seventh sage" references in the early materials as being an Indian colloquialism for 'the best'...

Malcolm wrote:

Honestly, this is one of the most far-fetched theories I have yet seen.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, September 7th, 2014 at 1:20 AM

Title: Re: Historical Buddha

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

I see, so you don't consider Vipassi, Sikhin, Kanakamuni, etc. to be "historical buddhas"?

daverupa said:

Nope.

Malcolm wrote:

Then we really have no common basis for a discussion.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 6th, 2014 at 11:56 PM

Title: Historical Buddha

Content:

daverupa said:

Malcolm wrote: daverupa wrote:

The historical Buddha

Which one?

There's only the one, Malcolm.

Malcolm wrote:

I see, so you don't consider Vipassi, Sikhin, Kanakamuni, etc. to be "historical buddhas"?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 6th, 2014 at 11:51 PM

Title: Re: Purpose of Monkhood/Nunhood and the Monastic Sangha

Content:

Crazywisdom said:

This is the perfect time for a master like HH to establish as Samye in America.

Malcolm wrote:

I think Tarthang Tulku has already done that:

<http://www.odiyan.org> " onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 6th, 2014 at 11:26 PM

Title: Re: buddhist authority structures

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

In actuality, someone becomes interested in Dharma, decides academia is the best place to learn about it, and over the course of time, as their expertise in and appreciation for the opinions of other Buddhologists increases, their faith in Dharma decreases.

dzogchungpa said:

What, in every case? I'd have to see some actual evidence before I accept that that is in fact typical.

Malcolm wrote:

I said it was a common pattern, I did not say it was universal — though it is more likely to be found among those who originally were interested in Mahāyāna or Vajrayāna.

Add this to the fact that Buddhology these days is dominated by people like Gombrich, Schöpen, Bronkhorst and so on with no practical interest in the subject at all...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 6th, 2014 at 10:45 PM

Title: Re: buddhist authority structures

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

He denies that he cares about personal transformation and awakening, or that personal transformation and awakening are possible? I haven't seen that, but I haven't read everything he's written. From what I have seen, he seems sincere in his Buddhist aspirations.

Malcolm wrote:

There are many ex-Buddhist Buddhologists, Tibetologists and so on — it is a common pattern. In actuality, someone becomes interested in Dharma, decides academia is the best place to learn about it, and over the course of time, as their expertise in and appreciation for the opinions of other Buddhologists increases, their faith in Dharma decreases.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 6th, 2014 at 10:43 PM

Title: Re: buddhist authority structures

Content:

Mkoll said:

And unfortunately, here, many of those translations are marred by the imperfect understanding of the scholars who produce them.

That can be true. However, perhaps what you call "imperfect" may often have less to do with the technical skill of the translator and more to do with their colored interpretation. The only way around it is to learn the source language for oneself. Nonetheless, it is still useful to have other translations and perspectives for comparison.

Malcolm wrote:

Imperfect includes both lack of skill in the source language as well as "interpretation".

In the world of Tibetan studies, I am often amazed as the slipshod work for which people receive PhDs.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 6th, 2014 at 9:49 PM

Title: Re: buddhist authority structures

Content:

Indrajala said:

The very fabric of the Vinaya, for example, is stained with the eight worldly dharmas: an obsessive preoccupation with presenting a pure image to the laity so as to secure material and social resources.

kirtu said:

This is of course one of your two fundamental theses (the other being that Westerners are culturally incurable of understanding concepts outside of their primary cultural core [a sort of deeply misguided Sapir-Whorf Hypothesis]).

You have fundamentally misunderstood monasticism and the sangha. Furthermore you have transferred themes from your culture dealing with scarcity and acquisition of resources (the whole economic obsession) onto the sangha. These are apples and oranges issues.

.... have empowered people politically, financially and socially,

See - this is what I'm talking about. These are all primarily English language cultural obsessions. Even the French and Germans don't have quite the same obsessions.

Even the Dutch present this stuff differently. They just don't have the same focus (and you would expect the French to come pretty close in fact). Power structures, resources - you have reduced the sangha to a cargo cult.

It would be one thing if you came from a 2nd or 3rd world culture with definite scarcity and extreme secularism (Americans born and raised in the US will never see this about themselves although 3rd culture Americans raise these issues almost whenever we meet one another - and America is at the top of the heap of the unfortunate societies burdened by actual economic scarcity and occasional life-threatening uncertainty) but you come from a very mild social democracy where true scarcity hasn't been an issue since the great Tommy Douglas began the transition of Canada to a modern nation. Perhaps these issues really reflect your intense focus on the common issues discussed in English speaking academia? This is not a personal attack. Each of our fundamental orientations need to be examined in the light of Buddhadharma because they are all relative truth at best (until we can transform our minds into true wisdom).

Kirt

Malcolm wrote:

Buddhologists could care less about personal transformation or awakening — this is extremely clear. Instead, they obsess about contracts and inscriptions carved in stone, etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 6th, 2014 at 9:47 PM

Title: Re: buddhist authority structures

Content:

Mkoll said:

You seem to believe that you must valiantly defend Buddhism against "academic fundamentalism."

Malcolm wrote:

I am not defending Buddhism, I am criticizing the belief that the meaning and value of Buddhadharma can be accessed through an academic tradition largely devoted to forensic dissection.

Mkoll said:

Of course that's a foolish belief. And I think few people hold it, including academics. Even someone with a mediocre knowledge of Buddhism should be able to understand that it's a living path of practice.

But that doesn't mean academic study is something that should be treated with "pointed disdain." Some of it can be quite useful if you aren't on a crusade against it.

Malcolm wrote:

To the extent that translations are produced, and that is about the extent of it. And unfortunately, here, many of those translations are marred by the imperfect understanding of the scholars who produce them.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 6th, 2014 at 9:29 PM

Title: Re: Purpose of Monkhood/Nunhood and the Monastic Sangha

Content:

kirtu said:

However his comments regarding monasticism, aspects of which were often stated in various threads seemed to me to be off. In particular he seems to think that the main purpose of monasticism is social.

Malcolm wrote:

A warning tale to people who take Buddhology more seriously than Buddhadharma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 6th, 2014 at 9:24 PM

Title: Re: buddhist authority structures

Content:

Mkoll said:

You seem to believe that you must valiantly defend Buddhism against "academic fundamentalism."

Malcolm wrote:

I am not defending Buddhism, I am criticizing the belief that the meaning and value of Buddhadharma can be accessed through an academic tradition largely devoted to forensic dissection.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Saturday, September 6th, 2014 at 6:45 AM
Title: Re: buddhist authority structures
Content:

Mkoll said:
That's a strawman.

Malcolm wrote:
No, honestly, that's what seems to pass muster these days — if it isn't carved on a rock or a pillar somewhere, it is not counted as historically valid in the Buddhist studies world.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Saturday, September 6th, 2014 at 6:30 AM
Title: Re: buddhist authority structures
Content:
Mkoll said:
This one: the "Lord Buddha" that Emperor Asoka was referring to when he had his edicts carved into solid rock in the 3rd century BCE. One of those edicts reads:

Malcolm wrote:
I see, so your "Lord Buddha" has to have his title carved on a pillar, in other word, he must be grounded in some impermanent plastic artifact.

Mkoll said:
What is that supposed to mean?

Malcolm wrote:
Just what it says, i.e., your Buddha must be established by a stone pillar with his name carved in it.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Saturday, September 6th, 2014 at 5:17 AM
Title: Re: buddhist authority structures
Content:
gad rgyangs said:
critical thinking, discernment and intellectual honesty are also a path, the difference being that the narrative is always evolving to include new insights and information.

Malcolm wrote:

Intellectual honesty, critical thinking and discernment? That's what you think the academic study of Buddhism is predicated upon? I sure don't.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 6th, 2014 at 3:28 AM

Title: Re: English Tantric Texts

Content:

Christopherxx said:

Malcom do you mind me asking why that is.

How does it avoid the trap of just staying in samsara and not progressing?

Malcolm wrote:

The proper way to enter Vajrayāna is through receiving empowerment. There is no other way. You can read this or that book, but without having taken proper empowerment, Vajrayāna texts will not benefit you and can actually give rise to wrong views that will cause you much problem.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 6th, 2014 at 3:20 AM

Title: Re: English Tantric Texts

Content:

Christopherxx said:

Here in the west we want to study, see the merits of something.

Malcolm wrote:

Vajrayāna cannot be approached this way.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 6th, 2014 at 2:16 AM

Title: Re: English Tantric Texts

Content:

Christopherxx said:

So a while ago I started the post "English Mahayana Sutras" and Sherab Dorje did an absolutely incredible post listing all the major Mahayana sutras and links to them for download in English.

I was hoping I could get some kind of similar amazing posts for tantras and the like. I am really trying to dig in here

Malcolm wrote:

If you want to study Tantras, you must first find a master, receive the required empowerments, only then should you look at tantric texts. And only then after a sufficient amount of training under a qualified master.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 6th, 2014 at 12:43 AM

Title: Re: buddhist authority structures

Content:

Lazy_eye said:

Do you believe that historical methods tell us anything that is reliable and worth knowing?

Malcolm wrote:

Histories are like kaleidoscopes — they present only a distorted and necessarily limited view of any given subject. There is no such thing as a comprehensive history, much less a true one.

Lo rgyus on the other hand, narrative accounts, serve a contextual purpose for a practitioner to orient themselves within a given stream of practice, and present the origin of a transmission.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 6th, 2014 at 12:42 AM

Title: Re: buddhist authority structures

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

...logic is valued as well as is the ability to correctly perceive transactional reality.

Malcolm wrote:

The only thing about "transactional reality" we need to perceive is that it is fundamentally predicated on delusion.

gad rgyangs said:

but your claim for the veracity of the sutras is a claim made in transactional reality, so it too must be predication on delusion, no?

Malcolm wrote:

Of course. The only value relative truth bears is whether it can be adventitiously employed for the purpose of [an imputed] liberation or not. Otherwise, it is of no interest nor bearing on the path.

For this reason and this reason alone do we take interest in "logic", the two truths and so on., "history", etc. History, as we can all see, is a completely malleable subject. People who take it very seriously will find in the end that it is about as satisfying as candy in a dream.

For this reason it is far better for people who are practicing a given path to just accept the narrative proper to that path and to ignore others. Since western academic research on Buddhist "history" has no bearing on the path, it is a subject that should be treated with pointed disdain by serious practitioners.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 6th, 2014 at 12:22 AM

Title: Re: buddhist authority structures

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

...logic is valued as well as is the ability to correctly perceive transactional reality.

Malcolm wrote:

The only thing about "transactional reality" we need to perceive is that it is fundamentally predicated on delusion.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 5th, 2014 at 11:57 PM

Title: Re: buddhist authority structures

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Sure, because it so much better to be slaves to an ever evolving academic fundamentalism...

gad rgyangs said:

you don't have to be an academic to wake up and smell the coffee.

and even within the buddhist traditional world-view, logic is valued as well as is the ability to correctly perceive transactional reality. There is no way to apply logic and correct perception of conventional reality and still believe that the sutras are accurate transcripts made in real time of someone preaching, except willful stubbornness.

Malcolm wrote:

Whoever said they were made in real time? That is not even an assertion of traditional Buddhist accounts. The sutras were written down, all of them, at a much later time.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 5th, 2014 at 11:44 PM

Title: Re: buddhist authority structures

Content:

rory said:

I really don't understand the rationale here against scholarship. I think everyone here would be laughing if they read a forum where Christians denied the need for biblical scholarship and they didn't need to understand that the gospels were not literally written by John, Mark, Luke etc..

gad rgyangs said:

how DARE you compare Buddhist fundamentalists with Christian fundamentalists! Christian fundamentalists are confused retards, while Buddhist fundamentalists are fundamental because they know their religion is the One True Faith. Sheesh, its like apples and oranges. Only an idiot would believe that the bible is the unedited word of god, whereas everybody knows that every sutra was spoken verbatim by the Buddha exactly when and where it says he did!

Malcolm wrote:

Sure, because it so much better to be slaves to an ever evolving academic fundamentalism...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 5th, 2014 at 10:24 PM

Title: Re: buddhist authority structures

Content:

Lazy_eye said:

[then there's the section about the pilgrimage of Sudhana who cannot be regarded as a historical figure according to Western methodology.

Malcolm wrote:

But he is a historical figure from a Mahāyāna buddhist pov.

Lazy_eye said:

To come at this text with the goal of seeking historical details about the life and times of the Buddha would be patently absurd.

Malcolm wrote:

No, not at all.

Lazy_eye said:

My point is that a reader with a historicist outlook is most likely going to be mystified or put off by a text like this, which operates on such a large, multidimensional plane; such a person will more likely find the nikayas appealing.

Malcolm wrote:

In other words, you mean that people whose framework is based on a largely materialist outlook on history will find the nikayas more appealing...but they won't in fact since the Nikayas also contain much material which cannot be accounted for in such a materialist framework, such as Buddha having discussions with Indra, Brahma and so on.

Lazy_eye said:

The ahistorical elements that I'm referring to in the sutras

<http://www.urbandharma.org/pdf/AggannaSutta.pdf>, but to a far lesser extent, whereas Mahayana really brings them out in a big way.

Malcolm wrote:

All that is clear here is that westerners apparently need to alter Buddhist history to make it fit their largely materialist historical worldview.

Of course now we have largely veered off topic because of the suggestion that our structures of authority in Buddhism are predicated on false historical claims.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 5th, 2014 at 9:38 PM

Title: Re: buddhist authority structures

Content:

Lazy_eye said:

Not at all. I'm not interpreting anything here, just pointing to obvious differences in narrative mode.

Large parts of the Avatamsaka sutra are not "going on" at any definable time and place. They are happening, in effect, in all times and places, with innumerable Buddhas giving teachings to innumerable sentient beings. This is quite different from the typical nikayan text in which a specific person, Shakyamuni Buddha, went on his alms round on a particular day, met so and so, and delivered this or that teaching.

Malcolm wrote:

The Avatamsaka Sūtra was taught by the Buddha at a very specific time and place, under the bodhitree, after he woke up. It is the first sutra he taught.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 5th, 2014 at 9:20 PM

Title: Re: buddhist authority structures

Content:

Mkoll said:

This one: the "Lord Buddha" that Emperor Asoka was referring to when he had his edicts carved into solid rock in the 3rd century BCE. One of those edicts reads:

Malcolm wrote:

I see, so your "Lord Buddha" has to have his title carved on a pillar, in other words, he must be grounded in some impermanent plastic artifact.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 5th, 2014 at 9:09 PM

Title: Re: buddhist authority structures

Content:

Lazy_eye said:

Many of the Mahayana sutras do not. Their mode is ahistorical and atemporal, in effect unifying the "three times". I've been delving into the Avatamsaka this week, for instance, and the idea of coming at it the way one would approach an historical record is simply ludicrous; it's an altogether different kind of text.

Malcolm wrote:

This is merely your interpretive overlay predicated on view of history based largely on an unconscious Western materialist outlook.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 5th, 2014 at 8:26 PM

Title: Re: buddhist authority structures

Content:

daverupa said:

The historical Buddha

Malcolm wrote:

Which one?

Mkoll said:

I'm quite certain daverupa is talking about Gotama/Shakyamuni/Siddhartha.

Malcolm wrote:

Which one of those?

My point of course being that there really does not exist one sole authoritative narrative by which we may pretend we have found the "true" Buddha.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 5th, 2014 at 8:13 PM

Title: Re: buddhist authority structures

Content:

daverupa said:

The historical Buddha

Malcolm wrote:

Which one?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 5th, 2014 at 1:22 AM

Title: Re: buddhist authority structures

Content:

Indrajala said:

I try to remain unattached to views...

Malcolm wrote:

On the contrary, you have very strong views, which you present to anyone who will listen.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 5th, 2014 at 1:17 AM

Title: Re: buddhist authority structures

Content:

Indrajala said:

If your religious authority is founded on false premises (like the Vinaya being the historical decrees of the Buddha), and modern scholars have demonstrated such premises to in fact be false, then the academy is ignored at one's own peril.

Malcolm wrote:

It has not been demonstrated by anyone that the pratimokṣa was not actually taught by the Buddha. The most one can say is that various different schools present slightly different versions of it.

What one can say is that specific procedures of ordination were not necessarily established by the Buddha directly since they in fact vary from sect to sect — but this fact does not require modern scholarship to recognize since this has been recognized for a long, long time within the tradition by people well studied in the traditional histories of Buddhist schools.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 5th, 2014 at 1:07 AM

Title: Re: buddhist authority structures

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

But they are largely irrelevant to a Dharma person who is not really concerned with what outsiders think.

Indrajala said:

Speak for yourself.

The great thinkers of Indian Buddhism clearly cared a lot about how others thought, especially figures like Dharmakīrti.

Malcolm wrote:

He was primarily concerned with proving that the Buddha was an authority. Everything in his intellectual project was subordinated to that aim. I doubt much if he cared what Hindus thought at all, actually.

In practice, polemics, like propaganda, is usually constructed for one's followers.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 4th, 2014 at 8:26 PM

Title: Re: buddhist authority structures

Content:

Dan74 said:

Sure for an academic paper to get some traction, it should be evidence-based. But evidence can come from a variety of sources. Suttras, commentaries, biographies and other traditional narratives are also possible sources of evidence, if what is studied is how the tradition sees itself. In any case, it is important to distill one's core inquiry - what truly matters to me and why?

Indrajala said:

There are two primary approaches in the field: emic and etic. The former accommodates the traditional perspective quite fine.

Malcolm wrote:

These two approaches exist if you are cultural anthropologist or a linguist.

But they are largely irrelevant to a Dharma person who is not really concerned with what outsiders think. The terms themselves are biased in so far as the so called "etic" approach is considered "scientific" blah blah blah.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 3rd, 2014 at 11:48 PM

Title: Re: buddhist authority structures

Content:

conebeckham said:

There are problems with any institutions, and any authority structures.

Malcolm wrote:

Indeed, as one will find when burdened with the mundane tasks of running a religion department.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 3rd, 2014 at 11:36 PM

Title: Re: Kayas

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

]Well, if your teacher explained these passages and texts in this way (ie that Great Bliss refers to sexual union), then who am I to question it?

conebeckham said:

Great Bliss does not refer to "Tantric Sexual Union." .

Malcolm wrote:

Of course not, it refers to nirvana.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 3rd, 2014 at 10:00 PM

Title: Re: buddhist authority structures

Content:

Dan74 said:

You want to tear it down? First turn towards your own aversion, Indrajala. Then tell us again.

Malcolm wrote:

He can't very well make a career in a modern academia (which has proven itself hostile to any version of Buddhist history which does not match the narrative they wish to push in Western colleges) without tearing Buddhadharma down, now can he?

If someone wants to make a career as a Buddhist academic, there are a number of things which are not allowed. First and foremost, one is not allowed to actually give traditional narratives any credit whatsoever.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 3rd, 2014 at 6:55 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen: Query Regarding the 'Guru'

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

he misunderstands the role of a guru in Dzogchen teachings.

Mkoll said:

That seems to be correct. I hadn't spent much time on Dharma Wheel before I figured that the guru (I prefer "teacher") was an essential component of the Vajrayana tradition.

Malcolm wrote:

The word is guru, actually, i.e. one who is heavy with qualities.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 3rd, 2014 at 5:46 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen: Query Regarding the 'Guru'

Content:

Mkoll said:

That's a great passage. for sharing.

Malcolm wrote:

But it has nothing to do with Dzogchen.

Mkoll said:

True. Nonetheless, it's a great passage and I'm glad he shared it.

Malcolm wrote:

The user in question seems to have some issues with authority. Thus, he misunderstands the role of a guru in Dzogchen teachings.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 2nd, 2014 at 7:53 PM

Title: Re: Dzogchen: Query Regarding the 'Guru'

Content:

Mkoll said:

That's a great passage. for sharing.

Malcolm wrote:

But it has nothing to do with Dzogchen.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 1st, 2014 at 12:22 AM

Title: Re: Mixing Buddhist and non-Buddhist Practices?

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

Anybody know what exactly is meant by the term ordinariness?

Thanks!

PS According to this quote any practice this is based in the hope of gaining happiness, or on the fear of continued suffering, is Black Dharma.

Malcolm wrote:

No, not at all. "If any teaching you study, reflect upon, or expound becomes an effective remedy against your disturbing emotions..."

Here, there is a clear reference to afflictions. All suffering comes ultimately from afflictions.

What it means is that if you are practicing Dharma out of the eight worldly Dharmas, this is not really Dharma practice at all and will not liberate you from afflictions.

Sherab Dorje said:

Hmmmm... seems to be a fine line we are drawing here. The eight worldly include the fear of suffering and the hope of happiness. Are you saying that what makes it definitive is the fact that it starts with the aim of overcoming the afflictive emotions, rather than the aim to overcome suffering? That overcoming suffering is a consequence, and not an aim?

Malcolm wrote:

First, the translation is a little off: it is not happiness and suffering, it is bde ba and mi bde ba. Here we can understand it is not sukha and dukha, but more like sparsā and asparśa, things we want to have contact with and things we want to avoid contact with.

The whole point of the Buddhist path is to attain permanent sukha, which is the absence of dukha.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, August 31st, 2014 at 11:59 PM

Title: Re: Karma in Buddhism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Nevertheless, tathāgatagarbha was a minor school in India, and it was not taken up with any vigor by so called Yogacarins.

Vajrasvapna said:

The Buddha taught the teachings about no-self and emptiness as a antidote to the tendency of people to cling to a illusory conditioned self.

In the 3th turning teachings, the Buddha taught about a no-conditioned self, that is birthless, deathless and eternal.

Malcolm wrote:

No he didn't. The only place in sutra where a "third turning" is mentioned is the Samdhinirmocana sūtra, which has no mention of such an unconditioned self — the idea that Buddha taught such a self just Hinduism in drag.

The three turnings of the wheel are also mentioned by Maitreya in the Sūtrālamkāra, but he asserts they were all turned at the same time, not one here, then one there, then another one later on.

Though many generations of scholars in Tibet have concluded that the tathāgatagarbha sūtras are part of the "third turning" there is certainly no evidence in the Indian canon that this is so at all. There are actually very, very few references to "a third turning". It has to do with the question of how the dependent nature shifts from being conditioned to being unconditioned [i.e. the absence of the imagined in the dependent is the perfected: see Mahāyānasamgraha by Asanga]. In short, there is an unresolved inner contradiction in the way the Yogacara three natures is presented that forces them to be a realist school.

Your statements do not make logical sense to me.

Blame Asanga.

buddha, from the root "buddh", to know, and "dha", absolute, infinite.

Some Tibetan lamas like that kind of logic. If you have in mind the teachings on interdependence, this etymological logic makes some sense.

It is complete nonsense. It cannot be defended in any way. The way most Tibetans etymologize "sangs rgyas" is that "sangs" means to cleanse or purify, additionally "sangs" also means to wake up; and rgyas means "to expand" or "fully". So it means to remove or cleanse afflictions and to expand wisdom, or more simply, "fully awaken".

Budh simply means to awaken; dha means that possessor of that, hence Buddha simply means "the one who has awakened".

Sorry if you were offended, but I tend to call things as I see them.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, August 31st, 2014 at 11:52 PM

Title: Re: Mixing Buddhist and non-Buddhist Practices?

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

Anybody know what exactly is meant by the term ordinariness?

Thanks!

PS According to this quote any practice this is based in the hope of gaining happiness, or on the fear of continued suffering, is Black Dharma.

Malcolm wrote:

No, not at all. "If any teaching you study, reflect upon, or expound becomes an effective remedy against your disturbing emotions..."

Here, there is a clear reference to afflictions. All suffering comes ultimately from afflictions.

What it means is that if you are practicing Dharma out of the eight worldly Dharmas, this is not really Dharma practice at all and will not liberate you from afflictions.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, August 31st, 2014 at 5:41 AM

Title: Re: Mahamudra, dzogchen, & nibbana!

Content:

Christopherxx said:

Hi Malcom,

Can you elaborate a bit? I am sure there will be many people that will view this post either now in the present or in the future. Maybe some just for one moment of their Buddhist exposure. And who knows maybe a good description will help them in their path.

I am sure many will not go out and buy books, etc. So there is something to be said for giving an effort to help in a skillful way.

Your both obviously quite well read and intelligent. Time to share and help others with what you've been shared and helped with?

Malcolm wrote:

You need to receive teachings from a teacher who is qualified. Only then will you understand.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, August 31st, 2014 at 4:16 AM

Title: Re: Mahamudra, dzogchen, & nibbana!

Content:

Christopherxx said:

So recently there has been a lot of information that seems to be going around the same area.

Ajahn Amaro has been describing nibbana as "Awareness" and that seems to be how a lot of masters describe dzogchen's rigpa with Buddhahood being omniscience applied to that?

Malcolm wrote:

It's really not the same thing.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 30th, 2014 at 4:07 AM

Title: Re: Karma in Buddhism

Content:

Vajrasvapna said:

Why you think that so? Could you give me any proof that what they says is wrong?

Malcolm wrote:

Just take this spurious etymology:

buddha, from the root "buddh", to know, and "dha", absolute, infinite.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 30th, 2014 at 4:00 AM

Title: Re: Karma in Buddhism

Content:

Vajrasvapna said:

Now you are conflating the Tathāgatagarbha and Yogacara schools.

To me, without the Tathāgatagarbha teachings Buddhism become a nihilistic philosophy.

Malcolm wrote:

Nevertheless, tathāgatagarbha was a minor school in India, and it was not taken up with any vigor by so called Yogacarins.

In my perception, Yogacara is a psychological view of the teachings of Prajnaparamita, together with the teachings of Maitreya. It is not a contradiction of the teachings of Nagarjuna.

Yogacara is a realist school. Their position forces them to assert that jñāna is real.

The qualities of wisdom are also mere perception. Some people cling to that experience believing they are real, but they are like illusion also.

It has to do with the question of how the dependent nature shifts from being conditioned to being unconditioned [i.e. the absence of the imagined in the dependent is the perfected: see Mahāyānasamgraha by Asanga]. In short, there is an unresolved inner contradiction in the way the Yogacara three natures is presented that forces them to be a realist school.

In fact, you misunderstand what I said, let me explain more clearly: I said that the logical method used by Madhyamikas are not compatible with Dzogchen; but depending on how you interpret the different schools, they vision may or may not be compatible with Dzogchen.

It is not the method they are referring to; they are referring the conclusion.

The method of Dzogchen is the direct introduction to mind, one example is how Patrul Rinpoche was introduced by Do Khyentse Yeshe Dorje to the nature of his mind. And its language is similar to Yogacara. In same way, Mahamudra language is similar to Madhyamaka.

Mahāmudra and Dzogchen both make equal use of terminology from Yogacara. Your distinction is dubious at best.

Why you think that so? Could you give me any proof that what they says is wrong?

[/quote]

All kinds of things, from the fake Sanskrit equivalents they supply to incorrect translations.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 30th, 2014 at 3:42 AM

Title: Re: Mixing Buddhist and non-Buddhist Practices?

Content:

Anders said:

The certainty with which he pronounces his conclusion bears no correlation at all to the flimsiness of his argumentation.

Malcolm wrote:

Perhaps it is because his argument is so flimsy. Anyway, why would any regard Bronkhorst a greater authority on the Buddha's intent than Nāgārjuna?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 30th, 2014 at 3:11 AM

Title: Re: Mixing Buddhist and non-Buddhist Practices?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The emptiness he taught is the emptiness of dependent origination.

dzogchungpa said:

From Bronkhorst's "Buddhist Teaching in India": The main conclusion to be drawn is that we are not likely to learn much about the teaching of the Buddha from the doctrine of conditioned origination. In its classical form it is not part of the original teaching of the Buddha.

Don't get mad.

Malcolm wrote:

He is presenting his opinion. I don't agree with his opinion. It is unfounded.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 30th, 2014 at 1:43 AM

Title: Re: Mixing Buddhist and non-Buddhist Practices?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Anyway, as you and I have discussed before, I do not think that the various liberations bandied about by this and that school are even commensurate with one another. That is to say, I don't think non-Buddhists and so on are necessarily in the same mountain range as Buddhadharma, much less climbing the same mountain.

Anders said:

Clarifying assumptions of commensurability would probably go a long way in a lot of these comparative discussions.

I am curious as to how you square off such incommensurability with pronouncements like Samantabhadra claiming even the worldly paths as his vehicles.

Malcolm wrote:

Amazing, wielder of the vajra,
though my vehicles are inconceivable, they are included in two categories:
samsara and nirvana.
Further, samasara is as follows:
false view and eternalist view.

And:

Likewise, the countless views of a self are included in two. Those are included in both the eternalist view and annihilationist view. Countless views of self come from those two. Likewise, son of a good family, because you have avoided entering a false path, I have summarized the views of a self and demonstrated them.

While the actual content of different non-buddhist vehicles is mistaken, one can understand that impulse to follow them is an impulse towards liberation from the same tantra:

[S]ince a person living in a nirmanakāya buddhafiield of a buddha has set lamps he sees a Buddha from the five lights of wisdom through a slight clairvoyance and experiences five fires.

But since they have no idea what they are experiencing:

He then prepares a log of sandalwood with sesame oil and sets five heaps of fire; and even burns his own body.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 30th, 2014 at 1:25 AM

Title: Re: Mixing Buddhist and non-Buddhist Practices?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The reason why I do not express doubt about whether there can be realization of the same ultimate truths by those who do not follow Buddhadharma is that if such people did have the same realization as the Buddha and his followers, they would teach exactly what Buddha and his followers taught, i.e. dependent origination, emptiness and so on.

dzogchungpa said:

So if you decided that the Buddha did not in fact teach emptiness, which I believe was actually your position at one point, then you would hold that his realization was necessarily inferior in some way?

Malcolm wrote:

I never held that Buddha did not teach emptiness. He clearly did teach emptiness even if you only accept Hinayāna sutras as being valid. The emptiness he taught is the emptiness of dependent origination. He also taught freedom from extremes in the Hinayāna sutras even if the full ramifications of that were only fully explicated in the Prajñāpāramita.

Regardless of my past doubts about the authorship of Mahāyāna sūtras, I have always held them as being exemplars of Buddha's intention.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 30th, 2014 at 1:14 AM

Title: Re: Mixing Buddhist and non-Buddhist Practices?

Content:

Karma Dorje said:

He taught according to the needs, desires and predispositions of his students. This included having many Hindu students in India right up until his poor health prevented travel.

Malcolm wrote:

Allow me to illustrate a point. For example, I studied Yoga and Samkhya with Ramaswami. If someone should ask me to teach a course on the Yoga Sutras, then I would. I would present its point of view to those students who were interested in it.

When pressed, would I claim that I followed the version of liberation presented in that text? No, of course not, no more than Ramaswami, when pressed, admitted that he was an Advaitan, even though his guru, Krishnamācarya was a Vaiśnava in the Ramanuja tradition (Viśtādvaita).

If I am teachings Ayurveda, I teach Samkhya; when teaching Tibetan Medicine, I teach Buddhadharma. I think that the latter is more profound than the former. But Samkhya has its uses, even if its ultimate view is a problem.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 30th, 2014 at 12:56 AM

Title: Re: Mixing Buddhist and non-Buddhist Practices?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

There is no awakening outside of Buddhadharma. The best we can hope for those following the yānas of devas and humans is a higher rebirth and eventual contact with the Buddhadharma.

Karma Dorje said:

If there is one thing you like to do, it is to make sweeping and emphatic claims. After watching several of your volte-face, I can't help but wonder why you don't take a more aporetic stance.

However, you have your disposition and I have mine. As I said, there is precious little chance of either of us convincing the other of our respective positions.

Malcolm wrote:

There were some things which I hold as deep convictions: dependent origination, emptiness, rebirth and karma. I also deeply hold the conviction that apart from the Buddha and his followers, liberation as understood and taught by the Buddha is not achievable outside of his path. You can examine my posts for the past 20 years, and you will see that I never vary from these points. People like to make a big deal out of some superficial "volte faces" I have shared with you all, but in reality the core of what I understand to be unique about Buddhадharma has not changed in 20 years and will not change since it arises out of my experience of the teachings, as an examination of my posts will show.

The reason why I do not express doubt about whether there can be realization of the same ultimate truths by those who do not follow Buddhадharma is that if such people did have the same realization as the Buddha and his followers, they would teach exactly what Buddha and his followers taught, i.e. dependent origination, emptiness and so on. Since they don't teach Buddhадharma, I question the claim that they have realized what the Buddha realized. I don't think there has ever been anyone on this globe who has ever had realization superior to the Buddha's total perfect awakening, not in any Hindu sects, not in any Jain sects, much less traditional Chinese religion, Islam, Christianity, or Judaism. I do not think they even have partial realization.

Of course there is mundane wisdom in all of these non-Buddhist traditions, no one denies that. But when it comes right down to realizing the nature of reality, as the Rig pa rang shar points out:

As such, also the three hundred and sixty views can be gathered into four categories.

Further those can be included in eternalism and annihilationism.

Those also can be included in meaningless nihilism.

This is the extent of the worldly views.

and:

Likewise, the countless views of a self are included in two. Those are included in both the eternalist view and annihilationist view. Countless views of self come from those two.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 30th, 2014 at 12:35 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen: Query Regarding the 'Guru'

Content:

monktastic said:

I'll share a crazy idea.

If a tradition claims that realization simply cannot be had without a connection to its lineage, then perhaps those who were destined to attain a little realization anyway will not be bothered by this claim that seemingly contradicts their own experience.

Malcolm wrote:

That is not the claim that is being advanced. The claim that is being advanced is that Dzogchen refers to the result brought about through a specific path, the Dzogchen path. Mahamudra is a path brought about through its path [principally the two stages]; and Prajñāpāramita through its path [the six perfections].

These three results may be the same in essence, but the reason for the difference in name is that the paths used to reach this result are different.

On the other hand, Buddhism does claim that outside its purview there is no liberation at all.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 30th, 2014 at 12:28 AM

Title: Re: Mixing Buddhist and non-Buddhist Practices?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

...those modern perverts who think that Buddha taught a self and what pertains to a self...

dzogchungpa said:

Such as?

Malcolm wrote:

Its a pretty inclusive statement.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 30th, 2014 at 12:27 AM

Title: Re: Mixing Buddhist and non-Buddhist Practices?

Content:

Karma Dorje said:

Absolutely any symbol system can be used by a realized teacher to wake their students up.

Nonsense. You have absolutely no evidence that this is the case. In order to prove this, you would have to produce someone who achieved at minimum stream entry through a non-Buddhist "symbol system". Such a person never existed.

In whatsoever Dhamma and Discipline, Subhadda, there is not found the Noble Eightfold Path, neither is there found a true ascetic of the first, second, third, or fourth degree of saintliness. But in whatsoever Dhamma and Discipline there is found the Noble Eightfold Path, there is found a true ascetic of the first, second, third, and fourth degrees of saintliness.

Mahāparinibbana sutta.

The Buddha repeated this statement many times in earlier sutras.
Right view proceeding from yogi pratyakṣa can inform any approach.
How are you defining yogic pratyakṣa?

As I have said repeatedly, Buddhist dharma is more explicit and has more methods than any other system I have seen/practiced. However, not everyone has a karmic connection to it. If we can use the traces of sentient beings to hook them into their own awakening, we should. This is the point of infusing other systems with the energy of practice and realization.

Malcolm wrote:

There is no awakening outside of Buddhadharma. The best we can hope for those following the yānas of devas and humans is a higher rebirth and eventual contact with the Buddhadharma.

Does this mean we should stop teaching Yoga Sutras, etc.? No, of course not. But after a certain point it has to become clear to any practitioner where they have confidence and faith. If someone is really a Shaivaites, Vaishnava or even a follower of Franklin Jones, what need would they have to follow Buddhadharma? They've chosen their refuge. It is not our job to change that. But we should not, in a rush to ecumenicism, erase the distinction between Buddhadharma and Sanatanadharma. They do not point to the same reality, they do not have the same assumptions about karma, rebirth and liberation, and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 30th, 2014 at 12:14 AM

Title: Re: Mixing Buddhist and non-Buddhist Practices?

Content:

Karma Dorje said:

That's not the general Hindu view, if one can even say such a thing exists with the plethora of viewpoints comprised under the rubric "Hindu". Vicara is not intellectualization.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, provide your account of what liberation is in Hinduism as you understand it, and how it is attained. Then we will stack it up against what the Buddha taught and see how it measures up.

One of the difficulties here of course is that even the Buddhist idea of what constitutes rebirth is complete different than the Hindu idea. Ideas about whether karma are also totally different. The notion of a self of course has to be addressed, since this concept is refuted in Buddhadharma (apart from those modern perverts who think that Buddha taught a self and what pertains to a self), and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 29th, 2014 at 11:33 PM

Title: Re: Mixing Buddhist and non-Buddhist Practices?

Content:

conebeckham said:

...and there are some Buddhists, apparently, who think the intellect is sufficient for an experiential understanding of emptiness.

Just sayin'...

Malcolm wrote:

The point of course is that in Dharma, a correct conceptual understanding of emptiness is required to realize emptiness.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 29th, 2014 at 11:00 PM

Title: Re: Mixing Buddhist and non-Buddhist Practices?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Some people think realization can come about through meditation alone [this is the Hindu view in general].

dzogchungpa said:

Really? That's the Hindu view in general? Did you take a survey or something?

Malcolm wrote:

Well, there are some Advaitans who think you can just intellectualize your way to liberation...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 29th, 2014 at 10:58 PM

Title: Re: Dzogchen: Query Regarding the 'Guru'

Content:

Concordiadiscordi said:

"All authority of any kind, especially in the field of thought and understanding, is the most destructive, evil thing. Leaders destroy the followers and followers destroy the leaders."

Paul said:

That's dumb. These are not 'destructive, evil' people...

Malcolm wrote:

Well, the poor guy has no idea what he is waffling on about.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 29th, 2014 at 10:16 PM

Title: Re: Practices "for" ISIL

Content:

Ivo said:

The Dharmapalas can not be made to act on behalf of selfish intentions, but they will respond to someone with pure samaya who has legitimate concerns, even if this practitioner is still a samsaric being (and thus have a mixed motivation). If that was not the case, then only Buddhas would have been able to invoke them (absurd), and there would have been no point in any dharmapala practices, actually. The motivation of a practitioner on the path is always flawed, since there is still samsaric vision. But the intention to subdue gross violence through wrathful means is a legitimate one in Vajrayana, especially when we are requesting the Dharmapalas for help and not trying to liberate beings ourselves without the proper capacity or qualifications.

Malcolm is right that Dza Rahula should be invoked by all means necessary. As for wrathful yidam practices, these will work only if those doing them are qualified. I have my doubts that requesting a monastery to do that could be effective. At this point in time there are not many such practitioners, H.H. Sakya Trisin is certainly one of them, Chatral Rinpoche most definitely. Making a formal request to Namkhai Norbu Rinpoche about this however is the easiest option, IMHO, although I am pretty sure that he is already doing something about it. A real master performing Kilaya lower activity or something similar can do more than a thousand monastics mumbling mantras and waiting for the tea break.

My personal opinion is that ISIS is a very valid threat to the Dharma, in every possible sense. However this should not be an "us vs. them" situation, although I admit that it can very easily become just that. That's why there is a lot of merit in Greg's posts too.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 29th, 2014 at 10:08 PM

Title: Re: Mixing Buddhist and non-Buddhist Practices?

Content:

Karma Dorje said:

What we are talking about is whether realization is possible without having the specific conceptual frameworks of Buddhist dharma. I think that Buddhism provides a particularly clear conceptual framework and corpus of methods to discover the natural state. However, I don't believe those conceptual frameworks to deal with our confusion are of themselves a necessary precursor to realization.

You are free to choose whose opinions you value. I will continue to follow the words of my guru, as they accord with my experience after putting them into practice. Anyway, I know there is little chance of common ground on this issue at this time.

Malcolm wrote:

Your Guru was a Buddhist monk correct? A Nyingmapa correct? Someone who spent some time as a Hindu renunciate and then moved on to become a Buddhist practitioner?

This is hardly a ringing endorsement for your view that liberation, freedom from rebirth in samsara, is something your teacher held was possible outside of Buddhadharma.

Some people think realization can come about through meditation alone [this is the Hindu view in general]. But this is definitely not the Buddha's teaching. The Buddha's teaching is that view informs meditation.

Right view is at the head of the path.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 29th, 2014 at 9:32 PM

Title: Re: Dzogchen: Query Regarding the 'Guru'

Content:

Concordiadiscordi said:

“All authority of any kind, especially in the field of thought and understanding, is the most destructive, evil thing. Leaders destroy the followers and followers destroy the leaders. You have to be your own teacher and your own disciple. You have to question everything that man has accepted as valuable, as necessary. [...] To be free of all authority, of your own and that of another, is to die to everything of yesterday, so that your mind is always fresh, always young, innocent, full of vigor and passion. It is only in that state that one learns and observes. And for this a great deal of awareness is required, actual awareness of what is going on inside yourself, without correcting it or telling it what it should or should not be, because the moment you correct it you have established another authority, a censor.”

— J. Krishnamurti

Malcolm wrote:

Krishnamurti is not an authority on Dzogchen, or even Buddhadharma. His opinion is completely irrelevant to the topic at hand.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 29th, 2014 at 9:14 PM

Title: Re: Karma in Buddhism

Content:

Vajrasvapna said:

I believe Tibetan interpretation of Yogacara is incorrect...

Malcolm wrote:

It is not a Tibetan interpretation. It is the presentation of Yogacara which is found in the Yogacara section of the Tarkajvala of Bhavya.

Vajrasvapna said:

Khenchen Palden Sherab Rinpoche and Khenpo Tsewang Dongyal Rinpoche also have similar view with my "As Mipham Rinpoche states, to believe that tathagatagarbha is a substantially existent thing would contradict the teachings of both Nagarjuna and the Prajnaparamita Sutras. From Mipham's perspective, there is no contradiction between tathagatagarbha and Nagarjuna's teachings

Malcolm wrote:

Now you are conflating the Tathāgatagarbha and Yogacara schools.

Vajrasvapna said:

nor is there any contradiction between the teachings of Asanga and Nagarjuna; nor is there a contradiction between Rangtong and Shentong schools of thought.

Malcolm wrote:

Karl B identifies two kinds of presentations of the three natures. The one presented by Bhavya he terms type 1. The one presented in gzhan stong and in a couple of very late Indian texts he labels type 2. He admits that all the so called classical Yogachara authors, Asanga, Vasubandhu, etc., use the type 1 scheme.

Vajrasvapna said:

In my perception, Yogacara is a psychological view of the teachings of Prajnaparamita, together with the teachings of Maitreya. It is not a contradiction of the teachings of Nagarjuna.

Malcolm wrote:

Yogacara is a realist school. Their position forces them to assert that jñāna is real.

Vajrasvapna said:

It is curious that despite the Tibetans claim that prasangika represent the view of Dzogchen, Manjusrimitra states that logic is not really satisfactory:

Malcolm wrote:

You are not really understanding what it is about "Prasanga" that Longchenpa, for example, claims to be consistent with Dzogchen. It is not that the means of analysis that is the same, it is the conclusion, i.e., freedom from extremes.

Vajrasvapna said:

Some writers, like Namkhai Norbu, say Manjusrimitra was a scholar of Yogacara and so he used the terminology of this school to explain Dzogchen. I found no Manjusrimitra's biography, except this one: <http://www.dharmafellowship.org/biographies/historicalsaints/manjusrimitra.htm>.

It says he was not a scholar of Yogacara, but an anti-Yogacara: "The Mahapandit Manjusrimitra represented the classical, scholastic tradition of Madhyamaka. He was the uncontested head of the great monastic University of Nalanda, and thus representative of a long historical scholarly line that considered itself the pinnacle of orthodoxy. He viewed anything to do with Yogacara as a false doctrine". If true, then it makes nonsense to say that he was just using the term from a school that he advocated earlier.

Malcolm wrote:

Everything on that website should be viewed with suspicion.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 29th, 2014 at 8:29 PM

Title: Re: Dzogchen: Query Regarding the 'Guru'

Content:

Concordiadiscordi said:

Transmission may be necessary, but the cult of the guru is sorely mistaken in assuming that their preferred methodology is the only viable mode of transmission for attaining the Way, or Great Perfection.

Malcolm wrote:

The Dzogchen tradition itself asserts a Guru is necessary:

The virtuous mentor is like a precious jewel which produces everything.

— Soaring Great Garuda

Without an authentic master, like the scripture of a monkey, the basis and path will be erroneous, indeed one will be seized by conceptuality.

Therefore, like applying ferrous sulfate to gold, the precious master should be paid with a gem of inestimable value.

— The Inner Potentiality

The commentary to this runs:

For example, like applying ferrous sulfate to gold, a guru obtains the empowerment and agamas of the authentic lineage. The guru moistened by the experience of realization and who is diligent in the meaning possesses the qualities that are praised in the collections of the teachings. If one should meet a guru who is devoted to compassion and is diligent with teaching, he should be seen as teacher who is a great treasure. Make a request that corresponds with the collection of the teachings and please him with a positive attitude. Request the teachings, and thoroughly ascertain the view. One must understand the deviations and obscurations from beginning to end, and one must comprehend what is the point of the meaning.

It is thus axiomatic that in order to practice Dzogchen, one must find a qualified guru and follow that person until one has realized the goals of the path. There is really nothing to discuss with regard to this. People who express opinions contrary to what is stated in the tantras and agamas of Dzogchen about the absolute necessity of following a qualified master are merely expressing their ignorance. By persisting in such opinions, they merely widen the gulf between themselves and the possibility of finding such a qualified master.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 29th, 2014 at 6:35 AM

Title: Re: Mixing Buddhist and non-Buddhist Practices?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Now in turn, unless you can assure us that in fact you are speaking from detailed knowledge of having experienced and realized both paths, how can your perspective be anything other than a speculation based on your own suppositions or someone else's opinion?

Karma Dorje said:

Actually, relying on the words of an enlightened guru is not merely someone else's opinion-- it is buddhavacana.

Malcolm wrote:

In other words, someone else's opinion. Further, a guru's words are only buddhavacana to the extent that they correspond with the Dharma, as Sakya Pandita makes very clear.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 29th, 2014 at 4:10 AM

Title: Re: Mixing Buddhist and non-Buddhist Practices?

Content:

Karma Dorje said:

I am not saying it appears similar on first glance. I am saying that after years of practicing advaita vedanta and Shakta tantra with a guru, it's clear to me that there is little substantive difference between the resultant contemplations while the symbologies can diverge widely. Equally, it is clear that there are considerably more methods to work with in Buddhist dharma and it is in general more direct.

Malcolm wrote:

It is not the contemplations that are important, it is the view brought to contemplation that makes the difference. For example, there is no actual difference between the Hindu Nirvikalpa samadhi and Vajropama samadhi in terms of its content, but the fact that one is accompanied by insight and the other is not makes the difference between whether it is mundane or liberative.

Karma Dorje said:

Have you experienced the Hindu nirvikalpa or sahaja samadhi and compared the two or are you speculating based on texts?

Malcolm wrote:

I am not speculating, I am reporting what it is stated in the authoritative texts of the Buddhist tradition. Now, you may not feel that these texts are authoritative, but for me they are and that is the end of it.

When we talk about "insight" we are talking very specifically about the Buddha's experience of Vajropama samadhi and what he reports and teaches. This kind of non-conceptual samadhi, the samadhi of cessation merely creates causes for rebirth in this or that loka, like all mundane samadhis and dhyanas unless one has attained the path of seeing.

Now in turn, unless you can assure us that in fact you are speaking from detailed knowledge of having experienced and realized both paths, how can your perspective be anything other than a speculation based on your own suppositions or someone else's opinion?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 29th, 2014 at 2:07 AM

Title: Re: Mixing Buddhist and non-Buddhist Practices?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

It is not the contemplations that are important, it is the view brought to contemplation that makes the difference

dzogchungpa said:

How do you know that?

Malcolm wrote:

buddha said so.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 29th, 2014 at 1:46 AM

Title: Re: Mixing Buddhist and non-Buddhist Practices?

Content:

Karma Dorje said:

I am not saying it appears similar on first glance. I am saying that after years of practicing advaita vedanta and Shakta tantra with a guru, it's clear to me that there is little substantive difference between the resultant contemplations while the symbologies can diverge widely. Equally, it is clear that there are considerably more methods to work with in Buddhist dharma and it is in general more direct.

Malcolm wrote:

It is not the contemplations that are important, it is the view brought to contemplation that makes the difference. For example, there is no actual difference between the Hindu Nirvikalpa samadhi and Vajropama samadhi in terms of its content, but the fact that one is accompanied by insight and the other is not makes the difference between whether it is mundane or liberative.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 29th, 2014 at 1:21 AM

Title: Re: Mixing Buddhist and non-Buddhist Practices?

Content:

Anders said:

In either case, the territory is your own mind.

Malcolm wrote:

Not necessarily so. Take Samkhya for example. Your own mind [manas] is regarded as being inert and non-sentient. The whole Buddhist project, according to a Yoga-Samkhya perspective is just involvement in prakṛiti, at the expense of realizing puruṣa, etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 29th, 2014 at 1:14 AM

Title: Re: Mixing Buddhist and non-Buddhist Practices?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, and I don't agree since this assumes that one cannot examine a map to understand the layout of two distinct geographical regions.

Karma Dorje said:

Except that in this case you are talking about two maps that use different landmarks to portray a single territory, not a single map of two regions. Unless one has actually walked the terrain by both routes, it seems pointless to me to merely use one map to invalidate the other. But this is obviously not a discussion that we can resolve one way or another.

Malcolm wrote:

Don't think I agree, the basis and result posited are different, despite that what may at first glance appear to similar terrain.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 29th, 2014 at 12:51 AM

Title: Re: Mixing Buddhist and non-Buddhist Practices?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Ajātivāda was borrowed from Mahāyāna into Advaita by Gaudapada.

But since it is not grounded in dependent origination, even Gaudapada's presentation misses the point.

Anyway, as you and I have discussed before, I do not think that the various liberations bandied about by this and that school are even commensurate with one another. That is to say, I don't think non-Buddhists and so on are necessarily in the same mountain range as Buddhādharma, much less climbing the same mountain.

Karma Dorje said:

Yes, it all hinges on how much the ideas about liberation matter compared with the realization that arises from contemplation. From what my guru taught and what I have seen in my own experience, the conceptual structures really don't need to be compared with a view to a single correct doctrinal viewpoint, as correct doctrine for each being is a factor of his or her own traces and predisposition.

I think one needs to receive the Mahāvākyas from a lineage teacher and practice them to realization before one can comment on their topography relative to Buddhist dharma. I don't think that treating Advaita strictly as an intellectual position is of much use.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, and I don't agree since this assumes that one cannot examine a map to understand the layout of two distinct geographical regions.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 28th, 2014 at 11:35 PM

Title: Re: A small victory, still more questions than answers

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

You finished the full 111,111 repetitions of the 100 syllable mantra?

Challenge23 said:

My teacher stated that he only wanted 100,000 but other than that, yes.

Malcolm wrote:

Considering that you have had countless past lifetimes, it is a bit much to expect that 100,000 mantras is going to remove the negativity of all of that. However, there are specific signs of accomplishing the practice. If you have those signs, then you have really accomplished the goals of the practice. Counting a number is really not the point.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 28th, 2014 at 11:28 PM

Title: Re: Mixing Buddhist and non-Buddhist Practices?

Content:

Sönam said:

As far as Buddha's teaching is about cessation of suffering, it is the only dharma doing so ... and it cannot be compared to any other dharma. Doing so is a fallacy.

Karma Dorje said:

I think much too much is made of doctrine. Any symbol system can be used by a siddha to wake people up, including Christianity. It's just that some are more direct than others and some (like Christianity) put a lot of unnecessary doctrinal obstacles in the way.

It is certainly not a fallacy to compare Buddhist dharma with other very similar systems like ajātivāda advaita vedanta, or better yet to practice either or both. Everyone likes to think they have a monopoly on Truth. It creates a lot of unnecessary division.

Malcolm wrote:

Ajātivāda was borrowed from Mahdyamaka into Advaita by Gaudapada.

But since it is not grounded in dependent origination, even Gaudapada's presentation misses the point.

Anyway, as you and I have discussed before, I do not think that the various liberations bandied about by this and that school are even commensurate with one another. That is to say, I don't think non-Buddhists and so on are necessarily in the same mountain range as Buddhadharma, much less climbing the same mountain.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 28th, 2014 at 8:51 PM

Title: Re: 13 Bhumi model?

Content:

zenman said:

Which school uses the 13 bhumi model? Any good sources/books on this?

Malcolm wrote:

It comes from the mother tantras. In general the path section of Kongtrul's Buddhist Encyclopedia should have something on it.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 28th, 2014 at 8:34 PM

Title: Re: Mixing Buddhist and non-Buddhist Practices?

Content:

Dan74 said:

OK, for me this thread was about using non-Buddhist methods in with Buddhist methods, not following two religions. I gave some examples of folks who did follow Buddhism as well as Christianity and it might be worth giving them a look, but this is not something I identify with, nor have I given it any attention so far.

Malcolm wrote:

It is axiomatically impossible to be both a Christian, in the sense of accepting Jesus as your lord and savior, and a Buddhist.

Dan74 said:

On the other hand, what I've said in this thread is simply that various aspects of other traditions (and for that matter psychology, etc) can be helpful on our path to liberation.

Malcolm wrote:

For example?

Dan74 said:

Whether or not one attends the mass, taking to heart Jesus's teachings and being inspired by his example, is following aspects of Christianity, though one may not call oneself a Christian, nor accept Jesus as lord and saviour.

Malcolm wrote:

That's a stretch.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 28th, 2014 at 3:57 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen: Query Regarding the 'Guru'

Content:

Will said:

Concord paraphrased: What I question is whether such a teacher or guide would necessarily have to be flesh and blood?

Paul said:

Interestingly, in the Zhang Zhung Nyengyud lineage, the first master of the lineage was a deva called Lhabon Yongsu Dagpa and the second was a naga, Lubon Banam. Everyone after that was a human.

Malcolm wrote:

well, depending on how the lineage is counted, also prior to Dzogchen spreading in human dimensions, there were vidyādhara for the nāgas and so on as well.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 28th, 2014 at 3:52 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen: Query Regarding the 'Guru'

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The only people who disagree that Dzogchen is the most direct path are people who honestly have no idea what Dzogchen is.

dzogchungpa said:

What do you mean by direct in this context?

Malcolm wrote:

immediate, direct, personal experience of your real state, etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 28th, 2014 at 2:08 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen: Query Regarding the 'Guru'

Content:

Will said:

Concord paraphrased: What I question is whether such a teacher or guide would necessarily have to be flesh and blood?

No, but the realms of the non-physical are chock full of bad entities that delight in impersonating Sages and great Gurus. An 'ordinary' human guru has a lineage and disciples that can attest to his qualifications, in addition to your own impressions. The non-physical 'guide' has only your unenlightened self and the assertions from it to help you appraise him.

Malcolm wrote:

This is based upon the fact that ordinary people can only interact on the nirmanakāya level. Therefore, coarse physical contact with a human guru is a necessity for all of us who were not born high bodhisattvas on the stages.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 28th, 2014 at 1:09 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen: Query Regarding the 'Guru'

Content:

LastLegend said:

Dzogchen has a unique way to access it?

Jikan said:

This one.

Dharmakaya is Dharmakaya, realization is realization in whatever school you might practice in.

Dzogchenpas claim that the difference is in the time it takes someone to realize it by different means (Dzogchen being the fastest). And yes, different schools disagree.

Malcolm wrote:

The only people who disagree that Dzogchen is the most direct path are people who honestly have no idea what Dzogchen is.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 28th, 2014 at 12:51 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen: Query Regarding the 'Guru'

Content:

Jikan said:

"Buddhahood is the goal" is the theme in common between Ekayana teachings and Dzogchen.

Malcolm wrote:

In general, Tibetan Buddhism has a whole subscribes the Ekayāna ideal since there is but one result to attain.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 28th, 2014 at 12:43 AM

Title: Re: Keeping Precepts your experience

Content:

duckfiasco said:

Precepts are very difficult for some people.

Malcolm wrote:

Most people can refrain from taking life, lying and stealing.

Sexual misconduct and drinking alcohol, that is a little harder.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 27th, 2014 at 10:46 PM

Title: Re: Sadhana of Mahamudra (Trungpa)

Content:

Jikan said:

Some time ago I paid a visit to a local Shambhala center, and joined in the practice of the Sadhana of Mahamudra. There was a brief instruction prior. It seems to me that there's a lot going on in this sadhana that no introduction can cover. I'd like to understand this practice better so that next time I have the opportunity to join in, I'll be able to participate more fully.

Does anyone have any audio materials available on this practice that are unrestricted they may wish to make available to me?

Many thanks.

Malcolm wrote:

It's an anuyoga Hūṃ sgrub. Apart from details, that is the main point.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 27th, 2014 at 10:45 PM

Title: Re: Dzogchen: Query Regarding the 'Guru'

Content:

Konch said:

Well.. According to Dzogchen history if Im not mistaken, Garab Dorje first received the dzogchen teachings not from a human teacher.

Malcolm wrote:

Garab Dorje was a nirmanakāya, awakened from birth.

Konch said:

Dudjom Lingpa also comes to mind in this case due to the colourful nature in which he received the dzogchen teachings.

Malcolm wrote:

Dudjom Lingpa has many gurus when he was young.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 27th, 2014 at 10:24 PM

Title: Re: Dzogchen: Query Regarding the 'Guru'

Content:

Concordiadiscordi said:

My personal conviction is that no single tradition, school, lineage, or method may lay claim to an exclusive monopoly on the Great Perfection.

Malcolm wrote:

Dzogchen is the name of the result of a specific path, just as Prajñāpāramita is the name of the result of a different specific path, and Mahāmudra the name of the result of yet another path.

If you want to realize Buddhahood under the name of Dzogchen, you need to receive teachings on it and practice that path. Dzogchen is something very specific and very precise and the instructions to realize its path is not found in other schools. It is not a question of whether the Buddhahood in Dzogchen is the same or different than Buddhahood realized in sutra or tantra, it isn't. But the path is quite different.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 27th, 2014 at 4:54 AM

Title: Re: Practices "for" ISIL

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The point greg, is that you entered the thread with a patronizing:

Sherab Dorje said:

Instead of looking to subjugate the negativity of others, one would probably be better off in trying to overcome their own mental poisons.

Really? And here is me thinking that was the whole point of Mahayana Buddhist practice: identifying and dealing with ones own flaws. Then, we spent three pages trying to keep the page on topic.

Checking ones motivation before engaging in (especially wrathful subjugation) practices is not off-topic in the slightest.

Malcolm wrote:

Actually, Greg, we were discussing a Vajrayāna practice.

Edited out personal remarks.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 27th, 2014 at 4:05 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen: Query Regarding the 'Guru'

Content:

Concordiadiscordi said:

The myriad things surely cannot be exhausted by books and humans alone?

Malcolm wrote:

"gcig shes kun grol"

Knowing one thing liberates all things.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 27th, 2014 at 4:04 AM

Title: Re: Practices "for" ISIL

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Your point was irrelevant, actually.

Sherab Dorje said:

I'm not interested in having to wring complete answers out of you Malcolm. The show is all yours.

Malcolm wrote:

The point greg, is that you entered the thread with a patronizing:

Sherab Dorje said:

Instead of looking to subjugate the negativity of others, one would probably be better off in trying to overcome their own mental poisons.

Malcolm wrote:

Then, we spent three pages trying to keep the page on topic.

Edited out personal remarks.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 27th, 2014 at 3:50 AM

Title: Re: Practices "for" ISIL

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

Yes, well, I think I'm about finished here.

Mkoll said:

Maybe if you were arguing in a different sub-forum, you'd have a good case. But coming from a relatively less biased observer (less biased since I don't practice Tibetan Buddhism though that also means more ignorant of it), it seems as though Malcolm's list confirms the opposing argument.

Sherab Dorje said:

Even if one has the qualities in the list then... But STILL one needs the correct motivation on behalf of the practitioner. Somebody may qualify based on the listed qualities, but I may "target" them because their dog crapped on my lawn rather than... in which case...

I fail to see how my reasoning is incorrect and instead of answers I am given smoke screens, so I'm finished here, mainly coz there is nothing left to learn.

Malcolm wrote:

Your point was irrelevant, actually.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 27th, 2014 at 2:50 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen: Query Regarding the 'Guru'

Content:

Concordiadiscordi said:

Do you deem it absolutely necessary to establish a direct relationship with a living guru of explicitly human form in order to engage the Way of Dzogchen?

Malcolm wrote:

Of course. You cannot receive transmission from a book.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 27th, 2014 at 2:45 AM

Title: Re: Practices "for" ISIL

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

irrelevancies snipped

Malcolm wrote:

I disagree with your assumptions about people's motivations. But usual, you must have some magic crystal you examine which allows you to know with certainty what other people are thinking.

Sherab Dorje said:

Yes,well, I already explained my hypothesis, but you did not answer my question. The question is (maybe I didn't phrase it clearly): Do you believe that ego-centred motivation destroys the efficacy of a practice?

Malcolm wrote:

It depends on what you mean by "ego-centered".

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 27th, 2014 at 2:31 AM

Title: Re: Practices "for" ISIL

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

irrelevancies snipped

Malcolm wrote:

I disagree with your assumptions about people's motivations.

Edited out personal remarks.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 27th, 2014 at 1:52 AM

Title: Re: Practices "for" ISIL

Content:

ngodrup said:

Therefore, the original post is reasonable.

Malcolm wrote:
Yes, of course it is.

ngodrup said:
Every day at dusk, without fail, Jamdrak would perform a short subjugation ritual and throw a torma-an offering cake, which symbolized a weapon-toward the east.

"Rinpoche, why do you do this every day?" Jokiyab asked him.
"Oh dear!" the master explained. "From a country in the east, an evil force will rise up. It will utterly and completely destroy the Buddha's teachings in this snowy land of Tibet and leave the country in pitch-black darkness. This force cannot be stopped, but merely trying to stop it brings more benefit than if I were to chant the ritual for the peaceful and wrathful deities one hundred times and light ten thousand butter lamps. When I throw this torma, I imagine hitting the demon square in the head. It won't help, though; no one can repel this demon. Nevertheless, simply by trying, I will accumulate great merit and purify obscurations on the path to enlightenment."

Malcolm wrote:
— Blazing Splendor, pg. 178

We already know from the Kalacakra that at some point the mlecchas will take over the most of the world. Then we know what happens when Rudracakravartin magically defeats them in 2430.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Wednesday, August 27th, 2014 at 1:41 AM
Title: Re: Practices "for" ISIL
Content:

Malcolm wrote:
You may believe as you wish.

Sherab Dorje said:
There are two separate points being made here, which one are you responding to?

Malcolm wrote:
Both.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Wednesday, August 27th, 2014 at 1:37 AM

Title: Re: Practices "for" ISIL

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

I mean they (Christians) are continuing their mission of trying to destroy Islam in Afghanistan and Iraq, for example, and are currently re-establishing their mission to destroy Judaism in Europe (again). Actually the Jews had an infinitely better time under the rule of the Muslim Ottoman Empire than they ever did under a Christian Empire. But this is an aside, since they are not attacking Buddhists I shouldn't care right?

Malcolm wrote:

You can care if you choose to, but such people are not included in the zhing bcu tshang ba'i bstan dgra, so it would be inappropriate to apply wrathful rites to such people. What is a zhing bcu tshang ba'i bstan dgra, an enemy of the doctrine in whom ten domains are complete? They are someone who would

- 1) Harm the teachings
- 2) Despise the Three Jewels, Buddha, Dharma and Sangha
- 3) Plunder the Sangha
- 4) Despise Mahāyāna
- 5) Harm the person of the Guru.
- 6) Attack Vajra siblings
- 7) Cause obstacles in practice
- 8) Has total lack of love and compassion
- 9) Lacks samaya
- 10 Has false views about the result of karma.

I think it is fair to say that the extremists in IS fit the bill. It's not about Islam per se. It is about these kinds of people in general no matter what tirthika religious group they belong to. That worldly protector some Gelugpas are fond of also fits the bill for such wrathful actions.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 27th, 2014 at 1:24 AM

Title: Re: Practices "for" ISIL

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Ordinary aggressors simply do not warrant such rites since they are no threat to the Dharma.

Sherab Dorje said:

All ignorant aggression is a threat to Dharma. An attack on any sentient being, is an attack on that beings enlightened nature. An attack on the Triple Gem.

Malcolm wrote:

Greg, the requisites for being considered a subject worthy of being the object of a wrathful rite are pretty specific. Attacking an ant mound just does not qualify that anteater for being the object of such a rite.

Further, the point is that such rites, conducted by people such as H Sakya Trizin and so on, have the power to liberate the consciousness of those demonic beings into the dharmadhātu. This is why we have so many such rites in Tibetan Buddhism in all four schools. They are not there merely for their symbolic value.

Sherab Dorje said:

Again though, what people are failing to see, and what I have been talking about from the very beginning, is that with an ego-centred motivation (and here you were just trying to justify an ego-centred motivation by camouflaging it with the term Dharma) the protector practice is bound to fail.

Malcolm wrote:

You may believe as you wish.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 27th, 2014 at 1:04 AM

Title: Re: Practices "for" ISIL

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

Please note: if people do not want this thread to end up locked and deleted (like almost every thread that even remotely touches on the subject of Islam) due to sweeping Islamophobic prejudicial remarks then they would do well to refrain from them.

Malcolm wrote:

While Muslims are not ipso facto bad people (quite the contrary), it must be recognized that Buddhism and Islam can barely coexist on the same planet — not because of Buddhist intolerance, but because of the systematic Islamic intolerance of other religions, specially the Salafis. The Saudis have been exporting Salafism for years.

Please keep in mind that Muslims wiped Persia clean of Zoroastrians within the space of 250 years, systematically forcing conversions and so on.

"Allah commanded us, by the mouth of His Prophet, to extend the dominion of Islam over all nations."

— History of the Parsis: including their manners, customs, religion, pg. 15; Dosabhai Framji Karaka, 1884.

Thus far, I see nothing to indicate that this fundamental mission statement has changed.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 27th, 2014 at 12:43 AM

Title: Re: Practices "for" ISIL

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

IS has threatened to destroy a major Buddhist heritage site. They are self-proclaimed enemies of Dharma.

Ukrainian and Israeli nationalists have declared no such program, therefore, there is no reason to petition Dharmapalas to defeat them.

Sherab Dorje said:

Exactly. So because some here see it as a personal threat to their illusory sense of self, they react panic stricken wanting to lash out at a perceived enemy, but since the others (Ukrainian and Israeli nationalists) are not a personal threat, they don't care: self-centred egotistical motivation.

Malcolm wrote:

Threatening the Dharma threatens all sentient beings since the Dharma is the only source of refuge in samsara. Sponsoring wrathful pujas to counter the power of demonic human beings bent on destroying the Dharma is nothing but compassionate and benefits all sentient beings, including the demonic humans who are the object of such pujas.

Ordinary aggressors simply do not warrant such rites since they are no threat to the Dharma.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 27th, 2014 at 12:31 AM

Title: Re: Vajradhara-title

Content:

zenman said:

What is the meaning of the title Vajradhara as in Vajradhara Chogyam Trungpa? Thanks.

Malcolm wrote:

It is Vidyādhara and it means "bearer of knowledge".

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 27th, 2014 at 12:13 AM

Title: Re: Practices "for" ISIL

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

IS has threatened to destroy a major Buddhist heritage site. They are self-proclaimed enemies of Dharma.

Ukranian and Israeli nationalists have declared no such program, therefore, there is no reason to petition Dharmapalas to defeat them.

Will said:

What about many Muslims being active now in destroying, opposing and being hostile to Buddhism everywhere? Why confine the Dharmapalas work to just one group?

Jikan said:

I've found the Muslims in my neighborhood and workplace to be supportive of my Buddhist activities--quite the opposite of destroying, opposing, and being hostile to them. The only opposition I've had has been from the most conservative corners of the "megachurch" movement, and from (weirdly enough!) the author of a recent book on "contemplative pedagogy." not sure what that was about.

I bring it up because it's important to be very careful indeed with the blanket generalizations.

Malcolm wrote:

I would imagine Will was talking about Talibans in Afghanistan and so on. But nevertheless, we will always be kaffirs...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, August 26th, 2014 at 11:48 PM

Title: Re: Practices "for" ISIL

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

IS has threatened to destroy a major Buddhist heritage site. They are self-proclaimed enemies of Dharma.

Ukranian and Israeli nationalists have declared no such program, therefore, there is no reason to petition Dharmapalas to defeat them.

Will said:

What about many Muslims being active now in destroying, opposing and being hostile to Buddhism everywhere? Why confine the Dharmapalas work to just one group?

Malcolm wrote:

They are under surveillance

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, August 26th, 2014 at 11:20 PM

Title: Re: Practices "for" ISIL

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

And that is why the wrathful practices will fail, because (in this case) they are motivated by selfish egotistical concern. By hope and fear. That is why you don't hear anybody asking for practices to overcome the slaughter of innocent Palestinians, or the genocidal actions of Ukrainian nationalists, etc... because they don't feel that these are a threat to their own personal well-being. Well, sorry to be the one to inform you but protectors are not in the business of fortifying ego.

Malcolm wrote:

IS has threatened to destroy a major Buddhist heritage site. They are self-proclaimed enemies of Dharma.

Ukrainian and Israeli nationalists have declared no such program, therefore, there is no reason to petition Dharmapalas to defeat them.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, August 26th, 2014 at 6:50 AM

Title: Re: Practices "for" ISIL

Content:

aparajita said:

So, moving right along, does anyone have any suggestions about who might be most effective in performing these practices?

Malcolm wrote:

HH Sakya Trizen, Chatral Sangye Dorje, HH Taklung Tsetrul, etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, August 26th, 2014 at 3:34 AM

Title: Re: Practices "for" ISIL

Content:

aparajita said:

I've been thinking of starting a gofundme to raise funds for sponsoring 1,000,000 Dorje Drollo mantras (or maybe Guru Drakphur,) 1,000,000 Vajrakilaya mantras, and 1,000,000 Singhamukha mantras (with the appropriate number of activity mantras too), and a large number of protector offerings. Maybe Palden Lhamo? I'm just guessing here, but it seems like the mamos would be particularly effective in dealing with people who follow a harsh, paternalistic religion (maybe?).

Malcolm wrote:

Not Magzorma, rather Rahula is the appropriate dharmapala for this purpose.

aparajita said:

I'm curious as to why. PM me if that's a better option than replying on here.

Malcolm wrote:

Because Rahula is the Dharmapala for destroying enemies of the Dharma, and IS certainly fits the bill.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, August 25th, 2014 at 7:20 PM

Title: Re: Practices "for" ISIL

Content:

aparajita said:

I've been thinking of starting a gofundme to raise funds for sponsoring 1,000,000 Dorje Drollo mantras (or maybe Guru Drakphur,) 1,000,000 Vajrakilaya mantras, and 1,000,000 Singhamukha mantras (with the appropriate number of activity mantras too), and a large number of protector offerings. Maybe Palden Lhamo? I'm just guessing here, but it seems like the mamos would be particularly effective in dealing with people who follow a harsh, paternalistic religion (maybe?).

Malcolm wrote:

Not Magzorma, rather Rahula is the appropriate dharmapala for this purpose.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, August 25th, 2014 at 6:41 AM

Title: Re: Dual citizenship

Content:

Seishin said:

I think that is a bit of confusion with terminology. UK does allow dual nationality (my wife and several friends and family members have dual nationality). A "British Subject" isn't the same as "British citizen" https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/British_subject " onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;" onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

Gassho,

Seishin

Malcolm wrote:

Interesting.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, August 25th, 2014 at 5:02 AM

Title: Re: Dual citizenship

Content:

kirtu said:

Not so. The US went all in on dual citizenship in the late 70's. Many nations permit dual citizenship like those weaklings the UK, Sweden, France and Switzerland. Ironically Holland and Germany stepped back from dual citizenship during the 70's although Germany now permits some forms of dual citizenship (technically Holland does too again but it's more restricted certainly than Germany or the US). The weak/strong country concept you are advancing is nonsense.

Malcolm wrote:

The UK does not permit you to be a dual citizen. They simply don't recognize that you have abandoned your citizenship unless you make a specific declaration to a British authority even if you for example renounced your allegiance to Britain by becoming a US citizen.

kirtu said:

That's not what the Her Majesty's https://www.gov.uk/government/uploads/system/uploads/attachment_data/file/261499/bn18.pdf says:

THE LAW IN THE UNITED KINGDOM

1. A person is a dual national if he or she holds more than one nationality or citizenship at the same time. There are normally no restrictions, in United Kingdom law, on British nationals having the citizenship of one or more other countries as well. So you will not need to give up any other nationality if you become British (but see paragraphs 2 - 4 below). Similarly, if you are a British national and you acquire another nationality, you will not normally lose your British nationality. However, special rules apply to British protected persons and certain British subjects (see Note 1).

Kirt

Malcolm wrote:

Note one says:

If you are a British subject, you will lose that status automatically if you acquire any other nationality or citizenship (unless you are a British subject by connection with Ireland). If you are a British protected person, you will lose that status on acquiring any other nationality or citizenship.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, August 25th, 2014 at 4:58 AM

Title: Re: Dual citizenship

Content:

David N. Snyder said:

The U.S. allows her citizens to have dual-citizenship (if they so choose) with about 60 different nations:

Mkoll said:

I've heard that a US citizen who leaves still has to pay taxes to the US gov't, no matter where one goes. Is that true?

Malcolm wrote:

Not exactly. They have to pay taxes to the US when their income in that foreign country exceeds a certain amount, which is fairly high.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, August 25th, 2014 at 4:56 AM

Title: Re: Dual citizenship

Content:

David N. Snyder said:

The U.S. allows her citizens to have dual-citizenship (if they so choose) with about 60 different nations:

<http://www.immihelp.com/citizenship/dual-citizenship-recognize-countries.html> "onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;" onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

I knew about Israel because I have some family members that have done that, but didn't know that Iran was allowed.

Malcolm wrote:

sort of, this is what the State Department says:

Also, a person who is automatically granted another nationality does not risk losing U.S. nationality. However, a person who acquires a foreign nationality by applying for it may lose U.S. nationality. In order to lose U.S. nationality, the law requires that the person must apply for the foreign nationality voluntarily, by free choice, and with the intention to give up U.S. nationality.

So in a case where another state grants one citizenship through marriage and so on, one can be a "dual citizen", but the website also stipulates that such a person when traveling must enter and leave using their US passport.

It also says:

The U.S. Government recognizes that dual nationality exists but does not encourage it as a matter of policy because of the problems it may cause.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, August 25th, 2014 at 4:50 AM

Title: Re: Mixing Buddhist and non-Buddhist Practices?

Content:

M.G. said:

@Malcolm - That was a very informative answer.

Are there historical evidences of practitioners studying under, say, both Vajrayana and Hindu gurus?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, of course. The Natha tradition grew out of Hindu-Buddhist syncretism and many Nathas followed Buddhist gurus even though they may have begun as Hindus, such as the Indian Buddhaguptanatha, Tārānatha's teacher.

M.G. said:

Interesting. Were aspects of Hindu yogic practice actually adopted by Buddhists and seen as conducive to liberation? Or was it more along the lines of learning worldly rites?

Malcolm wrote:

It is not really possible to explore this in a simple post. However, the long and short of it is that the highest Buddhist tantric systems present the body in a way entirely different than lower Buddhist schools such as Theravada and general Mahāyāna, or even lower tantra. In lower schools, things like the three kāyas and so on are exteriorized, but in the highest tantric systems they are understood to be implicit in the very structure of the body itself. The way the body is understood in Hindu systems is really not the same, so no, I do not think one can say that aspects of yoga as understood by Hindus were adopted by Buddhists.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, August 25th, 2014 at 2:08 AM

Title: Re: Mixing Buddhist and non-Buddhist Practices?

Content:

kirtu said:

Not so. The US went all in on dual citizenship in the late 70's. Many nations permit dual citizenship like those weaklings the UK, Sweden, France and Switzerland. Ironically Holland and Germany stepped back from dual citizenship during the 70's although Germany now permits some forms of dual citizenship (technically Holland does too again but it's more restricted certainly than Germany or the US). The weak/strong country concept you are advancing is nonsense.

Malcolm wrote:

The UK does not permit you to be a dual citizen. They simply don't recognize that you have abandoned your citizenship unless you make a specific declaration to a British authority even if you for example renounced your allegiance to Britain by becoming a US citizen. Anyway, Kirt, this is off topic.

Traditionally, as you know, you cannot serve two kings, as the metaphor goes, and that was the point. You cannot have refuge in Dharma and also have refuge in Christianity.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, August 25th, 2014 at 1:32 AM

Title: Re: Mixing Buddhist and non-Buddhist Practices?

Content:

kirtu said:

I personally have denied that one could benefit from the dharma of gods and men but I was wrong. Some/most people can benefit as long as they are secure in refuge in the Buddhadharma. So Hindu mantras and some practices, for example, can have a place. See Mipham's Verses to the Eight Noble Auspicious One's for example. This includes a constrained invocation of Shiva and Ishvara.

Kirt

Malcolm wrote:

Who ever said there was no benefit in the Dharma of gods and humans? It assures birth in higher realms, as mentioned above.

If you bothered to read the thread carefully you will note that we addressed the issue of mundane practices from Hinduism already.

Weak countries may let you have citizenship in two nations, but if you are a US citizen, you cannot be a citizen of another country, unless you are a minor, but at some point you have to choose.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, August 25th, 2014 at 12:44 AM

Title: Re: Mixing Buddhist and non-Buddhist Practices?

Content:

Sönam said:

The fact is that there is more buddhists than follower of buddhadharma ...

Sönam

Malcolm wrote:

Ironic.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, August 25th, 2014 at 12:28 AM

Title: Re: Bug in "The Practice of Dzogchen"

Content:

Sönam said:

Yes, it seems they are unequipped to answer ... we have asked the right for a publication they hold the copyright, and it tooks months before they contact their agency in Paris for they contact us.

Sönam

Malcolm wrote:

Snow Lion was sold to Shambhala in May 11, 2012. But I am sure they were in negotiations for a long while before hand. Hence, their lack of response, I imagine.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, August 25th, 2014 at 12:22 AM

Title: Re: Mixing Buddhist and non-Buddhist Practices?

Content:

duckfiasco said:

We cannot allow our warm and fuzzy feelings obscure the fact that Buddhadharma is something very precise and specific. It is not a method of "becoming a better person", nor is it a method of "resolving our unresolved issues", nor is it a practice of "mindfulness", nor is it a method of "becoming more compassionate", and so on. All of these things reduce Buddhadharma to the level of pop self-help manuals. Nor should we negate the very real benefits Buddhism has for ordinary beings to be happy in this world, which can engender faith in them to pursue the path to its completion.

Malcolm wrote:

We don't negate it, but we don't use mundane benefits to to sell the Dharma. If our motivation for practicing Dharma is merely to be happier in this life, then we are not practicing Dharma at all.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, August 24th, 2014 at 11:55 PM

Title: Re: Mixing Buddhist and non-Buddhist Practices?

Content:

Dan74 said:

So let me get this straight - a Buddhist who is inspired by stories about Jesus's life and some teachings which help him cultivate kindness, forbearance and compassion, is wasting his time and getting further away from liberation?

I see plenty of potential for people to be inspired by all sorts of stories, teachings, day-to-day occurrences. There is Dharma in all sorts of places if one knows how to see.

Malcolm wrote:

Dan, what is the topic of the thread? "Mixing Buddhist and non-Buddhist Practices", right?

So, essentially, we are not talking about whether Jesus is an inspiring character for someone, our warm feelings about St., Francis of Assisi and so on.

We are talking about a technical issues, e.g, for example, whether one ought to sincerely attend a Catholic Mass, looking for redemption, as a Buddhist. In other words, we are discussing the appropriateness of someone who claims to follow Buddhадharma who also asserts that Jesus Christ is their lord and savior.

Someone who has taken refuge in the Three Jewels cannot at the same time take Jesus Christ as their lord and savior. They may imagine that they can, but all they succeed in doing is ignorantly destroying their refuge in the Three Jewels.

This is also the case with teachings such as emptiness and dependent origination. For example, I heard HH Dalai Lama, that bastion of ecumenicalism, state in 2005 in Tucson, AZ, that emptiness was not the business of Christians and that he generally felt that Christians ought to mind their own business. Emptiness, he said, was the business of followers of Buddhадharma, and that is was inappropriate for Christians to be interested in it. Why? Because Christians believe in ex nihilo creation, souls, and so on. Ex nihilo creation and dependent origination are mutually incompatible. One does not need to be a Buddhist to see this, as Lucretius said, ex nihilo nihil fit, "nothing comes from nothing" (but we leave all similarity with epicurean materialism here).

It's a little different with Hinduism and Buddhадharma. There are many mundane rites Buddhists can avail themselves of from Hinduism, and have done so for millennia. Even so, it is inappropriate for those who have taken refuge in the Three Jewels to take refuge in Brahma, Shiva or Vishnu and so on because the latter are mundane gods who have not realized the nature of reality and are themselves trapped in samsara, like Jesus, Allah, Jehovah, etc.

We cannot allow our warm and fuzzy feelings obscure the fact that Buddhадharma is something very precise and specific. It is not a method of "becoming a better person", nor is it a method of "resolving our unresolved issues", nor is it a practice of "mindfulness", nor is it a method of "becoming more compassionate", and so on. All of these things reduce Buddhадharma to the level of pop self-help manuals.

If someone from outside the Dharma wants to enter the Dharma he or she must leave their previous refuge behind. You cannot have two feet in two boats (try it, it is really, really difficult), you cannot serve two masters, etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, August 24th, 2014 at 11:09 PM

Title: Re: Mixing Buddhist and non-Buddhist Practices?

Content:

Unknown said:

These are just a few qualities I've observed in some followers of other religions that I could do well to improve in.

Malcolm wrote:

BTW Dan, there are decent people everywhere. That does not take a religion.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, August 24th, 2014 at 11:04 PM

Title: Re: Mixing Buddhist and non-Buddhist Practices?

Content:

M.G. said:

@Malcolm - That was a very informative answer.

Are there historical evidences of practitioners studying under, say, both Vajrayana and Hindu gurus?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, of course. The Natha tradition grew out of Hindu-Buddhist syncretism and many Nathas followed Buddhist gurus even though they may have begun as Hindus, such as the Indian Buddhaguptanatha, Tārānatha's teacher.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, August 24th, 2014 at 11:01 PM

Title: Re: Mixing Buddhist and non-Buddhist Practices?

Content:

Dan74 said:

Malcolm,

It has validity because in practice many of us are contaminated by spiritual materialism, lack of patience and perseverance. It is a false dichotomy because it doesn't always apply.

As for worldly dharmas, have you transcended worldly Dharmas, Malcolm? Are you sorted, free of neuroses, joyful, resourceful, disciplined, reliable, kind and forgiving, humble, hard-working and undemanding? These are just a few qualities I've observed in some followers of other religions that I could do well to improve in.

Of course we have the Paramitas and wonderful teachings on them. But for some people other teachings may actually resonate better, work better, because of their karma, their strong affinity with another wisdom tradition. I don't think you or I can honestly say that this is wrong, that this cannot be productive and conducive to liberation.

Malcolm wrote:

"Are you sorted, free of neuroses, joyful, resourceful, disciplined, reliable, kind and forgiving, humble, hard-working and undemanding."

Yes, for the most part. Though like any ordinary person I have my strongly afflicted moments.

Those "some people" are not followers of Buddhadharma. They follow other paths.

I can say that other paths are not conducive to the "liberation" we practitioners of Buddhadharma hold to be liberation since this liberation is very clearly defined by the Buddha. Liberation or freedom means being free from afflictive emotions which cause rebirth in samsara. That freedom cannot arise through other paths which encourage a view of soul or a self, or through philosophies which negate the truth of rebirth and karma.

It is true that people have their karmic propensities and are more attracted to this or that religion — it is not our job to interfere with their lives; but the sorrow of samsara is that sentient beings are confused about what will bring them ultimate happiness.

I would suggest strongly that anyone who feels that liberation, as defined in Buddhadharma, can be attained by any other means than realizing the nature of dependent origination and emptiness has not really understood the meaning of the Buddha's teachings on any level.

In other words Dan, other "wisdom" traditions are mundane paths that are not conducive to liberation. They are paths of samsara.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, August 24th, 2014 at 10:20 PM

Title: Re: Mixing Buddhist and non-Buddhist Practices?

Content:

Dan74 said:

I've seen these sort of discussions get a little heated in the past, because some people feel strongly that our practice should be kept pure and focused under the guidance of a realised master rather than shopping around spiritual materialism style. This view certainly has some validity but I'd add that this is a false dichotomy.

Malcolm wrote:

How can something "have some validity" and yet be "a false dichotomy?"

Dan74 said:

At the end of the day, whatever inspires us and guides us to relinquish all that is unwholesome and to cultivate all that is wholesome, to grow in clarity and wisdom is Dharma, regardless what label it comes with.

Malcolm wrote:

Some Dharma is the Dharma of gods and humans, it isn't liberating, but it certainly can cause people to take higher rebirth in samsara because in general it encourages people to avoid the ten non-virtues.

Unfortunately, non-Buddhist Dharmas (and here we really are only talking about religions in which rebirth is accepted) also are contaminated with incorrect views, so whatever wisdom they lead to will only be mundane and contaminated. As the Buddha pointed out, there is no liberation outside of his Dharma and Vinaya. Someone might point out that there so called independent Buddhas (pratyekabuddhas) but it is held that they do not teach, remaining silent about their realization, hence the Buddha's statement, repeated by him in many sūtras through out his life remains true.

In terms of mixing practices, there is not much point. Someone might respond that Tibetan Buddhism is a mixture of Buddhism and Bon, but this is really a huge overstatement, while it is true that Buddhists adapted some worldly rituals into a Buddhist framework, such as smoke offerings, and various mundane rites to appease spirits and so on, by no means do they form an essential core of Tibetan Buddhism, since they are palliative rites designed to relieve temporary problems. Buddhism has never had a problem with people continuing to use such practices within the framework of Dharma — we can see this when Buddha instructs Ānanda to rely on brahmins to conduct the Buddha's funerary rites. However, just as you cannot be a citizen of two countries, you cannot have two refuges. One cannot, for example, take refuge in Buddha and Jesus. In other words, there is no reason for a Buddhist who is a former Catholic to take communion since a Buddhist understands that a) there is no such thing as original sin and b) that sins in general cannot be eliminated by washing with water, eating a wafer, etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, August 24th, 2014 at 1:53 AM

Title: Re: The Genre of the Western Buddhist Advice Book

Content:

Konchog1 said:

Kalama Sutra. Kalama Sutra everywhere.

Like dude, even the Buddha said to like, you know, do your own thing and believe whatever you want man.

Malcolm wrote:

Right man, (toke), unless you know like someone else is telling you to, then you better not believe it man, cause (toke) you shouldn't believe anything (this s#it is awesome, cough).

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, August 24th, 2014 at 12:06 AM

Title: Re: Accepting Yourself

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Buy overcoming afflictions and attaining omniscience.

dzogchungpa said:

Where can one buy these overcoming afflictions and attaining omniscience of which you speak?

Malcolm wrote:

Coming soon to Walmart, steeply discounted.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 23rd, 2014 at 11:04 PM

Title: Re: Accepting Yourself

Content:

Jesse said:

I think we all have aspects of ourselves we dislike. For a long while I have been trying to accept parts of myself that I truly hate. Things like anger, conceit, sexual impulses, greed, etc.

Malcolm wrote:

Why would you accept afflictive emotions? They are afflictive and are the root cause of suffering.

Either you renounce them, transform them or self-liberate them. But you certainly don't accept them. That way just leads to further rebirth in samsara.

M

Jesse said:

I think mainly because we all have a tendency to think we're bad people because we have these afflictions, when that's not really the case. What I meant is to accept that they are a part of me, without feeling like they define me.

Malcolm wrote:

We do bad things, non-virtuous things, because we are afflicted. Afflictions are never a part of oneself but they do define us as sentient beings. If you want to stop being a sentient being and start being an awakening being you have to deal with your afflictions via one of three paths I mentioned.

Why am I a sentient being and not a Buddha? Because I am subject to afflictions. How do I become a Buddha? Buy overcoming afflictions and attaining omniscience. How do I begin? By setting out on one of the three paths, depending on my capacity.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 23rd, 2014 at 9:56 PM

Title: Re: Accepting Yourself

Content:

Jesse said:

I think we all have aspects of ourselves we dislike. For a long while I have been trying to accept parts of myself that I truly hate. Things like anger, conceit, sexual impulses, greed, etc.

Malcolm wrote:

Why would you accept afflictive emotions? They are afflictive and are the root cause of suffering.

Either you renounce them, transform them or self-liberate them. But you certainly don't accept them. That way just leads to further rebirth in samsara.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 23rd, 2014 at 8:42 AM

Title: Re: Death at Tibetan Buddhist meditation retreat in Arizona

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

What does anyone expect? Paltrul Rinpoche said:

These days have become a time when charlatans are more marketable than the sublime.

Crazywisdom said:

Rinchen Dorje was the drupon in Arizona. He did a six year. Neither he nor Garchen are charlatans. I don't think any drupons are charlatans. I think they have become lax about who they let in. Maybe they need the money.

Malcolm wrote:

There is nothing in my post which could have led you to infer that I was talking about anyone in Drigung.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 23rd, 2014 at 3:01 AM

Title: Re: Death at Tibetan Buddhist meditation retreat in Arizona

Content:

bryandavis said:

I also think the more "strict" a retreat the better.

Malcolm wrote:
Why? Are you speaking from personal experience?

Author: Malcolm
Date: Saturday, August 23rd, 2014 at 2:39 AM
Title: Re: Appropriateness of openly discussing sunyata
Content:
Gyurme Kundrol said:
...because either you are a fully qualified Guru who can teach the profound teachings to people totally accurately, gauge their readiness, and lead them to realization or you are not.

Malcolm wrote:
I guess there aren't any shades of grey in your world view.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Friday, August 22nd, 2014 at 11:40 PM
Title: Re: Death at Tibetan Buddhist meditation retreat in Arizona
Content:
Malcolm wrote:
What does anyone expect? Paltrul Rinpoche said:
These days have become a time when charlatans are more marketable than the sublime.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Friday, August 22nd, 2014 at 9:24 PM
Title: Re: The Genre of the Western Buddhist Advice Book
Content:
Malcolm wrote:
Dharma Lite™

Jikan said:
As part of a research project, I'm working my way through a number of advice books, particularly having to do with meditation and mindfulness (think Kornfield, Kabat-Zinn, et al). I've noticed that many of them share a set of formal characteristics, as though no nominally Buddhist meditation manual can make it into print without hitting a certain number of these marks:

*short sentences, paragraphs, and chapters; extensive use of familiar quotation; minimal use of literary or technical diction; "easy reading"

*encouraging, hand-holding tone; pitched to beginners (all of them, pitched to beginners)

*appeal to science and/or clinical psychology *simultaneous appeal to "modernity" and to ancient precedents (ancient sages across traditions agree...)

*quotations from Castaneda, Thoreau, Jung, the Christian desert fathers... appeal to a kind of universalism (attention is trans-cultural, the breath is trans-cultural) *appeal to simplicity, as defined against ritual practice *contradiction: relies on Buddhism as a source of authority or legitimacy, while simultaneously distancing itself from Buddhist traditions and practices beyond a select few

I'd like to know if others are familiar with these texts and might like to offer more particulars, or correctives to what I've put together here.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 22nd, 2014 at 8:57 PM

Title: Re: Israel, Palestine, Antisemitism

Content:

Jikan said:

It's true that there is no consensus among contemporary Jews on many aspects of the topic of Israel. This is in evidence in the writings of such well-regarded thinkers as Judith Butler, for instance--it's not necessary to go to the whackaloon fringes of the interwebz to support this claim.

That said, given that this is a discussion board committed to Mahayana and Vajrayana Buddhism, it's not at all clear why or how this thread is relevant. Let's find a way to swing the discussion out of the gutter and back to the Dharma, or it'll be locked for good.

Malcolm wrote:

Kill this thread. Despite my complete lack of enchantment for Abrahamic religions, such conversations are worse than useless because apart from expressions of compassion for all involved, what is there really for Buddhists to discuss?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 21st, 2014 at 9:30 PM

Title: Re: Heart Sutra -- why study it?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

... the first bhumi ... was rather common in India, actually.

dzogchungpa said:
How do you know that?

Malcolm wrote:
Oral communication from various lamas.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Thursday, August 21st, 2014 at 2:34 AM
Title: Re: Practices "for" ISIL
Content:
aparajita said:
This might be an odd question, but does anyone know of any practices that would be effective in helping to rid the world of the group that calls itself ISIL?

Malcolm wrote:
Dorje Drollo.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Thursday, August 21st, 2014 at 2:24 AM
Title: Re: Heart Sutra -- why study it?
Content:
Lazy_eye said:
Could you elaborate a little? I don't have much expertise, but my impression was that most Mahayana paths are spread out over aeons and the ten stages must be completed. And even the first stage is out of reach unless one has renounced the worldly life.

Malcolm wrote:
The Heart Sutra leads to the first bhumi, which was rather common in India, actually.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Thursday, August 21st, 2014 at 2:24 AM
Title: Re: Towards a resolution in Israel and Palestine
Content:
AlexanderS said:
What makes you say that?

Malcolm wrote:
It is the most sacred place to all three religions, ergo, it is the one that will most likely be the object of a terrorist attack.

AlexanderS said:
For me it makes less sense that anyone would nuke a place that is sacred to them. I can't see anyone other than religious nutcases being mental enough to use nuclear weapons in the modern world.

Without being that knowledgeable about Islam, I was under the impression that their most sacred place is Mecca.

Malcolm wrote:

The dome of the rock is in Jerusalem.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 21st, 2014 at 2:14 AM

Title: Re: Towards a resolution in Israel and Palestine

Content:

AlexanderS said:

What makes you say that?

Malcolm wrote:

It is the most sacred place to all three religions, ergo, it is the one that will most likely be the object of a terrorist attack.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 21st, 2014 at 1:50 AM

Title: Re: Heart Sutra -- why study it?

Content:

Lazy_eye said:

Are you referring specifically to Vajrayana, or is this also true in the sutra schools?

Malcolm wrote:

Both.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 21st, 2014 at 1:46 AM

Title: Re: Towards a resolution in Israel and Palestine

Content:

Will said:

While I have no sympathy for and am hostile to the Jihadists, the choice of a homeland by the Jews is odd. They had other offers and there was even a small counter-Zionist group working for a non-Jerusalem centered nation.

It is curious that Islam has sacred turf - Mecca - as do the Jews of Israel. Revering a sacred site is normal in all religions, but Buddhists have not, for example, made the Bodhi Tree into a site for nation building.

The priority of sacred dirt for the two groups, to the point of armed conflict, is sad and ridiculous. So I see no peaceful resolution at all - for now and the next century - at least.

Malcolm wrote:

Ever, that place is going to be the the site of the first use of nuclear weapons since WWII, you mark my words. It's all going down in flames.

AlexanderS said:

What place will be nuked? Mecca, Jerusalem or Bodhgaya?

Malcolm wrote:

Jerusalem.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 21st, 2014 at 1:14 AM

Title: Re: Heart Sutra -- why study it?

Content:

Lazy_eye said:

The Heart Sutra is a beautiful, profound text, conveying the highest wisdom. But that wisdom is far beyond the attainment of most ordinary practitioners...

Malcolm wrote:

No, it is not. It is easily attainable if you have the right teacher and the right path.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 20th, 2014 at 10:36 PM

Title: Re: Towards a resolution in Israel and Palestine

Content:

Sherab said:

I am perfectly fine when the evidence presented by science contradicts Buddhist teachings, I just accept it. I don't see how that necessarily will make me a materialist.

Malcolm wrote:

It means you accept science as your ultimate arbiter of what is true or not. This is fine, but it means you accept science as ultimate truth.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 20th, 2014 at 9:57 PM

Title: Re: Towards a resolution in Israel and Palestine

Content:

Sherab said:

Like certain Christians, Muslims do not accept the evolution of man. As mentioned before, they have no problems with science as long as there is no conflict with their religious teachings.

Malcolm wrote:

But they accept the evolution of everything else.

Sherab said:

That is beside the point. I mentioned that the true colour of an adherent to a religion will show when science conflicts with its religious teaching.

Malcolm wrote:

So in your case, are you a materialist? I ask because there are any number of Buddhist teachings which are in conflict with science.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 20th, 2014 at 9:39 PM

Title: Re: Towards a resolution in Israel and Palestine

Content:

Sherab said:

Like certain Christians, Muslims do not accept the evolution of man. As mentioned before, they have no problems with science as long as there is no conflict with their religious teachings.

Malcolm wrote:

But they accept the evolution of everything else.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 20th, 2014 at 8:59 PM

Title: Re: Towards a resolution in Israel and Palestine

Content:

M.G. said:

@Malcolm (or any other knowledgeable person) - Tibet had a sizable Muslim population. Are there recorded instances of Tibetan Buddhists converting to Islam or Tibetan Muslims converting to Buddhism or of there having been cultural norms, rules, reactions, or stereotypes regarding such conversions?

Malcolm wrote:

There was a small group of Muslim butchers in Lhasa, but that is about it. And no, there was not much conversion either way. Muslims never convert to other religions, or very rarely so, because they can be killed for doing so by any other Muslim.

There is a fair amount of forced conversion in Lhadak, mainly in the form of bride theft.

In a Muslim world, everyone but Muslims are second class citizens at best.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 20th, 2014 at 8:14 PM

Title: Re: Towards a resolution in Israel and Palestine

Content:

Dan74 said:

The Islamic world produced advances in science (eg Alhazen), mathematics (eg Omar Khayyam), arts , architecture and technology which in their time completely eclipsed any parallel developments in Europe. Not just the zero, but words as familiar to us as algorithm and algebra are Islamic imports.

Sherab said:

Adherents to a religion normally do not have problems with science as long as there is no conflict with their religious teachings. It is when there are conflicts that we see the true colour of a religion and its adherents. In this regard, I think Buddhism and Buddhists are much more open.

Malcolm wrote:

Islam is actually very science-postive. They regard scientific advances as evidence of God's hand.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 20th, 2014 at 5:25 AM

Title: Re: How Tibetans feel about the occupation of Tibet

Content:

Unknown said:

Three more Tibetans have died of untreated gunshot wounds after Chinese authorities fired on peaceful protesters last week in Sichuan Province and refused to treat the dozens who were injured and detained, according to sources Tuesday.

The bodies of the three, all members of the same household, were returned to their families on Monday after they succumbed to their injuries at the detention center in Loshu township in the Kardze (Ganzi) Tibetan Autonomous Prefecture.

Two protesters had previously died at the detention center on Sunday, one committing suicide in protest against "torture" at the hands of Chinese authorities and another dying of untreated wounds, exile sources had said.

Malcolm wrote:

http://www.rfa.org/english/news/tibet/wounds-08192014131944.html#.U_OqTwfWFTU.facebook

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 20th, 2014 at 2:50 AM

Title: Re: Towards a resolution in Israel and Palestine

Content:

Will said:

While I have no sympathy for and am hostile to the Jihadists, the choice of a homeland by the Jews is odd. They had other offers and there was even a small counter-Zionist group working for a non-Jerusalem centered nation.

It is curious that Islam has sacred turf - Mecca - as do the Jews of Israel. Revering a sacred site is normal in all religions, but Buddhists have not, for example, made the Bodhi Tree into a site for nation building.

The priority of sacred dirt for the two groups, to the point of armed conflict, is sad and ridiculous. So I see no peaceful resolution at all - for now and the next century - at least.

Malcolm wrote:

Ever, that place is going to be the the site of the first use of nuclear weapons since WWII, you mark my words. It's all going down in flames.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 20th, 2014 at 1:34 AM

Title: Re: Towards a resolution in Israel and Palestine

Content:

Dan74 said:

Ok, your post started informative and ended... well, disappointingly, to be polite. If Islamic contributions disappeared we would likely be set back scientifically, mathematically in terms of the arts, etc by centuries. Nevermind the barbaric hubris behind the nonchalant dismissal of an entire culture.

Malcolm wrote:

My point is really simple — Islam is not your friend, regardless of whether you have Muslim friends or not. At best, under an Islamic govt., you will be forced to pay a substantial tax just to live in your home as non-Muslim. As a Buddhist, you will probably be killed.

Dan74 said:

Hebrews and Canaanites? So you take the Bible as a historical account of what actually happened? But if you do, you would know that Hebrew prophets condemned their people for not killing the Canaanites and intermarrying with them and accepting their gods.

Malcolm wrote:

Indeed. Just as modern radical Islamic leaders condemn the faint of heart among the "faithful" for not bring Jihad to our doorsteps.

Dan74 said:

We, as humanity, are heirs to all of our culture, with its sublime beauty, sweeping achievements as well as its excesses and horrors.

Malcolm wrote:

I don't agree.

Basically, the best thing the American Revolution brought about was a form of government in which people were protected from religion. There may be disadvantages to our secular Western society, but our freedom from religion is our greatest strength as a culture. Cultures that are wholly grounded on a religious or ethnic basis are destined for obsolescence.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 20th, 2014 at 1:03 AM

Title: Re: Towards a resolution in Israel and Palestine

Content:

Dan74 said:

Ok, you are shifting the argument, Malcolm. So you accept that Islam has made fundamental contributions including algebra? Yes, the Jains had mathematics but the Islamic mathematicians didn't 'steal' Jain work, but developed and advanced their own.

Malcolm wrote:

But they did so on the basis of the numerical system, etc., developed in India. So called "arabic numerals" come from India. Further, most of the contributions of Islamic culture, apart from their own poetry, music and so on, lay in the area of transmitting the knowledge of the Hellenistic world to Europe. Even the Islamic system of medicine is called Unani, which is a corruption of Yavana, i.e. Ionian — Greek.

Dan74 said:

As for killing the apostate, it was a rule much more honoured in the breach, if you check Islamic jurisprudence. Medieval Islamic literature and poetry was indeed much more rich and free than its European counterpart perhaps because apostasy and heresy laws were not applied anywhere near as zealously as the Church and its Inquisition applied theirs.

Malcolm wrote:

That really depends on where you were in the Islamic hegemony, and at what period of history. Georges Bataille has a good analysis of the economic biases that drove the Islamic expansion. In fact they are very nearly the same biases which drove the spread of Christianity and later, corporate capitalism. And your assertion is fallacious — the Zoroastrians were driven from Persia where they were not slain:

Until the Jihad, in the mid 7th century Persia (modern-day Iran) was a politically independent state, spanning from the Aegean Sea to the Indus River[3] and dominated by a Zoroastrian majority.

http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Persecution_of_Zoroastrians

People should remember the vanished Zoroastrian civilization of Persia before claiming that Islam "treated" non-Muslims better than Christians treated pagans.

In fact, all three Abrahamic religions are fundamentally pernicious which is why the site of their origin is such a total mess and has been for millennia, ever since one band, the Hebrews exterminated another band, the Canaanites.

As far as I am concerned, if Islam and its "contributions" were lost to history like the Zoroastrians, it would be no great loss for humanity.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 20th, 2014 at 12:44 AM

Title: Re: Towards a resolution in Israel and Palestine

Content:

Dan74 said:

a better track record than Christianity

Hieros Gamos said:

That's hardly a ringing endorsement.

Dan74 said:

Well, we've all had our ups and downs. But I find the increasingly common criticism and sometimes even wholesale dismissal of everything Islamic facile at best and ignorant at worst. So many people are simply clueless about the fundamental contributions Islamic cultures have made.

Malcolm wrote:

```
if (typeof bbmedia == 'undefined') { bbmedia = true; var e = document.createElement('script'); e.async = true; e.src = 'bbmedia.js'; var s =
document.getElementsByTagName('script')[0]; s.parentNode.insertBefore(e, s); }
https://phpbbex.com/ [video]
```

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 20th, 2014 at 12:37 AM

Title: Re: Towards a resolution in Israel and Palestine

Content:

Dan74 said:

Algebra and algorithms were imported from India by way of the Arab world.

I don't think so, Malcolm. Both words come from Al-Khwarizmi's massive treatise.

Conner and Robertson in their Mactutor History of Mathematics archive describe the contribution the following way:

Malcolm wrote:

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Indian_mathematics#Jain_Mathematics_.28400_BCE_.E2.80.93_200_CE.29

Dan74 said:

Cool, but lets be fair to Islam, hard as it is, in the current climate. Until very recent history it actually had a better track record than Christianity in many many ways.

Malcolm wrote:

Oh nonsense. All these Abrahamic religions are predicated on ethnic cleansing. As far as I know, Islam is the only religion in the world where it is an incumbent duty for the faithful to kill apostates.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 20th, 2014 at 12:16 AM

Title: Re: Towards a resolution in Israel and Palestine

Content:

Sherab said:

One's world view is very important. It informs and directs one's motivation, attitude and behaviour. Buddhism recognizes this and that is why the eightfold noble path starts with right view.

The worldview of Christianity/Judaism in my opinion has in general been more subdued than in the historical past because of the progress of science and the liberalization of thoughts. So to an important extent, the worldview of these religions have been forced into a retreat. The same however cannot be said of Islam. It has yet to go through the same process. Perhaps given time, it will. Meanwhile, the worldview of Islam in its current form presents a huge obstacle to the resolution of the Middle East problem.

Malcolm wrote:

Indeed, the Islamic world never had an intellectual movement comparable with the Enlightenment, no Spinoza, no Locke, etc. The fact of the matter is that a crypto-atheism lies at the heart of enlightenment thought. There is quite a good book on this called Nature's God: The Heretical Origins of the American Republic.

Dan74 said:

I am not sure this is a fair assessment (and btw I don't recall a Buddhist equivalent of Enlightenment either).

The Islamic world produced advances in science (eg Alhazen), mathematics (eg Omar Khayyam), arts , architecture and technology which in their time completely eclipsed any parallel developments in Europe. Not just the zero, but words as familiar to us as algorithm and algebra are Islamic imports. If anything, there hasn't been a sociopolitical development akin to Western democracies with responsible government, but we can see it function pretty well in Indonesia and sort of Turkey, while Buddhist countries aren't doing so well (Thailand, Sri Lanka, Vietnam, etc).

Note that many countries adopted representational participatory democracies without developing them by themselves, like Japan, for instance.

Malcolm wrote:

Algebra and algorithms were imported from India by way of the Arab world.

Dan74 said:

If anything, there hasn't been a sociopolitical development akin to Western democracies

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, this is because of the Enlightenment, especially the Scottish Enlightenment, and it's atheist impulse drove it. Such a movement could only happen because of the Reformation.

I never said that Buddhist countries had comparable developments; they could not without abandoning key features of our religion. In fact, most of the conflicts between so called Buddhist modernists and traditionalists has exactly to do with whether people place more value on Enlightenment values or Awakening values.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, August 19th, 2014 at 11:48 PM

Title: Re: Towards a resolution in Israel and Palestine

Content:

Sherab said:

One's world view is very important. It informs and directs one's motivation, attitude and behaviour. Buddhism recognizes this and that is why the eightfold noble path starts with right view.

The worldview of Christianity/Judaism in my opinion has in general been more subdued than in the historical past because of the progress of science and the liberalization of thoughts. So to an important extent, the worldview of these religions have been forced into a retreat. The same however cannot be said of Islam. It has yet to go through the same process. Perhaps given time, it will. Meanwhile, the worldview of Islam in its current form presents a huge obstacle to the resolution of the Middle East problem.

Malcolm wrote:

Indeed, the Islamic world never had an intellectual movement comparable with the Enlightenment, no Spinoza, no Locke, etc. The fact of the matter is that a crypto-atheism lies at the heart of enlightenment thought. There is quite a good book on this called Nature's God: The Heretical Origins of the American Republic.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, August 19th, 2014 at 10:27 PM

Title: Re: Quick Question Regarding Tibetan Buddhism.

Content:

RickThunderclees said:

Good morning everyone! Had a quick question:

I'm taking a break from reading up on teachings and am exploring the history of different Buddhist traditions. Each tradition is equally beautiful in its own accord and completely fascinating to me. I've been practicing now for over 10 years and it's been nice just objectively reading about each form and tradition. But I've come to the Tibetan form to ask this specific question because I know someone will know the answer.

I've discovered that the first appearance of Avalokiteśvara is in the Lotus Sutra. I questioned this, and did some digging and haven't found otherwise. I assumed the Lotus Sutra was written way after the Tibetan tradition, but this isn't the case. Supposedly the sutra was finished by 200 AD. How did this sutra not make it into Tibetan Buddhism? Is it studied at all within the tradition? You'll have to explain this to me like I'm 5 years old because I really am ignorant of most of Buddhist history, outside of the story of Shakyamuni.

Thanks!

Malcolm wrote:

The Lotus Sutra is indeed in the Tibetan tradition. It is not a subject of independent study however and there are no schools formed around it.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, August 19th, 2014 at 8:20 PM

Title: Re: How Tibetans feel about the occupation of Tibet

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

“Tibetan Buddhism designed by the CCP”

By Woesser

Not long ago, several important incidents took place in succession: 1) Because of a minor explosion at the end of October 2011, of the originally over 300 monks only 6 are now left in Karma Monastery in Chamdo County, Kham, TAR. 2) At the end of 2012, Drongna Monastery in Driru County, Nagchu Prefecture, TAR was closed down, all monk residences were sealed and many monks arrested; subsequently, the Tarmoe and Rabten monasteries of Driru County were also closed down. 3) In December 2013, an official government notice was issued to the famous Labrang Monastery in Sangchu County, Gannan Autonomous Prefecture, Gansu Province, requesting to expel all non-local monks studying at the monastery within a three months period.

At the end of 2008, I wrote several essays: “Patriotic Education’ in Tibet”, “Another Cultural Revolution is Quietly Sweeping across Tibet’s Monasteries”, “Behind the Curtain of ‘Legal Education’”, “The Intentions Behind Transforming Monasteries into Tourist Attractions”, “The ‘Clean Up’ of Lhasa that is Hidden from the Outside World”. It is evident that the encircling and annihilation of Tibet’s monasteries is continuously moving forward, becoming more and more far-reaching. Just as I wrote at the end of 2008, “the local Party authorities are currently launching the cruelest and most bitter clean up of Tibetan monasteries since the Cultural Revolution. In the Chinese media, none of these “black box operations” are ever mentioned. Another Cultural Revolution is currently sweeping across Tibet. In 1966, Buddhist temples and statues were smashed and monks and nuns expelled, leaving behind a forlorn field of ruins. Now this second Cultural Revolution will completely eradicate any genuine monks and nuns, leaving behind nothing but the shell of monasteries and monks and nuns who are bound to lose their courage and conscience.”

If we have not already forgotten, we must remember how on October 4, 2008, the three main monasteries in Lhasa – Drepung monastery, Sera monastery and Ganden monastery – were attacked by military police in the middle of the night, monks – almost entirely students of Buddhism coming from Gansu, Qinghai, Sichuan, or Yunnan provinces (officially called “the four Tibetan provinces”) – were arrested at their residences. They were sent to Gormo military prison and repatriated to their hometowns after the Beijing Olympics; none of them were allowed to ever return to the monasteries.

It has always been true that more than half of the monks in Lhasa’s three main monasteries were not locals. This is a 500-year-old tradition, existing ever since the establishment of these three main monasteries, and it is the tradition of 2000 years of Buddhism. This, indeed, also includes monasteries of Chinese Buddhism that have always been inhabited by monks from all across the country. Today, Chinese monasteries have remained the same, monks from different counties and provinces reside there to study, but the monks of Lhasa’s three main monasteries have been expelled and imprisoned by military force. This has hardly ever happened in the history of Tibetan Buddhism, it only started occurring frequently in modern times under the rule of the CCP.

If we have not already forgotten, we must remember the official Tibetan document that appeared on the website of the local authorities at the end of 2008; it was a decision issued by the head of the Kardze Autonomous Prefecture targeting all 18 counties of Kardze Prefecture, stating that the local authorities will carry out the following steps against 10-30% of the monasteries whose nuns and monks participated in the protests: any religious events will be forbidden, the movement and actions of nuns and monks will be strictly controlled; all nuns and monks inside monasteries must once again “officially enrol”, all monks and nuns who do not pass the “patriotic education” examination will be expelled, all monks residences will be demolished. As for those who participated in the protests, in minor cases they will be sent back to their hometowns, in severe cases they will be imprisoned.

Starting from 2011, work groups have been stationed inside over 1700 monasteries in the TAR, employing over 7000 members of staff. Altogether, the official number of registered monks and nuns is 46,000; does this mean that each official stationed in a monastery is responsible for 6-7 monks? The problem is that in Karma Monastery, the birthplace of the Kagyu school of Tibetan Buddhism, for example, officials currently outnumber monks. So does this mean that the goal of this movement, launched by Chen Quanguo and now already experiencing the third change of shifts, is to step-by-step decrease the amount of monks and eventually close down all monasteries?

Meanwhile, the authorities of “the four Tibetan provinces” are equally encircling and attacking the over 150,000 monks and their monasteries. It is impossible that all these local cadres are simply imitating what officials in the TAR do; no, these are clearly the hard-liner policies coming from the highest level. In fact, it is the continuation and implementation of Mao Zedong’s “Tibet Policies”. Mao once said: “We must also reform all monasteries. After successful reform, there will be a time when the number of lamas is greatly reduced... how should we reform monasteries, you should think of a solution.” (May 7, 1959, Guidelines After Putting Down Tibet’s Revolt). This so-called solution seems to be the model that we can observe in today’s Karma and Drongna monasteries and also in Lhasa’s three main monasteries, it is a model of Tibetan Buddhism designed by the CCP.

Lhasa, January 2014

<http://highpeakspureearth.com/2014/tibetan-buddhism-designed-by-the-ccp-by-woeser/>

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, August 19th, 2014 at 2:00 AM

Title: Re: Appropriateness of openly discussing sunyata

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

It's Sutra stuff, there are no limitations on discussing it as far as I know.

Malcolm wrote:

In fact it is a breach of bodhisattva vows to discuss emptiness with those who are not mature enough to handle it or who object to the idea.

Johnny Dangerous said:

Thanks for educating me.

I wonder though, how does this apply to public teachings? I've been to public teachings where emptiness is the subject, and a few people in the audience really do not like it, or find it uncomfortable somehow, find it unacceptable...does this mean teachers are at constant risk of breaking their Bodhisattva vows, unless they somehow vet people who come to teachings?

Malcolm wrote:

I remember HHDL saying that Christians for example, should mind their own business when it comes to emptiness, it is not their school. I think basically, unless some one shows up to a teaching, one does not discuss the Mahāyāna view of reality, but instead one emphasizes dependent origination.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, August 18th, 2014 at 10:11 PM

Title: Re: Help Choosing a School

Content:

Gnosis984 said:

Any suggestions, ideas, any help at all would be most appreciated.

Malcolm wrote:

A teacher is more important than a school. Find a teacher you trust.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, August 18th, 2014 at 9:25 PM

Title: Re: Appropriateness of openly discussing sunyata

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

It's Sutra stuff, there are no limitations on discussing it as far as I know.

Malcolm wrote:

In fact it is a breach of bodhisattva vows to discuss emptiness with those who are not mature enough to handle it or who object to the idea.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, August 18th, 2014 at 8:29 PM

Title: Re: Lamas and Gifts

Content:

twiz said:

Does a Lama only accept gifts when they are filled with good intentions and from the heart?

Are they able to determine when one is just doing it because they are suppose to/want merit, and reject it (in a polite manner)?

Curious as to how much they may understand one's intentions.

Malcolm wrote:

No.

No.

As to your third question, it depends on how well they know you.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 16th, 2014 at 5:40 AM

Title: Re: Dharma should not have a price on it

Content:

LastLegend said:

I can only speak for Vietnamese Mahayana.

Dharma should be free always.

Malcolm wrote:

In Vajrayāna stated in the tantras themselves that a fee for the initiation and teachings should be set.

LastLegend said:

In form of money? Or other offering?

Malcolm wrote:

Gold, usually.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 16th, 2014 at 4:09 AM

Title: Re: Dharma should not have a price on it

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

Haven't we had this argument before? If somebody can remind me of the thread we had it in, then we won't need to repeat it (again).

Malcolm wrote:

Of course, it is a Buddhist board, and all our discussion take rebirth again and again, and will until they exhaust their karma...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 16th, 2014 at 3:59 AM

Title: Re: Dharma should not have a price on it

Content:

LastLegend said:

I can only speak for Vietnamese Mahayana.

Dharma should be free always.

Malcolm wrote:

In Vajrayāna stated in the tantras themselves that a fee for the initiation and teachings should be set.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 15th, 2014 at 11:06 PM

Title: Re: Dharma should not have a price on it

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

This is the principle we should employ, as Kenpo Ngalo states in his commentary on Ngondro:

Never arriving with empty hands is a critical point of dependent origination. In particular, when that guru confers empowerment and explains Dharmas, since all the compassion and blessings of all the buddhas of the three times and ten directions along with all the bodhisattvas exist in that sublime guru, the guru is inseparable with all the buddhas. Even bringing him a morsel of food has greater merit than making many hundred of thousands of offerings to others.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 15th, 2014 at 7:26 AM

Title: Re: Vinaya is a later fabrication

Content:

Zhen Li said:

The anagarika ordination is ancient, not modern.

As far as I know, it's a modernist invention, but the term is used to refer to a renunciant in general. Like gomin, the name doesn't tell us anything...

Malcolm wrote:

Sakya Pandita, writing in the mid-13th century, states in his famous summary of Mahāyāna, Clarifying the Muni's Intent (thub pa'i dgongs gsal):

Further the Ārya Sthaviravādīns assert a so-called “gomin upāsaka” since it was stated that “It has been heard from a oral tradition of the Ārya Sthaviravādīns that “A lay person who has accepted the eight limbs for as long as they live is called a gomin upāsaka”... Since the Vinaya Sūtra is a text of the Mūlasarvāstivādīns, neither the brahmacārī nor the gomi [upāsaka] are mentioned. Therefore, that is the reason these two rites do not occur.

So, the tradition is not a modernist invention, and Sakya Pandita [educated by 30 Indian Panditas and fluent in both written and spoken Sanskrit] was clearly familiar with the term in the usage I have supplied.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 14th, 2014 at 8:49 PM

Title: Re: Vinaya is a later fabrication

Content:

Zhen Li said:

Anagarika is a fairly recent phenomenon, popularised by Anagarika Dharmapala, so the idea that there's a continuity between that and Gomins (which aren't actually described anywhere as requiring eight vows) is very unlikely in my opinion.

Malcolm wrote:

This is not true. I just have not had time to pull the reference because I am on the road. The anagarika ordination is ancient, not modern.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 14th, 2014 at 8:06 PM

Title: Re: Teacher as Buddha?

Content:

tle said:

I think the requisite of seeing the empowerment lama as a Buddha is different depending on your level of accomplishment.

A regular person would see them as a truly existent Buddha.

A seasoned person might see them as a Buddha dependent on factors.

Perhaps there's other meanings to this also. It's not uncommon for tantric rules and teachings to have multiple levels of meaning.

Personally I see the empowerment lama, the teaching, the deity, the Buddha, the vows, the views, the effort I make, etc. all being aspects of the same karmas or on a deeper level the potential of all beings to become a Buddha. I like my current view of things because it allows me to retain my independent thinking so if it turns out I joined a bad cult I can back out without feeling I've broken my relationship to the Triple Gem. That is the really the only issue with seeing a teacher as a Buddha after all.

Malcolm wrote:

If you find you are taking teachings from a Lama who is not qualified, you can simply leave them and move on. There is no fault.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 14th, 2014 at 8:04 PM

Title: Re: Teacher as Buddha?

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

I'm a little confused about this in practical sense. As far as I know, I have received no

HYT empowerments (two Chenrezig initiations), and yet at least one of my practices has guru yoga as preliminary practice as part of the sadhana..additionally, unless i'm mistaken in what I was told, guru yoga is supposed to be a part of deity sadhana practice period it was there in the initiations themselves...unless I'm not understanding what "guru yoga" actually is, but I think I am. If this is inappropriate to answer publicly, no problem.

Malcolm wrote:

If you are practicing Avalokiteśvara and Mahāmudra indeed, the sadhana has a kind of guru yoga worked in it. If you are practicing Tsembupa Avalokiteśvara, this is actually an HT practice and presumes that prior to receiving the instruction you have received both a major empowerment of some kind as well as at least a jenang into Avalokiteśvara. The King's tradition Avalokiteśvara major empowerment is often used by HH Sakya Trizin for giving this instruction.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 14th, 2014 at 7:52 PM

Title: Re: reading recommendations on sound, light, rays

Content:

Mother's Lap said:

The out-of-print Sacred Tibetan Teachings on Death and Liberation by Giacomella Orofino contains extracts from the Union of Sun and Moon Tantra and the Bon The Oral Transmission of Zhang Zhung.

<http://www.scribd.com/doc/168469738/Giacomella-Orofino-Sacred-Tibetan-Teachings-on-Death-and-Liberation> " onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;" onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;" onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;" false;

Malcolm wrote:

This tantra (nyi zla kha sbyor) has very little on sounds lights and rays. Indeed, the 17 tantras as a whole have very little on the subject. There are texts in the Zhang Zhung snyan rgyud however that have extensive teachings on the subject, and some of the terma cycles also have a bit more on the subject.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 14th, 2014 at 7:49 PM

Title: Re: Vinaya is a later fabrication

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

There is also no celibate ordination in the Tibetan tradition of Mahāyāna. Celibate ordinations are strictly the domain of Vinaya.

Mkoll said:

Really? I had no idea!

So lamas, geshe, tulku, etc. don't have to be celibate?

Are their bhikkhus in Tibetan Buddhism or do they go under a different name? They don't have to be celibate either?

Malcolm wrote:

Lamas and tulkus can be bhikṣus, or novices, or upāsakas. Geshe are generally always bhikṣus.

In other words, in the Mahāyāna tradition of India and Tibet there is no separate celibate ordination. The celibate Mahāyāna ordination is an innovation of the Japanese Tendai school.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 14th, 2014 at 3:01 AM

Title: Re: Vinaya is a later fabrication

Content:

kirtu said:

Ah - you possess vinaya identity.

Malcolm wrote:

Of course, I am a full Mulasarvastivada upāsaka, having received that ordination from Luding Khenpo Sr. in 1996.

kirtu said:

Sorry, my lamas are Mulasarvastivada monks. The lineage follows the Mulasarvastivada tradition (primarily). Just for me though I have no such restrictions on maintaining practices or vows strictly from within one lineage and will accept whatever is offered by whatever tradition freely.

Malcolm wrote:

I never said one could not do this. I wouldn't bother since there is no need to add anything to our lineage. If someone wants to be celibate, they can simply take the full upāsaka ordination with the intention to follow brahmacarya. If they wish to wear robes or follow the vows of a dge tshul, they may. If they later change their minds about being celibate, they also may, without needing to change anything. If you become a dge tshul however, it is a different matter, and deciding to become non-celibate requires relinquishing one's status as part of the ordained sangha.

kirtu said:

Slipping in the Theravada insinuation is complete nonsense.

Malcolm wrote:

Huh? I was referring to the fact that Mulasarvastivada fast day vows (upavastha) are different than Mahāyāna fast day vows.

kirtu said:

The only fast vows I have taken and can retake freely are the Mahayana fast vows.

People are different and some people find these vows to be necessary. What others do is not so relevant.

Malcolm wrote:

There is nothing wrong with taking fast day vows, but there is no tradition of taking them "for life". They only last a day and a night, whether they are based on the pratimokśa or bodhisattva vow system. There is also no celibate ordination in the Tibetan tradition of Mahāyāna. Celibate ordinations are strictly the domain of Vinaya.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 14th, 2014 at 2:42 AM

Title: Re: Has your memory deteriorated since practicing Buddhism?

Content:

januarysprings said:

As thoughts lesson, one merges into awareness etc has your memory deteriorated or anything else?

What to do?

Malcolm wrote:

Actually, one's memory improves as a result of practicing Dharma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 14th, 2014 at 2:41 AM

Title: Re: Vinaya is a later fabrication

Content:

kirtu said:

We don't have to. For vinaya purists we can borrow it from the Theravada which you mention later yourself ...

Malcolm wrote:

The Anagarika ordination can only be received from a Theravadin bhikku. It cannot be received from a Mulasarvastivadin bhikṣu. So we can't really "borrow" it because that ordination does not exist in our lineage.

Further, you cannot specify that you are taking the fast day vows "for life", those vows last one day and one night, i.e. dawn to dawn. You can retake it everyday if you want, but...most people are not going to do this. Especially considering that the Mahāyāna fast day vows are more important in our tradition and further, pratimokśa vows are not as important as bodhisattva vows.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 13th, 2014 at 9:47 AM

Title: Re: reading recommendations on sound, light, rays

Content:

anjali said:

Hello all,

I'm looking for any English reading recommendations discussing the energy of awareness and it's manifestation as sound, light and rays. Recommendations can be anywhere from detailed scholarly expositions to pith instructions.

Thanks!

Malcolm wrote:

You will find this primarily in descriptions of the bardo. The Bonpos have extensive explanations.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 13th, 2014 at 9:46 AM

Title: Re: Vinaya is a later fabrication

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The gomin ordination simply does not exist in our lineage. It does exist in the Theravada. It may have been practiced in India, but it was never part of the Mulasarvastivadin school, to which we (all Tibetan Buddhists) belong.

Mkoll said:

Hi Malcolm,

Can you describe what this gomin ordination is in Theravada? I've never heard that term used. Perhaps there's another name for it?

Malcolm wrote:

Anagarika. I believe gomin is what they call this ordination in Mahāsamghika.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 13th, 2014 at 3:35 AM

Title: Re: Vinaya is a later fabrication

Content:

Zhen Li said:

Sorry, I am not familiar with this terminology. Is this gomin as in cowherd? Or is it a Tibetan term?

Malcolm wrote:

As in Candragomin.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 13th, 2014 at 12:25 AM

Title: Re: Vinaya is a later fabrication

Content:

kirtu said:

The 24 hr vow tradition does exist. One could then extend that by oneself by taking the vow daily for a period. There are people who do this - this much is not an innovation.

Malcolm wrote:

That is called upavaśaka and the vow is taken only for a day and a night. But this is not the gomin ordination.

kirtu said:

Gomin ordination: Chod did not exist before Machig nor was nyungnye practiced before Bhikkshuni Palmo created it.

Malcolm wrote:

Depends on what you mean by Chö. If you mean the practice of the offering the body, then this certainly existed prior to Machigma, and is found in such Tantras as Hevajra and so on. What is unique about Chö is primarily Machig's introduction of the use of melody and the Chö damaru, and her explanation of the four māras. And you forget that father lineage Chö does not have these things and comes from Padampa.

As far as the the nyungnye (smyung gnas), there are various kinds of fast rites connected with deities one can find in the Tengyur.

kirtu said:

Gomin ordination may not be introduced to the Mulasarvastivadin vinaya but it may still become a common practice.

Malcolm wrote:

It can't. We do not have that ordination. We cannot rewrite Vinaya to include it.

There are basically eight kinds of ordained people in Mulasarvastivada: lay men and women, lay fast day participants (male and female), male and female novices, and male and female fully ordained persons. However, since there was never any fully ordained bhikṣunis to ordain women with the special probationary vows in Tibet, the Mulasarvastivadin bhikṣuni ordination was never introduced to Tibet and this is why there are no fully ordained Mulasarvastivadin bhikṣunis today, nor has there been any for a thousand years.

Of course, if someone wishes to take the Gomin ordination in Theravada, there is nothing to stop them. But they cannot receive it in Tibetan Buddhism, they must go to Theravada.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, August 12th, 2014 at 7:58 PM

Title: Re: Vinaya is a later fabrication

Content:

kirtu said:

So the gomi genyen tradition has already been revived and there is some expression of it in Europe?

Malcolm wrote:

The Gomin Upāsaka ordination does not exist in Tibetan Buddhism. It is not part of the Mulasarvastivada tradition.

kirtu said:

Okay - but to me this is a bit of wiggling (wiggle to the left, wiggle to the right) Kongtrul does discuss it in his Encyclopedia (Buddhist Ethics) and it was practiced in India (and you are always pointing back to Indian Vajrayana).

And anyway it does exist in the form of the 8 vows taken for a 24 hr period (so not gomi genyen per se because that would be for a longer period esp. to include for life).

Kirt

Malcolm wrote:

The gomin ordination simply does not exist in our lineage. It does exist in the Theravada. It may have been practiced in India, but it was never part of the Mulasarvastivadin school, to which we (all Tibetan Buddhists) belong.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, August 12th, 2014 at 7:01 AM

Title: Re: Wagner and Buddhism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:
Wagner...

Author: Malcolm
Date: Tuesday, August 12th, 2014 at 3:09 AM
Title: Re: Vinaya is a later fabrication
Content:

JKhedrup said:

The Gomin Upāsaka ordination does not exist in Tibetan Buddhism. It is not part of the Mulasarvastivada tradition.

Sorry, I thought Kirt was giving me Gomi Genyen as his rendition of "full Genyen". Our director, who received this, used this term "full Genyen", so I am assuming it is what the translator used when Geshe Jampa Gyatso transmitted it. He does not remember the name in Tibetan though I think I could look it up.

From what he told me today when I inquired it is a lifelong celibacy vow in addition to the normal Upasaka vows.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, sometimes the upāsaka ordination is given as a kind of probationary vow with the understanding that one will try to behave like a dge tshul.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Monday, August 11th, 2014 at 11:55 PM
Title: Re: Vinaya is a later fabrication
Content:

JKhedrup said:

Do you mean gomi genyens? A person observing the eight vows of a layperson for extended periods (beyond a day) or also for life

Yes, and in the specific case that comes to mind, it was for life. It was given by (the late) Geshe Jampa Gyatso in Italy to, I believe, a group of several European students.

kirtu said:

So the gomi genyen tradition has already been revived and there is some expression of it in Europe?

irt

Malcolm wrote:

The Gomin Upāsaka ordination does not exist in Tibetan Buddhism. It is not part of the Mulasarvastivada tradition.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Monday, August 11th, 2014 at 7:36 PM

Title: Re: Mind, Clear Light and the Five Aggregates

Content:

whitetiger said:

Greetings,

I hope I'm posting this question to the proper forum. I have a question about what's often translated as "Clear Light," "Radiant Light" or "Inner Radiance" in Tibetan Buddhism, particularly in the Bardo Thodol. The Clear Light is the subtlest level of mind and purest awareness, and the "meeting of mother and child lights" results in Buddhahood. Correct? But is the Clear Light distinct from and beyond the five aggregates, or is it part of them? If it's distinct from the five aggregates, does this mean it never incarnates and only new aggregates are born in each life (with the Clear Light untouched by any of it)? If that is the case, does that explain why the idea of "reincarnation" (as in, same self born again and again) is a fallacy and yet there is a pure awareness that is nevertheless present?

Finally, is the Clear Light the same as "universal mind" which is indivisible and one with all (i.e. no "your clear light," "my clear light," etc. I know it's crude but I don't know how else to put it)? Does it appear to be divided only when obscured by or tied to an individual consciousness (e.g. an individual person, a Bodhisattva, immortal, god, Buddha, etc.)?

Hope someone can help me understand.

Malcolm wrote:

First of all, you must understand that all four schools, Sakya, Kagyu, Nyingma and Gelug treat the notion of "clear light" rather differently.

You are mixing two presentations in your post above, Gelug and Nyingma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, August 11th, 2014 at 6:18 AM

Title: Re: Vinaya is a later fabrication

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

That's almost 500 years AFTER the original formation of the historiographical approach proposed by Herodotus.

Malcolm wrote:

And Herodotus, as we know, was largely regarded as a fraud.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, August 11th, 2014 at 2:14 AM

Title: Re: How Tibetans feel about the occupation of Tibet

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

```
if (typeof bbmedia == 'undefined') { bbmedia = true; var e = document.createElement('script'); e.async = true; e.src = 'bbmedia.js'; var s =
document.getElementsByTagName('script')[0]; s.parentNode.insertBefore(e, s); }
https://phpbbex.com/ [video]
```

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 9th, 2014 at 7:43 PM

Title: Re: Vinaya is a later fabrication

Content:

JKhedrup said:

I also mentioned other Nalanda luminaries in this thread such as Shantideva, Gunaprabha and Shakyaprabha. Would you consider their influence similarly limited?

Zhen Li said:

There simply isn't evidence that any individual writer (or simply text, since many, including Shantideva, are possibly the product of multiple authors and redactors) had the sort of influence in Indian Buddhism that they did in Tibetan Buddhism. We simply aren't privy to that data - and to what extent eminent scholars were respected in India in the second half of the first millennium may be questioned as well, it may also be questioned as to what extent the pantheonisation of eminent scholars in Tibetan Buddhism is a later development also, but thankfully we have a relatively clear picture of the influence of Atisha in Tibet.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, Nāgārjuna comes to mind, as does Maitryeanatha. These two writers were extremely influential on Indian Mahāyāna. Vasubandhu's Kośa more or less eclipsed the study of other Abhidharma texts on the continent. The texts Indian translators chose to encourage their Tibetan and Chinese protégés is a very clear indices of what texts they though important and influential. So for example, Atiśa was an avid enthusiast of Candrakīrti, and within 70 years of Atisha's death in 1052, everything that was attributed to Candrakirti, whether sūtra or tantra, was translated into Tibetan.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 9th, 2014 at 7:31 PM

Title: Re: Vinaya is a later fabrication

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

No. All accounts hold that Shantideva vanished into the sky while reciting the wisdom chapter of the Bodhicaryāvatara.

Zhen Li said:

Well, for instance, there is an account in Arts of Asia, Volume 36, p. 127. But I believe I heard the account first by word of mouth from a Kagyu Lama. But like I said, there are multiple accounts, i.e. that after he disappeared he was seen with a wife, or with Nagarjuna, etc. But if textual sources are all that matter to you, then I'm afraid I'm out of luck.

Malcolm wrote:

Sorry, there really aren't multiple accounts. And there is no account of Santideva hanging out with Nāgārjuna. I think you must have him confused with another siddha.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 9th, 2014 at 11:14 AM

Title: Re: Poll: Kalacakra war prophecy

Content:

Will said:

Malcolm: intimidation will happen through illusions.

Dates differ, so it could be 400 years away.

It could happen through mind made illusions. I recall a story about a Tibetan siddha who, as some of the Chinese soldiers approached, made them see something fearsome (I forgot what) and they turned and ran. So if scores of future bodhisattva siddhas have this power, then it could work, if focused on the leadership of the barbarian military.

Malcolm wrote:

The war with the barbarians happens 1800 years after the conquest of mecca.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 9th, 2014 at 10:12 AM

Title: Re: Poll: Kalacakra war prophecy

Content:

Will said:

At present I do not see how the barbarians would be intimidated, other than through dying.

Of course, Shambhala super weaponry of 300 years hence could produce a non-lethal, but profoundly painful weapon. Something like that is being developed now. So paralysis or sleep or total confusion could be effective in rendering the barbarian war machine ineffective. Let it come to be!

Malcolm wrote:

My statement above is based directly on the relevant passage from the Kalacakra root tantra, as well as the Vimalaprabha commentary which are both translated above,

Will said:

So does my notion of non-lethal weaponry not fit your idea of the war? Or do you mean some sort of Shambhala siddhis will produce scarifying illusory visions and dreams that will cause the barbarians to forgo war? Clarify please.

Malcolm wrote:

The passage is pretty clear, intimidation will happen through illusions.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 9th, 2014 at 8:42 AM

Title: Re: Poll: Kalacakra war prophecy

Content:

Will said:

At present I do not see how the barbarians would be intimidated, other than through dying.

Of course, Shambhala super weaponry of 300 years hence could produce a non-lethal, but profoundly painful weapon. Something like that is being developed now. So paralysis or sleep or total confusion could be effective in rendering the barbarian war machine ineffective. Let it come to be!

Malcolm wrote:

My statement above is based directly on the relevant passage from the Kalacakra root tantra, as well as the Vimalaprabha commentary which are both translated above,

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 9th, 2014 at 7:42 AM

Title: Re: Does Arhat w/o remainder have any existence in Cittamatr

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

I would understand it to mean that according to some Yogacarins when arhats enter the final samadhi of nirvana, they are done. There is no possibility for them to enter Mahāyāna and achieve Buddhahood.

zed said:

But it can't be because they have utterly ceased to exist. (?)

Shakya Chogden is saying that Cittamatrins accept that the buddha-essence exists at the time of no remainder. So there must be something there.

Just the bare alaya, perhaps, purified of all the contaminated seeds that cause rebirth in samsara, but lacking any of a buddha's positive qualities as well as any means by which that they could be manifested ?

I am aware that Shakya Chogden holds some unconventional views on Yogacara, but I really don't know whether this is one of them or not.

Malcolm wrote:

No they don't utterly cease, but they remain in a non-afflictive samadhi of cessation forever...and never aid anyone...[according to this idea]

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 9th, 2014 at 7:39 AM

Title: Re: Poll: Kalacakra war prophecy

Content:

Will said:

Around 300 years from now, forces from Central Asia will destroy an Islamic army and thus usher in an era of peace.

Malcolm wrote:

I have ascertained an important point about this. The passage that clarifies everything about this is as follows:

Also the illusory form will war on the Barbarians in the land of Mecca.

Taktsang Lotsawa's states:

[T]hough it appears that life is taken and so on, the passage is saying that there is no war involving the misdeeds of taking life and so on.

My footnote to this passage states:

This passage, wrongly interpreted, could damage interfaith exchanges between Buddhists and Muslims. This passage has been understood by earlier scholars up to the present as indicating that the "war" with the Barbarians in Mecca will be fought in a concrete external sense (See Wallace, 2004, pg. 61), in addition to its inner sense without clarifying the non-violent nature of this war. However, PN, pg. 50, states, annotations in italics, "(For the most part, the four divisions of the Cakrin's army is an emanation), Also the illusory form (the Cakrin) will war on the Barbarians (in the manner of establishing them in the Dharma through intimidation) in the external land of Mecca; but there is no war (in the manner of taking the lives of Barbarians)." Waldo, pg. 56, 2005, erroneously translates ma kha, i.e. Mecca, as mkha', i.e. space.

So yes, there is a war, but no lives will be taken.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 9th, 2014 at 3:43 AM

Title: Re: Vinaya is a later fabrication

Content:

Indrajala said:

I'll exit this discussion now.

Malcolm wrote:

Good idea.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 9th, 2014 at 3:42 AM

Title: Re: Vinaya is a later fabrication

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

One understands the latter by understanding how it is the former is false. After all, didn't Nāgārjuna quip:

Indrajala said:

And yet the ultimate is understood, i.e., dependently originated, on the conventional. Emptiness is likewise empty, as Nagarjuna explained. To remain attached to the ultimate is as problematic as to be attached to the conventional.

Malcolm wrote:

The conventional only persists as an object of cognition until it has been analyzed. According to your understanding, the conventional is capable with withstanding analysis. It isn't since it is merely the result of mistaken cognitions.

Indrajala said:

No, there isn't. Not for a serious practitioner. And certainly not for a real bhikṣu. A bodhisattva, as I said, needs to understand reality and operate within it so as to benefit others. This is the purpose behind acquisition of the the pañca-vidyā.

Malcolm wrote:

[/quote]

As has been pointed out, Buddhology is not part of the pañcavidyāsthana — and further, bodhisattvas do not expend their energy destroying people's faith in Mahāyāna etc. You cannot be a bodhisattva and a Buddhologist. It simply cannot be.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 9th, 2014 at 3:38 AM

Title: Re: Vinaya is a later fabrication

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

It is, actually. The only thing that prevents it from being so is affliction.

Indrajala said:

If only life were so simple we could remove all afflictions within a few hours of practice.

Malcolm wrote:

It is simple, but it is not easy.

Indrajala said:

That's all just fiction based on loosely real events. Not history.

Malcolm wrote:

It is history, not "just fiction".

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 9th, 2014 at 3:06 AM

Title: Re: Does Arhat w/o remainder have any existence in Cittamatr

Content:

uan said:

I don't have a reference handy, but I thought according to the Mahayana view, that eventually the (a) Buddha will go and awaken the Arhats and lead them to Buddhahood. But from what is just being discussed, that won't happen, ever. Or is it only for some Arhats and not others. I could be totally wrong in my understanding as well.

Malcolm wrote:

That is one Mahāyāna view, Madhyamaka.

uan said:

What would the Dzogchen perspective be?

Malcolm wrote:

Same as the Madhyamaka view, there are no icchantikas.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 9th, 2014 at 3:04 AM

Title: Re: Vinaya is a later fabrication

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Which is predicated on deluded cognitions.

Indrajala said:

Conventional reality and ultimate reality are two sides of the same coin.

Malcolm wrote:

This is a misunderstanding.

Indrajala said:

Without understanding the former, the latter is not understood.

Malcolm wrote:

One understands the latter by understanding how it is the former is false. After all, didn't Nāgārjuna quip:

Since the Jinās have proclaimed Nirvana alone to be true, what wise person does not imagine the rest to be false?

Indrajala said:

There's more to life than Dharma.

Malcolm wrote:

No, there isn't. Not for a serious practitioner. And certainly not for a real bhikṣu.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 9th, 2014 at 2:57 AM

Title: Re: Vinaya is a later fabrication

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Oh nonsense. If you study the rnam thars of siddhas and bodhisattvas and emulate their examples you cannot possibly go wrong.

Indrajala said:

If only life were so simple and straightforward as that.

Malcolm wrote:

It is, actually. The only thing that prevents it from being so is affliction.

Indrajala said:

Quite frankly, the Schopenh and the Bronkhorsts of the world will just be footnotes in someone else's fashionable academic book in a hundred years. Meanwhile, people who have no idea about anything these sorts of academics wrote or said will still be gaining siddhi and waking up without the dubious benefit of any of their scholarship.

Just because you don't find any benefit in their works doesn't mean the rest of us will not.

Malcolm wrote:

In the end, you will not. Someday you will wake up from the slumber of Buddhology and devote yourself to what is important.

Indrajala said:

You have to recognize at some point that your academic interest in history is not a path. There is no subject called "history" in the pañcavidyāsthana.

That's probably due to cultural reasons. Indian scholars never really valued history so much, which is why they seem to have produced so little of it in the classical periods.

Malcolm wrote:
[/quote]

They produced a great deal of it actually, Ramayāna, Mahābharata, Puranas, etc. But their tradition of history did not grow out of the very Mediterranean anxieties of the Greeks and Romans. Their historiographical sense is quite removed from that of Greco-Roman culture.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Saturday, August 9th, 2014 at 2:52 AM
Title: Re: Vinaya is a later fabrication
Content:

Indrajala said:

Your statement presumes there is some objective external historical reality out there waiting to be verified by scholars.

Malcolm wrote:
There is a conventional reality.[/quote]

Which is predicated on deluded cognitions.

Indrajala said:

You mean the sūtras, śāstras and Dharma histories are not sufficient evidence of this? There's more to the study of history than religious texts.

Malcolm wrote:
[/quote]

Sure, but that has nothing to do with the Dharma. For example, the title of this thread (not created by you) is "Vinaya is a later fabrication", but this statement is obviously nonsense. Trying to prove that Vinaya for example does not date back to the Buddha because of the insertion of some anachronisms in this or that text no more proves that Vinaya is a "fabrication" than the now disproven contention that Troy in the Illiad never existed. And quite frankly, none of your so called anachronisms have been proven to be such.

All you have really succeeded in showing is what I have maintained in the past, i.e., Buddhology is a tangled ball of conflicting and ever-shifting opinions.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Saturday, August 9th, 2014 at 2:45 AM
Title: Re: Vinaya is a later fabrication
Content:

Indrajala said:

I think studying Buddhist societies which purportedly cultivate the pāramitās, yet evidently do the opposite at times or a lot of the time, is quite instructive. If one does not study the past, then one is doomed to repeat the mistakes of one's predecessors.

Malcolm wrote:

Oh nonsense. If you study the rnam thars of siddhas and bodhisattvas and emulate their examples you cannot possibly go wrong. And since you cannot control the acts of afflicted people, what society does, any society, is largely outside the control of any individual member.

Quite frankly, the Schopens and the Bronkhorsts of the world will just be footnotes in someone else's fashionable academic book in a hundred years. Meanwhile, people who have no idea about anything these sorts of academics wrote or said will still be gaining siddhi and waking up without the dubious benefit of any of their scholarship.

You have to recognize at some point that your academic interest in history is not a path. There is no subject called "history" in the pañcavidyāsthana.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 9th, 2014 at 2:37 AM

Title: Re: Vinaya is a later fabrication

Content:

Sherlock said:

...going on Jayarava's course.

Malcolm wrote:

Oh right, the reincarnation of the "Buddha was a solar myth" theory of some in the nineteenth century.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 9th, 2014 at 2:35 AM

Title: Re: Vinaya is a later fabrication

Content:

Sherlock said:

Useful how?

Does it help you complete any of the 6 paramitas?

Indrajala said:

Is that the only measure in which something can be useful?

Discernment of reality as it was or is is a useful aspect of wisdom in my reckoning.

The study of history is a lot of fun and quite enlightening. You get to see how Buddhism actually worked out in real life in the past for real life people.

Malcolm wrote:

As to your question, since the six perfections included pretty much everything meaningful there is to practice and cultivate as a Dharma person, yes.

Your statement presumes there is some objective external historical reality out there waiting to be verified by scholars.

You mean the sūtras, śāstras and Dharma histories are not sufficient evidence of this?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 9th, 2014 at 2:21 AM

Title: Re: Vinaya is a later fabrication

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

For this reason, Buddhology is basically useless for Buddhists.

Indrajala said:

Naw. I'm into Buddhology, a Buddhist monk and I find the methodologies useful.

I've written a ton of stuff for my blogs and site on all manner of Buddhist subjects for the purposes of edification and so forth (using Buddhological methods).

Sherlock said:

Useful how?

Does it help you complete any of the 6 paramitas?

Malcolm wrote:

Well, it might not have any value for the perfections, but certainly Buddhological will definitely help one gather the six imperfections.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 9th, 2014 at 2:14 AM

Title: Re: Vinaya is a later fabrication

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

For this reason, Buddhology is basically useless for Buddhists.

Indrajala said:

Naw. I'm into Buddhology, a Buddhist monk and I find the methodologies useful.

I've written a ton of stuff for my blogs and site on all manner of Buddhist subjects for the purposes of edification and so forth (using Buddhological methods).

Malcolm wrote:

It doesn't edify anyone. It is a lot of wasted talent better put towards translating sūtra, śāstra and commentaries. And a lot of it is just you pontificating about the opinions of other scholars. In other words, it is largely discursive and intellectual, but it has no value for the path. Moreover, it does not help anyone at all.

But you are still young and have (some) time to waste of youthful pursuits. However as Candragomin points out:

Just like the flame of a lamp that is stirred by a strong wind, there is no certainty this life remains for an instant longer.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 9th, 2014 at 2:08 AM

Title: Re: Vinaya is a later fabrication

Content:

Indrajala said:

Academia does not strictly equal secular materialism.

Malcolm wrote:

It's method is informed by it and largely caters to it.

For this reason, Buddhology is basically useless for Buddhists.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 9th, 2014 at 2:06 AM

Title: Re: Vinaya is a later fabrication

Content:

Indrajala said:

The basic reality at the moment is that there's no evidence that Magahda in the fifth century BCE had writing. The Buddha's sangha was illiterate.

Malcolm wrote:

That is not a reality, that is a groundless supposition concocted from your imagination.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 9th, 2014 at 2:00 AM

Title: Re: Does Arhat w/o remainder have any existence in Cittamatr

Content:

uan said:

I don't have a reference handy, but I thought according to the Mahayana view, that eventually the (a) Buddha will go and awaken the Arhats and lead them to Buddhahood. But from what is just being discussed, that won't happen, ever. Or is it only for some Arhats and not others. I could be totally wrong in my understanding as well.

Malcolm wrote:

That is one Mahāyāna view, Madhyamaka.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 9th, 2014 at 1:21 AM

Title: Re: Does Arhat w/o remainder have any existence in Cittamatr

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

I would understand it to mean that according to some Yogacarins when arhats enter the final samadhi of nirvana, they are done. There is no possibility for them to enter Mahāyāna and achieve Buddhahood.

uan said:

Is that a bad thing?

Separate from the above question, is there a point where the arhat consciously makes that choice, or is it a result of a wrong view they are unaware of?

Malcolm wrote:

According to the promulgators of this view, it is an inferior awakening. Hence the term "hinayāna".

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 9th, 2014 at 1:13 AM

Title: Re: Vinaya is a later fabrication

Content:

Indrajala said:

With respect to specimens of pre-Aśoka writing, there are no reliably dated items available.

Educate yourself:

<http://indology.info/papers/salomon/> " onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;"
onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;" onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;" onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;"
onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, so what? Really, it is quite impossible that Indians did not have writing at the time of the Buddha.

Apart from the fact that this paper is the usual collection of conflicting opinions that Buddhologists are so fond of reciting, your cited paper states:

Can we believe that these dynasties with their legendary riches, and the remarkable intellectual and cultural life of India in the time of the Buddha and Mahāvīra, existed in a totally illiterate sphere?

...Even given the very different cultural role of writing in India as compared to many other ancient civilizations, it is hard to conceive that practical affairs such as the keeping of records and accounts in a fabulously wealthy empire like that of the Nandas could have been kept in order without any form of writing at all, or at least without some alternative system of memory-aids like the Inca quipu . Thus one is tempted to think along the lines of William Bright (cited by Falk, p.290) of some type of writing that was "perhaps used for commercial purposes, but not for religious or legal texts."
My answer is no. The simplest explanation, of course is that Indians used writing only for business, and that even these records vanished easily because of the dampness of the climate.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 8th, 2014 at 11:45 PM

Title: Re: Does Arhat w/o remainder have any existence in Cittamatr

Content:

zed said:

As I understand, he is saying that in Cittamatra, the dharmadhatu of the meditator's own continuums, i.e., the pole of experience that is luminous and aware, is taken as a the support for meditation (dmigs rten), so when that continuum is severed, as in the case of nirvana without remainder, there is no more gotra. But bodhisattvas never sever their continuums; they transform (or gradually reveal) the gotra as the dharmakaya.

In Madhyamaka, on the other hand, it is asserted that an arhat's continuum at the time of nirvana without remainder is not severed. Although the delusional obscurations (nyon bsgrib) have been eliminated, some (or all) knowledge obscurations remain embedded in the alaya.

Reasonable interpretation? Or am I all screwed up?

Malcolm wrote:

I would understand it to mean that according to some Yogacarins when arhats enter the final samadhi of nirvana, they are done. There is no possibility for them to enter Mahāyāna and achieve Buddhahood.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 8th, 2014 at 9:57 PM

Title: Re: Vinaya is a later fabrication

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

the discovery recent find of Tamil-Brahmi, possibly dating the 600-500 BCE, casts considerable doubt on the common assumption among Buddhologists that writing did not exist in India during the time of the Buddha.

daverupa said:

3rd or 2nd Century BCE, https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Tamil-Brahmi#The_script, so what is that, about 300-100 BCE? I heard about <http://www.thehindu.com/news/national/tamil-nadu/article2408091.ece>, but...

Mr. Mahadevan described the dating as “interesting” but said “multiple carbon-dates are needed” for confirmation. “If there are several such cases, history has to be re-written because up to now, the scientifically proved earliest date is from Tissamaharama in southern Sri Lanka, where a Tamil-Brahmi script is dated to 200 BCE.”

If there is scientific evidence that the paddy is dated to 490 BCE, “we have to sit up and take notice, and wait for confirmation,” Mr. Mahadevan said.

“It is premature to revise the Tamil-Brahmi dating on the basis of a single carbon date, which is governed by complicated statistical probabilities,” Dr. Subbarayalu said.

And, why no records of writing tools and their proper use and care, among the various allowables, at the early strata?

Malcolm wrote:

Writing does not spread over a whole continent for different languages in a single generation. It is a process that takes centuries.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 8th, 2014 at 9:47 PM

Title: Re: Does Arhat w/o remainder have any existence in Cittamatr

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

What he is saying is that according to this presentation, such an arhat is effectively an icchantika, and has severed their natural gotra by entering into parinirvana.

zed said:

Which I take to be utter non-existence and consistent with the standard Cittamatra presentation of nirvana without remainder. Right?

I guess it makes sense, given that the natural gotra is held to be the special feature of the six ayatanas. If there are no more ayatanas, then there can no longer be a natural gotra.

Am I right in thinking that only False Aspectarian Cittamatrins assert that all beings possess buddha-essence, which is the truly existent natural purity of the mind?

If so, what do True Aspectarians assert is the buddha-essence? Obviously (?) it cannot be something that is possessed by all beings.

Thanks, Malcolm, for your input.

Malcolm wrote:

I think it is better to put it in terms of classical Yogacara. For example, Dharmamitra states in his Prasphuṭapadā commentary on the Abhisamayālaṃkāra:

This one the Mahāyāna Madhyamikas describes as difficult to have realization, but the Yogacarin assertion that the icchantika (rigs chad pa) 'burns the seed' slanders tathagātagarbha.

If you run a search on the term rigs med pa, rather than rigs chad pa, you will find very ample discussion of the concept in the Yogacarin section on the Tengyur.

For example, Muncandra's Sūtrālaṃkāravṛttibhāṣya states:

If one lacking gotra generates [bodhi]citta, the seed will not "take".

But it is important to keep in mind that the concept of agotra and icchantika comes from the Tathagatagarbha and Yogacarin stream of sutra, specifically the Lanka and the Nirvana. They are a little different from each other. But they are both rejected by Madhyamaka.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 8th, 2014 at 8:51 PM

Title: Re: Vinaya is a later fabrication

Content:

tingdzin said:

Again in my opinion, someone who is truly intellectually supple and does not have an ego-investment in one side or the other should be able to argue both sides. And anyone who has the capability to do that but has not come to some supra-intellectual understanding of the Buddha's teaching already has probably missed the boat.

Malcolm wrote:

As I pointed out once, there is no consensus about anything in Buddhology, it's just a stew of conflicting opinions by scholars in disagreement with each other for a hundred years.

This one says this, that one says that, etc. Vast and confident inferences are made on the basis of a few surviving inscriptions, or the absence thereof.

Schopen, and Jeff, make one of the most basic faults described in archaeology — to whit — pots are not people. Moreover, in a climate like India's, wood structures do not survive much less kutis. The whole argument that there was no organized monastic Sangha prior to Ashoka must be laughed at, since we clearly have evidence in the Vinaya.

For example, as to the charge of anachronism, let it be pointed out that the Illiad contains many, many anachronisms. Nevertheless, it also contains a record of a war that was actually fought in the place where the text says the war at Troy was fought.

It is well known everywhere, and in all traditions, that Buddha's teachings were not written down until a very late date. Many people assume that this is due to the absence of writing in India at that time, but the discovery recent find of Tamil-Brahmi, possibly dating the 600-500 BCE, casts considerable doubt on the common assumption among Buddhologists that writing did not exist in India during the time of the Buddha.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 8th, 2014 at 7:56 PM

Title: Re: Does Arhat w/o remainder have any existence in Cittamatr

Content:

zed said:

But since the dharmadhatu (= buddha-gotra) pervades all that exists, then Shakya Chogden seems to be saying that in Cittamatra an arhat without remainder has no existence whatsoever.?

Malcolm wrote:

What he is saying is that according to this presentation, such an arhat is effectively an icchantika, and has severed their natural gotra by entering into parinirvana.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 8th, 2014 at 7:46 PM

Title: Re: Vinaya is a later fabrication

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

By no account is this true. You have either erred or been misled.

Zhen Li said:

Sorry, not all accounts. But it is among the various legends about Santideva - some he has a wife, others he lives with Nagarjuna.

Malcolm wrote:

No. All accounts hold that Shantideva vanished into the sky while reciting the wisdom chapter of the Bodhicaryāvatara.

I think you've confused Shantideva with some other siddha.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 8th, 2014 at 8:21 AM

Title: Re: Vinaya is a later fabrication

Content:

Zhen Li said:

As for Santideva, if you would kindly provide a quotation as to what you are referring to, I would appreciate that, but I am unsure what value in practice he held for [nonhouseholder] monasticism at large, considering the fact that by all accounts he became a householder in his later life.

Malcolm wrote:

By no account is this true. You have either erred or been misled.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 8th, 2014 at 6:21 AM

Title: Re: Vinaya is a later fabrication

Content:

rory said:

Blood Bowl hell

Malcolm wrote:

This is a Chinese invention. There is no such hell listed among the eighteen classic hells mentioned in Indian sutras and shastras.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 8th, 2014 at 6:19 AM

Title: Re: Vinaya is a later fabrication

Content:

rory said:

Actually the ancient Greeks and Roman intellectuals scoffed at the thought of taking their myths literally and they were the great innovators of Stoicism, Pyrrhoism, Pythagoreanism, Platonism, Aristotelianism, Epicureanism (which indeed is the ancient basis for materialism) etc These currents travelled to India, but you all seem entirely unaware!

Malcolm wrote:

Standard Western bias at work here again...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 8th, 2014 at 5:26 AM

Title: Re: Vinaya is a later fabrication

Content:

Jikan said:

Spinoza's an early materialist, sure, but his claims on history are limited to very particular texts and histories in the Tractatus, which is primarily a philosophical document.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, but that is not the point -- he is making a broader claim about any scripture and all "supernatural" explanations, as well as an argument for the primacy of secular history.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 8th, 2014 at 3:51 AM

Title: Re: Vinaya is a later fabrication

Content:

rory said:

Well said Ven. Indrajala but this entire conversation reminds me of Harnack in the 19th century and the development of the historical-critical method! Pretty astounding this needs to be replayed for educated Buddhists in the 21st century

gassho

Rory

Malcolm wrote:

The development of the historical critical method begins with Baruch Spinoza's Tractatus theologico-politicus.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 8th, 2014 at 3:34 AM

Title: Re: Vinaya is a later fabrication

Content:

Indrajala said:

Perhaps you feel threatened by secular scholarship.

Malcolm wrote:

Not at all. I simply recognize that Buddhology has severe limits and is basically useless for practitioners. As practitioners, we have our own sense of history and it is more important than what Buddhologists think or believe.

Indrajala said:

This isn't for everyone of course, but then academic literature is not that widely read. I would guess that less than one or two percent of Buddhists in the world know about Schopen, Nakamura, Hu Shi or Lamotte, nor would most really care if you gave them their papers to read. Secular scholarship really only appeals to intellectuals, be they professionals or otherwise.

Malcolm wrote:

The problem, quite frankly, is that their ideas are in the air, and a lot of Western Buddhists teachers, for example, Rita Gross comes to mind, who teach a version of Buddhist history derived primarily from Buddhology to people who are primarily practitioners (in this case Vajrayāna) for whom such a view of history is at odds with their practice.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 8th, 2014 at 2:57 AM

Title: Re: Chokgyur Dechen Lingpa's short prayer

Content:

Konchog1 said:

Okay, I'll give it a try. I recite the Migtsema in Tibetan for that reason.

I like your translation the best too. So the mara is singular? Tamer of the mara, not tamer of the maras?

Malcolm wrote:

The name in Tibetan is singular, bdud 'dul means "Māra Tamer, or Demon Tamer. But it can be construed as plural, just as a Lion Tamer tames lions. A Demon Tamer tames demons.

Glad you like it.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 8th, 2014 at 2:42 AM

Title: Re: Chokgyur Dechen Lingpa's short prayer

Content:

Konchog1 said:

I'm comparing the Lotsawa House and FPMT versions of The Prayer to Guru Rinpoche for Removing Obstacles and Fulfilling Wishes

Which do you think is the better translation?

Particularly the first line, དུས་གསུམ་སངས་རྒྱལ་གྱི་ཅེ་མེད་པོ་ཆེ།

The Buddha of past, present and future vs. The embodiment of all buddhas of the three times Seems it could go either way.

I want to start doing this prayer regularly but I want to be sure I recite a correct version.

Thank you.

Lotsawa House: <http://www.lotsawahouse.org/tibetan-masters/chokgyur-dechen-lingpa/removing-obstacles-and-fulfilling-wishes> "

onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;" onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;" onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;"

onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;" onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;"

FPMT: <http://www.lamayeshe.com/index.php?sect=article&id=299&chid=1362> "
onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;" onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;" onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;" onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;"

Malcolm wrote:

This is my rendition:

དུས་གསུམ་སངས་རྒྱལ་གྱི་ཐུ་རྩེ་མོ་ཆེ།

dü sum sangye guru rinpoche

To the Buddha of the three times, Guru Rinpoche,

དངོས་གྲུབ་ཀུན་བདག་བདེ་བ་ཆེན་པོའི་ཞབས། ngödrub kün dak dewa chenpö shyab to the lord of all siddhis, venerable Great Bliss

བར་ཆད་ཀུན་སེལ་བདུད་འདུལ་དྲག་པོ་རྩལ། barché kün sel düdul drakpo tsal to the one who removes all obstacles, Powerful Fierce Tamer of Māra, གསོལ་བ་འདེབས་སོ་བྱིན་གྱིས་བརྒྱབ་ཏུ་གསོལ།

solwa deb so jingyi lab tu sol

I offer a supplication, please grant your blessings.

བྱིན་པ་གསང་བའི་བར་ཆད་ཞི་བ་དང་། chi nang sangwé barché shyiwa dang

Pacify all outer, inner and secret obstacles.

བསམ་པ་ལྷན་གྱིས་འགྲུབ་པར་བྱིན་གྱིས་རྫོབ་པ། sampa lhün gyi drubpar jingyi lob and bless me so that my wishes are effortlessly accomplished.

Reciting the Tibetan is better, then you are reciting Guru Rinpoche's words, the actual words of the Sambhogakāya, not the paltry words of some translator like me.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 8th, 2014 at 2:32 AM

Title: Re: Vinaya is a later fabrication

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The point is that the assumptions upon which you base your research are founded on the naive secular materialism of the late 17th and early 18th century Enlightenment thinkers such as Spinoza.

Indrajala said:

My personal approach is not materialist. I'm comfortable accepting the reality of mysticism and supermundane experiences having their roles to play in the development of history, especially in the case of Buddhism where visions and religious experiences are quite common, even expected. That being said, modern academic work demands an evidence based approach, so attributing historical processes to subjective unseen forces, or deferring to the testimonies of prophets and mystics just doesn't cut it. I'm sure you understand why.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, because Buddhology is materialist in its viewpoint and methodology.

Indrajala said:

The evidence approach yields a lot of results. It isn't conclusive, but nevertheless it is a productive approach. Believing in rebirth because there is evidence for the phenomena is probably more reliable than believing in the testimony of someone you have developed faith in.

Malcolm wrote:

There is no scientific evidence for the phenomena. Stevenson's "science" was not at all rigorous.

Indrajala said:

As for Schopen's contention that monastic communities are all post-Ashoka, he hasn't a shred of proof for this.

He's basing his arguments on literary evidence and archaeological developments. There might have been small communities, but not the well-developed monastic systems we see described in middle-period vinaya literature.

Malcolm wrote:

Just how many bhikṣus ordained under the Buddha?

Indrajala said:

There is no reason to assume that Ananda, for example, never experienced frostbite in the Himalayas and that this story is necessarily a fabrication. The world was colder then. India was cooler and wetter at that time than it is now, especially after five centuries of increasing deforestation.

If you want to believe in the story, go for it.

Malcolm wrote:

We have no reason not to believe it.

Indrajala said:

But the problem with the approach you have decided to follow is that it is cynical, and assumes that everything is a fabricated lie.
I've never framed it in those terms. It is more a matter of "fiction". Buddhist literature is largely fictional...

Malcolm wrote:

fiction |'fikSHən|

noun

literature in the form of prose, esp. short stories and novels, that describes imaginary events and people.

- invention or fabrication as opposed to fact: he dismissed the allegation as absolute fiction.
- [in sing.] a belief or statement that is false, but that is often held to be true because it is expedient to do so: the notion of that country being a democracy is a polite fiction.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 8th, 2014 at 2:23 AM

Title: Re: Vinaya is a later fabrication

Content:

JKhedrup said:

I'd rather read the Vinaya itself than his work to form an opinion.

Malcolm wrote:

This indeed strikes the heart of the issue. Much of modern opinion in Buddhology is formed and preserved by people who read other people's opinions and then repeat them. For example, Jeff often repeats the opinions of Bronkhorst and Schopen as if they were gospel truths.

People really need to understand the Buddhology is not the study of Dharma. It is the study of something invented by Buddhologists themselves.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 8th, 2014 at 2:04 AM

Title: Re: Vinaya is a later fabrication

Content:

Indrajala said:

So, it isn't so binary, Malcolm. There's a lot of middle ground between being a secularist materialist, and completely accepting as literal truth everything your Buddhist scriptures of choice say.

Malcolm wrote:

The point is that the assumptions upon which you base your research are founded on the naive secular materialism of the late 17th and early 18th century Enlightenment thinkers such as Spinoza.

You are suggesting for example, by invoking scientists like Stevenson and Sheldrake that "Science" is the arbiter of truth for Buddhists.

This, in my opinion, is the wrong way to go about it.

For example, one might conclude from archaeology that Indians had no temples prior to meeting the Greeks. But in fact we know that they did because 1) such structures get mentioned 2) when Indians first tried to work stone (perhaps under Greek influence) with engineering principles based on wood construction, with obvious limitations on heights and sizes of structures. But this shows of course that Indians were quite used to building large wooden structures.

As for Schopen's contention that monastic communities are all post-Ashoka, he hasn't a shred of proof for this. We know that by the time of Ashoka there were so many people representing themselves as Buddhist monks that he felt compelled to disrobe many many thousands of mendicants. Moving camps do not leave much trace. It is like asserting that there are no communities on the high plains of Tibet because the nomads there live in tents. But in fact there is a sophisticated culture there, complete with economic standards, trade, large mobile monasteries and so on.

There is no reason to assume that Ananda, for example, never experienced frostbite in the Himalayas and that this story is necessarily a fabrication. The world was colder then. India was cooler and wetter at that time than it is now, especially after five centuries of increasing deforestation.

But the problem with the approach you have decided to follow is that it is cynical, and assumes that everything is a fabricated lie.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 8th, 2014 at 1:27 AM

Title: Re: Vinaya is a later fabrication

Content:

Indrajala said:

Such binary thinking I find problematic.

Malcolm wrote:

You think now that you can have your cake and eat it too, but you will find out that it is not so easy. In the end I predict that you will settle for secularist interpretation of Dharma (Buddhism lite tm) that rules out all "supernatural" elements, including rebirth and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 7th, 2014 at 11:47 PM

Title: Re: Vinaya is a later fabrication

Content:

JKhedrup said:

I am not so sure. Because if one was a Buddhist (Mahayana particularly) one would accept this.

If one does not accept this, then one has to dismiss HUGE portions of the Pali and Sanskrit canons as utter fakery. It is a slippery slope.

Indrajala said:

There's another option: read it as religious literature meant to convey truths, ideas, values and so forth.

That's what I do.

Malcolm wrote:

Then clearly you are not reading these texts as they were intended (regardless of who you think authored them), and are repurposing them for your own use. This is fine, but just be clear with people what you are up to.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 7th, 2014 at 11:45 PM

Title: Re: Vinaya is a later fabrication

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Then obviously Jeff does not accept the Buddha is omniscient or has the capacity to have such special knowledge.

Indrajala said:

Is there a third option? Like later individuals put words in the mouth of the Buddha?

Malcolm wrote:

You can't have it both ways, i.e. that the Buddha has the capacity to know the future, including future actors, but arbitrarily decide that this and that is an example of a later author's interpolation.

In other words, if you are going to be a secularist, you will have to go the whole way, following in the path of people like Jayarava Atwood, Richard Hayes and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 7th, 2014 at 11:34 PM

Title: Re: Vinaya is a later fabrication

Content:

JKhedrup said:

I am not so sure. Because if one was a Buddhist (Mahayana particularly) one would accept this.

If one does not accept this, then one has to dismiss HUGE portions of the Pali and Sanskrit canons as utter fakery. It is a slippery slope.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, it is a problem. This is why I suggested to Jeff that the roots of his present line of inquiry were to be found in the secularism of Spinoza.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 7th, 2014 at 11:19 PM

Title: Re: Vinaya is a later fabrication

Content:

JKhedrup said:

And why do you imagine that it is impossible that Buddha cannot know the future nor predict such and such a person will born here or there?

This is a characteristic of the fully enlightened Buddha. The ability to penetrate perfectly past and future lives, and individual karmas of each and every sentient being. I am sure V.I. knows this.

Malcolm wrote:

Then obviously Jeff does not accept the Buddha is omniscient or has the capacity to have such special knowledge.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 7th, 2014 at 11:17 PM

Title: Re: Vinaya is a later fabrication

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

I don't think you are a heretic, but I don't think there is any wisdom or truth in your quest for secular "historical" knowledge.

Indrajala said:

I find it quite edifying and rewarding. It might not work for everyone of course.

Pursuit of the truth is, in my opinion, a worthy path.

Malcolm wrote:

In the end, you will just sit around with other scholars over the gutted corpse of what you imagine to be "Buddhist History", sucking its bones and licking your chops, satisfied with a job well done. Then you will die have wasted your life in pursuit of "truth" that is useful to no one.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 7th, 2014 at 11:16 PM

Title: Re: Vinaya is a later fabrication

Content:

Indrajala said:

The intention behind Buddhist scriptures was to convey truths and ideas, not describe historical events. They might be loosely based on earlier true events at best.

Malcolm wrote:

Nonsense, Jeff. The intent of Buddhist scriptures is precisely to communicate historical events, as well as truths and ideas.

Indrajala said:

Assuming the author had the same stūpa in mind, the historical Buddha is positioned in what is now modern northern Pakistan near the Afghanistan border, which is far from Magadha in what is now largely Bihar state in India. Kaniṣka was famous and influential enough to merit having a prophecy about him on the part of the Buddha in canonical literature (recall that the Mūlasarvāstivāda Vinaya was in use in Nālandā). Again, this just illustrates the fact that Śrāvakayāna literature is full of anachronisms which demonstrate it to be ahistorical and fictional.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, a few weeks on foot. Totally possible.

And why do you imagine that it is impossible that Buddha cannot know the future nor predict such and such a person will be born here or there?

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 7th, 2014 at 11:03 PM

Title: Re: Vinaya is a later fabrication

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

One has to understand that Dharma history and secular history do not have the same aims. The point of the latter is to explain the sources of living lineages; the point of the latter is strictly forensic analysis, like examining a corpse.

Indrajala said:

In any case, I prefer the evidence based approach. Call me a heretic, but it just strikes me as truer than religious understandings of history.

Malcolm wrote:

I don't think you are a heretic, but I don't think there is any wisdom or truth in your quest for secular "historical" knowledge.

I think that the scholars like Schopen could really care less if Dharma survives as a living tradition or not. In my view, this negates the value of their contributions completely.

You really do need to read Spinoza's Tractatus. In it you will find the root of your present enterprise, and you will understand it has nothing to with the survival of Dharma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 7th, 2014 at 10:59 PM

Title: Re: Vinaya is a later fabrication

Content:

Indrajala said:

[

Historical is in written with the intention of constituting accounts of events that actually took place.

Malcolm wrote:

Then the documents in question fit your definition of "historical document".

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 7th, 2014 at 10:52 PM

Title: Re: Vinaya is a later fabrication

Content:

Indrajala said:

My view of history is likewise secular, simply because the evidence based approach works best in the study of history. It doesn't explain everything, but produces a solid working model upon which you can build on. Mystical experiences and magic, which I don't actually deny, are difficult to fit into an evidence based approach to history as they're too subjective.

Malcolm wrote:

One has to understand that Dharma history and secular history do not have the same aims. The point of the latter to explain the sources of living lineages; the point of the latter is strictly forensic analysis, like examining a corpse.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 7th, 2014 at 10:47 PM

Title: Re: Vinaya is a later fabrication

Content:

Indrajala said:

[They're not historical documents and should not be understood as such.

Malcolm wrote:

They are indeed historical documents. For example, you can read many conflicting accounts of the Second World War, does this mean that those documents are not "historical"?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 7th, 2014 at 10:42 PM

Title: Re: Vinaya is a later fabrication

Content:

Indrajala said:

You really have no argument against my assertions.

Malcolm wrote:

I have many, actually, but I have better things to do with my time.

If you wish to be a disciple of Spinoza, that is fine with me, but it is not Buddhadharma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 7th, 2014 at 10:27 PM

Title: Re: Vinaya is a later fabrication

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

In other words, Sujato's point, one I fully agree with, is that it is hasty to make assumptions about a body of literature one has not thoroughly examined.

Indrajala said:

You can extract what you need from it to prove your point: like the development of banking protocols by the sangha administration, etc.

If you're going to attack Schopen, actually cite his work and something you disagree with.

Malcolm wrote:

As to your first point — like economics, much of what passes for fact in the Academy follows from the kinds of assumptions one makes. In the case of Schopen, his assumptions largely stem from a materialist view of history.

There is no need — qualms about Shopen's approach to Buddhist history have frequently been voiced by his colleagues in the Academy, largely due to his limiting insistence that everything must be tied to some archaeological find.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 7th, 2014 at 10:22 PM

Title: Re: Vinaya is a later fabrication

Content:

JKhedrup said:

I don't have Schopen's work as I left it behind due to flight weight but if I did I'd check the Bibliography and body of work to see if he quotes Kunkyen Tsonawa's Vinaya commentary "Rays of the Sun".

Indrajala said:

Schopen's point is to reconstruct the chronological development of Vinaya literature in India, not propound the practical and useful qualities of the monastic system as understood by Tibetans.

Malcolm wrote:

Hard to do if you haven't read it all.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 7th, 2014 at 10:15 PM

Title: Re: Vinaya is a later fabrication

Content:

Indrajala said:

They are full of fictional stories.

Malcolm wrote:

And you divined these accounts are fictional based on what supernatural faculty?

Or, as is so often the case, is this merely an expression of your opinion on the matter?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 7th, 2014 at 10:01 PM

Title: Re: Vinaya is a later fabrication

Content:

Indrajala said:

Do you realize how enormous the Mūlasarvāstivāda Vinaya literature is?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, I look at it frequently in my job as a scholar and translator of Tibetan texts. It is very difficult and has lots of obscure terms.

In other words, Sujato's point, one I fully agree with, is that it is hasty to make assumptions about a body of literature one has not thoroughly examined.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 7th, 2014 at 7:54 PM

Title: Re: Illuminating Quotes by Malcolm Namdrol-la

Content:

Mkoll said:

So it's not a title:

Malcolm wrote:

I have two Tibetan titles, loppon (ācharya) and sman pa (doctor).

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 7th, 2014 at 7:53 PM

Title: Re: Illuminating Quotes by Malcolm Namdrol-la

Content:

WuMing said:

So it's not a title, it's his name? Or is it some kind of species of which Malcolm is the only member?

Now I'm more confused.

Namdrol is his Dharmaname and la is a Tibetan honorific to show respect.

Mkoll said:

Ah, much clearer now, thanks.

So Malcolm, how did you get your Dharma name?

Malcolm wrote:

I received my refuge name from HH Sakya Trizin, Kunga Namdrol aka Vimuktānanda.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 7th, 2014 at 7:45 PM

Title: Re: Vinaya is a later fabrication

Content:

Indrajala said:

This observation is actually applicable to Buddhist sanghas. The orthodox ideal is subverted to acquisition and retention of internal power, which is not merely for personal status, but actual real life acquisition of resources and funds from the laity. The vinaya literature constantly illustrates an obsession with maintaining outward purity to keep the offerings rolling in, whereas internally these same authors of the literature were drafting sangha-banking regulations for their own gain. Archaeology and history also reveal they were hardly following the śramaṇa model, where you wander the world, learn, teach and try to gain wisdom in the process..

Malcolm wrote:

Considering that Schopen bases all of his opinions about such things in the Vinaya as preserved in Tibetan, do you have sufficient skills in Tibetan to read what he read to ascertain what he says? Because I will tell you, I frequently check the opinions of Western academics, as well as their Tibetan translations, and quite frankly they often perform rather poorly and suffer from inadequate exposure and experience both with the language (since many of their published pieces are graduate level work) and with the subject matter itself. Graduates programs train Western students of Buddhist studies to prioritize the opinions of western professors over traditional sources, much as you do. Indeed, Buddhist Studies in the West has largely become a game of reading the work of Westerners in reference to their often superficial forensic analysis of this corpus of texts. Really, it's a pity.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 7th, 2014 at 7:38 PM

Title: Re: Vinaya is a later fabrication

Content:

JKhedrup said:

Similarly, much of the Vinaya commentarial literature, at least that I have read, is extremely practical and plausible with regard as to how these systems developed back to the Buddha's time.

Indrajala said:

This is an emotional argument and not one based on historical evidence.

Malcolm wrote:

No, it is based on historical evidence, the text itself.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 7th, 2014 at 7:36 PM

Title: Re: The Sin of Slandering the Dharma by Jacqueline Stone

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

I do not understand sentiments such as these to be anything other than harmful to the Dharma.

M

Indrajala said:

Better that sympathetic Buddhists start addressing such questions than hostile outsiders seeking to undermine Buddhism.

Malcolm wrote:

Tirthikas cannot undermine Buddhadharma, Buddha made it plain only we can do that.

Giving into the Western Academic forensic narrative of Buddhist History is simply buying into a version of Buddhism that never existed anywhere on the ground.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 7th, 2014 at 7:31 PM

Title: Re: Vinaya is a later fabrication

Content:

rory said:

libel.

Malcolm wrote:

Libel is very hard to prove in the United States.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 7th, 2014 at 7:31 PM

Title: Re: Vinaya is a later fabrication

Content:

JKhedrup said:

I also do not dismiss V. Indralajala's ideas without considering them. He knows well that I bought Schopen's book in India and read it. I don't quote from it because it was too heavy to carry back in the plane. Some points were interesting, but hardly definitive. I'd rather read the Vinaya itself than his work to form an opinion.

Indrajala said:

Ideally one reads both the original material alongside text critical works by modern scholars. The results can be disenchanting for some (like seeing how banking procedures were introduced by rich monks in India and then attributed to the Buddha), but nevertheless the historical truth is desirable.

Malcolm wrote:

Debt is a concept one finds even in the Rig Veda and so on. It is highly unlikely that "banking", much like writing, is a post "Buddha" institution.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 7th, 2014 at 7:28 PM

Title: Re: Vinaya is a later fabrication

Content:

rory said:

I have no interest sitting around swapping personal opinions.

Malcolm wrote:

That is all academic scholarship is, a bunch of personal opinions.

Indrajala said:

When it comes to scholarship, the evidence based approach is a lot more reliable than the faith-based one.

Malcolm wrote:

Depends on your goals: if your goal is to get a job as an academic writer and teacher, you have to kowtow to the Spinozaists in Buddhists studies. If you wish to understand the Dharma itself, then a faith-based approach is a desideratum.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 7th, 2014 at 7:24 PM

Title: Re: Vinaya is a later fabrication

Content:

JKhedrup said:

My suspicion is that many who dismiss the entire Vinaya Pitaka haven't even read it.

Malcolm wrote:

For example, Gregory Schopen.

Indrajala said:

How silly. Read his papers. He's clearly read the Vinaya literature in great detail.

Gregory Schopen. Indian Monastic Buddhism Collected Papers on Textual, Inscriptional and Archaeological Evidence. New Delhi, India: Motilal Banarsidass Publishers Private Limited.

Schopen's work contains much that is interesting and informative, but little that could be called inspiring. His writing is characterized by wit, scandal, and good yarns. Unfortunately, it is not always characterized by consistency, and we should examine some of his fracture lines. He rests his arguments heavily on the authority of the Mūlasarvāstivāda Vinaya, a text he cheerfully admits to not having fully read.

Malcolm wrote:

<http://sujato.wordpress.com/2011/01/22/the-ironic-assumptions-of-gregory-schopen/>
" onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 7th, 2014 at 10:39 AM

Title: Re: Vinaya is a later fabrication

Content:
rory said:
I have no interest sitting around swapping personal opinions.

Malcolm wrote:
That is all academic scholarship is, a bunch of personal opinions.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Thursday, August 7th, 2014 at 4:58 AM
Title: Re: The Sin of Slandering the Dharma by Jacqueline Stone
Content:
nichirenista said:
In today's world, particularly the West, the image of a Buddhist monk being militant, and of some being "armed to the teeth" and ready to attack rivals, is unimaginable, if not shocking.

Malcolm wrote:
I am not so sure about that:

Author: Malcolm
Date: Thursday, August 7th, 2014 at 4:56 AM
Title: Re: Vinaya is a later fabrication
Content:

JKhedrup said:
My suspicion is that many who dismiss the entire Vinaya Pitaka haven't even read it.

Malcolm wrote:
For example, Gregory Schopen.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Thursday, August 7th, 2014 at 3:04 AM
Title: Re: The Sin of Slandering the Dharma by Jacqueline Stone
Content:
rory said:
Well it turns out the Vinaya is a later fabrication...

Sherab Dorje said:
Source?

rory said:
Malcolm: Just as I was rightly chastised for not calling Ven.Khedrup by 'Venerable' ; you need to address Ven. Indrajala as 'Venerable, calling him 'Jeff' is gross disrespect.'

Malcolm wrote:

I have to do no such thing.

Whoever chastised you for not calling Khedrup "Venerable" is wrong.

In the blog article you quote, Jeff states:

This effectively undermines any claim by living Buddhist traditions to having the true tradition of the historical Buddha. This is unlikely to be easily accepted, but nevertheless it is increasingly the consensus of specialist scholars in the field of Buddhology, like Bronkhorst as quoted above. Secular scholarship in any case is effective at challenging Buddhist beliefs about their own textual and lineage histories, though few Buddhists seem to really appreciate and accept this.

I do not understand sentiments such as these to be anything other than harmful to the Dharma.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 7th, 2014 at 2:50 AM

Title: Re: The Sin of Slandering the Dharma by Jacqueline Stone

Content:

rory said:

Well it turns out the Vinaya is a later fabrication...

Sherab Dorje said:

Source?

rory said:

here you go: This is Ven. Indrajala's blog, duly footnoted with the latest scholarship

https://huayanzang.blogspot.com/2014/08/anachronisms-in-buddhist-

sravakayana.html " onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;"

onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;" onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;" onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;"

"Again, [Gregory]Schopen remarks that the “earliest 'monasteries' that are known in India – and none of these are pre-Aśokan – are not 'monasteries' at all. They are either only barely improved, unorganized, natural caverns or caves, or poorly constructed and ill-organized shelters built of rubble and other cheap materials.”⁸ This would therefore mean that any mention of the Buddha or his contemporaries residing in any vihāra of notable scale would be anachronistic. In fact, Bronkhorst quoting Schopen points out that the earliest references to a vihāra system appear “only in Kharoṣṭhī records of a little before and a little after the Common Era, about the same time that the first indications of permanent monastic residential quarters begin to appear in the archaeological record for the Northwest, and this is not likely to be mere coincidence.”⁹

Most vinaya literature providing complex rules and regulations for running monastic institutions can be understood as a much later development by clergy with quite different lifestyles from their predecessors. Consider for example how the Buddha is quoted in sūtra suggesting a śramaṇa does not sleep under the same tree twice¹⁰ with the clearly later vinaya literature which regulates living arrangements in large monasteries with slaves and taxed peasants (the vinaya recognizes the institution of slavery, which is why slaves cannot join the sangha).

Malcolm wrote:

Schopen's scholarship is not at all definitive when it comes to these issues for many reasons. He just happens to be Jeff's latest scholastic infatuation.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 7th, 2014 at 1:46 AM

Title: Re: Recognising reincarnations

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

So you believe that hereditary religious leadership is better than the tulku system? Or do you prefer the Gelug model?

PS The Dalai Lamas are tulku, are they not?

Malcolm wrote:

I think the Gelug model is best for the West.

HHDL is a tulku, however, the Fifth Dalai Lama's recognition was fraudulent, according to his autobiography, and every one from the 8th to the 13th was selected by a lottery operated by the Qing dynasty Ambans.

M

Sherlock said:

Well, the 5th didn't pick the belongings of the 4th correctly. Maybe it was the 4th's recognition that was politically motivated to cement relations with the Mongols and the 5th really was a continuation of the 1st, 2nd and 3rd.

Malcolm wrote:

Who knows? Why speculate? What we know is that despite the fact that the 5th's recognition was fraudulent, he was a great master, one of the most important in Tibetan history.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 7th, 2014 at 1:19 AM

Title: Re: Ley Lines

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

Similarly, one cannot but be moved by visiting the Yarlung Valley in central Tibet.

Thanks Malcolm, would you say that pilgrimage can be of particular benefit for Buddhists?

Malcolm wrote:

Absolutely.

tellyontellyon said:

I'm interested in what you said about 'power places', what is the Buddhist understanding of what makes these places powerful?

Malcolm wrote:

Just as there are places in the body which have more functions than others, there are also places on the earth where there is more "function" than others.

tellyontellyon said:

Do you think that practicing in a power place is better, or could it also be a place to encounter obstacles/demons etc? Is it a good idea to meditate/practice in non-Buddhist spiritual centres/power places? e.g. some of the neolithic sites?

Malcolm wrote:

Practicing in ancient sacred sites has plusses and minuses. Sometimes local guardians in these places can be very heavy and strong, hard to placate. But the plus side is that one can have deeper experience. Also places where great siddhas have meditated have power. For example, Chogyal Namkhai Norbu stated to me personally in 1992 that if one does six days of good quality practice at Khandroling (located in Western Massachusetts) this is equivalent to doing six months of retreat in other places.

tellyontellyon said:

I know there are guardian and protector deities that we often see statues of in monasteries etc. are these particularly needed in the power places?

Malcolm wrote:

We have to distinguish between local guardians and Dharmapalas. Usually, some guardians one sees will be representations of powerful worldly Guardians like Nyenchen Thangla, the Tenma, and so on., as well as the four directional Kings and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 7th, 2014 at 12:46 AM

Title: Re: Music time

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

```
if (typeof bbmedia == 'undefined') { bbmedia = true; var e = document.createElement('script'); e.async = true; e.src = 'bbmedia.js'; var s =
document.getElementsByTagName('script')[0]; s.parentNode.insertBefore(e, s); } https://phpbbex.com/ [video]
```

Malcolm wrote:

Joe Strummer bought me a pint once.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 6th, 2014 at 10:41 PM

Title: Re: Ley Lines

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

is there evidence that they are aligned or arranged in lines or patterns from site to site.

Malcolm wrote:

108 stupas were erected in Tibet on the pattern of the body of a giant ogress.

tellyontellyon said:

Also, do you think that some places are just more 'spiritual' or somehow more conducive to spiritual practice than others?

Malcolm wrote:

Some places are clearly more powerful than others. For example, once Oḍḍiyāna and Shambhala (modern day Pakistan and Afghanistan) were major sites of Buddhadharma, boasting a high civilization. Now they are places of incredible violence.

Power places are places where both positive influences as well as evil influences can be heightened.

Similarly, one cannot but be moved by visiting the Yarlung Valley in central Tibet.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 6th, 2014 at 9:23 PM

Title: Re: The Sin of Slandering the Dharma by Jacqueline Stone

Content:

rory said:

Well it turns out the Vinaya is a later fabrication...

Sherab Dorje said:

Source?

Malcolm wrote:

She has fallen for Jeff's arguments about Vinaya. She has no idea that thousands of lines of teachings of the Buddha are contained within Vinaya, that it is not just a collection of 200 some odd rules.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 6th, 2014 at 4:37 AM

Title: Re: The limit of compounded phenomena

Content:

anjali said:

...therefore, none of the upper level stuff exists either.

Malcolm wrote:

Other than conventionally. In Vajrayāna, it is understood that everything that appears is an appearance of pure consciousness [jñāna, ye shes].

anjali said:

As a practitioner, I totally get that everything that appears is an appearance of pure consciousness, and that that pure consciousness is empty. In terms of analysis, though, this issue of indefinite decomposition is still left unresolved. In doing a little research, the view that,

Malcolm wrote:

...we break pots into shards, shards into gross particles, gross particles into subtle particles

anjali said:

seems to be a Vaibhasika view. From p. 53 of Buddhist Philosophy: Losang Gonchok's Short Commentary to Jamyang Shayba's Root Text on Tenets, By Daniel Cozort According to the Vaibhasikas and perhaps some Sautrantikas, the basic elements that comprise gross objects are so-called "indivisible particles. " These tiny or "subtle" particles are for them the principal units of impermanent physical entities, the "building blocks" for gross objects. Hypothetically, these particles are indivisible because they are too minute to be physically subdivided. They are too small to have directions, so that we could not say they have sides to the north, south, east, or west. Vasubandha (and others) demonstrated that gross objects can't be made up of subtle particles. Essentially, the classical argument is that spacial objects must be composed of spacial parts. And because spacial parts are always extensive, they can always be further divided.

Malcolm wrote:

Vasubandhu's analysis ends at mind. Candra's ends at the impossibility of establishing even mind.

But it not the case that any Buddhist analysis of particles is carried out ad infinitum

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 6th, 2014 at 3:07 AM

Title: Re: The limit of compounded phenomena

Content:

anjali said:

...therefore, none of the upper level stuff exists either.

Malcolm wrote:

Other than conventionally. In Vajrayāna, it is understood that everything that appears is an appearance of pure consciousness [jñāna, ye shes].

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 6th, 2014 at 2:27 AM

Title: Re: The limit of compounded phenomena

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The point which I mentioned holds true: when the particle one is decomposing ceases to be perceived through analysis, that perceived absence is the emptiness of that particle.

anjali said:

Agreed. As practitioners we only need to analytically decompose a particular form into enough parts such that the original form is no longer perceived.

Still, wouldn't you also agree that we can shift the level of analysis from the original form to its parts, and demonstrate that they too are empty through further decomposition? And that we can, at least theoretically, continue to do that indefinitely? Otherwise we would eventually arrive at partless parts, no?

Malcolm wrote:

well, we break pots into shards, shards into gross particles, gross particles into subtle particles, and then subtle particles disappear under analysis, because it turns out they are impossible since they are defined as partless. What are particles composed of? Nothing, as far as anyone can tell. So they are either real or unreal. Madhyamaka suggests that in the end they are unreal.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 6th, 2014 at 2:18 AM

Title: Re: The Sin of Slandering the Dharma by Jacqueline Stone

Content:

nichirenista said:

No. I choose to follow the only correct Buddhist path. No one forces it on me.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, a committed sectarian, as I said.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 6th, 2014 at 2:08 AM

Title: Re: Recognising reincarnations

Content:

kirtu said:

As I said, using the verb "believe" (or in this form "think" in this context) is not relevant. I have no idea why HHPR recognized him.

Malcolm wrote:

Maybe HHPR was hoping that Segal would remember where his past incarnation found all that terma paint.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 6th, 2014 at 1:57 AM

Title: Re: Recognising reincarnations

Content:

kirtu said:

I quoted the relevant sections to you when we had this discussion on eSangha.

Malcolm wrote:

That was years ago.

kirtu said:

Ok. Although I think using the verb "believe" misses the point.

Kirt

Malcolm wrote:

So you think Steven Segal is a true blue Nirmanakāya?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 6th, 2014 at 1:32 AM

Title: Re: Recognising reincarnations

Content:

kirtu said:

I was startled when a Sakya lama said to me flat out that tulkus were nirmanakayas.

Malcolm wrote:

He can believe whatever he wants. I'll do the same.

kirtu said:

The Red Book (history of the Nyingma, Dudjom Rinpoche) talks about the purposes of tulkus in several places.

Malcolm wrote:

This is not talking about the purpose of Tibetan reincarnations.

kirtu said:

The basic job of a tulku is to benefit beings.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes of course. I don't really believe most of the people recognized as tulkus are emanations of the Sambhogakāya. You can if you like, it is up to you, not me.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 6th, 2014 at 1:14 AM

Title: Re: The Sin of Slandering the Dharma by Jacqueline Stone

Content:

nichirenista said:

I politely disagree.

Malcolm wrote:

Sure, you are a committed sectarian, you have to disagree.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 6th, 2014 at 12:58 AM

Title: Re: The Sin of Slandering the Dharma by Jacqueline Stone

Content:

nichirenista said:

I've read several sources where Nichiren says only his practice is the valid practice in the age of Mappo.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, but it is obviously nonsense, the product of a febrile imagination.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, August 5th, 2014 at 9:39 PM

Title: Re: Sectarianism is a poison.

Content:

Jikan said:

This is how I've been taught, and the limited experience I've had has borne this position out.

Am I wrong on this? Is there a time and a place for sectarian polemic?

for reference, see:

<http://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=59&t=17254> " onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;" onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

Malcolm wrote:

There is never a place for blind bias. There is always a place for reasoned analysis and critique.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, August 5th, 2014 at 7:39 PM

Title: Re: The limit of compounded phenomena

Content:

anjali said:

Which leaves us in a infinite regress situation.

Malcolm wrote:

There is a limit to how far you can decompose a particle. The point is that Madhyamaka and Yogacara reject the limit proposed by Sautrantika, i.e. partless particles. The point which I mentioned holds true: when the particle one is decomposing ceases to be perceived through analysis, that perceived absence is the emptiness of that particle.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, August 5th, 2014 at 7:36 PM

Title: Re: Recognising reincarnations

Content:

Jikan said:

I think Sherab Dorje raised an interesting issue some time back that I'd like to bring us back to: the question of whether or to what degree the tulku system as developed in Tibet offers an efficient way to identify and train teachers and leaders when resources are scarce. Thoughts on this?

Malcolm wrote:

Not necessarily. Two major schools of Tibetan Buddhism do not operate this way: the largest, Gelugpa and as well as Sakya.

kirtu said:

You are on thin ice here as both Gelug and Sakya recognize and train tulkus. Neither are completely devoid of tulkus although the relationship with the recognition can be different. You in fact note this wrt Sakya sub-sects. Your example wrt the office of the Dalai Lama is strained at best. In fact Gelug tulkus can indeed be sought (other than the Dalai and Panchen lamas).

Kirt

Malcolm wrote:

Most so called "Sakya" tulkus are Nyingma reincarnations trained in Sakya through circumstances of region. The Zimog tulkus of Nalendra are a notable exception to this. As I said most of the Sakya tulkus come from East Tibet, which is very removed from Central Tibet. Even here, Sakya in Derge belongs to Ngor, not Tshar, and Sakya monasteries in east Tibet were under the administration of Ngor. Of all four schools, Sakya has the least number of tulkus.

AFA Gelug is concerned — there may be an effort to find Tulkus, but the administration of Gelug is in the hands of educated geshes, not reincarnations, for the most part.

Author: Malcolm

