Date: Tuesday, August 5th, 2014 at 4:15 AM

Title: Re: The limit of compounded phenomena

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

It is around the same point as the statements that anjali transcribed. Maybe anjali remembers the time mark?

Malcolm wrote:

The mind is not a material thing, so it cannot be divided in the same way as a finger.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, August 4th, 2014 at 11:49 PM

Title: Re: The limit of compounded phenomena

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

In the video he is explaining the statement: form is emptiness, emptiness is form. He seems to be talking only in regards to physical phenomena having a limit, at another point he explains that mind can be reduced indefinitely.

Malcolm wrote:

What precisely does he say?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, August 4th, 2014 at 10:54 PM

Title: Re: Commentary on the 51 Mental Factors?

Content:

Concordiadiscordi said:

Thank you, Malcom.

I have located a beautiful translation of the work suggested by you. Naturally, you are quite correct in recommending a direct return to the original beast, for what could be more rewarding than to cultivate one's own unique mode of understanding by grappling with the very source itself? However, I still wish it were possible to locate a manuscript in which most of the grappling had been done for me - a highly delusive notion, but a notion nonetheless!

Malcolm wrote:

It is really not that difficult a subject: there basically four groups of mental factors; universal, positive, afflicted and negative.

10 you cannot be without. All positive minds in samsara consist of 22 mental factors (10 universal, ten positive, plus vitarka and vicara), the minimum number of mental factors and afflictive mental state can have is eighteen, and so on.

The mental factors operate in groups, not individually.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, August 4th, 2014 at 10:48 PM

Title: Re: The limit of compounded phenomena

Content:

anjali said:

As best I can make out, here is what Khenpo said from 37:29-39:16...

But this is not your mind, this is your cut finger. So, eventually become empty. Do you understand that? Ok. If you understand that, that is emptiness.

This analysis doesn't seem right.

Malcolm wrote:

Fundamental to the analysis of the two truths is that when an object is subject to ultimate analysis, it does not remain as an object of cognition. What he is saying, perhaps not so well, is that at a certain point there remains no object at all which can be identified as a finger, no finger remains before the mind to be apprehended as such. That objectless state of mind is called "recognizing emptiness".

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, August 4th, 2014 at 9:59 PM

Title: Re: Commentary on the 51 Mental Factors?

Content:

Concordiadiscordi said:

Greetings.

I am currently seeking a decent commentary on the 51 mental factors listed within the yogācāra abhidharma. Even better would be a commentary on the 100 dharmas of Vasubandhu. I am currently in possession of three fine works on the subject (viz, "Know Your Mind" by Sangharakshita, "Living Yogacara" by Tagawa Shun'ei, and "Shastra on the Door to Understanding the Hundred Dharmas" by Master Hua), but I am wondering whether there might not be a single volume containing a balanced, comprehensive, systematic exposition of the 51 mental factors (or the 100 dharmas) which is neither too abstruse and pedantic nor too vague and simplistic. Scholarly tomes such as "Buddhist Phenomenology" are certainly not what I am looking for in this case, and neither are watered-down introductory texts intended for general audiences. On the contrary, what I am looking for is a penetratingly detailed analysis crafted specifically for the serious practitioner, preferably authored by a seasoned practitioner.

All in all, I am looking for something thorough, rigorous, detailed, comprehensive, systematic, and genuinely insightful... yet pragmatically geared and practically informed.

Critical but real.

I might be asking too much, but it is worth a shot.

I am hoping that somebody might be able to point me in a promising direction!

Thanks.

Malcolm wrote:

Abhidharmakoshaḥ by Vasubandhu, Why settle for anything less?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, August 4th, 2014 at 9:58 PM

Title: Re: What is Blessing?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

"Blessing" here just means the power of one person to inspire another to follow the path in some way. That's all. There is no Dharma called "blessing", no magical force called "blessing". If there was, the Buddha, being compassionate, would have blessed us all into nirvana long ago.

Astus said:

That makes sense. Thank you.

Malcolm wrote:

I should add, it can also be the power of an object such as a statue, book, incense, stupa, etc., to induce the same effect. But again, there is no Dharma called "blessing", no magical force called "blessing".

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, August 4th, 2014 at 8:59 PM

Title: Re: What is Blessing?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Byin rlabs means quite literally "conferral [rlabs] of power [byin]."

Byin is defined in Tibetan as "the ability or power to transform the minds and vision/appearances of another."

The word Byin rlabs is defined in Tibetan as "the power to remain in any subject of the Dharma of the Noble Path."

Astus said:

Thank you. Does that mean then that a blessing is inducing insight/realisation/enlightenment in another being directly (instead of through giving instructions)? If so, what is being communicated/transferred between one being/thing to another? What connection exists at the time of receiving a blessing?

Malcolm wrote:

"Blessing" here just means the power of one person to inspire another to follow the path in some way. That's all. There is no Dharma called "blessing", no magical force called "blessing". If there was, the Buddha, being compassionate, would have blessed us all into nirvana long ago.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, August 4th, 2014 at 2:20 AM

Title: Re: Dr. Sanderson: Phowa etc. are directly from Saivism

Content:

sherabpa said:

Yet nobody says the lower tantra path is as easy as the higher tantra path. Lack of difficulties is precisely one of four superiorities of tantra over paramitayana, and by implication of the higher over the lower paths. There is superior and inferior, but not effective and ineffective, and superior means the four superiorities.

Malcolm wrote:

superior = more effective inferior = less effective higher = more effective lower = less effective easy = more effective difficult = less effective.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, August 4th, 2014 at 2:18 AM

Title: Re: Dr. Sanderson: Phowa etc. are directly from Saivism

Content:

sherabpa said:

When he says that only Guyhamantra is appropriate for the present times...

Malcolm wrote:

Here, Guhyamantra does not mean lower tantra.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, August 4th, 2014 at 12:53 AM

Title: Re: Teacher as Buddha?

Content:

Will said:

If one has confidence in the buddhadharma and cultivates according to what is there taught - such as 'guru is the Tathāgata himself', then one does so. It has nothing to do with being 'in secret mantra'.

Malcolm wrote:

Will, you can either choose to understand special emphasis and necessity of a guru as explained in secret mantra, or you can argue with it. It's up to you.

Will said:

I prefer to choose a third way; ignore secret mantra and 'understand special emphasis and necessity of a guru' as taught in Mahayana.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, you can if you like, but the fact is that the relationship with a guru is different in secret mantra than it is in Mahāyāna. It is a much more potent relationship.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, August 3rd, 2014 at 11:45 PM

Title: Re: Teacher as Buddha?

Content:

Will said:

If one has confidence in the buddhadharma and cultivates according to what is there taught - such as 'guru is the Tathāgata himself', then one does so. It has nothing to do with being 'in secret mantra'.

Malcolm wrote:

Will, you can either choose to understand special emphasis and necessity of a guru as explained in secret mantra, or you can argue with it. It's up to you.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, August 3rd, 2014 at 11:22 PM

Title: Re: Teacher as Buddha?

Content:

Will said:

Mahayana also posits the guru as Buddha, as in this quote from Avatamsaka Sutra, ch. 39:

As for the good spiritual guide, he is just the Tathāgata himself.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, while it is true that in Mahāyaṇa and even in Hinayāna, the idea of a guru is to be found, nevertheless, it is only in secret mantra that one is to regard one's (qualified) teacher as an actual Samyaksambuddha.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, August 3rd, 2014 at 8:42 PM

Title: Re: Dr. Sanderson: Phowa etc. are directly from Saivism

Content:

Sherlock said:

But Shingon has yogatantra too which is said to bring Buddhahood in one life?

Malcolm wrote:

Indeed. But unless you are a priest, your practice is mainly confined to the liturgical practice of reciting a few mantras and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, August 3rd, 2014 at 7:35 PM

Title: Re: The limit of compounded phenomena

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

I am interested to hear peoples opinions and especially to see some scriptural quotes that verify/contradict this.

Malcolm wrote:

He is perfectly correct. Since particles cannot be established since they do not bear ultimate analysis, there comes a time when under analysis they cannot be found at all. The chapter refuting permanent functioning phenomena in the 400 Verses demonstrates this very well.

Sherab Dorje said:

I wasn't doubting that he was correct, he is a khenpo after all, I was just looking for scriptural verification/contradiction. I imagine there would be other schools/traditions, that may care to disagree.

Thanks for the info.

Malcolm wrote:
Not in Mahāyāna.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Sunday, August 3rd, 2014 at 9:39 AM
Title: Re: Dr. Sanderson: Phowa etc. are directly from Saivism
Content:
Malcolm wrote:
Loppon Rinpoche states:

Therefore, followers of the Pāramitāyāna do not accomplish [awakening] in this degenerate age, but followers of Secret Mantra do accomplish [awakening] in this degenerate age. The Herukābhyadaya also states:
If one upholds Śrī Heruka,
There will be accomplishment in the decadent age.

There is no Śrī Heruka in lower tantra.

sherabpa said:
The lower tantras belong to Secret Mantra, and hence siddhis are attained. As Sapan says in sdom gsum 3.262:
Nonetheless, on the level of action tantra accomplishment may be obtained by meditating on a painted image of the deity: pleased by one's observance of austerity and cleanliness the Buddha will bestow his attainments.
Now I believe it is said somewhere that only through anuttaratantra will one attain mahamudra siddhi in a single lifetime. Supposing that is true, this is quite different to saying the lower tantras are ineffective, or pointless.

Malcolm wrote:
The Samputa states:
None of the eighty four thousand Dharmaskandhas have any result since the true state of the body is not understood. Since the true state of the body is not taught outside of highest yoga tantra, etc., well then, I leave you to your own conclusions.

Now then, Ngorchen does clarify in his commentary on kriya tantra that the most a person can aspire to with kriya tantra practice is the tenth bhumi:
"The result accomplished in one life of anuttaratantra is only the perfect Buddhahood of the three inseparable kāyas; here, having relied on the three paths, one can manifest the tenth stage in this [life] and with that support, Buddhahood can be accomplished." He also explains that even so, the path of kriya tantra is quite slow: But in kriya tantra, because there is no teaching of taking siddhis apart from (40/a) inviting and creating the deity in front, the speed with which the result is accomplished is slight. The difference with Pāramitāyāna is very important, in that in [Pāramitāyāna] not even taking siddhis from a deity invited in front is ever taught. Further, the difficulty with kriya tantra is that it is very precise and requires absolute adherence to ritual purity and so on. This is quite difficult to maintain unless you are in a place like Koyasan, etc. For all of these reasons then it is safe to say that for the most part we can consider kriya tantra ineffective in this day and age (which was my point), which also explains why outside of Shingon and Tendai, no one practices it anymore. There is also the consideration of which yuga a given teaching is most effective or needed, and in this yuga, the kali yuga, annuttarayoga tantra is a desiderata.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, August 3rd, 2014 at 6:15 AM

Title: Re: The limit of compounded phenomena

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

I am interested to hear peoples opinions and especially to see some scriptural quotes that verify/contradict this.

Malcolm wrote:

He is perfectly correct. Since particles cannot be established since they do not bear ultimate analysis, there comes a time when under analysis they cannot be found at all. The chapter refuting permanent functioning phenomena in the 400 Verses demonstrates this very well.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, August 3rd, 2014 at 3:26 AM

Title: Re: What is Blessing?

Content:

Astus said:

What is the definition of blessing (any and all types)? What dharma is it? What are its qualities and conditions?

Malcolm wrote:

Byin rlabs means quite literally "conferral [rlabs] of power [byin]."

Byin is defined in Tibetan as "the ability or power to transform the minds and vision/appearances of another."

The word Byin rlabs is defined in Tibetan as "the power to remain in any subject of the Dharma of the Noble Path."

So that is your answer.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, August 3rd, 2014 at 2:30 AM

Title: Re: Recognising reincarnations

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

So you believe that hereditary religious leadership is better than the tulku system? Or do you prefer the Gelug model?

PS The Dalai Lamas are tulku, are they not?

Malcolm wrote:

I think the Gelug model is best for the West.

HHDL is a tulku, however, the Fifth Dalai Lama's recognition was fraudulent, according to his autobiography, and every one from the 8th to the 13th was selected by a lottery operated by the Qing dynasty Ambans.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 2nd, 2014 at 10:52 PM

Title: Re: Recognising reincarnations

Content:

Jikan said:

I think Sherab Dorje raised an interesting issue some time back that I'd like to bring us back to: the question of whether or to what degree the tulku system as developed in Tibet offers an efficient way to identify and train teachers and leaders when resources are scarce. Thoughts on this?

Malcolm wrote:

Not necessarily. Two major schools of Tibetan Buddhism do not operate this way: the largest, Gelugpa and as well as Sakya.

The Gelugpas appoint their leaders and teachers through education, not tulku lineages, with the notable exception of the Panchen Lama, who is the head of Tashi Lhunpo monastery. The Dalai Lamas are not monastic heads, but actually part of the Drepung Monastic system.

The leadership of Sakyapas is held in the Kohn family lineage. The abbacy of Ngor (a subsect of Sakya) is circulated among the scions of four families. It is only in the smallest of the Sakya subsects, Tshar, and Eastern Tibetan Sakya monasteries where tulkus play a significant role in the leadership of monasteries.

The leadership of Mindroling likewise is held in an old family, and is not tulku based.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 2nd, 2014 at 10:44 PM

Title: Re: Teacher as Buddha?

Content:

Mkoll said:

1) Is this belief common to all the Tibetan schools? Is it part of Shingon? I don't know much more about Mahayana than Vajrayana but I don't think it is part of the beliefs of any of their schools, is it?

Malcolm wrote:

It is not common to Shingon, because it is a practice restricted to the highest tantras.

Mkoll said:

2) How does one believe that one's teacher is a Buddha? What is the correct mindset? For example, does one believe they are fully enlightened like the historical Buddha was? Or is there some other approach?

Malcolm wrote:

You understand that the impure appearance of one's root guru as an ordinary person is due to one's own flaws and afflictions, but that in their real nature, they are actually Samyaksambuddhas and you accept their words as such.

Actually, it is very unlikely that any one of us meeting Gotama Buddha today would be able to see him as being a Samyaksambuddha. We would see an old North Indian guy dressed in ragged robes followed around by people of similar mien.

Anyway, this practice only applies to qualified people from whom one has received empowerment into a highest yoga tantra mandala. If you have not received such an empowerment, then there is no reason to follow this practice.

Mkoll said:

3) This one is kind of unrelated, but: Are all Tibetan schools Vajrayana Buddhism?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 2nd, 2014 at 5:53 AM

Title: Re: Recognising reincarnations

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Dzogchen existed in India, and is found in the tantras, unlike the tulku system.

Sherab Dorje said:

If I remember correctly, a certain tulku whose teachings I have been following the past few weeks, stated quite clearly, a number of times that the Dzogchen teachings/method did not originate from India, but from one of the current day -stans: Kyrgyzstan, Turkmenistan...

So...

But now we digress.

Malcolm wrote:

Dzogchen was brought to Tibet from India by way of Vajrāsana. This is clearly stated in the early Dzogchen annals.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 2nd, 2014 at 4:47 AM

Title: Re: Recognising reincarnations

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

First, my authority is not Tibet, my authority is sutra and tantra. I do not have to accept Tibetan cultural practices as authoritative, I don't eat Tsampa, drink Chang, or herd yaks.

Sherab Dorje said:

So the tulku system is on par with eating tsampa and herding yaks...

Malcolm wrote:

My point is that it is a cultural practice.

Sherab Dorje said:

Greg, the tulku system started in Kagyu, than spread to other schools. It is not a universal thing in Buddhism, it never existed in India, and it does not need to exist in the West.

Neither did/is Dzogchen, you reckon we should get rid of that too?

Malcolm wrote:

Dzogchen existed in India, and is found in the tantras, unlike the tulku system.

Sherab Dorje said:

I can understand your attachment to it...

I am not attached to it. If I was attached to it I would not be calling for its reformation. I am just not averse to it.

Malcolm wrote:

I am not averse to it. If Tibetans want to continue the tulku system, they are free to.

Some of their reincarnations might even be real ones, like ChNN — but most will be chosen and "blessed" as tulkus.

Sherab Dorje said:

But the point is that there is a sufficient amount of corruption in the system to call the whole system into question.

This is our fundamental point of disagreement.

Malcolm wrote:

Yup, we disagree on this point.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 2nd, 2014 at 2:43 AM

Title: Re: Recognising reincarnations

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

The tantric texts do not call for abolishing of the tulku system though, do they? They are all situated within the same framework: Tibetan Vajrayana.

Malcolm wrote:

Considering that the tulku system does not come from tantras, why would they even mention it?

Sherab Dorje said:

They are all situated within the same framework: Tibetan Vajrayana. Please don't cherry pick.

Malcolm wrote:

First, my authority is not Tibet, my authority is sutra and tantra. I do not have to accept Tibetan cultural practices as authoritative, I don't eat Tsampa, drink Chang, or herd yaks.

Greg, the tulku system started in Kagyu, then spread to other schools. It is not a universal thing in Buddhism, it never existed in India, and it does not need to exist in the West. I can understand your attachment to it, but it really is something which is a cultural practice of Tibetans and not really something which has a strong foundation in sutra and tantra.

This does not mean that there are no reincarnations, or that no one can recognize a reincarnation with accuracy. But the point is that there is a sufficient amount of corruption in the system to call the whole system into question. As long as there is no clearly defined criteria by which a tulku may be recognized, then I am afraid it is just a matter of faith whether one accepts someone as a reincarnation of a master or not.

This is why I bring up the examples of NKT. For example, according to them, <redacted> is Sakya Pandita's reincarnation. According to your logic, since this is the opinion of Trijang Rinpoche, I should accept it, or at least not dispute it. Can't you see how crazy your point of view is? according to your point of view, I should accept that a worldly spirit is the reincarnation of one of the most important Sakya masters.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 2nd, 2014 at 2:32 AM

Title: Re: Recognising reincarnations

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

The tantric texts do not call for abolishing of the tulku system though, do they? They are all situated within the same framework: Tibetan Vajrayana.

Malcolm wrote:

Considering that the tulku system does not come from tantras, why would they even mention it?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 2nd, 2014 at 2:31 AM

Title: Re: Recognising reincarnations

Content:

conebeckham said:

I am not certain we can infer that all those things are the result of the Tulku system. Sometimes, in fact, I think they exist despite it.

Sherab Dorje said:

Maybe, maybe not. Personally I would prefer an overhaul of the tulku system rather than its being scrapped just because it has some flaws. Like I said earlier: this is samsara, it is flawed by its very nature (Kongtrul's opinion, in his autobio, is worth a look.....)

Thank you. I will track it down and read it.

Is this the one you mean: "Enthronement: The Recognition Of The Reincarnate Masters Of Tibet And The Himalayas" or is it this one: "The Autobiography of Jamgon Kongtrul: A Gem of Many Colors"?

Malcolm wrote:

The real problem with tulku system is that it is a Tibetan cultural artifact, and not something which can be found in sutra or tantra.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 2nd, 2014 at 2:24 AM

Title: Re: Recognising reincarnations

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

This is yet another clumsy attempt by you to deflect the conversation away from the real subject, in order to cover up your own logical flaws and egocentric concerns.

Malcolm wrote:

If there is a flaw in my logic, prove it. Otherwise, your comments are baseless ad hominem remarks with no substance.

Sherab Dorje said:

I have, you are unwilling to admit them and that is why this conversation continues to drag on for no reason at all. I have pointed out what pure view entails and how preferring "one" over "another" has nothing to do with pure view and everything to do with egotistical concern and dualising (like, dislike, believe, don't believe, is tulku, is not tulku, etc...).

I have admitted that the tulku system is flawed and shown how the idea of tulku cannot (unfortunately, and as much as I personally would like it to be able to) be separated from the system that recognises tulku.

You have responded by trying to start a bun fight over a certain controversy (notice how I did not take the bait?). Now whilst the example does highlight some of the flaws in the system, at the same time it also shows how the system can, does and has worked in a positive manner, for over 800 years.

Malcolm wrote:

Hi Greg:

Well, you have not shown any such flaws, and moreover, you have only succeeded in proving that tulku system is inane by referring to pure vision. The tulku system only works in a world where there is higher and lower, pure and impure. Once you have decided that you are going to trot down the path of "pure vision", well, now you have no reason to ban <redacted> and NKT here at all. According to "pure vision", the pope is as much a Buddha as the HHDL or the HHK, etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 2nd, 2014 at 1:16 AM

Title: Re: Recognising reincarnations

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

This is yet another clumsy attempt by you to deflect the conversation away from the real subject, in order to cover up your own logical flaws and egocentric concerns.

Malcolm wrote:

If there is a flaw in my logic, prove it. Otherwise, your comments are baseless ad hominem remarks with no substance (countdown to thread meltdown begins now...)

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 2nd, 2014 at 1:09 AM

Title: Re: Recognising reincarnations

Content:

conebeckham said:

Tulkus are GREAT!

The Tulku System sucks.

Malcolm wrote:

it seems our friend Greg does not want to distinguish between the two. I for one think nirmanakāyas are excellent. But developing a whole bureaucracy predicated in the principle of "recognitions", as we have seen throughout Tibetan history is fraught with manipulation, fraud and abuse.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 1st, 2014 at 10:36 PM

Title: Re: What is considered a teaching from the Upadesha cycle?

Content:

bryandavis said:

So a revealed cycle can have maya, anu, ati ect. as part of its corpus but upadesha would only refer to the ati aspect of the practices?

Is upadesha then direct personal experience of any of these paths given in pith to students who have the capacity to get it in a less unelaborated way?

Or is upadesha the method that points directly to rigpa without any secondary methods?

Malcolm wrote:

Upadesha just means "intimate instruction" from upa, meaning "close", and desha, meaning "to instruct". The inference is that these are instructions one hears at the feet of one's guru in an intimate setting. There are all kinds of upadeshas.

Also upadesha is translated two ways into Tibetan gdams ngag and man ngag. The former meaning oral advice, that latter means secret advice.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 1st, 2014 at 10:05 PM

Title: Re: Dzogchen & rainbow body

Content:

Tod said:
Hi, friends,

after the very detailed explanation of Gyurme Kundrol, I have a question as to what is considered a teaching from the Upadesha cycle.

All the Longsal teachings of Namkhai Norbu are called "upadesha" in their name, although they display many different methods. Not to name all, but there are very different ones, like Mandarava with it's Tsa Lung, not a Dzogchen teaching in itself maybe; Saltong, combining Tsa Lung, Semdzins etc; Todgal, and so on.

And what about a teaching like "The Upadesha of Introduction to the State of Ati", which has a method from Semde, but then explains also Tregchod?

Thanks for clarifying.

Tod

Malcolm wrote:
Longsal Khandro Nyinthig contains teachings from Anuyoga such as Jñāna Dakini and Mandarava (which are really all part of one cycle) as well as the three series of ati yoga.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Friday, August 1st, 2014 at 9:59 PM
Title: Re: Recognising reincarnations
Content:
Sherab Dorje said:
at least we should refrain from cultivating aversion.

Malcolm wrote:
You do realize that now we are going to comb your every post for examples of aversion?

Author: Malcolm
Date: Friday, August 1st, 2014 at 9:57 PM
Title: Re: Recognising reincarnations
Content:
Sherab Dorje said:
And, yes, doubting the veracity of the recognition of the Karmapa tulkus(or any other tulku teacher other than your own) is a condemnation of their capacities.

Malcolm wrote:
Therefore, according to your own reasoning, you yourself must accept that HH Karmapa, Orgyen Thrinly Dorje, is the real Karmapa. And if you don't, you are condemning him. Moreover, you are asserting that the late Shamarpa was wrong in not accepting Tai Situ's candidate. Not only that, but you are equally asserting that Tai Situ is wrong not to accept HH Karmapa, Thrinly Thaye Dorje, as being the real Karmapa.

The only solution for you then is that you must regard both Karmapas as the same and take teachings from them both.

Basically what you are saying is that we all must accept all tulku recognitions on faith without question.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 1st, 2014 at 5:12 AM

Title: Re: Recognising reincarnations

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Accepting that ChNN is the reincarnation of Adzom Drugpa does not entail that I must accept all or even any other recognitions of reincarnations.

Jikan said:

following this to its conclusion: one may well have reason to believe someone is a reincarnation of someone else, but this has nothing to do with the question of the political institution of reincarnation-recognition. I think this distinction is getting lost in the shuffle of this conversation for some parties.

if you have a precious human rebirth now, it follows that at some time in lives previous you'd done something right. Is it necessary to have an enthronement ceremony for each of you in order to take this at face value? Accepting this premise but rejecting the "tulku system" as a social construct are not contradictory positions.

Malcolm wrote:

Thank you.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 1st, 2014 at 3:12 AM

Title: Re: Recognising reincarnations

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

For example, if we accept that Tibet fell because of the non-virtue of its rulers, for the most part who were they? High tulkus.

ReasonAndRhyme said:

So Tibet was a theocracy then?

Malcolm wrote:

No.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 1st, 2014 at 2:48 AM

Title: Re: Zabmo Nangdon to be published by Shambhala

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The entire (reliable) translation of Longchenpa's commentary on Guhyagarbha is available for free on the internet. It is ludicrous therefore for anyone to restrict commentaries on it.

Jikan said:

I'm interested in finding this one, but it seems my google skills aren't up to the task. If anyone could please point me in the right direction, I'd appreciate it very much. Thank you.

Malcolm wrote:

<http://vajrayana.faithweb.com/guhyagarbhatantra.pdf>

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 1st, 2014 at 1:54 AM

Title: Re: Recognising reincarnations

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

They are still both tulku though. Ratified through the tulku system. And earlier you stated that you have no doubt that ChNN is a tulku.

Malcolm wrote:

ChNN did not believe in his own status as a tulku for many years.

He only accepted that he was the tulku of Adzom Drugpa later on in life based on some circumstances.

The reason why I accept that ChNN is an actual reincarnation of Adzom Drugpa has to do with those circumstances — primarily, ChNN wrote a commentary, and later on, when he finally got a copy of Adzom Drugpa's collected works, he found a text identical to the one he had written himself in that collection, the same for over a hundred folios. He explained all this in 1992 at the first SMS retreat at Tsegylgar.

Further, the master that recognized him as the tulku of Adzom Drugpa was his own uncle, the one who attained rainbow body, not Yeshe's predecessor.

But the tulku system is just religious politics, completely and totally worldly in my opinion.

Sherab Dorje said:

So, really: You want to have your cake or do you want to eat it? Make up your mind.

Malcolm wrote:

Accepting that ChNN is the reincarnation of Adzom Drugpa does not entail that I must accept all or even any other recognitions of reincarnations.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 1st, 2014 at 1:47 AM

Title: Re: Zabmo Nangdon to be published by Shambhala

Content:

Son of Buddha said:

I wish All dharmic texts were free,that's what the Buddha wanted.

Malcolm wrote:

That is true only of sutra. It is completely not true of tantra.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 1st, 2014 at 1:41 AM

Title: Re: Recognising reincarnations

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

Strangely enough, not being enlightened and all, the only thing we are capable of doing is offering opinions. In my opinion the whole tulku system is a worldly system.

Except when it is being applied to your teacher and his son?

Malcolm wrote:

Yeshe's enthronement at the monastery of his predecessor is a completely worldly affair.

ChNN himself was never in line to head a monastery. He would have wound up being a disaffiliated teacher whether in the East or the West.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 1st, 2014 at 1:19 AM

Title: Re: Zabmo Nangdon to be published by Shambhala

Content:

conebeckham said:

Hard to believe, but perhaps that's not their chief goal...

Son of Buddha said:

Providing Dharma at a reasonable price so all people who are interested in it can learn it should be their chief goal.

Malcolm wrote:

If someone cannot cough up a 100 bucks for a rare text someone has gone through considerable trouble to translate then they don't really need it or want it.

Sutrayāna is different than Vajrayāna on this score. Eventually, whole Kenjur will be online, for free. This does not mean however that all books should be free. Even the Kenjur is not free -- 84000 is paying a lot of money to have those sutras and tantras translated.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 1st, 2014 at 1:10 AM

Title: Re: Recognising reincarnations

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

PS I tend to agree with Lord Jigten Sumgons analysis of karma where the actual act itself, regardless of intention/motivation etc... produces effects too. So...

Malcolm wrote:

Another opinion, one that is not supported in the classical Indian texts, but whatever.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 1st, 2014 at 1:10 AM

Title: Re: Recognising reincarnations

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

Being a tulku is not just a high worldly position.

Malcolm wrote:

It is simply a matter of opinion. In my opinion the whole tulku system is a worldly system. Your opinion is different.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 1st, 2014 at 12:27 AM

Title: Re: Recognising reincarnations

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

What sort of karma causes anyone to have a high position in samsara?

Sherab Dorje said:

It's not just a high position. It is a high Dharma oriented position. At the very least they will receive a really good Dharma education. That's MUCH more than what most of us will encounter in this lifetime. So it seems to me that even being falsely recognised as a tulku requires craploads of merit.

Malcolm wrote:

It is just a high worldly position.

Whether the person is a Dharma person or not depends on the qualities of the person in the chair, and not the chair itself.

There are a lot people with Dharma in their mouths but not in their hearts. "Dharma" words are not necessarily Dharma.

For example, if we accept that Tibet fell because of the non-virtue of its rulers, for the most part who were they? High tulkus. So you see, these institutional positions are actually quite worldly and there is a huge amount of writing by the people in these position of monastic authority bemoaning the fact that these positions are just worldly fetters that prevent them from practicing.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 1st, 2014 at 12:09 AM

Title: Re: Recognising reincarnations

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

As far as pure vision goes, if someone has the idea that even one person is not a fully awakened buddha, their vision is not pure.

Sherab Dorje said:

Exactly. In which case EVEN if you were to see your teacher as a Buddha then the only thing you are doing is indulging in dualistic egotistical speculation: He is a Buddha, He is not a Buddha. They are real tulku, they are not real tulku.

So what is it going to be? Pure vision or aversion/attraction?

Malcolm wrote:

Honestly, greg, I don't think other teachers much. What I do know is that my primary teachers are Buddhas. YMMV.

Sherab Dorje said:

You are also not obligated to put one up on the pedestal, while burying the other. So why do it?

Malcolm wrote:

I didn't. I used the Karmapas merely as an example. I don't really think about them very much.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, July 31st, 2014 at 11:50 PM

Title: Re: Recognising reincarnations

Content:

Jikan said:

I can't speak for Malcolm, but I'd argue that if someone has concrete evidence that a recognition was made purely for material or political reasons, and not for the qualities of the one recognized, and that person judges that incarnation to be totally false, then that person isn't making egotistical speculation. That person is making an informed judgment. Not all judgments are rational, nor are they all speculative-egotistical, nor are they all matters of faith.

Sherab Dorje said:

Consider this though: What sort of karma would lead to one being enthroned, as a child, as a false tulku? What kind of karma is generated by the child after having been thrust into this role?

Malcolm wrote:

What sort of karma causes anyone to have a high position in samsara?

As for the second question, that really depends on whether they behave virtuously or non-virtuously.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, July 31st, 2014 at 10:03 PM

Title: Re: Dr. Sanderson: Phowa etc. are directly from Saivism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Lower tantra a) is not effective in this day and age.

sherabpa said:

Wait, is anyone saying lower tantra is not effective because it was originally intended for Shaiva followers, lower castes etc?

I can see how one might conclude that the lower tantras are less effective than the higher tantras, but I cannot see that they are ineffective.

Sonam Tsemo says in the Tantra Sets Presentation that the lower tantras are distinct from paramitayana in that they have blessing and gazing/smiling at the deity, which makes them more similar to the higher tantras than to the paramitas. But nothing is said to be ineffective.

I guess I am asking - what does effectiveness mean here?

Malcolm wrote:

Loppon Rinpoche states:

Therefore, followers of the Pāramitāyāna do not accomplish [awakening] in this degenerate age, but followers of Secret Mantra do accomplish [awakening] in this degenerate age. The Herukābhyadaya also states:

If one upholds Śrī Heruka,

There will be accomplishment in the decadent age.

There is no Śrī Heruka in lower tantra.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, July 31st, 2014 at 9:32 PM

Title: Re: Recognising reincarnations

Content:

JKhedrup said:

I think the point Malcolm makes is a pertinent one. From the Vajrayana POV, it is important to view one's Vajra Master as enlightened. This becomes even more essential with regards to Highest Yoga Tantra.

Sherab Dorje said:

While this is true, at the same time, this does not mean that one does not view other teachers with pure vision too. I can understand if Malcolm considers ChNN a Buddha, but that does not mean he has the right to judge others as false incarnations. Then his view is just reduced to egotistical speculation.

Malcolm wrote:

I did not judge anyone as a false incarnation. In other words, for example, I have no faith in the two Karmapas as incarnations of the 16th Karmapa. But my lack of faith in them as reincarnations has no bearing on whether they are the actual incarnations of the 16th or not. Just to clarify, I have 0 connection with the Karma Kagyu lineage, for whatever reason, just like I have 0 connection with the Gelug lineage.

As far as pure vision goes, if someone has the idea that even one person is not a fully awakened buddha, their vision is not pure. So, if we are going to take about pure vision, we really need to be clear what we mean.

I have no obligation to regard teachers other than my own as Buddhas. I am not even obliged to have pure vision of them (other than the same we try to imagine all sentient beings are buddhas in the context of the universe as a buddhamandala). I have no obligation to regard people who are not my teachers as anything more than ordinary worldly people with no special qualities worth mentioning.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, July 31st, 2014 at 4:48 AM

Title: Re: Recognising reincarnations

Content:

Norwegian said:

Malcolm said there's no way of giving an objective verification, and that it is all 100% faith based. So asking for objective evidence in that case is rather difficult...

Sherab Dorje said:

There is actually no objective verification of anything. All verification is based on a majority of subjective opinion. So why would it be different for tulku? Why do we, in this case, call it faith and in other cases objective verification?

Malcolm wrote:

You can falsify a chemistry experiment, but not a tulku recognition. As for the latter, you either believe it or you don't.

In the case of ChNN, I believe it. In the case of both Karmapas, I don't believe in either one.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, July 31st, 2014 at 4:45 AM

Title: Re: Recognising reincarnations

Content:

zenman said:

Medieval beliefs. Surely there are no buddhas teaching at every dharma center. It is entirely misleading to spread such beliefs. I've seen the fruit of this when it is realised that the guru isn't a buddha after all.

Malcolm wrote:

You don't need to believe someone else's guru is an actual Buddha, just your own. That is all that matters. If you cannot believe your root Guru is a Buddha, then you have no business taking any kind of Vajrayāna teachings and more to the point, the Vajrayāna teachings you do take will not be effective.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, July 31st, 2014 at 3:11 AM

Title: Re: Recognising reincarnations

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

It is %100 percent faith -- there is no objective way of verifying any of it. So just admit it and be happy.

Sherab Dorje said:

Objective? That's a strange term coming from you Malcolm! So I guess that a tulku admitting that they had memories of their past life when they were still a child but that over time the memories faded so that now they have little recollection of their previous life is not objective. So what would be an objective source of evidence then?

Malcolm wrote:

I have always made a distinction between falsifiable phenomena and non-falsifiable phenomena. Frankly, even though, from a Buddhist perspective, all children have some memory of past lives due to the activation of clairvoyance from the eighth month of pregnancy onwards, accepting this idea is based on faith, indeed even rebirth is just something you have to have faith in, %100.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, July 31st, 2014 at 3:01 AM

Title: Re: Recognising reincarnations

Content:

heart said:

Well, many tulkus seems to be verified by dreams great masters have. I am not really sure I would call that just faith.

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

%100 percent faith. Why? well, if you accept the testimony of such a master it is based on faith, %100.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, July 31st, 2014 at 2:52 AM

Title: Re: Recognising reincarnations

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Just admit it Greg, it is all %100 faith based.

Sherab Dorje said:

I wouldn't say 100%. Having talked to a tulku and seen and read some accounts it seems to be more than just faith. Some do display specific/extraordinary qualities. Of course there is nepotism and (like I said) politics involved, which means that there it also has a strategic component, thus we are talking about a deviation from the ideal of faith. That in itself means that it is not 100% faith. There is some cunning in there too. Plus, of course, other more objective factors. Maybe even some virtue.

Malcolm wrote:

It is %100 percent faith -- there is no objective way of verifying any of it. So just admit it and be happy.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, July 31st, 2014 at 2:44 AM

Title: Re: Recognising reincarnations

Content:

zenman said:

Procedure meaning a process done by some or many experienced lamas who investigate and either reject or confirm it? I'd think that this is more a matter of perception, intuition and discrimination (as in the ability to discern the quality of subtle vibration) than procedure, if it means something like I explain here. Yes? No?

Sherab Dorje said:

Procedure like: This lama is responsible for making the final decision regarding candidates, in the event that this lama is not in the position to make the decision, then the responsibility lies with this lama, etc...

Or: A candidate will be considered valid on the basis of this, this and this criteria, if they do not satisfy the aforementioned criteria then they will not be eligible...

Procedure. You see there is property and wealth involved too, many times, not just a title. Or the future of a lineage may depend on the "right" candidate being found. So, as we all well know quite well, whenever money, wealth and power comes into things then politics arise. Since they are bound to arise, if there is a set procedure (which there isn't) then this acts as a check to the politics. Even if there are politics involved, if there is a procedure in place then at least the politics are executed in a relatively smooth and conflict-free fashion.

But there is no set procedure, and intuition is a little difficult to verify objectively. And anyway, just because two (or more) intuited results conflict, doesn't mean that all of them are incorrect.

Malcolm wrote:

Just admit it Greg, it is all %100 faith based.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, July 31st, 2014 at 12:43 AM

Title: Re: Recognising reincarnations

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Klesha obscurations and Knowledge obscurations. Bodhisattvas on the bodhisattvas have these.

zenman said:

Bodhisattvas on the bodhisattvas? A typo?

Malcolm wrote:

yes, on the bodhisattva bhumis, as opposed to ordinary bodhisattvas.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, July 30th, 2014 at 11:38 PM

Title: Re: Recognising reincarnations

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

...why do these disagreements exist?

Because there is no clear cut procedure.

zenman said:

Procedure meaning a process done by some or many experienced lamas who investigate and either reject or confirm it? I'd think that this is more a matter of perception, intuition and discrimination (as in the ability to discern the quality of subtle vibration) than procedure, if it means something like I explain here. Yes? No?

Malcolm wrote:

A "reincarnation" means the rebirth of someone who has some portion of the two obscurations remaining. An "emanation" is someone who is in fact an expression of the compassion of a fully awakened Buddha who may manifest as an ordinary person externally, but internally has all the full mature qualities of a Buddha. How do you tell the difference? In Vajrayāna it does not really matter, since you are supposed to regard your guru as an actual buddha in every respect.

zenman said:

Great! A clear explanation What are the two obscurations of the reincarnations?

Malcolm wrote:

Klesha obscurations and Knowledge obscurations. Bodhisattvas on the bodhisattvas have these.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, July 30th, 2014 at 10:03 PM

Title: Re: Recognising reincarnations

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

A "reincarnation" means the rebirth of someone who has some portion of the two obscurations remaining. An "emanation" is someone who is in fact an expression of the compassion of a fully awakened Buddha who may manifest as an ordinary person externally, but internally has all the full mature qualities of a Buddha. How do you tell the difference? In Vajrayāna it does not really matter, since you are supposed to regard your guru as an actual buddha in every respect.

zenman said:

These two quotes lead me to consider a subject that I've pondered a few times before: the differences in recognitions of lamas reincarnations. I recall this matter has come by a few times before but I can't remember which cases exactly.

I'm not familiar with what emanations and reincarnations mean, have to do some googling on those, unless someone could easily explain it for me.

Anyway, my main question is, based on these two messages below as well as other similar cases, that there are disagreements on recognitions of the reincarnations. My intention is not to argue about this but to analyse why do these disagreements exist?

Thanks for the input all.

Karma Jinpa said:

... a letter from Namdroling monastery: Kyabjé Drubwang Pema Norbu's reincarnation has been found!!!

All Palyulpas and Nyingmapas in general should rejoice; a great being---an emanation of Vajrasattva and reincarnation of Vimalamitra---has returned to tame beings once more! reincarnation of Vimalamitra

Malcolm wrote:

He can't be a reincarnation of Vimalamitra since Vimalamitra, according to legend, attained 'pho ba chen po, and still lives at Wutai Shan.

He would be an emanation of Vimalamitra. As the legend has it, Vimalamitra returns to Tibet every one hundred years.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, July 30th, 2014 at 9:51 PM

Title: Re: Religions vs Communist Party in China

Content:

Will said:

Or is it so closely watched and/or infiltrated that Chinese Buddhism in China is just a sham?

Malcolm wrote:

Very likely.

Will said:

Your 'Very likely' is just a speculation, right? My guess would be the same, but I would like to hear from any Chinese Buddhism followers who know from 1st hand or have heard reliable testimony about the facts. Of course, they may endanger themselves when they share such facts publicly. So silence is 'very likely' too.

Malcolm wrote:

During the 90's, many Vietnamese temples, even in the US, were infiltrated by monastic spies from Vietnam. It became a real problem for them.

The fact is that monks in monasteries in China are little more than museum guards. Their standard of education in Dharma is very poor, and they are forced to spend a lot of time in political education classes. Tibetan Monasteries are also forced to waste time on political education classes. If you want high quality Chinese Dharma you must go to Taiwan.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, July 30th, 2014 at 9:28 PM

Title: Re: Religions vs Communist Party in China

Content:

Will said:

Or is it so closely watched and/or infiltrated that Chinese Buddhism in China is just a sham?

Malcolm wrote:

Very likely.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, July 29th, 2014 at 10:57 PM

Title: Re: Re 21 Taras

Content:

pemachophel said:

Narraboth,

Sorry, I can't answer your questions although they are good ones. I hope someone addresses them in a knowledgeable way. In my case, I'm working on a Dakini sadhana (sorry, can't say which one) which includes visualization of the 21 Taras around the periphery of the central Dakini. The text says to visualize the 21 Taras in terms of color, hand implements, expression, etc. clearly and precisely but doesn't say how exactly. When I asked my Teacher Who gave me this practice which of the various versions of the 21 Taras to use, He said to use this one. That's what spurred my OP.

When I did Yumka Dechen Gyalmo, I was not given this lay-jor of the 21 Taras. I hope some day to receive it in the context of Yumka.

Malcolm wrote:

If you received the transmission of Tara from ChNN, you received this.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, July 29th, 2014 at 9:29 PM

Title: Re: Restricted Publications-An Effective or Ineffective Tact

Content:

yegyal said:

I was actually referring to SofB's description of book costs more than anything. It seems that this became a thread dedicated to a different topic since my last post.

Malcolm wrote:

I know, and I agree with you %100. As a translator I can tell you we survive solely on sponsorships. There is no money in translating books.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, July 29th, 2014 at 8:55 PM

Title: Re: Zabmo Nangdon to be published by Shambhala

Content:

yegyal said:

One of the reasons that Sanskrit titles are included at the beginning of Tibetan translations of Indian texts is to remind the reader of the kindness of the translators. This notion seems to be lost in the fray of these discussions about the cost of Dharma books. Elizabeth Callahan has been working on this book for years and people are talking about how much profit can be made selling bound up copies of ink on paper. That shows very little understanding of the value of the work. Of course, none of this would even get to the point of being published if there wasn't a sponsor supporting her. In fact, that's why all those books are available in Tibetan, because sponsors took it upon themselves to have them printed and made available for a nominal price. Even TBRC is funded by sponsors. So all this talk about things being free or available is all because of somebody else footing the bill. So rather than complaining about the costs of books like this, maybe you should appreciate how cheap it really is. What's dinner and a movie cost these days? Is that really worth more to you than being able to read the scriptures of your chosen religion?

Malcolm wrote:

Right, but the issue here is not cost, it is restrictions vs. lack of restrictions, and the reality is that restricting books is a little fatuous.

Personally, making books like khrid ye shes bla ma and so on expensive automatically restricts them. Setting a high price for important tantric texts is a more effective strategy than making people fill out questionnaires and signing oaths.

Anyway, as I already pointed out, well trained students will not purchase books for which they do not have transmission/permission.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, July 28th, 2014 at 10:47 PM

Title: Re: Melody of Dharma No. 13

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

http://www.hhthesakyatrizin.org/pdfs/Melody_of_Dharma_13.pdf

This volume contains our translation (Khenpo Migmar Tseten and myself) of an important never before translated text by Mahāsiddha Virupa.

Enjoy!

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, July 28th, 2014 at 10:29 PM

Title: Re: Zabmo Nangdon to be published by Shambhala

Content:

Anders said:

Maybe those lamas aren't thrilled with the Tibetan situation either and reckon that at least in English, it can be 'done right'...

Malcolm wrote:

The reason why these books are available in Tibetan is because the Tibetan Buddhist Lineage Heads want these books out there so that they won't die. Every book on TBRC has a database entry through which any text can be restricted by tradition of they so choose. There are many books on TBRC that in fact are restricted by tradition.

When Tibetan lineages send books to TBRC they do so knowing full well that they are openly making these texts available.

Now, Sherapa has brought up the point of samaya — and this is a valid point. If you are a practitioner, and take lineage seriously, it is better to get permission to read this or that text if you are interested in it. This is the proper approach. On the other hand, a text like Zabmo Nangdon is a general text on tantric anatomy, so in fact anyone who has received HYT empowerment is qualified to read it.

Even then, the Shambhala "restriction" pages are kind of ludicrous because anyone can just lie if they want to get the book.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, July 25th, 2014 at 10:57 PM

Title: Re: Dogen's quote: arhathood or buddhahood?

Content:

LastLegend said:

I am willing to hear the explanation why Vajra methods can take people to full Buddhahood? What rational explanation behind this?

Malcolm wrote:

A realized master directly introduces a willing and interested student to their own state through different kinds of experiences. Rinse, repeat. This is the shortest explanation. There are many more complicated discussions. The essence of them all is that Vajrayāna has the method of taking the result as the path. Dzogchen is also a little different than this.

uan said:

That's a great way of stating it. Could you expand a bit on how Dzogchen is a little different?

Malcolm wrote:

Dzogchen takes the result as the basis, and the basis is practiced as the path.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, July 25th, 2014 at 9:31 PM

Title: Re: Dogen's quote: arhathood or buddhahood?

Content:

LastLegend said:

I am willing to hear the explanation why Vajra methods can take people to full Buddhahood? What rational explanation behind this?

Malcolm wrote:

A realized master directly introduces a willing and interested student to their own state through different kinds of experiences. Rinse, repeat. This is the shortest explanation. There are many more complicated discussions. The essence of them all is that Vajrayāna has the method of taking the result as the path. Dzogchen is also a little different than this.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, July 25th, 2014 at 9:29 PM

Title: Re: Dogen's quote: arhathood or buddhahood?

Content:

Dan74 said:

I agree with Jikan that it is fraught with danger to use a Kagyu master's teachings in response to a Soto Zen teacher, as they are coming from different initial assumptions and often different terminology. The (apocryphal?) story of Hashang Mahayana, the Ch'an monk who debated with Vajra masters and lost, is a great case in point when two traditions meet but not much contact takes place. Another one is the case of Kalu Rinpoche and Seung Sahn.

Malcolm wrote:

The Samye debate was not a debate between Vajrayāna masters and Hashang. Kamalashila was debating a strictly sutrayāna point of view grounded in standard Indian Mahāyāna. Not all Tibetans agree that Kamalashila won the debate either.

If you want to read a Dzogchen master's treatment of 8th century Northern School Chan, then you need to read Nubchen Sangye Yeshe's "Lamp of the Eye of Dhyāna". One of the interesting things about this text is that it cites scores of Tibetan Chan masters, not just Chinese masters.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, July 25th, 2014 at 9:22 PM

Title: Re: Dogen's quote: arhathood or buddhahood?

Content:

Vajrasvapna said:

From Nyingmapa point of view, Chan/zen affirmation are correct...

Malcolm wrote:

Well, not so fast, Kiomosabe, for one thing, the type of Chan Tibetans were exposed to was a Northern School variant. It is very hard to make a case that 10th century Tibetan doxologies apply to the Vajrayāna influenced Zen of the Kamakura period, or even Sung Dynasty Chan.

Secondly, Nubchen makes it very, very clear that while Chan (as known in Tibet) follows the definitive Mahāyāna sutras, it is not as direct or efficient as Mahāyoga, and addresses the seeming contradiction here in so far as the fact that Chan is supposedly a "sudden" path, whereas Mahāyoga is gradual. And of course, he clearly places Atiyoga as the pinnacle of all.

Third, the idea that one can "realize" Dharmakāya without achieving full buddhahood is somewhat absurd. Sure, we call the emptiness aspect of the mind "the dharmakāya" of the basis, but this does not mean we have realized the result dharmakāya even though there is no substantial difference between the dharmakāya of the basis and the dharmakāya of the result.

It is very interesting to examine Nubchen's detailed and nuanced arguments. It is true that Thuken wrote about Chan in 18th century China, but he dismisses it as Yogacara in a short summary fashion. While it is true that Longchenpa and Jigme Lingpa comment briefly on Chan, there is no Tibetan whose treatment of the Chan/Gradualist debate is more authoritative than Nubchen's.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, July 25th, 2014 at 9:06 AM

Title: Re: Dogen's quote: arhathood or buddhahood?

Content:

Jikan said:

According to Vajrayana. Your mileage may vary in some Mahayana schools.

Malcolm wrote:

There is no common Mahāyāna school, including Chan/Zen, that works with the body method the way it is worked with in Vajrayāna. Further, all common Mahāyāna schools are paths of renunciation.

Tendai is in a sort of bizarre situation, for it is the only school in which distinct elements of Vajrayāna are present, but nevertheless are subordinated to a sutrayāna exegetical framework.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, July 25th, 2014 at 4:52 AM

Title: Re: Dogen's quote: arhathood or buddhahood?

Content:

zenman said:

When I get this clear, then I'll get back to the topic.

Malcolm wrote:

Put succinctly there are two kinds of emptiness, the emptiness of persons and the emptiness of phenomena. Hinayāna paths such as Theravada and so forth do not realize the emptiness of phenomena, only the emptiness of persons.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, July 25th, 2014 at 4:00 AM

Title: Re: Dogen's quote: arhathood or buddhahood?

Content:

asunthatneversets said:

Arhats only have knowledge of "one-fold" emptiness, so they have full knowledge of the emptiness of self but lack (or have incomplete) insight into emptiness of phenomena.

zenman said:

Is that a view that is upheld by all or most buddhist trads? Doesn't onefold emptiness mean the same as that the "I" disappears for good and hence anatta/no-self is realised?

Malcolm wrote:

This is the point of view of Indian Mahāyāna and virtually all its descendants.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, July 24th, 2014 at 12:06 AM

Title: Re: Dorje Gotrab deity picture origin

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

rdo rje go khrab, vajra armor, is a generic name for all kinds of practices, not just one practice or lineage of practice.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, July 23rd, 2014 at 10:00 PM

Title: Re: Dzogchen & rainbow body

Content:

Jesse said:

How does onerainbow....?

Malcolm wrote:

You received Dzogchen teachings on a complete way from a realized master. Then you practice diligently, devoting yourself to little else in this lifetime.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, July 23rd, 2014 at 6:55 AM

Title: Re: Tarot as divination tool

Content:

Karma Dorje said:

Mipham's dice divination practice published as Mo: Tibetan Divination System does not require empowerment or retreat:

https://books.google.ca/books/about/Mo.html?id=c6Z8Kqdf6LoC&redir_esc=y "onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;" onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;" onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;" onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;" onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;"

The results are quite precise, including what practices one should do in the event of problems. This level of detail is not possible with Tarot.

Motova said:

I have this book! Are you saying I can practice Mo using this book with absolutely no guidance? If so, where is this information coming from?

Malcolm wrote:

You need to do the retreat.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, July 23rd, 2014 at 1:48 AM

Title: Re: Tarot as divination tool

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Well, for starters he wrote any number of very interesting books.

dzogchungpa said:

Any in particular that you recommend? I've always been daunted by the vastness of his output.

Malcolm wrote:

There is a good bio of him called Perdurabo, which makes no attempt to whitewash his career or person at all.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, July 23rd, 2014 at 12:35 AM

Title: Re: Tarot as divination tool

Content:

Mkoll said:

I agree with Vajrasvapna about Crowley. I've read of others who have lost their minds or come close to it by delving too deep into his work.

Malcolm wrote:

In other words, you don't really know anything about him.

Mkoll said:

And why any Buddhist would admire him is beyond me.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, for starters he wrote any number of very interesting books. For another he was in the employ of the British Secret Service for decades, using his masonic credentials as a cover. Beyond that, he was a world class mountain climber and all around adventurer. Even further, he studied Vipassana in Burma and Yoga in South India., etc.

He is one of the all-around most interesting people of early 20th century.

Having said all that, however, it doesn't mean I think AC taught a valid path, etc. AC was interesting, but still a worldly person in every respect. His "wickedness" however is totally overstated and silly:

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, July 22nd, 2014 at 8:32 PM

Title: Re: Clouded perception

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

You are not responsible for other's reactions.

Sherab Dorje said:

That is not 100% true. If I said to somebody that they should go make love to their mother and the person gets angry and upset, it is quite obvious that I have acted as a cause or condition for their reaction. If, on the other hand, I engage in Right Speech, and the person gets angry or upset, then my responsibility (ie my acting as a cause/condition) for their reaction is reduced drastically (maybe even to zero).

Malcolm wrote:

I don't agree Greg, I also don't care enough about this issue to bother mounting a counter argument.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, July 22nd, 2014 at 9:19 AM

Title: Re: Hello board and admins

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Take me to your leaders...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, July 22nd, 2014 at 7:46 AM

Title: Re: Tarot as divination tool

Content:

Vajrasvapna said:

It is very difficult to understand how a Buddhist might recommend something from a black magician, known for the practice of animal sacrifice.

Malcolm wrote:

In general I think Tarot and WET is a waste of time for Buddhists.

AC was not a "black magician". He may have on one or two occasions experimented with animal sacrifice (a practice he in general abjured).

In fact, he was one of the few westerners in his day who had any real understanding of Buddhism.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, July 22nd, 2014 at 7:27 AM

Title: Re: Tarot as divination tool

Content:

Karma Dorje said:

You know, you could make things easier and just add that to your signature.

dzogchungpa said:

I don't think you can put images in a signature.

Malcolm wrote:

This is veering awfully close to a metadiscussion.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, July 22nd, 2014 at 7:22 AM

Title: Re: Tarot as divination tool

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The best deck was and remains the Thoth Tarot of Crowley.

dzogchungpa said:

Why do you say that?

Malcolm wrote:

Crowley was a genius.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, July 22nd, 2014 at 7:00 AM

Title: Re: Tarot as divination tool

Content:

emptydreams said:

Okay this is going to be a weird question.

I have the ability to use tarot cards to take a peek into decision making situations, the same way how some Lamas use Mo divination.

How do I get the cards 'initialized' in a Buddhist way? I rarely use the cards except when my intuition (which is very strong) starts being muddled. Usually the cards' answers are the same as my intuition. Can i bring them along to tsog or request a Lama to bless/cleanse them?

hope this isnt too weird of a question...

Karma Dorje said:

These are not a Buddhist divination technique. They have their own context in the tradition of Ceremonial Magic that should be respected.

My advice is not to mix up the traditions into a porridge, but rather if you are going to use

Tarot do so according to the context that produced it.

Jetavan said:

I believe tarot cards originated as a type of playing card, and were later adopted for divination by occultists in general, not limited to ceremonial magickians. There's at least one set of tarot cards based on <http://www.aeclectic.net/tarot/cards/buddha/>.

Malcolm wrote:

My theory about the origin of playing cards and ultimately Tarot is that they originated in the small initiation cards used central Asia for initiations.

The best deck was and remains the Thoth Tarot of Crowley.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, July 22nd, 2014 at 6:32 AM

Title: Re: Am awareness itself meditation

Content:

avisitor said:

I believe there is no object to attain in meditation.

Malcolm wrote:

That would be the standard Mahāyāna view.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, July 22nd, 2014 at 5:21 AM

Title: Re: Clouded perception

Content:

Qing Tian said:

Question: How can I exercise Right Speech when I cannot anticipate all possible reactions to what I say?

Malcolm wrote:

You are not responsible for other's reactions.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, July 22nd, 2014 at 3:26 AM

Title: Re: Am awareness itself meditation

Content:

avisitor said:

"Naturally occurring timeless awareness

Malcolm wrote:

What is being described is rang byung ye shes, which can be translated a number of ways such as "naturally occurring timeless awareness", "spontaneous pristine gnosis",

"self-originated primordial wisdom" and so on.

avisitor said:

I am sorry but where does it say it is a state of meditation or in any way related to meditation??

I don't contend the translation.

Malcolm wrote:

It is not a state of meditation. It is a transcendent state, quite beyond meditation and a meditator.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, July 22nd, 2014 at 3:21 AM

Title: Re: Am awareness itself meditation

Content:

avisitor said:

"Naturally occurring timeless awareness

Malcolm wrote:

What is being described is rang byung ye shes, which can be translated a number of ways such as "naturally occurring timeless awareness", "spontaneous pristine gnosis", "self-originated primordial wisdom" and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, July 22nd, 2014 at 2:54 AM

Title: Re: Dorje Gotrab deity picture origin

Content:

heart said:

I have seen it before, there is also a short sadhana. This is what is written in the beginning of the translation: "sngags 'bum rdo rje go khrab Adamantine Armor, mantras for protection and for repelling obstacles, revealed by Dorje Lingpa"

The DC booklet contains a full translation of at least one of the texts by Dorje Lingpa from this terma. So both practices can be correct.

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

The Dorje Lingpa tradition has no visualization in the main text. The image is from a later terma, Ratna Lingpa, I think.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, July 22nd, 2014 at 2:53 AM

Title: Re: ACLU: UN to Confront USA on Persistent Racial Discrimina

Content:

David N. Snyder said:

The U.S. like most countries has a long way to go toward ending discrimination, but in what other country could a half-black, half-white, son of a man from Kenya become president for two terms? I won't mention names of countries, but can you imagine very many other countries electing a man or woman to prime minister or president where they are originally from Turkey, Iran, Congo, etc.?

Malcolm wrote:

Well, there is India.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, July 21st, 2014 at 11:14 PM

Title: Re: Uninterrupted motivation to practice mindfulness

Content:

Dan74 said:

A good point. The trouble is, as I see it, that most of the time it is not so much akusalacittas, but habitual mental patterns that occupy our minds. The technique of mindfulness is to help us break out of these habits and attend to the matter at hand with complete attention and a fresh seeing.

Malcolm wrote:

Dan,

One, we have to make a distinction between smṛti and smṛtyupasthāna. The former is a mental factor, the latter is "Close placement of mindfulness", familiar to us as the four foundations of mindfulness.

Secondly, smṛti is always accompanied by saṃprajāna, i.e. attentiveness. These two always work in a pair.

The point is that we cannot have a mind where kusalacaittas and akusalacaittas are present at the same time -- it's impossible

This is why even simple exercises of mindfulness, the mundane kind, are useful. For example, mindfulness it is often described by the Buddha means when eating one knows that one is eating, when walking, one knows that one is walking, when wearing pants, one knows that one is wearing pants. Before you can have "right mindfulness" of the kind that TRC is describing, you have to develop mindfulness.

But more to the point, when you have the presence of the mental factor of smṛti, the mental factor of vīrya, diligence, is automatically present. Why? Because the kusalacaittas always work in company, where one is found all the other nine are to be found as well.

Moreover, when the ten kusalacaittas are present, it is impossible for the akusalacaittas to arise in the mind, including the three afflictions referenced above. So therefore, as long as one is mindful and attentive even in an ordinary way, this eliminates the possibility for the akusalacaittas and the afflictive cittas to arise.

So the answer to the question is, by understanding how mind and mental factors function the motivation to practice mindfulness arises merely by understanding how the mind works and taking opportunity of this knowledge. It does not have to be this formal, academic, intellectual trip.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, July 21st, 2014 at 5:51 PM

Title: Re: CHNN Shang Shang publications - Password?

Content:

vajraheart said:

Hi,

I just received several download links for restricted items that I ordered from the Shang Shang store of CHNNR. After downloading the files, when attempting to open them I am prompted for a password, but was never sent one in the email. Where do I get the passwords to open my files? Thanks...

Malcolm wrote:

They will send you one, but it might take a day.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, July 21st, 2014 at 2:36 PM

Title: Re: Uninterrupted motivation to practice mindfulness

Content:

TRC said:

I have to disagree with your characterisation of mindfulness as being “nothing more profound” than “not forgetting to put your pants on” Malcolm.

Malcolm wrote:

Mindfulness is simply a mental factor.

Of course there are different objects of mindfulness, but the act of being mindful is the same in so far as it is a mental factor associated with all positive minds. Mindfulness is always beneficial, since it is a kusalacaitta. This does not make mindfulness profound however.

The point here of course is to point out that we are always being mindful of something, unless of course we are distracted by the akusalacaittas, etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, July 21st, 2014 at 8:12 AM

Title: Re: Uninterrupted motivation to practice mindfulness

Content:

SeekerNo1000003 said:

Hi,

One thing bothers me a lot lately & that is the lack of a continuous motivation to practice mindfulness.

It bothers me that I am distracted most of the day & too lazy to do anything about it.

I imagine that this is normal & motivation becomes more continuous as we continue to practice. On the other hand, I've experienced sudden rises in determination as far as other things are concerned (e.g., finding a solution to a problem that remained unsolved for too long).

In the case of practicing mindfulness more consistently, it feels to me that a simple insight of some sort may be missing...

I'm curious have you ever had any breakthroughs or insights that helped you get into gear in the practice of mindfulness? Could you kindly share with your experience?

Malcolm wrote:

Mindfulness means not forgetting to put your pants on before you step out the door. It is really nothing more profound than this, but it is very useful to have.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, July 20th, 2014 at 10:39 AM

Title: Re: Why do only very few practitioners attain rainbow body?

Content:

smcj said:

Upon sober reflection...

Malcolm wrote:

Well, I did ask you if you were high.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, July 20th, 2014 at 10:38 AM

Title: Re: Why do only very few practitioners attain rainbow body?

Content:

smcj said:

Part of what he was talking about was wishing for validation of the teachings, to make them something more than stories and ideas, to make them something you can know you can rely on.

Malcolm wrote:

The practice of Dzogchen has the ability to eradicate the two coarse obscurations [i.e.

the obscurations of affliction and knowledge] even in ordinary practitioners below the path of seeing because it permits ordinary practitioners to encounter their real condition even though they are not what one would be normally considered "enlightened" [i.e. the path of seeing/the first bodhisattva stage and beyond].

The path of Dzogchen is really quite extraordinary precisely because of its benefits for normal, everyday people.

Of course, one still must continue to practice and attain awakening in order to deal with the two subtle obscurations which remain.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, July 20th, 2014 at 4:53 AM

Title: Re: Why do only very few practitioners attain rainbow body?

Content:

smcj said:

I believe that the points that I was making were entirely in keeping with the traditional Nyingma approach to Dzogchen.

Malcolm wrote:

How would you know? Not all Nyingma teachers teach Dzogchen or have a deep understanding of Dzogchen, much less a deep practice of Dzogchen.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, July 20th, 2014 at 3:13 AM

Title: Re: Rainbow body question

Content:

Fa Dao said:

sorry if am a little dense..just want to make sure I understand you correctly..this is serious shit, ya know?

3rd level=Awakened person=you just Know?

Malcolm wrote:

Well, one, if you reach the 3rd vision, this assumes you have had instructions on all four visions. So yeah, once you hit the third vision you also enter the first bhumi and the path of cultivation, and you are guaranteed buddhahood from that point on in the bardo at minimum.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, July 20th, 2014 at 2:42 AM

Title: Re: Rainbow body question

Content:

Fa Dao said:

ok..so in that slow dissolution does one just Know how to do that? Is it an intrinsic part of the process? or are there specific practices when one does reach that level? I am not asking for any specific details of course, especially in an online forum, just asking for future reference..

Malcolm wrote:

Once you hit the third vision you are an awakened person.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, July 20th, 2014 at 2:14 AM

Title: Re: Rainbow body question

Content:

Fa Dao said:

my question is simple..does rainbow body just happen spontaneously when one reaches the 4th vision as described in Longde/Thogal/Yangti texts? or does one just know what to do when they reach that level? or are there specific practices that one does when they reach that level?

Malcolm wrote:

The fourth vision is described as a gradual process.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, July 20th, 2014 at 2:01 AM

Title: Re: Why do only very few practitioners attain rainbow body?

Content:

uan said:

Hi Malcolm, I thought this thread would be a better place to follow up on a response you made (just so we don't go off topic on the Western Buddhist thread). I was hoping you could clarify a couple things.

Malcom wrote

uan wrote:

Based on that, is there a reason you would be presently incarnated here, rather than having attained rainbow body in the bardo or in a pure nirmanakāya buddhafiield?

When you wake up in the bardo, you also generate emanations. Maybe I am one of those. In terms of the rainbow body, whether it's attained at death or afterwards in the bardo/a pure nirmanakāya buddhafiield, is that a mark that a practitioner has entered on the Bhumis or is it a mark that one has attained full Buddhahood? Does awaken mean realized or enlightened - and are those two terms describing different things or not? My understanding, which is likely to be incorrect, is that "realized" meant a person was at least on the 1st Bhumi, while "enlightened" would mean full Buddhahood. Your insight would be appreciated.

Malcolm wrote:
Generally, speaking here we mean buddhahood.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Sunday, July 20th, 2014 at 2:00 AM
Title: Re: Dharma wheel, ethics, value & online communities
Content:
boda said:
I think this often springs from the notion that newcomers must be protected from wrong views or whatever.

Malcolm wrote:
No, we are just tired of arguing with obstinate materialists about what the Buddha actually taught.

boda said:
Who on the forum is a materialist?

Malcolm wrote:
well, lets see, there was A108, etc.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Sunday, July 20th, 2014 at 1:26 AM
Title: Re: Dharma wheel, ethics, value & online communities
Content:
boda said:
I think this often springs from the notion that newcomers must be protected from wrong views or whatever.

Malcolm wrote:
No, we are just tired of arguing with obstinate materialists about what the Buddha actually taught.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Sunday, July 20th, 2014 at 12:31 AM
Title: Re: Dharma wheel, ethics, value & online communities
Content:
martin123 said:
I can honestly say that of all the forums i have visited(not just Buddhist forums) Dharmawheel is the most heaviest in atmosphere.What is heavy(in a negative sense) about wisdom and compassion?something worth considering.

boda said:
It reeks of self-importance.

Sherab Dorje said:
What reeks of self-importance?

Malcolm wrote:
DW

Author: Malcolm
Date: Sunday, July 20th, 2014 at 12:26 AM
Title: Re: Why do only very few practitioners attain rainbow body?
Content:

Crazywisdom said:
Dzogchen is nothing like the lottery. Dzogchen is not reserved only for the mahasiddhas. If you listen, contemplate and practice the teachers words, you can have that realization in one life.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Saturday, July 19th, 2014 at 11:57 PM
Title: Re: Recent tragic events and the West vs Russia situation
Content:

Malcolm wrote:
MOSCOW (AP) — A top pro-Russia rebel commander in eastern Ukraine has given a bizarre version of events surrounding the Malaysian jetliner crash — suggesting many of the victims may have died days before the plane took off.

The pro-rebel website Russkaya Vesna on Friday quoted Igor Girkin as saying he was told by people at the crash site that "a significant number of the bodies weren't fresh," adding that he was told they were drained of blood and reeked of decomposition.

The Malaysia Airlines Boeing-777 was shot down Thursday, killing all 298 people aboard. The plane was flying 10,000 meters above an area where Ukrainian forces have been fighting separatist rebels. Each side accuses the other of downing the plane.

U.S. intelligence authorities said a surface-to-air missile brought down the plane, and U.S. Ambassador Samantha Power told the U.N. Security Council in New York on Friday that the missile was likely fired from a rebel-held area near the Russian border.

Girkin, also known as Strelkov and allegedly a former Russian military intelligence agent, said he couldn't confirm the information. But it's sure to add to the intense emotions surrounding the crash, with the rebels accused of shooting down the plane.

Girkin said "Ukrainian authorities are capable of any baseness."

He claimed that a large amount of blood serum and medications were found in the wreckage.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, July 19th, 2014 at 11:53 PM

Title: Re: Why do only very few practitioners attain rainbow body?

Content:

smcj said:

I think my response to Zoom was better than yours. You are welcome to try it again.

Malcolm wrote:

Are you high?

smcj said:

No, Gelug/Kagyu.

Malcolm wrote:

Right, and so your interest in the Dzogchen forum is?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, July 19th, 2014 at 11:52 PM

Title: Re: Why do only very few practitioners attain rainbow body?

Content:

smcj said:

I think my response to Zoom was better than yours.

Malcolm wrote:

I was being sarcastic because his comment was not serious. In fact, none of his comments have been serious.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, July 19th, 2014 at 11:45 PM

Title: Re: Why do only very few practitioners attain rainbow body?

Content:

smcj said:

I think my response to Zoom was better than yours. You are welcome to try it again.

Malcolm wrote:

Are you high?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, July 19th, 2014 at 11:34 PM

Title: Re: Why do only very few practitioners attain rainbow body?

Content:

smcj said:

You guys make too much of a big thing about Dzogchen.

Malcolm wrote:

No we don't. Dzogchen is our path. It is not yours, and that's ok.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, July 19th, 2014 at 10:19 PM

Title: Re: Recent tragic events and the West vs Russia situation

Content:

Karma Dorje said:

What I find deeply disturbing ...

Malcolm wrote:

Nothing that governments do is disturbing, or rather, it's all disturbing on one level or another.

Karma Dorje said:

Why are you correcting me when I am saying what I find disturbing? If you don't find it disturbing, that's up to you.

Malcolm wrote:

it was an observation spurred by your comment, not a correction...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, July 19th, 2014 at 8:31 PM

Title: Re: Diet in relation to Rainbow Body

Content:

zenman said:

I read the book Incarnation by Tulku Thondup. Fascinating stuff, a very good book. So many have attained the rainbow body that it kind of surprises.

My question is a specific one: What has been the role and content of the diet of these people who have attained rainbow body? I am especially interested in the changing situation of the need for food. I suppose most if not all of them have been vegetarians. What have they eaten? Does anyone know?

Malcolm wrote:

Probably very few of them were vegetarians. But they all practiced what is known as Chulen or rasāyana, which is an important secondary practice for attaining rainbow body.

And slowly, they would have reduced their dependence on food.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, July 19th, 2014 at 8:27 PM

Title: Remember 1988?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Navy Missile Downs Iranian Jetliner

By George C. Wilson

Washington Post Staff Writer

Monday, July 4, 1988; Page A01

A U.S. warship fighting gunboats in the Persian Gulf yesterday mistook an Iranian civilian jetliner for an attacking Iranian F14 fighter plane and blew it out of the hazy sky with a heat-seeking missile, the Pentagon announced. Iran said 290 persons were aboard the European-made A300 Airbus and that all had perished.

"The U.S. government deeply regrets this incident," Adm. William J. Crowe Jr., chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, told a Pentagon news conference.

The disaster occurred at mid-morning over the Strait of Hormuz, when the airliner, Iran Air Flight 655, on what Iran described as a routine 140-mile flight from its coastal city of Bandar Abbas southwest to Dubai in the United Arab Emirates, apparently strayed too close to two U.S. Navy warships that were engaged in a battle with Iranian gunboats.

The USS Vincennes, a cruiser equipped with the most sophisticated radar and electronic battle gear in the Navy's surface arsenal, tracked the oncoming plane electronically, warned it to keep away, and when it did not fired two Standard surface-to-air missiles.

Navy officials said the Vincennes' combat teams believed the airliner to be an Iranian F14 jet fighter. No visual contact was made with the aircraft until it was struck and blew up about six miles from the Vincennes; the plane's wreckage fell in Iranian territorial waters, Navy officials said.

Iranian vessels and helicopters searched for survivors, but there was no indication last night that anyone survived what apparently is the sixth worst aviation disaster. Iranian television broadcast scenes of bodies floating amid scattered debris.

It was the first time any U.S. military unit had shot down a civilian airliner. It occurred almost five years after a Soviet fighter pilot shot down an off-course Korean Air Lines Flight 007, killing 269 people.

Iran accused the United States of a "barbaric massacre" and vowed to "avenge the blood of our martyrs."

President Reagan in a statement said he was "saddened to report" that the Vincennes "in a proper defensive action" had shot down the jetliner. "This is a terrible human tragedy. Our sympathy and condolences go out to the passengers, crew, and their families We deeply regret any loss of life."

Reagan, who was spending the Fourth of July holiday at Camp David, said the Iranian aircraft "was headed directly for the Vincennes" and had "failed to heed repeated warnings." The cruiser, he said, fired "to protect itself against possible attack."

News of the downing of the plane began with sharply conflicting accounts from Iran and from the Defense Department of what had transpired in the Persian Gulf. Early yesterday, Tehran broadcast accusations that the United States had downed an unarmed airliner.

The Pentagon at first denied the Iranian claims, declaring that information from the fleet indicated that the Vincennes, equipped with the Aegis electronic battle management system, had shot down an attacking Iranian F14 jet fighter. But after sifting through more detailed reports and electronic intelligence, Reagan directed the Pentagon to confirm there had been a tragic case of mistaken identity in the war-torn gulf.

Crowe, in his hastily called news conference at the Pentagon, also backed up the skipper of the Vincennes and faulted the Iranian airline pilot. Crowe said the Airbus had flown four miles west of the usual commercial airline route from Bandar Abbas to Dubai and that the pilot ignored repeated radioed warnings from the Vincennes to change course.

Why and how the Vincennes mistook the bulky, wide-bodied Airbus A300 for a sleek, supersonic F14 fighter plane barely a third the transport's size will be the subject of "a full investigation," Reagan promised. A military team under the command of Rear Adm. William N. Fogarty of the U.S. Central Command will leave this week to begin that investigation, Defense Department officials said.

The shootdown of the Airbus represents the biggest loss of life on the strategic waterway since the U.S. warships began escorting Kuwaiti tankers in and out of the Persian Gulf last July. Pentagon officials then said the increased U.S. naval presence would have from a "low to moderate risk" of provoking confrontations with Iran.

But in the past year, although the United States and Iran are not in a formal state of war, there have been a series of brief but fierce sea battles in the gulf between the two countries' military forces. Vigilance and readiness among U.S. forces intensified after the near-sinking of the patrol frigate USS Stark by an Iraqi fighter-bomber on May 17, 1987, in a missile attack that killed 37 sailors.

Yesterday started out as another sea battle, and ended with what the Vincennes commanders misinterpreted as a "Stark profile" attack on the high-tech cruiser. Crowe in his briefing and other Navy and Defense Department officials offered a detailed version of how the shoot-down occurred.

At 2:10 a.m. EDT, the Pentagon said, three Iranian Boghammar gunboats fired on a helicopter that had flown off the Vincennes on a reconnaissance mission. The helicopter flew back to the cruiser unscathed. The Vincennes and a smaller warship, the frigate USS Elmer Montgomery, a half-hour later closed on the gunboats and put them under fire with 5-inch guns, sinking two and damaging the third.

At 2:47 a.m. EDT, the Iranian Airbus with almost a full load of passengers took off from Bandar Abbas, a big Iranian naval base on the northern coastal elbow of the Strait of Hormuz. The field at the base is used by civilian and military aircraft and recently had become the center for Iran's dwindling force of F14s, a twin-engine, two-place fighter that the United States sold to Iran during the rule of the shah.

Two minutes after the Airbus took off, the far-reaching radars of the Vincennes Aegis cruiser saw the plane was coming its way. The skipper of the ship, operating under liberalized rules of engagement that call for U.S. captains in the Persian Gulf to fire before being fired upon to avoid another Stark disaster, warned the approaching aircraft to change course, according to the Pentagon.

The Vincennes and most airliners are equipped with identification of friend or foe (IFF) electronic boxes that query each other across the sky to establish identities. The Vincennes' IFF questioned the Airbus IFF via telemetry, but received no response. A response would come in radio pulses that would be deciphered and displayed as an identifying number on the ship's combat information center consoles.

Failing to raise the Airbus by IFF, the Pentagon said, the Vincennes broadcast its warnings by voice radio, using the emergency UHF and VHF channels that aircraft crews would hear if they followed standard practice of monitoring those frequencies. Crowe said three warnings were sent over the civilian emergency channel and four over the military one, called "Guard." The Pentagon said the Vincennes could have issued the warning over the air traffic control channel but did not.

"The suspect aircraft was outside the prescribed commercial air corridor," Crowe told reporters. Defense Department officials said later that the Airbus was four miles west of commercial air corridor. "More importantly," Crowe continued, "the aircraft headed directly for Vincennes on a constant bearing at high speed, approximately 450 knots."

Without becoming specific, Crowe said there were "electronic indications on Vincennes" that led the U.S. crew to conclude the approaching airliner was an F14. "Given the threatening flight profile and decreasing range, the aircraft was declared 'hostile' " at 2:51 a.m. EDT. The airliner at that crucial moment was on a course of almost due south, 185 degrees, and descending toward the Vincennes from an altitude of 7,800 feet, according to Crowe. Visibility was no more than five miles, Crowe said.

Three minutes later, at 2:54 a.m. EDT, the Vincennes launched two Standard surface-to-air missiles from its deck. The missiles whooshed toward the twin-jet airliner, which was nine miles away and not visible to the naked eye because of the haze hanging over the gulf. The Standard missiles homed in on the heat of the quarry's engines and at least one of them exploded when it pulled abreast of the Airbus. Such a missile hit usually slices an aircraft apart and turns it into a fireball of burning fuel.

"At least one hit at an approximate range of six miles," Crowe said. "We do have some eyewitness reports that saw the vague shape of the aircraft when the missile hit, and it looked like it disintegrated."

Asked if the Vincennes' skipper had been prudent or impetuous by firing at a plane he could not see, Crowe replied: "The commanding officer conducted himself with circumspection and, considering the information that was available to him, followed his authorities and acted with good judgment at a very trying period and under very trying circumstances Not only was he following this aircraft and concerned about it," but he also "was engaged on the surface with Iranian units."

Crowe said it was "logical" for the skipper to assume an aircraft that was coming down from the sky at high speed and would not respond to radio warnings was putting the Vincennes "in jeopardy."

At another point in the news conference Crowe broadened his defense of the Vincennes skipper, declaring "the No. 1 obligation of the commanding officer of a ship or units are the protection of his own people. We deeply regret the loss of life here, but that commanding officer had a very heavy obligation to protect his ships, his people. We've made that clear throughout the Persian Gulf mission"

Crowe, who used a chart of the Strait of Hormuz that displayed the approximate positions of the vessels and the route of the airliner, said he did not have enough data to explain fully why the multiple kinds of detection gear aboard the Vincennes mistook a wide-bodied jetliner for a fighter.

But he noted that the Vincennes' radar was focused on a plane coming at it head-on, reflecting a smaller dot on the console screens than would be the case from a side view. Also, he said, no Air Force Airborne Warning and Control System (AWACS) or Navy Hawkeye sentry planes were aloft over the Strait of Hormuz to provide additional identification data to the Vincennes at the time of the shootdown.

Navy leaders said Iranian commercial aircraft had flown over U.S. warships in a threatening manner at least eight times before the Stark was hit by two French Exocet missiles fired by an Iraqi jet. Ever since the Stark attack, skippers in the gulf have been less tolerant of such apparent threats.

Asked if the skipper of the Vincennes would have held his fire under the interpretation of the rules of engagement followed before the Stark was attacked, Crowe replied: "I don't know. Certainly the rules of engagement would not have been as specific as the authorities granted him." He said another review of the rules of engagement would be part of the general investigation of the shootdown.

Crowe said there were "fundamental differences" between the actions of United States in this incident and the Soviet Union in the downing of Korean Air Lines Flight 007, which strayed into Soviet airspace on the night of Sept. 1, 1983, during a flight from Alaska to Japan. The Soviet airspace was not a war zone like the Persian Gulf, Crowe said, "and there was not combat in progress" as was the case yesterday. "It was at very high altitude" and no Soviet warnings were issued.

"In the Persian Gulf," Crowe said, there is very little time or maneuver room when ships are put at risk. "We're fighting in a lake."

Staff writer Molly Moore contributed to this report.

© Copyright 1996 The Associated Press

Back to the top

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, July 19th, 2014 at 8:18 PM

Title: Re: Dharma wheel, ethics, value & online communities

Content:

Dan74 said:

But more importantly here on fora, there are clearly people seem to spend an inordinate amount of time arguing over the doctrine, which I suspect is detrimental to other aspects of practice, would you agree? So I was simply trying to say that there isn't one uniquely correct way of looking at this. That's all.

Malcolm wrote:

I have found that arguing about things between lineages is not productive, say Chan and Highest Yoga Tantra, or even between Kagyu and Sakya, for example.

Why? Partially it has to do with the way different schools perceive themselves. If you tell a Chan practitioner that Chan is not the apex of buddhadharma, they will think you are crazy. If you tell a Vajrayāna practitioner that one can attain Buddhahood by common Mahāyāna in less than three incalculable eons (and that includes Chan), they will think you are crazy. Similarly, if you tell Theravadins they are following Hinayāna they get all offended and huffy. If you try to insist to Vajrayānists that Theravada does not fall under the criteria of what we define as Hinayāna, you will get blank stares.

On the other hand, if one wants to go and understand why Chan considers itself the apex, or why Vajrayānists consider Theravada Hinayāna, and so on, then one should do so with an open mind.

Then of course there is the issue of conflicting assumptions — a lot of long time Mahāyānists and Vajrayānists, as we know, claim to be unconcerned with the assertion that their texts and so on are not really products of Buddha speech as traditionally defined (that is spoken, by permission, or blessed). This also raises complexities. Then there is the difference of canons -- for example, frequently Chinese Buddhists will cite the Shurangama Samaadhi 2, for the sake of convenience. This sutra, whether authentic or not, simply is not read in the Tibetan Canon and so therefore, will not be felt of much authority by Tibetan Buddhists. It is certain that it existed, but unlike many other sutras, for whatever reason, the Tibetans chose not to translate it into Tibetan because perhaps they doubted its authenticity.

Then of course there is the modern pro-atman interpretation of the Dharma, grounded far more in the Coomaraswamy, Grim, and modern early 20th century authors, than traditional discourse, AFACT, represented by our own Son of the Buddha, and elsewhere, Zenmar (aka Ardent Hollingsworth), who right or wrong, represent a vocal minority on virtually every Buddhist forum I have been on in the past 20 years.

Finally, there are the out and out "Buddhist" skeptics such as the Triratna Order's Jayarava Atwood and Richard Hayes. What possible interest they have in Dharma anymore is totally beyond me, since people like they seem bent on tearing Buddhism down completely, but whatever. They seem to emanated out of the forensic trend of Buddhist historical scholarship, but of what use this is for the practice of Dharma is totally mystifying.

All of this leads to a rather complex maze of issues and assumptions one has to navigate on a heterogeneous forum such as this. And most people do not have the long view I have, since they have not participated on these forums of and on. How many folks remember alt.buddha.short.fat.guy?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, July 19th, 2014 at 7:36 PM

Title: Re: Why do only very few practitioners attain rainbow body?

Content:

ZOOM said:

I never heard that even one of all the Westerner Dzogchen practitioners (no matter if they are in an official lineage, have an official teacher, got direct "empowerment" or instruction from the teacher) ever attained rainbow body.

This poor success rate for Westerners (0.000%) seems very disconcerting and leads to a lot of questions.

In case that I am misinformed, I would be happy if someone could point out some rainbow body success stories of Westerner students to me!

Thank you very much!

Malcolm wrote:

Yup, I guess Dzogchen just doesn't work for westerners. Better move along, nothing to see here.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, July 19th, 2014 at 7:34 PM

Title: Re: Recent tragic events and the West vs Russia situation

Content:

Karma Dorje said:

What I find deeply disturbing ...

Malcolm wrote:

Nothing that governments do is disturbing, or rather, it's all disturbing on one level or another.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, July 19th, 2014 at 7:31 PM

Title: Re: Recent tragic events and the West vs Russia situation

Content:

Dan74 said:

But the West, who have removed and installed regimes as they saw fit from Iran to Central America, and in the past annexed huge swathes of land from Hawaii to Mexico, hardly has the high moral ground.

Malcolm wrote:

The Monroe Doctrine, formulated during an era when the US was under constant threat from European Colonial powers. That was amended by Teddy Roosevelt's big stick policies.

Dan74 said:

I don't think Putin is the power-crazed despot, Western media portrays him to be. His thinking, as far as I can make out, is to push back and re-establish Russia as a power to be reckoned with. A Russia that will protect its national interest and throw its weight around if needs be, rather than being pushed around by the West, as it is perceived domestically. Russia has always focused on its local scene - Chechnya, Abkhazia, Ukraine, which it sees as its legitimate sphere of influence after the loss of the Warsaw Pact states. I think much of what we see is a product of the West trying to contain Russia (just like China) and maintain hegemony over world affairs.

Malcolm wrote:

As far as I can tell, Russia is interested annexing the whole of the Ukraine, which Russians regard as properly a part of Russia.

This is a screw up of massive proportions on the part of the Russians.

Dan74 said:

I am seriously worried about where this is all heading...

Malcolm wrote:

No where. Russia's lost the moral high ground, despite the Ukrainian Nazis and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, July 19th, 2014 at 8:55 AM

Title: Re: Is Western Buddhism an (ethnic) identity-based Buddhism?

Content:

Jikan said:

We're way off topic, but that can be sorted out in a moment.

Question for Malcolm et al: define "early age" for the purpose of this conversation.
what age of taking an interest might indicate such a thing?

Malcolm wrote:

Kungfu came on when I was 10, Cutting Through, etc. at 16. I have self-identified as a Buddhist since then.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, July 19th, 2014 at 7:34 AM

Title: Re: Is Western Buddhism an (ethnic) identity-based Buddhism?

Content:

uan said:

Based on that, is there a reason you would be presently incarnated here, rather than having attained rainbow body in the bardo or in a pure nirmanakāya buddhafiield?

Malcolm wrote:

When you wake up in the bardo, you also generate emanations. Maybe I am one of those.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, July 19th, 2014 at 7:26 AM

Title: Re: Why do only very few practitioners attain rainbow body?

Content:

kirtu said:

It is the case that for most people it is easier to attain Arhatship

Malcolm wrote:

This just really is not the case, kirt. But far be it from me to sway you from your superior knowledge.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, July 19th, 2014 at 4:00 AM

Title: Re: "Protestant" vs Traditional/"Orthodox" approaches to Dha

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

It might be time to sit back, keep an eye on whether or not the changes we are in the process of implementing make DW a place you want to spend time, or if they don't after some time, make your decision accordingly.

Announcement July 18th, 2014 said:

2. People are free to question the teachings and traditional interpretations in Open Dharma subforum as has mostly been happening. Questions about a practice, a teaching or belief are appropriate in the specific subforum where the practice belongs, but criticisms belong in Open Dharma only and should be done sensitively, where possible with reference to the appropriate teachings. For example, do not challenge the core Dharma concepts and principles of Pure Land Buddhism in the Pure Land subforum and the same goes with the other specific traditions as well.

Malcolm wrote:

This means you have decided to change nothing. This means that criticism of Mahāyāna and Vajrayāna will proceed unchecked. This means that you are WILLINGLY providing a harbor for adharma. Why you all fail to understand this is somewhat astonishing. The fact that some of you possess samaya and still are willing to aid and abet those mārās who would criticize Mahāyāna and Vajrayāna is even more astonishing still.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, July 19th, 2014 at 3:54 AM

Title: Re: "Protestant" vs Traditional/"Orthodox" approaches to Dha

Content:

Fruitzilla said:

Teyes was mostly hands-off, especially at the last stages. Besides, there was a sudden tightening of policy which can be called a power grab in all reasonableness IMHO.

Malcolm wrote:

Nope, there was no grab. At that point I had totally stepped down.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, July 19th, 2014 at 3:45 AM

Title: Re: Dharma wheel, ethics, value & online communities

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

It was never mandatory to believe in rebirth on e-sangha, it was forbidden to argue against it.

Sherab Dorje said:
Same thing.

Malcolm wrote:
No, not the same thing at all.

Sherab Dorje said:
It's different, no one is arguing with him.
Yes, this is true, but this is a discussion forum after all and the example was to highlight the necessity of the repetitive reinforcement of basic principles. ie You missed the point.

Malcolm wrote:
Sorry, but you miss the point — i.e. ChNN does not have to deal with argumentative people when reiterating basic points. He reiterates basic points again and again because new people come again and again. Here, it is not new people coming again and again, it is old people with the same old axes to grind, often from E-Sangha.

Sherab Dorje said:
It would be a lot easier to manage, and the level of conversation would be more elevated if people did not feel entitled to argue with every basic aspect of the teachings regardless of forums. For example the user TRC feels completely at ease being confrontational in every forum, the same goes for Alfredo.
Okay. So if they are breaking the Terms of Service by being unnecessarily disruptive you report them and they get warned, suspended and banned.

Malcolm wrote:
That is the problem, people get reported, a moderator handles the report, and often nothing happens because as long as no one uses expletives, for whatever reason the moderation style here is "let the $#!% fly", for example, the tactless pillorying of the late Rachel Olds.

Sherab Dorje said:
The tulku system as it is present in Tibet has no precedent in sutra and tantra. It is relied upon heavily in Kagyu and Nyingma, less so in Gelug, and almost non-existence in Sakya outside of east Tibet.
Really? Coz I am sure that it would have some precedent in tantra.

Malcolm wrote:
It has no precedent in sutra or tantra. You can listen to ChNN state this quite clearly today since you do not believe me. The Tulku system started with Karma Pakshi.

Sherab Dorje said:

I seem to remember a couple of predictions by Guru Padmasambhava being thrown around.

Malcolm wrote:

The tulku system has no precedent in sutra and tantra. Yes, in the Mañjuśrī mulakalpa there are some predictions of rebirths of bodhisattvas in Tibet such as Gampopa, and in the Padma Khathang there are lists of predictions about where this terma is concealed and by which of the 25 disciples it will be revealed in a later incarnation, and so on, but there is no precedent for system of reincarnated lineage heads like you have in Nyingma and Kagyu exclusively. The fact that it is not bound by some canonicity is why there can be disputes over the recognition of the Karmapa, for example. There is no clear guide in sutra and tantra which regulates how reincarnations are recognized/selected, trained, appointed, succeeded and so on. For this reason then, the recognition of Steven Segal as a minor tulku generated some controversy in the West. Many people really could not and still cannot understand why he was recognized by Penor Rinpoche — it was not for money, I can guarantee that. Since it is not really a part of sutra and tantra, the recognition of tulkus merely boils down to the opinion of this or that master. If someone follows that master, they are likely to give credence to the reincarnations he recognizes.

Sherab Dorje said:

So who has the say about the orthodoxy of the tulku system then? Who's orthodoxy (tradition) are we going to follow?

Malcolm wrote:

[/quote]

The tulku system is an embedded feature of Tibetan culture, religious life, politics and economics, but it is a deeply ingrained custom, it is not a system which is grounded in sutra and tantra. That being said, it is an integral feature of many lineages in Tibet such as Gelug (Drepung, Ganden, Sera), Drikung, Drugpa, Karma Kagyu etc., Palyul, Khathog, Dorje Drag, Dzogchen, Shechen and so on, as well as Dzongsar, as well as Bon monasteries also.

Thus, even though the tulku system does not have the orthodox and canonical backing of say bodhisattva vows or samaya, it is a deeply embedded part of Tibetan religious culture, and at this point, I would say Tibetan religious culture could barely function without it, which is why the Chinese are so keen on regulating it.

Unfortunately, due to the highly subjective nature of recognitions, it is difficult to say there is an "orthodox" position on the issue of recognitions. Sometimes reincarnations are recognized in dreams, sometimes, by divinations, sometimes, as in the case of the Dalai Lamas of late 18th and 19th centuries, by drawing lots; sometimes by predictions of the dying Lama like the 13 Dalai Lama or the 16th Karmapa (if you follow Tai Situ's version), etc. Sometimes by tests, and in the case of 5th Dalai Lama, even though he failed the tests, the regent proclaimed to the Kashag that he passed them all and successfully recognized the belongings of the 4th.

The buddhology of tulkus is still being worked out by Tibetans. The only books I know that attempts to work out this buddhology is Tulku Thondup's INCARNATION: The History and Mysticism of the Tulku Tradition of Tibet. It is an attempt, but I have to say, it is a little scanty. There is also Enthronement: The Recognition Of The Reincarnate Masters Of Tibet And The Himalayas. This book makes it eminently clear that the rite of enthroning a tulku is basically the same as the rite of consecrating a statue.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, July 19th, 2014 at 2:58 AM

Title: Re: "Protestant" vs Traditional/"Orthodox" approaches to Dha

Content:

Jikan said:

How is it that so many recent DW posts get derailed into discussions of moderation policy and practice instead of Dharma? Surely that is an obscure and boring topic for most of us.

Fruitzilla said:

Well, basically because it is a power grab. IIRC it's about the same thing that happened on e-sangha.

Malcolm wrote:

There was no power grab on e-Sangha. Teyes was always the owner of the board. We always served in our various capacities at his pleasure.

There is no power grab here happening here, just an honest discussion of what is appropriate and inappropriate for a board of this type which great out of a discussion started by Sherlock.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, July 19th, 2014 at 12:22 AM

Title: Re: Ukraine says Malaysian Airliner shot down, 295 dead

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Yup, well, Russia has a lot of answering to do...

Norwegian said:

Usually planes don't suddenly explode in mid air with debris falling down, so I think we can rule out the crash theory.

As for being shot down, that's the only legible solution. And that Ukraine would shoot down the plane makes no sense. However, we do know that pro-Russian separatists are in the area where the plane crashed, we do know that they have issued warnings before that they consider the airspace above where they are located as theirs, and we also do know that they have bragged about having BUK missiles in the past. These are just the kind of missiles you need to shoot down a commercial airliner, which has an altitude that is far beyond what "regular" missiles (which what most rebels and terrorists are in possession of) have.

This cached link shows the pro-Russian separatists in that area tweeting an image of the BUK missiles:

https://webcache.googleusercontent.com/search?q=cache%3ANF6E5FCKFNEJ%3Ahttp%3A%2F%2Ftwitter.com%2Fdnrpress%2Fstatus%2F483248037629018112 " onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;" onclick="window.open(this.href);return false; -- and I say cached, because they have now deleted that image.

And earlier today, on Russian social network VKontakte (a sort of Russian Facebook), a leader of the pro-Russian separatists bragged about having shot down a Ukrainian military plane over the exact same town as the Malaysian airliner crashed down into. There has been no Ukrainian military plane crashing down there today, only the Malaysian airliner - ergo it was a misunderstanding of gigantic proportions. This post on VK have since been deleted...

And now US intel confirms that indeed a missile have been fired at the airliner: "A senior U.S. official said one radar system saw a surface-to-air missile system turn on and track an aircraft right before the plane went down. A second system saw a heat signature at the time the airliner was hit, the official said. The United States is analyzing the trajectory of the missile to try to learn where the attack came from."

The pro-Russian separatists are now intending on sending the discovered black box of the airliner to Moscow.

This is a tragedy that easily could've been avoided if people had made the right choices. And I really do wonder what Putin is thinking right now...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, July 19th, 2014 at 12:21 AM

Title: Re: "Protestant" vs Traditional/"Orthodox" approaches to Dha

Content:

Mkoll said:

The purpose of this sub-forum is to openly permit important and challenging discussion on the Dhamma. By establishing a particular forum as a "Free-For-All", albeit one where members must still be nice to each other, we aim to keep other areas of the site free from vociferous debate...

Malcolm wrote:

The problem, as I see it, is that Dhammwheel is more heterogeneous than Dharma Wheel. Secondly, debates tend to spill over into all forums here. Third, this forum is more heterogeneous and it is not as tightly run a ship as Dhammawheel. You have to recall, they all learned their mod skills at E-Sangha and basically transferred the Theravadin forum from E-Sangha to there. ESangha was also a much more tightly run ship than DW is at present. We also had a lot more mods.

My approach to this issue is to mark of dangerous shoals and navigate past them all together, rather than use up the man hours necessary to sound shallow water so we don't constantly run aground, i.e., as I have said several times, shutter this forum rather than trying to fix it.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, July 19th, 2014 at 12:13 AM

Title: Re: Why do only very few practitioners attain rainbow body?

Content:

smcj said:

I am personally of the opinion that Dzogchen has been over-marketed here in the West.

Malcolm wrote:

That's true. And even worse it is marketed as just another meditation technique. Just look at the latest cover of Shambhala Sun:

smcj said:

I do not doubt the validity of anything about it, just that it has pandered to many of our cultural preconditions and thus has gotten an undue amount of attention.

Malcolm wrote:

A lot of people use Dzogchen to sell their teachings, without really teaching Dzogchen at all.

smcj said:

The reason there are 9 yanas is because one size does not fit all. The best medicine is the one that cures the sickness you have got, not the most powerful or famous medicine.

Malcolm wrote:

In this case, the best Dharma for you is the one you want to practice. Dzogchen is a high teaching. That does not mean it is not a path. It is a path. And it can be practiced by any interested person.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, July 18th, 2014 at 11:52 PM

Title: Re: Dharma & Science

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Motova, you seriously misunderstand my point. My point is solely that it becomes a problem for practitioners and for Dharma in general when people who are nominally "buddhists" take refuge science rather than Dharma. There are a lot of negative consequences one could list. We can start with most obvious one, the denial, of rebirth, which the Buddha clearly defines as a wrong view.

Motova said:

I get what you're saying. But using science and taking refuge in science are two different things. There are people with the karma capable of using science/technology to complement their practice of the Dharma, without having to give up refuge.

Malcolm wrote:

I agree, in principle. On the other hand, sometimes the tools we use shape how we think, i.e., to a hammer, everything is a nail, and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, July 18th, 2014 at 11:49 PM

Title: Re: "Protestant" vs Traditional/"Orthodox" approaches to Dha

Content:

smcj said:

But from what you've said elsewhere based on your E-Sangha experience those discussions spilled over to the other forums.

Malcolm wrote:

Constantly.

The goal here should be to limit opportunity for Adharma speech.

Inevitably someone is going bring up the point of who decides what is Adharmic speech.

Well, this is a Mahayāna/Vajrayāna forum, so right there, questioning the authenticity of Mahāyāna or Vajrayāna should be off limits. It does not mean of course that anyone should be expected to accept Vajrayāna, or for that matter Mahāyāna, but criticisms of these traditions should not be allowed.

In general. DW should be a forum devoted to the promulgation and positive growth of Mahāyāna and Vajrayāna. How can that happen if we allow random people to engage in slanderous criticism of Mahāyāna and Vajrayāna? Somehow it is a major sin to refer to Theravada as a Hinayāna school, but no one blinks even once when the authenticity of Mahāyāna sutras and tantras are questioned or even denied.

Anyway, I think everyone gets my point.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, July 18th, 2014 at 11:38 PM

Title: Re: "Protestant" vs Traditional/"Orthodox" approaches to Dha

Content:

Mkoll said:

I'm not convinced, but I don't know much about inter-Mahayana relations so I can't say for sure. However, and this is putting it lightly, I do know for certain that Theravada has a different presentation of Dhamma than Mahayana.

Malcolm wrote:

And they have their own forum, don't they?

Mkoll said:

Well, I've come closer to your side of the fence on this issue since we've started talking about it. I could see a valid argument for certain topics of debate (like the legitimacy of the four concepts I mentioned) being anathema to the forum as a whole because they only serve to increase the hindrance of doubt.

Malcolm wrote:

Classically speaking, debate in Dharma is meant to clarify one's understanding of Dharma because one wants to understand the Dharma with more precision. The purpose of debate in Dharma has never been to fault Dharma teachings and replace them with some post-modern revision. But because of the way we conduct political discourse in the West, we extend that to religious discourse. Then because we have this idea of "free speech", we are offended by the notion that some lines of conversation might be considered non-virtuous from the perspective of Dharma. In other words, we constantly confuse political speech with Dharma speech thinking that it should be the kind free for all we might find in the Hyde Park Speaker's corner.

What I am pointing out is that this "open dharma" forum violates the very TOS of DW by its very nature because of the kind of speech that is built into the forum itself. As I mentioned before, it provides a natural platform for adharma.

Classically speaking, in ancient India, debate was lead by qualified masters who taught students how to think more clearly and precisely about the Dharma. It has never been a free-for all as we find here. The purpose of this debate was to lessen the students' conceptual doubt and to sharpen their thinking. But that does not happen here. Mostly, it becomes the default forum for what are essentially non-virtuous discussions.

In ancient India, if tirthikas wanted to debate with us, they were sent to the gatekeepers, expert Panditas like Naropa, etc., whose job it was to debate all comers, both Buddhist and non-Buddhist. Well, we don't have that kind of capacity here. We are not a Buddhist university. There are no panditas here.

In the end, the goal should not be to have lots of users, or lots of controversial conversations. The goal at DW should be to have meaningful, edifying discussions about Mahāyāna and Vajrayāna Dharma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, July 18th, 2014 at 11:14 PM

Title: Re: Why do only very few practitioners attain rainbow body?

Content:

Punya said:

waking up in the bardo do as well? (but not saying that's easy).

Malcolm wrote:

Achieving Buddhahood in the bardo is much easier than in this life. Why? It is because in the bardo state we have seven times more clarity. Buddha Vajrasattva states in the Victor's Speech Tantra

After that, in the bardo of rebirth the present unobstructed awareness with complete sense organs has seven times more clarity.

kirtu said:

But one's negative emotions are also unimpeded thus making it difficult unless one has a very high level of clarity already.

Kirt

Malcolm wrote:

For this reason we have Dzogchen teachings, which make waking up in the bardo relatively easy. Of the 21 capacities of Dzogchen practitioners listed the Rig pa rang shar tantra it is only the last three or four who need to take rebirth in a pure nirmanakāya realm in order to attain buddhahood.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, July 18th, 2014 at 11:11 PM

Title: Re: Why do only very few practitioners attain rainbow body?

Content:

kirtu said:

It is more easy to become an Arhat than attain rainbow body.

Malcolm wrote:

This is really not the case. Who ever taught you this?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, July 18th, 2014 at 10:58 PM

Title: Re: Dharma wheel, ethics, value & online communities

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

What do you propose: like e-sangha where it was mandatory to believe in rebirth? A list of topics people are allowed/not allowed to debate and discuss? According to which traditions criteria?

Malcolm wrote:

It was never mandatory to believe in rebirth on e-sangha, it was forbidden to argue against it.

Sherab Dorje said:

How many times has he given the lung for the tun, etc...?

Malcolm wrote:

It's different, no one is arguing with him.

Sherab Dorje said:

Like you stated in the sangha poll, this is not a sangha. There is no teacher. So obviously anything more than recycling the basics, requires sending a member to find a teacher.

Malcolm wrote:

It would be a lot easier to manage, and the level of conversation would be more elevated people if did not feel entitled to argue with every basic aspect of the teachings regardless of forums. For example the user TRC feels completely at ease being confrontational in every forum, the same goes for Alfredo.

Sherab Dorje said:

And let's look at this idea of "traditional". Traditional according to which tradition and who? You claim a traditional approach yet, if I remember correctly (and please correct me if I am wrong) I have heard you express doubts/objections regarding the tulku system. Well, doesn't that make you non-traditional or a reformist of types? So according to the orthodoxy of your own position, you should not be allowed to take part in discussions on this forum.

Malcolm wrote:

The tulku system as it is present in Tibet has no precedent in sutra and tantra. It is relied upon heavily in Kagyu and Nyingma, less so in Gelug, and almost non-existence in Sakya outside of east Tibet.

I never said the tulku system was completely bad, merely that it was rife for opportunity for abuse. I never stated that there were no authentic tulkus, merely that many so called tulkus are tulkus only named for economic reasons or political reasons. ChNN just finished discussing this issue not 15 minutes ago. I have also expressed my doubt about whether this system is appropriate for continuing the teachings in the West.

Sherab Dorje said:

Discussion and questioning (to a reasonable degree) are a valid tool for learning

Malcolm wrote:

That is not what happens in the so called open dharma forum; and as in e-Sangha, the acute skepticism found here tends to spill into other forums. This is why we shuttered the equivalent forum on esangha.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, July 18th, 2014 at 10:47 PM

Title: Re: "Protestant" vs Traditional/"Orthodox" approaches to Dha

Content:

Jikan said:

That's how learning happens. It can be ugly and uncomfortable working with people at the level of their own affliction, and acknowledging and working with one's own affliction under the guidance of a teacher. I'm thankful I've had teachers who are willing to keep prodding me.

Malcolm wrote:

My point is that this forum, the open dharma forum, is not a teacher. It is place where people come and share their own confusion and increase that of others.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, July 18th, 2014 at 9:51 PM

Title: Re: "Protestant" vs Traditional/"Orthodox" approaches to Dha

Content:

Mkoll said:

I will concede that certain points are most certainly adharmic such as outright rejection of: the Buddha's existence, his enlightenment, karma, or rebirth. Someone going on like this on a Buddhist forum is probably trolling. However, polite questions regarding these things coming from a newbie who is clearly amenable to learning and is not here to preach their own adharmic views is different.

Malcolm wrote:

We have a beginners forum for those questions.

Mkoll said:

Also, when you talk of "incorrect presentations of Dharma", we enter another gray area. Each of the traditions has a different presentation of Dharma and who is to decide what is correct or incorrect? Not only that, but each practitioner has their own approach and own perspective.

Malcolm wrote:

Not grey at all. We have different traditions for many reasons, but in general, when it comes to general Mahāyāna, I have no true quibbles with any of the great Mahāyāna traditions, traditional Chan/Zen, Pure Land, etc.; Kagyu, Sakya, Nyingma, Gelug, Jonang, etc.

Mkoll said:

In the end, what you are suggesting is an increase in censorship of those people posting adharmic views, a change in the structure of the forum, and a change in the way moderators do their job. It's not a small change.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, it is pretty easy to see which kinds of arguments are not appropriate in this or that forum. For example, if a Theravadin comes to the general Mahāyāna forum and claims that the Mahāyāna sūtras were not taught by the Buddha, well, this is inappropriate. If a Mahāyāni goes to Dhammawheel for example, and insists that Mahāyāna sūtras be accepted as Buddha's speech, they will be laughed off the forum.

But if you a forum devoted for the sole purpose of debating the very validity of Buddha's teaching, what use does this serve but to further Adharma. For example, the Buddha did advise us to check his teachings the way a goldsmith checks gold, but not because Buddha doubted that what he was teaching was gold. He knew that his teachings were gold. So when we are checking the Buddha's teachings for its "gold content", we are doing so because we want to find gold, not because we want to find pyrite. But the way that kind of forum works is that we begin from a posture of no trust, we assume from the outset that what we are being handed is pyrite, and not gold. We then spend all of our energy in trying to prove this shiny substance in our hand is not gold, and even when we find out it is not pyrite, still we are not sure it is gold. This is the incorrect way of understanding the Buddha's teaching on testing his doctrine like a goldsmith tests gold. Even more to the point, when it comes to Vajrayāna, you had better make damn sure you have already decided the teachings are gold, because after you enter Vajrayāna, if you decide the teachings are not for you, then you can have real problems and obstacles.

Moreover, such a forum just gives a safe haven to those who harbor all sorts of wrong views about the Dharma in general, and Vajrayāna and Mahāyāna in particular. In a free for all zone, no one can prevent someone from slandering Mahāyāna and Vajrayāna. This forum, the "Open" Dharma forum, is just such a haven. While not all the threads in this forum are pernicious, there a great number that are very pernicious for one reason or another. It is because of the nature of the forum that this is so.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, July 18th, 2014 at 9:02 PM

Title: Re: Why do only very few practitioners attain rainbow body?

Content:

ZOOM said:

You just have to do the minimum of training your guru requires & pay your membership fee and your guru will take care that you will be enlightened after death?

Malcolm wrote:

Actually, in Vajrayāna in general, after receiving empowerment, as long as one scrupulously maintains samaya, liberation is guaranteed in seven lifetimes.

ZOOM said:

I mean, it has to be your guru who takes care of it...otherwise people wouldn't believe adamantly that you have to have a guru or you won't attain enlightenment.

Malcolm wrote:

There is no means of entering any Vajrayāna path without a Guru — ergo, no Guru, no path, no awakening by means of that path. That is why the Guhyasamaja Tantra states: The Guru is the Buddha, the Guru is the Sangha, likewise, the Guru is the Sangha, the Guru is great glorious Heruka.

ZOOM said:

Because, you can learn from books as well as you can learn from your guru.

Malcolm wrote:

One cannot receive transmission from a book. Having made an effort to receive transmission and the precious oral instructions which are not contained in any book from the mouth of the Guru, then one can rely on books as a supplement.

ZOOM said:

Many books are compiled out of speeches of gurus and reading those speeches does not lead to a worse learning success than hearing the speeches directly standing in front of the guru.

Malcolm wrote:

First, you must have a connection with the lineage. That means you must have a guru. And even so, quite frankly hearing the teachings directly has the quality of transmission, of being in the same state at the same time as the teacher. You just do not get that with a book. It is much better to have received the reading transmission of the Dharma text you wish to follow so that you have a living connection with that teaching. There are many Dharma texts you really are not allowed to read without such transmission. There are many Dharma texts that have one to one transmissions.

For mantra, it is indispensable to have the reading transmission, in other words, you cannot successfully practice any mantra without first having received the lung, the sole exceptions being the mantras of Avalokiteshvara, Tara, Mañjuśrī, Śakyamuni and some others. But for deities like Vajrayogini, Kalacakra, etc., it is indispensable.

ZOOM said:

And hearing the speeches of the guru is all that most students get concerning their communication with their guru. Only the few who practically live with their guru get more.

Malcolm wrote:

A realized guru's job is to teach through body and voice. For example, everything that a teacher like Chogyal Namkhai Norbu (and HH Dalai Lama, HH Sakya Trizin etc.) does is a teaching, the way he walks, dresses, eats, laughs, smiles, frowns, goes to the bathroom, washes, sleeps, wakes up, i.e., the way he lives and the way he dies.

It is important to make time to spend attending one's guru. But you do not have to spend your life doing so. Even so, serving the guru is an important part of practice, and the fastest, most excellent way to earn merit.

In reality all a guru can do is show one the path. There is nothing a guru can do more than that. There is nothing you can do more than receive their transmission and practice. You practice, and when you have questions, you ask. That's it. His or her job is to give transmission, your job is to apply transmission and realize what they have realized.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, July 18th, 2014 at 7:23 PM

Title: Re: Using the Dharma to Quit Smoking

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

We use the Dharma to stop suffering. Smoking is a kind of suffering. Therefore, one absolutely should use the Dharma to stop smoking.

As to smoking itself -- smoking causes craving which gives rise to addiction. Sensation conditions craving, contact gives rise to sensation.

You must avoid all conditions where you encounter tobacco in any form, and all people who use it. It is also useful to cultivate an extreme aversion to tobacco.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, July 18th, 2014 at 3:18 PM

Title: Re: "Protestant" vs Traditional/"Orthodox" approaches to Dharma

Content:

Mkoll said:

If you don't want to read this kind of stuff, don't read this sub-forum! It's that simple.

Malcolm wrote:

Frankly, I just don't understand why a Dharma practitioner would support a forum devoted to adharma. People are always droning on about "Right Speech" here, but has it not occurred to anyone that incorrect presentations of Dharma is the essence of adharma; that rejecting rebirth is adharma; etc.?

Why would we wish to provide a platform for the promulgation of adharma? It is out of some notion of preserving "free speech"? Adharmic speech is not free, it is binding, it causes bad karma and providing a platform for its promulgation is also a cause of bad karma.

Seriously, I wish people would use their heads a bit more and understand that our thoughts and our words have consequences. What we choose to permit on this forum and what we choose not to, also has consequences. This is why, much to the anger of many, we chose to eliminate "the abandon all hope ye who enter here" forum, the so called debate court.

You really should understand that so called Open Dharma forum is really just an Adharma forum. it should be shuttered.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, July 18th, 2014 at 2:45 PM

Title: Re: "Protestant" vs Traditional/"Orthodox" approaches to Dha

Content:

Alfredo said:

For example, the Dalai Lama has stated that if a Buddhist belief is ever disproven by science (e.g., the flat earth), then the Buddhist thing to do would be to follow science.

Malcolm wrote:

Again, as I pointed out to James, this is really not what HHDL says, which is why I disagreed with the statement, "as written and as presented". But of course people who do not actually read what HHDL says tend to naively present this citation much in the same way as the Kalamas Sutta is naively presented. The source of the citation is The Universe in a Single Atom:

His Holiness, The Dalai Lama said:

My confidence in venturing into science lies in my basic belief that as in science so in Buddhism, understanding the nature of reality is pursued by means of critical investigation: if scientific analysis were conclusively to demonstrate certain claims in Buddhism to be false, then we must accept the findings of science and abandon those claims.

Malcolm wrote:

Dalai Lama (2005-09-13). The Universe in a Single Atom: The Convergence of Science and Spirituality (Kindle Locations 48-50). Crown Publishing Group. Kindle Edition.

This citation comes on the second page of the preface, which is why it is so widely cited. But the context for HHDL's statement is found here:

His Holiness, The Dalai Lama said:

As I see it, science falls within the scope of the first truth in that it examines the material bases of suffering, for it covers the entire spectrum of the physical environment—" the container"— as well as the sentient beings—" the contained." It is in the mental realm—the realm of psychology, consciousness, the afflictions, and karma—that we find the second of the truths, the origin of suffering. The third and fourth truths, cessation and the path, are effectively outside the domain of scientific analysis in that they pertain primarily to what might be called philosophy and religion.

Malcolm wrote:

Dalai Lama (2005-09-13). The Universe in a Single Atom: The Convergence of Science and Spirituality (Kindle Locations 1248-1252). Crown Publishing Group. Kindle Edition.

So you see, the first quote may only be properly understood when it is given its full context, provided later on in the same book. I.e. HHDL is saying that when it comes to things like cosmology, physics and biology, the material basis of suffering, Buddhists should defer to science, as this falls under the rubric of suffering, or in other words, conventional truth of deluded persons. However, the third and fourth truths are part of ultimate truth, and are beyond science, according to HHDL. This leaves the second truth in a funny position. It might seem to some that since HHDL is saying here that the second truth concerns mental phenomena which are under the domain of scientific analysis, but since he clearly states that cessation and the path are beyond the domain of science altogether, this really leaves only psychology within the realm of scientific analysis; karma, affliction and consciousness are outside this domain because these three things are precisely what the third and fourth noble truths are concerned with.

So it is important to understand the citation properly.

Some words by Dungsey Thrinley Norbu are appropriate here:

The reason Buddha did not predominantly teach science is that beings are already attached to materialism and reality, so they can become distracted by material ideas. Instead of only increasing materialism, Buddha taught how to believe in karma, how to develop good karma, and how to purify karma to go beyond karma on the path of enlightenment. Buddha taught beings to have faith in sublime beings because ordinary beings do not know the right direction; they can only know through faith in sublime beings who can show them the correct path. This kind of teaching is so much more powerful than ordinary materialism because it shows how not to create negative karma and how to create positive energy until attaining enlightenment. Spiritual ideas cannot be compared to the material ideas of science, and Buddhist spiritual ideas cannot be changed to accommodate scientific ideas. In Buddhism, the sciences that are taught are never totally material, because they are connected with spirituality, since they are understood to be reflections of the mind and do not deal solely with material existence.

Since modern science generally deals with material existence, people often mistakenly think that it is important for them to know more about it. By miscalculating that a material rather than a spiritual orientation will help them sustain themselves and prosper within their immediate lives, they become more concerned with materialism than with spirituality. This is the antithesis of a spiritual point of view. Since the mind does not end, it is the mind's development of spiritual qualities that is important, and these qualities endure from one life to the next throughout the succession of one's lives. Norbu, Thinley (2011-05-26). A Cascading Waterfall of Nectar (Kindle Locations 3243-3255). Shambhala Publications. Kindle Edition.

OK. I hope this clears that up.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, July 18th, 2014 at 2:16 PM

Title: Re: "Protestant" vs Traditional/"Orthodox" approaches to Dha

Content:

Karma Dorje said:

Why should I tell them they can't hold these views or discuss them?

Malcolm wrote:

We are not telling them that they cannot hold these views or discuss them. They can do both, elsewhere.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, July 18th, 2014 at 2:15 PM

Title: Re: "Protestant" vs Traditional/"Orthodox" approaches to Dha

Content:

smcj said:

Maybe David Snyder should open a third website for secular Buddhists?

Malcolm wrote:

Right, he can call it "Training Wheel: A forum devoted to fingerpainting on Dharmabooks."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, July 18th, 2014 at 2:11 PM

Title: Re: Dharma wheel, ethics, value & online communities

Content:

Dan74 said:

As for presenting 'unadulterated Dharma', the way I see it, this forum is not a master, it is a place of discussion. The forum isn't presenting anything, it is providing a space for people to discuss the Dharma.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, Mahāyāna and Vajrayāna Dharma. Not everything people want to call "Dharma" in order to sell a book, make a buck and gain followers.

Dan74 said:

There would be no consensus on what this 'unadulterated Dharma' constitutes on a number of issues among the many schools that make up this forum,

Malcolm wrote:

This is why we have different fora devoted to traditional Mahāyāna and Vajrayāna SCHOOLS.

Dan74 said:

even if it were desirable to enforce such a thing. But the ethos of the forum, if I understand correctly, is not to be a mouthpiece of someone's take on 'unadulterated Dharma' but a forum for inclusive discussion of the Dharma.

Malcolm wrote:

Much of what passes here for discussion does not merit the appellation "Dharma".

Dan74 said:

What would be desirable, IMO, is for the more experienced and knowledgeable members such as yourself, to share their experience and knowledge, to cite sources and (gently) correct misunderstanding or wrong views when they arise. That's how people learn.

Malcolm wrote:

Dude, it isn't working. That's what FAQs are for.

Dan74 said:

They don't learn by the mods coming down on questions because we are tired of hearing them after decades on the Interwebs. They don't learn if we crush them with our superior attitude and patronising tone (not pointing at you or anyone, but many of us, including myself, have been guilty of it at times). They will just think Buddhism is full of jerks. They will likely not understand the air of exasperation and not even hand-wringing over the direction of the forum.

Malcolm wrote:

I don't crush anyone with superior attitudes. I just answer questions -- but then having to put up oceans of irrelevancy over and over again means that discussions here rarely rise out of the explaining basic concepts to people (who really ought to know better) again and again.

Dan74 said:

What's going to work for the folks who come here with an open mind is a patient sincere generous attitude from more experienced people and for the folks with a closed-mind, well, we should be patient as well - closed mind is not a permanent condition, however, they should be kept within the ToS so as not to disrupt the flow of discussion and recurring themes/memes can be amalgamated so as not to clog up the forum, IMO. Of course, you know all this.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, it is not happening. We have people in the Dzogchen forum again questioning why a Guru is needed for Dzogchen, etc., when by now it should be %$^#%^& axiomatic in Dzogchen and Vajrayāna that this is indispensable. There are many more interesting questions that could be answered, if we were not constantly having to deal with argumentative naifs who disrupt fora after fora, conversation after conversation, even the ones they themselves start.

Dan74 said:

But do you have concrete suggestions, Malcolm? Do you think posts that question certain tenets have no place on the forum?

Malcolm wrote:

Of course that is what I think.

Dan74 said:

Do I understand you correctly? So Batchelor goes, IMS probably goes, a bunch of Zen teachers like Nishijima, Brad Warner, certainly Nonin, who believes in impermanent Buddhahood, maybe a whole lot more who at one time or another have said something heterodox, maybe Ajahn Sumedho, because he generally talks of rebirth in the present moment context?

Malcolm wrote:

There are whole forums devoted to Bathchelor, the secularized brand of Vipassana IMS promulgates, Warner, Nonin and so on. What use is bringing all that here?

Dan74 said:

To me as a Seon practitioner this preoccupation with perfect doctrine is putting the cart before the horse. AFAIAC, our view should be right as much as is necessary for practice, everything else can actually be counterproductive, clogging up the mind with more proliferations, expectations, creating more divisions, aversions, cravings, etc. KISS and learn things as you go, on a need to know basis. But I know that this view is not necessarily shared by other schools. Maybe I should push to close all those 'unnecessary' threads that detract people from practice and mold the forum to be sparse and minimalist like a Zen monastery? I don't think so. Different strokes for different folks and I am glad it's like this.

Malcolm wrote:

This is supposed to be a forum devoted to MAHAYANA and VAJRAYANA, but over and over again, we cannot even lift the conversation out of arguments about rebirth, karma, and so on. When was there a substantive conversation about the bodhisattva path that was not disrupted almost immediately by someone who wants to go and revision the Buddha's Dharma? Honestly, it is a problem. Generally speaking, the most successful conversations here are rarely about Dharma, but rather worldly topics like peak oil, politics, and these sorts of things.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, July 18th, 2014 at 1:55 PM

Title: Re: Dharma wheel, ethics, value & online communities

Content:

Son of Buddha said:

You say there is no place for secular buddhism on this forum, are you advocating the ban of secular buddhists and or secular buddhist discussions?

Didn't you yourself have untraditional views not more than a month ago?

It seems to many people want to be the sanctioned dharma police.

Malcolm wrote:

There is no such a thing as Secular Mahāyāna. How could there be?

Eliminating secular buddhism from this forum would not have any negative effect on the forum, and a very salutary effect. There are plenty of places on the internet where people of such persuasions can theorize and proliferate to their little heart's content about the children of barren women (i.e. the result of so-called secular buddhism).

How can a forum supposedly devoted to MAHAYANA and VAJRAYANA even put up with such nonsense?

As far as my decision to abandon the western text critical approach to the history of Mahāyāna sūtras, that has been a long time coming. I finally realized that giving credence to the whole edifice of western text criticism which is based on unfounded theories and speculations was nonvirtuous and harmful to my practice as well as that of others. But if you carefully examine the content of my posts over many years, you will see that I have always emphasized a so-called traditional approach to Dharma explanation, teaching and practice.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, July 18th, 2014 at 1:41 PM

Title: Re: Why do only very few practitioners attain rainbow body?

Content:

Ivo said:

...because the Guru is just our own twisted samsaric perception of the buddha nature. He/she is as external, or internal, as you want him/her to be, but never absolutely so.

ZOOM said:

I agree with your view.

Good insight into the true meaning of the guru!

Malcolm wrote:

The Dzogchen point of view of about gurus is taught in The Magical Dimension of Sound Tantra, the root tantra of all Dzogchen teachings:

Gurus of perfect characteristics are the source of all qualities,

the ones who sustain the basis of perfect awakening.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, July 18th, 2014 at 12:43 PM

Title: Re: "Protestant" vs Traditional/"Orthodox" approaches to Dha

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

E-sangha had such a forum once, we closed it because in fact it just became a source of constant attacks on the Dharma, like we see occurring here time and time again. The whole idea that there is an "open" Dharma is completely wrong-headed. This forum should actually be shuttered.

Alfredo said:

What I hear you saying is that, as a fundamentalist / traditionalist, you are offended by modernist interpretations of Buddhism, and feel they should be banned from the site, or at least made to wear a funny hat.

Karma Dorje said:

There is no monolithic "fundamentalist/traditionalist" viewpoint. What is being suggested is that in a board dedicated to Mahayana and Vajrayana, each of the traditions comprised under this rubric should be evaluated and respected on its own terms. Pure Land schools should be respected according their own scriptures and modes of interpretation. Zen, Chan, Nichiren, etc. should similarly be respected as those who uphold each of these traditions represents.

Nyingmas should not come here to try to undercut Gelukpa points of view and vice versa. How can one construe this as a monolithic position and equate it with a Buddhist Taliban as has been done on other threads? What the traditionalists have been suggesting is that the only way to respect the plethora of Buddhist traditions is respect the viewpoints grounded in the traditions of each in the respective forums. This so-called Buddhist modernism is really a way of dismissing all of the Buddhist traditions and replacing them with a Rorschach blot of quasi-scientific speculation. There is no lineage for this, there are no scriptures and there is no dharma of realization. It's simply discursiveness and idle chatter.

One can't go onto a medical forum and just make stuff up according to one's own viewpoint. One would quite rightly be called a quack and a nuisance and be banned in short order. I have no problem with a separate Skeptical Buddhism forum dedicated to these issues. I have a huge problem with having to read topic after topic where conversation degenerates to this lowest common denominator of belief argued by those interlocutors with the least grounding in scripture and meditative training and the least openness to what the traditional perspectives have to offer.

Mkoll said:

The threads you're describing, including this one, are in the Open Dharma sub-forum. I'll copy-paste the description of it below, with my own emphasis added:

No holds barred discussion on the Buddhadharma. Argue about rebirth, karma, commentarial interpretations etc. Be nice to each other.
If you don't want to read this kind of stuff, don't read this sub-forum! It's that simple.

Now, I could understand a gripe about threads being in the wrong sub-forum. But looking through them briefly, I don't see any polemical threads that stand out. The mods do a good job of sequestering that kind of stuff here. And if you have a problem with where a thread is, maybe you can contact a mod about it.

~~~

TLDR: Complaints about the no holds barred discussion, argument about rebirth, kamma, etc., or "untraditionalist" views in the Open Dharma forum are unwarranted.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, July 18th, 2014 at 12:36 PM

Title: Re: Dharma & Science

Content:

Motova said:

It doesn't matter, science won't go away. You might as well make the best of it. I never said the terrible shit stopped.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, we work with circumstances as best we can. But it does not mean we remain passive and silent.

Motova said:

Are any of us going to have a serious impact on scientific theory or method in our lives? Unlikely. You can yell as loud as you want. I'm not saying I will have any impact, but it's a means of relieving suffering and supporting the Dharma. If it's here to stay, why not use it? That's what it comes down to. I can still achieve enlightenment while using science as a means to acquire merit, there's nothing wrong with it if you do it skillfully. If I had been born in Asia maybe I could have been a monk, a thangka painter or sculptor. But that's not really in the cards now.

Malcolm wrote:

Motova, you seriously misunderstand my point. My point is solely that it becomes a problem for practitioners and for Dharma in general when people who are nominally "buddhists" take refuge science rather than Dharma. There are a lot of negative consequences one could list. We can start with most obvious one, the denial, of rebirth, which the Buddha clearly defines as a wrong view.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, July 18th, 2014 at 12:15 PM

Title: Re: Dharma wheel, ethics, value & online communities

Content:

David N. Snyder said:

As a discussion forum get fairly large, there is bound to be a diverse set of views. There will be some who want a hard-line certain Dharma-view / their interpretation only, some that will want something more toward a secular view, etc. And that is fine as long as everyone is cordial. Here and at Dhamma Wheel too, we sometimes get complaints that we are allowing too many secular views to be expressed. And then we also get complaints from the opposite side that we are being Dharma-police and not allowing other views and interpretations.

Malcolm wrote:

Hi David:

I guess, speaking as a traditionalist, there really isn't room for views of Dharma in a forum that imagines itself dedicated to Mahāyāna and Vajrayāna that are not grounded in the tradition itself. This is especially true of a Vajrayāna forum where the lineage and lineage explanations absolutely vital. But beyond that, like the point I made in another thread, Mahāyāna and Vajrayāna, like the Śrāvaka schools, are grounded in hearing, reflection and cultivation, i.e. the three prajñās, whereas the so called "secular Buddhism" is just based on an intellectual interpretation of Dharma that is not grounded in the three prajñās. Instead it is based on the three vikalpas [conceptualities] reading, proliferation and attachment to views. Really, in a forum dedicated to Mahāyāna and Vajrayāna, there should be no place at all for so called "Secular Buddhism". Why? Because there is no Dharma in "Secular Buddhism".

Dan74 said:

Forgive me if I am getting this wrong, Malcolm, but weren't you espousing quite a different approach not that long ago to the point of rejecting the label "Buddhist"? I wasn't following closely, so I may be getting this wrong. But if not, I am glad you weren't booted out of the place. We all go through changes, our views change, positions change, it is sensible, IMO, to not allow the board to be derailed or overtaken by modern/divergent interpretations but ban them altogether? I don't think so. It would not be the compassionate thing to do, even if one were certain the view is wrong. And how many of us truly have this certainty about all our current positions?

Malcolm wrote:

I follow Dharma. not "Buddhism", precisely for the reason that I do not not think everything called "buddhism" these days is Dharma. That is part of my discarding the label "buddhist" that many people ignored, though i made it plain at the time.

The compassionate thing to do is to present unadulterated Dharma for those who are interested. That is necessarily based on hearing the dharma from realized lineage teachers, and studying authentic teachings of the Buddha, which here, on this forum, also includes Mahayana sutras and tantras and treating them with proper respect., as well as the treatises of the sublime masters of India, Tibet, China, Korea and Japan.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, July 18th, 2014 at 12:05 PM

Title: Re: Why do only very few practitioners attain rainbow body?

Content:

Ivo said:

Zoom, you have some very valid points. I don't know why no one is explaining here that the attainment of the rainbow body is generally a product of the very special practice of Togyal - a practice which requires much effort and which, in order to be brought to this particular conclusion needs to be done in strict retreat. Very few practitioners are actively and seriously engaged in Thogyal at this point in time. The rainbow body does not result from regular contemplation/resting in Rikpa, even if this is authentic. Other attainments result from that and they are described very extensively in the Dzogchen literature.

And, strictly speaking, the Guru does not do it for you, in the bardo or anywhere else, because the Guru is just our own twisted samsaric perception of the buddha nature. He/she is as external, or internal, as you want him/her to be, but never absolutely so.

Malcolm wrote:

It is easier to bring it conclusion in the bardo.

Of course, having met a path, it is up to you follow, as the Buddha said "i cannot wash away your misdeeds with water, nor remove your suffering with my hand, but i can show you the path to liberation."

Nevertheless, without a realized teacher of Dzogchen, it is difficult to make any progress on the path Of Dzogchen. If one does not have confidence that one's teacher is really a buddha, well, one will not make much progress on the path no matter how much one practices this or that technique.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, July 18th, 2014 at 8:39 AM

Title: Re: Dharma & Science

Content:

Motova said:

It doesn't matter, science won't go away. You might as well make the best of it. I never said the terrible shit stopped.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, we work with circumstances as best we can. But it does not mean we remain passive and silent.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, July 18th, 2014 at 8:34 AM

Title: Re: "Protestant" vs Traditional/"Orthodox" approaches to Dha

Content:

Alfredo said:

What I hear you saying is that, as a fundamentalist / traditionalist, you are offended by modernist interpretations of Buddhism, and feel they should be banned from the site, or at least made to wear a funny hat.

Malcolm wrote:

I am not offended by them, I pity those who hold them. But I feel that their confusion has many other places where it can be spread, and does not need to be coddled here.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, July 18th, 2014 at 8:31 AM

Title: Re: Why do only very few practitioners attain rainbow body?

Content:

ZOOM said:

Is the answer that you have to be the member of an old Dzogchen lineage or that you have to be the student of an accomplished Dzogchen teacher?

No, because if that was the reason then every member of an old Dzogchen lineage or every student of an accomplished Dzogchen teacher would attain rainbow body.

But this is not the case.[/u][b]

Malcolm wrote:

Every practitioner that I know who follows an authentic teacher will attain total realization either in this life, the bardo or in the natural nirmanakāya buddhafiels.

This is what my teachers state, this is what the tradition states.

And yes, you need to be the student of a realized master.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, July 18th, 2014 at 8:28 AM

Title: Re: Why do only very few practitioners attain rainbow body?

Content:

ZOOM said:

Yes, and the only way to know if someone is approaching or attaining enlightenment are visible signs as those I was already talking about.

Malcolm wrote:

That is not the only way to know whether someone is approaching or has attained awakening.

Such signs are actually for those who lack faith and require miracles.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, July 18th, 2014 at 8:23 AM

Title: Re: Dharma & Science

Content:

Motova said:

How would you improve science Malcolm (the theory, goal and method)?

If scientific development were up to you, would you just halt it?

Malcolm wrote:

If it were up to me, I would regulate scientific research in accordance with Dharma ethics.

The point here is that science is not an activity carried out by awakened people, which is why so much of it is perverted.

But what I am really talking about is the pervasive tendency to subordinate Dharma to science that we see in so many practitioners.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, July 18th, 2014 at 7:56 AM

Title: Re: Dharma wheel, ethics, value & online communities

Content:

David N. Snyder said:

As a discussion forum get fairly large, there is bound to be a diverse set of views. There will be some who want a hard-line certain Dharma-view / their interpretation only, some that will want something more toward a secular view, etc. And that is fine as long as everyone is cordial. Here and at Dhamma Wheel too, we sometimes get complaints that we are allowing too many secular views to be expressed. And then we also get complaints from the opposite side that we are being Dharma-police and not allowing other views and interpretations.

Malcolm wrote:

Hi David:

I guess, speaking as a traditionalist, there really isn't room for views of Dharma in a forum that imagines itself dedicated to Mahāyāna and Vajrayāna that are not grounded in the tradition itself. This is especially true of a Vajrayāna forum where the lineage and lineage explanations absolutely vital. But beyond that, like the point I made in another thread, Mahāyāna and Vajrayāna, like the Śrāvaka schools, are grounded in hearing, reflection and cultivation, i.e. the three prajñās, whereas the so called "secular Buddhism" is just based on an intellectual interpretation of Dharma that is not grounded in the three prajñās. Instead it is based on the three vikalpas [conceptualities] reading, proliferation and attachment to views. Really, in a forum dedicated to Mahāyāna and Vajrayāna, there should be no place at all for so called "Secular Buddhism". Why? Because there is no Dharma in "Secular Buddhism".

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, July 18th, 2014 at 7:39 AM

Title: Re: Why do only very few practitioners attain rainbow body?

Content:

ZOOM said:

Visible results are the name of the game.

Malcolm wrote:

No, not really. The name of the game is waking up, attaining buddhahood for the benefit of all sentient beings. It does not matter much if it happens in this life, the bardo or the next life.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, July 18th, 2014 at 7:37 AM

Title: Re: Why do only very few practitioners attain rainbow body?

Content:

ZOOM said:

books or gurus!

Malcolm wrote:

The way things work in Vajrayāna Dharma is that we do not make assertions about the teachings unless they are backed up in the words of the Buddha, which are found in Dzogchen and other kinds of tantras.

A guru is indispensable in Dzogchen teachings, as well as all other Vajrayāna teachings. Without a guru, there is no path. Without a path, there is no result, much less rainbow body. Without a Guru we cannot receive the transmissions for the books in which Dzogchen teachings are recorded. So a Guru is indispensable as the root of the path.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, July 18th, 2014 at 6:51 AM

Title: Re: "Protestant" vs Traditional/"Orthodox" approaches to Dha

Content:

Alfredo said:

It seems to me that what we're talking about here is not an issue of Protestant Buddhism, but of a clash between fundamentalist and modernist approaches to Buddhism.

Malcolm wrote:

There is no modernist approach to Dharma. If it is not traditional, i.e., based on hearing the teachings from qualified masters, like a seal and its imprint, it really isn't Dharma at all.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, July 18th, 2014 at 6:44 AM

Title: Re: Why do only very few practitioners attain rainbow body?

Content:

Punya said:

waking up in the bardo do as well? (but not saying that's easy).

Malcolm wrote:

Achieving Buddhahood in the bardo is much easier than in this life. Why? It is because in the bardo state we have seven times more clarity. Buddha Vajrasattva states in the Victor's Speech Tantra

After that, in the bardo of rebirth the present unobstructed awareness with complete sense organs has seven times more clarity.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, July 18th, 2014 at 6:28 AM

Title: Re: Why do only very few practitioners attain rainbow body?

Content:

ZOOM said:

The only Dzogchen practitioners we can be sure that they achieved something meaningful at all in their training are those attaining rainbow body during life or at death.

Malcolm wrote:

I think you really need to study the teachings a bit more before making such confidence pronouncements.

All these grades of practitioners are described in detail by the Buddha in such tantras as the Self-Arisen Vidya Tantra and so on, where the whole process is very precisely described, how many days they remain in the bardo of dharmatā, how many emanations they will have after achieving liberation in the bardo and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, July 18th, 2014 at 6:19 AM

Title: Re: Is Western Buddhism an (ethnic) identity-based Buddhism?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

It makes sense when discussing people with affinities for Tibetan Buddhism. The Chinese started suppressing Buddhism right way, it reached the height of suppression between 1959-1968, then was suppressed until the early 80's. Meanwhile the refugee community in India was really in dire straights, so many people who were Tibetan practitioners in their past life, such as myself, were born into western families so we could meet the Dharma again with freedom and endowment to practice.

Mkoll said:

So are you claiming to recollect your past life as a Tibetan practitioner, Malcolm?

Malcolm wrote:

Nope, but I am sure it is the case for many, many reasons I won't bore you with. Suffice it to say, in my last lifetime, I was a practitioner from the Derge region of Eastern Tibet. Educated in Sakya, practitioner of Dzogchen, just like now.

I will share with you however that when I was in Central Tibet, I had past life memories, not very precise in detail, but vivid. This is when we were on our way to Samye and being in Samye. I remembered the place. Not Deja vu, something much stronger. Most specifiially I remembered how the mountains looked in the Yarlung Valley, among other things.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, July 18th, 2014 at 6:13 AM

Title: Re: Is Western Buddhism an (ethnic) identity-based Buddhism?

Content:

Nemo said:

Chinese invade Tibet in 1950, give the reincarnated 20 years to grow up in the West. Western Tibetan Buddhism should start flourishing in the 1970's with a huge influx of new students but by 1980 that should start slowing down to a trickle. Now they would likely be born in Asia. It is quite possible that Tibetan Buddhist centres will become museums when that initial influx starts passing on in another 30 years. I don't think many Sanghas will be growing now unless they are selling something that is not genuine Dharma.

Perhaps my reincarnation based identity theory is too Buddhist for some.

uan said:

Is that how rebirth in Buddhism works? I don't know if it's too Buddhist for some, or not Buddhadharma at all.

Mkoll said:
I'd go with the latter.

Malcolm wrote:

It makes sense when discussing people with affinities for Tibetan Buddhism. The Chinese started suppressing Buddhism right way, it reached the height of suppression between 1959-1968, then was suppressed until the early 80's. Meanwhile the refugee community in India was really in dire straights, so many people who were Tibetan practitioners in their past life, such as myself, were born into western families so we could meet the Dharma again with freedom and endowment to practice. And yes, I was definitely a Tibetan practitioner for many lifetimes.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, July 18th, 2014 at 5:42 AM

Title: Re: "Protestant" vs Traditional/"Orthodox" approaches to Dha

Content:

uan said:

The question is, how would someone in the West know a translation or interpretation is wrong? They need to rely on the translators, but which one? Places like DW provide a place where the translations can be held up in the light of day to by people with the knowledge of Dharma from the source(s) and of the West, and who can provide a lingua franca for better understanding.

Malcolm wrote:

Again, those of us who are in the Dharma must emphasize to interested newcomers the essential import of engaging in the three prajñās of hearing, reflection and cultivation. There is no prajñā identified as "reading".

In order to hear the Dharma one must go to a qualified kalayānamitra [lit. good friend], a virtuous mentor, and begin the process of hearing the Dharma.

As I stated above, Dharma is a Aural Lineage. The Aural, or Hearing lineage, is much more important, relatively speaking, than the texts. The texts must be understood on the basis of the hearing the Dharma taught by a qualified teacher. Without that essential act of hearing the Dharma taught by a living, qualified teacher, one's understanding of the Dharma is sure to be bent askew right from the start.

Once we decide to rely on a qualified mentor, then we will be able to know when our own or other's understanding of the Dharma is correct or incorrect.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, July 18th, 2014 at 5:37 AM

Title: Re: "Protestant" vs Traditional/"Orthodox" approaches to Dha

Content:

Kim O'Hara said:

I think we only have two choices: we can try to go back to the past (or stay in it, like the Amish) or we can tackle the messy but stimulating process of working out an approach to the dharma which adapts to, and benefits people in, the society we live in. We will just have to do our best not to lose or distort anything essential.

Kim

Malcolm wrote:

It is really simple — you find an awakened teacher, you respectfully ask for teachings. You apply them. If you have extra time in your life, then you also study a lot. If you don't, you mainly focus on practice.

But Dharma is not something that is "worked out" — it is essentially a tradition grounded in hearing. You cannot learn Dharma from books. It must be heard. Then you apply it. This is the only proper way to approach the Dharma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, July 18th, 2014 at 5:16 AM

Title: Re: Why do only very few practitioners attain rainbow body?

Content:

ngodrup said:

How many dzogchen yogis are free of the eight worldly concerns and spend a significant portion of their life in solitary retreat?

Malcolm wrote:

The same could be said of many so called "Dzogchen teachers".

Anyway, whether your corpse shrinks or you wake up in the bardo, your body still reverts to the five lights of pure consciousness [ye shes].

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, July 18th, 2014 at 5:03 AM

Title: Re: Dharma & Science

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

My hearing of of the Dharma would depend very much on where I was born. The fact that I have entered the Dharma in this life at an early age pretty much guarantees I was a Buddhist for a long time, in many life times.

Emakirikiri said:

On this note it's said that Dzogchen practitioners of average capacity that do not recognise in the bardo of dharmata are then transferred to the five Pure Lands and attain Enlightenment. Does this mean that we were less than average Dzogchen practitioners in our past lives or that this is the first time we have properly entered into Dzogchen in our continuum?

Malcolm wrote:

Capacity here is related to diligence, that's all.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, July 18th, 2014 at 4:42 AM

Title: Re: Why do only very few practitioners attain rainbow body?

Content:

ZOOM said:

Why do only very few Dzogchen practitioners attain rainbow body compared to the high number of Dzogchen practitioners in the world?

Malcolm wrote:

There are 21 types of capacities of practitioners. Only the best of the best attain great transference body, i.e., rainbow body in this life. Virtually all others attain it in the bardo, or failing that, in a pure nirmanakāya buddhafield.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, July 18th, 2014 at 4:08 AM

Title: Re: Dharma & Science

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Science, in its present iteration, is reductive and destructive.

Science is clearly not a panacea, has actually done nothing to remove the total amount of suffering in the world [in fact it has increased it substantially] and so on.

catmoon said:

What a perfectly ridiculous thing to say. Without scientific advances you'd be illiterate, diseased, and have a life expectancy of 28 years. You would never have heard of the Dharma or Buddha either.

Malcolm wrote:

Even with scientific "advances" people are still illiterate, have short life spans, and suffering from many diseases that did not exist even 100 years ago.

BTW, most life expectancy stats are factor in infant mortality — remove that, and we still tend to live into our 70s and 80s. After all Buddha lived to be 80, and that was not considered unusual at all.

My hearing of of the Dharma would depend very much on where I was born. The fact that I have entered the Dharma in this life at an early age pretty much guarantees I was a Buddhist for a long time, in many life times.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, July 17th, 2014 at 7:20 PM

Title: Re: "Protestant" vs Traditional/"Orthodox" approaches to Dha

Content:

Kim O'Hara said:

Hi, Sherlock,

I'm not going to disagree (not yet, anyway! ) but do you distinguish between approaches coming from Protestantism as opposed to the scientific method as opposed to historical research techniques as opposed to the (European) Enlightenment philosophical tradition and, if so, how?

Kim

Malcolm wrote:

They are all of a piece.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, July 16th, 2014 at 11:58 PM

Title: Re: Complete Tegal Instruction in Unrestricted New Book

Content:

Crazywisdom said:

I'm sure she will find the teachings again.

Malcolm wrote:

Then why paint such a condemning picture?

Crazywisdom said:

Her students will not. She received Longchen Nyingthig. Her students received Earth Visions.

Malcolm wrote:

I really don't think they have many students.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, July 16th, 2014 at 10:33 PM

Title: Re: Complete Tegal Instruction in Unrestricted New Book

Content:

Crazywisdom said:

I'm sure she will find the teachings again.

Malcolm wrote:

Then why paint such a condemning picture?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, July 16th, 2014 at 8:39 PM

Title: Re: Direct introduction and purification of the 6 lokas

Content:

frank123 said:

If Rinpoche gives the lung for the 6 lokas at the end of the upcoming Massachusetts retreat will one be able to practice the 6 lokas and incorporate Vajrasattva into the practice? or is Vajrasattva with six lokas part of the Longsal Ngondro only and need the specific lung? Apologies if it sounds like I'm repeating myself.

Malcolm wrote:

The Longsal Ngondro is something very specific, it is not the same thing as the retreat he gave recently, though in essence it is the same.

frank123 said:

I was studying the Paris retreat from 2006 where the 6 lokas incorporates Vajrasattva. So would a 6 lokas lung be suffice to do the practice from this retreat?

Malcolm wrote:

No Idea. At this point you really need to ask the boss.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, July 16th, 2014 at 8:35 PM

Title: Re: Complete Total Instruction in Unrestricted New Book

Content:

Crazywisdom said:

No. They did not. They completely misunderstood the teachings. They might have seen bindus but they did not understand the part about not conceptualizing them and not concretizing or universalizing them.

Malcolm wrote:

Do you know them personally, or are you basing your opinion merely off of their books? Also, doesn't it strike you as a bit unkind to refer to Rachel Olds in such a condemning way? Speaking strictly for myself I would prefer to think that she will take a human birth again, in a Dharma family.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, July 16th, 2014 at 8:32 PM

Title: Re: Complete Tegal Instruction in Unrestricted New Book

Content:

Crazywisdom said:

She's going to go into the bardo thinking she's supposed to see "essence... nothing, not nothing" When she sees the deities, she'll freak out and be in hell.

Malcolm wrote:

I don't think so. She understood what chos nyid mngon gsum was well enough, this alone is enough to prevent rebirth in lower realms forever.

Crazywisdom said:

That might be the case for someone who doesn't misrepresent dharma and teach a bastardized path. Chos nyid mngon gsum is only path of application. Even a first bhumi bodhisattva can be reborn in hell, like when The Bodhisattva killed the boatman. And that was considered a righteous killing.

Malcolm wrote:

As ChNN states, again and again, whoever has the experience of chos nyid mngon gsum will never take rebirth in lower realms again, cf. sgra thal gyur tantra.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, July 16th, 2014 at 8:16 PM

Title: Re: Dharma & Science

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Afflicted people make guns. Afflicted people do science. See the problem? It is the one I have been talking about.

Mkoll said:

And afflicted people practice Buddhism.

I don't see the problem.

Malcolm wrote:

The difference is when they practice the path. Unlike all other phenomena, the path, while conditioned, is unafflicted. Why? Because it comes from the wisdom of awakened people and, at least in Vajrayāna, is transmitted by awakened people. Science, on the other hand, is afflicted knowledge transmitted by afflicted people about afflictive phenomena.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, July 16th, 2014 at 8:10 PM

Title: Re: Dharma & Science

Content:

Dan74 said:

Are you suggesting we ban science?

Malcolm wrote:

Of course not, Dan. What I am pointing out, all other distractions aside, is that the benefits of science are not nearly as great as some of its enthusiasts imagine, that in fact there are long range harmful effects of our present, scientific industrial culture. What I am also suggesting the reason for this is that science is not derived from wisdom.

But this is not even the main point — the main point is that science is taken as more authoritative than Dharma. For example, Wayfarer constantly refers to a scientist to defend rebirth (without notable success), not masters like Nāgārjuna and so on. Perhaps he feels that people are more likely to listen to a scientist than an ancient masters?

Amazingly, I see more impassioned defense of science here than Dharma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, July 16th, 2014 at 7:08 PM

Title: Re: Dharma & Science

Content:

TRC said:

Science and Technology aren't the problem. Greed, hatred and delusion are the problem. Stop blaming Science!

Malcolm wrote:

Right, guns are not the problem, it's people. You really do need to read In Absence of the Sacred.

Mkoll said:

Who makes the guns? People.

Why do people make guns? Defilement.

That's not to say guns aren't a problem, but they aren't the root of the problem.

Malcolm wrote:

Afflicted people make guns. Afflicted people do science. See the problem? It is the one I have been talking about.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, July 16th, 2014 at 9:17 AM

Title: Re: Dharma & Science

Content:

TRC said:

Science and Technology aren't the problem. Greed, hatred and delusion are the problem. Stop blaming Science!

Malcolm wrote:

Right, guns are not the problem, it's people. You really do need to read In Absence of the Sacred.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, July 16th, 2014 at 9:16 AM

Title: Re: Dharma & Science

Content:

Dan74 said:

That said, there will always be individuals in all walks of life who don't care about anything and anyone other than themselves and who can work with no regard to ethical consequences of their work. My impression is that they are a tiny fringe, generally hidden in some secret military laboratories and every scientists I've had dealings with has been very conscious of the big picture.

Malcolm wrote:

I would argue that on the contrary, it is institutionalized and wide spread. As you say "corporate sociopathy".

Dan74 said:

But going after science because its discoveries has been misused is pretty pointless and misguided, I think. We should go after the polluters, the governments that don't protect our interests and the natural heritage that we should be custodians of, rather than destroyers. We should go after the culture of consumerism and corporate sociopathy. Science is knowledge and sure enough knowledge can be a dangerous thing. But the genie is out of the bottle and there is no use trying to shove it back in or throw stones. Best to be constructive and learn to use it wisely.

Malcolm wrote:

Another "people kill people" argument.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, July 16th, 2014 at 6:23 AM

Title: Re: Complete Total Instruction in Unrestricted New Book

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

She understood what chos nyid mngon gsum was well enough...

dzogchungpa said:
Just out of curiosity, how do you know that?

Malcolm wrote:
Because they received the teachings, and knew what they meant.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Wednesday, July 16th, 2014 at 5:40 AM
Title: Re: Dharma & Science
Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:
It's not your forum, and not your call to interpret how that rule gets implemented. I'm willing to listen to concrete complaints personally, but mostly what I have is general hand-wringing from a small group of users who feel that DW somehow is "attacking them" on both sides of the debate due to simply not seeing the larger picture.

Malcolm wrote:
Did I ever say DW was attacking me? No, never.

What I said was the DW does not live up to its advertising as a forum for Mahāyāna and Vajrayāna. One assumes that means that Mahāyāna and Vajrayāna should be the main focus of conversation, not endless reruns with the same people who deny rebirth, who insist that Dharma must conform to science and so on.

Johnny Dangerous said:
There are endless reruns of all sorts of conversations on here, what do you expect, a Mahayana loyalty pledge? Do you expect us to actively censor heterodox views that don't break the ToS?

Malcolm wrote:
I think you ought to be a forum for Mahāyāna and Vajrayāna as you claim to be. Instead it is "Buddhism is whatever the hell I think it is" quite often.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Wednesday, July 16th, 2014 at 5:29 AM
Title: Re: Dharma & Science
Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:
It's not your forum, and not your call to interpret how that rule gets implemented. I'm willing to listen to concrete complaints personally, but mostly what I have is general hand-wringing from a small group of users who feel that DW somehow is "attacking them" on both sides of the debate due to simply not seeing the larger picture.

Malcolm wrote:

Did I ever say DW was attacking me? No, never.

What I said was the DW does not live up to its advertising as a forum for Mahāyāna and Vajrayāna. One assumes that means that Mahāyāna and Vajrayāna should be the main focus of conversation, not endless reruns with the same people who deny rebirth, who insist that Dharma must conform to science and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, July 16th, 2014 at 5:23 AM

Title: Re: Direct introduction and purification of the 6 lokas

Content:

frank123 said:

If Rinpoche gives the lung for the 6 lokas at the end of the upcoming Massachusetts retreat will one be able to practice the 6 lokas and incorporate Vajrasattva into the practice? or is Vajrasattva with six lokas part of the Longsal Ngondro only and need the specific lung? Apologies if it sounds like i'm repeating myself.

Malcolm wrote:

The Longsal Ngondro is something very specific, it is not the same thing as the retreat he gave recently, though in essence it is the same.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, July 16th, 2014 at 5:17 AM

Title: Re: Dharma & Science

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

With regard to the problems and conflicts between science and Dharma, science is not a wisdom tradition, its practitioners not necessarily wise. We can understand that this because it is technology, which we all understand to be a product of science [after all, how often have I been chided in the past two days for using technology while criticizing science as the be all and end all?] that has plunged this world into a human-made crisis of epic proportions, a fact which no one seems willing to acknowledge. Somehow, we are supposed to imagine that science in its own little unassailable domain, exempt from criticism because of its touted "benefits". Dharma on the other hand, is also assigned its domain, restricted to moral issues, but when it comes down to things like the four or five elements, etc., we are supposed to dismiss these as archaic, obsolete, "unscientific" doctrines.

Dan for example, says "...are we to blame Tibetan herbs because they can be harmful if used incorrectly?" Gee Dan, you are making a perfect argument for the NRA, since after all, it is people that kill people and not guns. As I pointed out already, most of the ills of the world today, the pollution, the over-population, the manufactured toxins in our environment, GMO crops, the extinction crisis, etc., are all a result of science that is not guided by wisdom. These days, most people understand that the proliferation of guns is not a good thing. Why is it so hard for these same people to understand that at present, in the hand of confused people science is more dangerous than any gun.

Science and Dharma should not be kept in their own domains, on the contrary, science should be subordinate to Dharma, that is to say, a follower of Dharma needs to evaluate science and technology according to its impact on the world. This is rarely done in any systematic way, and this is largely because the moral fiber and wisdom of the world-wide Post-Industrial Civilization is very weak.

Beyond this are the obvious tensions between science and Dharma that have already been pointed out.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, July 16th, 2014 at 4:45 AM

Title: Re: Dharma & Science

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

there will continue to be a "secular Buddhism".

Malcolm wrote:

We should not even have to put up with this for one second. Supposedly this forum is "...on Mahayana and Vajrayana Buddhism". I don't see where "Secular Buddhism" even has a place here at all. They have their own forums, named as such.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, July 16th, 2014 at 4:31 AM

Title: Re: Dharma & Science

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

My own experience of things is that the rhetoric on this has gotten to a place where it's creating it's own vortex of malaise, bad feelings, and general back-and forth about who is properly Buddhist and who is not. While I have my own opinion about the arguments themselves, I hope those of you going polemic about this on either will periodically question what level of this kind of debate is actually beneficial, and if and when it reaches a point of dragging things here downhill.

Malcolm wrote:

It has reached the point where the ability to talk here is stymied by two things) 1) constant referral to the Pali Canon when in fact discourse should be grounded in Mahāyāna and Vajrayāna texts 2) the inability to conduct a conversation about Mahāyāna and Vajrayāna without it being sidetracked by skeptics. These two facts have lead to an exodus of more traditionally minded users, if you haven't noticed. The third issue is that people who really have no idea what they are talking about are allowed to waffle on and one for months without being curbed.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, July 16th, 2014 at 4:16 AM

Title: Re: Complete Tegal Instruction in Unrestricted New Book

Content:

Crazywisdom said:

She's going to go into the bardo thinking she's supposed to see "essence... nothing, not nothing" When she sees the deities, she'll freak out and be in hell.

Malcolm wrote:

I don't think so. She understood what chos nyid mngon gsum was well enough, this alone is enough to prevent rebirth in lower realms forever.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, July 16th, 2014 at 1:17 AM

Title: Re: Dharma & Science

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

But here, on DW, it really seems that the general tone of this board is that where Buddhadharma is contradicted by "Science", well, this is what we have to follow.

Mkoll said:

Your perception of the "general tone of this board" is based on the personal outspoken views of whatever select members you have in mind.

"We" don't have to follow anything of the sort.

Malcolm wrote:

Basically, it is really simple — whenever someone posts something about some traditional topic, be it authorship of Mahāyāna, etc., by far and away the consensus always comes down in favor of secular scholarship. Someone recently suggested that the TOS of the board be changed from: Do not be disruptive. Dharma Wheel is an environment for the discussion of Mahayana and Vajrayana Buddhism.

To:

Do not be defensive of tradition. Dharma Wheel is a secularizing, science-based, unevenly regulated environment for the dissection, dissolution and eventual replacement of Mahayana and Vajrayana Buddhism with a new secular philosophy stripped of all inconvenience.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, July 16th, 2014 at 1:09 AM

Title: Re: Dharma & Science

Content:

Mkoll said:

I really don't understand how religious fundamentalists can spit on science while using as their medium to do so a computer and the internet.

Malcolm wrote:

This is a very facile observation, and specious to boot. What I pointed out, and am pointing out is that science is not based in the perceptions of awakened people. It is based in the lowest common denominator, ordinary perception.

But here, on DW, it really seems that the general tone of this board is that where Buddhadharma is contradicted by "Science", well, this is what we have to follow. We can beat up Buddhist teachings all we like, but god forgive that anyone should question the sacred cow "Science" which is such a cornucopia of "benefits".

Jikan said:

Malcolm, do you think this view pertains to DW's users in plurality, or its team members, or...?

I see forceful arguments being made against the putative Dharma-science connection by more than one voice in this thread and elsewhere.

Malcolm wrote:

I think it is a general tone, some members reflect that tone more than others. But this board is hardly perceived as being devoted to upholding traditional Buddhist values. In general, the primary standard-bearers of Buddhadharma here are the Tibetan Buddhists.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, July 16th, 2014 at 12:45 AM

Title: Re: Dharma & Science

Content:

Mkoll said:

I really don't understand how religious fundamentalists can spit on science while using as their medium to do so a computer and the internet.

Malcolm wrote:

This is a very facile observation, and specious to boot. What I pointed out, and am pointing out is that science is not based in the perceptions of awakened people. It is based in the lowest common denominator, ordinary perception.

But here, on DW, it really seems that the general tone of this board is that where Buddhadharma is contradicted by "Science", well, this is what we have to follow. We can beat up Buddhist teachings all we like, but god forgive that anyone should question the sacred cow "Science" which is such a cornucopia of "benefits".

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, July 16th, 2014 at 12:40 AM

Title: Re: Dharma & Science

Content:

Dan74 said:

Utility is only one aspect. I would actually start with understanding. You practice Tibetan medicine. I suspect that at some stage, knowledge of Tibetan plants has been used to poison people. At some other stage, some quacks probably practiced it inappropriately with disastrous consequences. Should all the books have been burned then? Should people have railed against it as doing "nothing to remove the total amount of suffering in the world"? I think not.

Malcolm wrote:

The point is not "is this this scientific technique of analysis good or bad?" The point is that many people who post here subordinate the Dharma to science, arguing incorrectly that HH Dalai Lama actually holds such a position as well. They then immediately then bring up the utility argument "The benefits of science" argument, if you will. Then, if anyone should even venture to suggest that science, as it is being used today, is actually pernicious and harmful, they immediately bring up the "well this computer and internet was brought to you by science, so shut up." These people have apparently never read In the Absence of the Sacred: The Failure of Technology and the Survival of the Indian Nations by Jerry Mander.

Dan74 said:

As for science being "reductive and destructive", it can be, usually in its infancy it is because when starting from nothing, a simple reductive model is the best you can do. In its maturity it progresses to more complex models.

Malcolm wrote:

As opposed to Buddhadharma, which begins from a place of maturity and wisdom, and is never destructive, never requires adaptation, never requires any change whatsoever, since it is the highest point of human knowledge possible.

Dan74 said:

No, knowledge can be abstract and specific and one kind can inform the other. The prevailing ignorance, like the example you describe, is hardly the fault of science. And I wholeheartedly agree with you about the importance of being connected with the place you live. I can do better, get my hands dirtier more often and contribute more positively to our local environment. But again, this is at best tangential to the topic at hand.

Malcolm wrote:

It is not tangential at all. We live in a society of heads without bodies, we are more alienated and disconnected with our world (as it rapidly disappears before our eyes, being transformed into wasteland) than at any time in history. Our civilization has produced the greatest harm to the planet we have ever seen. All of this is result of our brimming confidence in science and the technological solutions it proposes, each one of which has brought more sorrow to us than the last. All of this is a result of our collective abandonment of the wisdom traditions of our elders, our sacred traditions, our sense of sacred place, etc.

Dan74 said:

But I think you are not serious with your dismissal. Abjure all technology, give up all new materials, build your own house from basic materials and no help from powertools, sell your car, grow your own food, live like a true Luddite and you will have some credibility as far as a philosophical position on technology is concerned. But that still doesn't touch science. Science, first and foremost, is about understanding. Do you really want to close the door on scientific understanding of the material world?

Malcolm wrote:

First of all, the Luddites were not opposed to technology per se, they were trying to prevent the destruction of artisanal cottage industry weaving.

Second of all, my specific criticism is focused on the idea that scientific knowledge can supersede Dharma or that Dharma is can be understood in the manner which those who do "science" are accustomed to looking at things. Why, because as a said science is not based on wisdom, it does not even discover wisdom, it just discovers material intricacies, it is very detailed and so on, but its meaning is very, very coarse and not at all profound. There is nothing profound in science at all.

It is not possible now to live the way you suggest.

Anyway, it is you who are conflating issues, not me. I presented this premise:

Science operates from a lowest common denominator approach to evaluating knowledge. It is predicated on the perceptions of confused sentient beings, not the perceptions of awakened people.

Please examine your statements in light of my statement there.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, July 15th, 2014 at 11:21 PM

Title: Re: Dharma & Science

Content:

Dan74 said:

This might be a starting point for those who are interested:

http://undsci.berkeley.edu/article/whatisscience\_01

Malcolm wrote:

How patronizing...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, July 15th, 2014 at 11:18 PM

Title: Re: Dharma & Science

Content:

Dan74 said:

But this has nothing to do with your argument.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, actually it has a lot to do with my argument — you are now making a utility argument for science. I think that is a poor argument. There is not nearly as much utility in science as you want to believe.

The point about knowledge of place is that most of the knowledge you are talking about is just abstract, it has nothing to do with where people live, how they live, and so on. We live in a world where children do not know that eggs come from chickens.

Dan74 said:

but it's a great approach, it imbues us with fascination and respect as nature's secrets reveal themselves.

Malcolm wrote:

Science, in its present iteration, is reductive and destructive.

Science is clearly not a panacea, has actually done nothing to remove the total amount of suffering in the world [in fact it has increased it substantially] and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, July 15th, 2014 at 11:03 PM

Title: Re: Dharma & Science

Content:

Dan74 said:

...while our worldview has been so enriched both by our understanding of the Universe, genetics, biology, particle physics and quantum mechanics.

Malcolm wrote:

Dan, I am going to ignore your other statements, since they are rhetorical flourishes for the most part that don't bear any need of reply.

However:

How many plants can you name which grow where you live, which ones are edible, poison, or neither? What are their medicinal properties?

How well do you know the movements of stars in the sky?

How connected are you actually with the place where you live?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, July 15th, 2014 at 9:59 PM

Title: Re: Is Western Buddhism an (ethnic) identity-based Buddhism?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

This is really only true of the Vipassana folks.

Jikan said:

I was going to pose a related question:

Is there such a thing as a Western Buddhism, that is, a single one? It seems to me that some of what is swept into the category "WB" corresponds to the criticism made in the OP, but there's a great deal of diversity elsewhere in the same category. Maybe even contradictions.

One reason these discussions can get so prickly: it's very difficult to generalize about these issues intelligently

Malcolm wrote:

Oh definitely there is a "Western Buddhism"; it is characterized by a commitment to secularism, scientism, and a psychotherapeutic approach to meditation.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, July 15th, 2014 at 9:50 PM

Title: Re: Is Western Buddhism an (ethnic) identity-based Buddhism?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

This is really only true of the Vipassana folks.

Seishin said:

I would say mostly rather than only, in my experience at least (I'm not sure about the rest of the world). But could this be because vipassana (and anapanasati) is being pegged as the "scientific" practice??

Gassho.

Malcolm wrote:

Probably.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, July 15th, 2014 at 8:49 PM

Title: Re: How Tibetans feel about the occupation of Tibet

Content:

Unknown said:

On Monday, during the telephone interview, Ms. Woesser gave a dire assessment of the situation in Tibetan regions, where more than 120 people have set themselves on fire as a political protest in recent years, unnerving Chinese officials.

“The current situation hasn’t changed, and the oppression still has not been relaxed,” she said. “As for what will happen in the future, it’s difficult to predict. On the one hand, the authorities’ policy of guilt by association is very harsh, and also the current tactic of control is one of micromanagement. The entire Tibetan area is under a management grid. On the surface, it appears that the situation had been easing up from such strict control, but it hasn’t. The Lhasa that I know is still under tight control.”

Malcolm wrote:

http://sinosphere.blogs.nytimes.com/2014/07/15/tibetan-activist-on-her-latest-house-arrest/?\_php=true&\_type=blogs&ref=world&\_r=0

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, July 15th, 2014 at 8:47 PM

Title: Re: How Tibetans feel about the occupation of Tibet

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

<https://www.callofthewhitecrane.blogspot.com/p/petition-for-jailed-tibetan-singers.html>

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, July 15th, 2014 at 8:41 PM

Title: Re: Is Western Buddhism an (ethnic) identity-based Buddhism?

Content:

JKhedrup said:

I know I take a risk at presenting this, but I thought this quote COULD foster a measured, kind discussion on the issue of lack of multi-ethnic participation in Western Buddhism. Hopefully any discussion will be free from false accusations (without apologies), one line missives, tit for tat claims etc.

The below I think is a response to some people objecting to specific Buddhist practice spaces for People of Colour or specific ethnic groups. Larry Yang argues that Western Buddhism is identity-based Buddhism, as Western teachers trained in Asia did not feel culturally comfortable in that paradigm and wanted to establish a space where people like them could practice:

Larry Yang: Ironically, identity-based retreats were long in the making because when the teachers of the European-American mainstream sangha came back from Asia to teach, they didn’t go to the existing Asian temples or venues that were already in North America. They started the mainstream centers we know today because they didn’t see themselves reflected in these Asian temples. They didn't hear their life stories, they didn't hear the relevance to how these teachings actually dissolved their particular suffering in their particular life. This is the exact same reason that the identity retreats have been formed. Even in our expression of difference, we're the same. There is something that still completely connects us. The point of these retreats is to garner a strength of practice to enable us to see beyond the differences.

<http://www.thebuddhadharma.com/web-archive/2011/11/9/forum-why-is-american-buddhism-so-white.html> " onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;"
onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;"

Malcolm wrote:

This is really only true of the Vipassana folks.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, July 15th, 2014 at 8:40 PM

Title: Re: Direct introduction and purification of the 6 lokas

Content:

bryandavis said:

Thanks for any reply. Still trying to figure out how to navigate with in the DC.

.

Malcolm wrote:

In the end, since you will hear many different answers from students, it is always better to ask Rinpoche himself personally. The reason you will hear many different answers is that Rinpoche has given many different answers to different students at various times in different circumstances.

In general, this ngondro practice can be practiced if you have the lung of the text, and Rinpoche often uses methods of introduction which are from Longsal such as the Yeshe Zangthal. He will give the lung if requested.

But when you have questions and are really not sure, it is always better to ask him directly.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, July 15th, 2014 at 8:33 PM

Title: Re: Dharma & Science

Content:

Wayfarer said:

Thanks for clarifying that.

There is no need for there to be a conflict between science and Buddhism. I can't see any reason why the Buddha, and Buddhists, would oppose the means of enhancing life expectancy, providing communications technology, optimising food crops, and developing many new means of livelihood, to mention but a few aspects. Scientific medicine alone has done immense amounts to reduce human suffering.

Malcolm wrote:

As HHDL puts it in the book from which you draw your quote:

Buddhism draws the critical division differently— i.e., between sentience and non-sentience— because it is primarily interested in the alleviation of suffering and the quest for happiness. In Buddhism, the evolution of the cosmos and the emergence of the sentient beings within it— indeed, effectively everything within the purview of the physical and life sciences— belong within the domain of the first of the Four Noble Truths, which the Buddha taught in his initial sermon. The Four Noble Truths state that within the realm of impermanent phenomena there is suffering, suffering has an origin, the cessation of suffering is possible, and there is a path to the cessation of suffering. As I see it, science falls within the scope of the first truth in that it examines the material bases of suffering, for it covers the entire spectrum of the physical environment—“ the container”— as well as the sentient beings—“ the contained.” It is in the mental realm— the realm of psychology, consciousness, the afflictions, and karma— that we find the second of the truths, the origin of suffering. The third and fourth truths, cessation and the path, are effectively outside the domain of scientific analysis in that they pertain primarily to what might be called philosophy and religion.

Dalai Lama (2005-09-13). The Universe in a Single Atom: The Convergence of Science and Spirituality (Kindle Locations 1243-1252). Crown Publishing Group. Kindle Edition.

You see here, rather than saying this or that topic falls within science's domain, he claims that science falls within a specified subset of the Buddhist analysis of the existential problem facing all sentient beings, suffering.

It is true that modern medicine has had some impact on the area of the first kind of suffering, the suffering of suffering, it has had no impact on the second kind of suffering, the suffering of change, and in fact it can be argued that suffering of change is more endemic than ever before in what we know of human history. No only that, modern science has vastly increased the means of inflicting the suffering of suffering, as we see in the wars we have been having in the Middle East and during the 20th century. So, advances in technology are not really so rosy in fact, and do not actually add up to more happiness for human beings and other kinds of creatures.

A great deal of what we call "science" is merely technology, and great deal of science that is done has no practical use at all. For example, most of the scientific knowledge we have about the cellular processes of the human body are not at all valuable in medical cures, and the vast majority of synthesized drugs are derived from plants whose properties have been known for centuries by indigenous healers. Moreover, many of the diseases we now can cure are diseases that are a product of our technological and very toxic industrial civilization, diseases which were rare or non-existent even in the not so distant past. One thing I will grant is that in the area of surgery, surgical technology has been able to advance a great deal in the past 170 years, but primarily due to two factors, antibiotics and anesthesia.

In other words, the scientific revolution has created ten problems for every one that it has solved, from global warming to increased pollution of the biosphere, to an unprecedented extinction event that is ongoing and so on.

So forgive me for not placing any confidence at all in the confused perception of ordinary beings, whose thrashing efforts to free themselves from suffering merely bring more problems and pain.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, July 15th, 2014 at 8:52 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist "relics"?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The pity is that the topic of Buddhist relics is very interesting and worthy of discussion, but the topic itself was poisoned by the OP's confrontational and close-minded perspective.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, July 15th, 2014 at 8:41 AM

Title: Re: Dharma & Science

Content:

Wayfarer said:

I would like to know if you disagree with that statement from the Dalai Lama 'If scientific analysis were conclusively to demonstrate certain claims in Buddhism to be false, then we must accept the findings of science and abandon those claims.' Yes or no?

Malcolm wrote:

I disagree with HHDL on this point, as written and as presented. You have to bear in mind that the way the Gelugpa school defines conventional truth is in terms of how it corresponds with the deluded perceptions of worldly beings. HHDL is a Gelugpa and presents these issues from that framework.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, July 15th, 2014 at 8:08 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist "relics"?

Content:

nichirenista said:

I suppose what I'm ultimately trying to do is define the term "relic."

Malcolm wrote:

Shariram, relics, are the small pellet—like secretions found in the ashes of Buddhist saints when they are cremated.

Crazywisdom said:

They look like pearls. These are but one kind.

There have been many Kagyu masters whose eyes, tongue and heart fused in cremation.

Malcolm wrote:

That is not really a relic, per se.

Crazywisdom said:

Some manifested bija on their teeth. Some manifested mandalas in their skulls, mantras on bones, etc.

Malcolm wrote:

Those are not shāriram, but are called "gdung", bone relics. They are a bit different than shariram and are not the kind of relics on display at the Maitreya Relic Tour, Another form of relic is the remains of the saint, like the hair or even the robe. These carry very powerful blessings.

No doubt, but these things are not described in sutra and tantra per se.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, July 15th, 2014 at 8:04 AM

Title: Re: Thinley Norbu Rinpoche's Sole Panacea

Content:

nickhol said:

I just read Thinley Norbu Rinpoche's new Sole Panacea: A Brief Commentary on the Seven-Line Prayer to Guru Rinpoche That Cures the Suffering of the Sickness of Karma and Defilement. Its a must read.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, it dispenses very nicely with the scientific materialism that forms the dominant culture of today.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, July 15th, 2014 at 8:02 AM

Title: Re: Buddhism, r/atheism, Human Rights...

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Modernity has yet to come to terms with desire, hatred and ignorance.

There is nothing particularly noble about "modernity" (read, post-Hegelian Western culture) and nothing especially difficult about living in a so called modern culture.

Sentient beings are still the same — afflicted by the three poisons — and Buddhadharma is still relevant to that state of affairs and always will be.

Queequeg said:

I certainly did not suggest modernity is noble or that living in it is particularly difficult. However, short of some catastrophic decline of modern civilization, these are the conditions human being will be living in, the context in which they will have to come to terms with desire, hatred and ignorance. I didn't even come close to suggesting that Buddhadharma is not relevant today. In fact, I think my whole argument is that it IS relevant.

That said, would the Buddha, if he were to appear today, be counseling someone in breathing meditation using the example of a blacksmith's bellow? No, more likely he'd be referring to spin class.

Malcolm wrote:

I am pretty sure the Buddha would call a dashboard a dashboard, even though no one has really used horse drawn wagons for a hundred years in the US and England.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, July 15th, 2014 at 7:47 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist "relics"?

Content:

nichirenista said:

I suppose what I'm ultimately trying to do is define the term "relic."

Malcolm wrote:

Shariram, relics, are the small pellet—like secretions found in the ashes of Buddhist saints when they are cremated.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, July 15th, 2014 at 7:35 AM

Title: Re: Dharma & Science

Content:

Wayfarer said:

No, I definitely and emphatically do not reject belief in rebirth. Ian Stevenson spent 30 years researching children who recalled their previous lives. He said, and I fully accept, that this evidence suggest the truth of re-birth. And he was a scientist - but not a materialist. Science and scientific materialism are different things. You need to get some clarity around that.

Malcolm wrote:

I have a lot of clarity around this issue, thank you very much. Science operates from a lowest common denominator approach to evaluating knowledge. It is predicated on the perceptions of confused sentient beings, not the perceptions of awakened people.

Buddhadharma on the other hand is predicated on the perception of awakened people, not confused people — you need to get some clarity around that.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, July 15th, 2014 at 7:26 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist "relics"?

Content:

Wayfarer said:

I don't think there are *any grounds whatever* to accuse this contributor of 'scientism' or 'materialism' on the basis of what he has written here. He is asking honest questions and wrestling with honest doubts. I regard such accusations as ad hominem and would suggest that they are dropped.

Malcolm wrote:

I would suggest that your observation is out of place and inaccurate, so I will ask you not interfere further unless you have something value to add. You are over-moderating.

I would also point out the person in question made defamatory remarks about the Buddhist tradition, implying it was preposterous because it does not fit with what he understands as "scientific".

In other words, it is ok, in your view, to make defamatory remarks about Buddhadharma since it is not "scientific", but it is not ok to call people on it when they make such remarks from a scientific materialist perspective. In other words, we, who follow Buddhadharma, are barred from defending our tradition, according to you, if its traditions contravene "science".

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, July 15th, 2014 at 7:25 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist "relics"?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Technology is one thing. technology is not a truth claim, scientism like yours however is.

M

nichirenista said:

The earlier statement was that science is for confused people. My response is that science is what has allowed us to have computers and communicate via the Internet. I'm not making a so-called truth claim here. This is fact.

Similarly, the relics are either those of the historical Buddha who lived 2500 years ago in India, or they are not.

Malcolm wrote:

I did not say science was for confused people, I said that your criteria of a truth claim is based on the ordinary perceptions of confused people.

Saying this or that is a "fact" is another kind of truth claim.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, July 15th, 2014 at 7:02 AM

Title: Re: Dharma & Science

Content:

Wayfarer said:

But I also don't think that religious practitioners ought to say that they are in possession of some facts which over-rule science in regards to matters in which scientific measurement obviously holds sway.

Malcolm wrote:

I guess you reject rebirth then, since as far as science is concerned, brains = minds.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, July 15th, 2014 at 6:59 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist "relics"?

Content:

nichirenista said:

What was shaken was my faith in the integrity of certain Buddhist leaders. It's disillusioning for me to see that representatives of other traditions make outrageous claims that almost certainly would not stand up to scientific verification. I'd thought Buddhism was above that.

Malcolm wrote:

Science takes the vision of ordinary confused human beings as the benchmark for truth claims. Buddhadharma takes the wisdom vision of awakened beings as the bench mark for truth claims.

You have made your choice.

nichirenista said:

You can thank science for enabling you to communicate with me now through your computer via the Internet. You can thank science for lighting up the room where the relics were displayed and powering the sound the monk used to speak to the group assembled at the event.

Yes, I've made the choice to acknowledge something most people on this thread apparently won't accept: my opinion on the matter ultimately has no bearing. Either the relics are historically/archaeologically real, or they aren't. My personal perspective is not the deciding factor.

I hope those of you who are posting that I am insensitive will take a look at the how insensitive you are being to me. There is no need to attack me.

Malcolm wrote:

Technology is one thing. technology is not a truth claim, scientism like yours however is.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, July 15th, 2014 at 5:44 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist "relics"?

Content:

nichirenista said:

What was shaken was my faith in the integrity of certain Buddhist leaders. It's disillusioning for me to see that representatives of other traditions make outrageous claims that almost certainly would not stand up to scientific verification. I'd thought Buddhism was above that.

Jesse said:

Lol. There's lots of things which are true that science can't verify. There's more to reality and life than can be measured, and while it's fine and all that you've chosen logic over dogma, don't go throwing materialistic beliefs like it's the defacto stance of science.

Malcolm wrote:

He has just chosen a different dogma, that's all.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, July 15th, 2014 at 5:39 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist "relics"?

Content:

nichirenista said:

What was shaken was my faith in the integrity of certain Buddhist leaders. It's disillusioning for me to see that representatives of other traditions make outrageous claims that almost certainly would not stand up to scientific verification. I'd thought Buddhism was above that.

Malcolm wrote:

Science takes the vision of ordinary confused human beings as the benchmark for truth claims. Buddhadharma takes the wisdom vision of awakened beings as the bench mark for truth claims.

You have made your choice.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, July 15th, 2014 at 5:37 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist "relics"?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Doesn't sound to me like there is much Buddhadharma in your Buddhism, but rather, a whole lot of materialism.

nichirenista said:

Ironical that I'm the one who was accused of being insensitive.

I leave you to bask in your spiritual superiority to me....

Malcolm wrote:

It is not about superiority -- you might as well chant Namu Mickey Mouse, based on your own stated belief I've read that scientific studies have revealed that chanting (no matter the religion) is good for mental health because the rhythm of chanting corresponds with that of the pulse of brain activity. Such ideas really have nothing to do with Buddhadharma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, July 15th, 2014 at 5:07 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist "relics"?

Content:

nichirenista said:

Science speaks for itself. A relic either is or isn't literally from the historical Buddha. My attitude is not the deciding factor. No religious faith on my part was necessary in appraising the historical verifiability of the Venus of Willendorf.

I'm not Nichiren Daishonin and this isn't the 1200s. Heck, I'm not even Japanese. I'm a "white ethnic" raised in the Roman Catholic Church in the United States of America -- where one of our greatest freedoms is the freedom of expression. My reasons for chanting are different from Nichiren's (I like the scientific view), and I'm aware that he believed things that I don't. I find his beliefs and history to be beneficial to study -- but from a historical, scholarly standpoint.

I suppose what I'm saying is that mythology is different from science, and I wish the advertisement for this event would have made it clear that this event was within the realm of "Buddhist mythology." But I think I have to accept that maybe it wasn't advertised that way because some people believe it is scientifically, literally true that the relics are from the historical Buddha.

Malcolm wrote:

Doesn't sound to me like there is much Buddhadharma in your Buddhism, but rather, a whole lot of materialism.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, July 15th, 2014 at 12:21 AM

Title: Re: Buddhism, r/atheism, Human Rights...

Content:

Queequeg said:

[

As a whole, Buddhism has not come to terms with modernity.

Malcolm wrote:

Modernity has yet to come to terms with desire, hatred and ignorance.

There is nothing particularly noble about "modernity" (read, post-Hegelian Western culture) and nothing especially difficult about living in a so called modern culture. Sentient beings are still the same — afflicted by the three poisons — and Buddhadharma is still relevant to that state of affairs and always will be.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, July 14th, 2014 at 8:14 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist "relics"?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The term is "sharira". The Buddha's remains from his cremation were divided into eight parts and placed in Stupas.

Buddhist masters have been producing shariraṃ in all traditions for centuries. The understanding of shariraṃ is highly developed in Tibetan Buddhism, especially in the Dzogchen teachings, where many different kinds of shariraṃ from different parts of the body, indicating different levels of practice are detailed by the Buddha in texts such as the Brilliant Relics Tantra and so on. For example, in the Self-Arisen Vidyā Tantra, Buddha states:

After my nirvana in order to generate the devotion of migrating beings place the relics in a statue.

Place these major classes of relics in statues of my form.

The Buddha teaches in the Bhadrakalpika-nāma-mahāyāna-sūtra

Making a small offering to the relics of the Sugata in nirvana has limitless qualities.

Kuśalamūla-paridhara-nāma-mahāyāna-sūtra

The transformation of his relics, is just like my nirvana,

the relics of the Sugata sNying po Tshogs, those will transform.

The Arya-sarvadharmaguṇavyūharāja-nāma-mahāyāna-sūtra:

At a place of stupa containing relics or a temple, make offerings with incense, scents, various flowers and various pennants.

nichirenista said:

I hesitate to start this thread because I don't mean to seem disrespectful, much less sacrilegious. So, let me state upfront that this is an honest, sincere question....

<http://www.maitreyarelictour.com> " onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;"
onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;" onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;" onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;"
onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

I attended the loving kindness tour a few days ago, which is a part of the Maitreya Project through the Foundation for the Preservation of the Mahayana Tradition. I was completely caught off guard. When I saw the word "relic" in their advertisements, I thought in terms of archaeology. I didn't know about the concept of "relics" in the Tibetan tradition. I came to feel that these are relics in the same way that the bread was the body of Jesus in my Catholic childhood. Symbolically.

To be honest I'm almost at a loss here. I will refrain from posting my more blunt thoughts on the topic, for fear of offending some people. But I suppose my questions would be as follows: 1. What is the general consensus of the relics on this tour? Do people actually believe that they have relics from the historical Buddha? (It would seem to me that something that rare and valuable would be displayed at the Smithsonian behind lock and key, under video surveillance, and under the careful watch of a security guard nearby. Not casually displayed at the local Masonic Temple, where any average Joe from off the street could wander in and then place the relics of the historical Buddha on his head!) 2. Have such relics ever been verified by any scientist?

I'll be a little more blunt, though hopefully tactful and not disrespectful. Truth is that it was a very disillusioned and disappointing display for me. I guess I would like to know that there are other Buddhists out there who don't believe in this either....

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, July 14th, 2014 at 12:10 PM

Title: Re: Are Karma and Rebirth Real?

Content:

Wayfarer said:

Again, you make many sweeping statements without any attribution or justification. When asked for justification, you offer bad interpretations of scholastic Buddhist texts, reading things into them which aren't there and coming to conclusions which the texts don't justify.

(I am starting to appreciate why certain levels of teaching were traditionally kept secret....)

Andrew108 said:

This is pretty bad. I have enough of this attitude.

Malcolm wrote:

Oh, i think this evaluation of your posts is entirely justifiable in many ways.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, July 14th, 2014 at 11:21 AM

Title: Re: Are Karma and Rebirth Real?

Content:

Wayfarer said:

Of course, I agree, but as you say, it gets to a point where it is unseemly to refer to advanced teachings as a basis for making unsubstantiated and sweeping claims about Buddhist fundamentals..

Malcolm wrote:

You seem to be suffering from the misapprehension that it is always inappropriate to cite higher texts when they support teachings found in lower yanas.

Finally, if you don't mind, i will cite any text i deem appropriate in support of any point i wish to make.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, July 14th, 2014 at 7:48 AM

Title: Re: Are Karma and Rebirth Real?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The teachings are not something to be debated about for sport.

Wayfarer said:

I don't think it is much use referring to advanced texts in trying to reason with someone who demonstrates no understanding of the basics. For someone whose understanding is basic, basic texts are all that is required.

Malcolm wrote:

The point is that A108 was refuting teachings which are found in Dzogchen teachings, of which he professes to be a practitioner, as well as Abhidharma in favor of Theravadin presentations.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, July 14th, 2014 at 3:38 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen & rainbow body

Content:

Gyurme Kundrol said:

since in the ultimate nature such an intention or aspiration, or even such a thought is literally not needed.

Malcolm wrote:

Correction, does not exist.

But Dzogchen practice is predicated first of all on vidyā, rigpa, knowledge. Without that experiential knowledge we call "rigpa" all these nice Dzogchen words are empty of meaning.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, July 14th, 2014 at 2:44 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen & rainbow body

Content:

Andrew108 said:

Dzogchen attitude is quite unique. Very special. The idea of wanting to have rainbow body or wanting to achieve enlightenment doesn't fit.

Malcolm wrote:

I guess, according to you, that ChNN is a fool then for having stated countless times that he hopes he can achieve rainbow body, that he wants to achieve rainbow body. I guess his attitude is not Dzogchen at all.

M

Andrew108 said:

That's an unfortunate projection on your part. ChNN has stated countless times that we need to go beyond dualistic vision. It is our fixation to the dualistic state we find ourselves in that is blocking the manifestation of realization. When our spiritual aims become part of this dualistic vision then our practice will fall short.

Malcolm wrote:

You are changing the subject. Address the issue at hand. How do you reconcile what you have stated with ChNN's stated desire to attain rainbow body?

You have basically stated that anyone who desires to achieve rainbow body is a fool.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, July 14th, 2014 at 2:08 AM

Title: Re: Rebirth....how does it happen?

Content:

Andrew108 said:

It seem to me that the best explanation of rebirth is that present actions have consequences for those coming later.

Malcolm wrote:

This is clearly not the intention of the teachings on rebirth in Dzogchen, of which there are very, very many.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, July 14th, 2014 at 2:03 AM

Title: Re: Rebirth....how does it happen?

Content:

Andrew108 said:

Vasubhandu asserted Antarābhava-skandha.

Malcolm wrote:

The Buddha asserted the Antarābhava-skandha.

Andrew108 said:

Vasubhandu used reasoning to argue the existence of antarābhava-skandha.

Malcolm wrote:

He also cites a sūtra when explaining the teaching on the bardo.

Considering that the bardo is an incredibly important topic in Dzogchen, since this where most people are going to attain liberation, how can you possibly call yourself a Dzogchen practitioner, and yet spend so much time and effort rejecting the teachings in the antarābhava? As the Buddha states in The Union of the Sun and Moon Tantra (an important tantra belonging to man ngag sde):

The place entered by all sentient beings who do not possess this instruction is called “the bardo of existence.”

The doorway to the path of the places of samsara, for example, is turning like a water wheel.

Having separated from the body of ordinary flesh and blood, one has an illusory mental body,
which has two names since it incorporeal.

And the Self-Liberated Vidyā Tantra states (a tantra belonging to man ngag sde):
After people of average capacity have died and left this world, passed through the bardo and have been born in buddhafiels of half-visible emanations, they are free from all paths of samsara.
So you see, the teachings about the bardo are incredibly important for Vajrayāna and Dzogchen practitioners. The teachings are not something to be debated about for sport.

M

Author: Malcolm
Date: Monday, July 14th, 2014 at 1:22 AM
Title: Re: Dzogchen & rainbow body
Content:
Andrew108 said:
It seems to me that their craving has increased rather than decreased.

Malcolm wrote:
How would you know? You are not them. You are not in a position to judge anyone's practice apart from your own.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Monday, July 14th, 2014 at 1:20 AM
Title: Re: Dzogchen & rainbow body
Content:
Malcolm wrote:
[quote="Andrew108"]If you contact a Dzogchen master and tell them that you want to achieve rainbow body what do you think they would say? /quote]

Do this practice, then do this practice, then this one, then you if you are diligent you gave the possibility of attaining rainbow body.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Monday, July 14th, 2014 at 1:16 AM
Title: Re: Dzogchen & rainbow body
Content:

Andrew108 said:
Dzogchen attitude is quite unique. Very special. The idea of wanting to have rainbow body or wanting to achieve enlightenment doesn't fit.

Malcolm wrote:
I guess, according to you, that ChNN is a fool then for having stated countless times that he hopes he can achieve rainbow body, that he wants to achieve rainbow body. I guess his attitude is not Dzogchen at all.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, July 13th, 2014 at 2:43 AM

Title: Re: Dharma wheel, ethics, value & online communities

Content:

uan said:

There are people who follow Buddha Dharma who cling to the idea that they need to call themselves Buddhists. Eventually, following Dharma, we grow beyond needing to identify as Buddhist or anything really. As an example, and I clearly don't speak for Malcolm, but iirc, he used to identify as a Buddhist, but he doesn't anymore, though he allows himself to use that identifier for the sake of simpler interactions with people who still cling to needing to call people "Buddhist". Though perhaps he's back to being a Buddhist? I don't know.

Malcolm wrote:

I practice Buddhadharma, call me what you will.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, July 13th, 2014 at 2:40 AM

Title: Re: Rebirth....how does it happen?

Content:

Andrew108 said:

What is the intermediate state aggregate?

Malcolm wrote:

Antarābhava-skandha, means the five aggregates of a being in the bardo [antarābhava].

Andrew108 said:

So you are going with Vasubhandhu's assertion.

Malcolm wrote:

No, I am going with the Buddha's teaching in the sūtra cited above. But when it comes to choosing between Abhidhamma and Abhidharma, I will pick Abhidharma every time.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, July 13th, 2014 at 2:37 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen & rainbow body

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Citation, Andrew.

Andrew108 said:

In the Mejung Chapter 23. The Marvelous Primordial State: The Mejung Tantra.

Malcolm wrote:

And so you conclude from these citations that one ought not wish for freedom from suffering? That the entire Buddhist path is mere foolishness? That the wish to attain awakening (bodhicitta) should be given up, eschewed?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, July 13th, 2014 at 12:21 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen & rainbow body

Content:

Andrew108 said:

There is another key concept in Dzogchen which is something like 'those who wish to achieve are the ones who will never achieve'.

Malcolm wrote:

Oh really, in what Dzogchen teaching is this taught? Citation please.

Andrew108 said:

It's outlined in Kunjed Gyalpo, Mejung. Nubchen writes about it as does ChNN.

Malcolm wrote:

Citation, Andrew.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, July 13th, 2014 at 12:19 AM

Title: Re: Rebirth....how does it happen?

Content:

Andrew108 said:

What is the intermediate state aggregate?

Malcolm wrote:

Antarābhava-skandha, means the five aggregates of a being in the bardo [antarābhava].

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, July 12th, 2014 at 8:49 PM

Title: Re: Rebirth....how does it happen?

Content:

Wayfarer said:

From Bikkhu Thanissaro's presentation on re-birth:

Malcolm wrote:

Why don't we properly ground this discussion in Mahāyāna Sūtra for a change?

Then, the Bhagavan said this to Āyusman Nanda, “Nanda, when a sentient being wishes to enter the womb, if causes and conditions are perfect, a body will be appropriated. However, if [the causes and conditions] are not perfect, a body will not be appropriated. If one should ask how is it that a sentient being does not possess the conditions, it is as follows. Though a man and a woman have the mental factor of desire, and the intermediate state aggregate is present and seeking a womb, should that male and female have sexual intercourse too soon or too late or not have intercourse at that one time; or should there be some diseases in the body of either [the male or the female], there will be no ‘entry into the womb’. If family line of the male and the female are noble and their merit is great, but the intermediate state aggregate has small merit, or should the intermediate state being have a noble family line and great merit, [65] but the male and female have small [merit] or though they both have merit, but if the accumulation of karma is not mutual, then there will be no ‘entry into the womb’.”

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, July 12th, 2014 at 8:42 PM

Title: Re: Dzogchen & rainbow body

Content:

Andrew108 said:

There is another key concept in Dzogchen which is something like 'those who wish to achieve are the ones who will never achieve'.

Malcolm wrote:

Oh really, in what Dzogchen teaching is this taught? Citation please.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, July 12th, 2014 at 7:11 PM

Title: Re: Stephen Batchelor is influential in the evolution of Dharma

Content:

Alfredo said:

Okay, look--as far as anybody knows, Buddhists have disagreed with one another since day one.

Not over key issues like rebirth.

There is no "core" that represents Buddhism to everybody, and never has been.

Malcolm wrote:

Rebirth, dependent origination, infallibility of karmic causes and effects, etc. These are core Buddhist tenets that represent all Buddhists until the 1970's. Then all of a sudden we have this pernicious movement to take Buddha's teachings out of Buddhism.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, July 12th, 2014 at 7:07 PM

Title: Re: Stephen Batchelor is influential in the evolution of Dha

Content:

boda said:

Y'all are not following. If different interpretations of the world around us is dangerous to Buddhism then ALL interpretations which are not agreeable are dangerous. There's no reason why Hindu interpretations, for example, would be any less dangerous than Batchelorian interpretations. Yet Buddhism has survived Hinduism from the very beginning, and indeed more to the point, Hinduism has survived Buddhism.

Malcolm wrote:

The Buddha pointed out that only people who could destroy Buddhism was Buddhists. Batchelor is happily leading the way with his incorrect views about what the Buddha taught.

Andrew108 said:

Buddhists have to believe in rebirth right? So it would seem it will be Buddhists (those who believe in literal rebirth) that will destroy Buddhism and not secularists like Batchelor.

Malcolm wrote:

Not at all, A108 — Buddha had in mind people who say things like "rebirth is not necessary for Buddhism" and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, July 12th, 2014 at 8:21 AM

Title: Re: Buddhism, r/atheism, Human Rights...

Content:

Wayfarer said:

There is a sense in which traditional Buddhism could be fatalistic - as the world was illusory, and as beings suffered due to their own karma, and so on

I think that sense of 'engaged Buddhism' is a counter to that...

Malcolm wrote:

There is nothing here to counter, this is just a Buddhist matter of fact. It is not fatalistic at all. All beings make their own karma, both the good and the bad.

I can no more change your karma than you can change mine. But as human beings, we can act with compassion, and perhaps inspire others.

However, please do recall the Buddha watched the Vajjians enslave all his relatives...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, July 12th, 2014 at 7:34 AM

Title: Re: Learning Sanskrit

Content:

coyote said:

I know that Buddhist Sanskrit is different to classical Sanskrit

Malcolm wrote:

It is not really that different. Buddhist texts merely have their jargon. But in general there is no such thing as "Buddhist" Sanskrit.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, July 12th, 2014 at 7:25 AM

Title: Re: Buddhism, r/atheism, Human Rights...

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

HH Dalai Lama's concept of universal responsibility can form such a basis...

Jikan said:

Hi Malcolm,

Would you please help us see the connection here? I'm not at all familiar with this concept, and I don't think I'm the only one. Thanks.

Malcolm wrote:

When we understand we have a universal responsibility to assure everyone's happiness, there is no need even to mention human rights, since they will automatically be satisfied.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, July 12th, 2014 at 7:22 AM

Title: Re: Stephen Batchelor is influential in the evolution of Dha

Content:

boda said:

Y'all are not following. If different interpretations of the world around us is dangerous to Buddhism then ALL interpretations which are not agreeable are dangerous. There's no reason why Hindu interpretations, for example, would be any less dangerous than Batchelorian interpretations. Yet Buddhism has survived Hinduism from the very beginning, and indeed more to the point, Hinduism has survived Buddhism.

Malcolm wrote:

The Buddha pointed out that only people who could destroy Buddhism was Buddhists.

Batchelor is happily leading the way with his incorrect views about what the Buddha taught.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, July 12th, 2014 at 5:52 AM

Title: Re: Stephen Batchelor is influential in the evolution of Dha

Content:

boda said:

And I pointed out that there are wildly divergent interpretations, of the same raw material. Buddhism has survived for millennia surrounded by all the divergent interpretations. OBVIOUSLY, you could not be more wrong.

Malcolm wrote:

None however that flat out negate the importance of rebirth for understanding and practicing Dharma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, July 12th, 2014 at 1:10 AM

Title: Re: Stephen Batchelor is influential in the evolution of Dha

Content:

uan said:

But you do encourage defending the dharma.

Malcolm wrote:

Of course, and that means understanding Dharma as properly as possible and following a qualified master until you are a master yourself.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, July 11th, 2014 at 9:44 PM

Title: Re: Buddhism, r/atheism, Human Rights...

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

HH Dalai Lama's concept of universal responsibility can form such a basis...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, July 11th, 2014 at 9:27 PM

Title: Re: Stephen Batchelor is influential in the evolution of Dha

Content:

uan said:

We don't need to defend the Dharma.

Malcolm wrote:

Of course we do.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, July 11th, 2014 at 11:25 AM

Title: Re: Stephen Batchelor is influential in the evolution of Dha

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Again whose? Modern feminism ala Sarah Palin?

Virgo said:

She's a feminist?

Kevin

Malcolm wrote:

So she claims.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, July 11th, 2014 at 11:07 AM

Title: Re: Stephen Batchelor is influential in the evolution of Dha

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Again whose? Modern feminism ala Sarah Palin? Robin Morgan? etc.

boda said:

How about we settle for any variety that disfavors dowry killings, acid throwing, rape, or the forced prostitution of young girls.

Malcolm wrote:

That's not feminism, that is basic human decency.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, July 11th, 2014 at 3:56 AM

Title: Re: Dzongsar Khyentse on the importance of Mahayana

Content:

smcj said:

Nice.

What's nice about it?

His affirmation of the benefits of practicing the Mahayana as a basis for the Vajrayana.

Malcolm wrote:

I am sorry, but this following statement is very silly:

Those who skip the Mahayana path and go straight to the Vajrayana path are obvious from a distance by the gleam of their oily hair. They have at least four malas around their neck, and they love to talk about power and magnetizing wealth. Their view often seems to be founded on a rather superstitious cast of mind.

These kinds of put-downs are simply not necessary.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, July 11th, 2014 at 3:46 AM

Title: Re: Rebirth....how does it happen?

Content:

Andrew108 said:

So then you should specify which version of rebirth you hold to.

Malcolm wrote:

The one taught in Dzogchen tantras.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, July 11th, 2014 at 3:39 AM

Title: Re: Stephen Batchelor is influential in the evolution of Dha

Content:

boda said:

I can agree that anyone against modern feminism is a dribbling idiot.

Malcolm wrote:

Whose modern feminism?

boda said:

Men's of course.

Malcolm wrote:

Again whose? Modern feminism ala Sarah Palin? Robin Morgan? etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, July 11th, 2014 at 3:28 AM

Title: Re: Stephen Batchelor is influential in the evolution of Dha

Content:

Andrew108 said:

Stephen Batchelor says that there are four key components of Buddha's teachings that are unique and not a part of the culture of the time. These are the for unique views (here I am quoting SB):

- "1. The principle of "this-conditionality, conditioned arising."
2. The principle of the Four Noble Truths.
3. The practice of mindful awareness.
4. The power of self-reliance."

Not so bad if you take these on and perfect them. I mean if you live them and they become part of a lived experience. More than enough there to keep the dharma pure.

Malcolm wrote:

He is mistaken.

Samkhya also explains a kind of conditioned arising, the idea of escaping from suffering, mindfulness and self-reliance. So Batchelor is quite wrong.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, July 11th, 2014 at 3:26 AM

Title: Re: Stephen Batchelor is influential in the evolution of Dha

Content:

boda said:

I can agree that anyone against modern feminism is a dribbling idiot.

Malcolm wrote:

Whose modern feminism?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, July 11th, 2014 at 2:10 AM

Title: Re: Rebirth....how does it happen?

Content:

Andrew108 said:

The first sentence of the quote shows that Abhidhamma is not idealist.

Malcolm wrote:

Correct, the Abhidhamma of Theravada is realist. It is the lowest tenet system alongside Vaibhāṣika and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, July 11th, 2014 at 2:07 AM

Title: Re: Rebirth....how does it happen?

Content:

Andrew108 said:

Believe it or not there are many Buddhists who reject the idea of objective existence.

Malcolm wrote:

Ultimately, yes; conventionally, no.

Andrew108 said:

Ultimate here is an imagined ultimate.

Malcolm wrote:

No, not at all. Imagination has nothing to do with it.

Andrew108 said:

In the texts I have been studying ultimate is unconditioned or baselessness. This baselessness is present.

Malcolm wrote:

Which texts are those?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, July 11th, 2014 at 1:30 AM

Title: Re: Dzongsar Khyentse on the importance of Mahayana

Content:

smcj said:

Nice.

Malcolm wrote:

What's nice about it?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, July 11th, 2014 at 1:24 AM

Title: Re: Stephen Batchelor is influential in the evolution of Dha

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

People, let's all try to be a little more simpatico, shall we? We're trying to have a sangha here.

Malcolm wrote:

We are? Not me, this is not a Sangha (not for me at any rate) — this is internet board.

Sangha are those who share refuge, that is not the case here.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, July 11th, 2014 at 12:03 AM

Title: Re: Stephen Batchelor is influential in the evolution of Dha

Content:

Jikan said:

boda: you forgot to mention that I'm an ugly white dude who hasn't yet completely shaken his working-class (or "redneck" if you prefer) accent.

Malcolm wrote:

True, from a Buddhist perspective, at this point to be an Asian male Buddhist who is a serious practitioner and has means to afford teachings is really the top of the food chain in the Buddhist world.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, July 10th, 2014 at 8:44 PM

Title: Re: Stephen Batchelor is influential in the evolution of Dha

Content:

Andrew108 said:

Isn't there a kind of beauty in equality and the acceptance of views that we might disagree with?

Wayfarer said:

Two different things there. Certainly in a pluralist society a range of views are to be tolerated, and individuals have a freedom of conscience, and so on.

But it doesn't override the requirement of discerning the truth and attaining the correct view. Not all views can be correct, and to say they are is simply subjectivism and relativism. Everything is then simply a matter of opinion. Which is perilously close to where we are in many respects.

Malcolm wrote:

This is why as Buddhists we follow śabda-pramāṇa.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, July 10th, 2014 at 8:43 PM

Title: Re: Stephen Batchelor is influential in the evolution of Dha

Content:

Andrew108 said:

It's easy to criticize and it's hard to accept different views from ones own. Seems like the world is full of conflict. But aren't all these views adornments of the natural state? Isn't there a kind of beauty in equality and the acceptance of views that we might disagree with? There is such a instinctive impulse to divide and draw lines and we do so because we think we have responsibility for the preservation of a particular set of teachings. We are damaging these teachings by being so close-minded. Very hard to see this but open hand is better than a closed fist.

Malcolm wrote:

First, A108, one must distinguish between a right path and wrong path; then one must distinguish between a higher path and a lower path.

Part of that is distinguishing right view from wrong view. That is why we train in tenet systems. Somehow, some people believe that secular views such as those advanced by scientists and western philosophers should be exempt from being graded by the traditional tenet system. However, the fact is that all western science, philosophy and religion falls under the category of either non-Buddhist eternalism or annihilationism.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, July 10th, 2014 at 8:35 PM

Title: Re: Dharma wheel, ethics, value & online communities

Content:

JKhedrup said:

I've never seen Batchelor or his fans shy away from a debate. Indeed, challenging what they see as the "status quo" of traditional Buddhism seems to be part of their raison d'etre.

Malcolm wrote:

Basically it is the difference between this:

And this:

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, July 10th, 2014 at 8:21 PM

Title: Re: Rebirth....how does it happen?

Content:

Andrew108 said:

Believe it or not there are many Buddhists who reject the idea of objective existence.

Malcolm wrote:

Ultimately, yes; conventionally, no.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, July 10th, 2014 at 5:40 AM

Title: Re: Rebirth....how does it happen?

Content:

Andrew108 said:

For those who believe in literal rebirth, can you explain how it happens? What are the mechanics of it? What is the reasoning that convinces you that there is literal rebirth?

boda said:

It's better that we don't know the mechanics of it, because if we did know the mechanics we would start manipulating the system. That's what our species does, we manipulate our environment in order to take advantage. That rarely turns out well. Indeed, look at the condition of our environment.

If we knew the mechanics of rebirth we might manipulate it to be reborn as a rockstar, or someone important, like an actor. Then there would be too many actors in the world and everything would be all out of balance.

Malcolm wrote:

We do know the mechanics. However, the things you describe require merit and so on, and given that merit is not something most people are interested in accumulating, there is no danger that higher rebirths will become overstocked, if you will.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, July 10th, 2014 at 5:32 AM

Title: Re: essential tremor

Content:

saraswati said:

Interesting that Malcolm says it is linked to wind. I don't know much of Tibetan medicine but years back I've self-diagnosed as having a Vata imbalance according to Ayurveda.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, it is a vata/rlung condition connected with the nervous system or so called "white channels".

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, July 10th, 2014 at 5:00 AM

Title: Re: Dharma & Science

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The pure heart of Buddhism is found only in the lineage of realization. Without that lineage, a lineage which frankly has not existed outside of Mahāyāna for many centuries, there is no pure heart of Buddhism.

dzogchungpa said:

What about Daniel Ingram?

Malcolm wrote:

If he is an Arhat, I am a samyaksambuddha with 32 major and 80 minor marks...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, July 10th, 2014 at 4:12 AM

Title: Re: Rebirth....how does it happen?

Content:

Andrew108 said:

In Abhidhamma there are irreducible ultimate dhammas or ultimate objects of right knowledge and these are separate from conceptualised conventionalities. These ultimate dhammas are universal and unchanging. They do not depend on concepts and are uncovered by analysing the conventional. These ultimates are naturalistic. They are laws that are the same everywhere and at every time. They are independent of mind's conceptualizing. I think science and dharma uncover these paramattha. And in that sense dhamma is naturalistic.

Nibbana is also an ultimate in that it is the law of 'unconditionality'.

Malcolm wrote:

Considering that Abhidhamma belongs to a Śravaka school, it comes as no surprise that its point of view is realist and negated by higher Buddhist teachings such as Madhyamaka, Dzogchen and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, July 10th, 2014 at 1:52 AM

Title: Re: Dharma & Science

Content:

Jikan said:

...the pure heart of Buddhism,

Malcolm wrote:

The pure heart of Buddhism is found only in the lineage of realization. Without that lineage, a lineage which frankly has not existed outside of Mahāyāna for many centuries, there is no pure heart of Buddhism.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, July 9th, 2014 at 10:17 PM

Title: Re: Dharma & Science

Content:

Wayfarer said:

How about we say that 'science is generally in the realm of samvriti-satya' (conventional truth). That would appear to offer a way of accomodating science without having to declare that it is necessarily in conflict with Dharma (which belongs in the realm of paramartha satya.)

I also feel compelled to refer once more the well-known book by the Dalai Lama on philosophy of science, The Universe in a Single Atom. That book is not the least 'anti-science' whilst showing a clear grasp of the distinction between science as method, and scientific materialism as an attitude.

Malcolm wrote:

The Madhyamaka definition of conventional truth is simply functionality ( arthakriya ), thus the rites of shamans for making rain are as conventionally valid as predicative models in science so long as they function. Of course, if you are convinced they do not function you will not resort to them.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, July 9th, 2014 at 9:22 PM

Title: Re: Are these the warning signs of a cult?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

http://www.globalvt.org/?page\_id=72

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, July 9th, 2014 at 9:11 PM

Title: Re: Dharma & Science

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The problem is that Buddhists are so worried about being perceived as "modern", many of them have lost sight of their roots — the awakening of the Buddha and all that entails — and rush to shed anything in Dharma that seems pre-modern to their sensibilities.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, July 9th, 2014 at 8:10 PM

Title: Re: Are these the warning signs of a cult?

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

Which tradition does the group belong too?

Malcolm wrote:

NKT

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, July 9th, 2014 at 8:12 AM

Title: Re: essential tremor

Content:

Jikan said:

Thank you both for the helpful information. I'm glad to know that the forms of self-medication I've picked up along the way (I've also been advised to imbibe gently but consistently) have some validity.

Malcolm wrote:

There are also a number of effective herbal formulas you can take, pm me and we can talk.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, July 9th, 2014 at 6:07 AM

Title: Re: essential tremor

Content:

Jikan said:

I was diagnosed with this some time ago. Basically, it means my hands & feet shake, and my voice sometimes sounds a little strange. I don't have Parkinson's. I just wiggle a little. It's inconvenient and sometimes embarrassing when I have trouble gripping something, or if my handwriting gets out of control. My grandfather had it too. He was able to use a tablesaw until he was about 85 years old, but it was scary toward the end.

There's not much that conventional medicine can offer on this except the usual things (stay healthy, avoid caffeine, manage stress, &c).

I'd like to know if anyone has any insights on this. with this and the migraines, you might understand why the vajra armor practice has a very strong appeal for me.

many thanks in advance.

Malcolm wrote:

It's a systemic wind disorder of the nervous system.

There are all kinds of things you can do to manage. daily self-massage, a little good wine everyday, etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, July 9th, 2014 at 3:51 AM

Title: Re: Rebirth....how does it happen?

Content:

Andrew108 said:

I think this is the problem. Perhaps it is this Mahayana view of rebirth - with the idea of bardo. I'm wondering what is the scriptural basis for bardo?

Malcolm wrote:

Ārya-laṅkāvatāra-mahāyāna-sūtra

Nandagarbhāvākṛāntinirdeśa

Karmaprajñapti

etc.

Andrew108 said:

These Sutras are all about the primacy of consciousness. This is why I have been unsure about your posts. Earlier suttas are more focused on the primacy of kamma. O.k so that is why there has been a disconnect.

Malcolm wrote:

No, this is not the case. The Karmaprajñāpti is about karma.

Nandagarbhāvākṛāntinirdeśa is about how conception and development in the womb takes place. For example:

If the father and mother are of noble social class, or endowed with great merit, but the intermediate existence being's merit heap is small; or if the intermediate existence beings' social class is noble, or is endowed with great merit, but the father and mother's merit is small, or even though both are endowed with merit, when past actions to mutually meet together are not accumulated, there cannot be entry into the womb. In this case, merit of the father and mother can be an external condition determining whether conception can occur or not.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, July 9th, 2014 at 3:41 AM

Title: Re: Rebirth....how does it happen?

Content:

daverupa said:

So is patisandhi-citta your "rebirth-linking consciousness"?

Andrew108 said:

Yes that's it. And this consciousness is said to be generated by kamma (productive kamma) immediately after death. It seems that some types of kamma in Abhidamma texts are close to what I have called an 'objective condition'.

Malcolm wrote:

No, all karma is subjective in so far as all karma is mental volitions.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, July 9th, 2014 at 3:40 AM

Title: Re: Rebirth....how does it happen?

Content:

Andrew108 said:

I think this is the problem. Perhaps it is this Mahayana view of rebirth - with the idea of bardo. I'm wondering what is the scriptural basis for bardo?

Malcolm wrote:

Ārya-laṅkāvatāra-mahāyāna-sūtra
Nandagarbhāvākṛāntinirdeśa
Karmaprajñapti

etc.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Wednesday, July 9th, 2014 at 3:28 AM
Title: Re: Rebirth....how does it happen?
Content:
Andrew108 said:
I've explained that I am looking at the Abhidharma texts.

daverupa said:
So is patisandhi-citta your "rebirth-linking consciousness"? Because if you're already reading that stuff and it feels acceptable, please note that the answer to your question is in there too.

But a lot of Mahayana accepts Bardo between births, while in Theravada there's no time at all between them, so the discussion is bound to get out of alignment.

Malcolm wrote:
All of Mahāyāna...

Author: Malcolm
Date: Wednesday, July 9th, 2014 at 3:21 AM
Title: Re: Rebirth....how does it happen?
Content:
Jikan said:
I'm not clear on what you mean by consciousness, Andrew108.

Malcolm wrote:
Neither is he.

Andrew108 said:
Neither are you. Less of the Ad homs. I've explained that I am looking at the Abhidharma texts. So instead of the popcorn why not contribute?

Malcolm wrote:
It is definitely the case that I am not clear on what you mean by consciousness; and that is because you are not clear on what consciousness is.

As far as participating, I have provided all of these answers for you in the past, but still you persist in asking questions so:

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, July 9th, 2014 at 3:20 AM

Title: Re: Rebirth....how does it happen?

Content:

Andrew108 said:

@Jikan...Consciousness in the context of my last few posts is the rebirth-linking consciousness. I'm looking at the Abhidharma texts. It is stated quite clearly that this rebirth-linking consciousness requires prior cause or kamma that is the result of action. It is said that this type of Kamma (productive kamma) that is responsible for generating the rebirth-linking consciousness exists prior to that consciousness and that "during the course of existence it produces other resultant cittas and the continuities of kamma-born materiality, such as the sense faculties, sexual determination, and the heart-base." The heart-base is quite interesting in itself and could be a separate topic of discussion.

So it seems that kamma exists as an objective condition as the result of action prior to the manifestation of the consciousness. In this case it is not that consciousness contains within it all types of kamma.

Jikan said:

Sorry, I'm even more confused now. Rather than ask you to explain your explanation, would you please tell me what it is you're reading so I can get a sense of where you're coming from?

thanks.

Malcolm wrote:

Andrew missed the part where karma was defined by the Buddha as volition, and the effects of volition body and speech.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, July 9th, 2014 at 3:08 AM

Title: Re: Prayer

Content:

Crazywisdom said:

It amounts to a distinction without a difference, brother Malcolm.

Malcolm wrote:

It is an important distinction, actually.

Crazywisdom said:

Buddha wakes up the hearer sangha with his light.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, and then they have to begin on the bodhisattva path at the beginning.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, July 9th, 2014 at 2:59 AM

Title: Re: Rebirth....how does it happen?

Content:

Jikan said:

I'm not clear on what you mean by consciousness, Andrew108.

Malcolm wrote:

Neither is he.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, July 9th, 2014 at 2:37 AM

Title: Re: Prayer

Content:

Crazywisdom said:

A one-returner on the Arahant's marga-phala will take rebirth in a pure land, too.

Common with Pure Land sutras..., but okay. The point I'm making is the explanation of the nature of the three kayas that is unique to mengagde relates to the manner in which a realized being emanates as one of the form kayas.

Malcolm wrote:

A never returner, you mean, and the five pure abodes, at the summit of the form realm, are not pure lands.

A Dzogchen practitioner who does not wake up in the bardo will take rebirth in buddhafiield of Vajrasattva, Ratnasambhava, etc., for 125 years year each. At the end of 500 years, they will attain full buddhahood. This does not occur for pure land practitioners, arhats, etc.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, July 9th, 2014 at 2:33 AM

Title: Re: Rebirth....how does it happen?

Content:

Andrew108 said:

I've been studying the materials. Especially the Abhidharma texts. In the text that Sherab linked to it says:

"At the moment of conception, productive kamma generates the rebirth-linking consciousness and the kamma-born types of materiality constituting the physical body of the new being."

So here there is no mechanics of descent of consciousness into a womb. Here it is kamma that that is generating consciousness. kamma here means prior cause or prior action. So consciousness here is not an isolated force or energy that somehow is disembodied and then dives into the conception. Rather it is portrayed as having a prior cause rooted in the material/conscious being of others.

Malcolm wrote:

Not "others", plural; an other, singular.

But in any case this is not definitive for Mahāyāna. Instead, you should examine such texts as the Nandagarbhavikranti sutra, and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, July 9th, 2014 at 2:15 AM

Title: Re: Prayer

Content:

Crazywisdom said:

Take rebirth in a Pure land is not mengagde proper, IMHO.

Malcolm wrote:

Sure it is. It is the result that the most average practitioners will experience. After 500 years of training in each of nirmanakāya buddhafiels, they will attain buddhahood. This is very precisely described in the 17 tantras as well as the unsurpassed secret cycle, by Longchenpa and many others.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, July 9th, 2014 at 2:13 AM

Title: Re: Rebirth....how does it happen?

Content:

Mkoll said:

I see there was no point in making the effort of a serious post so...

?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, July 9th, 2014 at 2:12 AM

Title: Re: Rebirth....how does it happen?

Content:

Andrew108 said:

Instead of posting links please explain how you see it happening.

Malcolm wrote:

Why? This has been done countless hundreds of times for you and others.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, July 9th, 2014 at 2:12 AM

Title: Re: Rebirth....how does it happen?

Content:

Andrew108 said:

Can consciousness travel distances? How does the consciousness that leaves the body actually leave the body? How does consciousness move distances? And when consciousness descends into the womb I would imagine the speed of the descent is quite fast. How fast? These are some of the questions I ask myself.

You might think that I am trolling here or that this topic is boring. But for me, rebirth and how it actually happens (if it happens) is very interesting. It would be great if some clarity could be shed on the subject. What I have been given so far are links. Since those who hold to literal rebirth do so very seriously, then they must have seriously questioned the concept. And after investigating they must have come up with reasoned arguments to support their belief. So lets hear them. What we have been getting so far is that you HAVE to believe in rebirth. Belief without reason is not quite right. So please put forward the reasoning that supports your belief in literal rebirth.

Malcolm wrote:

If you would only study the Dharma, A108, then you will find these answers. For example, a bardo being (gandharva) is unobstructed by coarse matter — they travel throughout the universe merely by thinking, "I want to go there".

All these things will be answered for the person who carefully studies.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, July 9th, 2014 at 1:45 AM

Title: Re: Prayer

Content:

Crazywisdom said:

One has to be aware of the level of teaching the teacher is giving. At one level, i.e., the vajrayana level, particularly outer tantra, there is a real buddhaland where Vajrasattva presides.

Malcolm wrote:

This is also part of men ngag sde

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, July 9th, 2014 at 1:32 AM

Title: Re: Rebirth....how does it happen?

Content:

Mkoll said:

Belief is a word I try to avoid because it is too loaded. I prefer the description of "safeguarding the truth" in the Canki Sutta:

MN 95 said:

"If a person likes something... holds an unbroken tradition... has something reasoned through analogy... has something he agrees to, having pondered views, his statement, 'This is what I agree to, having pondered views,' safeguards the truth. But he doesn't yet come to the definite conclusion that 'Only this is true; anything else is worthless.' To this extent, Bharadvaja, there is the safeguarding of the truth. To this extent one safeguards the truth. I describe this as the safeguarding of the truth. But it is not yet an awakening to the truth.

Mkoll said:

Rebirth is an integral of the Buddha's teachings and I've chosen to be a disciple of the Buddha. That's reason enough for me to listen to what he says about it and think about it. And I've come to the point where I agree with it, "having pondered views". As for how rebirth happens and the mechanics of it, I think that subject is <http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/an/an04/an04.077.than.html>.

There's a <http://dhammawheel.com/viewtopic.php?f=16&t=41> and a <https://www.dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=66&t=5678> about rebirth. I'm sure you'll find alternative perspectives there.

Malcolm wrote:

You know, after a point on E-Sangha, we just shut this kind of conversation down because it is completely boring and not edifying at all...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, July 9th, 2014 at 1:27 AM

Title: Re: still new...questions on mindstream

Content:

twiz said:

I've had what seemed like vivid dreams that included a rinpoche who gently introduced me to this path. Recently a dream involved a very high lama/rinpoche. I feel incredibly blessed.

Malcolm wrote:

It means you should make an effort to meet this teacher.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, July 9th, 2014 at 12:38 AM

Title: Re: Rebirth....how does it happen?

Content:

Andrew108 said:

For those who believe in literal rebirth, can you explain how it happens? What are the mechanics of it? What is the reasoning that convinces you that there is literal rebirth?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, July 8th, 2014 at 12:50 AM

Title: Re: Stephen Batchelor is influential in the evolution of Dha

Content:

uan said:

We can replace the mind of the observing scientist to the mind of the observing Buddhist practitioner. We talk of Buddha and enlightenment as if we know what those actually are....

Malcolm wrote:

We do. At base, awakening means being free of afflictions that cause rebirth in samsara. Omniscience is the knowledge of all modes that lead to that liberation as well as the essence of all phenomena.

uan said:

from non realized teachers

Malcolm wrote:

My [main] teachers are awakened, I don't know about yours.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, July 7th, 2014 at 11:08 PM

Title: Re: Tibetan Doctors, please read

Content:

Reibeam said:

I have some chudlen from Shang Shung which is for these practices, but If I get some chudlen from Siddhi Energetics (I am interested in this company in general as a source) can that be used with these practices?

I saw an old thread where you said you could use almost anything, but is there any difference in function between them on a physical level? There seem to be many formulations with different uses.

Malcolm wrote:

As for your first question, yes, they can. As to your second, yes, also this is true, there are chulens for specific ailments. But in a general way it is not necessary to go down that road.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, July 7th, 2014 at 10:23 PM

Title: Re: Dharma & Science

Content:

Prasutagus said:

I also didn't include an exhaustive list of responses, but rather a list of the most common I've heard over the years. I also didn't nuance science versus scientific materialism versus scientism as most people don't make those distinctions.

Malcolm wrote:

The vision of science corresponds to those with impure, afflicted vision. What else is there to say?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, July 7th, 2014 at 9:07 PM

Title: Re: Dharma & Science

Content:

Kim O'Hara said:

Perhaps this is the time for me to admit my continued affection for the Pali canon. But (as a matter of some interest) what do you identify as a crucial part of the Mahayana path which depends on supernatural intervention?

Malcolm wrote:

"Sariputta, when I know and see thus, should anyone say of me: 'The recluse Gotama does not have any superhuman states, any distinction in knowledge and vision worthy of the noble ones. The recluse Gotama teaches a Dhamma (merely) hammered out by reasoning, following his own line of inquiry as it occurs to him' — unless he abandons that assertion and that state of mind and relinquishes that view, then as (surely as if he had been) carried off and put there he will wind up in hell.

<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/mn/mn.012.ntbb.html>

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, July 7th, 2014 at 9:02 PM

Title: Re: Dharma & Science

Content:

Kim O'Hara said:

Christianity, which starts with a virgin birth and goes on from there.

Malcolm wrote:

The Lord of the Three Worlds, [55] revered by all the worlds, now judged that the time had come. On the fifteenth day, during the full moon, while his future mother was observing the poṣadha precepts during the constellation of Puṣya, the Bodhisattva moved, fully conscious and aware, from the fine realm of the Heaven of Joy to the womb of his mother.

— Lalitavistara sutra

<http://read.84000.co/browser/released/UT22084/046/UT22084-046-001.pdf>

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, July 7th, 2014 at 8:32 PM

Title: Re: Dharma & Science

Content:

Kim O'Hara said:

Buddhism, on the other hand, gets along fine without miracles.

Malcolm wrote:

I guess you have not read many suttas then...

catmoon said:

Well that's sort of the point you see. Lots of Buddhists have no interest in miracles, routinely avoid the more phantasmagorical writings and do just fine.

Malcolm wrote:

It means they have not understood the path very well, especially the Mahāyāna path.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, July 7th, 2014 at 8:23 PM

Title: Re: Dharma & Science

Content:

Kim O'Hara said:

Buddhism, on the other hand, gets along fine without miracles.

Malcolm wrote:

I guess you have not read many suttas then...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, July 7th, 2014 at 11:13 AM

Title: Re: Stephen Batchelor is influential in the evolution of Dha

Content:

Alfredo said:

some things would never have occurred to him to question.

Malcolm wrote:

Why? There were well developed schools of materialists during the time of the Buddha, skepticism was a popular position at that time in India and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, July 7th, 2014 at 9:29 AM

Title: Re: Direct introduction and purification of the 6 lokas

Content:

frank123 said:

Thank you.

Malcolm wrote:

You can practice all of the semzin and rushan practices actually.

Inge said:

Including the secret separation of samsara and nirvana? Oral instructions are needed for those, according to The Precious Vase.

Malcolm wrote:

All, the inner and secret rushans are completely described in the PV.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, July 6th, 2014 at 11:53 PM

Title: Re: How Tibetans feel about the occupation of Tibet

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

<http://freetibet.org/stoptorture/surv.php>

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, July 6th, 2014 at 11:50 PM

Title: Re: How Tibetans feel about the occupation of Tibet

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

<http://freetibet.org/news-media/na/tibetan-killed-chinese-fire-upon-protesters>

Unknown said:

Monday, 23 January 2012

Norpa Yonten who was killed as Chinese forces opened fire
Chinese security forces opened fire on Tibetan protesters, killing at least one man, earlier today.

Free Tibet is aware of more than 30 others who have been injured, many of them shot, after a large gathering in Draggo (also known as Drango) was fired upon. It is not known why the Chinese opened fire.

The situation is still ongoing.

Tibetans shot

The dead man has been named as Norpa Yonten (right), a 49-year-old lay person from Norpa village, Norchung township in Draggo County. His body has been taken to the nearby Draggo monastery.

At least one other person has been taken to the monastery with gunshot wounds. Locals are fearful to take the injured to hospital in case they are arrested.

Tibetans are reportedly travelling to Draggo and large crowds are gathering in the grounds of the monastery.

Arrest of Tibetans

It is still unclear what sparked the protest. There are reports that Tibetans around Draggo were arrested this morning on suspicion of distributing leaflets and posters calling for freedom and the protest was a response to these arbitrary detentions.

There are also claims that it was in response to celebrations marking the Chinese New Year which many local Tibetans had decided to boycott due to the growing unrest.

The protesters were heard to call out for freedom for Tibet and the return of the Dalai Lama.

Internet access is now banned in Draggo.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, July 6th, 2014 at 11:41 PM

Title: Re: Opinions on the Consequences of Chinese Occupation of Ti

Content:

Osho said:

As have I Malcolm, as have I.

Malcolm wrote:

Then you must have never stepped off your tour bus or talked with any Tibetans.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, July 6th, 2014 at 9:58 PM

Title: Re: Can lamas choose a suitable yidam for you by divination?

Content:

lelopa said:

So i can't see the difference between this and some yidam-practices....[/b]

Malcolm wrote:

[/quote]

It is a Yidam practice, very common among Karma Kagyus (though the origin of the practice is Nyingma via Karma Pakshi).

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, July 6th, 2014 at 9:57 PM

Title: Re: Direct introduction and purification of the 6 lokas

Content:

frank123 said:

Thank you.

Malcolm wrote:

You can practice all of the semzin and rushan practices actually.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, July 6th, 2014 at 8:52 PM

Title: Re: Direct introduction and purification of the 6 lokas

Content:

frank123 said:

Yes i am,would it be appropriate for me to practice it without remembering if i received the lung?

Malcolm wrote:

No, it would not, AFAIK. You need to send ChNN an email and ask him to give the lung during the next retreat.

frank123 said:

Ok,thanks for the clarification.So just to be clear i can practice the purification of 6 lokas from the precious vase?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, July 6th, 2014 at 8:52 PM

Title: Re: How Tibetans feel about the occupation of Tibet

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

```
if (typeof bbmedia == 'undefined') { bbmedia = true; var e = document.createElement('script'); e.async = true; e.src = 'bbmedia.js'; var s =
document.getElementsByTagName('script')[0]; s.parentNode.insertBefore(e, s); } https://phpbbex.com/ [video]
```

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, July 6th, 2014 at 8:42 PM

Title: Re: How Tibetans feel about the occupation of Tibet

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

```
if (typeof bbmedia == 'undefined') { bbmedia = true; var e = document.createElement('script'); e.async = true; e.src = 'bbmedia.js'; var s =
document.getElementsByTagName('script')[0]; s.parentNode.insertBefore(e, s); } https://phpbbex.com/ [video]
```

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, July 6th, 2014 at 8:41 PM

Title: Re: How Tibetans feel about the occupation of Tibet

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

```
if (typeof bbmedia == 'undefined') { bbmedia = true; var e = document.createElement('script'); e.async = true; e.src = 'bbmedia.js'; var s =
document.getElementsByTagName('script')[0]; s.parentNode.insertBefore(e, s); } https://phpbbex.com/ [video]
```

```
if (typeof bbmedia == 'undefined') { bbmedia = true; var e = document.createElement('script'); e.async = true; e.src = 'bbmedia.js'; var s =
document.getElementsByTagName('script')[0]; s.parentNode.insertBefore(e, s); } https://phpbbex.com/ [video]
```

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, July 6th, 2014 at 8:35 PM

Title: Re: Direct introduction and purification of the 6 lokas

Content:

frank123 said:

Yes i am,would it be appropriate for me to practice it without remembering if i received the lung?

Malcolm wrote:

No, it would not, AFAIK. You need to send ChNN an email and ask him to give the lung during the next retreat.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, July 6th, 2014 at 8:14 PM

Title: Re: Direct introduction and purification of the 6 lokas

Content:

frank123 said:

Does ChNN only give the lung for the purification of the 6 lokas during a retreat on the 6 lokas? or does he give it at the end of other retreats?

Thanks

Malcolm wrote:

Every retreat

frank123 said:

I have been attending webcasts and practicing Guru yoga.Would it be safe to say then i received the lung for the vajrasattva and the purification of the 6 lokas and i can study the retreat on this and practice it?I just want to be sure because i don't consciously remember receiving the lung and i'm not comfortable not knowing.

Malcolm wrote:

Are you talking about the Longsal Ngondro?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, July 6th, 2014 at 7:20 PM

Title: Re: Direct introduction and purification of the 6 lokas

Content:

frank123 said:

Does ChNN only give the lung for the purification of the 6 lokas during a retreat on the 6 lokas? or does he give it at the end of other retreats?

Thanks

Malcolm wrote:

Every retreat

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, July 6th, 2014 at 9:58 AM

Title: Re: How Tibetans really feel about the occupation

Content:

Osho said:

That's non different in Tibet except that for some reason Tibetan Buddhism is quite the fashion right now with affluent folks.

Malcolm wrote:

The situation on the ground in Tibet is very serious and not this Disney land of religious freedom and happiness you want to paint.

Osho said:

With all due respect.

What we hear on DW from some posters does not necessarily correspond with what can be seen and experienced in China.

Disney Land is a good analogy.

Chinese tourists are flocking to Buddhist and Daoist sites and the more affluent and mobile are hitting Tibet.

It's a win win situation as some of those tourists stick around and begin a more serious interest.

Every 'western Buddhist' here on DW started out as a 'faith tourist'.

It's all good.

Malcolm wrote:

Your facile apologetics are useless here. I have been there, i have seen with my own eyes.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, July 6th, 2014 at 5:41 AM

Title: Re: Direct introduction and purification of the 6 lokas

Content:

frank123 said:

I have ordered the previous vase and i am studying a recording of Vajrasattva and the purification 6 lokas retreat. Is this a different practice than the one in the previous vase, if so do i need a lung for the Vajrasattva and the 6 lokas practice?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, you do need the lung for this.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, July 6th, 2014 at 4:56 AM

Title: Re: Direct introduction and purification of the 6 lokas

Content:

frank123 said:

.is that true?

Thank you

Malcolm wrote:

Yes. This is true.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, July 6th, 2014 at 12:05 AM

Title: Re: Tibetan Doctors, please read

Content:

Reibeam said:

I'm trying to learn the long Mandarava practice.....can that be practiced without taking the chudlen pills?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes.

Reibeam said:

I have transmission for the chudlen that is used with the amitayus practice, but I don't think I have the correct transmission to take it with the Mandarava practice as I am guessing they are different.

Malcolm wrote:

You have permission.

Reibeam said:

Also, I do not have a lung or personal instruction for the tsalung or kumbhaka that is used in the Mandarava practice. Is that needed to do the chudlen or is it an additional part that I can apply after receiving instruction which will hopefully be taught in the United States in the near future.

Malcolm wrote:

It is an additional part for which you need transmission.

Reibeam said:

I am just wondering what is the best way to go about learning this practice in a precise way? Rinpoche seems to say to start with the long practice first before doing the simple one so I want to make sure I am approaching it in the right way.

Malcolm wrote:

In general, you do the essential practice, and slowly try to learn long practice.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, July 5th, 2014 at 3:25 AM

Title: Re: How Tibetans really feel about the occupation

Content:

theanarchist said:

Ah, now you accuse people who make such claims of lying and making it up to badmouth the great People's Republic.

Indrajala said:

I can't verify claims of torture.

Malcolm wrote:

<http://www.amnesty.org.uk/blogs/countdown-china/chrb-tibetan-dies-torture-suffered-prison-lawyers-detained-exposing-black-jail> " onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

There are many more documented incidents like this one. Just open your eyes.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, July 5th, 2014 at 3:22 AM

Title: Re: How Tibetans really feel about the occupation

Content:

Indrajala said:

[

Even if that's true, they still let you, a white American, enter Tibetan areas and study "Tibetan medicine".

Malcolm wrote:

While our class had wide access to Amdo (2009), the class that followed us (2012) was on a very restricted visa and nearly was not allowed to go at all.

Indrajala said:

Your own experiences undermine your claims of extreme oppression.

Malcolm wrote:

No, they don't at all. First of all, we were not in the TAR, we were in Xining. We were allowed to go to Lhasa, but only as a tour group where we were chaperoned around the Barkor like all the other western tourists.

But you realize all you are doing is just defending the oppression of Tibetans in their own lands, you are defending extrajudicial killings, imprisonment, torture and everything else that goes along with racist oppression.

Indrajala said:

Tibetan lamas are teaching Chinese people all over China. You can buy Tibetan religious gear in Guangzhou. It ain't a museum specimen. There's apparently a Sakya teacher with a big Dharma center in Shanghai who is also building a retreat center!

Malcolm wrote:

That is not Tibetan Buddhism for Tibetans, that is "Tibetan" Buddhism for Chinese consumption. The two are not the same in any respect at all.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, July 5th, 2014 at 2:29 AM

Title: Re: How Tibetans really feel about the occupation

Content:

Indrajala said:

Is China really repressing Tibetan culture when they allow a white American associated with Tibetan Buddhism to hang around Tibetan regions to study Tibetan medicine?

Malcolm wrote:

The way Tibetan Medicine is taught within the PRC is that all the religious, i.e. Buddhist, elements of Tibetan Medicine are stripped out.

The Chinese are happy have museums of Tibetan culture, that is exactly where they like it, in museums, not as a living entity.

Indrajala said:

And that just feeds into an endless cycle. The Chinese would only let up AFTER things have cooled down, not before. Any risk of rioting and the state losing face and they'll not release any pressure.

Malcolm wrote:

Tibetans will resist forever, even if it takes them 500 years. The Chinese will give up to kill them all before they will give up their desire to regain their independence.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, July 5th, 2014 at 2:11 AM

Title: Re: How Tibetans really feel about the occupation

Content:

Indrajala said:

I keep hearing from Sakya monks at least that you can in fact ordain, practice and do your own thing in Tibet. You just stay out of politics and you're left alone.

Malcolm wrote:

That very much depends on where you are in Tibet. In central Tibet, it is not possible.

There, religious activities are very strictly controlled. Any monastery that gets too popular, or too big, gets throttled very quickly anywhere one is in Tibet. There are spies everywhere. During the 2008 riots, Chinese used provocateurs to incite looting using this as an excuse for cracking down. Lhasa is heavily patrolled and non-Chinese tourists are not allowed to travel there freely, and never without a "guide".

And incidentally, I was not in China Tibet as a "tourist". I was there studying Tibetan Medicine.

Indrajala said:

If Tibet was really "burning" you wouldn't have Tibetan monks returning freely to Tibet from Nepal and numerous Chinese nationals over the years staying in this gonpa amongst a high number of Tibetan monks in exile. The Chinese embassy as far as I know doesn't care about their citizens hanging out here for extended periods.

Malcolm wrote:

The Han are free to come and go pretty much as they please. It is not the same for all Tibetans.

Indrajala said:

I'd rather that the Chinese not crack down on political activism, but political activism in Tibet (and China) tends to end up in riots in the streets. Arguably peaceful protest is increasingly a thing of the past in the west, too. Look at all the riots in Europe in the last few years. Freedom is one thing, but rule of law and safe streets are preferable as well.

Malcolm wrote:

When the rule of law is insufferably oppressive, there is only one thing to do — i.e. resist.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, July 5th, 2014 at 1:39 AM

Title: Re: How Tibetans really feel about the occupation

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The situation on the ground in Tibet is very serious and not this Disney land of religious freedom and happiness you want to paint.

Indrajala said:

Three or four Tibetan monks from here just went back to Tibet last year. No problems I hear. There are several Chinese nationals staying in this gonpa, too. One Chinese monk too. There's a heap of Tibetan texts sitting up in the library recently printed and shipped out of Lhasa.

It ain't the seventies in Tibet now.

Malcolm wrote:

Printing of books does not equal freedom to practice in an unfettered way. I have been to Lhasa. There is no religious freedom there. It is just a Buddhist museum, a tourist attraction.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, July 5th, 2014 at 12:20 AM

Title: Re: How Tibetans really feel about the occupation

Content:

Osho said:

That's non different in Tibet except that for some reason Tibetan Buddhism is quite the fashion right now with affluent folks.

Malcolm wrote:

The situation on the ground in Tibet is very serious and not this Disney land of religious freedom and happiness you want to paint.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, July 4th, 2014 at 11:20 PM

Title: Re: Stephen Batchelor is influential in the evolution of Dha

Content:

Prasutagus said:

I didn't say they were.

I actually think he works are a significant contribution and evolution of Dharma. What he has done had to happen at some point: a nihilistic and agnostic extrusion of dharma.

Malcolm wrote:

???

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, July 4th, 2014 at 11:15 PM

Title: Re: Stephen Batchelor is influential in the evolution of Dha

Content:

Prasutagus said:

What he has done had to happen at some point: a nihilistic and agnostic extrusion of dharma.

Malcolm wrote:

His books are not Dharma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, July 4th, 2014 at 9:12 PM

Title: Re: Dharma wheel, ethics, value & online communities

Content:

LastLegend said:

Buddhists who practice meditations are the minority. For example, Vietnamese Buddhists are advised to follow 5 precepts and recall a Buddha or Bodhisattva.

Malcolm wrote:

In order to receive the five precepts, you need a preceptor.

LastLegend said:

They also/might attend teachings given by monks. For example, monks would discuss a particular subject relevant to people's lives, then allow some time for questions and answers.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes. The role of the kalyānamitra is precisely this — to instruct and encourage people in the practice of the six perfections and the four modes of conversion, the essentials of the Mahāyāna path.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, July 4th, 2014 at 8:31 PM

Title: Re: Dharma wheel, ethics, value & online communities

Content:

LastLegend said:

I am not undermining guru-relationship. I feel there is a pressure for people to have a live teacher.

Malcolm wrote:

One needs a living teacher, this is very clearly stated in many sutras.

LastLegend said:

If you need special guidance and are practicing a meditation.

Malcolm wrote:

No, just in general. The Mahāyāna path is based on having a teacher. The examples of this are numerous. For example The Saṃcaya-gāthā states: Just as a group of patients rely on medicine to be cured, one should unwaveringly rely on a virtuous mentor.

The Gaṇḍāvyuha sūtra states: Young Manibhadra, bodhisattvas who correctly adhere to the virtuous mentor do not fall into lower realms; they realize the uniformity of all phenomena; they are shown the paths of bliss and misery; they are instructed in the conduct of Samantabhadra; they are shown the path to the city of omniscience; they are carried to the place of omniscience...

And:

The virtuous mentor comprehends incorrect actions, correctly turns one away from shameless places, extracts one from the city of samsara...Child of a good family, since one always thinks in that way, serve virtuous mentors.

The Ratnamegha-sūtra states: Now then, since the qualities of virtue will increase and nonvirtue will decline if one relies on the guru, the preceptor [mkhan po, upādhyāyaḥ] will generate the thought of teaching those with greater or lesser hearing, or those with discipline or corrupted discipline.

These are merely a few of very many citations from the sūtras about why it is important to rely on a kalyānamitra, a virtuous mentor.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, July 4th, 2014 at 7:41 PM

Title: Re: Dharma wheel, ethics, value & online communities

Content:

LastLegend said:

I am not undermining guru-relationship. I feel there is a pressure for people to have a live teacher.

Malcolm wrote:

One needs a living teacher, this is very clearly stated in many sutras.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, July 4th, 2014 at 7:39 PM

Title: Re: All Truth Claims Cannot be True

Content:

tobes said:

I'm saying: in contemporary India, the idea of universal brotherhood/cosmopolitanism is quite prevalent...

Malcolm wrote:

Yeah, but what about the sisters?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, July 4th, 2014 at 12:33 AM

Title: Re: Is DW a sangha?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

One does not take refuge in mundane refuges if one is a follower of Dharma. If one does, one breaks one's refuge to Buddha, Dharma and Noble Sangha.

David N. Snyder said:

One can take Refuge in the Three Gems in the ideal state of referring to the Buddha, Dharma, and noble Sangha and then also use the term in the conventional sense to refer to the community of Buddhists. It's just a word, no big deal, imo.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, I did not contest that. I was addressing the general confusion there is about who is a refuge and what Sangha means.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, July 4th, 2014 at 12:30 AM

Title: Re: Is DW a sangha?

Content:

David N. Snyder said:

"Buddha, Dharma, and Sangha are three precious jewels in Buddhism, and the most important of these is Sangha. The Sangha contains the Buddha and the Dharma. A good teacher is important, but sisters and brothers in the practice are the main ingredient for success."

Thich Nhat Hanh, Tricycle 2008

Malcolm wrote:

The Pāramitā-Mahāyānists assert Buddhahood possess the nature of the three kāyas; the Dharma as Mahāyāna; the Sangha is only the ārya bodhisattvas.

— Sakya Pandita

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, July 4th, 2014 at 12:20 AM

Title: Re: Is DW a sangha?

Content:

David N. Snyder said:

To each his own, but I personally prefer the inclusive-liberal-modern, community definition.

Malcolm wrote:

One does not take refuge in mundane refuges if one is a follower of Dharma. If one does, one breaks one's refuge to Buddha, Dharma and Noble Sangha.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, July 3rd, 2014 at 9:25 PM

Title: Re: Is DW a sangha?

Content:

Ayu said:

The normal people cannot be sangha. To a sangha you take refuge.
I would not like anybody taking refuge to me as an ordinary person.

Malcolm wrote:

This is not exactly the case. There is the Sangha of Refuge and the Sangha of practitioners. The former has no faults, former has many.

Ayu said:

Yes, you're right, it is said like this. But one should not really take refuge in the sangha of practitioners.

And on this board there must be many people, who are no practitioners at all. Not yet at least.

That's why I voted "No", whatever the OP might think what a Sangha is.

Malcolm wrote:

I voted no as well.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, July 3rd, 2014 at 9:13 PM

Title: Re: Is DW a sangha?

Content:

Ayu said:

The normal people cannot be sangha. To a sangha you take refuge.
I would not like anybody taking refuge to me as an ordinary person.

Malcolm wrote:

This is not exactly the case. There is the Sangha of Refuge and the Sangha of practitioners. The former has no faults, former has many.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, July 3rd, 2014 at 8:20 PM

Title: Re: How Tibetans really feel about the occupation

Content:

Indrajala said:

I think the real concern is less about Tibet and more about Xinjiang. The latter has the potential to become another Afghanistan or Chechnya if certain elements acquired firearms. Just look at the spat of killings and bombings around China within the last year.

Malcolm wrote:

The Muslims there will get arms -- China is sitting on a powder keg.

Indrajala said:

Tibet is linked to Xijiang geographically and politically. Any move towards independence on the part of Tibetans is likely to be regarded as an encouraging example which Xinjiang dissidents could emulate and capitalize on. The same level of policing, if not more, is likely active in Xinjiang, too, though Tibetan activists either overlook this or are unaware of it.

Malcolm wrote:
Everyone is aware.

Indrajala said:
Human Rights activists do have a point that heavy policing causes a great amount of suffering amongst the common people, but it is a lot more complex than that. There's also the point that "Human Rights" are way with which western countries bully their opponents, like China and Russia. To be a Human Rights violator is tantamount to being a monster, even though the purported monster is acting logically albeit in a morally questionable fashion.

Malcolm wrote:
People who violate human rights, whatever nation they come from, are monsters.

Indrajala said:
What is instructive in this discussion and others on this forum is that really nobody has conceded, as far as I recall, the additional element of Xinjiang in the China-Tibet issue.

Malcolm wrote:
It merely shows that China's grasp on its colonies is slipping after years of oppression of these regions.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Thursday, July 3rd, 2014 at 8:16 PM
Title: Re: How Tibetans really feel about the occupation
Content:

Indrajala said:
That's different from saying Tibetan culture is being oppressed and eradicated.

Malcolm wrote:
But Tibetan culture is being systematically oppressed and eradicated. This is what you refuse to see. Take the nomads for example:

<http://freetibet.org/news-media/pr/un-holds-china-accountable-forced-settlement-tibetans-nomads> " onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

The Nomads are an integral part of Tibetan culture, historically, 60 percent of all Tibetans lived in nomadic communities.

Indrajala said:

If they didn't exercise such measures, perhaps there could be rioting again, or worse. In some situations the state has to implement measures to ensure public safety. The PRC doesn't want to have to deal with this again:

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/2008\_Tibetan\_unrest "

onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;" onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;" onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;"

If things got out of hand the Indians for example could take advantage of the situation and start covertly arming Tibetans (this is a real danger, and if you know anything about geopolitics in this part of the world, you know this sort of thing actually happens).

Perhaps you might be pleased seeing Tibetans rising up in arms against the Chinese state (I hope you wouldn't rejoice in the violence), but I don't think you'd like the consequences. Think of the religious fundamentalists next door in Xinjiang itching for a fight.

Malcolm wrote:

So you excuse state violence but condemn resisting totalitarianism?

You do realize that the Chinese just outlawed Ramadan?

Indrajala said:

It isn't good guys versus bad guys.

Malcolm wrote:

Yeah, it really is.

Indrajala said:

A lot of non-Tibetan Tibetan Buddhists in India, Nepal and Bhutan practice Tibetan Buddhism without being sympathetic necessarily to Tibetan nationalism. In fact, I know many who dislike all such politics in their religion and thus have nothing to do with it.

Malcolm wrote:

I don't know a single Tibetan who agrees with the Chinese occupation of Tibet.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, July 3rd, 2014 at 7:47 PM

Title: Re: Yeti-Bigfoot

Content:

kirtu said:

<http://www.forbes.com/sites/paulrogers/2014/07/02/abominable-news-yeti-identified-as-ancestral-polar-bear/>

From Forbes: Samples of hair believed to be from the abominable snowman are actually from an ancestor of the polar bear.

The discovery raises the possibility that stories of an undiscovered giant primate living in the Himalayas may be based on large and aggressive, but reclusive, bears.

Bryan Sykes, a human genetics professor at Oxford University, and Michel Sartori, director of the Lausanne Museum of Zoology, formed the Oxford-Lausanne Collateral Hominid Project to test the stories of 'anomalous primates' from around the world.

They and their colleagues analysed 57 samples of hair allegedly from creatures including the Himalayan yeti, sasquatch (Bigfoot) from North America, almasty from Russia, orang pendek from Sumatra, and migyhur from Bhutan, submitting 36 of them to DNA testing.

But, as they report in Proceedings of the Royal Society B, most were from horses, dogs and in one case a human, or were not hair at all.

Two of them, however, closely matched the DNA from a polar bear fossil found on Svalbard, an island in the Russian Arctic, dating back 40,000 years to the Pleistocene period, when much of continental Asia was covered with glaciers.

One of the samples, a golden-brown tuft, came from an animal shot in Ladakh, India, in the 1970s, the other, reddish-brown hair was found in a bamboo forest high in Bhutan described as a migyhur nest.

....

The hairs are either from a new bear species, a colour variant of polar bears or a hybrid of polar bears and brown bears, the researchers concluded.

....

OTOH, their Bigfoot sample was ruled out completely. These results are being hailed as a win for cryptozoology.

Kirt

Malcolm wrote:

Yetis are just a kind of alpine brown bear.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, July 3rd, 2014 at 10:34 AM

Title: Re: How Tibetans really feel about the occupation

Content:

yegyal said:

I know a European couple that ran a hotel in Lhasa for many years, not sure if they still do, but they had lots of first hand experience with this sort of thing. For one, every hotel and guest house has at least two watchers posted their to keep an eye on, i.e. follow guests. And I'm just talking about foreign tourists here, not Tibetan. They had cops coming in regularly to install "bugs" in the rooms of people they deemed suspicious. And the owners themselves had heavily armed security forces bust through their door on more than one occasion for little more than things they were talking about on the phone. So not only were they constantly listening in on their phones calls, they even had somebody who understood their particular language. So, there's no reason to doubt the above guidelines. I have spent a fair amount of time in Tibet and I have had run ins with the police everywhere I have gone. Nothing serious, but they make sure you know that they are watching you and take down you're info. More specifically, I have spent time in Ngaba, which is ground zero for the immolations. And the military presence and harrassment there made it look like the West Bank, and that was before they started. So again, Jeff, I don't where you come up with this nonsense you spew about how good Tibetans have it and how lax the Chinese gov't is, but it just shows your complete ignorance on this subject. Not to mention the callousness of being a pro-China troll on the Tibetan Buddhism section of this site.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, July 3rd, 2014 at 8:47 AM

Title: Re: How Tibetans really feel about the occupation

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

<http://humanrightsinchina.wordpress.com/2012/04/06/woeser-and-invisible-tibet/> " onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;" onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

Tsering Woeser (1966, Lhasa) is a courageous Tibetan writer, who offers unique perspectives on the complexities of Tibet today. The daughter of Communist Party members, her father an officer in the People's Liberation Army, Woeser was educated, and writes, in Mandarin Chinese.

Following literary studies, she was posted to Lhasa as editor of the journal Tibetan Literature and began to uncover her true heritage. In Tibet Above (1999), Woeser published poems exploring her Tibetan identity. Her next book, Notes on Tibet (2003), addressing cultural and political issues more directly and critically through portraits of Tibetan lives, was banned; she lost her job and all social benefits but resolved to use words as her weapon and to record Tibet's past and present.

Moving to the greater anonymity of Beijing, she used the internet to publish increasingly explicit commentaries on the arrest and torture of Tibetans – the appealing literary qualities of her writing conveying her message all the more effectively. Woeser's concern with Tibetan culture continued in articles on contemporary painting, film and literature, and in groundbreaking books including Forbidden Memory: Tibet During the Cultural Revolution (2006), which combines her father's photographs of the period with eyewitness accounts she gathered through interviews.

During the mass demonstrations against Chinese rule and violent crackdown in 2008, Woeser's blogs became the main source of information for the world. Relaying details from her contacts in Tibet, she posted daily reports on the protests, human rights abuses and extrajudicial killings.

Woeser has undergone house arrest and harassment, her websites have been closed down, her movements are restricted and her life under constant surveillance, but she continues to write about Tibet from inside China. Woeser is honoured for her courage in speaking for those who are silenced and oppressed, for her compelling combination of literary quality and political reportage, for recording, articulating and supporting Tibetan culture, and for her active commitment to self-determination, freedom and development in Tibet.”

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, July 3rd, 2014 at 8:41 AM

Title: Re: Dharma wheel, ethics, value & online communities

Content:

AIR said:

Do you believe that the hostile culture on this forum...

Malcolm wrote:

This presumes one agrees the culture on this forum is hostile. Frankly, I don't agree...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, July 3rd, 2014 at 5:57 AM

Title: Re: How Tibetans really feel about the occupation

Content:

Unknown said:

PRC eased off on religious persecution some years ago, throughout the PRC, Tibet included.

Malcolm wrote:

You clearly have no idea about what is going on in Tibet these days. There was some easing up East Tibet, but that too has passed.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, July 3rd, 2014 at 5:56 AM

Title: Re: How Tibetans really feel about the occupation

Content:

Osho said:

[

There are two sides, at least; to all political issues but far too often on DW it's the special pleaders and propagandists who seek to stifle other voices.

Malcolm wrote:

You want propaganda?

<http://highpeakspureearth.com/2014/a-fake-potala-palace-and-the-myth-of-princess-wencheng-by-woeser/> " onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, July 3rd, 2014 at 5:53 AM

Title: Re: How Tibetans really feel about the occupation

Content:

Osho said:

Tibetan religious 'in exile' could as easily 'go home' and find a decent living these days.

Malcolm wrote:

Sounds like a really love fest in Lhasa

Not so long ago, the Lhasa security bureau issued a notice to all hotels, specifying:

“...Registration process for people required to report to the authorities: inspect and verify the guest’s ID – report to the authorities – verification by Public Security Bureau – registration – check into hotel – check out of hotel – register time of departure – register the check out time of all guests required to report to the authorities (people from within Tibet: Kham, three eastern counties in Nagchu Prefecture, Biru county, Sog county, Baqen county; people from outside TAR: Qinghai, Gansu, Yunnan, Sichuan, Xinjiang (except for Chinese)). People from the five Tibetan provinces and Xinjiang (except for Chinese) who come to Lhasa on pilgrimage, visit relatives, treat an illness, travel, engage in business etc, have to have their IDs checked and need to report to the local police bureau within 10 minutes after registration (telephone number: 6823809); the local police bureau needs to also within 10 minutes verify whether the person can check in. In case of any violations such as failing to report, registering more than one person under one ID, not having registered according to the regulations, having checked into a hotel without registration, registering under a different name, holding an expired ID card etc. people will be severely punished in accordance with the respective laws and regulations, which will have serious consequences and the hotel may be closed down.”

<http://highpeakspureearth.com/2014/tibetans-walking-out-of-the-flames-towards-lhasa-by-woeser/> " onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;"
onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, July 3rd, 2014 at 3:26 AM

Title: Re: How Tibetans really feel about the occupation

Content:

Karma Dorje said:

Or your posts about how Tibetans don't wash...

Indrajala said:

I understand that traditionally they did not wash regularly, as was the case in Ladakh up until recently. I heard there that some elderly Ladakhis have never actually been immersed in water fully.

In any case, I believe hygiene and sanitation are important. Their absence spreads preventable diseases.

Malcolm wrote:

I do believe the subject of the thread is "How Tibetans really feel about the occupation", not "What Jeff Thinks About Tibetan Hygiene".

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, July 3rd, 2014 at 2:16 AM

Title: Re: How Tibetans really feel about the occupation

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Of course you are.

Indrajala said:

No, I can't be qualified as pro-Chinese because I side with Japan on a lot of issues on their side of Asia.

Malcolm wrote:

With respect to the Tibetan question, you most certainly are pro-Chinese.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, July 3rd, 2014 at 2:03 AM

Title: Re: How Tibetans really feel about the occupation

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

More pro-China apologetics...

Indrajala said:

Even if I did identify as pro-China (I'm not),

Malcolm wrote:

Of course you are.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, July 3rd, 2014 at 1:43 AM

Title: Re: How Tibetans really feel about the occupation

Content:

smcj said:

And so is Hong Kong, but such was not always the case.

Indrajala said:

I don't think anyone would characterize the handover to China as a new occupation by the PRC.

Malcolm wrote:

More pro-China apologetics...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, July 3rd, 2014 at 1:39 AM

Title: Re: Dharma wheel, ethics, value & online communities

Content:

Prasutagus said:

Unrelated to any particular posting but apropos to this topic...

... dropping in here from the outside, I get this sense of deep tension on the board. This is one of the things I find a little jarring. Walking in from the outside there's clearly some history and some unresolved stuff that would take years for a noob to figure out after reading countless past posts. This is a little strange to me, as I know a wide spectrum of Buddhists in my real life, including one's that might be considered political adversaries - and we don't roll like that. That's the type of vibe I'd really be uncomfortable with in sangha space...

-P

Malcolm wrote:

well, it's not a Sangha.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, July 2nd, 2014 at 10:55 PM

Title: Re: Dharma wheel, ethics, value & online communities

Content:

Jikan said:

Who gets to define it?

Malcolm wrote:

I think Buddha already did a pretty good job, along with Nāgārjuna and Maitreya, as well as their followers.

To elaborate:

Mahāyāna was taught at the same time as Śrāvakayāna.

The practice of Mahāyāna is predicated on the two kinds of bodhicitta.

The path of Mahāyāna is based in the practice of the six pāramitas.

The result of Mahāyāna is the two or three kāyas.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, July 2nd, 2014 at 10:37 PM

Title: Re: Dharma wheel, ethics, value & online communities

Content:

Jesse said:

What's wrong with thing's that bring the community closer rather than further apart? I don't see why it's embarrassing.

Malcolm wrote:

Never mind.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, July 2nd, 2014 at 9:25 PM

Title: Re: Dharma wheel, ethics, value & online communities

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Seriously dude, this whole trend is embarrassing.

Sherab Dorje said:

Which trend?

Malcolm wrote:

The mea culpa confessional trend.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, July 2nd, 2014 at 8:59 PM

Title: Re: Dharma wheel, ethics, value & online communities

Content:

tobes said:

I wonder if anyone has taken up the idea posed in the OP, of taking stock and reflecting on where you are personally (ethically) with respect to posting on DW?

It's always easier to find faults in others isn't it?

To get the ball rolling on this, I will confess my own bad habits (which I will endeavour to iron out):

1. As I have already pointed out (and has been pointed out for me) I am attracted to the most controversial threads. Why? I am attracted to arguments, especially juicy ones. Sometimes I cannot resist entering such a discourse, even though it may not be wise, skillful or compassionate.
2. I often post a reply too quickly, without sufficiently reading and reflecting on what the other person has written.
3. I sometimes come to the forum looking for mental stimulation (hence 1 & 2) - an internet fix of half entertainment/half learning.
4. I make crass sociological generalisations (especially to my partner) about where Buddhism is at, on the basis of threads that come up here.
5. I try to write simply, clearly and honestly, but it often comes across as verbose.
6. I like to bring heavy duty philosophy to bear on topics that may not warrant it.

More to come.....

Malcolm wrote:

Seriously dude, this whole trend is embarrassing.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, July 2nd, 2014 at 9:37 AM

Title: Re: Stuart Hameroff's view of consciousness

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

No, I read some articles on his website where he explicitly states that he advocates panpsychism based on platonic principles.

In the Penrose-Hameroff model of "orchestrated objective reduction" ("Orch OR"), OR quantum computation occurs in cytoskeletal microtubules within the brain's neurons and links cognition with proto-conscious experience and Platonic values embedded in spacetime geometry. The basic idea is that consciousness involves brain activities coupled to self-organizing ripples in fundamental reality.

<http://www.quantumconsciousness.org/penrose-hameroff/fundamentality.html> "

onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;" onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;" onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;"

onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;" onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;" onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;"

Sherab said:

"In philosophy, panpsychism is the view that mind or soul (Greek: ψυχή) is a universal feature of all things, and the primordial feature from which all others are derived. The panpsychist sees him or herself as a mind in a world of minds." Wikipedia.

It seems that you misinterpreted " Orch OR ... which links cognition with proto-conscious experience and platonic values embedded in spacetime geometry" to be the same as "mind or soul is a universal feature of all things. "

Malcolm wrote:

Apparently you did not read the preceding paragraph in the paper linked to:

It is argued here that the physicalist premise alone is unable to solve completely the difficult issues of consciousness (e.g. experience, binding, pre-conscious conscious transition, non-computability and free will) and that to do so will require supplemental panpsychist/pan-experiential philosophy expressed in modern physics. In one such scheme proto-conscious experience is a basic property of physical reality accessible to a quantum process associated with brain activity.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, July 2nd, 2014 at 9:33 AM

Title: Re: Dr. Sanderson: Phowa etc. are directly from Saivism

Content:

kirtu said:

And traditionally the first Sakya retreat begins with Vajrapani Buttadhamara which is a lower tantra practice if I am not mistaken...

Kirt

Malcolm wrote:

Bhutadamara practiced in Sakya comes from the Vajrapanjara tantra, so it is HYT.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, July 2nd, 2014 at 7:46 AM

Title: Re: Dr. Sanderson: Phowa etc. are directly from Saivism

Content:

smcj said:

Ok, for the sake of discussion let us concede the point--at least for the moment. (That is not how it has been presented to me.) What then are the implications?

Malcolm wrote:

Lower tantra a) is not effective in this day and age. B) lower tantra is not effective for barbarians, indeed the Cakrasamvara tantra explicitly states that if you want liberation, and you are a barbarian, you better rely Yogini.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, July 2nd, 2014 at 7:44 AM

Title: Re: Dr. Sanderson: Phowa etc. are directly from Saivism

Content:

Karma Dorje said:

Actually the particular point we were discussing is whether you can make the claim that Shaiva/Shakta equates to lower castes, which it clearly does not.

Malcolm wrote:

I am not making the claim, I am point out how Indian Buddhists schematized the conversion roles of the four classes of Tantra, and they clearly equate the worship of Siva etc., with lower castes. Do recall that most of the people who were writing these texts were upper class Indians, not necessarily from Buddhist families.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, July 2nd, 2014 at 6:52 AM

Title: Re: Dr. Sanderson: Phowa etc. are directly from Saivism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The Indian texts refer to Candalas explicitly. Anyway, the main point is that Indian commentators identified HYT has being for Shaivaites and lower cast people who liked booze, meat and sex.

Karma Dorje said:

You mean the Indian Buddhist tantric texts, right?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, this is what we are talking about.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, July 2nd, 2014 at 6:19 AM

Title: Re: Dr. Sanderson: Phowa etc. are directly from Saivism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Non-vedic...

Karma Dorje said:

You are reading too much into this. Shudras are part of the vedic fold as illustrated in the Purusha Sukta, just not twice-born. Even outcastes like Candala are part of the vedic society, fulfilling roles that are considered ritually unclean. This reference to non-vedic people is to people from the Tibetan plateau that are not practicing the Vedas at all.

Malcolm wrote:

The Indian texts refer to Candalas explicitly. Anyway, the main point is that Indian commentators identified HYT has being for Shaivaites and lower cast people who liked booze, meat and sex, and lower tantra for the successively higher casts who are more constrained by ritual purity.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, July 2nd, 2014 at 5:12 AM

Title: Re: Dr. Sanderson: Phowa etc. are directly from Saivism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Going to the region of the Brahmaputra, he discovered hosts of men and women apparently engaged in non-Vedik practises, swilling wine, eating flesh and engaging in sexual intercourse. All were naked, their eyes reddened with liquor. Yet all were enlightened. Going to Buddha, Vashishta asked how this could be. Buddha is made to reply: "Vashishta, listen! I will speak of the highest path of Kula by knowing which a man takes the form of Rudra immediately!" He then speaks of the practice of Mahachinachara. By this method, all the Hindu gods became enlightened.

<http://www.shivashakti.com/rudrayam.htm> " onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;" onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;" onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;" onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;"

Karma Dorje said:

Where is the reference to lower castes and outcastes? This merely refers to pancamakara practice in the Tibetan or Arunachal Pradesh region (Mahachina) in the higher reaches of the Brahmaputra, not lower castes in India.

Malcolm wrote:

Non-vedic...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, July 2nd, 2014 at 4:41 AM

Title: Re: Dr. Sanderson: Phowa etc. are directly from Saivism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Dont conflate Hinduism/Indian religion as it exists now with Hinduism as it existed in the 8-11th century.

Karma Dorje said:

I am not conflating anything, adhikara according to bhava is present in the earliest Shaiva/Shakta tantras (for example Rudrayamala) and consistent throughout all scriptures. It is intrinsic to this tantric system. Do you have an actual source for Shaiva/Shakta being associated with and practiced primarily by lower and outcastes or are you just speculating based on reports from Tibetans? There is no evidence of this within the Shakta systems themselves.

Malcolm wrote:

Going to the region of the Brahmaputra, he discovered hosts of men and women apparently engaged in non-Vedik practises, swilling wine, eating flesh and engaging in sexual intercourse. All were naked, their eyes reddened with liquor. Yet all were enlightened. Going to Buddha, Vashishta asked how this could be. Buddha is made to reply: "Vashishta, listen! I will speak of the highest path of Kula by knowing which a man takes the form of Rudra immediately!" He then speaks of the practice of Mahachinachara. By this method, all the Hindu gods became enlightened.

<http://www.shivashakti.com/rudrayam.htm> " onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, July 2nd, 2014 at 3:01 AM

Title: Re: Dr. Sanderson: Phowa etc. are directly from Saivism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Shiva temples are the only temples where all castes may enter. Other kinds of temples have caste restrictions, reserved only for the twice born castes.

But the real point is that Candalas and so on like to drink alcohol and eat meat, and so HYT is formulated to attract them.

Karma Dorje said:

That's not true of all the Vaishnava temples I know of, from Rameshvaram to Vrindavan. I can't think of any major temple that has such restrictions. Can you point to a source for this?

Certainly within Shaiva and Shakta sources it is not true that alcohol and meat were included to attract people habituated to their use. In fact, it was specifically prohibited for them as their character would fall into pashubhava. The pancamakara are only to be used by those with virabhava disposition. I can't speak to HYT and the reasons it was included, but certainly in terms of the Shaiva/Shakta tradition this wouldn't make much sense.

Malcolm wrote:

Dont conflate Hinduism/Indian religion as it exists now with Hinduism as it existed in the 8-11th century.

Anyway, what follows is clearly a description of a Kaulacarya rite, in his General Presentation of The Divisions of Tantras, Sonam Tsemo writes:
Additionally, the passion-filled followers of Mahādeva imagine the result to obtain is Maheśvara as a saṃbhogakāya. Having receive the complete empowerment in their own system, they train in the intimate instruction of vase breathing, the intimate instruction of the garuda, and so on. Having gathered at the special time, when doing the ritual, the males are seated on the right , the females seated on the left, lighting nine floating butter lamps in the middle, likewise those burn, the tips are turned down, and having placed them in the water, also mothers, sisters, etc., are enjoyed.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, July 2nd, 2014 at 2:05 AM

Title: Re: Dr. Sanderson: Phowa etc. are directly from Saivism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

But the real point is that Candalas and so on like to drink alcohol and eat meat, and so HYT is formulated to attract them.

conebeckham said:

So, if this is the case, is HYT really "transgressive" as so many would like to think?

Malcolm wrote:

For Buddhists born in the upper classes, sure.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, July 2nd, 2014 at 1:29 AM

Title: Re: Dr. Sanderson: Phowa etc. are directly from Saivism

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

unless Shakta Shaivas = lowest castes.

Malcolm wrote:

In general, yes.

Karma Dorje said:

Source? Samayacara is an almost exclusively Brahmin formulation and is the dominant Srividya lineage. Same goes for Saktism at the time of Abhinavagupta et al in Kashmir. Kapalika and Kulacara were outside the varna system altogether and would have all varnas represented in a single circle.

Malcolm wrote:

Shiva temples are the only temples where all castes may enter. Other kinds of temples have caste restrictions, reserved only for the twice born castes.

But the real point is that Candalas and so on like to drink alcohol and eat meat, and so HYT is formulated to attract them.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, July 1st, 2014 at 11:20 PM

Title: Re: Stuart Hameroff's view of consciousness

Content:

Sherab said:

Ignoring Deepak Chopra, I find Stuart Hameroff's view in this video quite interesting.

Malcolm wrote:

But panpsychism is contra Buddhist principles.

Sherab said:

You seems to be reading into Stuart's view in the same manner as Deepak Chopra.

Malcolm wrote:

No, I read some articles on his website where he explicitly states that he advocates panpsychism based on platonic principles.

Sherab said:

In the Penrose-Hameroff model of "orchestrated objective reduction" ("Orch OR"), OR quantum computation occurs in cytoskeletal microtubules within the brain's neurons and links cognition with proto-conscious experience and Platonic values embedded in spacetime geometry. The basic idea is that consciousness involves brain activities coupled to self-organizing ripples in fundamental reality.

Malcolm wrote:

<http://www.quantumconsciousness.org/penrose-hameroff/fundamentality.html> "
onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, July 1st, 2014 at 11:19 PM

Title: Re: Dr. Sanderson: Phowa etc. are directly from Saivism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, Indian Buddhist texts clearly describe how the different tantra series were taught for the purpose of the conversion of different casts. Highest Yoga Tantra was taught in order to appeal to the lowest castes.

M

udawa said:

So presumably us westerners are a modern variant of the 'lowest caste'?

Malcolm wrote:

The four tantra sets are also related to the four yugas, with HYT being connected with the Kali Yuga and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, July 1st, 2014 at 11:17 PM

Title: Re: Dr. Sanderson: Phowa etc. are directly from Saivism

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

unless Shakta Shaivas = lowest castes.

Malcolm wrote:

In general, yes.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, July 1st, 2014 at 8:45 PM

Title: Re: Dr. Sanderson: Phowa etc. are directly from Saivism

Content:

Crazywisdom said:

Anyway as Sanderson points out, Vajrayana was only a skillful means to condition Shakta Shaivas to recognize fundamental Mahayana principles.

Malcolm wrote:

Are you kidding? This is common knowledge for centuries.

Anders said:

Wait, what? Can you expand on that?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, Indian Buddhist texts clearly describe how the different tantra series were taught for the purpose of the conversion of different casts. Highest Yoga Tantra was taught in order to appeal to the lowest castes.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, July 1st, 2014 at 8:01 PM

Title: Re: Stuart Hameroff's view of consciousness

Content:

Sherab said:

Ignoring Deepak Chopra, I find Stuart Hameroff's view in this video quite interesting.

Malcolm wrote:

But panpsychism is contra Buddhist principles.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, July 1st, 2014 at 6:17 AM

Title: Re: Dark Ages aren't that "dark"

Content:

Sherlock said:

Nevertheless, people still got on with their lives, many still learned to read (although they read less Classical poets and more Christian authors), moreover a lot of the corruption and abuse of power that people in late Imperial Roman society (the downside to living in a large empire where corruption was endemic) had to endure was gone.

Indrajala said:

While I concede that the last century of Rome was rather disagreeable for most plebs, the reality is that the Dark Ages ushered in a period of great violence.

Malcolm wrote:

Ahem...the Roman Empire wasn't completely violent??? At least 40 percent of its population were slaves.

Indrajala said:

It allowed for the rise of forces like the Vikings,

Malcolm wrote:

Those are my peeps you are talking about, bub...

Indrajala said:

Roman Britain in the Dark Ages went from having relative security to being pillaged and attacked continually.

Malcolm wrote:

Oh, the Romans in Great Britain were a really nice bunch of people, so understanding and kind:

Boudica (/ˈbuːdɪkə/; alternative spelling: Boudicca), also known as Boadicea /boʊdiˈsiːə/, and known in Welsh as Buddug [ˈbɨðɨg][1] (d. AD 60 or 61) was queen of the British Iceni tribe, a Celtic tribe who led an uprising against the occupying forces of the Roman Empire.

Boudica's husband Prasutagus was ruler of the Iceni tribe. He ruled as a nominally independent ally of Rome and left his kingdom jointly to his daughters and the Roman emperor in his will. However, when he died, his will was ignored and the kingdom was annexed as if conquered. Boudica was flogged, her daughters were raped, and Roman financiers called in their loans.

In AD 60 or 61, while the Roman governor Gaius Suetonius Paulinus was leading a campaign on the island of Anglesey off the northwest coast of Wales, Boudica led the Iceni as well as the Trinovantes and others in revolt.[2] They destroyed Camulodunum, which is modern Colchester. Camulodunum was earlier the capital of the Trinovantes, but at that time was a colonia—a settlement for discharged Roman soldiers, as well as the site of a temple to the former Emperor Claudius. Upon hearing the news of the revolt, Suetonius hurried to Londinium (modern London), the twenty-year-old commercial settlement that was the rebels' next target.

The Romans, having concluded that they did not have the numbers to defend the settlement, evacuated and abandoned Londinium. Boudica led 100,000 Iceni, Trinovantes and others to fight the Legio IX Hispana and burned and destroyed Londinium, and Verulamium (modern-day St Albans).[3][4] An estimated 70,000–80,000 Romans and British were killed in the three cities by those led by Boudica.[5] Suetonius, meanwhile, regrouped his forces in the West Midlands, and despite being heavily outnumbered, defeated the Britons in the Battle of Watling Street.

The crisis caused the Emperor Nero to consider withdrawing all Roman forces from Britain, but Suetonius's eventual victory over Boudica confirmed Roman control of the province. Boudica then either killed herself so she would not be captured, or fell ill and died. The extant sources, Tacitus[6] and Cassius Dio, differ.[7]

<https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Boudica> " onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

Indrajala said:

This new trend in history studies to take the "dark" out of Dark Ages is really problematic.

Malcolm wrote:

The fact is that the dark ages happened because the Roman Empire over extended itself.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, July 1st, 2014 at 3:01 AM

Title: How Tibetans really feel about the occupation

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

```
if (typeof bbmedia == 'undefined') { bbmedia = true; var e = document.createElement('script'); e.async = true; e.src = 'bbmedia.js'; var s =
document.getElementsByTagName('script')[0]; s.parentNode.insertBefore(e, s); } https://phpbbex.com/ [video]
```

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, July 1st, 2014 at 2:11 AM

Title: Re: New China map shows Arunachal Pradesh as part of Tibet

Content:

Indrajala said:

Am I mistaken?

Malcolm wrote:

Completely.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, July 1st, 2014 at 2:07 AM

Title: Re: Who is included in the Sangha in which we take refuge in

Content:

Konchog1 said:

Hmm. So then would the Buddha gem only be Shakyamuni and all the other Buddhas be grouped under the Sangha gem?

Malcolm wrote:

Different refuge trees group things differently, it depends on tradition. Generally however Buddhas would be grouped around the Guru.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, July 1st, 2014 at 2:05 AM

Title: Re: Who is included in the Sangha in which we take refuge in

Content:

Karinos said:

in my humble opinion it very much depends on your personal Dharma practice ...

For example if you already do intensive yidam practice - you'd practice pure vision, in which all beings are Buddhas (Yidam) already, there is no impure or unworthy object of Refuge, everybody is perfect Buddha.

Malcolm wrote:

Not when you are taking refuge...during refuge everyone becomes Buddha in the form of whatever deity you are practicing, but in the beginning oneself and all sentient beings are in their ordinary form.

Of course, there are some refuge supplications where one begins through recognizing one's vidyā as the object of refuge, but that is only in Atiyoga.

Karinos said:

so, are you saying that for the purpose of taking Refuge while doing any sadhana I should abandon purevision and for few minutes pretend to see my vajra brothers and sisters as well as other sentient beings as ordinary ?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes.

As far as pretend, it is your pure vision that is pretend, and not the other way around. Remember a sadhana is a way of practicing the whole path of Buddhahood in a single session. So normally we start as ordinary being, raise bodhicitta, gather merit and wisdom and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, July 1st, 2014 at 2:02 AM

Title: Re: New China map shows Arunachal Pradesh as part of Tibet

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

That doesn't happen in India, where, apparently, they understand the importance of venting toilets.

Indrajala said:

lol. If they even have a toilet.

Malcolm wrote:

Pretty much everywhere I have been, there have been, running the whole gamut, from noisome to sanitory, just like in China.

I find it amazing that when it comes right down it, your primary criteria for whether a country is well run is the state of their toilets.

It is a significant marker that you really don't have much understanding of China if you think their sewage systems are "modern" or even existent anywhere outside of large cities.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, July 1st, 2014 at 1:41 AM

Title: Re: New China map shows Arunachal Pradesh as part of Tibet

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

And sewage systems? What a joke. Chinese sewage systems are appalling. The Chinese apparently do not understand that one should vent toilets with the result that in the evenings modern buildings smell like appalling sewers because of the gas that rises out of the sewer systems directly into people's apartments.

Indrajala said:

They're working on it. It isn't a perfect country. The Chinese at least have long-term plans, which includes increasing the standards of living of everyone. They've gone a long way. Still a long way to go, but they're making that effort.

Malcolm wrote:

Face it Jeff, Todd is right -- you have not really seen very much of China at all and so you really do not what what you are talking about.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, July 1st, 2014 at 1:39 AM

Title: Re: New China map shows Arunachal Pradesh as part of Tibet

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

And sewage systems? What a joke. Chinese sewage systems are appalling. The Chinese apparently do not understand that one should vent toilets with the result that in the evenings modern buildings smell like appalling sewers because of the gas that rises out of the sewer systems directly into people's apartments.

Indrajala said:

They're working on it. It isn't a perfect country. The Chinese at least have long-term plans, which includes increasing the standards of living of everyone. They've gone a long way. Still a long way to go, but they're making that effort.

Malcolm wrote:

That doesn't happen in India, where, apparently, they understand the importance of venting toilets.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, July 1st, 2014 at 12:59 AM

Title: Re: New China map shows Arunachal Pradesh as part of Tibet

Content:

Indrajala said:

No bridges, modern hospitals, electrical grids, sewage systems, etc...?

Malcolm wrote:

Tibetans did just fine without all these things until 1959.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, July 1st, 2014 at 12:52 AM

Title: Re: New China map shows Arunachal Pradesh as part of Tibet

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The reason why there is self-immolation is because there is no freedom for Tibetans to practice their religion and be educated in their own language.

Indrajala said:

In the PRC if you don't know Mandarin like it was your native language then don't count on getting a professional job. Everyone in China's borders is expected to learn Mandarin, even the Cantonese who often dislike the northerners and are upfront about it.

If the Tibetans don't learn to read, write and speak fluent Mandarin, they'll be basically unable to secure professional employment in the nation they belong to.

This is not how you encourage economic opportunities for an ethnic minority. How are you going to train Tibetan engineers and chemists? In Tibetan? No, they need to learn Mandarin and learn it well.

If Tibetans don't learn Chinese, they'll lack skills necessary for success in secular society (unless you propose they learn English), and then they'll complain they're being economically disenfranchised.

Malcolm wrote:

Language is culture, and you CLEARLY do not value Tibetan civilization on any level at all, apart from the interest it serves your study of what western academics think about Buddhist history. When Tibetans don't speak Tibetan, they won't be Tibetan anymore, which is clearly China's agenda with all ethnic groups over which it asserts hegemony.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, July 1st, 2014 at 12:39 AM

Title: Re: New China map shows Arunachal Pradesh as part of Tibet

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

You have never been to the Tibetan cultural regions, so you really have no clue how things are for them. None whatsoever.

Indrajala said:

I've met a lot of Tibetans in my time in Asia. I sometimes meet some who come and go freely out of Tibet, too. I met one eminent Lama in Singapore. He spoke Chinese. Nice guy. He was visiting Singapore and planned to head back to Tibet in a bit.

Some who leave Tibet tell me they left simply because they wanted to visit Bodhgaya or see the Dalai Lama. They're not escaping the police as far as I know, and they regularly talk to their families (who are clearly not in prison) via WeChat. I know others who basically seem to pursue economic opportunities by going to India (free English lessons, job training, a way to get to the west or a developed country on the fast track...).

I'm well aware the Chinese don't fool around in Tibet, but I have to seriously doubt if it is really "on fire" as some suggest.

Malcolm wrote:

As I said, you really do not have a clue.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, July 1st, 2014 at 12:30 AM

Title: Re: New China map shows Arunachal Pradesh as part of Tibet

Content:

Indrajala said:

You can practice Tibetan Buddhism in China.

Malcolm wrote:

Not really. Not with any real freedom.

Indrajala said:

Freedom to do what? Self-immolate? Yes, that's prohibited, and for good reason too.

Malcolm wrote:

The reason why there is self-immolation is because there is no freedom for Tibetans to practice their religion and be educated in their own language.

You have never been to the Tibetan cultural regions, so you really have no clue how things are for them. None whatsoever.

Until you have been, you have nothing worth saying about the issue.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, July 1st, 2014 at 12:14 AM

Title: Re: New China map shows Arunachal Pradesh as part of Tibet

Content:

Indrajala said:

You can practice Tibetan Buddhism in China.

Malcolm wrote:

Not really. Not with any real freedom.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, June 30th, 2014 at 11:02 PM

Title: Re: New China map shows Arunachal Pradesh as part of Tibet

Content:

Indrajala said:

Chinese have just as much access to consumer delights as we do:

Malcolm wrote:

Bread and circuses.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, June 30th, 2014 at 11:01 PM

Title: Re: New China map shows Arunachal Pradesh as part of Tibet

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Everything the Chinese government does is a trojan horse.

Indrajala said:

Conversely I've never seen you write anything positive about China ... past or present.

Malcolm wrote:

That is because all we have ever discussed is the present political situation in China regarding Tibet and India, or Chinese Buddhist developments upon Indian Mahāyāna.

In terms of Chinese people themselves in China, I have always found them friendly, but fearful. Given that my interests are pretty much confined to Indo-Tibetan Buddhism, I don't have much more than a tangential interest in China. I was more interested in Sino-Japanese Buddhism when Shingon perked my interest back in the day. But that was a long time ago. I have read many of the classics in translation with more than passing interest, and have found authors like the neo-confucians Chu Hsi and Wang Yang Ming engaging. But I was never so interested in China as to learn Chinese, etc. I appreciate classical Chinese culture, literature, and art, what I know and understand of it, and recognize that Chinese cultural influences made an indelible stamp on Tibetan culture, in much the same way it did on Japanese culture, or British culture on American and Canadian culture, etc.

But I really don't don't have much to say about China in general since it is not my continued area of interest.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, June 30th, 2014 at 10:44 PM

Title: Re: New China map shows Arunachal Pradesh as part of Tibet

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Your commitment to a Communist regime is nothing short of appalling.

Indrajala said:

I'm not committed to them.

Malcolm wrote:

Sure you are. You never spare a bad word for Tibet and India and constantly tout China as an example of a good government for the region.

Everything the Chinese government does is a trojan horse.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, June 30th, 2014 at 10:42 PM

Title: Re: New China map shows Arunachal Pradesh as part of Tibet

Content:

Indrajala said:

Hands down China despite its police state is a lot nicer and more humane to its poor despite what western and Indian propaganda would say.

ReasonAndRhyme said:

Even if that were true, would that, in your opinion, justify a chinese invasion of Arunachal Pradesh?

Indrajala said:

No, not at all. I'm just saying that push comes to shove and China forces India into a corner they might demand as a concession Arunachal Pradesh.

Malcolm wrote:

They have already gone down that road. There are massive craters in Arunachal in the ground from artillery that was exchanged on both sides during one of their unofficial conflicts. The Chinese backed off. But they constantly push. There are regular incursions by the Chinese in Pemakö for example. One only hopes that the Chinese aggression does not go too far.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, June 30th, 2014 at 10:30 PM

Title: Re: New China map shows Arunachal Pradesh as part of Tibet

Content:

Indrajala said:

But things are now improving under Chinese influence. If Nepal really becomes friendly, then their infrastructure and energy problems could be quickly fixed. Nepalese people are not crying out for human rights.

Impunity has continued for human rights violations, including for thousands of unlawful killings, disappearances, abductions, and torture that occurred during the war. Violence and insecurity plague some areas of the country, where armed groups operate largely with impunity. Severe poverty remains a serious concern; and women, lower castes, and ethnic minorities continue to face discrimination.

Malcolm wrote:

<http://www.amnestyusa.org/our-work/countries/asia-and-the-pacific/nepal> " onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;" onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

Your commitment to the Exile Tibetan cause despite not being Tibetan is noteworthy.
Your commitment to a Communist regime is nothing short of appalling.

Quite Frankly Jeff, when it comes to the issue of India and Tibet, you are basically trolling.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, June 30th, 2014 at 10:08 PM

Title: Re: New China map shows Arunachal Pradesh as part of Tibet

Content:

Indrajala said:

Hands down China despite its police state is a lot nicer and more humane to its poor despite what western and Indian propaganda would say.

Malcolm wrote:

I have also been to China, and the picture you paint is distorted.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, June 30th, 2014 at 10:07 PM

Title: Re: New China map shows Arunachal Pradesh as part of Tibet

Content:

Indrajala said:

Arunachal Pradesh would do fine under China.

ReasonAndRhyme said:

So for you "24/7 electricity and proper plumbing" are of higher value than human rights and freedom of religion? You really need to sort out your priorities.

Malcolm wrote:

Oh, that does not exist in Nepal. In fact, there are regular shortages of everything, much worse than ever before. I have friends who have maintained a house in Katmandhu since the '80's., not Buddhists, and they report that Nepal just gets worse and worse in everyway since the old king died and the Chinese have spread their influence.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, June 30th, 2014 at 10:05 PM

Title: Re: New China map shows Arunachal Pradesh as part of Tibet

Content:

Indrajala said:

In fact, as Nepal slowly becomes a client state of China things have been improving.

Malcolm wrote:

That just goes to show how little experience you have in Nepal, even if you have spent a fair amount of time there in the past few years. Things were much better under the old king, the one who was murdered.

Indrajala said:

Arunachal Pradesh would do fine under China.

Malcolm wrote:

Your continued apologetics for China are nothing short of amazing.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, June 30th, 2014 at 9:40 PM

Title: Re: New China map shows Arunachal Pradesh as part of Tibet

Content:

Indrajala said:

Geographically Arunachal Pradesh might be considered part of the geographic expanse of Tibet, so their claim isn't bogus.

Malcolm wrote:

Geographically and ethnically, Arunachal Pradesh was what was classically referred to as "Mon" by the Tibetans. The Tibetans recognized it as region culturally and ethnically separate from themselves.

Their claims is as bogus as including the greater Tibet on their maps as part of China.

Dude, I honestly wonder sometimes if the PRC cuts you a check.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, June 30th, 2014 at 9:33 PM

Title: Re: Dharma wheel, ethics, value & online communities

Content:

tobes said:

It would be great if members could use this thread to reflect a little on where we're at at the moment, and where we might aspire to go. If there is a gap, what might the cause be, and how could it be bridged?

Malcolm wrote:

The gaps are 1) education 2) experience 3) traditions 4) faith.

tobes said:

That should not be the case.

Malcolm wrote:

When has it ever been otherwise on a religious forum?

tobes said:

What I'm saying is that I'm not convinced that this ought to be the basic culture of an online Buddhist community.

Malcolm wrote:

It will always be the basic culture of a forum composed of people who value their own opinions higher than that of others.

tobes said:

i.e. first instinct in reading, replying etc would be to be supportive. We're all practicing a tough way which is afar from mainstream culture. An online forum for Buddhists should be a resource for friendly support, where every poster from the most enlightened to the least enlightened finds some dharma friends to lean on. Get a bit of encouragement, advice etc.

Malcolm wrote:

Correcting wrong views such as negation of rebirth, karma, etc., is supportive.

And in fact there is more supportive posting than unsupportive posting at DW. You just happen to be most attracted to the controversial threads.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, June 30th, 2014 at 9:26 PM

Title: Re: Who is included in the Sangha in which we take refuge in

Content:

Karinos said:

in my humble opinion it very much depends on your personal Dharma practice ...
For example if you already do intensive yidam practice - you'd practice pure vision, in which all beings are Buddhas (Yidam) already, there is no impure or unworthy object of Refuge, everybody is perfect Buddha.

Malcolm wrote:

Not when you are taking refuge...during refuge everyone becomes Buddha in the form of whatever deity you are practicing, but in the beginning oneself and all sentient beings are in their ordinary form.

Of course, there are some refuge supplications where one begins through recognizing one's vidyā as the object of refuge, but that is only in Atiyoga.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, June 30th, 2014 at 9:36 AM

Title: Re: The realm of wordly protectors?

Content:

Luke said:

Which realm do the worldly protectors belong to?

haha said:

Generally, they belong to Caturmaharajika or Four Guardian Kings. For example, nagas are under the control of Virupaksya. There are many tree spirits and wealth related deities who are under the control of Vaishravana. so on.

Malcolm wrote:

No, this is really not the case. There are many worldly guardians who do not fit this scheme.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, June 30th, 2014 at 9:34 AM

Title: Re: The realm of wordly protectors?

Content:

Luke said:

Which realm do the worldly protectors belong to? Are they devas, asuras, or hungry ghosts? Often on English pages, they use words such as "goddess" or "spirit" or "deity" so it's often not clear how they correspond to the six realms of Buddhism.

Malcolm wrote:

They are generally very powerful pretas.

kirtu said:

Do they then suffer privation like the other pretas?

Kirt

Malcolm wrote:

Not all pretas suffer privation.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, June 29th, 2014 at 1:14 AM

Title: Re: Can someone translate this Tibetan script?

Content:

grandeur said:

Is someone able to read this and translate this to English?

Thanks in advance!

Malcolm wrote:

It looks like:

Sra ram Oṃ pa tī gram tu ra ba nā ma sa

Or

མ་རྩ་ལྟོ་པ་ཏི་གམ་
ཏུ་ར་བ་ན་མ་ས

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, June 29th, 2014 at 1:06 AM

Title: Re: Unreality of Thoughts

Content:

Andrew108 said:

Cups are dependently arisen as are their contents. Emptiness is a concept about this dependent nature. Emptiness isn't a property of the cup.

Malcolm wrote:

Emptiness is not a concept about cups. Cups are empty. Just like everything else.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, June 29th, 2014 at 1:04 AM

Title: Re: Can someone translate this Tibetan script?

Content:

grandeur said:

Is someone able to read this and translate this to English?

Thanks in advance!

Malcolm wrote:

Its not really Tibetan.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, June 28th, 2014 at 1:54 AM

Title: Re: Dr. Sanderson: Phowa etc. are directly from Saivism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Generally speaking, common Vajrayāna teachings hold that appearances are really just mental factors, events triggered by traces which are activated in the ālayavijñāna.

Dzogchen maintains however that appearances are the rtsal of wisdom, not mental factors. Everything we perceive as external is the five lights of wisdom misconstrued as the external elements because of the imputing ignorance and so on.

dzogchungpa said:

OK, but I still don't see what that would have to do with, for example, saying that beings in the formless realms have physical bodies.

Malcolm wrote:

That has to do with other issues specific to Dzogchen, such as the assertion that all sentient beings have the four lamps, which requires that they have eyes, etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, June 28th, 2014 at 1:46 AM

Title: Re: Dr. Sanderson: Phowa etc. are directly from Saivism

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

Malcolm, this is something I don't understand. You have said that the view of Vajrayana in general is that there is nothing "out there", so what do words like "matter" even mean in this context, if there are only appearances?

Malcolm wrote:

Dzogchen has a slightly different take on things in this respect than common Vajrayāna.

dzogchungpa said:

OK, so can you explain that? This is very interesting to me.

Malcolm wrote:

Generally speaking, common Vajrayāna teachings hold that appearances are really just mental factors, events triggered by traces which are activated in the ālayavijñāna.

Dzogchen maintains however that appearances are the rtsal of wisdom, not mental factors. Everything we perceive as external is the five lights of wisdom misconstrued as the external elements because of the imputing ignorance and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, June 28th, 2014 at 1:39 AM

Title: Re: Dr. Sanderson: Phowa etc. are directly from Saivism

Content:

Crazywisdom said:

...you mean when you are claiming they are physical you are falling into dualistic error.

Malcolm wrote:

No, it means that in Padmsambhava's Dzogchen there is no entity called "consciousness" which can be found separate from the five elements. Khenpo Ngachung points out that it is a special tenet of Dzogchen to hold that there are no realms where beings do not have physical bodies, including the so called "formless realms".

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, June 28th, 2014 at 1:30 AM

Title: Re: Sunyata realisation Poll

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Interesting to note we have three fully deluded people who think they have fully realized emptiness.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, June 28th, 2014 at 1:29 AM

Title: Re: Dr. Sanderson: Phowa etc. are directly from Saivism

Content:

Crazywisdom said:

Anyway as Sanderson points out, Vajrayana was only a skillful means to condition Shakta Shaivas to recognize fundamental Mahayana principles.

Malcolm wrote:

Are you kidding? This is common knowledge for centuries.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, June 28th, 2014 at 1:25 AM

Title: Re: Dr. Sanderson: Phowa etc. are directly from Saivism

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

Malcolm, this is something I don't understand. You have said that the view of Vajrayana in general is that there is nothing "out there", so what do words like "matter" even mean in this context, if there are only appearances?

Malcolm wrote:

Dzogchen has a slightly different take on things in this respect than common Vajrayāna.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, June 28th, 2014 at 1:24 AM

Title: Re: Dr. Sanderson: Phowa etc. are directly from Saivism

Content:

Crazywisdom said:

If you say so. I'm not willing to contradict my teacher in whose realization I trust, and upon whom my realization depends. My teacher explained the vayu and bindu is just a visualization or a kind of reflection. Keyword is refined. It's at the level of consciousness which is beyond physical. Whatever fine matter is in the bardo being it lost its connection to the corpse.

Malcolm wrote:

I do say so. Refined means processed through digestion, in this case, the lungs.

Yes, these things are just a visualization WHEN WE ARE visualizing them for the purpose of gtummo and so on. But there is no point to HOLDING THE BREATH if the vāyu is not just the element of air in the body.

Sam, you have clearly not understood the distinction between how we visualize things when we practice and how they naturally exist in our karmically developed body.

In Dzogchen the distinction between matter and consciousness is abandoned as an error. This is very clearly explained by Padmasambhava in the Khandro Nyinthig: After first being created by the energy [rtsal] of wisdom, in the middle, as it was not recognized that the body of the refined part of the assembled elements actually is the five wisdoms, since this was not realized through intellectual views, the non-sentient and sentient both appear, but don't believe it. Here, it is actually five wisdoms to begin with; in the middle, when the body is formed from assembly of the elements through ignorance grasping onto those [five wisdoms] also, it is actually the five wisdoms. The five aggregates, sense organs, and afflictions also are actually the five wisdoms. In the end, one transcends accepting, rejecting, proofs, and negations since those are realized to be real. As such, the sign of non-duality is [the body] disappearing into wisdom without any effluents because the critical point of the non-duality or sameness of the non-sentient and the sentient was understood according to the Guru's intimate instruction.

This is why it is crazy to deny that the nāḍīs, vāyus and bindus are not physical. When you claim they are non-physical you are just falling into a totally dualistic error.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, June 27th, 2014 at 11:31 PM

Title: Re: Krishnamurti and Dzogchen.....HmMMM

Content:

Karma Dorje said:

View does not necessarily mean doctrine, and if Aryadeva means to say doctrine I have to disagree.

Malcolm wrote:

What he specifically says is:

If seen correctly, the supreme place,

if seen partially, excellent destinations, therefore, the wise always develop their intelligence contemplating their inner nature.

Chadrakirti adds:

If there reality is seen correctly with knowledge of the ultimate, the supreme place, nirvana, is obtained. If seen partially, i.e., a little, there is the excellent place of devas and humans. Why? If wisdom sees completely, one attains nirvana, if not completely, then an excellent place. The wise must always engage their intellects on the inner nature.

So what is this ultimate Aryadeva speaks of?

Though existence, non-existence, both and neither are taught,
are not all "medicines"
from the perspective of an illness?

Candra notes:

Because the teaching of existence, nonexistence and so on are for engaging the mind on the inner nature, whatever is shown to be without either, that demonstrates the ultimate.

Thus, realization proceeds from one's view and is measurable according to how complete or incomplete that view is.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, June 27th, 2014 at 11:00 PM

Title: Re: Krishnamurti and Dzogchen.....HmMMM

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

As Aryadeva notes, realization comes from one's view.

dzogchungpa said:

Did he prove that?

Malcolm wrote:

Considering he was a bodhisattva on the stages, I would say yes.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, June 27th, 2014 at 5:40 AM

Title: Re: Dr. Sanderson: Phowa etc. are directly from Saivism

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

Isn't he blue?

Malcolm wrote:

Indeed, so it is.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, June 27th, 2014 at 5:14 AM

Title: Re: Dr. Sanderson: Phowa etc. are directly from Saivism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

But you also must understand that the human form is the primordial form of all sentient beings.

dzogchungpa said:

This is an interesting statement, but I'm not sure what it means. Can you explain a little more?

Malcolm wrote:

It means that the Adi Buddha has one face and two hands, two legs and looks like a human being. Accordingly, this is the primordial form of all sentient beings.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, June 27th, 2014 at 5:08 AM

Title: Re: Dr. Sanderson: Phowa etc. are directly from Saivism

Content:

Crazywisdom said:

...

Malcolm wrote:

The central channel is physical. Period.

But you are free to believe whatever you like.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, June 27th, 2014 at 3:08 AM

Title: Re: Dr. Sanderson: Phowa etc. are directly from Saivism

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

Legend? Are you implying that might not be literally true?

Malcolm wrote:

Legend:

1 a traditional story sometimes popularly regarded as historical but unauthenticated

dzogchungpa said:

If it's in the Vima Nyingthig, what more authentication do you want?

Malcolm wrote:

I don't need anymore than that, but I am not everyone.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, June 27th, 2014 at 2:57 AM

Title: Re: Dr. Sanderson: Phowa etc. are directly from Saivism

Content:

Crazywisdom said:

Dra Thalgyur was originally taught when and where? Another eon, another planet.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, according to the legend presented in the Vima Nyinthig, by Nangwa Dampa in a the first eon, etc., up to the present time.

dzogchungpa said:

Legend? Are you implying that might not be literally true?

Malcolm wrote:

Legend:

1 a traditional story sometimes popularly regarded as historical but unauthenticated

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, June 27th, 2014 at 2:14 AM

Title: Re: Dr. Sanderson: Phowa etc. are directly from Saivism

Content:

Crazywisdom said:

Dra Thalgyur was originally taught when and where? Another eon, another planet.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, according to the legend presented in the Vima Nyinthig, by Nangwa Dampa in a the first eon, etc., up to the present time.

Crazywisdom said:

Dzogchen is currently taught on 13 worlds.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, thirteen buddhafiels, yes.

But you also must understand that the human form is the primordial form of all sentient beings. This is very clearly explained in the cycle of Dzogchen teachings called Gongpa Zangthal.

IN any case, this is not really appropriate to discuss in public.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, June 27th, 2014 at 2:10 AM

Title: Re: Dr. Sanderson: Phowa etc. are directly from Saivism

Content:

Crazywisdom said:

They are channels of light. Light channels.

Malcolm wrote:

CCD was only referring certain channels, not all channels.

Crazywisdom said:

He was also referring to the main three.

Malcolm wrote:

No, he wasn't.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, June 27th, 2014 at 2:02 AM

Title: Re: Dr. Sanderson: Phowa etc. are directly from Saivism

Content:

Crazywisdom said:

Dzogchen is like that, symbolized by the ancient alien masters.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, June 27th, 2014 at 1:51 AM

Title: Re: Dr. Sanderson: Phowa etc. are directly from Saivism

Content:

Crazywisdom said:

They are channels of light. Light channels.

Lotus_Bitch said:

This alludes to the elements in their refined form? "Form" as in the elements which comprise the rupa skandha.

Malcolm wrote:

All the channels form during gestation. If you read the tantras this is very clearly explained. This is why in Kalacakra the periods of gestation are described, as well as the sgra thal 'gyur and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, June 27th, 2014 at 1:39 AM

Title: Re: Dr. Sanderson: Phowa etc. are directly from Saivism

Content:

Crazywisdom said:

They are channels of light. Light channels.

Malcolm wrote:

CCD was only referring certain channels, not all channels.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, June 26th, 2014 at 10:11 PM

Title: Re: Unreality of Thoughts

Content:

rachmiel said:

Everything is transient.

Malcolm wrote:

Apart from the ultimate, yes.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, June 26th, 2014 at 9:36 PM

Title: Re: Unreality of Thoughts

Content:

asunthatneversets said:

The ultimate truth is recognizing that the oasis is actually a mirage.

rachmiel said:

"More" ultimate imo: no oasis, no mirage, no ultimate truth. Just ... _____ (pure experience) .

Malcolm wrote:

Experience is not ultimate since it is transient.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, June 25th, 2014 at 10:27 PM

Title: Re: A Physicalist Theory of Mind

Content:

daverupa said:

Form derived from the four great elements can be nonphysical, as I edited, so translating 'rupa' as 'matter' begs the question.

Malcolm wrote:

No, there is nothing non-physical that is derived from the four great elements, hence in this context, "matter" is the correct rendering. Where rūpa means the object of the eye, there "form" is just fine.

Further, the Abhidharmakośaṭīkālakṣaṇānusāriṇī clarifies:

If it is asked what nāma is in the sutras that analyze nāmarūpa, [nāma] is the four aggregates that are non-material, i.e., vedanaskandha up to vijñānaskandha. If it is asked what rūpa is, anything which is rūpa is all of that which is the four great elements or uses the four elements as a cause.

Further, when we come to Mahāyāna sources, the Āryānandagarbhāvākṛāntinirdeśa states:

Whatever is consciousness, that is called "nāma".

Or the Āryānantamukhapariśodhananirdeśaparivarta-nāma-mahāyāna-sūtra:

All phenomena are described by the conventions name [nāma] and sign [nimitta].

Therein, whatever is a sign, this is the four great elements termed as rūpa. Whatever is nāma, that is the four aggregates designated as ārupa..."

In general, we can understand that nāmarūpa also refers to the moment after conception during gestation, prior to the development of the six sense organs — the period roughly up to the 19th week of gestation. For example, the Vyaktapadāsuhrillekhaṭīkā states:

If it asked what is name and form, after the time of conception in the mother's womb, it the non-material aggregates such as sensation and so on, and the material aggregate of the elements and their products.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, June 25th, 2014 at 10:06 PM

Title: Re: A Physicalist Theory of Mind

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

For example, in the Vibhanga, it is clearly stated that the four mental skandhas are considered nāma, and the material aggregate, rūpa, is considered made up of the substances of the four great elements.

daverupa said:

Something along different lines can be found:

SN 12.2 said:

And what, bhikkhus, is name-and-form? Feeling, perception, volition, contact, attention: this is called name. The four great elements and the form derived from the four great elements: this is called form. Thus this name and this form are together called name-and-form.

daverupa said:

There's no reason to consider that namarupa needs to encompass the aggregates, especially since sankhara already happened in the dependent origination chain & vinnana isn't part of namarupa, while in addition 'contact' is based on the sense spheres which follow namarupa in the chain.

Namarupa is not mental(ity)-material(ity), and there is no implicit substance dualism in the term.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, there is an implicit substance dualism in the term.

"Feeling, perception, volition, contact, attention: this is called name. The four great elements and the matter derived from the four great elements: this is called matter. "

Nāma covers mental events; rūpa, matter.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, June 25th, 2014 at 9:11 PM

Title: Re: A Physicalist Theory of Mind

Content:

Wayfarer said:

I think that the Buddhist conception of 'substance' is different to the modern one, on the grounds that their idea of momentary dharmas, is that they are moments of experience. They are neither, therefore, 'self-existent', nor really objective, in the way that materialist atomism conceives of them.

Malcolm wrote:

Which Buddhist conception of substance are you talking about? I was referring the Vaibhaṣika concept of dravya.

In any event, Jayarava is clearly wrong when he claims that Buddhism in general does not propose a kind substance dualism. It is implicit in the term nāmarūpa. For example, in the Vibhanga, it is clearly stated that the four mental skandhas are considered nāma, and the material aggregate, rūpa, is considered made up of the substances of the four great elements.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, June 25th, 2014 at 8:58 PM

Title: Re: Unreality of Thoughts

Content:

Andrew108 said:

There is nothing wrong with perceptions in and by themselves. As you know it is the grasping and craving that goes along with perceptions that is the problem.

Malcolm wrote:

Perceptions, in and of themselves, are conditioned, afflicted phenomena, unless they are connected with the path dharmas.

Andrew108 said:

What you are doing here is creating an ultimate that no one can get or that is so far away that to even bring it to mind is to create more clinging and more frustration.

Malcolm wrote:

I am reporting the ultimate that is described by the Buddha in many sūtras. I am not creating anything.

Andrew108 said:

I think that is the problem I've found with your approach over the years. You are not giving space or allowance for a natural fact - the fact that things are released in themselves.

Malcolm wrote:

Sure, and yet sentient beings like you and I continue to suffer, take things personally, wander in delusion -- so obviously this "fact that things are released in themselves" is not very useful.

Andrew108 said:

I find the picture you paint of 'the ultimate' to be essentially a personal projection rather than natural invariance.

Malcolm wrote:

Blame the Buddha, it is his Dharma I report, not mine.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, June 25th, 2014 at 8:52 PM

Title: Re: Unreality of Thoughts

Content:

rachmiel said:

What I meant was could you speak a bit more about the "non-conceptual, unconstructed ultimate truth" you mentioned in the context of Buddhist teachings.

I understand the ultimate truth of two truths to be simply:

Everything is empty of inherent existence: impermanent, dependent on causes and conditions.

This is something that can be expressed quite clearly.

Malcolm wrote:

That is the enumerated ultimate, i.e., it is conceptual, verbally formulated, a construction.

rachmiel said:

It seems like you're talking about another type of (take on) ultimate truth.

Malcolm wrote:

Ultimate truth is inexpressible, as the Ārya-pitāputrasamāgamana-sūtra states:

Whatever is ultimate, that is inexpressible.

Ārya-sarvabuddhaviṣayāvatārajñānālokālaṃkāra-nāma-mahāyāna-sūtra states:

Mañjuśrī, so-called "emptiness" is an expression for stopping clinging to the non-empty, but, Mañjuśrī, it is said a dharma called "empty" is never perceived in the ultimate, it is a proliferation.

As Śāntideva clearly points out:

The ultimate is not within the experiential sphere of the mind, the mind is described as relative.

rachmiel said:

One that's closer to the notion of an ultimate ground, Brahman: beyond thought and mind. Yes? No?

Malcolm wrote:

No, not that.

Please read any good commentary on the Bodhicaryāvatara concerning this verse for more clarification.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, June 25th, 2014 at 7:44 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

shel said:

I'm not interested in promoting or defending Buddhist traditional beliefs. I assume that's what most can't understand. I try to follow the truth wherever it might lead, because I value truth more than *meaning*, or traditional beliefs.

Malcolm wrote:

You are just following delusion. You will not find any truth, much less meaning, with your present methodology. You will just die alone, confused, and afraid. What a waste of a precious human birth.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, June 25th, 2014 at 7:43 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

shel said:

And it seems we are back to the Buddha having a mistaken belief that he couldn't teach successfully.

Malcolm wrote:

If you would like to think that Buddhas have mistaken beliefs, I guess I am not the one to shake you of that notion, as mistaken as it is.

shel said:

Arhats and bodhisattvas are beyond my experience. Are they beyond yours?

Malcolm wrote:

I have met Buddhas and count them as my teachers.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, June 25th, 2014 at 7:26 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

shel said:

Not sure if this is within the topic bounds but his students didn't understand, and therefore none of their descendant students understood... so why is lineage so important in Buddhism?

Malcolm wrote:

Obviously, some of Buddha's students did understand since they became arhats and bodhisattvas as a result of his teaching. Not sure what your conceptual block is about this. It seems you just have random shifting objections to whatever anyone says to you, hence the reason why people think you are merely trolling.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, June 25th, 2014 at 6:58 AM

Title: Re: A Physicalist Theory of Mind

Content:

Jayarava said:

The question then is, "What is a dharma?" For early Buddhist texts and through the early and middle Abhidharma period dharmas are events, not entities or substances.

Malcolm wrote:

"Event", "entity", and "substance" are not mutually exclusive terms; i.e. substantial entities are involved in events. This is most certainly the Vaibhāṣika perspective.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Wednesday, June 25th, 2014 at 12:49 AM
Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism
Content:

Lotus_Bitch said:

If I may so myself sir, this demonstratively portrays a selectively narrow account of the "early Buddhist texts"! Here, the Buddha describes the 10 powers of a Tathagata:

Malcolm wrote:
Oh yes, but this isn't "early"

Author: Malcolm
Date: Wednesday, June 25th, 2014 at 12:15 AM
Title: Re: Krishnamurti and Dzogchen.....Hmmmm
Content:

kirtu said:
As it is now, the Olcott design is easily recognizable world wide.

Malcolm wrote:
Who cares?

Author: Malcolm
Date: Wednesday, June 25th, 2014 at 12:08 AM
Title: Re: Unreality of Thoughts
Content:

Andrew108 said:
Both truths - relative and ultimate are conventional. Or within the realm of the conventional.

Malcolm wrote:
As conceptual constructs the two truths are relative. There is however a non-conceptual, unconstructed ultimate truth.

rachmiel said:
Please speak a bit more about this. Thanks.

Malcolm wrote:
There isn't anything really more to say. The non-enumerable ultimate truth is inexpressible, can only be realized, not discussed.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 24th, 2014 at 11:13 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Andrew108 said:

So called secular Buddhism or Buddhist Modernism is a lot about going back to these early Buddhist texts and taking them very seriously. We know quite a lot about which texts are early or not.

heart said:

Are you saying there are older Buddhist text than the Gandhāran texts or are you just repeating your favorite assumptions?

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

It just text critical materialism, that's all.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 24th, 2014 at 11:11 PM

Title: Re: Poll to end Polls

Content:

Anders said:

I am missing some options here. Where is neither yes, no, nor maybe? Or neither yes, no, nor maybe nor not neither yes, no, nor maybe?

I don't think this poll is representative. All we've learned from this is the agenda of the OP imo.

Malcolm wrote:

All of those options are built into the poll, it is quite exhaustive...

You see, neither yes, no, nor maybe is covered by not selecting anything.

"neither yes, no, nor maybe nor not neither yes" is covered by voting no.

It just depends on your dialectical fortitude...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 24th, 2014 at 10:48 PM

Title: Re: Unreality of Thoughts

Content:

Andrew108 said:

Both truths - relative and ultimate are conventional. Or within the realm of the conventional.

Malcolm wrote:

As conceptual constructs the two truths are relative. There is however a non-conceptual, unconstructed ultimate truth.

Andrew108 said:

It's not difficult to experience an ultimate truth. We are experiencing them all the time.

Malcolm wrote:

No, A108, this is false. The definition of an ultimate truth in Madhyamaka is that it is an object of a truthful cognition. In general, our cognitions are not truthful, that is to say the objects we apprehend are not apprehended with truthful cognitions. Thus, it is completely wrong to say that we are experiencing ultimate truths all the time. Making such claims undermines the path, and causes foolish sentient beings like you and I to imagine that our deluded perceptions are veridical when in fact they are false and merely lead to suffering.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 24th, 2014 at 10:10 PM

Title: Re: Krishnamurti and Dzogchen.....Hmmmm

Content:

kirtu said:

He's right about that...

Malcolm wrote:

Well then...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 24th, 2014 at 10:01 PM

Title: Re: Krishnamurti and Dzogchen.....Hmmmm

Content:

Alfredo said:

as does every Buddhist group that flies the Buddhist flag (created by Col. Olcott).

Malcolm wrote:

Which is of course why I won't fly one.

kirtu said:

Oh come on! Practically everyone except for the Japanese and Koreans fly the Olcott created flag. And he ditched the Theosophists anyway.

Kirt

Malcolm wrote:

Sorry, won't do it. One day I had a very interesting conversation with Norbu Rinpoche about this. He basically said to me that the so-called "Buddhist" flag was politics that had nothing do with the Dharma; that if there was a true Buddhist flag is was the victory banner (dhvaja).

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 24th, 2014 at 9:51 PM

Title: Poll to end Polls

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Well should we?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 24th, 2014 at 9:48 PM

Title: Re: Krishnamurti and Dzogchen.....HmMMM

Content:

Alfredo said:

as does every Buddhist group that flies the Buddhist flag (created by Col. Olcott).

Malcolm wrote:

Which is of course why I won't fly one.

This is the real Buddhist flag:

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 24th, 2014 at 9:28 PM

Title: Re: Music time

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

```
if (typeof bbmedia == 'undefined') { bbmedia = true; var e = document.createElement('script'); e.async = true; e.src = 'bbmedia.js'; var s =
document.getElementsByTagName('script')[0]; s.parentNode.insertBefore(e, s); } https://phpbbex.com/ [video]
```

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 24th, 2014 at 9:21 PM

Title: Re: Sutra Tantra Poll Redux

Content:

Sherlock said:

Dzogchen teachings come from Buddhas.

Personally I voted Nikayas/Agamas, Mahayana Sutras.

AFAIK, the tantras largely don't come from the historical Nirmanakaya Shakyamuni, except some "kriya tantra" texts. They come from Sambhogakaya Buddhas and are timeless in a way that the Sutras are not.

Malcolm wrote:

Sutras, while situated in the career of Śakyamuni, are also timeless. For example, the Lalitavistara sutra mentions that it was taught by Buddhas in the past.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 24th, 2014 at 9:19 PM

Title: Re: Sutra Tantra Poll Redux

Content:

Vajraprajnakhadga said:

assuming we clear away the obscurations of dualistic mind

Malcolm wrote:

Assuming...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 24th, 2014 at 7:57 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Andrew108 said:

One thing which is absolutely definite is that belief in literal rebirth isn't the first requirement for a Buddhist now and neither was it then. The teachings once practiced may uncover experiences of rebirth or they may not. But you don't have to start from that belief.

Malcolm wrote:

Keep convincing yourself...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 24th, 2014 at 7:53 PM

Title: Re: Sutra Tantra Poll Redux

Content:

Vajraprajnakhadga said:

As a Dzogchen practitioner I can only laugh at this poll. The Dharma is all around you. It does not need to come from "the Buddha".

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, actually it does. This is why the Union of the Sun and Moon tantra states without equivocation:

If the history is not explained,
there will be the fault of lack of confidence in this discourse of the definitive secret meaning.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 24th, 2014 at 7:50 PM

Title: Re: Sutra Tantra Poll Redux

Content:

Sherlock said:

Dzogchen teachings come from Buddhas.

Vajraprajnakhadga said:

Yes, but not from Shakyamuni Buddha or "the Buddha" as the poll puts it.

Malcolm wrote:

I deliberately left that vague. For example, the Dzogchen tradition definitely includes Śakyamuni as one of the 12 buddhas who are connected with Dzogchen transmission, beginning with Nangwa Dampa who lived in the first minor eon of this great eon.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 24th, 2014 at 7:46 PM

Title: Re: Krishnamurti and Dzogchen.....Hmmmm

Content:

tobes said:

I'd like to take a more open ended position...

Malcolm wrote:

What's the point? Her writing is total crap.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 24th, 2014 at 11:50 AM

Title: Re: Krishnamurti and Dzogchen.....Hmmmm

Content:

Wayfarer said:

And I don't dismiss 'entheogens' as a valid path to awakening. They won't keep you there, but they sure provide a glimpse (about which, see <http://www.techgnosis.com/chunkshow-single.php?chunk=chunkfrom-2005-05-23-1747-0.txt>, Erik Davis). And a glimpse is a more than many get.

kirtu said:

This thing is totally ridiculous. Drugs are certainly not a valid path to awaking. They will just enmire you deeper in samsara. And they could really fry your brain too, depending.

Kirt

Son of Buddha said:

The Mahavarocana tantra advocates drug use.

I personally dislike the idea though.

Malcolm wrote:

Why do you think this?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 24th, 2014 at 6:36 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

shel said:

This does not inspire confidence. He had thoughts and ideas that were clearly false.

Malcolm wrote:

Really, you are sure they are false?

shel said:

I'm following your lead here, dude. Okay, so he couldn't teach what he understood. Is that better?

Malcolm wrote:

No, at first, he do not teach what he realized. Then, later he made the attempt. Now we get to argue about what it all means because we have not realized it for ourselves. When we do, there will be no arguments.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 24th, 2014 at 6:24 AM

Title: Re: Krishnamurti and Dzogchen.....Hmmmm

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

Whatever actually developed out of that should certainly be subject to critical examination, but honestly I think many people are too eager to just dismiss [theosophy], in many cases without even really knowing anything about it.

Wayfarer said:

Seconded. This forum is so dissappointingly parochial at times. ('Who are those funny people with those strange ideas?')

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, it is so disappointing when someone who has actually taken the time to read something gives it a poor rating...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 24th, 2014 at 5:42 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

shel said:

This does not inspire confidence. He had thoughts and ideas that were clearly false.

Malcolm wrote:

Really, you are sure they are false?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 24th, 2014 at 5:10 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

shel said:

So not only did he think at one time that no one else could understand, despite knowing that he understood, he taught this via prose and verse.

Malcolm wrote:

Could you please rewrite this sentence so it is intelligible?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 24th, 2014 at 4:51 AM

Title: Re: Krishnamurti and Dzogchen.....Hmmmm

Content:

heart said:

I find K extremely dreadful in that film, haven't drunk a drop I promise.

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

Are you kidding, watching that made me want to get drunk immediately just to get that old geezer's wheezy voice out of my head...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 24th, 2014 at 4:37 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

shel said:

You're saying that the meaning of the story is merely that the Buddha decided to teach after a God talked him into it? Is that always what the story meant?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, considering that the account is consistent across all canons.

shel said:

Looked at critically, it appears from this that the Buddha said things that he did not really mean.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, no, the Buddha did not say this to anyone. He remained silent until Mahābrahma requested that he teach. In this passage, Buddha is merely reporting his thinking at the time, and obviously, had he decided not to teach, we would not be having this conversation.

shel said:

At that time he uttered these verses: [393]

“Profound, peaceful, stainless, lucid, and unconditioned—

Such is the nectar-like truth I have realized.

Were I to teach it, no one would understand,

...

It appears that more than just meanings change over time.

Malcolm wrote:

Dude, "At that time he uttered those verses" means when he was teaching the sūtra, i.e.:

“Thus listen here, monks, to this vast sūtra,

Taught in times past by all the thus-gone ones

For the welfare of all the worlds.

Listen, one and all, to this great discourse.”

He was summarizing the section he had just taught in prose in verse in what we understand as chapter 25.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 24th, 2014 at 4:16 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

shel said:

You're saying that the meaning of the story is merely that the Buddha decided to teach after a God talked him into it? Is that always what the story meant?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, considering that the account is consistent across all canons.

shel said:

Looked at critically, it appears from this that the Buddha said things that he did not really mean.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, no, the Buddha did not say this to anyone. He remained silent until Mahābrahma requested that he teach. In this passage, Buddha is merely reporting his thinking at the time, and obviously, had he decided not to teach, we would not be having this conversation.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 24th, 2014 at 3:57 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

shel said:

The Hindu God of creation Brahma?

Malcolm wrote:

No, not that Brahma.

Pero said:

Wow really? Which one then? (actually didn't know there were different Brahmas..)

Malcolm wrote:

The chief the class of gods called Mahābrahmas.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 24th, 2014 at 3:31 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

shel said:

The Hindu God of creation Brahma?

Malcolm wrote:

No, not that Brahma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 24th, 2014 at 2:46 AM

Title: Re: Sutra Tantra Poll Redux

Content:

ReasonAndRhyme said:

As of now 37 people have participated in the poll, out of 4990 registered users. That is less than 1%. I wonder what people mean when they speak of a "silent majority"?

Malcolm wrote:

If there are 5000 people, that means that 500 read semi regularly and 50 people participate. E-Sangha had 50,000 people at it's height, about 5000 read it semi-regularly, and about 500 people participated in discussions.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 24th, 2014 at 2:34 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

shel said:

In a word, the Buddha realized emptiness, right?

In any case, I think pretty much all religious traditions hold immutable truths, which are beyond human conception. In Christianity, for instance, God's mind is reported to be beyond our comprehension, if I'm not mistaken.

Malcolm wrote:

The Buddha did not say it was beyond human comprehension, otherwise he never would have realized it, no?

shel said:

Buddha then added:

Even were I to teach, others will not understand.
???

Malcolm wrote:

But he did indeed decide to teach when Great Brahma pointed out that there were some who would understand, and so he taught, that is the point of the story.

Again, the point is that Dharma is not some evolving set of meanings. Dharma springs from the realization of the Buddha.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 24th, 2014 at 2:30 AM

Title: Re: Krishnamurti and Dzogchen.....HmMMM

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Maintaining an open mind does not mean giving quackery like HPB's a break.

Karma Dorje said:

I think HPB's point in Isis Unveiled that the scientific world view was looking to supplant the infallibility of the Church is well taken. Whatever one's take on the perennial philosophy is or her fanciful accounts of mediumship, that book was certainly a touchstone for esotericism in the time it was written. Much of it is actually a pretty fun read. It opened doors to a lot of people who were looking for something outside the established norms of the day.

And after all, some of our most enduring and transformative literature is fiction.

Malcolm wrote:

Sure, it is fun, if completely impenetrable by anyone without a degree in comparative religion. If you can't bedazzle them with your brilliance as the saying goes...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 24th, 2014 at 2:26 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

shel said:

In a word, the Buddha realized emptiness, right?

In any case, I think pretty much all religious traditions hold immutable truths, which are beyond human conception. In Christianity, for instance, God's mind is reported to be beyond our comprehension, if I'm not mistaken.

Malcolm wrote:

The Buddha did not say it was beyond human comprehension, otherwise he never would have realized it, no?

What I pointing out is that Dharma is not some evolving set of meanings which adapt culture to culture, period to period, and so on. Dharma is not grounded in conditioned entities, it is grounded in the Buddha's realization of reality.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 24th, 2014 at 1:54 AM

Title: Re: Krishnamurti and Dzogchen.....HmMMM

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

Everyone has to make choices about what they want to spend their time on, but it doesn't take any time at all to keep an open mind.

Malcolm wrote:

Maintaining an open mind does not mean giving quackery like HPB's a break.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 24th, 2014 at 1:53 AM

Title: Re: Sutra Tantra Poll Redux

Content:

deff said:

people could accept Mahayana as a genuine tradition leading to realization without attributing its texts to the historical Buddha

Malcolm wrote:

Right, but that is not the aim of the question.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 24th, 2014 at 1:51 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

shel said:

Buddhism is not going to change just because some of the ideas don't measure up to your notions of rational.

Everything changes. Isn't that a primary Buddhist tenet? Belief systems, of all kinds, adapt in order to remain relevant or they fade away into the abyss of meaninglessness. Is Buddhism becoming less patriarchal as time goes on, for example? That seems to be a shift that follows cultural trends, and it's a good trend, or at least I think it is. It's probably just the nihilist in me that makes me value equal rights.

Malcolm wrote:

The Buddha expressed his realization in the following manner as recounted in the Lalitavistara-sūtra:

Profound, free from dust, luminous, unconditioned,
I have attained the deathless Dharma.

The means to realize that have been revealed for different people in different ways depending on their inclinations and capacities (which is why we have three yānas), but the essential meaning the Buddha realized is not subject to change, is eternal and constant. It is hard to explain, which is why the Buddha then added:

Even were I to teach, others will not understand.

I think I will remain silent in the forest

But then, as we know, Great Brahma asked the Buddha to teach because there were some who would understand.

My point is that there is nothing we need to adapt. Buddha realized an eternal truth, not subject to change. As I said, while different epochs and persons may require different means to realize that truth, the fundamental realization of the Buddha is immutable.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 24th, 2014 at 12:56 AM

Title: Re: Krishnamurti and Dzogchen.....Hmmmm

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

but honestly I think many people are too eager to just dismiss it, in many cases without even really knowing anything about it.

Malcolm wrote:

Drink deeply then, and be sated:

<http://www.theosociety.org/pasadena/sd/sd-hp.htm> "
onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 24th, 2014 at 12:37 AM

Title: Re: A closer look into empowerments

Content:

narraboth said:

Yes, but that specific ritual claims that the lineage is from Padampa Sangye, and no Nyingma master was mentioned (at least from what I remember).

Malcolm wrote:

Indeed, however, the system of gtor ma empowerments does not exist in the new tantras at all.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 24th, 2014 at 12:31 AM

Title: Re: Krishnamurti and Dzogchen.....Hmmmm

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

One shouldn't be too quick to dismiss theosophy and related teachings, in my opinion.

Malcolm wrote:

Have you actually read Isis Unveiled, The Secret Doctrine or Voice of Silence?

HPB was an interesting person, and a lot of interesting people were connected with Theosophy. Quite frankly, however, Theosophy itself is a very strange thing, the original New Age. Most of the present New Age movement has roots in Theosophy.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, June 23rd, 2014 at 8:06 PM

Title: Re: Sutra Tantra Poll Redux

Content:

daverupa said:

Surely integrating a bit more subtlety was possible without vague hand-wringing over "confusing".

Malcolm wrote:

In the moment it was conceived, no. It was not possible. And definitely not after it was posted.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, June 23rd, 2014 at 8:05 PM

Title: Re: Unreality of Thoughts

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Obscuration.

Astus said:

Is that different from ignorance? If so, how?

Malcolm wrote:

Ignorance is an obscuration. Even tenth stage bodhisattvas have it, though at that point it is very sheer.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, June 23rd, 2014 at 7:50 PM

Title: Re: Unreality of Thoughts

Content:

Astus said:

What is there to stop one from this realisation?

Malcolm wrote:

Obscuration.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, June 23rd, 2014 at 7:46 PM

Title: Re: A closer look into empowerments

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

No, since Shangpa transmissions exist in other schools than Kagyu. Then there is the fact that they all, for the most part, pass through another Nyingmapa, Thangthon Gyalpo.

Don't get me wrong, I am not dissing Shangpa, it is just that gtor ma empowerments do not exist in the New Tantras at all.

narraboth said:

I remember there's a torma based mother tantra dbang of chod, black troma, said to be from Padempa Sangye lineage, in collection of sadhana. (for its length it looks like a jin rlab, but I think the name is dbang) Don't know if it has any link to Nyingma tradition.

Malcolm wrote:

The collection of sadhanas contains both gsar ma and rnying ma transmissions, weighted heavily towards the former, however.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, June 23rd, 2014 at 7:00 PM

Title: Re: Sutra Tantra Poll Redux

Content:

daverupa said:

It's a matter of phrasing questions to include/exclude nuance. The way a poll is written says a lot.

Malcolm wrote:

Correct. However, this is not a scientific poll, but just a broad poll to capture a snapshot of where people's allegiances are.

I mean really: do we need to drill down to the level of

Majjihma Nikāya

Samyutta Nikāya

Anguttara Nikāya

Khudakka Nikāya

Digha Nikāya

Perfection of Wisdom sūtras

Tathagatgarbha sūtras

Yogacara sūtras

Miscellaneous sūtra

snying ma tantra

gsar ma tantra

bka' ma

gter ma

etc????

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, June 23rd, 2014 at 6:38 PM

Title: Re: Sutra Tantra Poll Redux

Content:

JKhedrup said:

The results are a little surprising in that they reveal a "quiet majority" of posters on the board.

Malcolm wrote:

After Will's attempt at a similar poll, I noted that a number of people objected that they they could not select which canon they found valid.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, June 23rd, 2014 at 6:31 PM

Title: Re: All Truth Claims Cannot be True

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

He writes:

Western universalism first achieved full-blown expression in the Romantic movement which swept Europe in the late eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries. There are four key moments, each of which directly involves India and her dharmic traditions: 1) the 'discovery' of the Orient as a spiritual and cultural, as well as material, resource; 2) the use of Sanskrit to bolster Western racial identities, especially German ones; 3) the development of a narrative of history as the unfolding of a 'universal' World Spirit manifesting exclusively in the European and American nations as opposed to Asian ones (a narrative promulgated largely by one man: Hegel); and 4) the export of this narrative back to India, with the effect that Indians came to feel a profound need to reinterpret their own past in the light of the now overwhelmingly powerful Western 'universal' myth.

Malhotra, Rajiv (2011-10-10). Being Different: An Indian Challenge to Western Universalism (Kindle Locations 5096-5102). . Kindle Edition.

In Discussion Hegel's theory of history, which underlies both capitalist and communist globalization:

The Spirit is thus explicitly Western. Other cultures are either thrown away in history's dustbin, if they belong in history at all, or forced to emulate the West. Otherwise, they are trampled. World history and philosophy are seen as one single development, and the World Spirit is a single progressive movement in a linear trajectory.

His books are well worth reading, provocative.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, June 23rd, 2014 at 5:53 PM

Title: Re: Sutra Tantra Poll Redux

Content:
Malcolm wrote:
bump

Author: Malcolm
Date: Sunday, June 22nd, 2014 at 11:02 PM
Title: Re: Krishnamurti and Dzogchen.....Hmmmm
Content:
Wayfarer said:
Which tradition did Krishnamurti explore in full?

Andrew108 said:
The various streams of thought within Theosophy. That was the tradition he grew up with.

Malcolm wrote:
Theosophy is a "tradition" now, is it? [Rather than a hodgepodge of 19th century silliness and cultural misappropriation]

Author: Malcolm
Date: Sunday, June 22nd, 2014 at 10:51 PM
Title: Re: Sutra Tantra Poll Redux
Content:
Alfredo said:
I'm not sure how to answer the poll. Some portions of the Nikayas.

Malcolm wrote:
None of the above then.

daverupa said:
Hmm.

Malcolm wrote:
The point of poll is to find out what a broad sweep of people think.

So, it seems only natural that one who only accepts a portion of the Nikayas/Agamas should answer none of the above, because there really isn't space to have a super nuanced poll.

I already excluded Abhidhamma, Vinaya, Jatakas, etc., since these are already widely regarded as extra-canonical by various traditions.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Sunday, June 22nd, 2014 at 10:40 PM
Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Anders said:

I don't know what you lay into the word 'speculative'...

Speculative:

1 engaged in, expressing, or based on conjecture rather than knowledge: discussion of the question is largely speculative.

Malcolm wrote:

Speculation is not a valid form of knowledge. However, direct perception, inference, and testimony are.

So that is the reason you seek. That is the why I reject the contention that rebirth is "speculative" since it can directly perceived, inferred, and known through Buddha's testimony.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, June 22nd, 2014 at 9:45 PM

Title: Re: Sutra Tantra Poll Redux

Content:

Alfredo said:

I'm not sure how to answer the poll. Some portions of the Nikayas.

Malcolm wrote:

None of the above then.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, June 22nd, 2014 at 9:44 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

tobes said:

I think you're muscling Anders into a position he doesn't hold - where has he said that he rejects anumāna?

Clearly there are inferences to be made in either direction; his point seems to be that 'knowing' on this matter hinges on śhabda, and if one is not enlightened, it is 'speculative' in the sense that we have to take on trust or faith that the person who makes the claim is in fact enlightened.

Malcolm wrote:

However, Dharmakīrti has already shown us the way by which we may take Buddha as an authority on this and other matters without recourse to scriptures based on the fact that Buddha's awakening is a provable proposition. And if we can accept Buddha as an authority on this and other matters, it means that śabda is not speculative.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, June 22nd, 2014 at 5:16 AM

Title: Re: Looking for a good translation of 21 Praises to Tara

Content:

Dharmaswede said:

There are quite a few out there, and I would be most grateful if members would like to share their favorite versions.

Thank you.

Best Regards,

Jens

Malcolm wrote:

Well, there is always mine...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, June 22nd, 2014 at 12:30 AM

Title: Sutra Tantra Poll Redux

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Another angle.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, June 21st, 2014 at 10:11 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The second statement "guided by evolution" is a fallacy. Evolution does not guide anything.

ovi said:

OK, you're right, guided by natural selection. Feeling better now?

Malcolm wrote:

Natural selection does not select.

My fundamental point however is that your belief that consciousness evolves from matter is not consistent with what the Buddha taught.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, June 21st, 2014 at 10:08 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Andrew108 said:

It's not seen just as a superstition. It's seen as being speculative. There is a big difference.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, and this is a symptom of the materialist world view.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, June 21st, 2014 at 9:44 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

I already answered this question. To recap — only materialists insist that the only valid perception is a direct perception. They negate inference and testimony as sources of pramāṇa, valid perception.

However, rebirth can be inferred, it is also described in detail in many hundreds of sutras, not to mention directly perceived by those with sufficient yogic facility.

Andrew108 said:

Where did you get the idea that materialists only accept direct perception? Inference and trusted testimony are incredibly important for so-called materialists. It's just that inference needs to be backed up with evidence or eventually be testable. Scientific enquiry thrives on inference.

Malcolm wrote:

The rejection of inference and testimony has a rich history in materialism, starting with the Carvakas.

We are at the same place today, since the special instrumentality of yogically sharpened senses are not falsifiable according to empirical standards of ordinary perception. Therefore, all the wisdom and knowledge of our tradition is just so much superstition according to modern science.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, June 21st, 2014 at 9:35 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

ovi said:

Consciousness came into existence through form, guided by evolution, this is where the ignorance came from.

Malcolm wrote:

This is faulty for two reasons: one, the first statement is not consistent with Dharma, and rejected by Buddhadharma. This is the very kind of materialism that Buddha rejects.

The second statement "guided by evolution" is a fallacy. Evolution does not guide anything.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, June 21st, 2014 at 8:56 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Anders said:

I think you lay too much at the feet of materialists here. There are many non-materialists who would disagree with this assertion.

Either way, whether it is speculative, Pramana, or whether Pramana can be speculative, I think is perhaps too off-topic for this.

Malcolm wrote:

Rebirth can only be speculative for you if you do not accept inference and testimony as valid forms of perception. So for you, it is speculative. For me, it is not.

This also leads the negative consequence that for you, liberation is also speculative.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, June 21st, 2014 at 8:41 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Andrew108 said:

Sorry I thought your position was that belief in rebirth is essential?

Malcolm wrote:

You misunderstood. Literal birth is not speculative.

Anders said:

Surely that depends on the person?

Barring direct knowledge, how can literal rebirth not be a matter of speculation?

Malcolm wrote:

I already answered this question. To recap — only materialists insist that the only valid perception is a direct perception. They negate inference and testimony as sources of pramāṇa, valid perception.

However, rebirth can be inferred, it is also described in detail in many hundreds of sutras, not to mention directly perceived by those with sufficient yogic facility.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, June 21st, 2014 at 8:31 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Mkoll said:

I claimed that loving-kindness in conjunction with the rest of the Path can result in liberation. You missed the caveat that I clearly made. Here's your post and my response that started this whole conversation. And here, I'll make the caveat even more clear for you this time so that, hopefully, you won't miss it again.

Malcolm wrote:

Then why pose agreement as an objection?

It's not loving kindness and the rest of the path. Loving kindness is not the path [out of samsara]. The Yoga Sūtras, for example, have a beautiful presentation of the four brahma-viharas. The Yoga Sutras however, do not present a Buddhist path in any sense.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, June 21st, 2014 at 5:31 AM

Title: Re: Poll on Faith in Sutras

Content:

pensum said:

I did vote no Will. And as i just mentioned in my previous comment, you wrote "by Buddha" which by convention refers specifically to Shakyamuni, not to other buddhas.

Malcolm wrote:

But in fact they are Śākyamuni Buddha's teaching. Why? Because those teachings appear through Śākyamuni Buddha's permission and blessing, just as for example, in the Prajñāpāramitahridaya, when Ārya Avalokiteśvara explains things to Śāriputra.

pensum said:

Be careful for you are on a slippery slope there my friend. For that still only refers to those sutras describing situations in which Sakyamuni was present or gave explicit permission or blessings. So one still must be precise as to which sutras are being referred to. But more importantly if you get too loose in regards to interpreting "Śākyamuni Buddha's permission and blessings" then your entire argument on that other 80+ page thread is nullified, as any lineage holder could be said to have such permission and blessings; in which case it would make no difference whether they were accurate transcripts of teachings actually spoken or attended by Shakyamuni or simply composed by another person long after the fact.

Malcolm wrote:

No, it's not a slippery slope at all.

A lineage holder does not have the same authority, for example, as a Vimalakirti, and so on.

These different types of teachings as Buddhavacana are well established. For example, we have suttas in the Pali canon taught by Śāriputra or Dhammadinna, wholly on Buddha's permission.

Of course, we are merely talking about _sutras_, of which there are a finite number. When it comes to tantras, well, that is a whole 'nother game.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, June 21st, 2014 at 4:46 AM

Title: Re: Is there anyone home?

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

Anyway, I'm just trying to point out that scholars have different opinions on this issue.

Malcolm wrote:

Right, just like different scientists have different opinions about climate change.

But we know what the majority think, and have thought since the time of the Buddha.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, June 21st, 2014 at 12:10 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Lazy_eye said:

So jettisoning rebirth, it seems to me, necessarily forces a reinterpretation of the goals of Buddhism, to the point that it's hard to see how it can be called Buddhism any more.

Malcolm wrote:

Indeed.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, June 20th, 2014 at 10:41 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

shel said:

No, he's talking about submission, not merely deferring to an authority. Many Westerners defer to you as some sort (I don't know much about you) of authority, for example. Clearly deferring to an authority is not a problem in the West.

Malcolm wrote:

You will have to ask Shamati what he or she means by submission.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, June 20th, 2014 at 10:00 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Andrew108 said:

You can negate literal rebirth both conventionally and ultimately. When I say literal rebirth I am talking about an individual's disembodied consciousness both experiencing the bardo, and their individual karmic imprints during the bardo, and then descending into the womb during conception. This is reasonably easy to negate both conventionally and ultimately.

Malcolm wrote:

What do you mean by "an individual's disembodied consciousness"? If you mean Sati's heresy, i.e, that an integral unit of consciousness takes rebirth, then yes, that it just a atman theory. If you mean however that after this life, based on on karma and afflictions, there is an appropriation of a new set of aggregates, well, this cannot be rejected without rejecting the whole of the Buddhas teachings.

Andrew108 said:

Then you haven't explained how you can hold to some practices, such as sexual practices and drinking alcohol, that seem to directly contradict Buddha's teachings and still say with a straight face that your view of these practices is rooted in Buddhadharma.

Malcolm wrote:

They are also the Buddha's teachings.

Andrew108 said:

What if this denial of literal rebirth has the same function?

Malcolm wrote:

You are not the Buddha, and you are not teaching tantras. There is no such "denial of literal rebirth" in any Buddhist tradition.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, June 20th, 2014 at 9:41 PM

Title: Re: Is there anyone home?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

This is why it is so easy to make the mistake.

Sherab Dorje said:

And why it should be avoided like the plague.

Malcolm wrote:

Unfortunately, it is a deeply grounded blindness that has affected us from beginningless time until now. And even now, even though we may not intellectual believe that we have a self we operate as if we have one because we still have the knowledge obscuration. Even Arhats do not completely realize selflessness, they realize only the selflessness of persons.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, June 20th, 2014 at 9:27 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Andrew108 said:

Sorry I thought your position was that belief in rebirth is essential?

Malcolm wrote:

You misunderstood. Literal birth is not speculative.

I never said you have no right to call yourself a Buddhist. I said that your views about this and that are not grounded in Buddhadharma.

Are you sure about that? Isn't that what sparked the thread with Dharmagoat?

Quite sure.

Now about my views not being grounded in Buddhadharma - definitely some of my views are my own. That's normal right? But I do think that you can provide a logical argument against literal rebirth that is in some way grounded in Buddhadharma.

You can negate rebirth ultimately, but not conventionally. Then again, you can negate everything ultimately — suffering, the origin, cessation, the path and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, June 20th, 2014 at 9:11 PM

Title: Re: Is there anyone home?

Content:

Andrew108 said:

So you can see how this 'flow' is 'atman-like ' without being ' atman '.

Malcolm wrote:

More importantly, you can see how this flow can be mistaken for an atman without an atman being present.

Andrew108 said:

Yes that is true. But there is only a hair width of difference. Like a chain being mistaken for a rope or thread.

Malcolm wrote:

This is why it is so easy to make the mistake.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, June 20th, 2014 at 9:10 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Shamati said:

Westerners have a problem with submission. It contradicts the egalitarian foundation of the modern democratic ideal and I think this is a very large part of culture and discourse in Europe and USA.

shel said:

Hello Shamati,

This is interesting but it's not clear exactly what you are suggesting. Are you for instance suggesting that within religious hierarchies all people are NOT equal and DO NOT deserve equal rights and opportunities?

Malcolm wrote:

I am pretty sure they mean that we have a problem with the idea that someone else might know better than ourselves...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, June 20th, 2014 at 8:53 PM

Title: Re: Is there anyone home?

Content:

Andrew108 said:

So you can see how this 'flow' is 'atman-like ' without being ' atman '.

Malcolm wrote:

More importantly, you can see how this flow can be mistaken for an atman without an atman being present.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, June 20th, 2014 at 8:41 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Andrew108 said:

Literal rebirth is speculative. You have said that it is essential.

Malcolm wrote:

No, I have not implied that anywhere.

Andrew108 said:

But again and again you are saying that I have no right to call myself a Buddhist.

Obviously I find that difficult to accept. I guess that is why this discussion continues.

Perhaps it's time to agree to disagree.

Malcolm wrote:

I never said you have no right to call yourself a Buddhist. I said that your views about this and that are not grounded in Buddhadharma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, June 20th, 2014 at 8:33 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Simon E. said:

Suffering can and should be alleviated by medicine and therapies

Malcolm wrote:

From the point of view of Dharma, as long as we are operating under the influence of the afflictions, whether we think we are happy or not, healthy or not, we are suffering.

I think everyone can agree to this as a basic definition.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, June 20th, 2014 at 8:31 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Mkoll said:

Sheesh, you give a new definition to "shadow-boxing": creating shadows to fight with.

Malcolm wrote:

On the contrary, several people here, including you, have claimed that Brahma-viharas can result in liberation.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, June 20th, 2014 at 5:13 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Andrew108 said:

There are many Buddhists who view literal rebirth as speculative. Consider the following quote from Ajahn Sumedho:

Malcolm wrote:

Then they have not understood the Buddha's teachings completely, including Ajahn Sumedho.

anjali said:

For most of us, literal rebirth probably is speculative, if we take "speculative" to mean "based on conjecture rather than [direct] knowledge." Nevertheless, I do believe in literal rebirth because some masters I have great faith in have said it's true based on their personal experience.

Also, I don't think people have really come to terms with what it is that is "reborn." Unless practitioners can come to some understanding of the nature of the knowing quality of the mind, the notion of rebirth will always be problematic.

Just tossin' in my 2 cents to this "energizer bunny" thread.

Malcolm wrote:

There are three forms of valid knowledge in Buddhadharma — direct perception, inference and testimony.

For us, rebirth is one of the latter two.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, June 20th, 2014 at 4:07 AM

Title: Re: Dorje Drollo and Simhamukha

Content:

alpha said:

How would one know that the obstacles one faces are in fact due to the eight classes ?

Vajrasvapna said:

Some signs are negative dreams, feelings of being persecuted or of a negative presence, fatigue and lack of energy. If the main obstacles that you experience are women, then it is likely that there is a predominance of female spirits; otherwise, a predominance of male spirits.

Malcolm wrote:

These things are not certain. If you want to _know_ for certain, then mo or calculation is the surest bet. Otherwise, you can become very paranoid and fearful, seeing ghosts under the bed everywhere.

In Tibetan Medicine and astrology, we deal with provocations all the time. In fact, when we are diagnosing an illness, we only suspect provocations when a treatment that ought to respond to a treatment is not responding at all.

Diagnosing provocations is a very specialized part of both Tibetan medicine — it can be done through pulse and through urine.

I know many practitioners who assume every problem is a problem with spirits -- this is really sad.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, June 20th, 2014 at 3:38 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Andrew108 said:

There are many Buddhists who view literal rebirth as speculative. Consider the following quote from Ajahn Sumedho:

Malcolm wrote:

Then they have not understood the Buddha's teachings completely, including Ajahn Sumedho.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, June 20th, 2014 at 3:37 AM

Title: Re: Dorje Drollo and Simhamukha

Content:

alpha said:

How would one know that the obstacles one faces are in fact due to the eight classes ?

Malcolm wrote:

Well, concretely it is difficult to know without some kind of divination or calculation.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, June 19th, 2014 at 11:19 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

uan said:

Those "materialists" are actual human beings, and those human beings do have Buddha Nature at their core.

Malcolm wrote:

What exactly do you think Buddhanature is?

uan said:

If Buddhadharma is the ultimate dharma, and if a person is ultimately a Buddha at their essence beneath all the layers of obscurations, then it's quite easy to see how any one person can cling, even at a subconscious level, to Buddhism. It's not too difficult to find similar examples in other areas of people having major inconsistencies in their lives. As Emerson said "A foolish consistency is the hobgoblin of little minds, adored by little statesmen and philosophers and divines."

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, I am willing to allow that of course the "instinct" to awaken comes from our inherent buddhadhātu -- that is a sensible explanation.

I was not talking about someone new, but rather, someone who decides in the end that they do not accept the Buddha's teachings on karma and rebirth for whatever reason, and yet persist in identifying themselves as Buddhists and so on.

Aren't they new to Buddhism though? We talk about incalculable eons, impermanence, rebirth, etc, and yet 20, 30, 50 years makes something not new? Isn't that a "materialist" view?

Well, it really depends on which relative scale you would like to apply. From that point of view, such people's rejection of the core truths of Dharma arise from traces that are countless eons in the making. Such a sad waste of precious human birth.

Isn't it possible, within the Buddhist schema, to live 100s of lifetimes and still be "new" to Buddhism, even if you were a Buddhist in all those lifetimes, or at least had heard of Buddhism? I don't ask this as a rhetorical question, I'm genuinely curious.

As I said, it really depends on the scale we are discussing.

It's really no big deal that they do this. I mean, which is the bigger deal, that they do this, or that others need to go on about how wrong they are to continue self-identifying as Christians?

I didn't say it was "wrong", I said I didn't really understand why someone (in this case a convert to Dharma) would bother maintaining an identity as Buddhist, having rejected Buddha's core teachings.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, June 19th, 2014 at 9:12 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Andrew108 said:

Buddhist wisdom is existential. I don't consider it contains wisdom at a metaphysical level. It's not a doctrine that brings benefit just by itself as a 'complete thing' just by itself.

Malcolm wrote:

Not sure what you mean by "existential" or "metaphysical".

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, June 19th, 2014 at 8:53 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Ok Humpy Dumpty.

Andrew108 said:

It's an important point. Although may be you don't see it. If Buddhism sets itself up in opposition to Science then it will die. Science is not completely formulated - it's an ongoing field of knowledge. This is how Buddhism needs to be. It needs to work itself out in people's experience. It needs to continue to offer relevant ways to view and overcome suffering.

Malcolm wrote:

Buddhadharma is complete. As a product of the Buddha's wisdom, it offers a complete path of freedom and omniscience. Buddhadharma is not a result of experimentation and revision with new data.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, June 19th, 2014 at 8:24 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

I mean, of course, we all understand that suppression of afflictions through śīla and samadhi will prevent us from engaging in actions that will result in suffering, but what about the suffering we are presently experiencing?

I am all ears if anyone has any real suggestions.

oushi said:

Seeing emptiness of the past, the present, and the future eradicates suffering from the present moment.

I am quite disappointing. Seriously you didn't know about that?

Malcolm wrote:

That requires the realization of the first bhumi — and then only when one is established in āryan equipoise. Otherwise, one suffers just like everyone else, the difference being that one knows that it is fundamentally like a dream.

We on the other hand react to suffering as if it is quite real, since we are under the grip of the deep-seated delusion of self-grasping — at least I am, I do not know about the rest of you.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, June 19th, 2014 at 7:52 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Andrew108 said:

Buddha's teachings are not complete.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, actually they are.

Andrew108 said:

They are not complete because we have to work through them. Work them out. If we say they are complete then all we need to do is believe them and we will get the results. In this case Buddhism dies. Never gets into the heart. Becomes ornamental.

Malcolm wrote:

Ok Humpy Dumpty.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, June 19th, 2014 at 7:04 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Andrew108 said:

Buddha's teachings are not complete.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, actually they are.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, June 19th, 2014 at 7:03 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Mkoll said:

Thank you for doing the work, xabir. And better than I would have, I might add.

As you can see, Malcolm, loving-kindness can be used as a basis (along with the rest of the Path <--- this should go without saying) for not only non-returning, but arahantship as well.

Malcolm wrote:

You are not really understanding what the Buddha is saying here.

Dhyāna is not a path out of samsara by itself (this is one of the Agamic Buddha's discoveries), but it can be used as a support for the path.

Loving kindness is not a path, but can be used as a support for the path.

Śīla is not a path, but can be used as a support.

Where did I ever suggest otherwise?

What I said was that the four brahma-viharas are not paths, and the Kalamas sutta does not teach a path out of samsara.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, June 19th, 2014 at 7:35 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Lazy_eye said:

It seems to me that if we are going to define dharma as "strictly that which the Buddha alone taught, and which is not found in any other religion," then we would have to say the only real dharmic teachings are not-self and dependent origination.

That would also mean that karma is not a Buddhist teaching, as it is found in other sramana movements that preceded the Buddha.

Malcolm wrote:

There is Dharma, then there is Buddhadharma. Buddhadharma is superior to other Dharmas (so we believe) because it liberates from samsara. But Buddhism, a Dharma religion, shares common features with other Dharma religions as well. Other Dharmas also assert that rebirth occurs because of karma and klesha and so on, and that liberation too comes about from the eradication of karma and kleshas.

It is important to understand the difference between mundane Dharma and Buddhadharma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, June 19th, 2014 at 7:31 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

uan said:

Therein lies the value of practicing Buddhism, even if it's incomplete. We talk like we all believe in rebirth but really? Do we really? For the vast majority of Buddhists, it will take incalculable lifetimes to reach Buddhahood. Yet we act as if people don't get it quite right in this lifetime, it's a bust, a complete waste of time.

Malcolm wrote:

The whole point of what I am saying is that one should not expect to gain any definitive result in this lifetime. I am saying that one should practice for the next life, always.

uan said:

You mentioned you don't understand how a person can be attracted to Buddhism without believing in rebirth.

Malcolm wrote:

No, I definitely did not say that. What I said was:

Shamati said:

on the other hand I dont really understand why a materialist, who have no faith in spiritual existence or realities would want to cling to buddhism?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, this has puzzled me for years too. I have never understood it.

I was not talking about someone new, but rather, someone who decides in the end that they do not accept the Buddha's teachings on karma and rebirth for whatever reason, and yet persist in identifying themselves as Buddhists and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, June 19th, 2014 at 7:24 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Sorry, but the four brahmaviharas are not a liberative path — that is why the Buddha called them, as well as the practice of the ten virtues, "the vehicle of humans and devas" since they only lead to higher rebirth and not out of samsara.

Mkoll said:

By themselves, you are correct, they are not sufficient for liberation. But, along with the rest of the Eightfold Path, loving-kindness can be used as a basis, a meditation object if you will, for the attainment of non-returner in the Theravada tradition. Please see the <http://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/kn/snp/snp.1.08.than.html> for the evidence of this.

Malcolm wrote:

I do not see this as saying that metta leads to the path of a non-returner, but rather, it is contrasting a mundane path with a transmundane path.

Buddha does this frequently.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, June 19th, 2014 at 5:30 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

The point being that there are tangible fruits, here and now, from Buddhist practices, even if one does not subscribe to a right view (ie if one is an essentialist or a nihilist). MBT is a perfect example of the advantages of Buddhist practices, even without a Buddhist view.

Malcolm wrote:

The loving kindness and compassion are not buddhist practices per se. Neither is moral discipline. This is saying nothing more than if you are a nice, ethical person, your life will better. Laudatory, but not Buddhist per se.

Anders said:

So what? That Buddhism shares these factors of goodness with other religions doesn't make them any less Buddhist or any less worthwhile. They are what the Buddha taught - That makes them straight up 'Buddhism per se'.

Malcolm wrote:

Sorry, but the four brahmaviharas are not a liberative path — that is why the Buddha called them, as well as the practice of the ten virtues, "the vehicle of humans and devas" since they only lead to higher rebirth and not out of samsara.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, June 19th, 2014 at 5:28 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Andrew108 said:

Lets repeat again what buddhism is about. It is about identifying craving and clinging and then having that craving and clinging dry up...

Malcolm wrote:

This might prevent the arising of future suffering in a future time, but will not put an end to suffering in this here and now.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, June 19th, 2014 at 5:25 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Buddhism does not teach a way not to suffer in this life. Where did you ever read this? Buddhism teaches us that we are suffering, why, that there can be an end, and how to arrive at that end. But there is no guarantee in Buddhism that if you practice Dharma you will "suffer less in this life" -- especially considering the three kinds of suffering.

Sherab Dorje said:

There is if you reach enlightenment in this lifetime, that's what the whole Vajrayana deal is about, ain't it?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, of course if you become a buddha or an arhat in this life, you will cease suffer. Apart from that, no, you will not cease to suffer. Instread

When I say that "Buddhism does not teach a way not to suffer in this life" what I mean is that Buddhism does not provide any means of eradicating suffering apart from full buddhahood. Certainly even bodhisattvas on the paths and stages still experience suffering since, they possess the twin obscurations on the lower bhumis. Granted, Bodhisattvas on the pure stages do not experience suffering, but then they have conquered death.

So, exactly in what way does Buddhadharma teach a way not to suffer in this life short of attaining some āryan realization?

I mean, of course, we all understand that suppression of afflictions through śīla and samadhi will prevent us from engaging in actions that will result in suffering, but what about the suffering we are presently experiencing?

I am all ears if anyone has any real suggestions.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, June 19th, 2014 at 1:29 AM

Title: Re: Poll on Faith in Sutras

Content:

pensum said:

I did vote no Will. And as i just mentioned in my previous comment, you wrote "by Buddha" which by convention refers specifically to Shakyamuni, not to other buddhas.

Malcolm wrote:

But in fact they are Śākyamuni Buddha's teaching. Why? Because those teachings appear through Śākyamuni Buddha's permission and blessing, just as for example, in the Prajñāpāramitahridaya, when Ārya Avalokiteśvara explains things to Śāriputra.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, June 19th, 2014 at 1:25 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Anders said:

"I suffer [in this life]. Buddhism teaches a way to not suffer [in this life]. It also seems to be the best path for this. Therefore I practise Buddhism." Not hard at all. Nor even untrue.

Malcolm wrote:

Buddhism does not teach a way not to suffer in this life. Where did you ever read this? Buddhism teaches us that we are suffering, why, that there can be an end, and how to arrive at that end. But there is no guarantee in Buddhism that if you practice Dharma you will "suffer less in this life" -- especially considering the three kinds of suffering.

Whatever suffering you experience is the ripening of past actions not even the buddha's can prevent. The goal of Buddhist practice is to awaken and end the cycle of birth in samsara.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, June 19th, 2014 at 1:21 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

The point being that there are tangible fruits, here and now, from Buddhist practices, even if one does not subscribe to a right view (ie if one is an essentialist or a nihilist). MBT is a perfect example of the advantages of Buddhist practices, even without a Buddhist view.

Malcolm wrote:

The loving kindness and compassion are not buddhist practices per se. Neither is moral discipline. This is saying nothing more than if you are a nice, ethical person, your life will be better. Laudatory, but not Buddhist per se.

My objection is that people are constantly putting this forward as evidence of tangible fruits of Buddhist practice when they are not even Buddhist practices at all per se, and do not, in any way whatsoever address the issue of suffering.

I don't know what "MBT" is.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, June 19th, 2014 at 12:11 AM

Title: Re: Poll on Faith in Sutras

Content:

pensum said:

I don't really understand the purpose of your question for, even within the traditional canon, many sutras themselves clearly state that they were not taught by the Buddha but by someone else, for example

Āryasaṃvṛtiparamāṛthasatyanirdeśanāmamahāyānasūtra in which it is Manjushri who is specifically requested to give teachings. (It's a very worthwhile read by the way, and is available at <http://read.84000.co/#!ReadingRoom/UT22084-060-008/12> )

Will said:

We also read that "through the blessing or empowerment of Buddha" such & such bodhisattva spoke. Thus "in some manner or form."

pensum said:

But this is why i picked that specific sutra for in it the retinue specifically requests the Buddha to call Manjushri so that they might see him. Buddha does nothing more than call Manjushri to join them, and refuses to ask or command Manjushri to teach. And then they ask to hear him not recount the teachings of Shakyamuni but rather those of Ratnaketu: Then the divine son Lord of Peace and Calm bowed to the Blessed One and said, with joined palms, "Blessed One, all of us would like to listen, so please ask Mañjuśrī Kumārabhūta to teach."

The Blessed One replied, "Divine son, you yourself should make that request."

So the divine son said, "Mañjuśrī, it would be wonderful if you could give us a Dharma teaching similar to what is taught in the buddha realm of the blessed one, the Thus-Gone Ratnaketu."

And as pointed out above other sutras were composed or transcribed by others such as Huineng. So i, and it would appear others as well, find the wording of your poll question to be too vague.

Malcolm wrote:

The teaching of one buddha is the teaching of all.

The platform sutra is misnamed.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, June 18th, 2014 at 11:46 PM

Title: Re: Poll on Faith in Sutras

Content:

pensum said:

I don't really understand the purpose of your question for, even within the traditional canon, many sutras themselves clearly state that they were not taught by the Buddha but by someone else, for example

Āryasaṃvṛtiparamārthasatyanirdeśanāmamahāyānasūtra in which it is Manjushri who is specifically requested to give teachings. (It's a very worthwhile read by the way, and is available at <http://read.84000.co/#!ReadingRoom/UT22084-060-008/12> )

Malcolm wrote:

This is an example of the Buddha teaching through granting permission.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, June 18th, 2014 at 11:20 PM

Title: Re: Poll on Faith in Sutras

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

Come on Malcolm, everybody knows Huineng penned the original Platform Sutra. Let's not kid ourselves. Then it developed over a 500 year period.

Malcolm wrote:

The development of the platform sutra is not relevant to the discussion.

It is one thing to have Mahāyāna sutras that transcend time when taught in Akaniṣṭha by the Sambhogakāya to an emanated retinue -- quite another when they feature retinues like Śāriputra (who passed a few months before the Buddha), and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, June 18th, 2014 at 11:17 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

The Brahma Viharas are a Buddhist practice too, and the assurances were in regards to positive circumstances in this life too arising as a consequence of right ethics.

Malcolm wrote:

You are missing the point — they are not a transcendent practice, they do not transcend samsara, therefore, they do not eradicate suffering.

daverupa said:

Neither does mere Sila on it's own, nor mere guarding of the sense gates, yet these comprise essential steps along the Gradual Training. You expect far too much, given the context, while ignoring the rather dense Dhamma teaching they did receive, all things considered.

Malcolm wrote:

No, I am merely pointing out that people invest far more in the Kalamas account than is warranted, given its context. People constantly misuse this sutta, a minor text in every respect, lacking importance until it was seized upon in the 20th century as some putative confirmation of Buddhist agnosticism.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, June 18th, 2014 at 10:52 PM

Title: Re: Poll on Faith in Sutras

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

No. The Platform Sutra comes to mind here.

Malcolm wrote:

No what?

Are you claiming that Śariputra transcends space and time?

The "Platform sutra" is not really called that. Not in the sense of the Indian usage of the term. The Chinese term "jing" has a broader usage.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, June 18th, 2014 at 10:37 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

The Brahma Viharas are a Buddhist practice too, and the assurances were in regards to positive circumstances in this life too arising as a consequence of right ethics.

Malcolm wrote:

You are missing the point — they are not a transcendent practice, they do not transcend samsara, therefore, they do not eradicate suffering.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, June 18th, 2014 at 10:26 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Since the very definition of suffering in Buddhism is predicated on endless birth in samsara, Buddhadharma as a path simply makes no sense absent that understanding.

Sherab Dorje said:

Anders said: "for the sake of the fruits it can offer in this life alone." Enlightenment is not the only fruit of Buddhist practice. The "assurances" taught to the Kalamas demonstrate that quite clearly.

Malcolm wrote:

The Buddha did not teach the Kalamas a path -- he taught them the four Brahma Viharas and nothing else — which are common with Hinduism — resulting only in higher birth in samsara.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, June 18th, 2014 at 9:04 PM

Title: Re: Hello!

Content:

Ed1980 said:

Keen to completely avoid the NKT. I hope I'm in the right place!

Malcolm wrote:

Indeed you are...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, June 18th, 2014 at 8:42 PM

Title: Re: Poll on Faith in Sutras

Content:

Jikan said:

I voted "yes" because Buddha isn't limited by time & space.

Malcolm wrote:

Audiences, however, are...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, June 18th, 2014 at 8:37 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Shamati said:

on the other hand I dont really understand why a materialist, who have no faith in spiritual existence or realities would want to cling to buddhism?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, this has puzzled me for years too. I have never understood it.

Anders said:

If I had to guess, I'd say it is because you seem not to appreciate that pursuing freedom from suffering could be worthwhile for the sake of the fruits it can offer in this life alone.

Malcolm wrote:

Since the very definition of suffering in Buddhism is predicated on endless birth in samsara, Buddhadharma as a path simply makes no sense absent that understanding.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, June 18th, 2014 at 8:30 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Dan74 said:

As for Western Zen, my teacher was very traditionally trained in Korea, and even there, lineage is not very important. Lineage, as we know, is not a guarantee.

Malcolm wrote:

That just illustrates an important difference between Zen and Vajrayāna — in Vajrayāna, lineage is everything.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, June 18th, 2014 at 8:20 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

How's this for a dilemma: If we accept the veracity of all Mahayana Sutra without applying (modernist text) critical analysis then what happens in the case of Sutra who's content contravenes some of the four seals. Sutras that preach Atman theory, for example. I give this example, as the question occurred to me during a discussion I was having in another thread.

- THIS IS NOT AN INVITATION TO START (yet another) DISCUSSION ON SELF vs NON-SELF (again) -

Malcolm wrote:

I have pointed out before that the four seals are not an adequate test for determining Buddhist vs. non-Buddhist for the simple reason that Pudgalavadins are clearly Buddhists who advocate a doctrine of self (the inexpressible person who is neither the same as nor different from the aggregates).

Author: Malcolm
Date: Wednesday, June 18th, 2014 at 7:36 PM
Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism
Content:

tobes said:

That's simply the argument given across 81 pages: that every scholar and most western practitioners uncritically accept the hegemonic view that the Mahayana sutras were later developments. In other words, when anyone reads sutras, they read them in that way.

Malcom's argument is that we need to overturn this hegemony.

The fact that there is a hegemony to be overturned clearly implies that we ought not take things at face value; we ought to find some other (more traditional) way of engaging.

Malcolm wrote:

Tobes, quit playing with words.

Otherwise, you are quite right, there is a lens through which every one introduced to Buddhism in the West reads Buddhism and that lens was originally polished in the late 19th century.

That lens consists primarily of the assumption that writing was unknown in India at the time of the Buddha and that all references to writing are proofs of post-Hellenic developments.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Wednesday, June 18th, 2014 at 7:32 PM
Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism
Content:

Wayfarer said:

Perhaps a lot of what you say is actually context-dependent. It depends on the point you are trying to make, to those you are speaking to at the time. You adopt a certain position for argument's sake, and then pursue it.

Would that be a fair assessment?

Malcolm wrote:

No, I still stand by what I said then, and what I said yesterday. Even A108 is a Buddhist, just a Buddhist whose views of reality are not consistent with Buddhism. This does not mean I would ever deny these people access to as much of the teachings as they can stomach -- it also does not mean that I am willing to cut them slack when they start advocating changing the teachings to suit whatever biases and preconceptions about reality that they hold.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, June 18th, 2014 at 8:58 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

tobes said:

By explicitly working on early Indian Prajnaparamita...

Malcolm wrote:

Your statement betrays you right here...

If Prajñāpāramita is the Buddha's teaching, how can there be "earlier" and "later"?

At this point the narrative is so embedded in our thinking, we don't even question it.

You also need to understand that I am pretty much confining myself to historical scholarship.

Sociology, anthropology and so on of Buddhist cultures are relatively new fields, and are often not undertaken by people with serious skills in Buddhist literature.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, June 18th, 2014 at 8:56 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

tobes said:

Now we have the admission, that although there might in fact be a large percentage of scholar-practitioners, all of them, somehow, disavow their Buddhist beliefs for a quasi materialism which implicitly informs all of their work.

Malcolm wrote:

Jesus Tobes, have you ever read any of the stuff that these people write?

dzogchungpa said:

You mean stuff like this: <http://dash.harvard.edu/handle/1/11125112>?

Malcolm wrote:

Funny you mention that, she asked me a number of questions about the text she was working on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, June 18th, 2014 at 8:01 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

tobes said:

Now we have the admission, that although there might in fact be a large percentage of scholar-practitioners, all of them, somehow, disavow their Buddhist beliefs for a quasi materialism which implicitly informs all of their work.

Malcolm wrote:

Jesus Tobes, have you ever read any of the stuff that these people write?

They all adhere to the text critical method which is the consensus view of Buddhist textual evolution in the academy.

For example, our own dear and beloved Huifeng doesn't believe a single word of Mahāyāna was taught by the Buddha. Neither does Jeff aka Indrajala, and I dare say, neither do you. Forget about all these fancy rationals, dreams, visions, and so on. Basically, the simple fact is that most of us who follow Mahāyāna and Vajrayāna don't actually believe that the scriptures we purport to follow were indeed taught by the Buddha in any form at all.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, June 18th, 2014 at 7:09 AM

Title: Re: Interview with the Arahāt

Content:

duckfiasco said:

But I suppose that's why I don't subscribe to the thousands of lifetimes to do anything worth a fart model of some schools.

Malcolm wrote:

That would be common Mahāyāna.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, June 18th, 2014 at 6:48 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

daverupa said:

For what it's worth, <http://dhammaloka.org.au/files/pdf/authenticity.pdf> covers a Buddhist Modernism that is pro-rebirth, involves practitioner-scholars, etc., so please note that so far this recent conversation is a rather one-sided characterization of what this sort of approach involves.

Malcolm wrote:

If you accept certain Western historic claims, it might be satisfying for some. But it is still very much a "Protestant Buddhism" with a "Scientific Buddha" at the heart of the quest.

Of course, according to them, I would fall in the denialist camp.

I would not characterize this as "modernism" but more like a different sort of fundamentalism. It is an attempt at setting down a scholastic, "Early Buddhist" fundamentalism.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, June 18th, 2014 at 5:48 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Shamati said:

on the other hand I dont really understand why a materialist, who have no faith in spiritual existence or realities would want to cling to buddhism?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, this has puzzled me for years too. I have never understood it.

Mkoll said:

I would guess that it is the fear of death that we all share. Sometimes, people become more religious or spiritual later in life as old age, sickness, and death roll in. And who can say what changes of heart may take place in a materialist on their deathbed.

Malcolm wrote:

I guess, what I don't understand the most is people like Batchelor who clearly want to revise Dharma with rebirth out of it.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, June 18th, 2014 at 4:58 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Shamati said:

on the other hand I dont really understand why a materialist, who have no faith in spiritual existence or realities would want to cling to buddhism?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, this has puzzled me for years too. I have never understood it.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, June 18th, 2014 at 1:33 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

I don't think that scholar-practitioners are taken very seriously.

mutsuk said:

I can assure you that Matthew Kapstein is taken very, very seriously in academic circles. However, I had no idea he was a practitioner and actually I suspect he is not. But his research work is definitely worth the reading.

Malcolm wrote:

Hi Mutsuk:

Kapstein is a brilliant guy, there is no doubt he is taken quite seriously. But as you know I am making a different point.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 17th, 2014 at 11:17 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

TocharianB said:

Aren't Janet Gyatso and David Germano both scholar-practitioners?

Malcolm wrote:

They are both extremely knowledgeable in their fields. I am not aware that they are serious practitioners. They probably be offended if they were asked.

TocharianB said:

In my understanding, the majority of American scholars of Tibetan traditions in particular are devoted to Vajrayana, e.g. John Makransky, Matthew Kapstein, Jose Cabezón, Jeffrey Hopkins, Jakob Dalton, Anne Klein, Gregory Hillis.

Malcolm wrote:

I don't think that scholar-practitioners are taken very seriously.

TocharianB said:

The same cannot be said for scholars of Theravada and East Asian traditions, of course, but I'm a little confused why you're painting all of academia with the same brush, especially American scholars devoted to Tibetan Buddhism, who tend, in my limited experience, to be very engaged students of the dharma. Is the new generation of scholars at UVA, who mostly haven't gotten around to publishing yet, more secular than generations past?

Malcolm wrote:

The requirements for the study of religion in all academic programs is the same — you must subordinate traditional narratives for the academic ones, or seek to explain the traditional narratives in otherizing terms.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 17th, 2014 at 10:08 PM

Title: Re: Dorje Drollo and Simhamukha

Content:

alpha said:

What is the difference between Dorje Drollo and Simhamukha in terms of actions and removing obstacles ?

It seems that in general the preferred choice for removing obstacles related to spirit possession, black magic, provocations is Simhamukha although as far as i know DD is much more powerful but don't know in what way powerful ,so i've been told.

Malcolm wrote:

Drollo is meant for controlling the eight classes in general.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 17th, 2014 at 12:42 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Dan74 said:

To my way of seeing, the trouble is not with too little faith but with too much corrosive doubt, the papanca borne of too much hair-splitting and intellectualising relative to practice. I've been fortunate to meet several practitioners to whom this entire debate would be completely irrelevant. Not because they are so adamant that the traditional accounts are exactly right, but because their strong practice root has rendered such hand-wringing entirely beside the point.

Malcolm wrote:

My main point is that the traditional accounts have been supplanted by a modern narrative of uncertainty. This can be beneficial to no one who practices these traditions.

In Western Zen, lineage is simply not as important as it is Vajrayāna.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, June 16th, 2014 at 11:14 PM

Title: Re: Historical Changes in Ritual Implements & Shrine Set-up

Content:

Jikan said:

On two occasions, I've been able to see mid-19th century photographs of Tibetan Buddhist practitioners and some of their implements (one was on display years ago at the University of New Mexico, USA; the other at George Mason University, USA). It seems to me that there have been some small but significant changes in the size and shape of some articles of practice, which seem to be increasingly standardized today. For instance, the chodpas I've seen photographed in practice over a hundred years ago might have much smaller and differently-accoutred damaru than one might expect to see someone using today--or not.

I'm wondering if these changes reflect easier manufacturing processes today compared to pre-industrial Asia, or changes in attitude/expectation toward practice implements, or something else entirely--or if I'm completely off the reservation in my reading of these images.

Thanks.

Malcolm wrote:

There has been some modernization and stream-lining of practice articles since the 1970's. And in general, quality has declined.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, June 16th, 2014 at 1:01 PM

Title: Re: The Buddha from Babylon

Content:

plwk said:

The Lost History and Cosmic Vision of Siddhartha Gautama

After reading the excerpts from this <http://www.buddhafrombabylon.com/>, I have no idea on what to make out of it.

Maybe, those of you who have bought/read this book or the excerpts do?

Malcolm wrote:

I see, so this is reverse of the Lost Jesus in India trope, i.e. the Lost Buddha in the Middle-East.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, June 16th, 2014 at 11:33 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

daverupa said:

Saddha isn't harmed by history.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, if you are a Theravadin, and your "history" is written by people who prefer Pali terms to Sanskrit ones, of course not. You folks already have an agenda to discredit Mahāyāna.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, June 16th, 2014 at 11:30 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Mkoll said:

Can you provide a reference? This thread is almost 80 pages long.

Malcolm wrote:

<https://www.dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=66&t=16491&p=239338&hilit=sujato>

Mkoll said:

I'm sorry but one quote from one scholar about one Buddhist school is hardly proof of your words: "Scholars have no idea where the eighteen schools came, and so on".

It would be presumptuous of me to expect you to go out of your way to provide more numerous and solid references for your claim.

Malcolm wrote:

It is not likely to happen. I have been reading academic Buddhist literature for the better part of three decades, I worked for a Buddhist book store at one time, and also Wisdom Pubs as their retail manager in 1990-1. I have maintained a familiarity with the latest and greatest of academic literature especially where it concerns Mahāyāna — when I tell you that it piles speculation on assumptions in absence of actual facts, I mean it. When I tell you that I have observed a number of interpretive fads amongst western scholars, I mean it. Even if there are closeted Buddhists in academia, they certainly cannot write books from the perspective of their faith. Instead, they must accommodate the western scholastic set of assumptions and prejudices about the history of Mahāyāna whether they buy them or not (but they largely seem to). The one thing it all boils down to is that according to the current state of knowledge of the origins of Mahāyāna and Vajrayāna, western scholars simply have no clear idea where these traditions are from and how they arose.

But we do. Why? Because we have clear accounts of the rise of these teachings; which teacher brought out which tantras (Nairatma, Hevajra; Saraha, Cakrasamvara, Garab Dorje, the Dzogchen Tantras, and so on). In general we consider that Nāgārjuna revealed Mahāyāna. And that is all a practitioner of these systems really needs to know.

Their approach does not lead to a living wisdom tradition that will never be obsolete.
Their approach leads to dead knowledge in a book, soon obsolete.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, June 16th, 2014 at 5:51 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Wayfarer said:

many more Buddhologists are now also practitioners.

Malcolm wrote:

Very few of those are Mahāyānist in any identifiable way — at most they are Mahāyāna "sympathetic".

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, June 16th, 2014 at 3:46 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Kunzang said:

Malcolm,

Do you think your former self that more-or-less accepted the academic view of Mahayana origins would have been persuaded by the type of reasonings you're using now if someone had presented them to you?

Malcolm wrote:

I would have to admit that is all guesses, mostly conflicting.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, June 16th, 2014 at 2:59 AM

Title: Re: The Three Skyes

Content:

Nirvan said:

Hello brothers and sisters

Could some of you give here some explanations of the 3 Skyes (namkha sum - nam-mkha' gsum), important notion in the Dzogchen teachings ?

Thank you

Malcolm wrote:

It is something you need to receive directly from a qualified teacher.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, June 16th, 2014 at 2:34 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

daverupa said:

So due to

<https://www.dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=66&t=16491&p=239338&hilit=sujato#p239338> you consider "almost everything we read by scholars etc." to be a supported claim? This has "taken care of it"?

Malcolm wrote:

This is merely a drop in the bucket of similar speculative confusion that I have encountered in people like Vallee -Pouissin, Davidson, Snellgrove, etc., et al. over the past 30 years or so. Like many people, I gained my first real introduction to Buddhism by taking a course at a college (with Malcolm David Eckel). He told me then he was glad he was a Christian, because Buddhism as a religion to follow never made any sense to him, despite his interest in Madhyamaka.

Pretty much every suggestion of origin, or attempt to pin something down in Buddhist history is met with a chorus of confusion and counter claims.

I seriously considered becoming a Buddhologist, but after seeing how the work of people like Janet Gyatso, Hallisey, Van de Kuip, Germano, etc., turned out, and how destructive, or if you prefer, deconstructive the approach of the western academy towards Buddhadharma is, I have decided to eschew its conclusions as non-productive and sterile speculations. In other words, there will be no living tradition of Buddhadharma flowing out from Western Academia.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, June 16th, 2014 at 2:13 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Therefore, I have concluded that the traditional accounts are indeed more satisfying.

dzogchungpa said:

I don't find the traditional accounts even slightly satisfying.

Malcolm wrote:

They are that we have, unless, like western Academic scholars of the history of Buddhism, you make a (meager) living inventing and then selling new narratives.

The problem with Buddhadharma in the West is not too much faith, it is too little faith. Not in my case.

Lack of faith is not obvious. But it definitely begins with deciding that traditional Buddhist narratives are just "myths", and dissatisfying ones at that.

BTW, I am not judging anyone personally — people are free to believe whatever they wish, AFAIC. But I have come to the conclusion that some approaches to the Dharma are more virtuous than others, so I am following my own advice in this respect. Everyone else is free to do as they please.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, June 16th, 2014 at 2:10 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Mkoll said:

Can you provide a reference? This thread is almost 80 pages long.

Malcolm wrote:

<https://www.dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=66&t=16491&p=239338&hilit=sujato>

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, June 15th, 2014 at 9:19 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Given the fact that the whole edifice of the western historiography of Buddhism is consists of a house of cards

daverupa said:

This is yet to be demonstrated, even this many pages in.

Malcolm wrote:

Oh, I took care of that pages ago by pointing out that Scholars have no idea where the eighteen schools came, and so on. Almost everything we read by scholars, unless it is grounded in some plastic fact like inscription, and so on, is entirely speculative fabrications, and at this point in my life, I find them less reasonable to take seriously on any level at all.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, June 15th, 2014 at 8:12 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The people most attached to views here are those who are committed to historiography of Buddhism as promulgated in the western academy, or their pet view of the brain, etc.

I have also come to understand that "Buddhist Modernism" arises out of this destructive analysis, the only thing "Buddhist" about it is its name, but like the Holy Roman Empire that was neither "holy", nor "Roman", nor an "empire", Buddhist modernism is neither "Buddhist" nor "modern" at all.

As for myself, I am not attached to any particular story — I have simply, and finally come to understand that western Academic scholarship on Buddhadharma is destructive to that Dharma, not merely for one reason, but for very many. Therefore, I have concluded that the traditional accounts are indeed more satisfying. They involve less clinging, less proliferation, are more inspiring, and generate more genuine faith. The problem with Buddhadharma in the West is not too much faith, it is too little faith.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, June 15th, 2014 at 8:00 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

treehuggingoctopus said:

e-Sangha-like questing for hardline orthodoxy, I wouldn't hesitate even a second..

Malcolm wrote:

E-Sangha was only hardline about one thing really — rebirth.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, June 15th, 2014 at 11:20 AM

Title: Re: A bunch of questions about empowerment, deities and prac

Content:

LolCat said:

Thank you for all the responses people, they were really helpful.

Malcolm wrote:

Recite refuge and bodhicitta. Then recite whatever mantras you have received, focusing on the sound.

Eventually, you will be able to find the correct sadhana and receive instruction. For now, it is excellent if you can maintain the stream of recitation daily.

LolCat said:

I think I do have the correct sadhana right now:

<http://www.garchen.net/resources/Amitabha%20FINAL%20FINAL.pdf> "

onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;" onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

Would it be okay for me to continue this practice without a teacher?

Malcolm wrote:

Definitely. You do your best.

You will eventually find someone who can give you instruction, or you will find the book, etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, June 15th, 2014 at 10:26 AM

Title: Re: A bunch of questions about empowerment, deities and prac

Content:

LolCat said:

Thank you for all the responses people, they were really helpful.

Malcolm wrote:

Recite refuge and bodhicitta. Then recite whatever mantras you have received, focusing on the sound.

Eventually, you will be able to find the correct sadhana and receive instruction. For now, it is excellent if you can maintain the stream of recitation daily.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, June 15th, 2014 at 10:25 AM

Title: Re: A bunch of questions about empowerment, deities and prac

Content:

Alfredo said:

6. Since mantras can be pronounced in different ways, depending on local phonology, and have evolved somewhat over time, this lends support to the suggestion that they are derived from particular cultures.

Malcolm wrote:

Mantras are the speech acts of awakened beings — they can be in any language. But they must have been pronounced first by a buddha for a given purpose.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, June 15th, 2014 at 10:23 AM

Title: Re: A bunch of questions about empowerment, deities and prac

Content:

Alfredo said:

11. No one really "gets" bodhicitta until they are enlightened!

Malcolm wrote:

This is not correct.

Compassion is the cause of bodhicitta, bodhicitta is the cause of buddhas.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, June 15th, 2014 at 10:21 AM

Title: Re: A bunch of questions about empowerment, deities and prac

Content:

LolCat said:

10. What is the difference between Metta and Boddhicitta?

Malcolm wrote:

Metta is love. [Mahāyāna] bodhicitta is the wish to attain complete buddhahood for the benefit all sentient beings.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, June 15th, 2014 at 7:43 AM

Title: Re: The practices of the base of santi maha sangha

Content:

thewhiterussia said:

Dear people,

According to the instructions for the practices of the base level of santi maha sangha one day of practice corresponds to four thuns. Does anybody know how long is one thun supposed to be?

Many thanks

Malcolm wrote:

Traditionally, three hours, practically, two.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, June 15th, 2014 at 5:51 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

daverupa said:

own, which is utterly amazing to see repeated over and over here.

Malcolm wrote:

Given the fact that the whole edifice of the western historiography of Buddhism is consists of a house of cards, it is not surprising it is challenged over and over. What you have are a few phenomena caked in modern speculations which are utterly unsupported. This is case of the whole of Buddhist studies in the west. Not merely studies of Mahāyāna.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, June 14th, 2014 at 2:07 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Sönam said:

Easy one ... Buddhist version does not reject evolution theory, it includes it in a more complete process.

pueraeternus said:

The Buddhist version of the origin of the human race is that we devolved from deva beings due to the three poisons, our bodies and mind becoming grosser and grosser, etc. This contradicts scientific evolution.

Malcolm wrote:

Not necessarily.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, June 14th, 2014 at 1:56 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Sönam said:

[

Dzogchen view does not say that we come from deva ...

Malcolm wrote:

Norbu Rinpoche subscribes to the origin of humanity described by the Buddha. It is not in Dzogchen tantras, but it also does not contradict Dzogchen tantras.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, June 14th, 2014 at 1:42 AM

Title: Re: Dharma protectors and samaya

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

North American is Tsiu Marpo. Ocean is Marutse.

Karinos said:

Hi, and which one for Europe please? thanks

Malcolm wrote:

Pramoha

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, June 13th, 2014 at 4:31 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

And if a vidyādhara tells you that you should regard sutras as the actual words of the Buddha, or the termas as the actual words of Padmasambhava you will react how?

dzogchungpa said:

I'm curious, did Sakya Pandita think that one should regard termas as the actual words of Padmasambhava?

Malcolm wrote:

Sakya Pandita was skeptical of the nascent treasure tradition.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, June 13th, 2014 at 3:13 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

I see no contradiction in having faith in the transmission of a living rigdzin and at the same time recognizing the reality of the complexities of text transmission over centuries.

Malcolm wrote:

Even though your very notion of a vidyādhara is derived from a textual tradition in which you have no confidence?

gad rgyangs said:

my notion of vidhydhara is derived from sitting in front of ChNNR. I find all kinds of interesting things in sutras, I just dont think they fell out of the sky onto my roof.

Malcolm wrote:

And you know that ChNN is a vidyādhara exactly how? And if a vidyādhara tells you that you should regard sutras as the actual words of the Buddha, or the termas as the actual words of Padmasambhava you will react how?

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, June 13th, 2014 at 3:01 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

I see no contradiction in having faith in the transmission of a living rigdzin and at the same time recognizing the reality of the complexities of text transmission over centuries.

Malcolm wrote:

Even though your very notion of a vidyādhara is derived from a textual tradition in which you have no confidence?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, June 13th, 2014 at 2:18 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

This is what the Mahāyāna and Vajrayāna traditions clearly maintain. There is no reason for practitioners of these traditions not to simply accept these accounts, and every good reason to do so.

M

gad rgyangs said:

so, basically you reject the highly plausible text critical explanation in favor of fairytales, and provide no justification beyond "just because".

Malcolm wrote:

Your stance is not different, you accept the text critical explanation just because you cannot imagine anything else to be the case.

You basically do not have any faith in the tradition, which is fine — but then you are left holding a bunch of teachings in which you have no confidence nor reason to believe that they will do anything other than provide you with a few hours of entertainment. Otherwise, if you actually have confidence in the teachings, you cannot really say why you do apart from your own conceptual admiration of them since you certainly cannot believe they come from an awakened source. This is the inevitable consequence of accepting the text critical version of the history of Buddhist sūtras and tantras.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, June 13th, 2014 at 1:51 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

OK, so whats your alternative, fully demonstrable, explanation for the state of the texts?

Malcolm wrote:

They were taught by the Buddha, and then squirreled away by nāgās, devas, yakṣas, tenth stage bodhisattvas, etc., until they were again promulgated by Nāgārjuna.

M

gad rgyangs said:

and this is demonstrable how exactly?

Malcolm wrote:

This is what the Mahāyāna and Vajrayāna traditions clearly maintain. There is no reason for practitioners of these traditions not to simply accept these accounts, and every good reason to do so.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, June 13th, 2014 at 1:30 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

As it happens, I noticed the relationship between the 8000 & the 25000 on my own by comparing them. Yes, its that obvious, even to a non-specialist.

Malcolm wrote:

Sure, why not? They are both Prajñāpāramita sutras, the basis message is the same. Even some of the words are the same. In the Agamas/Nikayas there are countless places where the Buddha uses the same phrases over and over again. This does not mean that your contention that one is merely a padded out version of the other is supportable in anyway. It is merely your conjecture based upon your idea of sutra composition.

gad rgyangs said:

OK, so whats your alternative, fully demonstrable, explanation for the state of the texts?

Malcolm wrote:

They were taught by the Buddha, and then squirreled away by nāgās, devas, yakṣas, tenth stage bodhisattvas, etc., until they were again promulgated by Nāgārjuna.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, June 13th, 2014 at 12:48 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

As it happens, I noticed the relationship between the 8000 & the 25000 on my own by comparing them. Yes, its that obvious, even to a non-specialist.

Malcolm wrote:

Sure, why not? They are both Prajñāpāramita sutras, the basis message is the same. Even some of the words are the same. In the Agamas/Nikayas there are countless places where the Buddha uses the same phrases over and over again. This does not mean that your contention that one is merely a padded out version of the other is supportable in anyway. It is merely your conjecture based upon your idea of sutra composition.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, June 13th, 2014 at 12:12 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

Malcolm, I'm assuming you've read all that. Yet, as little as 6 months ago you said:

Malcolm wrote:

No, of course not.

dzogchungpa said:

So, with all due respect, WTF?

Malcolm wrote:

With all due respect, I realized I was wrong.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, June 12th, 2014 at 11:55 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

gad rgyangs said:
its as plain as the nose on anyone's face. you're just being stubborn.

Malcolm wrote:
No, it is not as plain as the nose on anyone's face.

Let me ask you — the Śatasāhasrika-prajñāpāramitā is 12 volumes long. Have you actually read it? The Pañcaviṃśatisahasrika-prajñāpāramitā is three volumes long. Have you actually read it? Or are you just relying what some western scholar you read decided?

We talk about these texts as if we have infinite familiarity with them, utterly lacking any humility, when in reality most of us have barely read 0.01 percent of the sutras, let alone the tantras. And yet we confidently make proclamations about their authorship based on the latest western intellectual fads.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Thursday, June 12th, 2014 at 11:28 PM
Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism
Content:

Malcolm wrote:
To answer Dante's question about whether the Buddha taught the PP in 100,000 lines, one day, 25 on a different day and so on -- it is not necessary to think this way.

gad rgyangs said:
i would hope not. a better way to think would be to acknowledge what even a cursory examination of the texts show: that the 25000 was created at least in part by taking the text of the 8000, breaking it apart, and inserting other material in between.

Malcolm wrote:
That is what some people think. But that is merely a supposition. There is no proof that this is the case.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Thursday, June 12th, 2014 at 10:55 PM
Title: Re: Critical thinking and Dharma
Content:

Andrew108 said:
If someone takes a path based on faith and belief then they shouldn't question liberation or someone else's claims to be liberated.

Malcolm wrote:
This is a total non-sequitar.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, June 12th, 2014 at 9:36 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

tobes said:

But it seems we're slowly edging towards a position on hermeneutics which is really quite at odds with one of the most persistent themes in many Mahayana traditions (and indeed, many of those sutras ): the intractable gap between concepts/language and reality. And in doing so opening up a new position which seemingly holds that there are two types of concepts/language - one in which the intractable gap is generated, and the other in which language/concepts is reality.

Malcolm wrote:

The Buddhāvatamska states:

From one single melodious word of the victors,
all the infinite gates of Dharma arise.

And:

The tathāgatas fully attain the accomplishment of speech that is without center or periphery in order that all realms of sentient beings may understand it with a single tone

The gap between reality and language is a problem only for us. There is no such gap for Buddhas? Why? Because the Buddhas are free from concepts. So their acts of speech are similarly free from any conceptual restraint that would differentiate their content from describing reality just as it is.

To answer Dante's question about whether the Buddha taught the PP in 100,000 lines, one day, 25 on a different day and so on -- it is not necessary to think this way.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, June 12th, 2014 at 11:34 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

pueraeternus said:

Davidson relates:

Malcolm wrote:

One whom no one should really take seriously. He has a huge chip on his shoulder.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, June 12th, 2014 at 11:29 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

pueraeternus said:

I can't verify the veracity of your claim that the Yogini's Eye was mistranslated, since I don't read Tibetan. However, Haribhadra had a different idea. Davidson relates:

Malcolm wrote:

Not the whole thing, just that passage (as well as the title, which exists nowhere in the text). This is verifiable since Loppon Rinpoche brings up the issue again in Introduction to Dharma. Unfortunately, Jeff Schoening did not translate the whole of it, and the section which mentions the compilation at Vimalasambhava is absent from the translation of his at present, so you will have to be content with my meager effort presented already above (If I only give a citation of the Sanskrit title, without referring to another translator, you are to assume I translated it myself, usually on the spot from the text in question.)

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, June 12th, 2014 at 11:21 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

tobes said:

I agree that they have ignored this - but I don't see how satya-vacana is going to give you some essentialist or realist account of language. Why is it that now the finger pointing the moon is taken to be the moon?

Malcolm wrote:

The point is that their speech has blessings and power because of the truth of their realization. That realization is what lends "essence", if you want to call it that, to their speech. I have personally observed such speech acts on the part of realized teachers.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, June 12th, 2014 at 11:14 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

pueraeternus said:

Of course. When I said "sutras don't have to be taught by the nirmanakaya Buddha", I was referring to the rupakaya of a Buddha in his earthly emanation. But the Sambhogakaya can emanate as many nirmanakayas as the situation needs.

Malcolm wrote:

But there is no tradition of this, so this is merely your fabrication and rational.

pueraeternus said:

Not for me. I am not limited that way.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, you just make up whatever suits your fancy.

pueraeternus said:

Allied to the mythology of the preaching of the dharma is the problem of the recitation of the Mahayana scriptures immediately after the demise of the Buddha. ...

Malcolm wrote:

Which Sapan resolves by point out that there is no contradiction between the two (compilation by Vajrapani and Ananda).

But the one thing all these masters have in common is that they, unlike you, understand that all these sūtras were spoken by the Buddha during his forty year teaching career, before his parinirvana.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, June 12th, 2014 at 11:08 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

pueraeternus said:

Thanks. I forgot about this sutra. It seems the Buddha forgot about the Mahasamghikas and other sects when he cast his eye into the future? I wonder what reasons Malcolm will give here?

Malcolm wrote:

The Buddha has the capacity to know events, both specific and general, in the future. That is why he is termed "omniscient in the three times".

M

pueraeternus said:

But still he missed out 15 other sects? What about the Mahayana traditions?

Malcolm wrote:

You need to examine the dream of King Kṛkin (who lived during the dispensation of Buddha Kāśyapa) which predicts the eighteen schools occurring during the dispensation of Śākyamuni Buddha.

Anyway, why are you arguing against Buddha's omniscience? Do you have a point? Do you not accept it? Do you think any phenomena within the three times is closed to a Buddha's eye? Are you merely trying to bust my balls?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, June 12th, 2014 at 11:03 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

pueraeternus said:

Then is Sonam Tsemo wrong, erroneous? In his Entryway to the Dharma:

Malcolm wrote:

It is not very precise. For example, in the Bodhisattvacaryāvatāravivṛttipañjikā we see:

'..such as the Carvaka assertion of annihilation, the assertion of our own Vaibhaṣikas that the conditioned and the unconditioned are mutually exclusive, the Sāṃkhya assertion that all things are the same in the original nature as the three guṇas, and also the Tīrthikas who advocate permanence...'

For the most part we see Indian masters differentiating the two terms. The single place where I see the term mu stegs pa applied to rgyang 'phan pas in the bstan 'gyur is the Āryalaṅkāvatāra-nāma-mahāyānasūtravṛttitathāgatahṛdayālaṃkāra. Otherwise, in hundreds of places the term mu stegs pa (tīrthika) is applied to eternalists and the term rgyang 'phan pa (carvaka) strictly applies to nihilists.

However, it is true that as catch-all term, Tibetans tend to lump all non-buddhists under the heading mu stegs pa. But it is not an accurate description.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, June 12th, 2014 at 1:25 AM

Title: Re: Critical thinking and Dharma

Content:

underthetree said:

My difficulty is with manipulating history, conceptually, to make things hang together.

Malcolm wrote:

That is essentially what one is doing when one invents visionary encounters, dreams and visions to account for Mahāyāna sutras which have no basis in any traditional account.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, June 11th, 2014 at 11:18 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

Tirthika (Skt. tīrthika; Tib. ལུ་རྟེན་པ་, mutegpa; Wyl. mu stegs pa) — a proponent of non-Buddhist views.

From <http://www.rigpawiki.org/index.php?title=Tirthika>

According to this definition by Mipham Rinpoche Carvaka are tirthika: The tirthikas' views embody the gross, simplistic view of eternalism, considering that phenomena are not momentary and the simplistic view of nihilism, the belief that although phenomena are caused, they themselves do not generate their own effects—there are no past nor future lives—or that actions will not give rise to karmic results.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, but not according to Padmasambhava's man nag lta ba phreng ba, Candrakīrti's Madhyamakāvatāra and bhaṣyam, the Tarkajvala of Bhavya, the Pramāṇavarttika of Dharmakīrti and so on.

So either the translation is incorrect, or Mipham is mistaken.

Guru Rinpoche lists four types of non-buddhists: phyal ba, rgyang 'phen pa (Carvaka), mur thug pa, and mu stegs pa. The last, used for eternalists, is well known to translate the term "tīrthika" i.e. ford-crossers, referring to their belief in rebirth.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, June 11th, 2014 at 9:34 PM

Title: Re: Critical thinking and Dharma

Content:

underthetree said:

This is my difficulty with the whole thing. I find it extremely hard to believe the above scenario.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, because you are limiting the Buddha's capacity with your conceptual mind.

underthetree said:

Conversely, I have no trouble at all believing in that the Mahayana was taught by Lord Buddha as mind-treasure, as revelations.

Malcolm wrote:

This is a fiction modern Mahāyānists have invented. But this not the tradition we have. The tradition we actually have is that Mahāyāna was recovered as an earth treasure by Ārya Nāgārjuna.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, June 11th, 2014 at 9:30 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Karma Dorje said:

Do you mean Cārvāka? Tīrthika typically refers to Jains though it came to include Hindus as well, i.e. those that do not accept the words of the Buddha.

Sherab Dorje said:

Carvaka are Tīrthika too since they subscribe to the nihilist position.

Malcolm wrote:

Greg:

Carvakas are not tīrthikas [mu stegs pa]. Tīrthikas are eternalists; carvakas are nihilists.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, June 11th, 2014 at 9:22 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

pueraeternus said:

But the Lotus Sutra of this world would certainly be taught by a different Buddha, at a different, time, place and retinue. And since you said that the conditions does not have to be same, etc, then it is quite clear that the Hevajra in this world was taught after the 4 tenet schools have arisen, since that would be the appropriate condition for the tantra to actually mention the 4 schools. Hence we have internal evidence that the Hevajra was really taught later, via visions, illusory bodies, etc.p[./quote]

This is not evidence for that. One, it was taught to Virupa by a human women in person, the Nirmanakāya Nairatmya, not in a dream. Secondly, it was taught by the Buddha in the morning of his awakening when he conquered the four māras. Further, the longest version of it was taught eons ago by Mahāvajradhara.

Since Buddhas are indeed omniscient concerning the three times, there is also no contradiction that the Buddha could teach on the four tenets before they arose. And since the retinue the Buddha taught the Hevajra too on the morning of his awakening is not specified apart from Vajragarbha and the net of dākinīs, we can also assume they understood what the Buddha was teaching about in the two sectioned version of the Hevajra tantra.

Malcolm wrote:

So there is no contradiction at all in the same sūtra or tantra being taught in a different manner, with different topics when taught to different people in different epochs.

Of course - proof that sutras don't have to be taught by the nirmanakaya Buddha, can be taught later, etc.

When a sūtra or tantra is taught to an ordinary human being, it needs to be taught by a Nirmanakāya, as we see from account of Virupa's awakening. Virupa was not yet even a first stage bodhisattva when he met Nairatmya, so he could not possibly have perceived her in any other form than the one she presents to him as a two armed, one faced human being.

I am not saying that such persons reject the sutras and tantras are taught by the Buddha. Let me repeat myself again, since you are obviously deaf to this: the sutras and tantras are indeed taught by the Buddha, but the Buddha is not limited to his nirmanakaya form 2500 years ago in India.

Sure, but when a sutra says "When the Buddha was residing in Vaisali attended by Śāriputra, etc." we are to understand it happened within the 80 year span of the Buddha and not in some vision.

Because of his all-pervasiveness and supreme skillfulness, he can manifest in the mindstream of sentient beings teaching in various forms and methods, even after his rupakaya entered parinirvana. In this, I would say that my position on this is stronger than yours, since I am not constrained by historical facts.

But you are so constrained by the historical references to various places and events mentioned in many Mahāyāna sutras. I am specifically referring to sūtras that say things like "When the Bhagavan was residing at Vulture Peak or Vaisali, etc."

The second thing constraining you is that there is no Indian tradition at all which suggests what you suggest, i.e. that Mahāyāna sutras were produced piecemeal in visions by later yogins. This is just a modern rational invented by you latter-day Mahāyānists who have basically accepted the idea that Mahāyāna was not actually taught by the nirmanakāya Śākyamuni Buddha. Why do you use this rational? It is because you fundamentally accept the account of the appearance of Mahāyāna as it is presented by western scholars from the time of Max Müller onward.

But back to your question - it seems that personages such as Sonam Tsemo, Kongtrul, and other illuminaries can argue and disagree with each other on the finer points of the origin stories of sutra, but this never hindered them from high attainments.

As I pointed out to you, exhaustively, there really is no such disagreement. Sonam Tsemo, Sapan, Buton, Kongtrul and others have basically provided more or less the same account over the years.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, June 11th, 2014 at 8:54 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Two points about this. 1. There's basically universal agreement that in any Buddhist tradition, language does not objectively reflect or refer to reality. Thus the problematic of language games runs deep through Buddhism, and often becomes a very central and prominent soteriological/philosophical issue. Surely you would not dispute this. If this were really true, then how do you deal with acts of true speech? For example, in the Śatasāhasrikāprajñāpāramitābṛhaṭṭikā we find:

"When an irreversible bodhisattva sees a city on fire, he says "May the fire be pacified". When the fire is pacified through the blessings of true words, you can know that one as being irreversible."

The only way to get outside of this is to either cease using language (which I suggested, and in some respects is a plausible yogic response) or to run with some alternative theory of language/meaning ala Panini, which would be very antithetical to any orthodox Buddhist view.

I think that thus far Western analysis of classical Buddhist attitudes towards language have ignored the role of satya-vacana.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, June 11th, 2014 at 8:24 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

pueraeternus said:

Thanks. I forgot about this sutra. It seems the Buddha forgot about the Mahasamghikas and other sects when he cast his eye into the future? I wonder what reasons Malcolm will give here?

Malcolm wrote:

The Buddha has the capacity to know events, both specific and general, in the future. That is why he is termed "omniscient in the three times".

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, June 11th, 2014 at 8:17 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

pueraeternus said:

He does. In the Yogini's Eye, he says: Some scholars say that the Mahayana Sutras were compiled in the southern region called Vimalasambhava in a gathering of 900 million bodhisattvas. However, this is in great error as [this gathering] never took place.

Malcolm wrote:

No, Verril has translated this passage incorrectly. I give the correct translation above, which is confirmed in another one of his works, which I also produced. "Yogini's Eye" is Verril's title for the General Presentation of The Divisions of Tantra. The passage is "...de'ang skyon chen po ni med do", "also a great error that is not", the error is asserting 90 million, rather than one. Here is my rendering again:

"When some masters say that the Mahāyāna sūtras were compiled after ninety million bodhisattvas gathered in the southern direction at Vimalasambhāva although there is no great fault in that position,

Further proof of my reading is that Sakya Pandita, Sonam Tsemo's nephew states in his Great History of Dharma:

"It is reputed that "One million bodhisattvas gathered at the southern royal palace, Vimalasambhava, where Mañjuśī compiled the sūtras, Vajrapani compiled Abhidharma, and Ajita Maitreya compiled the Vinaya in the language of Mahāyāna."

He then describes how statements in the sutras which describe both Vajrapani and Ānanda as the compiler of the teachings are not in contradiction. Later Buton, Rinchen Drup gives this account, then Kongtrul.

If Sapan thought it completely wrong, he would have rejected it outright — as we have plenty of examples of his doing so. Sonam Tsemo presents it in two different works which I produce above. The point is that this account is generally accepted in Tibet from an early period.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, June 11th, 2014 at 5:48 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

underthetree said:

I've always just taken the texts at face value.

Malcolm wrote:

Continue to do so...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, June 11th, 2014 at 5:46 AM

Title: Re: Dharma protectors and samaya

Content:

Konchog1 said:

Isn't Tsui Marpo a Tibetan spirit subdued by Padmasambhava? Why and how is he the protector of North America? Since when?

Malcolm wrote:

Since never, it was my error in assuming that Yava Rukshi was a name for Tsi'u Marpo.

Konchog1 said:

And while we're at it: If there are Tsen, Mamos, Gyalpo etc. all over the world, why the focus on Dakinis in Tantra? If they have to be female spirits why not Mamos or Yakshinis? PM me if you don't want to derail the thread further.

Malcolm wrote:

There are two kinds of dakinis, wisdom and worldly. The focus is on Wisdom...

Konchog1 said:

Why isn't the focus on . . . wisdom Mamos instead?

Malcolm wrote:

There is — Palden Lhamo, Ekajati, Mazar Gyalmo, etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, June 11th, 2014 at 5:45 AM

Title: Re: Critical thinking and Dharma

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

Malcolm I would be interested to hear your opinion on the Lotus Sutra: faithful record of a teaching of the historical Buddha, or much later composition by one or more "samsaric beings"?

Malcolm wrote:

It's a record of the Buddha's teaching.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, June 11th, 2014 at 4:58 AM

Title: Re: Dharma protectors and samaya

Content:

Konchog1 said:

Isn't Tsui Marpo a Tibetan spirit subdued by Padmasambhava? Why and how is he the protector of North America? Since when?

Malcolm wrote:

Since never, it was my error in assuming that Yava Rukshi was a name for Tsi'u Marpo.

Konchog1 said:

And while we're at it: If there are Tsen, Mamos, Gyalpo etc. all over the world, why the focus on Dakinis in Tantra? If they have to be female spirits why not Mamos or Yakshinis? PM me if you don't want to derail the thread further.

Malcolm wrote:

There are two kinds of dakinis, wisdom and worldly. The focus is on Wisdom...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, June 11th, 2014 at 4:09 AM

Title: Re: Critical thinking and Dharma

Content:

Jikan said:

Are you claiming that the Buddha Dharma is an invention of samsaric beings and, therefore, leads only to continued entanglement in affliction, shel?

Malcolm wrote:

It seems to be a bit of trend around here....

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, June 11th, 2014 at 3:55 AM

Title: Re: Critical thinking and Dharma

Content:

shel said:

Lets not forget that the teaching has limits, and indeed, was forged within human limits.

Malcolm wrote:

The teaching has no limits other than the total liberation of migrating beings.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, June 11th, 2014 at 12:44 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

smcj said:

...this modernist attitude is harmful to one's practice.

I respectfully disagree. I have the "modernist attitude" you are objecting to, and my practice is quite healthy--at least insofar as my faith and confidence goes.

Malcolm wrote:

I thought so too, then I examined my mind [once again, for the n-millionth time] and my attitudes towards the teachings...and I discovered two things — 1) the modernist suppositions I was entertaining really have no support at all 2) and therefore, they are pure prapañca 3) and thus I resolved to abandon them.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 10th, 2014 at 11:47 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

underthetree said:

I'm genuinely (and respectfully) curious, Malcolm: what exactly caused this volte-face?

Malcolm wrote:

I realized, as I explained above, that this modernist attitude is harmful to one's practice.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 10th, 2014 at 11:27 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

One cannot maintain that the sūtras are "satya-vacana", truthful speech, while maintaining that their origins are lies.

underthetree said:

'Lies' is an awfully strong statement. I would guess that, for many centuries, what you call lies have merely been accepted as literary conceits. There is a vast difference.

Malcolm wrote:

I really cannot remember any master referring to the origin story of Mahāyāna a "literary conceit". This is a modern concept about the origin of Mahāyāna. A literary conceit is nevertheless a pretense, and thus a falsehood. Hardly what one would call "satya-vacana".

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 10th, 2014 at 11:20 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

pueraeternus said:

The ancient Mahayana masters have contrasting opinions on what is correct or erroneous. Even the fanciful story about 900 million bodhisattvas compiling the Mahayana sutras in Vimalasambhava was not accepted by every master (eg. Jamgon Kongtrul).

Malcolm wrote:
Kongtrul accepts this.

pueraeternus said:
Sorry - it should be Sonam Tsemo, one of the five founding masters of the Shakyas. So as we can see, even when such masters don't see eye to eye on origin stories, their progression in the dharma was not hindered.

Malcolm wrote:
He does not exactly reject it; he reports it in his Introduction to Dharma:
"The Mahāyāna, so some assert, was compiled by ten million bodhisattvas at Vimalasvabhava in the south. Some advocate other means. Some [say] it is the same as the manner of the śrāvakas [your position]."
And in his General Presentation of the Divisions of Tantra he says:
"When some masters say that the Mahāyāna sūtras were compiled after ninety million bodhisattvas gathered in the southern direction at Vimalasambhāva although there is no great fault in that position, but both Secret Mantra and the uncommon Mahāyāna were compiled by Vajrapāṇi. As it is explained in the Prajñāpāramitā Treatise Commentary by master Vasubandhu through Ārya Maitreya's request to the bodhisattva Vajrapāṇi [55/b] "...this prajñāpāramitā heard by me is promised to the retinue."
Although one cannot reject compilation in different locations, it also cannot be proven."
In general, however, we can understand that Sonam Tsemo does not have your idea, which is that Mahāyāna was not actually taught by the Buddha at all.

M

Author: Malcolm
Date: Tuesday, June 10th, 2014 at 11:02 PM
Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism
Content:
dzogchungpa said:
Malcolm, please. When you posted this:
<https://www.dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=40&t=14929&p=202388#p202381> was your attitude premised on the idea that lineage just simply does not matter?
Was it a reflection of the materialism in our culture?

Malcolm wrote:
To the former question, no.
To the latter question, yes.

dzogchungpa said:
Were the blessings you had received insufficient?

Malcolm wrote:

Not exactly — the blessings I have cultivated were not sufficient.

I have since decided the whole approach to Dharma represented in that post written six months ago, opinions held for many years, since the early 90's, were frankly held up on baseless suppositions derived from my early Buddhist studies.

One cannot maintain that the sūtras are "satya-vacana", truthful speech, while maintaining that their origins are lies.

These present statements function to remedy in some small way my past error.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 10th, 2014 at 10:55 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Further, there is no contradiction at all, since when this tantra was revealed to Mahasiddha Virupa by the nirmanakāya ḍākinī, Nairatmya, it was in a time and a place where the four tenet systems had arisen. It is not the case that sūtras and tantras are engraved on golden plates somewhere and that their words are somehow eternal. As has been pointed out to you already,

pueraeternus said:

Oh, so Nairatmya would alter the contents of the tantra to suit Virupa's understanding? This would make the whole origin stories irrelevant and unnecessary.

Malcolm wrote:

No, it does not make the origin stories irrelevant nor unnecessary. For example, when the Saddharmapundarika sutra was taught, the Buddha states that it was taught in the very distant past by a Buddha called Candrasūryapradīpa. But I don't think we need to assume that the words are identical in every respect, nor was the assembly the same, nor were the conditions the same, and so on. He adds:

Immeasurable buddhas in the present and future
Will also teach this Dharma
With various skillful means.

Indicating that the Saddharmapundarika sutra will be taught in the future by many Buddhas.

So there is no contradiction at all in the same sūtra or tantra being taught in a different manner, with different topics when taught to different people in different epochs.

For example, the main point of the Hevajra tantra is that it presents the method of realizing the continuum of Vajradhara in the form of Hevajra, not that it mentions the four tenet systems, as well as the four divisions of tantra.

"the single vajra word is heard differently by beings of different capacities".

The meaning of the words can mean differently or have deeper layers to those of greater capacity, but the words would still be the same.

No, actually, that is the point. When citation this is taken from explains that one words is heard as different words by different people. It is called the "array of speech".

Many have advanced in their practice of tantra, even when they disagree with the varying origin stories of this sutra or that tantra.

Like who? Can you name even one modern person who has "advanced in their practice" even though they reject the sutras and tantras were actually taught by the Buddha?

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 10th, 2014 at 8:14 PM

Title: Re: Dharma protectors and samaya

Content:

orgyen jigmed said:

But when I have very recently posed the same question to CNN whether the Tsen Yava Rukshi, Tsiu Marpo and Jagpa Melen are the same deity with a different name, he simply said: "No, not the same even though they all belong to the same powerful class of Tsen..." he then continued: " see, I am not you and you are not me!"

Malcolm wrote:

Interesting, I never asked him, I merely assumed. Thanks for clearing that up.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 10th, 2014 at 8:12 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

What classic intellectual nonsense.

tobes said:

What classic avoidance of the issue.

Malcolm wrote:

Satya-vacana, "truthful speech" has nothing to do with language games. Even the idea of language games can only be predicated in an age where speech has become largely deceptive and false.

It used to be the case that speech had more power, when less people lied, and actually engaged in the practice of satya-vacana.

These days people have such little regard for satya-vacana that they don't care whether the scriptures they follow are examples of satya-vacana or not.

What a pity.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 10th, 2014 at 8:06 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

pueraeternus said:

The ancient Mahayana masters have contrasting opinions on what is correct or erroneous. Even the fanciful story about 900 million bodhisattvas compiling the Mahayana sutras in Vimalasambhava was not accepted by every master (eg. Jamgon Kongtrul).

Malcolm wrote:

Kongtrul accepts this.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 10th, 2014 at 8:03 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

Honestly, I don't see why you couldn't. You only have to have confidence that the practice is effective, and that could be based on many things. Are you saying that, e.g., if I don't take the stories about the origins of the Mahyana sutras literally I can't practice wholeheartedly? Frankly, I would find that ridiculous.

Malcolm wrote:

This kind of attitude is premised on the idea that lineage just simply does not matter, all that matters is techniques. It is very much a reflection of the materialism in our culture.

But this attitude is not conducive the entry of blessings, I am afraid, which is necessary for realization.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 10th, 2014 at 7:40 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

pueraeternus said:

Tradition claims that Shakyamuni taught Hevajra during his earthly time (to subdue the four maras), but in the subjugating chapter, he said that one should study the Vaibhasika, then Sautrantika, then Yogacara and then Madhyamaka. These schools didn't exist at all 2500 years ago, and would have made absolutely no sense to who ever was taught the tantra back then. This is just an example of the many anachronisms that are all over the place, especially in the later Mahayana tracts.

Malcolm wrote:

The source of this idea comes from the Śrī-vajramālābhīḥhānamahāyogatantra-sarvatantraḥṛdaya-rahasyavibhaṅga by Paṇḍita Alambakalaśa. After listing the various deva realms and so on where each of the five classes of tantra were taught he states:

After that, for the purpose of subduing the four māras, the large great tantra of Śrī Hevajra and explanatory tantra of the short one were taught here in Magadha in this Jambudvīpa.

This does not mean it was taught to an ordinary assembly, as we can see, since the this paṇḍita clearly states the compilers of the tantras are either Vajrapāṇi or Mañjuśrī, and because the petitioner of the Hevajra is Vajragarbha, a tenth stage bodhisattva. At the time of the taming of the four Māras, there was no ordinary Sangha at all.

Further, there is no contradiction at all, since when this tantra was revealed to Mahasiddha Virupa by the nirmanakāya ḍākinī, Nairatmya, it was in a time and a place where the four tenet systems had arisen. It is not the case that sūtras and tantras are engraved on golden plates somewhere and that their words are somehow eternal. As has been pointed out to you already, "the single vajra word is heard differently by beings of different capacities".

Tantras like Cakrasamvara were never taught to a bhikṣu sangha nor by Śakyamuni, but only in the 24 places, where they are still taught by the Nirmanakāya in the form of Cakrasamvara, just as Guru Rinpoche, Śakyamuni's emanation, is still teaching the rakṣasas in Camara on Zangdog Palri.

pueraeternus said:

...how can we rely definitely on traditional origin stories and claim that it has any influence on one's dharmic progression?

Malcolm wrote:

Well, because in fact the tantras themselves maintain it is so, as the Union of the Tantra of the Sun and Moon states:

If the history is not explained,
there will be the fault of lack of confidence
in this discourse of the definitive secret meaning.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 10th, 2014 at 9:19 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

when you watch a movie, do the characters in the movie need to attain liberation from Samsara?

Malcolm wrote:

In the movie they do.

gad rgyangs said:

but there's no one "in" the movie. its just flickering colors and shapes on the screen.

when you meet beings in a dream, do they need to attain liberation from samsara?

Malcolm wrote:

In the dream they do.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 10th, 2014 at 9:18 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

tobes said:

But if one can enter the language game of the text

Malcolm wrote:

Language games are the problem.

tobes said:

Then you should refrain from reading, writing and speaking.

{Insert massively over quoted Wittgenstein phrase >>>“Whereof one cannot speak, thereof one must be silent.”}

Malcolm wrote:
What classic intellectual nonsense.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Tuesday, June 10th, 2014 at 9:02 AM
Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism
Content:
tobes said:
But if one can enter the language game of the text

Malcolm wrote:
Language games are the problem.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Tuesday, June 10th, 2014 at 9:00 AM
Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism
Content:
gad rgyangs said:
As far as most Buddhism is concerned, human life has no meaning except as an opportunity to study Buddhism.

Malcolm wrote:
Correction, human life has no meaning apart from the chance to attain liberation from samsara. Samsara is the limitation, not Dharma.

gad rgyangs said:
when you watch a movie, do the characters in the movie need to attain liberation from Samsara?

Malcolm wrote:
In the movie they do.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Tuesday, June 10th, 2014 at 7:51 AM
Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism
Content:
gad rgyangs said:
As far as most Buddhism is concerned, human life has no meaning except as an opportunity to study Buddhism.

Malcolm wrote:
Correction, human life has no meaning apart from the chance to attain liberation from samsara. Samsara is the limitation, not Dharma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 10th, 2014 at 7:48 AM

Title: Re: Dharma protectors and samaya

Content:

asunthatneversets said:

Yeah, Traktung Khepa or Traktung Yeshe Dorje, from Michigan. He's considered to be a tulku of Do Khyentse Yeshe Dorje per Thinley Norbu Rinpoche.

Malcolm wrote:

No, per himself. His association with DTR was very subsequent to his proclamation of his own tulkuship. I have observed the development of Kirkpatrick's self-mythology for 20 years on the internet. The DTR relationship is rather late.

But this is off-topic, and if people choose to believe Kirkpatrick's claims about himself, that is their business and none of mine.

dzogchungpa said:

I take it you don't recommend him then?

Malcolm wrote:

I recommend that when anyone decides to make a Dharma connection with someone, they take some time to investigate the person they wish to make a connection with.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 10th, 2014 at 7:46 AM

Title: Re: Dharma protectors and samaya

Content:

asunthatneversets said:

Yeah, Traktung Khepa or Traktung Yeshe Dorje, from Michigan. He's considered to be a tulku of Do Khyentse Yeshe Dorje per Thinley Norbu Rinpoche.

Malcolm wrote:

No, per himself. His association with DTR was very subsequent to his proclamation of his own tulkuship. I have observed the development of Kirkpatrick's self-mythology for more than 20 years on the internet. The DTR relationship is rather late.

dzogchungpa said:

Is he worth checking out? Who is he supposed to be the tulku of?

Malcolm wrote:

He proclaimed himself a tulku of Do Khyentse Yeshe Dorje. He and his wife originally appeared on the internet as "Khepa and Acala".

And one of the reasons Khepa has never had an interest in meeting with Tibetan teachers is because it's very important in terms of our work in this time and place that we not take on some of the unnecessary cultural trappings of Tibetan Buddhism. We're American Buddhists.

Khepa: We are American Tantric Buddhists. We are not Tibetan Tantric Buddhists. So there was a long period where I decided I did not want any contact with any other teachings. I wanted to teach purely what was given to me through Terma and through vision. Now it's been eight years, and our community is very well established. So now I'm entering a completely different phase where I'm actually quite interested in meeting and talking with Ngakpa Chogyam, who's Scottish, but he teaches a very traditional Tibetan line of Dharma transmission.

<http://crazywisdom.net/assets/khepa-and-acala-interview.pdf> "
onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

I have no idea if he is "worth checking out". He has a nice farm. His wife likes to write and record Buddhist devotional folk music. He pissed off a guy name Namkha Rinpoche who then went on to develop a large Sangha in Europe. They used to be associated with the Aro people. He eventually studied with Dungsey Thrinley Norbu. He claims to be a tertön.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 10th, 2014 at 7:30 AM

Title: Re: Dharma protectors and samaya

Content:

Konchog1 said:

That's the problem with prophecy. What does red face mean? It's not red skin. Red face.

Black face means a person is angry, so red face could mean a country of lustful people. Or something else entirely.

Malcolm wrote:

It very clearly means Tibetans; since they used to smear their faces with red pigment.

At any rate, for more than a thousand years educated Tibetans have understood the term རྩོད་དམར་ཅན་, "red faced" to refer to themselves. Why? Because the Kaṃsadeśavyākaraṇa explicitly refers to Tibetans as "the red-faced" ones.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 10th, 2014 at 7:26 AM

Title: Re: Dharma protectors and samaya

Content:

asunthatneversets said:

Yeah, Traktung Khepa or Traktung Yeshe Dorje, from Michigan. He's considered to be a tulku of Do Khyentse Yeshe Dorje per Thinley Norbu Rinpoche.

Malcolm wrote:

No, per himself. His association with DTR was very subsequent to his proclamation of his own tulkuship. I have observed the development of Kirkpatrick's self-mythology for 20 years on the internet. The DTR relationship is rather late.

But this is off-topic, and if people choose to believe Kirkpatrick's claims about himself, that is their business and none of mine.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 10th, 2014 at 7:25 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

maybe we can learn from all of them, since no one perspective can capture the whole of the nature of reality and the meaning of life."?

Malcolm wrote:

Well, you and I part ways here — as far as I am concerned, Buddhadharma offers the only complete solution to the problem of suffering; the rest are palliative at best.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 10th, 2014 at 5:56 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

Quite honestly, I can't take this story as a literal account of historical events and furthermore, I can't believe that the author(s) of this text did either. In all seriousness, do you?

Malcolm wrote:

Why not? I have observed my teacher involved in personal interactions with Guru Rinpoche. I did not perceive Guru Rinpoche, but he certainly did. When you read the autobiographies of Dudjom Lingpa, Thangthog Gyalpo, etc., they have multiple experiences that ordinary people like us do not have.

I regard the Mahāyāna sutras to be the record of those teachings taught directly by the Buddha to people whose vision was much more expansive than ours.

dzogchungpa said:

I thought you were saying that the events described in the Mahayana sutras were ones that ordinary people could see. Is that not your position?

Malcolm wrote:

No, what I said was that the Nirmanakāya is the only buddhakāya that ordinary people can see. I never said that all of his deeds were able to be witnessed by everyone. We have the example Sunakṣatra, who, while able to see the Buddha's radiance, was convinced the Buddha was an ordinary human being, with no special powers at all, no special insight.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 10th, 2014 at 5:52 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Lazy_eye said:

One prong is that it's faddish and speculative.

The second prong is that it's harmful to a practitioner's conviction.

You've also made it clear that it's this second concern which is the primary motivation for your new stance against scholarship. You used to find the scholarship worthy of consideration, and you even agreed with some of its findings, but now you reject it because you saw it has a pernicious undermining effect on belief in the validity of the Mahayana dharma.

So I am wondering what your response would be if somebody presented scholarship that was not speculative, but nevertheless weakened your conviction. Would you still reject it on those grounds? Or would you change your beliefs, for instance by abandoning Mahayana in favor of the sravaka path?

And along the same lines, if there are practitioners here who do not think the historical Buddha taught what is in the Mahayana sutras, would you advise them to become sravakas?

Malcolm wrote:

I don't have a stance against scholarship -- that is a gross mischaracterization.

What I oppose are the biases and demonstrably unsupported assumptions which underlie the construction of a fabricated history which the Buddhological academy has been constructing and still is constructing for Mahāyāna for more than 100 years. And the traces that it has created are very strong, and present obstacles to many people's practice.

The only honest thing they can say is this: X text appears in Chinese here, here and here; and in Tibetan here; and in some Central Asian fragments we think date to here. And that is all, nothing more.

Those are the empirical facts, the only "truth" they can muster.

I understand the fascination with mysteries and puzzles, but in reality, there is almost nothing of use in western historical Buddhist writing that is of any benefit to practicing Mahāyāna Buddhists.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 10th, 2014 at 4:35 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

Quite honestly, I can't take this story as a literal account of historical events and furthermore, I can't believe that the author(s) of this text did either. In all seriousness, do you?

Malcolm wrote:

Why not? I have observed my teacher involved in personal interactions with Guru Rinpoche. I did not perceive Guru Rinpoche, but he certainly did. When you read the autobiographies of Dudjom Lingpa, Thangthog Gyalpo, etc., they have multiple experiences that ordinary people like us do not have.

I regard the Mahāyāna sutras to be the record of those teachings taught directly by the Buddha to people whose vision was much more expansive than ours.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 10th, 2014 at 4:26 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Lazy_eye said:

The alleged "speculativeness" of Western scholarship is something of a red herring in this discussion, it seems to me. Would you welcome the scholarship of Nattier, Schopen and so on if it was demonstrably non-speculative?

Malcolm wrote:

Sure, but it isn't.

Lazy_eye said:

But if it was, you would welcome it? What would you do then about the problem of doubt, which you cited earlier as being your main motive for rejecting the current scholarly consensus about the provenance of Mahayana sutras?

Malcolm wrote:

There would not be doubt.

As I have pointed out, the current scholarly consensus is based on speculations and assumptions. And there isn't really even a consensus, it is more like a series of one intellectual fad after another.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 10th, 2014 at 1:57 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Lazy_eye said:

The alleged "speculativeness" of Western scholarship is something of a red herring in this discussion, it seems to me. Would you welcome the scholarship of Nattier, Schopen and so on if it was demonstrably non-speculative?

Malcolm wrote:

Sure, but it isn't.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 10th, 2014 at 1:23 AM

Title: Re: Dharma protectors and samaya

Content:

tingdzin said:

Dear Reibeam,

This quote (about horses on wheels and red men ) has been discussed both here (I think) and on the previous incarnation of this website. It is probably bogus. To my knowledge, no one has ever been able to find a Tibetan source for it. If you know of one, please tell us.

Malcolm wrote:

The most likely source for it is a prediction which shows up first in Loppon Sonam Tsemo's Chos la 'jug pa'i sgo byed:

"The Vimalaprabhakaripṛcchā states that 2500 years after the parinirvana of the teacher, the sublime Dharma will spread in the land of the red faced ones.

There are three related texts which must be read to understand this more clearly, the Vimalaprabhakaripṛcchā-sūtra and the Arhatsaṃghavardhanavyākaraṇa and the Kaṃsadeśavyākaraṇa.

It seems that the notion of 2500 years is a mistake.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, June 9th, 2014 at 11:24 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Both Ārya Nāgārjuna and Maitreya Bodhisattva both insist that Mahāyāna is indeed was spoken by the Buddha himself.

daverupa said:

Speculative, ad infinitum apparently.

I wonder just how much history you'll call speculative; only those parts that infringe on Mahayana narratives? Or are there other areas?

Malcolm wrote:

A lot of history is speculative, the further back you go, the more speculative it becomes.

But people even radically disagree about the events of 25 years, or even 10.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, June 9th, 2014 at 11:05 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

underthetree said:

What worries me about the need to accept the Mahayana sutras as spoken by the Buddha himself is that it seems to undermine, quite radically, both the sangha and the dharma.

Malcolm wrote:

How could it? Both Ārya Nāgārjuna and Maitreya Bodhisattva both insist that Mahāyāna is indeed was spoken by the Buddha himself.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, June 9th, 2014 at 9:59 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

daverupa said:

I want to emphasize again, however, that we must not ignore textual stratification; the Nikayas, while early and containing even earlier material, are relatively late organizations of material; the previous ninefold system can still be discerned here and there, aside from being explicitly described in the Nikayas themselves.

Malcolm wrote:

Speculative.

daverupa said:

Part of these processes of developmental editorial efforts includes e.g. deva-realms increasing, the single reference to Metteya in the DN, and so forth. Clear stratification, etc.

Malcolm wrote:

Speculative.

daverupa said:

...a very clear understanding of how the Dharma has spread since the Buddha's parinirvana.

This is at odds with the prevailing academic consensus, which would need to be argued against, rather than simply counter-asserting Para-H-{M/I}.

Malcolm wrote:

Consensus does not equal knowledge. I am arguing against "the prevailing academic consensus" by pointing out that it is built on a tissue of speculation and conflicting hypothesis (which generally seemed to pulled out of thin air).

daverupa said:

Hardly true at all. The Agamas and Nikayas reflect their contemporary milieux...in ways the Mahayana texts simply do not reflect the historical Buddha.

Malcolm wrote:

Again, speculative. You have no possible way of knowing this.

daverupa said:

If one criticizes Mahāyāna as being a late production, inevitably one will be lead down the path of destroying the Dharma in general. One can't start at Mahāyāna, then stop at Abhidhamma. One can't start at Abhidhamma, but stop at the Dīgha Nikāya and so on. In the end, since the focus of text criticism is strictly forensic, once the autopsy is over, there is very little left of a corpse to bury.

Slippery slope fallacy. How utterly disappointing to hear from you.

Malcolm wrote:

But we see this at work already.

daverupa said:

Buddhology is of no use ... Further, I have seen more than one former practitioner travel down the road of Buddhology/Tibetology, etc., and completely lose their faith and interest in practice altogether. Why? Because they begin to prioritize what they learn in the academy over what they have learned from their gurus, and their spiritual development comes to a grinding halt.

If you're using the Dharma as a yardstick, you're right. But the Dhamma is still practicable - in every sense of that word - at the end of the process you describe, a practice based on the historical Buddha. It's simply a clear & necessary result given modern academic work on the matter.

Malcolm wrote:

Your "historical Buddha" will not survive academic forensic study, and neither will your "Dhamma".

daverupa said:

Ultimately, calling modern historical techniques and results into question can be perfectly reasonable, but asserting religious texts' alternatives as wholly superior is to make a claim without any evidence, and it does indeed look like fundamentalist pushback.

Malcolm wrote:

And therefore, you propose that erecting the authority of ordinary persons over the authority of āryas is the solution. However, this is the root of the problem, and if Buddhists begin to accept this sort of authority, Buddhadharma will be destroyed.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, June 9th, 2014 at 9:20 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

valid knowledge about the very tradition that one is practicing?

Malcolm wrote:

Which sort of "valid" knowledge are we talking about? My point about western scholarship of the origins of Mahāyāna is that it is constructed on speculations and suppositions which amount to nothing more than the mess of prapañca we see illustrated in Sujato's review of the different theories of the origins of Mulasavastivada school shows.

For example, when you have such a mess of theories, where is the "valid" knowledge therein contained.

Schopen's work, for example, is interesting because he chooses to focus on material evidence of Buddhism in India. Fine, but when he starts speculating, as he does throughout his books, and saying things like "the Buddha is made to predict..." and so on, we have left the grounds of confirmed evidence and entered the realm of hypothesizing.

My point is that Buddhists are not going to learn more about Buddhism by reading the speculative fantasies by which Buddhologists and Tibetologists earn their meager salaries. They are merely going to fill their head with the prapañca of conflicting theories and intellectual fashions.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, June 9th, 2014 at 11:30 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

pueraeternus said:

The evidence is found once we examine and internal and external circumstances (no record of Mahayana teachings until much later, anachronisms, etc), which we have been discussing for the last 10-20 pages.

Malcolm wrote:

You have not presented a single piece of evidence to back your claims, so convinced you are of the modern academic story of the origins of Mahāyāna.

And we would agree. That's not the point, however. There is no statement within these Mahāyāna sutras that we are to regard them as being the teachings from the Sambhogakāya, since that only happens in Akaniṣṭha Gandavyuha anyway.

The Sambhogakaya is capable of emanating illusory nirmanakaya bodies.

Indeed, who show up in space and time and can be seen by those who are not on the bodhisattva stages. But there are not infinite supreme nirmanakāyas like Śākyamuni, there is but one at a time in a given world system. But in general, Mahāyāna sutras are not taught in Akaniṣṭha Gandavyuha.

In other, words, when a Mahāyāna sutra begins with "Thus have I heard, the Bhagavan was dwelling Vaisali, etc., we are to understand that these are the words of Śākyamuni Buddha, located in a historical time and place.

We don't have to - and it is still buddhavacana since those teachings conform to the four seals, etc.

We are to have such understanding; if your understanding fails you because you have bought into Buddhist modernism, I am sorry but that is your problem. It's a pity that it causes you to invalidate the very texts you claim to follow.

The sutras and tantras themselves indicate when they were taught and where. In general, the tantras are not the Nirmanakāya's teachings at all.

Really? So what does Tibetan Buddhism say about who taught the anuttaratantras, such as Hevajra?

It depends on the tantra. Some were retaught by Śākyamuni, most are not.

Oh I see. So a generally-accepted emanation of Avalokiteshvara (among Tibetan Buddhists) says something that doesn't gel with the traditional story, and he gets no pass as well?

From some, yes; from others, no. DTR's real point is that the conventional deluded perception of ordinary persons is not authoritative. This also applies to academic opinions about the genesis of Mahāyāna, etc. Unfortunately, the opinions you have presented us are predicated precisely on the perspective of unawakened secular persons with impure vision.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, June 9th, 2014 at 9:52 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Wayfarer said:

You do realize you're preaching fundamentalism?

Malcolm wrote:

What I am actually doing is opposing the new secular "Buddhist" orthodoxy.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, June 9th, 2014 at 9:00 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

daverupa said:

I don't mean to be harsh with this term 'magic'; perhaps 'metaphysical history' will suit you, in that pleas are made to metaphysical realities...

Malcolm wrote:

You will find this throughout Buddhadharma.

daverupa said:

In any event, this simply needs to be distinguished, and it means that you must hold a view contrary to the linked academic discussion I've already provided. It may not be strictly ahistorical, but it is certainly parahistorical.

Malcolm wrote:

It is neither. The view I am elucidating is a specific historical view, grounded in a very clear understanding of how the Dharma has spread since the Buddha's parinirvana.

daverupa said:

...unfortunately, the same procedural approaches which describe Mormon accuracy in their claims also describe Mahayana accuracy in its claims.

Malcolm wrote:

This applies to the Agamas, the Pali Canon and so on as well.

daverupa said:

It really does boil down to this baseline, as far as I can tell. Worth the threadcount, at least, for succinctness in the future.

Malcolm wrote:

If one criticizes Mahāyāna as being a late production, inevitably one will be lead down the path of destroying the Dharma in general. One can't start at Mahāyāna, then stop at Abhidhamma. One can't start at Abhidhamma, but stop at the Dīgha Nikāya and so on. In the end, since the focus of text criticism is strictly forensic, once the autopsy is over, there is very little left of a corpse to bury.

In short, Buddhology is of no use to practitioners at all. It does not provide us with a solid sense of history; it does the opposite; it does not provide us with tradition, it does the opposite; it is not grounded in wisdom, but rather the rank conceptuality of ordinary people who are for the most part NOT practitioners and have no interest in transforming their lives with the Dharma. Further, I have seen more than one former practitioner travel down the road of Buddhology/Tibetology, etc., and completely lose their faith and interest in practice altogether. Why? Because they begin to prioritize what they learn in the academy over what they have learned from their gurus, and their spiritual development comes to a grinding halt.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, June 9th, 2014 at 5:57 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

daverupa said:

Malcolm, you write for magic and for secrets, and against history. It's simply descriptive to say so.

Malcolm wrote:

It is an inaccurate descriptive.

I don't write "against" history. None of the theories that western academics have produced are anything more than speculations and suppositions.

I am writing for a different history, you know, then one we actually received from our tradition.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, June 9th, 2014 at 4:23 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Pero said:

Yes well, how important is Mount Meru to one's spirituality?

anjali said:

From a tantric point of view, "Mt. Meru" is very important for one's spiritual practices. Because of my yogic background prior to coming to Buddhism, I've always taken Mount Meru to symbolically represent the spinal sushumna nadi, central axis of the body.

Malcolm wrote:

The central axis of the body is the aorta. Not the spine.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, June 9th, 2014 at 4:22 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Bodhisattva Maitreya...

magic

Ārya Āsanga was a third stage bodhisattva and received teachings in person from Maitreya Bodhisattva, nothing magical about it at all.

...the Buddha taught Mahāyāna at the same time he was also teaching Śrāvakayāna. historically invisible

On the contrary, we have the evidence of the existence of the Mahāyāna sūtras themselves. There isn't a single bit of proof that they were composed later. None. Zero. Zilch.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, June 9th, 2014 at 3:40 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Pero said:

Yes well, how important is Mount Meru to one's spirituality?

Malcolm wrote:

If you are doing mandala offerings, it is very important:

The ground is anointed with scented water and strewn with flowers, adorned with Meru, the four continents, the sun and the moon; by perceiving this as a buddhafiield and offering it, may all migrating beings enjoy a pure field.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, June 9th, 2014 at 2:58 AM

Title: Re: Abandoning Buddhism, What Now?

Content:

Adi said:

but frankly it seems a waste everyone's time.

Adi

Malcolm wrote:

Mostly A108's, but it is his choice.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, June 9th, 2014 at 2:57 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

daverupa said:

Either the Buddha taught Mahayana in magic ways, taught it in historically invisible ways, or didn't teach it.

Malcolm wrote:

We reject all three.

Bodhisattva Maitreya clearly teaches that the Buddha taught Mahāyāna at the same time he was also teaching Śrāvakayāna.

This is not magic, nor is it historically invisible.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, June 9th, 2014 at 1:00 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Here is a beautiful example of just what a useless waste of time Western writing on Buddhist history can become:

The uncertainty around this school has fuelled a number of hypotheses. Frauwallner's theory is that the Mūlasarvāstivāda Vinaya was the disciplinary code of an early Buddhist community based in Mathura, which was quite independent as a monastic community from the Sarvāstivādin of Kaśmīr (although of course this does not mean that they were different in terms of doctrine). Lamotte, against Frauwallner, asserts that the Mūlasarvāstivāda Vinaya was a late Kaśmīr compilation made to complete the Sarvāstivādin Vinaya.<sup>2</sup> Warder suggests that the Mūlasarvāstivādin were a later development of the Sarvāstivāda, whose main innovations were literary, the compilation of the large Vinaya and the Saddharmasmṛtyupasthāna Sūtra,<sup>3</sup> which kept the early doctrines but brought the style up to date with contemporary literary tastes.<sup>4</sup> Enomoto pulls the rug out from all these theories by asserting that Sarvāstivādin and Mūlasarvāstivādin are really the same. Meanwhile, Willemen, Dessein, and Cox have developed the theory that the Sautrantikas, a branch or tendency within the Sarvāstivādin group of schools, emerged in Gandhāra and Bactria around 200 ce. Although they were the earlier group, they temporarily lost ground to the Kaśmīr Vaibhāṣika school due to the political influence of Kaṇiṣka. In later years the Sautrantikas became known as the Mūlasarvāstivādins and regained their earlier ascendancy.<sup>5</sup> I have elsewhere given my reasons for disagreeing with the theories of Enomoto and Willemen et al.<sup>6</sup> Neither Warder nor Lamotte give enough evidence to back up their theories.

[Sects & Sectarianism, Sujato]

Don't get me wrong here, of course this book is well written and has a lot of interesting information, but passages like the above clearly illustrate the absurdity of much of what has been written by "Buddhologists".

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, June 9th, 2014 at 12:15 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

I'm curious, what do non-western Buddhist scholars say about the rise of Mahayana these days?

Malcolm wrote:

Look in Kongtrul, Dudjom, etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, June 9th, 2014 at 12:14 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

pueraeternus said:

I have shown that there is a problem with traditional presentations on this issue, using scriptural basis (i.e. the traditional presentation is not supported when we look at the scriptures), so I am not merely "making things up".

Malcolm wrote:

You have not shown this at all.

pueraeternus said:

This is because you and your camp thinks that anything that is transmitted via visions, dream transmissions, etc are pious forgeries.

Malcolm wrote:

There is no problem with teachings received in dreams and visions, etc. There is simply no record of Mahāyāna sūtras being received in this way. To make this claim is a claim made in absence of any evidence whatsoever.

pueraeternus said:

"Words of the Buddha" does not have to be from the lips of the nirmanakaya Buddha 2500 years ago.

Malcolm wrote:

And we would agree. That's not the point, however. There is no statement within these Mahāyāna sutras that we are to regard them as being the teachings from the Sambhogakāya, since that only happens in Akaniṣṭha Gandavyuha anyway. In other words, when a Mahāyāna sutra begins with "Thus have I heard, the Bhagavan was dwelling Vaisali, etc., we are to understand that these are the words of Śakyamuni Buddha, located in a historical time and place.

pueraeternus said:

Oh yes - these contradictions are especially problematic if you think that the nirmanakaya Buddha said all of these contradictory things during his lifetime. It makes a lot more sense to consider that the late tantras were revealed much later when the socio-political ground has changed so much that new teachings needed to be given to suit the times, excessive brahmanical-influenced obsession on purity needed to be countered by antinomian praxis, etc. And this can be resolved by not editing any sutra or tantra, but by merely not forcefully locking them into a specific time of origin that makes no sense whatsoever.

Malcolm wrote:

The sutras and tantras themselves indicate when they were taught and where. In general, the tantras are not the Nirmanakāya's teachings at all.

What is under discussion here is not Buddhist tantras such as the Sarvatathāgatatattvasamgraha, which are taught constantly throughout the three times.

pueraeternus said:

In fact, I showed that confusion does indeed arise when we take the traditional account uncritically.

Malcolm wrote:

You have indeed shared your confusion.

pueraeternus said:

Then the Dalai Lama must be a terrible person to inflate his self-importance and diminish trust in tradition when he said that he no longer believes in Meru Cosmology.

Malcolm wrote:

HHDL said that he rejected Vasubandhu's presentation of Meru Cosmology. However, Dunsey Thinly Norbu spares no words in condemning the materialist, indeed, what he calls nihilist, perspective which informs the rejection of the Buddha's teachings on this score.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, June 8th, 2014 at 11:40 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

tobes said:

The entire field of Mahāyāna studies in Western academia takes a forensic approach to the whole thing. It is all completely predicated on the notion that Mahāyāna sūtras could not have possibly been taught by the Buddha. I should have thought this was obvious to everyone.

There simply isn't that level of consensus; and the philological scientism which is so disparaged here has been under unceasing critique for decades.

Malcolm wrote:

Who are you kidding, Tobes?

There is not one Western Buddhist scholar in the academy that I can think of who has ever once defended any traditional account of the rise of Mahāyāna, save perhaps Robert Thurman.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, June 8th, 2014 at 4:13 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Since the academic view of Mahāyāna is that it was not taught by the Buddha, I would say it is singular, narrow, grounded in a materialist paradigm of history, "scientific" (what a laugh), modernist, self-interested (publish or die), and definitely not sympathetic.

dzogchungpa said:

Didn't you used to share that view? Was your view, then, narrow, etc.?

Somehow, that wasn't the impression I got.

Malcolm wrote:

I used to use the same kinds unfounded rationalizations we see PE use — i.e. that the Mahāyāna sūtras came from visions, dreams, and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, June 7th, 2014 at 8:23 PM

Title: Re: Abandoning Buddhism, What Now?

Content:

Andrew108 said:

You know that the buddhist tradition is heterodox.

Malcolm wrote:

"Heterodox" if you are a Hindu, perhaps.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, June 7th, 2014 at 7:56 PM

Title: Re: Abandoning Buddhism, What Now?

Content:

Andrew108 said:

Sometimes he says he has no need for faith othertimes he says it's essential.

Malcolm wrote:

I don't have need for faith, but that is because I have unshakable faith in the view based on my study and practice. Those who do not have that, well, they need faith to continue. It is very important. The Ratnālokaśūtra states:

Like a mother giving birth, faith goes before, produces and increases all qualities,
removes fears and crosses rivers;
faith shows the way to the city of bliss...

But I would say that it is the my faith in the Buddha's teaching, even where I did not fully understand it, that allowed me to grow in my understanding of the Dharma.

So yes, sometimes I say I don't need faith, that means "blind faith".

But lack of faith is damaging to one's practice, since faith is defined as "clarity about an object". Lack of clarity about the teachings, lack of clarity about one's practice, all of this comes about from the "lack of clarity" we term "lack of faith".

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, June 7th, 2014 at 7:48 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

tobes said:

There is a reason why this has been fundamentally ignored for 20 pages: it serves the dialectic well to consider "the academic view" as a singular, narrow, materialist, scientific, modernist, self-interested, anti-Buddhist perspective.

Malcolm wrote:

Since the academic view of Mahāyāna is that it was not taught by the Buddha, I would say it is singular, narrow, grounded in a materialist paradigm of history, "scientific" (what a laugh), modernist, self-interested (publish or die), and definitely not sympathetic.

tobes said:

That way, something can be posited which is a viable alternative - "the real, authentic, faith filled, guru sealed" perspective.

Malcolm wrote:

Textual forensics do nothing to assist people's practice.

To the extent that people learn how to read classical Chinese, Tibetan and so on, in universities (though often not that well), then Buddhist studies programs in Western academia have some purpose.

tobes said:

What is has to do with the truth and reality of contemporary Buddhist scholarship is a vastly different matter!

Malcolm wrote:

The only thing useful in contemporary Buddhist scholarship is the production of translations. That's about it.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, June 7th, 2014 at 7:41 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

pueraeternus said:

In a very unsatisfactory way. And you didn't address my earlier remarks about the apparent ineptitude of the countless arya-bodhisattvas. How do you reconcile that?

Malcolm wrote:

This has also been adequately addressed.

pueraeternus said:

False accusation.

Malcolm wrote:

It is the inescapable consequence of your position that the Nirmanakāya did not teach Mahāyāna.

pueraeternus said:

I already said many times the Buddha did preach the Mahayana sutras, but not in his earthly lifetime and only later when people are ripe to receive the deep training and higher teachings, via visions, illusory bodies, dream transmissions, etc.

Malcolm wrote:

So you speculate, but have no actual evidence of.

pueraeternus said:

You have demonstrated nothing viz a viz Maitreya's quote, only that it contradicted what was said in the Samdhinirmocana.

Malcolm wrote:

Maitreya does not contradict the Samdhinirmocana at all.

pueraeternus said:

My whole point in this is that taking your fundamentalist view will only expose us to the kind of criticism we don't want to face, since the wide variance demonstrated in the vast Mahayana canon accumulated over the millennia cannot fit into a "the flesh and blood Buddha said all of these during his 80 year lifespan" basis.

Malcolm wrote:

My whole point is that rejecting Maitreya's position that Mahāyāna was taught during the lifetime of the Buddha exposes us to the present criticism that we already suffer, which is that Mahāyāna was not taught during the Buddha's lifetime and therefore it is not valid Buddhavacana.

pueraeternus said:

Be lucky that it is me pointing out these glaring contradictions, not someone who have absolutely no faith in the Mahayana dharma or out to destroy us.

Malcolm wrote:

You have not pointed out any contradictions — you have invented some fantasies, that's all.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, June 7th, 2014 at 7:26 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Wayfarer said:

DJKR doesn't seem to think that the western academic approach is necessarily harmful to Mahayana, and I have to say that I agree with him.

I do too. I think the wholesale rejection of "Western academic Buddhism" is mistaken (and I am as staunch a critic of "materialism" as anyone). If any academic has a "materialist agenda" it is really not that hard to detect, but to write off the entire field of academic Buddhist studies is another thing altogether.

Malcolm wrote:

The entire field of Mahāyāna studies in Western academia takes a forensic approach to the whole thing. It is all completely predicated on the notion that Mahāyāna sūtras could not have possibly been taught by the Buddha. I should have thought this was obvious to everyone.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, June 7th, 2014 at 9:44 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

pueraeternus said:

Nevertheless, there were teachings superior to this, for this also gave rise to criticism, needed interpretation, and became an object of controversy. So the Blessed One, with an explicit intention, turned the wheel a third time for the sake of the followers of all vehicles....

Malcolm wrote:

This reading is not correct.

pueraeternus said:

Why were there no known champions of the second and third turning until much later when Nagarjuna and Asanga appeared in the scene?

Malcolm wrote:

This qualm has been addressed.

pueraeternus said:

Oh no - I am not discrediting the Mahayana.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, actually you are, even though that is not your intention. How? By agreeing with the objections to Mahāyāna posed by its opponents. I.e., by agreeing that Mahāyāna arose later, you are explicitly agreeing that it was not taught by the Buddha. No matter what your excuses are, opponents to Mahāyāna will insist on seeing it this way. In order to rebut this contention, Maitreya states that Mahāyāna arose at the same time as Śravakayāna, as I have already demonstrated.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, June 7th, 2014 at 6:04 AM

Title: Re: Dharma protectors and samaya

Content:

Reibeam said:

Instead of making a new thread, maybe one of you on this thread knows. I have read the DC books and listened to a number of retreats that speak of Guardians and am left with one question. In relation to ones of specific parts of the world in the Medium TUN book chNNr gives very little description for Oceania and North America and says those people living in that area should find out the details about the specific Guardian in their own country. Where do I look and who do I ask to find out more about the North American one? i read a short article in the Mirror, but that is all i can find. Please PM me if that is more appropriate. Thanks!

Malcolm wrote:

North American is Tsiu Marpo. Ocean is Marutse.

Reibeam said:

So the name in the TUN book is just another name for Tsiu Marpo?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, June 7th, 2014 at 3:33 AM

Title: Re: Dharma protectors and samaya

Content:

Reibeam said:

Instead of making a new thread, maybe one of you on this thread knows. I have read the DC books and listened to a number of retreats that speak of Guardians and am left with one question. In relation to ones of specific parts of the world in the Medium TUN book chNNr gives very little description for Oceania and North America and says those people living in that area should find out the details about the specific Guardian in their own country. Where do I look and who do I ask to find out more about the North American one? i read a short article in the Mirror, but that is all i can find. Please PM me if that is more appropriate. Thanks!

Malcolm wrote:

North American is Tsiu Marpo. Ocean is Marutse.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, June 7th, 2014 at 2:20 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Clarence said:

I might have missed it, but what brought about your change of opinion? I know you have done many 180's but I wonder what caused this particular one?

Malcolm wrote:

The recognition that doubting the word of the Buddha, even on a subtle level, causes negative traces.

dzogchungpa said:

Feel free to ignore this, but in all seriousness, I would like to hear more about this recognition. Did you have some kind of epiphany, or was it more of an intellectual thing or what?

Malcolm wrote:

I recognized that with this perspective comes a subtle lack of faith which is not good for one's practice. Lack of faith is one of the six afflicted mental factors that accompanies all afflicted minds in samsara. So it was a recognition of my own state of mind. I understood that if this affects me, then it affects others.

All non-virtuous actions come from afflictions. I understood that by maintaining the view that Mahāyāna sutras were products of later authors, not the Buddha, there was no way to avoid the contamination of subtle traces of lack of faith in the Buddha's teachings. These subtle traces cause obstacles in one's practice and life. Of course, if one is not a Mahāyāni, then there is no problem. But if one has taken bodhisattva vows, and so on, lack of complete confidence in the origin of Mahāyāna sutras is destructive to those vows.

Further, the whole western academic edifice around the diffusion of Mahāyāna is contaminated by a materialist world view. It is a house of cards built on suppositions and speculations.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, June 6th, 2014 at 10:33 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Clarence said:

I might have missed it, but what brought about your change of opinion? I know you have done many 180's but I wonder what caused this particular one?

Malcolm wrote:

The recognition that doubting the word of the Buddha, even on a subtle level, causes negative traces.

Clarence said:

Thanks. That makes sense but how do you then deal with some of the contradictions in the teachings themselves? Or is that all explained through the vehicles and the qualifications of the students?

Malcolm wrote:

The Sandhivāyākaraṇa-tantra states:...the pleasing single vajra word becomes many different [words] from the perspective of the mentalities of the trainees.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, June 6th, 2014 at 8:40 PM

Title: Re: Apocryphal Treatment for Conze's Heart Problems, JOCBS

Content:

plwk said:

Utilizing Nattier's theory of the text's history...

It's better to forget such nonsense. It won't help anyone understand anything about the Dharma. People like Nattier should not be regarded as authorities on any level.

If some further elucidation on this is possible, for the sake of us who are unfamiliar, the reason(s) for this statement?

Utilizing Nattier's theory of the text's history...

Malcolm wrote:

It means that there is absolutely not a shred of evidence that Nattier's theory is correct. And it is useless for practitioners.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, June 6th, 2014 at 8:32 PM

Title: Re: Abandoning Buddhism, What Now?

Content:

Minjeay said:

How many books did it take to make you realize this?

Malcolm wrote:

None at all.

Minjeay said:

Hundreds of wars and fights outside seem to contradict you, though.

Malcolm wrote:

They confirm merely that selfishness is also innate to human beings and that we struggle with these two competing impulses in our psyches.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, June 6th, 2014 at 8:30 PM

Title: Re: Abandoning Buddhism, What Now?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

I don't think that great kindness and compassion is the sole province of Buddhists. I am perfectly convinced that great kindness and compassion is innate to human beings.

dharmagoat said:

As is enlightened mind?

Malcolm wrote:

All sentient beings have the capacity to wake up. Whether they actually meet the Dharma and do so, on the other hand, is something else entirely.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, June 6th, 2014 at 11:49 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

pueraeternus said:

Oh yes it does, my quote earlier abundantly confirms.

Malcolm wrote:

It really does not not.

pueraeternus said:

The commentarial tradition then failed to notice that the Samdhinirmocana sutra stated.

Malcolm wrote:

Don't be silly.

pueraeternus said:

Again more nonsense - Paramarthasamudgata spoke of how the three turnings were done sequentially and said this 3rd turning was "the most marvellous and wonderful that ever occurred in the world. It has no superior nor did it contain any implicit meaning nor occasion any controversy", and then asked what merit would be accrued should this sutra be believed, copied, disseminated, etc. Buddha (in effect) said the merit is incalculable. This is quite obvious the entire exchange, and even the entire sutra was ascertained by the Buddha himself.

Malcolm wrote:

It does not prove your contention on any level.

pueraeternus said:

it is quite obvious now "simultaneous" does not mean the vehicles are taught at the same time on this planet.

Malcolm wrote:

Of course it does. Only someone who is completely blind could "see" otherwise.

pueraeternus said:

Oh yes it does - don't be obstinate.

Malcolm wrote:

No, it really does not.

pueraeternus said:

Ludicrous - the Buddha was referring to the "essential non-existence of things" - he was making a point and reference to the ultimate. Of course there is the second turning at that time, since that is the first time the Buddha taught the prajnaparamita. However, since even the 2nd turning was provisional and subject to controversy, the Buddha turned the wheel a 3rd time.

Malcolm wrote:

Not because the second turning was provisional in fact, but because it needed to be reaffirmed as definitive.

pueraeternus said:

This is really common sense (again), if they were really tasked to preserve the Mahayana canon, they would have done it immediately after the parinirvana.

Malcolm wrote:

This objection has been addressed several times. Long and short, the Mahayāna was of no interest to the śrāvakas, so they did not preserve it.

pueraeternus said:

How can Bhayva blame them then?

Malcolm wrote:

He doesn't — he simply recognizes that śrāvakas had no interest in preserving Mahāyāna.

pueraeternus said:

Oh - perhaps they are deficient in their faith in the Buddha's words? Or perhaps they are really just apologists and tried to shore up support for their chosen vocation, hence the selective focus? You said that we should take each Mahayana sutra as the word of the flesh and blood Buddha.

Malcolm wrote:

For a Mahāyanist, I find it odd that you so strenuously argue to discredit it.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, June 6th, 2014 at 11:38 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

pueraeternus said:

So why do you take the word of a 10th level Bodhisattva over the word of the Supreme Buddha of our eon?

Malcolm wrote:

Because you have proven incapable of demonstrating any of your understanding is actually validated on the basis of what the texts actually say.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, June 6th, 2014 at 10:57 AM

Title: Re: Apocryphal Treatment for Conze's Heart Problems, JOCBS

Content:

Huifeng said:

Utilizing Nattier's theory of the text's history...

Malcolm wrote:

It's better to forget such nonsense. It won't help anyone understand anything about the Dharma. People like Nattier should not be regarded as authorities on any level.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, June 6th, 2014 at 10:56 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Clarence said:

I might have missed it, but what brought about your change of opinion? I know you have done many 180's but I wonder what caused this particular one?

Malcolm wrote:

The recognition that doubting the word of the Buddha, even on a subtle level, causes negative traces.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, June 6th, 2014 at 10:54 AM

Title: Re: Abandoning Buddhism, What Now?

Content:

dharmagoat said:

But Dharma is required to develop the capacity for great kindness and compassion, which makes us considerably more able to help.

Malcolm wrote:

No, not at all. I don't think that great kindness and compassion is the sole province of Buddhists. I am perfectly convinced that great kindness and compassion is innate to human beings.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, June 6th, 2014 at 9:57 AM

Title: Re: Abandoning Buddhism, What Now?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

[quote="dharmagoat"]

Even if this were so, we do not kill beings to ease their suffering*, we care for them as much as we are able.[quote]

Sure, but Dharma isn't required for that. Simple kindness is sufficient.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, June 6th, 2014 at 9:21 AM

Title: Re: Abandoning Buddhism, What Now?

Content:

dharmagoat said:

No-one needs to rule out the possibility of buddhahood in a single lifetime, no matter what the odds.

Malcolm wrote:

There is no need for Buddhas or Buddhahood at all, if there is only one lifetime.

Anders said:

You are skipping steps here.

Malcolm wrote:

Not at all. If there is only one life, the suffering of all beings ends with death.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, June 6th, 2014 at 6:16 AM

Title: Re: Abandoning Buddhism, What Now?

Content:

dharmagoat said:

No-one needs to rule out the possibility of buddhahood in a single lifetime, no matter what the odds.

Malcolm wrote:

There is no need for Buddhas or Buddhahood at all, if there is only one lifetime.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, June 6th, 2014 at 6:15 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Pero said:

I'm sorry but it's a bit funny you've started to insist on accepting the traditional accounts on sutras while you deny traditional accounts of tantras.

Malcolm wrote:

No, I am including those too. kama, terma, etc.

Pero said:

So you no longer think that the 17 upadesha tantras of Dzogchen and the rest were written by someone in the 11th (?) century?

Malcolm wrote:

No, they are termas, of course, but I see no reason not to accept the traditional narrative of their concealment and rediscovery.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, June 6th, 2014 at 3:14 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The Tarkajvala states:

Not long after the Bhagavan's parinirvana, the śravakas were totally attached to the teaching for themselves. For that purpose, when the compilers compiled whatever they were able, since they could not retain the Mahāyāna discourses, they did not gather them at all. The nāgās and so on who rejoiced in the Sugata, gathered them all and were requested to keep them in the nāgā world, the deva world, etc. From there, because they were retained, the one predicted by the Buddha, Ārya Nāgārjuna, gathered them and spread them very widely in the human world.

dzogchungpa said:

Does it say how Nagarjuna "gathered" them?

Malcolm wrote:

Nope, but you might say that Nāgārjuna is the first terton.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, June 6th, 2014 at 2:51 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

pueraeternus said:

There is no doubt that the three turnings are as the Samdhinirmocana sutra states, as it specifies 3 different times, each vehicle higher than the previous. The sites of the first 2 turnings are common knowledge. The third one not sure, but certainly timewise, it is later than the 2nd turning. This is crystal clear from the sutra.

Malcolm wrote:

No, it doesn't. Not at all.

pueraeternus said:

This shows that your assertion on what Maitreya meant when he said "simultaneous" as incorrect.

Malcolm wrote:

No, it is very clearly stated in the commentarial literature what "simultaneous" means, it means that when he was in Śravastī, he taught both Śrāvakayāna and Mahāyāna, when he was Kapilavastu, he taught both, and so on.

pueraeternus said:

Why is it not reasonable? The Buddha ascertained that it is the case,

Malcolm wrote:

The Buddha did no such thing. He did not even speak the passage, Paramarthasamudgata did.

pueraeternus said:

and I have showed that if we don't assume the Mahayana sutras are spoken by the flesh and blood Buddha, that he delivered those teachings post-parinirvana, etc, then we have no problems.

Malcolm wrote:

Apart from the problem the very statement "simultaneous" is meant to rebut.

pueraeternus said:

The Samdhinirmocana citation I provided early does state different locations and times.

Malcolm wrote:

No, in fact it does not.

pueraeternus said:

And the fact that the 3rd wheel was turned because the 2nd wheel suffered "controversy", is another fact that shows that the 3rd was turned later than the 2nd.

Malcolm wrote:

No, this is not a warranted conclusion. In order to establish this, you would have to able to say for certain whether this sūtra was taught after the Prajñāpāramita, but as there is absolutely no difference in the statement of the text concerning the content of the second and third turning, your contention cannot be verified at all.

For example, in the 25,000 PP, the Buddha replies to Subhuti's declaration that the Buddha had turned a second wheel of Dharma:

Subhuti, because of the essential non-existence of things, this is also not a second turning of the wheel, it is also not the first turning of the wheel.

pueraeternus said:

A bunch of arhats preserved the Sravaka canon much better, maintaining the transmission immediately after the parinirvana.

Malcolm wrote:

As did Āryabodhisattvas. All these questions have been previously addressed. Further, the Buddha predicted obstacles for Mahāyāna in the 25,000 and elsewhere: "Subhuti, many obstacles will arise for this Prajñāpāramita..." and so on.

pueraeternus said:

Contrast this with bodhisattvas, who are supposed to be vastly superior in every way, having the Mahayana canon in such piecemeal fashion and all over the place?

Malcolm wrote:

The Tarkajvala states:

Not long after the Bhagavan's parinirvana, the śravakas were totally attached to the teaching for themselves. For that purpose, when the compilers compiled whatever they were able, since they could not retain the Mahāyāna discourses, they did not gather them at all. The nāgās and so on who rejoiced in the Sugata, gathered them all and were requested to keep them in the nāgā world, the deva world, etc. From there, because they were retained, the one predicted by the Buddha, Ārya Nāgārjuna, gathered them and spread them very widely in the the human world.

In fact, the whole "three turnings" thing is so unimportant to Indians, there is no a single Indian commentarial voice on the issue. There exists solely a Korean commentary and a Tibetan commentary in the bstan 'gyur that deals with the issue at all. As we have seen, the Korean commentary attempts to define a temporal sequence, the Tibetan commentary does not make any such attempt.

On the other hand, there are many voices which deal with Maitreya Bodhisattvas statement that Śrāvakayāna and Mahāyāna arose together.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, June 6th, 2014 at 1:07 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

mañjughoṣamaṇi said:

How are you approaching the history of the rgyud bzhi, nowadays?

Malcolm wrote:

An edited terma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, June 6th, 2014 at 12:53 AM

Title: Re: when and where ? Chöd wang and lung

Content:

Happy Thunderbolt said:

I think you might be misinterpreting Tulku Dakpa.

Malcolm wrote:

There is no specific dwang for this practice. It only needs a lung.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, June 6th, 2014 at 12:52 AM

Title: Re: Abandoning Buddhism, What Now?

Content:

Andrew108 said:

materialism is always changing in response to new proofs. It's not a completed project.

Malcolm wrote:

It's also not based on wisdom, but rather, concepts.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, June 6th, 2014 at 12:45 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Pero said:

I'm sorry but it's a bit funny you've started to insist on accepting the traditional accounts on sutras while you deny traditional accounts of tantras.

Malcolm wrote:

No, I am including those too. kama, terma, etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, June 5th, 2014 at 11:19 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

daverupa said:

and this is why Mahayana requires a position contra Buddhist Modernism with its textual criticism, etc.

Malcolm wrote:

I do not say that text criticism was immoral, what I said was that if one accepts the text critical version of Buddhist history and one is a Mahāyāni, then one necessarily accepts that the texts one is following are not authentic. That is an immoral position for a Mahāyānist to take.

This is obviously a problem for Indian Mahāyānists because they again and again voice the sentiment that Mahāyāna sūtras need to be accepted as historical Buddhavacana, i.e. that they come from the time with the Buddha had not passed into parinirvana.

I think it is simply more practical for practicing Mahāyānis to accept the classical Indian Mahāyāna position about the authorship of the sūtras. We then avoid all the complications of later and earlier sutras, blah, blah, blah.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, June 5th, 2014 at 8:35 PM

Title: Re: Abandoning Buddhism, What Now?

Content:

Berry said:

"You are wrong, I am right". ... "I like this, I don't like that" .... we tend to express these opinions a lot on the internet!

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, that's what we do on the internet.

As well as pictures, videos, etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, June 5th, 2014 at 8:31 PM

Title: Re: Abandoning Buddhism, What Now?

Content:

dharmagoat said:

As you point out, religious labels count for very little. While I no longer identify as a Buddhist, I still consider the bodhisatva ideal to be the highest aspiration.

Malcolm wrote:

One lifetime is a little short to accomplish this goal.

dharmagoat said:

But not necessarily too short, and I intend to die trying. Although it is most likely that not all beings are going to find enlightenment in one human lifetime.

Then again, is the goal really necessary? Can one be motivated by the aspiration without being fixed on the goal?

Malcolm, you make an important point. I need to think more on this.

Malcolm wrote:

Bodhicitta is the aspiration to attain buddhahood for the benefit of all sentient beings. If there is no rebirth, it is rather pointless as an aspiration no?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, June 5th, 2014 at 8:22 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

pueraeternus said:

Maitreya can't have meant that the 2 vehicles was taught at the same time, because in the Samdhinirnocana, it is explicitly mentioned that the dharma wheel was turned 3 separate times - first at Benares the four noble truths, then the Buddha later turned it a second time proclaiming alaksanadharmacakra (Madhyamaka) for the Bodhisattvas, then finally because even the second turning was provisional, he turned the wheel the third time for the ultimate teaching (Yogacara). So you see, even the Buddha himself segregated the 3 sets of teachings into 3 distinct temporal periods.

Malcolm wrote:

While it is certainly true that many people have understood it this way, for example, the Korean master Wan tshig (sorry, did not dig up his actual Korean name): Indeed that Dharma of the Buddha is profound, nevertheless because there are many methods of guidance and ways of introducing it, not only one, the Sovereign of the Dharma taught three Dharma wheels. Among those the first the demonstration of cycling in the forests where wild animals roam who constantly perish and the causes and results of nirvana to those who are to enter into the Śrāvakayāna. This is called "The Dharmawheel of the four truths". Second, is teaching the Ārya-prajñāpāramita to sixteen gatherings at Vulture Peak and so on to those who are to enter the Bodhisattvayāna. This is called the Dharmawheel of characteristiclessness. The third is the teaching of the Samdhinirmocana and so on to those in the pure buddhafiels such as Padmagarbha, and the impure ones to those are to enter all vehicles called the "Mahāyāna of the definitive meaning".

This is not completely certain. There is no record in any other sutra or commentary of where these sites may be. In any case, even if we accept Wan tshig's statement at face value, it still means that the Mahāyāna arose at the same time as the Śrāvakayāna because it was taught during the lifetime of the Buddha.

Moreover, there is no certain statement in the citation itself that this is the case. In his General Division of Tantras, Loppon Sonam Tsemo responds to the above assertion:

If it is true those three Dharmawheels were turned for different inclinations, to claim “...they were turned in stages in different countries” is not reasonable. If it is asked how it is not reasonable, it is because scripture and reason are contradicted, the objections of the śrāvakas will not be rejected, the Sugata will come under criticism and so on. Because there will be many such faults, it is not reasonable. He ultimately answers this qualm with the citation from the Sutralamkāra:
Not predicted earlier, arising at the same time.

As the Sandhivākarana-tantra too states:

Non-conceptual, undisturbed,
...the pleasing single vajra word becomes many different [words] from the perspective of the mentalities of the trainees.

A single statement of the Bhagavan’s will appear as many different Dharmas to many different trainees at the same time. That also does not contradict the citation of the Samdhinirmocana-sūtra explained above. Although that citation does state different Dharmas, it does not state different locations or different times. Since that is so, teaching different Dharmas to trainees with one statement made at the same time is called “the array of speech,” and demonstrating many different bodies in different locations at the same time are the beneficial deeds with an array of bodies.

pueraeternus said:

Since logically if the these turnings were done during the Buddha’s earthly time, then we would have seen the movements started during his lifetime.

Malcolm wrote:

Not necessarily, since the Mahāyāna was not collated by the Śrāvakas, but rather by the Mahābodhisattvas as indicated in such sūtras as the Tathāgatācintyaguhyanirdeśa.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, June 5th, 2014 at 9:49 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

pueraeternus said:

If trying to make sense of things is pure speculation, then I am guilty as charged.

Malcolm wrote:

What it means is that you are indulging in pure fantasy, at this point.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, June 5th, 2014 at 9:48 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

pueraeternus said:

Nonsense. The Samdhinirmocana's teaching on alayavijnana (sarvabijaka), trisvabhava and the three turnings (especially the very important chapter 7) are hallmarks of Yogacara.

Malcolm wrote:

In the passage in question, no mention is made of the ālayavijñāna, trisvabhava, etc. Read it again, closely.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, June 5th, 2014 at 9:47 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

pueraeternus said:

"Because it is self-evident;"

Malcolm wrote:

The term "self_evident" occurs nowhere in the text itself or the commentarial glosses.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, June 5th, 2014 at 9:45 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

pueraeternus said:

So you see, even the Buddha himself segregated the 3 sets of teachings into 3 distinct temporal periods.

Malcolm wrote:

Actually, the Samdhinirmocana does not state that. Read it again — closely this time.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, June 5th, 2014 at 5:02 AM

Title: Re: Abandoning Buddhism, What Now?

Content:

dharmagoat said:

As you point out, religious labels count for very little. While I no longer identify as a Buddhist, I still consider the bodhisatva ideal to be the highest aspiration.

Malcolm wrote:

One lifetime is a little short to accomplish this goal.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Wednesday, June 4th, 2014 at 10:39 PM
Title: Re: Abandoning Buddhism, What Now?
Content:
Malcolm wrote:
Love and compassion are not unique to Buddhism.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Wednesday, June 4th, 2014 at 10:15 PM
Title: Re: Practicing Together and lungs
Content:
Reibeam said:
Hello All,

Question about group practice:

If a number people were planning to get together and do chNNr's Green Tara practice and everyone but two people had received introductory transmission and the Green Tara lung from chNNr, but had done Tara practices before from other teachers would it be okay for them to participate in a group practice setting and do chNNr's Green Tara practice?

Both of these folks are intending on receiving transmission from chNNr eventually. I don't want to discourage them from coming to an event, but although it is a peaceful practice (obviously no action mantras during this gathering) It requires a lung so I am not sure what to do other than do another Tara practice that everyone has authorization for.

Thanks in advance for any advice,

R

Malcolm wrote:
You will get various answers, but if people are interested, let them come.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Wednesday, June 4th, 2014 at 9:44 PM
Title: Re: Is Nirvana Worth It?
Content:
Malcolm wrote:
But this contradicts the very sutra he is citing

Astus said:
Maybe not. As your quote says: "there is the appearance of many kinds of reflected images in the circle of a mirror".

Malcolm wrote:

The point is that none of those images are happening in the mirror.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, June 4th, 2014 at 8:54 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Anders said:

What Maitreya is basically saying is that your insistence on accepting the literal historicity of the Mahayana sutras is not in fact necessary for the Mahayana to be valid.

Malcolm wrote:

No, that is not what he is saying. What he is saying is that whoever wins the result is a Buddha, and whatever he or she explains will be Buddhavacana. Muncandra explains: That being the case, the Mahāyāna is proven to be the word of the Buddha. If it is asked how, the person who comprehends the stages, the perfections and the meaning of no arising and cessation, that person is called "a buddha". Since all the words that person explains are the word of a buddha, Mahāyāna is proven to be the word of the Buddha. This statement should not be taken as an argument for the ahistoricity of Mahāyāna, because that is not the intent. What it is in fact is a criteria for establishing the authority of the Guru. Maitreya first established that Mahāyāna is historical as I show above.

He also proves that without Mahāyāna there would be no Śrāvakayāna, since without the bodhisattva path there would be no Buddha. Muncandra continues:

If there is no Mahāyāna, there will be no Śrāvakayāna. If it is asked why, if Mahāyāna does not exist, the path of accomplishing Buddhahood, the accomplishment of Buddhahood will not exist. If Buddhahood was not accomplished, then also since the Hīnayāna will not be explained, then this Hīnayāna that appears like that also will not be the word of the Buddha.

The eight points that Maitreya illustrates are to be take together as a whole argument, i.e. Mahāyāna is the word of the Buddha because 1) it was not predicted to be false 2) because it arose at the same time as the Śrāvakayāna 3) because it is outside the range of intellectuals and because it not perceived in texts of tīrthikas 4) because it is proven 5) because it exists 6) because it does not not-exist 7) because it is a remedy for the afflictions and 8) because the words are not to be taken literally (i.e. they require interpretation).

We have to accept the historicity of the Mahāyāna because we have the example of the Buddha! That is the whole point of these eight reasons.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, June 4th, 2014 at 11:56 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

He means it is contemporary with and not later than the Śrāvakayāna, which is the Śrāvaka contention about Mahāyāna.

pueraeternus said:

He may have meant that the Mahayana is still preached nonetheless...

Malcolm wrote:

May have meant? No, Maitreya meant that Mahāyāna was taught at the same time as Śrāvakayāna — the commentarial voice on this is univocal.

pueraeternus said:

He also said that even if the Mahayana sutras were taught by someone besides Shakyamuni, it is still buddhavacana, since the eternal truth is self-evident.

Malcolm wrote:

This is a different issue altogether.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, June 4th, 2014 at 11:54 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

pueraeternus said:

And if the flesh and blood Buddha really did preach the second and third turnings, why would anyone even contest that the Yogacara teachings are the epitome of his dharma? He said so himself in the Saṃdhinirmocana...

Malcolm wrote:

The Buddha did not say any such thing in the Saṃdhinirmocana. What Paramarthasamudgata states is that the essencelessness, non-arising, non-cessation and so on is the definitive teachings for all vehicles, but not one word about Yogacara, etc. In other words, in this sūtra, the Buddha reaffirms the second turning as the definitive statement of his teaching. This renders it definitive.

pueraeternus said:

He planned to reveal the later phase of his teachings once the ground is fertile via visions, dream transmission, illusory bodies, etc, etc.

Malcolm wrote:

You are indulging in pure speculation.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, June 4th, 2014 at 5:00 AM

Title: Re: Abandoning Buddhism, What Now?

Content:

dharmagoat said:

If it means going against the advice set down by the Buddha himself, then I apologise to him alone.

Malcolm wrote:

I don't recall anyone asking you to apologize for anything.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, June 4th, 2014 at 4:58 AM

Title: Re: The Angulimala story is fake

Content:

odysseus said:

A hardened murderer can become a monk, but will not become enlightened.

Malcolm wrote:

Your reasoning is?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, June 4th, 2014 at 3:27 AM

Title: Re: Abandoning Buddhism, What Now?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

My point is, as always, that the entirety of the Buddhist path is meant to address the existential problem posed by constant rebirth in samsara. Our whole practice, regardless of yāna, is meant to address this sole fact.

smcj said:

Or, along the same lines, you can think of it this way: Even if someone has multiple wonderful meditation experience, sees life in a whole new way, is widely honored and praised for his spiritual accomplishments, is thought to be an authority on interpreting the Dharma, and seemingly reaps the fruits of all the potential benefits that practice has to offer in this life, if he is later reborn in an unfavorable situation then all that hoopla meant absolutely nothing --right?

Malcolm wrote:

Indeed, which is why Nāgārjuna quips that the fruits of generosity are enjoyed in lower realms...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, June 4th, 2014 at 3:25 AM

Title: Re: Is Nirvana Worth It?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

In the Sūtrālaṃkāravṛttibhāṣya, Sthiramati cites the Buddhābhūmi sūtra:

"Though there is the appearance of many kinds of reflected images in the circle of a mirror, those do not exist in the mirror, they do not enter the mirror and do not form in the mirror...

dzogchungpa said:

Maybe this is a question of the meaning of "image", or possibly of "mirror" or "in". I think that in ordinary English we would indeed say that images exist in the mirror and so on.

Malcolm wrote:

The point is that when the eight consciousness transform into wisdom, in the Indo-Tibetan tradition in general, it is understood there are no operations of consciousness one could liken to a sentient being's mind in a Buddha.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, June 4th, 2014 at 3:04 AM

Title: Re: Is Nirvana Worth It?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Whatever the case may be, Buddhas do not have operations of vijñāna. They do not possess the eight consciousnesses because all the traces that constitute the ālayavijñāna are exhausted, thus there is no basis for the arising of the other seven.

Astus said:

It seems to me that there are only some differences between consciousness and wisdom. For example, there are various mental functions going on according to Xuanzang:

.

Malcolm wrote:

But this contradicts the very sutra he is citing:

In the Sūtrālaṃkāravṛttibhāṣya, Sthiramati cites the Buddhābhūmi sūtra:

"Though there is the appearance of many kinds of reflected images in the circle of a mirror, those do not exist in the mirror, they do not enter the mirror and do not form in the mirror. In the same way, though there is the appearance of many kinds of reflected images of the mirror-like wisdom, the reflections do not exist in the mirror-like wisdom, those reflections do not enter into the mirror-like wisdom and do not form in the mirror-like wisdom.

He adds:

When the eye consciousness is supported on form, there is the aspect of blue, yellow and so on and there is no conventional discrimination of the individual perceptions. In the same way though the forms of the objects of knowledge appear in that circle of wisdom, since there is no discrimination and no concept of the aspect and perception "this is blue, this is yellow", it never faces them.

As Vasubandhu states in the Sūtrālaṃkārabhāṣya:

[The mirror like wisdom] does not face them because it is imageless.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, June 4th, 2014 at 12:41 AM

Title: Re: Metaphor for the skandhas

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Works for me.

dzogchungpa said:

OK, so is there anything that would correspond to jñāna in this metaphor?

Malcolm wrote:

No, since the skandhas only present contaminated phenomena.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, June 4th, 2014 at 12:28 AM

Title: Re: Is Nirvana Worth It?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Buddhas don't have minds. They have wisdom.

Astus said:

The four/five wisdoms/knowledges are the eight consciousnesses without the two hindrances, or in other words, a non-attached mind.

Malcolm wrote:

Whatever the case may be, Buddhas do not have operations of vijñāna. They do not possess the eight consciousnesses because all the traces that constitute the ālayavijñāna are exhausted, thus there is no basis for the arising of the other seven.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 3rd, 2014 at 9:56 PM

Title: Re: Is Nirvana Worth It?

Content:

oushi said:

Mind is a shape, not an actually existing entity. There is a small confusion here. When we talk about the mind, self, intention we see it as an added component of the bodyskandhas thing.

Astus said:

When I say mind, it means the mental aggregates. There is no mind besides the aggregates in Buddhism. Intention (cetana), for instance, belongs to the fourth aggregate (samskara).

Malcolm wrote:

Buddhas don't have minds. They have wisdom.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 3rd, 2014 at 9:01 PM

Title: Re: Abandoning Buddhism, What Now?

Content:

Sönam said:

Why some peoples accept annihilation at death as being obvious? Honestly I do not understand that pov, as all goes in the sens of a non-cessation (mind being the forerunner and is prior to matter, and so on) ... some are quite intricate.

ovi said:

Because scientifically speaking, mind isn't prior to matter.

Malcolm wrote:

Scientifically speaking, there simply is no basis for that claim.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 3rd, 2014 at 8:47 PM

Title: Re: Metaphor for the skandhas

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

This is from the section of the Abhidharmakosabhasyam where Vasubandhu explains the order of the skandhas: Matter is the pot, sensation is the food, ideas are the seasoning, the samskaras are the cook, and the mind is the consumer. We have a third reason for the order of the skandhas.

(La Vallée Poussin, Pruden translation)

I find this a rather charming image, but I'm wondering if this is actually a good way to think about the skandhas. I would be happy to hear what the learned members of DW think.

Malcolm wrote:

Works for me.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 3rd, 2014 at 8:33 PM

Title: Re: Abandoning Buddhism, What Now?

Content:

ovi said:

I never posted something along the lines of Rebirth doesn't exist, Buddha was wrong 111!

Malcolm wrote:

My point is, as always, that the entirety of the Buddhist path is meant to address the existential problem posed by constant rebirth in samsara. Our whole practice, regardless of yāna, is meant to address this sole fact.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 3rd, 2014 at 8:25 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

TRC said:

I know the Mahayana sutras trump the Nikayas/Agamas, but just wanted to point out that it does directly contradict the Śālmalivana-sutra, and maintains the point that the Buddha held nothing of importance back in regards to the Holy Life.

heart said:

The "Holy Life" means being a monk/nun, right?

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, it does. Specifically, it is a translation of the term "brahmacariya".

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 3rd, 2014 at 7:34 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

TRC said:

I know the Mahayana sutras trump the Nikayas/Agamas, but just wanted to point out that it does directly contradict the Śālmalivana-sutra, and maintains the point that the Buddha held nothing of importance back in regards to the Holy Life.

Malcolm wrote:

If your idea of the holy life is just to attain the state of an arhat, of course I agree.

If your aim is to practice the bodhisattvayāna and become a buddha however, the Buddha does not explain this in the canon the śrāvakas left for us.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 3rd, 2014 at 7:29 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

pueraeternus said:

There is certainly contradiction in the idea that Vajrapani is the collator of sutras - he is clearly not since the early Mahayana sutras specifically stated that the Buddha ordered Ananda to memorize the sutras, and never was Vajrapani asked. This is just a very late tantric idea.

Malcolm wrote:

The Tathāgatācintyaguhyānirdeśa, part of the Ratnakuta collection, is the main sources for this claim. As this sūtra was translated into Chinese in by Dharmarakṣa in 280, it is clearly not a "late tantric idea".

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 3rd, 2014 at 7:11 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

pueraeternus said:

The eight points brought up by Maitreya also covers this (in Vasu's bhasya):

"Because it is self-evident;" even if the universal vehicle was taught by some enlightened being other (than Sākyamuni Buddha), that also proves it to be buddha-word, since a buddha is anyone who becomes perfectly enlightened and then teaches such (a vehicle)."

So we can see that the Mahāyānasūtrālamkāra is trying to cover all bases. Even if Maitreya says "simultaneous", what does he really mean?

Malcolm wrote:

He means it is contemporary with and not later than the Śrāvakayāna, which is the Śrāvaka contention about Mahāyāna.

pueraeternus said:

And please don't say that Abhayakaragupta or Bhavya should know better because they are Indian Mahayanists - that doesn't fly since we know Indian Mahayanists could not come to agreement with each other on many many other fronts.

Malcolm wrote:

Indian Mahāyānistis disagreed with each other over only two major issues, the question of the view [Madhyamaka or Yogacara] and the question of definitiveness [second or third turning]. Apart from this, there was broad agreement in terms of the path.

pueraeternus said:

There is little need to appeal to "western academic biases" as a scapegoat...

Malcolm wrote:

I am not doing that. I am saying that people treat the Indian Mahāyānis as if they were idiots. We are so heavily conditioned by our own cultural heritage with regards to Buddhist studies, it general never occurs to us once to that the western academic narrative might be incomplete, wrong, etc.

pueraeternus said:

since many of us can read for ourselves the Mahayana sutras and see that there are a lot of internal contradictions and logical incongruities if we were to take the stance that the flesh-and-blood Buddha did speak those sutras 2500 years ago.

Malcolm wrote:

For example? And if this is the case, how is that the flesh and blood Buddha would not censure these teachings as being distortions of the Dharma? Certainly Theravadins censure Mahāyāna sūtras as fakes and forgeries.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 3rd, 2014 at 5:51 AM

Title: Re: Abandoning Buddhism, What Now?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

And my point is that we have to preserve the Dharma in the face of all those people who think that they can cherry pick the Dharma.

dharmagoat said:

Preserve the Dharma in its traditional forms by all means. That is essential.

But why be threatened by those that are selective in their beliefs? What harm can they do the Dharma that has survived unadulterated for 2500 years?

Malcolm wrote:

Who said I felt threatened?

As to your other question, it is when Buddhists start importing wrong views that Dharma will degenerate. Only Buddhists can destroy the Dharma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 3rd, 2014 at 2:49 AM

Title: Re: Abandoning Buddhism, What Now?

Content:

Lazy_eye said:

My point is that even a partial embrace of Buddhist teachings is better than falling into that kind of thinking. If nothing else, Buddhism provides moral principles and a framework for living a virtuous life. Engaging dhamma even on those limited terms is better for most people's well-being than nurturing an amoral or cynical outlook.

Malcolm wrote:

And my point is that we have to preserve the Dharma in the face of all those people who think that they can cherry pick the Dharma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 3rd, 2014 at 2:42 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

pueraeternus said:

Like I said, he is seldom there in the earlier sutras. His position in the early Mahayana sutras are the same as his namesake in the Agamas - that of a divine dharmapala. And in the Agamas and early Mahayana sutras, as far as I know, he is never there as an interlocutor.

Malcolm wrote:

It is very clear that the bodhisattva Varjapani is indeed the same person described in the Prajñāpāramita and in the Agamas, appearing as a guardian of the teachings here and there as an interlocutor — there is no contradiction whatsoever. In Vajrayāna, Vajrapani is considered to be the general of the dharmapālas.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 3rd, 2014 at 2:28 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

pueraeternus said:

And how would Abhayakaragupta know what happened during the First Council? Why would non-tantrikas take his words as definitive?

Ananda was present in many of the major Mahayana sutras, as already quoted earlier - the prajnaparamitas, vimalakirtinirdesa, etc. How do you explain this?

Malcolm wrote:

Of course Ānanda was present during the teaching of many Mahāyāna sūtras, this is not under dispute.

The point is that Abhayakaragupta is making is that the first council was not a convention for collecting all the teachings of the Buddha. The point he is making is that the first council had an agenda that was limited in its scope.

As an Indian Buddhist, he had access to sources and traditions we do not have. Abhayakaragupta is as likely to know what actually happened during the first council as we are. And Abhayakaragupta's perspective is a confirmation of earlier opinions voiced by those such as Maitreya and Bhavya.

We know a very great deal about what the Theravadins think about these issues. We know a very great deal about what western academics think about these issues. We know almost nothing about what Indian Mahāyānists think about these issues — but in general, Western Mahāyanists, including Tibetan Buddhists, tend to defer to the latter two groups when it comes to Mahāyāna history and ignore our own historical traditions. I think that is detrimental to Mahāyāna in general.

Mahāyāna proclaims five certainties: time, place, teacher, teaching and retinue, i.e. always; Akaniṣṭha; the Sambhogakāya; Mahāyāna; Buddhas and bodhisattvas, both emanated and the continuums of others. By contrast, the Śravakayāna is limited in its scope in terms of time, place, teacher, teaching and retinue. Nevertheless, Mahāyāna taught by the nirmanakāya is a localized and temporal instantiation of those teachings, and there are good reasons why the Mahāyāna narratives of their spread ought not be ignored.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 3rd, 2014 at 2:12 AM

Title: Re: Abandoning Buddhism, What Now?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Rejecting rebirth is embracing nihilism, just affirming a truly existent self is embracing eternalism.

Lazy_eye said:

Annihilationism, as presented in the suttas, seems to be defined with reference to the Carvaka:

...

One might subscribe to part of this ("the sense-faculties scatter into space", etc) while rejecting some other parts ("generosity is taught by idiots", "there is no fruit of actions"). It is not clear at all that failure to uphold rebirth means embracing annihilationism as defined in this context.

Malcolm wrote:

Simply put, it means that one embraces the view that there is no result of action, there is no karma, etc. We can understand the general point that Carvaka view was greatly exaggerated by their opponents, but in general, the salient point is that they taught that death was the annihilation of the person. Anyone who does not accept rebirth subscribes to this view.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 3rd, 2014 at 12:23 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Lazy_eye said:

Well, it seems to me that this is exactly what the Buddha told his disciples. He said you have all the teachings...

Malcolm wrote:

No, in fact for we read in the Śālmalivana-sutra *: Ānanda, I comprehend even more Dharma than however many leaves there are in this śālmali grove, but I have not taught them to you. Since that many were taught for a purpose, you must not be regretful, but you should also not be without desire [to hear them].

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 3rd, 2014 at 12:20 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Not exactly. What I said is that the Mahāyāna was not compiled by Ānanda. It was compiled by Vajrapani, etc.

Whatever was entrusted to Ārya Ānanda, that was employed by the śravakas for the worldly, and not for the purpose of compiling the Dharma.

pensum said:

So all the Mahayana sutras entrusted to Ananda, including the Prajnaparamita, are not actually Mahayana sutras? But whatever the case, the very fact that such texts were "employed by the sravakas" would seem to contradict your earlier statements, that the sravakas had no serious interest in them and did not practice them. Or is that statement just a ploy to create a further divide between the Sravaka and the Mahayana? (such dubious motive, to my mind, would then further undermine the trustworthiness of a sutra with such motives)

Malcolm wrote:

"Whatever" is a restrictive. Abhayakaragupt is telling us that the goal of the first council was to compile what they thought was useful, not to compile everything. Ananda was not present at many teachings, as he was Buddha's attendant only a bit later in the Buddha's career. He certainly is not present in such major Mahāyana sutras such as the Avatamska, and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 3rd, 2014 at 12:10 AM

Title: Re: Abandoning Buddhism, What Now?

Content:

Lazy_eye said:

embracing nihilism, etc.

Malcolm wrote:

Rejecting rebirth is embracing nihilism, just as affirming a truly existent self is embracing eternalism.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, June 2nd, 2014 at 11:10 PM

Title: Re: Is Rebirth Unscientific?

Content:

treehuggingoctopus said:

changing our convictions...

Malcolm wrote:

I have never, ever changed my conviction about the necessity to accept rebirth in all the years I have been participating in online discussions. While I have of course changed my opinions about many other things, this is one thing I have never wavered from for an instant as any review of my posting history will reveal.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, June 2nd, 2014 at 10:34 PM

Title: Re: Is Rebirth Unscientific?

Content:

ovi said:

Rejecting the notion of self is a common thought in the psychedelic community and the fact that there is suffering does not depend on the idea of rebirth.

Malcolm wrote:

The end of suffering very much depends on right view.

ovi said:

Frankly, you don't understand upaya. You would rather have people abandon Buddhism completely because they don't fully understand it...

Malcolm wrote:

In the contrary, I want people to understand Buddhism so they can gain the results of the path. Whatever they choose to believe is one thing; what the Buddha actually taught is quite another. We owe it the Dharma not to turn the teachings into a free for all.

ovi said:

..even though the vast majority of Buddhists who have full faith in rebirth and retribution fail to achieve liberation until death, that is they fail in fully understanding it.

Malcolm wrote:

Whether in this world, during the bardo or in the next world, liberation is liberation.

ovi said:

I do hope that it is more important for us to lead others to liberation than to actively work against their wellbeing.

Malcolm wrote:

One can not even begin to imagine one is leading others to liberation if one is not capable distinguishing right view from wrong view.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, June 2nd, 2014 at 8:48 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Not exactly. What I said is that the Mahāyāna was not compiled by Ānanda. It was compiled by Vajrapani, etc.

pensum said:

So by implication, are you now claiming that all the Mahayana sutras which were passed on by Ananda are fakes or that someone took literary license and switched the credit from Vajrapani to Ananda (hence falsifying them and drawing the validity of the entire corpus into question)? Or is Ananda merely one of Vajrapani's pen names?

Malcolm wrote:

Not claiming anything of the kind. I am also not engaging in conspiracy theories or speculations. I am reporting what various Indian masters opine based upon the sūtras that they read.

For example, Sakya Paṇḍita, while not an Indian master, opines that there is no contradiction between Vajrapani and Ānanda being the compilers of the sūtras.

I will leave it for others to engage in speculations and theories about this issue. As for myself, I am content to regard Guhyapati Vajrapani as being the primary collator of the Buddha's sūtras and tantras, as that is the role to which the Buddha appointed him.

Thus, there are three main considerations we need to understand:

- 1) The Śrāvakayāna and Mahāyāna arose at the same time, per Maitreyanatha
- 2) The collators of the Mahāyāna were the major bodhisattvas, Mañjuśrī, Vajrapani and so on per Bhava and so on

3) The person who is represented by "Thus have I heard..." is Vajrapani per Abhayakaragupta

This is our Mahāyāna tradition.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, June 2nd, 2014 at 7:24 PM

Title: Re: Is Rebirth Unscientific?

Content:

ovi said:

One can dispel the wrong notion of self and be liberated from suffering in this lifetime without making use of rebirth.

Malcolm wrote:

No, actually, you can't. Buddha lists acceptance of rebirth as being among the features of right view. People who do not understand this simply do not understand Buddha's Dharma and that's all there is to it.

ovi said:

I don't see how it prevents realization in this lifetime.

Malcolm wrote:

One cannot have any realization while one is operating under the influence of wrong view.

Frankly, you simply do not understand what the Buddha is saying in the Kalamas sutta.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, June 2nd, 2014 at 7:07 PM

Title: Re: Abandoning Buddhism, What Now?

Content:

Simon E. said:

It seems to have become almost axiomatic that those who quote the Kalama Sutta seem to ignore, or be unaware of, the fact that the Kalamas were not followers of the Buddha, and that he was telling them pointedly that their teacher would not give them the means to realise Nirvana.

Malcolm wrote:

It doesn't help matters that it is billed as Buddha's Charter of Free Inquiry. It is a minor sutta, of no traditional significance at all.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Monday, June 2nd, 2014 at 6:53 PM
Title: Re: Is Rebirth Unscientific?
Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:
"you have a mind"
... then are you saying that the mind is possessed by a person?

Malcolm wrote:
Conventionally, yes — just like I have a face, a hand, a mouth, and so on.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Monday, June 2nd, 2014 at 6:52 PM
Title: Re: Is Rebirth Unscientific?
Content:
PadmaVonSamba said:
the arising of mind is the result of awareness.
.
.
.

Malcolm wrote:
No, awareness is a characteristic of a moment of consciousness.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Monday, June 2nd, 2014 at 6:42 PM
Title: Re: Is Rebirth Unscientific?
Content:
ovi said:
, however, according to the Kalama Sutta, achieving a high level of realization in this lifetime does not depend on believing in rebirth.

Malcolm wrote:
The Kalamas sutra implies nothing of the sort. It states that people who practice the four brahma-viharas will be "free from hatred, free from malice, safe and sound, and happy" and that is it. This is not a level of realization at all. It states at most that one "...shall arise in the heavenly world, which is possessed of the state of bliss."

In other words, the teaching in the Kalamas is not a path. It does not lead from samsara. It leads merely to temporary, samsaric happiness and that is all.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, June 2nd, 2014 at 6:32 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The Vajrapani mentioned in the early Agamas is a yaksha...

As is Vajrapani in Mahāyāna sūtras. He is called "Guhyapati" because is he the master of the Guhyakas.

He is also seldom mentioned in most sutras and in the early Mahayana sutras, he is almost never there. Only in the much later phase of Mahayana does he appear with any regularity.

All these sutras mention him:

Śatasāhasrika-prajñāpāramitā

Pañcaviṃśatisahasrika

Aṣṭasāhasrika-prajñāpāramitā

Aṣṭadaśasahasrika-prajñāpāramitā

Daśasāhasrikā-prajñāpāramitā

Prajñāpāramitānayaśatapañcāśatikā

Pañcaviṃśatika-prajñāpāramitāmukha

In the Akṣobhyasya-tathāgatasyavyūha he is referred as the yakṣapati. The Lalitavistara states he is a yakṣa. The Mahāparinirvāṇa calls him the Yakṣarāja. The Gaganagañjaparipṛcchā calls him Vajrapani the yakṣa, as does the Vikurvāṇarājaparipṛcchā. The Vimalaprabhakaripṛcchā explains that he is the Yakṣarāja, the son of the yakṣa lord, Vaiśravaṇa. The Dānapāramitā calls him the Mahānāyakaḥ, the great chief of all the yakṣas, as does the Nīlāmbaṛadharavajrapāṇi-rudratriviṇaya-tantra, the Vajrapāṇinīlāmbaravidhivajrādaṇḍa-tantra, the Śrī-vajracandacittaguhyatantra and the Śrī-vajracandacittaguhyatantrottarottara, the Vajrabhūmitricaraṇi-rājakaḥpa-nāma, the Saptatathāgatapūrvapraṇidhānaviśeṣavistara-nāma-mahāyāna-sūtra, the Bhagavānbhaiṣajyaguruvaiḍūryaprabhasya-pūrvapraṇidhānaviśeṣavistara-nāma-mahāyāna-sūtra, Mahāmañivipulavimānaviśvasupratīṣṭhitaguhyaparama-rahasyakaḥparāja-nāma-dhāraṇī, etc.

Vajrapani is just Vajrapani, whether in the Agamas/Nikayas, Vinaya, or the Vaipulya sūtras.

In short, Vajrapani is a tenth stage bodhisattva born among the Yakṣas.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, June 2nd, 2014 at 10:55 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Sherlock said:

Incidentally I don't see what's wrong with the term "sravakayana". Calling it "Mainstream" lends weight to the the idea that Mahayana is somehow heterodox. Sravaka/Savaka on the other hand is used in the Sravakayana texts themselves and is used in the earliest Mahayana texts to distinguish it from the Pratyekabuddhayana and Bodhisattvayana.

Malcolm wrote:

Indeed, it is a bit of a joke.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, June 2nd, 2014 at 10:10 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

pueraeternus said:

Why would this be a problem? Since the Mahayana encapsulates the three vehicles, why is it shocking that they have a common foundational basis?

Malcolm wrote:

It is not shocking that they have a similar foundation. But my point is that your basic point of view establishes the Mainstream canon as being more authoritative than any Mahāyāna text ever could be.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, June 2nd, 2014 at 10:08 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

pueraeternus said:

Such as Vajrapani not even mentioned in many of the early Mahayana sutras and that Ananda was specifically appointed to memorize and propagate sutras.

Malcolm wrote:

Since you accept the Mainstream canons as being more authoritative the Mahāyāna, it could not have escaped you that Vajrapani is mentioned in the Pali Canon.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, June 2nd, 2014 at 9:27 AM

Title: Re: Is Rebirth Unscientific?

Content:

dharmagoat said:

Only one concern: what if the traditional Buddhist standpoint is under-represented?

Malcolm wrote:

Oh, completely.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, June 2nd, 2014 at 9:27 AM

Title: Re: Is Rebirth Unscientific?

Content:

dharmagoat said:

I am interested in discussing the issues faced by Buddhists (and ex-Buddhists) like myself who are struggling to engage with Buddhism in its existing forms, but are not interested in rejecting the teachings of the Buddha. The discussion may provide an insight into what form a new dharma derived from the Buddhadharma might take, but it would be entirely speculative.

Malcolm wrote:

It is pretty hard to reject birth and not reject the Buddha's teaching, since the very idea of right view is predicated on accepting rebirth.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, June 2nd, 2014 at 9:07 AM

Title: Re: Is Rebirth Unscientific?

Content:

Adi said:

Since you are a person who has renounced Buddhism and revoke their refuge vows, I'd say yes, there could be quite a bit of harm possible.

dharmagoat said:

The alternative would be to not have been upfront about my relationship with Buddhism.

Adi said:

Besides that, though, if those kinds of profound changes have come about then those other forums are surely a better place to find those of like mind who share the same goal.

dharmagoat said:

No profound changes, just a gradual progression.

I am actually primarily interested in what like-minded Buddhists can contribute to the idea. I won't find that on a non-Buddhist forum.

Malcolm wrote:

As I said, there are forums like the Secular Buddhist forum where you will find people of similar ideas.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, June 2nd, 2014 at 7:49 AM

Title: Re: Is Rebirth Unscientific?

Content:

dharmagoat said:

I would like to see the generation of a new dharma that derives from the Buddhadharma but does not attempt to challenge, change or replace any of the traditional forms. Any discussion that leads in this direction is a means to this end.

Malcolm wrote:

There are entire forums devoted to that already.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, June 2nd, 2014 at 7:00 AM

Title: Re: Is Rebirth Unscientific?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

We merely provide the glass of koolaid. It is up to them to drink it or not. We certainly don't waterboard them with it.

Mkoll said:

Crude, but it gets the point across.

ovi said:

You can't expect people to all agree on the same preference for flavor. You might blame renouncing Buddhism on something such as past karma and be indifferent to it, I blame it on lack of upaya.

Malcolm wrote:

You can't even get people to agree on a brand.

But when you present a brand, you need to include all the ingredients on the label so people may make intelligent, informed choices about what they are buying. You certainly don't sell something to someone saying, well, this tastes good, but ignore the ingredients, they are not important, since they might have a nut allergy and go into anaphylactic shock.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, June 2nd, 2014 at 6:18 AM

Title: Re: Is Rebirth Unscientific?

Content:

ovi said:

So you renounce Buddhism because people on the internet don't agree with you?

Malcolm wrote:

No, it would appear he has discovered that he does not in fact agree with the Buddha's Dharma in the end.

But we should respect his wish not to make a public discussion of this since it is a private matter.

ovi said:

Aren't we supposed to liberate beings from suffering, in accordance with their current abilities? Is there any point to try to preserve something called a Dharma that doesn't liberate people?

Malcolm wrote:

We merely provide the glass of koolaid. It is up to them to drink it or not. We certainly don't waterboard them with it.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, June 2nd, 2014 at 6:09 AM

Title: Re: Is Rebirth Unscientific?

Content:

ovi said:

So you renounce Buddhism because people on the internet don't agree with you?

Malcolm wrote:

No, it would appear he has discovered that he does not in fact agree with the Buddha's Dharma in the end.

But we should respect his wish not to make a public discussion of this since it is a private matter.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, June 2nd, 2014 at 6:07 AM

Title: Re: Is Rebirth Unscientific?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

No, this is your pet theory but it really does not make any sense. A plant turning towards the sun does not indicate the plant is any sense aware of the sun, or that there is awareness in a plant.

PadmaVonSamba said:

No, but a plant extending its roots specifically toward a source of water indicates intentional action.

Malcolm wrote:

No, absolutely not.

PadmaVonSamba said:

What I was getting at before, in responding to a previous post is that while you cannot really prove that all appearances are anything but illusions, or that your entire lifetime of existence is nothing but a brief dream you have been having, there is still awareness of that illusion, awareness of that dream.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, because you have a mind. Minds are aware.

PadmaVonSamba said:

...rebirth does not depend on any notion of a continuous physical body or brain.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, because minds are not dependent on bodies or brains.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, June 2nd, 2014 at 5:47 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

smcj said:

So your own personal confidence in the the validity of the Mahayana is based on...what?

pueraeternus said:

That it agrees with the dharma seals...

Malcolm wrote:

In other words, his acceptance of Mahāyāna is based on their containing the same instructions as the Mainstream canon, the doctrines they share in common. However, this bears the reverse consequence that he accepts the Mainstream canon as being the authority by which Mahāyāna compositions (as he must consider them) can be validated as Buddhist teachings.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, June 2nd, 2014 at 5:15 AM

Title: Re: Is Rebirth Unscientific?

Content:

dharmagoat said:

After 25 years of study and practice I renounce Buddhism and revoke my refuge vows.

Malcolm wrote:

What a pity.

dharmagoat said:

Do you mean that sincerely?

Malcolm wrote:

Of course.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, June 2nd, 2014 at 5:07 AM

Title: Re: Is Rebirth Unscientific?

Content:

dharmagoat said:

After 25 years of study and practice I renounce Buddhism and revoke my refuge vows.

Malcolm wrote:

What a pity.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, June 2nd, 2014 at 3:38 AM

Title: Re: Is Rebirth Unscientific?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

As has been pointed out to you any number of times, awareness is just a characteristic of consciousness.

PadmaVonSamba said:

Suggested, but not proven.

Since there are things which respond intentionally (meaning not merely "randomly") to their environments, yet possess nothing that is regarded as consciousness, and since awareness does not depend on sensory function, it is obvious that awareness precedes consciousness.

.
.
.

Malcolm wrote:

No, this is your pet theory but it really does not make any sense. A plant turning towards the sun does not indicate the plant is any sense aware of the sun, or that there is awareness in a plant.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, June 2nd, 2014 at 3:35 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

pueraeternus said:

What support is there that he taught Mahayana sutras during his earthly time?

Malcolm wrote:

Upon what evidence is the conclusion that he didn't based?

pueraeternus said:

Via the absence of any Mahayana materials in the earliest collections. For example, if the Mahayana were taught on the onset with everything else, the various Abhidharma texts of the many Sravaka schools would have made copious references to Mahayana sutras, since Abhidharmic texts are exegetical works on the sutric canons. And please don't repeat the canard about Arhats not privy to the Mahayana sutras (disproved).

Malcolm wrote:

I didn't say they were not privy to them. I said that the Mahāyāna canon was not their domain, meaning, it was not their path, nor a path they were interested in promulgating. They were interested in freedom in this life, not in buddhahood three incalculable eons hence.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, June 2nd, 2014 at 3:31 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

pueraeternus said:

We have several Agamic collections in the Taisho, along with abhidharmic works of various sects - none of them have any materials related to Mahayana. Malcolm said earlier that even Mahayana authors acknowledged that the Mahayana sutras were not gathered during early phases of Buddhism.

Malcolm wrote:

Not exactly. What I said is that the Mahāyāna was not compiled by Ānanda. It was compiled by Vajrapani, etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, June 2nd, 2014 at 3:29 AM

Title: Re: Is Nirvana Worth It?

Content:

Astus said:

If and when someone agrees that the whole of samsara from hells to heavens is painful and unsatisfactory, liberation from it is the logical choice. But when nirvana is presented as not only the end of all the inconvenient things in life, but the end of all the good things as well, how could enlightenment be desirable?

Malcolm wrote:

When one understands that the "good" things are just the suffering of change...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, June 2nd, 2014 at 2:50 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

pueraeternus said:

And at this point, you are just speculating, and with no viable or even vaguely plausible evidence.

Malcolm wrote:

As are you.

pueraeternus said:

Nonsense. So far, I have provided internal evidence within the Mahayana sutras (note I did not rely on any scholarly arguments, but pointed to what the Mahayana sutras themselves say) and pointed out that if Ananda and the other sravakas were indeed taught by the Buddha on these sutras 2500 years ago, it would be impossible for the First Council collection to not have these recited and gathered. Neither you nor heart have given a viable response against those points raised.

Malcolm wrote:

Sure I have. Unlike you, I am not willing to engage in speculation as to why this was the case, given that Maitreya insists Mahāyāna is contemporary with what we term the "śrāvaka canon" right at the beginning of the Sūtrālaṃkāra.

Further, the Vajrapāṇyabhiṣeka tantra and the Tathāgatācintyaguhyānirdeśa mahāyāna sūtra clearly maintain that Vajrapāṇi is actually the collator of the sūtras.

Abhayakaragupta states in the Āryāṣṭasāhasrikāprajñāpāramitāvṛttimarmakaumudī:

In the same way, the Tathāgatācintyaguhyānirdeśa-nāma-mahāyāna-sūtra explains the compiler of "the separate and continuous explanations" and so on is the the lord of the tenth bhūmī, the Mahābodhisattva Vajrapāṇi, empowered to protect the rūpakāya and the dharmakāya of the tathāgatas after [the Buddha's] departure and where he is individually entrusted with the teachings in Vajrapāṇyabhiṣeka-sūtra. Whatever was entrusted to Ārya Ānanda, that was employed by the śravakas for the worldly, and not for the purpose of compiling the Dharma. The Bhagava's demonstrated of parinivana here. Because Ārya Vajrapani converts all worlds, he desired to compile the Prajñāpāramita and so on, after which he said "Thus have I heard..." and so on to the assembly of Mahābodhisattvas such as Ārya Maitreya and so on. Just as he heard it from the teacher, afterwards he recited it and in that same way others heard it from him. Thus Vajrapani is the compiler.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, June 2nd, 2014 at 1:04 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

So why wasn't this material preserved by the Shravakas?

Malcolm wrote:

Sadly, we can only guess, and guesses are no substitute for knowledge. So in fact we do not know. As I have said, we can either go on the accounts of the Indian Mahāyāna masters in recounting the history their tradition or not. It is a personal choice.

dzogchungpa said:

OK, and only one of those choices is virtuous, right?

Malcolm wrote:

If one is a practitioner of Mahāyāna, expressing doubt that it is the teaching of the Buddha is indeed a non-virtue.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, June 1st, 2014 at 11:36 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

So why wasn't this material preserved by the Shravakas?

Malcolm wrote:

Sadly, we can only guess, and guesses are no substitute for knowledge. So in fact we do not know. As I have said, we can either go on the accounts of the Indian Mahāyāna masters in recounting the history their tradition or not. It is a personal choice.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, June 1st, 2014 at 10:28 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

pueraeternus said:

What support is there that he taught Mahayana sutras during his earthly time?

Malcolm wrote:

Upon what evidence is the conclusion that he didn't based?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, June 1st, 2014 at 10:20 PM

Title: Re: Is Rebirth Unscientific?

Content:

asunthatneversets said:

Sure but that doesn't mean the inherency of awareness cannot be refuted. Awareness is dependently originated just like any other conditioned phenomena is. To use Nāgārjuna's logic; if you can have awareness without objects, then you can have objects without awareness. Obviously you cannot have objects without awareness, and therefore you cannot have awareness without objects, meaning awareness is dependent and therefore without inherency and entirely refutable.

PadmaVonSamba said:

Awareness is self-evident.

The fact that you are "aware that you are aware" makes the fact of awareness itself an object of awareness.

And objects can and obviously do exist without any awareness of them, because all events are the results of causes, and causes are quite often functioning without any awareness of them at the time they are functioning.

.
.
.

Malcolm wrote:

As has been pointed out to you any number of times, awareness is just a characteristic of consciousness.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, June 1st, 2014 at 9:52 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Just to add a point:

Simultaneous.

The commentary on this line states:

In reply to the claim, "When the śrāvakayāna was explained by the Bhagavan in Śravastī and so on during the time of the śrāvakas, at that time Mahāyāna was not explained. Since the Dharma called "Mahāyāna" arose after the Buddha's parinirvana, the Mahāyāna is not a Dharma of the Buddha", it is stated "because it arose simultaneously". When the Bhagavan was in places such as Śrāvastī and so on explaining the śrāvakayāna as the minor vehicle, since he explained the Mahāyāna at that time in those places, it is proven that the Mahāyāna is the speech of the Buddha."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, June 1st, 2014 at 8:26 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

PorkChop said:

He's merely advocating accepting the traditional historical paradigm regarding Mahayana sutras...

Malcolm wrote:

Precisely.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, June 1st, 2014 at 8:24 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Nighthawk said:

Malcolm, let's say the western academics have it right and that none of the Mahayana sutras were spoken by the historical Buddha. Are we then to reject them and become Theravadins?

Malcolm wrote:

What I am contending is that there is no basis whatsoever to lend support to their claims that Mahāyāna is a later development. Especially since Maitreyanatha rejects this claim in the Sūtrālaṃkāra stating:

Not predicted and simultaneous.

What I am saying is that we have our own historical tradition and it is time to start honoring it.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, June 1st, 2014 at 10:26 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

pueraeternus said:

And at this point, you are just speculating, and with no viable or even vaguely plausible evidence.

Malcolm wrote:

As are you.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, June 1st, 2014 at 2:54 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Sherlock said:

I think people should remember that these academics' arguments are all hypotheses. Hypotheses which are mostly unfalsifiable (unless you have a time machine or can remember past lives). As practitioners of Mahayana, we can formulate our own hypotheses subject to the same criteria (falsifiable only by time-travel or recollection of past lives) and it is better for not only our practice but the credibility of Mahayana as a whole.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, for some reason, people think that following the traditions we have less reasonable than the academic supposition that Buddha never taught Mahāyāna. The mind boggles.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, June 1st, 2014 at 2:30 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

pueraeternus said:

[

And the Buddha totally had no issues teaching Arhats bodhisattva doctrine and practices (as we can see so clearly in the Mahayana sutras), so your reasoning that Mahayana sutras were not recited in the First Council due to different domains is asinine - the Buddha didn't hesitate to teach Arhats bodhisattva doctrine, so if he really taught it when he was flesh-and-blood 2500 years ago, the Arhats would have totally no problem reciting and gathering them.

Malcolm wrote:

So here again, you are putting the śravakas as the authority which defines the validity of the Mahāyāna.

Obviously, we cannot get the Buddha's input on why the first council did not recite his Mahāyāna sūtras because he was not present. And, we do not need to assume every sūtra taught by the Buddha would have been gathered and recited there. This is the fundamental flaw with your thinking. You assume that if it was taught, it must have or should have been recited and the first council, which as far as anyone knows, had no bodhisattvas present. The point Bhava is making is that the first council only recited sūtras relevant to the attainment of the fruit of an arhat, not a bodhisattva or a buddha.

We know that the different groups have different sets of sūtras. The net effect of your implicit supposition is that only the sutras that all groups have in common can be regarded as what the Buddha actually taught; whereas, any sutras this or that group has which are not reflected in the whole collection of all canons must therefore be fakes. This is extremely bad reasoning.

pueraeternus said:

Of course - there is absolutely no good reason why the Mahayana sutras were not recited if they were really taught during the Buddha's earthly life, because even if the Arhats were of a smaller denomination, they were certainly part of the prime audience in many sutras, especially the prajnaparamitas. And the fact that the Buddha instructed Ananda to memorize and preserve the sutras destroys your (and whatever Indian master you favor) contention that only Manjushri and the bodhisattvas preserved the Mahayana canon.

Malcolm wrote:

No, it does not, for the reasons given above. We have no certainty whatsoever that all the sutras the Buddha taught were recited at the first council. Why? Because even different Mainstream canons contain different sets of sūtras.

At base, what should be contested is the supposition that the first council was a comprehensive review of all of the Buddha's teachings. What is our authority for believing this?

Remember, Indian Mahāyāna authors (despite your opinion that they were "asinine" in their belief that the Mahāyāna was not recited at the first council because the bodhisattva path did not concern trainees for arhatship and so on), they were Indian Buddhists, highly educated in their literature, to which they had far more access than we do today.

That is your problem. You think they are pious forgeries when they are not spoken by the flesh-and-blood Buddha, I beg to differ. Why? Because I follow the Mahayana doctrines and its trikaya doctrine - that's why!

This explains nothing. The sambhogakāya does not teach ordinary flesh and blood people like ourselves for the simple fact that we are not 8th stage bodhisattvas. We, if we are even so lucky, can only see the nirmanakāya. But according to you, the Mahāyāna sūtras are not even the teachings of the nirmanakāya.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, June 1st, 2014 at 1:51 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Dan74 said:

But to us, to people who are already aware of the scholarship, to reject it because its findings are inconvenient, is intellectually dishonest.

Malcolm wrote:

The scholarship on the subject tells only that which we have already known for centuries: Mahāyāna sūtras were not recited during the first council, but began to be written down about the same time as the Agamas and Nikāyas.

We can see that the two most seminal authors in Mahāyāna, Nāgārjuna and Maitreya, both defended the validity of Mahāyāna in the face of Mainstream Buddhist attacks.

These are the only facts about them which we have at our disposal.

There are traditional accounts about how Mahāyāna was preserved. Those accounts clearly tell us that the Mahāyāna sūtras were all authored by the Buddha personally.

Then there is the point of view of western academics about the origin of these texts, which itself is purely speculative. It clearly tells us that not one of these texts was authored by the Buddha, that in effect it is an impossibility.

The net effect of following the latter position is that Mahāyāna is invalidated, the bodhisattva path and so on. The net effect of following the former position is that the Mahāyāna is validated, the bodhisattva path and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, May 31st, 2014 at 9:58 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Dan74 said:

I don't see this dichotomy as necessary, Malcolm, as I've already tried to suggest. I agree with you that we cannot know for sure whether the scholars are right, but in the absence of this certainty, I am left with the Sutras themselves. And what they contain is enough for me to respect and even revere them, but most importantly to put them to use.

Malcolm wrote:

The dichotomy is necessary precisely because of how western academia has framed the reception of Mahāyāna. We are no longer in the phase where Mahāyāna is merely a curiosity for Sanskritists. We are in a period where many hundreds of thousands of westerners like ourselves are embracing Mahāyāna. Therefore, the authenticity of the lineage is important.

Dan74 said:

I fail to see the preoccupation with the origin (which is unverifiable) as helpful to practice. If the Dharma is true, many realised masters followed in Shakyamuni's footsteps and I have no problem learning from them, if that's what the Sutras are.

Malcolm wrote:

Oh, you entirely are missing my point. I know very well that origins are not verifiable. I am talking about which narrative is the most useful to bring to our practice of Mahāyāna. One that disempowers our tradition (the western academic narrative) or the one that bolsters our practice (the traditional narrative).

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, May 31st, 2014 at 8:40 PM

Title: Re: Is Rebirth Unscientific?

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

The point is, for karma to happen "to" someone...

Malcolm wrote:

...there just has to be the conventions "karma", "ripening" and "person".

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, May 31st, 2014 at 7:50 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

tobes said:

But I will not grant you the possibility that you can listen, think, read and write about a Buddhist discourse, somehow free or outside of the contemporary structure of language.

Malcolm wrote:

I never suggested that one could. This is actually the issue I am raising, viz., it is precisely the contemporary framing of Mahāyāna history that I find destructive to our tradition.

Most people's encounter with Mahāyāna starts with a survey course book, in which is maintained that Mahāyāna was never taught by Śakyamuni in person, but rather at best it consisted of pious fictions, or possibly visions, by anonymous groups of people in various parts of India.

But when for example, Buton Rinchen Drup maintains that that the Mahāyāna was collated by bodhisattvas on Mt. Vimalasvabhava, this is met with derision and sneers by those who consider themselves Mahāyānists precisely because the majority of Western Mahāyānists have bought into the western academic version of Buddhist history.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, May 31st, 2014 at 7:42 PM

Title: Re: Arhats and Bodhisattvas

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

It is impossible for someone to have generated bodhicitta to experience the fruit of an arhat, i.e. cessation, indeed, it is against the very principles of the bodhisattva path to do so.

pueraeternus said:

Not true - bodhisattvas can fall from their path into Arhathood from the 1st to 7th bhūmis. So bodhicitta (which they need to fully blossom before they enter the 1st bhūmi) is no guarantee until the pure bhūmis.

Malcolm wrote:

Citation please?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, May 31st, 2014 at 7:37 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

pueraeternus said:

So? You said only a handful of Arhats spoke in the sutras, so I countered that likewise only a handful of Bodhisattvas really speak in Mahayana sutras.

Malcolm wrote:

Hundreds actually.

pueraeternus said:

It's a good question, but it has been answered already — the bodhisattva path is not the domain of śrāvakas.

Nonsense - then why did the Buddha preach to them the bodhisattva path, and even asked Ananda to preserve and propagate them?

Malcolm wrote:

Because the Sangha contained both śravakas and bodhisattvas.

Really. Already given that answer in my previous post.

Right, so we have four or five regularly appearing śravakas in the sūtras, as opposed to hundreds of bodhisattvas in the sūtras, and you still wonder at why the bodhisattva pitika was not recited at the first assembly?

Then sadly, those Indian masters didn't give a good explanation. Sorry.

Works quite well for me.

My goodness, you have actually become a Sravakayanist.

What a strange world we live in where the idea that the words of the Buddha might be pious forgeries is lauded as virtuous.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, May 31st, 2014 at 9:36 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

So not many at all. A mere handful, apart from those in the audience.

pueraeternus said:

Don't be specious. By this logic then there are also very little bodhisattvas since only at most a handful of them really speak in the Mahayana sutras.

Malcolm wrote:

The bodhisattva retinues are often described as being beyond number, but never the śrāvaka Sangha.

pueraeternus said:

The fact that most of these Mahayana sutras include 1250 arhats in the audience, shows that they were indeed part of the targeted audience (and not merely as passive listeners) and hence the question that if the Buddha really spoke of these sutras during his earthly time here, why didn't the arhats propagate them?

Malcolm wrote:

It's a good question, but it has been answered already — the bodhisattva path is not the domain of śrāvakas.

pueraeternus said:

Again, don't be specious. Those "four or five" (actually some Mahayana sutras had more arhat interlocutors) already is more than enough to prove my point.

Malcolm wrote:

Really, which ones?

pueraeternus said:

Let me give you a few examples to dispel these notions of yours:

Malcolm wrote:

It's not my notion. It is prescribed by many [to use your definition of many] Indian masters, not only one.

pueraeternus said:

I prefer the understanding that the Mahayana is indeed the teaching of the Buddha, revealed to later Buddhist savants through visionary encounters, direct yogic encounter via siddhis, dream transmissions, etc.

Malcolm wrote:

I used to be satisfied with such apologetics. But now I find them pale and dissatisfying. In the end they are simply an admission that Mahāyāna is not the actual teaching of the Buddha. Some people might be fine with that story, but I am not.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, May 31st, 2014 at 8:10 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

tobes said:

Where are all these scholars interpreting and translating Buddhist texts purely in this critical fashion and purely to publish and make a buck?

Malcolm wrote:

Publish or die...

tobes said:

I would say the trend is starkly opposite: most works occur out of sincere and genuine interest in what those texts might have to teach us. Very often they are scholar-practitioners. If not, they have committed a huge amount of time and energy to bring Buddhist thought into the contemporary epoch. I don't think it is possible to do this without a genuine effort to pursue an understanding.

Malcolm wrote:

Many of the academic scholars of Buddhism that I know are ex-practitioners.

tobes said:

Moreover, unless you have a time machine and can go back to the discourses themselves, there is no other possibility than, as you put it: "examining the dharma through different Western/modern/post-modern intellectual lenses." The point is, those lenses are already there in the language we use, and the conceptual frameworks we deploy in interpretation, whether we are aware of them or not. If there is a way to put them down, so to speak, and interpret 'on faith' could you explain how this may be possible?

Malcolm wrote:

Actually, we just accept the received tradition and leave it at that.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, May 31st, 2014 at 8:07 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

You can either assume that the reason for this is as described by Bhava...

Wayfarer said:

Where is this account to be found?

Malcolm wrote:

Tarkajvala.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, May 31st, 2014 at 6:55 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

How many arhats, exactly? In which sutras?

pueraeternus said:

Prajnaparamita sutras (eg. Subhuti), Suramgamasamadhi (eg. Sariputra, Mahakasyapa), Vimalakirti (e.g. Sariputra, Mahakasyapa, Purna, the whole team), Lotus Sutra (need I say more?)

Malcolm wrote:

So not many at all. A mere handful, apart from those in the audience.

pueraeternus said:

You're quite sure?

Oh yes, I am sure that the Buddha didn't intend only "Samantabhadra, Mañjuśrī, Guhyapati, Maitreya and so on" to compile the Mahayana sutras, since he directly gave instructions to Ananda to memorize and preserve many. And the fact that Arhats were present, many spoke and many rejoiced, and Ananda asked "what shall this wonderful sutra be called?", shows that the Buddha didn't intend to exclude them.

Malcolm wrote:

Many, as we see, is four or five. Ānanda of course was not an arhat while Buddha was alive.

But we are talking about compilers of these texts. Ananda did not hear all of the sūtras the Buddha taught. He did not compile them all. For example, in the Ānanda sutra, the Buddha states:

Anything the Bhagavan taught before, he [Ānanda] does not hold those. It is not reasonable to say "Teach them again to him" because they reside in some other bhikṣus. Thus it is not established at all that Ananda was even the sole compiler of the Mainstream Canon. Bhava argues there were several compilers.

pueraeternus said:

Of course he appears in many Mahāyāna sūtras, but Ananda was not the compiler of Mahāyāna.

He was. The Buddha said so in many Mahayana sutras.

Malcolm wrote:

There is only one such statement as far as I can tell, found in the Mahākaruṇāpūṇḍarīka sūtra. Buddha here asked Ānanda to gather whatever the Buddha said.

However the Tathāgatācintyaguhyānirdeśa-sūtra asserts that Vajrapani is the compiler of all the sūtras of the Buddhas of the Bhadrakalapa.

Despite this contradiction, it is definitely the case that Bhava has a rather lengthy discussion about the issue of the compilation of the sūtras and he rejects the notion that they were compiled by the śrāvakas.

pueraeternus said:

Oh, but he and other Arhats appeared in plenty of the early Mahayana sutras - that itself would be more than sufficient for the teachings to be gathered during the First Council.

Malcolm wrote:

Here is a fact. The Mahāyāna sūtras were not recited at the first council, and everyone agrees this is so, including all Mahāyāna authors we know of who wrote on the subject. . You can either assume that the reason for this is as described by Bhava, or you can simply go with western historiography which denies Mahāyāna is the actual teaching of the Buddha.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, May 31st, 2014 at 5:05 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

daverupa said:

So all history is strictly speculative, except your own historical perspective?

Malcolm wrote:

History is a story told about the past. That's all. The story told by western academics about Buddhadharma, especially Mahāyāna is harmful to it.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, May 31st, 2014 at 3:32 AM

Title: Re: Astrological conflicts

Content:

kng said:

Thank you for your answers. I would like to ask one more question, is it necessary that I hang out lungtas by myself or is it ok to ask some monastery or sangha friend to do it for me?

Malcolm wrote:

Generally you would do it yourself.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, May 31st, 2014 at 2:35 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, but this is incomplete. "Later" does not mean it was taught later. "Later" means that it appeared later. Rinpoche has explained the principle of how Buddha's teachings arose and spread many times using the example of the Heart Sūtra.

dzogchungpa said:

Well, I guess I haven't heard those explanations, but I don't think "what Buddha Shakyamuni taught orally to people was something like sutric Buddhism. It was not even the sutric Buddhism of the Mahayana Sutras" requires any interpretation. You are framing this as an issue of virtue, and I am happy to follow Rinpoche's lead here.

Malcolm wrote:

Please be my guest. But you are following the wrong lead.

Rinpoche clearly states (and so many times) for example that the Heart Sutra is an example where the text is taught through Buddha's permission, in this case by Avalokiteśvara. Or he uses the example of the Dharma drum which through Buddha's blessing automatically resounds with Dharma teachings. Or he gives the example of the Sambhogakāya. As I said, what you've seized upon is incomplete. What in fact he is criticizing is the desire by some Lamas to prove that all the Tantras were taught by Śākyamuni Buddha.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, May 31st, 2014 at 1:48 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

From "Dzog Chen and Zen":

ChNN said:

Furthermore, since the Buddhist schools all have a rather limited vision, whenever they speak of a given Buddhist teaching, they try to associate it, for example, with a specific saying or statement of the historical Buddha Shakyamuni. This is a very limited way of looking at things. The principle is not that. If that were the principle, it would be more than sufficient to follow something like the Theravada tradition of sutric Buddhism, because what Buddha Shakyamuni taught orally to people was something like sutric Buddhism. It was not even the sutric Buddhism of the Mahayana Sutras; we know very well that Mahayana Buddhism later.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, but this is incomplete. "Later" does not mean it was taught later. "Later" means that it appeared later. Rinpoche has explained the principle of how Buddha's teachings arose and spread many times using the example of the Heart Sūtra.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, May 31st, 2014 at 1:33 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Sherlock said:

Mahayanis have always been involved in textual criticism and analysis from at least the first translators in China. There is just no need to subscribe to Protestant assumptions when analysing texts.

Malcolm wrote:

Precisely, or subscribe to historical revisionism.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, May 31st, 2014 at 1:29 AM

Title: Re: Is Rebirth Unscientific?

Content:

Andrew108 said:

'Apart from a requisite condition, there is no coming-into-play of consciousness.'

This is how this 'ethical hedonist' understands it.

Malcolm wrote:

So, what is the requisite condition of the mental consciousness (mano-vijñāna)?

Andrew108 said:

'If one is asked, 'From what requisite condition does consciousness come?' one should say, 'Consciousness comes from name-and-form as its requisite condition.'

Malcolm wrote:

You forgot the other part of the citation. Sloppy.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, May 31st, 2014 at 1:24 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

pueraeternus said:

...if the Arhats were indeed in the audience in the Mahayana sermons (as they are clearly shown doing in said sutras), then the early Buddhists would have known and we would have seen clear evidence of it in the earliest materials.

Malcolm wrote:

Not so — we see in the sutras that the śrāvakas were constantly in a state of doubt about Mahāyāna. This is true even today, even more so.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, May 31st, 2014 at 1:22 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

daverupa said:

So the evidence is actually fairly consistent that Mahayana is late. Malcolm, however, suggests going an a-historical a-evidentiary route, and with respect to an attitude like that, evidence simply has nowhere to land.

Malcolm wrote:

All the evidence you can produce is strictly speculative. But since you don't care about Mahāyāna, it's not really your concern anyway. But to clarify, I am rejecting the Western academic revisionism in the historical presentation of Buddhadharma. My perspective however, is not ahistorical. It's just a historical perspective you do not like.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, May 31st, 2014 at 1:20 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

In other words, though the arhats were present at Mahāyāna teachings, it was not the path they were on, and not the path they wanted to preserve since they did not have the bodhisattva motivation. Thus, they compiled only the teachings they found relevant for nirvana and ignored those which treated the Bodhisattva path and did not memorize them or recite them.

pueraeternus said:

Mere apologetics and highly unconvincing - because based on the amount of Mahayana sutras, that would mean that the arhats ignored 70% of what the Buddha taught.

Malcolm wrote:

As indeed they did.

pueraeternus said:

And furthermore, they were heavily engaged in doctrine discussions in many of the Mahayana sutras. If they were indeed not interested, then why would they engage in the first place? They would just stand one side and look at their nails.

Malcolm wrote:

How many arhats, exactly? In which sutras?

pueraeternus said:

And besides, the Buddha himself never said anything like what Bhava suggested.

Malcolm wrote:

You're quite sure?

pueraeternus said:

Being omniscient, why would he preach to them Mahayana sutras if he knew they were not receptive?

Malcolm wrote:

In order to imprint traces on their minds. Not only is the Buddha omniscient, he is loving.

pueraeternus said:

According to many Mahayana sutras, Ananda certainly heard, knew and was instructed by the Buddha to disseminate said doctrines.

Malcolm wrote:

Of course he appears in many Mahāyāna sūtras, but Ananda was not the compiler of Mahāyāna. So he did not recite these texts at the first council the reasons already stated.

Further, for example, the Ratnakuta collection has 49 sutras. Ānanda appears in only thirty of them. Ananda appears nowhere at all in the Avatamska. He appears nowhere in the higher tantras with exception of the Śrī-buddhakapāla-nāma-yoginī-tantrarāja; and very few of the lower tantras.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, May 31st, 2014 at 12:44 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

Well, I am not a scholar so I don't even know the names of those treatises, let alone their contents, but do they speak with one voice about the origins of the Mahayana sutras?

Malcolm wrote:

The assertion that the bodhisattvas like Mañjuśrī and so on are the compilers of Mahāyāna was commonly held by Yogacarins, Madhyamakas as well by Vajrayana authors in such texts as: Āryāvikalpapraveśadhāraṇīṭikā [Mañjuśrī, etc.]; Prajñāpāramitāmātrkāśatasāhasrikābrhacchāsanapañcaviṃśatisāhasrikāmadhyaśāsanāṣṭādaśasāhasrikālaghuśāsanāṣṭasamānārthaśāsa; Bhagavatyaṃnāyānusāriṇī-nāma-vyākhyā [Vajrapani]; Madhyamakahrdayavṛttitarkajvālā [mentioned above]; Āryamanjuśrīguhyatantrasādhanasarvakarmanidhi-nāma-ṭikā; Vimalaprabhā-nāma-mūlatantrānusāriṇī-dvādaśasāhasrikālaghukālacakratantrarājaṭikā.

These six texts are the only ones I can find in a quick search for the key words "compiler" and "Mahāyāna" in the Kengyur and Tengyur; but I am sure there are others that may discuss the issue in slightly different terms.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, May 31st, 2014 at 12:05 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

We simply need to rely on the authoritative Indian treatises.

dzogchungpa said:

How do we know which ones are authoritative?

Malcolm wrote:

The one's deemed authoritative enough to expend the effort translating.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 30th, 2014 at 11:06 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

heart said:

That said I think the Mahasamgika's could certainly represent a clear link to Mahayana.
/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

Why? Maitreya clearly states in the first chapter of the Sūtrālaṃkāra that Mahāyāna was taught during the Buddha's own lifetime, and it is not a later development.

There is no need to rely on these speculative academic contrivances. We simply need to rely on the authoritative Indian treatises. It is high time Mahāyānis threw off the burdensome shackles of western historiography.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 30th, 2014 at 10:38 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

Isn't Bhava about 1000 years after the Buddha?

Malcolm wrote:

The last I checked, Gregory Schopen was about 2500 years after the Buddha.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 30th, 2014 at 10:37 PM

Title: Re: Astrological conflicts

Content:

kng said:

Hi everyone

During the last webcast Namkhai Norbu Rinpoche mentioned, that if someone has a difficult year from astrological point of view, he can use lungtas to be able to overcome those difficulties. Somehow I can not understand how this is supposed to work. I mean, I put some prayer flags with auspicious symbols and good wishes on trees and assuming that I did this on appropriate day, I shall be able to overcome problems and otherwise not? Seems a little bit odd to me.

Malcolm wrote:

One, Tibetan "astrology" is not astrology in the sense you understand it. The term in Tibetan is "calculation", so here we are calculating the cycle of the phases in the five elements— wood, fire, earth, metal and water— through the year, through the month and through the day.

Tibetan elemental calculation is very general, and it serves only as a sort of weather report, i.e., when rain is predicted, it may not necessarily rain in your area, but you are wise to bring an umbrella. It is the same with elemental calculation, if it indicates that this or that person will have obstacles in a given year, it is sound to make do practices to prevent this.

Lungta flags are blessed by you, and there is a mantra, so there is a definite connection between your energy and the flags themselves. They also harmonize the five elements of a place because they are consecrated to do so. Whenever you see them, you should also recite that mantra, since it increases their benefit for you.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 30th, 2014 at 10:22 PM

Title: Re: Arhats and Bodhisattvas

Content:

Astus said:

It reminds me of the common criticism found in the popular versions of Mahayana (e.g. Zen and Tantra), that the common path of the bodhisattva, as it is actually presented by most of the sutras, takes too long and it is too difficult. What hardly anyone dares to consider is that those popular versions actually teach sravakayana under the pretence of "buddhahood in this life". Also, both Zen and Tantra are famous for emphasising discipleship (sravaka-hood). So, I'd add to Bhikkhu Bodhi's quote that hardly anyone wants to take the bodhisattva path, and all the arguments against Theravada are practically valid against the same people who use them.

Malcolm wrote:

"Buddhahood in this life" means completing the two accumulations which lead to both freedom and omniscience.

It is impossible for someone to have generated bodhicitta to experience the fruit of an arhat, i.e. cessation, indeed, it is against the very principles of the bodhisattva path to do so.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 30th, 2014 at 10:15 PM

Title: Re: Is Rebirth Unscientific?

Content:

Andrew108 said:

'Apart from a requisite condition, there is no coming-into-play of consciousness.'

This is how this 'ethical hedonist' understands it.

Malcolm wrote:

So, what is the requisite condition of the mental consciousness (mano-vijñāna)?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 30th, 2014 at 10:14 PM

Title: Re: Is Rebirth Unscientific?

Content:

Wayfarer said:

The issue is, whether there is 'the consciousness' that 'goes' from life to life. Sati is rebuked for saying that there is. But the fact that there isn't something the same that goes from life to life, doesn't solve the problem of karma. If there is no agent, then to whom does karma accrue? There is clearly continuity in that sense. After all, if you say there is no karma, then you're a nihilist. So how does karma not pertain to agent?

Malcolm wrote:

There is no continuous agent, no atman, which transfers from this world to the next world [or even from this moment to the next], but the aggregates are serially connected, as Nāgārjuna shows in the Pratītyasamutpāḍakarikas.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 30th, 2014 at 10:03 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

pueraeternus said:

how is it that none of that survived in the First Council?

Malcolm wrote:

These sūtras were not compiled at the first council.

In the Madhyamakahrdayavṛttitarkajvālā, Bhava reports:

Mahāyāna was spoken by the Buddha because it does not contradict the Dharma seals, one is introduced to the sūtra canon of the noble truth; because the afflicted are truly seen to be tamed; and because it does not conflict with dependent origination — all of those said to be "spoken by the Buddha" are found in Mahāyāna. Further, also each of the eighteen schools each introduce their own canon, but there are a great many mutual contradictions [between them]. The profound and vast methods of benefitting others in Mahāyāna are not introduced at all in the sutra canon of the śravakas.

Mahāyāna introduces the bodhisattva training appearing in seven hundred topics.

Because the teaching of emptiness does not contradict the Dharma itself, therefore, the Dharma seals are not contradicted. Due to this, Mahāyāna was spoken by the Buddha because the compilers of the basic [texts], Samantabhadra, Mañjuśrī, Guhyapati, Maitreya and so on, compiled them. The compilers of our basic [texts] were not the śravakas because Mahāyāna discourses are not their domain.

In other words, though the arhats were present at Mahāyāna teachings, it was not the path they were on, and not the path they wanted to preserve since they did not have the bodhisattva motivation. Thus, they compiled only the teachings they found relevant for nirvana and ignored those which treated the Bodhisattva path and did not memorize them or recite them.

Bhava reports a citation from a text called the Śālmalivana-sutra *:

Ānanda, I comprehend even more Dharma than however many leaves there are in this śālmalī grove, but I have not taught them to you. Since that many were taught for a purpose, you must not be regretful, but you should also not be without desire [to hear them].

In response to the qualm that Ānanda heard all of the sūtras:

If it is said "Ārya Ānanda comprehended all of the sūtras", with respect to that, the Uttama sūtra* states: "There is not even one bhikṣu holding the number of Dharmas held by Śakra, the king of the devas." Since that is so, Ānanda did not hold all of the Dharma. Therefore, the vast teachings of the Buddha are not seen in that authentic compilation Ānanda demonstrated and compiled authentically.

Bhava continues in this vein for quite some time. The point is that a) arhats did not preserve all the teachings of the Buddha b) Ānanda did not know all of the sūtras.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 30th, 2014 at 8:16 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

I would simply insist that the hermeneutical framework of Mahāyāna sūtras has already been provided by the Buddha in those very same sūtras

So, you are saying that "the Buddha taught them" is not hermeneutics, it is simple fact, while the hermeneutics taught therein are valid, etc. because of this authorship by the historical Buddha, in the same way that the Nikayas are valid because of their authorship -- because the historical Buddha taught the content.

Parsing anything about this - such as e.g. that the Nikayas are stratified and not wholly Buddhavacana, or that Mahayana is wholly later... all of that, to any historian, text-critical examiner, etc, the reply is that Adopting the western text critical view of Mahāyāna sūtras is not virtuous.

Do I understand correctly?

Indeed you do. Indeed, Theravadins should adopt precisely the same attitude —why?

Because these days even the Pali Canon is coming under attack from the very same forces who initially caused Mahāyāna to fall into disrepute.

In short, it is not virtuous to regard teachings in the Agamas/Nikāyas and well as the Mahāyāna canon to be anything other than taught by the Buddha. I am not insisting that of adherents of the Mainstream canons necessarily must accord validity to Mahāyāna canon; or those who are adherents of common Mahāyāna necessarily must accept Vajrayāna — they should remain a place free of judgement. But for those of us who are Mahāyānis and Vajrayānis, well, it is better for us to simply accept all these teachings as the teachings of the historical Buddha where it is so indicated, unless there are absolutely compelling reasons to believe otherwise.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 30th, 2014 at 8:14 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Wayfarer said:

I think the idea of 'a visionary encounter with the Buddha' is perfectly real.

Malcolm wrote:

We have no evidence that the Mahāyāna sutras were received this way. My point is that all of these kind of speculative apologetics exist to satisfy a bias against Mahāyāna texts endemic in Western Academia, and sadly, a bias that persists even amongst the majority of those who term themselves Mahāyānis.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 30th, 2014 at 7:32 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

tobes said:

I think there is a huge difference between being text critical in the narrow philological sense, and simply recognising that reading any kind of literature necessarily involves some kind of hermeneutical framework.

Malcolm wrote:

Agreed — I am pretty sure I did not condemn hermeneutics. I would simply insist that the hermeneutical framework of Mahāyāna sutras has already been provided by the Buddha in those very same sutras, and where it has not, by such authors as Nāgārjuna, Maitreya, etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 30th, 2014 at 7:08 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

Malcolm, if the Mahayana sutras were actually spoken by the Buddha, why were they rejected by mainstream Buddhists, who apparently constituted the majority of Buddhists in India?

Malcolm wrote:

Because they were not preserved by Śravakas, but rather by Mañjuśrī and Samantabhadra.

smcj said:

Well that's a whole different take on the subject! I can go along with that!

Malcolm wrote:

This is the traditional account.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 30th, 2014 at 7:07 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

smcj said:

Your criteria for authorship is far too narrow.

His criteria for credible authorship of authentic Dharma is too narrow.

But Malcolm knows this. He could argue my position better than I have. He is being loyal to what he sees as the interests of the Mahayana. Mistakenly so in my opinion, but at the same time understandably so.

pueraeternus said:

More like he is having a midlife crisis. He should be well beyond the stage where he needs to wrestle with sraddha issues. I don't get it.

Malcolm wrote:

I am not wrestling with any issues. I simply realize that adopting the western text critical view of Mahāyāna sūtras is not virtuous.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 30th, 2014 at 7:06 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Adamantine said:

I just want to remind everyone that today is the first day of the sacred month Saga Dawa (according to Tibetan astrology).

As such, it is said that the effects of positive and negative actions are vastly multiplied.

dzogchungpa said:

Did the Buddha teach Tibetan astrology too?

Malcolm wrote:

No, that would be Mañjuśrī.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 30th, 2014 at 7:05 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

Malcolm, if the Mahayana sutras were actually spoken by the Buddha, why were they rejected by mainstream Buddhists, who apparently constituted the majority of Buddhists in India?

Malcolm wrote:

Because they were not preserved by Śravakas, but rather by Mañjuśrī and Samantabhadra.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 30th, 2014 at 5:46 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

pueraeternus said:

There is no surprise that fundamentalists of other creed denounce everything but their own. We don't even need to consider them since most of their minds are already closed to our path in this lifetime. We do need to exemplify the broad-mindedness, reasoning and virtue that accompanies those who walk the Buddhist path. We show by example, display the wondrous store of the Buddha's treasure to all and teach those who would come and listen. Closing our minds just because there are other closed-minded people out there is hardly skillful means.

Malcolm wrote:

I am not condemning anything. I am not denouncing anything. My message is quite positive. The Mahāyāna Sūtras are the words of the Buddha. Let those who do not believe this go their own way peacefully as I will mine.

Exemplifying broad-mindedness, reasoning and virtue does not entail denying the authorship and authenticity of our own core canon, which sadly, 90 percent of Western Mahāyānists do without even realizing it.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 30th, 2014 at 5:42 AM

Title: Re: Khyenri style of painting

Content:

dzoki said:

There is an updated page on Khyentri style of thangka painting on himalayanart, I found I really like this style. If I had the money I would have a whole set of thangkas painted in this style (that would be a hell lot of thangkas ), but then I found out it ceased to continue as a tradition. Have there been any attempts to revive this style? I am asking here since, as I understood this style was mainly tied to Sakya school.

<http://www.himalayanart.org/search/set.cfm?setid=83> "

onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;" onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

Malcolm wrote:

Well, I think this style continues to dominate Central Tibetan painting.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 30th, 2014 at 5:38 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

pueraeternus said:

Faith must lead towards prajna. The dog's tooth example merely shows that single-mindedness can lead to absorption and samadhi, and that (hopefully) leads to understanding and direct vision of dependent origination, emptiness, etc.

Malcolm wrote:

If one does not have faith in the authorship of the Dharma one is following, it will not lead to prajñā, but only to confusion and more doubt.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 30th, 2014 at 5:36 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

smcj said:

They can't. That's the point. But since they have, they have validated the texts and practices upon which they relied, proving that the tradition indeed came from an enlightened source, whether it be Sakyamuni or another enlightened being. The proof is in the taste of the pudding.

Malcolm wrote:

I see, so you are still left with the quandry: following the teaching in the sūtras produce the results predicted in the sūtras, upon what basis can you accept part of the text to be true, and yet doubt the attribution of the text. If the tradition is effective, if what the texts say are true, of what use is it to say "This tradition is effective, it produces the results which it claims, nevertheless, even though the words of the text are true, the authorship is false." For that is what you are saying here , no more, and no less.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 30th, 2014 at 5:31 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

But this is not how the text comes to us. These are all rationalizations to explain away the discomfort which arises from the fact that one has not accepted the Mahāyāna sūtras as being the actual speech of the Nirmanakāya, which is how they are presented, i.e. as the words spoken from the mouth of the Buddha .

pueraeternus said:

Oh - so now we are to uncritically accept at face value every Mahayana sutra word for word?

Malcolm wrote:

We are to merely accept that they were spoken by the Buddha.

pueraeternus said:

How do you think the Buddhist nitārtha/neyārtha textual hermeneutics came about? Go down this road and you will find yourself contenting with a mass of contradictions that ultimately leads to collapse of the very faith you are trying to protect.

Malcolm wrote:

I did not say we should not apply the hermeneutical strategies which come from the sutras themselves, as well as various commentaries upon them, such as the Abhisamayālaṃkāra. It is high time, as Western Mahāyanists, that we should be guided by what the sūtras and commentaries on those sūtras say, rather than the opinions of Buddhologists.

There is actually no reason whatsoever to doubt that Mahāyāna sūtras are the actual words of the Buddha. Not one, apart from the fact that some 19th century westerner scholars decided this was the case and we have blindly followed their lead ever since without once questioning the wisdom of this.

There is - even early Buddhists denounce the new fangled sutras as heresy. All internal evidence from Sravakayana texts point to the Mahayana as a later development.

Yes, they did indeed reject Mahāyāna sūtras, eliciting Nāgārjuna's response in the Ratnavali and Maitreya Bodhisattva's response in the Sūtrālaṃkāra. But the fact that Śravakas rejected the Mahāyāna sutras does not tell us anything at all about them. It certainly should not be taken as evidence that the Mahāyāna sūtras are not the Buddha's own words. But most Westerners are dependent upon philologists who were biased towards the Pali canon as being the "authentic" Buddhism of the Buddha. And quite frankly, they have constructed a picture of Buddhism that we inherit and generally buy into without second thoughts. The entire history of Mahāyāna studies in the Academy begins from the premise that Mahāyāna sūtras are later literary fabrications. But it is just a premise, one with no supporting facts whatsoever.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 30th, 2014 at 5:08 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

pueraeternus said:

Nonsense - just because a text was written down hundreds of years later after the Buddha's time on this planet does not mean that it did not come from an awakened or inspired source.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, so if you think that Mahāyāna sutras were not actually spoken by the Buddha, who is the awakened or inspired source to which you refer?

pueraeternus said:

They may not be spoken by the flesh-and-blood nirmanakaya Buddha, but they are certainly spoken by the Sambhogakaya or even Dharmakaya Buddha. Or perhaps the Buddha inspired someone to enlightened speech (ala Subhuti), and thus a sermon is given. Or a yogi obtained visions of Buddhas and Bodhisattvas in assembly, and promptly wrote it down after emerging from samadhi. Etc, etc.

Malcolm wrote:

But this is not how the text comes to us. These are all rationalizations to explain away the discomfort which arises from the fact that one has not accepted the Mahāyāna sūtras as being the actual speech of the Nirmanakāya, which is how they are presented, i.e. as the words spoken from the mouth of the Buddha, i.e. thus have I heard...

There is actually no reason whatsoever to doubt that Mahāyāna sūtras are the actual words of the Buddha. Not one, apart from the fact that some 19th century westerner scholars decided this was the case and we have blindly followed their lead ever since without once questioning the wisdom of this. We have basically decided that the wisdom of philologists is what we should follow.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 30th, 2014 at 4:28 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

pueraeternus said:

Nonsense - just because a text was written down hundreds of years later after the Buddha's time on this planet does not mean that it did not come from an awakened or inspired source.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, so if you think that Mahāyāna sutras were not actually spoken by the Buddha, who is the awakened or inspired source to which you refer?

pueraeternus said:

Why are you all of a sudden struck by such fundamentalist tendencies?

Malcolm wrote:

I have concluded that denying that Śākyamunu Buddha is the author of the Mahāyāna sūtras constitutes abandoning the Dharma. I have concluded therefore, it is very non-virtuous, and not in the interest of those who claim to be Mahāyānists. Such positions only serve the forces which wittingly or unwittingly seek to unravel the Buddha's Dharma from within.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 30th, 2014 at 4:22 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

smcj said:

No. The only fact that matters, and it is a fact, is that we have enlightened teachers today. Maybe they are not fully enlightened, but are sufficiently so that they are proof positive of the viability of the Path and the validity of the Teachings. Everything else is of no consequence.

Malcolm wrote:

If they are awakened , how could they become so on the basis of texts which are just literary fictions, not matter now edifying?

As the Tantra of the Union of The Sun and Moon states:

If the history is not explained,
there will be the fault of lack of confidence in this discourses of the definitive secret meaning.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 30th, 2014 at 3:51 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

smcj said:

Actually I'm even more speculative; that the historical Sakyamuni intended the said developments to occur. That's a little Issac Asimov "Foundation Trilogy" sic-fi speculative, but it is how I see it.

And I'm not so sure tradition dismisses it.

Malcolm wrote:

The fact is that we have some texts. They are records of the Buddha's teaching. Either they are or they are not. That is the only fact that matters.

I choose to believe that they are. I recommend that others do so. It will help their practice.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 30th, 2014 at 3:43 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

I finally understood that my former position is one which ultimately harms Mahāyāna Dharma. Since my practice comes first, I changed my mind.

smcj said:

I am largely in agreement with your former position, and do not see it as harming the Mahayana. However you are welcome to change your mind as you see fit.

Malcolm wrote:

My former position was purely speculative, it is not grounded in fact or tradition.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 30th, 2014 at 3:34 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Kunzang said:

Did I misunderstand your former position? If not, what has prompted this shift, if you don't mind talking about it? It seems a pretty radical turnaround.

Malcolm wrote:

I finally understood that my former position is one which ultimately harms Mahāyāna Dharma. Since my practice comes first, I changed my mind.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 30th, 2014 at 3:30 AM

Title: Re: NamDak SaLing closing

Content:

DechenNamdrol said:

Hello all.

I am immediately closing my centre in Calgary, Alberta and ceasing all activities due to a threat of violence made against me, a handicapped father of two young children, by a man who masquerades as a Dharma practitioner.

I wish you all the best. I won't be posting anything further.

Malcolm wrote:

Time for Simhamukha my friend.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Friday, May 30th, 2014 at 2:34 AM
Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism
Content:

pueraeternus said:

By taking textual analysis into consideration, we can still be reasonable to most people and have a chance to convince them that the Mahayana teachings adhere to the dharma seals.

Malcolm wrote:

No, taking this position means that we have no faith at all in the Mahāyāna path since it does not come from an awakened source.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Friday, May 30th, 2014 at 2:05 AM
Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism
Content:

pueraeternus said:

We have to accept the fact that some texts are indeed edited later, have textual corruption, are obviously apocryphal, etc. It is inevitable for a canon that is so vast and sprawling. Then we have to look at the soteriological value of such texts and determine if it is still of dharmic value. But to deny that is so just because of our "faith" is exactly the wrong thing to do.

Malcolm wrote:

The point is that from this point of view, the entire Mahāyāna canon is apocryphal, at least as far as Theravadins etc. are concerned. It is not desirable to admit this position. One fundamentally invalidates the Mahāyāna by following this view.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Friday, May 30th, 2014 at 2:04 AM
Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism
Content:

dzogchungpa said:

Malcolm, it all comes down to faith or confidence or whatever in the end, right? You think it's insufficient to say "I have faith in this group of texts." but it's sufficient to say "I have faith in the Buddha and I have faith that the Buddha said what's in these texts."? I don't think there's any real apologetic advantage there. Why do you have faith in the Buddha in the first place? Who are you hoping to convince anyway?

Malcolm wrote:

Oh, I am not trying to convince anyone of anything, I learned long ago that is useless.

dzogchungpa said:

You think it's insufficient to say "I have faith in this group of texts." but it's sufficient to say "I have faith in the Buddha and I have faith that the Buddha said what's in these texts."?

Malcolm wrote:

When confronted with a claim "X teaching in Mahāyāna is contradicted by x teaching in the Agamas", if you take the view that the Mahāyāna sūtras were not taught by the Buddha, you have no choice but to admit the Agamic teaching is the definitive one.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 30th, 2014 at 2:00 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

smcj said:

Don't you reject Mt. Meru cosmology, which in fact the Buddha taught?

Malcolm wrote:

I don't reject Meru cosmology. It is an Indo-centric map of the ancient world in which Meru clearly lies in the middle of Central Asia, undoubtedly Tibet. I do not necessarily accept the way the Koshā presents it.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 30th, 2014 at 1:56 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

smcj said:

Yes, motivated by ascribing them to Sakyamuni as the symbol of validity.

Malcolm wrote:

So now we are speaking the motivations of what we presume to anonymous authors? Seems a stretch to me.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 30th, 2014 at 1:00 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

pueraeternus said:

There are so many ways to cut it - so easy to turn it around and declare that the Mahayana teachings represented a deeper, more profound teachings that surely is the provenance of the Buddhas. And if others insist of the primacy of textual history, we just say "oh that is a viewpoint limited to time and space, we have to go beyond that.... blah blah blah"

Malcolm wrote:

This is a very weak apologetic. You are still admitting that the Mahāyāna teachings portray historical events which did not happen, conventionally.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 30th, 2014 at 12:59 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

smcj said:

Because otherwise, we are fundamentally admitting we do not know the source of such teachings.

I don't have a problem with that.

Malcolm wrote:

I do.

smcj said:

Likewise I don't believe the Naga story about Nagarjuna, yet I accept it as authentic Dharma. It is an appropriate elaboration on Sakyamuni's original teachings, the appropriateness being validated by Nagarjuna's own realization. It is an extension of Sakyamuni, not Sakyamuni's personal teaching.

Malcolm wrote:

I don't agree. And I don't think it serves our purposes in Mahāyāna take this perspective.

People with realization can add to Dharma, and have done so. People that have not been able to gain realization should not alter even one letter of it. That is why contemporary people that have failed at Dharma should not be the ones leading the charge to change it. That is taking the teachings of enlightened awareness and making them the teachings of ignorant unawareness.

smcj said:

Did Sakyamuni teach the 6 Yogas of Naropa? I don't think so. Dzogchen? I don't think so. If you say Vajradhara taught them, ok. (Vajradhara being the enlightenment of Sakyamuni as seen from the Vajrayana perspective.) But that means that the history of it will show up some time after the Parinirvana, when it comes back down to the human realm. If you say that Sakyamuni could still teach after the Parinirvana, then that is the same as saying later authors could, based on their own realization, contribute to the Canon. It is saying the same thing two different ways.

Malcolm wrote:

[/quote]

The Mahāyāna sūtras place themselves within the 80 year lifespan of the Buddha. If we take your route, we are openly admitting that Mahāyāna teachings are not the teachings of the Buddha. Therefore, this is a bad way to go. Vajrayāna also suffer too.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 30th, 2014 at 12:38 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

PorkChop said:

I'm with you on the idea of holding firm that the teachings themselves come from Shakyamuni; the issue I bring up is how to go about doing this in the most defensible position available. The ability to defend this position is integral given the vested interest others have of shooting down Mahayana/Vajrayana teachings.

Malcolm wrote:

The best approach is to simply discuss the teachings with the understanding that Buddha actually taught themselves himself as we Mahāyānists have been doing for the past 2000 years and ignore what outsiders think. People become interested in Mahāyāna because they have the merit to do so, not because of some evangelism on the part of Mahāyānists. People can either believe what faithless academics say, "The Mahāyāna teachings are not the words of the Buddha" or they can believe what all of our realized masters say: "The Mahāyāna teachings are the words of the Buddha."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 30th, 2014 at 12:34 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

smcj said:

I consider Dzogchen, Mahamudra, the tantas and such as authentic Dharma.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, and they can be traced back with precision to Vajradhara, apart from those few lower tantras the Buddha himself taught.

smcj said:

I feel no qualms whatsoever about not tracing them back 2,500 years to Sakyamuni.

Malcolm wrote:

Teachings such as Kalacakra were taught directly by the Buddha, even if they were set down later by the Shambhala Kings.

smcj said:

They produce enlightened beings. They come from enlightened beings. Those enlightened beings came from practicing the Dharma that Sakyamuni taught. That makes them authentic Buddhism, regardless of whether or not Sakyamuni's specifically articulating those teachings in the flesh.

Malcolm wrote:

My point is that we cannot regard those teachings in Mahāyāna sūtras which the Buddha taught to be truly valid, unless in fact we believe the Buddha indeed taught them, where and when it is said he taught them. Because otherwise, we are fundamentally admitting we do not know the source of such teachings.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 30th, 2014 at 12:24 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

smcj said:

The strength of Buddhism lies in the idea that generation after generation has been able to produce realized beings. Their realization may not equal Buddha's but it is still realization nevertheless. What they have to say is by definition Dharma. End of controversy. Anyone that feels the need to have had Sakyamuni personally teach something is showing a karmic bias towards Shravakayana. That's their karma. Let them follow it.

Malcolm wrote:

The strength of the Dharma lies on its lineage and origin being authentic. Otherwise, it is fabrication.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 30th, 2014 at 12:21 AM

Title: Re: Historicity of Yeshe Tsogyal

Content:

mutsum said:

Great! Thanks for the reference! We can even see that her toponymic affiliation is even given (as mKhar-che(n) bza'). It's indeed a good reference outside the gter-ma tradition.

Malcolm wrote:

I thought so. I think it must be the earliest known textual reference to her. Yes, it is late, but it is from the corpus of a Tibetan family known for their very strict adherence to their Dharma traditions, whose lineage of Kilaya traces back to Guru P.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 30th, 2014 at 12:16 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

smcj said:

Try standing behind the Nagarjuna story as literal history. Then you'll be laughed at.

Malcolm wrote:

No more so then someone will be laughed at for believing Abhidharma was taught to Buddha's mother in the deva realms.

smcj said:

The definition of Dharma needs to be made clear. It is the speech on an enlightened being.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, in the case of the Mahāyāna sūtras, if not Buddha, then who? Some anonymous enlightened being we do not know? This undermines the entire validity of the lineage.

smcj said:

Any other position is handing the academics the authority to decide what is authentic Dharma or not.

Malcolm wrote:

Academics have no such authority nor will they ever for as long as we insist that our sūtras are the actual words of the Buddha, either in person, by blessing or by permission.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 30th, 2014 at 12:13 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

smcj said:

The classic example is the fairy tale that sea serpents kept a secret text written by Sakyamuni at the bottom of the ocean in a time capsule for 1,000 years waiting for Nagarjuna to be born so they could give it to him.

Malcolm wrote:

But as must be clear to you for years, I actually believe in Nāgas, Yakṣas, Gandharvas, Kinnaras, Mahoragas, and so on. So I have absolutely no problem with the idea that Nāgārjuna recovered the Prajñāpāramita from the Nāga dimension.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 30th, 2014 at 12:10 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

pueraeternus said:

This is a dangerous veer towards fundamentalism.

Malcolm wrote:

No, it is actually an embrasure of "fundamentalism."

pueraeternus said:

One of our primary tasks as Mahayanist is to attract beings and convert them to the dharma. We cannot do this if we petulantly insist on the historicity of wildly contradictory sutras and tantras.

Malcolm wrote:

You call it "petulant", I call it "essential". We cannot attract anyone to Mahāyāna teachings if we front with "Well, Buddha did not really teach this, but..." By this strategy we are explicitly agreeing that our texts do not carry the weight of authority of the Mainstream Canon. It's just a simple fact.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 30th, 2014 at 12:06 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

smcj said:

What you are essentially saying is, "I recognize that these texts were not actually taught by the Buddha at the time they were said to have been taught. Nevertheless, I like what they say." One's objection to the refutation of their validity as the Buddhavacana will therefore be groundless and toothless. You have already admitted by this that the Mainstream canon is authoritative, and that the Mahāyāna canon is not.

I disagree on the grounds that tracing the historicity to Sakyamuni is not the criteria for "authoritative".

Malcolm wrote:

You can disagree all you like, and yet when you say the "Buddha said" and someone replies, "not he didn't because Gregory Schopen blah blah blah...", etc., how will you respond? Well, "Buddha didn't really teach that, I agree. But some later Buddhist wrote a book and put it in the mouth of the Buddha, so it is just as authoritative."? You will be laughed at.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 30th, 2014 at 12:02 AM

Title: Re: Understanding of karma

Content:

kng said:

"For example in dzogchen teaching, which is somehow different from other buddhist teachings, we do not say that, for example for meeting the teaching of Buddha we need to have some good causes, some merits etc., we need to do something good during many lifetimes and then as a result we meet this high teaching, that can help us to free ourselves, to become liberated.

Malcolm wrote:

Berkhin has a little misunderstanding here. We say that people who meet Dzogchen (and Dharma in general) are fortunate, why are they fortunate? Because they have the merit to meet the teachings. Why do they have that merit, because of positive actions performed over countless lifetimes.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 29th, 2014 at 10:47 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Wayfarer said:

I think the origin of the Mahayana Sutras is from 'visionary encounters' with the Buddha which could be understood as 'seeing the dharma by penetrating its meaning' or as 'insight into the true meaning of the Buddha's teaching through Prajñāpāramitā.' These insights were then codified into the Prajñāpāramitā sutras, amongst others.

Understood thus, I have always thought that these texts were the authentic word, even if not literally remembered and spoken in the same way as the early texts.

Malcolm wrote:

Again, this theory merely opens the door for criticism. It depends on a twist of interpretation. What you are essentially saying is, "I recognize that these texts were not actually taught by the Buddha at the time they were said to have been taught. Nevertheless, I like what they say." One's objection to the refutation of their validity as the Buddhavacana will therefore be groundless and toothless. You have already admitted by this that the Mainstream canon is authoritative, and that the Mahāyāna canon is not.

Instead it better to simply insist, "This is the sūtra that we read, if you do not read this sūtra, it is better for you to be neutral, than run the risk of abandoning Dharma." In this way one's point of view is unassailable when it comes to explicating points where the Buddha's teaching in Mahāyāna sūtras surpasses or seem to contradict those teachings found in the Mainstream canons.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 29th, 2014 at 10:39 PM

Title: Re: Is Rebirth Unscientific?

Content:

Sherab said:

I think I have problem...

Malcolm wrote:

Well, you can ground your understanding in the Nikayas, I prefer to ground it in Mahāyāna. I consider it more authoritative.

Sherab said:

Taking the Buddha as one who has an overall view of all things, I don't consider what the Buddha said in great vehicle sutras as more authoritative than what he said in the small vehicle suttas.

It is possible that one interpretation of what the Buddha said is more authoritative than another interpretation, but resorting to authority is my last resort for understanding what the Buddha said.

The Buddha said many things and unless one is as awakened as the Buddha himself, practically whatever he said would be interpreted by one's intellect. What is important as far as I am concerned is the consistency of interpretation (understanding) of one aspect with other aspects of the Buddha's teachings.

Malcolm wrote:

You can choose to ignore the Saṃdhinirmocana, if you like.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 29th, 2014 at 10:34 PM

Title: Historicity of Yeshe Tsogyal

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Mutsuk wrote:

Of course we have no trace of Yeshe Tsogyel before quite late in the tibetan history and there is not a single mention of her in the Dunhuang documents if I'm not mistaken. We have a record of Tsogyal outside the Nyingma Milieu which dates to the mid 12th century, i.e., there is a mention of her oral instructions concerning Vajrakīlaya in the Jetsun Dragpa Gyaltsen's collected works:

http://tbrc.org/link?RID=O01CT0026%7CO01CT002600KG04134\$W22271. The text from 793-794 mentions that it is advice given to her on Guru Rinpoche's departure from Tibet.

Thus, we can see here that the Khon tradition clearly mentions her. It's very unlikely that Jetsun Rinpoche would be following the lead of Nyangral, given how stringent Sakyapas are about lineage, and how dubious they were about the nascent gter ma tradition. In my opinion, we can safely say that this advice was included in their ancestral teachings.

Therefore, I personally see no valid reason whatsoever to doubt the historicity of a Tibetan woman named Yeshe Tsogyal who was Padmasambhava's companion.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 29th, 2014 at 8:33 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Dan74 said:

I am wondering though why on a Mahayana forum this dualistic parable would hold any sway?

Malcolm wrote:

Well, because the nondual is ultimate, but we still function in the relative.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 29th, 2014 at 8:30 AM

Title: Re: Is Rebirth Unscientific?

Content:

Sherab said:

I think I have problem...

Malcolm wrote:

Well, you can ground your understanding in the Nikayas, I prefer to ground it in Mahāyāna. I consider it more authoritative.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 29th, 2014 at 6:54 AM

Title: Re: Is Rebirth Unscientific?

Content:

smcj said:

Also, if I remember correctly, the nirvana of an Arhat is likened to a flame going out - you can't tell where the flame went. In other words, you can't tell where the mind of an Arhat goes when he attains nirvana.

That's not a Mahayana perspective. A Mahayanaist would understand the Arhat to have a continuation. In fact, the Mahayana perspective says that after a long while the Arhats are roused out of their sleep by the blessing of the bodhisattvas so they can continue on with the practice of the Mahayana.

And yes, that's not something I'd like to try to say on Dhamma Wheel.

Mkoll said:

I wouldn't be offended. If an arahant has put an end to suffering for themselves, I doubt they'd mind helping others do the same.

Or do I have that wrong? Do Mahayana schools believe the arahant has made an end to suffering for themselves?

Malcolm wrote:

Arhats have made an end to suffering, but have, in the Mahāyāna analysis, mistaken the samadhi of cessation for the ultimate fruit of the path. The Buddha teaches in the Lankāvatara that eventually, arhats are roused out of their samadhi and set on the Bodhisattva path, where after three incalculable eons, they attain full buddhahood.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 29th, 2014 at 6:49 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

We followers of Buddhadharma must confidence in the authenticity of our core canons. That confidence can only arise if we are confident in the lineage and authorship of these canons.

Anders said:

Are you saying then that confidence in the Mahayana hinges on the belief that the mahayana sutras were spoken by the historical Shakyamuni Buddha? And that you think such a belief is most ideal for modern mahayana buddhism?

Malcolm wrote:

I think it is not only ideal, but essential. I am not insisting of course that this be some kind of entry bar for becoming a Buddhist. But it is a little strange to claim that one is taking refuge in the Dharma, the speech of the Buddha, and then on the other hand, consider virtually all of the teachings that constitute Mahāyāna to be little more than fabrications, no matter how pithy or profound. In Mahāyāna, we do not accept the Agamas or Nikayas to be authoritative in a way in which Mahāyāna sūtras are not. But denying the authorship of Mahāyāna to the Buddha, we are depriving ourselves of the very basis which to respond to Theravadins and so on, because in affect, we are accepting their view of our own texts.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Thursday, May 29th, 2014 at 4:13 AM
Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism
Content:
Anders said:
the evidence is so overwhelmingly to the contrary.

Malcolm wrote:
Would you like to trot out that evidence?

M

Author: Malcolm
Date: Thursday, May 29th, 2014 at 4:01 AM
Title: Re: Is Rebirth Unscientific?
Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:
....what is your opinion of this?
Can a person be a Buddhist relying only on what can be achieved through direct experience?
...

Malcolm wrote:
A Buddhist cannot achieve anything without right view.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Thursday, May 29th, 2014 at 1:23 AM
Title: Re: Is Rebirth Unscientific?
Content:
Malcolm wrote:
The mind never ceases to continue, not even in the state of awakening.

Sherab said:
I am not sure about this. I remembered that there is a story about how Mara (or was it a Deva?) boasted about how he could know the mind of anyone but when challenged by the Buddha to find his (the Buddha's) mind, he failed. Also, if I remember correctly, the nirvana of an Arhat is likened to a flame going out - you can't tell where the flame went. In other words, you can't tell where the mind of an Arhat goes when he attains nirvana.

Malcolm wrote:
According the Mainstream Buddhist schools it is indeed the case that the stream of consciousness experiences total cessation in parinirvana; but not according to the Mahāyāna and Vajrayāna where the Buddha rejects this as a misunderstanding of his teachings. As Sachen Kunga Nyingpo puts it, the garland of of moments of clarity continue from sentient being-hood through the state of Vajradhara.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, May 28th, 2014 at 8:15 PM

Title: Re: Is Rebirth Unscientific?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The body.

PadmaVonSamba said:

Yes, constantly.

Malcolm wrote:

Death, according to the Buddha is the break up of the aggregates, i.e. when mind and body separate. Since the mind does not die, then we can say that what dies, ceases to continue is the body. The mind never ceases to continue, not even in the state of awakening.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, May 28th, 2014 at 7:56 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Simon E. said:

As to "if its not historically true its more important "...the mind boggles at the sheer frigging nonsense that clever people can take seriously.

Anders said:

If, for example, the encounter dialogues in Zen are not historical reports, then they were manufactured for a religious purpose.

Malcolm wrote:

They are not sūtra.

We followers of Buddhadharma must confidence in the authenticity of our core canons. That confidence can only arise if we are confident in the lineage and authorship of the these canons.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, May 28th, 2014 at 7:55 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Anders said:

I think it weakens Buddhism if it can formulate no religious response to academic findings. I don't wish to see Buddhism sticking its head in the sand, catholic style, insisting that dinosaurs were put in the ground to test our faith and so forth.

Malcolm wrote:

The religious response is not to cater to Western Academia by giving credence to their "findings" with such devices as the one you propose. No, it is not sufficient. It is just a back-handed way of saying, "Well, yes you're right, but..."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, May 28th, 2014 at 6:50 PM

Title: Re: Is Rebirth Unscientific?

Content:

JKhedrup said:

So I agree with Malcolm: if you want to be "happy" in this lifetime, ethical hedonism is 100% the way to go, and maybe a little Buddhist practice Meditation in the morning, Xanax or a joint and a couple of shots of vodka in the evening?

Malcolm wrote:

Dude!

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, May 28th, 2014 at 6:23 AM

Title: Re: Is Rebirth Unscientific?

Content:

LastLegend said:

Well death is real. I think we can all agree on this.

PadmaVonSamba said:

The death of....what?

.
.
.

Malcolm wrote:

The body.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, May 28th, 2014 at 6:22 AM

Title: Re: Is Rebirth Unscientific?

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

The reality of a physical universe is valid when it comes to suggesting the existence of a lineage of teachers,
....but not for "materialists" for whom it is a view 'so deeply ingrained'.

Malcolm wrote:

Just what are you on about? Are you interested in having a discussion or are you just interested in mocking people? What's your problem?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, May 28th, 2014 at 5:38 AM

Title: Re: Is Rebirth Unscientific?

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

It is possible to go beyond the dualism of comfortable vs. uncomfortable.

Malcolm wrote:

Not without first cultivating right view.

PadmaVonSamba said:

...then you are essentially saying that since (according to you) nobody has attained perfect tranquility and peace of mind in a thousand years, then nobody has cultivated right view.

Malcolm wrote:

I didn't say that. What I said is that, if one follows the Theravada school's reckoning of things, there has not been an arhat for more than a thousand years. I never said anything at all about bodhisattvas.

Even someone with only mundane correct view however, can attain perfectly tranquility and peace of mind — it's called śamatha. Even Hindus have this. The cultivation of śamatha does not depend on right view at all. Someone who has no faith in rebirth whatsoever can achieve śamatha.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, May 28th, 2014 at 5:27 AM

Title: Re: Is Rebirth Unscientific?

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

It is possible to go beyond the dualism of comfortable vs. uncomfortable.

...

Malcolm wrote:
Not without first cultivating right view.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Wednesday, May 28th, 2014 at 4:35 AM
Title: Re: Is Rebirth Unscientific?
Content:
Malcolm wrote:

Wrong view is not just active disbelief, it also includes well considered agnosticism on the issue, which by definition is a form of ignorance.

daverupa said:
The Buddha did not tell these fine folk that a well-considered agnosticism was a form of ignorance. He instead taught them how to use such an agnosticism to attain four assurances here and now, and even with agnosticism in play he is able to call those who successfully employ this gambit those with 'mind thus free from hostility, free from ill will, undefiled, & pure'.

Malcolm wrote:
Nevertheless, it is. An agnostic by definition cannot enter the beginning of the path. The four brahmaviharas are not a path.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Wednesday, May 28th, 2014 at 4:15 AM
Title: Re: Is Rebirth Unscientific?
Content:
Malcolm wrote:
Without rebirth, there is such thing as "liberation"

Anders said:
Surely full freedom from suffering in this life can qualify as "liberation" even if it is not a liberation from the endless rounds of samsara?

Malcolm wrote:
There can be no full liberation from suffering for one with wrong view, even in this life.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Wednesday, May 28th, 2014 at 2:58 AM
Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism
Content:
smcj said:
To me it is only when somebody starts trying to publicly legitimize their rejection of the teachings that I've got a problem, and at that point I'm right with you.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, and those people ought to just be ignored. It does no good to argue with academic skeptics like Jeff, materialists like Andrew, etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, May 28th, 2014 at 2:45 AM

Title: Re: Is Rebirth Unscientific?

Content:

Norwegian said:

As Nagarjuna points out:

" Even though an individual may have practiced well, with a wrong view

All that matures will be unbearable. "

-- Suhrllekha ["Letter to a Friend"]

Malcolm wrote:

Indeed.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, May 28th, 2014 at 2:39 AM

Title: Re: Is Rebirth Unscientific?

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

Ok, well I get it then, I think I took your words to mean something else, thanks for the clarification.

Malcolm wrote:

Just to reinforce the point:

Bhikku Bodhi said:

The Buddha includes belief in rebirth and kamma in his definition of right view, and their explicit denial in wrong view.

Malcolm wrote:

So, the point is that someone who has wrong view is automatically barred from liberation. Wrong view is not just active disbelief, it also includes well considered agnosticism on the issue, which by definition is a form of ignorance.

This is why I consider it so tragic that so many people out there are interested in the Dharma, but their very beliefs, or lack of it, bar them from experiencing the true fruits of practice. The most they can expect is a higher rebirth, which sadly, they do not even believe in. Worse, if they meditate incorrectly, develop the higher dhyanas and so on, they can take rebirth in formless realms from which they will never escape for literally millions and millions of years.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, May 28th, 2014 at 2:32 AM

Title: Re: Is Rebirth Unscientific?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

JD, can you tell me the difference between Buddhist mindfulness and say Hindu mindfulness, or even secular mindfulness?

Johnny Dangerous said:

No, I don't have your background, and thus I can't do that. I can however wonder what exactly you are trying to convey re: accessibility and right usage of Buddhist teachings in this thread, which is what I'm asking.

There is nothing particularly "Buddhist" about the kleshas for example, they are discussed in all Indian spiritual paths.

Sans rebirth, what is it that makes any discussion about the kleshas more interesting from a Buddhist perspective than say for example, the plethora of psychologies out there, considering that kleshas and so on are not unique to Buddhism?

I'm not approaching the question from an academic standpoint, nor do I imagine are most practitioners, nor most people who MIGHT become practitioners. All I am asking is why you would want someone to be an ethical hedonist rather than a Buddhist, albeit one whose opinions you might think are nonsense.

Malcolm wrote:

I never said ethical hedonist could not crib teachings of the Buddha and so on that suit them. But liberation is just not in the cards for them. Buddha never said that someone who did not accept rebirth could attain stream entry, let alone Arhatship. Forget about Bodhisattvas and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, May 28th, 2014 at 2:25 AM

Title: Re: Is Rebirth Unscientific?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

e]

Whose talking about restricting access to the teachings?

I dunno, what ARE you talking about then, declarations of faith, simply refuting incorrect views on doctrine, or what? Is there a purpose behind telling someone they should just be an ethical hedonist? I'm unclear on your actual position..especially as someone who not too long ago declared their desire to distance themselves from the "Buddhist" label.

Johnny Dangerous said:

I did not say someone should be an ethical hedonist, I said it would be better to be an ethical hedonist.

Actually, a "Buddhism" sans rebirth is just ethical hedonism.

Not by a longshot. Even given the obvious ethical quandaries that can be involved with "secular Dharma" - which I recognize, Buddhist meditation, and even a bit of the Buddhist understanding of emotion and mind works wonders for non-Buddhists..hopefully that's non-controversial right?

Malcolm wrote:

JD, can you tell me the difference between Buddhist mindfulness and say Hindu mindfulness, or even secular mindfulness?

There is nothing particularly "Buddhist" about the kleshas for example, they are discussed in all Indian spiritual paths.

Sans rebirth, what is it that makes any discussion about the kleshas more interesting from a Buddhist perspective than say for example, the plethora of psychologies out there, considering that kleshas and so on are not unique to Buddhism?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, May 28th, 2014 at 2:04 AM

Title: Re: Is Rebirth Unscientific?

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

Man, I really do not get this.

You don't think it's better for people to have access to teachings that decrease afflictive emotions, regardless of worldview? I sure do.

Malcolm wrote:

Whose talking about restricting access to the teachings?

Johnny Dangerous said:

It seems like the only real issue is when people want to say "the Buddha didn't believe in rebirth" and similar, thinking of Sam Harris here among others...beyond that, I WANT those people to have access to the teachings, and be welcome in Dharma centers etc. without needing to make some sort of declaration of faith - unless they plan on taking refuge of course.

Malcolm wrote:

Again, this does not address my point, which is, there are plenty of wonderful ethical systems out there which can bring people peace and improve their lives immeasurably. Actually, a "Buddhism" sans rebirth is just ethical hedonism.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, May 28th, 2014 at 1:45 AM

Title: Re: Is Rebirth Unscientific?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

No, it would be better to be an ethical hedonist. Why? If rebirth wasn't the case, the statement you cite from the Dhammapada would have no meaning.

Anders said:

Why should it be better?

Are you saying that liberation in this lifetime is not worth it for the sake of this lifetime? That there are higher means of happiness in this lifetime only than full freedom from suffering?

Malcolm wrote:

Without rebirth, there is such thing as "liberation". If you have your needs and wants met, that's enough. This is why said it would be better to be an ethical hedonist.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, May 28th, 2014 at 1:43 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

Macolm, I'm sympathetic to what you're saying, but what exactly do you mean by "the teaching of the Buddha"? For example, is the Aro gTér the teaching of the Buddha? Is Michael Roach's stuff the teaching of the Buddha?

Malcolm wrote:

I was actually talking about the teachings in the bKa' 'gyur in general as well as the Nyingma rgyud 'bum. As far as termas go, well, what I had in mind was more like standard traditional termas.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, May 28th, 2014 at 1:23 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Sherlock said:

Do we have to accept that tantras also come from Shakyamuni Buddha?

Malcolm wrote:

No, we should just accept they they were taught by a Buddha, such as Vajradhara, for example. However, some of the lower tantras were directly taught by the Buddha.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, May 28th, 2014 at 12:40 AM

Title: Re: Is Rebirth Unscientific?

Content:

Anders said:

If rebirth wasn't the case and perfect freedom from suffering was nevertheless an option for the remainder of one's singular lifetime, that would still be plenty good reason for a Buddha to teach. Cf the dhammapada:

Malcolm wrote:

No, it would be better to be an ethical hedonist. Why? If rebirth wasn't the case, the statement you cite from the Dhammapada would have no meaning.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, May 28th, 2014 at 12:02 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Three things are required to turn the tide of Buddhist modernism, especially of the academic variety:

1) We must resist the temptation to fall under the spell of text criticism. The text critical approach is forensic and speculative. It proceeds from Western hermeneutical prejudices founded in a materialist notion of what a "text" is. It also is born out of a Western idea of historiography. Text criticism, used as a means of discerning the origin of Buddhist texts and its developments, results in nothing more than speculative conjectures being taken as facts by the reading public, and by many Buddhists as well. These speculative conjectures harm the foundations of Mahāyāna and Vajrayāna in particular, which are seen as modifications or corruptions of an ur-canon.

2) We must resist the attempt to erect science as our final authority in all matters of cosmology, theories of consciousness, etc. While not disregarding modern science and so on, we must insist that domain of Buddhadharma is necessarily outside of scientific inquiry. The origin of Buddhadharma is the awakening of the Buddha. There is no way the mundane sciences can either enhance our understanding of Dharma nor can it replace the Dharma.

3) We must insist that on fact the Buddhist canon, all sutra, tantra and Vajrayāna originate with the Buddhas in general, and Śākyamuni Buddha in particular. We must take into consideration that the very survival of Buddhism as a living tradition depends on the integrity of the origins of the teachings. In particular, we must insist on the necessity that the timeless teachings of the Buddhas transcend mundane concerns about space and time, existing as a remedy for the suffering of all sentient beings, wherever they may be. Therefore, the teachings of the Buddhas, whether directly, by permission or by blessing should be accepted as they are at face value as the teaching of the Buddha. It is only in this way that the integrity of the Buddhist tradition will be preserved. This is not to say that all Buddhists must accept all canons as being of equal value. We need to recognize that all the Buddha's teachings have value for different people at different stages in their evolution on the path.

Therefore, engaging with people addicted to text criticism or historical analysis of Buddhist texts, or who have aim to replace key concepts in Buddhadharma with concepts drawn from the mundane sciences should be considered extraneous distractions and such people's qualms and objections must be ignored, because trying to deflect or negate such misguided criticisms of materialists, made by non-practitioners, or Theravadin practitioners is completely useless. If they say Mahāyāna is not the teaching of the Buddha, we must insist that it is. If they claim the Vajrayāna teachings are not the teaching of the Buddha, we insist that it is. If they claim that termas are not the teaching of the Buddha, we insist that they are and leave it at that. Many long, stupid conversations will be blunted in the beginning by a simple statement "This is a teaching of the Buddha. If you don't think so, you are welcome to your opinion but I am not interested in discussing it with you further." Such discussions are not useful for anyone's practice, their's, if they have one, or ours. Further, we create much non-virtue and negative traces by engaging in such discussions. So it is time to just stop.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 27th, 2014 at 11:03 PM

Title: Re: Hello from Texas

Content:

DharmaCloud said:

Hello everyone.

I'm a self-proclaimed "book buddhist" who has tried (really?) to engage in a practice for many years. Too many excuses to throw out there for that one, but as I often have, I'm once again stepping back onto the path.

I'm hoping to engage in lively discussions and be part of a community in the dharma. Once again moving from the distractions, I hope to use the encouragement of seeing others on the path to spur my own practice.

This time I hope to lay down my unhealthy ego, the one that causes me to seek perfection in my attempts to be in a better place. I am trying to accept where I am and start from here.

Malcolm wrote:
Find a teacher.

The victor, the owner of the best of all qualities, has said:
“Rely on the Buddha, Dharma and the virtuous mentor .”

— Samcayagathas

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 27th, 2014 at 9:27 PM

Title: Re: Is Rebirth Unscientific?

Content:

Andrew108 said:

When rebirth is debated it should be kept in mind that rebirth is something to be overcome. It is something that needs to be seen as false.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, that is the point of Buddhadharma, overcoming rebirth. Not merely as a concept, but in actuality. You seem to be proposing the only thing we need to overcome is the idea of rebirth. Well, materialists don't need to since they have no idea of rebirth. Maybe they are already liberated. At death, poof, nirvana.

The point is, A108, without rebirth, there is no need for Buddhadharma per se.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 27th, 2014 at 11:07 AM

Title: Re: Is Rebirth Unscientific?

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

How totally hypocritical to say that a scientific view

...

Malcolm wrote:

I wan't talking about science per se. I was talking about western materialism.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 27th, 2014 at 9:22 AM

Title: Re: Is Rebirth Unscientific?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

There has not been an Arhat for more than a thousand years...

Vajraprajnakhadga said:
How do you know this?

Malcolm wrote:
Please read my previous response to this post. This is a tradition that is universal in Theravada.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Tuesday, May 27th, 2014 at 8:09 AM
Title: Re: Is Rebirth Unscientific?
Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:
Every bit of your "true buddhism" is based on material references, on written texts...

Malcolm wrote:
No, my Buddhism is based on a living lineage of realized teachers going right back to the Buddha.

PadmaVonSamba said:
So, you are saying they are figments of your imagination?

Malcolm wrote:
You know, if you do not believe that the Buddha's teachings have passed down to us in an unbroken lineage through realized masters; which present those teachings to us faithfully, that's your problem, not mine.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Tuesday, May 27th, 2014 at 8:07 AM
Title: Re: Is Rebirth Unscientific?
Content:
Malcolm wrote:
There has not been an Arhat for more than a thousand years...

PadmaVonSamba said:
So you say.
Prove it.

Malcolm wrote:
There are various schemes, but let us suppose that we take the Theravadin scheme. According to Buddhaghosha, circa 5th century, when a thousand years have elapsed from the Buddha's parinirvana, it will no longer be possible to become a stream entrant, let alone an Arhat.

If you are interested in this kind of thing, look at Jan Nattier's synopsis of these issues in Once Upon a Future Time.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 27th, 2014 at 7:03 AM

Title: Re: Is Rebirth Unscientific?

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

How many people are there who argue about whether or not there is a next life when they haven't yet got freedom in this life?

Peace of mind, total contentment, these are all possible right now.

If you attain them in this life, whether another life follows this one or not doesn't really matter at all.

...

Malcolm wrote:

And if you don't, the point is critical. There has not been an Arhat for more than a thousand years...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 27th, 2014 at 7:02 AM

Title: Re: Is Rebirth Unscientific?

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

Every bit of your "true buddhism" is based on material references, on written texts...

Malcolm wrote:

No, my Buddhism is based on a living lineage of realized teachers going right back to the Buddha.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 27th, 2014 at 4:55 AM

Title: Re: Honen's One-Sheet Document

Content:

Luke said:

In Part 7, Rev. Ishikawa talks a bit about the views of some of Honen's main students, such as Bencho. He also mentions that he feels that there is very little information about Pure Land Buddhism available in English (this is part of his motivation for making these videos). Perhaps more Pure Land texts will be translated into English in the future...

One thing these videos have given me is just the opportunity to see how a Pure Land Buddhist priest thinks and acts. Rev. Ishikawa is very knowledgeable and rational, so this is what impresses me the most. He doesn't have any overdone "Praise Amitabha! Hallelujah, brothers and sisters!" type of attitude that I had always expected Pure Land priests to have.

Malcolm wrote:
Ippen is an interesting character.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Tuesday, May 27th, 2014 at 2:09 AM
Title: Re: Is Rebirth Unscientific?
Content:

Andrew108 said:
For some people it is important. For me it's not meaningful. If you want to follow Buddha's teachings then it is best to slowly divest yourself of concepts regarding Buddhist teachings.

asunthatneversets said:
This makes no sense. Seems to be a misinterpretation of what it means for wisdom to be free of concepts.

Andrew108 said:
When you sit back and think thank goodness I don't have to be a Buddhist anymore, maybe you relax a bit. When you sit back and think thank goodness I'm a Buddhist, maybe you relax a bit. As a practitioner you realize both are an equality. When you do this are you a Buddhist or are you someone who has understood something about the invariant condition we all find ourselves in?

Malcolm wrote:
The point is not whether one is a Buddhist or not; the point is whether one understands Buddhadharma or not. People who reject rebirth and yet continue to call themselves "Buddhists" do not understand Buddhadharma.

I don't know you personally, but from everything you have written, I would say that you are someone who has some intellectual understanding of Buddhism, but I really don't think you grasp the meaning of Buddhadharma.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Tuesday, May 27th, 2014 at 1:31 AM
Title: Re: Understanding of karma

Content:

Andrew108 said:

Yes agreed, but if Dzogchen accepted a conventional view of karma then one would think that one needs to accumulate vast stores of merit and purify oceans of negativities.

Malcolm wrote:

Khenpo Ngachung, someone who attained the pinnacle of Dzogchen realization in the last century, and then wrote of his experiences states:

In any system of sutra or tantra, without gathering the accumulations and purifying obscurations, Buddhahood can never be attained. Though the system of gathering accumulations and purifying obscurations is different, in this respect [dzogchen] is the same.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 27th, 2014 at 1:13 AM

Title: Re: Is Rebirth Unscientific?

Content:

Andrew108 said:

Physicalism? Not really.

Malcolm wrote:

Really.

Andrew108 said:

If I say that immaterial mental phenomena cannot exist independently of material phenomena you would take me as a physicalist. But I am not making any assertions as to what matter is apart from saying that it is interdependently originated.

Malcolm wrote:

Non-sequitur -- what is at issue of your views of consciousness, not your views of matter.

Andrew108 said:

On the other hand you are asserting that the immaterial (consciousness) has characteristics and functionality separate from the physical. It's characteristics do not depend on a physical base but are innate to it, part of it.

Malcolm wrote:

Andrew, your notion of the relation between consciousness and matter is a one way dependency: i.e. consciousness depends on matter, period.

Andrew108 said:

But I wonder how you can say this? What for example are the actual qualities of an immaterial rainbow if the rainbow is absolutely immaterial?

Rongzom says:

"If an immaterial phenomenon existed, for example a mirage, it would be empty of causes and empty of movement. In the very moment of engaging a mirage designated by convention, the phenomenon of emptiness does not depend upon the mirage."

Malcolm wrote:

I am not sure that Rongzom says this, citation please, so I can look at the Tibetan text. I am not sure what the translator means by "immaterial".

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, May 26th, 2014 at 11:38 PM

Title: Re: Understanding of karma

Content:

Andrew108 said:

Really? Dzogchen accepts a conventional view of karma?

Malcolm wrote:

Very much so, as Garland of Pearls Tantra [one of seventeen tantras] states:

One is placed in the dungeon of name and matter
in the castle of the three realms, tortured with the barbs of ignorance and so on,
oppressed by the thick darkness of samsara,
attached to the salty taste of desire,
bound by the neck with the noose of confusion,
burned with the hot fire of hatred,
head covered with pride,
setting a rendezvous with the mistress of jealousy,
surrounded by the army of enmity...
tied by the neck with the noose of subject and object, [29b] stuck in the mud of successive traces and handcuffed with the ripening of karma.
Having been joined with the ripening of karma,
one takes bodies good and bad,
one after another like a water wheel,
born into each individual class.
Having crossed at the ford of self-grasping,

one sinks into the ocean of suffering and one is caught by the heart on the hook of the three lower realms.
One is bound by oneself; the afflictions are the enemy.

The whole purpose of practicing rishan, especially outer rishan, is to eliminate the causes of birth in the six lokas.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, May 26th, 2014 at 11:23 PM

Title: Re: Is Rebirth Unscientific?

Content:

Andrew108 said:

I suspended my world view for 24 years. That's how many years it took for me to overcome the belief in literal rebirth.

Malcolm wrote:

And so now you have become an evangelist for replacing Buddha's own teachings with physicalism, and promulgating that as the Dharma.

Pretty sad, dude.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, May 26th, 2014 at 11:12 PM

Title: Re: Understanding of karma

Content:

kng said:

For those who would wish to participate in discussion, without having to watch the video, maybe you could suggest some sources from which to study karma or give overview about karma from the point of view of nine vehicles.

Malcolm wrote:

The point of view of karma in the conventional is the same for all nine vehicles. In other words, Dzogchen does not deviate in any significant way from the standard presentation of Karma given in chapter 4 of the Abhidharmakośa.

There is no karma in the ultimate, so in that respect too, the point of view of all nine vehicles is the same.

The treatment of karma absolutely does not change from one vehicle to the next.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, May 26th, 2014 at 10:02 PM

Title: Re: why is Vajrayana considered the fastest way to buddhahood

Content:

JKhedrup said:

I had thought what made the merit and wisdom accumulations more powerful was that they were done in most cases in the aspect of the self-generation. For example, one generates as Yamantaka before blessing the inner offering, and emanating goddesses to offer it to the merit field etc. as to do so in one's ordinary form would not be possible.

.

Malcolm wrote:

As I understand it, what makes the merit accumulation more powerful is that you are making offerings to the Guru above all. The wisdom accumulation is more powerful because it is done with a mantra based on the the example wisdom of the time of empowerment.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, May 26th, 2014 at 9:28 PM

Title: Re: Is Rebirth Unscientific?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The fact is that the only thing preventing many people from waking up is the rigid resistance I see among many westerners, who think they are interested in Buddha's Dharma, to what the Buddha's Dharma actually teaches. This is why many people follow a "Buddhism" of their imagination, rather than Buddhadharma.

Andrew108 said:

It is as you say. The Pali suttas are full of mentions of literal rebirth. But we also know that Buddhism has been modified and developed over the centuries.

Malcolm wrote:

No, Buddhadharma has never been modified. Over the centuries however, more of the Buddha's teachings have been revealed, to help people cope with evolving circumstances.

Andrew108 said:

In the Samadhanga Sutta Buddha says:

"If he wants, he recollects his manifold past lives,[3] i.e., one birth, two births, three births, four, five, ten, twenty, thirty, forty, fifty, one hundred, one thousand, one hundred thousand, many aeons of cosmic contraction, many aeons of cosmic expansion, many aeons of cosmic contraction and expansion, [recollecting], 'There I had such a name, belonged to such a clan, had such an appearance. Such was my food, such my experience of pleasure and pain, such the end of my life. Passing away from that state, I re-arose there. There too I had such a name, belonged to such a clan, had such an appearance. Such was my food, such my experience of pleasure and pain, such the end of my life. Passing away from that state, I re-arose here.' Thus he remembers his manifold past lives in their modes and details. He can witness this for himself whenever there is an opening."

So we should take this literally right?

Malcolm wrote:

It is intended literally. There is nothing here to dispute, conventionally speaking.

Andrew108 said:

But one wonders how could it be possible? How could all these memories survive so many lives when there were lives where we didn't have language or developed senses capable of recording and storing that information. Why was it that the Buddha couldn't talk about the evolution of species or what life was like on other planets. It seems that life on other planets was much like life on this one?

Malcolm wrote:

Life in Sukhavati for example, is nothing like life on this one.

Andrew108 said:

How does this memory survive after brain death? What is it about consciousness that enables it to contain so much information and why is that information not ordinarily available to us? Then there is a kind of folkism here where memory is seen like a serial display and that one needs only rewind to uncover past events. It seems if you develop the jhanas then that is the kind of capacity you will have. The way you remember things will be serial.

Malcolm wrote:

In general, for ordinary beings, the shock of being unconscious at the moment of conception is said to render our past life memories unavailable. Bodhisattvas in their last life however are conscious through the entire process of conception, gestation and birth.

When one enters into the concentration of recalling past lives, indeed one starts with this life and that starts with the present and works one's way back.

Memory is serial because consciousness is serial. Memory, as I already explained to you from Candrakirti, is not different than the consciousness that experienced the event. So the process consists of recalling every serial sense impression from beginningless time.

Consciousness is empty, there is nothing preventing consciousness from recalling all of its past objects other than our present obscurations. Just as there is nothing preventing karma from ripening because karma too is empty.

But if you try to understand these things in physicalist terms it will never make any sense.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, May 26th, 2014 at 7:26 PM

Title: Re: Is Rebirth Unscientific?

Content:

Andrew108 said:

The teachings have to make practical sense.

Malcolm wrote:

They do, but first you have to understand their context. The context of Buddhadharma is to be liberated from rebirth in samsara.

Andrew108 said:

Have to be applicable right now.

Malcolm wrote:

They are.

Andrew108 said:

Shouldn't isolate an individual.

Malcolm wrote:

They don't.

Andrew108 said:

Shouldn't enable the forming of inside-outside identity making.

Malcolm wrote:

Tell that to the Buddha, i.e., "Outside of my Dharma and Discipline..."

Andrew108 said:

Should bring a measurable benefit to the practitioner and others.

Malcolm wrote:

They do.

Andrew108 said:

Have to be absolutely useful and relevant.

Malcolm wrote:

There is nothing more relevant than eliminating the traces that cause rebirth in samsara.

Andrew108 said:

All of these amazing effects of the teachings are available when the metaphysical aspects are dropped in favour of direct experience.

Malcolm wrote:

The direct experience of deluded beings is delusion.

Andrew108 said:

So many buddhists are in denial about their behaviour.

Malcolm wrote:

Here is a mirror, take a look at your reflection.

Andrew108 said:

Thinking that being buddhist and being in receipt of wonderful teachings is enough. It is not enough.

Malcolm wrote:

Agreed, but abandoning the Buddha's Dharma and replacing it with physicalism is not the right approach.

Andrew108 said:

There needs to be an absolute benefit to the practitioner's life.

Malcolm wrote:

There is only one absolute benefit, liberation. If someone does not begin with right view, which incidentally includes rebirth, karma and so on, there will be no benefit at all to a person's life.

The fact is that the only thing preventing many people from waking up is the rigid resistance I see among many westerners, who think they are interested in Buddha's Dharma, to what the Buddha's Dharma actually teaches. This is why many people follow a "Buddhism" of their imagination, rather than Buddhadharma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, May 26th, 2014 at 7:16 PM

Title: Re: Is Rebirth Unscientific?

Content:

Andrew108 said:

There is also the issue of petty sectarianism where other views can't be tolerated and are seen as being a threat.

Malcolm wrote:

I am afraid that you seem to subscribe to the view, "Buddhism is whatever I think it is". Well, to a large extent these days that that is true. But Buddhadharma is not "whatever we think it is".

Andrew108 said:

Since the logic is not there, it should be perfectly acceptable for a Buddhist to not accept rebirth. They should not have to feel excluded or de-valued because of their agnosticism or reasoned disbelief.

Malcolm wrote:

I have never insisted that people accept rebirth as a personal belief. I have insisted that people understand how Buddha's teaching of rebirth is critical to understanding Buddhadharma properly. I have also insisted that if we discard rebirth, the Buddha's Dharma ceases to have any more meaning than any other secular self-help system. Without the teaching of rebirth, the Buddha's Dharma is no more than a set of moral platitudes. It ceases to be a path of liberation, and becomes a mere palliative for life's ailments, rather than a cure.

This I have unwaveringly maintained literally for years, as anyone who remembers E-Sangha can attest.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, May 26th, 2014 at 6:25 AM

Title: Re: why is Vajrayana considered the fastest way to buddhahood

Content:

JKhedrup said:

I honestly thought that the practices of generating as the deity, and things like illusory body, clear light and tummo were the uncommon features of Highest Yoga Tantra. I especially thought the generation stage created extraordinary causes to achieve the form body. I am a little worried I misunderstood something here. (Which is totally possible!)

Malcolm wrote:

All these things are uncommon, JK, but in a sadhana, the merit and wisdom accumulations are completed even before you start in on the main section. And the main section of the sadhana is nothing or nor less than a reenactment of Buddha's awakening and deeds through nirvana.

Yes, it is true that creation stage is a cause for realizing the rūpakāya, just as the completion stage is a cause for realizing the dharmkāya. But superior even to the the two stages is guru yoga, which along with mandala offerings are truly unique to anuttarayoga tantra.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, May 26th, 2014 at 6:18 AM

Title: Re: Is Rebirth Unscientific?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The same applies to text critical scholarship of Buddhist texts. It destroys Buddhadharma. I really want nothing more to do with this contemporary approach to Buddhadharma.

dzogchungpa said:

Are we to just ignore it then?

Malcolm wrote:

Pretty much, AFAIC. It does nothing to help one's practice or realization.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, May 26th, 2014 at 2:39 AM

Title: Re: Is Rebirth Unscientific?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

From my limited perspective, it appears to me that the real danger inherent in all of this is that by adhering to this western materialist view that is so deeply ingrained in our culture, we are simply piling trace upon trace in our mindstreams that will make it ever more difficult for us to meet the Dharma in future lives, much less have faith in it.

This is sad.

The same applies to text critical scholarship of Buddhist texts. It destroys Buddhadharma. I really want nothing more to do with this contemporary approach to Buddhadharma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, May 26th, 2014 at 2:27 AM

Title: Re: why is Vajrayana considered the fastest way to buddhahood

Content:

JKhedrup said:

I have heard some lamas explain it that Vajrayana also establishes causes for achieving the form body of a Buddha, it allows us to start doing that right in this life. This is part of the reason for its swiftness.

Malcolm wrote:

That is not a very good explanation. The rupakāya comes from the punyasambhara, the merit accumulation. Also this exists in common Mahāyāna, right from the start. It is the means of accumulating merit that set Vajrayāna apart, like mandala offerings (in particular) and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, May 26th, 2014 at 2:18 AM

Title: Re: Concerns about Commercializing Buddhism in the West

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

<http://tuttejior.wordpress.com/2014/01/31/tutte-wachtmeister-how-to-monetize-the-dharma/>

smcj said:

298 pages. Hardback. $34.95

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, one of those x-buddhist hacks.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, May 26th, 2014 at 2:17 AM

Title: Re: why is Vajrayana considered the fastest way to buddhahood

Content:

Arjan Dirkse said:

Religions all compete in the market place of ideas, most of them and their denominations claim to have the superior path.

Malcolm wrote:

Vajrayāna is the uncommon Mahāyāna path because it uses methods which the Buddha did not teach in Mahāyāna sūtras. The Buddha taught that, unlike in common Mahāyāna, it is possible for a beginner, someone at the beginning of the path of preparation, to attain complete buddhahood in a single lifetime by following Vajrayāna. These teachings are stated by the Buddha, Padmasambhava, and so on, not by simple people like me.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, May 26th, 2014 at 1:25 AM

Title: Re: Concerns about Commercializing Buddhism in the West

Content:

catlady2112 said:

I read in some earlier posts of people who went to a (Buddhist Geeks?) conference and said there was an overemphasis on how to market yourself in order to get students.

Malcolm wrote:

Seriously? That is corrupt. Such people will merely send themselves to hell.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, May 26th, 2014 at 1:19 AM

Title: Re: why is Vajrayana considered the fastest way to buddhahood

Content:

Crazywisdom said:

Tantras themselves say they are the pinnacle of the dispensation,

theanarchist said:

Yeah, but they also say that they are for disciples of higher/highest capacity. Means, only for a small minority of all people who come in contact with dharma.

Malcolm wrote:

No, the tantras do not say this. What the tantras say is that only _fortunate_ people meet the Vajrayāna stream.

theanarchist said:

And the fact that a lot of people follow vajrayana, but very very very few of them indeed attain liberation in this one life...

Malcolm wrote:

The tantras divide people in three categories basically, best, medium, average. They provide all necessary methods for attaining buddhahood in this life, or the bardo, or taking rebirth in a buddhfield such as Sukhavati.

theanarchist said:

So yeah, anyone can follow vajrayana, but not everyone can or will attain liberation in the that fast manner.

Malcolm wrote:

Vajrayāna texts promise that if one maintains ones samaya well, one will attain full buddhahood within seven lifetimes. Compared to the three incalculable eons at minimum to practice the common Mahāyāna path, this is fast, no?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, May 26th, 2014 at 12:07 AM

Title: Re: why is Vajrayana considered the fastest way to buddhahood

Content:

theanarchist said:

[

Why should they be offended? In Theravada leading all other beings to liberation is indeed not on the program.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, as is the case with all the so-called Mainstream schools.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, May 25th, 2014 at 11:44 PM

Title: Re: Honen's One-Sheet Document

Content:

Luke said:

I have watched the first five videos just out of curiosity. They don't make me want to practice Jodo Shu, but they have given me a better understanding of this tradition and of Japanese language and culture. Rev. Ishikawa seems like a very kind and joyful person. If anybody thinks that Buddhism is only about misery and suffering, they should take a look at Rev. Ishikawa!

Malcolm wrote:

Buddhism is only about escaping misery suffering; but if someone thinks there is even a microgram of happiness in samsara, they are pretty deluded. However, people on the path have good reason to be happy.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, May 25th, 2014 at 10:51 PM

Title: Re: why is Vajrayana considered the fastest way to buddhahood

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Needless to say, for those who have no faith in Vajrayāna, Vajrayāna is not a vehicle at all, much less the fastest one.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, May 25th, 2014 at 9:33 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

plwk said:

I used to agree with some like Malcolm that this 'foundation' may not be necessary but after having read this thread and some others, I can now see the wisdom and acute urgency of this statement.

Malcolm wrote:

I used to have that feeling, I no longer do. Quite the opposite in fact.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, May 25th, 2014 at 7:43 PM

Title: Re: 21 Years from the Dharamsala Conference

Content:

kirtu said:

How does the square with the pervasive drug culture in the US?

Malcolm wrote:

Dude, people in Britain snort so much coke it in the WATER supply.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, May 25th, 2014 at 7:40 PM

Title: Re: 21 Years from the Dharamsala Conference

Content:

kirtu said:

Due to misfortune I had to move to Baltimore in late 2012. The entire region is a nest of rampant drug activity.

Malcolm wrote:

Like every working class city in the US with a ruined economy.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, May 25th, 2014 at 7:16 PM

Title: Re: Excellent online resource for Colloquial Tibetan

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Some of the speakers have terrible Chinese accents.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, May 25th, 2014 at 6:39 AM

Title: Re: China expands new measures to directly control Tibetan m

Content:

kirtu said:

Then by your admission, Central Tibet was some ruled in some way by the Gelug during the time of the 5th Dalai Lama to the 6th, then there was a 40 year period (this would overlap with the life of the 6th and the 7th), then from some point during the life of the 7th the Gelug rule again in some form up to the 13th. Is that correct?

Malcolm wrote:

I was very precise. The government established by the Fifth collapsed when when Lozang Khan invaded, and Desid Sangye Gyatso was assassinated by Lozang Khan's wife (a former mistress of his) in 1705 (I said 1704, but oh well). The Desid never allowed the Sixth to rule.

Central Tibet remained without any effective government at all, apart from warlords, until Pho lha nas, an aristocrat from Tsang, ruled Tibet from 1727-1748 with Qing backing.

The seventh was installed by the Qianglong emperor in 1751. The Kashag itself was a creation was a creation of the Qianglong emperor.

Please get your facts straight, Kirt. I expect better from you. The Central Tibetans were ruled by the Qing, so they could not be a theocracy either.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, May 25th, 2014 at 6:28 AM

Title: Re: China expands new measures to directly control Tibetan m

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

No one refers to Europe as a THEOCRACY during the middle ages. No one. I defy you find even one serious historian that labels Medieval Europe so.

uan said:

I defy you to find even one serious historian that labels Medieval Europe as a single country.

Malcolm wrote:

That my friend, is my entire point. Tibet was never "Tibet", Tibet is Ü, Tsang, Ngari Korsum [Formerly known as Zhang Zhung], Guge, Amdo, Chamdo, Kham, Nangchen, Golog, Nyarong, Gyalmo Rong, Lhodrag, Kongpö, Pö, and a plethora of other small kingdoms and regions like Mustang, Lhadak, Dolpo, Jyathang and so on, with huge ethnic diversity — for example, the people in Gyalrong speak a language that is not even Tibetan, though they are Tibetan Buddhists. You are talking about a vast region, historically tied together by religion rather than ethnic identity, much like Medieval Europe.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, May 25th, 2014 at 5:37 AM

Title: Re: China expands new measures to directly control Tibetan m

Content:

kirtu said:

Your characterization of the brief rein of the 5th Dalai Lama is correct. The rest was an obfuscation. Although a specific Mongol group invaded and disposed the 6th Dalai Lama, it appears that the Gelugs were more or less in charge of Central Tibet at least through the beginning of the rule of the 13th Dalai Lama. This was enforced at least nominally from Beijing.

Malcolm wrote:

No that is not correct. There were two separate secular regimes over a period of 40 or so years, before the 7th was installed.

kirtu said:

Yes, people do. Europe was characterized as having heavy theocratic influence at least until the French Revolution. The period 1789-1848 was this inflection point in Western and Central Europe.

Malcolm wrote:

No one refers to Europe as a THEOCRACY during the middle ages. No one. I defy you find even one serious historian that labels Medieval Europe so.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, May 25th, 2014 at 3:04 AM

Title: Re: China expands new measures to directly control Tibetan m

Content:

JKhedrup said:

Also, let us not forget that the post-Industrial Revolution, capitalist system of the West, while perhaps "democratic", has led to an unsustainable strain on the earth's resources and a pollution crisis that is destroying the planet.

Malcolm wrote:

If this is the case, then the "West" is the whole world.

In fact everybody on the whole planet has bought in industrialization. The West coast of the US and Canada experiences the pollution from China's factories.

Quite frankly, there are no players who do not participate willingly in the Global economy. I know it is fun to point fingers at the US, but in reality, the environmental degradation we are experiencing was caused by all countries who industrialized.

This East/West thing is really misguided — ya'll need to read Edward Said.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, May 25th, 2014 at 2:33 AM

Title: Re: Is Rebirth Unscientific?

Content:

Andrew108 said:

Stop crying and make your position more clear. I haven't invented anything.

Malcolm wrote:

Sure you have.

Andrew108 said:

You are the one implying consciousness has potential and is supported by warmth.

Malcolm wrote:

What do you mean by "potential"?

Andrew108 said:

So why wouldn't I assume that you understand consciousness to be self-sustaining and therefore not without energy?

Malcolm wrote:

A moment of consciousness is not self-sustaining, like everything else it is sustained on causes and conditions, they are simply not physical causes and conditions. Unless of course you eliminate the formless realm, in which case there would only be two dhātus rather than the standard three.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, May 25th, 2014 at 2:06 AM

Title: Re: 21 Years from the Dharamsala Conference

Content:

kirtu said:

Logic please. Mexico is not considered the West

Malcolm wrote:

Yes it is.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, May 25th, 2014 at 1:50 AM

Title: Re: 21 Years from the Dharamsala Conference

Content:

kirtu said:

You can also just take up the "fearful and mistrusting" assessment with Noam Chomsky, Carol O'Connor and others who have said exactly the same thing.

Malcolm wrote:

As I have often pointed out, you live in a different country than I do.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, May 25th, 2014 at 1:49 AM

Title: Re: 21 Years from the Dharamsala Conference

Content:

kirtu said:

It has been the most violent society in the West

Malcolm wrote:

You clearly have never been to Mexico.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, May 25th, 2014 at 1:41 AM

Title: Re: China expands new measures to directly control Tibetan m

Content:

kirtu said:

No you said that the majority of Tibet was actually small kingdoms and said nothing about how they were actually governed. Central Tibet was ruled by the 5th Dalai Lama for 50 years but that Gelug rulership fell apart after his death (which is inaccurate, BTW).

Malcolm wrote:

It's perfectly accurate. Why you don't you look up the period between Desrid's assassination and the kidnapping of the sixth, and the the ascension of the 7th? Tell me who ruled Tibetan during this period.

kirtu said:

Tibet was very much a kind of theocracy where the aristocracy vied amongst themselves and with lamas to secure power...

Malcolm wrote:

Sounds very much like Medieval Europe, but no one calls this a "theocracy":

Europe was very much a kind of theocracy where the aristocracy vied amongst themselves and with clergy to secure power...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, May 25th, 2014 at 1:21 AM

Title: Re: 21 Years from the Dharamsala Conference

Content:

kirtu said:

If you grew up in the US, you additionally grew up in a fearful, violent and mistrusting society (albeit one that does not recognize that it is fearful, violent or mistrusting).

Malcolm wrote:

hahahahahahaha.

You have such a strange view of the US.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, May 25th, 2014 at 1:18 AM

Title: Re: China expands new measures to directly control Tibetan m

Content:

ReasonAndRhyme said:

I'd find it much more interesting to hear historical arguments why Tibet was or was not a theocracy.

Malcolm wrote:

Been there, done that.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, May 24th, 2014 at 9:54 PM

Title: Re: Is Rebirth Unscientific?

Content:

Andrew108 said:

Very fine quote indeed from RM.

Malcolm wrote:

And this?

Andrew108 said:

Maharshi: The real Self is continuous and unaffected.

Malcolm wrote:

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, May 24th, 2014 at 8:17 PM

Title: Re: Is Rebirth Unscientific?

Content:

Andrew108 said:

Substantial cause? Yes causality is an invariant. But there needs to be a 'substantial' cause. I fail to see how disembodied consciousness can be classed as 'substantial'.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, because for you, if it is not listed on the table of elements, or composed thereof, it does not exist. Ergo, you are a materialist, not a follower of the Buddha.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, May 24th, 2014 at 8:09 PM

Title: Re: why is Vajrayana considered the fastest way to buddhahood

Content:

Crazywisdom said:

So what do we make of how Buddha treated poor Shariputra in the Mahayana sutras?

Malcolm wrote:

Buddha, in Mahāyāna sutras, was acting out of his infinite and omniscient compassion. Not only that, while Śariputra may seem like a foil against which many unkind tricks were played, Śariputra in fact is a very high bodhisattva on the stages, a player in the drama of the Mahāyāna sutras.

I think that until I am at that level, I will refrain from criticizing the other vehicles.

Of course, when we openly discuss the fact that Vajrayāna promises the ideal practitioner full buddhahood replete with the two accumulations in a single life, it is natural that others might feel criticized or that we are making "triumphalist claims", but we are not. There isn't even one single Mainstream sutra or Mahāyāna sūtra that suggests that full buddhahood can be attained in a single life, so what need to mention the complete absence of the methods of doing so? Moreover, the Mainstream Sūtras do not detail the path of the bodhisattva, so people who wish to embark on the career of a bodhisattva must learn that from Mahāyāna sūtras. The Mainstream sūtra teachings have one goal primarily, to guide people to the four fruits of the śravakas path.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, May 24th, 2014 at 7:48 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Wayfarer said:

Science is indispensable and if used wisely brings many material benefits.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, but it is not profound.

Crazywisdom said:

What do you mean by profound?

Malcolm wrote:

It does not lead to liberation.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, May 24th, 2014 at 7:29 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

dharmagoat said:

... For that matter, I am grateful to everyone who has posted intelligently on this subject, regardless of their perspective.

Malcolm wrote:

I guess that leaves me out, since according to Andrew, I am not "logical".

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, May 24th, 2014 at 7:27 PM

Title: Re: why is Vajrayana considered the fastest way to buddhahood

Content:

Crazywisdom said:

We have good reason to disparage the smaller goal.

Malcolm wrote:

Actually, disparaging the other yanas is a violation of our samaya.

Crazywisdom said:

Disparaging is too strong a word. I admit. The Mahayana sutras do disparage poor Shariputra, I'm afraid. Vajrayana is a species of Mahayana.

Malcolm wrote:

As the samaya of the Amitabha family states:

"I will uphold the sublime Dharma, the outer, inner and secret yānas".

Therefore, if we Vajrayānists criticize or berate other yānas, we break our samaya -- not in the sense of a root downfall, no, but in the sense that we are not honoring our commitment to the Padma family which is related to the teachings.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, May 24th, 2014 at 11:58 AM

Title: Re: why is Vajrayana considered the fastest way to buddhahood

Content:

Crazywisdom said:

We have good reason to disparage the smaller goal.

Malcolm wrote:

Actually, disparaging the other yanas is a violation of our samaya.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, May 24th, 2014 at 7:48 AM

Title: Re: why is Vajrayana considered the fastest way to buddhahood

Content:

smcj said:

Ahem, in order to avoid a different kind of shit storm we say "Mainstream Buddhism" around here instead.

I thought we were supposed to use "Shravakayana". I know HHDL just differentiates between Pali and Sanskrit texts.

In any case we do try no avoid pejoratives.

Malcolm wrote:

Nah, that is also considered pejorative. They want to be Mainstream Buddhism, because in point of fact there were never that many Mahāyāna Buddhists in India anyway.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, May 24th, 2014 at 7:12 AM

Title: Re: China expands new measures to directly control Tibetan m

Content:

uan said:

That was a non answer. But it does arise out of a real understanding of how non answers function.

Malcolm wrote:

Look, you made a gross inaccurate generalization. For one, the vast majority of Tibet, for most of its history, was divvied up into small kingdoms held together by a network of trade, family relations as well as monastic ties.

While it is true that the Great Fifth took control of Central Tibet and Tsang, his consolidation fell apart after his death completely. in 1704. It was another 50 years before a Dalai Lama was the nominal ruler of Central Tibet and Tsang. Even here, principalities like Sakya in Western Tsang maintained their independence. During much of the 19th century, Lhasa was controlled through Manchu Ambans.

So my point is, your contention has no substance.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, May 24th, 2014 at 5:46 AM

Title: Re: China expands new measures to directly control Tibetan m

Content:

uan said:

Their culture was a theocracy and was centered around supporting that theocracy. A theocracy is not Dharma. Samsara existed in Tibet and permeated all levels of their culture, just like any other culture.

Malcolm wrote:

You really have no understanding of Tibetan history or culture.

uan said:

Would you care to elaborate?

Their culture was a theocracy and was centered around supporting that theocracy

Malcolm wrote:

This statement is complete nonsense. It cannot arise out of a real understanding of how Tibetan culture functions.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, May 24th, 2014 at 5:43 AM

Title: Re: why is Vajrayana considered the fastest way to buddhahood

Content:

Crazywisdom said:

Hinayana

Malcolm wrote:

Ahem, in order to avoid a different kind of chaotic and unpleasant situation we say "Mainstream Buddhism" around here instead.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, May 24th, 2014 at 5:41 AM

Title: Re: why is Vajrayana considered the fastest way to buddhahood

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

No, it merely proves that a text from the Agamas was translated during late eighth or early ninth century into Tibetan. Virtually no one reads that text, and no one regards it as being particularly authoritative.

santa100 said:

But that's the question I posed to you and which you continue to evade. Please provide reference to back up your claim that the Agamas is less "authoritative" to your sutras.

Malcolm wrote:

No, it merely proves that a text from the Agamas was translated during late eighth or early ninth century into Tibetan. Virtually no one reads that text, and no one regards it as being particularly authoritative.

santa100 said:

But that's the question I posed to you and which you continue to evade. Please provide reference to back up your claim that the Agamas is less "authoritative" to your sutras.

Malcolm wrote:

Well for example, in Mahāyāna sūtras, it very clearly explains that the Bodhisattva Mañjuśrī actually attained samyakasambuddhahood countless eons ago. If it is the case that in Mahāyāna they accepted the statement in the Dhātubahuka-sūtra as authoritative, how is it that Mañjuśrī could appear as a disciple of the Buddha? For example, in the bKa' 'gyur, the translated words of the Buddha, the Ārya-mañjuśrīnāmāṣṭaśataka praises Mañjuśrī in the following words:

You are a Buddha, a pratyekabuddha, and you are the Primordial Buddha.

How can this be possible, if the Dhātubahuka-sūtra is to be regarded as definitive?

Further, to underscore the point that Mahāyāna sūtras are more definitive for Mahāyāna followers than Mainstream Buddhist Sūtras, consider the following from the Ārya-sandhinirmocana-nāma-mahāyāna-sūtra:

At first, since the Bhagavan demonstrated the aspects of the four noble truths to those correctly participating in the vehicle in the deer park called Rṣivadanam, the amazing Dharma wheel he turned first was amazing, a corresponding Dharma had not been turned in the past by any deva nor any human. However, that Dharma wheel that the Bhagavan turned was surpassable, contextual, of provisional meaning, and a basis for contention. The Bhagavan turned a second very amazing Dharma wheel with the aspects beginning with the absence of inherent existence of phenomena, and beginning with their nonarising, noncessation, peace from the beginning, and intrinsic parinirvana to those correctly participating in the Mahāyāna. However, that Dharma Wheel turned by the Bhagavan too was surpassable, contextual, of provisional meaning, and a basis for contention. The Bhagavan then turned the third very amazing Dharma Wheel perfectly differentiating for those correctly participating in all vehicles beginning with the absence of inherent existence of phenomena, and beginning with their nonarising, noncessation, peace from the beginning, and intrinsic parinirvana. This Dharma Wheel turned by the Bhagavan is unsurpassable, not circumstantial, definitive in meaning, and not a basis of contention.

Here you can see that Mahāyāna sūtra, the teaching of the Mahāyāna is clearly defined as definitive. while the teaching of the Mainstream Buddhists, the Agamas and so on are defined as provisional in meaning, etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, May 24th, 2014 at 4:48 AM

Title: Re: why is Vajrayana considered the fastest way to buddhahood

Content:

smcj said:

And just because this is the "Mahayana/Vajrayana" forum doesn't give you the right to say that.

If not here, then where?

santa100 said:

No, not here. This is the General Dharma > Exploring Buddhism section, not Vajrayana section. Saying any elitist claim about Vajrayana here in this section is extremely misleading to those who are new to Buddhism. I see a site admin currently viewing this, if he disagrees, I will shut up.

Malcolm wrote:

I answered a direct question put out to the forum. I am sorry you don't like the answer, but the answer I provided was the correct one from a Vajrayāna perspective.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, May 24th, 2014 at 4:45 AM

Title: Re: why is Vajrayana considered the fastest way to buddhahood

Content:

Crazywisdom said:

For example the claim made above, Buddha does not say which discourses, or which language. It is mere assumption he refers only to Pali. Buddha did not speak Pali.

santa100 said:

But that's irrelevant. The fact that you have the exact equivalence in the Agamas and the Tibetan prove that this is universally accepted by all Buddhist schools.

Malcolm wrote:

No, it merely proves that a text from the Agamas was translated during late eighth or early ninth century into Tibetan. Virtually no one reads that text, and no one regards it as being particularly authoritative in the Tibetan tradition. Your mistake is assuming that we value the Agamas as highly as you do. While we respect all the Buddha's teachings, we really do not spend much time with Mainstream Buddhist primary texts, as we have very few Agamic sutras in our canon.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, May 24th, 2014 at 4:41 AM

Title: Re: why is Vajrayana considered the fastest way to buddhahood

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

By your words you have shown this to be so. You have also demonstrated huge ignorance about Vajrayāna texts with your tempest in a teapot here.

santa100 said:

And you've also demonstrated a distorted view of Vajrayana text, even the basic Tibetan equivalence of MN 115 I have repeatedly provided.

Malcolm wrote:

Not everything in the Tibetan Canon is Vajrayāna; there are Mainstream Buddhist texts like Vinaya, Abhidharma and so on, as well as their commentaries, and a few scattered sūtras from the Agamas, but very few indeed; Mahāyāna texts like the Prajñāpāramita, Avatamska and so on, as well as their commentaries; and Vajrayāna texts like Kalacakra, Hevajra, Manjushri Namasamgiti, etc., and their commentaries.

The interpretive rule is simple — where a Mahāyāna text contradicts a Mainstream Buddhist text such as the one you cited, the Mahāyāna text takes precedence. Where a Vajrayāna text contradicts a Mahāyāna text, the Vajrayāna text takes precedence.

It is that simple. Because you do not understand how those of us in Tibetan Buddhism are trained to understand our own canon, you have made several erroneous assertions that I have kindly and patiently corrected.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, May 24th, 2014 at 4:19 AM

Title: Re: why is Vajrayana considered the fastest way to buddhahood

Content:

santa100 said:

And just because this is the "Mahayana/Vajrayana" forum doesn't give you the right to say that.

Malcolm wrote:

Of course it does.

santa100 said:

I have no problem with Vajrayana. I do have a problem with the the wild claim that Vajrayana as the fastest vehicle above all other schools and that it will make one becomes a Fully Enlightened Buddha in a single lifetime.

Malcolm wrote:

Umm, that is exactly what Vajrayāna texts state without reservation.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, May 24th, 2014 at 3:47 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

pensum said:

if it is true that the self is not a thing but a process ... then it is also true that the tragedy of the ego dissolves because, strictly speaking, nobody is ever born and nobody ever dies. "

Malcolm wrote:

The self isn't even a process, it is just an innate imputation.

pensum said:

Which is precisely what Metzinger describes in his self-model theory.

Malcolm wrote:
Yes, Hume had the same idea.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Saturday, May 24th, 2014 at 3:38 AM
Title: Re: why is Vajrayana considered the fastest way to buddhahood
Content:

smcj said:
But in any case good fences make good neighbors.

Malcolm wrote:
It would appear TRC and santa100 have boundary issues.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Saturday, May 24th, 2014 at 3:16 AM
Title: Re: why is Vajrayana considered the fastest way to buddhahood
Content:

JKhedrup said:
There is a whole thrust of literature that the Tibetans call རྟོག་ཆེན་ བཀའ་རྒྱུ་བས་ or "Proving Mahayana as the Buddha's Word". The philosophy is worth looking at for those interested in the basis and defense of Mahayana philosophy. I once had a list of works and passages of this genre but have now lost it, which is a shame.

jiashengrox said:
Ven Khedrup, I am not sure if we are suggesting the same thing, but try Chapter 1 or 2 of The Ornament of Mahayana Sutras. I remember there is a whole Chapter in the treatise dedicated to proving the words of the Mahayana to belong to the Buddha. Otherwise, The Chapter 1 of Mahayanasamgraha gives a summarised explanation, with Vasubhandu's bhasya.

Malcolm wrote:
Its the subject of chapter one.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Saturday, May 24th, 2014 at 3:11 AM
Title: Re: why is Vajrayana considered the fastest way to buddhahood
Content:

santa100 said:
I'm so so glad that I participated in this thread for I have presented the most vivid proof that Vajrayana cannot be the best and fastest vehicle above all other Buddhist schools.!

Malcolm wrote:
In your imagination.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Saturday, May 24th, 2014 at 1:34 AM
Title: Re: why is Vajrayana considered the fastest way to buddhahood
Content:

santa100 said:
Well, then you must agree that Vajrayana is not the fastest vehicle above all other Buddhist schools that enable one to become a Fully Enlightened Buddha, SammaSambuddha!

Malcolm wrote:
There are no means by which one may become a buddha, gathering the twin stores of merit in a single lifetime and eliminating the two obscurations outside Vajrayāna. I am sorry, but such a teaching does not exist in any sūtra.

santa100 said:
I'm for all the Buddhist schools Mahayana and Theravada that challenge the absurd elitist Vajrayana claim here.

Malcolm wrote:
Glad you finally revealed your anti-Vajrayāna bias. As Nāgarjuna said while addressing critics of Mahāyāna:
Since the teachings of the Tathāgata are not explicit, they are not easy to understand.
Since one vehicle and three vehicles are taught,
one should guard oneself with equanimity.
Through equanimity one will not commit a misdeed, through aversion there will be a misdeed and there will be no virtue, therefore, hatred towards the Mahāyāna is not reasonable for one who desires their own welfare.
Those of you who cannot endure it when you see someone speak openly of Vajrayāna principles should apply Nāgārjuna's advice in kind.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Saturday, May 24th, 2014 at 1:30 AM
Title: Re: why is Vajrayana considered the fastest way to buddhahood
Content:
Crazywisdom said:
N

Yes, the bodhi of a Buddha and an Arahant are the same. The Pali sources, at least, do seem to say this. But Buddha differs from Arahants in two respects: He was first to teach dharma, and by virtue of this, teaches it the best.

Malcolm wrote:

That quite depends on what you mean by "bodhi".

Crazywisdom said:

Buddhadharma is really and truly THE most amazing phenomena in the history of the universe. How it makes us feel, how it transforms us and empowers us is something wondrous. All of Buddhism is very special and unique. Practitioners, whether high or low are all so so very very precious. Even to think of awakening once is such a precious moment, not just for oneself but in the history of sentient beings. Even one thought has so many karmic ripples.

Malcolm wrote:

Indeed.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, May 24th, 2014 at 12:40 AM

Title: Re: China expands new measures to directly control Tibetan m

Content:

uan said:

Their culture was a theocracy and was centered around supporting that theocracy. A theocracy is not Dharma. Samsara existed in Tibet and permeated all levels of their culture, just like any other culture.

Malcolm wrote:

You really have no understanding of Tibetan history or culture.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, May 24th, 2014 at 12:38 AM

Title: Re: why is Vajrayana considered the fastest way to buddhahood

Content:

JKhedrup said:

If it did, both sides would just be collecting negative karma back and forth I think. When I was in Thailand I put aside my views and respectfully learnt what I was taught by conservative Dhammayutika Nikaya Theravada masters. I am glad I didn't push the envelope because I wouldn't have learned nearly as much and would have upset people.

Malcolm wrote:

Of course. It would be like going to Dhammawheel and insisting that people were wasting their time with Theravada and the Pali canon. Practicing any of the Buddha's teachings is never a waste of time.

What is a waste of time is when sectarian Theravadins like TRC come here and try to shove the Pali Canon down our throats.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, May 24th, 2014 at 12:34 AM

Title: Re: why is Vajrayana considered the fastest way to buddhahood

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

But not necessarily the supreme authority of any of the Mainstream Buddhist canons. For example, in Tibetan Buddhism, the doctrine of the three kinds of nirmanakāyas comes from the Sutrālaṃkāra attributed to the Maitreya Bodhisattva. Because this text is by a tenth stage bodhisattva, it is considered to Buddhavaśana. Likewise, the Three Bodhisattva Commentaries on the Tantras are considered in the same light since they are authored, according to tradition, by tenth stage Bodhisattvas.

santa100 said:

Since you keep saying "Mainstream Buddhist", please define exactly what you mean. Per the cross references I have provided with the Chinese Taishos and the Tibetan, please be explicit on what exactly is and is not included in that "Mainstream Buddhist" source of yours.

I have no problem with the Bodhisattva comy. but you will have to reconcile it with your own Tibetan and the Chinese Taisho equivalences of MN 115 source I have provided, which was the Buddha's own words. I don't know about you, but I'd place my bet with the Buddha's teaching in

<https://books.google.com/books?id=lt7kFLVNONcC&pg=PT377&lpg=PT377&dq=That+bhikkhu%E2%80%99s+statement+should+neither+be+approved+nor+rejected&source=bl&ots=hnUHIu->

hvM&sig=ElhMoutbuf01Si4LZtgovpV2e8Q&hl=en&sa=X&ei=p2B9U5TTD63KsQSDjIDwBA&ved=0CCYQ6AEwAA#v=onepage&q=That%20bhikkhu%E2%80%99s%20statement%20should%20neither%20be%20approved%20nor%20rejected&f=false

Malcolm wrote:

Mainstream Buddhism refers to the canons of the Theravadins, Sarvastivadins and so on, what are often called the Śrāvaka canon. The Chinese canon combines both the Agamas and the Vaipulya [aka Mahāyāna] sūtras together. There are indeed a few scattered Śrāvakayāna sūtras in the bKa' 'gyur in the mdo sde section, but in any case, these are not considered as authoritative as Mahāyāna sūtras,

As pointed out to you, now for the third time, I have not, and no one has said, that there can be two SUPREME nirmanakāyas in a given world system, but there is nothing forbidding anyone to obtain the same result as the Buddha himself in this world system during the dispensation of Shakyamuni's Dharma. Such persons therefor are nirmanakāyas, known as "nirmanakāyas through birth" because they have fully completed both stores of wisdom and merit and are completely free from the two obscurations. Nirmanakāyas are Buddhas.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 23rd, 2014 at 11:58 PM

Title: Re: why is Vajrayana considered the fastest way to buddhahood

Content:

santa100 said:

...all schools believe in the authority of the Sutta Pitaka.

Malcolm wrote:

But not necessarily the supreme authority of any of the Mainstream Buddhist canons.

For example, in Tibetan Buddhism, the doctrine of the three kinds of nirmanakāyas comes from the Sutrālaṃkāra attributed to the Maitreya Bodhisattva. Because this text is by a tenth stage bodhisattva, it is considered to Buddhavaśana. Likewise, the Three Bodhisattva Commentaries on the Tantras are considered in the same light since they are authored, according to tradition, by tenth stage Bodhisattvas.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 23rd, 2014 at 11:46 PM

Title: Re: Do Tummo-practitioners describe this?

Content:

zenman said:

Copied from <https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Tummo> " onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;" onclick="window.open(this.href);return false; by Kurt Keutzer

Kundalini yoga in the Natha Sampradaya and Vajrayana in Tibetan Buddhism both take their origin from the Mahasiddhas who were active in India from the 8th century to the 12th century. Kundalini yoga practices formed the core of the teachings of a number of these Mahasiddhas and are strongly represented in both Tibetan Buddhist practices and contemporary kundalini yoga practices. Kundalini yoga was spoken of as "Candali yoga" by these Mahasiddhas and became known as gTummo rnal 'byor in Tibet. Candali yoga was a key practice of the famous Tibetan yogin Milarepa.

How does this claim fit in the picture?

What little I've heard or read of tummo, they have to do with breathing, moving attention and visualising in the central channel in the spine. I don't mean to be a drag Malcolm but what you say is a major surprise for me. If spine practices nor kundalini energy are utilised what do they/you guys do then? No specific information needed, just general remarks with slight explanations, please.

Malcolm wrote:

There is no meditation related to the spine, for the third time.

Yes, caṇḍali yoga involves kumbhaka.

In general the spine is considered to be a major subsidiary channel.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 23rd, 2014 at 11:32 PM

Title: Re: why is Vajrayana considered the fastest way to buddhahood

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

This is not a statement that they will achieve buddhahood in a single life in Sukhavati.

Astus said:

The 11th vow:

"If, when I attain Buddhahood, humans and devas in my land should not dwell in the Definitely Assured State and unfailingly reach Nirvana, may I not attain perfect Enlightenment."

Later in the Larger Sutra:

"Sentient beings who are born in that Buddha-land all reside among those assured of Nirvana."

Also:

"However hard you may practice in this life, it can only be for a short while. In the life to come you will be born in the land of Amitayus and enjoy endless bliss there. Being forever in accord with the Way, you will no longer be subject to birth-and-death and be free of the afflictions caused by greed, anger and stupidity. If you wish your life to be as long as a kalpa, a hundred kalpas, or ten million kalpas, it will be just as you please. You will dwell in effortless spontaneity and attain Nirvana."

Shinran's collection of quotes regarding enlightenment in the Pure Land:

<http://www.amidanet.com/kgss-e.htm>

Malcolm wrote:

None of these citations assure buddhahood in a single lifetime.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 23rd, 2014 at 10:37 PM

Title: Re: why is Vajrayana considered the fastest way to buddhahood

Content:

Astus said:

The Pure Land path is the easy method of guaranteed buddhahood in one life.

In the <http://www.amidanet.com/amida-sutra-b.htm>:

"sentient beings born in that land all dwell in the Stage of Non-retrogression, and will not fall again into an evil realm, be born in a border-land or in the state of debased people or mlecchas. They always enjoy visiting pure lands of other Buddhas. With their excellent vows and practice advancing and developing every moment, they will unflinchingly realize the highest, perfect Enlightenment."

Malcolm wrote:

This is not a statement that they will achieve buddhahood in a single life in Sukhavati.

Astus said:

The <http://www.amidanet.com/contemplation-sutra.htm> says about birth on the lowest level of the lowest grade:

"Because he calls the Buddha's Name, with each repetition, the evil karma which he has committed during eighty kotis of kalpas of Samsara is extinguished. When he comes to die, he sees before him a golden lotus-flower like the disk of the sun, and in an instant he is born within a lotus-bud in the Land of Utmost Bliss. After twelve great kalpas the lotus-bud opens. When the flower opens, Avalokiteshvara and Mahasthamaprapta teach him with voices of great compassion the method of extinguishing evil karma through the realization of Suchness of all dharmas. Hearing this, he rejoices and immediately awakens aspiration for Enlightenment."

The 19th vow in the <http://www.amidanet.com/larger-sutra-1.htm>:

"If, when I attain Buddhahood, sentient beings in the lands of the ten quarters, who awaken aspiration for Enlightenment, do various meritorious deeds and sincerely desire to be born in my land, should not, at their death, see me appear before them surrounded by a multitude of sages, may I not attain perfect Enlightenment."

And vow 46:

"If, when I attain Buddhahood, bodhisattvas in my land should not be able to hear spontaneously whatever teachings they may wish, may I not attain perfect Enlightenment."

Malcolm wrote:

These three statements have nothing to do with buddhahood in one lifetime. There is a very strong Amitabha tradition in Tibetan Buddhism, it is an important practice for millions of Tibetans. Karma Chagme has the mostly beautiful aspiration prayer for birth in Sukhavati and there are several important commentaries written on these topics.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 23rd, 2014 at 10:34 PM

Title: Re: why is Vajrayana considered the fastest way to buddhahood

Content:

TRC said:

Lastly, it seems that many here are upset because I dare question the veracity of the grandiose claims of the Vajrayana.

Malcolm wrote:

Your rudeness in starting a sectarian feud is inappropriate when I was merely answering someone's questions.

TRC said:

You obviously don't like being challenged on this. However, if you continually make grandiose and provocative claims on a public forum (even if it is in response to a question), people are going to question them, and I believe they have a right to question them. I'm sure others feel this way too, so you may need to get used to it.

Malcolm wrote:

What is even more inappropriate is the fact that you come here your "Mainstream" Buddhist biases and expect us to accept them as definitive. This is a Mahāyāna and Vajrayāna forum. It is not a Theravada forum. Go back to Dhammawheel.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 23rd, 2014 at 10:28 PM

Title: Re: why is Vajrayana considered the fastest way to buddhahood

Content:

TRC said:

Notice also the absence of any polemic and sectarian rhetoric written into the Pali Canon? That's because its content was established pre-sectarianism. The Lankavatara Sutra was written post-sectarianism. Do you see the relevance here?

Malcolm wrote:

Who are you kidding? There is plenty sectarian rhetoric in Mainstream Buddhism, it just happens to be aimed at tirthikas such as the Jains, and so on.

TRC said:

I maintain that the quantification and the sectarian comparative determination of levels of awakening cannot be verified, and the labels attached to them are just loaded concepts.

The whole exercise of claiming highest, fastest, most profound, etc is puerile and silly and bears no resemblance to the reality on the ground.

Malcolm wrote:

What a laugh. When it comes to the tīrthikas you excuse the exact same thing in the Pali Canon that you accuse us of.

The worldly are bound by desire, desire itself brings liberation.

This contrary meditation will not be understood by Buddhist tīrthikas.

— Hevajra Tantra

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 23rd, 2014 at 9:56 PM

Title: Re: why is Vajrayana considered the fastest way to buddhahood

Content:

Dan74 said:

My sense is that Zen (or Seon that I've been taught) can be a direct path and very fast if one has the right karma, but most of us don't and so teachers take that into account. Not having practiced Vajrayana, I can only surmise that it has a somewhat different toolkit which may sometimes help cut through a lot of garbage, and sometimes not. Just like any other school, really. I recall John Blofeld saying that Zen was too hard for him, that he was too dull (he ordained with Ven Hsu Yun) and he switched to Vajrayana. Go figure!

Malcolm wrote:

It's a completely different understanding of the path, meditation, the body, and so on than sūtrayāna.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 23rd, 2014 at 9:52 PM

Title: Re: Is Rebirth Unscientific?

Content:

Andrew108 said:

The causes need to be somewhere and they need to be active without a physical body. That is, they must have potentiality and function by themselves or in and of themselves. If someone asserts a literal interpretation of rebirth then it is impossible not to imply that some substance with energy and potentiality continues and directs itself towards taking another material form.

Malcolm wrote:

Andrew, this is your limitation. In any case, it is karma that accounts for rebirth.

Andrew108 said:

If you don't take a literal view of rebirth and see rebirth as the experience of becoming in this life only...

Malcolm wrote:

...then you have abandoned the Buddha's teachings.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 23rd, 2014 at 9:30 PM

Title: Re: why is Vajrayana considered the fastest way to buddhahood

Content:

JKhedrup said:

Also, there are the different "grades" of lotuses, which has always confused me a bit. How are these grades determined?

Malcolm wrote:

By your karma and merit. Some take rebirth in Suhavati and never see Amitabha's face. In some respects, Sukhavati is like taking a nap from sasmara.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 23rd, 2014 at 9:29 PM

Title: Re: Do Tummo-practitioners describe this?

Content:

zenman said:

Oh, OK. I thought tummo was all about that. Well... are any vajrayana practices concerned with breathing in the spine and kundalini?

Malcolm wrote:

Nope, not at all.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 23rd, 2014 at 9:21 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

pensum said:

if it is true that the self is not a thing but a process ... then it is also true that the tragedy of the ego dissolves because, strictly speaking, nobody is ever born and nobody ever dies. "

Malcolm wrote:

The self isn't even a process, it is just an innate imputation.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 23rd, 2014 at 9:13 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Wayfarer said:

I think there have been scientific discoveries...which are indubitably profound

Malcolm wrote:

I really don't agree.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 23rd, 2014 at 8:42 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Wayfarer said:

Science is indispensable and if used wisely brings many material benefits.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, but it is not profound.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 23rd, 2014 at 8:38 PM

Title: Re: why is Vajrayana considered the fastest way to buddhahood

Content:

TRC said:

Why would the Buddha, the founder of the movement teach such a lowly level of awakening (I.E. the Arahant)?

Malcolm wrote:

First of all, Buddha differentiates the bodhi of a buddha and the bodhi of an arhat.

Secondly, Buddha taught according to the needs of the disciples he had in front of him. They compiled a canon. He taught other things to devas, brahmans, kṣatriyas, etc. He even says so himself in the Mainstream sūtras, but he does not state what he taught them.

And Buddha was not the founder of Buddhadharma. Buddhadharma has existed for eons and eons in many different expressions. Sometimes there is a monastic Sangha, sometimes there isn't a monastic Sangha and so on.

Moreover, the Buddha explains in the Lankāvatara sūtra that he is not even the definitive buddha.

In any case, if you want to understand the difference between the bodhi of an Arhat and a Bodhisattva, you should read Maitreya's Abhisamayālaṃkāra, which explains the Prajñāpāramitasūtras treatment of the bodhi of arhats and so on.

Dan74 said:

Malcolm, in the light of what we know today about the development of Buddhism, a literal belief in all of the above is somewhat naive, don't you think?

I ask myself how this discussion is relevant to my practice and I come up empty-handed. There is much that you say that is actually very useful but these sectarian threads, what purpose do they serve?

Malcolm wrote:

So you are including the idea that Sakyamuni was not the founder of Buddhadharma among those literal beliefs that are naive? You believe there is no difference between the awakening of an arhat and a Buddha? Which exactly are the naive beliefs to which you refer?

As for the thread — this thread was not a sectarian thread until others chose to make it so. I was merely answering a question.

Dan74 said:

The only good reason I can see for the Vajra claim is to increase Vajra practitioners' determination, but it just seems to lead to pride, resentment and wrangling...

Malcolm wrote:

You don't understand Vajrayāna, and as I already told you, if you really wanted to understand it, you'd have to take Vajrayāna teachings, and that comes with some commitments.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 23rd, 2014 at 8:11 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

JKhedrup said:

Well stated.

I should add I think that in some cases a rigorous scientific training produces very sharp and intelligent Buddhists, much more capable of debate of the finer points than I am. However, in a number of cases it also seems to lead to a dichotomy of world-view which seems to be troubling or frustrating for some people, both from the POV of their Buddhist practice and their daily life. They are difficult worlds to reconcile, though for those more intelligent than I, it sure may be possible.

Malcolm wrote:

They cannot be reconciled. To adapt a statement by Rongzom to the present conversation; the words of Buddhadharma are simple and easy to understand, but the meaning is very profound and hard to realize; the words of science and so on are very detailed and intricate, but the meaning is as rough and course as a pile of dust.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 23rd, 2014 at 7:58 PM

Title: Re: Supreme Nirmanakaya

Content:

reddust said:

Malcolm said: In Mahāyāna, and especially Vajrayāna, it is considered possible for there to be more than one nirmanakāya during a given Buddha's dispensation. However, it is only possible for there to be one supreme Nirmanakāya during any given dispensation in any given world system.

Why is it not possible for there to be two Supreme Nirmanakaya when the Dharma is still being taught? Is it because a Buddha has no ignorance, aversion and craving so there is nothing to see?

Malcolm wrote:

It is because only one Buddha at a time may demonstrate the deeds of discovering the path, and so on. However, this does not preclude others from reaching the same level of realization the Buddha himself attained.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 23rd, 2014 at 7:54 PM

Title: Re: chNNr New York Retreat

Content:

Bhusuku said:

Can't seem to find any infos on this one, so I'm wondering... is this a new Longsal teaching?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, AFAIK.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 23rd, 2014 at 7:17 PM

Title: Re: why is Vajrayana considered the fastest way to buddhahood

Content:

PorkChop said:

This is where the paths diverge. It's not empty rhetoric as there's an actual training method being described. It's also described in Chapter 26th of the Avatamsaka, known as the Chapter on the Ten Grounds, but I don't have a complete translation to work with.

Nagarjuna talks about the equivalency (of Arhats, Pratekyabuddhas, and 8th Bhumi Bodhisattvas) a lot in his commentaries.

Malcolm wrote:

No, this is not right; the paths diverge in the generation of bodhicitta. Arhats do not form the bodhicitta to attain full buddhahood. While there is also a Bodhisattva path in Mainstream Buddhism, which as I mention before, it is not detailed in Mainstream Buddhist sūtras. As Nāgārjuna points out in the Ratnavali:

Ignorant blind people cannot bear this Mahāyāna the Buddha taught;
the great path of awakening that has the nature of merit and wisdom.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 23rd, 2014 at 6:42 PM

Title: Re: why is Vajrayana considered the fastest way to buddhahood

Content:

TRC said:

You "think." And that is the crux of the problem. Speculating and making claims about things which cannot be determined. As these claims can never be determined, it is just irresponsible and provocative to make them. It creates disharmony and is divisive.

Malcolm wrote:

It all depends on what one accepts as authoritative.

In general, here, we accept Mahāyāna sūtras as authoritative. Therefore, when someone comes along and complains that common ideas found in Mahāyāna are "speculative" and "cannot be determined", when in fact they can by recourse to examining the foundational texts of our tradition, this itself "creates disharmony and is divisive".

In fact, the person disrupting this thread, clearly out of a sense of self-righteous indignation, is none other than you. Your comments are clearly out of place since I was merely responding to a person's question. The claims made in the Mahāyāna and Vajrayāna traditions may enrage you, as they clearly do, but you should go be enraged somewhere where people will be sympathetic to you.. Because certainly, your comments are not welcome here, they add nothing to the conversation.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 23rd, 2014 at 6:31 PM

Title: Re: why is Vajrayana considered the fastest way to buddhahood

Content:

TRC said:

Why would the Buddha, the founder of the movement teach such a lowly level of awakening (I.E. the Arahant)?

Malcolm wrote:

First of all, Buddha differentiates the bodhi of a buddha and the bodhi of an arhat.

Secondly, Buddha taught according to the needs of the disciples he had in front of him. They compiled a canon. He taught other things to devas, brahmans, kṣatriyas, etc. He even says so himself in the Mainstream sūtras, but he does not state what he taught them.

And Buddha was not the founder of Buddhadharma. Buddhadharma has existed for eons and eons in many different expressions. Sometimes there is a monastic Sangha, sometimes there isn't a monastic Sangha and so on.

Moreover, the Buddha explains in the Lankāvatara sūtra that he is not even the definitive buddha.

In any case, if you want to understand the difference between the bodhi of an Arhat and a Bodhisattva, you should read Maitreya's Abhisamayālaṃkāra, which explains the Prajñāpāramitasūtras treatment of the bodhi of arhats and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 23rd, 2014 at 6:20 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Andrew108 said:

I don't really see this discussion as a contest. Posters here are free to hold whatever beliefs they like and I am not interested in conditioning anybody. What has kept me in the discussion is the hope that Malcolm can furnish some amazing logic or description that gives belief in rebirth a solid foundation. I don't think he has been able to do this.

Malcolm wrote:

The problem here, Andrew, is not my logic, but rather, your commitment to materialism. It is just as Dharmakīrti points out: if the "opponent" is committed to materialism, the conversation can go no further. In order to have a true debate there must be some commonly agreed upon principles. You and I have no commonly agreed upon principles concerning the matter that we have been discussing.

Andrew108 said:

This idea of warmth for example is very weak. Where would the 'warmth' come from in the bardo for example?

Malcolm wrote:

The diaphanous body of the gandharva, of course.

Andrew108 said:

It's about belief and to that end how that belief supports real results. Initially many Buddhist practitioners take on Buddhist beliefs with enthusiasm, imagining that they open up a way of seeing the world that is new and insightful. After some time these beliefs become more restrictive and practitioners understand that to continue they must submit.

Malcolm wrote:

Not, really. One sees that the Buddha's own logic makes sense and so continues down his path.

Andrew108 said:

I'm not alone in my scepticism of rebirth. Posters here might of heard of Stephen Batchelor but I wonder if they have read the sceptical views of Glenn Wallis (who claims not to be a Buddhist whilst holding a PhD in Buddhist studies)?

Malcolm wrote:

Glenn Wallis adds nothing of interest to the conversation. Such people merely wish to destroy Dharma, create a "Franken-Dharma" fashioned out of bit and pieces of the corpse of Buddhadharma they have left for dead. There are a lot of people who hold PhD's in Buddhists studies, this means that they are might be good at languages [though this is varies with the person] and writing book reports and not much else, necessarily. It does not mean that they are insightful, or that they have a deep understanding of the subject about which they write.

Andrew108 said:

Anyway I don't think the discussion is going to continue or that I really want to put my effort into presenting the 'other side'. If Malcolm or others can put forward a logically coherent case for how it is consciousness gets reborn then I might chip in.

Malcolm wrote:

Sure I have, the problem is that you don't accept the basic terms of the discussion because of your intellectual commitment to nonbuddhist materialism.

Andrew108 said:

My own bias is that if you understand Madhyamaka and you practice contemplation in which results lead to reduction of kleshas then you have no need for the beliefs around rebirth and so on.

Malcolm wrote:

For materialists, there are all kinds of contemplations out there Andrew, even some materialists in Ancient India were contemplatives.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 23rd, 2014 at 10:28 AM

Title: Re: why is Vajrayana considered the fastest way to buddhahood

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

There is no Mainstream Buddhist sūtra nor Mahāyāna sūtra that asserts full buddhahood can be realized in a single lifetime. This is strictly a Vajrayāna claim.

PorkChop said:

Would the http://www.bdk.or.jp/pdf/bdk/digitaldl/DBET\_T0848\_Vairocana\_2005.pdf be considered a Vajrayāna Sutra?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes.

Moreover, he assumed the appearance of vajradharas and the bodhisattvas Samantabhadra, Padmapāṇi, and so on, and proclaimed everywhere in the ten directions the Dharma of the pure words of the mantra path so that [all the steps from] the initial generation of the [bodhi-]mind up to the ten stages may be progressively satisfied in this lifetime, the seeds of the karmic[ally determined] lives of the varieties of sentient beings who have been born and nurtured by karma may be eradicated, and there may also occur the sprouting of [wholesome] seeds.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 23rd, 2014 at 8:37 AM

Title: Re: why is Vajrayana considered the fastest way to buddhahood

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

It is based on the commentary, which clarifies...

...This is strictly a Vajrayana claim

santa100 said:

As you've said, it's the comy's interpretation, not the Buddha's own words. At best, it's still a life time work, not the Satipatthana sutta's attainment in 7 days.

Malcolm wrote:

This is the attainment of an Arhat, not even that of a first stage bodhisattva. It is completely different.

And no, King Indrabhuti and many other siddhas attained buddhahood merely through receiving empowerments.

Anyway, your mind is made up. You have decided that Mainstream Buddhist sutras are the most authoritative. I respect that and wish you all the best of luck.

santa100 said:

Sakya Pandita...

Malcolm wrote:

...says:

If one who possesses the three vows understands the profound points of the two stages, it is said that in this life, the bardo or within sixteen lifetimes, that one will accomplish perfect buddhahood.

Incidentally, there are many other such citations from the tantras, but I don't have time to dig them all out for you.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 23rd, 2014 at 8:08 AM

Title: Re: why is Vajrayana considered the fastest way to buddhahood

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The Guhyasamaja states:... accomplish[buddhahood] in this life the "buddhahood" in brackets is your own note? If not, still says nothing about SammaSambuddha as I have requested. Also, please provide URL.
<http://asianclassics.org/reader.php?collection=kangyur&index=416>

It is based on the commentary, which clarifies that "in this lifetime" refers to attaining the state of Buddha Mahāvajradhara.

Sri-devikali-namastasata:...

Please provide full context with URL to make sure this talks about sentient beings instead of the Buddha himself.

<http://asianclassics.org/reader.php?collection=kangyur&index=639>

Sri-candraguhyatilaka-nama-mahatantraraja:...

Please, for crying out loud, one doesn't even have to be a Buddhist Noble disciple to master the siddhis.

So, yes, please continue, there's still nothing about being the "fastest" nor SammaSambuddha as repeatedly requested.

Ummm, actually, "all siddhis" means both the common siddhis as well as the supreme siddhi, buddhahood.

In general, in order to accomplish Buddhahood, it takes three incalculable eons. So when a text says that this can happen in a single lifetime, that is fast. There is no Mainstream Buddhist sūtra nor Mahāyāna sūtra that asserts full buddhahood can be realized in a single lifetime. This is strictly a Vajrayāna claim.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 23rd, 2014 at 6:57 AM

Title: Re: why is Vajrayana considered the fastest way to buddhahood

Content:

santa100 said:

Please understand that I'm in no way trying give you a hard time. But in order to engage in an informative, fair and objective discussion, we need to support our claims with backup literatures and proper sutra references. So far, I have not seen the appropriate sources to support your claim that Vajrayana is indeed the "fastest" vehicle that helps one to become a Fully Enlightened Buddha (SammaSambuddha). On my part, I have provided 2 sources straight from the Buddha's teaching in the Tipitaka: one is the proper way to handle peoples' claims and the other is the impossibility of 2 Fully Enlightened Buddhas in the same world-system ( <http://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=77&t=16555&start=40#p235723> )

Malcolm wrote:

The Guhyasamāja states: Because of this, lords of Dharma, ornamented with an ocean of wisdom arising from the three inseparable kāyas, accomplish [buddhahood] in this life.
Śrī-devikālī-nāmāṣṭaśataka: Omniscient and self-knowing, also the twelve bhumis of buddhahood are rapidly produced in this lifetime.

Śrī-candraguhyatilaka-nāma-mahātantrarājā The great bliss of all siddhis will be accomplished by this in one lifetime.
Sarvatathāgatacittaguhyajñānārthagarbhavajrakrodhakulatantrapinathārthavidyāyogasi ddhi-nāma-mahāyāna-sūtra In this one lifetime, sambuddhahood.
Do you really need me to continue?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 23rd, 2014 at 5:55 AM

Title: Re: why is Vajrayana considered the fastest way to buddhahood

Content:

santa100 said:

All I see there is the key phrase "every sentient being is fully shown", which says nothing about the claim you said Vajrayana as the best vehicle for one to attain Fully Enlightened Buddha state (SammaSambuddha) and more importantly, nothing that contradicts the Buddha's teaching in MN 115 that "It is impossible, it cannot happen that two Accomplished Ones, Fully Enlightened Ones, could arise contemporaneously in one world-system—there is no such possibility".

Malcolm wrote:

I already explained to you that there can only be one supreme nirmanakāya in any given world system. But this does not preclude variegated nirmanakāyas, as I have already explained.

santa100 said:

Again, nothing about Vajrayana and nothing about the fastest way to attain Fully Enlightend state.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, it is axiomatic that Vajrayāna makes such claims. Do you really want me to dig out the Vajrayāna citations about variegated nirmanakāyas and the rapidity of Vajrayāna? Is it necessary? I can, if it will make you happy.

I am not trying to convert anyone, I was merely answering a posed question. I really do not see why people are getting so up in arms over this.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 23rd, 2014 at 1:49 AM

Title: Re: why is Vajrayana considered the fastest way to buddhahood

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Only a Buddha is completely free from all afflictive obscurations.

Should be "Only a Buddha is completely free from all non-afflictive obscurations."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 23rd, 2014 at 1:38 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Andrew108 said:

But still you have repeatedly stated that it has energy...

Malcolm wrote:

No, you stated it for me, and since then, have not wavered from your mistake.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 23rd, 2014 at 12:50 AM

Title: Re: Is Rebirth Unscientific?

Content:

Andrew108 said:

So far we have Malcolm saying that consciousness is massless, yet supported by warmth...

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, because in living bodies, there is warmth, in dead bodies, there is none. It's a simple empirical observation.

Andrew108 said:

So after death what is consciousness supported by?

Malcolm wrote:

It takes new body, as has been endlessly explained to you.

Of course not all realms of rebirth are material, so in those "places" consciousness is sustained on karma alone.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 23rd, 2014 at 12:47 AM

Title: Re: why is Vajrayana considered the fastest way to buddhahood

Content:

Dan74 said:

Does the Bodhisattva not have to attain liberation from delusion? So does the Vajra path speed that up?

Malcolm wrote:

Arhats are liberated from affliction, according the Sarvastivadins, Arhats and Pratyekabuddhas still possess a non-afflictive ignorance. Only a Buddha is completely free from all afflictive obscurations. Further, according the Lankāvatara, Arhats and Pratyekabuddhas are roused from the samādhi of cessation in which they enter at their death, only to begin on the bodhisattva path. There are also differences in the depth of emptiness taught in the Mainstream Canon, i.e. the Agamas and Nikayas.

So, yes, the Vajrayāna does speed up the process, because unlike common Mahāyāna where emptiness is the result, etc., Vajrayāna experientially introduces the wisdom to be realized right at the very beginning.

Since someone asked, I have answered.

Granted, in order gain the satisfaction of Vajrayāna claims, one must do the practice very perfectly and study and practice under a qualified guru.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 23rd, 2014 at 12:29 AM

Title: Re: why is Vajrayana considered the fastest way to buddhahood

Content:

Dan74 said:

Unique - I haven't seen it yet.

Malcolm wrote:

Without fully studying Vajrayāna, you won't. And you cannot really study it without entering it. And you cannot enter it without making commitments, hence it is secret and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 23rd, 2014 at 12:26 AM

Title: Re: why is Vajrayana considered the fastest way to buddhahood

Content:

santa100 said:

So I'm not sure which particular Mahayana or Vajrayana source you're referring to (please provide sutra references and related backup literatures) that contradicts the Buddha's teaching in the Tipitaka.

Malcolm wrote:

The Avatamska sūtra, volume nga, folio 147a, Lhasa:

Oh Jinaputras, when the samyaksambuddha, the unsurpassed dharmarāja, manifests with an unceasing manifestation of Dharma, the entire dharmadhātu is entirely filled with the cloud of dharmakāya, and truly shows a cloud of kāyas according to the inclinations of sentient beings. In this way, each and every sentient being is fully shown a cloud of kāyas being born; each and every sentient being is fully shown a cloud of nirmanakāyas; each and every sentient being is fully shown a cloud of kāyas of blessings; each and every sentient being is fully shown a cloud of rūpakāyas; each and every sentient being is fully shown a cloud of full accomplished variegated kāyas; each and every sentient being is fully shown a cloud of punyakāyas; each and every sentient being is fully shown a cloud of jñānakāyas; each and every sentient being is fully shown a cloud of unconquerable strong kāyas; each and every sentient being is fully shown a cloud of fearless splendid kāyas.

The Lanka states:

In delightful Akaniṣṭha,
beyond the pure abodes,
the true Buddha becomes a Buddha;
an emanated one becomes a Buddha here.

So you see, there is no reason any number of persons cannot become Buddha here on Jambudvīpa, because Buddhas do not, according to Mahāyāna, actually attain buddhahood here anyway.

It is true that teaching of the variegated nirmankāya is more thoroughly taught in Vajrayāna texts, but it is present in Mahāyāna as well, as you can see from the above.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 22nd, 2014 at 11:31 PM

Title: Re: why is Vajrayana considered the fastest way to buddhahood

Content:

Dan74 said:

The Buddha in Satipatthana Sutta says :

...

Of course there is a condition, "if". And to maintain the the Four Arisings for a week certainly requires a karma that is accumulated over some serious practice. But the same thing can be said about keeping the samaya. So yes, one lifetime, provided you've cultivated for x lifetimes that enables you to meet the right guru and keep the samaya... No?

Malcolm wrote:

There are no methods for attaining full Buddhahood in Mainstream Buddhism, even thought a limited version of the bodhisattva path is taught.

Dan74 said:

This claim is hard to believe, since the Buddha is not really known for making such a distinction. The Suttas are about liberation, and according to them the arahats attain full release. Of course one can believe that there is something higher and beyond, but this is a belief, and one based on latter developments. I take it no one here surpassed arahatship?

But considering that most of us are not going to, and seeing that the Buddha taught that release is possible in this lifetime too, I think it takes the wind out of the Vajra claim. As far as I can make out, the speediest path is the one that one is ready to commit to fully, and the one with the right teacher and Sangha.

Malcolm wrote:

No one doubts that the Mainstream Buddhist path brings about freedom, in the sense of full freedom from afflictions, that is the awakening of an arhat or a pratyekabuddha. But that is not the awakening to which Vajrayāna refers. The awakening to which Vajrayāna refers is the full buddhahood that results from gathering the two accumulations as taught Mahāyāna. The bodhisattva path is not detailed in any of the Mainstream canons. For the Mainstream canons, it is extra-canonical.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 22nd, 2014 at 11:01 PM

Title: Re: why is Vajrayana considered the fastest way to buddhahood

Content:

Dan74 said:

The Buddha in Satipatthana Sutta says :

...

Of course there is a condition, "if". And to maintain the the Four Arisings for a week certainly requires a karma that is accumulated over some serious practice. But the same thing can be said about keeping the samaya. So yes, one lifetime, provided you've cultivated for x lifetimes that enables you to meet the right guru and keep the samaya... No?

Malcolm wrote:

There are no methods for attaining full Buddhahood in Mainstream Buddhism, even though a limited version of the bodhisattva path is taught.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 22nd, 2014 at 10:59 PM

Title: Re: why is Vajrayana considered the fastest way to buddhahood

Content:

Jamyang_Tsering said:

Just for the record, if your search for quick enlightenment why not to try Zen!

28. Open Your Own Treasure House

Daiju visited the master Baso in China. Baso asked: "What do you seek?"

"Enlightenment," replied Daiju.

"You have your own treasure house. Why do you search outside?" Baso asked.

Daiju inquired: "Where is my treasure house?"

Baso answered: "What you are asking is your treasure house."

Daiju was enlightened! Ever after he urged his friends: "Open your own treasure house and use those treasures."

Malcolm wrote:

Awakening and Buddhahood are not the same thing.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 22nd, 2014 at 10:04 PM

Title: Re: Is Rebirth Unscientific?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Well, if your only standard is Mainstream Buddhism, such as Theravada or Sarvastivada, this is true. However, Mahāyāna and Vajrayāna has a different understanding of the issue, which is more authoritative for those who follow that teaching.

santa100 said:

I'm not sure what you mean about Mainstream Buddhism. I have cited the sources from the Tipitaka, the Three Baskets that all schools of Buddhism recognize and study. It's not something only the Theravada studies, but the Mahayana and Tibetan schools do too. Please see the cross references <https://suttacentral.net/mn115> and <https://suttacentral.net/an4.180>. So I'm not sure which particular Mahayana or Vajrayana source you're referring to (please provide sutra references and related backup literatures) that contradicts the Buddha's teaching in the Tipitaka.

Malcolm wrote:

In Mahāyāna, and especially Vajrayāna, it is considered possible for there to be more than one nirmanakāya during a given Buddha's dispensation. However, it is only possible for there to be one supreme Nirmanakāya during any given dispensation in any given world system.

As for Tripitika, do you mean the Tripitaka according to the Mainstream Schools, or are you including the Mahāyāna sutras and tantras in that designation?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 22nd, 2014 at 7:45 PM

Title: Re: Is Rebirth Unscientific?

Content:

Andrew108 said:

I have to keep repeating myself because you are not understanding the implications of what I am saying. If consciousness is self-sustaining after death or even supported by 'warmth' (as per Malcolm) then it has energy. If it has energy it can be measured. That is it. We don't need to enter into a philosophical debate about the nature of energy. Just that consciousness, as described by Malcolm who claims to accurately represent the Buddhist view, has characteristics that should be measurable.

Malcolm wrote:

The warmth of a body inhabited by consciousness is measurable, but the consciousness that has a appropriated that series of aggregates is not.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 22nd, 2014 at 7:42 PM

Title: Re: Is Rebirth Unscientific?

Content:

Andrew108 said:

So far we have Malcolm saying that consciousness is massless, yet supported by warmth...

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, because in living bodies, there is warmth, in dead bodies, there is none. It's a simple empirical observation.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 22nd, 2014 at 7:36 PM

Title: Re: why is Vajrayana considered the fastest way to buddhahood

Content:

JKhedrup said:

However, from the headline of a thread, we can see what is written is an answer, from a Vajrayana POV, to a very specific question.

Malcolm wrote:

Thank you for reminding people of this.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 22nd, 2014 at 7:34 PM

Title: Re: why is Vajrayana considered the fastest way to buddhahood

Content:

TRC said:

It has more to do with the practitioner than the path.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes and no.

There is no means for realizing total buddhahood in Mainstream Buddhism, not in Theravada, not in Sarvastivada nor in Dharmaguptaka, the only three Mainstream Buddhist schools left.

In Mahāyāna, total Buddhahood takes a minimum of three incalculable eons, for the best practitioner.

In Vajrayāna, total Buddhahood can be realized in a single lifetime by the best practitioner, but even if you do not practice, as long as you maintain your vows perfectly, one will achieve total Buddha within seven lifetimes.

You can either accept or reject these accounts as you wish. There is really nothing to argue about. Incidentally, I am merely reporting the assertions made in these schools. Whether one accepts these assertions or not depends upon one's own inclinations.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 22nd, 2014 at 7:28 PM

Title: Re: why is Vajrayana considered the fastest way to buddhahood

Content:

santa100 said:

Bottom line is, though many masters from various schools claimed their attainment of "Buddhahood", per the suttas' teaching, it doesn't mean they have attained "Fully Enlightened" Buddha state for the Dispensation is still around. If they meant the state of Savakabuddha or Arahantship, then any Buddhist school would be just as good provided that its practitioner puts in their best effort to cultivate virtues, meditation, and wisdom (as mentioned from my previous post <http://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=77&t=16555#p235263> )

Malcolm wrote:

Well, if your only standard is Mainstream Buddhism, such as Theravada or Sarvastivada, this is true. However, Mahāyāna and Vajrayāna has a different understanding of the issue, which is more authoritative for those who follow that teaching.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 22nd, 2014 at 7:25 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

dharmagoat said:

Could it be the last vestige of faith?

Malcolm wrote:

That does not really answer the question. It is not a question whether science is "honest" -- indeed, there is as much faith and zeal among scientists in scientific endeavor as there is in evangelical Christians. The question is, can you reconcile what you truly have faith in, i.e. science, with the Buddha's teachings? Unlike Andrew, for example, I don't think that science has gotten at what consciousness is, they don't have the math for it, consciousness cannot be mathematically modeled. I don't think that science will ever be able to get at consciousness because consciousness is not a physical process, in the end, even though nama and rūpa do interact. But the interaction is strictly one way, consciousness interacts with matter, matter does not interact with consciousness. Our brains, our physical eyes, our body are all, in essence, inert matter, conventionally speaking (forget about going into higher Buddhist teachings like Dzogchen where matter is merely the reified luminosity of consciousness). Chemical processes do not amount to consciousness. There is no experiment that can produce consciousness. Consciousness cannot be created in a lab. There is no way to verify experimentally what consciousness is at all, that is, not by any means known to western science. But there is a means to know these things and it involves personally developing the skills to verify the Buddha's teachings on such issues. It's not hard, per se, you just have to be dedicated, and do the work.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 22nd, 2014 at 9:38 AM

Title: Re: why is Vajrayana considered the fastest way to buddhahood

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Do you have any evidence the Buddha was even awakened?

TRC said:

Oh come on, is that the best you can do?

Malcolm wrote:

That is the point, the evidence is the hundreds of biographies of masters in Tibet who achieved Buddhahood or the bhumis.

The evidence we have for Vajrayāna is the same evidence we have for the Buddha, the reports of their close disciples.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 22nd, 2014 at 9:26 AM

Title: Re: why is Vajrayana considered the fastest way to buddhahood

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Fundamentally, speaking, according to Vajrayāna texts, the extraordinary difference in time is due to the fact that Vajrayāna practices use the body as the vehicle for liberation, as well as other special methods, that allow a very serious practitioner to gather the two accumulations that normally require three eons in a single lifetime.

M

TRC said:

Using the "body as the vehicle for liberation." Yeah that's right. Kind of like what the Buddha was saying

<http://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/an/an04/an04.045.than.html>

"Yet it is just within this fathom-long body, with its perception & intellect, that I declare that there is the cosmos, the origination of the cosmos, the cessation of the cosmos, and the path of practice leading to the cessation of the cosmos."

But hold on, that's not a 'vajrayana' practice, just 'sutrayana'. Perhaps the differences between the practices aren't really as different as the rhetoric likes to make out.

Malcolm wrote:

It is completely different.

TRC said:

So Malcolm, do you have any actual evidence that the vajrayana path is really quicker, that are not just claims and boasts?

Malcolm wrote:

Do you have any evidence the Buddha was even awakened?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 22nd, 2014 at 3:33 AM

Title: Re: gDangs And mDangs: Differences In Meaning?

Content:

asunthatneversets said:

A few other questions:

Which is the proper Wylie transliteration for 'dang', in the context of the three energies: dang, rol pa and rtsal [gdangs or mdangs]? Because I have seen both used in that context.

Which [gdangs or mdangs] is the vital essence (dang) spoken of in Tibetan medicine?

How about this third term 'dwangs'? Is dwangs simply an orthographic variant of one of the above terms?

When Namkhai Norbu Rinpoche makes a statement such as "The dang of emptiness is rigpa", which variant [gdangs or mdangs] is he using?

Malcolm wrote:

- 1) gdangs
- 2) mdangs, it is a translation of ojas.
- 3) dwangs ma is the nutriment, it means refined essence.
- 4) gdangs.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 22nd, 2014 at 3:28 AM

Title: Re: Is Rebirth Unscientific?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

First of all, why do you even believe there is such a thing as awakening? What reason do you have to believe such a state is even possible?

dharmagoat said:

Because I have experienced the very beginning of the process (who hasn't?). It is natural to expect more to follow.

Malcolm wrote:

And you consider this sufficient to accept Buddha was an awakened person, yet you disbelieve when rebirth is central to his teachings.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 22nd, 2014 at 3:25 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

People of a scientific bent will need to ask themselves whether they actually believe there is such a thing a awakening.

dharmagoat said:

And if the answer is 'yes', what then?

Malcolm wrote:

Why do you believe such thing.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 22nd, 2014 at 2:43 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The funny thing is that there are folks here who take it on faith that Buddha was a buddha, and yet spend endless energy trying to prove that the awakening Buddha taught is not what he really meant. I mean, doesn't it strike you as odd to on the one hand accept that the Buddha was buddha on faith, and then spend all this effort refuting the Buddha's own teaching?

dharmagoat said:

Who truly appreciates the breadth and depth of the Buddha's skillful means?

Malcolm wrote:

Um, this is a total non-sequitar.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 22nd, 2014 at 2:42 AM

Title: Re: China expands new measures to directly control Tibetan m

Content:

Indrajala said:

Weren't you fine with the Bhutanese booting out the Nepalis, where Nepalis born in Bhutan were selectively identified and ejected from the country (i.e., discrimination by a Buddhist state)?

Malcolm wrote:

I am fine with illegal Mexican immigrants being deported from the US, why should I not be fine with illegal Nepali immigrants being deported from Bhutan?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 22nd, 2014 at 2:37 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

pensum said:

of course it only seems reasonable that now various skillful means ought to be developed for those with a scientific bent.

Malcolm wrote:

There is no need. People of a scientific bent are still just deluded sentient beings. There are sufficient means for everyone already.

People of a scientific bent will need to ask themselves whether they actually believe there is such a thing a awakening.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 22nd, 2014 at 2:35 AM

Title: Re: Is Rebirth Unscientific?

Content:

dharmagoat said:

What troubles me is this idea that any rearrangement of the teachings merely serves to "cater to our biases", instead of, as Andrew describes it, "speaking to our condition as we find it now". The difference seems to be lost on you, which is unfortunate.

Malcolm wrote:

First of all, why do you even believe there is such a thing as awakening? What reason do you have to believe such a state is even possible?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 22nd, 2014 at 2:33 AM

Title: Re: Is Rebirth Unscientific?

Content:

Andrew108 said:

Buddha speaks directly to our condition in the Kālāma Sutta. Through following this teaching and other definitive teachings we become the 'reliable witness'.

Malcolm wrote:

Buddha is talking to a group of non-Buddhists in that text. He then leaves them the "ngondro" of the four brahma-viharas. But he does not teach them any path at all, for the four brahma-viharas are not a path since they do not lead out of samsara.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 22nd, 2014 at 2:23 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

pensum said:

Besides there are countless gateways to the Dharma so who is to say that attempting to disprove the Buddha isn't one of them?

Malcolm wrote:

A much misunderstood point. There are 84 thousand doors to dharma because there are 21,000 doors for addressing the three afflictions, and the three afflictions combined.

In other words, all doors to the Dharma involve addressing the three poisons and nothing else. So they can be included in four, or, since the root of the three poisons is self-grasping, there is only one, since all Dharma practice bears on that point. And why you would want to remove self-grasping? Because it is the force that causes us to take rebirth in samsara again and again. Mainstream Buddhism, Mahāyāna and Vajrayāna all stem the desire to eradicate this single root.

pensum said:

So the tradition itself provides the standard for those who do not surrender to faith so easily and first require sound logic and empirical evidence which they can see with their own (unawakened, fleshy) eyes.

Malcolm wrote:

The funny thing is that there are folks here who take it on faith that Buddha was a buddha, and yet spend endless energy trying to prove that the awakening Buddha taught is not what he really meant. I mean, doesn't it strike you as odd to on the one hand accept that the Buddha was buddha on faith, and then spend all this effort refuting the Buddha's own teaching?

It seems to me that such people really ought to start from beginning:

- 1) What does "buddha" mean?
  - 2) Having discerned what "buddha" means, do I believe in this state?
  - 3) Was Buddha actually a buddha?
- etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 22nd, 2014 at 1:56 AM

Title: Re: China expands new measures to directly control Tibetan m

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The point here, Jeff, is whether their behavior is reprehensible to you.

Indrajala said:

Of course I feel it is wrong to kill, harm and imprison innocent people, but I also recognize that if the Chinese leadership plays their cards wrong then there are a lot more lives than the Tibetans at stake. You seem to think that idealistically if they just did the right thing everything would work out for the best and Tibetans would forgive and forget, but Chinese civilization has many centuries of experience which renders their political thinking cold and calculating because the alternatives haven't always worked out in the past.

Malcolm wrote:

No "buts", Jeff. It is either acceptable or it is not.

Indrajala said:

Their position is really ugly because they inherited territories that were conquered by Mao in earlier decades which were never really part of China. Nevertheless, they have to govern them in the face of hostile neighboring states (India) and now non-national threats (Jihadists). On top of that by virtue of ruling Tibet they have a threatening deterrent against their neighbors which ensures relative peace (India is unlikely to push China into a war, and avoiding war is desirable). In the real world peace is established by having a threatening deterrent against potential enemies. You can be virtuous and honorable, but your enemies don't have to be and probably won't be.

Malcolm wrote:

India is "hostile" because of absurd PRC claims about where their border is. China made their enemies all on their own.

Indrajala said:

Buddhist ethics in the realm of geopolitics are problematic because if you try to be the good guy you can easily end up shot in the back by those who don't play by the rules, and then those whose welfare you were charged with suffer tremendously because you failed your job. Classical Buddhist literature comments on how hard it is being king because you have to commit misdeeds in the course of your duties.

Malcolm wrote:

Understood. Kings and leaders are fools.

Indrajala said:

In any case, I doubt most members on this forum really understand what I am saying because they have a religious belief that China is the model Devil that everyone loves to hate. Almost nobody here is trying to see things from their side. It is just a lot of finger pointing and condemnation, which is reflective of how activists operate in the Tibetan Buddhist scene it seems. As I said, this is really simplistic and doesn't really help to solve the issues at hand.

Malcolm wrote:

[/quote]

Jeff, I don't hate China. I have been there on more than one occasion. I understand why they do what they do, but I will never see things "from their side" because what they are doing is wrong, just as I don't see things from the side of the US Govt., I don't see things from the side of the Mexican Govt. w/regards to Chiapas; or the Israeli Govt. w/regards to Palestine; or the Myanmar Regime w/regards to the Rohingyas (which is more of an issue having to do with border security than anything else, and the Rohingyas are caught in the middle), Japanese Govt. w/regards to ethnic Koreans in Japan and so on.

In other words, I think it is deplorable when Buddhists apologize for atrocity, discrimination, etc., for any reason.

I don't have a personal stake in the Tibetan Nationalist cause, I have never been active in it, never demonstrated. I actually got a good report card from the Party Secretary in the school (we all did) when I was in China for not stirring up anti-Chinese sentiment amongst Tibetans I came into contact with while doing my internship and so on. But Tibet is an important place. It is environmentally important, politically important, and so on to the whole world, not just the Chinese.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 22nd, 2014 at 1:23 AM

Title: Re: Is Rebirth Unscientific?

Content:

Andrew108 said:

Malcolm's point is that the Buddha asserted literal rebirth...

Malcolm wrote:

literally thousands of times, even if you only accept the Mainstream canon (Nikayas/Agamas).

Andrew108 said:

The problem we have is not that we doubt the Buddha's realization and overcoming of suffering, but we doubt that there was a 'reliable witness' to report all of what the Buddha would/could have said if we or someone like us, had been there.

Malcolm wrote:

But you must doubt it. You are merely taking Buddha's realization and overcoming of suffering on blind faith Why can't you see this defect in your own thinking: to wit; you claim to accept the Buddha was a realized person, and yet you reject everything the Buddha says about the terms of how he came to be a realized person. Do you not see the internal contradictions in your own statements?

Andrew108 said:

So the sutras we have need to speak to our condition as we find it now. That is the definition of 'reliable witness'.

Malcolm wrote:

You really do have the strangest ideas. A reliable witness is someone whose testimony is beyond reproach, not someone who caters to our biases.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 22nd, 2014 at 12:39 AM

Title: Re: China expands new measures to directly control Tibetan m

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Finally. It is like pulling your teeth to get you to admit that Chinese policies towards Tibetans are inhumane and savage.

Indrajala said:

My ongoing point has been that despite moral judgments, their behavior is predictably politically amoral because that's often how politics works. Their behavior might be reprehensible to many, but they're acting logically, and the leadership seems to feel that their policies are warranted. Human rights and so on are very alien concepts to much of the world, but then from the Chinese perspective the west just uses "human rights" to bully their opponents and justify acts of unwarranted violence against innocent people.

So in their minds why care about human rights?

Malcolm wrote:

The point here, Jeff, is whether their behavior is reprehensible to you.

Indrajala said:

There is no political stability at stake for the PRC if they left the Tibetans alone to do their thing.

Do you think India wouldn't try to get the Tibetans on their side? What about the border control and Xinjiang? If Tibet gets autonomy, so should Xinjiang, and Xinjiang is easily another Afghanistan in the making. These would presumably be issues apparent to China's leadership.

Malcolm wrote:

Tibetans do not have a good relationship with Muslims in general. So China would have no worries on that score. In fact, if China eased up on Tibetans, supported their national culture, education, gave them education in Tibetan as their primary language will sponsoring CSL programs, as well as TSL programs for Han immigrants into Tibet, etc., if the Chinese stopped discriminating against Tibetans for jobs, and so on, and did a 180, the Tibetans would happily be part of a New China, and would probably even gladly join the PLA and fight Muslim terrorists. Really, I think most of your opinions come from have very little familiarity with Tibetans inside Tibet. But right now the Chinese have given the Tibetans NO reason to have a stake in Chinese security on any level. You have no idea about the resentment that Tibetans inside Tibet have against exile Tibetans, nor the piles of shit Tibetans from Tibet get from exile Tibetans in places like Dharamsala.

Indrajala said:

If the Chinese Govt., had an ounce of sense they would bring back HHDL, restore Tibet, restore Tibetan culture, and turn Tibet into their new best friend.

Have you been reading the idealist Thurman?

Malcolm wrote:

[/quote]

Nope, but it is just plain common sense — you catch more flies with honey than vinegar.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 22nd, 2014 at 12:31 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

LionelTeo said:

What is most important is everyone becomes a better person at the end is all that matters.

Malcolm wrote:

One does not need Buddhism to become a better person.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 22nd, 2014 at 12:29 AM

Title: Re: why is Vajrayana considered the fastest way to buddhahood

Content:

kirtu said:

However just following Cittamatra in some form is sutric. But if you take a Cittamatra POV of emptiness for tantra, then that is tantra. Someone like Mipham Rinpoche *may* have then teased out the results of tantric practice following the Cittamatra in his writings.

Malcolm wrote:

We already know what happens when Cittamatrins practice Vajrayāna, they become Virupa.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 22nd, 2014 at 12:26 AM

Title: Re: Is Rebirth Unscientific?

Content:

Andrew108 said:

I was talking about tha mal gyi shes pa. Which is very close.

asunthatneversets said:

Sems and tha mal gyi shes pa are only 'close' in the same sense that gold and pyrite are 'close', in appearance. However they are not 'close' at all in fundamental characteristic or constitution.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, in the sense that thoughts (citta) are contaminated consciousness, and "ordinary mind" is an untainted consciousness, i.e. ye shes. So the difference is more like gold in gold ore and refined gold, rather than a substantial difference. The shes pa is the same in both.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 22nd, 2014 at 12:22 AM

Title: Re: Is Rebirth Unscientific?

Content:

dharmagoat said:

The apparent contradiction is due to the fact that I attribute the Buddha's teaching of literal rebirth to skillful means on his part. But that is a point of contention that I feel it best not to elaborate on.

Malcolm wrote:

There is actually no evidence that this is the case. There is piles of evidence that Buddha took rebirth literally himself.

dharmagoat said:

Then maybe I don't have complete faith in the Buddha after all. Arrgh!

Malcolm wrote:

My advice is that you should practice as if you accept rebirth. A Buddhist version of Pascal's wager, as it were.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 22nd, 2014 at 12:11 AM

Title: Re: Is Rebirth Unscientific?

Content:

dharmagoat said:

The apparent contradiction is due to the fact that I attribute the Buddha's teaching of literal rebirth to skillful means on his part. But that is a point of contention that I feel it best not to elaborate on.

Malcolm wrote:

There is actually no evidence that this is the case. There is piles of evidence that Buddha took rebirth literally himself.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 22nd, 2014 at 12:10 AM

Title: Re: Is Rebirth Unscientific?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Praṇā and warmth are the supports for consciousness.

Andrew108 said:

But it has energy. Warmth? What do you mean warmth? If it had no mass how could it have warmth? Bizarre.

Malcolm wrote:

Consciousness does not have warmth, warmth is a support for consciousness, as is lifeforce.

The preceding moment of consciousness, i.e. the mental organ (manendriya) acts as the support for consciousness the same way that a son becomes the father of another; a fruit, the seed of another.

The preceding moment of consciousness is as massless as the following moment? So how does a massless mental organ exist? The examples you give all have mass.

Well, "organ" is not a completely adequate translation of indriya. Indriya really means "faculty" or power. The mental organ is not an organ like cakṣuendriya, for example, i.e. the eye faculty.

No substrate is necessary, according to Madhyamakās. The Yogācāra sūtras propose the ālayavijñāna to account for memory, continuity and so on.

But a mental organ is necessary or is the mental organ something that is made at the same time as the following moment of consciousness?

No, the mental faculty (lets not call it an organ since that is really not the right term) is the immediately preceding moment of consciousness.

The point here is that the mental organ and the moment of consciousness can't exist at the same time. So one must precede the other and therefore you have continuity based on a continuing mental organ and moment of consciousness. Here continuing mental organ is no other than functional 'substrate' for continuing moment of consciousness. There is a continuing mental faculty in as much as this moment of consciousness always arises on the basis of the previous moment; the immediately antecedent moment of consciousness is always the mental faculty.

Seeds and sprouts cannot exist at the same time, still, sprouts come from seeds, and produce other seeds all in good time, when there is proper cause and condition.

So this doesn't accord with Madhyamaka reasoning or the definitive teachings of Buddha.

It obviously corresponds with Madhyamaka teachings since Candrakīrti instructs us that the functions of memory and so on are worldly conventions, and as such should not be examined. Or did you just choose to ignore the citation about memory taken from his commentary on MAV 6:75. Ultimately, of course, it cannot bear analysis -- but then, neither can any conventional phenomena. Still, since we are deluded, in the refined sense of not being free from grasping at self, for us conventional truth is where we live. Consciousness is driven by thirst for existence.

So it has that kind of characteristic? How does it know to strive for existence? Or is it like a seed striving to find the light? Is it instinctive? If so then how can a massless thing like consciousness also have instinct and striving?

As before, consciousness is that which knows objects. When it is contaminated, it experiences craving.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, May 21st, 2014 at 11:58 PM

Title: Re: Is Rebirth Unscientific?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The Buddha framed his entire teaching in terms of rebirth. If this is discarded, then Buddha's teachings collapse like an old house.

dharmagoat said:

I have complete faith in the Buddha...

Malcolm wrote:

Apparently you don't because you say:

I do not believe in past lives...

This is fine, you do the best you can. Practice the four brahmaviharas, if you do, then in this life you will be more relaxed.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, May 21st, 2014 at 11:53 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

LionelTeo said:

the subconscious mind...

Malcolm wrote:

...does not exist.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, May 21st, 2014 at 10:53 PM

Title: Re: Is Rebirth Unscientific?

Content:

dharmagoat said:

There is a fundamental contradiction in Buddhism:

The Buddha is known as an independent thinker and innovator. We are encouraged to emulate him, yet are obliged to follow his teaching without question and without making any compensation for the enormous social and cultural changes that have occurred over the 2000+ years since it was written down.

Malcolm wrote:

You are obliged only to understand what the Buddha himself meant by suffering, the cause of suffering, it's cessation, and the path.

Despite all the enormous cultural changes, there is one thing that is still true: there is suffering because of karma, and there is karma because of affliction.

The Buddha framed his entire teaching in terms of rebirth. If this is discarded, then Buddha's teachings collapse like an old house.

There is no point in teaching a path to nirvana if there is no rebirth in samsara.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, May 21st, 2014 at 10:21 PM

Title: Re: Is Rebirth Unscientific?

Content:

oushi said:

There is always this small chance that Buddhas true path was lost long time ago, and we are only juggling with ideas created by fanatic believers.

Malcolm wrote:
I don't believe this.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Wednesday, May 21st, 2014 at 10:17 PM
Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism
Content:

T. Chokyi said:
Secondly, you might want to address directly what Dzongar Khentse Rinpoche has to say or not say about who is Buddhist or not.

Malcolm wrote:
As Sakya Pandita points out, and as Dzogzar Khyentse, A Sakya educated man, knows, acceptance of the four seals is not sufficient to be called a Buddhist. Why? Because the largest monastic school in India, the Pudgalavadins, believed in an inexpressible self that was neither the same as nor different from the aggregates which underwent rebirth.

Instead Sapan opines that in order to be called a "Buddhist" one must have taken refuge in the Three Jewels, be training on the path [implicit in going for refuge] or have realized the fruit of the path.

T. Chokyi said:
"Buddhist" as you know, is a label. It is a word describing something you yourself said you weren't not that long ago...
when you had a kind of "realization" about that...

Malcolm wrote:
Well, what I am is a follower of Buddhadharma. One of the reasons that I eschew the label "Buddhist" for myself is that I am not any particular kind of Buddhist. The term "Buddhist" in many ways is too limiting. I have met "Buddhists" who imagine that because they are Buddhists they cannot take teachings from teachers in other streams of Dharma outside Buddhadharma. I personally have no problem with it. That is why I follow Dharma, and Buddhadharma in particular. All Dharma religions, incidentally, accept rebirth.

However, I have also found that conventionally, it is easier to resort to the term Buddhism and Buddhist in common conversations with others.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Wednesday, May 21st, 2014 at 9:59 PM
Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

T. Chokyi said:

Secondly, you might want to address directly what Dzongar Khentse Rinpoche has to say or not say about who is Buddhist or not.

Malcolm wrote:

As Sakya Pandita points out, and as Dzogzar Khyentse, A Sakya educated man, knows, acceptance of the four seals is not sufficient to be called a Buddhist. Why? Because the largest monastic school in India, the Pudgalavadins, believed in an inexpressible self that was neither the same as nor different from the aggregates which underwent rebirth.

Instead Sapan opines that in order to be called a "Buddhist" one must have taken refuge in the Three Jewels, be training on the path [implicit in going for refuge] or have realized the fruit of the path.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, May 21st, 2014 at 9:28 PM

Title: Re: China expands new measures to directly control Tibetan m

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Chinese policies towards Tibetans are brutal and crimes against humanity.

Indrajala said:

I agree, but when you're rich and powerful your "crimes against humanity" are seldom punished (recall Bush and Blair).

Malcolm wrote:

Finally. It is like pulling your teeth to get you to admit that Chinese policies towards Tibetans are inhumane and savage.

Indrajala said:

...there are millions of lives at stake and the political stability for the PRC.

Malcolm wrote:

There is no political stability at stake for the PRC if they left the Tibetans alone to do their thing. And that they do not do. There is no necessity for the Chinese Govt. to act with such swift brutality against a people who are culturally averse to organized military violence. If the Chinese Govt., had an ounce of sense they would bring back HHDL, restore Tibet, restore Tibetan culture, and turn Tibet into their new best friend.

Indrajala said:

I don't think "we" can change China's policies. Do you think "we" can? I don't think dozens of years of activism has done much to change their minds.

Malcolm wrote:

Actually, it has made the Chinese Govt. very uncomfortable, which is why they keep shifting their policies towards Tibet. So this signals to me that the pressure of international criticism of the policies of the Chinese Govt. with regards to Tibet are in fact effective.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, May 21st, 2014 at 9:15 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

pensum said:

Indeed, it is a pretty safe assumption that rebirth was widely accepted amongst his audience, and even among the general population in 13th century Japan. Luckily several of his most famous texts are dedicated to the notion of life-and-death, which i personally find to be rather profound and inspiring reads.

Malcolm wrote:

You will note however he does exercise some attention to refuting those who reject rebirth.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, May 21st, 2014 at 9:14 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

T. Chokyi said:

http://www.religiondispatches.org/archive/science/3631/for\_buddhism\_\_science\_is\_not\_a\_killer\_of\_religion

Malcolm wrote:

Big problem with this article:

This cosmology held until the 16th century, when European explorers arrived in India with a new religion and a new cosmology. The Earth, these visitors insisted, is not flat or disc-shaped, but is instead an enormous ball. This idea met with stiff resistance from the natives.

Actually, this is false. Indians understood the earth was a round ball, as explained in the Surya Siddhanta.

T. Chokyi said:

it peels away all the claptrap

Malcolm wrote:

This is offensive.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, May 21st, 2014 at 8:41 PM

Title: Re: why is Vajrayana considered the fastest way to buddhahood

Content:

saraswati said:

Ah, thank you very much Malcolm.

Do all the schools of Tibetan Buddhism share the same interpretation? I must say I haven't tuned in to the subtle differences between the vows I have heard chanted. (So far I have been to Gelug and Kagyu centres.)

Malcolm wrote:

Yes they do. The shepherd-like vow is considered the most superior, but the king-like vow the most practical.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, May 21st, 2014 at 8:34 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Here is a random sampling, running a quick word search on the pdf you provided from Shasta Abbey. From these samplings you can Dogen was a follower of Mainstream Buddhism, and took the idea of rebirth quite literally.

pensum said:

Thanks Malcolm. I am familiar with those passages (and others). It is interesting that out of the thousands of pages that Dogen wrote he does not appear to have ever penned a sustained treatment of rebirth. Focusing instead on actual practice here and now in this life, he merely makes the occasional passing reference to rebirth in order to spur one's practice.

Malcolm wrote:

Why would he have to? He was in a monastic environment training educated monks, not lay ignoramuses. However the Karma chapter can be understood as just that. Context is everything in understand the authors of these texts.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, May 21st, 2014 at 8:31 PM

Title: Re: China expands new measures to directly control Tibetan m

Content:

Indrajala said:

What I see in this thread is the general theme of "China is really bad and needs to be nicer to Tibetans" which is far too simplistic and fails to address a number of details and geopolitical concerns.

Malcolm wrote:

Chinese policies towards Tibetans are brutal and crimes against humanity. Stating that we who live in Western countries have nothing to say against the Chinese Government's treatment of Tibetans because our governments, yours included, are engaged in various nefarious deeds is a non-sequitar. It sounds just like the Chinese Government's justification of their treatment of Tibetans because we in the US and Canada drove our native peoples here to the brink of extinction.

Your geopolitical concerns are just excuses. You never once condemn the Chinese Government for their actions, you merely say "I don't condone them". That is not a condemnation.

Indrajala said:

This doesn't justify anyone's misdeeds, but to really come to viable solutions for the human suffering in Tibet requires a bit more developed ideas that factor in everything I've attempted several times to outline above (particularly long and short term strategic issues).

Malcolm wrote:

The first step is to recognize that what the Chinese Government is doing and has been doing to the Tibetan people is a crime against humanity. Until you cross that bridge, you just continue to apologize for Chinese geopolitical concerns. It's like saying, "Well, there is abuse in Tibetan monasteries, but you have to understand the situation, and because of this and that reason, we really can't change it, so the little kids should just suck it up and try to assimilate."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, May 21st, 2014 at 8:22 PM

Title: Re: Is Rebirth Unscientific?

Content:

Wayfarer said:

Well I for one am trying to combat it with reasoned argument and analysis. If we can't do that then what is the point of being here?

Malcolm wrote:

You think you are alone? The reasoning is very simple. The Buddha demonstrated a path to awakening which involve certain assumptions. If those assumptions are true, so is the Buddha's path, and the Buddha's awakening is validated. If not. then not.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, May 21st, 2014 at 8:15 PM

Title: Re: why is Vajrayana considered the fastest way to buddhahood

Content:

saraswati said:

I am somewhat confused with this idea of reaching Buddhahood in this very lifetime:

I've learned that part of Vajrayana is taking the Bodhisattva vows, where we pledge to *not* take up Buddhahood asap but to postpone it until all beings are liberated. If this is so, how does it fit in with the fast path to Buddhahood? Or is it the case that Vajrayana is not always a Bodhisattva-based approach?

Malcolm wrote:

There are three different types of bodhisattva vows: like a king, like a captain, and like a shepherd.

The king-like bodhisattva vow involves the wish to achieve buddhahood as soon as possible, in order to guide others to that state, like a king ruling a country.

The captain-like bodhisattva vow involves the wish to achieve buddhahood at the same time as all other sentient beings, like a captain arriving in port at the same time as his passengers.

The shepherd-like bodhisattva vow involves attaining buddhahood only after all sentient beings have attained buddhahood, like a shepherd who only rests after his flock is safely penned for the night.

Vajrayāna uses the first of these. In other words, our bodhisattva vow states " May I attain the state of Buddhahood in order to place all other sentient beings in that state."

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, May 21st, 2014 at 8:08 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

pensum said:

So if you do come across the chapter you mention please pass it along, as obviously i'd be interested in reading it.

Malcolm wrote:

Here is a random sampling, running a quick word search on the pdf you provided from Shasta Abbey. From these samplings you can see Dogen was a follower of Mainstream Buddhism, and took the idea of rebirth quite literally.

The kesa, from ancient times, has been called 'the garment of liberation', for it can free us from all our obstructions, be they from the karmic* effects of our past deeds, from our defiling passions, or from the effects of our rebirth in one of the six worlds* of existence.

What we call the three temporal periods are the three time periods in which we receive the retribution from our good and evil acts. These are, first, the retribution experienced in one's present life; second, the retribution experienced in one's next life; and third, the retribution experienced in some later future life. Through your practice of the Way of the Buddhas and Ancestors you learn, first off, to clarify what the principle of karmic retribution in these three time periods is. If you do not do so, you will make many errors and fall into false views. You will not just fall into false views, you will also give rise to evil ways and undergo suffering for a long time. By failing to continue developing your good roots, you will lose much spiritual merit and will have long-standing obstructions on your path to enlightenment. The karmic retribution experienced in these three temporal periods comes from both good and evil acts.

Right view is a gate to what the Dharma illumines, for by means of it we can realize the Saintly Path and exhaust the stream of rebirths.

Right thought is a gate to what the Dharma illumines, for by means of it we eliminate all discriminatory judgments, as well as any lack of discernment.

Right speech is a gate to what the Dharma illumines, for by means of it we will recognize that all names, voicings, and words are simply like vibrations.

Right livelihood is a gate to what the Dharma illumines, for by means of it we rid ourselves of all our evil ways.

Right action is a gate to what the Dharma illumines, for by means of it we arrive at the Other Shore.

Right mindfulness is a gate to what the Dharma illumines, for by means of it we do not intellectualize all thoughts and things.

Right concentration is a gate to what the Dharma illumines, for by means of it we can attain the meditative state that is beyond scattered thoughts.

It is clear that the desire to be reborn within the human world is something longed for even by a Lord Yama. Once someone has been reborn as a human being, he or she should forthwith have their head shaved, don the kesa of the Three Treasures, and take up the study of the Way of the Buddha. These are the merits of being within the world of humans, which surpasses the other five worlds of existence. But to be born in the human world and then to wantonly seek out the path to political power or some other worldly career, vainly spending one's life as a toady to ministers and kings, wrapping oneself up in fantasies and dreams, only to proceed in later times towards pitch darkness without anything to rely upon, that is folly indeed! Not only have you received the body of a human being, which is hard to come by, but you have also encountered the Buddha Dharma, which is hard to encounter. You should forthwith cast aside all your involvements and quickly leave home life behind in order to study the Way. Rulers and ministers, along with their wives and children, their relatives and households, are encountered everywhere, but the Buddha Dharma, like the rare udumbara blossom, is hard to meet up with. In short, when impermanence suddenly arrives, there is no ruler or minister, friend or relative, spouse or child, or any precious treasure that will save us, for each of us simply returns to death's Yellow Spring alone.<sup>24</sup> What follows along with us is simply our good and bad karma. When we are about to lose our human body, our feelings of regret for our human body may well be deep indeed! So, while we still have our human body, we should quickly leave home life behind. Just this alone will be the true Teaching of the Buddhas of the three temporal worlds.

When all bodhisattvas who are bound to be reborn one final time are about to descend from the Tushita Heaven to be born in the land of Jambudvīpa,* they invariably proclaim the one hundred and eight gates to what the Dharma illumines for the sake of the celestial multitudes in the Tushita Heaven, and thereby pass on the Teaching to those celestial ones, for this is the invariable method of Buddhas.

After darkness has come before our eyes, we should, right off, strive to recite the Three Refuges, not shirking from this even during our entering the intermediate world or our next birth. In this way, we should thoroughly expend life after life and, in age after age, reverently recite Them.

Once you have given rise to the intention to seek enlightenment, even though you are spinning about through the six worlds* of existence, being born through any of the four modes of birth, the very causes and conditions of your spinning will become your heartfelt practice of enlightenment.

We do not know how many rounds of birth and death we have already spent returning again and again to various useless delusions, even while possessing this wisdom. It is like rocks covering up a jewel: the jewel is unaware that it is covered up by rocks and the rocks are unaware that they are covering up a jewel. When human beings recognize this jewel, they seize upon it. This is not something that the jewel expectantly awaits nor is it something that the rocks have been waiting for, and it does not depend on a spiritual awakening on the part of the rocks nor is it something that the jewel thinks about. That is to say, even though a human being and wisdom are unaware of each other, the Way is invariably overheard by the person's wisdom.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, May 21st, 2014 at 7:29 PM

Title: Re: Death at Tibetan Buddhist meditation retreat in Arizona

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

It's a problem that so many people find their Buddhism on the shelves of Barnes and Noble's.

Sherab Dorje said:

Don't be so judgmental, we all have to start somewhere. The problem is where do we go from there. I have run into my fair share of bogus teachers too (as have you, I imagine). Some compassion is needed at this point, as the lemmings rush towards the cliff.

Malcolm wrote:

What I am implying is that when one goes into a Barnes and Noble's, one sees books of various authors, and there is no guide to which authors are more legit, less legit and so on. Then people read a book, they like what it says, and they decide to make a Dharma connection with the author. It's a bit of a crap shoot.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, May 21st, 2014 at 7:26 PM

Title: Re: why is Vajrayana considered the fastest way to buddhahood

Content:

frank123 said:

I'm new to Buddhism and exploring various traditions and schools. I'm wondering if it takes incalculable eons to reach buddhahood through sutra approach what makes it possible to achieve buddhahood in one lifetime through vajrayana methods? why is there such a vast difference in time? seems so extreme.

Malcolm wrote:

Mahāyāna etc., are paths of renunciation.

Vajrayāna is a path of non-renunciation.

Mahāyāna has no special methods.

Vajrayāna is the vehicle of methods.

Mahāyāna has no system of coordinating the basis, the five aggregates, with the result.

Vajrayāna is the vehicle with the basis, the five aggregates is coordinated with the result through the empowerment rites.

Mahāyāna is a causal vehicle in that they practice creating the causes for awakening for three or more, i.e. the cause is taken as the path.

Vajrayāna is the resultant vehicle because here, the result, the three kāyas, is taken as the path.

Mahāyāna and so on are for people of lower intelligence.

Vajrayāna is for people of sharper intelligence.

Mahāyāna is for people who have less afflictions and can easily give up desires and so on.

Vajrayāna is for people who are highly afflicted and cannot easily give up desires and so on.

Mahāyāna is the practice for past ages when the five degenerations were not so rampant.

Vajrayāna is the practice for this age, when the five degenerations are very rampant.

And so on. These are the usual reasons given in Vajrayāna texts.

frank123 said:

Thank you for the reply.

There is such a fast difference between three incalculable eons and one human lifespan, even if the methods are faster etc. I am still perplexed with this extraordinary difference in time.

Malcolm wrote:

Fundamentally, speaking, according to Vajrayāna texts, the extraordinary difference in time is due to the fact that Vajrayāna practices use the body as the vehicle for liberation, as well as other special methods, that allow a very serious practitioner to gather the two accumulations that normally require three eons in a single lifetime.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, May 21st, 2014 at 10:28 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Actually, in another chapter Dogen states very strongly that rejecting literal rebirth impugns the four kinds of realized persons, i.e., stream entrants and so on.

Lindama said:

I have never heard it discussed in Zen.

Malcolm wrote:

You may have never heard it discussed in Western Zen circles you are familiar with -- Dogen on the other hand, strongly criticizes those who discard it.

pensum said:

However, Dogen's views on life and death are somewhat more nuanced than that found in typical discussions of "literal rebirth"; to wit, this excerpt from the Bendowa, the first chapter of Dogen's Shobogenzo: Question: Someone has said, "Do not reject life and death. There is an easy shortcut to freedom from life and death. This is knowing that the essence of the mind is eternal. This means that although this body is born and inevitably progresses towards death, this mental essence does not perish. If you understand that this mental essence that is not subject to arising and ceasing resides in my body is the original mental essence; and so, while the body takes a temporal form but is always inconstant, born here and dying there, this mental essence is eternal and does not change in past, present, and future. To know this is to be free from birth and death. For those who know this, the birth and death they have known up to now vanish, and they enter into an ocean of the mental essence. Entering this ocean, they have wonderful virtues like the Buddhas and Tathagatas. Even if you know this now, because your body is the result of former delusive actions, you differ from the sages. Those who do not know this principle turn in the cycle of life and death eternally. So you only need to know this principle of the eternal mental essence. If you sit in vain you waste your whole life. What can you possibly hope for?"

Does this view conform to the Way of the Buddhas and Ancestors?

Answer: This view is not the Buddha Dharma at all. It is the Senika view which is skewed outside of the Way. This skewed view says: "In our body there is a ghostly intelligence and it is through this that, as conditions occur, we have the capacity to distinguish between like and dislike, right and wrong, pain and stimulation, and suffering and pleasure. When the body dies, this ghostly intelligence is released from here and is born some place else. Therefore, though it seems to die here, it is born there, it is immortal and eternal." This is that view skewed outside the Way.

If you learn about this and think it is the Buddha Dharma, it is sillier than holding a tile or pebble and thinking it to be golden treasure. This foolishness is beyond anything to compare it to and is an embarrassment. The National Master Huizhong of Tang China strongly warned against this view. Those who hold this delusive view think that "the mind is eternal and that appearance is transitory" and equate this with the wonderful Dharma of the Buddhas and think that they have broken free from life and death; but this is the original cause of life and death. Isn't this shamefully silly? This is nothing but a deluded view skewed outside of the Way. Don't let your ears touch it.

Still, I need to address this issue, and so I will now rectify this delusion out of compassion. Understand that in the Buddha Dharma body and mind are single; nature and form are spoken of as not-two. This is known throughout both the Western heavens and Eastern lands and is beyond any doubt. In a school that talks about eternity, the myriad things are all eternal and body and mind is undivided. In a school that talks about cessation, all things are ceasing and nature and form are not divided. How can you say that the body ceases while the mind is eternal in contradiction to this true principle? You must further realize that life and death itself is nirvana. We cannot talk about nirvana without life and death. It is wrong to think that the view that "the mind becomes eternal when it is free from the body" is the Buddha's wisdom that is free from life and death, when the mind that thinks this is itself arising and ceasing and is not eternal. Could this be relied upon? Understand thoroughly that the singleness of body and mind is always upheld in the Buddha Dharma. And so, how could the mind go off from the body to be eternal when the body arises and perishes? If you say that body and mind are sometimes one and sometimes not, this would mean you are saying that the Buddha's words are false. To think that birth and death can be avoided is guilty of despising the Buddha Dharma. Caution is needed here.

The Buddha Dharma, especially the Lineage that speaks of "the Dharma Gate of the totality of the nature of Awareness as the vast array" of the total world of events and experiences does not divide suchness from appearance, nor arising from vanishing. Even bodhi and nirvana are nothing but this nature of Awareness. All things and appearances without exception are totally and only this single Awareness and are embraced without disarray. The various Dharma Gates are all equally this single Awareness. This is how the nature of mind is understood in the Buddha Dharma. How can you divide this into body and mind or life and death from nirvana? You are already a child of the Buddha so do not listen to madmen who preach views that are skewed outside of the Way.

(this translation by Ven. Anzan Hoshin roshi and Ven. Yasuda Joshu Dainen roshi at <http://wwwzc.org/dharma-text/bendowa> another English version is available from Shasta Abbey <http://www.shastaabbey.org/pdf/shobo/001bendo.pdf> )

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, May 21st, 2014 at 10:22 AM

Title: Re: why is Vajrayana considered the fastest way to buddhahood

Content:

rory said:

I'd love if you could explain to me, if you follow Yogacara philosophy how can Vajrayana be a quick path? Supposedly it takes 3 aeons to extirpate the seeds, so how does it work?
gassho

Rory

Malcolm wrote:

Who said i follow Yogacara? Certainly not me.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, May 21st, 2014 at 7:57 AM

Title: Re: Death at Tibetan Buddhist meditation retreat in Arizona

Content:

Tom said:

Diamondsutra,

I would like to know exactly what you know is made up.

dzogchungpa said:

Apparently the sutra is silent on this question.

Malcolm wrote:

It's a problem that so many people find their Buddhism on the shelves of Barnes and Noble's.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, May 21st, 2014 at 7:56 AM

Title: Re: China expands new measures to directly control Tibetan m

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

China is by no means a Buddhist nation.

Indrajala said:

It is a secular state with many many Buddhists. More Buddhists than any other country in the world.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, I understand this. However China destroyed a Buddhist country, one Buddhist through and through. It's different.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, May 21st, 2014 at 7:43 AM

Title: Re: China expands new measures to directly control Tibetan m

Content:

Indrajala said:

China is also partly a Buddhist nation and there's a massive ongoing Buddhist revival there. There's statistically more Buddhists in China than all Tibetan Buddhists in the world combined probably.

Malcolm wrote:

China is by no means a Buddhist nation.

Perhaps, however, if enough Chinese people become Buddhists, Tibetan Buddhists in particular, they will realize that China's policies towards Tibet are environmentally unsound, racist, and criminal.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, May 21st, 2014 at 7:40 AM

Title: Re: why is Vajrayana considered the fastest way to buddhahood

Content:

frank123 said:

I'm new to Buddhism and exploring various traditions and schools. I'm wondering If it takes incalculable eons to reach buddhahood through sutra approach what makes it possible to achieve buddhahood in one lifetime through vajrayana methods? why is there such a vast difference in time? seems so extreme.

Malcolm wrote:

Mahāyāna etc., are paths of renunciation.

Vajrayāna is a path of non-renunciation.

Mahāyāna has no special methods.

Vajrayāna is the vehicle of methods.

Mahāyāna has no system of coordinating the basis, the five aggregates, with the result.

Vajrayāna is the vehicle with the basis, the five aggregates is coordinated with the result through the empowerment rites.

Mahāyāna is a causal vehicle in that they practice creating the causes for awakening for three incalculable eons or more, i.e. the cause is taken as the path.

Vajrayāna is the resultant vehicle because here, the result, the three kāyas, is taken as the path.

Mahāyāna and so on are for people of lower intelligence.

Vajrayāna is for people of sharper intelligence.

Mahāyāna is for people who have less afflictions and can easily give up desires and so on.

Vajrayāna is for people who are highly afflicted and cannot easily give up desires and so on.

Mahāyāna is the practice for past ages when the five degenerations were not so rampant.

Vajrayāna is the practice for this age, when the five degenerations are very rampant.

And so on. These are the usual reasons given in Vajrayāna texts.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, May 21st, 2014 at 7:32 AM

Title: Re: China expands new measures to directly control Tibetan m

Content:

Indrajala said:

I've never condoned such killings.

Malcolm wrote:

I see, so now you change your tune -- first it was, "I have no idea if there is..." to "I don't condone..."

Well it is good you don't condone it, since a Buddhist monk is forbidden to condone the killing of any human being, otherwise, they commit a parajika.

Indrajala said:

I'm just saying things are not going to change and passive-aggressive resistance against an unforgiving authoritarian state is not going to solve much, especially when that state is largely left unchallenged by other world powers. Not even your country the USA with all its talk of human rights and liberty will lift a finger to really help Tibet.

Malcolm wrote:

Our leaders meet with HHDL regularly, and disregard China's temper tantrums over the issue. Tibet has major sympathy in the house and senate. And, you have to remember, the US did not even recognize China diplomatically until 1972.

Indrajala said:

What exactly do western converts to Tibetan Buddhism do other than condemn China and maybe protest, meanwhile buying Made-in-China products?

Malcolm wrote:

We keep people aware of what the Chinese are doing to Tibetans and to Tibetan Buddhism.

Indrajala said:

Are you willing to arm yourself and launch a guerrilla campaign in Tibet to "drive out" the Chinese from the Tibetan homeland? How about at least helping to pay for it?

Malcolm wrote:

Of course not. I do not believe that armed struggle will result in anything other than the annihilation of Tibetans forever.

Indrajala said:

Even if you insist on non-violence, self-immolation and international awareness campaigns clearly have had little effect.

Malcolm wrote:

Of course we insist on non-violence. Actually the proof it is having effect is the increased brutality of Chinese security forces against Tibetans.

Indrajala said:

China is still in control of Tibet and nobody is stopping them.

Malcolm wrote:

The non-virtue of China's destroying a Buddhist nation will do them in. We just don't know how long it will take before China's karma ripens. Sadly, it will be bad.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, May 21st, 2014 at 7:24 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

daverupa said:

This means that one can be a Buddhist without accepting rebirth as described by this or that source text, since one simply accepts that it's to be seen, not that it's to be seen as X right now, first, before beginning, otherwise I'm a faker or something equally silly.

Malcolm wrote:

Then Buddha certainly wasted his time talking to a lot of folks about rebirth who had not seen it for themselves, didn't he?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, May 21st, 2014 at 7:23 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Lindama said:

]I have never heard it discussed in zen.

Malcolm wrote:

You may have never heard it discussed in Western Zen circles you are familiar with -- Dogen on the other hand, strongly criticizes those who discard it.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, May 21st, 2014 at 7:19 AM

Title: Re: Is Rebirth Unscientific?

Content:

Prasutagus said:

This is amazing really. Epic.

I've never seen someone theoretically committed to dharma practice so dead set at proving it's foundations are invalid, and to be so dead sure about it.

Maybe that's a new practice these days. Point out all the ways Buddhism is f'd...

Malcolm wrote:

Buddha once remarked that the Dharma could never be destroyed from without, only from within. This is how the Dharma is destroyed, i.e., when people who are nominally Buddhist set out to destroy the foundations of Buddhist teaching.

Epic indeed.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, May 21st, 2014 at 7:13 AM

Title: Re: China expands new measures to directly control Tibetan m

Content:

JKhedrup said:

Geshe Sonam's uncle was thrown in jail for 6 months due to too many calls coming to his cellphone from India. There was no charge laid, no trial, he was just sent to jail.

Geshe la's cousin endured similar treatment for sending back and forth photos of HH Dalai Lama on Wechat.

I really wonder how you don't hear this information considering it is widely known in the HP Tibetan community.

Indrajala said:

I agree it is morally wrong to arbitrarily imprison people, but do you think responding to such treatment with aggressive protesting or passive-aggressive resistance will make the Chinese authorities change their ways when there is negligible international pressure for them to stop?

Malcolm wrote:

That is why people who live outside of Tibet must continue to voice their opposition to atrocities committed by the PRC against Tibetans. If people are silent, the Chinese will merely take this as assent. This is why HH Dalai Lama is so important, he is living testament to the 55 years of utter brutality to which Tibetans have subjected in their own land.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, May 21st, 2014 at 7:10 AM

Title: Re: China expands new measures to directly control Tibetan m

Content:

JKhedrup said:

It was the second such incident to be reported in recent days from the TAR's Chamdo (in Chinese, Changdu) prefecture. On Feb. 28, Chinese authorities detained and fatally beat another monk after finding him in possession of banned writings and videos.

Malcolm wrote:

Or would you like more proof of Chinese oppression of Tibetan people, Jeff? Because really, there is bucket loads. Far more examples of Chinese authorities beating, torturing, raping and killing Tibetans than there is of sexual abuse in Tibetan monasteries in India.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, May 21st, 2014 at 5:57 AM

Title: Re: Is Rebirth Unscientific?

Content:

Andrew108 said:

What do you mean by non-material? Do mean that it has no mass?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, consciousness has no mass. It is not composed of the four elements, nor by anything in the table elements.

Andrew108 said:

Does this mean that it is 'on' and has energy? What is the source of this 'on' state? What sustains it?

Malcolm wrote:

Praṇā and warmth are the supports for consciousness.

Andrew108 said:

How can a preceding moment act as a support and organ for mental consciousness?

Malcolm wrote:

The preceding moment of consciousness, i.e. the mental organ (manendriya) acts as the support for consciousness the same way that a son becomes the father of another; a fruit, the seed of another.

Andrew108 said:

Surely there must be some underlying continuity?

Malcolm wrote:

No substrate is necessary, according to Madhyamakās. The Yogācāra sūtras propose the ālayavijñāna to account for memory, continuity and so on.

Andrew108 said:

Also how can memories be recalled if the preceding moment acting as support is no longer present?

Malcolm wrote:

Candrakīrti weighs in:

"The consciousness of the memory is not different than the consciousness (experiencing the object) by which an object is experienced, as has already been explained. Why? Because the memory isn't a different thing. Since there was an experience, the memory arises with the object since the consciousness recalling that experience is not different than the experience. Since whatever is encompassed by the consciousness of the experience is encompassed by the consciousness of the memory, it is said "I saw". This is also a worldly convention and is not something to examine, since it is worldly convention of those who possess deluded objects."

Andrew108 said:

How is it that we can hold thoughts and experience connectedness between moments if the preceding consciousness is always changing?

Malcolm wrote:

See above.

This also accounts for rebirth, why, when this body breaks up, the series of consciousness can appropriate a new series of aggregates through one of the four modes of birth.

Why would this account for rebirth? How does consciousness actually appropriate aggregates?

[/quote]

Consciousness is driven by thirst for existence.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, May 21st, 2014 at 5:02 AM

Title: Re: karma bully

Content:

Vajrasvapna said:

I do not have a positive opinion about the Western Buddhist teachers, I remember of a certain lama who, after I commented about my health, began making accusations about my 'bad karma'. I never saw any Asian teachers have such an attitude, they are always friendly and benevolent.

Malcolm wrote:

Well you should not infer that all Western Buddhist teachers are cut from the same mold that "lama".

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, May 21st, 2014 at 5:00 AM

Title: Re: karma bully

Content:

Vajrasvapna said:

Actually, I just express myself in a way that was not clear what I meant, but this debate was positive, because I learned how to express myself better. I do not believe that karma is just a Buddhist or a Hindu theory, all religions and materialistic philosophies speak of causality somehow. Buddhist philosophy explains karma in order to help people to achieve enlightenment, then it seems to me to be something dangerous to use karma in other context.

Malcolm wrote:

Buddha used karma to explain why some people are born rich, others poor, why some are famous, others not, why some are healthy, others ill, and so on. The point of teaching about karma is that afflictions cause karma, all karma, even positive karma, is rooted in affliction -- which is why positive karma, aka, merit, is exhaustible (unless it is dedicated with a dedication free from the three wheels).

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, May 21st, 2014 at 1:47 AM

Title: Re: karma bully

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Of course Buddhism is a tradition of reason. We do not accept things merely on blind faith. On the other hand, we also accept śabda pramāṇa, which mean that once we have accepted the Buddha as an authority, we now can accept what he says in the sūtras as being true. Prior to accepting the Buddha actually shows the way to nirvana, of course one can be skeptical.

Vajrasvapna said:

The problem is that different Buddhist scripture make different statements, then each person must develop their own understanding of the Buddhist scriptures, avoiding intolerance.

Malcolm wrote:

This is why one must rely on a qualified teacher, to make things clear to one.

Vajrasvapna said:

Because they can then understand that also their practice can help alleviate their disease. Reduction of bile diseases comes from reducing anger, etc. It really works. I have health problems and the reason I still alive are my practices of meditation and mantra recitation, only medical treatment would not suffice. However it is because of my poor health I became interested about Buddhism, then my poor health ended up being something auspicious.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, this a good thing for you. As it say in mind training teachings, suffering is our friend.

Vajrasvapna said:

This is why I consider using karma to accuse someone

Whoever suggested that?

It is a very common practice among Western Buddhist teachers, maybe someone should go and tell that to them.

Malcolm wrote:

Honestly, I have never ever heard any teacher of any merit whatsoever treat karma in the way in which you describe. Maybe you or someone you know had a bad experience with an unqualified western teacher.

Vajrasvapna said:

To add to what I said about the vision of Mahayana about karma, the ideas of Yogacara school, if understood correctly, expression well as karma works from the individual point of view...

Malcolm wrote:

Khenpo Palden Sherab was an awesome lama, someone for whom I have great respect, but nothing you are saying is really brand new to me. Each teaching has its specific context. You cannot expect people who are not Vajrayāna practitioners, for example, to cultivate pure vision in the Vajrayāna sense of the word because they have not been ripened by empowerment nor granted liberating instructions.

Karma is always taught subsequent to dependent origination, for while dependent origination explains the how and why of being reborn; karma explains the what and where of being reborn.

It is fine to say this is all an illusion, a mirage, its unreal, and so on. But it is also necessary to recognize, such as you do, then we need to deal with all these unreal conditions like illness, floods, death, meals, sleeping, waking and so on, and we have to bear in mind that we generally deal with them, 99.999 percent of the time as if they are real. For example, if you are shot, you not sit on your cushion reciting mantras, telling yourself that it is all unreal and it will go away. Not only does one's own karmic traces have the ability to generate appearances for oneself, but also the karmic traces of others can do so as well, as Shabkar points out in Flight of the Garuda. Given this situation, we have to be practical and understand and remind ourselves that having a profound view and realizing it are totally different.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, May 21st, 2014 at 1:18 AM

Title: Re: Is Rebirth Unscientific?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The idea of consciousness and rebirth are extremely precise.

Andrew108 said:

Go on then. Describe them precisely.

Malcolm wrote:

Consciousness is one of the four non-material aggregates. It is the knower and perceiver of objects. The six consciousness are supported on their respective sense organs; five are supported upon their respective material organ, the eye and so on; the sixth consciousness is supported on its organ, the mental organ, which is in fact the immediately antecedent consciousness. This also accounts for rebirth, why, when this body breaks up, the series of consciousness can appropriate a new series of aggregates through one of the four modes of birth.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, May 21st, 2014 at 12:18 AM

Title: Re: Is Rebirth Unscientific?

Content:

Sönam said:

Holy crap! what a cloudy lemonade ...

Sönam

Andrew108 said:

It seems cloudy because the idea of consciousness and rebirth is cloudy. May be you could add something to the discussion?

Malcolm wrote:

The idea of consciousness and rebirth are extremely precise.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, May 21st, 2014 at 12:07 AM

Title: Re: China expands new measures to directly control Tibetan m

Content:

kirtu said:

No, the Chinese ruling class holds all the cards.

Indrajala said:

They're not omnipotent. The geopolitical situation in the region brings with it a lot of limitations. India would be at an advantage if China let its guard down for instance.

Malcolm wrote:

Poor China, always has to defend itself against its enemies...boo hoo.

Indrajala said:

It doesn't indicate they're being oppressed if they can leave and return unsupervised. The lines of communication are not necessarily cut either. Again, WeChat is used to constantly communicate with family back home.

Malcolm wrote:

Where everything they say is constantly being monitored. So they speak in codes and so on. Really, your level of apology for the PRC is astonishing compared with your bile vented towards Indians and Tibetans in general. So much for equanimity.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 20th, 2014 at 11:59 PM

Title: Re: Death at Tibetan Buddhist meditation retreat in Arizona

Content:

Clarence said:

I am surprised no one got back to the THREE drupons that got stroked out of the retreat. If we follow traditional paradigm, there are some serious Samaya issues going on there.

Malcolm wrote:

Not necessarily.

Clarence said:

Could you elaborate? I always heard strokes in comparison with practice means Samaya issues. Of course, nowadays, with all the diabetes, strokes are a lot more common.

Malcolm wrote:

It depends on the kind of stroke. Whether there is a provocation involved or not.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 20th, 2014 at 11:14 PM

Title: Re: Death at Tibetan Buddhist meditation retreat in Arizona

Content:

Clarence said:

I am surprised no one got back to the THREE drupons that got stroked out of the retreat. If we follow traditional paradigm, there are some serious Samaya issues going on there.

Malcolm wrote:

Not necessarily.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 20th, 2014 at 11:04 PM

Title: World's largest hydropower project in Tibet

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The cascade of dams planned for the Yarlung Tsangpo river and its tributaries – including one three times the size of the Three Gorges Dam – threatens an already fragile environment

<https://www.chinadialogue.net/article/show/single/en/6781-World-s-largest-hydropower-project-planned-for-Tibetan-Plateau>

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 20th, 2014 at 10:43 PM

Title: Re: Vajrasattva practice books/articles

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

Recommend some good ones. I know the basic stuff, just would like pointing to some good commentaries or similar.

Malcolm wrote:

At some point my translation of the Sakya ngondro text will be out, this has a comprehensive section on Vajrasattva practice,

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 20th, 2014 at 10:01 PM

Title: Re: Is Rebirth Unscientific?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

All of these questions are answered in the texts.

No they are not.

Yes, actually they are.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 20th, 2014 at 9:45 PM

Title: Re: China expands new measures to directly control Tibetan m

Content:

Indrajala said:

I'm basically suggesting everyone be realistic and broad minded rather than simply saying what China is doing is wrong and they should stop because we feel they should.

The actual options available to the parties involved are actually quite limited.

Malcolm wrote:

I suggest you apply that attitude towards India and Tibetan Monasteries.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 20th, 2014 at 9:32 PM

Title: Re: Is Rebirth Unscientific?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

All of these questions are answered in the texts.

My advice to you is to start over at the beginning. You have gotten yourself completely stuck in a morass of vapid intellectualism.

Andrew108 said:

If rebirth were to be established scientifically...

Malcolm wrote:

Rebirth can never be established scientifically because it cannot be verified by ordinary persons directly in anyway other than inferentially.

...

Andrew108 said:

All of these issues are ignored.

Malcolm wrote:

All of these issues have been addressed. You simply do not find the answers satisfactory because you accept and have faith in a different authority than the Buddha. You have faith in science and accept, without personal verification, the claims that scientists make about this or that phenomena.

It is a good thing to know with what one agrees and with what one disagrees. What you have come to discover is that you fundamentally do not agree with the Buddha's own teachings on liberation, the purpose of liberation and the results of liberation, in toto. That must be a sad thing for you, considering all the years you have put in studying and practicing.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 20th, 2014 at 9:20 PM

Title: Re: China expands new measures to directly control Tibetan m

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Therefore, you are pro-China and anti-Tibet.

Indrajala said:

No.

Malcolm wrote:

Definitely. We are all well aware of the the real politik goals of China, and why they do what they do. You have offered no special insight to that in anything you have posted anywhere. Instead, while libeling Tibetan monasteries for systematic child abuse with little proof, when it is pointed out to you that Chinese have a systematic policy of the cultural annihilation of Tibetans which includes systematic forced abortions and sterilization, you aver and ask for similar proofs (and there is plenty, entire movies in fact). Your sentiments are not nearly as opaque as you seem to think.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 20th, 2014 at 9:11 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

As far as I can tell, you do not regard the Buddha as a special witness, and consider him to be an ordinary man, just like anyone else.

Andrew108 said:

I don't regard the Buddha as a special witness because there are contradictions in what he is reported to have said. Also there are historical/cultural reasons why he might have said what he said. It seems that he was working with circumstances within his own cultural milieu just like us ordinary folks.

Malcolm wrote:

Hogwash. This is your weak argument. The Buddha's essential message is entirely consistent through Mainstream Buddhism, Mahāyāna and all Vajrayāna teachings including Dzogchen. Beings take continual rebirth samsara, dying here, reappearing there for as long as they are under the control of the three afflictions produced by self-grasping. When that self-grasping is eradicated, beings stop taking birth in beginningless samsara. Dependent origination exists solely for the purpose of explaining that process and how to end that process. It is not, as it is commonly misapplied today, to be taken as a general commentary on external phenomena such as the formation of galaxies and so on, though it can of course be applied to such external phenomena as well. The primary reason Buddha taught dependent origination was so that people would stop asking him who they were in past lives. So his reply is fundamentally: our origin is rooted in affliction, which is the cause of karma, and karma is the cause of suffering. When we remove those afflictions, we cease creating karmas, the cause of suffering. This process occurs for living beings from beginningless time. All valid Buddhist traditions accept this. This is the Dharma of the Buddha we are taking refuge in. If someone does not accept this, they are not really taking refuge in the Dharma, I am sorry to say.

Andrew108 said:

Then in terms of direct perception - I guess you are talking about yogic direct perception. I'm not sure this is really reliable. There are some meditators who have claimed to be able to access past lives but who really knows?

Malcolm wrote:

No, I was talking about common direct perception.

Andrew108 said:

Then inference based on logic. Well according to you I don't really need that because it's enough to take the words of the Buddha as gospel. And if I don't then I'm not Buddhist. The logic you have put forward I regard as being weak. It's such weak logic that the only thing you can do is say that I have to base my conviction on what the Buddha is said to have said.

Malcolm wrote:

Actually what I said was that the phenomena under discussion, rebirth, liberation and so on cannot be verified by the perceptions of ordinary persons, such as scientists engaged in empirical research. I fully allow that things like rebirth, liberation, and so on can neither be proven nor disproven by means available to empirical research. These things are non-falsifiable. Buddha addresses this issue in the Eastern Gatehouse Sūta I previously cited above.

Andrew108 said:

But anyway I have agreed with you that I can't call myself Buddhist. So I'm no longer a Buddhist because I don't accept a literal interpretation of rebirth.

Malcolm wrote:

I didn't say you could not call yourself a Buddhist, I said the views you enunciate are not Buddhist and are not consistent with what the Buddha clearly taught in Mainstream Buddhist texts, Mahāyāna and Vajrayāna as well.

Andrew108 said:

You might also read the Gendun Chopel book that Lopez published. In it there are some interesting passages regarding appeal to authority.

Malcolm wrote:

Of course it does. The most interesting one is that he points out that in the end, one is the only authority for oneself. But the promise of Buddhadharma is that if you bother to do the work, instead of relying on intellectual reason, as you do, you will personally verify the claims the Buddha has made about rebirth, liberation, etc. As for myself, I have verified enough of the claims of the Buddha and the awakened masters that have followed, including our mutual guru, ChNN, to have confidence in the other claims put forward by the tradition.

Look, if you wish to hammer out your own doctrine with logic and reason, be my guest. But don't conflate it with Siddhartha's intent.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 20th, 2014 at 7:46 PM

Title: Re: Death at Tibetan Buddhist meditation retreat in Arizona

Content:

bryandavis said:

This kind of thing can happen even in a very traditional setting. I feel by me sharing this I am able to let a bit off my chest so to speak, since I was in the retreat. As well just put it out there that a long term retreat is a serious decision and when entering one you really have to be a very stable person all ready ( that should be obvious but it shocking how it is not )

...

These things need serious reflection before entering. They need concerned, compassionate, caring helpers and assistants along the way. And they need reality checks when things flare up. Maybe for at least the lay practitioners a mental health screening would have been helpful in my situation! There is so much shit that comes up being alone with one self, as Malcom pointed out with the axe example!

Reintegrating after that much time is diffiuct. Reinegrating after psychological dissapointments is even more challenging. Not letting your "spiritual" world get completely crushed and being able to maintain the veiw though out insance circumstances is greater still.

Anyhow, sorry if there was not much point in all that, I just wanted to share and say it can happen anywhere, even in a seemingly perfect traditional situation.

Bryan.

Malcolm wrote:

Sharp weapons are generally not permitted within a retreat precinct because things like the following happen: when my teacher, Ngagpa Yeshe Dorje, was nearly done with his first three year retreat, he had what is called a "chod nyams", a chod experience where he saw his leg as a huge side of meat. So he took a knife he had brought with him into the retreat, and cut a huge chunk of his leg out for his ganapuja. The next morning his attendant found him lying in a pool of blood, nearly dead. His retreat master told him that he could not leave, but anyhow they brought a doctor, patched up his leg, and he remained in the retreat. Now, you have to understand that the Throma retreat manual specifically forbids bringing anything sharp with you into the retreat.

My point is that retreats are serious business and a lot of things can go wrong, and do go wrong. Luckily my experience was pretty peaceful, but then I did my retreat alone without companions, so it was not complicated by the presence of others.

I don't think any knowledgable person here imagines that what happened at DM is impossible in other situations. I remember hearing that in one three year retreat in the US, a very disturbed woman tried to burn down the house the the retreat was being held in, back in the '80's.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 20th, 2014 at 7:36 PM

Title: Re: Tibetan institutional religious violence

Content:

Minjeay said:

I really don't get why things like these seem to be so hard to understand for persons who talk a lot about religion, and buddhism, while learning what wholesome acts are, and what non-wholesome deeds are, is one of the basic teachings you can even find in Theravada buddhism, though in this system they don't put emphasis on those teachings.

Malcolm wrote:

That is an entirely false claim.

Minjeay said:

Mahayana did build up the whole system around those teachings, and still when negative things happen you will see most buddhists just stand besides someone being raped and just debating about the karma of the persons involved.

Malcolm wrote:

That is an entirely false claim.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 20th, 2014 at 7:34 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Andrew108 said:

I have preferred to use Buddhist logic to question a Buddhist belief.

Malcolm wrote:

Buddhist logic only works if you accept the parameters of Buddhist logic. I think you need to study Dignaga and Dharmakirti a little more thoroughly before you can say you were using "Buddhist" logic to question a Buddhist tenet.

So what are the parameters of Buddhist logic, or "pramāṇa"? They are that there are three valid forms of authority: direct perception, inference, and testimony of special witnesses, such as the Buddha.

Dharmakirti's entire project is to prove that Buddha is a special witness, without recourse to sūtras and so on. If one can show that indeed the Buddha is a special witness, then it follows that one can heed what the Buddha says without reservation. You should get Jackson's book "Is Enlightenment Possible" which deals with this very issue, and includes a logical defense of rebirth.

As far as I can tell, you do not regard the Buddha as a special witness, and consider him to be an ordinary man, just like anyone else.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 20th, 2014 at 7:26 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The point is that the Buddha is merely telling people if they practice the four immeasurable, love, compassion, etc., it is good for them. But he never says anywhere they are sufficient for liberation.

dzogchungpa said:

If memory serves, Gombrich, in "What the Buddha Thought", attempts to demonstrate that the Buddha did indeed view them as sufficient for liberation. Just sayin'.

Edit:

I think this is basically his argument:

<http://www.ocbs.org/images/documents/gonda.pdf>

Malcolm wrote:

Basically his argument is extremely thin in the face of traditional Buddhist exegesis which flatly denies that the four brahma-viharas lead to nirvana. Dharmakirti is one such author, Gombrich mentions another on the first page of his rather diffuse and not to the point treatment, Bhikku Bodhi.

You can follow non-Buddhist scholars exegetical treatment of Buddhist concepts if you like, I will continue to prioritize how they were understood within the tradition.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 20th, 2014 at 7:18 PM

Title: Re: China expands new measures to directly control Tibetan m

Content:

Indrajala said:

there are real strategic reasons for China's inability to grant freedom to the Tibetans. The welfare of over a billion people rest on these strategic concerns being addressed.

Malcolm wrote:

Therefore, you are pro-China and anti-Tibet. Case closed.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 20th, 2014 at 10:44 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

smcj said:

They seem not to understand that Dharma is not a pick and choose sort of thing. It is not a supermarket of ideas in which one can shop and take home and create one's own recipe.

Once again we disagree. Of course they are allowed their own recipe, however they then take responsibility for how the pudding tastes. And as they say, the proof is in the taste of the pudding.

But beyond that, people evolve. I personally have seen your online presence change greatly over the years. If Dharma really is a multi lifetime project then people have to pick up where their predecessor left off. You can't demand everyone's karma have the same starting point, or disallow them their own progress.

Johnny Dangerous said:

P.S.:

This thread is somewhat confusing, as I specifically remember Malcolm arguing passionately (and convincingly, IMO) not that long ago for Steven Batchelor's right to be called "A Buddhist" -care to comment Malcolm? Has your opinion changed, or am I missing some nuance or qualifier here?

Personally, I don't fig "Dharma Lite" much, and I think the Buddhist worldview with Karma and Rebirth removed turns nonsensical for the most part..however I don't think believing this way makes someone "not a Buddhist" at all - we should respect people's evolution somewhat I think - as SMCJ says . Wherever I might want to pick apart their worldview, I have "secular Buddhist" friends who certainly walk the walk in the way the live, and have been greatly helped by their "incomplete" version of Dharma.

On the other hand, I DO question materialist-leaners who spend a lot of effort trying to prove the Buddha did actually mean what he said..and I assume that is maybe part of the tension in this thread, and with this subject in general, which let's face it..is ubiquitous.

Malcolm wrote:

People can all themselves anything. That is not the point. Someone can call themselves a buddhist and yet enunciate views that are not consistent with whta the Buddha taught.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 20th, 2014 at 7:54 AM

Title: Re: Death at Tibetan Buddhist meditation retreat in Arizona

Content:

conebeckham said:

You know, I know plenty of folks who have completed 3 year retreats, both here in the West, and in Asia. None of them were even close to as extreme as this situation with Ian and Christie. That this sort of thing happened at all, has to be laid at the feet of those responsible, and those responsible need to take responsibility. GMR clearly bears a part of this burden, I feel. He has not taken responsibility for this. Frankly, neither has Christie, and I am afraid that is because she has been damaged.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, kicking delusional people out of a retreat without first getting them some professional counseling was definitely a huge and tragic error. Had the DM board taken a gentler approach, this may never have happened. They could have been told they should be in separate retreat cabins and seen now that worked out.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 20th, 2014 at 7:51 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The Samaññaphala Sutta in fact talks explicitly about recollection of past lives as being such a fruit...

Wayfarer said:

Right, I concede that...it was a poor choice on my part. However there are places where the visible benefits of 'the fruit of practice' are discussed. It always seems to me to be a better approach to those who have reservations about 'the next life' to approach it in those terms.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, for those people who find it difficult to commit to a path, I would never actually say "You do not believe in rebirth, so you cannot attend this or that teaching". What I say is "Suspend judgement about rebirth for now, and see if Buddhist practice is helping you transform and change."

But here we are not talking to such people. Here we are talking to people, mainly one person, who is intent on promulgating physicalism as correct view.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 20th, 2014 at 7:48 AM

Title: Re: karma bully

Content:

Vajrasvapna said:

I made no assertion of personal realization, just expressed my opinions on Buddhist philosophy, if you disagree, fine. I believe that Buddhism is a tradition of reason, as is attributed to Buddha himself: 'You don't have to believe what I say with blind faith.'

Malcolm wrote:

Of course Buddhism is a tradition of reason. We do not accept things merely on blind faith. On the other hand, we also accept śabda pramāṇa, which mean that once we have accepted the Buddha as an authority, we now can accept what he says in the sūtras as being true. Prior to accepting the Buddha actually shows the way to nirvana, of course one can be skeptical.

Vajrasvapna said:

"There is only one cause to all diseases
it is the ignorance
That does not realize selflessness.

Like a bird flying in the sky is not separated from its shadow,

Sentient beings, even when living in happiness
Are never separated from disease because of ignorance.

Ignorance produces attachment, hatred
And closed-mindedness
The three mental poisons are the particular cause
That manifests wind, bile and phlegm humors.

Malcolm wrote:

As a doctor of Tibetan Medicine [Shang Shung, 2009], I can tell you that when patients ask me to explain the three humors to them, and they are Buddhist, then of course I explain to them that the ultimate cause of their illness is the knowledge obscuration of self-grasping, which in turn produces the three afflictions, which in turn produces the three humors. Why? Because they can then understand that also their practice can help alleviate their disease. Reduction of bile diseases comes from reducing anger, etc. It really works.

Vajrasvapna said:

This is why I consider using karma to accuse someone

Malcolm wrote:

Whoever suggested that?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 20th, 2014 at 7:37 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

tobes said:

There is little that is coherent, settled or unified in all of that - it is a terrible and fallacious endeavor to reify all of that contestation into either a crass ontological materialism or a metaphysical realism or some bizarre and unfounded version of both - which either defeats or is defeated by 'the dharma'.

Malcolm wrote:

One thing that there can be no doubt about; people who are interested in Buddhism often cannot reconcile the ideological underpinnings of logical positivism, the bedrock of scientism, with Dharma. That is the point. Therefore, they seek to discard keystone Dharma tenets which they feel are not relevant to them (Andrew108 illustrates this for us perfectly), whilst maintaining whatever they are interested in: meditation, etc. They seem not to understand that Dharma is not a pick and choose sort of thing. It is not a supermarket of ideas in which one can shop and take home and create one's own recipe.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 20th, 2014 at 7:30 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Wayfarer said:

That passage I quoted from the Kalama Sutta, is also elaborated in the Samaññaphala Sutta, which deals with the 'fruits of the contemplative life visible in the here-and-now'.

I am trying to take a middle path approach. The middle path is neither believing nor disbelieving, but suspension of judgement. That suspension of judgement is quite a hard discipline in its own right. If you lived in such a way that your mind didn't jump to conclusions or reach judgements about things that were not apparent, it would be quite a different kind of life.

Malcolm wrote:

Incidentally, in this text, it is the agnostic position the Buddha finds the most worthy of criticism:

"When this was said, Sañjaya Belatthaputta said to me, 'If you ask me if there exists another world [after death], if I thought that there exists another world, would I declare that to you? I don't think so. I don't think in that way. I don't think otherwise. I don't think not. I don't think not not. If you asked me if there isn't another world... both is and isn't... neither is nor isn't... if there are beings who transmigrate... if there aren't... both are and aren't... neither are nor aren't... if the Tathagata exists after death... doesn't... both... neither exists nor doesn't exist after death, would I declare that to you? I don't think so. I don't think in that way. I don't think otherwise. I don't think not. I don't think not not.'

"Thus, when asked about a fruit of the contemplative life, visible here and now, Sañjaya Belatthaputta answered with evasion. Just as if a person, when asked about a mango, were to answer with a breadfruit; or, when asked about a breadfruit, were to answer with a mango: In the same way, when asked about a fruit of the contemplative life, visible here and now, Sañjaya Belatthaputta answered with evasion. The thought occurred to me: 'This — among these brahmans and contemplatives — is the most foolish and confused of all. How can he, when asked about a fruit of the contemplative life, visible here and now, answer with evasion?'

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 20th, 2014 at 7:26 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Wayfarer said:

That passage I quoted from the Kalama Sutta, is also elaborated in the Samaññaphala Sutta, which deals with the 'fruits of the contemplative life visible in the here-and-now'.

Malcolm wrote:

I am sorry but I must disagree. The Samaññaphala Sutta in fact talks explicitly about recollection of past lives as being such a fruit:

"With his mind thus concentrated, purified, and bright, unblemished, free from defects, pliant, malleable, steady, and attained to imperturbability, he directs and inclines it to knowledge of the passing away and re-appearance of beings. He sees — by means of the divine eye, purified and surpassing the human — beings passing away and re-appearing"

But it never says "if there is no world after death, if there is no fruit of actions rightly & wrongly done, then here in the present life I look after myself with ease — free from hostility, free from ill will, free from trouble." The passage simply does not exist in that text.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 20th, 2014 at 6:40 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

dharmagoat said:

If there is no world after death, if there is no fruit of actions rightly & wrongly done, then here in the present life I look after myself with ease — free from hostility, free from ill will, free from trouble.

It would seem that it is those who believe in rebirth that have the problem.

As I have long suspected, Buddhist belief can be a curse.

Malcolm wrote:

The point is that the Buddha is merely telling people if they practice the four immeasurable, love, compassion, etc., it is good for them. But he never says anywhere they are sufficient for liberation.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 20th, 2014 at 6:39 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Wayfarer said:

The point I am trying to make here is regarding whether you're required to believe in the phenomenon of re-birth in order to consider yourself Buddhist. Belief in rebirth is a very controversial question, as I have pointed out before - it is taboo in Western culture, on religious and scientific grounds. But it has always been controversial to some people. That is why I referred to the passage above, 'if there is no world after death, if there is no fruit of actions rightly & wrongly done, then here in the present life I look after myself with ease — free from hostility, free from ill will, free from trouble.' That kind of proviso is found in many places in early Buddhist texts. So I am saying, I think you can live according to Buddhist principles, and realize the benefits of them, without necessarily accepting beliefs about re-birth, or at the very least suspending judgement about it.

Malcolm wrote:

Many texts? How many? I don't think so. That text is merely teaching the four brahmaviharas to non-Buddhists because whether they believe in rebirth or not, the practice of the same leads to birth in higher realms.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 20th, 2014 at 6:35 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Wayfarer said:

Well, I part company there. 'Having to believe certain things' is what made me leave the Christian church. And I say that, even though I accept the reality of Samsara.

My advice to the sceptic would be: to observe the principles and the discipline that Buddhism entails and to keep an open mind. 'Keeping an open mind' does not require 'theorizing about the ultimate nature of things' or speculating on alternative explanations of Buddhist philosophy based on science. It's a lot more basic, in my view.

Malcolm wrote:

It is not a question of forcing people to believe this or that. But there are certain understandings that it is crucial to have if one wishes to make progress in Dharma practice. Rebirth is one of those understandings. Why? Because the whole point of Buddha's teaching was free people from samsara. What is samsara? The <http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn15/sn15.003.than.html> explains it beautifully:

From an inconstruable beginning comes transmigration. A beginning point is not evident, though beings hindered by ignorance and fettered by craving are transmigrating & wandering on. Long have you thus experienced stress, experienced pain, experienced loss, swelling the cemeteries — enough to become disenchanted with all fabricated things, enough to become dispassionate, enough to be released.

For those who have it, the Anamattaggasamyutta is indispensable reading.

" The heap of bones one person leaves behind with the passing of a single aeon, would form a heap as high as a mountain,
so said the Great Sage.

This is declared to be as massive as the tall Vepulla Mountain standing north of Vulture's Peak in the Magadhan mountain range.

"But when one sees with correct wisdom the truths of the noble ones — suffering and its origin,

the overcoming of suffering, and the Noble Eightfold Path, that leads to suffering's appeasement — then that person, having wandered on, for seven more times at most makes an end to suffering by destroying all the fetters."
SN 15:10

Simply put, not one can study Mainstream Buddhism seriously and not come away understanding the crucial and central role rebirth places in the Buddha's teachings.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Tuesday, May 20th, 2014 at 6:00 AM
Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism
Content:

Wayfarer said:
I don't much like that idea that in order to practice Buddhism, certain beliefs have to be held.

Malcolm wrote:
Certain understandings need to be arrived at; without which one cannot really consider oneself well trained. Acceptance of rebirth is one of those understandings.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Tuesday, May 20th, 2014 at 5:45 AM
Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism
Content:

Prasutagus said:
Following this thread for some time, and going back to Malcolm's original post from (shudder) Tricycle, I have to ask:

Why is a marriage between Buddhism and science something that's even an issue? We're talking about two conceptual systems with radically different interests and goals. One is to cultivate inner qualities to eliminate suffering of self and other. The other is to understand the functioning of the physical world in its various forms. Why this push to certify or qualify Buddhism by extruding it through a scientific lens?

Also, it's interesting that the original (shudder) Tricycle article was about Buddhism offering a correction to the scientific materialism of modern science.... while ironically, much of this thread has been a defense of Buddhist world view against materialistic critiques.

In the end, these are both conceptual constructs-- Buddhism and science. We really don't need to be overly rigid about either them, and allow some space between them. In the Buddhist philosophical tradition one traditionally interpolates between various different tenet systems, again, without any drama. That flexibility is possible here as well. There's really no reason to shoot down Buddhism for what science finds, for science for what Buddhism finds. We can be a little pliant, committing to a world view that says something contrary to what scientists might claim, simply for its spiritual efficacy. We can also be a little pliant ignoring what the abhidharma says about cosmology when looking at NASA pics of Iapetus.

Malcolm wrote:

You know, we do not need to abandon the Meru cosmology system in toto at all. In reality, even Ptolemy called people who lived north of Pamirs "Kurus". Despite the fact that Vasubandhu's presentation reached a highly formalized picture of the world. In reality, the main outline in the Meru cosmology can be understood as reasonable when it is understood that four continent Meru cosmology actually roughly maps to the known continents from an India centric point of view, taking India as Jambudvīpa.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 20th, 2014 at 5:39 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Andrew108 said:

Because as Malcolm points out, you can't be flexible with the dharma. You have to submit to it. That's the basic point he is making. Submission is the name of the game. Many Western practitioners forget how important that is.

Malcolm wrote:

If you want to get anywhere with Dharma, you must fit your life into the Dharma. You cannot fit the Dharma into your life. It simply does not work.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 20th, 2014 at 5:35 AM

Title: Re: China expands new measures to directly control Tibetan m

Content:

Indrajala said:

If you have a better solution I'm all ears.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, the Tibetans should continue to resist, just as the Vietnamese did, until the Chinese are finally driven out of their lands.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 20th, 2014 at 5:29 AM

Title: Re: China expands new measures to directly control Tibetan m

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Right, your solution is that Tibetans should just forget they had a country, Tibet,; a language, Tibetan; and a religion, Buddhism.

Indrajala said:

The Jews never forgot they once had Israel, nor did they lose their religion or heritage.

Malcolm wrote:

The last point is not true. Jewish people have had their heritage stripped from them time and time again.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 20th, 2014 at 5:22 AM

Title: Re: China expands new measures to directly control Tibetan m

Content:

kirtu said:

So the plan is cultural genocide. And you are seemingly acting as an apologist for this.

Kirt

Indrajala said:

Seemingly to you, but this not what I am doing.

I'm recognizing the reality and suggesting an alternative approach to what is generally presently advocated.

Malcolm wrote:

Right, your solution is that Tibetans should just forget they had a country, Tibet,; a language, Tibetan; and a religion, Buddhism.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 20th, 2014 at 4:16 AM

Title: Re: China expands new measures to directly control Tibetan m

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

I am well aware of Chinese expansionist history. But it will never happen that Tibetans will ever identify as "Chinese citizens".

Indrajala said:

Even if that turns out to be true, the majority Han Chinese born and raised on the plateau will call themselves Chinese citizens from Tibet.

Malcolm wrote:

No they won't. The Han on the plateau hate living there.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 20th, 2014 at 4:11 AM

Title: Re: China expands new measures to directly control Tibetan m

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

As to the first point-- that will never happen.

Indrajala said:

Perhaps you are unaware of Chinese expansionist history. The peoples living in what is now Fujian for example used to be seen as barbarians and they themselves did not identify with Chinese civilization. However, the southward expansion of Chinese states eventually saw to their forced assimilation over time. Now almost everyone in Fujian would identify as a Zhongguoren 中國人. The same can be said of places like Harbin in the northeast.

Malcolm wrote:

I am well aware of Chinese expansionist history. But it will never happen that Tibetans will ever identify as "Chinese citizens". Unlike you, I have talked to highly educated young Tibetans in Tibet. They understand perfectly the situation they are in, and they will never give in. You simply don't understand Tibetans nor Tibetan culture.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 20th, 2014 at 4:05 AM

Title: Re: China expands new measures to directly control Tibetan m

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

All of the problems in the world today have but a single cause, lack of virtue. One cannot hope to solve the problem with a proper understanding of its causes. One cannot remedy a problem without applying an antidote consistent with the condition.

Indrajala said:

You said yourself you can't fix saṃsāra.

Malcolm wrote:

Indeed, one cannot fix samsara, but this does not mean that one must be a coward.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 20th, 2014 at 3:49 AM

Title: Re: China expands new measures to directly control Tibetan m

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

No, what they have is virtue on their side.

Indrajala said:

And is that triumphant idealism supposed to just give hope or actually solve the problem?

Malcolm wrote:

All of the problems in the world today have but a single cause, lack of virtue. One cannot hope to solve the problem with a proper understanding of its causes. One cannot remedy a problem without applying an antidote consistent with the condition.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 20th, 2014 at 3:48 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

anjali said:

This raises a question I'm curious about: if one doesn't believe in rebirth, just how far can one go on the Path?

Presumably since one doesn't have Right View, then one can't follow the Path to fruition. Yet, I'm curious what specific obstacles will arise along the way preventing one from successfully following the Path to completion? For example, would lack of belief in rebirth naturally preclude one from having successful direct introduction (in the Mahamudra/Dzogchen traditions)? Or, in the Zen tradition, would it prevent one from successfully seeing one's original face? Or, would it naturally prevent one from developing boundless compassion? Or...? (FYI, I'm fully in the rebirth camp, although that has no relevance to my question.)

Malcolm wrote:

What ChNN says about this issue in Crystal is that those who do not believe in rebirth can relax a little bit in this life; while those who do believe in rebirth can progress to total liberation.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 20th, 2014 at 3:30 AM

Title: Re: China expands new measures to directly control Tibetan m

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

What isn't working is China's oppression of Tibetans.

Indrajala said:

Really? The Tibetans don't got guns anymore, or commando training from the CIA.

Malcolm wrote:

No, what they have is virtue on their side.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 20th, 2014 at 3:28 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

LastLegend said:

4) A ship, in honour of the professor on Gilligan's Island let us call it "The Minnow", is in continual use. But each night a few parts are secretly removed and replaced by identical ones. The original removed parts are secretly reconstructed. Over the years, The Minnow continues to sail and have its license renewed. After 3 years the boat is entirely reconstructed, and the two identical ships are docked next to each other. Which one is The Minnow? (those who know their Plato will recognize this last one as Theseus's paradox)

I don't know what this all about. But one of them is The Minnow because it's named Minnow.

conebeckham said:

Spurious argument. Everyone know the Minnow had been lost. The Minnow had been lost.

Malcolm wrote:

Not so, the Minnow was not lost, but rather, beached.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 20th, 2014 at 3:14 AM

Title: Re: China expands new measures to directly control Tibetan m

Content:

Indrajala said:

False comparisons. The PRC does not plan to systematically kill off the Tibetans. They plan to assimilate them and make them self-identify as Chinese citizens, just as many Mongolians, Manchurians and so on came to do.

Does anyone believe the present approach to the Tibetan issue is actually working or will work?

Malcolm wrote:

As to the first point-- that will never happen.

What isn't working is China's oppression of Tibetans.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 20th, 2014 at 2:59 AM

Title: Re: China expands new measures to directly control Tibetan m

Content:

Indrajala said:

If bending a knee to an authoritarian government saves more lives than doing otherwise, how can you argue it is wrong if you support non-violence?

Malcolm wrote:

This appeasement approach resulted in the Holocaust, that's why.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 20th, 2014 at 2:52 AM

Title: Re: China expands new measures to directly control Tibetan m

Content:

Indrajala said:

What I wrote above wouldn't be out of place on a politics forum.

Malcolm wrote:

This isn't a politics forum.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 20th, 2014 at 2:52 AM

Title: Re: China expands new measures to directly control Tibetan m

Content:

Indrajala said:

Clearly this passive-aggressive approach isn't working and never has. It only lends political will to more aggressive measures and attempts at sinicization of Tibetans. One option on the table for the Chinese is to try and make all the Tibetan children into Mandarin speaking self-identifying Chinese citizens. It would solve their problem in Tibet regardless of how the rest of the world would see it (and let's be realistic nobody would give enough damn to do anything about it as business would carry on as usual).

Malcolm wrote:

Ummm...you cannot get an education inside Tibet in Tibetan anywhere BUT the monasteries. Why do you think the Chinese are cracking down so hard on Tibetan Buddhism?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 20th, 2014 at 2:04 AM

Title: Re: China expands new measures to directly control Tibetan m

Content:

Indrajala said:

Trying to fight them as a subjugated people with passive aggressive acts like self-immolation just provokes them, no matter how such acts can be morally justified. It really accomplishes nothing and makes the situation worse.

Malcolm wrote:

If you were in their shoes you would feel differently.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 20th, 2014 at 1:28 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

pensum said:

as i mentioned in my earlier post i can't even figure out what you guys and gals are arguing about. .

Malcolm wrote:

Any discussion of so called secular or modernist "Buddhism" quickly degenerates into a discussion about rebirth, and usually only rebirth. Why? Because rebirth is not falsifiable by any means accessible for ordinary persons who have not developed sufficient skills. It is instructive to read the <http://www.accesstoinsight.org/lib/authors/nanamoli/wheel390.html>. Here we discover the Buddha talking about his own rebirth, how others take rebirth after their bodies break up and so on.

What is interesting about the second one, is that it is a response to a disciple, the famed Sunakṣatra [ legs pa'i skar ma ] who claimed:

Now on that occasion Sunakkhatta, son of the Licchavis, had recently left this Dhamma and Discipline.[1] He was making this statement before the Vesali assembly: "The recluse Gotama does not have any superhuman states, any distinction in knowledge and vision worthy of the noble ones.[2] The recluse Gotama teaches a Dhamma (merely) hammered out by reasoning, following his own line of inquiry as it occurs to him, and when he teaches the Dhamma to anyone, it leads him when he practices it to the complete destruction of suffering."

The Buddha clearly criticizes the idea that he, the Buddha, hammered the path with logic, that is was not born of true insight. This of course is one of the reason's why I find the constant appeal of physicalists like Andrew and so on so pale. For them, everything must be "logical". But the Buddha states:

when I know and see thus, should anyone say of me: 'The recluse Gotama does not have any superhuman states, any distinction in knowledge and vision worthy of the noble ones. The recluse Gotama teaches a Dhamma (merely) hammered out by reasoning, following his own line of inquiry as it occurs to him' — unless he abandons that assertion and that state of mind and relinquishes that view, then as (surely as if he had been) carried off and put there he will wind up in hell.

In other words, by impugning the Buddha's knowledge born of concentration and insight, it does not turn out well for the person who does not abandon such views.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 20th, 2014 at 1:22 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Andrew108 said:

It is very difficult to know that "as long as "I" am bound by affliction, then "I" conventionally speaking, will take rebirth." It's difficult because in many ways your belief comes before experience. You can't know it because you already believe in it. And that is added to the other points of the debate that we have been having.

Malcolm wrote:

I accept śabdapramāṇa explicitly, the Buddha's śabda in particular, as it proper, for example, the Pabbakotthaka sutta relates:

"Excellent, Sariputta. Excellent. Those who have not known, seen, penetrated, realized, or attained it by means of discernment would have to take it on conviction [śraddha] in others that the faculty of conviction [śraddha]... persistence... mindfulness... concentration... discernment, when developed & pursued, gains a footing in the Deathless, has the Deathless as its goal & consummation; whereas those who have known, seen, penetrated, realized, & attained it by means of discernment would have no doubt or uncertainty that the faculty of conviction... persistence... mindfulness... concentration... discernment, when developed & pursued, gains a footing in the Deathless, has the Deathless as its goal & consummation."

Here, the Buddha is clearly stating that those of us who are not stream-entrants and so on, need to take it on faith that the five faculties and so on lead to liberation. You prefer accept the śabda of scientists. That's fine, but it is not Buddhist.

This afflictive I-making is not an intellectual belief, and it cannot be routed out through merely imagining it does not exist. It reasserts itself at every turn, at every reaction, in almost everything we do. It is the root of samsara. It cannot be eradicated through intellectual analysis and so on. The point is that for as long as one in thrall of this, for that long ones' continuum will not be liberated.

Definitely agree that it's not possible that just by imagining something not existing you make it so it doesn't exist. Conventional reality comes and shocks you out of that. But then you can't really imagine the positive of that to be true - which is something happening (like rebirth) happening because you believe that it will happen.

Honestly, I would prefer that it didn't. Then, of course, I could just pursue a worldly life, with worldly goals and motivations, and when I die, that would be it.

Again, reality tends to have the final word.

Indeed.

Buddhist Modernism or Secular Buddhism are more focused on contemplation or the inner life of being a Buddhist rather than only the doctrinal aspects.

Total nonsense. These people are concerned only with the benefits meditation practice might have for them in this life. They have no bodhicitta, how could they? They do not believe in Buddhahood.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 20th, 2014 at 1:12 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

pensum said:

How then is this "rebirth" any different from, let alone contradictory to, any process as seen from a Western scientific perspective? As you have defined it here, any disagreement is merely due to using the term "rebirth" and could be avoided by simply using "process" or "evolution".

Malcolm wrote:

The physicalists imagine that when the brain dies, so does an "individual's" stream of consciousness.

pensum said:

1) A seed falls from a tree. The tree dies, is ground up and left to decompose. The seed is planted in the soil created by the decomposition of the tree, and a new tree grows. Is the new tree the old tree reborn?

Malcolm wrote:

No.

pensum said:

2) Two trees stand in a field, a tall one and a short one. The tall one is chopped down. When the stump is dug up, it is discovered that the roots were connected and the little one was just the offshoot of the tall one. So, has one chopped down the original tree or merely pruned it?

Malcolm wrote:

One has chopped down the parent.

pensum said:

3) Two apples fall from the same tree. Are these two individuals or the tree itself?

Malcolm wrote:

They are all distinct individuals, each bearing their own characteristics.

pensum said:

4) A ship, in honour of the professor on Gilligan's Island let us call it "The Minnow", is in continual use. But each night a few parts are secretly removed and replaced by identical ones. The original removed parts are secretly reconstructed. Over the years, The Minnow continues to sail and have its license renewed. After 3 years the boat is entirely reconstructed, and the two identical ships are docked next to each other. Which one is The Minnow? (those who know their Plato will recognize this last one as Theseus's paradox)

Malcolm wrote:

The one licensed as the Minnow.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, May 19th, 2014 at 11:48 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Andrew108 said:

I'm glad to hear it. Perhaps you could describe in more detail the connection between the brain and consciousness. I will add here that for science, the actual production of consciousness is still a matter of debate. What isn't debated is the location of consciousness and therefore cognition.

Malcolm wrote:

The brain necessary for coordinating the five senses. The interaction of consciousness, sense organs and the body with its organs is nothing new.

However, the mano-indriya (the organ of mind) is clearly defined as being non-material. So there you have it.

Andrew108 said:

Liberation isn't really happening for those who take on rebirth as a belief. But if they see rebirth and DO directly in experience then why not? Although I would suggest that direct seeing of rebirth (is it possible or not) is more a result of realization than the cause of realization.

Malcolm wrote:

Rebirth is clearly possible, if you accept Buddha at his word. If you don't, well what can I say?

At first we are scared by rebirth and then later we are comforted by it. All the while we miss the main point of the teachings. That's the problem.

I don't find rebirth comforting at all. Quite the opposite. It does not scare me, I simply know that as long as "I" am bound by affliction, then "I" conventionally speaking, will take rebirth. I.e. the continuum I now call "mine" will not have fully relinquished the innate clinging to 'I', and it will continue in samsara. An empty dharma produced by other empty dharmas.

This afflictive I-making is not an intellectual belief, and it cannot be routed out through merely imagining it does not exist. It reasserts itself at every turn, at every reaction, in almost everything we do. It is the root of samsara. It cannot be eradicated through intellectual analysis and so on. The point is that for as long as one is in thrall of this, for that long one's continuum will not be liberated.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, May 19th, 2014 at 10:35 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

T. Chokyi said:

I felt that is what you were doing with me although you never asked me where I stood.

Malcolm wrote:

I wasn't responding to you as person, I was responding to what was written.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, May 19th, 2014 at 10:31 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Well, hate to disappoint, but rebirth was not a dominant belief during the time of the Buddha. This is a common misconception which comes from not carefully studying the history of Indian thought.

dharmagoat said:

Could it be described as a "common belief" then?

Nevertheless, belief in an afterlife was the norm, was it not?

Malcolm wrote:

Not sure how common it was, really. For example, the first person the Buddha met after awakening was an Ājīvika ascetic, someone who definitely thought the Buddha had something, but since the Ajivikas were materialist ascetics, he was not really interested in Buddha's teachings. On a side note, in the Ashokāvadana, Ashoka is portrayed as ordering the executions of 18,000 Ajivikas because he saw a portrait of the Buddha which cast him in a negative light.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, May 19th, 2014 at 10:16 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

dharmagoat said:

Unfortunately it is necessary to accept rebirth in order to follow the Dharma as taught by the Buddha.

Malcolm wrote:

Presumably that is the one we want to follow, no?

dharmagoat said:

The Dharma as taught in the time of the Buddha, that is. When reincarnation was the predominant belief.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, hate to disappoint, but rebirth was not a dominant belief during the time of the Buddha, it was but one among many beliefs. This is a common misconception which comes from not carefully studying the history of Indian thought.

For example, many brahmins did not believe in rebirth. They performed rituals in order ensure _worldly_ happiness and success by making proper sacrifices and so on. It is not clear at all that rebirth is part of early Vedic religion.

Here is the cliff notes version:

The origin and development of the belief in transmigration of souls are very obscure. A few passages suggest that this doctrine was known even in the days of the Rigveda, and the Brahmanas often refer to doctrines of re-death and rebirth, but it was first clearly propounded in the earliest Upanishad—the Brihadaranyaka. There it is stated that the soul of a Vedic sacrificer returns to earth and is reborn in human or animal form. This doctrine of samsara (reincarnation) is attributed to the sage Uddalaka Aruni, who is said to have learned it from a Kshatriya chief. In the same text, the doctrine of karma (“actions”), according to which the soul achieves a happy or unhappy rebirth according to its works in the previous life, occurs for the first time and is attributed to the theologian Yajnavalkya. Both doctrines seem to have been new, circulating among small groups of ascetics who were disinclined to make them public, perhaps for fear of the orthodox priests. These doctrines must have spread rapidly, for they appear in the later Upanishads and in the earliest Buddhist and Jain scriptures.

<http://www.britannica.com/EBchecked/topic/266312/Hinduism/59824/The-Upanishads>

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, May 19th, 2014 at 10:13 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

pensum said:

Then in light of the above what exactly what is "it" that is reborn, etc.? Especially in light of karma and dependent origination.

Malcolm wrote:

Read my reply to Andrew -- the aggregates of this life are serially connected with those of the next, cf, Nāgārjuna above; nevertheless, nothing transfers from this life to the next which could be described as an agent or a self. Nevertheless, there is rebirth, there is karma and the ripening of karma, all of which take place with out any substantial or real agent or actor.

pensum said:

Once that has been laid out then i might be able to sort out whether modern Western perspectives are actually all that different or not, or if the apparent disagreements are really just false assumptions from either side.

Malcolm wrote:

Don't be ridiculous -- these issues have been discussed to death on these boards, all the players here understand the terms.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, May 19th, 2014 at 10:02 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

T. Chokyi said:

one can't be saying someone isn't a Buddhist for example, and then that someone may say back to the one saying they aren't Buddhist, something like "I've been a Buddhist for 26 years".

Malcolm wrote:

It is quite obvious that your intention was to label me a pecha thumper. I don't care. When people say things that are clearly at odds with Buddhadharma, it is quite right to question whether they are Buddhists. When so called "Buddhists" advocate the Carvaka materialist view, they are not Buddhists, but instead are promulgating false views. The denial of rebirth is one of the two fundamental false view the Buddha describes, it is the view of non-being. Nāgārjuna describes this view as being very pernicious in more than one place.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, May 19th, 2014 at 9:51 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

T. Chokyi said:

Can you explain that experience she had? Do you care to talk about the implications of such a delog?

Andrew108 said:

Evidence is not the type of word we can use here. The implications of someone having an out of body experience and being able to see things that they are not supposed to know about poses certain logical problems. First of which is how do we see without eyes? Second is how does the information about the object travel from the object to the one perceiving the object? I would guess that light and photons have to be involved somewhere? So again how can something new be seen when there is no organ to perceive it and where there is no light doing the illuminating. The obvious answer (to me anyway) is that it is seen in the 'mind's eye' and that it must either be a repressed memory or a deduction that is being visualized.

I'm going to presume that you hold another view of this, so could you offer a rational explanation that can counter the explanation I have put forward?

Malcolm wrote:

Sure, such a person has a mental body with all sense organs intact (manomaya-kāya), as described by the Buddha in many places.

Basically, Andrew, the reason why I question whether you are actually a Buddhist, despite your emotional allegiance to Buddhism and time put in pursuing Buddhist studies, is that your physicalist views cause you to contradict the Buddha's own words at every turn.

Instead asking us to reevaluate our beliefs in terms of how they line up with scientific theories of mind and cognition, I think it is time for you reevaluate whether you really have faith in the Buddha's teachings and whether they really serve your purpose any longer.

From everything I have seen you say, you would be happier as a Taoist, quite honestly. They have no theory of rebirth. They value naturalism and non-contrivance, they have a quasi theory of emptiness, sort of, they sort of have dependent origination, etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, May 19th, 2014 at 9:25 PM

Title: China expands new measures to directly control Tibetan monas

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Chinese authorities in Yulshul (Ch: Yushu) Tibetan Autonomous Prefecture, Qinghai Province, in the Tibetan province of Kham has begun implementing new repressive measures introduced in late 2011 to directly control and manage Buddhist religious institutions in Tibet.

<http://www.tchrd.org/2014/05/china-expands-new-measures-to-directly-control-tibetan-monasteries>

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, May 19th, 2014 at 9:04 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

PorkChop said:

Once rebirth (and any sort of post mortem experience) is explicitly denied, bodhicitta loses a lot of its actual meaning. Not only is the multi-lifetime career of a bodhisattva rendered null and void, but so is the idea that Buddhas always continue to work tirelessly to relieve the suffering of sentient beings (a foundational tenet of Mahayana). If this one lifetime is it, you might as well be a social worker, get involved with greenpeace, or join the peace corps you'd do a lot more good.

Malcolm wrote:

It is true many people mistake compassion, which does not have the force to lead to buddhahood, with bodhicitta, the aspiration to become a buddha to benefit sentient beings.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, May 19th, 2014 at 8:35 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

ovi said:

I'm not criticizing those who do believe in rebirth, I just don't think it's necessary in order to be a Buddhist.

Malcolm wrote:

Rebirth is necessary for understanding both the Mainstream Buddhist path as well as the Mahāyāna and Vajrayāna paths.

Frankly, if you say you don't accept rebirth, you are basically saying that you don't really accept the Dharma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, May 19th, 2014 at 8:28 PM

Title: Re: Death at Tibetan Buddhist meditation retreat in Arizona

Content:

Zhen Li said:

I do sometimes wonder if DM is so far gone as to be a (dangerous) cult, and what it'd be like if it was in 'communion' with mainstream Buddhism.

5heaps said:
easily one of the top 3 sanghas in the US

Malcolm wrote:
Who are the other 2?

5heaps said:
then again most centers are very low quality, so thats not hard

Malcolm wrote:
That is a pretty serious criticism. Upon what do you base it? Have you been to most of the Sanghas in the US?

5heaps said:
there are some problems, as there always are, but the caliber of people there far exceed the majority of dharma students in general. its basically a bunch of psychologists, architects, singers, artists, bankers, scientists, business ppl, studying dharma together

Malcolm wrote:
Sounds like any number of Sanghas in the US, not only three. Pride is fine, arrogance, well...

Author: Malcolm
Date: Monday, May 19th, 2014 at 8:12 PM
Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism
Content:

Malcolm wrote:
The main point is that rebirth, dependent origination and karma are keystone doctrines of the Dharma, and need to be understood in that respect.

Andrew108 said:
Yes this is the main point that you want to make. But you haven't really established logically why a literal interpretation of rebirth is valid.

Malcolm wrote:
Sure I have -- the Buddha taught literally. Anyone who spends even a little bit of time with Buddhist texts can hardly dispute that literal rebirth is a central concern of the Buddha's.

Andrew108 said:
1. You said that rebirth happens because of alayavijnana - afflicted consciousness acts as a store. You then said everyone accepts this. Not everyone accepts that there is alayavijnana not even conventionally. Prasangika for one does not accept alayavijnana.

Malcolm wrote:
Gelugpa Prasangikas do not accept the ālayavijñāna, however Candrakirti does.

Jayananda, the Indian Pandita who translated the Madhyamakavatara with Batsap into Tibetan explains in his commentary on the MAV, that ālayavijñāna is a name for consciousness which has emptiness, i.e. the ālaya, as its object. Further I already explained to you what Candrakirti holds to take rebirth, the habit of I-making. Eliminate the knowledge obscuration of the habit of I-making, all birth in samsara ceases. Even tenth stage bodhisattvas have a subtle knowledge obscuration of self-grasping, while being Buddhas in practically every other respect.

Andrew108 said:

2. You cannot explain how it is that consciousness creates another moment of consciousness to the extent that consciousness can 'exist' or at least be functional when there is no physical support or external object. You would have to assert continuity. If you assert continuity then you are asserting some kind of essence - or at least something acting as an essence.

Malcolm wrote:

Nāgārjuna writes in the Pratītyasamutpadahridaya

Although the aggregates are serially connected, the wise are to comprehend nothing has transfers

As to consciousness being "non-functional" when there is no physical senses or objects -- I agree, without physical senses, even all the traces stored in the ālayavijñāna will remain unripened. For example, four kinds of formless realm beings only have a single concept during their entire lives, i.e. the concept of "everything is consciousness", etc. They cannot have any other concept since they have no sensory input at all. However, their lifespan, lasting hundreds of millions of years is supported on karma, merit and jivendriya, the organ of lifeforce.

Andrew108 said:

3. The brain is more important than you take it to be. When the brain has problems it seems consciousness also has problems. If there were some underlying consciousness then you wonder how all of these problems like memory loss could occur? When someone's conscious experience is effected there can be seen corresponding damage within the brain. Strong logic that the brain and consciousness are intimately linked. Nearly all philosophers today accept consciousness to be brain-based.

Malcolm wrote:

I never ruled out a relationship between consciousness and the brain. If you think so you are mistaken. What I don't accept that that brain produces consciousness.

Andrew108 said:

4. Nihilists 2,500 years ago were a different breed than the nihilists today. And still today teachings on rebirth have a positive value. Especially for those who would be prone to act without a care for their actions.

Malcolm wrote:

Actually, the materialists of 2,500 years ago use more or less precisely the same arguments to negate rebirth as materialists today. So they have not advanced that much.

Andrew108 said:

5. You don't believe in reincarnation but you do believe in rebirth. Many have taken the rebirth notion and use it to justify their bias for a transmigrating consciousness. They have also said that you can control this transmigrating consciousness and direct it. One may also use it to achieve liberation. You don't accept that though because you don't believe in a transmigrating consciousness or reincarnation.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, if you were to read back on some of my posts, you would see that I think the distinction that some try to make between reincarnation and rebirth is dubious. In English they are in fact synonymous. However, the modern convention is to treat them differently, one as a soul/atman based interpretation of migration through samsara, the other interpretation of migration in samsara absent a soul or self. As Buddhist, I think the latter is correct and the former to be mistaken.

Andrew108 said:

6. Rebirth means becoming. That is how it fits into the DO model. Thinking of it in these terms is an effective remedy for those who are prone to ignore conventional truth and to assert a kind of inertness. It is a natural law. Becoming. But we still have no logical proof that this becoming is personal to us - that we will personally continue to become again and again for as long as it takes for us to become Buddha.

Malcolm wrote:

Rebirth happens at two places in the twelve links of dependent origination, it happens at the link of consciousness, and it happens at the link of birth. The links 3 — 10 are the links of this life. Becoming is everything we do in this life, which provides the karma which informs the next life. Nāgārjuna again:

The first, eighth and ninth are affliction;

The second and the tenth are action.

Also the remaining seven are suffering.

Twelve dharmas are gathered into three.

Two arise from three.

Seven are produced from two,

That is the wheel of existence, it is turned again and again.

Andrew108 said:

7. Middle way teachings are subtle and easily misunderstood. Understanding emptiness isn't by itself something that liberates, but on the other hand one wonders how an understanding rebirth would lead to liberation?

Malcolm wrote:

Nāgārjuna again:

All migrating beings are causes and results.

There are no sentient beings at all.

Empty dhammas are entirely produced from dhammas strictly empty;
dhammas without a self and [not] of a self.

In other words, liberation ensues from understanding rebirth in terms of rebirth and dependent origination. Buddha's own liberation, according to the Majjhima Nikaya was brought about because he recalled more than 90,000 of his past lives, and through doing so, understood the principle of dependent origination. In the first watch, he reviewed his own past lives, in the second watch he reviewed the samsaric travails of other beings. In the third, he watch he understood dependent origination and the four noble truths, and at that point, became the Buddha. In the <http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/mn/mn.004.than.html>:

"When the mind was thus concentrated, purified, bright, unblemished, rid of defilement, pliant, malleable, steady, & attained to imperturbability, I directed it to the knowledge of recollecting my past lives. I recollected my manifold past lives, i.e., one birth, two... five, ten... fifty, a hundred, a thousand, a hundred thousand, many eons of cosmic contraction, many eons of cosmic expansion, many eons of cosmic contraction & expansion: 'There I had such a name, belonged to such a clan, had such an appearance. Such was my food, such my experience of pleasure & pain, such the end of my life. Passing away from that state, I re-arose there. There too I had such a name, belonged to such a clan, had such an appearance. Such was my food, such my experience of pleasure & pain, such the end of my life. Passing away from that state, I re-arose here.' Thus I remembered my manifold past lives in their modes & details.

"This was the first knowledge I attained in the first watch of the night. Ignorance was destroyed; knowledge arose; darkness was destroyed; light arose — as happens in one who is heedful, ardent, & resolute.

"When the mind was thus concentrated, purified, bright, unblemished, rid of defilement, pliant, malleable, steady, & attained to imperturbability, I directed it to the knowledge of the passing away & reappearance of beings. I saw — by means of the divine eye, purified & surpassing the human — beings passing away & re-appearing, and I discerned how they are inferior & superior, beautiful & ugly, fortunate & unfortunate in accordance with their kamma: 'These beings — who were endowed with bad conduct of body, speech & mind, who reviled noble ones, held wrong views and undertook actions under the influence of wrong views — with the break-up of the body, after death, have re-appeared in the plane of deprivation, the bad destination, the lower realms, in hell. But these beings — who were endowed with good conduct of body, speech, & mind, who did not revile noble ones, who held right views and undertook actions under the influence of right views — with the break-up of the body, after death, have re-appeared in the good destinations, in the heavenly world.' Thus — by means of the divine eye, purified & surpassing the human — I saw beings passing away & re-appearing, and I discerned how they are inferior & superior, beautiful & ugly, fortunate & unfortunate in accordance with their kamma.

"This was the second knowledge I attained in the second watch of the night. Ignorance was destroyed; knowledge arose; darkness was destroyed; light arose — as happens in one who is heedful, ardent, & resolute.

"When the mind was thus concentrated, purified, bright, unblemished, rid of defilement, pliant, malleable, steady, & attained to imperturbability, I directed it to the knowledge of the ending of the mental fermentations. I discerned, as it had come to be, that 'This is stress... This is the origination of stress... This is the cessation of stress... This is the way leading to the cessation of stress... These are fermentations... This is the origination of fermentations... This is the cessation of fermentations... This is the way leading to the cessation of fermentations.' My heart, thus knowing, thus seeing, was released from the fermentation of sensuality, released from the fermentation of becoming, released from the fermentation of ignorance. With release, there was the knowledge, 'Released.' I discerned that 'Birth is ended, the holy life fulfilled, the task done. There is nothing further for this world.'

"This was the third knowledge I attained in the third watch of the night. Ignorance was destroyed; knowledge arose; darkness was destroyed; light arose — as happens in one who is heedful, ardent, & resolute.

Andrew108 said:

Teachings on emptiness do contain definitive aspects that once understood in direct experience do lead to liberation - they are definitive and that is not just my point of view. Consider the following from Nagarjuna:

...

Here Nagarjuna is questioning this assumption you have of present unenlightenment and future liberation. Future liberation here is seen as a convention since by what are beings bound?

Malcolm wrote:

I agree that rebirth is a convention. So is the attainment of Buddhahood. As Haribhadra points out, the path from beginning to end is an illusion. So what? We still have to travel it.

Andrew108 said:

Milarepa sang:

Not separating appearance and emptiness

This is mastery of the view.

Malcolm wrote:

This master became a master because of his terror of rebirth in lower realms.

Andrew108 said:

So why cling to conventional beliefs if liberation is your target?

Malcolm wrote:

It is not a question of clinging to conventional beliefs -- it is a question of understanding that if one does not achieve liberation in this life, then due to innate I-making, etc, one will continue to take rebirth in samsara.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, May 19th, 2014 at 7:31 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Emptiness is not a unique teaching of the Buddha, Hume understood it; Hindus teach emptiness. The four nobles truths are predicated on an understanding of rebirth.

ovi said:

From my understanding, Hinduism talks about atman, I could be wrong though.

Malcolm wrote:

Some do, but Hinduism is a vast field, and there are many permutations. It is never really accurate to say "Hindus believe..."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, May 19th, 2014 at 6:40 AM

Title: Re: Receiving Empowerment: Crash Course

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Well, you had the intent to take them, you recited them in Tibetan following His Holiness, and so you took them. The refuge and the bodhisattva vows would have been just about the first thing you recited, apart from perhaps a Lama dgongs su sol....

The main point is that you received permission to practice Tara, which is what you wanted after all, no? Email me off line if you would like the sadhana to practice.

M

Motova said:

I didn't recite anything in Tibetan until the Guru Rinpoche empowerment because I simply had no idea. Luckily a friend beside me told me I should, so I tried to copy it as best as I could.

Also there were a couple of kids going back and forth to their moms and I had the pleasure of being in the middle of the that and crying babies while HHST was explaining the visualizations. And on top of that I had no idea what the syllables I had to visualize looked like in any of the empowerments....

Malcolm wrote:

Well, go to Montreal, it will all be in English there...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, May 19th, 2014 at 6:05 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The proof that consciousness could be rooted in material processes can only be shown by the generation of a sentient being through means which do not involve biological reproduction.

ovi said:

How about evolution, the origin of life itself?

Malcolm wrote:

That does not support the idea that consciousness is rooted in material processes. There is no basis at all for an inference that this planet is the only planet upon which sentient beings may be found.

ovi said:

For me, the notion of rebirth does not matter; one can uphold it, deny it or neither.

Malcolm wrote:

The point is that rebirth is a keystone teaching of the Buddhas. Through recollecting his past lives, according to Mainstream Buddhism, the Buddha came to understand the principle of dependent origination (which by the way was not conceived in any fashion at all related to external phenomena).

ovi said:

I consider the Kalama Sutta the charter to free inquiry and I think that whatever skillful means I use to attain liberation that is in accord with the Teaching is correct in this sense.

Malcolm wrote:

The Kalamas sutta is the most miscited text on the whole of the Pali Canon. It is not a charter for free inquiry. Not that free inquiry is forbidden in Buddhism, for it is not. But the Kalamas is not a charter for it. It principally concerns teaching the four Brahma Viharas to people who may or may not accept the principles of rebirth, dependent origination, so on and so forth.

ovi said:

Furthermore, I did bring the Dharma into discussion with suitable people, but knowing that none of them actually believe in any sort of afterlife and it would be a hindrance for them, I did not bring up the issue. Instead, I try to lead the discussion towards dependent origination, emptiness, virtues/bodhicitta and The Four Noble Truths, what truly make Buddhism unique.

Malcolm wrote:

Emptiness is not a unique teaching of the Buddha, Hume understood it; Hindus teach emptiness. The four nobles truths are predicated on an understanding of rebirth.

We can understand that emptiness is not a unique teaching of the Buddha because for formless āyatana, "all is emptiness", etc.

ovi said:

Sure you can make use of rebirth, but maybe some can understand why sometimes it's useful not to.

Malcolm wrote:

The main point is that rebirth, dependent origination and karma are keystone doctrines of the Dharma, and need to be understood in that respect.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, May 19th, 2014 at 4:49 AM

Title: Re: Receiving Empowerment: Crash Course

Content:

Motova said:

I had no idea what was going on.

Malcolm wrote:

BTW, no one ever has any idea what is going on in the very first initiation they take. How could they? But with time you will learn. Taking initiations is a skill acquired through repetition. The first initiation I ever received was from HHST, I had no idea what was happening, other than that I could not sit still for longer than a minute, and I really had no comprehension of what he was doing, and it was all in English.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, May 18th, 2014 at 11:28 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

xabir said:

But you seem to be suggesting here that there is appearances and then there is the mind that cognizes those appearances?

dzogchungpa said:

I'm not an expert, but otherwise wouldn't the vedana skandha, for example, be part of the vijnana skandha?

Malcolm wrote:

Vedana skandha, like saṃjñā skandha, is actually a mental factor (caittas). They both are named "skandha" for their special power in keeping sentient beings bound to samsara. As objects, they are part of the dharmāyatana/dhātu, along with the saṃskara skandha.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, May 18th, 2014 at 11:26 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

xabir said:

But you seem to be suggesting here that there is appearances and then there is the mind that cognizes those appearances?

Malcolm wrote:

Conventionally speaking, there are outer objects and sense organs for those objects, presented in the scheme of the twelve āyatanas.

Andrew, Daverupa and so on do not accept higher Mahāyāna tenets, so it is pointless to bring them up here. They consider Mainstream Buddhism more authoritative.

We are talking about what are the minimum tenet requirements of Buddhist view. That necessarily involves privileging Mainstream Buddhist tenets, since they are shared by everyone (with qualification).

This part of the conversation is a sidetrack from the main point — the necessity for maintaining rebirth, dependent origination and karma as mutually related keystone doctrines of Buddhadharma, contra a modernist approach to Buddhism which would abandon these in favor of some sort of materialistic framework.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, May 18th, 2014 at 10:32 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

But these things are not consciousness, they are experienced by consciousness.

daverupa said:

So consciousness is to be understood apart from its content? This seems to get in the way of rise-fall contemplation... e.g. dependent on sense-sphere and sense-content, sense-consciousness arises.

This is in accord with all six senses; it is the case for the All.

Malcolm wrote:

There are cittas and caittas, no? Caittas belong to the dharmāyatana/dhātu, the object of the manāyatana/manodhātu

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, May 18th, 2014 at 9:13 PM

Title: Re: Receiving Empowerment: Crash Course

Content:

Motova said:

Did I receive empowerment?

Malcolm wrote:

You received the permission to practice Green Tara, a jenang. You went for refuge, you took bodhisattvas vows with one of the greatest living masters in world. Rather than being disappointed you should be rejoicing.

Even if the whole thing was in english from beginning to end, you still would not have received anything more than that. So count yourself as fortunate.

A jenang does not typically have an elaborate mandala, BTW.

Motova said:

Thanks Malcolm, I get your point. I don't like to be a cry baby, it's just not what I expected.

I had no idea what was going on. How could I have taken bodhisattva vows without even understanding I was taking them? I knew that they would be occurring during the empowerment/transmission because you mentioned so and I had the intent to take them, but when I think of taking vows I think of active participation in the moment.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, you had the intent to take them, you recited them in Tibetan following His Holiness, and so you took them. The refuge and the bodhisattva vows would have been just about the first thing you recited, apart from perhaps a Lama dgongs su sol....

The main point is that you received permission to practice Tara, which is what you wanted after all, no? Email me off line if you would like the sadhana to practice.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, May 18th, 2014 at 8:58 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Andrew108 said:

The fact that blind people who are blind at birth do not dream in images is well established. This is logical proof that consciousness relies on a material base to operate. So.....mental consciousness needs a brain. It's clear and logical.

Malcolm wrote:

Not even slightly. In the case of the five senses, it is generally the case that we consider that consciousness operates through them. But if you propose the brain as material basis of consciousness, just where in the brain is? The whole brain? This can't be the case because if it were, then modifying any part of the part of the brain would modify consciousness -- certainly we can stimulate mood, arousal, fear, etc., by stimulating the brain in this way that. But these things are not consciousness, they are experienced by consciousness.

Andrew108 said:

What is also clear (to me) is that afflicted consciousness must be a 'special type' of consciousness because it doesn't have a specific physical basis. It seems that those proponents of afflicted consciousness view the preceding moment of this consciousness to give rise to subsequent later and different moments of the same consciousness. In effect it is consciousness being both the cause and the result of itself - like riding on your own shoulders. I have doubts about this - I am agnostic about this. I view this as a convention that has weak logic underpinning it. I view a literal interpretation of rebirth as being a convention and under-pinned by weak logic.

Malcolm wrote:

Now you are referring klṣṭa-mānas. In fact it does not give rise to itself, but takes as its object the other six consciousnesses, according to the Yogacara model.

Andrew108 said:

There are Sūtric references to this type of consciousness. I regard these references as not definitive (given the argument that I have used previously) and that belief in rebirth has historically been an important device that may have now served its purpose (for certain types of practitioners). Although who knows?

Malcolm wrote:

Neyārtha simple means "interpretable". Nitārtha means "requires no interpretation". There are different uses of these terms in different context. For example, the Avatamska-sūtra refers to itself as the "definitive sūtra for practice". The Akṣayamatinirdeṣa-sūtra establishes that any sūtra which talks about pretty much anything other than emptiness is provisional. I agree with the latter sūtra, of course. However, it does not work to say "science is based on natural laws" for that too is provisional. There are no more natural laws than there are persons, living beings, selves and so on. You cannot have it both ways. You must either stick to your proposed ultimate perspective in which there is no cessation, no arising, no going, no coming and so on, or come down to earth.

Andrew108 said:

I think if you look at a country like Thailand where belief in rebirth is the consensus you can see it both helps and hinders.

Malcolm wrote:

I don't think the Buddha's teaching rebirth hinders anyone. I see it as being salutary in every respect.

Andrew108 said:

There have always been debates and contra-positions within Buddhist traditions. One might say with a certain amount of certainty that there has never been an orthodoxy. So why try to establish one?

Malcolm wrote:

There has never ever been a debate as to whether rebirth was factual or not within the Buddhist tradition until the late 20th century and now in the 21st century, when number of unconscious materialists (unconscious in the sense of being unaware of how ingrained their "scientific" materialism was) became fascinated with Buddhist meditation but could not accept rebirth due to their prior conditioning by logical positivism. For example, a fellow like Buddhadasa could never have even imagined negating rebirth without exposure to western science which occurred because the King of Siam, educated at Harvard in the 19th century, ordered the educational system in Thailand to adopt a western curriculum.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, May 18th, 2014 at 8:11 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Who says people born blind never dream in images?

pensum said:

Actually blind people don't dream in images. I went to a talk by Ryan Knighton who wrote a book about his experience of losing his sight and i was surprised to discover that even when a sighted person loses their sight, over time they eventually lose visual memory and the visual component of dreams as well. In fact, Ryan made the point that the blind community don't consider someone truly blind until they no longer have visual dreams. (this is his book: <https://www.amazon.ca/Cockeyed-A-Memoir-Ryan-Knighton/dp/0143051857> " onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;" onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;" onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;" onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;")

dzogchungpa said:

Interestingly, I recently learned that blind people can experience phosphenes.

Malcolm wrote:

Right, this is why in Dzogchen teachings there are thogal techniques even for blind people.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, May 18th, 2014 at 8:10 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Who says people born blind never dream in images?

pensum said:

Actually blind people don't dream in images.

Malcolm wrote:

Never, ever?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, May 18th, 2014 at 6:39 AM

Title: Re: Receiving Empowerment: Crash Course

Content:

Motova said:

Did I receive empowerment?

Malcolm wrote:

You received the permission to practice Green Tara, a jenang. You went for refuge, you took bodhisattvas vows with one of the greatest living masters in world. Rather than being disappointed you should be rejoicing.

Even if the whole thing was in english from beginning to end, you still would not have received anything more than that. So count yourself as fortunate.

A jenang does not typically have an elaborate mandala, BTW.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, May 18th, 2014 at 6:34 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Matt J said:

While true, some models work better than others. For example, I would prefer the modern Western medical model over the Medieval Western 4 humors theory as the Western model appears to allow people to live longer.

Malcolm wrote:

Western medical model misses a lot that Unnani Tibb and Ayurvedic/Tibetan Medicine models don't.

In reality, I, as a physician of Tibetan Medicine, have been able to address conditions [dramatically in some instances] allopaths don't know what do about since they do not have a model to account for many conditions, so they are left untreated by allopaths.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, May 18th, 2014 at 6:30 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Andrew108 said:

If consciousness contained seeds or habitual tendencies or traces of any kind, then those born blind would be able to dream in images because the traces from previous lives (countless) would be present. But since there is no eye faculty there is no eye consciousness. Would these blind people experience the visions in the bardo? Obviously not. What does this tell you about consciousness?

Malcolm wrote:

Who says people born blind never dream in images?

When a person is in the bardo, they have mind-made body with complete faculties, so of course they would experience the visions in the bardo.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, May 18th, 2014 at 1:09 AM

Title: Re: Is Rebirth Unscientific?

Content:

Matt J said:

How is rebirth unscientific? For that matter, even reincarnation?

Malcolm wrote:

You have to ask those who think it is, people like Andrew108.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, May 18th, 2014 at 12:16 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Andrew108 said:

Malcolm, you haven't debated. My main contention is that consciousness cannot be a stream.

Malcolm wrote:

Of course it can be a stream.

Andrew108 said:

If you assert that one moment of consciousness gives rise to the next moment of consciousness

Malcolm wrote:

I didn't assert a single cause for a moment of consciousness. The rest of your refutations are therefore invalid.

Andrew108 said:

In essence what you are doing with rebirth is giving primacy to deluded consciousness by saying that that is where and what the self is and that is why rebirth happens.

Malcolm wrote:

What I am saying is that rebirth happens because a deluded consciousness apprehends a self, in line with some Madhyamakas, since Bhaviveka actually claims that consciousness is what takes rebirth. Other Madhyamakas state that what takes rebirth is the deluded habit of I-making. In any case, no Madhyamaka negates rebirth.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, May 17th, 2014 at 9:50 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

T. Chokyi said:

CHNN always stresses respect...

Malcolm wrote:

He also stress respecting the teachings and not importing foreign things into them.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, May 17th, 2014 at 8:51 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

So it is necessary consequence that a proper Buddhist view includes rebirth; people who say otherwise are quite simply deluded about what the Dharma is.

pensum said:

and yet... Being reborn in the three dimensions of existence,

All is just a name and a magical illusion ( rDo rje sems dpa' nam kha' che ch.30, Kunjed Gyalpo, pg. 170 in Supreme Source)

Malcolm wrote:

So? This illustrates nothing contradictory at all my fundamental point, which is that as long as one is under the influence of affliction, one will continue to take rebirth in samsara, despite the fact it is a mere name and an illusion.

Moreover, there is nothing in this statement you produce which says anything even slightly different than Prajñānpāramitā in general.

Incidentally, the notion that recognizing "the nature of the mind" is adequate is really a pity. A lot of yogis crash and burn on that one. In fact, recognizing the nature of the mind is not even the path. It is the basis (khregs chod). It is upon that recognition (now we are in Dzogchen land), that one practices the path (thod rgal). And in the case of the bodhicitta text you cite, the path is the two stages, the bodhicitta texts themselves describe the result of the two stages and nothing more. Even ChNN maintains that this is so.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, May 17th, 2014 at 8:48 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

oushi said:

Rebirth is something that requires understanding, not belief, because it takes place here and now through intention. Intention creates new karma, and is the result of old karma. This is the vicious circle of samsara. Some may believe that this intention can transmigrate to another body after death, but even if it doesn't, the problem and techniques used to break this cycle stays the same. If we manage to break it, and the entire old karma is burned, then there is liberation.

Malcolm wrote:

There is no need to burn all of our old karma, so to speak. We merely need to interrupt its causes for ripening.

oushi said:

If we attack someone personally, an intention to defend will arise in him. This is not helping anyone, quite contrary, it's creating more karma. There is no understanding, learning and relief during a battle.

Malcolm wrote:

This isn't a battle, this is yet just one more illustration of how Buddhism will either be practiced as the Buddha intended, or be changed into a "non-Buddhism", by abandoning keystone teachings such as karma, rebirth, and so on.

What I have pointed out repeatedly, and few people seem to hear, is that Buddha's model of liberation was elaborated in terms of how many rebirths one would undertake in the desire and form realms before one attained nirvana upon achieving stream-entry.

This is just talking about achieving freedom. We have not even begun to talk about the Mahāyāna path of attaining omniscience, but here we are, having a discussion amongst people of supposedly Mahāyāna persuasions who do not seem to have even the most basic concept of freedom in Buddhism means.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, May 17th, 2014 at 8:27 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Andrew108 said:

Consciousness cannot exist without an object.

Malcolm wrote:

The Kevaddha sutta directly contradicts your thesis, as do countless numbers of Mahāyāna sutras, as well as all of the Dzogchen tantras.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, May 17th, 2014 at 8:24 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

It has already, look at Rigpa, Shambhala, Dzogchen Community, etc.

Minjeay said:

Oh wey, poor, poor traditionalist buddhists.

Malcolm wrote:

I wasn't complaining, merely acknowledging a fact.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, May 17th, 2014 at 8:20 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Zhen Li said:

I don't think Malcolm is claiming that the Buddha's realisation was just rebirth.

But the texts detailing his enlightenment do depict him acquiring knowledge of rebirth, along with the noble truths.

Personally, I think it's okay to admit that one doesn't know, but I don't think confident scepticism should be employed prior to fully satisfying oneself of the opponent's arguments.

pensum said:

Malcolm, Dzongsar Khyentse and others have however claimed that accepting rebirth is a necessary condition for being a Buddhist. And yet not even Dharmakirti, let alone they, can present a sound, cogent argument for rebirth or its necessity. Whereas the nature of mind is readily accessible, provable without recourse to any external agent, by its very definition fundamental and hence its realization can be said to be infallible.

Malcolm wrote:

The problem, pensum, is that awakening is not merely understanding the nature of the mind. This is more along the lines of neo-advaita, and those folks. What is necessary for awakening, as described the Buddha, is an insight into dependent origination which causes one to relinquish fetters than bind one to samsaric rebirth.

For example, when reading the <http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/mn/mn.135.than.html>, one cannot come away with anything other than the conclusion that Buddha really meant rebirth quite literally when the subject came up.

Or here, where the Buddha discusses cosmology:

"There will be a time, monks, when this world comes to an end.[32] And at that time, beings are generally reborn in the heaven of the Radiant Deities.[33] There they live, made of mind, feeding on joy, radiating light from themselves, traversing the skies, living in glory, and thus they remain for a very long time. When the world comes to an end, monks, these Radiant Deities rank as the highest. But even for the Radiant Deities change takes place, transformation takes place.

— <http://www.accesstoinight.org/lib/authors/nyanaponika/wheel238.html#book-10>

So it is necessary consequence that a proper Buddhist view includes rebirth; people who say otherwise are quite simply deluded about what the Dharma is.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, May 17th, 2014 at 8:10 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

pensum said:

for no one has yet presented consciousness independent of matter...

Malcolm wrote:

The Buddha did, they are called formless realms...

pensum said:

Okay, then what is the proof for the existence of such formless realms?

Malcolm wrote:

In this case we must rely on śabda pramāṇa, the testimony of reliable witnesses, the generations of awakened people who have experienced such an "sphere" of existence through the four formless āyatana. Why? Because such phenomena are not within the purview of those who have not developed sufficient meditative ability. The same is true of rebirth. Until you yourself attain the abhijñā of recalling past lives, you have to take it on the word of the Buddha, etc., that you have past lives.

So in this case you either accept the authority of the Buddha or you don't. There is nothing sophistic about it. You either accept that ordinary sentient beings with their ordinary powers of cognition are not capable of perceiving certain things or you don't.

In fact, the arguments of materialists that consciousness is a mere epiphenomena of brain function are quite weak and unconvincing. This is not to say that our cognitions are not moulded by our nervous system, because of course they are. That is a necessary consequence of taking a human, animal or so on body. The proof that consciousness could be rooted in material processes can only be shown by the generation of a sentient being through means which do not involve biological reproduction.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, May 17th, 2014 at 8:42 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

pensum said:

for no one has yet presented consciousness independent of matter...

Malcolm wrote:

The Buddha did, they are called formless realms...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, May 17th, 2014 at 7:30 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

pensum said:

Furthermore, because a specific material cause is cannot be pinpointed does not lead to the conclusion that there is no material cause, merely that the cause remains inconclusive, unknown or inaccessible.

Malcolm wrote:

One can make the reverse argument for consciousness "because a specific non-material cause for matter is cannot be pinpointed does not lead to the conclusion that there is no non-material cause, merely that the cause remains inconclusive, unknown or inaccessible."

Its a very vague argument.

If mind and matter arise mutually, or are coemergent, this still does not point to a material cause for mind.

It would not point to a unique cause, but still to a necessary causal factor, for in such a case without matter there would be no consciousness.

In any case, we are talking about the stream of individual consciousness.

<http://www.unm.edu/~rhayes/rebirth.pdf> " onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;" onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, May 17th, 2014 at 7:05 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

pensum said:

Just wondering but how does one prove conclusively that consciousness does not have a material cause?

Malcolm wrote:

Well, exactly what is the material cause of consciousness? Andrew, among others for example, seem to think it arises in from the brain.

pensum said:

Or that consciousness and matter arise mutually or are coemergent?

Malcolm wrote:

If mind and matter arise mutually, or are coemergent, this still does not point to a material cause for mind.

pensum said:

As this would require presenting consciousness without recourse to any material body or related to any physical sensation or process such as seeing, hearing, thinking. And this evidence would also need to be presented to a pure consciousness independent of any physical sense, such as sound (word), image etc. which seems a tall order.

Malcolm wrote:

Consciousness without feature,
without end,

luminous all around:

Here water, earth, fire, & wind have no footing.

Here long & short coarse & fine fair & foul name & form

are all brought to an end.
With the cessation of [the activity of] consciousness each is here brought to an end."

<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/dn/dn.11.0.than.html> "
onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

Author: Malcolm
Date: Saturday, May 17th, 2014 at 5:15 AM
Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism
Content:

Andrew108 said:
I understand it and I am very happy with it. Since you can't prove rebirth, not even logically...

Malcolm wrote:
Of course rebirth can be proven logically once one understands how the Buddha structured the five aggregates.

It is a simple procedure:

Either consciousness has a material cause or it does not have a material cause.

If consciousness has a material cause, then there is no rebirth.

No material cause can be found for consciousness.

If consciousness does not have a material cause, it must have another kind of cause, i.e. a non-material cause. In which case the first moment of consciousness of this life must arise from the previous moment of consciousness of a past life, much as the present moment of consciousness one is experiencing now must have arisen from a previous moment of consciousness.

This is the basic logic used by Dharmakirti to refute materialists.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Saturday, May 17th, 2014 at 1:31 AM
Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism
Content:

JKhedrup said:
God forbid we should correct anyone. After all, "Buddhism" is like a Montessori school, its not whether you are right or wrong, its how you feel when you did it...

This also points to this alarming new trend of Buddhist students never wanting to have a teacher.

Malcolm wrote:

We live in a society where people trust their peer group more than their elders.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, May 17th, 2014 at 12:55 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

smcj said:

Oh I buy it alright. I'm just trying to allow for other people to practice as they please without criticism.

Malcolm wrote:

God forbid we should correct anyone. After all, "Buddhism" is like a Montessori school, its not whether you are right or wrong, its how you feel when you did it...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, May 17th, 2014 at 12:37 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Prasutagus said:

I am just encountering more and more Buddhists that seem to not believe in rebirth and who also don't a problem with any of the logical ramifications of that position. I'm curious how one does that.

Malcolm wrote:

They don't understand the ramifications of their point of view.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, May 17th, 2014 at 12:36 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

smcj said:

I still say that "I just don't buy it" is a completely fine position to take. That's a person's prerogative.

Malcolm wrote:

The question is not what a person's prerogatives are; the question is at what point do our personal biases and convictions render our "Buddhism" a "non-Buddhism?"

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, May 17th, 2014 at 12:21 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Andrew108 said:

The descriptions of rebirth are provisional.

Malcolm wrote:

No, they are definitive, nges don, they require no interpretation.

If "provisional" means "for some people, these descriptions are not meaningful", then even buddhahood is provisional, even emptiness is provisional. The consequence of your belief is nihilism, both epistemic as well as moral.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 16th, 2014 at 11:57 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Andrew108 said:

External object is something that is not consciousness itself. If you say that when we die, one moment of consciousness results in another moment of consciousness then you are asserting that consciousness is both cause and effect and that consciousness has potential that is self-generating, self-sustaining.

Malcolm wrote:

I do not, and no one contends that consciousness is self-generating in the manner in which you suggest here. Consciousness is reflexive and can take itself as an object, as in memory, it is also accompanied by a plethora of mental factors, each of which can function as an object for it. Consciousness can be sustained merely through conceptuality, for example, the formless realm beings who are sustained on such ideas a "consciousness only", "Its all emptiness" etc.

Andrew108 said:

Rebirth is an important concept but what has happened is that it has been over elaborated to become an idea that suggests consciousness can move between lives supported by its own energy.

Malcolm wrote:

No, this has not been suggested at all. A given stream of consciousness has attendant factors which support it, with or without a physical body.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 16th, 2014 at 11:18 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Andrew108 said:

I agree with what you have written here. I am a Buddhist in every possible sense. It is only when rebirth is mentioned that I tend to take an agnostic position or actually more these days I take the position put forward by some Theravadan practitioners.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, the ones that go through lots of complicated arguments to try and prove the Buddha just didn't mean what he said on the subject.

Andrew108 said:

What I don't think is right is the pushing of a Buddhist orthodoxy (or any kind of orthodoxy) that says you have to believe in things being a certain way because if you don't then you are not a Buddhist. Or worse when posters imply that one has limited capacity because of not accepting certain things. I mean some practitioners are of the belief that natural phenomena are 'mind phenomena'. Which is their choice.

Malcolm wrote:

Dear boy, there is such a thing as "right view". The most basic element of right view is not rejecting rebirth. After all, the Buddha arrived at the doctrine of dependent origination through recalling more than 90,000 of his own past lives. He very clearly describes this in the Majjhima Nikaya. If you don't accept the Buddha at his word, who will you accept?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 16th, 2014 at 9:53 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Andrew108 said:

Consciousness can't exist without an external object. In the absence of perceiver and perceived what consciousness can exist? In short, consciousness cannot exist as a thing in itself and by itself.

Malcolm wrote:

What are you defining as an external object, something belonging only to the five external material dhātus (rūpa, etc.)?

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 16th, 2014 at 9:49 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

ovi said:

I do think that if you reject certain parts of Buddha's teaching you abandon the teaching, but that is because if you consider the Kalama Sutta, you don't have to and if in this context you do take some things as unreasonable, you do abandon the teaching. There have been schools who have called themselves Buddhist, yet talked about true existent selves. Not abandoning the teaching has been a useful protection against degeneration for 2500 years and hopefully, it will continue to be so. If the Buddha himself said that you don't need to belief in rebirth to follow the Dharma, how can others criticize you for that?

Malcolm wrote:

The Kalamas sūta merely extols the benefit of the four brahma viharas. The latter are not causes of liberation.

ovi said:

All it takes is to realize that Mahayana isn't only necessary to accomplish others' goals, but also your own, that of ultimate enlightenment.

Malcolm wrote:

There will be no ultimate awakening for someone who rejects the very foundation of Buddhist liberation, i.e., the freedom afflictive rebirth in samsara.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 16th, 2014 at 9:20 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

ovi said:

Because of that, I don't think the idea of rebirth is useful or necessary to spread the Dharma today, but I'm fine with those who make use of it. The end result is the same, liberation from suffering, realization of emptiness and attainment of full Buddhahood.

Malcolm wrote:

I am sorry, but the notion of rebirth is absolutely critical. Without it, the Buddhist model of liberation is completely useless and makes no sense. Emptiness, absence of self and so on can be found in Western Philosophy, so who would need Buddhism in absence of rebirth? No one, that's who.

ovi said:

If by using analytical meditation or other techniques you understand that emptiness, liberation and bodhicitta are definitely worth realizing, what is the point of lack of faith?

Malcolm wrote:

Bodhicitta is a meaningless sentiment without rebirth.

ovi said:

The only thing constantly doubting and trying to understand things in terms of your own categories and assumptions leads to is downfall.

Malcolm wrote:
Hence the necessity of rebirth in Buddhism.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Friday, May 16th, 2014 at 9:15 PM
Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism
Content:
Sherlock said:
I don't think what I've written is neurotic.

Malcolm wrote:
In my opinion, Western students express a lot of neurotic anxiety when the term "faith" is broached.

Sherlock said:
My point is that you don't need to present sraddha/dad pa in terms of "faith" especially to modern people who might be on-the-fence.

Malcolm wrote:
I don't see much reason to cater to the neurosis of modern people.

Sherlock said:
I could be wrong, but for beginners, ChNN seems to say that the bare amount of dad pa is that you recognise that there is some value to his teachings and that you try to practise them.

Malcolm wrote:
Yes, ChNN's approach is perfectly fine. But the fact is that people who get neurotic about the word faith have all kinds of faith in all kinds of things -- it is merely misguided.

As I said, faith in a mental factor, one of the five faculties.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Friday, May 16th, 2014 at 9:10 PM
Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism
Content:
Andrew108 said:

"When form is found not to exist, do not cling to the existance of mind!"

"When mind is cognized as existent, do not cling to the non-existence of form."

HH9K

Malcolm wrote:
Yes, of course, and I will add when mind is cognized a existent, do not cling to the non-existence of rebirth.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 16th, 2014 at 9:09 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Andrew108 said:

Malcolm, in Dzogchen rebirth is always dgongs pa can.

Malcolm wrote:

First the term is "ldem dgong".

Second, this is not factual. This is not factual with respect the Nikaya teachings either.

For example, there are four types of liberated persons the Buddha mentions in the Agamas/Nikayas: stream entrants, once returners, never returners and arhats (such as the Buddha).

The only people who achieve total freedom in this life in these teachings are Arhats.

Stream entrants must take rebirth in the desire realm for seven lifetimes and so on.

In the case of Dzogchen there are three opportunities to achieve liberation: in this life (only those with the highest capacity), in the bardo (medium down to high average) or in other buddhafiels after taking rebirth there. This is all detailed in such tantras as the Rig pa rang shar and so on.

So it is not the case that rebirth is an teaching with a concealed intent. It is to be taken at face value, as the Buddha taught it in hundreds of places.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 16th, 2014 at 9:03 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Andrew108 said:

I can dig up more quotes from Malcolm that confirm this view that there is a transmigrating consciousness. He has stated his position on this many times. You would be hard put to find a TB scholar who disagrees with the view of transmigrating consciousness. They have the Tulku system after all.

Malcolm wrote:

Andrew, you are clearly not understanding the point. There is no transmigrating consciousness, no atman, no unitary consciousness which remains the same through all time. No Tibetan Buddhist teacher maintains that there is.

There is a stream of momentary afflicted consciousnesses, i.e. one moment of consciousness exists in this life (you can even calculate how many such moments a person who lives for a hundred years will have i.e. a moment of consciousness lasts for seven nano seconds) at the moment of death, it perishes, giving rise the next moment of consciousness in the bardo, where the stream continues for some time, and then, at a certain point, another moment of consciousness 'descends into the womb' i.e. appropriates a new series.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 16th, 2014 at 8:40 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

It means that consciousness descends into the womb, in the case of human being, joining with the spermatozoon and oocyte at the moment of conception.

Andrew108 said:

I guess you will say that this is not a description by you of transmigrating consciousness.

Malcolm wrote:

No. It is not.

This is a description by the Buddha of the first link of dependent origination (of this life) in the Mahānidāna sūta.

Andrew108 said:

I know the Pali cannon treats this issue differently than other traditions and again there are differences of view within those schools that hold the Pali cannon to be definitive. You can see Buddhadasa Bhikkhu's analysis of Paticcasamuppada and compare that with the descriptions of the same thing within the Tibetan schools. You might come to the conclusion (as I do) that taking a literal view of rebirth (as many do) can be a gross oversimplification.

Malcolm wrote:

The Theravada view is that one take rebirth in the next world immediately upon dying in this one without any bardo at all. Of course, then they have to go through great lengths to explain away what Buddha meant by the gandhabba, but that is their problem.

Anyway, supposedly you are a Dzogchen practitioner. You should understand then that the model of rebirth followed in Dzogchen teachings in the Sautrantika/Yogacara model, as described in the beginning of the third chapter of the Abhidharmakoshaśāstra.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 16th, 2014 at 9:21 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Sherlock said:

Faith/confidence is developed through practice IMO.

Malcolm wrote:

Faith is a mental factor, as well as being the very first of the 37 adjuncts of awakening. We don't really need to bring a lot of neurotic anxiety to bear on the word. Having faith IS having confidence in something.

Faith is also one the ten positive mental factors, so if you are experiencing faith, you cannot be experiencing a negative mind. This is why people of faith, whether it be in Dharma, Krishna, or Karl Marx in general are more positive than people who have no faith at all.

Of course, when you have faith, in order for it be effective in taking you out of samsara, from the perspective of Dharma, the object is important. Having faith in a teaching is good, having faith in a teacher is better. Of course, it does not start as perfectly formed, it requires cultivation — but without faith, no path is possible.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 16th, 2014 at 8:48 AM

Title: Re: Beginning a Ngöndro

Content:

Karma Jinpa said:

Mind if you do what? Start another thread? Have at it, by all means.

Does anyone here know of other texts, either classical or contemporary, that deal specifically with the Four Reminders? Any other treatises on Ngöndro? Feel free to mention transcripts of a certain lama's teachings --- Khenpo Karthar Rinpoche's Ngondro Commentary available thru Namse Bangdzo is particularly good if you need specifics on Karma Kagyu, now that I think about it...

Malcolm wrote:

I am in the process of translating the Sakya Ngondro commentary. It has a very extensive section on the four common preliminaries.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 16th, 2014 at 8:46 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

smcj said:

He is talking about the first of the five indriyas on the path. sraddha. Without sraddha, the path is impossible. In English, the first definition of faith is "complete trust or confidence in someone or something".

You need that if you are going to practice a path.

Yes, however people differ as to what may initially inspire confidence in them. For some it is history, for others it is meeting a teacher, for the next guy it is philosophy, etc. For people like us that part is completely individual karma.

Plus as one progresses there is a positive feedback loop. So there's a bit more to than just what you said.

Malcolm wrote:

Actually, in order to start on the path, you need to know one clear thing, you are suffering, you want a way out and you have confidence that the path leads out of suffering. The Ratnālokaśūtra states:

Faith goes before, like a mother giving birth, producing and increasing all qualities,
removes fears, and crosses rivers,
faith shows the way to the city of bliss...

So first of all, to set out on the Buddhist path, you need faith. Until you have faith, you are not on the path in any meaningful way.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 16th, 2014 at 7:11 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Sherlock said:

I like how in English, ChNN usually talks about the first of the Five Faculties in terms of "interest" and "confidence" rather than faith. I don't know if it's an accurate translation, but it seems to be a good upaya. You don't necessarily have to have faith in the beginning, in him or the teaching, the fact that you are attending his retreat or watching the webcast means that you have some level of interest. As you do practice more and more you gain confidence in the teaching (and in him, although he is self-effacing and never says that).

Malcolm wrote:

He is talking about the first of the five indriyas on the path. śraddha. Without śraddha, the path is impossible. In English, the first definition of faith is "complete trust or confidence in someone or something".

You need that if you are going to practice a path.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 16th, 2014 at 7:08 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Andrew108 said:

Malcolm, you have talked about transmigrating consciousness many times.

Malcolm wrote:

Then you did not understand what I was saying.

Let's put it this, no consciousness transmigrated from yesterday until today, but still you have memories, and so on. You account for this continuity by imagining that consciousness is located in the brain. I don't. Therefore, for you rebirth is impossible, while for me it isn't.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 16th, 2014 at 2:07 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The equivalent concept in Theravada would be bhavanga citta.

And no, since Madhyamakas also accept a serial continuity of consciousness.

Andrew108 said:

If we are talking about rebirth then I guess the term to use in the Theravadan context would be patisandhi. This notion is quite different from the idea of disembodied consciousness moving between births.

Malcolm wrote:

Whoever said an integral consciousness moved from one life to another? That is not consistent with what the Buddha taught.

A serial continuity of consciousness means exactly what the patisandhi concept in Theravada is talking about.

Conventionally, the Buddha often states in many suttas so and so disappears from this world, and appears in the next. But when we really dig down, we discover the real point is that there is a "rosary" of moments of conscious each one the cause of the next, each one the result of the previous one.

The point is that if someone does not believe in rebirth, karma and so on, there is little point in their studying or practicing any form of Buddhism whether Theravada, Zen or Dzogchen.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 16th, 2014 at 1:16 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Andrew108 said:

Ground consciousness? Don't you just love Yogachara? It's almost like you are saying that you have to be a Yogacharin to be a Buddhist. Something I would disagree with.

Malcolm wrote:

The equivalent concept in Theravada would be bhavanga citta.

And no, since Madhyamakas also accept a serial continuity of consciousness.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 16th, 2014 at 1:07 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Nope, you just have to accept that there is a stream of afflicted consciousness which continually appropriates aggregates until it is no longer afflicted.

Andrew108 said:

Ah the 7th consciousness. That which you can't really do much about. The one that stays with you until you reach level 7 on the bodhisattva scale. So that is the thing I have to believe in. O.k.

Malcolm wrote:

That would be the eighth, ālayavijñāna.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 16th, 2014 at 12:56 AM

Title: Re: A closer look into empowerments

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

. . . some Lamas like KDL would recite the empowerment mantras from the extended seven line prayer, for example. . .

dakini_boi said:

What is the "extended seven line prayer"?

Malcolm wrote:

It is the one that has the request for the four empowerments amended to it.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Friday, May 16th, 2014 at 12:54 AM
Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism
Content:

Andrew108 said:

We are training all the time to see the self as illusory. Materialism doesn't locate a self in the material. That's a fact. But to be a genuine Buddhist I now have to believe in an afflicted self that takes rebirth.

theanarchist said:

Nope, (at least according to mahayana) you have to believe in the two truths. Relative and absolute truth, what their properties are (and are not) and how they are connected.

Andrew108 said:

There are lots of different yanas and there is always something to believe in. However the experience of not finding self is fundamental.

Malcolm wrote:

The idea that there is no innate self is not particularly Buddhist, for example, David Hume figured that out all on his own. But his notion of the absence of self is not liberative.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Friday, May 16th, 2014 at 12:53 AM
Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism
Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Liberation means freedom from rebirth. Anyone who does not accept rebirth cannot seriously practice any Buddhist path since liberation in Buddhism is predicated on freedom from rebirth in samsara.

saraswati said:

Last week I heard a talk where it was said that Tulku Ugyen Rinpoche gave pith instructions to people from a variety of religious backgrounds, including Catholic monastics, and many such people experienced <...>. Thus, it seems to me that explicit belief in some important Buddhist ideas isn't totally necessarily for progress on the Buddhist path. But it may stop being able to label such people as Buddhists.

Malcolm wrote:

TUR even gave direct introduction to materialists. It's called creating positive traces so that people in future lives will have the opportunity to meet with the teachings.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 16th, 2014 at 12:23 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Anyone who does not accept rebirth cannot seriously practice any Buddhist path since liberation in Buddhism is predicated on freedom from rebirth in samsara.

Andrew108 said:

So I have to believe that a conditioned 'self' gets reborn in order to be liberated from conditioned 'self'?

Malcolm wrote:

Nope, you just have to accept that there is a stream of afflicted consciousness which continually appropriates aggregates until it is no longer afflicted.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 15th, 2014 at 11:41 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Liberation for them is irrelevant. Any practice that they do will necessarily be for this life.

Andrew108 said:

Of course practice has to be for this life. Why practice for later? Liberation is freedom from suffering rather than a transcendent state.

Malcolm wrote:

Liberation means freedom from rebirth. Anyone who does not accept rebirth cannot seriously practice any Buddhist path since liberation in Buddhism is predicated on freedom from rebirth in samsara.

Andrew108 said:

You need to say explicitly why I can't be a Buddhist.

Malcolm wrote:

You can be a "Buddhist", it just doesn't make much sense since you disagree with the very foundation of Buddha's teachings, i.e. serial afflicted rebirth.

Andrew108 said:

Seriously, what can you get that I can't?

Malcolm wrote:

You don't need to worry about that, its none of your concern. As far as you are concerned given how you have defined the mind elsewhere, when you die, with the the death of your brain your cognition is extinguished, and your mind as well, .

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 15th, 2014 at 11:00 PM

Title: Re: A closer look into empowerments

Content:

pemachophel said:

Is poti lung wang something like ka-tad? Malcolm, can you explain ka-tad in terms of lung, ti, and wang?

Malcolm wrote:

Its the same.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 15th, 2014 at 10:35 PM

Title: Re: Ordination in Mahayana

Content:

Huifeng said:

While you mention "... in Japan, say...", the Mahayana tradition also covers China.

Malcolm wrote:

And Tibet.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 15th, 2014 at 10:13 PM

Title: Re: A closer look into empowerments

Content:

ngodrup said:

I received a "Potri wang" one time in which the Lama used a computer hard drive.

pensum said:

Ah, we forgot to mention this type earlier, so perhaps Malcolm will be so kind as to explain exactly what a guidance manual empowerment ( pod khrid dbang ) is and its purpose.

Malcolm wrote:

A poti lung dbang is part of a larger empowerment used to grant permission to read and transmit a text (usually the root text of the cycle) without having to go to the effort of actually doing so. In this case then, some Lamas like KDL would recite the empowerment mantras from the extended seven line prayer, for example, and give an abhisheka for a text in this way, in a very condensed way, he would call this the dpe dbang. He actually did this for whole collections of texts such as the Rinchen Terdzod and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 15th, 2014 at 10:08 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Andrew108 said:

I think a materialist can have a keen appreciation of the value of life.

Malcolm wrote:

Of course.

Andrew108 said:

A materialist for instance has no need to reject the 4 thoughts or the principle of dependent origination. Nor do they have to disavow themselves of the view of karma. They would see the 12 links as referring to personal causality. Rebirth is a bit of a problem. At most I think I would say that I am agnostic. Reduction of kleshas is high on the agenda of a materialist who appreciates Buddhist practice.

Malcolm wrote:

Liberation for them is irrelevant. Any practice that they do will necessarily be for this life.

Andrew108 said:

Remember too that materialists have developed democratic political philosophies.

Malcolm wrote:

My critique of physicalism is confined to the fact that it makes no sense whatsoever for people who reject rebirth to consider themselves Buddhists, since of necessity they automatically the liberation which the Buddha taught.

Andrew108 said:

But anyhow when it comes to Buddhist practice, being a materialist is not a problem at all.

Malcolm wrote:

Materialists can benefit from the four brahmaviharas and a bit of shamatha. But that's about it.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 15th, 2014 at 9:13 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Indrajala said:

With respect to materialism, I acknowledge that it is incompatible with the basic premises of the Buddha's teachings, though that being said I think we should be sympathetic to our contemporaries who express an interest in Buddhist philosophy yet have lingering reservations given their propensities towards materialism and/or logical positivism. Most of us are educated with materialism as the default worldview.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, I feel sorry for such people, standing at the window with their nose pressed to the glass.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 15th, 2014 at 9:10 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

JKhedrup said:

Regardless of whether one chooses a faith based or more intellectual approach, whether one is a MENSA member or a simple farmer, the guidance of a teacher is essential for a proper practice of Buddhism.

Indrajala said:

I don't think that's universally true.

Malcolm wrote:

It is universally true.

Indrajala said:

While book learning, doubt, questioning and analysis are laudable, without guidance of a teacher to use those things to bring pressure to bear on the delusions, there is a danger that Dharma becomes merely an intellectual or soteriological pursuit rather than a process of transformation.

That's an unfair assessment. You can transform yourself for the better through reading and implementing what is found in the sūtras, with or without a teacher supervising you.

Malcolm wrote:

I have never observed that this is really the case. What I have seen is a lot of autodidactic Buddhists puff themselves up with arrogance. It is a pity because their ego prevents them from connecting with an authentic practice lineage.

Indrajala said:

A lot of intellectuals...

Malcolm wrote:

...have their heads firmly planted where the sun never shines.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 15th, 2014 at 9:04 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Varahamihira lived squarely in the six century. Vasubandu, the fourth. It is not unreasonable to understand that prior to Varahamihira there was sophisticated knowledge of math and astronomy amongst Buddhists. Calendar making is an important thing.

Indrajala said:

Again this suggests to me many Buddhists in India accepted the flat earth Mt. Meru model as literally true. They had accurate knowledge of astronomy, but not cosmography and geography.

Malcolm wrote:

The Surya Siddhanta, as well as one of Vedas, asserts it is a ball.

Indrajala said:

You say "Indian Buddhists" -- do you mean all of them?

Malcolm wrote:

From third century onward, at the very least. Secular arts did not seem to be much of a concern until well after Ashoka.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 15th, 2014 at 9:01 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

smcj said:

Or you could skip all that, open your mind, and posit the possibility that The Buddha actually saw the Truth as it pertains to the path towards enlightenment. (Unfortunately that would require that you somehow understand your way of looking at things is flawed though.) Your choice.

Indrajala said:

The problem is that we actually don't know for sure what the Buddha actually taught as the truth.

Malcolm wrote:

Of course we do, he taught that afflicted people take rebirth in samsara because of their afflictions, and provided remedies for those afflictions in the form of śīla, samadhi, and prajñā so they would stop doing so.

Indrajala said:

Deference to scripture doesn't work because Buddhist scripture does not qualify as a historical witness to circa fifth century BCE Magadha. Consequently examining the chronological development of Buddhist traditions and discerning common features amongst the diverging traditions therein might be the optimal way of identifying what best represents Buddhadharma.

Malcolm wrote:

The best representation of Buddhadharma is a qualified teacher.

Indrajala said:

The faith based approach you are advocating doesn't work for everyone. If it works for you, that's fine, but understand that some prefer a more intellectually rigorous approach to their Buddhism.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, this is the approach of forensic historians. But they don't generally practice.

Indrajala said:

Even if you say this doesn't produce realization, then what is the alternative? Tell them to just have faith and force themselves to practice something they have no faith in?

Malcolm wrote:

You can see very clearly that it doesn't produce realization. So there is no alternative.

If you don't have faith in the Buddha's teaching, your time is better spent elsewhere. That's just common sense.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 15th, 2014 at 8:09 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

smcj has a very excellent point, that is why it is important to distinguish the difference between the cadaver called "Buddhism", which forensic historians like Schopen, et al perform an autopsy on for a living, and Buddhadharma, the practice of transforming oneself from an afflicted person into an awakened person.

Matt J said:

This statement sounds a lot like fundamentalism to me.

smcj said:

Basically, I'm calling for an evidence based approach

An evidence based approach to what? You can amass all the evidence you want, but then all you will have is a mass of evidence. If you're going to court, that's fine. But in terms of Dharma practice, the best that you could hope for would be to have all your objections overcome and all your preconditions met. At that point, in theory, you would finally be ready to Take Refuge. Dharma is about people evolving towards realization.

Or you could skip all that, open your mind, and posit the possibility that The Buddha actually saw the Truth as it pertains to the path towards enlightenment. (Unfortunately that would require that you somehow understand your way of looking at things is flawed though.) Your choice.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 15th, 2014 at 6:29 AM

Title: Re: Mahamudra meditation problem: locating the mind

Content:

Andrew108 said:

Malcolm you haven't given a precise location you have given a general location. So now you understand the analogy? You haven't been able to say exactly where because the heartbeat 'happens' in different places within the same organ. But you can still give the heartbeat a general location. You know it is not happening in your big toe or just in your left ventricle.

Malcolm wrote:

No, it happens exactly when the ventricles eject their contents and that is also where.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 15th, 2014 at 6:27 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

That is actually my point -- the cosmologies in the Kośa and other texts which describe levels of devas and so on do not correspond with Indian math and astronomy.

Indrajala said:

What do we know about Indian math and astronomy from the era of Vasubandhu?

Malcolm wrote:

Varahamihira lived squarely in the six century. Vasubandhu, the fourth. It is not unreasonable to understand that prior to Varahamihira there was sophisticated knowledge of math and astronomy amongst Buddhists. Calendar making is an important thing.

Indrajala said:

The best place where we see this is in the Kalacakra. There really very little evidence to show that Indians really took such cosmologies like those presented in the Kośa completely literally.

Your conclusions are problematic. The Kālacakra and Kośa are separated by six or seven centuries. Some Indians when the Kālacakra was composed in the first years of the eleventh century did not take the earlier Kośa model literally. How does this amount to "show that Indians really took such cosmologies like those presented in the Kośa completely literally"? This is an essentialist conclusion.

Malcolm wrote:

Huh? What I am saying here is that Kalacakra shows that Indian Buddhists did not take the Kośa cosmology literally. Calculation, which really means astronomy and calendar making, among other things, was mentioned in the Mahāyāna sūtrāṃkara as a necessary art for a bodhisattva to learn.

Indrajala said:

If you are an Indian Buddhist astronomer, you will quickly understand that the cosmology of the Kośa is clearly untenable.

Right, but how many Indian Buddhist astronomers were around when the bulk of major Abhidharma texts were composed, such as the Kośa? Even if there were Buddhist astronomers, why would they have had any say in the writings on Mt. Meru cosmology?

Malcolm wrote:

The point is that Meru Cosmology is a moral cosmology, not a literal one. Vasubandhu even rejects the conventional existence of the hells realms in his Yogacara treatises.

Indrajala said:

Basically, I'm calling for an evidence based approach, though you've already denigrated such an approach, so perhaps this discussion will not prove fruitful.

Malcolm wrote:

It's great if you want a job as an intellectual ghoul or a ghoulish intellectual.

The only evidence based approach to Dharma that counts for a practitioner however is practice.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 15th, 2014 at 6:08 AM

Title: Re: Mahamudra meditation problem: locating the mind

Content:

Andrew108 said:

But if I ask you where exactly in the heart is the heartbeat? Yo will struggle to give me a precise location.

Malcolm wrote:

Not at all:

Each beat of the heart involves five major stages. The first two stages, often considered together as the "ventricular filling" stage, involve the movement of blood from the atria into the ventricles. The next three stages involve the movement of blood from the ventricles to the pulmonary artery (in the case of the right ventricle) and the aorta (in the case of the left ventricle)...The fourth stage, "ventricular ejection," is when the ventricles are contracting and emptying, and the semilunar valves are open. During the fifth stage, "isovolumic relaxation time", pressure decreases, no blood enters the ventricles, the ventricles stop contracting and begin to relax, and the semilunar valves close due to the pressure of blood in the aorta.

The fourth and fifth stage is where that actual "beat" that you feel exists.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 15th, 2014 at 6:04 AM

Title: Re: Mahamudra meditation problem: locating the mind

Content:

Andrew108 said:

Which part of the mind does pride reside in?

Malcolm wrote:

Pride is a mental factor (caitta) that arises with the mind (citta), it is not located "in" the mind. Actually it is "in" the dharmadhātu.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 15th, 2014 at 6:01 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

People have a right to challenge whatever they want. But sooner or later, when they challenge too much, they stop being buddhists and become ex-buddhists.

Indrajala said:

Some people go through phases where they don't feel like being Buddhists any longer, and maybe even announce this to everyone, but they bounce back. No big deal.

Malcolm wrote:

It depends, some people have decided that "Buddhism" is a stinking cadaver dissected in the academy by intellectual ghouls (or ghoulish intellectuals take your pick), and decide what they really are following is Buddhadharma. But of course in common dialogue, they may also use conventions like "Buddhist".

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 15th, 2014 at 5:59 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Indrajala said:

In the case of Buddhist Abhidharma, why provide such detailed numbers for measurements if they were largely structured metaphorically?

Or in the case of the Sūrya Siddhanta or other Indian astronomical texts, why provide empirically verifiable measurements for planetary diameters and distances (many of these check out as largely accurate by modern standards too)?

Malcolm wrote:

That is actually my point -- the cosmologies in the Kośa and other texts which describe levels of devas and so on do not correspond with Indian math and astronomy.

The best place where we see this is in the Kalacakra. There really very little evidence to show that Indians really took such cosmologies like those presented in the Kośa completely literally.

The cosmologies provided a moral universe, locations for rebirth. Astronomy provided a way of creating somewhat accurate calendars. If you were an Indian Buddhist astronomer, you would have quickly understand that the cosmology of the Kośa is clearly untenable.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 15th, 2014 at 5:48 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

I on other hand really don't have any problem at all with the Buddha teaching about the Indra's palace on Meru, hell realms and so on. I don't see any real need to modernize Buddhism or make it "evidence" based.

Indrajala said:

I don't have any problems with traditional cosmologies and mythology either, though I accept this won't be acceptable to everyone in this era when empirical rationalism is the ideology of choice amongst leading intellectuals.

When the age of rationalism passes we'll still have our cosmologies and mythology.

Malcolm wrote:

One either has the karma to practice authentic Dharma or not. We have no need to make anything acceptable to anyone.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 15th, 2014 at 5:47 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, and that is his prerogative. But he is not the boss of Tibetan Buddhism, he is just one lama.

Indrajala said:

He is also arguably the foremost representative of Tibetan Buddhism. So, his opinion does count for a lot in practice since many Buddhists and non-Buddhists alike respect his views.

Malcolm wrote:

The foremost representative of Tibetan Buddhism is one's own Guru.

He is the foremost representative of Tibetans, not necessarily of Tibetan Buddhism. That being said, I am a big fan of HHDL. But I am not so interested in his science dialogues.

Indrajala said:

Really the point is that the dialogue between scientists and Buddhists by request of the Dalai Lama is proceeding and is an interesting chapter in Buddhist history

Malcolm wrote:

It is mostly a dry hump, politics.

Indrajala said:

Really the point is that if someone wants to be more empirical in their approach to Buddhism, then it should be accepted and they have the right to challenge beliefs, especially those based on deference to texts or authorities.

Malcolm wrote:

People have a right to challenge whatever they want. But sooner or later, when they challenge too much, they stop being buddhists and become ex-buddhists.

Indrajala said:

The truth is that śabda-pramana is highly problematic now because of the new scholarship which has revealed the multifaceted development behind Buddhist scriptures. It isn't enough to just declare them buddha-vacana and leave it at that.

Malcolm wrote:

This is not a problem at all. There are many kinds of Buddhavacana, direct, permitted, blessed, etc. Then of course there is the notion that whatever is well spoken and corresponds with the Dharma in general can be considered Buddhavacana.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 15th, 2014 at 5:38 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:
Norwegian said:
Indrajala,

The same person, His Holiness the Dalai Lama, rejects the cosmology chapter of the Abhidharmakosha. He doesn't reject karma, dependent origination, rebirth, and so on however.

Malcolm wrote:
Jeff is just busting my balls for telling Andrew that he is being very selective about those things he thinks to Buddha said are true and those that are false.

I on other hand really don't have any problem at all with the Buddha teaching about the Indra's palace on Meru, hell realms and so on. I don't see any real need to modernize Buddhism or make it "evidence" based.

All of these things exist within the human body, so of course they have external correlates.

I also still stand by my general contention that Indians were not that obsessed about their cosmologies, and that they were largely structured metaphorically.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Thursday, May 15th, 2014 at 5:34 AM
Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism
Content:

Malcolm wrote:
There is a Mt. Meru and four continents. I don't reject the cosmology of ancients Buddhists in the manner in which you imagine. Their picture of the world was grounded on the world. Uttarakuru is exactly where Ptolemy and so on described the people called the Kurus as living and so on.

What I reject is the Kośa cosmology, the way things are described in the Kośa.

M

Indrajala said:
And do you believe Indra's palace was/is atop Mt. Meru?

Malcolm wrote:
Sure, why not. He has to live somewhere. Might as well be there. He certainly does not have a pad in Manhattan.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 15th, 2014 at 5:29 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Who cares if a bunch of worldly intellectuals takes us seriously?

Indrajala said:

Clearly figures like the Dalai Lama, who dialogues with representatives of neuroscience and seems to care about their opinions.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, and that is his prerogative. But he is not the boss of Tibetan Buddhism, he is just one lama.

Quite frankly, the mind-science thing is really a dead end. Has been for years.

It is one thing to be interested in this or that, it is quite another to imagine that "evidence-based" reality is real.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 15th, 2014 at 5:28 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Ok, you can choose to consider that version the definitive one. But I don't. I don't think the Buddha presented a definitive cosmology.

Indrajala said:

Now you're just justifying your own selective thinking about what to accept and reject with respect to what the Buddha taught.

It is pretty clear the Buddha's cosmology included Mt. Meru and the four continents. If you reject this based on modern evidence to the contrary, then admit this and concede you are selective about some aspects of the Buddha's teachings.

Malcolm wrote:

There is a Mt. Meru and four continents. I don't reject the cosmology of ancients Buddhists in the manner in which you imagine. Their picture of the world was grounded on the world. Uttarakuru is exactly where Ptolemy and so on described the people called the Kurus as living and so on.

What I reject is the Kośa cosmology, the way things are described in the Kośa.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 15th, 2014 at 5:23 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Indrajala said:

Nowadays in both science and the humanities we have to rely almost exclusively on evidence based approaches otherwise few intellectuals will take us seriously. The revealed testimonies of mystics just doesn't cut it for modern thinkers.

Malcolm wrote:

I already addressed this: this is just a throwback to the Carvaka rejection of inference etc., as pramāṇas.

Who cares if a bunch of worldly intellectuals takes us seriously?

Buddhadharma is only practiced by those with the karma to meet it and practice it. That is what it means to have a "precious human birth". We have no need to convince anyone of anything. We are not on a campaign to ensure that the academy "Takes us seriously". They never have anyway.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 15th, 2014 at 5:14 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The Buddha is presented as teaching several different cosmologies. Which one are we to consider definitive?

Indrajala said:

The general model where the world is flat with four continents and a big mountain in the middle atop which Indra lives.

Malcolm wrote:

Ok, you can choose to consider that version the definitive one. But I don't. I don't think the Buddha presented a definitive cosmology.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 15th, 2014 at 4:59 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

I don't reject the fact that Indians conceived that Meru lay somewhere to the north of India.

Indrajala said:

But you selectively reject Mt. Meru cosmology as taught by the Buddha?

Malcolm wrote:

The Buddha is presented as teaching several different cosmologies. Which one are we to consider definitive?

Now, if it turns out that there really is a ring of iron mountains surrounding our world system to keep the stench of the rotting corpse hell from instantly annihilating all of us, well, then I will be very grateful for all the combined merit of sentient beings that keeps those mountains standing.

My point, is that I don't think the Indians, Buddha included, with their penchant for exaggeration necessarily took their own speculations about such things as Meru as representing some absolutely objective presentation.

On the other hand, there is considerable evidence that Buddha took other things very seriously, such as rebirth.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 15th, 2014 at 4:46 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Well, you see the thing is that you are very selective about what you think the Buddha that is accurate, and what the Buddha said that was not.

Indrajala said:

Don't you reject Mt. Meru cosmology, which in fact the Buddha taught?

Malcolm wrote:

I don't reject the fact that Indians conceived that Meru lay somewhere to the north of India.

We also need to keep in mind that ancient Indians certainly regarded Meru as a mytho-poetic place, as is born out by the multiple cosmologies we find among Indian texts, both Buddhist and non-Buddhist.

I do not think that Indians feverishly adhered to their various cosmologies literally as Tibetans, and so on did. For one thing, Indians were awfully good at astronomy, and Meru cosmology as presented in the Kośa for example, certainly conflicts with Indian astronomical treatises written near the same time. No Buddhist mathematician working on calendars could have squared their calculations with the motion of the sun and moon around Meru as described. This is quite evident when the calculations in the Kalacakra are analyzed and then compared with the modified Meru Cosmology presented in the Kalacakra. See Henning, Kalacakra and the Tibetan Calendar.

I consider the Kośa cosmology anachronistic, and see no need to take it literally. There are also several cosmologies in Buddhist texts, not only one.

But when I do Mandala offerings, I definitely visualize the universe in that way.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 15th, 2014 at 3:47 AM

Title: Re: karma bully

Content:

smcj said:

Habits are actions, SM CJ, that is the point. There is nothing within the materialist paradigm to suggest that a wealthy person will become impoverished through his stinginess, and so on as a direct and infallible moral consequence of that act. No, the materialist paradigm does not allow for such.

However Dharma paradigm allows for the action to effect the actor. Repeated action even more powerfully so. This same facet of karma explains both how repeated actions can create a drug addict or a virtuoso violinist. If someone can relate to those teachings they should be allowed to use them as a basis for further consideration.

Malcolm wrote:

I never preclude someone from considering the Dharma more deeply, in fact I encourage it.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 15th, 2014 at 3:45 AM

Title: Re: karma bully

Content:

Andrew108 said:

The experience of karma for me is very specific, direct and obvious.

Malcolm wrote:

Since you don't believe in rebirth, being a physicalist, you hold an essentialist view of the mind, i.e. that it is in the brain somehow. For you, karma is irrelevant, as is Buddhadharma.

Andrew108 said:

Well you are painting quite a picture. I have said that I don't see how the usual logic that is advanced for rebirth is a definitive answer. I simply don't know about rebirth except that I won't be around to experience it - although there may be some depersonalised 'I' that continues and experiences but it won't be 'me'. I don't see mind or consciousness as somehow floating free of the body or being beyond the ALL. For what the ALL means then see my signature.

Malcolm wrote:

In the first part of the bardo you will have a subtle body that looks exactly like the one you have now, you will at first wonder why no one hears you or sees you, and so on, and this continues for the first couple of weeks. Eventually, you figure out that you died. Then, you take on the form of the kind of body you will have in your next rebirth, etc. This is all very clearly described by our teacher, Chogyal Namkhai Norbu, in Birth, Life and Death.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 15th, 2014 at 3:21 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Thank you. I just want to point out that I in no way conflate "science", which is a practice, with "scientific materialism", which is a belief system.

Prasutagus said:

As someone trained as a scientist, this type of conversation gets heavily leveraged by assumptions as to what science is and is not.

There aren't physical laws scribbled onto the side of the box the universe came in, and if we look hard enough, we'll find the box, and thus the laws, and *poof* know how things work. It doesn't work that way. What we call "physical laws" are really conceptual schema for describing subjective experiences of the world. Those laws become more refined as our subjective experience of the world becomes more refined through the use of technologies.

The scientist is able to fall into the fault of physicalism every bit as much as the Buddhist. Scientists will often talk about these conceptual schema as if they actually exist. Nobody has seen an electron but we talk about them as they exist, not to mention quarks, photons and other inventions to describe phenomena. We talk about matter as if it's real, even though, from a physical sense it is made of point quanta and that everything that we really experience is the interactions between the quanta and not the point quanta. Turn everything off and it collapses onto a single point.

If physicalism is a dead end for the scientist, it certainly is for the Buddhist. Trying to reconcile Buddhism with the physicalist dead end of the intellectually naive scientist is no virtue.

Regarding quantum mechanics-- we can roll two ways with that, and I think that's pertinent to this discussion.

The basis of QM is that observations are non-commutative. That means it depends upon whether we measure something's position in one direction before the momentum in another, and so on. This is the Heisenberg uncertainty principle. We can look at that in two ways. One, this is how the quantum world behaves upon observation. As such, we can say this is a property of the geometry or space that things exist in. The flip side of that is that we can say this is how consciousness operates when observing things small enough and discrete enough to notice. QM is then really describing mind, and mind is more fundamental than all these little quanta.

No, Virginia, there is no physical reality separate from mind, and many scientists are coming to see that.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 15th, 2014 at 3:00 AM

Title: Re: Mahamudra meditation problem: locating the mind

Content:

Andrew108 said:

What we need to accept are the methods he gives us for getting this direct experience of mind/cognition. But that is another issue entirely.

Malcolm wrote:

As long as you think that cognition is in the brain, for that long you will not be able to have a direct experience of your own cognition.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 15th, 2014 at 2:55 AM

Title: Re: karma bully

Content:

smcj said:

Karma has to do with the moral repercussions of actions motivated by affliction on the person themselves in terms of how it affects the circumstances of their own life. The essentialist, physicalist model of reality precludes karma automatically.

Do you say that habit & such are not included in the teachings of karma? I believe it is under the heading of "consequences that reflects the germ of the act". If so, then what A108 is taking as his (current) interpretation could be seen as a correct, albeit partial, understanding of the whole theory. These days Newtonian physics is still seen as legitimate, but just not the whole story.

Malcolm wrote:

Habits are actions, SMCJ, that is the point. There is nothing within the materialist paradigm to suggest that a wealthy person will become impoverished through his stinginess, and so on as a direct and infallible moral consequence of that act.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Thursday, May 15th, 2014 at 2:52 AM
Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism
Content:

Andrew108 said:
My understanding is informed by direct experience. .

Malcolm wrote:
Classically in India, materialists (but not Buddhists and so forth) only accepted direct perception as authoritative. However, the Buddha held that there were three authorities: direct perception, inference, and testimony of reliable witnesses.

I merely point this out to suggest to you that your thinking does not really fit within the fold of Buddhist teaching.

M

Author: Malcolm
Date: Thursday, May 15th, 2014 at 2:17 AM
Title: Re: Mahamudra meditation problem: locating the mind
Content:

Andrew108 said:
Oh o.k. Now I understand. Yes you can find cognition - in the sense that you can understand and recognise it's characteristics. You can't find it as a thing by itself. Understanding it's characteristics is just the beginning. It's not like recognizing it means that you reach an end point.

Malcolm wrote:
No, that's the end point, i.e. "Mind is in the brain", boom!

In reality, your solution, the physicalist one, runs "There mind cannot be found in terms of color, shape or form because there is no mind. What we call "mind" is an epiphenomena of information processes that reside in the brain", end of story.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Thursday, May 15th, 2014 at 2:13 AM
Title: Re: karma bully
Content:

Andrew108 said:
The experience of karma for me is very specific, direct and obvious.

Malcolm wrote:
Since you don't believe in rebirth, being a physicalist, you hold an essentialist view of the mind, i.e. that it is in the brain somehow. For you, karma is irrelevant, as is Buddhadharma.

smcj said:

I don't think that is fair to say. The teachings on karma do include habits and such, which is readily experiential. If someone does not feel comfortable extrapolating out beyond that, it's ok. Perhaps in another lifetime they will. But for now their view isn't mistaken, just limited.

Malcolm wrote:

Karma has to do with the moral repercussions of actions motivated by affliction on the person themselves in terms of how it affects the circumstances of their own life. The essentialist, physicalist model of reality precludes karma automatically.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 15th, 2014 at 2:07 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Andrew108 said:

The ability to see other realms isn't possible.

Malcolm wrote:

For you it isn't. For a Buddha, it is.

Andrew108 said:

You are right about me. As for the Buddha then I don't know. I guess it is a matter of faith. And you are entitled to have faith. That is your right.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, you see the thing is that you are very selective about what you think the Buddha that is accurate, and what the Buddha said that was not. For example, you believe the Buddha about the value of mindfulness, but you don't believe the Buddha when he gives accounts of his memory of his own past lives, his abilities to see into other realms or talk with "supernatural" beings like devas and so on.

I would say that your understanding of Dharma is molded to fit with your present world view, which is founded on a basis of scientific materialism. Now as far as it goes, this is perfectly fine and I have no objection. However, when you speak as if you are an authority on Buddhadharma and enunciate some of the interpretations of his teachings that you do, well...that is a completely different story.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 15th, 2014 at 1:43 AM

Title: Re: What is "mind" in mahamudra

Content:

catlady2112 said:

I have been doing Thrangu Rinpoche's mahamudra meditations on locating and observing "the mind," and examining what appears in the mind. I have 2 questions about the meaning of the word "mind" in this context:

1) Does mind mean "all" of these things below (and possibly more I am not considering).

- The thing/experience I have that is aware of the coming and going of thoughts?
- The thing/experience I have that is still present when there are no thoughts?
- The experience I have of being unaffected by thoughts?

2) Based on the 3 elements I've listed above, are these also considered the "nature" of mind ?

Thanks for your help! (I'm rephrasing an earlier question I didn't ask clearly enough to address my root question)

Malcolm wrote:

You should ask your teacher.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 15th, 2014 at 1:42 AM

Title: Re: karma bully

Content:

Andrew108 said:

Holding a deterministic view of Kamma isn't helpful in my view. In fact, as I mentioned before, I see it as akin to a crime against humanity. If you follow this deterministic interpretation then you can't help but be in a position of indifference and then worse, a moral certitude that blames the victim.

asunthatneversets said:

I don't see that anyone has suggested determinism in this thread. Determinism would require inherent causes giving rise to inherent effects, however if you understand karma it is understood that this isn't the case. Ironically, you are the one who is advocating for inherent natural laws, which is just about as close to determinism as you're going to get.

Malcolm wrote:

I honestly do not know why we have to again and again remove people's misconceptions about this. I wish people would take the time to study these things properly.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 15th, 2014 at 1:41 AM

Title: Re: karma bully

Content:

Andrew108 said:

The experience of karma for me is very specific, direct and obvious.

Malcolm wrote:

Since you don't believe in rebirth, being a physicalist, you hold an essentialist view of the mind, i.e. that it is in the brain somehow. For you, karma is irrelevant, as is Buddhadharma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 15th, 2014 at 1:38 AM

Title: Re: karma bully

Content:

Andrew108 said:

Holding a deterministic view of Kamma isn't helpful in my view.

Malcolm wrote:

For as long as one has not overcome one's afflictions, for that long one will be subject to the rounds of rebirth. When one overcomes one's afflictions, one will no longer be subject to the rounds of rebirth and the ripening of karma, both positive and negative.

The Buddhist teaching of karma is not deterministic in any ultimate sense; but as long as one has not freed oneself from the three poisonous afflictions, one will still be subject to the effects of the fruit of actions committed while under their influence. For example, a bad king may not have an inherent position, but he and his evil ministers still dominate the subjects. But when the bad king is overthrown, his evil ministers lose their power too, and the subjects are free from their rule. Likewise, we are not inherently afflicted, but we are still dominated by afflictions. When we throw off our afflictions, the king, also we are free from his evil ministers, the result of afflicted actions.

But this is not deterministic. In order for the Buddha's teaching to be deterministic, one would have imagine that afflictions were inherent, but there is nothing in Dharma that states this is so, and quite a lot that rejects it.

What is stated is that karma is unerring, and will always ripen as long as conditions for its ripening are present.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 15th, 2014 at 1:29 AM

Title: Re: karma bully

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Buddha clearly explained that one's karma follows one through lifetime after lifetime like a shadow that follows a bird.

saraswati said:

But... what is the "one" that is followed? What is the bird? Or is the shadow itself the bird?

Malcolm wrote:

The one that is followed is the kleshas which are responsible for assembling the skandhas over and over again in every lifetime, what follows are the actions motivated by those kleshas, which ripens as afflicted body, speech and mind.

Buddha taught it is permissible to refer to the five aggregates as "a self" or "a person", with the understanding that the five aggregates do not constitute a real self which endures over lifetimes.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 15th, 2014 at 1:27 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Andrew108 said:

The ability to see other realms isn't possible.

Malcolm wrote:

For you it isn't. For a Buddha, it is.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 15th, 2014 at 12:54 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Andrew108 said:

Natural law means that nature or reality has characteristics that are observable or applicable in every case.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, this is the sort of irreducibility that is meant by "ultimate". Such laws are inviolable even by a Buddha. For example, there is no way the Buddha could have any of the psychic powers he claimed for himself, such as the ability read minds, see into other realms and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 15th, 2014 at 12:35 AM

Title: Re: karma bully

Content:

Berry said:

genetic illnesses ?

Malcolm wrote:

Genetic illnesses, deformities, etc., are by definition karmic diseases.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 15th, 2014 at 12:34 AM

Title: Re: karma bully

Content:

Andrew108 said:

You may have noticed that I haven't denied that individual beings have their own continuum of causality that is specific to them. But it is at the level of mental reasoning and habitual tendencies that kamma gets played out.

Malcolm wrote:

No, sensations which are a result of negative action are exclusively physical; whereas sensations that are result of positive actions are exclusively mental.

You really ought to study the fourth chapter of the Abhidharmakośa, among other texts, rather than substituting your own concepts about what karma means in a Buddhist context.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 15th, 2014 at 12:23 AM

Title: Re: karma bully

Content:

Andrew108 said:

What I read here is that karma is causality. I don't see any detailed explanation as to the specifics. So can you say what it was in your own karma that caused you to be born into your family? Can you give the specifics?

saraswati said:

When I first got interested in Buddhist thought I got into a bit of a muddle because of this whole identification with past karma. But I got a clarification from Ajahn Sumedho, who pointed out that this identification of myself with "my" karma is a symptom of wrong view. By thinking that "I" must have done something very bad in the past I would be holding to Ahankara, and believing that there was a "me" which could take responsibility for particular acts. At least in my naive view, I feel now that it's all a big pot of karma and we are what we are by picking up some part of it. And if we can help everyone by consuming and eliminating some of this collective karma, all the better. Not sure how this fits in with the Vajrayana view though.

Malcolm wrote:

No pot of karma at all.

Buddha clearly explained that one's karma follows one through lifetime after lifetime like a shadow that follows a bird.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 15th, 2014 at 12:14 AM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Andrew108 said:

Yes I am a naturalist. I posit that there are natural laws that exist independently. Natural laws are applicable everywhere. They are pervasive rather than ultimate.

Malcolm wrote:

"independent existence" is just another name for "ultimate", i.e., these laws are irreducible.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, May 14th, 2014 at 11:46 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Andrew108 said:

Science doesn't posit an ultimate truth. Most scientists aren't looking for ultimate truth.

Malcolm wrote:

You however do, you posit that there are real natural laws that exist independently.

Andrew108 said:

But for the purposes of furthering discussion, scientists do have proof that there is a world 'out there' and we should take such proof seriously.

Malcolm wrote:

Which proof would that be?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, May 14th, 2014 at 10:18 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Andrew108 said:

So in that respect I think the authors of that article have made a mistake.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, of course you do, because your ultimate view is physicalism, not Dharma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, May 14th, 2014 at 9:54 PM

Title: Re: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

The irony, of course, is that the Buddhism to which these Westerners were drawn was one already transformed by its contact with the West.

He doesn't really say anything about Tibetan Buddhism. Do you think something like this happened with TB as well?

Malcolm wrote:

It has already, look at Rigpa, Shambhala, Dzogchen Community, etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, May 14th, 2014 at 9:25 PM

Title: Re: In the shadow of the Buddha

Content:

Sherab said:

<https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=u0ssQFNpAJ0> "

onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;" onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

Anyone read the book?

Malcolm wrote:

For nearly a decade, Matteo Pistono smuggled out of Tibet evidence of atrocities by the Chinese government, showing it to the U.S. government, human rights organizations, and anyone who would listen. Yet Pistono did not originally intend to fight for social justice in Tibet—he had gone there as a Buddhist pilgrim.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, May 14th, 2014 at 9:02 PM

Title: Contra Buddhist Modernism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Interesting article.

<http://www.tricycle.com/interview/losing-our-religion> "

onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;";

What sort of critique of the scientific view might Buddhism otherwise offer? The naturalistic stance—the idea that there is an independent insentient world out there governed by scientific laws and impersonal processes—is ultimately a human construct, a powerful and effective human construct, but a construct nonetheless. This is not to deny the power of science, but it does call into question the way we approach scientific knowledge. Of course, there are many philosophers, scientists, and historians of science who have made a similar point. But Buddhism has its own insights and perspectives to offer. In other words, when we engage seriously with the Buddhist tradition we learn other ways of construing the world, other stories we can tell about the way things are, and these can be cogent, coherent, and compelling in their own way. This is not to argue for a naive acceptance of Buddhist epistemology and cosmology. But we won't see what Buddhism has to offer if, at the outset, we twist it out of shape to make it conform to contemporary norms.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, May 14th, 2014 at 8:31 PM

Title: Re: Root guru? Mother sentient beings?

Content:

saraswati said:

Dear friends: could someone give me the Tibetan (or even Sanskrit) terms for the above concepts?

I still don't understand the difference between guru/root guru/lama, but that is a topic for another subforum, maybe. But knowing the terms when they appear in chants would help.

Thank you in advance. And, happy Wesak to all!

Malcolm wrote:

rtsa ba'i bla ma

ma gyur sems can

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, May 14th, 2014 at 8:02 PM

Title: Re: karma bully

Content:

seeker242 said:

Seems appropriate for this topic! Would telling someone that their cancer or disease is just their karma from their bad actions, would that be beneficial for that person? If not, then even if it's true, it would still be an inappropriate thing to say, according to the above. If it's not beneficial, it does not matter if it's true or not. It would still be a cruel thing to say to someone.

Malcolm wrote:

As I pointed out, a Buddhist should understand this already, and non-Buddhist has not need to.

Of course not all diseases are karmic diseases directly. But having a human body is a karmic ripening, and therefore too all the pleasure and pain that accompanies it.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, May 14th, 2014 at 7:09 PM

Title: Re: karma bully

Content:

Zhen Li said:

To say that everything that happens is due to one's own actions is an extreme position.

Malcolm wrote:

No one said that. What I said was that all sensations are a result of action, either directly or indirectly. For example, being reborn in hell.

Buddha himself states in the Karmaśataka:

The happiness and misery of mortal beings depends on actions.

And again we see in the Bodhisatvāvadānakalpalatā:

All of these happinesses and sufferings of mortal beings manifests through past karma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, May 14th, 2014 at 3:45 AM

Title: Re: karma bully

Content:

Adi said:

Not so much anymore since all our cookware is now made in China and when the pots and kettles get to talking it's all in Mandarin or Cantonese and we can't understand a word of it.

Adi

Sherab Dorje said:

Okay people, can we drop the aggression level a few notches please?

Thank you.

Malcolm wrote:

Now that is definitely the pot calling the kettle black...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, May 14th, 2014 at 1:53 AM

Title: Re: karma bully

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

.

You're new around here. You might want come down off that high horse you rode in on.
The fall can be crippling.

Berry said:

Good grief! That sounds quite threatening & rather like the school bully .

.

Malcolm wrote:

I didn't say I was going to push him off. Anyway, his saddle, like the saddle of Gesar's mythic horse, is too high for me to reach. I am just an ordinary sentient being with impure vision, after all.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, May 14th, 2014 at 1:21 AM

Title: Re: karma bully

Content:

Vajrasvapna said:

If you want to debate, it would be a good idea to use argument, not to be offensive.

Malcolm wrote:

This is not a debate. I was sharing my opinion of your statement.

You're new around here. You might want come down off that high horse you rode in on.
The fall can be crippling.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, May 14th, 2014 at 1:18 AM

Title: Re: karma bully

Content:

Vajrasvapna said:

Thus, in the pure vision of enlightened beings, all beings are seen as Buddha and Bodhisattva.

Malcolm wrote:

Indeed, but not in ours. As Virupa said:

Appearances are impure for sentient beings in defilement;

Appearances are experiential for yogins in samadhi;

Appearances are pure for tathāgatas in the ornamental wheel of the inexhaustible body, speech and mind.

It is really sound to know where one is.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 13th, 2014 at 10:35 PM

Title: Re: Next generation of Dharma teachers in the West?

Content:

JKhedrup said:

It is a good idea to make sure they are sincere monastics, and not people who use the title of "monk" to attract students, fame, and so on.

I actually think in the Western countries, especially with Western monks and nuns, rather than helping one attract students, fame etc. being a monk or nun actually makes things harder. Many Westerners I know have a strong bias towards lay teachers and often frankly don't like Western ordained Sangha.

Malcolm wrote:

My point is that I have met a number of western monks who imagine that by becoming monks they are going to become Dharma teachers. Anyone who wants to become a teacher is insane. If you teach because people repeatedly ask you to, this is a different story.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 13th, 2014 at 9:50 PM

Title: Re: Should Buddhists even care about "engaging" social polit

Content:

AlexanderS said:

As far as I understand it from that text those full benefits are only achieved if one practices the mantra with pure bodhichitta motivation and pure samaya.

Malcolm wrote:

That's a given.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 13th, 2014 at 9:13 PM

Title: Re: karma bully

Content:

muni said:

Sherab Dorje,

I understand you when you say phenomena are the cause of suffering, since this is what we experience in samsara/suffering.

Only when the phenomena are really the cause of our suffering, how to get rid of them all? I think many wars (karma) have been started by the idea that the phenomena (other) are the cause of our suffering.

Malcolm wrote:

The weakest practitioners, understanding that phenomena are the cause of suffering break the link at contact, so they will not experience sensation, and so on. This is the function of śīla, discipline. Stronger practitioners can sever the link at sensation, since they can control their craving with samadhi. The best practitioners however, can sever the link at ignorance, since they are owners of prajñā.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 13th, 2014 at 9:10 PM

Title: Re: karma bully

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

ignorance is klesha, formations is karma, consciousness through sensation are dukkha ; craving and addiction are klesha

muni said:

This makes sense to me.

Addiction = ("the fact or condition of being addicted to a particular substance, thing, or activity..." google) = conditioned by own craving/clinging.

Malcolm wrote:

With is in turn conditioned by sensation [suffering], which is turn conditioned by contact [suffering] and so forth.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 13th, 2014 at 7:51 PM

Title: Re: Next generation of Dharma teachers in the West?

Content:

catlady2112 said:

I think it's always a good rule of thumb to study with monastics, no matter what generation they are of. People who have taken vows as monks and nuns have committed their whole life to the dharma.

Malcolm wrote:

It is a good idea to make sure they are sincere monastics, and not people who use the title of "monk" to attract students, fame, and so on. Not every one in robes who has taken vows observes them, or even thinks it is incumbent upon them to do so.

Therefore, it is better to take as a teacher someone whose discipline is pure, whether they are a lay person or a monastic.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 13th, 2014 at 7:48 PM

Title: Re: karma bully

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The cause of suffering is karma. The cause of karma is affliction. It is really quite straightforward and not esoteric.

muni said:

And the cause of affliction? (disorder, Disease.. I read on google)

Malcolm wrote:

--> klesha --> karma --dukkha --> klesha -->

For example, according to Nāgārjuna, ignorance is klesha, formations is karma, consciousness through sensation are dukkha ; craving and addiction are klesha, becoming is karma, birth, and aging and death are suffering.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 13th, 2014 at 7:29 PM

Title: Re: karma bully

Content:

muni said:

Ah! Then they are not afflicted by themselves.

Malcolm wrote:

"...all phenomena apart from path phenomena are afflicted or conducive to affliction "

muni said:

Thanks. I understand conducive to (actually not, but i went to google). Only, they are not the cause of suffering.

Malcolm wrote:

The cause of suffering is karma. The cause of karma is affliction. It is really quite straightforward and not esoteric. In this respect, as it is said in the four seals "All tainted phenomena are suffering".

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 13th, 2014 at 7:11 PM

Title: Re: karma bully

Content:

muni said:

Ah! Then they are not afflicted by themselves.

Malcolm wrote:

"...all phenomena apart from path phenomena are afflicted or conducive to affliction "

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 13th, 2014 at 7:03 PM

Title: Re: karma bully

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

Phenomena may be empty of essence (and this includes karma) but that does not mean that they are not a source of suffering (since they are empty of essence).

muni said:

Phenomena are the source of suffering or clinging is?

Malcolm wrote:

Actually, all phenomena apart from path phenomena are afflicted or conducive to affliction, so they induce craving...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 13th, 2014 at 6:56 PM

Title: Re: What Constitutes Misconduct?

Content:

shaunc said:

As far as I know, for a lay follower of Buddhism, the only rule so to speak is adultery. Other things like rape, pedophilia & incest besides being prohibited in Buddhism are also illegal in most if not all western countries.

Karma Jinpa said:

shaunc, if I wasn't clear before, I apologize. I figured since most of us are, like you, lay-practitioners, that we would discuss sexual misconduct as it pertains to upasakas & upasikas, rather than monastics. While I'm sure it's more nuanced in the Vinaya, the practical rule of thumb for monastics (whether monk or nun) is celibacy, so any sexual conduct would be considered misconduct.

That's one of the reasons Khen Rinpoche's statement is so striking to me, If I'm honest with myself. Transformation of Suffering is a very accessible, down-to-earth explanation of the the Mahayana/Vajrayana Dharma, from the Four Thoughts to Refuge & Bodhicitta and the Six Paramitas. He's most certainly talking to us lay-followers/householders throughout the whole book.

shaunc, which tradition (school/lineage) was the lama who gave you that explanation of misconduct, if I may ask? No need to mention your individual teachers.

That leads me to my next question... Are the vows interpreted differently between the different schools and lineages? Or do Rinpoche's words in ToS match directly with what is said in the Mulasarvastivada Vinaya where we get our Pratimoksha vows?

Malcolm wrote:

Generally, all this is explained in Abhidharmakosha. Sexual misconduct for lay people is wrong partner, wrong orifice, wrong time, wrong place.

Wrong partner means someone who is 1) not your spouse 2) underage 3) under the authority of another 4) ordained.

Wrong orifice means 1) anal 2) oral

Wrong time means daytime

Wrong place means in public, in a temple, in general in places where there is no privacy.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 13th, 2014 at 11:02 AM

Title: Re: Tibetan institutional religious violence

Content:

Zhen Li said:

Yes, quite. But that's not the meaning of backwards I was using.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, you were saying that which is actually moving us deeper into strife and barbarism is "forward", based on competitiveness and martial prowess, as opposed to a civilization, which despite its many faults, was one of the few remaining dedicated to the principles of Buddhadharma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 13th, 2014 at 10:38 AM

Title: Re: Tibetan institutional religious violence

Content:

Zhen Li said:

I'm open to arguing about backwards, but I defined my terms - which is comparative and competitive. I don't think there's much debate on this one - history is the witness.

Malcolm wrote:

All that history attests to is that we are deeper in the Kali yuga. It is we who are moving backwards.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 13th, 2014 at 10:14 AM

Title: Re: Tibetan institutional religious violence

Content:

Zhen Li said:

Scientific knowledge that doesn't allow one to out compete other world powers doesn't prevent one from being backwards.

Malcolm wrote:

As Todd pointed out, this is very biased definition of "backwards". Your thinking on this needs some work. As far as I am concerned, the Europeans, et al were the backwards ones, issuing unheralded barbarisms the world has never before seen.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 13th, 2014 at 10:02 AM

Title: Re: Tibetan institutional religious violence

Content:

Zhen Li said:

less scientific knowledge....

Malcolm wrote:

You're normally a smart guy, but this is simply ignorance.

Tibetan Medicine for example has a germ theory, understood circulation correctly, how nerves functioned in relation to the brain and other sense organs, etc., hundreds of years before anyone in Europe had similar ideas.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 13th, 2014 at 8:48 AM

Title: Re: karma bully

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

At that time, Maha-Moggallana lived alone in a forest hut at Kalasila. After his encounter with Mara he knew that the end of his days was near. Having enjoyed the bliss of liberation, he now felt the body to be just an obstruction and burden. Hence he had no desire to make use of his faculties and keep the body alive for the rest of the aeon. Yet, when he saw the brigands approaching, he just absented himself by using his supernormal powers. The gangsters arrived at an empty hut, and though they searched everywhere, could not find him. They left disappointed, but returned on the following day. On six consecutive days Moggallana escaped from them in the same way. His motivation was not the protection of his own body, but saving the brigands from the fearsome karmic consequences of such a murderous deed, necessarily leading to rebirth in the hells. He wanted to spare them such a fate by giving them time to reconsider and abstain from their crime. But their greed for the promised money was so great that they persisted and returned even on the seventh day. Then their persistence was "rewarded," for on that seventh day Moggallana suddenly lost the magic control over his body. A heinous deed committed in days long past (by causing the death of his own parents) had not yet been expiated, and the ripening of that old Kamma confronted him now, just as others are suddenly confronted by a grave illness. Moggallana realized that he was now unable to escape. The brigands entered, knocked him down, smashed all his limbs and left him lying in his blood. Being keen on quickly getting their reward and also somewhat ill at ease about their dastardly deed, the brigands left at once, without a further look.

<http://www.accesstoinight.org/lib/authors/hecker/wheel263.html#ch9> "
onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 13th, 2014 at 8:42 AM

Title: Re: Tibetan institutional religious violence

Content:

Andrew108 said:

Omniscience isn't possible. It would be crazy to assert that it is true. .

Malcolm wrote:

"Not seeing the characteristics of phenomena is the aspect (kara). Knowing all of this is called omniscience , hence "omniscience" is knowing all things."

— Āryāṣṭasāhasrikāprajñāpāramitāpañjikāsārottamā

TRC said:

Now I know why the Vajrayana can make the claim that Buddhahood can be attained through their path. Just lower the standard of what Buddhahood actually is.

Malcolm wrote:

This is a Mahāyāna sūtra commentary.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 13th, 2014 at 7:16 AM

Title: Re: Should Buddhists even care about "engaging" social polit

Content:

Emakirikiri said:

I would believe it if there was a textual Dzogchen basis in which it is said so or if it came from ChNNR's mouth. As far as you're aware do you know if it has a grounding in either source?

Malcolm wrote:

It has a grounding in many terma cycles.

KDL said many things like this as well.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 13th, 2014 at 7:15 AM

Title: Re: karma bully

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Ok, you keep on reducing things to the impossible -- tell me how well that works out the next time you burn your mouth on pizza.

Vajrasvapna said:

I'll just see the pain as something empty. created by the mind, not as something solid and real.

Malcolm wrote:

That, my friend is just a bunch of intellectual bullshit.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 13th, 2014 at 7:14 AM

Title: Re: karma bully

Content:

Vajrasvapna said:

A Buddha teaches according to the tolerance of his students...

Malcolm wrote:

A Buddha has the clairvoyance to look right into a person's mind and know exactly what teaching they need.

We on the other hand, do not.

Vajrasvapna said:

My understanding is that negative actions are all actions motivated by the five poisons and clinging to a self and positive actions are all actions motivated by compassion and selflessness. People create their suffering unknowingly cling to what brings them pleasure and having aversion to what brings them suffering.

Malcolm wrote:

Right, so filling people's ear with a load of stuff about non-dualism probably isn't going to help them, just as telling them they are a poor sinner isn't either.

Actually, most people who are sick just want a doctor, which is why I studied medicine, because in order to help people with Dharma, they have to have already drunk the koolaid.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 13th, 2014 at 7:02 AM

Title: Re: Should Buddhists even care about "engaging" social polit

Content:

Emakirikiri said:

Do you believe this to be the case from a Vajrayana view and a Dzogchen view?

Malcolm wrote:

It doesn't matter if I believe it. The question is, do you?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 13th, 2014 at 6:48 AM

Title: Re: karma bully

Content:

daverupa said:

can indeed be a great cruelty to be avoided, depending on many contextual variables:

Malcolm wrote:

If they don't follow Dharma, for sure. If they are Buddhists then as Buddha said to Angulimāla, "Bear it brahmin, bear it, this is your past karma ripening...."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 13th, 2014 at 6:32 AM

Title: Re: Tibetan institutional religious violence

Content:

rory said:

[ Basically it must be the norm.

Malcolm wrote:

Judge, jury and executioner, huh?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 13th, 2014 at 6:30 AM

Title: Re: karma bully

Content:

Vajrasvapna said:

The logic of stating that there is a separation between the relative and the absolute is the idea of Svatantrika school, even if this logic is positive to avoid the nihilistic tendencies of some people; I prefer the logic of "reduction to the impossible", as in Prasangika school.

Malcolm wrote:

Ok, you keep on reducing things to the impossible -- tell me how well that works out the next time you burn your mouth on pizza.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 13th, 2014 at 6:23 AM

Title: Re: karma bully

Content:

Vajrasvapna said:

To me, karma is an illusion. And what I want is that people help each other and not make use of religion to abuse those already in pain.

Malcolm wrote:

Then keep telling them that their suffering is just an illusion, that will get you really far.

At least the Buddha's teaching on karma, contained in such texts as the String of Pearls Tantra and others, actually explains to them why they are suffering.

"I am suffering"

"This negative sensation you are experiencing is a ripening of your karma."

"I feel pleasure"

"This positive sensation you are experiencing is a ripening of your karma."

"I feel neither suffering or pleasure."

"This neutral sensation you are experiencing is a ripening of your karma."

Etc.

At that time, the signs of awareness are as follows:

the mind of someone who has purified karma is clear.

In the same way, if [karma] is not purified, [the mind] is not clear.

All of that arises from positive and negative karma.

Tantra of the Union of the Sun and Moon

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 13th, 2014 at 6:21 AM

Title: Re: karma bully

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

You mean ultimately there is no good or bad action. But even in Dzogchen, relatively speaking there is good and bad action.

Vajrasvapna said:

Actually, I did not mean it, the text that you shared expresses what I wanted to say at the end:

Malcolm wrote:

You should have meant it, since the text clearly says: "the ultimate [your stance] endowed with the form of the relative [where people experience the ripening of action]."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 13th, 2014 at 6:14 AM

Title: Re: karma bully

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

We suffer because of our own past actions, and not for any other reason, as uncomfortable as this notion is to daverūpa and many other folks who nominally describe themselves as Buddhist.

There is a difference between the Theravada and Sarvastivadin point of view on this. The Theravadins maintain that not everything bad that can happen to someone is necessarily karmic. It is derived from their theory of 24 conditions.

For the Sarvastivadins however, all suffering, even suffering caused by natural disasters, requires some kind of karmic cause.

daverupa said:

So the Theravadans have it wrong, and the Sarvastivadins have it right. The Theravadans are nominally Buddhist; the Sarvastivadins are actually Buddhist.

Do I understand you correctly, Malcolm?

You also either think I'm a Theravadin, or nominally a Buddhist for other reasons, such as citing the Anguttara... I'm so very perplexed.

Malcolm wrote:

Dave,

You took rebirth in samsara. Samsara has three kinds of suffering, according to Shariputra in the Majjhima Nikāya, suffering of suffering, the suffering of change and the suffering of compounded things. Therefore, everything in samsara is suffering. We only take rebirth because of our karma and for no other reason. Since we are reborn in samsara, and there is nothing but suffering, there is no other reason for any of our suffering than karma, either directly, as the Sarvastivadins maintain, or indirectly, as the Theravadins must in the end admit. But there are some people who call themselves Buddhists who actually imagine that there is some kind of happiness in Samsara. These people are a little mistaken.

Your citation of the Anguttara Nikaya does not in any way refute my contention all our suffering comes from past causes of our own creation. That's why I cited the Anguttara Nikaya back at you. I never said anywhere that everything we do now was caused by something we did in the past. Essentially, what I am saying is that all positive, negative and neutral sensations we experience in the three realms are a result of the ripening of positive, negative and neutral actions. You have carried a misunderstanding of my position from our last conversation about this.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 13th, 2014 at 6:06 AM

Title: Re: karma bully

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Nāgārjuna, in the only place where he expresses a preference in the MMK, expresses a preference for the debt theory of the Ārya-Sammitiya school. This latter theory has ancient resonances in the immorality of debt which can be found in the Vedas.

Vajrasvapna said:

What is the debt theory of the Ārya-Sammitiya school or where I can read more about it?

Malcolm wrote:

The Ārya-sammitiya proposed that every act created a dharma called an "avipranasha", which was like a debt. It exists until it paid up. The Buddha himself likened action to a debt. You can think of karma as being like an inheritance tax.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 13th, 2014 at 5:45 AM

Title: Re: karma bully

Content:

Vajrasvapna said:

People think that karma works in a dualistic way, all suffering originates from a evil action, but this is not true, because, in essence, there is no good or evil action.

Malcolm wrote:

You mean ultimately there is no good or bad action. But even in Dzogchen, relatively speaking there is good and bad action. As the String of Pearls Tantra states:

One is placed in the dungeon of name and matter
in the castle of the three realms, tortured with the barbs of ignorance and so on,
oppressed by the thick darkness of samsara,
attached to the salty taste of desire,
bound by the neck with the noose of confusion,
burned with the hot fire of hatred,
head covered with pride,
setting a rendezvous with the mistress of jealousy,
surrounded by the army of enmity...
tied by the neck with the noose of subject and object, [29b] stuck in the mud of successive traces
and handcuffed with the ripening of karma.
Having been joined with the ripening of karma,
one takes bodies good and bad,
one after another like a water wheel,
born into each individual class.
Having crossed at the ford of self-grasping,
one sinks into the ocean of suffering
and one is caught by the heart on the hook of the three lower realms.
One is bound by oneself; the afflictions are the enemy.
The body of a hell being appears as fire or water.
Pretas are frightened and intimidated.
There is a fog-like appearance for animals.
The aggregates, sense gates and sense elements of humans appear as the five elements, and also happiness, suffering and indifference.
They appear as armor and weapons to asuras and desirable qualities for devas.

Such dualistic appearances, for example, are like a quickly moving wheel spinning continuously for a long while.
As such, diverse appearances are like seeing a snake from a rope; that [rope] is not [a snake] but is apprehended as a [snake];
forming as both the outer universe and inhabitants.
If that is investigated, it is a rope.
The universe and inhabitants have always been empty,
the ultimate endowed with the form of the relative.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 13th, 2014 at 5:39 AM

Title: Re: karma bully

Content:

Vajrasvapna said:

The Yogacara school says that every action generates a karmic seed, so the seed would be harvested in the future. This idea is in common with the way people think in general, but it is strange from the standpoint of the Mahayana philosophy.

Malcolm wrote:

Ultimately, the Yogacara theory is grounded in the Sautrantika notion that karma is a result of the transformation of vasana [bag chags] in the mind stream [citta samtanaparinama].

Vajrasvapna said:

On the other hand, Nagarjuna, founded of the Madhyamaka school,

Malcolm wrote:

Nāgārjuna, in the only place where he expresses a preference in the MMK, expresses a preference for the debt theory of the Ārya-Sammitya school. This latter theory has ancient resonances in the immorality of debt which can be found in the Vedas.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 13th, 2014 at 5:21 AM

Title: Re: Tibetan institutional religious violence

Content:

Andrew108 said:

Ven. Khedrup...I'm not bullying you. I just found it hard to believe that after 10 years or so of being involved with Tibetan monastic institutions you haven't also come across some forms of abuse ( mental and physical).

Malcolm wrote:

He has.

Andrew108 said:

I have come across it in the U.K and also in Boudha, Kathmandu. I was given the impression that what happened to me was common. I'm glad that you have had a different experience.

Malcolm wrote:

Different monastic traditions have different standards. For example, what I am familiar with from Bodhanatha in a monastery I was at, was that many of the adolescent monks had girlfriends. In the group of students I was with, there was also a guy, not a monk, who hit on a couple of the teenage monks.

There is also the issue that indeed pornography is quite widespread in Tibetan exile community in general, and has been for quite a long time, for at least twenty years. It would be extremely naive to believe that adolescent promiscuity in Tibetan monasteries does not happen. Of course it does. But as I already pointed out, most of these kids are not expected to become monks in adult hood. Many of them are being sent their by their parents because they want then to have a religious education.

The problem with this whole conversation, apart from its origins in an clumsy attempt to discredit certain Tibetan cultural beliefs that have nothing to with the Dharma, is that it exists in a vacuum absent a whole range of sociological considerations.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 13th, 2014 at 5:09 AM

Title: Re: Tibetan institutional religious violence

Content:

smcj said:

Dude should have given back his robes

Malcolm wrote:

He did.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 13th, 2014 at 4:53 AM

Title: Re: karma bully

Content:

smcj said:

If karma was fixed then liberation wouldn't be possible

Unripened karma is not fixed. Fully ripened karma is pretty fixed. If your karma has fully ripened in such a way that you are going to have a leg amputated, your leg is going to be amputated. But if you purify that same karma while it is in an unripened state you may just have a blister on your foot.

...and karma doesn't operate the forces of nature.

If people who've lived somewhere all their lives are killed in a tsunami its nothing to do with their past.

Don't be so sure. That would mean that airplane crashes, war dead, epidemics and such were not karmic either.

Malcolm wrote:

There is a difference between the Theravada and Sarvastivadin point of view on this. The Theravadins maintain that not everything bad that can happen to someone is necessarily karmic. It is derived from their theory of 24 conditions.

For the Sarvastivadins however, all suffering, even suffering caused by natural disasters, requires some kind of karmic cause.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 13th, 2014 at 4:50 AM

Title: Re: karma bully

Content:

rory said:

I had a prior discussion about 'whether the Buddha can experience evil thoughts' the interesting outcome is that I found there is a big difference between Tibetan Buddhists and East Asian adherents: the former do not have the concept of merit transference that East Asian adherents have...

Malcolm wrote:

This is not the case rory, you are once again mistaken in your understanding of Tibetan Buddhism, and not for the first time. I suggest you study it a bit. Especially a book like Lamrim Chenmo where the principle of dedication of merit is covered in detail.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 13th, 2014 at 4:35 AM

Title: Re: Tibetan institutional religious violence

Content:

theanarchist said:

it's fair to say it's nothing more than a vile smear campaign.

Malcolm wrote:

Indeed, started by someone who ought to have the common sense to know better.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 13th, 2014 at 4:28 AM

Title: Re: karma bully

Content:

DCDDM228 said:

No one should ever use karma as a bullying tactic. Just as everyone's concept of reality is different for them as it is for someone else, so are their acts that have affected karma. You never know the details of someone's past that could be dramatically different than yours that affects karma. I have always been under the impression that karma was slightly more entailed than just "do this and get that effect. "

Malcolm wrote:

What you can know about everyone is that we were born in this life because we were afflicted in the past life. All negative karma is caused by affliction, all suffering is caused negative karma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 13th, 2014 at 4:26 AM

Title: Re: karma bully

Content:

Andrew108 said:

Yes we know about karma. We are just not sure how smart it is to pass a judgement on the suffering of others in a way that suggests the victim/'sufferee' (?) is to blame.

Malcolm wrote:

I just said blame is not even an issue. We suffer because of our own past actions, and not for any other reason, as uncomfortable as this notion is to daverūpa and many other folks who nominally describe themselves as Buddhist.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 13th, 2014 at 4:18 AM

Title: Re: Tibetan institutional religious violence

Content:

JKhedrup said:

Where did I say I didn't? I objected to widespread, endemic, rife and all the other silly adjectives.

Both cases I know of occurred in Thai monasteries though, not Tibetan ones.

Andrew108 said:

You know more than you are saying.

Malcolm wrote:

Really, now you can read minds?

Andrew108 said:

You are worried about Tibet bashing. Anti-Tibetan sentiments. I'm more interested in the truth.

Malcolm wrote:

No, that is not true. We are concerned that this kind of thing quickly becomes an unfounded witch hunt.

Andrew108 said:

Or at least an open discussion. If we have an open discussion then we can understand more of the subtleties of the situation and this can bring about useful understanding.

Malcolm wrote:

Right, this is kind of open discussion you want to have:

"When is the last time you beat your wife?"

"But I don't even have a wife!"

"Ah, that is because you beat her, correct? Then she left you."

"But I've never even been married!"

"Yes, that is because you beat your girlfriend!"

"But I am gay!"

"Aha, so you are a little pervert after all!"

Etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 13th, 2014 at 3:53 AM

Title: Re: karma bully

Content:

AN 3.61 said:

"Having approached the brahmans & contemplatives who hold that... 'Whatever a person experiences... is all caused by what was done in the past,' I said to them: 'Is it true that you hold that... "Whatever a person experiences... is all caused by what was done in the past?"' Thus asked by me, they admitted, 'Yes.' Then I said to them, 'Then in that case, a person is a killer of living beings because of what was done in the past. A person is a thief... unchaste... a liar... a divisive speaker... a harsh speaker... an idle chatterer... greedy... malicious... a holder of wrong views because of what was done in the past.' When one falls back on what was done in the past as being essential, monks, there is no desire, no effort [at the thought], 'This should be done. This shouldn't be done.' When one can't pin down as a truth or reality what should & shouldn't be done, one dwells bewildered & unprotected. One cannot righteously refer to oneself as a contemplative. This was my first righteous refutation of those brahmans & contemplatives who hold to such teachings, such views.

Malcolm wrote:

<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/an/an03/an03.033.than.html>:

"Just as when seeds are not broken, not rotten, not damaged by wind & heat, capable of sprouting, well-buried, planted in well-prepared soil, and the rain-god would offer good streams of rain. Those seeds would thus come to growth, increase, & abundance. In the same way, any action performed with greed ... performed with aversion ... performed with delusion — born of delusion, caused by delusion, originating from delusion: wherever one's selfhood turns up, there that action will ripen. Where that action ripens, there one will experience its fruit, either in this very life that has arisen or further along in the sequence.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 13th, 2014 at 3:48 AM

Title: Re: Tibetan institutional religious violence

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

This is a spurious objection. So far as we know, there are no Buddhas running any monasteries in the world today.

Regarding one's guru as being an actual buddha is a practice, not an objective fact.

Andrew108 said:

I didn't say they were Buddhas. I said if they had a fraction of the realization then they would know. Sometimes we get lost in the Maitreya/Asanga elaboration of a Buddha's omniscience rather than looking at the facts on the ground or in the Sutras.

Malcolm wrote:

The Maitreya/Asanga elaboration of a Buddha's omniscience is based on the sūtras, Mahāyāna sūtras.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 13th, 2014 at 3:22 AM

Title: Re: karma bully

Content:

Andrew108 said:

Yes it is cruel and completely wrong.

Malcolm wrote:

No it is merely a fact.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 13th, 2014 at 3:21 AM

Title: Re: karma bully

Content:

Vajrasvapna said:

I have noticed that it is very common for people to use the concept of karma to abuse people who often are already experiencing some pain, for example, saying "this is your karma" for people who are sick, which gives the impression that the person deserves his or her suffering. I wonder what people opinion about this topic, for it seems to me a great cruelty.

Malcolm wrote:

No one "deserves" suffering, but all suffering is the ripening of past karma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 13th, 2014 at 3:04 AM

Title: Re: Tibetan institutional religious violence

Content:

Andrew108 said:

If an enlightened master who heads up a monastic institution had even a fraction of this capacity then they would know about the abuse that goes on under their roof. They would also know how to organise things so that this abuse didn't take place.

Malcolm wrote:

This is a spurious objection. So far as we know, there are no Buddhas running any monasteries in the world today.

Regarding one's guru as being an actual buddha is a practice, not an objective fact.

Andrew108 said:

Knowing something that is 'beyond range' isn't possible.

Malcolm wrote:

The range of a Buddha's mind, what they can see, hear, and so on infinitely exceeds ours.

For example, for us, without binoculars, ALL, in reference to sight, means all that can be seen with our ordinary naked eye. But a Buddha's eye (there are five eyes actually) is not so restricted.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 13th, 2014 at 2:27 AM

Title: Re: Tibetan institutional religious violence

Content:

JKhedrup said:

I have to admit that I feel a little worn out from much of the recent anti-Tibet sentiment on the board here, as well as from witnessing the same sentiment outside HH DL's teachings in Holland yesterday.

Luke said:

People in Holland have anti-Tibet feelings? May I ask why?

Are they just racist? Or were they just upset about some specific religious/political issue?

Malcolm wrote:

It's the Dogyal crew shouting their same stupid slogans at HHDL.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 13th, 2014 at 2:20 AM

Title: Re: Tibetan institutional religious violence

Content:

Andrew108 said:

Does this 'knowing completely' of a Buddha also include that which does not appear to the senses, such as the thoughts and intentions of others as well as past and future events?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, of course. Buddhas can know all phenomena, including the minds of others, where they are reborn, where they are now, what kind of karma they have, where they will be, and so on, throughout the three times.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 13th, 2014 at 1:55 AM

Title: Re: Tibetan institutional religious violence

Content:

Andrew108 said:

According to this Sutta the Buddha is confirming 'All knowing' is not possible.

Malcolm wrote:

No, that is not what is happening in this sutra. What the Buddha is saying here is that he does not assert of himself what Mahathera asserted of himself, i.e. that the Buddha constantly in a state of total knowledge of all things at all times. Buddha rejected this kind of omniscience. The kind of omniscience the Buddha has is the ability to know completely anything to which his mind is directed without effort. Not even in Mahāyāna is asserted that a Buddha in a state of total knowledge of all phenomena at all times.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Tuesday, May 13th, 2014 at 1:51 AM
Title: Re: Tibetan institutional religious violence
Content:
mañjughoṣamaṇi said:
It does border on a racialized discourse though.

Malcolm wrote:
Indrajala is not a racist, but he is a chauvinist.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Tuesday, May 13th, 2014 at 1:33 AM
Title: Re: Tibetan institutional religious violence
Content:
Andrew108 said:
And by the way the Buddha never made any claims to be omniscient.

Malcolm wrote:
Believe what you like. But you might want to study a bit of sutra and tantra before you make such bold claims.

In fact, since all phenomena are actually the display of a buddha's wisdom, there is in fact nothing that a buddha cannot know. Buddhas are omniscient, they are not, however, omnipotent.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Tuesday, May 13th, 2014 at 1:03 AM
Title: Re: Tibetan institutional religious violence
Content:
Malcolm wrote:
You do not understand the context of what omniscience means.

It means "not seeing the characteristics of phenomena". Since that is perceived with respect to all phenomena, a Buddha is omniscient. It does mean, as Dharmakīrti famously quipped, that a Buddha knows the number of maggots in the ground.

It means that they know the nature of all phenomena and all the details of all paths to become buddhas.

Andrew108 said:
You are changing the meaning of the word. So it might be better to use a different term. Knowing the nature of all phenomenon is not the same as omniscience.

Malcolm wrote:
Latin | Sanskrit | Tibetan | English

omni | sarva | thams cad | all

Latin | Sanskrit | Tibetan | English
scientia | jñāna | mkhyen pa | knowing

In this case, knowing the nature of all phenomena bears the consequence that one's mind is unimpeded and thus one can also know all the details, should one wish to.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 13th, 2014 at 12:46 AM

Title: Re: Tibetan institutional religious violence

Content:

Andrew108 said:

Omniscience isn't possible. It would be crazy to assert that it is true. .

Malcolm wrote:

"Not seeing the characteristics of phenomena is the aspect (kara). Knowing all of this is called omniscience , hence "omniscience" is knowing all things."

— Āryāṣṭasāhasrikāprajñāpāramitāpañjikāsāroṭṭamā

Andrew108 said:

I know that omniscience means knowing all things and I am saying that this 'knowing all things' is not possible.

Malcolm wrote:

You do not understand the context of what omniscience means.

It means "not seeing the characteristics of phenomena". Since that is perceived with respect to all phenomena, a Buddha is omniscient. It does not mean, as Dharmakīrti famously quipped, that a Buddha knows the number of maggots in the ground.

It means that they know the nature of all phenomena and all the details of all paths to become buddhas.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 13th, 2014 at 12:18 AM

Title: Re: Tibetan institutional religious violence

Content:

Andrew108 said:

Omniscience isn't possible. It would be crazy to assert that it is true. .

Malcolm wrote:

"Not seeing the characteristics of phenomena is the aspect (kara). Knowing all of this is called omniscience , hence "omniscience" is knowing all things."

— Āryāṣṭasāhasrikāprajñāpāramitāpañjikāsāroṭṭamā

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, May 12th, 2014 at 10:02 PM

Title: Re: Tibetan institutional religious violence

Content:

Indrajala said:

I'm not saying it is right. Nations generally behave in a way that is in their interests. It isn't about what is right and wrong, but what is in your interests.

Malcolm wrote:

As a Buddhist, you know quite well that knowing the difference between right and wrong and then acting on that information in all areas of one's life is the only thing that is one's own as well as everyone else's interest.

Excusing the harmful actions of great nations on the grounds they are merely acting in their own interest is excusing the sociopathy behind all of the world's conflicts today.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, May 12th, 2014 at 9:47 PM

Title: Re: Tibetan institutional religious violence

Content:

Indrajala said:

There's actually a lot of logic behind the decisions undertaken by the PRC. It isn't necessarily moral by Buddhist standards, but they're not a bunch of psychotic monsters.

Malcolm wrote:

Psychopathy has many shades.

<http://tibettruth.com/case-files-on-forced-sterilization/> "
onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, May 12th, 2014 at 9:34 PM

Title: Re: Tibetan institutional religious violence

Content:

Andrew108 said:

I

realization will be seen to consist of the special reduction or elimination of kleshas and worldly concerns.

Malcolm wrote:

This is the path of freedom, i.e. Arhatship and Pratyekabuddhahood. It is the principle goal of the Hīnayāna path.

Then there is the path of achieving both freedom and omniscience, i.e. Buddhahood.
This is the principle goal of the Mahāyāna path.

Then there is the path of achieving freedom and omniscience in one lifetime in this body.
This is the principle goal of the Vajrayāna path.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, May 12th, 2014 at 9:12 PM

Title: Re: Tibetan institutional religious violence

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Some people apparently think that Buddhism in China is more important than the Buddhism in its homeland. This really is a reflection of the belief amongst many Chinese Buddhists that late Indian Buddhism was completely corrupt. A false belief, of course, but one that is widely diffused amongst them.

Indrajala said:

That's true. Some Chinese Buddhists also believe they civilized Buddhism, too.

Incidentally, some Shingon proponents believe late period Vajrayāna is corrupted and degenerate, and that theirs represent pure esoteric Buddhism.

Malcolm wrote:

Of course they believe this. It comes out of believing that some human cultures are better than others, a belief to which you strongly adhere.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, May 12th, 2014 at 8:27 PM

Title: Re: Tibetan institutional religious violence

Content:

jiashengrox said:

Exactly. One of them is the debate tradition which was inherited from the ancient Nalanda University. I thought it was really wonderful to preserve this pedagogy of learning and study.

Malcolm wrote:

Some people apparently think that Buddhism in China is more important than the Buddhism in its homeland. This really is a reflection of the belief amongst many Chinese Buddhists that late Indian Buddhism was completely corrupt. A false belief, of course, but one that is widely diffused amongst them.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, May 12th, 2014 at 8:14 PM

Title: Re: Tibetan institutional religious violence

Content:

JKhedrup said:

I am actually really glad they did pull out.

Not because I don't like East Asian Buddhism- I really think if I had met different teachers I could see myself practicing in a traditional Chinese Buddhist order like Master Hua's.

The reason I'm glad they pulled out is that it enabled them to preserve the essence of many Indian Buddhist traditions that died out in the land of their birth, and if they had adopted East Asian Buddhism this would not have been the case.

Malcolm wrote:

As I explained to Rory, after 845 there was no mainstream East Asian Buddhism to join. She should study history a little more closely.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, May 12th, 2014 at 8:13 PM

Title: Re: Tibetan institutional religious violence

Content:

Indrajala said:

I spoke to the Health Minister of the Exile Government a few months ago and he said TB is the biggest health problem among Tibetans in India (or maybe it was?).

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, many of the refugees bring it with them from China when they escape. When I interned in the hospital in Xining, we had a whole wing devoted to TB patients. Many had come back several times.

Indrajala said:

Many would choose poverty over kowtowing to totalitarianism and systematic cultural annihilation.

China is not a totalitarian state.

Malcolm wrote:

\

It really depends on who you are. The Tibetans are under a totalitarian regime; their culture, language and heritage under extreme attack.

Indrajala said:

I'm not so convinced Tibetan culture is subject to 'systematic cultural annihilation'. Monasteries are being rebuilt. Akong Rinpoche was working on that. You can still be a monk in Tibet.

Malcolm wrote:

When you deny people the right to be educated in their own language, their culture dies.

Indrajala said:

New Tibetan books are regularly published in Tibet, or so I hear.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, this is true -- but an every dwindling population of Tibetans can read them.

Indrajala said:

but the standard of living is still far better than what you get in India.

Malcolm wrote:

That really depends on where you live and how high up in the party you are.

Having seen many Chinese people as patients while I was an intern, most of their diseases were a result of their very low standard of living, just like in India.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, May 12th, 2014 at 7:54 PM

Title: Re: Tibetan institutional religious violence

Content:

rory said:

I really don't have much of an opinion of Tibet, I'm neither a lover nor a basher. I do have a low opinion of their pulling out after 1 debate and not being part of mainstream East Asian Buddhism.

Malcolm wrote:

The Tibetans chose to follow mainstream Indian Buddhism because, from the Tibetan point of view, the Chinese Buddhists were bested in a three year debate.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, May 12th, 2014 at 7:49 PM

Title: Re: Tibetan institutional religious violence

Content:

JKhedrup said:

Also, medical care in China is prohibitively expensive. Despite being a socialist country, it makes people pay for healthcare just like in America. Good quality hospitals are probably financially out of reach for most Tibetans.

Malcolm wrote:

This is a fact. In order to even be seen in a Chinese emergency room, you must bring 2000 RMB cash.

Add to this the fact that as for most rural Indians, rural Chinese people have thoroughly noisome outhouses (and the bathrooms in the cities are just as foul as any I have encountered in India) and let their little ones pee and poo in public everywhere...his notion that China is cleaner than India is a fantasy. The water in mainland China is polluted beyond belief. The air in many places in China, unbreathable, just like Kathmandu and Delhi. 25 percent of the arable land in China is too polluted to farm, and the list of China's environmental woes goes on and on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, May 12th, 2014 at 7:12 PM

Title: Re: Tibetan institutional religious violence

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Two cases is not "numerous".

Indrajala said:

And suspicion of it occurring elsewhere.

A year later, at least a dozen monks, including some who were underage, were diagnosed with STIs, and at least five monks were known to be HIV positive.

And the link to sexual abuse is?

HIV is unlikely to be introduced to a group of minors from another minor.

Malcolm wrote:

Are you completely naive? Teen transmitted HIV is very common.

For example:

Despite stable rates of HIV diagnosis in older populations, the rate of HIV diagnoses from 2006 to 2009 increased in teens 15-19 and youth 20-24 years of age, and was highest in the 20-24 year-old age group. Undiagnosed HIV cases are thought to be highest among young people. Of the approximately 1.2 million people living with HIV, approximately one in five, or 220,000, doesn't know they're infected. The U.S. Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC) estimates more than half of all undiagnosed HIV infections are youth ages 13 – 24.<sup>3</sup> <https://www.hhs.gov/ash/oah/news/e-updates/june-2012.html> "

onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

When you add this to the fact that Bhutan has a cultural reputation for promiscuity, well what do you expect in a country where people do not where condoms and the most important culture hero is Drugpa Kunley?

Author: Malcolm
Date: Monday, May 12th, 2014 at 7:00 AM
Title: Re: Tibetan institutional religious violence
Content:

Indrajala said:
Also, in 2013 there were also numerous cases of sexual abuse reported in Bhutan:

Malcolm wrote:
Numerous, as it turns out, is two.

Indrajala said:
Four victims that have been reported, plus suspicion of it being an issue in the larger community:

Malcolm wrote:
Two cases is not "numerous".

Indrajala said:
A year later, at least a dozen monks, including some who were underage, were diagnosed with STIs, and at least five monks were known to be HIV positive.

Malcolm wrote:
And the link to sexual abuse is?

Author: Malcolm
Date: Monday, May 12th, 2014 at 2:52 AM
Title: Re: Tibetan institutional religious violence
Content:

Indrajala said:
Also, in 2013 there were also numerous cases of sexual abuse reported in Bhutan:

Malcolm wrote:
Numerous, as it turns out, is two.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Monday, May 12th, 2014 at 2:50 AM

Title: Re: Tibetan institutional religious violence

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

"Teeth and Claws of the Buddha: Monastic Warriors and Sōhei in Japanese History."
Adolphson, 2007, Hawai'i.

Indrajala said:

It remains unclear how many sōhei were actually monks.

Secondly, there were a minority in Japan, if they were even largely clergy.

Thirdly, they are part of medieval Japanese history, and not Chinese history. In China the Shaolin monks were not necessarily accepted by more mainstream Buddhist monks.

Malcolm wrote:

You made a blanket statement about East Asian Mahāyāna. You did not qualify in anyway.

Indrajala said:

As well as the case of HIV being spread in Bhutanese monasteries:

http://www.huffingtonpost.com/2013/03/29/bhutas-makes-condoms-available-to-monks-to-stop-spread-of-stds\_n\_2976401.html "

onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;" onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;" onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

Malcolm wrote:

This not about sexual abuse.

Indrajala said:

Chhoekey Penjor, deputy chief information officer at the Children's Division of the commission, confirmed the allegations were found to be true and "necessary action was taken."

Malcolm wrote:

So yes, there are pedophiles everywhere. Here, they were discovered and punished.

Indrajala said:

If this sort of thing is happening in Bhutan which at least has rule of law and journalists willing to address such matters, what about India and Nepal where Tibetans have little voice being refugees? India and Nepal barely have rule of law, so complaints to the police might not mean much.

Malcolm wrote:

You have not demonstrated this is a pervasive problem in Tibetan Monasteries.

Also, Kalu Rinpoche has said that the cycle of abuse went onto other young monks after he left his monastery:

It wasn't until Kalu returned to the monastery after his three-year retreat that he realized how wrong this practice was. By then the cycle had begun again on a younger generation of victims, he says.

Note the use of the plural there: victim s.

Yes, apparently the gang of monks that abused him continued to abuse others. In his monastery, not all other monasteries in India.

Indrajala said:

Apparently even Dzongsar Khyentse Rinpoche has voiced concern about sexual abuse in monasteries:

Malcolm wrote:

Stating that it is a "concern" is not a statement that it is endemic or pervasive.

Indrajala said:

Incidentally, in 2000 there were claims of sexual abuse at Samye Ling Center (that's the west, of course, but still Tibetan Buddhist):

Malcolm wrote:

Not of children.

Indrajala said:

Therefore taken altogether I would conclude that sexual abuse in Tibetan monasteries is a serious problem.

Malcolm wrote:

Of which you actually have no proof or evidence of. Merely a suspicion.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, May 12th, 2014 at 1:40 AM

Title: Re: Tibetan institutional religious violence

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

"Vajrayāna claims rapid results.

Tulkus practice Vajrayāna.

Tulkus can't seem to protect children under their care from sexual predation.

Therefore, Vajrayāna claims to produce rapid results are questionable."

This sort of logic is really very poor.

M

Andrew108 said:

The logic is quite well-founded. It shows that rapid results are not axiomatic, even for those who are privileged.

Malcolm wrote:

It's extremely poor, since I have shown that the tulku system does not come from the system of Vajrayāna. It is merely a Tibetan cultural practice. It is not Dharma.

Andrew108 said:

As to the idea that abuse isn't widespread or claims aren't substantiated well you know that there is a lot that is hidden due to feelings of shame.

Malcolm wrote:

I see, so there is a conspiracy of silence. What nonsense.

Andrew108 said:

This self-censorship is one large part of the problem - the denial of abuse is only now being seen as not helpful (hence the issuing of condoms to monks in Bhutan).

Malcolm wrote:

Issuing condoms to rape victims? That's a novel approach. In general, teenagers in monasteries tend to have girlfriends. One of the most common reasons for leaving the monastery is knocking up your girlfriend.

Andrew108 said:

Adele Wilde-Blavatsky discusses this in an article she wrote for the Elephant Journal.

Malcolm wrote:

Actually, I agree that monasteries are not suitable places to educate children. But for reasons different than the one's she raises. Kids educated in monasteries do not receive the benefit of a modern education.

Andrew108 said:

She writes:

"In October 2011, a famous and highly-respected reincarnate Tibetan Buddhist master, Kalu Rinpoche, posted a Youtube video in which he reveals the abuse he suffered as a young monk at the hands of adult monks in his monastery. Rinpoche's allegations caused shockwaves within the Tibetan Buddhist community (particularly his western students). Since that time, I have not heard any Tibetan Buddhist teacher (especially those connected with Kalu Rinpoche) publicly respond to his allegations, let alone suggest there be a formal investigation and those responsible brought to account. One can only hope Kalu Rinpoche's video exposure of this serious issue has not gone to waste and been brushed under the carpet in the hope that people might forget about it.

You wonder why there has been no follow up or public statement.

Malcolm wrote:

It would be irresponsible for anyone to respond without launching an investigation.

Andrew108 said:

If you were a father and your young child was recognized as a tulku would you let your child be taken by monastics? I doubt it.

Malcolm wrote:

I would not let my child be recognized as a tulku to begin with.

Andrew108 said:

Whilst sexual abuse may be hidden and not discussed openly, what is known to be commonplace and is openly discussed is the violent corporal punishment meted out to monks who commit only minor infractions that displease their superiors.

Malcolm wrote:

Oh please. They get a stick across the back of their calves. One of the reasons one of my teachers did so well in school is that those kids who did not memorize their lines would be stood up and would be punished in front of the class.

Andrew108 said:

I myself have seen how sexual relations within Tibetan monastic institutions are commonplace.

Malcolm wrote:

Which kind of sexual relations? Between whom?

Andrew108 said:

You might also consider the testimony of Ruben Derksen (a western tulku) who talks about systematic abuse in the monastery where he was receiving his training.

Malcolm wrote:

What kind of abuse? Beatings, rape, etc?

Andrew108 said:

Now the point is that the leaders of these monasteries are not being proactive in preventing cases of abuse and rarely promote organisational changes that would mitigate against such abuse.

Malcolm wrote:

You don't actually know this.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, May 12th, 2014 at 1:12 AM

Title: Re: Tibetan institutional religious violence

Content:

Andrew108 said:

There are well documented cases of abuse.

Malcolm wrote:

Define "well documented". Do you mean that people were arrested, sent to court? Imprisoned?

Or do you mean by well documented "So and so said so".

The point is not to deny that such things can, and indeed, do occur, if we are to believe Kalu Rinpoche's allegations.

The point is to approach the issue with responsibility and not paint all Tibetan institutions as places infested with pedophiles and child rapists.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, May 12th, 2014 at 1:01 AM

Title: Re: Tibetan institutional religious violence

Content:

theanarchist said:

So, go home with your tired old rambling.

Indrajala said:

Would you be content if we all ignored documented cases of child abuse in monasteries and pretended such things never occurred?

Malcolm wrote:

We would be content if you actually had some facts upon which to base your wide ranging accusations. So far we have Kalu Rinpoche's story as well as ???

Not much at this point. The point is to act responsibly and not fling out accusations which smear shit even on people you have taken teachings from and claim to respect.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, May 12th, 2014 at 12:58 AM

Title: Re: Tibetan institutional religious violence

Content:

Dan74 said:

Well, this is more than a discussion. When you make statements like "East Asian Mahāyāna actually has a better track record historically than Tibetan Buddhism" it crosses into sectarian bashing, rather than a discussion about learning. Learning can take place in a respectful environment, can it not? That's the key notion I am trying to raise here - respect.

Indrajala said:

It can't qualify as sectarian bashing because EA Mahāyāna is a general geographical designation for forms of Buddhism based on the Classical Chinese canon in the Sinosphere. For the simple fact East Asian clergy seldom had major political-military authority, they were seldom if ever guilty of transgressions that putting down a rebellion would entail. Consequently my statement is reasonable albeit provocative.

Malcolm wrote:

"Teeth and Claws of the Buddha: Monastic Warriors and Sōhei in Japanese History."
Adolphson, 2007, Hawai'i.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, May 11th, 2014 at 11:29 PM

Title: Re: Tibetan institutional religious violence

Content:

Andrew108 said:

Whether there are Tulkus or not the guru is seen as infallible.

Malcolm wrote:

One is to perceive only one's own guru as free from faults. That does not mean that one not free to see faults wherever and in whomever they exist.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, May 11th, 2014 at 9:59 PM

Title: Re: Next generation of Dharma teachers in the West?

Content:

WuMing said:

To come back to the original question: Next generation of Dharma teachers in the West?

What about you, Malcolm, being a Dharma teacher?

Malcolm wrote:

There is very little need for me to be a Dharma teacher.

There are many people, both in the East and the West, who are far more qualified than me, and much nicer people to boot.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, May 11th, 2014 at 9:38 PM

Title: Re: Next generation of Dharma teachers in the West?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The Vajrayāna claim is that if you take two beginners of equal diligence and capacity and put them on the path, the Mahāyāni will take three incalculable eons to attain full buddhahood, .

theanarchist said:

Can we be sure that it's not possible to do it faster than the being later known as Shakyamuni did? Just because he took this amount of time doesn't automatically mean that as a rule this is the fastest possible.

Malcolm wrote:

Three "incalculable" eons is the minimum time it takes the person of highest capacity to travel the common Mahāyāna path.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, May 11th, 2014 at 9:11 PM

Title: Re: Next generation of Dharma teachers in the West?

Content:

smcj said:

Sutra Mahayana does make the claim that full awakening is possible in this body, but only if this body is the product of previous bodies' Dharma practice. So who knows if this body is in striking distance or not? The only way to tell is practice Dharma and see what happens. Sure would be a waste if all you're previous incarnations spent all that time and energy to get you this close and you just didn't feel like it this time.

The tantric claim is that full awakening is possible in the body that first makes contact with Dharma practice, not later incarnations. Sure would be a waste if you're this close and don't feel like making the effort.

Malcolm wrote:

The Vajrayāna claim is that if you take two beginners of equal diligence and capacity and put them on the path, the Mahāyāni will take three incalculable eons to attain full buddhahood, the Vajrayāni will be able to attain full buddhahood in one body and one lifetime.

Why? Quite simply speaking, Mahāyāna has no methods that work with the body and it does not take the result as the path.

However, no one is forcing anyone to believe Vajrayāna claims about anything.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, May 11th, 2014 at 9:06 PM

Title: Re: Next generation of Dharma teachers in the West?

Content:

smcj said:

Sutra Mahayana does make the claim that full awakening is possible in this body, but only if this body is the product of previous bodies' Dharma practice.:

theanarchist said:

Indeed. Like Shakaymuni was said to have practiced for several immeasurable kalpas to get there.

Malcolm wrote:

Three, in fact. Two eons to get the eighth bhumi, one more to attain full buddhahood.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, May 11th, 2014 at 9:02 PM

Title: Re: Tibetan institutional religious violence

Content:

TRC said:

It appears the Vajrayana can be critical of others, but cry foul when some overdue criticism is directed at them.

Malcolm wrote:

People can criticize Vajrayāna all they like, but they should use arguments which make sense, which are actually grounded in Vajrayāna claims, rather than cultural issues which are not actually part of Vajrayāna at all.

Since you are a former Vajrayāna practitioner, whatever that means, you should know perfectly well that one's capacity to experience the results Vajrayāna claims to confer is entirely predicated on how well one maintains one's three vows, pratimokṣa vows, bodhisattva vows as well as samaya vows.

Whoever is disappointed by the Vajrayāna path either has not practiced enough, or has not maintained their vows well enough.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, May 11th, 2014 at 8:52 PM

Title: Re: Tibetan institutional religious violence

Content:

Indrajala said:

As you're aware the fundamental premise of Vajrayāna is that one may attain buddhahood in this very life or failing that within a dozen or so lifetimes, as opposed to many countless lifetimes in other models of Mahāyāna.

Malcolm wrote:

If, and only if, you maintain your samaya.

Indrajala said:

In TB it is generally said that this is indeed possible and that it works like this in real life.

Malcolm wrote:

Some people are capable of maintaining their samaya.

Indrajala said:

There are also tulkus who are believed to have the ability to voluntarily come back to the world (as a human) for our benefit.

Malcolm wrote:

You have linked three things in a rather clumsy attempt at being "critical": Vajrayāna claims of rapidity, one instance where a tulku alleges he was repeatedly gang raped as a young boy, and the general competence of tulkus as enlightened administrators in order to cast doubt on Vajrayāna claims (addressed above).

However, items two and three have no relation to item one.

Aside from the fact that the Mañjuśrīmūlakapa Tantra makes predictions about reincarnations which appear in various countries including Tibet; the tulku system as it presently exists is not part of Vajrayāna theory in anyway. It is not mentioned in the tantras, nor the treatises and is a religious custom which first evolved in Tibet during the 13th century among the Kagyus. It continues solely because Tibetan society demands that it does.

Since there is no precedent for the tulku system in Vajrayāna, the effectiveness of tulkus as administrators, even the question of whether tulkus are actually awakened beings or not, is completely irrelevant to Vajrayāna claims about rapidity of its path.

Since there is no precedent for the tulku system in Vajrayāna, there is no reason to expect that tulkus are awakened beings, and no reason to expect that they would be able affectively manage any sexual abuse of minors in their care in any manner other than conventional ones. I.e., the actions need to be discovered, the perpetrators brought to justice, and so on.

This means that your complaints, apart from the fact that they are malicious gossip, amount to nothing more than a hill of beans.

The net effect of your unsubstantiated rumors and gossip is that some chicken-minded people will hear such things, and they too will then start spreading this gossip to others.

The fact is that there is no evidence at all of wide-spread systematic abuse of children, sexual or otherwise, in Tibetan monasteries in India. To claim otherwise without evidence is simply malicious. Of course, everyone is responsible for their own actions and their own karma. And since as Buddhists we all accept that karma is unerring, those who spread gossip, lies and half-truths can easily understand what kind of suffering they will experience from their own actions, not the least of which is that those who would formally have been inclined to lend them an ear, will not be well disposed to in future.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, May 11th, 2014 at 11:01 AM

Title: Re: Tibetan institutional religious violence

Content:

Indrajala said:

yet boys in monasteries of that same tradition are regularly raped...

Malcolm wrote:

You haven't established this, this is mere hearsay.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, May 11th, 2014 at 7:07 AM

Title: Re: Next generation of Dharma teachers in the West?

Content:

Gwenn Dana said:

And then there are also those who wish to achieve awakening in this life and this body and don't follow Vajrayana.

Malcolm wrote:

If wishes were fishes...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, May 11th, 2014 at 7:05 AM

Title: Re: Tibetan institutional religious violence

Content:

Zhen Li said:

Well, funnily enough, I think it was Schopen who did point out that in fact things like dedication of merit were some of the earliest lay Buddhist practices, based upon inscriptions at stupas. So, I'm pretty sure we're unlikely to lose those types of elements due to archaeology.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, as you may have heard, Jayarava is all fired up to prove that Buddha never existed at all.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, May 11th, 2014 at 6:34 AM

Title: Re: Tibetan institutional religious violence

Content:

Zhen Li said:

...

He did stop him, that's why we practice Buddhism today and not Devadattism.

Adi said:

So many would say but we're still waiting for Ven. Indrajala's answer and explanation of how he regards what he is now calling sacred myths.

Malcolm wrote:

While Schopen et al were quite right to point to a lack in Buddhist studies, i.e. that there was not sufficient attention being paid to archaeology, now the pendulum has swung to far. The idea that the canon record is of no value for understanding the nature of Buddhadharma or even the Buddha is patent nonsense.

Undoubtedly, one day we be reading Jeff going on and on about how rebirth and karma too cannot really be considered Buddha's teachings, blah, blah, blah...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, May 11th, 2014 at 2:11 AM

Title: Re: Tibetan institutional religious violence

Content:

JKhedrup said:

Why wasn't Lord Buddha able to stop Devadatta?

Indrajala said:

That's mythology, not real life today.

Malcolm wrote:

That is not a rebuttal to Khedrup's point.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, May 10th, 2014 at 9:46 PM

Title: Re: Tibetan institutional religious violence

Content:

JKhedrup said:

There is something very disturbing to me about the current climate of Tibet bashing.

Malcolm wrote:

Especially since we never observe China bashing, Japan bashing, etc., on these boards. It's pretty sad, actually. We have the PRC, literally raping Tibet and sterilizing Tibetan women after forcing them to have late term abortions, resettling Tibetan nomads in concrete villages and restricting the number of cattle they can own, fencing off their traditional grazing lands, but no, we don't really hear about this.

What we hear about instead are unfocused accusations against real bodhisattvas like HHDL to the effect that they, like the Catholics, are knowingly complicit in covering up sexual abuse of children in monasteries -- and this goes unremarked and uncorrected by the staff.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, May 10th, 2014 at 9:35 PM

Title: Re: Tibetan institutional religious violence

Content:

Indrajala said:

I said there are samaya commitments in TB that if broken result in hell realms.

Malcolm wrote:

Primarily the one in which you physically harm your guru's body. One is born as Vajra Hell, which is just the Vajrayāna name for Avīci hell.

As Khedrup just pointed out, as for the others, there are many ways of maintaining one's samaya vows, which in any case are meant to assist one's practice. Since taking rebirth in the three lower realms is an eventual surety for all sentient beings who are not on a path, samaya vows are the skillful means we use in Vajrayāna to make sure that we do not become complacent about our paths and practice.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, May 10th, 2014 at 9:31 PM

Title: Re: Tibetan institutional religious violence

Content:

rory said:

...the sad fact that AIDS is rampant in Bhutan.

Malcolm wrote:

AIDS is "rampant in Bhutan"? Reality check:

In 2011, there were 246 reported cases of HIV in Bhutan, representing just over 0.3% of the population.

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/HIV/AIDS\_in\_Bhutan "

onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

Bhutan and Ireland have the same percentage of people infected with AIDS. About three in every 1000 people. So I guess AIDS is "rampant" in Ireland too. The percentage of people infested with AIDS in Bhutan is the same as in all South Asia, 0.3%.

rory said:

So meanwhile all the enlightened lamas the present Dalai Lama, the various enlightened lamas and Rinpoches past and present knew all about it and did nothing.

Malcolm wrote:

Are you quite sure? Or do you just enjoy engaging in the baseless slander of bodhisattvas?

rory said:

...if you don't believe in the entire mythos of 'enlightened' masters you as a TB practitioner go to Avici hell.

Malcolm wrote:

There is no such teaching.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, May 10th, 2014 at 3:30 AM

Title: Re: "The Secret Lamp of Wisdom"

Content:

Bhusuku said:

In the "Supreme Source" it is mentioned that one of the early sources for the 4 yogas of Semde is a tantra called "The Secret Lamp of Wisdom" ( ye shes gsang ba sgron ma rin po che man ngag gi rgyud ).

Malcolm wrote:

Which ironically is one of the root tantras of "klong sde".

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, May 10th, 2014 at 3:29 AM

Title: Re: Next generation of Dharma teachers in the West?

Content:

Gwenn Dana said:

Nobody wants to take Vajrayana away. But not everybody wants to accept Vajrayana's "truths".

Malcolm wrote:

Vajrayāna is a specific path, with a specific method. If you want to follow that path, you are free to. If you don't want to follow that path, you are free not to. But it is useful to know what a path entails prior to embarking upon it, no?

Those who wish to achieve awakening in this life and this body follow Vajrayāna, the rest may do as they please.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, May 10th, 2014 at 3:23 AM

Title: Re: Tibetan institutional religious violence

Content:

conebeckham said:

Could you explain number 8?

I've got to think number 9 would be hard to prove.....everyone? Really?

Malcolm wrote:

8 means the harmer shows up in person, i.e. you can't go chasing after such beings or person, they have to be coming at you.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, May 10th, 2014 at 1:50 AM

Title: Re: Tibetan institutional religious violence

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Indeed. In order to engage in abhicarya rites there must be two things: the limitless compassion of the practitioner, and the object of the rite must satisfy ten criteria which render them so evil that the only way they can experience liberation without going straight to hell for harming the Dharma is to be subject to a rite of liberation.

Sherab Dorje said:

Is there a source (in English) that outlines the ten criteria? Thanks!

Malcolm wrote:

zhing bcu - ten defects or the ten objects are:

- 1) The enemy of the Three Jewels
- 2) the enemy of the master
- 3) The samaya violator
- 4) the perverted one
- 6) the hostile one
- 7) The samaya enemy with a wicked character
- 8) The one arriving to the congregation
- 9) the harmer of everyone
- 10) the three lower realms

In order to be considered a candidate Vajrayāna extreme rendition, the person or being must satisfy all ten criteria, otherwise the act is nothing more than common act of killing that will send the doer to lower realms.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, May 10th, 2014 at 12:44 AM

Title: Re: Tibetan institutional religious violence

Content:

Andrew108 said:

One of my teachers has been very keen on building a democratic community. His teacher before him built an unusual community in Tibet in that it was open and democratic.

Malcolm wrote:

Chang Chub Dorje did not build a community, one sprang up around him.

Andrew108 said:

One wonders why there were not more of these types of communities in Tibet? What was stopping the enlightened masters from implementing this kind of change / social justice?

Malcolm wrote:

There were plenty of such communities in Tibet, gathered around realized masters.

We should not, however, fall into the trap of assuming that institutions are by their very nature corrupt. There were of course many excellent monasteries in Tibet prior to 1959 and while I am sure humans in them have all the human faults and problems, there was also a great deal of good that came out of the Tibetan monastic system, just in case anyone has forgotten this.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, May 10th, 2014 at 12:01 AM

Title: Re: Next generation of Dharma teachers in the West?

Content:

theanarchist said:

Devotion and pure perception should come from a deep respect for the qualities of that teacher and gratitude for what he or she gives you.

Malcolm wrote:

That is really not how it is taught in the tantras if by pure perception this allows you to view your guru acts as anything other than buddha activities.

Of course, this is a practice. It is not perfected in a day.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 9th, 2014 at 11:01 PM

Title: Re: I thought Buddhism wasn't about threatening people with

Content:

The Way said:

Regarding the video in the OP, I believe it was created by Wat Dhammakaya, a group that should not in any way be considered mainline "Theravada". Many Theravadin practitioners over on Dhamma Wheel have compared it to Scientology or even outright labelled it as a cult. Having the conviction that your actions have consequences is far, far different than threatening people with a version of Hell that looks like a Sims expansion pack.

Also shoot, I apologize for resurrecting such an old topic. That's google search for ya.

Mort432 said:

Also gonna gravedig here a little bit, and possibly be a little off topic, but I spoke with my Shingon teacher (who is an ordained lama) and he said that the concept of hell/the narakas in Buddhism is completely false, at least within Shingon.

Malcolm wrote:

The Buddha definitely taught the hell realms. You can read about them in the Sutta Nipatta, etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 9th, 2014 at 10:56 PM

Title: Re: Tibetan institutional religious violence

Content:

rory said:

But try and say that about Tibet! Denial denial and denial....it's very sad.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, since there were no soldier monks in Tibet, denying their existence is similar to denying hair on a tortoise, i.e. it's true there were never soldier monks in Tibet.

rory said:

Tibet was a feudal state...

Malcolm wrote:

No, it wasn't. It was something else entirely different.

rory said:

and after 1 dharma debate withdrew from Chinese intellectual currents unlike the Koreans, Vietnamese Japanese, etc who participated in cross-cultural exchange and development.

Malcolm wrote:

To begin with the debate was not between Tibetan and Chinese protagonists; it was between Indians and Chinese protagonists, sponsored by the Tibetan king, in imitation of similar debates in India. The debate actually occurred over three years, via letters, though people often imagine that it was a one-off smack down with Kamalashila emerging the proclaimed victor. In reality, the account of the debate which later Tibetans inherited was penned by a scion of the Ba clan, who were part of the anti-Chinese faction within the Tibetan aristocracy.

However the debate turned out, and there is no real clear answer to this question, the Tibetans decided that Chinese Buddhism did not represent the latest developments and currents of Indian Buddhism, and so after about 50 years of experience with Chinese Buddhism decided to devote their attentions to the Buddhism being taught at the great universities in India, Nalanda, Somanatha, Vikramashila and so on instead. In other words, they did a perfectly understandable thing: they decided that the Buddhism they found in India was more authentic than the Buddhism they were being introduced to by the Chinese monastics stationed in Lhasa. It is unlikely that the best and the brightest were sent to Lhasa, since the Chinese considered Tibet a barbarian backwater.

Moreover, the Tibetans were attracted to the ritualism of Yoga tantra (there was no anuttarayoga appellation at this time), and they had a shrine built at Samye where the Vajradhātu maṇḍala practice could be regularly performed with a special image of Mahāvairocana crafted for that purpose. It still exists at Samye. The influence of the practice Sarvatathāgatatattva samgraha tantra pervades all of Tibetan Buddhism right down to this day.

Part of the lack of interest of Tibetans with currents in Chinese Buddhism also can be attributed to the fact that Chinese Buddhism was largely destroyed during the reign of the Taoist emperor, Wuzong in 845. As a result of the economic decline of Asia from 845 onward, and due to the chaos of the Five Dynasties period, there really was no Buddhism in China for that could interest Tibetans for the simple reason that Chinese Buddhism was institutionally destroyed by its own people.

Therefore, as Tibet society recovered its own economic stability in the mid 10th century, Yeshe Ö (947–1024 or 959 - 1040), the great, great grandson of Langdarma, the last of the Yarlung Kings, initiated a revival of Buddhist transmissions from India by sending a number of young men in Kashmir to learn Sanskrit and translate texts.

So in fact your castigation of Tibetans for not engaging in cultural exchange misses the mark completely. The Tibetans controlled Central Asia during most of the 8th and 9th centuries, and they maintained constant ties with India and Nepal from the late 9th century onwards. The Tibetans above all were great traders. They simply were more interested in what they saw in India than what they saw in China, as with China they had a neighbor with whom they had had constant struggles. The Tibetans never had any wars with any Indian kingdoms at all.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 9th, 2014 at 9:13 PM

Title: Re: Complete Tegal Instruction in Unrestricted New Book

Content:

pensum said:

The Olds aren't the only ones to write a book on togal and make it available, there is also this bizarre shoddy contribution: <https://www.amazon.ca/Vajrasattva-Secret-Wisdoms-Trekcho-Tegal/dp/1491863684/>. Rife with typos and grammatically bizarre phrasing, and not to be trusted in the least. Here's a sample copied exactly as it appears in the Amazon preview:

Rgyun-gyi ting-nge-'dzin, the same state in Tibetan definition is such. Rgyun-gyi has in depth meaning. Self existing pristine Rigpa. Self arising, self ignited, self originated openness of ecstatic Rigpa. Self, here is not the composite of impermanent elements. It is one's own, without grasping, if anything, own power, own guidance.

Anybody know anything about the apparently illiterate author, Richard Chambers Prescott?

Malcolm wrote:

He definitely has a bone to pick with the Nyingmapas.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 9th, 2014 at 9:07 PM

Title: Re: Tibetan institutional religious violence

Content:

Indrajala said:

Seldom were Buddhist clerics either in China or Japan in positions of significant political authority, which is unlike in Tibet where Lamas in charge had to utilize violence in order to advance the interests of the state.

Malcolm wrote:

If you carefully examine Tibetan history, you will discover rather swiftly that Lamas were rarely in positions of significant political authority either, the 5th and the 13th being notable exceptions.

For example, after the death of the 5th, the affairs of state were conducted by the regent, Desrid Sangyas Gyatso, a lay person his whole life. During most of the 18th century, and most of the 19th, the Dalai Lamas played no significant role in governing Tibet. Even the 7th's government lasted only 6 years, from 1751 to his death in 1757. From 1707 to this period of time, Central Tibet has a variety of regimes and it was a time of intense political instability.

There were five Dalai Lamas between the 7th and the 13th in a space of 120 years.

Furthermore, "Tibet" is a big place. Lhasa never controlled Kham (always ruled by independent kings) and Amdo (ruled by a mixture of Muslim, Mongol and Chinese warlords at various times), lost Ladakh to Kashmir in the 18th century, etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 9th, 2014 at 8:24 PM

Title: Re: Tibetan institutional religious violence

Content:

Indrajala said:

I just take what I want from it and leave the rest (like the swan who separates the cream from the water).

Malcolm wrote:

Or perhaps like a musk hunter who takes the gland and leaves behind the corpse.

theanarchist said:

Swans can't separate cream from water.

Malcolm wrote:

It is a traditional metaphor...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 9th, 2014 at 8:21 PM

Title: Re: A closer look into empowerments

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

There is also a srog gtad, an entrustment rite for worldly protectors.

Konchog1 said:

I can't find anything in English on srog gtad. Can you explain it briefly please? What's the difference between worshipping a protector with and without a srog gtad? Thank you.

Malcolm wrote:

Wisdom protectors, for example, Mahakala, generally speaking have everything from full empowerments down to permissions.

A srog gtad on the other hand represents making a contract with a worldly protector to perform services for you in exchange for offerings. It is a deal, basically. It is a practice that does not come from Indian tantras.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 9th, 2014 at 8:19 PM

Title: Re: A closer look into empowerments

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

There is what is called a gtor dbang in Nyingma, where the torma is blessed as the basis of the empowerment, not a mandala.

dakini_boi said:

Could you say more about the Tor Wang, Malcolm? What is the significance of using a torma instead of a mandala?

Malcolm wrote:

The way it is presented in the Sakya tradition of Vajrakilaya, the torwang comes from the empowerment of the lower activities. Usually, the torma empowerment includes the body, speech, mind, qualities and activities of a the deity.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 9th, 2014 at 8:16 PM

Title: Re: Tibetan institutional religious violence

Content:

Indrajala said:

I just take what I want from it and leave the rest (like the swan who separates the cream from the water).

Malcolm wrote:

Or perhaps like a musk hunter who takes the gland and leaves behind the corpse.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 9th, 2014 at 7:53 PM

Title: Re: Tibetan institutional religious violence

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

This is well known. Magical battles between Buddhists and Bonpos continued until at least the 12th century.

Indrajala said:

So, the four immeasurables are to be taught while simultaneously engaging in magical battles to kill opponents? Is there no contradiction here? Where are the enlightened qualities?

Malcolm wrote:

Indeed. In order to engage in abhicarya rites there must be two things: the limitless compassion of the practitioner, and the object of the rite must satisfy ten criteria which render them so evil that the only way they can experience liberation without going straight to hell for harming the Dharma is to be subject to a rite of liberation.

Indrajala said:

Yes, some Tibetans indeed practiced animal sacrifice, how widespread this practice was is subject to much debate because quite frankly, we really know very little about Tibetan religion prior to the seventh century.

According to the cited Chinese source, they did it every year and three years as a way of renewing their oaths.

That sounds rather widespread and common.

Malcolm wrote:

It sounds vague and almost completely uninformative. What is the context? what is the rite? Under what circumstances? In any case, this is pre-Buddhist religion we are talking about. That was largely stamped out and driven into the border lands by the later Yarlung Kings.

Indrajala said:

The Tang histories also display almost no Buddhist sympathies.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, they weren't really written by people who were on the scene, were they?

Indrajala said:

So, what kind of Buddhism existed in the Yarlung period?

Malcolm wrote:

State Buddhism centered around Samye and Lhasa.

Indrajala said:

Magical battles resulting in people being killed and court officials taking oaths with animal sacrifices?

Malcolm wrote:

As explained above, any abhicarya rites Padmasambhava engaged in were engaged in with the criteria listed above. The practice of animal sacrifice was ended during the reign of Trisrong Detsen.

Indrajala said:

Without the strong sponsorship of the Yarlung kings, this would have never happened. A lot of Yarlung kings were opportunistic warlords (the same can be said about early Chinese Tang emperors like Taizong especially too, but nobody calls him a Dharma King as far as I know).

Malcolm wrote:

Not all of the Yarlung Kings are counted as Dharmarājas, only Srongtsan Gampo, who built the original Potala; Trisong Detsan, who definitely invited Shantarakshita and Padmasambhava, and who may have patronized Chan (<http://earlytibet.com/2007/11/13/tibetan-cha-i-the-emperors-cha/> "onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;" onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;"), and Ralapacan, who oversaw one of the world's great translations projects.

Indrajala said:

The opinion of some major scholars is that Buddhism offered an attractive model for social cohesion and in turn state consolidation...

So, while there were some devout Buddhists, Buddhism was utilized by the state for less benevolent purposes.

Malcolm wrote:

What can be more benevolent than social cohesion and undermining the old Bon families with allegiance to Zhang Zhung?

Indrajala said:

In light of that, why speak of Dharma Kings in the Yarlung period, or have images of them to be venerated?

Malcolm wrote:

Because the three Dharmarājas of Tibet were responsible for the importation of Dharma to Tibet, whatever their personal reasons may have been, honest or sinister, however they may be. Moreover, the later narratives about the three Dharmarājas provided generations of Tibetans a national identity based on the importation of Buddhism into their culture and grounded the Tibetan people in a Buddhist identity in a way that few other peoples in history have been so affected by Buddhism.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 9th, 2014 at 5:51 AM

Title: Re: Tibetan institutional religious violence

Content:

Lotus_Bitch said:

Instead of focusing exclusively on "institutional religious violence": why not divulge on [inter-sectarian] political intrigue?

Malcolm wrote:

Well first, we haven't really established that there was institutional religious violence in Tibet. The thread of the title is very misleading, created by one of the mods.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 9th, 2014 at 4:30 AM

Title: Re: Tibetan institutional religious violence

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

As already pointed out: the citation you provided was sensationalized by use of the term "death squad". It was provided from a work by an academic with no expertise in Tibetan history apart from an ability to read English. It was provided with barely any context at all in Sperling's paper which I provided, from where it was derived by your former source.

mañjughoṣamaṇi said:

Sperling's specialty is the history of Tibetan-Chinese relations and he relies on Chinese and Tibetan documents. He offers courses in Tibetan and the use of Chinese as a research tool for Tibetan studies at Indiana University. He can read more than English, even if the piece in question was was sensationalist. This is of course a point aside from Jeff engaging in the denigration of Tibetans again, downplaying the grotesque violence of Chinese regimes, and the destabilizing effects of Qing intrigues in Mongol and Tibetan lands.

Malcolm wrote:

Todd, I wasn't talking about Sperling, I was talking about Johan Elverskog, whose expertise is Mongolian, not Tibetan.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 9th, 2014 at 4:29 AM

Title: Re: Tibetan institutional religious violence

Content:

Indrajala said:

Let's look at early Tibetan history then.

According to Tāranātha (1575-1634) in his biography of Padmasambhava, Padmasambhava himself used his magic to kill an opponent of Buddhism. Whether it really happened like this or not is unclear, but it would suggest violent hostility between proponents of and opponents to Buddhism in this period.

Malcolm wrote:

This is well known. Magical battles between Buddhists and Bonpos continued until at least the 12th century.

Indrajala said:

The Tun-Huang Chronicles state the following:

...the paternal subjects rebelled; the maternal subjects revolved. ... The father gNam ri was given poison and died. The son Srong btsan firstly wiped out the families of the rebels and the prisoners.

Meanwhile Butön Rinchen Drup (Wyl. bu ston rin chen grub) (1290-1364) relates the following:

...Thirteen years of age he ascended the throne and brought under his power all the petty chiefs of the borderland who offered him presents and sent their messages (of submission).

Malcolm wrote:

These two accounts are not necessarily in conflict.

Indrajala said:

This suggests to me an intentional reworking of past history to suit contemporary Buddhist interests.

Malcolm wrote:

Sure, this definitely happened, but not for the reasons you seem to imagine.

Indrajala said:

Whereas Songstän Gampo was a violent despot

Malcolm wrote:

This is a bit of an exaggeration.

Indrajala said:

Actually, according to contemporary Tang dynasty reports, the Tibetans practiced animal sacrifice. The Old Book of Tang 舊唐書 has the following:

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, some Tibetans indeed practiced animal sacrifice, how widespread this practice was is subject to much debate because quite frankly, we really know very little about Tibetan religion prior to the seventh century. There is no reason to assume that Srongtsan Gampo was a deeply religious man, when the historical record is examined. However, he is credited with bring the practice of Avalokiteshvara to Tibet and Nyingma sources paint him as an emanation of that Bodhisattva.

Indrajala said:

All this leads to questions about the extent or concern for Buddhism in the Yarlung period.

Malcolm wrote:

There is no doubt about how active Tibetans were in bringing Dharma to Tibet in this period. The vast majority of sūtras were translated in the late imperial period, ending with the death of Ralpachan in 838.

Tibetan accounts paint Trisong Detsen as a king too busy to practice, but nevertheless an interested patron of Dharma.

Ralpacan on the other hand was quite zealous and religious, and like most religious zealots, proved to be a rather incompetent ruler, his downfall hastened by economic discontent due to the very generous relationship he had with monastic establishment. This provoked the backlash amongst the aristocracy that resulted in the assassination of Ralpacan, and the ascension of Langdarma, who tried to tax the monasteries (which resulted in his own assassination).

However, the fact that Tibetans were enthusiastically adopting Buddhism is born out by the fact that by 1000, almost all traces of any organized pre-Buddhist religion in Tibet had completely vanished. Without the strong sponsorship of the Yarlung kings, this would have never happened.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 9th, 2014 at 4:03 AM

Title: Re: Tibetan institutional religious violence

Content:

Adi said:

So far no one has provided any evidence that this is true.

Indrajala said:

I did cite an academic work detailing orders purportedly given by the Fifth Dalai Lama to violently wipe out his opponents.

Malcolm wrote:

As already pointed out: the citation you provided was sensationalized by use of the term "death squad". It was provided from a work by an academic with no expertise in Tibetan history apart from an ability to read English. It was provided with barely any context at all in Sperling's paper which I provided, from where it was derived by your former source.

All we can really glean from the citation, knowing what we know about the war that the King of Tsang thrust upon the 5th when he was a very young man, not that much younger than you, is that during the 1660's there continued to be pockets of unrest by dissenters whom 5th felt that had abandoned their obligation to follow the rule of law, which now squarely rested with his government.

No context at all was given in your original citation. What can we expect to learn from this apart from your desire to downplay religious violence in China and Japan in comparison to secular violence ordered out by a sovereign ruler under the pretext that it contradicted the "the values of Tibetan Institutions". As we know, the values of any Government are to prioritize political stability.

No mention was made by Sperling of the numerous qualms the 5th expressed throughout his career in his autobiography at the unpleasant necessities of his position (one he in fact never sought out and could not in any case relinquish) save one.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 9th, 2014 at 2:19 AM

Title: Re: Next generation of Dharma teachers in the West?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, in Japan they had entire armies of monastics armed to the teeth, who wielded enormous power.

Indrajala said:

Actually it is unclear exactly how many of them were ordained as monks in either the Tendai bodhisattva-renunciate model or otherwise. So while they were nominally called monks, it is unclear how many through the centuries were ordained as such.

Malcolm wrote:

Considering your views on ordination, this hardly seems like a major objection to my point.

Indrajala said:

Also given the proportion of sōhei to the greater monastic population, they would have been a small minority all things considered. Aside from a few major battles, most sōhei it seems got involved in petty skirmishes and burned down monasteries or shrines. Not morally justifiable perhaps, but they never ran the country.

Malcolm wrote:

My point of course is that these were violent religious militants of a kind completely unknown in Tibet.

While wars in Tibet often broke down along sect lines, they were never carried out by religious people, though religious people were frequently victims of violence that generally occurred along sectarian lines. Generally speaking, in Tibet when some aristocratic family decided to go to war with another one, the monasteries they patronized would suffer if they lost, for example, the Karma Kagyu, Jonangpas and Sakyapas suffered when Karma Tenkyong lost to the Ganden Phodrang. Since Karma Tenkyong was actually the aggressor in the war for the control of Tsang (following in his father's footsteps) in the mid 17th century, the actions of the Ganden Phodrang must be considered in that light. Plus, the 5th Dalai Lama was quite young, a man of a mere 25 years when Gushri Khan executed Karma Tenkyong (1642).

In fact the 5th was the first real religious ruler of Tibet. While Chogyal Phagpa was nominally the ruler of Tibet, he spent little time in Tibet, mostly being in Beijing with Kublai Khan.

So it is simply wrong to characterize the wars in Tibet as being wars brought by one religious establishment against another. In general, wars in Tibet were fought by aristocratic clans by soldiers and never monks.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 9th, 2014 at 1:35 AM

Title: Re: Next generation of Dharma teachers in the West?

Content:

jiashengrox said:

There is no explicit instruction or mention in both treatises that the master has to be enlightened.

Malcolm wrote:

No, merely in the latter that one must regard one's guru as a Buddha.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 8th, 2014 at 11:19 PM

Title: Re: H.E. Beru Khyentse Rinpoche

Content:

Gyaltzen Tashi said:

Dear all,

I am thinking of attending this Dharma event with tsog and two empowerments over two days:

<http://www.khyenkong-tharjay.org/EventMay2014> "

onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;" onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;" onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

Upcoming Programme for 2014

Friday 9th May 2014

to

Sunday 11th May 2014

Guru Rinpoche Tsog Bum (with Guru Rinpoche empowerment) & Kurukulle Grand Puja (with Kurukulle empowerment)

Venue:

Ngee Ann Auditorium

Teochew Building

97 Tank Road

Singapore 238066

Bus Service(s): 123

Nearest MRT: Dhoby Ghaut

However, I am not familiar with H.E. Beru Khyentse Rinpoche. I only know he is recognised as the 16th Karmapa, which I take as the minimum standard when considering to take empowerments.

Here is his wikipedia page:

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Second\_Beru\_Khyentse " onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;" onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;" onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

Please advise me today as the event starts tomorrow.

Regards,
Gyaltzen Tashi

Malcolm wrote:

The Guru Rinpoche empowerment will be from Konchog Chidu, I am almost certain.
Kurukulla probably from Chogyur Lingpa's collection of termas.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 8th, 2014 at 11:06 PM

Title: Re: Next generation of Dharma teachers in the West?

Content:

Indrajala said:

Compared to Tibetan Buddhism, in my estimation at least, you see less religious violence in other forms of Mahāyāna, such as in China and Japan. ... Admittedly, there were warrior monks in Japan (most notably in Tendai perhaps) who would torch the monasteries of rival sects, though these were small scale skirmishes.

kirtu said:

Tendai was nearly wiped out as a result of this. And Soto Zen struck out for the hills and mountains. Literally.

Kirt

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, in Japan they had entire armies of monastics armed to the teeth, who wielded enormous power.

The phenomena of militarized clergy never existed in Tibet, even with the existence of monastic police (Dob dobs, restricted to Lhasa and mainly active during the Monlam Chenmo).

When there were conflicts between Sakya and Drikung, in general, in the case of Drikungpas, they had patrons among Mongols, and so they used Mongol troops to sack the main monastery at Sakya. The Sakyas, if I understand correctly, used local soldiers when they retaliated.

The Ganden Phodrang under the 5th had a standing army. However, by the nineteenth century and 200 hundred years of being finlandized by the Qing, Lhasa had no real army to speak of. For this reason the 13th tried to create a modern army to repel the invasion that he knew was coming from China.

The fact is all the hostilities in Central Tibet were provoked by the King of Tibet, Karma Tenkyong. Karma Tenkyong allied himself with the Bonpo King of Beri, Donyo Dorje. A letter was intercepted by the Gelugpas indicating a conspiracy between Karma Tenkyong and Donyo Dorje, etc. This Wiki page is based on reliable books:

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Karma\_Tenkyong " onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;"

This page is a little less well written but also has useful information which outlines the war for control of Tibet between the Tsang Dynasty and the Ganden Phodrang.

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/5th\_Dalai\_Lama " onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;"

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 8th, 2014 at 10:37 PM

Title: Re: Next generation of Dharma teachers in the West?

Content:

theanarchist said:

That's based on the fact that unless you develop pure perception you will not obtain anything. That does not mean that you become an undiscerning, idolizing groupie of a guru rock star and are then rewarded with siddhis for this self brainwashing.

Malcolm wrote:

I see, so it is only so long as the Guru conforms to your expectations that you are to have a pure perception of that teacher. Right?

If Naropa or Mila had that attitude they would have never developed siddhis.

jiashengrox said:

And that is why it has been explicitly qualified in, say Maitreya's Ornament of Mahayana Sutras, or Fifty Verses (for tantric master).

Malcolm wrote:

Huh? Qualified how? What do you mean? When Naropa meant Tilopa, Tilopa was cooking fish alive.

Of course the Gurupañcāśikā states:
The intelligent disciple does not take as a guru
one who has these faults:
resentment,
arrogance, desire and lack of restraint.

So how are we to understand Naropa's decision to rely on Tilopa despite this advice from the Gurupañcāśikā?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 8th, 2014 at 10:06 PM

Title: Re: Next generation of Dharma teachers in the West?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

2. There is a slight logical loophole. Not criticizing one's guru doesn't imply viewing the guru as the buddha.

Nevertheless:

The Vajramāla Tantra states:

Whoever thinks there is difference between the guru and Vajrasattva,
he or she will not obtain the signs
of gathering siddhis.

theanarchist said:

That's based on the fact that unless you develop pure perception you will not obtain anything. That does not mean that you become an undiscerning, idolizing groupie of a guru rock star and are then rewarded with siddhis for this self brainwashing.

Malcolm wrote:

I see, so it is only so long as the Guru conforms to your expectations that you are to have a pure perception of that teacher. Right?

If Naropa or Mila had that attitude they would have never developed siddhis.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 8th, 2014 at 9:56 PM

Title: Re: Next generation of Dharma teachers in the West?

Content:

Gwenn Dana said:

If you snuck this page into the Old Testament probably nobody would notice.

Malcolm wrote:

It is standard Indian hyperbole which basically means "it is really, really, really, really, really, really important to your path not to criticize your Guru."

jiashengrox said:

Two things:

1. The context of the verses from the Fifty Verses of Guru Devotion is based on the assumption of a qualified spiritual teacher.

Malcolm wrote:

Agreed.

jiashengrox said:

2. There is a slight logical loophole. Not criticizing one's guru doesn't imply viewing the guru as the buddha.

Malcolm wrote:

Nevertheless:

The Vajramāla Tantra states:

Whoever thinks there is difference between
the guru and Vajrasattva,
he or she will not obtain the signs
of gathering siddhis.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 8th, 2014 at 9:40 PM

Title: Re: Next generation of Dharma teachers in the West?

Content:

Gwenn Dana said:

If you snuck this page into the Old Testament probably nobody would notice.

Malcolm wrote:

It is standard Indian hyperbole which basically means "it is really, really, really, really, really, really important to your path not to criticize your Guru."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 8th, 2014 at 9:04 PM

Title: Re: Next generation of Dharma teachers in the West?

Content:

smcj said:

The guru-yoga teachings do not allow for criticism..

theanarchist said:

That's complete nonsense and a misunderstanding of vajrayana pure perception/devotion

Malcolm wrote:

The Gurupañcāśik ā states:

If one criticizes the master, that great confusion will cause death because of epidemics, harms, spirits, contagious disease, poison.
Having been slain by a king, fire, poison snakes, water, dākinis, thieves,
spirits and misguiders,
sentient beings will go to hell.

And:

The master's mind
must never be disturbed.
If one becomes confused,
one will surely roast in hell.
Whatever fearful hells are shown such as Avīci and so on, those who criticize the master are correct explained as being located there.

The Kṛṣṇayamāripaṅjikā states:

Hearing even a single verse
if one does not hold that person as a guru, after being born one hundred times as a dog,
one will be born as a butcher.

So, it is pretty clear that Indian ideal of guru yoga is to hold the guru as being above all reproach.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 8th, 2014 at 9:00 PM

Title: Re: Next generation of Dharma teachers in the West?

Content:

Indrajala said:

Compared to Tibetan Buddhism, in my estimation at least, you see less religious violence in other forms of Mahāyāna, such as in China and Japan.

Malcolm wrote:

Seriously? What about Sōhei? This sort of thing never existed in Tibet.

Indrajala said:

East Asian Mahāyāna actually has a better track record historically than Tibetan Buddhism.

Malcolm wrote:

Not really.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 8th, 2014 at 8:54 PM

Title: Re: Next generation of Dharma teachers in the West?

Content:

jiashengrox said:

How would you look at the rise and fall of, say the Sakya empire, from the start of Sapan and Chogyal Phagpa being the preceptor for the Mongol emperors, till the decline of Sakya empire and the rise of the Phagmodrukpa Dynasty?

Malcolm wrote:

Well, Sapan died in a foreign country and Phagpa was murdered at 44. The Sakya hegemony was not run by nice people, from what I understand. It was not governed by men of the caliber of Sapan and Phagpa.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 8th, 2014 at 8:49 PM

Title: Re: Next generation of Dharma teachers in the West?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Which atrocities, by whom?

kirtu said:

The Sakya Drikung War

Malcolm wrote:

And what "atrocities" were committed by either side during this conflict? Names and events please, not vague accusations of blame.

kirtu said:

the destruction of some monasteries mostly during the time of the 5th Dalai Lama, the war between the Karma Kagyu and the Gelug.

Malcolm wrote:

Which monasteries, you mean like Taranatha's monastery which had a full compliment of Jonang monks practicing Jonang lineages?

kirtu said:

These events are well documented.

Malcolm wrote:

Not so well as you seem to believe.

kirtu said:

If the 5th Dalai Lama wrote an edict ordering violence against people (as Indrajala posted) then that is a serious problem.

Malcolm wrote:

Or, if the Fifth is your guru, it is bodhisattva activity.

In any case, if you read the Sperling paper, you can see that the 5th attempted peaceful means before sending in his soldiers to quell a rebellion in Tsang.

What is left out of the Sperling piece is that the 5th was very conflicted about the secular actions demanded of him as a secular ruler. His qualms are spread through his 4 volume autobiography. As a ruler, he had to make recourse to the stick. It's what rulers must do. He however did not seek power, he was installed as a young boy and was at the mercy of his ministers and inherited a political world that was not of his making, though he left an indelible mark.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 8th, 2014 at 9:24 AM

Title: Re: Complete Tegal Instruction in Unrestricted New Book

Content:

smcj said:

Plus their famous natural spring hot tubs on the cliff above the sea. They are beautiful at night.

Malcolm wrote:

Clothing optional.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 8th, 2014 at 7:08 AM

Title: Re: H.H. Sakya Trizin in Canada May 2014

Content:

conebeckham said:

TBRC.....

this is from the Sakya KaBum...

http://tbrc.org/link?RID=O8LS4784%7CO8LS47848LS5280\$W00EGS1017151 " onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;" onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;" onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

And this is from Khyentse Wangpo

http://tbrc.org/link?RID=O00AG016%7CO00AG0161GS37000\$W21807 " onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;" onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;" onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

Not sure which one is more in use.....Malcolm can likely answer that.

Malcolm wrote:

The first is the long sadhana.

The latter is an instruction, not a sadhana.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 8th, 2014 at 6:27 AM

Title: Re: Next generation of Dharma teachers in the West?

Content:

kirtu said:

Come on - the atrocities that the Tibetan institutions committed are well documented.

Malcolm wrote:

Which atrocities, by whom?

pensum said:

Here are a few:

"Judicial mutilation - principally the gouging out of eyes, and the cutting off of hands or feet - was formalized under the Sakya school as part of the 13th century Tibetan legal code, "

Heinrich Harrer: "in the days of the fifth Dalai Lama (in the eighteenth century), and even under the thirteenth (1900- 33), Tibetans still had their hands and feet chopped off."

"Whipping was legal and common as punishment in Tibet including in the 20th century, also for minor infractions and outside judicial process. Whipping could also have fatal consequences, as in the case of the trader Gyebo Sherpa subjected to the severe corca whipping for selling cigarettes. He died from his wounds 2 days later in the Potala prison. Tashi Tsering, a self-described critic of traditional Tibetan society, records being whipped as a 13 year old for missing a performance as a dancer in the Dalai Lama's dance troop in 1942, until the skin split and the pain became excruciating."

from

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Serfdom\_in\_Tibet\_controversy#Human\_rights\_in\_Tibet

Malcolm wrote:

"Whipping was common....", really, says who? A Wiki page?

"Judicial mutilation - principally the gouging out of eyes, and the cutting off of hands or feet - was formalized under the Sakya school as part of the 13th century Tibetan legal code, "

This an unattributed claim.

There were a total of five executions carried out by the Tibetan government in the 19th century.

Capital punishment was really quite rare in old Tibet, and not the frequent occurrence it is today under Communist rule.

Most of this page is bullshit Chinese propaganda. Everything composed by Grunfeld for example, is sheer crap fed to him by his Chinese handlers.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 8th, 2014 at 5:39 AM

Title: Re: Complete Tegal Instruction in Unrestricted New Book

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

BTW, it looks like Lama Drimed is teaching at Esalen in September:

<http://www.esalen.org/workshop/week-september-14-21/lotus-borne-perception-awareness-teachings-tibetan-buddhism-and>

theanarchist said:

At a minimum of 900 dollars for one week

Malcolm wrote:

$900.00 – $4,975.00 (based on accommodation type)

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 8th, 2014 at 5:24 AM

Title: Re: Next generation of Dharma teachers in the West?

Content:

kirtu said:

Come on - the atrocities that the Tibetan institutions committed are well documented.

Malcolm wrote:

Which atrocities, by whom?

kirtu said:

Indrajala has made a devastating point.

Malcolm wrote:

No, he hasn't. He quoted a sensationalized citation from a paper written by Eliot Sperling.

http://info-

buddhism.com/Orientalism\_Violence\_Tibetan\_Buddhism\_Elliot\_Sperling.html "
onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

kirtu said:

The term "death squad" is a little extreme.

Malcolm wrote:

Unfortunately it's not.

Yes, it is. It's ridiculous.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 8th, 2014 at 3:13 AM

Title: Re: H.H. Sakya Trizin in Canada May 2014

Content:

DechenNamdrol said:

FYI, I was told today that they didn't manage to have the Chakrasamvara sadhana translated in time for this weekend, so they will not be supplying a sadhana to practice with.

Malcolm wrote:

The Luipa tradition is the most complex.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 8th, 2014 at 1:42 AM

Title: Re: Next generation of Dharma teachers in the West?

Content:

Indrajala said:

If we go back to India, violence was employed in an unapologetic fashion in the late period against Brahman aggression. You've read Verardi's book, right?

Malcolm wrote:
I did not finish it.

Indrajala said:
If there were realized bodhisattvas at the helm in Tibet before the invasion, why didn't they foresee and prevent the invasion?

Malcolm wrote:
Many Lamas did for see the invasion and tried hard to prevent it — some, like the 16th Karmapa left well in advance of it on purpose. In fact, your lack of familiarity with the Tibetan anxiety over being invaded, first by Kuomintang forces, and then by the Communists is a little surprising because it is well documented.

Indrajala said:
Moreover, why were so many serfs mistreated by their Lama overlords?

Malcolm wrote:
According to whom? Were there serfs in Tibet? I don't think so. Not by the definition normally imagined when people use the term. You need to read Authenticating Tibet: Answers to China's 100 Questions

Indrajala said:
The conditions of many common indentured servants in Tibet before the invasion is well documented. This is why so many of them joined the Communists to destroy monasteries.

Malcolm wrote:
By whom? How many is "so many"?

Indrajala said:
Whose claims are you referring to?
Well you've claimed lineage founders were realized. In Tibetan Buddhism it is hoped that at least some of the contemporary leadership is realized.

Malcolm wrote:
I didn't claim that. I pointed out that all of these masters that I listed were considered to be highly realized in their respective schools.

Indrajala said:
Papal infallibility didn't work out so well for the Catholics in the end.

Malcolm wrote:

It's completely different. There is no pope. And this is not a rule, it is a practice. One is expected to feel that way, but in widely recognized reality is that it is an aspiration.

It is not the case that everyone is required to recognize HHDL as a buddha since he is not everyone's root guru.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 8th, 2014 at 1:08 AM

Title: Re: Next generation of Dharma teachers in the West?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

In fact, as far as Vajrayāna is concerned, one must believe that one's root guru is an actual Buddha, and that includes all the lineage masters, if one is to gain realization oneself.

dzogchungpa said:

I have no doubt most or all of the texts and teachers say that, and I have a lot of faith in Vajrayana, but honestly I can't see how such a statement could be established.

Malcolm wrote:

As in proven? It cannot be proven. But it is indeed how it is taught in every Vajrayāna tradition in Tibet.

Lower tantra does not contain the practice of Guruyoga, so this is why, Jeff, such teachings are absent in Shingon, etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 8th, 2014 at 12:45 AM

Title: Re: Next generation of Dharma teachers in the West?

Content:

Indrajala said:

]If you look at the history of late Indian Buddhism and Tibetan Buddhism, it is difficult to believe there were many "realized" people in charge for the simple fact that these institutions often clearly turned their backs against their own stated values and aims by engaging in all manner of harmful activities against beings.

Malcolm wrote:

Who, what, when, where?

Indrajala said:

The violence and religious conflict would suggest realized bodhisattvas were not at the helm. The serfs and other violently repressed commoners of Tibet before the PRC invasion also lived under brutal tyrants who often derived their authority from religion.

Malcolm wrote:

Again, who, what, when and where?

Indrajala said:

In the case of Tibetan Buddhism, one can look at the life of the fifth Dalai Lama and compare claims with historical facts

Malcolm wrote:

Whose claims are you referring to?

Nevertheless, if the Fifth Dalai Lama is one of your lineage gurus, you should regard him as a Buddha, and his questionable acts as skillful means to tame beings. That is the Vajrayāna way. This is a difficult point for many people. It is better perhaps not to adopt a king as one's guru.

The term "death squad" is a little extreme.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, May 7th, 2014 at 11:30 PM

Title: Re: A closer look into empowerments

Content:

conebeckham said:

Malcolm-

Are you familiar with nyur dze Yeshe Gonpo nyingshuk? I suppose that's not a true srog gtad, though it's called srog gi rgya can?

It, and many of the Shangpa jenangs, include tor-wangs. Are you saying this is Kongtrul being influenced by Nyingma?

Malcolm wrote:

I would say that Shangpa empowerments in general are heavily colored by Khyungpo Naljor's Nyingma past.

conebeckham said:

Not Kongtrul's, eh?

Malcolm wrote:

No, since Shangpa transmissions exist in other schools than Kagyu. Then there is the fact that they all, for the most part, pass through another Nyingmapa, Thangthon Gyalpo.

Don't get me wrong, I am not dissing Shangpa, it is just that gtor ma empowerments do not exist in the New Tantras at all.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, May 7th, 2014 at 11:27 PM

Title: Re: Next generation of Dharma teachers in the West?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, indeed this seems to be the case. Of course, one assumes that some of these teachers actually did attain realization.

Indrajala said:

It feels reassuring to believe in it, doesn't it?

Malcolm wrote:

It is not a question of reassurance. In fact, as far as Vajrayāna is concerned, one must believe that one's root guru is an actual Buddha, and that includes all the lineage masters, if one is to gain realization oneself.

It is fine to be a skeptic. But that attitude is best left for academics who [for whatever perverse reasons] study "Buddhism" rather than Buddhadharma, people who lack faith in such things as rebirth, karma and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, May 7th, 2014 at 11:21 PM

Title: Re: A closer look into empowerments

Content:

conebeckham said:

Malcolm-

Are you familiar with nyur dze Yeshe Gonpo nyingshuk? I suppose that's not a true srog gtad, though it's called srog gi rgya can?

It, and many of the Shangpa jenangs, include tor-wangs. Are you saying this is Kongtrul being influenced by Nyingma?

Malcolm wrote:

I would say that Shangpa empowerments in general are heavily colored by Khyungpo Naljor's Nyingma past.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, May 7th, 2014 at 8:42 PM

Title: Re: Next generation of Dharma teachers in the West?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

So, when we have some realized westerners, then maybe we will have some western lineages — but until then, I expect not.

Indrajala said:

Plenty of eminent Buddhist teachers become "realized" after they die thanks to their hagiographies.

So we'll just wait for that to happen with some western teachers.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, indeed this seems to be the case. Of course, one assumes that some of these teachers actually did attain realization.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, May 7th, 2014 at 8:26 PM

Title: Re: A closer look into empowerments

Content:

conebeckham said:

Srog gtad are not only for "worldly protectors," I think....perhaps mainly so.

Malcolm wrote:

They are strictly for worldly protectors. There is no need for such entrustments when it comes to wisdom protectors.

conebeckham said:

And Sarma traditions have gtor dbangs as well.

Malcolm wrote:

Actually, gtor dbangs are strictly a Nyingma thing, their presence in Kagyu and Sakya is derived from Nyingma.

No, they are synonyms for the most part. Sometimes you see the term applied to rites for wisdom protectors, but it not perfectly correct.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, May 7th, 2014 at 8:17 PM

Title: Re: Next generation of Dharma teachers in the West?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, they have many retreats to do, many mandalas and rites to learn and so on.

Indrajala said:

The Tibetans created their own lineages and programs to go with them. The west could just as well take much from TB and create their own lineages with different programs, thus having "lineage heads" with different requirements.

Kukai and Shingon likewise did the same thing. They developed their own programs.

Malcolm wrote:

Lineages are not "created", they evolve. In order to have a lineage, one has to have a realized person at the head of that lineage. For example, in Sakya there is Sachen, Sonam Tsemo, Dragpa Gyaltsen, Sapan, and Phagpa as well as Kunga Zangpo and Losal Gyatso for the two main subsects of Sakya, Ngor and Tshar; Marpa, Mila and Gampopa for Kagyu, with various realized masters sitting at the eight of the subsects of Kagyu; for Nyingma there are tertons or tulku lines who sit at the head of each lineage; For Gelugpa, there is Tsongkhapa, etc.

So, when we have some realized westerners, then maybe we will have some western lineages — but until then, I expect not.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, May 7th, 2014 at 8:02 AM

Title: Re: A closer look into empowerments

Content:

conebeckham said:

Srog gtor are not only for "worldly protectors," I think....perhaps mainly so.

Malcolm wrote:

They are strictly for worldly protectors. There is no need for such entrustments when it comes to wisdom protectors.

conebeckham said:

And Sarma traditions have gtor dbangs as well.

Malcolm wrote:

Actually, gtor dbangs are strictly a Nyingma thing, their presence in Kagyu and Sakya is derived from Nyingma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, May 7th, 2014 at 5:55 AM

Title: Re: A closer look into empowerments

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Let us abandon Tibetan for the moment.

There are basically four kinds of initiations:

abhiṣekas [dbang skur, empowerment] = this is your full empowerment, generally takes two days.

adhiṣṭhānas [byin brlabs, blessing] = this a way of conferring the four empowerments in a short hand, called "don dbang" in Nyingma.

anujñāta [rjes gnam, permission] = this is a type of ritual derived from end of an abhiṣeka where various kinds of permissions are granted, such as permission to recite a mantra, visualize oneself as the deity, and understand the deity's wisdom and one's mind are the same. In general, the more strict schools like Sakya consider that properly speaking, one must have received an abhiṣeka before receiving an adhiṣṭhānas or an anujñāta

Then there is a final rite known as a "rig gtad", a kind of rite for entrusting someone with a vidyāmantra from Kriya tantra, i.e. it permits you to recite the mantra.

There is also a srog gtad, an entrustment rite for worldly protectors.

There is what is called a gtor dbang in Nyingma, where the tormas are blessed as the basis of the empowerment, not a mandala.

Also in Dzogchen there is the so called "rig pa'i rtsal dbang", the empowerment of the power of the vidyā, more or less an expansion of the word empowerment. There are a number of other empowerments in Dzogchen as well such as the rgyal ba spyi blugs, and so on, more or less variations on the theme of the rig pa'u rtsal dbang.

There is finally, the empowerment of the descent of the wisdom vajra described in Indrabhūti's Jñānasiddhi, an influential text on Mahāmudrā.

And that's about it, and in all of this there is no pre-recorded video abhiṣeka, etc., at least, not until this century.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, May 7th, 2014 at 3:51 AM

Title: Re: A closer look into empowerments

Content:

Jikan said:

We thought it appropriate that Khenpo's email should basically have the last word.

Malcolm wrote:

In this case it was an evasion, and I can understand why, since the correct answer is actually no, one cannot receive an empowerment from a recording.

Privileging someone's answer because of their title, in absence of any clear scriptural precedent or reasoning is pretty lame.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, May 7th, 2014 at 3:21 AM

Title: Re: A closer look into empowerments

Content:

Adamantine said:

Well the idea was mainly that most of the conceivable opinions about recorded wangs have been expressed in the prior thread, and it gets repetitive and almost like proselytizing for the same people to keep expressing the same opinions over and over. If we can try to avoid that here, it would be ideal. The topic is certainly not banned though. Thanks!

Malcolm wrote:

What we are discussing now is the fact that "answer" (which was a non answer) basically confirms our opinion that there is no validity to the idea that one can receive an empowerment from a recording (but we already knew that...).

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, May 7th, 2014 at 12:22 AM

Title: Re: A closer look into empowerments

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

So he said that no one can say for sure at anytime that another person has received the empowerment.

This amounts to a non-answer. This means that anyone, at any time can declare they have received x empowerment from x guru.

dzogchungpa said:

It might be a non-answer, but it seems to directly contradict what you said here:

<https://www.dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=40&t=16286&p=230684#p230647>

Malcolm wrote:

Were you awake during the activities of the disciple? Did you recite the prayers understanding what they meant and why? Did you try to follow the visualizations sincerely as best you could? If so, then you entered the mandala.

It does not. It is a kind of dissimulation.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 6th, 2014 at 11:13 PM

Title: Re: A closer look into empowerments

Content:

Unknown said:

So he said that no one can say for sure at anytime that another person has received the empowerment.

Malcolm wrote:

This amounts to a non-answer. This means that anyone, at any time can declare they have received x empowerment from x guru.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 6th, 2014 at 11:09 PM

Title: Re: Three Steps Insight Meditation

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

this way of meditating the view is actually derived from the section on the meditating the inseparability of samsara and nirvana, termed "the three points of practice", i.e. mind, illusion and insubstantiality.

Since the view of the inseparability of samsara and nirvana as well as the three points of practice should only be discussed with those who have received the Hevajra cause empowerment etc., and the instruction of the view of the inseparability of samsara and nirvana, I will leave it here.

In other words, if you really want to understand this you should meditate it properly.

kunle said:

totally agree with your last statement - it is a practice instruction.

however, could you elaborate on your previous point?

since the entire nangsum is taught and supposedly practised before one receives Hevajra, i don't see why one has to rely on the explanation on the inseparability of samsara and nirvana. not that it would harm, i'm just trying to understand why you mean one needs to understand this first. cheers.

Malcolm wrote:

The real meditation of these three points in 'khor 'das dbyer med is done on the basis of examples, whereas in snang gsum it is presented on the basis of intellectual analysis. But the format of mind, illusion and insubstantiality is ultimately derived from the Vajra Verses where it says "All phenomena are the appearance of mind itself" and so on.

snang gsum itself is presented on the basis of the outline written for the snang gsum and rgyud gsum which may be found in pod gser ma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 6th, 2014 at 10:09 PM

Title: Re: Three Steps Insight Meditation

Content:

kunle said:

unfortunately there seems to be no extant Sakya commentary on this text. Rongton is said to have authored one, but it was lost.

apart from Dzongsar, no Sakya shedra teaches this text i believe, so i'm not sure how standard sakya this really is.

Malcolm wrote:

@ Kunle: nevertheless, when the view presented in snang gsum and so on — it is clearly stated that first section of meditation on vipaśyāna is in accordance with how ultimate truth is meditated in Yogacara. It is only in the second and third sections on vipaśyāna in snang gsum and so on that freedom from extremes and inexpressibility is meditated.

@ Astus, this way of meditating the view is actually derived from the section on the meditating the inseparability of samsara and nirvana, termed "the three points of practice", i.e. mind, illusion and insubstantiality.

Since the view of the inseparability of samsara and nirvana as well as the three points of practice should only be discussed with those who have received the Hevajra cause empowerment etc., and the instruction of the view of the inseparability of samsara and nirvana, I will leave it here.

In other words, if you really want to understand this you should meditate it properly.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 6th, 2014 at 9:09 PM

Title: Re: Three Steps Insight Meditation

Content:

kirtu said:

Cittamatra is in fact taught as a prelude to Madhyamaka in Sakya.

Astus said:

Do you mean Cittamatra in its limited sense of "all phenomena are only mind"?

Malcolm wrote:

As in Shantaraskita's Yogacara Madhyamaka.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 6th, 2014 at 8:05 PM

Title: Re: Next generation of Dharma teachers in the West?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The ability to give an empowerment is a technical skill more or less acquired in a decade. The ability to be a lineage head however requires a lifetime of training from a young age. It is important to keep this distinction in mind.

dzogchungpa said:

Is that just because a lineage head has to be able to give many different kinds of empowerments or is there something more to it?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, they have many retreats to do, many mandalas and rites to learn and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 6th, 2014 at 6:43 AM

Title: Re: Next generation of Dharma teachers in the West?

Content:

theanarchist said:

My guess is that in the Tibetan tradition the gap between the holy, venerated tulku teachers and the disciples is deliberately kept so big. It's kind of aristocracy by either recognition or family line.

Therefor i's implied that what they have archieved is pretty much unarchievable for any "ordinary folk" followers anyway. People are not exactly encouraged to aspire the same. (that one day you can teach vajrayana it not exactly something you should aspire like becoming a mechanic, but still it's to such an extent unthinkable that people psychologically limit themselves I think)

Malcolm wrote:

The ability to give an empowerment is a technical skill more or less acquired in a decade. The ability to be a lineage head however requires a lifetime of training from a young age. It is important to keep this distinction in mind.

It is very likely that within the next thirty years there will be a plethora of western teachers who can give a limited set of empowerments. It will be a hundred years before there is a genuine western lineage head.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 6th, 2014 at 4:48 AM

Title: Re: Next generation of Dharma teachers in the West?

Content:

conebeckham said:

Tenzin Wangyal Rinpoche is in his early to mid 50's, I believe, as is Dzongsar Khyentse Rinpoche. So....no offense, but these are the current generation. HH Karmapa, Mingyur Rinpoche, are a generation closer.....or younger, IMO.

dzogchungpa said:

Sure, but with respect to the people mentioned in the OP, DJKR and TWR are 1 or even 2 generations behind them. The point is they could easily be teaching for another 20 years.

Sherab Dorje said:

Or they could die tomorrow.

Malcolm wrote:
As could any of us...

Author: Malcolm
Date: Tuesday, May 6th, 2014 at 3:51 AM
Title: Re: Buddhist neglect of academic findings.
Content:
dzogchungpa said:
First, a nonreturner is not necessarily an arhat...

Malcolm wrote:
Is never an arhat...

Author: Malcolm
Date: Tuesday, May 6th, 2014 at 2:37 AM
Title: Re: the so-called "open minds" of the young and old Content:
dzogchungpa said:
That's interesting. Are you saying that for someone like you, Malcolm, who needs meat to be healthy, but is a non-Vajrayana Mahayana practitioner, it is impermissible?

Malcolm wrote:
Yes, according to Mahāyāna vows.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Tuesday, May 6th, 2014 at 1:50 AM
Title: Re: Next generation of Dharma teachers in the West?
Content:
Indrajala said:
I used to have the same ideas as Malcolm in these respects, but I changed my mind when exposed to new models.

Malcolm wrote:
The luxury of youth is the ability to change your mind before anyone actually takes you seriously.

Indrajala said:
lol. You change your mind a lot. On E-sangha you defended meat eating, then one day said it was sinful to eat meat, then not so long ago started defending meat eating yet again.

Malcolm wrote:
I have always said exactly the same thing about meat eating:

From the point of view pratimokṣa vows it is permissible.
From the point of view of Mahāyāna vows it is not permissible.
From the point of view of Vajrayāna samaya, it is permissible.

When I was debating against the general consumption of meat, I was doing so out of personal conviction. Even then I clarified that I exempted the practice of consuming meat in the context of Vajrayāna samaya. I continue to maintain that industrially produced meat (and plantfood) is a bane for the environment to this day, and that it should be avoided. I still do not cook meat in my home.

If there are people who can be vegetarian and be healthy, I applaud them. I cannot. In general, I consume some meat because it is good for me to do so, physically. The two times in my life when I went for extended periods of time without eating meat, my health suffered a great deal, and not because I was not eating correctly. In general as a physician, I see a lot of people who really do need to eat meat and who feel better when they do.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 6th, 2014 at 1:34 AM

Title: Re: Next generation of Dharma teachers in the West?

Content:

Indrajala said:

I used to have the same ideas as Malcolm in these respects, but I changed my mind when exposed to new models.

Malcolm wrote:

The luxury of youth is the ability to change your mind before anyone actually takes you seriously.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 6th, 2014 at 1:14 AM

Title: Re: Next generation of Dharma teachers in the West?

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

For Bon, there is Tenzin Wangyal.

Malcolm wrote:

I meant when he is gone...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 6th, 2014 at 1:06 AM

Title: Re: Next generation of Dharma teachers in the West?

Content:

kalzang said:

I sometimes wonder how Dharma in the West will be affected by the passing of today's famous/popular teachers. What will happen to (the perception of) certain sanghas when their iconic teachers pass away? How will popular support and (serious) attendance be affected? Imagine Plum Village without Thich Nhat Hanh, Sravasti Abbey without Thubten Chodron, Gampo Abbey without Pema Chodron, Rigpa/Lerab Ling without Sogyal Rinpoche etc. Where are the future iconic/charismatic Dharma teachers?

Any thoughts?

Malcolm wrote:

For Nyingma there is Dzongsar Khyentse; Zigar Kongtgrul, Khandro Rinpoche, Anam Thubten, etc. lots of people.

The Sakyapas never produce anyone charismatic...

There is the HH Karmapa, Migyur Rinpoche, etc.

I don't know the Gelug or Bon schools well enough to comment.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 6th, 2014 at 12:59 AM

Title: Re: Next generation of Dharma teachers in the West?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

I know a shitload more about everything than I did when I was 28, especially about myself.

Indrajala said:

I think you're a smart guy who has continually been in learning mode, but that's often exceptional in people. Not all people past fifty know so much or even tried to spend part of their lives studying and trying to figure themselves out.

Malcolm wrote:

It is a quality of my generation notably lacking in those younger than us, from the Reagan youth onward. There is a fifteen year slice from roughly of people born from 1950 to 1965 who were remarkably open-minded, introspective, culturally open, etc. People prior to that and subsequent to that tended to be either more conservative or more nihilistic...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 6th, 2014 at 12:56 AM

Title: Re: Next generation of Dharma teachers in the West?

Content:

Indrajala said:

My generation is a lot more open minded.

Malcolm wrote:

Than who? People my age (51)? I don't think so. And you yourself are not a bastion of open-mindedness, quite the opposite from my perspective.

dzogchungpa said:

Does being a "bastion of open-mindedness" even make sense?

In all fairness to VIJ, it seems to me that he actually is quite open-minded, although perhaps not quite bastion material.

Malcolm wrote:

Have you examined his views on gay marriage lately? How about his view that "inferior" social classes requiring a firm controlling hand...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, May 5th, 2014 at 11:55 PM

Title: Re: Next generation of Dharma teachers in the West?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Jeff wrote on his blog that accompanies this:

My generation is still too young to command much respect or authority.

I can remember bitching about this very fact when I was your age. My opinion was that the only difference between me and some 45 year old guy was that he was 45 and I was 28. Of course, in the intervening years I have come to realize that there is a lot of difference between being 28 and 51, and I am sure that when I am 75, if I make it that long, I will have an even longer lens to view things from. I know a shitload more about everything than I did when I was 28, especially about myself.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, May 5th, 2014 at 11:43 PM

Title: Re: Next generation of Dharma teachers in the West?

Content:

Indrajala said:

My generation is a lot more open minded.

Malcolm wrote:

Than who? People my age (51)? I don't think so. And you yourself are not a bastion of open-mindedness, quite the opposite from my perspective.

Give yourself another 20 years and you will be laughing at your youthful opinions of today, especially when some 28 or 30 year old tells you that his or her generation is more open-minded than yours.

I have live for five decades; what I have learned is that for every decade there are opinions about life that are shared among those people who live in that decade, and that people who have not reached a certain decade generally cannot imagine that the people who have reached that decade have anything worthwhile to say just based on lived experience. But the fact is that the older you get, the more things just stay the same, young people like yourself have been bitching about older people since the dawn of humanity and will continue to do so, and older people will continue to shake their heads in amusement as they watch the younger generations continue to make the same damn mistakes they did.

If you were really a Confucian, you should be seeking to follow the example of some sagacious mentor, you would be attending to your dear parents, and so on. But I see the usual business of young intellectuals like yourself, lots of sturm and drung, tons of opinions, but not much yet in the way of follow through...and how could there be? You have not been an adult for even a decade yet.

It does not mean that you are not bright, or your opinions are not worthwhile, but put them in context...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, May 5th, 2014 at 10:52 PM

Title: Re: Next generation of Dharma teachers in the West?

Content:

Indrajala said:

For example, some people condemn me as being delusional or having some cultural fetish for openly adopting certain East Asian cultural bits while mockingly saying they would never accept me as one of their own. This is a curious generation gap I've noticed. Previous generations disdain the idea of someone white adopting Asian ways, whereas in my generation, at least amongst people I know, it is acceptable..

Malcolm wrote:

Frankly, dude, you have been in an ex-pat bubble for so long, you have no idea how people in Canada will relate to you as a "monk". Further, you discount the fact that the West is becoming more xenophobic, not less so, etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, May 5th, 2014 at 4:26 AM

Title: Re: Validity of recorded empowerments

Content:

Adamantine said:

But in this case --of a live video or recorded video-- there is a physical support, a support of visual and audible phenomenon. So it is different.

Malcolm wrote:

As I have explained, in the case of the former, the mandala is active, the guru is present, the disciples are present. In the case of the latter, the mandala has been dissolved and the rite is already finished, the guru is not present. Case closed.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, May 5th, 2014 at 3:39 AM

Title: Re: Source? getting on the horse just to fall off the other

Content:

mañjughoṣamaṇi said:

Hello,

Throughout the years, in reference to Madhyamika and eternalism/nihilism, I've seen variants of phrase that goes something like the following:

"getting on the horse just to fall off the other side" indicating one's attempts to avoid either of the extremes has left one squarely in the opposite extreme. Does anyone know if there is a canonical source for this expression?

Thanks.

Malcolm wrote:

I think it begins with Gorampa.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, May 5th, 2014 at 3:31 AM

Title: Re: Validity of recorded empowerments

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Jigme Lingpa is hardly an ordinary shmoe, a beginner, trying to gain a proper introduction to Vajrayāna. He was a highly experienced practitioner who had been in retreat for years. He also had a real guru, a human being.

Adamantine said:

I pointed out he was of the highest capacity-- I understand his background, however it is still an example of receiving transmission outside of a concrete physical presence.

Malcolm wrote:

That was an example of a siddha receiving transmission from a Sambhogakāya manifestation. Even the Buddha cannot manifest his sambhogakāya to any ordinary sentient being to give them a single word of teaching, much less an empowerment. In order to even see a Sambhogakāya one must be an eighth stage bodhisattva.

Adamantine said:

I don't think it is irresponsible to give the benefit of the doubt to Garchen Rinpoche-- that this was his intent and what he communicated, and that he may indeed have the capacity to benefit beings in this way.

Malcolm wrote:

Not even Buddha Vajradhara can benefit beings in that way.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, May 5th, 2014 at 2:54 AM

Title: Re: Validity of recorded empowerments

Content:

Adamantine said:

Speaking of highest capacity though, of course we know that Jigme Lingpa received the body speech and mind blessings of Longchenpa in visionary form. So this may be an example of a yogi truly with the highest capacity. He came to see Longchenpa as his true root Guru, even though he never met him in the flesh.

Malcolm wrote:

Jigme Lingpa is hardly an ordinary shmoe, a beginner, trying to gain a proper introduction to Vajrayāna. He was a highly experienced practitioner who had been in retreat for years. He also had a real guru, a human being.

It is really irresponsible to encourage people to think it is even a remote possibility that one could receive an qualified empowerment from a recording.

Of course, in matters of religion people are free to believe whatever fantasies they want...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, May 4th, 2014 at 11:01 PM

Title: Re: Alan Wallace on Dzogchen

Content:

smcj said:

Half an hour into it he mentions that Dudjom Lingpa never had a human teacher.

Malcolm wrote:

This is of course completely false.

Just look on TBRC, you can see that Dudjom Lingpa was a disciple of a very prominent 19th century Gelugpa master , 'jam dbyangs thub bstan nyi ma.

<http://www.tbrc.org/#!rid=P382> " onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;"

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, May 4th, 2014 at 9:30 PM

Title: Re: Tröma Nagmo in Sanskrit?

Content:

plwk said:

<http://www.himalayanart.org/image.cfm/490.html>

No, it is Khrodhakāli, a form of Vajrayogini originally revealed by the Mahāsiddha Virupa and brought to Tibet by Padampa Sangye.

Thanks Malcolm but what you mentioned is also mentioned in the link I gave. So Himalayan Art got the Krishna Krodhini part wrong huh?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, I have never seen that equivalent anywhere. There are a lot of mistakes on Himalayan Art actually.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, May 4th, 2014 at 9:07 PM

Title: Re: Tröma Nagmo in Sanskrit?

Content:

yegyal said:

Wouldn't it be Khrodhikali, as both parts of the name are feminized?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, actually.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, May 4th, 2014 at 8:19 PM

Title: Re: Tröma Nagmo in Sanskrit?

Content:

plwk said:

<http://www.himalayanart.org/image.cfm/490.html>

Malcolm wrote:

No, it is Khrodhakāli, a form of Vajrayogini originally revealed by the Mahāsiddha Virupa and brought to Tibet by Padampa Sangye.

zenman said:

Is Krodhakali a direct translation?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, May 4th, 2014 at 8:04 PM

Title: Re: Tröma Nagmo in Sanskrit?

Content:
plwk said:
<http://www.himalayanart.org/image.cfm/490.html>

Malcolm wrote:
No, it is Khrodhakāli, a form of Vajrayogini originally revealed by the Mahāsiddha Virupa and brought to Tibet by Padampa Sangye.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Saturday, May 3rd, 2014 at 11:59 PM
Title: Re: Receiving Empowerment: Crash Course
Content:

Motova said:
Thanks for the help everyone. So I guess I don't have to memorize this book yet, but I'll still read it and get a good grasp of it. I really prefer it as opposed to the Lam Rim or Words of My Perfect Teacher...

Thanks for the book recommendation Malcolm, I'll definitely order it!

Will this Green Tara initiation allow me to practice the 21 Praises to Tara?

Malcolm wrote:
Yes, absolutely.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Saturday, May 3rd, 2014 at 9:40 PM
Title: Re: What practices can you do publicly?
Content:

Sherlock said:
Sometimes on a nice day, I like to go to a park and sit down and do some practice that doesn't involve much chanting. Is this alright?

What about chod?

Malcolm wrote:
Doing an outer chod is a little strange. But you can of course do chod in a very simple way. However, if you are chanting strange things in a loud voice, even SOV, this is not a good thing as you know.

But going to do semzins like white a and so on, no problem.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Saturday, May 3rd, 2014 at 8:42 PM

Title: Re: Validity of recorded empowerments

Content:

Alfredo said:

Must the tantras be accepted as literally true, in order for tantric Buddhism to make sense?

Malcolm wrote:

In order for the practice presented in Buddhist tantras to make sense, you must accept that one can achieve the result they promise by following the methods they prescribe. If you accept that, then in order to achieve those results, you must follow the methods they prescribe with faith in those methods.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, May 3rd, 2014 at 8:34 PM

Title: Re: Validity of recorded empowerments

Content:

Alfredo said:

Are there no legitimate disagreements, either among the various tantras, or in the case of the same tantra, from one commentary to another?

Malcolm wrote:

Since the procedures for empowerment into HYT mandalas actually depend on yoga tantras such as the Sarvatathāgatatattvasamgraha, there is an unusual degree of conformity in methodology amongst the HYT tantras for how to give an empowerment into an HYT mandala.

We find very little controversy over the procedure for granting empowerments within the Indian texts themselves. Naturally, different empowerments all have their special features, but in general they all follow a fairly standard model.

There is a fair amount of controversy among Tibetans over what constituted a proper maturational rite; the Nyingmapas and Kagyus being on the loose side of things, the Sakyapas being on the strict side of things, Gelugpas somewhere in the middle. If you are interested in these debates, then you need to read Sapan's Clear Differentiation of the Three Codes and the responses to it by various Kagyu and Nyingma authors. You can also read Tsele Natshog Rangdrol book on empowerments, as well as what Kongtrul has to say on the subject.

But even where there is some debate amongst Tibetans over whether "blessings" (sbyin rlabs) as opposed to full empowerments (dbang skur) have the necessary features to properly introduce one into Vajrayāna, there was never any debate at all that one must properly receive some kind of empowerment in person from the guru in order to be considered someone who has received samaya.

And as you know, this would clearly exclude recorded empowerments from consideration.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, May 3rd, 2014 at 7:17 PM

Title: Re: Validity of recorded empowerments

Content:

Alfredo said:

And in those tantras, does the relevant Buddha or tutelary deity typically REVEAL rules which already exist, inherent in the structure of the universe, or ESTABLISH rules according to what would work best for sentient beings, or TRANSMIT rules which he/she received from some other source?

Malcolm wrote:

The source of empowerments are the Buddha Vajradhara's wisdom, set down in words in the tantras. If someone is a person who has faith in Vajrayāna, it is hard to maintain that one has faith in Vajrayāna and yet disbelieves the verity of the basic texts of Vajrayāna.

For example, the Kalacakra tantra contains a chapter which explains empowerments in great detail.

Empowerments themselves are a method, working with causes and results, bases of purification, purifiers and results of purification which are taught in the tantras. Empowerment is a method, and it has certain procedures to ensure it is successful.

Secondly, there are the instructions of Mahāsiddhas like Naropa who have realized the result of the path, and who have written commentaries on empowerments, such as the Sekkhodesha, etc.

Then there are of course commentaries written by learned scholars on these things who nevertheless may not have realization and so on.

At base, the fundamental principle of an empowerment is to reverse samsaric dependent origination.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, May 3rd, 2014 at 7:09 PM

Title: Re: Receiving Empowerment: Crash Course

Content:

Motova said:

So I just finished school a week ago and started full time landscaping for this summer.

So I haven't had much time to prepare for: <http://www.sakyatoronto.com/> "

onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;" onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

Hopefully the tickets aren't sold out when I go to buy them this weekend...

I haven't taken refuge yet, though I am going to try and do it myself before I go. And I emailed the rep for the event, and they said refuge isn't necessary, also someone mentioned something along the same lines on a thread here.

Basically, I have two weeks to prepare myself so I can receive proper empowerment and/or not get kicked out.

I have Three Visions - Fundamental Teachings of the Sakya Lineage of Tibetan Buddhism by Ngorchen Konchog Lhundrug with a Foreword by H.H. Sakya Trizin... My plan is to memorize the outline on page 221 for those who have it and try to read the book twice, as well as become familiar with H.H. Sakya Trizin's biography.

Please post anything that you think might help me with my goal. I'm specifically looking for some resources on how to receive empowerment's properly, as well as any stories about Sakya Trizin that might inspire faith in him and/or the Sakya Lineage. Also, if you have any criticism go crazy. Finally, does anyone know the specific sadhana's H.H. Sakya Trizin will be giving transmission for and if they will be handed out or sold on site?

Malcolm wrote:

The Green Tara practice is quite common. But if you cannot find it there let me know after you have received the initiation. My translation is the one used in the Sakya centers under Lama Migmar.

You should consider purchasing Treasures of the Sakya Lineage, available from Shambhala. My trainings is primarily in Sakya.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, May 3rd, 2014 at 7:06 PM

Title: Re: Receiving Empowerment: Crash Course

Content:

Motova said:

I haven't taken refuge yet, though I am going to try and do it myself before I go. And I emailed the rep for the event, and they said refuge isn't necessary, also someone mentioned something along the same lines on a thread here.

Karma Jinpa said:

I've never heard of being able to take an empowerment without having first gone for refuge.

Malcolm wrote:

Refuge is given at the beginning of every empowerment, so there is no reason to attend a refuge ceremony as a preliminary. Bodhicitta vows are given in every empowerment, so there is no reasons to attend a bodhicitta vow ceremony separately.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, May 3rd, 2014 at 7:03 PM

Title: Re: Validity of recorded empowerments

Content:

heart said:

So, in my opinion I don't think anyone that posted in this thread mean disrespect or insult to Garchen Rinpoche.

Malcolm wrote:

No, not at all.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, May 3rd, 2014 at 6:53 PM

Title: Re: Validity of recorded empowerments

Content:

Alfredo said:

If there are rules governing the validity of Buddhist empowerments, from where do these rules arise?

Malcolm wrote:

The tantras, of course.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, May 3rd, 2014 at 6:47 PM

Title: Re: Validity of recorded empowerments

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

My answer was clarifying that ChNN said he could not confer a full empowerment through the net and why he felt this was so.

JohnJ said:

I apologize for any redundant questions, and questions that are off topic from this thread, but since the teachings of ChNN were brought up again I'd like to make sure my understanding is clear.

By full empowerment, am I correct in understanding that you mean one that includes all 4 empowerments and has the necessary physical supports? Your answer earlier seemed to indicate that for students of the right capacity, direct introduction could suffice for their ripening, and so a full empowerment would not be necessary, while for students of lesser capacity a full empowerment is definitely necessary. Have I understood this correctly, according to the Dzogchen perspective and teachings of ChNN?

Is the central difference between a meaning empowerment and a full physical empowerment, according to ChNN, found in whether or not there are physical supports? If there is greater underlying difference, could you say a few words as to what that difference is? For instance, sometimes ChNN states that for many people a meaning empowerment can be much more important than a traditional empowerment, does this also have to do with one's capacity?

My questions centrally revolve around the meaning of the word 'full' in this explanation of empowerment, since I have never thought the teachings and path presented by ChNN was lacking, or "not full".

Thank you in advance for helping to clarify any misunderstandings that I might have on this issue.

Malcolm wrote:

A full empowerment generally takes two days (though it can all be done in one) and has an elaborate version of the vase empowerment, etc. Empowerments that do not have that are called "blessings" according to the new tantras and "meaning empowerments" according to the system of anuyoga because they do not have the preparation phase and the four empowerments are given symbolically.

The Garland of Pearls Tantra, one of the 17 Dzogchen tantras, maintains that for students of lesser capacity all four empowerments are necessary, while students of higher capacity or experience may require only direct introduction. The sgra thal gyur definitely states that empowerments are a necessary requirement and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, May 3rd, 2014 at 5:59 AM

Title: Re: Validity of recorded empowerments

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

There are no siddhis without empowerment,
just as there is no oil even if sand is pressed.
Whoever proudly explains the tantras and citations
to those without empowerment,
both master and disciple go to hell
as soon as they die even if there are siddhis.
-- Mahāmudratilaka-tantra

Virgo said:

Very scary.

Kevin

Lhasa said:

Yup, and the Catholic church used to teach that if you swallowed your toothpaste on purpose during the three hour fast before receiving communion, and died on the way home, you went straight to hell.

Malcolm wrote:

The point, of course, is that one should not expect to have any positive results from the practice of Vajrayāna if one does not enter Vajrayāna in a proper way.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, May 3rd, 2014 at 4:51 AM

Title: Re: Validity of recorded empowerments

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

face palm buddha 2.jpg

Malcolm wrote:

classic

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, May 3rd, 2014 at 3:19 AM

Title: Re: Validity of recorded empowerments

Content:

T. Chokyi said:

I can't imagine that you don't see this as an opportunity to learn something.i

Malcolm wrote:

One cannot receive an empowerment from a recording of an empowerment. It simply isn't possible. Such a thing resembles the son of a barren women. You can talk about such a boy all you want, you can describe his hair, his abilities, his intelligence, his wit, grace and charm — but in the end, you have to admit you are talking about a fantasy.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, May 3rd, 2014 at 2:46 AM

Title: Re: Validity of recorded empowerments

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The Dalai Lama on the other hand, opined that people watching Kalacakra and participating actively via a webcast could receive the empowerment in that way. But here, this is all taking place within the context of an active mandala.

Karma Jinpa said:

This is interesting to hear. Did His Holiness say this at the most recent Kalachakra in D.C. a few years ago, or was it at some other place/time?

The reason I ask is because I attended a Guhyasamaja wang he gave back in 2010 or 2011 via webcast and he specifically said that those viewing it online had not received the empowerment. Don't remember if his reasoning was the lack of contact with the substances/supports or not, or if he even gave one. Sounds like either the Dalai Lama is changing his mind on webcast wangs, or that Kalachakra is a special case/exception to the rule.

Also worth noting that His Holiness has said on numerous occasions that he gives the Kalachakra empowerment as skillful means to give introductory and fundamental teachings since tons of people will come from far and wide for such a high empowerment but the vast majority of them won't receive it in actuality.

Malcolm wrote:

It might be the number of people attending but I don't know.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, May 3rd, 2014 at 2:38 AM

Title: Re: Mistranslating Gampopa?

Content:

Karma Jinpa said:

Thank you to everyone who's provided alternate translations! These have really helped dispel my confusion on the matter.

Malcolm wrote:

It literally ought to be:

Grant blessings [that] Dharma moves to the path;

Karma Jinpa said:

Malcolm, can you kindly give your gloss/understanding of what "Dharma moves to the path" would mean? Thanks.

This is one of the many reasons why I'm so overjoyed to learn the language: one day I'll be able to read the texts directly and even compare my own understanding to the translations of others.

Malcolm wrote:

One is requesting that the Dharma one has learned becomes a path. Then you are asking for the path to destroy delusion, etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, May 3rd, 2014 at 2:14 AM

Title: Re: Validity of recorded empowerments

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The issue is not whether someone can receive an empowerment through the internet.

Sherab Dorje said:

Actually, this was raised as an issue too. And your answer was basically that people cannot receive full empowerment via the internet, neither through live broadcast nor through a recording.

Malcolm wrote:

My answer was clarifying that ChNN said he could not confer a full empowerment through the net and why he felt this was so. The Dalai Lama on the other hand, opined that people watching Kalacakra and participating actively via a webcast could receive the empowerment in that way. But here, this is all taking place within the context of an active mandala.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, May 3rd, 2014 at 2:12 AM

Title: Re: Validity of recorded empowerments

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

So how can one verify if the siddhi that arose, even in the case of a proper empowerment, are not just based on the exhaustion of merit?

Malcolm wrote:

One can infer on the basis of the kindness of the person whether they are a bodhisattva. Otherwise there is no way you or I can tell.

Sherab Dorje said:

There are Siddhas in non-Buddhist tantric traditions too, do they receive correct empowerment or are their siddhi based exclusively on the exhaustion of merit?

Malcolm wrote:

The latter.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, May 3rd, 2014 at 1:51 AM

Title: Re: Validity of recorded empowerments

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

There are no siddhis without empowerment,
just as there is no oil even if sand is pressed.
Whoever proudly explains the tantras and citations

to those without empowerment,
both master and disciple go to hell
as soon as they die even if there are siddhis.
-- Mahāmudratilaka-tantra

Sherab Dorje said:

I'm not denying the validity of this statement, but if siddhis arose then it would verify the validity of the empowerment, right? Or maybe not? Can empowerments theoretically ripen over lifetimes?

Malcolm wrote:

Nope, it is mentioned that even if one shows signs of accomplishment, one is merely exhausting one's merit.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, May 3rd, 2014 at 1:39 AM

Title: Re: Validity of recorded empowerments

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Imagine someone claiming they have attained siddhi from only attending a recorded empowerment and doing the retreat, and then seeking to initiate students into that said empowerment.

Sherab Dorje said:

And if the siddhi were verified?

Malcolm wrote:

There are no siddhis without empowerment,
just as there is no oil even if sand is pressed.
Whoever proudly explains the tantras and citations
to those without empowerment,
both master and disciple go to hell
as soon as they die even if there are siddhis.
-- Mahāmudratilaka-tantra

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 2nd, 2014 at 11:59 PM

Title: Re: Validity of recorded empowerments

Content:

untxi said:

I find this whole thread a little disturbing.

There are many very highly qualified masters, with genuine realization, who offer a variety of teachings across a wide range of topics (lam rim, dialectics, empowerments, tantric grounds & paths, kyerim and dzogrim instructions, pointing-out and pith instructions) in a wide range of contexts (one-one, informally through skillful means, in groups, in teaching retreats, in practice retreats)-- which happen to include modern technologies such as recording and webcasts.

Malcolm wrote:

You are overshooting the mark here with your objections.

The only thing I question, and quite rightly so as far as I am concerned, is the practice of some students encouraging other students to believe that watching a video of an empowerment constitutes receiving that empowerment. I have never once called into question the practice of attending live webcasts, following a course through the mail, and so on.

My concern is quite real, since I think that this belief that one can receive an empowerment or even the transmission of a mantra from a recording will do serious damage to Vajrayāna teachings.

Imagine someone claiming they have attained siddhi from only attending a recorded empowerment and doing the retreat, and then seeking to initiate students into that said empowerment.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 2nd, 2014 at 11:37 PM

Title: Re: Dharma Quotes Thread

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

མེས་ལས་གཞན་མང་པར་ནི་སྒྲོས་རིག་ནས།
དེ་ནས་མེས་ཀྱང་མང་པ་ཉིད་དུ་རྟོགས།
སྒྲོ་དང་ལྡན་པས་གཉིས་པོ་མང་རིག་ནས།
དེ་མི་ལྡན་པའི་ཆོས་ཀྱི་དབྱིངས་ལ་གནས།

- Mahayansutralamkara

Malcolm wrote:

Having come know that nothing exists apart from the mind, then understanding the mind too does not exist,
the intelligent, knowing both do not exist, dwell in the dharmadhātu that is without them.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 2nd, 2014 at 10:13 PM

Title: Re: Validity of recorded empowerments

Content:

Lhasa said:

Thank you!

T. Chokyi said:

You're welcome Lhasa, I've been in empowerments with you by Garchen Rinpoche over the internet I do believe, I think I've seen you in the live chat Rinpoche allows at those empowerments, where we can request substances from Rinpoche, and also the deity images, sadhana, and mantras...I believe I've "seen" you there. Tashi Deleg to you!

Malcolm wrote:

This was never an issue. The issue is not whether someone can receive an empowerment through the internet.

The issue is whether one can receive an empowerment from watching a video of an empowerment that took place at an earlier time. This is impossible and I have given many reasons for why this is impossible.

I think many people are largely ignorant of what an empowerment actually is, and so believe all kinds of strange things are possible when in fact they are not. Such thinking truly involves abandoning the Buddha's teaching "where this exists, that exists, where this does not exist, that does not exist." Believing that one can receive an empowerment from watching a video is similar to believing that one can be sustained by looking at a picture of a fine meal. In reality, one will only be fed by sitting down at a real table and eating a real meal.

The point is not to deprive people of an avenue for making a Dharma connection. The point is to make sure that people actually make a Dharma connection.

The person who takes secret mantra on his own is like a child who swallows burning iron.
— Ārya-vajrakrodharājakaḷpa-laghutantra-nāma

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 2nd, 2014 at 8:58 PM

Title: Re: Mistranslating Gampopa?

Content:

Karma Jinpa said:

So I always see this translation of the Four Dharmas of Gampopa:

། རྒྱ་ཆོས་སུ་འགྲོ་བར་བྱིན་གྱིས་སྒྲོབས། །
ཆོས་ལམ་དུ་འགྲོ་བར་བྱིན་གྱིས་སྒྲོབས། །
ལམ་འཁྲལ་བ་ཞིག་པར་བྱིན་གྱིས་སྒྲོབས། །
འཁྲལ་བ་ཡི་ཤེས་སུ་འཆར་བར་བྱིན་གྱིས་སྒྲོབས། །

Grant your blessing so that my mind may turn towards the Dharma.

Grant your blessing so that Dharma may progress along the path.

Grant your blessing so that the path may clarify confusion.

Grant your blessing so that confusion may dawn as wisdom.

I've bolded and italicized the part that's always confused me, or struct me as clunky. Is the grammar for the Tibetan such that this is the only way to read it? If that's not the case, I would think that "Grant your blessing so that I may progress along the path of Dharma" would be a much more sensible translation.

Can anyone with more Tibetan skills weigh in on this?

Malcolm wrote:

It literally ought to be:

Grant blessings [that] mind moves to the Dharma;
Grant blessings [that] Dharma moves to the path;
Grant blessings [that] the path destroys delusion;
Grant blessings [that] delusion rises as wisdom.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 2nd, 2014 at 7:27 PM

Title: Re: Validity of recorded empowerments

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

Doesn't motivation/intention play a role in dependent origination?

Malcolm wrote:

If you take as a master someone who only intends to make money off of empowerment rites, as long as they are done correctly, you still are taking samaya with that person and so on, as well as agreeing to the commitments of Vajrayāna in general. Of course, if you find out later that person is merely a carpetbagger, a Dharma salesman, well, you can leave that guru's company, but you can't look back and say "oh, those empowerments I took were not valid".

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 2nd, 2014 at 6:53 PM

Title: Re: Validity of recorded empowerments

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, of course, as long as they have done the retreats, and so on.

This is why it is critical to examine the qualities of the guru.

If you take someone as a guru, and request empowerment and so on from them, then you have a connection with that person even if their motivation is wrong. Why? Because you made the connection; you requested empowerment, and so on. From that point on you are supposed to view them as being an actual Buddha. You are the one who, at the beginning of the empowerment, are saying "Guru, please heed me; accept me as your disciple".

Sherab Dorje said:

So an empowerment executed "correctly" with the "wrong" motivation has the desired result, whereas an empowerment done "incorrectly" but with the "right" motivation does not have the desired result. So can you please explain to me how this contradicts my opinion about the preeminence of ritual?

Malcolm wrote:

It is similar with an ordination of a monk. If the rite is not properly executed, the ordination does not happen. Someone can intend to be a monk with all the right motivation in the world; but if they do not receive the ordination from a properly constituted quorum, they cannot be considered a bhikṣu. On the other hand, someone who wishes to become a monk for power and fame becomes a monk if they ordain in front of a properly constituted quorum.

As for an empowerment, it is the case that an unawakened person can bestow an empowerment which produces the cause and condition for another to achieve awakening in this very life, for example, in the case of Kotalipa who achieved the state of mahāmudra, and whose own guru begged him to become a disciple. Why? Because the rites of maturation during an empowerment are effective. They work because of dependent origination.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 2nd, 2014 at 6:40 PM

Title: Re: Validity of recorded empowerments

Content:

dakini_boi said:

Well, my understanding is that the orthodox response would be yes (according to scriptural sources which I am unable to cite, but I'm sure you could).

Malcolm wrote:

The answer in fact is no, according to scriptural sources. When the guru asks you to do something that violates Buddhist principles, you are to explain to him that you cannot do that.

dakini_boi said:

I have learned a lot from this topic, particularly your posts about empowerment, Malcolm.

Malcolm wrote:

My sole intention is edify, so I am glad.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 2nd, 2014 at 6:08 AM

Title: Re: Validity of recorded empowerments

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Thus far, no one has been able to offer any sort of reasonable response to my objections about this.

dakini_boi said:

Vajrayana is based on the instructions of an authentic Guru first and foremost, before any scriptural source...

Malcolm wrote:

I am sorry, but this is just a pathway to delusion. By this reasoning, if the Guru tells you to rape and murder people, you should follow this teaching though it totally violates every Buddhist principle!?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 2nd, 2014 at 4:05 AM

Title: Re: Validity of recorded empowerments

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

While I can understand and sympathise with what you are saying here, it seems to me that we are falling into a trap. The trap here is that of the preeminence of ritual.

Malcolm wrote:

You are mistaken. If people think that properly upholding methods taught by the Buddha fall under the heading of adherence to rites and rules, then the Dharma is already hopelessly corrupt and there is no point in my discussing this further. There is no point in even criticizing those who give empowerments without having received them and so on.

M

Sherab Dorje said:

No, because most of those giving empowerments without having received them (and some of those giving them, after having received them) are doing so with wrong/unwholesome motivation.

What do you think: if the vajra master does not have the right motivation, even if the ritual is carried out according to the book, using all the correct physical/material supports etc..., will/can it be successful based only on the adherence to prescribed outer forms?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, of course, as long as they have done the retreats, and so on.

This is why it is critical to examine the qualities of the guru.

If you take someone as a guru, and request empowerment and so on from them, then you have a connection with that person even if their motivation is wrong. Why? Because you made the connection; you requested empowerment, and so on. From that point on you are supposed to view them as being an actual Buddha. You are the one who, at the beginning of the empowerment, are saying "Guru, please heed me; accept me as your disciple".

And if they have not done themselves received empowerment they are granting, then both that guru and you will go to lower realms. All this is clearly stated tantras such as the Mahāmudratilaka and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 2nd, 2014 at 2:48 AM

Title: Re: Validity of recorded empowerments

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

Malcolm, you have given a good description of what is supposed to be going on in the guru's mind during an empowerment. What is less clear is what effect this is supposed to have on the students. Perhaps this is the point that needs to be clarified. For example you said: "the master summons the jñānasattva, the wisdom being, into each disciple who is present" but what does that mean exactly?

Malcolm wrote:

It means that through the proper causes and conditions the student is prepared to receive the main part of the empowerment. If the student is free of obstacles, they may experience certain signs that I will not discuss.

There are any number of very good books on the subject of empowerments and what happens during them.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 2nd, 2014 at 2:21 AM

Title: Re: Gorampa & Tsongkhapa

Content:

michaelb said:

Do Gelugpas take this true existence as something separate from an object? I know they say it doesn't exist, but is it something separate from the object that they are negating, so "pot is not empty of pot but empty of inherent existence?" would they take a statement that the pot is empty of pot to be nihilism?

Thanks.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, they regard statements like "The pot is empty of the pot" to be an over-negation. They only accept "the pot is emptiness of potness".

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 2nd, 2014 at 2:09 AM

Title: Re: Validity of recorded empowerments

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

While I can understand and sympathise with what you are saying here, it seems to me that we are falling into a trap. The trap here is that of the preeminence of ritual.

Malcolm wrote:

You are mistaken. If people think that properly upholding methods taught by the Buddha fall under the heading of adherence to rites and rules, then the Dharma is already hopelessly corrupt and there is no point in my discussing this further. There is no point in even criticizing those who give empowerments without having received them and so on.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 2nd, 2014 at 1:28 AM

Title: Re: Validity of recorded empowerments

Content:

haha said:

Dog's tooth can do the Buddha's work. Why the rinpoche's empowerment video cannot do that??? How many people are going to watch that? and then how many people do get benefit from it? However, those ppl whoever want to connect with him definitely get benefit from it if the rinpoche said so.

Malcolm wrote:

No. Faith in the Buddha qualities what caused the results produced in this story. The women did not have faith in a dog's tooth, she had faith in the Buddha's qualities. The women may have been mistaken about the tooth, but she was not mistaken about the Buddha.

But we are not talking about the veneration of relics. No one in history has ever suggested that one can receive, for example, a Vajrakilaya empowerment from even a valid, authentic relic of the Buddha.

We are discussing whether someone who watches recording of an empowerment actually receives it. Thus far, no one has been able to offer any sort of reasonable response to my objections about this.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 1st, 2014 at 9:59 PM

Title: Re: Validity of recorded empowerments

Content:

Alfredo said:

An analogy might be with a wedding ceremony.

Malcolm wrote:

It was just pointed out to me that the analogy might be apt if one could be married by watching a recording of someone's else's wedding.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 1st, 2014 at 8:34 PM

Title: Re: Validity of recorded empowerments

Content:

Alfredo said:

An analogy might be with a wedding ceremony. What counts as a valid ceremony? Can it be performed by proxy (i.e., with a third person standing in for one of the couple)?

Some religions, notably Catholicism, conceive of marriage (or technically, sacramental marriage--the following would not apply to natural marriage) as indeed involving some kind of spiritual bond, which comes into existence only under certain precise conditions. Others, notably Buddhism, defer to whatever standards each society may have.

Malcolm wrote:

The analogy is not apt. We are not comparing what an empowerment is in Buddhism and Catholicism.

Further, the definitions and procedures of empowerments (a practice unique in Vajrayāna Buddhism with unique requirements) are defined in the basic literature of the Vajrayāna (the tantras); unlike marriage ceremonies which are extra-canonical rites; despite the fact that there are considered one of the seven sacraments of the church.

There are hundreds of texts written by Indian masters on the subject of empowerments, how to conduct them, for all four classes of tantras.

There have been some disagreements among Tibetans in the past as to what constitutes a proper "maturational empowerment" -- those interested can read Sakya Pandita's Clear Differentiation of the Three Vows and the various responses to it by Kagyu masters such as Pawo Tsuglag Trengwa and so on (Here the issue is whether a sbyin rlabs can be considered to "mature" or "ripen" a student).

Nevertheless, everyone agrees that without an empowerment one is not matured as a student of Vajrayāna. The question here is whether one can be ripened by or receive an empowerment from an inanimate object such as a "blessed" picture, book or a movie. The answer is, "Of course not."

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 1st, 2014 at 8:03 PM

Title: Re: Gorampa & Tsongkhapa

Content:

conebeckham said:

Ironically, by inserting the qualifier "inherent" critics say he leaves a subtle sort of "existence" as regards conventional truth. His supporters say those who completely negate existence stray into nihilism.

michaelb said:

Are the 'freedom from extremes' types negating existence, though? Not existent, not nonexistent, etc. But are they just really saying not existent and the other three are added just to copy a traditional Indian pattern?

I'm still a little stuck on the inherent existence thing. Translations I've read from Nagarjuna to Mipham also talk about the absence of this being what emptiness means.

Malcolm wrote:

All four extremes represent positions found in Indian philosophy; for example, the Jain position of indeterminacy is really just the position that something can exist and not exist at the same time.

So yes, all four extremes must be negated, both relatively and ultimately, and that, and that alone is the middle way.

Tsongkhapa is faulted for a lot of things in his Madhyamaka writings which really have very little to do with Madhyamaka per se. Of course, what many people do not understand is that often Gorampa's polemics are not so much aimed at Tsongkhapa as they are Khedrupje.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 1st, 2014 at 7:31 PM

Title: Re: Validity of recorded empowerments

Content:

Alfredo said:

Transmissions are not magic spells--

Malcolm wrote:

Correct, and imagining that digital files can be "blessed" to grant empowerments is precisely the kind of thinking that informs "magical spells".

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 1st, 2014 at 7:28 PM

Title: Re: Validity of recorded empowerments

Content:

JohnJ said:

but merely speculating based on instructions I have received.

Malcolm wrote:

That's a bad idea.

JohnJ said:

I am very grateful for your clarification, however, as it has helped me understand the quote by Garchen Rinpoche that I referenced above. I think, in this case, that you are saying the same thing he has said but in much greater detail.

Malcolm wrote:

I don't have any idea what Garchen has said, I merely note that a lot of people are claiming Garchen Rinpoche's endorsement for their own concepts. I have yet to see any formal written statement about this matter from him. For example, you can bet that were ChNN to do something as controversial he would publish a formal written statement and explain his reasons why he was doing this or that very precisely.

JohnJ said:

...to abandon this kind of divisive thinking...

Malcolm wrote:

The divisive thinking here that is being promulgated is being promulgated by those who claim against all reason and common sense that digital files can be "blessed" to "grant" empowerments.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 1st, 2014 at 4:45 AM

Title: Re: Simhamukha and Guru Dragpur

Content:

Reibeam said:

does the lung for the medium Tun give enough authorization to practice Simhamukha and Guru Dragpo separately from the Tun?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 1st, 2014 at 3:42 AM

Title: Re: Dharma Quotes Thread

Content:

Malcolm wrote:
The Samādhirāja Sūtra states:

Though I have taught the very excellent dharma, if you do not correctly practice after hearing it,
it is like a patient holding a bag of medicine,
it will not cure one's illness.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Thursday, May 1st, 2014 at 1:55 AM
Title: Re: Validity of recorded empowerments
Content:
dzogchungpa said:
OK thanks, but I was also wondering if there are supposed to be "signs" indicating that you have really "received the empowerment"?

Malcolm wrote:
You mean like stigmata?

Author: Malcolm
Date: Thursday, May 1st, 2014 at 12:27 AM
Title: Re: Validity of recorded empowerments
Content:
Malcolm wrote:
During an empowerment, there are two sections...
...
As you can now understand, in order to be a Vajramaster one must have extraordinary powers of samadhi.

dzogchungpa said:
OK, thanks. If that is (part of) what is necessary to enter a HYT mandala correctly, I kind of wonder how often that happens.
Is there any way to "verify" that one has indeed done so?

Malcolm wrote:
Were you awake during the activities of the disciple? Did you recite the prayers understanding what they meant and why? Did you try to follow the visualizations sincerely as best you could? If so, then you entered the mandala.

Even though your master is not the most realized person, as long as he satisfied his responsibilities in doing the basic approach retreats and fire offerings, etc., and performed the empowerment rites correctly, still you took the pledges of samaya, still you received the empowerment. Still you need to regard that person as a real Buddha. If you do so, then you will achieve buddhahood. Even if the Buddha were to give you an empowerment, if you think he is an ordinary shmoe, then like Sunakṣatra, you might be swallowed up by the ground before you even die.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 1st, 2014 at 12:13 AM

Title: Re: Validity of recorded empowerments

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Again, this is the fault of the master. There are two things that must happen; the master must examine the student, the student must examine the master. If the master does not examine the student and the student walks away thinking the Vajrayāna is bullshit, whose fault could it possibly be other than the master's for not checking the student?

Sherab Dorje said:

Seriously now: when was the last time you ever heard of this happening, either in the "East" or the "West"?

Malcolm wrote:

I know of quite a bit of difficulty encountered by both masters and students because this does not happen. Masters driven by blind kindness or even by selfishness (to gather large retinues to pay for things "for the dharma") and students driven by greed and egotism because they are going to "become buddhas" etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 1st, 2014 at 12:02 AM

Title: Re: Validity of recorded empowerments

Content:

qwerty13 said:

Do mean by "unsuitable" a person who has no faith in Vajrayana, or even disrespects it?

Malcolm wrote:

As for two, yes.

Sherab Dorje said:

I don't really see how physical presence is any guarantee of this though, I've been to empowerments where many present did not know what they were getting themselves involved in and left with a negative attitude regarding the Vajrayana methods.

Malcolm wrote:

Again, this is the fault of the master. There are two things that must happen; the master must examine the student, the student must examine the master. If the master does not examine the student and the student walks away thinking the Vajrayāna is bullshit, whose fault could it possibly be other than the master's for not checking the student?

Unfortunately in this day and age we have a "try it before you buy it" culture. This really does not work well in a Vajrayāna context, since it ruins both masters and students.

This is why ChNN repeatedly says there is no such thing as taking an empowerment as a blessing, and forgoing the commitments. It is actually impossible, and when you are told "You can take this as a blessing", and you think this means you do not have samaya, or a vajra relationship with that teacher, or the practice and so on, you don't understand anything. If you are not serious about a practice or a teacher, then it is better you don't go.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, April 30th, 2014 at 11:27 PM

Title: Re: Validity of recorded empowerments

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Further, there is the very real likelihood that unsuitable people will choose to watch such performances on places like youtube resulting in many samaya problems.

qwerty13 said:

Are you now strictly talking about empowerments in to highest yoga tantra ( like Vajrayogini, Yamantaka, guhyasamaja etc. etc)?

Are these samaya problems (coming from watching recored empowerment) present only in the case of Highest yoga tantra initiation?

Malcolm wrote:

Further, there is the very real likelihood that unsuitable people will choose to watch such performances on places like youtube resulting in many samaya problems.

qwerty13 said:

Do mean by "unsuitable" a person who has no faith in Vajrayana, or even disrespects it?

Malcolm wrote:

As for question one; in general, yes. However, even among kriya yoga deities, those of the Vajra family have samayas to observe which involve secrecy and so on.

As for two, yes.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, April 30th, 2014 at 11:25 PM

Title: Re: Validity of recorded empowerments

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

One: in any empowerment, there are three mandalas: the front created mandala, the vase mandala and the mandala of the teacher. The teacher arranges the descent of the wisdom being from the front created mandala onto the disciple after he creates each disciple as the form of the deity to be given.

dzogchungpa said:

OK, this is interesting. Is there anything that can be said about how the teacher arranges the descent of the wisdom being from the front created mandala onto the disciple, and what it means to create each disciple as the form of the deity to be given?

Malcolm wrote:

During an empowerment, there are two sections: the self-empowerment conducted by a qualified master which includes such things as preparing the the space, and so on, which culminates in the master conferring the empowerment upon himself into the mandala and the creation of the front mandala as well as the vase mandala.

Second, when all this is done, then the master again repeats the sadhana, creating each disciple as the mandala they into which they are to be initiated: this stage is called creating the samayasattva, the commitment being. Then, when this has been done, the master summons the jñānasattva, the wisdom being, into each disciple who is present. In a very serious empowerment this is done one by one, i.e. the master visualizes each disciple separately as the deity, and is the reason why the most serious and proper way to give empowerments is to give them to one, three, seven or no more than twenty-five disciples at a time. In other words, if he or she is giving the initiation to 3 people, he or she must visualize three separate mandalas. If he or she is giving the empowerment to twenty five people, they must visualize 25 separate and complete mandalas. For example, the Kalacakra Mandala in the full form has 648 deities, if I recall correctly. Each deity must be separately visualized for each person during that empowerment.

Even in a Jenang, where there is only a body, speech and mind "blessing" (i.e. the form of the deity, the mantra and introduction to the deity's wisdom continuum) the master must visualize everyone present as the form of the deity individually.

As you can now understand, in order to be a Vajramaster one must have extraordinary powers of samadhi.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, April 30th, 2014 at 6:55 PM

Title: Re: Validity of recorded empowerments

Content:

JohnJ said:

It might be good to mention that in my personal encounters with Garchen Rinpoche and the lamas that teach through his Institute, empowerment is understood as something that is rarely actually recieved. In other words, the belief seems to be that empowerment only occurs when one has understood the nature of their mind through that empowerment.

Malcolm wrote:

This represents a misunderstanding of the nature of empowerments on your part.

An empowerment is something that arranges a profound dependent origination between someone's body, speech and mind and the three kāyas of the result. Therefore, it is not so that one does not receive the empowerment if one does not realize the nature of the mind.

An empowerment is first of all a method for inducing realization, for example, when Indrabhuti I attained Buddhahood by receiving the Guhyasamaja empowerment. Failing that, we have sadhanas, which is the method connected to the empowerment to produce realization. When we receive an empowerment, we agree to follow various samayas until we attain buddhahood. People who do not receive empowerments do not have those samayas.

JohnJ said:

The real empowerment is much more than a permission to practice various Sadhanas, it is an introduction to the natural state, and only if you do not understand that and remain in confusion should you seek out various Sadhana and yoga practices.

Malcolm wrote:

If you did not truly receive an empowerment because you failed to realize nature of your mind, you could not realize the three kāyas through the practice of sadhanas. Therefore, this idea is really not very correct at all.

JohnJ said:

In that way, most everyone who receives the empowerment is only receiving blessings, not the actual empowerment.

Malcolm wrote:

Nonsense. This represents a total misunderstanding of what an empowerment actually is.

JohnJ said:

My own understanding is that the recorded empowerments are a permission to practice and a receiving of some lineage blessings, since the vast majority who come or stay at home won't receive the empowerment in the way that Garchen Rinpoche (and many others) understand it.

Malcolm wrote:

There are a number of problems with this:

One: in any empowerment, there are three mandalas: the front created mandala, the vase mandala and the mandala of the teacher. The teacher arranges the descent of the wisdom being from the front created mandala onto the disciple after he creates each disciple as the form of the deity to be given. If you are not at the empowerment in some fashion during the time it is being given, there is no descent of the wisdom being.

Two: at the end of any empowerment, byin rlabs, or rje gnang there is the dissolution of the mandalas, i.e., the front created mandala, the vase mandala and the mandala of the teacher. One cannot receive initiation into a mandala that has been dissolved by the master. Once the vajramaster has concluded his or her activities, the empowerment is over.

Therefore, watching an empowerment later on is like watching a performance on PBS. It may be interesting, fascinating, and so on. But it is not live, you are not there, you are not participating, you are watching a show. You may be edified, but there is no stream of blessing because the mandala has already been switched off, as it were.

Further, there is the very real likelihood that unsuitable people will choose to watch such performances on places like youtube resulting in many samaya problems.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, April 30th, 2014 at 5:56 PM

Title: Re: Gorampa & Tsongkhapa

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Take the empowerment yourself (or a similar one, for example, the Shi khro nges don snying po ). Then you will see.

ratna said:

Do other Shitros also confer these vows? Isn't Namchö Shitro also Anuyoga? Does this mean we're all bhikṣus in the DC and just don't know it?

Malcolm wrote:

Not necessarily.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, April 30th, 2014 at 9:26 AM

Title: Re: Indian roots of tibetan buddhism

Content:

Zhen Li said:

Not every great Buddhist tradition is Indian in origin.

Malcolm wrote:

Depends on what you mean by "tradition" and "origin".

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, April 30th, 2014 at 9:07 AM

Title: Re: Validity of recorded empowerments

Content:

untxi said:

a webcast

-U

Malcolm wrote:

No one has rejected attending a live webcast...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, April 30th, 2014 at 9:06 AM

Title: Re: Validity of recorded empowerments

Content:

JohnJ said:

Furthermore, regarding a "secret mantra guru", the Dzogchen Community has many secondary practices, mantras, protectors, etc. Does this mean that the Direct Introduction, though it has no physical supports, constitutes the entirety of a "proper" empowerment for those who receive it, since there are many practices in the DC that are of the Vajrayana vehicle?

Malcolm wrote:

In the system of Dzogchen, the rig pa'i rtsal dbang aka direct introduction is considered to be the source of all empowerments. Therefore, from the perspective of the Dzogchen teachings, a direct introduction by a qualified master alone is sufficient to ripen one as a student of Mantrayāna since the minds of all wisdom deities are the same; differing only in terms of mantra and appearances (for which thge khrid lung is then required).

On the other hand, it is not likely that many Sakyapa or Gelugpa lamas agree with this approach. Nevertheless, the system of Dzogchgen, following its own tantras, can support this approach with citations as well as reasonings.

Further, the system of Dzogchen considers the direct introduction to be an expanded, more experiential form of the fourth empowerment.

This however does not mean that other empowerments are not necessary. The Mutig Phrengwa tantra states that those with understanding require only introduction; the rest should receive the four empowerments in order. So it really depends on the capacity of the student.

JohnJ said:

In other words, ChNN rarely seems to give full Vajrayana empowerments, so would it still be correct to say that his teachings contain the essence of the 4 empowerments given in traditional HYT and that the many students and members of DC who follow his teachings have received Samaya, are expected to keep it perfectly, and have entered the Vajrayana?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, from the perspective of Dzogchen teachings, this is correct.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, April 30th, 2014 at 1:52 AM

Title: Re: Validity of recorded empowerments

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

So how does this all square with the fact that your teacher ChNN gives empowerments over the internet where students will not have access to the sacred substances and material supports of the empowerments (ie not in a proper way ) regardless of the fact that it is "live"?

Malcolm wrote:

Greg,

I just clarified that ChNN does not do this, read more carefully.

CHNN explicitly has stated that he cannot grant full fledged empowerments over the internet at all because there is no way to introduce the student into the mandala directly and so on. However he does give so called "meaning" empowerments and direct introductions because they require no physical supports.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, April 30th, 2014 at 1:51 AM

Title: Re: Validity of recorded empowerments

Content:

qwerty13 said:

I dont know anymore how to believe.

Malcolm wrote:

Shakyamuni's mantras is also from sutra (The Ārya-svalpākṣara-prajñāpāramitā-nāma-mahāyāna-sūtra to be exact), and kriya tantra, and so it too does not require any sort of empowerment at all to recite.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, April 30th, 2014 at 1:48 AM

Title: Re: Validity of recorded empowerments

Content:

smcj said:

The proof will be in the taste of pudding, as they say. If someone can take an empowerment via whatever means, do a retreat, and gain realization, then the empowerment is valid. Until such time as that experiment has been done we must rely on expert opinions.

I for one, however, am not willing to invest that much time and effort on such an experiment.

Pero said:

But, if you're not going to do it yourself you're just going to take someone else's word for it?

Johnny Dangerous said:

I think I've read a book (chime in if anyone remembers this) by (I think) Karma Chagme where he says something along the lines of "I hereby declare that reading of these words constitutes permissions to practice Avalokiteshvara". I'm sure it was worded differently, but the gist seemed to me that he was giving permission to practice a deity via text, and that reading it was enough. I don't remember the other qualifiers involved though. There certainly seems to be a precedent for reading of texts (for example) being transmission of something in Buddhism here and there.

I wanna say the book was A Spacious Path To Freedom..but I'm not positive.

Pero said:

Now that you say that I think Malcolm in some discussion long ago mentioned that somewhere Jigme Lingpa says that whoever is reading his text (I don't remember which one, too far back) has the lung for it. But since it was so long ago, it could've been whoever "understands" his text... Any memory of what I'm talking about, Malcolm?

Malcolm wrote:

There is a Dzogchen tantra which states "It is not necessary to hear it, obtaining the text is enough."

But this presumes that one has already been ripened by the four empowerments:

If this kind of intimate instructions is given to improper recipients, both will be burned.
May it be acquired by those trained suitable recipients with good karma!
Through that may secret mantra remain for a long while!
May the darkness of the ignorance of migrating beings be dispelled!

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, April 30th, 2014 at 1:41 AM

Title: Re: Validity of recorded empowerments

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

If someone could explain what it means to be "ripened" in this context we might be able to have a more constructive discussion.

Malcolm wrote:

"Ripened" means someone has entered a HYT mandala correctly, possesses all the samayas, and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, April 30th, 2014 at 1:40 AM

Title: Re: Validity of recorded empowerments

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

I think i've read a book (chime in if anyone remembers this) by (I think) Karma Chagme where he says something along the lines of "I hereby declare that reading of these words constitutes permissions to practice Avalokitsehvara". I'm sure it was worded differently, but the gist seemed to me that he was giving permission to practice a deity via text, and that reading it was enough. I don't remember the other qualifiers involved though. There certainly seems to be a precedent for reading of texts (for example) being transmission of something in Buddhism here and there.

I wanna say the book was A Spacious Path To Freedom..but i'm not positive.

Malcolm wrote:

Om mani padme hum is a sūtra mantra. Anyone can practice it without transmission anyway.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, April 30th, 2014 at 1:39 AM

Title: Re: Validity of recorded empowerments

Content:

smcj said:

The authority is the tantras, not the opinions of experts.
And where in the tantras does it say that live webcasts are valid?

Malcolm wrote:

They don't mention the issue at all.

smcj said:

How is it that the digital reproduction then is more valid than at a later date? Here at Dharma Wheel the validity is accepted because ChNN and Garchen R. say so.

Malcolm wrote:

CHNN explicitly has stated that he cannot grant full fledged empowerments over the internet at all because there is no way to introduce the student into the mandala directly and so on. However he does give so called "meaning" empowerments and direct introductions because they require no physical supports.

smcj said:

The rationale is based on the non-locality of the guru's blessing, on ChNN and G.R.'s expert opinion that such is the active operating principal in a live webcast.

Malcolm wrote:

See above, that is not ChNN's rational. ChNN's rational is that the student and the master are collaborating at the same time, therefore, distance is not an issue but time is.

smcj said:

There are teachings to that effect, that the guru-yoga

Malcolm wrote:

In order to have a secret mantra guru one must have received empowerment in a proper way.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, April 30th, 2014 at 1:01 AM

Title: Re: Validity of recorded empowerments

Content:

smcj said:

But in any case it still belongs on the editorial page, at least until such time as a consensus is formed one way or the other among the other experts.

Malcolm wrote:

It is not really an issue that can be resolved by consensus.

The authority is the tantras, not the opinions of experts.

We may debate about these things, but we must do so based on proper citations reinforced by logical reasoning. It is not sufficient to say "This is my guru's blessing, so therefore it is valid because I have faith in him or her."

Anyway, I have had my say.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, April 30th, 2014 at 12:03 AM

Title: Re: When are you considered a 'Buddhist'?

Content:

Pringle said:

When would a person be classed as a 'Buddhist' rather than someone who follows buddhist teachings (if there even is a difference)

Malcolm wrote:

When you sincerely go for refuge to the Three Jewels.

Pringle said:

How would one sincerely go for refuge? Do you mean if one sincerely practices in accordance with the the path with body, speach and mind, or do you mean sincerely go to refuge by taking a formal declartion in the presence of a sangha?

Malcolm wrote:

Or simply by going for refuge in the Three Jewels in your heart.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, April 29th, 2014 at 11:50 PM

Title: Re: Validity of recorded empowerments

Content:

smcj said:

However you have a habit of stating your opinions with the same voice of authority that you give your expertise.

Malcolm wrote:

It is not an opinion.

There is no teaching of the Buddha in any authentic Buddhist tantra anywhere that someone who wishes to be ripened to practice Vajrayāna can be ripened merely by interacting with an inanimate object, which is what a recording or a book is in fact.

If someone wants a blessing, they should go visit a lama and get a pat on the head and a cord. If someone wishes to practice Vajrayāna, they should make the effort and sacrifice to go to where a teacher is present, receive an empowerment in a proper way, and if they cannot manage that much, then they should participate in a live online transmission of some kind.

It is not sufficient to watch some video of an empowerment and say " I will do this now and later get the real empowerment" and so on. This kind of thinking also has many faults mentioned in the tantras. We are after all discussing Vajrayāna, right?

Complaining it is impossible to travel, or that there are no teachers where one lives is the worst sort of lameass excuse one can give considering the enormous troubles the ancient Tibetans went through to bring the teachings to Tibet from India.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, April 29th, 2014 at 11:15 PM

Title: Re: Gorampa & Tsongkhapa

Content:

jiashengrox said:

Ok thank you! Just to check this is the terma by Rigdzin Jatson Nyingpo, and is different from our usual Karling Shitro?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, Shi khro nges don snying po is a full anuyoga system empowerment in brief form.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, April 29th, 2014 at 11:13 PM

Title: Re: Validity of recorded empowerments

Content:

Anders said:

Cool dharma stuff can happen in the saha world too, much as we like to think that's reserved for holy people and holy worlds, etc. Imo, that's why the sutras tell us about these things. To open our minds to the possibilities of transmitting the dharma we can be exposed to.

Malcolm wrote:

This is to miss the point completely.

These kinds of teachings must be in accordance with the capacity of the recipient. Ordinary beings do not smell the sound of Dharma floating out of septic tanks. They smell rotten shit.

I am very sorry that I have to say this, but I have a responsibility to the Dharma. If people feel I am being critical of this or that teacher, that is not my intent.

Empowerments are not mystical transmissions, they are a very specific method with a precise dependent origination that requires the guru and the disciples' active, simultaneous, cooperative participation. The Buddha has no more power to bless a digital file with the potency to confer an empowerment (dbang skur), a blessing (sbyin rlabs), a permission (rjes gnam), a reading transmission or an ordination than the power to bless a book for the same purpose, so what need to mention any teacher living today? To believe otherwise is to fall under the influence of total proliferation.

Therefore, if someone asks me, I will always honestly tell them that it is impossible to receive any kind of Vajrayāna transmission from a recording of a prior event. People are of course free to disagree and that is between them and lower realms.

There are no siddhis without empowerment,
just as there is no oil even if sand is pressed.
Whoever proudly explains the tantras and citations
to those without empowerment,
both master and disciple go to hell
as soon as they die even if there are siddhis.
-- Mahāmudratilaka-tantra

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, April 29th, 2014 at 10:49 PM

Title: Re: Gorampa & Tsongkhapa

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The intention here comes from symbolic initiation into bhikṣu pratimokṣa in the Anuyoga grand empowerment.

jiashengrox said:

Would it be possible to support this with evidence? Somehow or another i couldn't find the reason in the same text.

Malcolm wrote:

The reason is not explicitly given.

Take the empowerment yourself (or a similar one, for example, the Shi khro nges don snying po ). Then you will see.

No such empowerment exists in the new tantras, and therefore, Sapan does not accept this perspective.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, April 29th, 2014 at 10:38 PM

Title: Re: Gorampa & Tsongkhapa

Content:

jiashengrox said:

I could quote from Ngari Panchen's Ascertaining the Three Vows on this issue:

"An upholder of lay ordination who is also a pure-awareness holder must, except for signs and rituals of complete ordination, practice all that remains" (page 26)

It summarises the need for us to adhere to fundamental pratimoksha precepts (in fact in a stricter sense, coz in that context, he mentioned the need to follow the bhikkhu's conduct, with exception of ceremonies performed by bhikkhus or ordained ones, the "outer signs of ordination", as commented on by Dudjom Rinpoche).

Malcolm wrote:

Rlght, that I disagree with completely -- this was already rejected by Sakya Pandita in sdom gsum. One only needs to follow the vows which one receives in a given rite.

The intention here comes from symbolic initiation into bhikṣu pratimokṣa in the Anuyoga grand empowerment.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, April 29th, 2014 at 9:54 PM

Title: Re: When are you considered a 'Buddhist'?

Content:

Pringle said:

When would a person be classed as a 'Buddhist' rather than someone who follows buddhist teachings (if there even is a difference)

Malcolm wrote:

When you sincerely go for refuge to the Three Jewels.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, April 29th, 2014 at 9:07 PM

Title: Re: Too much Vajrayogini?

Content:

JKhedrup said:

In Sakya the Hevajra cycle would be most important for understanding their take on tantra, I am guessing?

Is this point about the mandala the reason it is said VY herself bestows portions of the initiation, whereas for other systems this is not the case?

Malcolm wrote:

Well, Lamdre in general, as well as rgyud sde spyi rnam, rin po che ljong shing, etc.

As for the second point -- this is about how Yogini is the essence of the mandala, but it is not exactly like that.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, April 29th, 2014 at 8:59 PM

Title: Re: Gorampa & Tsongkhapa

Content:

Malcolm wrote:
And that is not Rongzom's POV at all.

ConradTree said:
Well he clearly holds tantra as more definitive than sutra.

Malcolm wrote:
Yes, but that does not mean we throw out the five lay vows because they are predicated on a dualistic view, for example, or toss out samaya for the same reason.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Tuesday, April 29th, 2014 at 8:14 AM
Title: Re: Gorampa & Tsongkhapa
Content:
ConradTree said:
The moral of all of this is to throw out sutra entirely, and stick to tantra like Rongzom says.

<https://www.amazon.com/Establishing-Appearances-Divine-Reasoning-Madhyamaka/dp/1559392886> " onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;"
onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

Malcolm wrote:
Don't be ridiculous. And that is not Rongzom's POV at all.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Tuesday, April 29th, 2014 at 8:13 AM
Title: Re: Validity of recorded empowerments
Content:
anjali said:
There came a time when the Buddha's teachings had to be written down.

pueraeternus said:
That would be passe. In the future, tertons would hide termas in the World of Warcraft, or maybe some obscure corner of Ultima Online.

Malcolm wrote:
dude, Halo...come on...

Author: Malcolm
Date: Tuesday, April 29th, 2014 at 5:10 AM
Title: Re: Gorampa & Tsongkhapa
Content:

jiashengrox said:

Anyways, i think in Mipham's book, it was said that Sera Jetsunpa (Jetsun Chokyi Gyaltzen), Jamyang Shepa, jamyang Gawai Lodroe and Panchen Delek Nyima did reply to Gorampa with regards to his criticism. I am not sure if that is right (refer to page 246, note 79).

Malcolm wrote:

I don't believe that these replies are considered by Sakyapas to address any of Gorampa's observations in any substantial way.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, April 29th, 2014 at 2:55 AM

Title: Re: Gorampa, Rendawa, and Rongton

Content:

jiashengrox said:

This discussion i hope to have actually stems from the following thread:

<http://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=52&t=16306&p=230132#p230132> " onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;" onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;" onclick="window.open(this.href);return false;

First of all, I would like to ask if any scholar around could give a precise differentiation on Gorampa and Rendawa's views on Madhyamika? As i do know that Gorampa's text is pretty much the standardised texts used in the seminaries, it would be good to actually have some basic information for everyone here before anyone else might make a decision to delve into Gorampa's text on Madhyamika.

Also, as I am currently reading Rongton's Commentary on Mulamadhyamikakarika (translated by Khenpo Ngawang Jorden, if i m not wrong), i would also appreciate if anyone could give an idea of how their differences in view are like? It's just for preliminary understanding.

Finally, if it is possible, would anyone be able to give a heuristic view of the Sakya's approach towards Maitreya's treatises (such as say, Uttarat Tantra)? It would be good to hear a different pov from the gelug, kagyu and nyingma traditions, since there are many translations that have been published.

Thanks a lot!

Malcolm wrote:

IN general, Gorampa and Rongton more or less have the same view. Many of Gorampa's refutations were penned defenses of Rongton against Khedrup.

Gorampa found Rendawa a bit extreme in terms of Rendawa's polemics against Jonang, but again, there is no real difference view.

As for Maitreya treatises Gorampa considers Abhisamayalamkara and Uttaratantra definitive, depending on interpretation, and the other three provisional.

Gorampa's works are considered the gold standard for view in Sakya, apart from the five founders.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, April 29th, 2014 at 12:26 AM

Title: Re: Gorampa & Tsongkhapa

Content:

plwk said:

Thanks Malcolm & jiashengrox. It's rather baffling (to me at least) that the Gelugpas, being known for being a scholastic tradition, would not have produce any commentarial or treatise to compare / contrast / refute Gorampa directly but resort to what is seemingly political moves as a 'valid' response instead? Hmmm...

Malcolm wrote:

Well the founder of Sera did pen one reply, but it more or less amounts to a tome of sputtering indignation, "How dare you, you #%$@$*&^...."

I think the Gelugpas in general would prefer to imagine that Gorampa was just a bad dream someone had. Pabhongkha was pretty indignant that Gorampa's collected works were collected and revived in Eastern Tibet and it seems to be one of his motives for encouraging sectarianism there.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, April 29th, 2014 at 12:24 AM

Title: Re: Validity of recorded empowerments

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

All these questions arise due to our failure to recognize the nature and function of the videokaya.

Malcolm wrote:

More importantly, they arise due to our failure to understand the essence of the interdhātu.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, April 28th, 2014 at 9:25 PM

Title: Re: Dzogchenpa's nose

Content:

thigle said:

Continuation from <https://www.dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=48&t=16295%22>

Simon E. said:

The point Malcolm is making thigle, is that 'lobster' has declared himself to be an arhat.

thigle said:

But another much more important point is Simon, that some people declared himself to realised an authentic introduction.

Malcolm wrote:

Ummmm, no.

Someone merely declared that they understood something.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, April 28th, 2014 at 8:45 PM

Title: Re: Now I "get it"

Content:

thigle said:

Stop to project selfish reasons. The delusion is obvious.

Malcolm wrote:

You make a lot of pronouncements so it seems like you consider yourself very expert in the teachings. As to whether some people here are working with various levels of understanding, that of course is true. But unless you are a realized person, it is a little strange to be castigating other people for being deluded when oneself has not even gouged out a small portion of one own delusion. On the other hand, if someone makes a statement that is clearly a factual error and is in contradiction with the teachings, then of course one is helping them by setting them straight, even if they find it painful.

thigle said:

Just as I said before, stop to project selfish reasons. The delusion is obvious.

Consequence: It's better to close this subforum. Make your circle secret. So no one can be harmed anymore. User unity was just a mirror.

Malcolm wrote:

You know, it is generally better to wear shoes than to cover the world with shoe leather. My advice to you is to stop participating in on-line forums such as this one if you disapprove so strongly. They are not going to shut this forum just because you recommend it.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, April 28th, 2014 at 8:33 PM

Title: Re: How to make voice last longer?

Content:

Belincia said:

My throat begins to hurt when I try to do a lot of mantras, so like during retreats I'm unable to do them as much as I'd like to. I do drink water a lot while doing it, because that helps somewhat. No matter if I do them loudly/quietly, I still can't keep going as long as I'd like to. I always do them with my normal pitch, which should be the healthiest way.

Are you aware of effective ways to train the voice to last longer?

I am a young person, and I don't have any tendency for illnesses on my "speaking organs". I very rarely get this pain from just talking. I think doing mantras is a bit more intense, as it is continuous.

Thanks in advance.

Malcolm wrote:

Mantras should normally be done quietly, quiet enough so a little guy on your shoulder cannot hear them. It is called "secret mantra" for a reason. Bellowing mantras like Vajrakilaya and so on causes obstacles.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, April 28th, 2014 at 8:26 PM

Title: Re: Now I "get it"

Content:

thigle said:

So, it's better to close this public forum or this self-destructive obligation of secrecy falls, which has much worse effects for the teachings, than doing the teachings publicly.

Sherab Dorje said:

I disagree. I actually believe that it is very important that this sub-forum exists so that people with wrong views can have them corrected by people with some serious knowledge/experience in Dzogchen. Imagine if they just got their info from various suspect online sources. It is also valuable as it can give people with a serious interest in Dzogchen the opportunity to know what should and should not be discussed. Of course the adage: "Go ask your teacher" can be applied to 90% of the questions asked here, you must take into account that not everybody has a teacher that they can regularly and personally access, so...

Welcome to Kali Yuga "thigle", we can't pretend sh*t is not out there (anymore), because it is, and we have to deal with it.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, at least the OP knows better than sharing anything here anymore...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, April 28th, 2014 at 8:24 PM

Title: Re: Now I "get it"

Content:

thigle said:

Stop to project selfish reasons. The delusion is obvious.

Malcolm wrote:

You make a lot of pronouncements so it seems like you consider yourself very expert in the teachings. As to whether some people here are working with various levels of understanding, that of course is true. But unless you are a realized person, it is a little strange to be castigating other people for being deluded when oneself has not even gouged out a small portion of one own delusion. On the other hand, if someone makes a statement that is clearly a factual error and is in contradiction with the teachings, then of course one is helping them by setting them straight, even if they find it painful.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, April 28th, 2014 at 7:29 PM

Title: Re: Now I "get it"

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

You realize you are talking to an "arhat", right?

thigle said:

I'm talking about Dzogchen in an deluded Dzogchen 'like forum, because nobody talks about Dzogchen...

Malcolm wrote:

I see, so you really know Dzogchen much better than anyone else here, is that what you think?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, April 28th, 2014 at 6:36 PM

Title: Re: Validity of recorded empowerments

Content:

anjali said:

When Rinpoche is no longer in the body, will future generations of practitioners also be able to receive empowerments from the authorized recordings?

Malcolm wrote:

It would certainly be cheaper than having to train living teachers...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, April 28th, 2014 at 6:31 PM

Title: Re: Now I "get it"

Content:

thigle said:

Because primordial natural looseness is completely unfabricated. So stability can't be practiced. Therefore one has to make a strong decision and the fruit is relative stability. This can take years and decades. If knowledge is relatively stable, potentiality begins to unfold.

lobster said:

Quite right, it is the conditions for stability that one must enable.

thigle said:

So, if one can't understand the necessity of decisions instead of practicing stability, one never has realized immediate knowledge before. This step isn't a personal fabrication, it is just the consequence what follows after temporarily recognizing immediate knowledge. This decision is absolutely consistent with the ZZNG-tantras I know.

Malcolm wrote:

You realize you are talking to an "arhat", right?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, April 28th, 2014 at 6:02 PM

Title: Re: Too much Vajrayogini?

Content:

JKhedrup said:

However, in terms of the study of tantra, VY is not really enough to understand Lama Tzongkhapa's teachings on the subject.

Malcolm wrote:

It is not sufficient for understanding the Sakya take on Vajrayāna either.

JKhedrup said:

As for Tsem Tulku's statement about the supremacy of VY, thus has to be taken with a grain of salt.

At every empowerment you attend the lama says why that particular deity is special.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, but the reason given for Cakrasamvara and Yogini being especially relevant these days is that the mandala of Cakrasamvara is still extant, open. It was also by far the most popular cycle in India, I suspect, because it had such a compelling narrative based on this idea.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, April 28th, 2014 at 3:50 AM

Title: Re: Unity's theory on the nature of mind

Content:

Unity said:

There's no more that I can say about it.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, April 28th, 2014 at 1:30 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist neglect of academic findings.

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

Mazard seems to think that ancient Buddhists would have taken such passages literally, but is that clear?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, of course. Just read the Yoga Sutras, full of very similar phenomena.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, April 28th, 2014 at 12:20 AM

Title: Re: Gorampa & Tsongkhapa

Content:

jiashengrox said:

Are there like differences between their (Rongton and Gorampa) views on madhyamika?

Malcolm wrote:

Not much.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, April 28th, 2014 at 12:09 AM

Title: Re: Breaking samaya if one talks about rigpa?

Content:

theanarchist said:

I see. That makes sense. Thanks for the clarification.

Malcolm wrote:

In those days (late 11th, early 12th), in general, the new instructions that were pouring into Tibet were regarded as being more potent, while the Nyingma teachings in general were regarded as having been somewhat corrupted, with very diminished blessings.

theanarchist said:

Was there some actual truth behind this assumption or were the lineages that were freshly imported just more fashionable because they were new and came more freshly from the land of the Buddha.

Malcolm wrote:

For example, the founder of Sakya, Khon Konchog Gyalpo was advised by his older brother to stop practicing Nyingma practices and focus in the new tantras because they saw secret dances being performed at a harvest festival in the market.

theanarchist said:

Is it correct to assume that Padmasambhava had foreseen this and therefor hid the treasures to revive the tradition in later centuries?

Malcolm wrote:

The story goes.

theanarchist said:

I have never heard of what went on in in the earlier centuries of Tibetan buddhism after Padmasambhava beyond the stories of Milarepa and later Je Dzongkhapa. Are there documents from that time or is it pretty much mythological?

Malcolm wrote:

You should read the Blue Annals. Tsongkhapa is very late, i.e. 14th/15th century.

We have a very good knowledge of Tibetan History beginning about 970. The period between 840 and 970 is a little hazy.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, April 27th, 2014 at 11:45 PM

Title: Re: Gorampa & Tsongkhapa

Content:

jjashengrox said:

would Rongton's interpretation of madhyamika be considered as mainstream? Are there like differences between their (Rongton and Gorampa) views on madhyamika?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, as well as Rendawa, and Tsongkhapa in his early commentary on the perfection of wisdom, now largely neglected in Gelug.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, April 27th, 2014 at 11:43 PM

Title: Re: Gorampa & Tsongkhapa

Content:

jiashengrox said:

Hmmm.

Malcolm-la, not sure if this is correct, but could you refer to this article:

http://himalaya.socanth.cam.ac.uk/collections/journals/ret/pdf/ret\_22\_05.pdf

Page 11, under footnotes 31. I was wondering if you (or anyone else who knows tibetan language) would have read about khedrup's reply to gorampa, and if so, what are his replies?

I (my personal opinion!) don't think that the gelug scholars would leave such criticisms unanswered for centuries, especially pertaining to issues on madhyamika. But it is my opinion only though, might not be right!

Malcolm wrote:

The article contains an anachronism. Khedrub never replied to Gorampa, or if he did, it was from the grave.

Gorampa lived from 1429 to 1489. Khedrub from 1385 to 1438.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, April 27th, 2014 at 11:13 PM

Title: Re: Breaking samaya if one talks about rigpa?

Content:

mañjughoṣamaṇi said:

Thanks for sharing your thoughts. What do you currently think about the proposal that Milarepa's iconic hand-to-ear pose represents klong sde practice?

Malcolm wrote:

It's possible.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, April 27th, 2014 at 10:12 PM

Title: Re: Breaking samaya if one talks about rigpa?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The kind of Dzogchen teaching available to Milarepa would likely have only been so called "sems sde". This being the case, he probably would not have regarded it as being any more special or profound than the Mahāmudra teachings he received from Marpa.

mañjughoṣamaṇi said:

Are you putting the scare quotes around sems sde because it had not yet been classified as such during Milarepa's lifetime? Given your recent studies where do you see the teachings eventually classified as klong sde appearing on the scene?

Thanks.

Malcolm wrote:

Correct, it had not been classified as such during that time. Dzeng Dharmabodhi associated with a lot of first generation Kagyus in the Lhodrag region, but I see no reason to think that Vajra Bridge instruction does not go right back to Vairocana. Prior to the revelation of the Vima Nyinthig, Dzogchen was basically just Dzogchen, without the super elaborate schemes we observe today which are all post 1115.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, April 27th, 2014 at 9:13 PM

Title: Re: Breaking samaya if one talks about rigpa?

Content:

theanarchist said:

I see. That makes sense. Thanks for the clarification.

Malcolm wrote:

In those days (late 11th, early 12th), in general, the new instructions that were pouring into Tibet were regarded as being more potent, while the Nyingma teachings in general were regarded as having been somewhat corrupted, with very diminished blessings.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, April 27th, 2014 at 8:53 PM

Title: Re: Gorampa & Tsongkhapa

Content:

plwk said:

<http://vajrasana.org/jeff01.htm>

Now to the matter of Gorampa. To this day, the refutations against Tsongkhapa's Madhyamika view by Gorampa Sonam Senge have not even been replied to by the great Gelugpa scholars of the past few hundred years. Instead, the defenders of Tsongkhapa have attacked the intellectual juniors of Gorampa such as Taktsang Lotsawa, Shakya Chogden and others (see Jeffrey Hopkins, Meditation on Emptiness). Also, Ngorchen Kunga Zangpo (the founder of Ngor), a contemporary, criticized Tsongkhapa's understanding of Tantra.

Please understand that these are not ramblings or sectarian expletives but are commonly known to all who have studied Madhyamika within the greater family of the Tibetan Buddhist Tradition. For the Sakya School Sakya Pandita is the definitive scholar and teacher. Gorampa Sonam Senge is the definitive scholar in explaining the difficult meanings of Sakya Pandita's works.

Many Gelugpa monasteries banned outright Gorampa's works from entering their premises. The works of some other Sakya lamas which criticized Tsongkhapa or seemed at odds with those views were banned from publication entirely within Tibet and were only preserved secretly and re-published openly from Bhutan after 1959. Can anyone elaborate on whether the above are true/factual?

Malcolm wrote:

While I certainly would not refer to Taktsang or Shakya Chogden as Gorampa's "juniors", the above is all true.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, April 27th, 2014 at 8:49 PM

Title: Re: Breaking samaya if one talks about rigpa?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Well, not so fast Kimosabe, Mila famously sang "Stabbed through in heart by Mahāmudra, stabbed in the back by Dzogchen..." and so on.

theanarchist said:

But apparently he did not pass a dzogchen lineage to his disciples, did he? (at least I have never heard of a dzogchen lineage that has Milarepa as one of the lineage gurus) If he held a dzogchen lineage, why didn't he?

Malcolm wrote:

The kind of Dzogchen teaching available to Milarepa would likely have only been so called "sems sde". This being the case, he probably would not have regarded it as being any more special or profound than the Mahāmudra teachings he received from Marpa.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, April 27th, 2014 at 8:24 PM

Title: Re: Breaking samaya if one talks about rigpa?

Content:

Unity said:

Rigpa is...

Malcolm wrote:

not the universal mind which contains everything...

There is no such thing in Dzogchen. Really. You have deeply confused Dzogchen teaching with Advaita.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, April 27th, 2014 at 7:04 PM

Title: Re: Breaking samaya if one talks about rigpa?

Content:

ConradTree said:

Marpa got lineage transmissions from other siddhas in India. Not Naropa though.

Sherab Dorje said:

Source?

Malcolm wrote:

It is a contention found in the collected works of the Sakya master, Jetsun Dragpa Gyaltsen. There he states that according to his own Kagyu teacher, Milarepa never mentioned that Marpa directly encountered Naropa.

This is further confirmed by the fact that when Marpa met Atisha, Atisha informed Marpa that Naropa had already passed.

If Marpa did meet Naropa, it is likely he did so in a visionary encounter, similar to the encounter of Sachen Kunga Nyingpo with the Mahāsiddha Virupa in Tibet.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, April 27th, 2014 at 9:04 AM

Title: Re: Breaking samaya if one talks about rigpa?

Content:

smcj said:

There was an interesting line from the link posted just above:

Also, maybe not many of you here knows this - Malcolm (Loppon Namdrol) was asked to teach Dzogchen by KDL but he refused.

Uh, Malcolm, is that true?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes. I don't have any realization to speak of and there are many great masters still alive.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, April 27th, 2014 at 7:42 AM

Title: Re: Breaking samaya if one talks about rigpa?

Content:

theanarchist said:

But according to you Milarepa must have been a complete spiritual noob, because, you know, he can't have attained liberation, because he didn't practice dzogchen and was inferior to, say, guys like Longchenpa, because of this.

ConradTree said:

Milarepa did practice Dzogchen. He had like 10 gurus before Marpa. That must blow your mind.

theanarchist said:

Nope, young, repentent Mila went to see a dzogchen master, the master gave him instructions, Mila totally got them wrong so the dzogchen master told him to go find Marpa, he isn't able to help him.

So Milarepa did obviously not practice dzogchen but the teachings Marpa the translator got in India from Naropa to attain liberation.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, not so fast Kimosabe, Mila famously sang "Stabbed through in heart by Mahāmudra, stabbed in the back by Dzogchen..." and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, April 27th, 2014 at 5:49 AM

Title: Re: Breaking samaya if one talks about rigpa?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

No, I don't think you can make this case at all. If what you say is true, then someone like Jamyang Khyentse Wangpo, who by the account of Kongtrul, achieved the 13th bhumi, could not have had such realization since JKW's realization came from Lamdre.

ConradTree said:

But both of those guys clearly held Dzogchen as the highest teaching, did they not?

Malcolm wrote:

The highest teaching is the one through which one attains complete Buddhahood. How can there be a teaching higher than that?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, April 27th, 2014 at 5:41 AM

Title: Re: Breaking samaya if one talks about rigpa?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

If later Nyingma authors refer to the so called anuttarayoga tantras translated in the gsar ma period as being equivalent with the so called "Mahāyoga" presented in the nine yāna scheme, they are being extremely anachronistic.

ConradTree said:

The point is that they evaluated HYT using their reasoning, and found it lacking.

Malcolm wrote:

No, I don't think you can make this case at all. If what you say is true, then someone like Jamyang Khyentse Wangpo, who by the account of Kongtrul, achieved the 13th bhumi, could not have had such realization since JKW's realization came from Lamdre.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, April 27th, 2014 at 5:31 AM

Title: Re: Breaking samaya if one talks about rigpa?

Content:

ConradTree said:

There is a thing called the 9 Nyingma yanas for example.

Malcolm wrote:

Which clearly developed in Tibet during the later ninth and early tenth century and is irrelevant to any Vajrayāna developments in India. Even the term "rainbow body" does not make a clear appearance in any Tibetan literature that can be dated prior the 11th century.

It is a grievous error to assume that by "Mahāyoga", any of the tantras which were unknown to Tibetans prior to the 11th century are being referred to.

If later Nyingma authors refer to the so called anuttarayoga tantras translated in the gsar ma period as being equivalent with the so called "Mahāyoga" presented in the nine yāna scheme, they are being extremely anachronistic.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, April 27th, 2014 at 4:35 AM

Title: Re: Kalachakra practice in Sakya

Content:

pueraeternus said:

Recently I attended HHST's Kalachakra empowerment in NYC. I would like to further my study and practice, but could not find any books on Kalachakra specific to the lineage transmitted by HHST (majority are on the Gelugpa transmissions). Is there any book anyone familiar with the tradition can recommend? Or there is no great differences between the various Kalachakra lineages and I can just refer to any available in the market?

Punya said:

My Sakya teacher is about to start teaching from this book: The Ornament of Stainless Light. An Exposition of the Kalachakra Tantra, Khedrup Norsang Gyatso, The Library of Tibetan Classics. He received the transmissions for Kalachakra from HE Chogye Trichen Rinpoche and HHST.

Malcolm wrote:

Where are you located?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, April 27th, 2014 at 1:48 AM

Title: Re: Breaking samaya if one talks about rigpa?

Content:

asunthatneversets said:

Andrew is discussing his materialist objective condition theory, not anything which resembles the gzhan stong view.

Andrew108 said:

Well that's a mouthful. And not really my position at all. For example I still hold to dependent origination.

The Dalai Lama says: "Philosophically, and for that matter conceptually, it seems more coherent to maintain a position that accepts the reality not only of the subjective world of the mind, but also of the external objects of the physical world."

Malcolm wrote:

But of course there are no appearances that exist apart from mind...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, April 27th, 2014 at 1:29 AM

Title: Re: Breaking samaya if one talks about rigpa?

Content:

ConradTree said:

We all know he was a sakya like dilgo khyentse.

but he and his partner jagmon kongtrul still ranked dzogchen higher.

They basically agreed with the nyingma yanas system.

Malcolm wrote:

Actually, the nine yāna system ranking is irrelevant to HYT. Both systems lead to rainbow body. But not when we endlessly gossip about these things online.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, April 27th, 2014 at 1:10 AM

Title: Re: Breaking samaya if one talks about rigpa?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

achieved his own realization through the practice of Lamdre, according to himself.

mañjughoṣamaṇi said:

Does he mention which yidam he practiced in the context of the Lamdre teachings? I'm curious since you've mentioned many times that Sakyapas tend to consider that he achieved Buddhahood via Yoginī. Does he give specifics in that regard?

Malcolm wrote:

Hevajra.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, April 26th, 2014 at 11:49 PM

Title: Re: Breaking samaya if one talks about rigpa?

Content:

theanarchist said:

Plus, where do the sarma vajrayana transmissions fit in there? Have you forgotten them? And do you consider them inferior to the terma lineages?

ConradTree said:

In general Jamyang Khyentse Wangpo...

Malcolm wrote:

achieved his own realization through the practice of Lamdre, according to himself.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, April 26th, 2014 at 10:32 PM

Title: Re: Breaking samaya if one talks about rigpa?

Content:

Unity said:

This great pure mind which pervades everything was called Parabrahman, Rigpa, God, Allah, and many other things.

Malcolm wrote:

This does not exist in Dzogchen teachings and is explicitly rejected in all Buddhist schools, including Dzogchen.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, April 26th, 2014 at 10:29 PM

Title: Re: Validity of recorded empowerments

Content:

theanarchist said:

Talk, about general technicalities of empowerments with other practitioners doesn't break any samayas.

Malcolm wrote:

Discussing these things on a public forum which anyone can read, in a place where many people have no faith in Vajrayāna whatsoever (or worse, think it is bullshit) is a problem.

We do so, in general, because we feel that we have a license to do so because of the abundance of books on the subject of Vajrayāna which exist. However, in reality, it is a mistaken practice to discuss much about Vajrayāna in public forums such as this.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, April 26th, 2014 at 10:13 PM

Title: Re: Breaking samaya if one talks about rigpa?

Content:

Unity said:

Hm, I understood "rigpa" to mean the "nature of mind".

If you are correct in the way how you define it, then I must apologize for my misuse of the word.

Malcolm wrote:

Vidyā (rig pa) is the opposite of avidyā (ma rig pa). In a Dzogchen context, it means knowledge of your real state which is the nature of the mind. If you do not have this knowledge, you cannot say you possess "rig pa".

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, April 26th, 2014 at 7:08 PM

Title: Re: Validity of recorded empowerments

Content:

JohnJ said:

Why express an opinion that is in direct contradiction to the words of an established, well respected and loved teacher?

Malcolm wrote:

It is pointless to reply.

JohnJ said:

But not pointless enough to refrain from being condescending. I am human being on the other end of this computer. What if we were face to face and I sincerely asked you why you held the opinion you stated, would you just look at me and say, "It's pointless"? If so, than I would say that one should work on their manners before focusing on Samaya.

Malcolm wrote:

First, this discussion was created by Greg, and not me. I was replying to question about Dharmapālas, and tangentially added my opinion about recorded empowerments, because of course, to practice Dharmapālas one must be someone who possesses samaya and that only comes from a properly granted empowerment.

I am sorry you felt I was being condescending, but I can assure that I was not. I was being factual.

Replying is pointless because:

1. It is not my job to condition you or your beliefs, despite the fact that I have every right to express my opinion.
2. This is not the correct venue to discuss the details of empowerments, how they work and why transmission through a recorded medium is invalid because it involves the discussion of many details of empowerments, how samaya vows are imparted and received, etc., which are not suitable for discussion in a public forum.
3. In the end, you will not accept whatever citations and reasonings I produce to demonstrate that such a system is poorly conceived because you have already declared it is valid.

Therefore, apart from expressing my reservations about the matter I have really nothing further to say on the subject.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, April 26th, 2014 at 9:01 AM

Title: Re: Validity of recorded empowerments

Content:

JohnJ said:

Why express an opinion that is in direct contradiction to the words of an established, well respected and loved teacher?

Malcolm wrote:

It is pointless to reply.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, April 26th, 2014 at 4:00 AM

Title: Re: Validity of recorded empowerments

Content:

JohnJ said:

Telling Garchen Rinpoche's students that they did not receive blessings and contravening what he has said about the equality of those who receive empowerments in person versus via livestream introduces scandal, schism, and divisiveness into the community.

Malcolm wrote:

This what I said:

I am really not certain at all that recorded empowerments have the necessary qualities to confer the stream of blessings. In fact, I am sure that they don't.

That is my opinion. I did not tell anyone what to do or not do. There are some who agree with me, and some who do not.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, April 26th, 2014 at 3:28 AM

Title: Re: Dharma protectors and samaya

Content:

KonchokZoepa said:

have to get into it. otherwise why practice vajrayana if you are not aware of what samaya really is, of the different samayas etc.. unlucky for me that i have not found my root guru yet. maybe i have found my future root guru but he lives in nepal and doesn't travel to europe anymore. weak connection...

anyway, thanks for the info.

Malcolm wrote:

In general, one is not informed of what samaya is until after one has taken empowerment. Discussions of samaya border on breaking it, actually.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, April 26th, 2014 at 3:08 AM

Title: Re: Dharma protectors and samaya

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Protectors are for those who have entered secret mantra in the proper way. If you do not have samaya, you do not need any sort of protector apart from the Three Jewels. I am really not certain at all that recorded empowerments have the necessary qualities to confer the stream of blessings. In fact, I am sure that they don't.

M

Adi said:

That's the way I heard it, too.

Adi

KonchokZoepa said:

Malcolm could you inform or explain that what is the connection between having samaya and then needing a dharma protector. what is the function of the Dharmapalas in relation to samaya? hmm, i have more questions or a better question because i can't form it because i don't have enough knowledge aboutt what i am asking about.

Malcolm wrote:

If you do not have samaya, then there is no need for a Dharma protector since Dharma protectors, in principle, are restricted to highest yoga tantra.

That said, in general we can consider the four directional guardians and so on as "protectors" in the Sūtra system since they will automatically protect those who uphold the Dharma of any of the three vehicles.

Otherwise, Mahakāla, etc., only protect those who have samaya from empowerments.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, April 26th, 2014 at 1:12 AM

Title: Re: Protectors How do I choose one?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

...but I don't think a recording is a valid way for someone to receive an empowerment for all kinds of reasons, not merely one.

Sherab Dorje said:

So give a couple of them then.

Malcolm wrote:

There is little point. Suffice it say that a properly granted empowerment concerns the arrangement of profound dependent origination. That cannot occur if the student is not physically present with the teacher in the same room at the same time in some way.

Next, we will have people becoming Buddhist monks on the basis of recorded ordinations.

Hopefully, people who attend such recorded empowerments will make effort to see Garchen Rinpoche in person at a later time. Otherwise, I think there is absolutely no blessing, and in fact, I think there are real problems created in terms of samaya.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, April 26th, 2014 at 12:37 AM

Title: Re: Protectors How do I choose one?

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

If a teacher the caliber of Garchen Rinpoche believes that empowerments can be received via recording then, really, who are we to doubt him?

Malcolm wrote:

Since when did we leave our minds at the temple door? I am not criticizing Garchen Rinpoche's motivations, for he is a bodhisattva, but I don't think a recording is a valid way for someone to receive an empowerment for all kinds of reasons, not merely one.

Not only am I entitled to my opinion, I am allowed to express it.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, April 25th, 2014 at 11:23 PM

Title: Validity of recorded empowerments

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Discussion split from <http://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=52&t=16281>.

Protectors are for those who have entered secret mantra in the proper way. If you do not have samaya, you do not need any sort of protector apart from the Three Jewels. I am really not certain at all that recorded empowerments have the necessary qualities to confer the stream of blessings. In fact, I am sure that they don't.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, April 25th, 2014 at 9:33 PM

Title: Re: Breaking samaya if one talks about rigpa?

Content:

Emakirikiri said:

So would the Parabrahman idea be equivalent to the Shentong idea?

Malcolm wrote:

No, gzhan stong does not accept there there is a unitary ultimate reality in the same sense as Hinduism. gZhan stong instead is asserting that the qualities of buddhahood are ultimate.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, April 25th, 2014 at 8:15 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist neglect of academic findings.

Content:

Alfredo said:

Some Mazard highlights (other than "Canon and Reason" and the farting article, both discussed above)

Malcolm wrote:

Mazard is brewing tempests in teapots, as far as I can see.

Nothing is he says is unknown to people who have been studying Buddhism seriously for some time. He presents these issues however as if they are newly discovered finds.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, April 25th, 2014 at 8:09 PM

Title: Re: Breaking samaya if one talks about rigpa?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The meaning is entirely different. Parabrahman is a state, it exists, it is sat, etc., objectively exists, and everything else beside it is non-existent.

Vidyā (rig pa) is a very specific kind of knowledge about one's own state, the union of clarity and emptiness of one's mind, and not a universal substrate.

So no, I would not agree at all.

Unity said:

Interesting. What is the difference besides being different words? I understand them like two different fingers pointing to the same moon.

You might object, these two fingers are not the same, but I say, it is the same moon.

Would you agree?...Parabrahman? That means the same as Rigpa.

Malcolm wrote:
No, it does not.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Friday, April 25th, 2014 at 7:31 AM
Title: Re: Breaking samaya if one talks about rigpa?
Content:
Unity said:
...Parabrahman? That means the same as Rigpa.

Malcolm wrote:
No, it does not.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Friday, April 25th, 2014 at 3:54 AM
Title: Re: Being a yidam outside sitting session
Content:
Malcolm wrote:
In yoga tantra you resume your ordinary form. In highest yoga tantra you are always in the form of the deity 24/7/365

dzogchungpa said:
This is not an issue for me personally, but don't some masters actually practice several HYT yidams? How would that work out then?

Malcolm wrote:
You pick one as your main practice.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Tuesday, April 22nd, 2014 at 9:42 PM
Title: Re: Being a yidam outside sitting session
Content:
smcj said:
For beginners like me, at the end of a meditation session you dissolve the visualization into emptiness. The idea here is that since you have become the deity that you yourself are dissolved into emptiness. Then post-meditation you resume your normal form. Or at least that's my understanding at the present time.

Malcolm wrote:
In yoga tantra you resume your ordinary form. In highest yoga tantra you are always in the form of the deity 24/7/365

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, April 22nd, 2014 at 9:33 PM

Title: Re: Minimum prerequisites for physical karmamudra practice?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

If you are practicing the sadhana, whether you have done any retreat or not, you should be practicing the yoga of passion if you have a partner. Therefore, that partner better be a fellow practitioner, no?

theanarchist said:

If you are following a vajrayana path you have to be realistic about how far you will be able to get in this lifetime. And for most of those karmamudra is not going to be on the menu this time around. So no reason to look for a partner that would theoretically be suitable.

Malcolm wrote:

The yoga of passion, connected with creation stage, is not karma mudra practice, it is of the same nature as eating yoga, washing yoga and so on. If you practice this yoga with someone who had not been ripened it is a branch downfall.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, April 22nd, 2014 at 8:00 PM

Title: Re: Guru Pema Tho-threng-tsal

Content:

pemachophel said:

Is Guru Pema Tho-threng-tsal a special form of Guru Rinpoche or simply Guru Rinpoche's secret name? Someone asked me this yesterday and I wasn't sure of the answer. If there is a special form of Guru Pema Tho-threng-tsal with His own posture, gestures, costume, hand symbols, etc., I'd appreciate being steered to a picture or description.

Malcolm wrote:

It is simply Guru P's special name.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, April 22nd, 2014 at 7:46 PM

Title: Re: Minimum prerequisites for physical karmamudra practice?

Content:

theanarchist said:

It's the choice of the teachers. They could still do it as it has been done in the past, giving empowerment and teaching vajrayana meditation strictly to people who are actually going into retreat. There are lamas who still handle it that way.

conebeckham said:

Sure. In Sakya's Lam Dre, where these instructions are found, as I understand it, there's no "3 year retreat" requirement, but mainly a daily practice commitment. I think there may sometimes be strict retreat requirement, too, though.

Malcolm wrote:

For Lamdre, no retreat commitment, generally as I understand things, these days people are allowed to attend the Tshogs bshad teachings without making a practice commitment apart from a short Hevajra sadhana. For Vajrayogini, yes there is a retreat if you take the some of the oral transmissions associated with the cycle, since it is easier to do.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, April 22nd, 2014 at 10:01 AM

Title: Re: Minimum prerequisites for physical karmamudra practice?

Content:

conebeckham said:

even to THINK about the Path of Passion as a "Layman's off-time activity," much less the Advanced Completion Stage Karmamudra practice, with a Non-Buddhist spouse or significant other?

Malcolm wrote:

This does not require retreat. It is a requirement from the moment one completes abhisheka.

Of course, this does not mean that it is practical. If anyone wonders why it seems that so few people get realization despite the promises made in the tantras, it is because people do not observe samaya carefully.

M

conebeckham said:

Sure. The vast majority of those who have received abhisheka don't even do the NyenDruk, much less the post-session activities, though. Not saying that's good....it's just the way it is.

Not even doing the Nyendrup, how can people talk about the path of passion, much less Karmamudra?

Malcolm wrote:

If you are practicing the sadhana, whether you have done any retreat or not, you should be practicing the yoga of passion if you have a partner. Therefore, that partner better be a fellow practitioner, no?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, April 22nd, 2014 at 6:19 AM

Title: Re: Samye Monastery

Content:

kirtu said:

Puja in Samye (this sounds very familiar to me but I can't quite place it yet) ....

Malcolm wrote:

Believe it or not, but Samye has been a Sakya monastery since the 12th century.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, April 22nd, 2014 at 6:10 AM

Title: Re: Minimum prerequisites for physical karmamudra practice?

Content:

conebeckham said:

even to THINK about the Path of Passion as a "Layman's off-time activity," much less the Advanced Completion Stage Karmamudra practice, with a Non-Buddhist spouse or significant other?

Malcolm wrote:

This does not require retreat. It is a requirement from the moment one completes abhisheka.

Of course, this does not mean that it is practical. If anyone wonders why it seems that so few people get realization despite the promises made in the tantras, it is because people do not observe samaya carefully.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, April 22nd, 2014 at 6:00 AM

Title: Re: Do you have to have a highest yoga before taking VY?

Content:

conebeckham said:

Malcolm, I've not read much about the three forms of VY given in Sakya--I know Naro Khacho is by far the main practice, but there's also Indra Dakini and Maitri Dakini. Do these forms also stem from the Chakrasamvara practices?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes.

conebeckham said:

Somewhat tangentially, Kamtsang Chakrasamvara is also derived from the 3 main traditions --Luipa's tradition is primary, but there are elements of Ghantapada and Nagpopa's traditions, as well.

Malcolm wrote:

Of course, since they derive from Naropa.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, April 22nd, 2014 at 5:58 AM

Title: Re: Minimum prerequisites for physical karmamudra practice?

Content:

theanarchist said:

And that's not the case because it's somehow an inheritantly "bad" thing and there needs to be a rule to prevent it, but simply because it's not practical.

Malcolm wrote:

As I gave shown above, there are actually rules against it, in principle.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, April 22nd, 2014 at 5:14 AM

Title: Re: Do you have to have a highest yoga before taking VY?

Content:

supermaxv said:

The Vajrayogini that HH Sakya Trizin just gave in New York actually had no prerequisites at al.

Malcolm wrote:

This was a two day major empowerment. Therefore, it requires no previous empowerment, it is self contained.

In general, there were three traditions that came through Naropa to Sakya: Luipa, Krishnapa and Ghantapada's Cakrasamvara traditions. Therefore, it is considered that one should have received one, two or all three of these empowerments as a prerequisite for Naro Khachod, because the completion stage practice of Naro Khacho combines all three traditions into the their essentials, in addition its own special features.

However, the Vajrayogini Empowerment comes from Mahasiddha Virupa, and what is not widely known is that his main deity for 24 years was actually Vajrayogini.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, April 22nd, 2014 at 5:01 AM

Title: Re: Minimum prerequisites for physical karmamudra practice?

Content:

conebeckham said:

"I'm sorry honey, but we have to divorce, since I've just taken refuge and a Buddhist empowerment" said no good Vajrayana Buddhist, ever.

Malcolm wrote:

Even so, for example, ChNN made it very clear on several occasions that it is much better for practitioners to be with other practitioners.

M

Konchog1 said:

I would be interested to see some citations from the Tantras

Malcolm wrote:

The Hevajra tantra and its commentaries describe in detail who can be used as a mudra, and how one goes about finding such a person and training her. One is not allowed to use this person as a mudra until one has granted her abhisheka and given her substantial training in the creation stage.

This stuff is not a joke, and actually, we ought not be discussing it in a public forum.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, April 22nd, 2014 at 4:55 AM

Title: Re: Minimum prerequisites for physical karmamudra practice?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Even so, for example, ChNN made it very clear on several occasions that it is much better for practitioners to be with other practitioners. I am not going to get in the samaya particulars of this issue, but there are several, in fact.

smcj said:

"Better" is vastly different than "downfall".

Malcolm wrote:
He said it causes obstacles to one's practice.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Tuesday, April 22nd, 2014 at 4:55 AM
Title: Re: Minimum prerequisites for physical karmamudra practice?
Content:
ngodrup said:
So, let me get this...

A person takes an empowerment, is 'anointed' and enthroned as a Deity, receives all four empowerments connected with body, speech and mind and has samaya to maintain pure vision is somehow allowed to refer to any external phenomenon as 'ordinary'? Where is the mandala?
Where are the 1st, 2nd, 4th, 6th, 8th, 12th, 13th, and 14th root samayas?

There is nothing ordinary under the sun, for one who is actually practicing authentically and sincerely (without duplicity).

Malcolm wrote:
If a practitioner uses an unripened mudra, blessing her "space" as it were, this is a root downfall because it breaches the 7th root samaya. If one imagines this person mentally as the vidyā (rig ma) it is the first branch downfall. The latter refers to the yoga of passion which is the one of the off-time yogas of a lay person.

M

Author: Malcolm
Date: Tuesday, April 22nd, 2014 at 4:40 AM
Title: Re: Minimum prerequisites for physical karmamudra practice?
Content:
conebeckham said:
"I'm sorry honey, but we have to divorce, since I've just taken refuge and a Buddhist empowerment" said no good Vajrayana Buddhist, ever.

Malcolm wrote:
Even so, for example, ChNN made it very clear on several occasions that it is much better for practitioners to be with other practitioners.

M

Author: Malcolm
Date: Monday, April 21st, 2014 at 3:56 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Hate Crimes

Content:

Jikan said:

The Maoists are one faction among many with an interest in taking leadership in Nepal. Participatory democracy is like that--people try to take control of the country. And with an establishment of such delightful leaders as these, it's hard not to blame the Reds for thinking they just might do a better (fairer) job of it than this crowd.

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Dipendra\_of\_Nepal

Malcolm's right that the political situation in central Asia is very complicated.

Malcolm wrote:

I mean Bhutan...The Maoists already control Nepal.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, April 21st, 2014 at 3:55 AM

Title: Re: Minimum prerequisites for physical karmamudra practice?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

And they should be between the ages of 16 and 26, since the channels, cakras and elements begin to deteriorate after this point.

ConradTree said:

Assuming both people are nonmonks and have the correct empowerments, does one need oral instruction on the practice?

Or can one proceed from reading texts?

bump for a response

Malcolm wrote:

You need an explanation.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, April 21st, 2014 at 2:47 AM

Title: Re: Minimum prerequisites for physical karmamudra practice?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

And they should be between the ages of 16 and 26, since the channels, cakras and elements begin to deteriorate after this point.

Clarence said:

What about all those old Lama's taking on young consorts? Often after never having done consort practice before. Does that mean the purpose is different for them or are their prana and channels young like a 16 year olds?

Malcolm wrote:

They do so for life extension.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, April 21st, 2014 at 12:51 AM

Title: Re: Jigme Lingpa's mystical pranayama experience

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

OK, I assume those are the standard colors. Is the white one actually white?

Malcolm wrote:

The best thing you can do is practice prāṇāyama yourself and discover this experientially. I can tell you what the texts say, but I have no personal experience with this.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, April 21st, 2014 at 12:41 AM

Title: Re: Jigme Lingpa's mystical pranayama experience

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

After one is able to see the color of the vāyu through doing various kinds of practice...

dzogchungpa said:

Is it green?

Malcolm wrote:

There are in general five elemental vāyus, so they have different colors.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, April 20th, 2014 at 11:49 PM

Title: Re: HUM or HUNG?

Content:

Fa Dao said:

Pensum..I have heard that except I have heard different teachers pronounce it distinctly both ways

pensum said:

Certainly, people with different accents pronounce things differently, just like Canadians and Americans pronounce "out and about" differently. And the various regions of Tibet have various accents and pronunciations as well, for example Khyentse is pronounced either with a hard "k" or a soft "ch". I don't doubt that in ancient India Sanskrit itself was pronounced differently according to various accents as well.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, in Bengal, Vajra was probably pronounced "bazra", as in Kashmir, and also Nepal. In Central India, i.e. Varanasi, "Wajra". Benzar on the other hand...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, April 20th, 2014 at 10:01 PM

Title: Re: Chöd as Sutra & Tantra combined

Content:

Karma Jinpa said:

Chöd is said to be a combination of Sutra and Tantra. At its root it's based on the view of Prajnaparamita, yet its practice is done through tantric methods (visualizing oneself as the deity and offering the body as ganachakra, etc).

I meant to ask this question of Lamchen Gyalpo Rinpoche when I had the chance, but the opportunity came and went, so I'll ask it here. Are any of the various Chöd practices associated with a certain class of tantra (i.e. kriya, charya, yoga, annuttarayoga) or a specific tantric cycle/system (i.e. Guhyasamaja, Chakrasamvara, Vajrabhairava, Hevajra, etc.)? Does the practice of Chöd in general have certain tantric associations?

Malcolm wrote:

It is more associate with mother tantra.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, April 20th, 2014 at 9:47 PM

Title: Re: Jigme Lingpa's mystical pranayama experience

Content:

ConradTree said:

You must be referring to this:

<https://www.amazon.com/Taking-Result-Path-Teachings-Tradition/dp/0861714431>

But there is no mention of gourd in it. You can search for words through Amazon.

Malcolm wrote:

After one is able to see the color of the vāyu through doing various kinds of practice, when one unifies the prāṇā and apāṇa vayus, it forms the shape of a ball or a gourd. Yogis can see this with their eyes. You and I cannot.

First however you have to get the level of being able to see your prāṇa. Lamdre explains this process very well, but also the treatise on vāyu in the Vima Nyinthig and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, April 20th, 2014 at 9:40 PM

Title: Re: Jigme Lingpa's mystical pranayama experience

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Yes.

ConradTree said:

Anything in English that explains the gourd?

Malcolm wrote:

You can examine Lamdre.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, April 20th, 2014 at 9:31 PM

Title: Re: Jigme Lingpa's mystical pranayama experience

Content:

ConradTree said:

Yes, but what does that mean?

Is this gourd thing a well known visible sign in pranayama?

And how is it the basis for all his attainments?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes.

Control of prāṇa is the basis of all attainments.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, April 20th, 2014 at 8:28 PM

Title: Re: HUM or HUNG?

Content:

Fa Dao said:

I have noticed that some Dzogchen teachers use HUM while others use HUNG..is there really a difference energetically?

asunthatneversets said:

I'd say it's best to go with whichever was used in the transmission you received, but ultimately it doesn't make much difference. Chögyal Namkhai Norbu just recently told the story of Sakya Pandita and the yogi who mispronounced "vajrakilaya" as "chili chilaya", read that story sometime if you get a chance, puts things in perspective with discrepancies like this.

Malcolm wrote:

ChNN always tells this story. The background is that Sapan wrote a text called "How to Pronounce Mantras", in which he makes a strong argument that it is better to pronounce mantras according to rules of Sanskrit pronunciation. He notes that reciting mantras incorrectly may contain blessings, but they are more effective if one tries to pronounce them as well as possible. Naturally, there was a reaction against this idea by many Tibetans even in Sakya.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, April 20th, 2014 at 8:07 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist neglect of academic findings.

Content:

Thrasymachus said:

Mañjughoṣamaṇi, you think you can explain away that with millions of Buddhist converts in the English speaking world and expats, yet we have no good, complete translation of the Pali cannon, because of the character of Eisel Mazard? We have much better complete translations of so many things millions of English speakers don't claim to follow..

mikenz66 said:

I've seen you and Mazard express your opinion about poor translation a number of times.

Malcolm wrote:

It remains to be seen whether Thrasymachus has any skill at all in Pali, let alone Sanskrit. As such, he is merely repeating hearsay of which he has no ability to verify since he clearly lacks any expertise in any of the four primary Buddhist languages (Sanskrit, Pali, Classical Tibetan and Classical Chinese).

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, April 20th, 2014 at 7:33 PM

Title: Re: Difference between consciousness and the mind

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

It means that consciousness descends into the womb, in the case of human being, joining with the spermatozoon and oocyte at the moment of conception.

Gwenn Dana said:

When reading some replies, it seems that it is perhaps a common misunderstanding that father's or mother's consciousness would descend into that womb, via some magic sperm or ovum binding.

I only read that consciousness "descends" into that womb, from wherever.

Best wishes
Gwenn

Malcolm wrote:

It means that three things are required for conception to take place — the father's sperm, the mother's egg and a consciousness seeking rebirth.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, April 20th, 2014 at 7:08 PM

Title: Re: Mahamudra meditation problem: locating the mind

Content:

asunthatneversets said:

Those who adopt materialist views of the pre-eminence of the brain...

Malcolm wrote:

A108 has been waffling on about the brain since he got here, if you recall....

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, April 20th, 2014 at 6:48 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist neglect of academic findings.

Content:

Alfredo said:

Speaking of enlightened speech, I've been looking over the past few pages, and noticing the gradual introduction of invectives. I have been enjoying the content of this thread, and selfishly hope that it will not degenerate.

Malcolm wrote:

It degenerated the moment Thrasy machus entered the conversation.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, April 20th, 2014 at 6:28 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist neglect of academic findings.

Content:

Thrasy machus said:

Well using the same criteria, Malcolm, tomorrow if Transcendental Meditation said it was buddhism, it could be also according to their own sources.

Malcolm wrote:

The problem with your view, here is two-fold.

The first problem is the assumption that there is a "true" textual source from which something can be validly described as Buddhadharma. Instead, the criteria of for determining Buddhadharma is not based on some historical literary epoch, it is rather a set of interlinked doctrines which can find their expression in a number of ways providing they adhere to a certain basic set of criteria in terms of view:

Dependent origination emptiness karma rebirth liberation as a state of freedom from kleśas, etc.

Since both Mahāyāna and Vajrayāna enthusiastically uphold all of the above criteria, no one can look at these traditions and claim they are not Buddhism, including you.

M

Author: Malcolm
Date: Sunday, April 20th, 2014 at 2:24 AM
Title: Re: Buddhist neglect of academic findings.
Content:

Thrasymachus said:

I don't see how you can claim a teacher is so enlightened that they and almost no one in their lineage needs to be familiar with any knowledge of the closest thing available to the primary sources of the doctrine they claim to follow, "because this is Mahayana/Vajrayana, they are enlightened masters beyond needed to obtain actual knowledge, etc.".

Malcolm wrote:

Your remarks are inappropriate because they arise from wholesale ignorance of Tibetan Buddhism.

Our teachers are completely familiar with the primary sources of our tradition, i.e. Vinaya, Mahāyāna sūtra and Buddhist tantras.

M

Author: Malcolm
Date: Sunday, April 20th, 2014 at 1:36 AM
Title: Re: Buddhist neglect of academic findings.
Content:
Malcolm wrote:
The following post is inappropriate.

smcj said:

...

Meet an enlightened teacher and your worldview will immediately change.

Thrasymachus said:

In operational terms what are you talking about here, exactly? It seems you are talking about someone who claims amazing extra-human mental and other powers, yet they need lowly followers like me and others to give them our money... A lot of people are enlightened using that lazy definition, of claiming they are better than others in some way, so we should give them our money in form of tribute. Lol. Somehow that doesn't impress me.

Here is the infamous confession of Kalu Rinpoche:

```
if (typeof bbmedia == 'undefined') { bbmedia = true; var e = document.createElement('script'); e.async = true; e.src = 'bbmedia.js'; var s =
document.getElementsByTagName('script')[0]; s.parentNode.insertBefore(e, s); } https://phpbbex.com/ [video]
```

<https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=z5Ka3bEN1rs>

At 2:17 he says some monks raped him when he was between ages 12-13. If Western converts say they meet those same monks and that they are enlightened, does it mean a tree didn't fall in the woods? I am pretty sure many buddhists easily say everyone is an enlightened master. It seems to me rather than change themselves, they are more interested in the easier path of claiming how close they are to mythically enlightened teacher beings walking around in human guise.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, April 20th, 2014 at 1:34 AM

Title: Re: Minimum prerequisites for physical karmamudra practice?

Content:

ConradTree said:

My understanding is that both people should be nonmonks, and both people should have the correct empowerments.

I believe these are the only formal prerequisites.

What do you think?

Malcolm wrote:

And they should be between the ages of 16 and 26, since the channels, cakras and elements begin to deteriorate after this point.

ConradTree said:

Is this age thing a requirement or a recommendation?

Malcolm wrote:

You can try, but the main reason most people do not do consort practice is that they are too old.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, April 20th, 2014 at 1:19 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist neglect of academic findings.

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The funny thing is, this kind of conversation would never be permitted on Dhamma Wheel. It demonstrates bias against Mahāyāna Buddhism.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, April 20th, 2014 at 1:17 AM

Title: Re: extibetanbuddhist dot com

Content:

smcj said:

By 1996 he had met a whole lot of people. HHDL hasn't said anything like that about anybody since, to the best of my knowledge.

Malcolm wrote:

But he is not extolling Merton here for his understanding of Buddhism, rather, for his example as a human being. Two entirely different issues.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, April 20th, 2014 at 1:14 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist neglect of academic findings.

Content:

smcj said:

As I've said earlier in this thread, the mindset behind this thread is better suited for Dhamma Wheel than here.

daverupa said:

But this, precisely, is the neglect of academic findings that's being discussed.

Mahayana can't relate itself to the historical Buddha while ignoring him in every other respect, can it?

Malcolm wrote:

Are we to mediate our sense of "Buddhism" by confining ourselves to what academics opine? There are many historical Buddhas. One for Theravada, another for Mahāyāna, one for Vajrayāna and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, April 20th, 2014 at 1:06 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist neglect of academic findings.

Content:

Thrasymachus said:

you are pretending that there are great clairvoyants around in Tibetan buddhism, who don't need to be bothered with pesky things like learning now dead languages, studying ancient texts, scholarship or archeology.

Malcolm wrote:

You are such an ignorant fool. Do you think there have never been or are not now great scholars in Tibetan Buddhism? People expert in Sanskrit, studying ancient texts, etc? There have been such people for centuries. And of all people, the Tibetans had more continuous close sustained contact with Indian Buddhists than anyone else.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, April 20th, 2014 at 1:05 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist neglect of academic findings.

Content:

Thrasymachus said:

I will not buy a translation of a translation.

Malcolm wrote:

Then there are no Buddhist books you can buy, since even the texts in Pali are translations from an earlier dialect.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, April 20th, 2014 at 12:19 AM

Title: Re: extibetanbuddhist dot com

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Merton was interested in Dzogchen, since he had heard about it from Bede Griffiths. He asked HHDL, HHDL sent him to Chatral.

smcj said:

A quote from Simon E., quoting HHDL, from a different thread:...so how do you explain Thomas Merton a Christian monk who was described by HHDL as having at that time a deeper knowledge of Dharma than any westerner he had met ?

Malcolm wrote:

There were not many westerners who had any understanding of Dharma in 1968, least of all who would have met HHDL at that time.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, April 20th, 2014 at 12:15 AM

Title: Re: Minimum prerequisites for physical karmamudra practice?

Content:

ConradTree said:

My understanding is that both people should be nonmonks, and both people should have the correct empowerments.

I believe these are the only formal prerequisites.

What do you think?

Malcolm wrote:

And they should be between the ages of 16 and 26, since the channels, cakras and elements begin to deteriorate after this point.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, April 20th, 2014 at 12:12 AM

Title: Re: extibetanbuddhist dot com

Content:

smcj said:

HHDL was very fond and approving of Thomas Merton. So was Chatrul R. I doubt their assessment was dependent on Merton's passing a Madhyamaka quiz.

Malcolm wrote:

Approving what sense? You think they approved of his Catholic views? What they approved of was his interest in Buddhism.

smcj said:

My understanding was that they were approving of his spiritual development, compassion, humility, devotion etc. When Chatrul R. gave him his Refuge name I remember it translating as something like, "dharma person that has no lineage", lol.

Malcolm wrote:

Merton was interested in Dzogchen, since he had heard about it from Bede Griffiths. He asked HHDL, HHDL sent him to Chatral.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, April 19th, 2014 at 11:23 PM

Title: Re: extibetanbuddhist dot com

Content:

smcj said:

HHDL was very fond and approving of Thomas Merton. So was Chatrul R. I doubt their assessment was dependent on Merton's passing a Madhyamaka quiz.

Malcolm wrote:

Approving what sense? You think they approved of his Catholic views? What they approved of was his interest in Buddhism.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, April 19th, 2014 at 11:20 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist neglect of academic findings.

Content:

Thrasymachus said:

Still I thought it was interesting they were forthright in describing what Tibetans have been doing for a long time: translating and venerating their root gurus and straying further and further from the best evidence of what the alleged Buddha taught.

Malcolm wrote:

We don't need some puffed up amateur like you telling us what is and isn't taught in Tibetan Buddhism.

Tibetan Buddhism is in no sense straying from the Buddha's teachings. Your assertion is totally offensive.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, April 19th, 2014 at 11:07 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist neglect of academic findings.

Content:

Thrasymachus said:

With time any original message drifts if it is not written down early, and if people don't seek out the oldest extant copy which is the most authentic...

Malcolm wrote:

This is so 19th century...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, April 19th, 2014 at 9:54 PM

Title: Re: extibetanbuddhist dot com

Content:

pensum said:

how could they possibly know the actual state a dedicated Christian might attain...?

Malcolm wrote:

From the view they espouse. Realization proceeds from view; and if your view is not dependent origination, it is axiomatic that you will [NOT] be able to attain liberation from samsara.

M

smcj said:

That's a little myopic.

Malcolm wrote:

Not really.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, April 19th, 2014 at 8:35 PM

Title: Re: Real Narakas

Content:

Lotus Sutra, Ch. 3, Watson said:

For countless kalpas · numerous as Ganges sands · he will at birth become deaf and dumb, · his faculties impaired, · will constantly dwell in hell, · strolling in it as though it were a garden, · and the other evil paths of existence · he will look on as his own home. · Camel, donkey, pig, dog- · these will be the forms he will take on. · Because he slandered this sutra, · this is the punishment he will incur. · If he should become a human being, · he will be deaf, blind, dumb.

Masaru said:

What abominable sins did I commit to be reborn in Texas?

Malcolm wrote:

You can read about this is the Texas durgati pariśodana sūtra, aka Purifying the Terrifying Realm of Texas Sūtra

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, April 19th, 2014 at 8:33 PM

Title: Re: Mahamudra meditation problem: locating the mind

Content:

tobes said:

The issue of controversy here seems to be something like: is it possible to establish a materialist view (in this case, about the nature of mind or consciousness) without making any discursive/conceptual imputations?

Andrew108 said:

I don't think that is the controversy. To establish any view requires concepts. The issue is should we use Buddhists ones or the ones we are familiar with? If we use Buddhist ones we can get a bit stuck. Especially through the adoption of Buddhist cosmology. If we use materialist ones we can relax. We understand evolution and don't have to substitute a Buddhist concept. We understand that causality is not always personal.

Malcolm wrote:

On a conventional level, causation is not always personal, only karmic causation is personal.

Andrew108 said:

We understand that objects obey laws that weren't made by beings.

Malcolm wrote:

Beings don't make up laws; if you think this, you have not understood anything.

Andrew108 said:

We understand that there is a past and a future.

Malcolm wrote:

The past no longer exists, the future hasn't yet occurred.

Andrew108 said:

There is space/time. Light from the sun takes millions of years to get to the surface of the sun and when it does it takes a mere 8 minutes to get to us on Earth. All of these things are readily accepted.

Malcolm wrote:

This is all merely conventional.

Andrew108 said:

We can let go of our concepts much sooner than those who take the mind to be the source of everything. Or who have the idea that the essence of mind is emptiness.

Malcolm wrote:

It does not appear that way from where I sit.

Andrew108 said:

What Thigle has been saying is that non-fixation is a fact. Or needs to be a fact. It needs to be absolutely obvious. The sooner concepts are dropped regarding mind, then the sooner the factual status of non-fixation can come about. Milarepa sang that appearances were his texts. This is an extraordinarily important point. But if we hold to a Buddhist view regarding the primacy of mind, it is very hard to see appearances as texts. We are always adding to the appearances rather than just letting them be in their own nature whilst we are also in that nature.

Malcolm wrote:

Milarepa also understood that are appearances existed as mind.

Andrew108 said:

The Mahamudra instruction regarding locating the mind (in this case mental consciousness) is not really weakened by saying that mental consciousness is in the brain.

Malcolm wrote:

Of course it is -- you've just given the mind a location.

Andrew108 said:

Those who adopt Buddhist views of the pre-eminence of mind (and I have done this), are not able to let go of subtle concepts regarding mind. Since they cannot let go of these subtle concepts regarding mind, they are not able to progress. That is the long and short of it. If you understand consciousness is located in the brain then go with that. The sooner you are able to have a direct experience of reality not mediated through concepts then the better you'll be.

Malcolm wrote:

Consciousness is not located in the brain. It is located, conventionally, in the center of the body.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, April 19th, 2014 at 10:03 AM

Title: Re: paramhansa yogananda

Content:

JKhedrup said:

Eminent figures have been spoken to. Incidentally if Malcolm (as he prefers now) were to teach this I don't think he'd be incredulous because he has been around long enough to have heard it before.

Malcolm wrote:

In general, the Sakyapa POV is that monks use a jñānamudra.

On the other hand, practitioners who have accomplished the path of strong heat are not capable of breaking samaya, so if they use a karmamudra??? This is a difficult point.

Beyond this however, Vajrayogini, for Sakyapas, obviates the need for kamramudra.

Finally, in Dzogchen, Karmamudra is criticized as being a lower path. Even Saraha criticizes it...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, April 19th, 2014 at 9:57 AM

Title: Re: Mahamudra meditation problem: locating the mind

Content:

dude said:

I reject that wholesale.

Malcolm wrote:
What are you rejecting wholesale?

Author: Malcolm
Date: Saturday, April 19th, 2014 at 9:41 AM
Title: Re: Mahamudra meditation problem: locating the mind
Content:

Sönam said:
Do you real think that Buddha state could be explained by mind ? ... what can be explained has to be within the scope of the explainer. Buddha state is not in the scope of mind ... otherwise is right.
That should end this interminable discussion ... but it will not. Mind trip.

Sönam

Malcolm wrote:
It pretty much depends on what you mean by the term "mind". There are plenty of Dzogchen texts that assert buddhahood cannot be found outside of the mind.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Saturday, April 19th, 2014 at 9:39 AM
Title: Re: Buddhist Hate Crimes
Content:

Malcolm wrote:
We do what we can, and we wish happiness on all. But the best use of our time, until we really have the capacity to truly practice engaged bodhicitta, is to practice Dharma to increase our wisdom. Until that time we should not be giving away our limbs, nor risking our lives trying to "help" others thinking that this is somehow "bodhisattva" activity. As long as we have limited compassion, we should be judicious about how we decide we are going to "help".

Nighthawk said:
You may be right but this is a very weak attitude.

Malcolm wrote:
No, it is a realistic attitude.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Friday, April 18th, 2014 at 7:27 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist Hate Crimes

Content:

Alfredo said:

There are thousands more stories like this. You must have great confidence in the Bhutan government, military, and police. Or a remarkable hatred of communism, that you would show such disregard for the human rights, and civil legal rights, of noncombatants.

Malcolm wrote:

The Bhutanese were fair, as far as I am concerned. The Nepali Communists wanted to take over Nepal, and used the presence of the Lhotsampas as a pretext for agitation. The whole situation is far more complicated than you paint it. And in the end, the Bhutanese Gvt. has the right to secure their borders and expel those they deem illegal. Not all Lhotsampas were expelled, incidentally. The real crime is the way the Nepalese Communists have abandoned their own countrymen in camps in Eastern Nepal.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, April 18th, 2014 at 7:23 PM

Title: Re: A Physicalist Theory of Mind

Content:

Jayarava said:

But at least we can say that the one thing that does not provide that continuity is vijñāna..."

Malcolm wrote:

This is not true; an Bhavaviveka (if not Candrakirti) specifically allows that conventionally speaking, it is vijñāna that takes rebirth. Moreover, when we look at the chain of dependent origination analyzed by such texts as the Vibhanga, they clearly are discussing a stream of mental events when rebirth is cast over three lifetimes.

Then of course there is the old "when vijñāna descends into the womb..." in the Mahāniddana sutra.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, April 18th, 2014 at 9:41 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Hate Crimes

Content:

Alfredo said:

Are you not ashamed?

Malcolm wrote:

Nope.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, April 18th, 2014 at 5:39 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Hate Crimes

Content:

Alfredo said:

The reality is that a bunch of people who had been born in Bhutan were forced into exile, apparently in order to prevent that Nepali-speaking Hindu population from gaining a demographic majority...

Malcolm wrote:

That is the communist version of events. In reality, there was a terrorist campaign waged by Nepalis in order to gain control of the Bhutanese Government -- but they failed.

Also, the United States is one of the very few countries where citizenship is granted through birth. Most countries in the world do not do this.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, April 18th, 2014 at 5:34 AM

Title: Re: Mahamudra meditation problem: locating the mind

Content:

Andrew108 said:

Freedom from extremes means not mediating reality through concepts.

Malcolm wrote:

No, it means that when things are examined their existence and their non-existence is no where to be found.

Andrew108 said:

I guess this thread has gone way off topic. The reason I have posted so much is because I think a realist/materialist view is more conducive to this practice of 'direct experience not mediated through concepts'.

Malcolm wrote:

You may think so, but it merely shows that you are fixated.

Andrew108 said:

In the end you have this cognition - just that - and that cognition is not separate from reality. It belongs in reality. If you see this reality as belonging to mind, as being in the mind, then reality is resting on a concept that stands between you and direct experience.

Malcolm wrote:

This is the problem with your view: you see reality as a container in which are contained cognitions and things. This is an inherently dualistic view; it is also essentialist.

In fact, there is no reality at all, apart from the reality that is constructed by minds acting together. The great Dzogchen master Shabkar reports in canto 11 of his famed Flight of the Garuda:

When a devaputra asked the Buddha:

“Who made Meru, the sun and the moon, and so on?”

The Buddha said:

“There is no other creator here.

The attachment of the traces of one’s conceptuality imputes them, grasps them and then they appear in that way.

Everything is created by one’s mind.”

When the devaputra asked the Buddha again:

“How can the attachment of my concepts make the hardness and stability of Meru, the sun and moon, and so on?”

The Buddha said:

“In Varanasi, an old woman meditated her own body as a tiger.

Since the villagers saw her as a tiger, they evacuated the village.

If one is able to appear like that for a little while, if one cultivates mental traces for beginningless lifetimes, one will be able to appear like this for a year.”

Therefore, everything is created by the mind...

therefore, whatever is imputed by the concepts of the mind can be perceived by others.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, April 18th, 2014 at 5:21 AM

Title: Re: extibetanbuddhist dot com

Content:

pensum said:

how could they possibly know the actual state a dedicated Christian might attain...?

Malcolm wrote:

From the view they espouse. Realization proceeds from view; and if your view is not dependent origination, it is axiomatic that you will be able to attain liberation from samsara.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, April 17th, 2014 at 7:52 PM

Title: Re: Astrology in East Asian Buddhism

Content:

Gwenn Dana said:

Astrology appears to be a set of interpretations. Thoughts. Starlight Feng Shui.

I rather take refuge in Buddha than in astrology's explanations.

Best wishes

Gwenn

Indrajala said:

Funny thing is according to some Mahāyāna scriptures the Buddha in fact taught astrology.

Malcolm wrote:

According to Tibetan tradition, astrology (calculation) was first introduced from China where it has been taught by Manjuśrī to Kong tse 'phrul rgyal, often identified as Confucius. Later Kalacakra was introduced (1027) and this is when Tibetans first began to officially use the 120 (five elements * 12 animals) year cycle. This is also why dating anything prior to 1027 in Tibetan annals is a problem without external references.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, April 17th, 2014 at 7:46 PM

Title: Re: Kalachakra practice in Sakya

Content:

pueraeternus said:

[

I see. Is this Vajramala the same as the Vajravali?

https://www.amazon.com/Tibetan-Mandalas-Vajravali-Tantra-Samuccaya-Raghuvira/dp/8186471014/ref=sr\_1\_1?ie=UTF8&qid=1397705467&sr=8-1&keywords=vajravali

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, vali and mala are alternate both translated as phreng ba into Tibetan.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, April 17th, 2014 at 7:44 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist Hate Crimes

Content:

Alfredo said:

but Bhutan's government (officially Drukpa Kargyud, with some Nyingma representation) perpetrated ethnic cleansing of Nepali-speaking Hindus in the 1990's. \

Malcolm wrote:

Not at all. Bhutan expelled illegal immigrants in response to a communist threat against their government.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, April 17th, 2014 at 7:39 PM

Title: Re: A Physicalist Theory of Mind

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The Buddhist definition of mind is that the mind is an impermanent serially caused entity that is clear and knowing.

dzogchungpa said:

OK, what are the Buddhist definitions of 'clear' and 'knowing'?

Malcolm wrote:

Clear means that mind is unimpeded and open; knowing means that a mind has the capacity to know.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, April 17th, 2014 at 7:28 PM

Title: Re: Mahamudra meditation problem: locating the mind

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Outside of sentience, proofs are not possible.

Andrew108 said:

You don't need proof. You just need to measure something. Of course theories are part of sentience. I am not denying sentience. I have also said that reality has no theory within it. But there are characteristics that can be measured and that are measured by non-sentient apparatus.

Malcolm wrote:

That which is non-sentient cannot measure anything.

There is no such thing as a non-sentient measurement. Manas, the word for mind in Sanskrit, means "to measure" as well .

I would disagree. I don't think fMRI scanners are sentient. In what way does the 'mind' make a measurement? As I understand it the 'mind' interprets measurements.

Measuring the measurements.

All measurements are based on judgments, long, short, thick, thin, etc. It is a fundamental characteristic of the conceptual mind to judge and measure. Instruments of measurement merely extend the capability of the mind's capacity to judge, but are not themselves capable of measuring anything.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, April 17th, 2014 at 8:10 AM

Title: Re: Mahamudra meditation problem: locating the mind

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

and it doesn't make any sense to say that something is a product of consciousness but that there is no awareness of it.

...

Malcolm wrote:

Sure it does; such phenomena are called traces; and when a trace is activated, a given consciousness becomes aware of the phenomena produced by that trace. Further, traces are created by actions of consciousness.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, April 17th, 2014 at 8:03 AM

Title: Re: Mahamudra meditation problem: locating the mind

Content:

Andrew108 said:

All we need to prove is that the mountain has an existence outside of sentience.

Malcolm wrote:

Outside of sentience, proofs are not possible.

Andrew108 said:

So the fact that it can be measured by a non-sentient device and has a series of values (height, mass, dimension and so on) mean that it has an existence outside of sentience.

Malcolm wrote:

There is no such thing as a non-sentient measurement. Manas, the word for mind in Sanskrit, means "to measure" as well

Andrew108 said:

Another example would be using a non-sentient device to measure phenomena that don't appear to the senses.

Malcolm wrote:

As above.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, April 16th, 2014 at 7:46 PM

Title: Re: A Physicalist Theory of Mind

Content:

LastLegend said:

Can you point to text or source that says it?

jeeprs said:

Not really, but see if you can find an agreed definition of the meaning of the term 'mind' according to the discipline of psychology.

Malcolm wrote:

Who cares?

The Buddhist definition of mind is that the mind is an impermanent serially caused entity that is clear and knowing.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, April 16th, 2014 at 7:45 PM

Title: Re: A Physicalist Theory of Mind

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

What I am saying is that you do not understand Dharma language because you have never studied it.

Andrew108 said:

I've studied it.

Malcolm wrote:

What texts, under what teacher, for how long, where?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, April 16th, 2014 at 7:42 PM

Title: Re: Mahamudra meditation problem: locating the mind

Content:

Andrew108 said:

He is saying that the universe is brought into being through the collective karma of all beings. Karma, like consciousness, doesn't exist outside of the skandhas. There is no collective karma. There is only 'individual' karma. So to say that there is collective karma (even as a convention of speech) is still an assertion of collective consciousness.

Malcolm wrote:

Not so. For example, Vasubandhu goes the example of a soldier in an army. All who share in the goals of that army (killing enemies) share in the karma of every action undertaken by the members of that army times the number of people who belong to that that army, whether or not they directly engage in killing enemies.

Andrew108 said:

This 'objective condition' wasn't made bit by bit due to the karma of individual beings and neither was it made in one go due to a singular consciousness and neither was it made by a multitude of consciousness. So the model that Malcolm has posted as to how the universe forms is illogical.

Malcolm wrote:

"The variety of the world is due to action"
-- Vasubandhu.

If you are a realist dualist Buddhist, i.e. you belong to one of the two lower tenet systems (and your views are very much in line with those apart from the fact that you reject rebirth, and thus in reality you are a Carvaka in your view), the differentiation in the world that you observe comes about because of the actions of intelligent creatures acting in the world.

The universe was formed by the multitude of consciousnessess in the following manner — to put it in more modern terms, it is the affliction in the consciousness of sentient beings that caused the instability in the proposed singularity at the observable beginning of this universe.

Until physics can model the general role of consciousness in the formation of the universe mathematically, its explanation of cosmology will always be incomplete and there will always be unanswered questions.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, April 16th, 2014 at 7:32 PM

Title: Re: Mahamudra meditation problem: locating the mind

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

It already exists, but was brought into existence through the collective karma of all beings. Really, this is non-controversial and is explained in Abhidharma as well as Yogacara and Vajrayāna.

Andrew108 said:

A term like collective karma is fundamentally useless. If you assert collective karma then you are asserting collective consciousness. It is a highly controversial idea.

Malcolm wrote:

It is a convention used to describe the aggregate of similar karmas belonging to individual beings. It is only in this sense that the term "collective" is used. It does not mean there is a collective consciousness, because of course, there is not.

Of course, when people do not take the time to study the fundamentals of Buddhadharma as presented in Abhidharma and so on, it is very likely they will misunderstand terms like "collective karma" to refer to karma generated by a collective consciousness.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, April 16th, 2014 at 11:00 AM

Title: Re: Mahamudra meditation problem: locating the mind

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

We all inhabit the same universe, the universe comes about because of our collective actions. It is as if we all build one house, but then we live on separate floors, using separate entrances.

PadmaVonSamba said:

If all beings inhabit the same universe,
Yet experience different 'realities' of different realms, some pleasant, some torturous, and so on, then what they experience cannot be the result of any sort of combined consciousness

Malcolm wrote:

I never said it was.

PadmaVonSamba said:

but rather, due to their own karma,

Malcolm wrote:

Yes.

PadmaVonSamba said:

each being experiences the same basic properties of an already existing physical universe in their own way

Malcolm wrote:

It already exists, but was brought into existence through the collective karma of all beings. Really, this is non-controversial and is explained in Abhidharma as well as Yogacara and Vajrayāna.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, April 16th, 2014 at 9:49 AM

Title: Re: Can Westerners truly become Buddhists?

Content:

JKhedrup said:

I am surprised people don't think Westerners are responsible for supporting monasteries.

Whenever I come to India with the geshe I translate for I also use some of my meager resources to make donations to monks who study well, for pujas, and to my teachers.

I am not a maverick who keeps it all for myself, and believe me it is a struggle to make those donations.

Indrajala said:

The reality it seems is that in the context of Tibetan Buddhism there is a widespread sense that western monks/nuns are unnecessary and even undesirable. Your own experiences as a translator who people have to begrudgingly tolerate is suggestive of this.

Malcolm wrote:

The majority of western Mulasarvastivada monks and nuns have very little value to add. Very few are qualified to be Dharma teachers, even less to act as Vajrayāna preceptors (a handful at best). You might argue they are objects of merit accumulations, and there is some truth to this, but mainly they are an economic drain since they have little to return in value (at this point) to the lay practitioners. If they can join a Dharma center where they can do useful work, great, but there are very few of these indeed.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, April 16th, 2014 at 9:04 AM

Title: Re: Mahamudra meditation problem: locating the mind

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

Malcolm, are you saying that all realms share the same universe, or that each realm creates its own universe?

If you say that all realms share the same universe, then the universe cannot be said to be created by the consciousness of beings in a particular realm.

If you say the realms exist in separate universes, then humans and animals could not share the same sense of reality.

Which is it?

...

Malcolm wrote:

It is like a house with separate floors. Not all inhabitants can know whether the others are home.

We all inhabit the same universe, the universe comes about because of our collective actions. It is as if we all build one house, but then we live on separate floors, using separate entrances.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, April 16th, 2014 at 8:59 AM

Title: Re: A Physicalist Theory of Mind

Content:

Sherab said:

But aren't you implying by your post that the six elements were equally basic while in yogacara and vajrayana systems, consciousness would be more basic than the physical elements even in the conventional sense?

Malcolm wrote:

No, even in Yogacara and Vajrayāna conventionally understand the six dhātus in the same way they are understood in the lower yānas. However, at the level of analysis, in the Yogacara systems and Vajrayāna, consciousness is understood to be more fundamental, and luminosity more fundamental still.

M

Sherab said:

Your reply seems to contradict what you said earlier. I guess that you have forgotten the discussion that led to this.

Malcolm wrote:

If you think so, you will have to remind me.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, April 16th, 2014 at 6:43 AM

Title: Re: A Physicalist Theory of Mind

Content:

jeeprs said:

I have noticed that you frequently encounter passages which explicitly state the difference between 'insentient matter' - the aggregates - and 'formless mind'.

Malcolm wrote:

It is a conventional distinction (and a hard distinction drawn in Abhidharma and so on) that is gradually abandoned in later Indian Mahāyānā and especially Vajrayāna.

jeeprs said:

You can say that if you wish. Once you start to be able to draw in the polemical sleights-of-hand offered by the distinction between relative and ultimate, there is practically nothing that you can't say.

In this case, I opt for a literalist interpretation.

Malcolm wrote:

Then you are opting for an essentialist interpretation, which is of course the reason this hard distinction was eventually abandoned as being incoherent beyond a certain convenience for conversation.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, April 16th, 2014 at 6:06 AM

Title: Re: A Physicalist Theory of Mind

Content:

jeeprs said:

I have noticed that you frequently encounter passages which explicitly state the difference between 'insentient matter' - the aggregates - and 'formless mind'.

Malcolm wrote:

It is a conventional distinction (and a hard distinction drawn in Abhidharma and so on) that is gradually abandoned in later Indian Mahāyānā and especially Vajrayāna.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, April 16th, 2014 at 5:05 AM

Title: Re: Mahamudra meditation problem: locating the mind

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

Since at this early point, there are no objects of attachment, with only consciousness functioning, what possible action of the mind can take place which would generate karma?

Malcolm wrote:

When the previous universe is destroyed, it is destroyed only up to the level of the third form realm. All remaining sentient beings exist in the upper highest form realm (those who are not in the formless realm, that is). Eventually, as their merit is exhausted, the winds created by their traces of karma generate an air mandala which begins the formation of a new container universe. As sentient beings have karma to be reborn in this and that place, this or that place appears to receive them.

M

Andrew108 said:

This has to be proven. Otherwise it is a fairy tale.

Malcolm wrote:

You can prove it for yourself by developing the devacakṣu, the divine eye. You will never be able to prove it to anyone else.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, April 16th, 2014 at 4:45 AM

Title: Re: Climate Change: We're Doomed

Content:

Zhen Li said:

There's nowhere along the line any sensible person can hang their coat. However, if one is looking for credible pricing, only the market can provide credible pricing - if the cost doesn't come up in the market place, it doesn't really exist.

Malcolm wrote:

This is because the market externalizes the costs of cleaning up after itself onto the consumer. As the cost of cleaning up after the market becomes higher and more costly, eventually the consumer have no choice but to enact legislations which limit the markets power to sell highly polluting commodities, and to impose fees on those who use them.

It is similar to drugs — the human cost of cleaning up after drugs such as cocaine, meth and heroin are too high -- therefore, these commodities are strictly controlled markets in which a class of professionals is licensed to dispense them. Governments exist because markets exist. Markets exist because governments exist. Markets must be controlled and regulated (rather than planned), and carbon taxation is one way for governments to control the market in petrochemicals.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, April 16th, 2014 at 2:33 AM

Title: Re: A Physicalist Theory of Mind

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

As I have pointed out before, consciousness, in the Buddhist system, is considered an element [dhātu], one of six that make up everything in the universe. As such, it is also defined as a dravya, usually translated as a substance or an ingredient, along with the other five.

Most of these discussions with people like A108 breakdown because they fundamentally never take the time to understand Buddhist principles.

M

Andrew108 said:

You think that the Buddhist system explains subjectivity? It does not. You are assuming that Buddhism explains subjectivity. Saying that matter is based on consciousness (serial/clarity) is not telling me anything about subjectivity at all. In fact, for all those that are criticizing Science because it can't explain subjectivity, remember that when Buddhism tries to explain subjectivity it invariably sees it as illusory.

Malcolm wrote:

What I am saying is that you do not understand Dharma language because you have never studied it.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, April 16th, 2014 at 2:31 AM

Title: Re: A Physicalist Theory of Mind

Content:

Sherab said:

But aren't you implying by your post that the six elements were equally basic while in yogacara and vajrayana systems, consciousness would be more basic than the physical elements even in the conventional sense?

Malcolm wrote:

No, even in Yogacara and Vajrayāna conventionally understand the six dhātus in the same way they are understood in the lower yānas. However, at the level of analysis, in the Yogacara systems and Vajrayāna, consciousness is understood to be more fundamental, and luminosity more fundamental still.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, April 15th, 2014 at 9:12 AM

Title: Re: A Physicalist Theory of Mind

Content:

Jikan said:

I'm rereading the OP and trying to understand how this new theory overcomes the obvious objections to Daniel Dennett's Consciousness Explained from twenty years ago. I remember that I was not the only one who thought Dennett's argument was preposterously reductive, and that the best-warranted evidence in support of his claims is not yet available, leading him essentially to write a series of bounced checks with each claim he makes. Am I reading this new work reductively, or does it seem that it represents the same old wine in newly-labelled bottles?

Malcolm wrote:

As I have pointed out before, consciousness, in the Buddhist system, is considered an element [dhātu], one of six that make up everything in the universe. As such, it is also defined as a dravya, usually translated as a substance or an ingredient, along with the other five.

Most of these discussions with people like A108 breakdown because they fundamentally never take the time to understand Buddhist principles.

M

Sherab said:

If Buddhist system holds that consciousness is one of the six substances that make up everything in the universe, then you are saying that everything in the universe is reducible only to these six and therefore these six are not reducible to each other and are therefore fundamental substances. Assuming that I understand you correctly, then where do the Mind Only System and Tantric and Dzogchen system fit in the Buddhist system as described by you?

Malcolm wrote:

This is still conventionally true in both [Yogacara and Vajrayāna] systems.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, April 15th, 2014 at 6:37 AM

Title: Re: A Physicalist Theory of Mind

Content:

Jikan said:

I'm rereading the OP and trying to understand how this new theory overcomes the obvious objections to Daniel Dennett's Consciousness Explained from twenty years ago. I remember that I was not the only one who thought Dennett's argument was preposterously reductive, and that the best-warranted evidence in support of his claims is not yet available, leading him essentially to write a series of bounced checks with each claim he makes. Am I reading this new work reductively, or does it seem that it represents the same old wine in newly-labelled bottles?

Malcolm wrote:

As I have pointed out before, consciousness, in the Buddhist system, is considered an element [dhātu], one of six that make up everything in the universe. As such, it is also defined as a dravya, usually translated as a substance or an ingredient, along with the other five.

Most of these discussions with people like A108 breakdown because they fundamentally never take the time to understand Buddhist principles.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, April 15th, 2014 at 4:30 AM

Title: Re: Mahamudra meditation problem: locating the mind

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

In fact, space arises from consciousness, and the four elements arise from space. This is a universal explanation of the arising of matter in Dharm texts.

dzogchungpa said:

Did the historical Buddha teach this?

Malcolm wrote:

Indeed.

dzogchungpa said:
Well, do you have a reference?

pensum said:
Bump.

Malcolm wrote:
You will have to wait until I get home.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Tuesday, April 15th, 2014 at 3:47 AM
Title: Re: Mahamudra meditation problem: locating the mind
Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:
Since at this early point, there are no objects of attachment, with only consciousness functioning, what possible action of the mind can take place which would generate karma?

Malcolm wrote:
When the previous universe is destroyed, it is destroyed only up to the level of the third form realm. All remaining sentient beings exist in the upper highest form realm (those who are not in the formless realm, that is). Eventually, as their merit is exhausted, the winds created by their traces of karma generate an air mandala which begins the formation of a new container universe. As sentient beings have karma to be reborn in this and that place, this or that place appears to receive them.

M

Author: Malcolm
Date: Tuesday, April 15th, 2014 at 2:39 AM
Title: Re: Do you believe in ghosts?
Content:
Malcolm wrote:
I did an entire lecture on this subject recently in Mexico City.

AlexanderS said:
On the fact that we are imputations or on ghosts?

I wouldn't mind seeing a recording of this lecture if it is possible.

Malcolm wrote:
On the fact that spirits are imputations which arise from afflictions.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, April 15th, 2014 at 2:21 AM

Title: Re: Mahamudra meditation problem: locating the mind

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

If those atoms are here because of our collective karma, then your karma is part of the reason my body is here...

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, and the problem is? That is covered under the principle of causation called katana-hetu, i.e., all things are the causes of all other things except for themselves.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, April 14th, 2014 at 7:52 PM

Title: Re: Do you believe in ghosts?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

I did an entire lecture on this subject recently in Mexico City.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, April 14th, 2014 at 7:51 PM

Title: Re: Mahamudra meditation problem: locating the mind

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

I do expect that people who call themselves Buddhist not substitute their own fantasies, whether derived from neo-plantonism, science, etc., for what the Buddha taught in issues such as cosmology and so on.

PadmaVonSamba said:

But you cannot prove that what is taught as Buddha's own words actually are. You cannot prove that the words he spoke have not been misinterpreted or distorted over the past 2500 years, or even during the century or so after he spoke them, before they were even written down. So, the difference is that some Buddhists rely on faith alone to validate the teachings, and other constantly weigh what is supposed to be the words of The Buddha against what is observable today that wasn't observable then.

I don't think you can say that one type is a true Buddhist and the other type is not.

. . .

Malcolm wrote:

We have a very good idea of what Buddha actually said. Reams and reams of texts which are repetitive and formulaic to the point where one cannot doubt they are recordings of the words of a single author.

Such things as the operations of karma, rebirth and so on are really beyond any doubt whatsoever. It is sheer sophistry to pretend otherwise.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, April 14th, 2014 at 7:48 PM

Title: Re: Mahamudra meditation problem: locating the mind

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Whatever the case may be; however, the teaching of the Buddha is that a given world system physically arises because of the collective action of the all the sentient beings who have the karma to be in it.

PadmaVonSamba said:

Are you quite positively, absolutely sure that...

...the teaching of the Buddha is that a given world system physically arises because of the collective action of the all the sentient beings who have the karma to be in it.
or, is it that ...

...the teaching of the Buddha is that what we experience as a given world system physically arising is because of the collective action of the all the sentient beings who have the karma to be in it.

Because, to me anyhow, the first premise makes absolutely no sense and the second premise makes perfect sense, and there is a difference between the two.

The first premise is not directly observable.

The second premise is at least somewhat observable.

. . .

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, I am quite sure about the first.

For example, when beings no longer have karma to be reborn in the hell realms, the hell realms vanish.

This is all very clearly explained in such texts as Abhidharmakosha. Even if you take a Mahāyāna perspective, which does not accept that phenomena actually exist apart from the mind, nevertheless, it is very clearly explained in such texts as the Mahāyānasamgraha that the container universe exists because of the seeds which exist in the ālayavijñānas of sentient beings, thus all hell beings are experiencing the ripening of seeds for the hell realms in their ālayavijñānas together.

The variety of the world is created by karma.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, April 14th, 2014 at 7:31 PM

Title: Re: Mahamudra meditation problem: locating the mind

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

I am saying that the universe arises from karma and karma is created by the (afflicted) mind. If all sentient beings were to attain buddhahood, it is certain the (defiled) universe would vanish, never to reappear.

Andrew108 said:

So we have luminosity, then consciousness (serial/clarity), then space (unobstructed), then karmic formations of matter. With the universe appearing due to the karma of the collection of beings within it. And if we don't accept this, we are not Buddhists.

Malcolm wrote:

No, what I said was if you do not accept rebirth, you really have no understanding of Buddhism.

Andrew108 said:

I also don't believe that Buddhist scholars should use 'orthodoxy' to condition others.

Malcolm wrote:

Neither do I. I do expect that people who call themselves Buddhist not substitute their own fantasies, whether derived from neo-platonism, science, etc., for what the Buddha taught in issues such as cosmology and so on. I.e., they can believe whatever they want, but they should be clear that they are abandoning Buddhist principles in favor of physics, idealism, etc.

Andrew108 said:

So I would ask you to engage in open debate about these issues without challenging posters' right to consider themselves Buddhists.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, I think you should reconsider what "open debate" means; since it includes to right to challenge whether a given person's position X or not.

Andrew108 said:

If they don't accept what you (or apparently the Buddha) are saying there is no need for you to consider their views heretical.

Malcolm wrote:

There is no heresy in Buddhism, there is merely wrong view and right view. For example, your rejection of karma and rebirth.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, April 14th, 2014 at 8:14 AM

Title: Re: The clear light of pure reality experience

Content:

ConradTree said:

By the way, why did you change your th*g*l code word from lhun grub to clarity?

Most people won't get it.

Malcolm wrote:

because the nature, natural perfection, is clarity.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, April 14th, 2014 at 7:50 AM

Title: Re: Kalachakra practice in Sakya

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The Vajramala is collection of template empowerments, so it is a full empowerment, but less elaborate than the two main traditions of Kalachakra (Rwa and Dro).

pueraeternus said:

So would this upcoming book be something that would help?

https://www.amazon.com/The-Vajra-Rosary-Tantra-

Vajramalatantra/dp/1935011189/ref=sr\_1\_1?ie=UTF8&qid=1397430839&sr=8-1&keywords=rosary+tantra

The synopsis indicates the text is mostly about the Guhyasamaja. Isn't this rather different from the Kalachakra (at least on the completion stage)? I am basing this on what I read from Daniel Cozort's book on Highest Yoga Tantra.

Malcolm wrote:

Vajramala is a tantra, it is also a collection of initiations by the Mahāsiddha Abhayakaragupta.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, April 14th, 2014 at 7:05 AM

Title: Re: Kalachakra practice in Sakya

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

I am not sure the text has been translated. But it is in the collection of main daily sadhanas used in Sakya.

pueraeternus said:

From these 2 websites, it seems HHST was transmitted the Kalachakra from both HHDL and Chogye Trichen Rinpoche (6 different lineages). Do you happen to know for the recent NYC transmissions, which lineage he transmitted?

<http://sakyausa.org/h-h-sakya-trizin/>

http://www.gemsofyogadubai.com/index.php?option=com\_content&view=article&id=21&Itemid=117

Malcolm wrote:

The Vajramala is collection of template empowerments, so it is a full empowerment, but less elaborate than the two main traditions of Kalacakra (Rwa and Dro).

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, April 14th, 2014 at 6:22 AM

Title: Re: Mahamudra meditation problem: locating the mind

Content:

jeeprs said:

It is not anywhere within the Universe itself but is pre-existent. That is more neo-platonist than Buddhist, I acknowledge that.

Malcolm wrote:

It is not Buddhist at all. Which is fine, but there is nothing in Buddhism, even in Dzogchen, which remotely resembles this idea.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, April 14th, 2014 at 6:11 AM

Title: Re: Mahamudra meditation problem: locating the mind

Content:

jeeprs said:

The consequence of your view is that you are every bit as much a realist as A108. No that is not the case but from experience it is most likely pointless to argue about it.

Malcolm wrote:

Whatever the case may be; however, the teaching of the Buddha is that a given world system physically arises because of the collective action of the all the sentient beings who have the karma to be in it.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, April 14th, 2014 at 6:02 AM

Title: Re: The clear light of pure reality experience

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

It might have to do with the fact that he did a seven year retreat on thogal.

ConradTree said:

That's exactly why I believe bardo of dharmata does not occur for everyone.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, you are wrong.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, April 14th, 2014 at 6:01 AM

Title: Re: Mahamudra meditation problem: locating the mind

Content:

smcj said:

I take note of the traditional reticence of the Buddha to discuss whether the Universe has a beginning or not. I might be completely mistaken in that regard, and if so, I will have to live with it.

Tibetan cosmology isn't shy like that. It has the universe ending and then reappearing anew endlessly. The causal factor for the reappearance is the leftover karma of sentient being from the previous universe. I think what Malcolm is saying is that if at the end of one universe everybody attained buddhahood, then the next universe would never appear.

Malcolm wrote:

Correct, that is what I am saying.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, April 14th, 2014 at 6:01 AM

Title: Re: Mahamudra meditation problem: locating the mind

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

I am saying that the universe arises from karma and karma is created by the (afflicted) mind. If all sentient beings were to attain buddhahood, it is certain the (defiled) universe would vanish, never to reappear.

jeeprs said:

Well, I can't understand that. I interpret 'the world' to be 'the umwelt', the 'life-world' or 'meaning-world'. I take note of the traditional reticence of the Buddha to discuss whether the Universe has a beginning or not. I might be completely mistaken in that regard, and if so, I will have to live with it.

Malcolm wrote:

No, he was not afraid to discuss whether a given universe cycle had a beginning or not. He was averse to discussing whether the whole process of arising and destruction of universes had a beginning, i.e. he refused to discuss first causes, considering such discussions as fruitless.

The consequence of your view is that you are every bit as much a realist as A108.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, April 14th, 2014 at 5:39 AM

Title: Re: The clear light of pure reality experience

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Because the visions are part of clear light.

ConradTree said:

Yes, but I'm curious why our sleep yoga's experience would be different than KDL's sleep yoga experience?

It must have something to do with channels and stuff.

Malcolm wrote:

It might have to do with the fact that he did a seven year retreat on thogal.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, April 14th, 2014 at 5:29 AM

Title: Re: The clear light of pure reality experience

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Well, the experience of clear light during sleep manifests differently depending on whether you have developed the visions.

ConradTree said:

Yes I brought this up in the other thread. Why does this occur?

Malcolm wrote:

Because the visions are part of clear light.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, April 14th, 2014 at 5:22 AM

Title: Re: The clear light of pure reality experience

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

It depends on whether you are emphasizing the emptiness aspect or the clarity aspect.

ConradTree said:

I emphasize relaxing in the state of knowledge, having definitively recognized ma bcos shes pa skad cig ma.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, the experience of clear light during sleep manifests differently depending on whether you have developed the visions. But you should really hear this from a qualified teacher.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, April 14th, 2014 at 5:03 AM

Title: Re: The clear light of pure reality experience

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

For example, lucid dreaming and so on, are all techniques of being aware while falling asleep; but they will not necessarily lead to resting in the state of luminosity.

ConradTree said:

I don't follow that New Age stuff, so I wouldn't know.

But you do agree that clear light is about falling asleep with trekcho?

Because that's what I was trying to convey.

Malcolm wrote:

It depends on whether you are emphasizing the emptiness aspect or the clarity aspect.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, April 14th, 2014 at 4:52 AM

Title: Re: The clear light of pure reality experience

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

It is "awareness" of a very specific kind.

ConradTree said:

Would you even be able to be aware while falling asleep, if you did not have that specific kind of awareness?

Malcolm wrote:

For example, lucid dreaming and so on, are all techniques of being aware while falling asleep; but they will not necessarily lead to resting in the state of luminosity.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, April 14th, 2014 at 4:51 AM

Title: Re: More faith in Amitabha than bardo of dharmata

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

In any event, exhaustion of dharmatā happens more easily in the bardo. Only the very best of the best practitioners show any signs of rainbow body at all. Most practitioners get realization in the bardo of dharmatā. Please consult birth, life and death where this process is explained very well.

ConradTree said:

I get it. It all about recognizing the bardo of dharmata.

My concern was whether bardo of dharmata really appears for everyone.

Malcolm wrote:

It really appears to everyone, down to the tiniest creature.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, April 14th, 2014 at 4:43 AM

Title: Re: More faith in Amitabha than bardo of dharmata

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, there is no contradiction. At this point is impossible to revive the person. We can consider therefore the link between body and mind has been severed.

ConradTree said:

If the link has been severed, you wouldn't get rainbow body phenomena like shrinking.

Malcolm wrote:

If the link had not been severed, you could revive the person.

"Shrinking" is not rainbow body.

In any event, exhaustion of dharmatā happens more easily in the bardo. Only the very best of the best practitioners show any signs of rainbow body at all. Most practitioners get realization in the bardo of dharmatā. Please consult birth, life and death where this process is explained very well.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, April 14th, 2014 at 4:38 AM

Title: Re: The clear light of pure reality experience

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Its about falling asleep in a state of recognition of the nature of the mind while the winds withdraw into the heart cakra.
while falling asleep without distraction.

ConradTree said:

So you do agree its about falling asleep with some kind of awareness?

Because that's what I was trying to convey.

Malcolm wrote:

It is "awareness" of a very specific kind.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, April 14th, 2014 at 4:38 AM

Title: Re: More faith in Amitabha than bardo of dharmata

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

It occurs after.

ConradTree said:

See:

Malcolm wrote:

rainbow body you realize the exhaustion of phenomena while in the bardo of dharmatā i.e. during THUGDAM.

Yes, there is no contradiction. At this point is impossible to revive the person. We can consider therefore the link between body and mind has been severed.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, April 14th, 2014 at 4:31 AM

Title: Re: More faith in Amitabha than bardo of dharmata

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Sleep is like death, by analogy; but it is not death since one is still connected with this life's body.

ConradTree said:

If exhaustion of phenomena for regular rainbow body occurs at bardo of dharmata, then bardo of dharmata must occur before separation with body,

Malcolm wrote:

It occurs after.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, April 14th, 2014 at 4:00 AM

Title: Re: The clear light of pure reality experience

Content:

ConradTree said:

So you do agree its about consciously entering the sleep state?

Malcolm wrote:

Its about falling asleep in a state of recognition of the nature of the mind while the winds withdraw into the heart cakra.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, April 14th, 2014 at 3:54 AM

Title: Re: The clear light of pure reality experience

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Clear light is a state of wisdom; deep sleep is a state of ignorance. When you are sleeping in clear light, that is because you were able to recognize it while falling asleep. Only great practitioners can do this. We can just try.

ConradTree said:

So you do agree its consciously entering the deep sleep state from say the lions posture?

Malcolm wrote:

It does not depend on posture. It is most easily accomplished by going either guru yoga or meditating one's yidam at the heart while falling asleep without distraction.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, April 14th, 2014 at 3:49 AM

Title: Re: The clear light of pure reality experience

Content:

ConradTree said:

I'm going by the teachings, nothing else.

Denying that clear light has to do with deep sleep contradicts every book on the subject and Malcolm.

I can consciously enter deep sleep via the lion's posture after about 6 months of trying. The mind is like a serene lake.

Malcolm wrote:

Clear light is a state of wisdom; deep sleep is a state of ignorance. When you are sleeping in clear light, that is because you were able to recognize it while falling asleep.

Only great practitioners can do this. We can just try.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, April 14th, 2014 at 3:48 AM

Title: Re: More faith in Amitabha than bardo of dharmata

Content:

ConradTree said:

Then how come only at a certain point do the visions occur during sleep?

This is where my recent doubt stems from.

Malcolm wrote:

Sleep is like death, by analogy; but it is not death since one is still connected with this life's body.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, April 14th, 2014 at 2:53 AM

Title: Re: Kalachakra practice in Sakya

Content:

conebeckham said:

Taranatha wrote about Lam Dre, liRC, and certainly about Kilaya and Vishuddha, right?

Also, Shangpa practices were and are obviously included in Jonang.

Malcolm wrote:

Sure, Jonang inherited a lot of Sakya practices, but it also went the other way. There are a lot of practice in Sakya from Jonang originally. HHST made the comment the other day that the Jonang schools was the original Rimed tradition.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, April 14th, 2014 at 2:47 AM

Title: Re: Mahamudra meditation problem: locating the mind

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, but you have to understand what "space" means in Buddhist terms; in this case it refers to absence of obstruction. So space arises from consciousness, just as consciousness itself arises from luminosity [od gsal].

For example, I demonstrated to you before that the five "empty" atoms (meaning very subtle, i.e., the tanmatras actually) in Kalacakra arise from the karmic winds which are produced by consciousness; these then form the basis for the coarse particles and so on. The universe and the elements within it arise from the collective actions of all sentient beings. This is a principle that is very well established from Abhidharma up to Dzogchen.

It is never that case in Dharma that any one thing is produced from a single cause; all conditioned things are produced from causes and conditions conventionally speaking. When it is asserted in a Buddhist context that matter arises from mind it does not mean that one mind produces all matter; it means that all matter is produced by all minds.

M

Andrew108 said:

Just a quick comment. It seems that you are saying consciousness and space are both inside and outside the individual. There is the sense here that space and consciousness are pervasive.

Malcolm wrote:

I am saying that the universe arises from karma and karma is created by the (afflicted) mind. If all sentient beings were to attain buddhahood, it is certain the (defiled) universe would vanish, never to reappear.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, April 14th, 2014 at 2:44 AM

Title: Re: Kalachakra practice in Sakya

Content:

conebeckham said:

I suppose I should point out that the Jonang lineage, Kalacakra specialists certainly, grew out of the Sakya lineage...

Malcolm wrote:

The Kalacakra of Jonang is not a Sakya lineage, it did not pass through the five founder masters, nor through Tshar or Ngor.

conebeckham said:

Sure. Never meant to imply otherwise. But masters of the Jonang were originally Sakyapas, before they became Kalachakrapadas, right? And later Jonang masters wrote authoritatively about Sakya practice, as well..including the Kama traditions of Kilaya and Vishuddha....

Malcolm wrote:

Only Dolbupa. The Sakyas and the Karma Kagyus both try and take credit for Jonang. The truth is that Jonang has influence from both.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, April 14th, 2014 at 2:38 AM

Title: Re: When did "mindfulness" become "mindfulness"?

Content:

Jikan said:

This is a historical or geneological question: at what point was point #7 of the Eightfold Path first translated as "mindfulness" and not some other term (I mean first documented instance)? At what point did "mindfulness" become the most common English word to use in such translations? It seems to me that other words had been used as recently as the mid-20th century, but by the early 1970s, mindfulness was the industry standard.

Any guidance from those who are knowledgeable in the history of such translations will be warmly welcomed. Thank you!

Malcolm wrote:

mindful (adj.) Look up mindful at Dictionary.com mid-14c., from mind (n.) + -ful. Related: Mindfully; mindfulness. Old English myndful meant "of good memory." Old English also had myndig (adj.) "mindful, recollecting; thoughtful," which if it had lived might have yielded a modern *mindy.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, April 14th, 2014 at 2:15 AM

Title: Re: Mahamudra meditation problem: locating the mind

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

And what exactly experiences these aggregates, these moments of clarity, this consciousness?

. . .

Malcolm wrote:

Clarity/consciousness/mind, etc; that is the "what".

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, April 14th, 2014 at 2:06 AM

Title: Re: More faith in Amitabha than bardo of dharmata

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Because the bardo of Dharmatā is connected with thögal.

ConradTree said:

Yes that's my entire point.

Bardo of dharmata only appears for long dedicated thogal practitioners.

Malcolm wrote:

No, it appears to everyone. The explanation of the bardo of dharmatā however is connected with thogal. Thogal can be seen as a method to recognize this bardo if you do not achieve rainbow body in this life (most won't).

Further, you don't have to be some long dedicated practitioner. If you have confidence in the experience of the first vision, this is sufficient for recognizing the bardo of dharmatā.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, April 14th, 2014 at 1:58 AM

Title: Re: Mahamudra meditation problem: locating the mind

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

What continues is the stream of aggregates, consciousness being the chief of them. Consciousness is defined as a (partless) moment of clarity. These moments are serial and independent from the serial moments of the consciousness of others.

Andrew108 said:

You have said that space arises from consciousness. Then you have defined consciousness as a partless moment of clarity that is serial and independent. So exactly, in what way does space arise from consciousness? Does it arise serially in the same way as consciousness and is it then independent of the consciousness of others?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, but you have to understand what "space" means in Buddhist terms; in this case it refers to absence of obstruction. So space arises from consciousness, just as consciousness itself arises from luminosity [od gsal].

For example, I demonstrated to you before that the five "empty" atoms (meaning very subtle, i.e., the tanmatras actually) in Kalacakra arise from the karmic winds which are produced by consciousness; these then form the basis for the coarse particles and so on. The universe and the elements within it arise from the collective actions of all sentient beings. This is a principle that is very well established from Abhidharma up to Dzogchen.

It is never that case in Dharma that any one thing is produced from a single cause; all conditioned things are produced from causes and conditions conventionally speaking. When it is asserted in a Buddhist context that matter arises from mind it does not mean that one mind produces all matter; it means that all matter is produced by all minds.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, April 14th, 2014 at 1:51 AM

Title: Re: Mahamudra meditation problem: locating the mind

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

What you propose is exactly what you refute elsewhere, something permanent that constitutes an individual self (atman).

Malcolm wrote:

I did not suggest this.

PadmaVonSamba said:

The aggregates are not a self.

Malcolm wrote:

No kidding.

PadmaVonSamba said:

They are more like the leaves that are on a tree in spring and summer, arranged for a lifetime, then blow apart in the autumn, when a person dies only to regather again in a raked up pile, which is the next rebirth.

Malcolm wrote:

No, there is a serial continuity, albeit momentary in nature. Otherwise, there would be no causal continuity of traces.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, April 14th, 2014 at 1:48 AM

Title: Re: Mahamudra meditation problem: locating the mind

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

Essentially, it is what the Buddha taught:

What we are today comes from our thoughts of yesterday, and our present thoughts build our life of tomorrow: our life is the creation of our mind.
-The Dhammapada

Malcolm wrote:

Please see:

<http://www.fakebuddhaquotes.com/our-life-is-the-creation-of-our-mind/>

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, April 14th, 2014 at 1:47 AM

Title: Re: Mahamudra meditation problem: locating the mind

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

In reality, the Buddha taught that one's five aggregates continue into the next world. It is foolish to deny that this is what the Buddha taught.

dzogchungpa said:

Even the rupa skandha?

Malcolm wrote:

Of course. When your consciousness leaves this body at the moment of death in the very next moment you appropriate a subtle material body in the bardo. In other words, bardo beings also have all five aggregates.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, April 13th, 2014 at 7:40 PM

Title: Re: More faith in Amitabha than bardo of dharmata

Content:

ConradTree said:

Of course I believe in bardo of dharmata. As Namdrol says, the realization of rainbow body occurs IN the bardo of dharmata:

Malcolm wrote:

rainbow body you realize the exhaustion of phenomena while in the bardo of dharmatā i.e. during thugdam.

ConradTree said:

Obviously rainbow body occurs, so obviously bardo of dharmata occurs.

However I have come to believe that bardo of dharmata only appears for long dedicated Dzogchen practitioners who have made significant progress.

Malcolm wrote:

Bardo of dharmatā occurs for everyone, but only experienced practitioners can recognize it.

ConradTree said:

Why is there no mention of bardo of dharmata before Dzogchen Menngagde for example?

Malcolm wrote:

Because the bardo of Dharmatā is connected with thögal.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, April 13th, 2014 at 7:37 PM

Title: Re: Kalachakra practice in Sakya

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

In Sakya, the main Kalacakra practice is the preliminary practice for the six yogas; it is a simplified form in one face and two arms. Chogye Trichen remarked this was all one needed.

M

pueraeternus said:

Noted, thanks. That should be easily found.

Malcolm wrote:

I am not sure the text has been translated. But it is in the collection of main daily sadhanas used in Sakya.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, April 13th, 2014 at 7:36 PM

Title: Re: Mahamudra meditation problem: locating the mind

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

In fact, space arises from consciousness, and the four elements arise from space. This is a universal explanation of the arising of matter in Dharm texts.

dzogchungpa said:

Did the historical Buddha teach this?

Malcolm wrote:

Indeed.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, April 13th, 2014 at 7:11 PM

Title: Re: Mahamudra meditation problem: locating the mind

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

[

...because if the idea is that there is some little invisible bubble of thoughts and personality that escapes the body of a dead person, and floats around, perhaps circling like a vulture, looking for people who are copulating so it can plant itself there, as though there is a sort of condensed version of a particular person, that's off base. But I think it is what a lot of people think rebirth means.

Malcolm wrote:

What continues is the stream of aggregates, consciousness being the chief of them. Consciousness is defined as a (partless) moment of clarity. These moments are serial and independent from the serial moments of the consciousness of others.

PadmaVonSamba said:

So, if one asks, "well, what exactly is it that gets reborn?" , it is exactly what is reborn moment to moment in one's daily life, that is not dependent on a never-changing body. If you start a fire in the woods, and then ext moment, you die, the fire does not die. It keeps burning. Yet, a fire is not the same thing from one second to the next either. each part of the wood causes another part of the wood to ignite. This is a poor analogy to how karma works, meaning how a set of habitual actions established at one time can continue to have a reverberating effect and remanifest themselves accordingly at a later time, even after the person's body is dead.

. . .

Malcolm wrote:

This sort of treatment is the post-modern version of "rebirth". It is not what the Buddha taught, however. In reality, the Buddha taught that one's five aggregates continue into the next world. It is foolish to deny that this is what the Buddha taught. You may not accept it, you may think it is nonsense, but if so, you are not really a student of the Buddha. It bears repeating that Buddha taught four kinds of liberated persons in terms of how many rebirths and in what realm (desire realm or form realm) it would take them to achieve final nirvana. Dzogchen tantras especially spend a great deal of time discussing rebirth and the bardo, and they do not mean this symbolically. To discard rebirth then is to discard the whole of the Buddha's Dharma and to replace it with some post-modern intellectualism as you have done here.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, April 13th, 2014 at 7:06 PM

Title: Re: Mahamudra meditation problem: locating the mind

Content:

jeeprs said:

So, the sense in which mind 'creates' space is also the sense in which it 'creates' matter..

Malcolm wrote:

Well, no. Matter arises from consciousness directly, i.e. consciousness is the efficient cause of matter, not merely a formal cause in the sense you provide. I already demonstrated this to Andrew that this was the Buddhist view (sutra as well as tantra).

When you understand that consciousness, like matter, is a "dravya", then it all makes sense.

M

jeeprs said:

Would you mind pointing out where you demonstrated that?

Malcolm wrote:

Some other thread.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, April 13th, 2014 at 9:36 AM

Title: Re: Mahamudra meditation problem: locating the mind

Content:

jeeprs said:

So, the sense in which mind 'creates' space is also the sense in which it 'creates' matter..

Malcolm wrote:

Well, no. Matter arises from consciousness directly, i.e. consciousness is the efficient cause of matter, not merely a formal cause in the sense you provide. I already demonstrated this to Andrew that this was the Buddhist view (sutra as well as tantra).

When you understand that consciousness, like matter, is a "dravya", then it all makes sense.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, April 13th, 2014 at 6:29 AM

Title: Re: Difference between consciousness and the mind

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

If you emphasize the emptiness aspect, you will err into annihilation.

odysseus said:

Do elaborate, are you pulling my leg?

Malcolm wrote:

Emptiness alone is insufficient to attain buddhahood.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, April 13th, 2014 at 6:28 AM

Title: Re: Kalachakra practice in Sakya

Content:

pueraeternus said:

Thanks Cone and Kirtu.

Malcolm wrote:

HHST wrote a short sadhana for the Kalacakra in NYC.

pueraeternus said:

Yes. It is a really short sadhana. It definitely something to start with, but I am also looking for more substantial texts.

There is this book on Geshe Ngawang Ghargyey's teachings on Kalachakra that he gave at the Sakya Tegchen Choling in Seattle in 1982. Would this be suitable for someone who had initiation from Sakya?

Malcolm wrote:

In Sakya, the main Kalacakra practice is the preliminary practice for the six yogas; it is a simplified form in one face and two arms. Chogye Trichen remarked this was all one needed.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, April 12th, 2014 at 10:43 PM

Title: Re: Mahamudra meditation problem: locating the mind

Content:

Andrew108 said:

So the teachings are heuristic? If so then fair enough. But there should be some transparency, because there are many practitioners who are invested in the belief that matter arises out of consciousness.

asunthatneversets said:

No one has suggested that matter arises out of consciousness.

Malcolm wrote:

In fact, space arises from consciousness, and the four elements arise from space. This is a universal explanation of the arising of matter in Dharm texts.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, April 12th, 2014 at 8:17 PM

Title: Re: Kalachakra practice in Sakya

Content:

kirtu said:

<http://vajrasana.org/buddhism.htm> is a teaching that HE Chogye Trichen gave on the Kalchakra.

In general Kalachakra practitioners can fairly openly use sadhana texts (from Berzin). Most of the sadhana texts published are from the Gelug tradition and can be found at the <http://kalachakranet.org/>. Most of the Kalachakra sadhanas are also pretty complex. If you are a student of Khenpo Pema or Lama Kunga then ask them.

There is also a brief sadhana written by Jamgon Kongtrul. This was given out at the Palyul Kalachakra empowerment and teaching that HH Penor Rinpoche gave in 2007.

You could also ask HHST for a Sakya Kalachakra sadhana. HHST said in Kevelaer, Germany that it would be good to practice the Kalachakra but went on to basically note that the empowerment was mostly given as a blessing. Nonetheless, practicing it in the Sakya tradition is in fact possible.

Kirt

Malcolm wrote:

When Chogye Trichen gave Kalacakra, he gave it from the Jonang tradition primarily.

HHST wrote a short sadhana for the Kalacakra in NYC.

I never said it was impossible to practice Kalacakra in Sakya, just that it is not a main practice in Sakya. However, since Chogye Trichen taught it fairly often, perhaps one of his successors will continue his teaching tradition.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, April 12th, 2014 at 8:16 PM

Title: Re: Kalachakra practice in Sakya

Content:

conebeckham said:

I suppose I should point out that the Jonang lineage, Kalacakra specialists certainly, grew out of the Sakya lineage...

Malcolm wrote:

The Kalacakra of Jonang is not a Sakya lineage, it did not pass through the five founder masters, nor through Tshar or Ngor.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, April 12th, 2014 at 8:14 PM

Title: Re: Mahamudra meditation problem: locating the mind

Content:

Andrew108 said:

I would prefer to say that Science posits truth rather than certainty. Certainty implies the end of the game. The realization itself. I don't trust science sufficiently to believe that it can provide me with realization just by itself. The type of truth science posits concerns the truth of how the world works. In that world objects obey rules. That by itself proves to me that there is an 'objective condition'. The truth of there being an objective condition has implications for my practice.

Malcolm wrote:

Science does no such thing. Scientific inquiry is a process of testing hypothesis, and that is all. There are no scientific truths, there are only the latest in scientific understandings, which are always subject to change and refinement.

Science is very subtle and detailed in its words, but its meaning is as coarse and rough as a pile of sand. By comparison, the words of Buddhadharma are very simple and easy to understand, but its meaning is very deep and profound.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, April 12th, 2014 at 8:05 PM

Title: Re: Ordaining as a monk or nun in the west

Content:

Indrajala said:

You could easily train them to do sand mandalas or elaborate pumas.

It would be easier logistically for example to have American monks accompanying some eminent teacher to America.

Malcolm wrote:

It would seem so. However, it takes many years of training to be a ritual attendant, as well as fluency in both spoken and literary Tibetan. Creating sand mandalas is not easy. It is a craft that takes a long time to perfect.

Indrajala said:

Again it just suggests to me that Tibetan Buddhism in general neither wants nor needs monastics from outside their fold, and such sentiments are only reproduced amongst western Tibetan Buddhists who wouldn't spit on you if you were burning on the side of the road.

Malcolm wrote:

Tibetans monasteries are quite happy to take in Westerners in general. What you don't understand is that Tibetan Monasteries in general do not really provide everything for their monks, who depend on families and benefactors for much of their needs. This is one of the sociological reasons for having monks do prayers on one's behalf, etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, April 12th, 2014 at 7:55 PM

Title: Re: Difference between consciousness and the mind

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

In some higher Dzogchen texts, it is suggested that even a division of sentient vs. non-sentient is merely conventional and not actual, not to be believed.

odysseus said:

Sure, but this doesn't mean that plants etc. are sentient. It means that there is no duality between sentience and non-sentience as one realizes emptiness.

Malcolm wrote:

It means that everything is the state of wisdom (jñāna) right from the beginning.

odysseus said:

Looks like both meanings are valid, no discrepancy.

Malcolm wrote:

If you emphasize the emptiness aspect, you will err into annihilation.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, April 12th, 2014 at 7:43 PM

Title: Re: Mahamudra meditation problem: locating the mind

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

If you don't accept this point, then no matter what you think you understand of the Buddha's teaching you cannot be considered someone who truly grasps its import and meaning. There are many refutations of your point of view even in Dzogchen.

Andrew108 said:

Stay on topic. This thread isn't about me.

Malcolm wrote:

The point is that you have made many statements about what Dzogchen is, about what reality is, which are in deep conflict with Buddhadharma, Dzogchen included.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, April 12th, 2014 at 7:42 PM

Title: Re: Mahamudra meditation problem: locating the mind

Content:

Andrew108 said:

For some people it is difficult to accept that consciousness has a physical basis. For others it is axiomatic.

Malcolm wrote:

For some people it is difficult to accept that matter has a basis in consciousness. For others it is axiomatic.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, April 12th, 2014 at 7:40 PM

Title: Re: Mahamudra meditation problem: locating the mind

Content:

Andrew108 said:

At it's most fundamental level, science is saying that objects obey rules. This isn't an assumption. It's not just a construct either. These rules are not conventions or formed by consensus. They are universal. It means that these rules are always applicable even without a consensus.

Malcolm wrote:

Hence for you they are an ultimate truth.

Andrew108 said:

What I have said about consciousness is that it can't be something which is beyond the rules of the physical universe.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, its not physical, so therefore, your contention goes out the window.

Andrew108 said:

This idea that objects obey rules is proof that reality is not just a subjective experience.

Malcolm wrote:

Tell that to a Mahāsiddha.

Andrew108 said:

But the 6 realms model is largely a model where an individual suffers because they are not able to adapt to that environment.

Malcolm wrote:

No, the six realms model is a model which explains six different kinds of perception.

Andrew108 said:

There is no proof of the Buddhist reduction that consciousness exists as a separate entity - as a stream.

Malcolm wrote:

Sure there is: karma and liberation.

Andrew108 said:

The one thing they trust, that they must trust, is reality.

Malcolm wrote:

As long as they are relying ultimate truth (the sole reality), this is fine. But you are suggesting that the conventional truth of physics is ultimate truth, and this will never result in realization.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, April 11th, 2014 at 9:52 PM

Title: Re: Mahamudra meditation problem: locating the mind

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

A sentient being is a stream of consciousness that transmigrates through samsara. If you don't understand this point, you don't understand Buddhadharma, much less Dzogchen, Mahāmudra and so on.

M

Andrew108 said:

You mean that if I don't believe this point. I certainly understand the point, but at the moment I choose not to believe it.

Malcolm wrote:

If you don't accept this point, than no matter what you think you understand of the Buddha's teaching you cannot be considered someone who truly grasps its import and meaning. There are many refutations of your point of view even in Dzogchen.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, April 11th, 2014 at 7:57 PM

Title: Re: Mahamudra meditation problem: locating the mind

Content:

Simon E. said:

Indeed. The gnostic/duality view of the 'ghost in the machine' is found nowhere in Buddhadharma.

Malcolm wrote:

There are six dhātus, Simon, not just five. Consciousness is the sixth. The view you enunciate would indicate that there are only five dhātus, earth, water, fire, air and space.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, April 11th, 2014 at 7:56 PM

Title: Re: Mahamudra meditation problem: locating the mind

Content:

Andrew108 said:

The brain is not a being inhabiting a body. The body and the brain together make the being.

Malcolm wrote:

If you are a physicalist, yes. However, such a view is incompatible with Buddhadharma. There are five aggregates, not merely one. A sentient being is a stream of consciousness that transmigrates through samsara. If you don't understand this point, you don't understand Buddhadharma, much less Dzogchen, Mahāmudra and so on.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, April 11th, 2014 at 7:44 PM

Title: Re: Kalachakra practice in Sakya

Content:

pueraeternus said:

Recently I attended HHST's Kalachakra empowerment in NYC. I would like to further my study and practice, but could not find any books on Kalachakra specific to the lineage transmitted by HHST (majority are on the Gelugpa transmissions). Is there any book anyone familiar with the tradition can recommend? Or there is no great differences between the various Kalachakra lineages and I can just refer to any available in the market?

Malcolm wrote:

There is very little material by Sakya authors on Kalachakra. For the most part, only Lama Dampa, Takstang Lotsawa and Amyezhabs wrote anything of significance on Kalachakra, unless of course you count Buton as a Sakyapa -- the Gelug lineage comes from him.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, April 11th, 2014 at 7:40 PM

Title: Re: Ordination

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Secondly, Indians had concepts of debt and contracts, found in the Vedas on up.

Buddha, for example, clearly refers to karma has a kind of a debt. Where there are debts, there must be means of keeping records of such debts, etc.

Indrajala said:

You can keep track of debts with colored stones in jars or ropes tied together.

You don't need writing to keep records. Some Mesoamerican civilizations managed fine with just ropes.

Malcolm wrote:

Indeed, but the fact that Indians were surrounded with people who had writing, and were in contact with people who had writing (Phoenicians, Greeks, Persians, Chinese) makes it unlikely that Indians were unaware of writing.

Basically, I find it unlikely that Indians all of a sudden adopted writing merely because of tenuous contacts with the Greeks. What I am suggesting as a more likely scenario is that Indians used writing for commercial documents, not religious texts, during this period. We have no paper documents at all from the Subcontinent that date earlier than Gandharan finds.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, April 11th, 2014 at 7:41 AM

Title: Re: Ordination

Content:

tingdzin said:

I suggest that the experts out there put their opinions in writing in a refereed journal and have them evaluated by other knowledgeable people. Until then , don't be too dogmatic about your opinions. An internet forum is a pretty small pond.

Malcolm wrote:

Personally, I am not that invested in the issue. I simply find it a little far-fetched to believe that Indians widely adopted a writing system based on a Phoenician script within the 150 year time frame.

Secondly, Indians had concepts of debt and contracts, found in the Vedas on up.

Buddha, for example, clearly refers to karma has a kind of a debt. Where there are debts, there must be means of keeping records of such debts, etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, April 11th, 2014 at 6:46 AM

Title: Re: Ordination

Content:

pueraeternus said:

Is there evidence that such bursaries were established during the Buddha's time? The Buddhist community wandered around as travelling mendicants most of the time (except during retreats), were supposed to only have the 4 requisites, cannot handle money, etc. So all these point the bursars towards a later phase in monastic Buddhism.

Malcolm wrote:

There is a difference between a monastic officer handling money and a monk handling money personally. You must recall, the Buddha was gifted with property during his lifetime. There is evidence that within 100 years of the Buddha's PN there were permanent Viharas.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, April 11th, 2014 at 6:22 AM

Title: Re: Ordination

Content:

Indrajala said:

I'm quite solid in my position stating that later developments in Vinaya literature where the Buddha is talking about drawing up loan contracts with people is in fact a much later development and moreover an indication of ignorance on the part of the author(s), who were unaware that writing didn't exist in the Buddha's day.

pueraeternus said:

Even if there were writing at the time of the Buddha, the loan contracts thingy would not make sense, since the Buddha expressively prohibited monastics from handling money (if we believe that part of the Vinaya to be Buddhavacana, which is very likely).

Malcolm wrote:

There were always bursars in monasteries, who were charged with managing money.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, April 11th, 2014 at 12:01 AM

Title: Re: Ordination

Content:

Indrajala said:

Megasthenes had very limited contact with Indian culture and civilization.
He did live there for some time. Your argument is silly.

Malcolm wrote:

He did not see very much of India. His fragments certainly do not constitute an accurate picture of Indian life in the 4th century BCE.

Indrajala said:

You're saying "it is quite likely that some form of writing existed in India during the time of Buddha." Well, you have no evidence for this.

Malcolm wrote:

There is also no evidence to the contrary apart from a single passage in a fragment by a Greek Ambassador in a book for which there is no original.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, April 10th, 2014 at 11:33 PM

Title: Re: Ordination

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Most scholars at one time agreed that Troy was a myth...further, Megasthenes is not a reliable witness.

Indrajala said:

And why wouldn't he have been a reliable witness? If writing existed you'd have had mention of it in the earliest stratum of Jain and Buddhist literature, but as far as I know there are no such references. You cannot dismiss him as a period witness.

In any case the Vinaya literature reveals multiple layers of historical development. Read Schopen and educate yourself.

Malcolm wrote:

The fact that Vinaya was composed in layers was known a long time before Schopen. Anyone who has studied the three vows literature is already well acquainted with this fact. Read Gorampa (for one) and educate yourself.

According to Schopen, there are no "earliest" records. As you know, he basically does not think anything is reliably datable based on text criticism alone.

Megasthenes had very limited contact with Indian culture and civilization.

We can say with certainty that Ashoka used writing. We cannot say with certainty when writing first was used in India and by whom. All we can really say with certainty is that it, like most other scripts in the ancient world, was based on Western Semitic, where aleph = an Ox.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, April 10th, 2014 at 10:14 PM

Title: Re: Ordination

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

It is quite likely that some form of writing existed in India during the time of Buddha.

Indrajala said:

Show us the evidence. There is no evidence of this as far as I know, and most scholars agree.

Malcolm wrote:

Most scholars at one time agreed that Troy was a myth...further, Megasthenes is not a reliable witness.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, April 10th, 2014 at 9:03 PM

Title: Re: Ordination

Content:

Indrajala said:

[ It was just a formality that orthodox Buddhist traditions demand.

Malcolm wrote:

Hardly.

Indrajala said:

(for example, like how to properly draw up loan contracts with laypeople which is actually attributed to the Buddha who lived in a time with no writing!).

Malcolm wrote:

It is quite likely that some form of writing existed in India during the time of Buddha. It may not have been used to record religious texts, but considering your recent speculations about a Mesopotamian/India connection, it would be absurd to suppose that Indians kept all their financial undertakings in their heads. And given that bark records don't survive long in India...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, April 7th, 2014 at 7:15 PM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

After the collapse of the previous universe, there are no buddhas and sentient beings -- and this is called the bardo of samsara and nirvana. Present in the latent basis however is a neutral awareness which does not know itself.

Because of traces of action and affliction remain from previous universe, the basis is stirred, lights shine out, and they are either recognized or not, resulting in samasara and nirvana.

This neutral awareness is what happens when someone achieves an incomplete full awakening, for example an arhat or some other form of lesser liberation that can "return to the cause". This is why Dzogchen makes such a big deal about Dzogchen Buddhahood being one that "does not return to the cause".

Emakirikiri said:

Do the atomic body, rainbow body and great transference body all constitute the "does not return to the cause" version of awakening?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, April 7th, 2014 at 7:12 PM

Title: Re: Difference between consciousness and the mind

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

The idea that gender is determined by past karma is linked to the (cultural) notion that birth as a female is an unfortunate event somehow due to negative actions in the past.

Vajraprajnakhadga said:

That is not a universal perspective. Nyingma in particular have yogini traditions where female birth is seen as auspicious. The view that male rebirth is superior is rooted in patriarchal monasticism, nothing more.

PadmaVonSamba said:

True. It is not universal. But is that attitude the exception? Must a female be exceptional in some way, in order for it to be considered that her birth as a female was not the result of negative karma?

. . .

Malcolm wrote:

In general, in Indian Buddhism, female birth is considered a disadvantage. A term often seen in sutras is "skye dman", inferior birth, used frequently for women. It is based on a Sanskrit original, but I forget what it is, something like hinajati.

It does not mean that women cannot achieve awakening, it means however they have some obstacles men do not have.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, April 7th, 2014 at 7:10 PM

Title: Re: Difference between consciousness and the mind

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The classical division in Buddhadharma is that there is sentient life and non-sentient life. In some higher Dzogchen texts, it is suggested that even a division of sentient vs. non-sentient is merely conventional and not actual, not to be believed.

Gwenn Dana said:

Thank you. Models apparently are not always as unanimous as one might think, even in a similar context.

odysseus said:

Sure, but this doesn't mean that plants etc. are sentient. It means that there is no duality between sentience and non-sentience as one realizes emptiness.

Malcolm wrote:

It means that everything is the state of wisdom (jñāna) right from the beginning.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, April 7th, 2014 at 7:08 PM

Title: Re: Difference between consciousness and the mind

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

The idea that gender is determined by past karma is linked to the (cultural) notion that birth as a female is an unfortunate event somehow due to negative actions in the past.

Vajraprajnakhadga said:

That is not a universal perspective. Nyingma in particular have yogini traditions where female birth is seen as auspicious. The view that male rebirth is superior is rooted in patriarchal monasticism, nothing more.

Malcolm wrote:

No, it is a practical observation. Women have more illnesses, they endure the hardship of childbirth, menstruation, etc. It is for this reason that there are many sutras where women are encouraged to desire rebirth as men in their next life.

On the other hand, as you note, in all highest yoga tantra traditions, the negative view of female birth is reversed because all women have the nature of prajñā. This is not an especially "Nyingma" perspective.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, April 7th, 2014 at 1:40 AM

Title: Re: Difference between consciousness and the mind

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

However, according to Tibetan Medicine and Ayurveda, gender is not fixed until the third week after conception, and can be changed using various medicines and rites.

dzogchungpa said:

That's not actually true though, is it?

Malcolm wrote:

As far as I am concerned it is.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, April 6th, 2014 at 10:57 PM

Title: Re: Difference between consciousness and the mind

Content:

alpha said:

Can a mother by manipulating the internal winds in the first three weeks of conception knowingly attract a particular type of consciousness ?

Malcolm wrote:

I don't think so. The moment of conception requires a viable sperm, egg and a consciousness seeking rebirth.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, April 6th, 2014 at 10:23 PM

Title: Re: Difference between consciousness and the mind

Content:

Sherab said:

Sorry Alpha, I misread your earlier post.

There can be the karma that ripens a being for rebirth is one that does not involve copulating couple, such as birth in the hell realm and birth in the gods realm. Other births that do not involve copulating couples are also mentioned in Buddhist text such as birth from heat and moisture but I do not know how such a birth maps to birth as understood in modern biology. But as I understand it, the karma for such a birth must ripen in a being for that being to take such a birth.

alpha said:

I meant the IVF process where in the absence of copulating couple, there is no basis on which the consciousness that takes rebirth to generate feelings of revulsion or attraction. Since the basis (the couple copulating) on which the consciousness usually generates attraction and revulsion is missing, how does the consciousness choose if it will be a male or a female?

Malcolm wrote:

It doesn't. Gender is determined mostly by past karma.

Bardo beings are clairvoyant. One presumes that they are aware of the intention of parents to conceive during the IVF process and take that chance.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, April 6th, 2014 at 9:56 PM

Title: Re: Difference between consciousness and the mind

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

Yes, it does. Totally. It shows that consciousness can just as easily plop itself down into (or as you say, "appropriate" ) a petri dish or a test tube just as easily as a woman's abdomen.

You have suggested all sorts of reasons why consciousness is specifically this or that, or can only go here or there or arise with one kind of thing or another.

It seems that consciousness thinks otherwise.

. . .

alpha said:

The way i see it copulation is not a precondition for rebirth.

But there is a question i don't know the answer for .In the absence of copulation on what basis does the consciousness choose to become a male or a female since the male and female(as a couple copulating) are absent as a basis on which to feel attraction or repulsion ?

Malcolm wrote:

As mentioned above, there are four birth types.

Karma is the primary determinant of gender. However, according to Tibetan Medicine and Ayurveda, gender is not fixed until the third week after conception, and can be changed using various medicines and rites.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, April 6th, 2014 at 8:28 PM

Title: Re: Nature of awareness

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

When I discuss awareness as a mental factor, I am referring to the mental operation of taking note of an object.

jeeprs said:

I believe that is usually given in English as 'apperception':

The mental process by which a person makes sense of an idea by assimilating it to the body of ideas he or she already possesses.

Malcolm wrote:

No, I am referring to the act of taking note of an object, whether inner or outer; so it is a more basic cognitive function.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, April 6th, 2014 at 8:08 PM

Title: Re: Nature of awareness

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Which Tibetan word do you mean by the term "awareness"?

Vajraprajñākhaḍga said:

In this particular context it would be rigpa.

Malcolm wrote:

"Rigpa", vidyā means "to know". It is not a mental factor.

When I discuss awareness as a mental factor, I am referring to the mental operation of taking note of an object.

aware (adj.)

late Old English gewær, from Proto-Germanic *ga-waraz (cognates: Old Saxon giwar, Middle Dutch gheware, Old High German giwar, German gewahr), from *ga-, intensive prefix, + waraz "wary, cautious" (see wary).

<http://www.etymonline.com/index.php>

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, April 6th, 2014 at 8:05 PM

Title: Re: Difference between consciousness and the mind

Content:

Gwenn Dana said:

Hmmmm. I just read this:

Outside of neuroscience biologists, Humberto Maturana and Francisco Varela contributed their Santiago theory of cognition in which they wrote:

Living systems are cognitive systems, and living as a process is a process of cognition. This statement is valid for all organisms, with or without a nervous system.[5]

This theory contributes a perspective that cognition is a process present at organic levels that we don't usually consider to be aware. Given the possible relationship between awareness and cognition, and consciousness, this theory contributes an interesting perspective in the philosophical and scientific dialogue of awareness and living systems theory.

It would be interesting to hear Malcolm's thoughts on this.

Best wishes

Gwenn

Malcolm wrote:

The classical division in Buddhhadharma is that there is sentient life and non-sentient life. In some higher Dzogchen texts, it is suggested that even a division of sentient vs. non-sentient is merely conventional and not actual, not to be believed.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, April 6th, 2014 at 9:52 AM

Title: Re: Nature of awareness

Content:

Jesse said:

So what is it? Does it arise from our physical form (Brain, nervous system etc), Is it a natural phenomena of the universe (Gravity, Space, Time, etc).

What is the difference between my awareness, and everyone else's? Does it even exist separately for each individual?, if not why is my experience so seemingly separate from everyone else, then.

Malcolm wrote:

This is the Buddhist perspective:

Awareness is a mental factor. It belongs to consciousness and arises with it. A consciousness is not always aware, for example, when it is in a state of cessation.

Your awareness is a mental factor of your consciousness, it belongs only to you.

Vajraprajnakhadga said:

That seems to almost be the opposite of what I've been taught. Dzogchen teachings essentially posit that mirror-like awareness is the very essence of what we are, and that it is not a thing ultimately.

Malcolm wrote:

Which Tibetan word do you mean by the term "awareness"?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, April 6th, 2014 at 9:34 AM

Title: Re: Difference between consciousness and the mind

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

...

Malcolm wrote:

No, it does not change anything at all about what Buddhism has to say about conception since there are generally four modes of conception according to the Buddha.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, April 5th, 2014 at 11:47 PM

Title: Re: Difference between consciousness and the mind

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

But YOU said:

Malcolm wrote:

Indeed, they have to be having sex. ...parents engaging in sex (in the case of a human birth)

PadmaVonSamba said:

. . .

Malcolm wrote:

In general, when we are talking about the normal mode of conception for human beings. Test tube babies, cloning, etc., do not really alter what Buddhism has to say about conception.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, April 5th, 2014 at 11:44 PM

Title: Re: Difference between consciousness and the mind

Content:

Andrew108 said:

You need the consciousness of the mother and father to create the conditions for the entry of a third consciousness. Which is more important for life, the consciousness of the mother and father or the consciousness of the third party?

Malcolm wrote:

Indeed, they have to be having sex. That requires that they are conscious beings, of course. One has to have all three things. In other words, parents engaging in sex (in the case of a human birth), and a gandharva that seeks rebirth.

PadmaVonSamba said:

Science has long proved that actual sexual union is not needed (in other words, a "test-tube baby").

Furthermore, cloning can also produce another being.

. . .

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, we would call these moisture and heat births...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, April 5th, 2014 at 10:57 PM

Title: Re: Difference between consciousness and the mind

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

.. There is no conceivable way to avoid this as long as we are using words and concepts.

Sherab said:

So you agree that your holding of the two truths as merely cognitions is within a framework of subject-object duality. If so, then there can be no objectivity of such a model of the two truths because such truths will disappear for beings in the two instances I mentioned earlier. I don't think your quoting of Chandrakirti's take on the two truth support your view that the two truths are merely cognitions because it is equally applicable in the model that I have described. In the model that I described, the two truths do not disappear for beings that are unconscious because unlike your model, the model is not tied to the perspective of individual beings.

Malcolm wrote:

First, I don't recall the model you described. This thread is complicated and our discussion has long since departed from the main body of the thread.

In the Madhyamaka model, the two truths are merely cognitions (veridical or false) of one and the same object.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, April 5th, 2014 at 9:52 PM

Title: Re: Nature of awareness

Content:

Jesse said:

So what is it? Does it arise from our physical form (Brain, nervous system etc), Is it a natural phenomena of the universe (Gravity, Space, Time, etc).

What is the difference between my awareness, and everyone else's? Does it even exist separately for each individual?, if not why is my experience so seemingly separate from everyone else, then.

Malcolm wrote:

This is the Buddhist perspective:

Awareness is a mental factor. It belongs to consciousness and arises with it. A consciousness is not always aware, for example, when it is in a state of cessation.

Your awareness is a mental factor of your consciousness, it belongs only to you.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, April 5th, 2014 at 9:33 PM

Title: Re: Difference between consciousness and the mind

Content:

Sherab said:

So does an unconscious being has a mind if there is no cognition whatsoever?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, it continues as the ālayavijñāna, for example, in nirodha-samapatti.

Sherab said:

Isn't it the case that for an untrained being, he is unconscious at the time of black near attainment? If yes, can an unconscious being at the time of black near attainment has luminosity as the object of his mind?

Malcolm wrote:

It is not that an untrained being is unconscious. He or she is simply not able to recognize the moment of luminosity when it occurs because it is very brief.

Sherab said:

Since you held earlier that the two truths are only cognitions, then in the above two instances, there can be no two truths since there are no cognitions.

This implies that the two truths as cognitions is subjective. Therefore your positing of two truths as cognitions is implicitly in a framework that is not free from subject-object duality.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, the way Candrakirti defines the two truths is a little more precise: he states that the two truths are the object of either true or false cognitions respectively. In this case then, luminosity would be an ultimate truth. However, when luminosity is not correctly perceived, it becomes a relative truth; when it is correctly perceived, it is an ultimate truth.

The point however is that the truths are defined on the basis of veridical or false cognitions, so as a shorthand, I place the emphasis on the cognitions since they are the defining factor.

So yes, the two truths are conventionally subjective, they are not objective. The object of a veridical cognition, dharmatā śūnyatā, is the ultimate truth. Nevertheless, the realization of ultimately truth comes when one's mind is truly synchronized with how things are (yatha bhutaṃ) and the apparent duality of subject and object vanishes since it is not there to begin with.

While one is confined to relative truth cognitions (including relative formulations of ultimate truths) one is necessarily confined to subject/object duality. There is no conceivable way to avoid this as long as we are using words and concepts.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, April 5th, 2014 at 8:56 PM

Title: Re: Difference between consciousness and the mind

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

If you properly study Dharma, you will understand the how.

Andrew108 said:

I thought you were against Ad Hominem remarks?

Malcolm wrote:

It was not an hominem remark; it was a simple observation.

Andrew108 said:

Your position is based on belief. It's similar to a Christian saying that you need to study the Bible some more in order to understand the resurrection.

Malcolm wrote:

My position is based on understanding what the Buddha said. I have not made any truth claims for it.

Andrew108 said:

If a consciousness was able to 'descend into a womb' then there are some logical inconstancies with that.

1. You have to get the timing right. Can't descend too soon and can't be too late. So how does a disembodied consciousness get so good at timing?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, the timing, etc., have to be right. There are many things that must come together, it must be the right parents, etc.

Andrew108 said:

2. You need the consciousness of the mother and father to create the conditions for the entry of a third consciousness. Which is more important for life, the consciousness of the mother and father or the consciousness of the third party?

Malcolm wrote:

Indeed, they have to be having sex. That requires that they are conscious beings, of course. One has to have all three things. In other words, parents engaging in sex (in the case of a human birth), and a gandharva that seeks rebirth.

Andrew108 said:

3. The disembodied consciousness must exist somewhere before descending into the womb. What is the nature of the place where the consciousness exists prior to the descent?

Malcolm wrote:

The bardo.

Andrew108 said:

Is it a bounded place?

Malcolm wrote:

No. Its more like a phase. You should read Birth, Life and Death by ChNN. He has a beautiful description of the bardo, and so on.

Andrew108 said:

Is it locatable? Is it another dimension? What is the relationship between that place and the dimension of our physical reality? In what way can they interact? The non-physical penetrating the physical?

Malcolm wrote:

Physical reality is merely an (strong) illusion. There is no physical reality in fact. In the end, the only thing that is "real" is consciousness.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, April 5th, 2014 at 8:48 PM

Title: Re: Difference between consciousness and the mind

Content:

Sherab said:

So does an unconscious being has a mind if there is no cognition whatsoever?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, it continues as the ālayavijñāna, for example, in nirodha-samapatti.

Sherab said:

Isn't it the case that for an untrained being, he is unconscious at the time of black near attainment? If yes, can an unconscious being at the time of black near attainment has luminosity as the object of his mind?

Malcolm wrote:

It is not that an untrained being is unconscious. He or she is simply not able to recognize the moment of luminosity when it occurs because it is very brief.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, April 4th, 2014 at 10:17 AM

Title: Re: Difference between consciousness and the mind

Content:

Sherab said:

I have two questions for you.

If the two truths are cognitions, what cognition is there for a being who is unconscious? More specifically, what cognition is there for a being in the state of black near attainment in the death process?

If the two truths are cognitions, and there is no subject-object duality, then cognition is present in rocks, plants, etc., things that we normally think as not having cognitions of any sort. Is this a valid conclusion? If not, why not?

Malcolm wrote:

By definition an unconscious being has no cognitions.

Second, luminosity is the object of the mind of the black near attainment.

When there is no subject object duality, then according to the Yogacara school there are no further cognitions of things like rocks and trees, which are understood to be mind only. That absence of subject/object duality aka mind only, is understood by them to be ultimate truth. The appearances of rocks and trees are understood to be relative.

For Madhyamaka the cognition of subject and object is considered relative, when it is understood and realized that all phenomena are empty, that correct cognition is termed ultimate truth and subject and object cognition ceases.

So, your conclusion is not valid, and misses the barn by a wide mark.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, April 4th, 2014 at 2:02 AM

Title: Re: Difference between consciousness and the mind

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

It means that consciousness descends into the womb, in the case of human being, joining with the spermatozoon and oocyte at the moment of conception.

PadmaVonSamba said:

You are describing what and I am interested in how.

In other word, what "appropriate" entails.

. . .

Malcolm wrote:

If you properly study Dharma, you will understand the how.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, April 4th, 2014 at 2:01 AM

Title: Re: Difference between consciousness and the mind

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

In any event, what you are fundamentally suggesting is that a spermatozoon has a consciousness, separate from the consciousness that descends into the womb at the moment of conception.

PadmaVonSamba said:

You know, that theory, which I think is from Padmasambhava, has a lot of holes in it.

. . .

Malcolm wrote:

That teaching is from the Buddha; specifically the Mahāniddana sutta:

"From consciousness as a requisite condition comes name-and-form.' Thus it has been said. And this is the way to understand how from consciousness as a requisite condition comes name-and-form. If consciousness were not to descend into the mother's womb, would name-and-form take shape in the womb?"

"No, lord."

"If, after descending into the womb, consciousness were to depart, would name-and-form be produced for this world?"

<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/dn/dn.15.0.than.html>

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, April 4th, 2014 at 12:38 AM

Title: Re: intoxication and tibetan buddhism

Content:

ovi said:

Meditation has been the only and single essential factor. Cannabis was a completely unessential one, yet very helpful, for reasons I have already talked about, that is, its powerful anxiolytic effect that it had upon me, which actually allowed me to meditate. I am well aware that it doesn't work the same way with everybody, it can even be anxiogenic to others, but telling me how I am completely deluded about this aspect isn't meant to be helpful, nor is it true.

Malcolm wrote:

Meditation has been the only and single essential factor.

Then why bother defending herb as useful for Buddhist practice?

I am well aware that it doesn't work the same way with everybody

It pretty much does, despite what you presently believe.

telling me how I am completely deluded about this aspect isn't meant to be helpful, nor is it true

It is both helpful and true.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, April 4th, 2014 at 12:34 AM

Title: Re: Difference between consciousness and the mind

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

Let's define this concept of appropriation...what that actually means in terms of awareness or consciousness arising with, or somehow interacting with organic (or, inorganic matter, from which organic matter is composed) matter.

Malcolm wrote:

It means that consciousness descends into the womb, in the case of human being, joining with the spermatozoon and oocyte at the moment of conception.

PadmaVonSamba said:

You see, I am asking this because I want to understand why, if awareness appropriates a collection of cells (my body) at some point, or even something formless, why not consider that it appropriates a single cell as well?

Malcolm wrote:

The material aggregate consists of sense organs and sense objects. A cell does not have sense organs. Plants do not have sense organs. Spermatozoa and oocytes do not have sense organs.

In any event, what you are fundamentally suggesting is that a spermatozoon has a consciousness, separate from the consciousness that descends into the womb at the moment of conception.

If you say "Sentient beings exist in seven locations" then are you not essentially saying that awareness/consciousness appropriates seven different sets of conditions?
. . .[/quote]

I am saying that there are six realms and the bardo; that is where sentient beings live.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, April 3rd, 2014 at 11:27 PM

Title: Re: intoxication and tibetan buddhism

Content:

ovi said:

I have smoked in the past, but it never got me out of depression until I combined it with meditation. I was never stoned during the meditation process, I consumed less than 1g/week. You know, your entire argument is flawed simply by claiming your own experience is that of everybody else.

Malcolm wrote:

I am glad you no longer feel depressed, but that fact that meditation is the key that helped you feel less depressed should tell you something about the effects of herb on your persona.

It's simple anatomy and pharmacology.

In any event, you do as you please. The reason why I spoke up is that I have more experience in this department than you. I am older, have been practicing far longer, and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, April 3rd, 2014 at 9:09 PM

Title: Re: intoxication and tibetan buddhism

Content:

ovi said:

I don't want to turn this thread into a place to post endless studies on psychedelics, but you realize that not all studies agree with your conclusions. Furthermore, I don't see how one can reject psychoactive substances in general. Don't you think people should receive treatment for depression, bipolar disorder, anxiety and other disorders if such treatment is useful? None of them are a panacea, but that doesn't reject their usefulness.

Malcolm wrote:

Everything can be medicine and everything can be poison; but that depends on the skill of the physician.

On the other hand, serious meditation practitioners generally avoid all drugs, as well as being intoxicated on alcohol.

In order to discover exactly how deleterious the effects of herb are on meditation, you would have had to have stopped smoking herb completely for at least a year and then resume it to observe its effects on your meditation practice.

Have you done this experiment?

I have. I can report that the effects of smoking herb on one's meditation practice is definitely not good. It leaves one with a cloudy fog which lasts anywhere from a day to a week depending on how much herb one has smoked and its quality. So now I do not smoke herb, nor do I take other kinds of drugs, all of which in my younger days I have done in large quantities. So, you are not speaking with someone who has no personal experience.

Of course, regular people who do not imagine themselves great meditators may do as they please, but not practitioners.

Of course, you may persist in your folly, that is your choice. But at least I have satisfied my obligation to inform you it is a folly.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, April 3rd, 2014 at 9:02 PM

Title: Re: intoxication and tibetan buddhism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

You are kidding yourself, however, it is really none of my business if you decide to follow a mistaken method.

ovi said:

This mistaken method allowed me end a 14-year old depression in one month of meditation and turn my mind towards Buddhism. It's good enough for me! Plus, I already said that in my case it's quite useful for reaching one-pointed concentration and maintaining it for hours. I don't see how anyone could fool themselves about what I said. Aren't we supposed to master all jhanas long before enlightenment? That is enter it at will, maintain it for as long as we want, leave at will and experience all the factors involved. Cannabis made my entry into the first jhana easier and that's about it; no mastery of even the first jhana; maintaining perfect one-pointed concentration for a few hours every day for a month is likely to get you some partial insight into the truth; reading about the kind of serenity and insight I have to develop shows me that all of my progress is quite meager in strength and I never said otherwise.

Malcolm wrote:

I can see how a stoned person can be in a state of distraction for hours and fool themselves into believing it was one pointed concentration.

ovi said:

What exactly is so wrong about what I said?

Malcolm wrote:

It contradicts every teaching of the Buddha on the nature of intoxicants.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, April 3rd, 2014 at 8:58 PM

Title: Re: Difference between consciousness and the mind

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

There are four kinds of bases that a given consciousness is can appropriate: moisture and heat birth, egg birth, womb birth and apparitional birth.

PadmaVonSamba said:

So, are you now saying that prior to "appropriating" some organic substance, something separate from organic substance, that can be called 'consciousness,' exists?

. . .

Malcolm wrote:

Not exactly. Sentient beings exist in seven locations, the six realms + the bardo. In each one they appropriate a body (one of four kinds) and have done so since beginningless time. Not all bodies are "material" on the coarse material sense of the term.

This is all Elementary Buddhism 101, what I am saying is not even slightly controversaial.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, April 3rd, 2014 at 10:04 AM

Title: Re: Difference between consciousness and the mind

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Truths are merely cognitions (of an object); one false, the other veridical. This is why they are inseparable, for they are cognitions of the nature of one and the same entity, one false; the other, correct.

Sherab said:

You are arguing within a framework where there is subject-object duality. I am arguing within a framework free of subject-object duality.

Malcolm wrote:

No, you are not, since truths are nothing other than cognitions. After all, you introduced the notion of "relative" into the conversation, not me.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, April 3rd, 2014 at 10:01 AM

Title: Re: intoxication and tibetan buddhism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

No, actually it does not. Marijuana impairs short term memory, and that is necessary for mindfulness by definition.

ovi said:

I can't deny facts. Cannabis is used world-wide for spiritual purposes and it has enhanced every part of my meditation session. It does a great job in calming my mind, I've spent hours in just being mindful of breathing without a single interruption, a thing much more difficult for me to do otherwise, it allows me to enter jhana in a matter of minutes, it allowed me to identify the direct connection between emptiness and dependent origination and I've had some pretty neat direct partial experiences of sunyata with ease. It's not essential for practice, but it was quite helpful in understanding the Dharma and turning me towards Buddhism. How it does that, I don't know. I've once read that although it impairs short-term memory, it vastly improves visual memory, among other things.

Malcolm wrote:

You are kidding yourself, however, it is really none of my business if you decide to follow a mistaken method.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, April 3rd, 2014 at 8:21 AM

Title: Re: Underweight worse then being overweight?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

In general, in Ayurveda and Tibetan Medicine consider that is best to be "slim". But slim does not mean underweight. It just means not carrying around too much extra weight.

Adi said:

And in general, if I'm not mistaken, both medicines don't take a universal approach to there being only one kind of person and One True Diet or One Best Food for everyone. Like coconut oil, it might be suggested for some in generous quantity, just a little for others, and strongly suggested not at all for some others. Or sunflower oil for one person, coconut oil for another, and for a third only small amounts of ghee depending on that person's constitution and their present situation.

Adi

Malcolm wrote:

Correct.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, April 3rd, 2014 at 8:16 AM

Title: Re: Difference between consciousness and the mind

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

There are two kinds of life: sentient and non-sentient.

PadmaVonSamba said:

I see....so, a single cell is not sentient, but if it merges with another single cell (which, by the way, is also not sentient) and then splits into a few more cells, and they divide into even more cells, and so on and so on...

then at some point the cells themselves "become" sentient?

...or no?

but if the cells are not sentient, then where is the sentience?

So, are you now saying that sentience is a property of organic matter itself?

...

Malcolm wrote:

Cells never become sentient, since sentience is not an emergent property of matter (which is why plants, which have cells, are nevertheless not included within sentient life). When a specific consciousness appropriates a basis, a material form, we call that "sentient life". There are four kinds of bases that a given consciousness is can appropriate: moisture and heat birth, egg birth, womb birth and apparitional birth.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, April 3rd, 2014 at 8:11 AM

Title: Re: Difference between consciousness and the mind

Content:

Sherab said:

Sure, but only if you don't hold the view that the relative is all there is.

Malcolm wrote:

All there is is the union of the two truths. If there is a basis, that is the basis.

Sherab said:

In the two truths model of reality, the relative truth is ultimately false, there is just one truth at the end.

If there is just one truth in the end, the so-called union of the two truth is true only provisionally and false ultimately.

Malcolm wrote:

Of course, who ever suggested otherwise?

"Since the Jinas have proposed that nirvana alone is true, what wise person would imagine that the rest was not false?"

-- Nāgarjuna

Sherab said:

The basis in the end, can only be the ultimate truth and the relative truth can only be a "truth" that emerges from the ultimate truth. In other words, from a true basis, a false basis can arise. Since the false basis arises from the true basis, it is possible to have the concept of a union of the relative and the ultimate where the relative is a "pure" relative rather than an "impure" relative.

Malcolm wrote:

Truths are merely cognitions (of an object); one false, the other veridical. This is why they are inseparable, for they are cognitions of the nature of one and the same entity, one false; the other, correct.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, April 3rd, 2014 at 4:24 AM

Title: Re: Underweight worse then being overweight?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

If you simply rely on the wisdom of the ṛṣīs, you will be fine.

dzogchungpa said:
May I ask what the ṛṣīs say?

Malcolm wrote:
Read either the four tantras or ayurvedic texts such as the Carakasamhita, etc.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Thursday, April 3rd, 2014 at 4:19 AM
Title: Re: Underweight worse then being overweight?
Content:

KeithBC said:
On the other hand, numerous studies have shown an increase in longevity on a restricted-calorie diet.

It might come down to reading the fine print in the specific studies, something that you can't do in the popular media.

Om mani padme hum
Keith

Indrajala said:
There are so many conflicting opinions. I think too many researchers make a living from coming up with new facts about diet and health. It is a way to advance your career and probably secure funding as anything to do with diet and health will prove popular.

Malcolm wrote:
If you simply rely on the wisdom of the ṛṣīs, you will be fine.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Thursday, April 3rd, 2014 at 4:18 AM
Title: Re: Underweight worse then being overweight?
Content:

Indrajala said:
There was an interesting new study done suggesting being underweight is more dangerous to one's health than being overweight...

Malcolm wrote:
In general, in Ayurveda and Tibetan Medicine consider that is best to be "slim". But slim does not mean underweight. It just means not carrying around too much extra weight.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Thursday, April 3rd, 2014 at 3:10 AM

Title: Re: Difference between consciousness and the mind

Content:

Andrew108 said:

The cause/effect regression isn't an infinite regression.

Malcolm wrote:

Of course it is. Why? a first cause would be an unconditioned cause. An unconditioned thing can have no effect on a conditioned thing.

Andrew108 said:

Entropy

Malcolm wrote:

Consciousness, being without mass, does not generate heat and is not subject to the law of entropy.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, April 3rd, 2014 at 3:08 AM

Title: Re: Difference between consciousness and the mind

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Chemical attractions do not indicate the presence of awareness.

PadmaVonSamba said:

The fact that the sperm does not randomly land on the egg but specifically goes toward it demonstrates something more than random chemical interactions. The fact of specific attraction (as opposed to, say, gravitational pull or magnetism, or some sort of stickiness) may not define "awareness" in your book. Whether it is attraction to chemicals, or heat or light is beside the point I am making, which is that something that is alive (A) responds specifically to stimuli from something else which is alive (B). I think that counts for something.

. . .

Malcolm wrote:

There are two kinds of life: sentient and non-sentient.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, April 3rd, 2014 at 3:07 AM

Title: Re: Difference between consciousness and the mind

Content:

Andrew108 said:

The cause/effect regression isn't an infinite regression.

Malcolm wrote:

Of course it is. Why? a first cause would be an unconditioned cause. An unconditioned thing can have no effect on a conditioned thing.

PadmaVonSamba said:

So..what's the cause of the whole "cause & effect" thing?

...

Malcolm wrote:

An effect of something else.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, April 3rd, 2014 at 3:00 AM

Title: Re: Difference between consciousness and the mind

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Chemical attractions do not indicate the presence of awareness.

PadmaVonSamba said:

There is nothing going on in the brain but chemical interactions and electricity.

I am not saying that the chemicals or their interactions "have" awareness.

In fact, completely the opposite.

Malcolm wrote:

No, you are saying that sperm has a mind since it evinces what you term "awareness".

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, April 3rd, 2014 at 12:14 AM

Title: Re: Difference between consciousness and the mind

Content:

Sherab said:

Sure, but only if you don't hold the view that the relative is all there is.

Malcolm wrote:

All there is is the union of the two truths. If there is a basis, that is the basis.

All the path is is the union of the method and compassion. If there is a path, that is the path

All the result is is the union of the two kāyas. If there is a result, that is the result.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, April 3rd, 2014 at 12:08 AM

Title: Re: Difference between consciousness and the mind

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

In that case, a single-cell organism would be sufficient for the arising of awareness. You are saying it's not, because of certain factors that a single cell organism lacks, and then you say those same factors are not dependent on the very thing a single-cell organism lacks.

garudha said:

The way you (PadmaVonSamba) address intelligent life is that sentience is a property of organic matter. Then, elsewhere, I read that form is inherently empty. Personally I took "form" to mean all organic matter, and therefore, that all organic matter is a property of sentience (eg Mind). If, however, form is inherently empty; then how could sentience appropriate form? --that would be a massive contradiction.

PadmaVonSamba said:

No, I have not said that sentience is a property of organic matter. In fact, just the opposite, constantly.

What I have said is that organic matter merely provides the conditions by which basic awareness manifests as the subject-object experience ("mind"). What distinguishes a living thing from a non-living thing is exactly this. Hence, a sperm cell, lacking any sensory apparatus whatsoever, no skandhas, no 12-links, is still attracted to progesterone excreted by the egg.

And my point was that, just as a tiny drop of dew can reflect the Sun, even a tiny think such as a sperm cell is sufficient for the reflection of awareness.

And regardless of whether one calls it "awareness" or not, the fact that the sperm does not randomly land on the egg but specifically goes toward it demonstrates a basic level of specific ("intentional") interaction. And I would even go so far as to suggest that this is at the root of our whole subject-object / self-other experience that is the dominating feature of mind.

...

Malcolm wrote:

Chemical attractions do not indicate the presence of awareness.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, April 3rd, 2014 at 12:07 AM

Title: Re: Difference between consciousness and the mind

Content:

Andrew108 said:

The cause/effect regression isn't an infinite regression.

Malcolm wrote:

Of course it is. Why? a first cause would be an unconditioned cause. An unconditioned thing can have no effect on a conditioned thing.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, April 3rd, 2014 at 12:06 AM

Title: Re: Difference between consciousness and the mind

Content:

Sherab said:

Impermanent are all component things,

...

Release from them is bliss supreme.

— Mahaa-Parinibbana Sutta (DN 16)

"There is, monks, an unborn .... If there were not that unborn ..., there would not be the case that emancipation from the born.... But precisely because there is an unborn ..., emancipation from the born ... is discerned."

— Ud 8.3

Malcolm wrote:

This is reconciled by the Mahāyāna doctrine that all conditioned things are in a state of nirvana from the beginning.

M

Sherab said:

How do all conditioned things relate to being in a state of nirvana from the beginning? I am not saying that they are not. What I am saying is that the words "release" and "emancipation" means that taking the relative as all there is, can never reconcile the meaning of the two quotations.

Malcolm wrote:

Liberation, in Mahāyāna, is merely the realization that "all conditioned things are in a state of nirvana from the beginning".

It means realizing that the nature of the arising, etc., is precisely, non-arising.

As a tantra states:

"Everything arose from non-arising, even arising never arose."

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, April 2nd, 2014 at 9:04 AM

Title: Re: Difference between consciousness and the mind

Content:

Sherab said:

Impermanent are all component things,

...

Release from them is bliss supreme.

— Mahaa-Parinibbana Sutta (DN 16)

"There is, monks, an unborn .... If there were not that unborn ..., there would not be the case that emancipation from the born.... But precisely because there is an unborn ..., emancipation from the born ... is discerned."

— Ud 8.3

Malcolm wrote:

This is reconciled by the Mahāyāna doctrine that all conditioned things are in a state of nirvana from the beginning.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, April 2nd, 2014 at 7:59 AM

Title: Re: Difference between consciousness and the mind

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Every effect arises from a cause; every cause is an effect. That is a complete explanation and also an infinite regression.

Sherab said:

I disagree. It merely means that causality is the explanation for specific events within an infinite regression while the infinite regression is an axiom or postulate.

Malcolm wrote:

The infinite regression is neither an axiom nor a postulate, it is an inference.

To answer your other question, the stream of cittas has no basis, being empty.

This is no answer from my point of view.

If by empty you mean that the stream of cittas is an infinite causal chain, then the infinite regression is not explained but has to be assumed. In my understanding of the Buddha's teaching, this becomes a fault in that the stream of cittas is always subject to change and because of that, there can be no permanent liberation.

By empty we mean it is not ultimately established.

Liberation (as opposed to Buddhahood) is defined by the eradication of afflictions or fetters in relation to the mind (stream). Through aryan insight those afflictions are "burned", and thus they no longer produce results (birth in various aspects of the three realms), that is all liberation means and no new afflictive traces are created.

The stream of cittas is subject to causation, but that does not bear the consequence that liberation is a) impossible or b) reversible.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, April 2nd, 2014 at 6:10 AM

Title: Re: intoxication and tibetan buddhism

Content:

ovi said:

On the other hand, cannabis enhances my mindfulness and the strength of the meditation session and even more so when taken together with piracetam and lecithin

Malcolm wrote:

No, actually it does not. Marijuana impairs short term memory, and that is necessary for mindfulness by definition.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, April 2nd, 2014 at 12:41 AM

Title: Re: Difference between consciousness and the mind

Content:

Sherab said:

As Malcolm said, the fault of the argument is infinite regression rather than circularity. Circularity anyway is a special form of infinite regression. For me, explanation that results in infinite regression is faulty because it indicates incompleteness of the explanation. In other words, an explanation with infinite regression must also explain that infinite regression if the explanation is to be complete.

Explanations that involves causality and dependent origination can never be complete since they lead to infinite regression. That is why I feel that they can never be satisfactory explanation when they are employed in an ontological argument without being complemented by something else.

Here I should add that where science is concerned, it usually does not have problem with explanations that involve beginninglessness or endlessness, or both. This is because by nature, explanations of science, are inherently provisional.

Malcolm wrote:

Every effect arises from a cause; every cause is an effect. That is a complete explanation and also an infinite regression.

To answer your other question, the stream of cittas has no basis, being empty.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 31st, 2014 at 11:37 PM

Title: Re: Difference between consciousness and the mind

Content:

Sherab said:

Even if you take appearing as synonymous with existing conventionally and leave out the part of labelling, the form of my argument as presented still holds.

In other words, things appearing is due to karmic traces appearing; karmic traces appearing is due to mind appearing; and mind appearing is due to mind appearing. Circularity of argument still exists in the end.

Malcolm wrote:

No.

Things [mental appearances] appear because of karmic traces; karmic traces occur because of afflicted minds, afflicted minds also arise because of karma traces. Minds are both cause and results; traces are both causes and results.

Since Buddhadharma rejects origins, the fault you should be seeking is infinite regress, not circularity, but in this case, there is no problem since mind has not discernible origin. There is not absolute beginning to the process of mind, affliction, traces, ripening of traces (appearances) and so on.

The doctrine you should be examining is called citta saṃtana parināma, i.e., transformations of the stream of cittas.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 31st, 2014 at 9:42 PM

Title: Re: Dungse Rigzin Dorje Rinpoche

Content:

KonchokZoepa said:

Hi, does anyone know this Lama.

What is the name of his home monastery and is it in Assam?

does he uphold the complete Vima Nyingtik cycle?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes.

Zangdog Palri

Yes.

he is the son of Kunzang Dechen Lingpa, and is an excellent teacher.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 31st, 2014 at 9:37 PM

Title: Re: Difference between consciousness and the mind

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

An answer to a question is not an assertion, providing the answer does not exceed the scope of the question.

M

Sherab said:

Not expecting this answer from you though. I thought you could see the internal contradiction in your reply.

Here is how I see the problem of your argument:

Things, exists only conventionally, i.e., appearance appears and the mind labelled the appearances thereby giving things a conventional existence.

Malcolm wrote:

The label does not given something conventional existence; the mere appearances of a thing is its conventional existence.

Sherab said:

Karmic traces causes the appearances of things, but karmic traces are also conventionally existent, i.e., appearances of karmic traces appear to the mind and are then given the label karmic traces.

Malcolm wrote:

See above.

Sherab said:

In our discussion, karmic traces is none other than mind.

Malcolm wrote:

Traces are actually impressions made on the mind by actions. The result of those actions arise when special conditions for the ripening of those traces are met.

Sherab said:

So there is an appearance of mind that the mind then give the label mind and thereby gives mind a conventional existence. This is inherently a circular argument.

Malcolm wrote:

But it is not my argument, it is an argument you have constructed for me.

Sherab said:

Because of the inherent circularity in your argument, as far as I am concerned, your answer is a non-answer.

Malcolm wrote:

You have non-answered yourself since you have not presented my argument.

Sherab said:

It is also inherently contradictory as the conventional existence of the mind must exist before it can give itself a conventional existence.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, if you think that conventional existence depends on labels, that would be a problem.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 31st, 2014 at 12:47 PM

Title: Re: Difference between consciousness and the mind

Content:

Sherab said:

If so, then how do appearances arise?

Malcolm wrote:

Conventionally.

Sherab said:

Another assertion?

Malcolm wrote:

An answer to a question is not an assertion, providing the answer does not exceed the scope of the question.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 31st, 2014 at 8:55 AM

Title: Re: Difference between consciousness and the mind

Content:

Sherab said:

If so, then how do appearances arise?

Malcolm wrote:
Conventionally.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 31st, 2014 at 8:14 AM

Title: Re: Difference between consciousness and the mind

Content:

Andrew108 said:

For example, how do idealists account for cosmic inflation? Or mass? Or light? Or space/time?

Malcolm wrote:

Buddhism is not idealism in the sense you understand.

Buddhism accounts for all of these things, cosmic inflation, mass, light, space, etc. via conventional truth.

Sherab said:

Buddhism does not account for these things. Buddhism merely asserts that these things are conventional in the sense that ultimately, these things don't exist when you analyse them to hunt for their source or sources. But this would contract another assertion that mind(s) (where mind now has to take the specific definition of karmic traces and not other definitions of mind) is(are) the source of these things.

Malcolm wrote:

No. There is no contradiction. When you hunt for mind you do not find it either.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 31st, 2014 at 7:40 AM

Title: Re: Difference between consciousness and the mind

Content:

Andrew108 said:

For example, how do idealists account for cosmic inflation? Or mass? Or light? Or space/time?

Malcolm wrote:

Buddhism is not idealism in the sense you understand.

Buddhism accounts for all of these things, cosmic inflation, mass, light, space, etc. via conventional truth.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 31st, 2014 at 1:59 AM

Title: Re: Difference between consciousness and the mind

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

there is no awareness which can be defined as something separate from a consciousness or a mind.

PadmaVonSamba said:

There is if you are talking about intentional, rather than merely random response to stimuli, whereby A is attracted specifically to B and commences actions which draw it closer to making contact with B. We have discussed this before. It may not be any sort of cognitive awareness, but as opposed to just lying there with no intentional response at all (two rocks lying next to each other) or making contact purely at random (seeds blowing in the wind until they land), you have to have some term for something in which which one thing somehow senses the existence of something else, and for lack of a better term, I use the term basic awareness. So, I am defining it that way.

Malcolm wrote:

Right, and I don't accept your theory. There is only awareness is strictly cognitive.

According Dzogchen, Mahāmudra and so on, no phenomena outside of mind can be established at all, that is, all physical appearances are projections of traces on mind streams, following the Yogacara school.

That is easily disproved, by examples which I have already given, such as not knowing one has cancer.

You don't understand; appearances are generated by activated traces which exist in the ālayavijñāna. We do not need to be "aware" of these traces for them to be activated.

You may think Yogacara is easy to refute, but it isn't.

PadmaVonSamba said:

A common misunderstanding is that nothing occurs anywhere outside of awareness.

Malcolm wrote:

Again, it depends on your point of view.

PadmaVonSamba said:

Unless you know everything that is happening in the universe, and nothing can ever be discovered that you didn't already know about, this might be the case. Otherwise, a sane point of view is that there is stuff happening that nobody knows about.

Malcolm wrote:

You need to study Yogacara, only then will you understand the context of this. It is more profound than your realism.

After all, the Buddha stated "The three realms are only mind."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, March 30th, 2014 at 11:56 PM

Title: Re: Difference between consciousness and the mind

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

However, a background, or 'ground of awareness' can be said to function, which is usually experienced as a separate perceiver when in contact with phenomena.

Malcolm wrote:

Nevertheless, there is no awareness which can be defined as something separate from a consciousness or a mind.

PadmaVonSamba said:

But physical phenomena, for example, can exist with no awareness of it.

Malcolm wrote:

That depends. According Dzogchen, Mahāmudra and so on, no phenomena outside of mind can be established at all, that is, all physical appearances are projections of traces on mind streams, following the Yogacara school.

PadmaVonSamba said:

A common misunderstanding is that nothing occurs anywhere outside of awareness.

Malcolm wrote:

Again, it depends on your point of view.

PadmaVonSamba said:

Another common misunderstanding is that "illumination" means that the mind is like a beam from a flashlight, that actually comes from someplace and shines on objects thus causing them to occur.

Malcolm wrote:

I have never run across such an assertion in any Buddhist text.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, March 30th, 2014 at 2:49 AM

Title: Re: Difference between consciousness and the mind

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

... we are speaking about something which exhibits sentience, i.e. a mind.

Gwenn Dana said:

How do you call the thinking facility then?

Malcolm wrote:

A mind. What else? A mind is that which can know, we can use the term consciousness, awareness, mind, knowing etc., but it all boils down to one thing, a mind, i.e. something that has the capacity for knowing. A buddha's consciousness is unrestricted, therefore we say that a buddha is omniscient.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, March 30th, 2014 at 1:48 AM

Title: Re: Difference between consciousness and the mind

Content:

garudha said:

Malcolm, your statement seems to state that awareness is a property of consciousness.

PadmaVonSamba, your question somewhat assumes that consciousness is a property of awareness.

If you remove all your clothes and go skinny-dipping in what respect do you regard yourself as naked ?

Malcolm wrote:

Awareness is conscious = consciousness is aware.

$1 + 1 = 1 + 1$

M

bob said:

Awareness is mind without objects.

Consciousness is mind with objects.

Malcolm wrote:

In the end it all boils down to pure consciousness or awareness, whether with objects or without — we are speaking about something which exhibits sentience, i.e. a mind.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, March 28th, 2014 at 10:02 PM

Title: Re: Śākyamuni's non-Indo-European heritage.

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Witzel's book is not racist, he explicitly states that all human beings come from Africa, and that we have a common ancestor. He is merely saying that there are two streams of myth development, a northern and a southern one and that the southern one seems to lack certain themes found in the northern one. But he never says on the basis of this that the Laurasian stream is "superior" to the Gondwana stream. That is a fallacious imputation on the part of the reviewers.

Indrajala said:

Incidentally for some great information on what constitutes proto-Indo-European religion, at least under reconstruction, see the following:

<http://pierreligion.org/pierintro.html>

Malcolm wrote:

The answers to all of these questions and many more are to be found in Witzel's new book:

The Origins of the World's Mythologies. Oxford University Press

He has questioned the linguistic nature of the so-called Indus Script (Farmer, Sproat, Witzel 2004).[70] Earlier, he had suggested that a substrate related to, but not identical with the Austroasiatic Munda languages, which he therefore calls para-Munda, might have been the language of (part of) the Indus population.[71][72]

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Michael\_Witzel#Research

Sherlock said:

There seems to be a lot of dissent among the Amazon reviews. Is it mostly coming from Hindu nationalists upset at Witzel for suggesting that Indo-Aryans are not native to India?

I know genetics don't necessarily tell the story of cultures and languages, but in many ways, it is more "rigorous" than linguistic reconstruction.

<http://dienekes.blogspot.co.uk/> collates a lot of relevant genetic studies in anthropology.

I haven't looked in too much detail in the studies on South Asian DNA, but the Indo-European spread in Europe seems to be quite clear.

Europe was populated by dark-skinned hunter-gatherers who might have had light-hair and eyes throughout the Mesolithic, WHG (Western Hunter Gatherers) in short. In the Neolithic, around 7,500 years ago, groups of agriculturalists from the Middle East started moving into Europe. They shared some ancestry with the WHGs but 44% of their DNA came from a lineage which diverged from the main lineage of Eurasians (who later split into West and East Eurasians) early on. These Early European Farmers (EEF) did not mix with the existing WHG population, the population spread was demic, not clinal; i.e. they killed the hunter-gatherers and took their lands. Areas which were previously inhabited by WHGs were taken over by EEF descendants who did not incorporate WHG DNA. EEF spread throughout Europe, West to Iberia and north to Scandinavia. The genes for white skin seem to come from this period. Later on, around 4,000 years ago, a new group of <http://dienekes.blogspot.co.uk/2012/07/bronze-age-indo-european-invasion-of.html> came in. They spread throughout Europe though the West Asian component is lowest in Iberia, Sardinia and Finland. The surviving WHG DNA also mixed into the resulting population.

I think the picture is quite clear that the West Asians are Indo-Europeans. The areas where West Asian DNA is lowest were the main non-Indo-European-speaking regions in Europe historically. The Iberians probably spoke languages related to Basque, and the Finns also speak a non-Indo-European language.

The situation in India seems to be more complex, with East Eurasian-related groups already living in East India, <http://dienekes.blogspot.co.uk/2012/06/smbe-2012-abstracts-part-ii.html>. There seems to be some presence of <http://dienekes.blogspot.co.uk/2010/12/solution-to-problem-of-indo-aryan.html> DNA in Ancestral North Indian populations. <http://dienekes.blogspot.co.uk/2013/08/major-admixture-in-india-took-place-42.html>.

This is very interesting IMO, I'm not sure exactly what it means but to wager a guess, I think proto-Indo-Europeans weren't genetically distant from ANIs enough for a different population structure to be detected; their spread through India was more of a cultural phenomenon than in Europe and they influenced the pre-existing populations to mix. Dravidian speakers today also carry ANI DNA.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, March 28th, 2014 at 7:55 AM

Title: Re: Difference between consciousness and the mind

Content:

garudha said:

Malcolm, your statement seems to state that awareness is a property of consciousness.

PadmaVonSamba, your question somewhat assumes that consciousness is a property of awareness.

If you remove all your clothes and go skinny-dipping in what respect do you regard yourself as naked ?

Malcolm wrote:

Awareness is conscious = consciousness is aware.

$1 + 1 = 1 + 1$

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, March 28th, 2014 at 6:44 AM

Title: Re: Difference between consciousness and the mind

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

There is still no "awareness" in absence of a consciousness-which-is-aware, whether that consciousness has an object or not.

PadmaVonSamba said:

You are saying, without an object (of awareness or of consciousness) to be aware of there is no faculty of awareness or consciousness whatsoever.
correct?

Malcolm wrote:

Incorrect. I am saying:

There is no "awareness" in absence of a consciousness-which-is-aware, whether or not that consciousness has an object.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, March 28th, 2014 at 3:29 AM

Title: Re: Your gender and sexuality

Content:

zsc said:

When the same kind of self-reflection is suggested when it comes to privilege, you'd think I was asking people to lasso the moon.

Malcolm wrote:

I am certainly glad that I was born into a privileged family.

I think it is unfortunate that others are not.

But short of some massive anti-democratic program of social and economic planning, I see no clear means to ensure everyone has the same privilege, the best we can do is try to make sure everyone has the same baseline of opportunity in terms of education, social services, health care, and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, March 28th, 2014 at 3:21 AM

Title: Re: Difference between consciousness and the mind

Content:

garudha said:

Reading between the lines; That explanation would be the yes that I presumed you'd somehow allude to. Although I recognise that we're referring to an Indian "materialist" philosophy. Thank you.

Malcolm wrote:

No, Samkhya is not materialist, it is realist, not the same thing at all.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, March 28th, 2014 at 3:09 AM

Title: Re: Who are the best teachers of non-duality?

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

Which is to say that Hindu Advaita is a form of monism? It seems so.

Malcolm wrote:

Yup.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, March 28th, 2014 at 3:04 AM

Title: Re: Difference between consciousness and the mind

Content:

garudha said:

Malcolm;

Would you agree that Prakriti is actually empty ?

Malcolm wrote:

That is not how it is parsed in the Samkhya system; Samkhya is realist, both prakriti and purusha are real, i.e. they exist.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, March 28th, 2014 at 2:51 AM

Title: Re: Difference between consciousness and the mind

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

So, the distinction being made is awareness or consciousness, both with, and without an object.

(the terms "awareness" and "consciousness" may be interchangeable but what is being referred to is not.)

Malcolm wrote:

There is still no "awareness" in absence of a consciousness-which-is-aware, whether that consciousness has an object or not.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, March 28th, 2014 at 2:36 AM

Title: Re: Difference between consciousness and the mind

Content:

garudha said:

Malcolm & Gwenn, you seem to be agreement over a "final step" ...of which could be construed as the cessation of causation eg leading to a "absolute".

Therefore, please could you detail how your agreement might relate the the OP. Specifically, how Puruṣa & Prakṛiti relate to the "consciousnesses" and "mind".

Why? Because on this forum we generally talk about "mind" as being primordial than "consciousnesses". However; from what I'm reading about Samkhya, "consciousnesses" is regarded as more primordial than "mind".

The question:

Can anyone explain something about this or point me to an article?

There exists consciousnesses corresponding to the senses, but it's not the mind in itself, right. While consciousness is dependent on and part of the psycho-physical makeup (as part of the aggregates), the mind is independent of physical matter, or?

Malcolm wrote:

In Samkhya Puruṣa is pure consciousness. Prakṛiti lacks consciousness and is material. It is "energized" by Puruṣa and seems to be aware, but it is not.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, March 28th, 2014 at 12:11 AM

Title: Re: Shamatha and Dhyana in different traditions

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

They are describing Dzogchen Śamatha which is more like repeated placement in the Bhavanakrama scheme. I am taking about your classic ninth stage śamatha where you can place your mind on any object for as long as you want without distraction and without effort.

Sherlock said:

Is what you call repeated placement the third stage in the 9 stage scheme? i.e. what Alan Wallace calls "resurgent attention". What is achieved is swift recovery of distracted attention, mostly on the object

Malcolm wrote:

Yes.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, March 28th, 2014 at 12:10 AM

Title: Re: Shamatha and Dhyana in different traditions

Content:

Emakirikiri said:

Malcolm does Lama Migmar's The Tibetan Book of Awakening and Kamalasila's Bhavanakrama contain enough instruction to help a beginner fully reach the one-pointedness of a mental object and the first dhyana (assuming he were in retreat)?

Thanks!

Malcolm wrote:

Yes.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, March 28th, 2014 at 12:07 AM

Title: Re: Difference between consciousness and the mind

Content:

Gwenn Dana said:

Of course the system is different. But I guess the method in the final step is not.

Best wishes

Gwenn

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, the method in the final step is quite different because the view is different and the result is different.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, March 28th, 2014 at 12:06 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist neglect of academic findings.

Content:

Indrajala said:

For instance, if so many liberated individuals in the past disdained women and suggested they needed to become men to achieve Buddhahood, what does that say about "liberation" and the purported qualities of compassion and kindness it is supposed to bring about?

Malcolm wrote:

It is well established even in Abhidharmakosha that arhats have non-afflictive ignorance.

Indrajala said:

That's not relevant to what I'm saying.

Malcolm wrote:

Sure it is, accounts for why some men who had freed themselves from afflictive rebirth nevertheless had unfortunate opinions about women.

Indrajala said:

I'm simply saying that "enlightened beings" and Buddhist values usually don't work out as they're supposed to on paper in real life history. Just look at the violent history of Buddhist Tibet.

Malcolm wrote:

It's not that violent compared to say Japan or China.

Indrajala said:

Just look at the serfs in Tibet who readily joined up with the Reds and proceeded to burn down monasteries.

Malcolm wrote:

They regret it now.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 27th, 2014 at 11:28 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist neglect of academic findings.

Content:

Indrajala said:

For instance, if so many liberated individuals in the past disdained women and suggested they needed to become men to achieve Buddhahood, what does that say about "liberation" and the purported qualities of compassion and kindness it is supposed to bring about?

Malcolm wrote:

It is well established even in Abhidharmakosha that arhats have non-afflictive ignorance.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 27th, 2014 at 11:24 PM

Title: Re: Difference between consciousness and the mind

Content:

Gwenn Dana said:

You can also call it bound and unbound consciousness, if that fits your canon better. But some may mistake this as awareness being trapped in the mind.

This differentiation is along the lines of samkhya, where awareness is first bound to form an ego (in realization of the seer/seeing), and afterward binds to the mind, creating all sorts of illusions. I know, this forum is about Buddhism. But I suppose the basic awareness processes between buddhists and other people work the same, indendent from the (21st century English!) words we use ...

You probably do not need to differ between these. I found them very helpful.

Best wishes
Gwenn

Malcolm wrote:

In Samkhya, the 24 tattvas, beginning with mulaprakṛiti, are insentient. Only purusha is sentient. Buddhi, ahamkara and manas are actually inert, not sentient. They seem to be aware but they are not aware — in actuality, they merely reflect the light of consciousness (jñā, purusha). This is why in Samkhya/yoga one tries to balance three gunas, so that sattva becomes predominate, and then from there one realizes the even buddhi is not the self and then purusha finally rests in itself.

But this is a very different system than Buddhadharma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 27th, 2014 at 11:09 PM

Title: Re: Who are the best teachers of non-duality?

Content:

greentara said:

We all know non duality means one without a second. So the world and the sense of I are not separate. To wake up is to see that 'we' exist only because the mind thinks us into creation.

Sherab Dorje said:

That's not non-dualism, that's monism. Monism is still dualistic since it posits one in contrast to many.

Malcolm wrote:

It's Hindu Advaita, actually.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 27th, 2014 at 10:59 PM

Title: Re: Difference between consciousness and the mind

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

There is if you are examining or talking about dependent arising.

Malcolm wrote:

Why do you think so?

PadmaVonSamba said:

It is self evident, and I think you can easily figure this out.

If not, I am not sure when I will have time to.

Malcolm wrote:

I don't think dependent origination is wrong, of course not. I just don't think it justifies the distinctions you try to draw between awareness and consciousness.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 27th, 2014 at 9:57 PM

Title: Re: Should Buddhists even care about "engaging" social polit

Content:

rory said:

Someone hasn't read the Lotus Sutra: Chapter 12 - Devadatta

At that moment, the entire assembly saw the Dragon Girl suddenly transform into a man

Malcolm wrote:

Apparently you have not read it either.

M

rory said:

Keep reading Malcolm!

Malcolm wrote:

What it actually says:

atha tasyāṃ velāyāṃ sāgaranāgarājaduhitā sarvalokapratyakṣaṃ sthavirasya ca śāriputrasya pratyakṣaṃ tat strindriyamantarhitāṃ puruṣendriyaṃ ca prādurbhūtaṃ bodhisattvabhūtaṃ cātmānaṃ saṃdarśayati| tasyāṃ velāyāṃ dakṣiṇāṃ diśaṃ prakrāntaḥ| atha dakṣiṇasyāṃ diśi vimalā nāma lokadhātuḥ| tatra saptaratnamaye bodhivṛkṣamūle niṣaṇṇamabhisambuddhamātmānaṃ saṃdarśayati sma, dvātrimśallakṣaṇadharaṃ sarvānuvyajanarūpaṃ prabhayā ca daśadiśaṃ sphuritvā dharmadeśanāṃ kurvāṇam|

འཐ་ནས་དེའི་ཆོ་འཛིན་རྟེན་ཐམས་ཅད་དང་།

གནས་བརྟན་གྱི་རིམ་བུའི་མངོན་སུམ་དུ་གླེང་བྱེད་ཀྱི་དབང་པོ་མི་སྣ་བར་གྱུར་ཏེ་སྐྱེས་པའི་དབང་པོ་བྱང་ནས།
བདག་ཉིད་བྱང་ཆུབ་སེམས་དཔར་འགྱུར་བར་ཡང་དག་པར་བརྟན་ཏེ་དེའི་ཆོ་རྩ་ཕྱགས་སུ་སོང་ངོ་། འཐ་ནས་ཕྱོད་ཕྱགས་སུ་འཛིན་རྟེན་གྱི་ཁམས་ཁྲི་མ་མེད་ཅེས་བྱ་བ་དང་།
རིན་པོ་ཆེ་སྣ་བདུན་གྱི་ཤིང་བྱང་དུ་འདུག་ནས་བདག་ཉིད་མངོན་པར་རྟོགས་པར་སངས་རྒྱས་པར་ཀླན་ཏེ་བརྟན་ཏེ་སྐྱེས་པའི་མཚན་སུམ་ཅུ་ཅ་གཉིས་དང་།
དཔེ་བྱང་བཟང་པོ་ཐམས་ཅད་དང་ཕྲན་པའི་གཟུགས་ཀྱི་ལུས་ཀྱི་འོད་ཀྱི་ཕྱགས་བརྩམས་ཁྱབ་པར་བྱས་ཏེ་ཆོས་རྟེན་པར་བྱང་ངོ་།

rory said:

After that, at that time, in the presence of the whole world, the sthaviras and Śāriputra, the female sexual organs of the daughter of the Nāgarāja Sagara disappeared, and after producing the sexual organs of a man, he [ātmānaṃ] perfectly demonstrated [saṁdarśayati] transformation into a bodhisattva, and at that time left for the south. After that, residing in front of a tree of seven precious substances in the southern world system called "Vimala", he [ātmānaṁ] perfectly demonstrated perfect Buddhahood, the ten directions were filled with the light of [his] physical body that possessed the thirty two signs of a mahāpuruṣa and all the excellent signs, and [he] taught the Dharma.

Malcolm wrote:

In fact, it is very clear, based on the original Sanskrit and its Tibetan translation, that the transformation is a one way transformation, and the reflexive pronoun ātmānaṁ is correctly rendered as "he" in this passage.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 27th, 2014 at 9:19 PM

Title: Re: Should Buddhists even care about "engaging" social polit

Content:

Son of Buddha said:

see me appear before them

Malcolm wrote:

This is all it promises, and nothing more.

Son of Buddha said:

thats incorrect the Nirvana Sutra citation does in fact describe the career of a female Buddha.

Malcolm wrote:

No, it does not

Son of Buddha said:

the same goes for the Nirvana Sutra citation it shows the Buddha manifested itself in the world as a human female and then proceeded to show humans how a human person would go about the path to attaining enlightenment. So both the career paths of either man or female are both manifestations of the Buddha, and are both represented.

Malcolm wrote:

Not in sutra. Despite the fact that there is shift in late Mahāyāna towards the idea that gender is not really so important or defining, still there is no explicitly mention of female buddhas like Tara or Vajrayogini and so on until we move into Vajrayāna texts.

Son of Buddha said:

The idea that there is no gender in the Sukhavati pure land is a post-modern interpretation.

nope the idea of the 32 features of the Buddha which we receive in the pure land, having no gender is not a post modern interpretation unless you consider the Nirvana Sutra post modern. the idea of the Buddha not even being a man can be found in the Donna Sutta so this is hardly a new view.

Malcolm wrote:

[/quote]

I am afraid you are reading things into the texts that are simply not there. In Amitabha's pure land, like Bhaisajyaguru's there is gender and that gender is male. In Akṣobhya's pureland on the other hand, there are both men and women.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 27th, 2014 at 1:48 PM

Title: Re: Should Buddhists even care about "engaging" social polit

Content:

Son of Buddha said:

Malcolm wrote:

There is also the recognition of the advantages of position in vow 43:

If after I have obtained the Buddhahood, that any Bodhisattva of other countries having heard my name, will be incarnated as a member of a noble family (if he so desires) when he dies, otherwise may I not attain enlightenment.

There is in fact no guarantee of immediate birth in Sukhavati in the 48 vows of Amitabha. Vow 19 is the guarantee for immediate rebirth in Sukhavati also it corresponds with the chapter on the 3 different types of aspirants which also teaches guaranteed immediate rebirth in Sukhavati.

Malcolm wrote:

NO, that vow is not a guarantee of rebirth in Sukhavati. It merely guarantees a vision.

Secondly, your Nirvana sutra citation does not describe the career of a female buddha. It merely describes the ability of a buddha to manifest a buddha in female form.

The fact remains that the only place where embodied female buddhahood, i.e. that one can attain buddhahood without changing from a female gender, is expressed only in Vajrayāna. It is just a fact of text, it is not even controversial.

The idea that there is no gender in the Sukhavati pure land is a post-modern interpretation.

But we are far afield from the original topic...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 27th, 2014 at 1:29 PM

Title: Re: Should Buddhists even care about "engaging" social polit

Content:

rory said:

Someone hasn't read the Lotus Sutra: Chapter 12 - Devadatta

At that moment, the entire assembly saw the Dragon Girl suddenly transform into a man

Malcolm wrote:

Apparently you have not read it either.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 27th, 2014 at 11:27 AM

Title: Re: Should Buddhists even care about "engaging" social polit

Content:

zsc said:

We have no genderless pronoun in English...

Malcolm wrote:

Nor are there any in Sanskrit, Pali, etc.

Amitabha has the thirty two major marks of a Buddha...one is a retractable penis.

In all Sanskrit literature referring to Avalokiteśvara, Avalokiteśvara is strictly referred to as male. It is only in China that Avalokiteśvara's gender is bent.

As to gender ambiguity in bodhisattvas, there are some examples of this, Śariputra's encounter with the goddess of the Ganges, for example. But Amitabha is indeed male as are all who are born in his pure land.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 27th, 2014 at 11:15 AM

Title: Re: Your gender and sexuality

Content:

untxi said:

We can pull some passages from the sutras and just morph "God hates queers" to "Buddha hates queers".

Malcolm wrote:

Actually, we can't. The most we can do is pull some passages out of Vinaya that bar certain types of persons from ordination as monks.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 27th, 2014 at 6:21 AM

Title: Re: Should Buddhists even care about "engaging" social polit

Content:

zsc said:

No, this has been the position of many unethical authorities who wanted to maintain the status quo by using "Buddhist" rationale. I agree that it's not what Buddhism teaches.

Malcolm wrote:

Which unethical authorities,

If it were possible for dedication of merit to change the karma of sentient beings, you would have thought that the Buddhas in their compassion would have dedicated all their merit to us, so that we would no longer suffer.

Besides rory's point, most Pureland thought assumes Amida already has, and Pureland practice serves to karmically link ourselves to him. Suffering is a samsaric condition that we are still bound by, for now.

Then something isn't working, either your theory or his vow.

In Jodo Shinshu, the progress phase is "instantaneously" realized because of the practitioners openness to the gift of shinjin by Amida.

Its a theory, but it has no support in sutra. In fact Shinran had to take huge liberties. And yes, I have read a lot of Shinran.

It is generally understood that the vows are all-encompassing due to Amida's boundless compassion, so they don't contradict each other, they are open to cover as many sentient beings as possible, including people in their deathbed who do not have the time to accumulate merit.

I don't agree.

In the early ages, the lives of women were full of hardships.

They still are.

They were expected to care of the house, go through the the pain of carrying a child to term then giving birth, take care of the kids from then on, and since a lot of women didn't have enough time to become literate (or weren't allowed to), women generally weren't allowed to become influential religious practitioners and teachers.

This is generally still true, though changing.

They were the backbone of the civilization, but this resulted in a lot of them being treated like work horses. Even in other sutras, a male rebirth was assumed to be better than a male one for practice, and Shakyamuni even hesitated to allow women to practice in the same way as his male disciples did. I've read commentaries that propose what I have said above--so much of society depended on women not dedicating a lot of time to practice when the same wasn't true for men, and even Shakyamuni's hesitance was due to this consideration. This is true in some countries even today. So like I said above, Amida's vows are meant to be all-encompassing. Of course, it is only in Vajrayāna where women's full spiritual potential is actuality recognized, and the only tradition in which there full fledged female Buddhas like Vajrayogini and so on.

Again, the vows are meant to be all-encompassing, they don't negate each other. As it stands today, Pureland practitioners are encouraged to direct their faith primarily to the 18th Vow, which is the Primal Vow.

You mean Jodo Shinshu practitioners.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 27th, 2014 at 6:12 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist neglect of academic findings.

Content:

kirtu said:

Do you have evidence that he significantly turned away Tea Party voters?

Malcolm wrote:

He lost.

kirtu said:

Republicans are a minority nation-wide. Republican presidential victories are only possible if a large enough proportion of Democrats do not turn out or vote for the Democrat candidate and independents vote with a > 50% for the Republican candidate.

So the fact that Romney lost tells us nothing about Tea Party voter turnout or their vote.

BTW - Republicans have held the Massachusetts governorship *four* times since 1984: Weld, Weld, Cellucci and Romney.

Kirt

Malcolm wrote:

Weld is a RINO, he does not really count.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 27th, 2014 at 4:09 AM

Title: Re: Difference between consciousness and the mind

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

There is no pure being, since there no being or non-being to find. So what is useful about the term "awareness"?

Why create two actors with "awareness expresses itself through consciousness?"

In fact there is no necessity to differentiate awareness, consciousness and mind any more than it is necessary to differentiate limpidity, wetness and water.

PadmaVonSamba said:

There is if you are examining or talking about dependent arising.

.
.
.

Malcolm wrote:

Why do you think so?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 27th, 2014 at 3:31 AM

Title: Re: Shamatha and Dhyana in different traditions

Content:

Clarence said:

Thanks. Would you mind exploring a little more how it ties in with Dzogchen practice? Is it absolutely imperative to properly practice Dzogchen? Or, can one get by with (much) less concentration and is the need for concentration mostly related to the practice of the postures?

Malcolm wrote:

If you can't control your mind, you can't sit still for long periods; if you can't sit still for long periods, of what use are postures?

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 27th, 2014 at 3:17 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist neglect of academic findings.

Content:

kirtu said:

Do you have evidence that he significantly turned away Tea Party voters?

Malcolm wrote:

He lost.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 27th, 2014 at 3:16 AM

Title: Re: Difference between consciousness and the mind

Content:

Gwenn Dana said:

Awareness is that of pure being (unbound presence).

Ego is awareness expressing itself through consciousness (*I* am). All senses working, all actions working.

Mind is what constructs concepts (I am some-thing). All senses disturbed by constant evaluation and categorization.

Malcolm wrote:

These are all just different different names and aspects of consciousness. No need to complicate things.

PadmaVonSamba said:

Well, you could also say that they are all aspects of brain activity, but so what?

No, I think this breakdown is useful.

.
.
.

Malcolm wrote:

There is no pure being, since there no being or non-being to find. So what is useful about the term "awareness"?

Why create two actors with "awareness expresses itself through consciousness?

In fact there is no necessity to differentiate awareness, consciousness and mind any more than it is necessary to differentiate limpidity, wetness and water.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 27th, 2014 at 1:32 AM

Title: Re: Shamatha and Dhyana in different traditions

Content:

Sherlock said:

So thoughts don't arise at all while you are concentrating on the object?

Malcolm wrote:

Just one thought, the object of mediation.

Sherlock said:

so it actually sounds more like the Visuddhimagga first jhana then or the Paki Sutta 2nd jhana.

Vitarka and vicara seem to involve thought both in early Pali commentaries and in northern Abhidharma and Yogacara works.

Do the Bhavanakrama-based presentations use the Tibetan equivalents of these 2 terms or is it just Rongzom?

Malcolm wrote:

Vitarka and vicara are mental factors which direct attention and maintain attention. The first dhyana you can change the object because both vitarka and vicara are still present.

I am not sure whether the Bhavanakrama mentions, I forget.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 27th, 2014 at 1:12 AM

Title: Re: Shamatha and Dhyana in different traditions

Content:

Sherlock said:

So thoughts don't arise at all while you are concentrating on the object?

Malcolm wrote:

Just one thought, the object of mediation.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 26th, 2014 at 11:18 PM

Title: Re: Shamatha and Dhyana in different traditions

Content:

Sherlock said:

Four hours sounds like a good goal to aim towards and seems achievable even in lay life. However is the goal a samadhi in which no thoughts except for the meditation object arise at all or is it that thoughts still arise but they are skilful thoughts and do not distract you?

Malcolm wrote:

The goal is one-pointedness on a single mental object.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 26th, 2014 at 10:47 PM

Title: Re: Shamatha and Dhyana in different traditions

Content:

Sherlock said:

I Based on what Tom said, it seems like Gelugpas on the other hand recommend developing shamatha through kyerim....

Tom said:

Yes, for Tantric practitioners. Of course, the nine stages, six powers, and four attentions are taught widely in the sutra context by Gelug Lamas.

Malcolm wrote:

In Sakya Lamdre, there is a detailed instruction based on Saroruhavajra's creation stage of Hevajra that includes a detailed breakdown of how the nine stages map to one's practice of the sadhana.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 26th, 2014 at 9:24 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist neglect of academic findings.

Content:

tobes said:

Even on the level of governmental politics, we have to account for the very influential rise of religious influenced conservatism - think about American politics for a moment! We cannot say that American governmental politics is becoming increasingly secular. If anything, it seems to be becoming increasingly less secular.

Malcolm wrote:

That really depends on where you live. Where I live (Western Massachusetts), born again conservative Christian Republicans are about as common as Sasquatch, and their secular counterparts, also infrequently sighted in the wild.

kirtu said:

Malcolm! Your state elected Sasquatch as Governor thus ensuring him national standing long after his semi-mythic salvation of the Salt Lake City Olympics had faded from memory. Just 1 1/2 years ago he was one of two conservative candidates for the Presidency from two supposedly diametrically opposed political parties (which are really just two wings of the same single National Conservative Party). Sasquatch's capitalist health care plan is now the law of the land even though he lost the election!

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Politics\_of\_Massachusetts#Party\_registration

So just over 11% of registered voters in Massachusetts *could* be a Sasquatch. Maybe it was just your former governor. And maybe all of these Sasquatch live on Cape Cod or outside of Boston.

Ironic that one of the most politically "liberal" states in the US propelled a Tea Party candidate nearly to the Oval Office.

Kirt

Malcolm wrote:

Kirt, I was very specific -- Mormons are not necessarily republican, though they tend to be conservative, and Romney is hardly a conservative Republican, which is one of the reasons he lost. He is fairly liberal by Republican standards, actually. I was talking about conservative born again evangelical Christians (who do not accept Mormons as being Christians (a big obstacle for Romney to overcome)).

And as I stated, specifically, in my neck of the woods, his kind are extremely rare. Most of the Republicans in MA live in and around Central MA and in Berkshire County. Eastern MA and Western MA (meaning Franklin, Hampshire and Hamden Counties) are about as liberal as you get anywhere in the country.

When Republicans get voted into office in MA (its happened twice in the past thirty years), it is generally because Democrats have botched something huge.

Romney is hardly a tea party candidate.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 26th, 2014 at 9:43 AM

Title: Re: Should Buddhists even care about "engaging" social polit

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The idea that a Buddha can have afflicted thoughts is patently absurd and should be rejected at face value without any further thought.

M

Indrajala said:

The idea is that the dharmakāya "encompasses" every aspect of saṃsāra.

Malcolm wrote:

The idea that a Buddha can have afflicted thoughts is still patently absurd and should be rejected at face value without any further thought. The dharmakāya is a Buddha's omniscience so of course it can encompass every aspect of samsara.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 26th, 2014 at 9:30 AM

Title: Re: Shamatha and Dhyana in different traditions

Content:

Sherlock said:

OK sure, I can only do 3 months of retreat at best though.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, you try your best.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 26th, 2014 at 9:27 AM

Title: Re: Shamatha and Dhyana in different traditions

Content:

Sherlock said:

Using breath concentration?

So how do you explain Dudjom Lingpa and Longchenpa's much shorter time period? Does the control of prana or bindus in the methods they give help to make it arise faster? Or is the samadhi that arises as a result of what they teach not as deep as the full-blown dhyana by whatever criteria you go by?

Many Theravadins also don't require months of retreat to accomplish at least the first jhana in their systems. Retreat, sure, but not that long.

Malcolm wrote:

They are describing Dzogchen Śamatha which is more like repeated placement in the Bhavanakrama scheme. I am talking about your classic ninth stage śamatha where you can place your mind on any object for as long as you want without distraction and without effort.

But anyway, you try yourself, then you will see. One thing for śamatha is that you need to be very relaxed, not concerned with outside world. That takes some time all by itself. You need to be well rested, free of distractions, etc.

But again, you see for yourself. Every practitioner is different. I am using a general time frame based on my personal experience of doing a three year+ retreat. That is what I consider the minimum time to gain a really stable śamatha practice.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 26th, 2014 at 8:39 AM

Title: Re: Shamatha and Dhyana in different traditions

Content:

Clarence said:

Malcolm,

How long do you estimate it would take the average person to master the first Dhyana? I have seen you mention it on and off over the years (requiring the first Dhyana for Dzogchen practice) but I have never seen you use a time frame. In Pa Auk it takes several months to years of intensive retreat. I was wondering how you view the process. And if you have any practical tips and pointers I am sure they will be much appreciated.

Many thanks.

Malcolm wrote:

That depends. Almost impossible if you do not do retreat. Six months if you do a real retreat.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 26th, 2014 at 8:38 AM

Title: Re: Your gender and sexuality

Content:

untxi said:

Malcolm...

Let's hope that's the case. A nice aspiration to have. That's the hope of any activist or ally-- that they might not be needed.

Right now, where I live, women and LBGTQIA people are brutalized on a regular basis. That's my fundamental reality.

-U

Malcolm wrote:

Well, the best thing one can do is continue to support civil rights for all people. The recognition of civil rights is not an overnight process, and it is a process. The way it has worked in the US is that first propertied white men secured their full civil rights, then men in general, then in a limited way, blacks; then women, then there was the civil rights movement, based on that the feminist movement, based on that the gay rights movement, now gay marriage.

In reality, the history of the expansion of civil rights is not bleak, it is in fact encouraging. But one lesson we can learn, is that when one group secures recognition for its civil rights, there is often another group that has been ignored or not seen in the back ground.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 26th, 2014 at 8:30 AM

Title: Re: Difference between consciousness and the mind

Content:

Gwenn Dana said:

Hello,

I'll try this one real short:

Awareness is that of pure being (unbound presence).

Ego is awareness expressing itself through consciousness (*I* am). All senses working, all actions working.

Mind is what constructs concepts (I am some-thing). All senses disturbed by constant evaluation and categorization.

Regards
Gwenn

Malcolm wrote:

These are all just different different names and aspects of consciousness. No need to complicate things.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 26th, 2014 at 8:22 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist neglect of academic findings.

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

In the deep South up through the classic "West", there is a movement towards increasingly less secularism.

daverupa said:

Oregon and Colorado seem to be moving in very secular ways. Utah accidentally legalized gay marriage. The West seems to be a wild card.

Malcolm wrote:

The "Northwest" is Oregon and Washington. Colorado is moving towards a more secular demographic because of people from California and other places moving there.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 26th, 2014 at 8:20 AM

Title: Re: Your gender and sexuality

Content:

untxi said:

Again, there are different nuances to normativity and it's connection to oppression. It's not just what the "norm" is, it is asserting that norm to diminish and minimize others.

In all forms of structural violence there is some form of "this is the norm, aspire to this or fail". People endure any number of forms of body modification from skin lightening to eye-lid surgery to other body modifications to comply with socially imposed images of "normal". People also go through various contortions to hide and deny their identities for the same reason.

If we limit "normativity" to a limited notion of what is normal re common and conventional, then I agree with you.

Malcolm wrote:

As civil rights will and are being recognized for those people who are now considered outside the heterosexual norm, these philosophical concerns will become irrelevant. Since 10 percent of the population will always be gay, gay people are already a normative percentage of society.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 26th, 2014 at 8:14 AM

Title: Re: Should Buddhists even care about "engaging" social polit

Content:

rory said:

Malcolm:

I don't know the practice in TB but in Asian Buddhism it's extremely common to call on Kwan Yin/Kannon/Gwan-eum for help. This bodhisattva uses her abundant karma to help those overcome trials. I've called on Kannon-sama and been helped. This is common.

Malcolm wrote:

Such things merely create a positive dependent origination so that your positive karma can ripen. But quite frankly, it is well understood that unless your dedication of merit is objectless, help by such bodhisattvas in the present exhausts your merit. For example, one can practice Jambhala for wealth, but if you do not have the merit to be wealthy in this life, Jambhala practice merely creates causes for future wealth. And if you do not properly dedicate merit of such practice such that it is objectless, then it is exhaustible merit.

rory said:

Now as for Yogacara and Madhyamaka, these seem to be the only 2 philosophical schools accepted by TB. Whereas in East Asia there is the Avatamsaka School, Tiantai/Lotus Sutra, Pure Land and Ch'an/Zen which is based usually on Yogacara.

Malcolm wrote:

Hua Yen, Tian Tai, Pure Land and Chan are Chinese innovations. Indians did not develop schools of philosophy based on specific sutras. Tibetans follow Indians in this respect.

rory said:

Anyway "Hua-yen [Avatamsaka] sees all phenomena as expression of an originally pure and undifferentiated one mind.....Hua-yen thinkers developed new theories of dependent origination (pratitya samutpada, yuan-ch'i, such as "dharma realm origination" (fa-chieh yuan-ch'i, tathagata-garbha origination...or "nature origination" to clarify how the one mind manifests in the phenomenal world"

Malcolm wrote:

If this is the case, then Hua-Yen is just Hindu Advaita Vedanta in Buddhist drag.

rory said:

The point of posting that is to show new philosophical developments that originated from Chinese thinkers such as Fazang and Zhi-yi that spread through East Asia as Koreans and Japanese travelled to China and studied these ideas. This obviously didn't happen with Tibet, so it's out of the East Asian mainstream. And this applies to ideas about karma.

Malcolm wrote:

Actually, Sino Japanese Mahayana Buddhism developed along lines that were outside of the Indian Mahayana mainstream. Tibetans traveled to India and studied Indian Buddhism and developed their schools along the lines set by the great Indian Buddhist monasteries such as Nalanda and Vikramashila.

rory said:

This is why Malcolm in another thread denied that a Buddha could think evil thoughts while those familiar with Zhi-yi's thought know this is true. Ven. Indrajala kindly translated a pertinent piece.

Malcolm wrote:

The idea that a Buddha can have afflicted thoughts is patently absurd and should be rejected at face value without any further thought.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 26th, 2014 at 8:03 AM

Title: Re: Should Buddhists even care about "engaging" social polit

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Personally, I find Hayek far more appealing than Trotsky, and much more reasonable and sensible. He fully exposes the failures of both right and left wing socialist collectivism.

tobes said:

It pained me to discover this, but I think Hayek is right about the relationship between price and knowledge - and it follows that centrally planned economies have a genuinely huge epistemic problem of making decisions that are not as well informed as those 'on the ground' making and buying stuff.

However, to say that he 'fully exposes' the failures of right and left wing socialist collectivism is beyond generous. One would have to already be a paid up libertarian to read him in such a kind light. The more orthodox reading is that like most liberals, he either doesn't read Hegel or Marx, or simply doesn't understand their dialectical logic.

One can't fully expose something one doesn't grasp.

Malcolm wrote:

I am pretty sure Hayek had a very good grasp of both, since he was Austrian, and fled Europe in 1933.

His principle observation is that both right and left wing collectivism share a common belief, i.e., that economies should be centrally planned. This is the main thrust of his thinking. In general, he was not nearly as libertarian as librarians read him. He fully supported the idea that laws can and should be passed to limit markets and so on. Further, another of his main observations is that Democracies only functioned well when people confined themselves to broad issues upon which consensus could be reached through discussion, and tended to break down when they tried to adjudicate specific economic problems which required the creation of a centralized bureaucracies to implement (as all implementations of economic planning require). His third main point about planned economies is that they were a priori goalless, that they required special knowledge of which no one could possibly have.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 26th, 2014 at 6:42 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist neglect of academic findings.

Content:

tobes said:

Even on the level of governmental politics, we have to account for the very influential rise of religious influenced conservatism - think about American politics for a moment! We cannot say that American governmental politics is becoming increasingly secular. If anything, it seems to be becoming increasingly less secular.

Malcolm wrote:

That really depends on where you live. Where I live (Western Massachusetts), born again conservative Christian Republicans are about as common as Sasquatch, and their secular counterparts, also infrequently sighted in the wild.

In the Northeast and Northwest, as well as most of the left coast (and Canada) politics is increasingly more secular in general.

In the middle swath of the country there is a bit of a ambivalence i.e. Pennsylvania and the Midwest.

In the deep South up through the classic "West", there is a movement towards increasingly less secularism.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 26th, 2014 at 6:31 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen in India post 8CE

Content:

Sherlock said:

What do you count as early "longde"? Dzeng Dharmabodhi is already in the Sarma period.

Malcolm wrote:

There are a few tantras and a collection of instructions on the nine dhātus (klong) which are pre-11th century. And of course, the vajra verses themselves.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 26th, 2014 at 6:14 AM

Title: Re: Who are the best teachers of non-duality?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The best teacher of non-duality is the Buddha. The rest are pale imitations.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 26th, 2014 at 6:09 AM

Title: Re: Your gender and sexuality

Content:

untxi said:

We have to differ on this. Heteronormativity does have connotations beyond the mere descriptive element that you describe. In the work of many feminists and queer theorists it is used to describe the social expectations and norms that oppress non-heterosexuals. If heterosexuality is the norm, it is normal, all else is outside the norm and thus abnormal. One can extend this idea to other forms of oppression such as racism: white-normativity.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, these social expectations and so on are a result of more than a thousand years of western history; lately informed by religious doctrines about what is morally normative. We have largely dropped the notion that who you want to f^%k has any moral implications, unless it is children and animals.

As far as racism goes, the problem is not that white is normative, the problem is when privileged people impose norms on those who are not privileged, thus denying them opportunities. Racism means "You are X, this is the norm you are expected to conform to", It does not mean, "I am Y, this is the norm you should aspire too but can never attain because you are X." If you are X in a racist society, you are never supposed to aspire to Yness.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 26th, 2014 at 6:02 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen in India post 8CE

Content:

Sherlock said:

Malcolm why do you think Vajra Bridge can be dated pre 1000CE?

Is it because although Kunzang Dorje's commentary is full of references to prana and bindus the actual Vajra Bridge and the Four Das don't mention them?

Malcolm wrote:

It is because the early literature of so-called klong sde makes no reference in general to such topics which were really only introduced to Tibet during the new translation period. So with the Vajra Bridge histories, we begin to see the evolution of what would swiftly turn into "man ngag sde". Also, I see no reason to doubt the account presented in the Vajra bridge histories and the so called early sems sde histories since they agree on virtually every point about the career of Vairocana and the introduction of Dzogchen to Tibet. The first place we see any real departure from the historical accounts presented in these earlier accounts is with Zhantong's text, which completely reframes the career of Śrī Simha and places the arrival of Vimalamitra during the reign Trisong Detsen, whereas the earlier histories place Vimala's arrival during the reign of Ralpacan.

I personally think that Zhantong's account was intended to compete with the marvelous tales of Indian siddhas like Naropa and so on. There was no such need for such narrative largess in the pre "gsar ma" period. One key clue is the appropriation of the iconography of Virupa for Śrī Simha.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 26th, 2014 at 5:45 AM

Title: Re: Shamatha and Dhyana in different traditions

Content:

Konchok Zoepa said:

Malcolm can you confirm that to be the right book, the one that Norwegian linked to Amazon. I looked inside the book and it seems that it's not about shamatha.

Malcolm wrote:

That is the book, and the chapter on meditation is on śamatha and the chapter on wisdom is on vipaśyāna. Lama Migmar is the Buddhist chaplain of Harvard, and his credentials are impeccable. He is one of the best scholars in Sakya. He has also been my teacher and friend for 25 years.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 26th, 2014 at 5:40 AM

Title: Re: Your gender and sexuality

Content:

untxi said:

So if gender and sexual orientation aren't that important, then what is the point of Buddhists asserting heteronormativity re social expectations and constraints-- e.g. straight good and normal, otherwise bad and abnormal?

Malcolm wrote:

"Normative" does not imply a value judgement, viz good/bad, etc. It just means, "what is most common". Basically ten percent of the population has a same sex gender orientation, this runs across social class, different societies, etc. This is just how things are. You can make the observation that there is normative ten percent variation in gender preference if you like.

You can parse these things in all kinds of ways. The fact remains that most people's gender orientation is towards the opposite gender. We are embodied mammals and while of course gender orientation has karmic causes, when we are embodied, we tend to express our gender orientations based on the facts of our embodiment.

With the rise of western relationship patterns that do not follow western traditional norms, a variety of civil right issues have arisen that otherwise would not have.

Even so, From a Buddhist pov, everyone is born with a single gender, which cannot be changed despite their sexuality, no matter how fabulous they are.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 26th, 2014 at 3:44 AM

Title: Re: Your gender and sexuality

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Of course one's gender is irrelevant [to a point]. If one's gender were a barring factor, women could not practice Heruka deities, and men could not practice Dakinis.

But on a strictly conventional level, one will always be the gender one has been born with (including being intersexed), regardless.

Apart from monastic ordination (barred to intersexed persons), gender is not so important, even if Buddhism is hetero-normative, and will remain so, since the majority of the population is heterosexual. This is just how things are.

untxi said:

This is certainly the textual tradition and the practice tradition in the traditional context. At the same time I have heard extremely high lamas say one's gender and sexual orientation is irrelevant, even in the context of Buddhist tantra. So there's a fork in the road. We have choices to make about how we frame gender and sexual orientation in our individual lives and in our practice communities. It's an important discussion.

-Untxi

That's essentially what we're doing by asserting that Buddhism is hetero-normative..

Malcolm wrote:

Buddhist tantra is hetero-normative, as is Buddhism in general. Further, gender in Buddhism is considered congenital, i.e., it is something you are born with, it is an indriya, and cannot be surgically altered, whether you cut off your penis or sew one on.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 26th, 2014 at 3:09 AM

Title: Re: Your gender and sexuality

Content:

untxi said:

That's essentially what we're doing by asserting that Buddhism is hetero-normative..

Malcolm wrote:

Buddhist tantra is hetero-normative, as is Buddhism in general. Further, gender in Buddhism is considered congenital, i.e., it is something you are born with, it is an indriya, and cannot be surgically altered, whether you cut off your penis or sew one on.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 26th, 2014 at 2:23 AM

Title: Re: Shamatha and Dhyana in different traditions

Content:

KonchokZoepa said:

you could ask your lama if you have one to explain this picture. it depicts the path to shamatha and he can actually explain you through this picture that what the actual accomplishment of shamatha is.

Malcolm wrote:

Lama Migmar's The Tibetan Book of Awakening has a detailed description of the process of Shamatha depicted here. We based it directly on the Bhavanakrama.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 26th, 2014 at 1:38 AM

Title: Re: Should Buddhists even care about "engaging" social polit

Content:

zsc said:

My main concern here is that the position of one "owning" karma in a completely isolated way, due to solely one's past life, has traditionally had the social consequences of justifying congenital birth defects, generational poverty, inequality and discrimination against social "deviancy" etc. When I say "justifying", I don't mean just "explaining", I mean that this understanding of karma has been used as a way to encourage complacency and passivity about suffering and mistreatment brought on due to social and political systems.

Malcolm wrote:

The fact that you and you alone are the owner of your karma (The Buddha likens karma to a debt that one has to pay off) merely explains these things, it does not condone nor justify them. What you say about encouraging complacency is not true of how karma is understood within Buddhism, it is true of how karma is understood in Hinduism.

zsc said:

I have already expounded on a "philosophy of karma that teaches something else", so I just would be repeating myself at this point. Also, I would say that a huge portion of the Buddhist world practicing merit-transference/dedication is more significant than what you imply when say "someone".

Malcolm wrote:

If it were possible for dedication of merit to change the karma of sentient beings, you would have thought that the Buddhas in their compassion would have dedicated all their merit to us, so that we would no longer suffer.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 26th, 2014 at 12:48 AM

Title: Re: What happened historically to the Vinaya in Japan?

Content:

Seishin said:

I agree. The question is though, should the priests be on equal standing as the monks?

Indrajala said:

In Tibetan traditions sometimes the non-celibate clergy are held as superior to the sangha. Just look at the Sakya lineage, like HH Sakya Trizin.

Malcolm wrote:

This is an understandable misconception.

In the Sakya tradition there are, in general, no non-celibate clergy apart from the Khon family members. In fact, HHST wanted to become a monk, but because of his birth heritage that option was not available to him. In general, most Khon family males who were not in line to be the throne holder of Sakya usually become monks. In this case, the younger son of His Holiness, Jñānavajra, was a monk for many years. He chose to give up his vows for his own reasons, but it was not without some controversy.

While the Khon family has been the locus for secular power from the beginning of the founding of the tradition, it has only been the spiritual locus of the tradition occasionally, with the real spiritual authority of Sakya resting primarily with the Ngor Khenpos, and the heads of the Tshar school. Occasionally (and apart from the five founding masters) remarkable figures like Lama Dampa, Kunga Tashi, Amyezhabs, Kunga Lodo, Dagchen Trinly Rinchen and so on have emerged from the Khon family to become major lineage figures, but in general, the Khon family has primarily had a political role in the Sakya school as the secular rulers of the Sakya principality.

It is really only in the Nyingma school that there is a notion that mantrikas are on a par with bhikṣus. But even in Nyingma, mantrikas are still seated behind the bhikṣus.

I should also add that even where a lay person is a guru giving initiations, it is permissible, for the purpose of decorum, for monks to prostrate to the shrine rather than the person of the guru if he or she is a lay person. This is fully laid out in 50 verses of Guru Devotion attributed to Ashvaghosha.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 26th, 2014 at 12:25 AM

Title: Re: Śākyamuni's non-Indo-European heritage.

Content:

Indrajala said:

Incidentally for some great information on what constitutes proto-Indo-European religion, at least under reconstruction, see the following:

<http://piereligion.org/pierintro.html>

Malcolm wrote:

The answers to all of these questions and many more are to be found in Witzel's new book:

The Origins of the World's Mythologies. Oxford University Press

He has questioned the linguistic nature of the so-called Indus Script (Farmer, Sproat, Witzel 2004).[70] Earlier, he had suggested that a substrate related to, but not identical with the Austroasiatic Munda languages, which he therefore calls para-Munda, might have been the language of (part of) the Indus population.[71][72]

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Michael\_Witzel#Research

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 26th, 2014 at 12:17 AM

Title: Re: Should Buddhists even care about "engaging" social polit

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

In genera the sutrayāna approach is that it takes a minimum of three incalculable eons to achieve the required accumulations of merit and wisdom to become a Samyak sambuddha. After spending two incalculable eons to reach the eighth bhumi, it take another eon to reach buddhahood.

Thus, the idea that having a human birth means you have all the accumulations behind you is plain wrong when you actually study the Mahāyāna path. Why? When you reach the eighth bhumi, you gain power over birth.

Further, each Bhumi allows one to manifest a number of emanations in different buddhafiels: thus, when one attains the first bhumi, one can manifest 100 emanations in one hundred buddhafiels and so on. When one attains the second bhumi, one can manifest 1000 emanations, etc. At each bhumi, one manifests emanations in successive powers of ten.

We who cannot manifest even two bodies in this lifetimes should not think that we are anywhere near the end of our path. In fact, we are merely on the first path, the path of accumulation, trying to develop authentic bodhicitta. We have indeed attained a precious human birth, but this can be lost easily and who knows when we will have this opportunity again. Buddha himself describes the rarity of the precious human birth through the analogy of a blind tortoise in the ocean who rises to the surface every one hundred years and manages to rise through a golden circle that is randomly floating around on the surface of that ocean.

The pure land path is not a quick path, per se. There are many grades of birth described in the pure land sutras, and some people who are born there are born in lotuses that never open, so they never see the face of Amitabha. Of course, in Shinran's pure land school this is all understood rather differently than in the Chinese and Tibetan pure land traditions. So the point is that even we consider that it is possible to take birth in the pure land, this is not necessarily a swift path. In the Tibetan tradition taking birth in the pure land tends to be considered a resting point, where one can make progress on the bodhisattva path, eventually returning to various impure realms to aid sentient beings. further, while Amitabha's vow clearly says "Whoever hears my name will be reborn in Sukhavati", it does not state "Immediately upon having died in this lifetime". In fact, one of vows clearly states that in order to take rebirth in Sukhavati, one must accumulate the necessary merits after one has heard his name and so on. So, in reality, birth in the Pure Land is not the shortcut it sometimes appears to be in East Asian Buddhism. And of course vow 35 can be understood to be completely sexist:

When I obtain the Buddhahood, women of boundless and inconceivable Buddha-worlds of the ten quarters after having heard my name thereby awakened in faith and joyful aspiration, and turning their minds towards Bodhi, therefore dislike their own female lives, when they be born again, in their next life should not be incarnated into a masculine body, then may I not attain the enlightenment.

In other words, this vow states that women who have faith in Amitabha, who are unhappy being women because they wish for awakening, will be born as men in their next life.

There is also the recognition of the advantages of position in vow 43:

If after I have obtained the Buddhahood, that any Bodhisattva of other countries having heard my name, will be incarnated as a member of a noble family (if he so desires) when he dies, otherwise may I not attain enlightenment.

There is in fact no guarantee of immediate birth in Sukhavati in the 48 vows of Amitabha.

When it comes to Vajrayāna, Vajrayāna proposes that one can achieve buddhahood in this lifetime in this body. If one does not succeed in this life, one can easily attain buddhahood in the bardo, or failing that, one will definitely achieve awakening with 7 lifetimes if one practices or 16 even if one does not practice.

zsc said:

I think rory's point is valid in explaining the different perspectives here where we are finding our disagreement. Even though I go to a Theravadin sangha because of convenience and I like the people there, my personal orientation is Pureland practice and thought, in which is not a controversial claim to say that this lifetime will be my last lifetime conditioned within samsara. Even with a lot Theravadin lay people who just would like a better rebirth though, meritorious actions are done in the hopes of that being their last lifetime in the human realm, or at the very least their last lifetime as a non-monastic.

Correct me if I'm wrong Tibetan Buddhists, but from a Tibetan Buddhist perspective this may seem sort of myopic to you because eons and eons of progression is taken as a given, while other East Asian traditions like Pureland-based traditions almost imply that our human birth and access to the dharma is "proof" that those eons of meritorious work are "behind" us, so it's realistic to believe we can go "up" from here in just one more lifetime.

Johnny Dangerous said:

Ok, i'm correcting you. It's not remotely controversial in Tibetan Buddhism to talk about enlightenment in one lifetime, nor rebirth in the Pure Land.

A Fuzzy explanation to the best of my knowledge:

Hinayana sutra = many many lifetimes, "incomplete" version, Mahayana sutra = fewer lifetimes but still lots, Tantra = different levels, but there is the definite possibility of this being the last lifetime. IIRC the lowest level is listed as 60 lifetimes until or something like that, all mapped out lol!

I don't know a lot about Pureland, but the biggest difference from what I do know is the "other power" thing.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 25th, 2014 at 10:52 PM

Title: Re: Should Buddhists even care about "engaging" social polit

Content:

zsc said:

I think rory's point is valid in explaining the different perspectives here where we are finding our disagreement. Even though I go to a Theravadin sangha because of convenience and I like the people there, my personal orientation is Pureland practice and thought, in which is not a controversial claim to say that this lifetime will be my last lifetime conditioned within samsara. Even with a lot Theravadin lay people who just would like a better rebirth though, meritorious actions are done in the hopes of that being their last lifetime in the human realm, or at the very least their last lifetime as a non-monastic.

Correct me if I'm wrong Tibetan Buddhists, but from a Tibetan Buddhist perspective this may seem sort of myopic to you because eons and eons of progression is taken as a given, while other East Asian traditions like Pureland-based traditions almost imply that our human birth and access to the dharma is "proof" that those eons of meritorious work are "behind" us, so it's realistic to believe we can go "up" from here in just one more lifetime.

Malcolm wrote:

It rather depends on which Tibetan Buddhist perspective you are discussion, sutra or tantra.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 25th, 2014 at 10:36 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen in India post 8CE

Content:

tingdzin said:

"Relevant materials" is not limited to religious scripture.

Malcolm wrote:

Since there are no records of Shri Simha outside of the religious records that exist, then relevant materials are only religious records.

All of the other things you mentioned about the identity of Li, etc., they have very little to do with the person known as Shri Simha.

For example, there is no archaeological record of a Shri Simha, and what we know of the fellow is restricted to colophons in texts of uncertain date.

When confronted with two separate Dzogchen lineage accounts which sites Shri Simha in India, and a third, later tradition, that sites him in an uncertain "rgya nag", well, chances are the two earlier traditions (pan grub thugs bcud and the rod rje zam pa lineage accounts) are the more correct.

The best we can do is try and understand why Zhangton Tashi Dorje wanted to shift the location of Shri Simha from India to regions outside of India, because it is a certainty that he is the first author to do so.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 25th, 2014 at 4:49 AM

Title: Re: Should Buddhists even care about "engaging" social polit

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

The fact is society is just going to have to grow up and make democratic planning of the economy work.

Malcolm wrote:

"Democracy" and "planned economy" are mutually exclusive terms.

tellyontellyon said:

Market forces are not going to save the planet

Malcolm wrote:

I never said they could. Markets require regulation. That what governments are for.

tellyontellyon said:

we need a new economic and political system.

Malcolm wrote:

No, we simply need to decide that some types of resources are better preserved than consumed and pass laws to ensure that.

Personally, I find Hayek far more appealing than Trotsky, and much more reasonable and sensible. He fully exposes the failures of both right and left wing socialist collectivism.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 25th, 2014 at 12:31 AM

Title: Re: Zabmo Nangdon to be published by Shambhala

Content:

conebeckham said:

Shifting gears a little bit for me...

About the price. Look, it costs a lot of money to publish any book. Shambhala is not making huge profits. Snow Lion certainly wasn't. The translators are not getting rich, of that you can be assured. The readership of such specialized books is very small. I've not looked at the prices for all the books in the restricted section, but I can tell you that I've seen prices in the $40-60's. This is frankly not outrageous, in my opinion. Textbooks cost far more. Even this "$108" dollars that was quoted, well.....that's still far cheaper than a college hardback textbook.

And if a given book is truly precious, a source of refuge or inspiration, a benefit to one's practice, what, really, can be said about the price of such a thing?

About the "Gatekeeper" function....as I understand it, Shambhala is merely "enforcing" or complying with the regulations for purchase bestowed upon the text by a given translator, or a given Lama. Some people here are quick to blame Shambhala for some sort of "scheme" of control, when in fact I don't believe they are instituting the scheme--though certainly they are supporting and participating in it. This point apparently needs to be made clear, based upon some previous posts.

Malcolm wrote:

My point is that such restrictions are totally arbitrary and are not based on genuine and sound reasoning.

conebeckham said:

Well, if it's true that the restrictions are placed upon the texts by the "supervising Lamas"-for example, Khenpo Tsultrim Gyamtso, His Holiness Sakya Trizin--your argument is addressed to them, and not to Shambhala. Correct?

To be clear, I'm not saying the restrictions are NOT arbitrary or well-Reasoned. Frankly, I don't know. In fact, to know, one would have to have some sort of telepathic ability, or at the very least to have had personal discussions with the parties.

Malcolm wrote:

The point is that if you decide to translate something, and then have it published by Snow Lion etc., then the idea of restricting it becomes absurd. If on the other hand, you privately publish a book and control the dissemination of the text, that is a different story.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 25th, 2014 at 12:00 AM

Title: Re: Zabmo Nangdon to be published by Shambhala

Content:

conebeckham said:

Shifting gears a little bit for me...

About the price. Look, it costs a lot of money to publish any book. Shambhala is not making huge profits. Snow Lion certainly wasn't. The translators are not getting rich, of that you can be assured. The readership of such specialized books is very small. I've not looked at the prices for all the books in the restricted section, but I can tell you that I've seen prices in the $40-60's. This is frankly not outrageous, in my opinion. Textbooks cost far more. Even this "$108" dollars that was quoted, well.....that's still far cheaper than a college hardback textbook.

And if a given book is truly precious, a source of refuge or inspiration, a benefit to one's practice, what, really, can be said about the price of such a thing?

About the "Gatekeeper" function....as I understand it, Shambhala is merely "enforcing" or complying with the regulations for purchase bestowed upon the text by a given translator, or a given Lama. Some people here are quick to blame Shambhala for some sort of "scheme" of control, when in fact I don't believe they are instituting the scheme--though certainly they are supporting and participating in it. This point apparently needs to be made clear, based upon some previous posts.

Malcolm wrote:

My point is that such restrictions are totally arbitrary and are not based on genuine and sound reasoning.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 24th, 2014 at 12:42 PM

Title: Re: Should Buddhists even care about "engaging" social polit

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

I say wealth distribution must be part of the aims of a compassionate society and Buddhists should support that.

Malcolm wrote:

The problem with wealth redistribution is that it is not feasible. There is no way to ensure fair and equitable distribution because central planning and democracy cannot coexist:

It is the price of democracy that the possibilities of conscious control are restricted to the fields where true agreement exists and that in some fields things must be left to chance. But in a society which for its functioning depends on central planning this control cannot be made dependent on a majority's being able to agree; it will often be necessary that the will of a small minority be imposed upon the people, because this minority will be the largest group able to agree among themselves on the question at issue. Democratic government has worked successfully where, and so long as, the functions of government were, by a widely accepted creed, restricted to fields where agreement among a majority could be achieved by free discussion; and it is the great merit of the liberal creed that it reduced the range of subjects on which agreement was necessary to one on which it was likely to exist in a society of free men. It is now often said that democracy will not tolerate "capitalism." If "capitalism" means here a competitive system based on free disposal over private property, it is far more important to realize that only within this system is democracy possible. When it becomes dominated by a collectivist creed, democracy will inevitably destroy itself.

Hayek, F. A. (2010-10-22). The Road to Serfdom: Text and Documents--The Definitive Edition (The Collected Works of F. A. Hayek, Volume 2) (pp. 109-110). University of Chicago Press - A. Kindle Edition.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 24th, 2014 at 5:52 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen in India post 8CE

Content:

alpha said:

Among the 5 sems sde original texts we find the khyung chen lding ba.

Isn't this text attributed to Sri Simha ?

If I am not mistaken CNNr gave teachings on it last year sometime before christmas...

Malcolm wrote:

Hi Alpha:

You are confusing the sems sde text with a tregchö text in the Vima Nyinthig (which indeed ChNN taught last year).

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 24th, 2014 at 2:47 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen in India post 8CE

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

I have either read and translated all the earliest datable historical sources for Sṛī Simha (pan grub thugs bcud, lo rgyus chen mo, the Vajra bridge histories, etc,) so your assertion that I have "no background" in relevant materials is plain nonsense.

alpha said:

Are these texts publicly available or will you publish them sometime in the future?

I would be particularly interested in anything related to Vajra Bridge.

Malcolm wrote:

I hope to publish yet another version of the five early bodhicitta texts at some point since I regard them as being the origin of the Dzogchen tradition. I am less certain of the actual provenance of the 13 later bodhicitta texts, and it is pretty clear (to me at any rate) that the kun byed rgyal po, the mdo bcu and the rmad du byung ba tantras are Tibetan compilations.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 24th, 2014 at 2:31 AM

Title: Re: Zabmo Nangdon to be published by Shambhala

Content:

conebeckham said:

Right. I'm referring to Shambhala's edition of the Treasury of Esoteric Instructions.

<http://www.shambhala.com/books/buddhism/treasury-of-esoteric-instructions.html>

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, this was published before the LTC's text was published, and the slob bshad is considered more profound. The LTC's book also has a complete commentary on the Vajra verses, written by Sachen.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 24th, 2014 at 1:22 AM

Title: Re: Zabmo Nangdon to be published by Shambhala

Content:

conebeckham said:

I'm not disagreeing, Malcolm--but, for instance, His Holiness Sakya Trizin is said to be the source of restrictions for the Lam Dre volume. It is the lamas who are the source of the restrictions. I'm just pointing this out for all readers.

Malcolm wrote:

Lamdre is an unrestricted download, and all the most essential Lamdre instructions (slob bshad) have been freely published with HHST's blessings as part of the Library of Tibetan Classics.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 24th, 2014 at 1:19 AM

Title: Re: Should Buddhists even care about "engaging" social polit

Content:

zsc said:

This is basically the basis for the motivation to engage the mechanisms of suffering in many different ways, including suffering brought on due to sociopolitical systems. This is just making a meditation practice of what I have been expressing this whole time.

Malcolm wrote:

Tonglen is simply a practice for developing the courage to be a bodhisattva, nothing more.

zsc said:

Edited to add As I continue to read about it, the less I see how this practice refutes my point about karma, which affirms the teachings of interdependence (from dependent co-origination) and nonduality, and therefore does not agree that karma is something that we "own" in any kind of independent way.

Malcolm wrote:

It is impossible to take on the Karma of another, just as it is impossible to take on the sufferings of others. The practice of Tonglen exists to strengthen one's resolve to assist others. For example, when we imagine we are taking the sufferings of all sentient beings, this does not cause us to experience all the sufferings of all sentient beings in fact. When we imagine we are taking on the sufferings of starving children, our bodies do not become emaciated and so on. When we imagine that we are sending all of our happiness and positive roots of virtue to sentient beings, such as starving children, they are not immediately rained upon with food and drink. Since the Buddha was not able to remove the sufferings of all sentient beings, how much less able to do so are we? Nevertheless, like the Buddha, we aspire to do so, because in that aspiration lies the seed to accomplishing the ultimate result, Buddhahood.

zsc said:

Honestly, it seems at this point it seems like there can be no pleasing you.

Malcolm wrote:

It would please me if you were able to elaborate a theory of social justice based on truly grasping Buddhist principles.

zsc said:

No matter what language I use, no usage adheres well enough to the teachings of the superior Malcolmyana vehicle, so the actual issues I am trying to discuss cannot be discussed coherently, because even terms like "conventional reality" don't actually mean "conventional reality". This is not meant to be a personal attack, but just an admission that I cannot get around your rhetorical tricks.

Malcolm wrote:

I am not using rhetorical tricks. I am merely pointing out that the view you present is based on a one-lifetime model. I would also like to point out again that you are misusing the notion of interdependence. You are mistaking karana-hetu (the fact that all things are causes of all other things apart from themselves) with pratītyasamutpāda (dependent origination, which fundamentally describes how sentient beings are caught in samsara and how they can interrupt that process) and the principles of karmavipaka (which describe the effects of morally determined actions).

When one confuses these three principles— cause and condition, dependent origination and karmavipaka — then one will be very confused about rebirth, karma, status in the world, etc.

When it comes to conventional reality, there is a statement by Shantideva, "the ultimate of the lower system is the conventional of the higher". Conventional truths are not written in stone. They change, they change depending on what one's understanding is. For example, the conventional truth of a ruler is that he is the most powerful person, but from the conventional truth viewpoint of a persona following Madhyamaka teaching, rulers are the greatest fools of all with the least power.

From the worldly point of view of the equal rights amendment and so on, we need to enable parity and opportunity for all US citizens, and beyond. I not only accept this, but I support it -- which is why you will have noted on other threads I consider gay marriage to be a civil rights issue and I think that people who don't agree with me have a fundamental lack of understanding of what civil rights means (which is why I think poc who do not support gay marriage have a huge blind spot). I am a deep ecologist, and feel that we have a fundamental obligation to respect all life. While my Buddhist practice informs these perspectives, I do not confuse them with my Buddhist practice. I know quite well that people who are suffering oppression in this life (for example Tibetans in Tibet) are experiencing the ripening of their own karma. Do I support measures to lessen it where possible? Of course. In other words, while it is true that I regard things like having a hot poker shoved in my eye as a result of karma, I also support the idea that the poker ought to be removed as soon as possible, and the inserting of pokers in eyes should be prevented at all costs. But when it does happen, I am not blind to the fact that all sensations in samsara, be they pleasant or painful, are fundamentally a result of karma.

A Buddhist social consciousness must be able to accommodate both perspective simultaneously: on the one hand observing that things like attack dogs and water canons being used on non-violent protestors is fundamentally wrong, and understanding also that the people who are being attacked are also experiencing the ripening of their own karma, while the attackers are creating negative karma for themselves too, which will ripen as suffering later. The Buddhist approach to social justice issues therefore should be equanimous concern and effective engagement, rather than passionate involvement and karmically questionable actions.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 24th, 2014 at 12:47 AM

Title: Re: Zabmo Nangdon to be published by Shambhala

Content:

conebeckham said:

It's not Shambhala who determines restrictions, but the translators or their teachers. In this case, it was the wish of Khenpo Tsultrim Gyamtso that certain requirements be met.

I think in all cases, it's not the publisher laying down the rules. Take a look at the Yeshe Lama, and the Guhyagarbha...etc.

Malcolm wrote:

The entire (reliable) translation of Longchenpa's commentary on Guhyagarbha is available for free on the internet. It is ludicrous therefore for anyone to restrict commentaries on it.

Everything in Yeshe Lama can be found in various books which anyone can buy. This ludicrous fetish for restriction really ought to be abandoned.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, March 23rd, 2014 at 11:29 PM

Title: Re: Zabmo Nangdon to be published by Shambhala

Content:

conebeckham said:

As for "elitism," well.....if the only people with free access to the texts are Tibetan readers, isn't that a form of elitism, as well?

Malcolm wrote:

That is the point. If you do not read Tibetan well, you are discriminated against in a form that those of who do read Tibetan well are not.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, March 23rd, 2014 at 11:27 PM

Title: Re: Dzogchen in India post 8CE

Content:

tingdzin said:

Once again, Malcolm dismisses as fantasy what does not accord with his preconceptions. As you rightly noted, I supplied a motive for later Tibetan scholars to attribute Indian origins to Sri Singha, while he offers none for the converse situation. I offer a concrete historical location and context, while he just says "near Bodh Gaya". Pensum, I will get back to you with historical sources by PM, but I'm not going to waste time arguing with someone who is Always Right, even when he has no background in the relevant material.

Malcolm wrote:

Tingzin:

I have either read and translated all the earliest datable historical sources for Śrī Śiṃha (pan grub thugs bcud, lo rgyus chen mo, the Vajra bridge histories, etc,) so your assertion that I have "no background" in relevant materials is plain nonsense.

The lo rgyus chen mo is quite late, comparatively, and is quite out of step with what the earlier sources say (which locate Shri Simha in India). Later Tibetan scholars in general do not locate Shri Simha in India, they locate him in all sorts of places outside of India such as Khotan, China, and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, March 23rd, 2014 at 11:12 PM

Title: Re: Zabmo Nangdon to be published by Shambhala

Content:

Osho said:

Pathetic.

Truly pathetic.

practitioner said:

I'd disagree, a translator using their time and expertise to give those who can't read Tibetan access to this text is hardly pathetic. Any restrictions are on the advice of their teacher, hardly a sound marketing strategy...

Malcolm wrote:

The point is these these books are freely available to people like me, translators, without any restrictions at all. So making the English translations restricted is just a kind of elitism.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, March 22nd, 2014 at 11:14 PM

Title: Re: Should Buddhists even care about "engaging" social polit

Content:

kirtu said:

The Avatamsaka is highly influential in Tibetan Buddhism although it can be argued that this is restricted to the Gaṇḍavyūha Sutra. For example the Prayer of Samantabhadra is taken directly from the Gaṇḍavyūha Sutra.

I've seen references to the Lotus Sutra pop up but it's influence is weak within Tibetan Buddhism.

Kirt

Malcolm wrote:
Hi Kirt,

Quite the contrary, the Lotus Sutra's ekayāna teachings are very influential in Tibetan Buddhism, forming the basis for example of Sonam Tsemo's observation that there is in reality only one vehicle.

The way we treat sutras is to get at the essential message of a given sutra, and not get caught up in irrelevant details.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Saturday, March 22nd, 2014 at 11:12 PM
Title: Re: Should Buddhists even care about "engaging" social polity said:
Content:
I know you don't read or comment on the Lotus Sutra either....

Malcolm wrote:
There are commentaries on the Saddharmapundarika Sutra in Tibetan.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Saturday, March 22nd, 2014 at 11:11 PM
Title: Re: Should Buddhists even care about "engaging" social polity Content:

zsc said:
Your theory that we cannot remove the karmic obstructions of others goes against the understanding that is the basis of the practice of the transference of merit.

Malcolm wrote:
The dedication of merit is not a "transfer" of merit.

zsc said:
Malcolm - I have said over and over here and in the other thread that my concepts of "white/non-white" are referring to conventional reality

Malcolm wrote:
Your concepts vis a vis this issue appear to be based in a one-lifetime perception of social relations. From a Buddhist perspective, taking a one life-time view is not conventional reality at all.

zsc said:

Also, it is an accepted understanding that one can practice the dharma with less obstructions when your basic needs are taken care of. It's the practical reason behind why we don't let our monks starve.

Malcolm wrote:

It would be best if no one starved, and yet despite everything, there is still suffering in the world.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, March 22nd, 2014 at 9:50 AM

Title: Re: Zabmo Nangdon to be published by Shambhala

Content:

conebeckham said:

Just an FYI, saw that Elizabeth Callahan has translated this, along with Kongtrul's commentary, and it will be available as a restricted text in September from Shambhala. Website says you must have completed ngondro, have had pointing out instructions, and be practicing HYT yidam under the guidance of a qualified lama.

Malcolm wrote:

You know, I just don't support this restricted text nonsense.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, March 22nd, 2014 at 6:12 AM

Title: Re: Should Buddhists even care about "engaging" social polit

Content:

rory said:

Malcolm: 8. deaf, dumb, blind or mentally deficient

This is a very good example of re-iterating something that is outdated. Times have changed a current priest in Honmon Butsuryu Shu is deaf and signs the Odaimoku, he enthusiastically wants to bring Buddhism to deaf people with sign language, as opposed to the times he was told in SGI to sit and be silent. Blind people can read braille and study just like anyone else. Even those who are developmentally disabled have levels of ability, it is up to them how much and how far they can learn. Let's not perpetrate these backward attitudes.

Malcolm wrote:

It is true that we have braille and sign language these assist people are deaf and blind learn Dharma. Developmental disabled people can learn Dharma too. But to pretend than these factors do not present significant problems is to just ignore how things are.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, March 22nd, 2014 at 12:53 AM

Title: Re: Should Buddhists even care about "engaging" social polit

Content:

zsc said:

I would say that since practice leads to the goal for liberation, more people would be able to practice if they weren't overburdened with concerns like not having enough to eat, not having adequate shelter, not having access to clean water, not having access to education, not having access to educational and employment opportunities, etc. These factors often depend on present social and political structures.

Malcolm wrote:

And all of these are covered in the teaching of the eight freedoms and ten endowments that define a precious human birth:

Freedom from being born in:

1. in the Hell realms
2. as a hungry ghost
3. as an animal
4. in a place where teachings are unavailable
5. as a long-life god (always content and therefore has no motivation for progress)
6. with wrong view (no understanding of karma, and no understanding of past and future lives)
7. where no Buddha has appeared
8. deaf, dumb, blind or mentally deficient

If one is born in any of the above realms, there is no chance of studying and practicing the teachings. What is therefore necessary are the Ten Endowments which consists of Five Inherent Endowments and Five Karma Provisions. The Five Inherent Endowments are one is born

1. as a human being
2. where there are teachings
3. possessing five senses
4. not having committed heavy negative karmas
5. having confidence in and devotion to the Triple Gem

The Five Karma Provisions are one is born

1. where a Buddha has appeared
2. where a Buddha has taught
3. where the Dharma teachings flourish

4. where there are followers who enter the pure path of Dharma
5. where there is support from the kindness of others, including the spiritual master.

zsc said:

Ultimately, I do not see social activism as an attempt to change the samsaric reality, but to remove as many samsaric obstructions as possible so that the Buddhist path can be open to more people. This is why I disagree with points like that reiterated by Johnny Dangerous, et all. I don't perceive any social resolution as an "end", but the means to liberation in a fuller sense.

Malcolm wrote:

The Buddhist path is open to anyone who takes refuge in the Three Jewels.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, March 21st, 2014 at 11:43 PM

Title: Re: Self-Immolation: an anti-Buddhist practice?

Content:

Nemo said:

Will you be returning your land to the indigenous people your ancestors displaced?

Malcolm wrote:

The land I live on was never owned or settled by any tribe, and lay in a sort of no man's land between the Hudson river valley and the Connecticut river valley. Settling in this part of Mass never displaced anyone.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, March 21st, 2014 at 11:40 PM

Title: Re: Self-Immolation: an anti-Buddhist practice?

Content:

Nemo said:

I would rather stop wasting resources on Tibet. The battle is lost. Flee the country and regroup elsewhere. We can still preserve something in Nepal and Bhutan.

Malcolm wrote:

You don't have to "waste" any resources on Tibet. However, Tibet is important. Tibetans are not going to flee; where would they go? Canada?

Nepal, not likely, they are in the pocket of the PRC. Bhutan is a park.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, March 21st, 2014 at 8:16 AM

Title: Re: Is all knowing state same as Higher Self?

Content:

garudha said:

You realise that not only are these words you are reading right now samsara, but every part of your body, including every single idea, thought & slightest movement of your brain IS samsara itself ?

You think that only the watch-face of the swiss-watch of samsara. I'm telling you that every single piece of the swiss-watch, even the tick noise, IS samsara.

Wisdom & Compassion are the Jewels of the watch. These Jewels are pure and nothing else.

Lotus_Bitch said:

Fundamentally, this is dualistic, from the Mahayana viewpoint.

garudha said:

Is Yab-Yum dualistic ?

Malcolm wrote:

No, it is symbol of the non duality method and wisdom.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, March 21st, 2014 at 8:15 AM

Title: Re: Can't Really Work with Mahayana by the Looks of it

Content:

rob h said:

Thanks again for the help.

I haven't actually read much about Bodhisattvas in Theravada, but this paper I just found speaks quite a bit about them and some of the misconceptions that have apparently been made. Have only read halfway through so far, but it's trying to say for at least part of it, that the Bodhisattva ideal is actually very alive in Theravada. Also something that I've seen before : that the whole "Hinayana" thing was actually meant to mean some sects of Mahayana, but things then got confused over time. Will hopefully read the rest later on.

<http://journals.ub.uni-heidelberg.de/index.php/jiabs/article/viewFile/8663/2570>

Malcolm wrote:

The fact is that in Theravada, if you choose bodhisattva aspiration, it is considered that you cannot become a stream entrant. Needless to say, in Mahāyāna, we do not agree.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, March 21st, 2014 at 8:05 AM

Title: Re: Should Buddhists even care about "engaging" social polit

Content:

zsc said:

From the last discussion that I participated in ( <https://www.dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=42&t=11898> ), something came up that I think deserves its own thread, which is the question of how involved Buddhists should be in politics, or if they even should be involved at all. My position is that I don't think it would be detrimental to our practice if we were politically involved.

Malcolm wrote:

That depends very much on how. If your politics cultivates the three poisons, then it is probably better you are not involved in politics.

zsc said:

Related to this, I find it pretty troubling when other Buddhists take positions that basically say that our current social position is the result of our karma from a previous life only. It implies that our social advantages are "rightfully ours" because they have been "earned" in some way, so there is little need to address inequality, making social politics irrelevant to practice. Remove the teaching of rebirth,

Malcolm wrote:

But we don't remove rebirth.

zsc said:

and this is basically the assumption that props up elitism, as well as the myth of the true meritocracy and the "self-made man".

Malcolm wrote:

But of course Buddhist social theory maintains that one's rebirth is based on one's virtuous deeds. So if you are born into an "elite" and behave non-virtuously, you will lose that position in your next life.

zsc said:

These are the mechanisms that have made imperialism, colonialism, racism, and other forms of bigotry possible, and have kept these forms of bigotry institutionalized and powerful.

Malcolm wrote:

None of this applies to Buddhist social theory.

zsc said:

Moreover, white mainstream Buddhism's major players have been taking similar philosophical positions...

Malcolm wrote:

We are just following the lead of our non-white teachers.

zsc said:

Where is the room for conventional reality to be addressed? "No independent identity" should not be taken to mean "irrelevant", especially from Mahayanists, who affirm the non-dualistic nature of reality.

Malcolm wrote:

If you wish to be taken seriously on this score you will have to abandon your rhetoric of white/non-white, etc.

zsc said:

Often, people who disagree with me bring up scriptures in which Shakyamuni asserts that political concerns are not appropriate for Buddhists to concern themselves with

Malcolm wrote:

The Buddha never said that we should not engage in political life.

zsc said:

The Hindu caste system had spiritual leaders at the top, implying a hierarchy of spiritual maturity...

Malcolm wrote:

When the Buddha was alive, as he very clearly says in many texts, the warrior class was more respected than the priestly class.

zsc said:

I think how we were taught to understand karma matters here. I was never taught that karma was only in relation to accumulation from a past life, but also the causes and conditions that each of us bring about through our thoughts and actions, and doesn't just affect you, because there is not a separate "you" to begin with. This is why the practice of accumulating merit makes sense, for instance. You accumulate good merit from wholesome deeds, and others also accumulate merit through, among other ways, rejoicing in the wholesomeness of your meritorious act when you tell them that you did it. Pretty much the opposite of the Christian understanding that you are supposed to do good deeds in secret.

Malcolm wrote:

You are conflating action (karma) with the ripening of action (karma vipaka). Action, as defined by the Buddha, is intention and what proceeds from intention. "You" are indeed a separate continuum, but that continuum simply isn't a self.

zsc said:

So as it relates to social politics, there is nothing inherently disadvantageous about being born black, for example.

Malcolm wrote:

Nope, not intrinsically; nothing intrinsically disadvantageous about being a woman either. But in this present epoch they seem to be both.

zsc said:

But since it is what it is, where black people and other marginalized groups are suffering due to today's circumstances, this should be engaged.

Malcolm wrote:

Sure, Buddhists who feel that they should do something should do something.

zsc said:

So to bring it all back, this is why I don't think that political activism is inappropriate behavior for a Buddhist, since I do not think that it is unwholesome for a Buddhist to engage conventional reality as long as he or she remembers it is ultimately empty.

Malcolm wrote:

As I said at the beginning, what matters is "the how." But there are a number of people you can learn from such as Bernie Glassman, a prominent example of an engaged Buddhist political activist and there are many others

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, March 21st, 2014 at 4:19 AM

Title: Re: Is all knowing state same as Higher Self?

Content:

Son of Buddha said:

he established that the 5 aggregates were Not Self and it was because they WERE not self that they lead to suffering

Malcolm wrote:

The Buddha established that the five aggregates were not a self, that none of the five aggregates individually are a self, and important, than there is no self apart from the five aggregates.

Thus, all phenomena, including nirvana, are not self.

Son of Buddha said:

SN 22.46 Impermanent (2) pg 885

At Savatthi. "Bhikkhus, form is impermanent.... Feeling is impermanent.... Perception is impermanent.... Volitional formations are impermanent.... Consciousness is impermanent. What is Impermanent is suffering. What is suffering is nonself. What is nonself should be seen as it really is with correct wisdom thus: This is not mine, this I am not, this is not my self."

so Nirvana is Suffering since it is not self correct?

talk about throwing out the baby with the bath water.

Malcolm wrote:

Where does the Buddha ever say in any śravaka text that nirvana is a self? No where, that's where.

While indeed the five aggregates are not self, this does not mean that space and the two cessations are a self.

Ārya-tathāgatācintyaguhyānirdeśa-nāma-mahāyāna-sūtra states:

Guhyapati, in the same way, the tathāgatas have summarized all Dharmas. The summaries of Dharmas are defined as four. If it is asked what four: in order to conquer the śramanas and brahmins who advocate permanence, the long-lived gods who think of permanence, it is said "All conditioned things are impermanent. In order to conquer humans and gods who think of happiness, it is said "all conditioned things are suffering". In order to conquer the tīrthikas who propose a permanent self, it is said that all phenomena (dharmas) are without self. In order to subdue that proud who engage in conceptuality, it is said that "nirvana is peace".

Guhyapati, impermanent denotes very impermanent. Suffering denotes freedom from aspiration. Selfless denotes the characteristic of emptiness. "Nirvana is peace" denotes actualizing the absence of characteristics.

Here, we can see what the four seals are really intended for. Further, the Ārya-ratnacūḍaparipṛcchā-nāma-mahāyāna-sūtra states:

"All conditioned things are impermanent", "all conditioned things are suffering", "all phenomena are not self" and "nirvana is peace" are equivalent statements.

Rājādeśa-nāma-mahāyāna-sūtra:

Nirvana is the supreme bliss of peace, without concepts grasping it as self and without affliction.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, March 21st, 2014 at 3:35 AM

Title: Re: Is all knowing state same as Higher Self?

Content:

Son of Buddha said:

he established that the 5 aggregates were Not Self and it was because they WERE not self that they lead to suffering

Malcolm wrote:

The Buddha established that the five aggregates were not a self, that none of the five aggregates individually are a self, and important, than there is no self apart from the five aggregates.

Thus, all phenomena, including nirvana, are not self.

garudha said:

So all phenomena manifests through/as/is the five aggregates ?

Malcolm wrote:

There are two classes of phenomena; conditioned and unconditioned. All conditioned phenomena are included in the five aggregates; the unconditioned phenomena are space, the two cessations (one of them being nirvana) and emptiness.

All of these phenomena are not a self.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, March 21st, 2014 at 3:12 AM

Title: Re: Is all knowing state same as Higher Self?

Content:

Son of Buddha said:

he established that the 5 aggregates were Not Self and it was because they WERE not self that they lead to suffering

Malcolm wrote:

The Buddha established that the five aggregates were not a self, that none of the five aggregates individually are a self, and important, than there is no self apart from the five aggregates.

Thus, all phenomena, including nirvana, are not self.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, March 21st, 2014 at 3:02 AM

Title: Re: Is all knowing state same as Higher Self?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

No, actually, I don't think the historical Buddha taught one word of Mahāyāna or Vajrayāna for that matter. They are teachings put in his mouth.

Nighthawk said:

Nagarjuna was a historical Buddha who taught the Mahayana amongst many others.

Malcolm wrote:

I was referring to the Buddha cast in Mahāyāna sutras.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 20th, 2014 at 10:54 PM

Title: Re: Dzogchen in India post 8CE

Content:

Konch said:

Longchenpa's claim that Srisimha, one of the earliest figures of the Dzogchen lineage, was Ho-shang Mahayana

Malcolm wrote:

Longchenpa's view of the history of the arrival of Dzogchen to Tibet was a bit skewed by Nyang ral's term bio. In some places it seems he follows Nyang, in others, he seems to follow Zhangton. In general, he seems to more or less ignore the sem sde account which formed the basis for the "Great Image" bio of Vairocana (which is a composite bio based on several sources).

Konch said:

But this aside, going back a little to the main topic from the OP, so it seems noone is having a go at the point of what happened to dzogchen in India.

Malcolm wrote:

That is because there is nothing definitive we can say about it beyond the fact that two students of Śrī Siṃha brought it to Tibet.

Given the interchangeability between the terms mahāmudra and rdzogchen in the early texts, we can consider that Dzogchen was a pre-mother tantra approach to the completion stage.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 20th, 2014 at 10:38 PM

Title: Re: Self-Immolation: an anti-Buddhist practice?

Content:

Nemo said:

It was a protectorate historically and has a predominantly Han population now. Jokhang Temple is now a shopping mall. Previously it was too isolated to bother administering directly. Now it is too resource rich and strategically important to be independent. It will revert back around the same time the Iroquois take back America. Resources should be spent on conserving Nepal and Bhutan.

Malcolm wrote:

It was not a protectorate, historically. Tibetan sovereignty has been well established in the historical record.

The Han who live there now were settled there illegally.

It may be the case that China will never voluntarily relinquish control of Tibet, but that does not mean we need to forget history.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 20th, 2014 at 10:29 PM

Title: Re: Three Turnings.

Content:

kirtu said:

However the Theravadin School is also not just a Sravakayana school.

Kirt

Malcolm wrote:

Of course it is.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 20th, 2014 at 10:27 PM

Title: Re: Three Turnings.

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

It is not a Mahāyāna POV, which are only Yogacara or Madhyamaka.

kirtu said:

It's not a Mahayana philosophical view of reality but that has nothing to do with one's bodhicitta. One can have a realist view and still be a bodhisattva not on the bhumis and thus nonetheless following the Mahayana path.

Kirt

Malcolm wrote:

I was talking about view, not motivation.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 20th, 2014 at 9:49 AM

Title: Re: Is all knowing state same as Higher Self?

Content:

Son of Buddha said:

Yea your just agreeing with me, you accept that the Buddha taught True Self ,you just think its provisional.

Malcolm wrote:

No, actually, I don't think the historical Buddha taught one word of Mahāyāna or Vajrayāna for that matter. They are teachings put in his mouth.

I evaluate the these texts based on their content, not who supposedly spoke them.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 20th, 2014 at 9:44 AM

Title: Re: Self-Immolation: an anti-Buddhist practice?

Content:

Vajraprajñākhaḍga said:

I wonder why both of you removed that one sentence from its context.

Malcolm wrote:

Because the rest of your statement, while obvious, does to address the salient feature of the problem.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 20th, 2014 at 9:00 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen in India post 8CE

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The earliest source that mentions that Shri Siṃha comes from somewhere outside of India is the 12th century lo rgyus chen mo. This is totally unlikely, considering that the pan grub thugs bcud (Bima rgyud 'bum. vol. 1) locates Shri Simha in India, near Bodhgaya. Thus, we can regard any idea that Sṛī Siṃha is anything other than an Indian a late Tibetan fantasy.

dzogchungpa said:

That's interesting. Do you have any idea why they would want to fantasize in that way?

Malcolm wrote:

I cannot speak about their motivations, apart from the fact that perhaps it was important to Zhangton to make Dzogchen seem more exotic than Indian tantra.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 20th, 2014 at 8:41 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen in India post 8CE

Content:

tingdzin said:

I'm sorry, Pensum, but this article you link to is useless from the standpoint of scholarly history. For example: note 3 says that So khyam is Su gnam; this is not only a phonetic stretch, it is directly contradicted by other Tibetan sources (e.g. Deb ther Sngon po, the Blue Annals), that have nothing to do with Sri Singha, but which put So khyam in the NW part of China proper, i.e. the upper reaches of the Yellow River. Phonologically So khyam is correctly related to the Chinese Suo fang and the Khotanese Sva hvam, both historically referring to the same area. This So khyam is moreover quite close to the Chinese Wu tai shan, which would make it a logical choice for Sri Singha's studies. The Five-peaked Mountain in Khotan was attested earlier than the one in China, but I don't think the one in Nepal was; in fact, as I recall, putting a five-peaked mountain in Nepal was simply a result of the later massive transfer of all the lore associated with Khotan to Nepal, under the mistaken later belief that Nepal was the Li yul often talked about in the oldest Tibetan material. This massive transfer might itself have been inspired by the pathological refusal of the later Tibetan schools to accept anything from outside the Indian subcontinent as authentic Buddhism. When the (conveniently anonymous) author of this article says things like "it is known that" to preface remarks which are at least highly controversial and probably complete fabrication, without citing sources, he shows that his "scholarship" is not worthy of consideration, regardless of its acceptance by an official Buddhist organization. If you are very interested in these things, I can refer you to real scholarly materials.

Malcolm wrote:

The earliest source that mentions that Shri Simha comes from somewhere outside of India is the 12th century lo rgyus chen mo. This is totally unlikely, considering that the pan grub thugs bcud (Bima rgyud 'bum. vol. 1) locates Shri Simha in India, near Bodhgaya. Thus, we can regard any idea that Sri Simha is anything other than an Indian a late Tibetan fantasy.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 20th, 2014 at 8:34 AM

Title: Re: Can't Really Work with Mahayana by the Looks of it

Content:

Alfredo said:

Mahayana rhetoric to the effect that "Hinayana" practitioners are selfish, less advanced, etc. should be treated as just that--rhetoric. Real-life Theravadins are just as compassionate, etc. as real-life Mahayanists. (.

Malcolm wrote:

Compassion is not the complete measure of Mahāyāna, there is no objectless compassion in Theravada; and the Theravadin bodhisattva doctrine is set up so that aspirants to Buddhahood are denied stream entry.

There are in fact there in fact three kinds of bodhicitta according to Mahāyāna: that of an arhat, a pratyekabuddha and a buddha. Of the three, the last is the most superior.

Just saying....

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 20th, 2014 at 8:27 AM

Title: Re: who is the Greatest master you have ever seen?

Content:

xabir said:

That is another occassion, not the teaching on the deer park. He gave countless teachings over his career. The ones in the deer park were his previous companions, and they recognised some change in the Buddha so got attracted to him.

On other occasions, such as the incident I provided, the follower of Buddha has not met Buddha before, and he did not recognise Buddha when meeting with him, and certainly did not suspect that he was Buddha merely by "his shining presence".

Only towards the end of the discourse, in recognising the profundity of Buddha's wisdom, he said, surely this must be the Buddha himself, and repented for the transgression of addressing Buddha as a "friend". He attained the awakening of an anagami after that discourse.

Basically: you can only tell someone is enlightened from his wisdom, not his/her appearance.

Malcolm wrote:

Sunakṣatra was Buddha's first attendant, for many years.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 20th, 2014 at 8:25 AM

Title: Re: Self-Immolation: an anti-Buddhist practice?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The Chinese psyche is still scarred and terrified of provinces declaring independence. Tibet is not now, never has been and never will be a "province" of China.

Vajraprajnakhadga said:
The maps say otherwise.

Malcolm wrote:
Screw the maps -- they don't represent the facts.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Thursday, March 20th, 2014 at 8:23 AM
Title: Re: Three Turnings.
Content:

jeeprs said:
So the phenomenal world exists, but everything in it is transient, unsatisfying and empty (sunya).

Malcolm wrote:
This is not a Mahāyāna point of view.

kirtu said:
It's not a Cittamatrīn or Madhyamānīkian view. It could however be a Mahayana POV...
Kirt

Malcolm wrote:
It is not a Mahāyāna POV, which are only Yogācāra or Madhyamaka.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Thursday, March 20th, 2014 at 8:20 AM
Title: Re: who is the Greatest master you have ever seen?
Content:

tyler2 said:
you dont understand that noone would believe buddha about enlightenment unless he was "shining" or had presence, anyone can talk and say "i am enlightened".
the ascetics he originally practiced with who had rejected him originally , were going to reject him again but as he drew closer they were attracted by his aura.

Malcolm wrote:
Of course, then there is the guy, Sunakṣatra, who claimed the only difference between himself and the Buddha was that the Buddha had a glow.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Thursday, March 20th, 2014 at 4:48 AM
Title: Re: Three Turnings.
Content:

jeeprs said:
So the phenomenal world exists, but everything in it is transient, unsatisfying and empty (sunya).

Malcolm wrote:
This is not a Mahāyāna point of view.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Thursday, March 20th, 2014 at 4:46 AM
Title: Re: Three Turnings.
Content:
Malcolm wrote:
If one claims the "third turning" is definitive, defines it as a number of sutras like the Saṃdhinirmocana and so on, and then you cite a "first" turning sūtra, you have contradicted yourself.

jeeprs said:
Not necessarily.

Malcolm wrote:
Necessarily, since your criteria would then be based on the teachings career of the Buddha.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Thursday, March 20th, 2014 at 4:44 AM
Title: Re: Is all knowing state same as Higher Self?
Content:
Son of Buddha said:
if you accept the Mahayana and the Vajrayana as being authentic schools of Buddhism then yes the True Self is really the Buddhas teaching.

Malcolm wrote:
Ah, no you don't. You can understand that so called "self" teachings or tathāgatagabha teachings in some Mahāyāna Buddhist sutras are provisional and still accept the validity of Mahāyāna and Vajrayāna

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 20th, 2014 at 4:41 AM

Title: Re: who is the Greatest master you have ever seen?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

"I am sorry I couldn't give you any vibration..."

-- Chogyal Namkhai Norbu's remark to a student who thought other Lamas had more "vibration".

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 20th, 2014 at 4:35 AM

Title: Re: Self-Immolation: an anti-Buddhist practice?

Content:

Unknown said:

The Chinese psyche is still scarred and terrified of provinces declaring independence.

Malcolm wrote:

Tibet is not now, never has been and never will be a "province" of China.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 20th, 2014 at 4:29 AM

Title: Good vibrations...

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

(Slightly adapted from the beach boys....)

I, I love the colorful clothes he wears
And the way the butterlamps play upon his hair
I hear the sound of a gentle word
On the wind that lifts his incense through the air

Im pickin up good vibrations
hes giving me excitations
Im pickin up good vibrations
(oom bop bop good vibrations)
hes giving me excitations
(oom bop bop excitations)
Good good good good vibrations
(oom bop bop)
hes giving me excitations
(oom bop bop excitations)
Good good good good vibrations
(oom bop bop)
hes giving me excitations
(oom bop bop excitations)

Close my eyes
hes somehow closer now
Softly smile, I know he must be kind
When I look in his eyes
he goes with me to a pure land world

Im pickin up good vibrations
hes giving me excitations
Im pickin up good vibrations
(oom bop bop good vibrations)
hes giving me excitations
(oom bop bop excitations)
Good good good good vibrations
(oom bop bop)
hes giving me excitations
(oom bop bop excitations)
Good good good good vibrations
(oom bop bop)
hes giving me excitations
(oom bop bop excitations)

(ahhhhhhhh)
(ah my my what elation)
I don't know where but he sends me there
(ah my my what a sensation)
(ah my my what elations)
(ah my my what)

Gotta keep those lovin good vibrations
A happenin with him
Gotta keep those lovin good vibrations
A happenin with him
Gotta keep those lovin good vibrations
A happenin

Ahhhhhhhhh
Good good good good vibrations
(oom bop bop)
(Im pickin up good vibrations)
hes giving me excitations
(oom bop bop)
(excitations)
Good good good good vibrations
(oom bop bop)
hes na na...

Na na na na na
Na na na
Na na na na na
Na na na
Do do do do do
Do do do
Do do do do do
Do do do

Author: Malcolm
Date: Wednesday, March 19th, 2014 at 10:43 PM
Title: Re: who is the Greatest master you have ever seen?
Content:
Malcolm wrote:
Who can say one buddha is greater than another?

Author: Malcolm
Date: Wednesday, March 19th, 2014 at 10:35 PM
Title: Re: The Dalai Lama Says Gay Marriage Is OK
Content:

jeeprs said:

Well, I'm afraid I do not concur. I admit, I might be quite mistaken, and I agree that others may hold completely different views to my own. But the issue is, as regards the recognition of 'gay marriage', that I am being compelled to agree. It means that the society of which I am part, no longer recognizes my right to dissent. It is not enough for me to live and let live anymore; I am required to live and applaud. And I'm not going to do that.

mañjughoṣamaṇi said:

Really? The Australian government rounds you all up and marches you down to the pride parade to cheer?

Malcolm wrote:

They do that in Canada too, that's why Jeff left. Rob Ford is the only bastion of conservative values left in Canada, I hope they elect him prime minister soon.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Wednesday, March 19th, 2014 at 10:31 PM
Title: Re: The Dalai Lama Says Gay Marriage Is OK
Content:

greentara said:

Some time ago I remember reading about twenty-six year old (female) lawyer who says, 'I choose to use the name Dean and masculine pronouns. In part this feels right because most people who look at me take me to be woman, so using these words helps to disrupt that process a little and opens a space for me to be something more complicated than that, which I feel better fits who I really am.'

It seems that the idea of identity flux, of being able to be whoever you want, is an essential part of the times we are living in.

The key word here is 'who I really am?'

So really who am I?

Lets dive deep within and look at it from a Buddhist and spiritual perspective, limited identities fail to address the fact that our true identity is limitless.

Malcolm wrote:

We cannot expect them to subscribe to Buddhist ideals.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 19th, 2014 at 10:29 PM

Title: Re: U.S Heruka Chakrasamvra Initiation

Content:

Matticus said:

I just picked up Lama Yeshe's book in which he discusses then 6 Yogas of Naropa.

Before the book starts discussing the various practices the author strongly suggests the reader obtain a proper Heruka Chakrasamvra initiation. Does anyone know of any facilities or teachers that are able to do this in the U.S?

Thanks for your time and have a good evening!

Matt.

Malcolm wrote:

HH Sakya Trizen will give the root empowerment for all Chakrasamvara empowerments (The Luipa tradition) in Vancouver in May. He will give a major Vajrayogini empowerment from the tradition of Laskminkara on April 4th in the US, as well as several other Vajrayogini blessings (Indra, Maitripa, Naropa, Severed Headed) over those days, as well as a Kalacakra empowerment in NYC April 7-8.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 19th, 2014 at 10:23 PM

Title: Re: The Dalai Lama Says Gay Marriage Is OK

Content:

Knotty Veneer said:

So the undermining of unions, ofshoring of manufacturing and globalized competition for wages has had no effect on middleclass incomes or the necessity for both partners in a marriage to go out to work then?

Malcolm wrote:

These are all factors in a competitive liberalized global economy. The alternative is much worse.

The decline of the middle class in the US has resulted in a rise in the middle class in other places such as China, India and Mexico. Such are the tides of the global economy.

You can't plan the economy, you can't "save" the middle class; the most you can do is decide what kinds of activities you are going to restrict, for example, pharmaceuticals as opposed to heroin; legal mining as opposed to unregulated illegal mining (a big problem in India), etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 19th, 2014 at 10:05 PM

Title: Re: The Dalai Lama Says Gay Marriage Is OK

Content:

Knotty Veneer said:

Nonsense. Free market economic policies that favor the superrich at the expense of everyone else have destroyed the middle class and the nuclear family.

Economic policies that rightwing dolts cheerlead for against their own best interests.

Malcolm wrote:

Free market policies created the middle class. Illegal financial speculation in exotic investment instruments have destroyed the middle class. The nuclear family is a socioeconomic myth invented in the fifties; in reality, the "nuclear" family destroyed itself, since two parents are not really capable of adequately raising children on their own.

The raising of children requires many people, the increased social alienation and misery that we see since the fifties is a result of the nuclear family and the decline of the extended family system.

Free markets do not mean unregulated markets. Free markets can and should operate within constraints. But they are the most efficient way of getting goods from place a to b. Planned economies are all nightmares.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 19th, 2014 at 9:55 PM

Title: Re: The Dalai Lama Says Gay Marriage Is OK

Content:

Knotty Veneer said:

More straw men. In which liberalized societies can parents provide consent for minors to marry?

Indrajala said:

It will come. Canada or Britain might be the first countries to allow it for religious purposes.

Malcolm wrote:

In fact parental marriage consent for minors already exists in states like Kentucky and so on has for a very long time, hearkening back to the day when it was not unusual for girls to be married off at 15.

Child betrothal is an Indian custom, and there is nothing anyone can do to prevent two sets of parents from agreeing that their children will become married in any country apart from the children themselves when they come of age. But as India and so on liberalize, these kinds of things will become rarer and rarer. They will not spread to the West.

As for Sharia law, well, it can't ever spread to the US on any level, so this paranoia is just an Alex Jones/Prison Planet non-starter.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 19th, 2014 at 9:48 PM

Title: Re: The Dalai Lama Says Gay Marriage Is OK

Content:

Knotty Veneer said:

Maybe some people should mind their own freakin' business.

Indrajala said:

By that logic we shouldn't halt all manner of private albeit questionable activities, like narcotics consumption for example, because it is none of our business what adults do in the privacy of their own homes.

Some argue that narcotics damage society, hence must be proscribed. Well, some argue gay marriage will damage society, too.

Malcolm wrote:

And some people argue that evolution destroys the moral fabric of society, still argue that equal rights for blacks damages society and so on. Some people will argue anything. This does not mean their arguments are valid or even deserve to be entertained.

In the case of narcotics, the medical evidence is very clear. In the case of gay marriage there is no evidence at all that it will "damage" society, just like the appallingly stupid claim that feminism has destroyed the American family has no evidence.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 19th, 2014 at 9:44 PM

Title: Re: The Dalai Lama Says Gay Marriage Is OK

Content:

Indrajala said:

I have pointed to the fact gay marriage sets a legal precedent that other groups will use for their own claims, which have to be addressed sooner or later.

Malcolm wrote:

And this absurd contention has been dismantled several times.

Indrajala said:

If denying gay marriage = human rights infringement,

Malcolm wrote:

Not human rights, civil rights.

Indrajala said:

...then denying some groups the right to child marriages can also be claimed as a human rights infringement. You can argue this doesn't apply because children can't give consent, but their parents can in fact do so on their behalf, and in any case the trends of increasingly liberalized societies in the west suggest eventually multiculturalism will have to accommodate such alien practices.

Malcolm wrote:

This is no more problematical than denying some groups the right to mutilate the genitals of their female children. Why do we deny such rights? Because the basic right to property is the right to one's body. In a liberalized society, parents do not have rights to their children's bodies. Parents have an obligation to protect the basic rights of their children, by they have no right to violate the right of a child to the integrity of their own bodies except in cases of illnesses where a child may wish to refuse treatments and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 18th, 2014 at 9:08 PM

Title: Re: The Dalai Lama Says Gay Marriage Is OK

Content:

Indrajala said:

Like I said, I'm just being orthodox. I am one of the good guys on this side of the pond.

Malcolm wrote:

No you are not. There is no "orthodoxy" in Buddhism when it comes to marriage.

What you are doing is reinforcing patriarchal values, specifically, a very Christian version of them.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 18th, 2014 at 9:06 PM

Title: Re: The Dalai Lama Says Gay Marriage Is OK

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Sure they do. But in your cynicism, you just don't want to see it.

Indrajala said:

Or perhaps you don't want to admit the failure of your cherished ideology.

Malcolm wrote:

I don't see that there are any failures in the principles of democracy and equal rights; I certainly will allow that the United States has not in every instance lived up to its own rhetoric. Nevertheless, people are more free now in history than they ever have been before, and this I attribute to liberal democracy and free market economics which go hand in hand.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 18th, 2014 at 8:29 PM

Title: Re: The Dalai Lama Says Gay Marriage Is OK

Content:

Indrajala said:

Not at all. If I was born a century or two ago I could have been a globe trotting swashbuckler. Quite easily actually, especially before passport controls were implemented.

Malcolm wrote:

In reality you probably would have never left your county.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 18th, 2014 at 8:29 PM

Title: Re: The Dalai Lama Says Gay Marriage Is OK

Content:

Indrajala said:

In practice your cherished notions of human rights and so on simply don't amount to much.

Malcolm wrote:

Sure they do. But in your cynicism, you just don't want to see it.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 18th, 2014 at 8:25 PM

Title: Re: The Dalai Lama Says Gay Marriage Is OK

Content:

Indrajala said:

Dislike me all you want, but I'm actually quite orthodox.

Malcolm wrote:

Nonsense, Jeff. A political reactionary? Yes. Are your views "orthodox Buddhism" on this score? No.

Buddhism does not and never has concerned itself with marriage as an institution.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 18th, 2014 at 8:24 PM

Title: Re: The Dalai Lama Says Gay Marriage Is OK

Content:

Clarence said:

Add to that the fact that he is representing Buddhism

Malcolm wrote:

He isn't representing Buddhism, he is representing himself. It is important to keep that in mind. The opinions of one junior monk hardly mean anything.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 18th, 2014 at 8:21 PM

Title: Re: The Dalai Lama Says Gay Marriage Is OK

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Actually, Jeff does not believe in rights for anyone, he stated so a few posts back. He does not even believe that he has "equal rights" or "human rights", even though of course his ability to spew the nonsense he has been spewing lately is possible because he has both.

Indrajala said:

You are misrepresenting me again.

I said I don't believe in human rights and equal rights.

This is quite different from saying I "do not believe in rights for anyone".

Malcolm wrote:

The concept of "rights" was predicated on class rights. That proved ineffective, so now we have human and equal rights. There are no other kinds, except for rights granted by licensure, and those are more akin to privileges rather than rights. You remind me of a Virginia cavalier who famously stated "I love liberty, but I hate equality!".

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 18th, 2014 at 8:17 PM

Title: Re: The Dalai Lama Says Gay Marriage Is OK

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Marriage is a govt. sanctioned institution. It confers certain rights onto people who marry (that's why you need a license to do it) to that unmarried people do not enjoy. Since gay people who are in long term committed relationships are denied those same rights as heterosexuals because they are denied the right of marriage, this amounts to civil rights discrimination.

Indrajala said:

Civil rights discrimination as a problem is entirely a subjective opinion. Your point here doesn't make your argument any more rational.

Malcolm wrote:

No, it is not "subjective opinion" — it is judicial opinion at this point in many advanced nations.

Indrajala said:

Secondly, there is no evidence that heterosexual parents are any better at raising children than gay parents.

It hasn't been widespread long enough to make that judgment call yet.

Malcolm wrote:

Sure it has. Gay people have been raising children together forever.

Indrajala said:

No. I've constantly pointed to the fact a legal precedent is set by virtue of sanctioning gay marriage. This can and will be used by fringe groups which many find presently detestable to further their own goals.

Malcolm wrote:

Your qualms are irrational: amounting to "If we allow miscegenation, bestiality must be next!" — you have basically placed gay people on a continuum with pedophiles, and that is really offensive.

Indrajala said:

As I keep noting, there are plenty of civil and well-developed industrial societies like Japan which have neither gay marriage nor overly liberal social policies, and arguably never will in the foreseeable future.

Malcolm wrote:

I think you will be surprised at how quickly this will change in industrialized nations around the world.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 18th, 2014 at 8:08 PM

Title: Re: The Dalai Lama Says Gay Marriage Is OK

Content:

Clarence said:

Actually, it is hateful. And the fact that you say you want what is best for western societies, while arguing against equal rights for gay couples, is truly offensive.

Malcolm wrote:

Actually, Jeff does not believe in rights for anyone, he stated so a few posts back. He does not even believe that he has "equal rights" or "human rights", even though of course his ability to spew the nonsense he has been spewing lately is possible because he has both.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 18th, 2014 at 8:04 PM

Title: Re: The Dalai Lama Says Gay Marriage Is OK

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

On this score, you are being an idiot.

Indrajala said:

This is just an insult and hardly contributes to the discussion.

Malcolm wrote:

You may feel insulted, I think you have left your senses on this one. Where you normally are clear headed and rational, I think you are being an idiot on this issue. So be insulted. I not only am allowed to think you are being an idiot, I am even allowed to say so. When you stop being an idiot, I will stop thinking you are being one, and addressing you as such, i.e., when you have returned to your senses.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 18th, 2014 at 8:03 PM

Title: Re: The Dalai Lama Says Gay Marriage Is OK

Content:

Indrajala said:

It deviates from historical norms to the point of being extreme and unprecedented.

Malcolm wrote:

This is total nonsense. As has been pointed out there are no historical norms when it comes to "marriage" and "families" across the broad swath of humanity.

But gay marriage is a natural out growth of the type of democracy we have in the west, it is a civil rights issue, and it naturally flows from the civil rights movement (which of course you don't believe in, since you don't believe in rights).

In this case you are just pissing against the wind, and like all people who piss against the wind, you only soil your own clothes.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 18th, 2014 at 7:59 PM

Title: Re: The Dalai Lama Says Gay Marriage Is OK

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Like all bigots, you have no rational basis for your claims. You might as well be saying that christians should not marry jews.

Indrajala said:

If this were so, what rational basis is there for claiming same sex couples should be able to marry?

If we are all just basing our arguments on our feelings and opinions, then nobody can claim a rational basis.

Malcolm wrote:

I have explained this already -- so, I will explain it again.

Marriage is a govt. sanctioned institution. It confers certain rights onto people who marry (that's why you need a license to do it) to that unmarried people do not enjoy. Since gay people who are in long term committed relationships are denied those same rights as heterosexuals because they are denied the right of marriage, this amounts to civil rights discrimination.

Since you have famously declared you don't believe in "rights" (though why a Canadian monk imagines he will be invited into the elite to help rule the world is beyond anyone's imagination), I imagine that this point will, as it has in the past, fall on deaf ears.

Secondly, there is no evidence that heterosexual parents are any better at raising children than gay parents. So there is no reason to deny gay men and women the right to raise children (in fact same sex oriented people have been raising children for as long as there has been humans, apparently to no ill effect).

So in the end, your arguments against gay marriage are biased and irrational, which is why they make you a bigot in this respect. Certainly, you can find a sanctuary safe from gay marriage in Uganda or Kenya where they routinely slaughter people for their gender preference, but I don't think you really want to live in such countries where they will probably mistake you for being gay as well.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 18th, 2014 at 7:47 PM

Title: Re: The Dalai Lama Says Gay Marriage Is OK

Content:

Indrajala said:

Nevertheless, I still believe sanctioning homosexual marriages is ultimately unwise for a number of reasons which I've outlined at length already.

Seishin said:

I'm still vague as to why it's against the cosmos?

Indrajala said:

There are principles in time and the cosmos that must be considered, observed and followed lest you suffer for it. In the absence of historical norms for a given policy reform, you are basically deviating from all previous norms. Disregarding such a fact is critically unwise.

Malcolm wrote:

Didn't you know? "Marriage is between one man and one woman" was actually etched into the fabric of the universe. We erase this at our peril. Gay marriage is apparently going to cause the entire fabric of the universe to unwind, it makes peak oil look like a stroll in the park.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 18th, 2014 at 7:17 PM

Title: Re: The Dalai Lama Says Gay Marriage Is OK

Content:

Knotty Veneer said:

I think that many of those who oppose marriage equality live in a bubble where they do not know any gay families. I too know a lesbian couple with kids. Their family is no different in its joys and challenges to that of any straight couple I know.

Indrajala said:

I have friends who are gay or lesbian. One is happily (and legally) married.

Nevertheless, I still believe sanctioning homosexual marriages is ultimately unwise for a number of reasons which I've outlined at length already.

I have nothing against homosexuality. I just feel it unwise to provide marriage rights to same sex couples.

For the record, I will note, I don't believe in human rights or equal rights. I understand these are sacred cows to many people here, but I don't see them as such.

Human rights are often used by some countries to bully their opponents before committing the same sins they accuse others of. Just look at the USA. It cries out about human rights violations, yet American leadership has slain immeasurable civilians in recent decades, often on false intelligence.

I also don't believe in equal rights for the simple fact that, as in nature, there is hierarchy in human society and clearly not everyone is equal in terms of intellect, power and so on. I think trying to superimpose "equality" on any society is an artificial albeit hopeful attempt at crafting an ultimately infeasible utopia. In actual practice there never are equal rights. Better to recognize this rather than pretend otherwise. Also, empowering the majority of a given population is unwise as it leads to dispersion of political authority, thereby leading to political deadlock. Polybius discusses this at length.

Malcolm wrote:

You clearly have no idea what equal rights are. As soon as you lose yours, you will want them back.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 18th, 2014 at 7:13 PM

Title: Re: The Dalai Lama Says Gay Marriage Is OK

Content:

Simon E. said:

I think your thinking on this issue is poorly formed and curiously immature, as well as lacking empathy and compassion Indrajala.

But I think you have the right to express it.

Malcolm wrote:

Sure, has a total right to make himself look like an idiot. Maybe he can get a gig as fox news pet buddhist monk.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 18th, 2014 at 7:08 PM

Title: Re: The Dalai Lama Says Gay Marriage Is OK

Content:

Clarence said:

Yes, Knotty, I find Indrajala's comments rather hateful and ignorant. And, truth be told, I don't know whether I agree with providing him a platform for his hate-speech.

Indrajala said:

It is not hate speech nor is it hateful. I want what is best for western societies, and I feel the state sanctioning same sex marriages will lead to many unnecessary problems down the road.

If you disagree with me, fine, but no need to advocate censorship of opinions you find disagreeable.

Malcolm wrote:

You are advocating repression, that is why people find your speech hateful.

Like all bigots, you have no rational basis for your claims. You might as well be saying that Christians should not marry Jews.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 18th, 2014 at 10:17 AM

Title: Re: The Dalai Lama Says Gay Marriage Is OK

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

What they think has no bearing on western secular morals. This is not a religious question, it is a social and civil rights question.

Indrajala said:

Buddhists are still nevertheless a voice in the development of social policies, and most Buddhists are still Asian.

Malcolm wrote:

And that is completely irrelevant in the West.

Indrajala said:

A religious voice still has the right to be heard even in secular society, assuming of course that society is democratic.

Malcolm wrote:

A right to speak is not a right to be heard.

Buddhists in the West play virtually no role in the development of social policies.

To the extent that they do so, we are well represented by enlightened leaders like His Holiness.

Enjoy your bastions of reactionary conservatism, but they too will undergo transformation as the forces of market liberalization inevitably change their cultures from social authoritarianism and conformism to democracy, individualism and personal choice. It is funny, your ability to choose to become a monk is based on your being raised in a liberal free market society, but you instead choose anti-democratic, authoritarian elitism.

The funny thing about US conservatism is that the very thing that they proclaim to love the most (free markets) is the very thing that is bringing on the social changes they most detest (gay marriage, etc.).

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 18th, 2014 at 9:44 AM

Title: Re: The Dalai Lama Says Gay Marriage Is OK

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

It is the same with abortion. Since arguments against abortion are all grounded on religious issues, and we have no right to legislate those types of religious beliefs, while I personally do not believe abortion is ethical, I understand that my belief is religious and is not a sound reason to deny others who have different beliefs than myself.

Indrajala said:

Your view here is highly problematic. You could just as well argue against abortion in the same way you could argue against corporal punishment for children: it is intentionally harming a living human being.

Malcolm wrote:

My view is not problematical at all. Courts in the US have defined that human life begins at 19 weeks. I don't agree with them, but we live in a secular society, and there are many people who for their own reasons also adopt this view. Since my view is religious, and it cannot be shown that a fetus prior to 19 weeks is "human" under current law, my hands are tied, as are yours. The standard in a secular society is secular, not religious. I prefer to live in a secular society, even though it may disadvantage some of my personal religious views, in general it assures the freedom that I can practice my religion as I see fit.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 18th, 2014 at 9:29 AM

Title: Re: The Dalai Lama Says Gay Marriage Is OK

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Your concerns are not about Asian Buddhist communities, you declared they were about western societies. As such, they are outlandish and out of touch.

Indrajala said:

So, what Asian Buddhist communities might think is not relevant to Buddhists in western society?

Malcolm wrote:

What they think has no bearing on western secular morays. This is not a religious question, it is a social and civil rights question. It is the same with abortion. Since arguments against abortion are all grounded on religious issues, and we have no right to legislate those types of religious beliefs, while I personally do not believe abortion is ethical, I understand that my belief is religious and is not a sound reason to deny others who have different beliefs than myself.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 18th, 2014 at 9:25 AM

Title: Re: The Dalai Lama Says Gay Marriage Is OK

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Your "concerns" about gay marriage could be construed in a number of ways, because they are so outlandish and out of touch.

Indrajala said:

What I would say on the subject would be considered quite reasonable and common sense in Asian Buddhist communities.

Malcolm wrote:

Your concerns are not about Asian Buddhist communities, you declared they were about western societies. As such, they are outlandish and out of touch.

In short, there is no morally defensible reason that a state should bar gay people from being married. As long as states are in the business of licensing marriages, I am quite sure that western countries will continue to legalize marriage for gay men and women, as they should.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 18th, 2014 at 9:24 AM

Title: Re: The Dalai Lama Says Gay Marriage Is OK

Content:

Indrajala said:

However, marriage was still understood as between men and women with the goal of producing children.

Malcolm wrote:

As pointed out, then infertile woman and sterile men should be barred from entering the social contract of marriage.

In reality, marriage is not purely about raising children. It is a social contract between two adults who wish to foster and protect each other.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 18th, 2014 at 9:22 AM

Title: Re: The Dalai Lama Says Gay Marriage Is OK

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

homophobia, like anti-semitism, is a pretty reliable marker for incipient or full-blown mental illness, or at least untreatable mental retardation.

Indrajala said:

So, instead of addressing people's genuine concerns you just write them off as signs of mental illness?

Malcolm wrote:

Your "concerns" about gay marriage could be construed in a number of ways, because they are so outlandish and out of touch.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 18th, 2014 at 9:20 AM

Title: Re: The Dalai Lama Says Gay Marriage Is OK

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Just more proof that celibate clergy have nothing useful to say about how the rest of us live, in general.

Indrajala said:

By this logic, the Buddha had nothing useful to say about how to live. He indeed told people in detail how to live their lives for the best.

Malcolm wrote:

I qualified it, with an "in general". And you are not the Buddha.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 18th, 2014 at 5:46 AM

Title: Re: Connection of Guru Rinpoche and Marpa the Translator

Content:

dzoki said:

Gampopa was also originally a nyingma practitioner

Berry said:

Gampopa was a doctor and then a Kadampa monk before meeting Milarepa.

<https://www.kagyu.org/kagyulineage/lineage/kag06.php>

.

Malcolm wrote:

As a young man, Gampopa was a Nyingma practitioner; he became a monk because of the death of his wife.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 18th, 2014 at 5:42 AM

Title: Re: The Dalai Lama Says Gay Marriage Is OK

Content:

Lhug-Pa said:

Doesn't change the fact that white-supremacist-influenced western governments & Zionist-influenced governments have had a penchant for bombing Semites and other melanated people. Plus we couldn't say that there isn't a significant Semitic or mixed-Semitic population within Pakistan and Afghanistan.

Malcolm wrote:

Zionists (Israelis) are Semites.

The US government is hardly "white supremacist". We have a black president, for lord's sake.

And no, the Afghanis and Pashtuns, etc., are not significantly mixed with people of Arabic heritage.

I am afraid you have some very racist ideas.

Anyway, this is off topic.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 18th, 2014 at 5:20 AM

Title: Re: Self-Immolation: an anti-Buddhist practice?

Content:

conebeckham said:

I don't dispute that it CAN be a "Buddhist act." I'm just not sure each individual immolation is a Buddhist Act. Would be hard to know that, in any case....

As for it "working," I myself am not so sure. For the sake of Tibetans, I hope so. Out here in California, though, two towns or cities were considering flying the PRC flag --and were shocked by the volume of "hate mail" they got by Pro-Tibetan/Anti-PRC people. If the "Powers that Be" in the Bay Area don't seem to be "in the loop," not sure.....

Malcolm wrote:

Well, they were probably smoking too much herb and forgot...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 18th, 2014 at 5:19 AM

Title: Re: The Dalai Lama Says Gay Marriage Is OK

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

...anti-semitism, is a pretty reliable marker for incipient or full-blown mental illness, or at least untreatable mental retardation.

Lhug-Pa said:

Yes there are very many mentally ill anti-Semites in the west, seeing how the west likes to repeatedly bomb Semites e.g. Iraqis, Pakistanis, Afghanis, Palestinians, etc.

Malcolm wrote:

Pakistanis and Afghanis are not semitic peoples.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 18th, 2014 at 3:32 AM

Title: Re: The Dalai Lama Says Gay Marriage Is OK

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

...where Assad started using them against his own folks

Lhug-Pa said:

How so/in what way?

Malcolm wrote:

By gassing them...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 18th, 2014 at 3:28 AM

Title: Re: The Dalai Lama Says Gay Marriage Is OK

Content:

Lhug-Pa said:

Malcolm,

While I'm interested in learning more about the apparent oppression of Kurdish Yezidis, I'm not so quick to buy everything about Saddam Hussein supposedly "gassing the Kurds". If he did gas them and/or in the way they say he did, then I'm certainly against it. It's just that we would have to look at it more before jumping to conclusions. It looks like "Assad gassing his own people" and "Yanukovich sniping his own people" turned out to be BS; and they never found Iraq's "weapons of mass destruction" so that makes most of the rest of the west's allegations very questionable.

Malcolm wrote:

That is because Hussein moved them to Syria, where Assad started using them against his own folks.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 18th, 2014 at 2:33 AM

Title: Re: Self-Immolation: an anti-Buddhist practice?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

I don't think that the self-immolations are happening, in general, because of aversion. They are happening because of the Mahāyāna ethics these young men and woman are trained under.

It is not like the suicide bombings, which are, where they occur, part of a calculated plan of terror. These are not terrorist acts in any sense.

conebeckham said:

I agree they're not terrorist acts. But I question whether Mahayana ethics, or emotional frustration, are the cause.

How can we say what the motivation is?

As I mentioned earlier in this thread, I've spent a fair amount of time with younger Tibetans...I sense frustration, anger, and a host of emotions. I can't say these are the drivers for the monks who have self-immolated, but....I've spent time with young Tibetan monks as well, and I see the same emotions in them, when Tibetan political issues are raised.

Malcolm wrote:

But not all the immolations are by young Tibetans. Many were in their thirties, even forties. There are 24 who were under 18.

I am not saying the motivations of all are the same. But I am saying that we cannot condemn them as terrorists, nor should we understand their acts as violating Mahāyāna buddhist ethics since ample sources for "offering the body" can be found in those sources. Remember, Karma Chagme offered his thumb as a lamp. The act of self-immolation, as near as I can tell, is meant to dramatically shine a lamp on the plight of Tibetans in the TAR and outside it. I think it is working.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 18th, 2014 at 2:25 AM

Title: Re: The Dalai Lama Says Gay Marriage Is OK

Content:

mañjughoṣamaṇi said:

Jeff,

You seem to be alternating between the notions of "history" and "nature" as your explanatory mechanisms for why gay marriage is supposed to be so dangerous. These two are not equivalent. History is rooted in any number of contingencies, and not all societies evolved an institution of marriage that is anything like that of the West in terms of a nuclear family. In many societies the role of biological father is negligible. In many societies divorce was acceptable and recognition of which could amount to as little as throwing a man's belongings out of the dwelling or a public statement to that effect. This brings us to the next point, which is that any notion of what is natural is quite contentious. Is the nuclear family the natural way of raising children? Is the traditional Mayan way of children being the primary caregivers of children natural? Is the Trobriander way of mother's brother being the most important educator of children instead of the biological father unnatural? Your readings have provided you with a focus on state level societies. Are states natural or historically contingent?

You really ought to brush up on the kinship literature from the past 40 years.

Malcolm wrote:

Just more proof that celibate clergy have nothing useful to say about how the rest of us live, in general.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 18th, 2014 at 2:22 AM

Title: Re: The Dalai Lama Says Gay Marriage Is OK

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

That just simply isn't true. You clearly have not studied this issue with any care.

<https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Two-Spirit>

Allan Tulchin, "Same-Sex Couples Creating Households in Old Regime France: The Uses of the Affrèment." Journal of Modern History: September 2007

You really are just broadcasting Christian values.

Indrajala said:

Not exactly gay marriage as it is understood now.

I am not broadcasting Christian values. Good luck finding sufficient numbers of Buddhists and Buddhist clergy in Asia who will actively support gay marriage in their countries.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, you are broadcasting Christian values.

Marriage is exactly about creating households, sharing property and raising children. Gay people do so just as effectively/or not as heterosexual people. Making gay marriage legal means recognizing that all people have the right to make households regardless of their gender orientation. There is nothing magical about dicks and pussies in combination that makes heterosexual people better parents than dicks and dicks or pussies and pussies. To suggest that parenting ability boils down to some magical social recipe about "MArriage is between one man and one women" is backwards redneck thinking.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 18th, 2014 at 2:14 AM

Title: Re: The Dalai Lama Says Gay Marriage Is OK

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Gay marriage is hardly a "cosmic" issue. It is simply a civil rights issue.

Indrajala said:

It is a deviation from all historical norms.

.

Malcolm wrote:

That just simply isn't true. You clearly have not studied this issue with any care.

<https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Two-Spirit>

Allan Tulchin, "Same-Sex Couples Creating Households in Old Regime France: The Uses of the Affrèment." Journal of Modern History: September 2007

The political ideologies, philosophies, and religions of ancient China regarded homosexual relationships as a normal facet of life, and in some cases, promoted homosexual relationships as exemplary. Ming Dynasty literature, such as Bian Er Chai (弁而釵/弁而钗), portray homosexual relationships between men as more enjoyable and more "harmonious" than heterosexual relationships.[10] As in Ancient Rome, homosexual relationships were prevalent in ancient China and were not regarded as morally deviant prior to the influence of foreign cultures. Writings from the Liu Song Dynasty claimed that homosexuality was as common as heterosexuality in the late 3rd century:

All the gentlemen and officials esteemed it. All men in the realm followed this fashion to the extent that husbands and wives were estranged. Resentful unmarried women became jealous.[1]

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Homosexuality\_in\_China#cite\_ref-Cut\_Sleeve\_1992\_p.\_170\_2-0

You really are just broadcasting Christian values.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 18th, 2014 at 2:06 AM

Title: Re: The Dalai Lama Says Gay Marriage Is OK

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

You are not Asian and you never will be: you are hairy, uncouth, and you smell bad.

Indrajala said:

I was unaware you've been sneaking into my bedroom at night and thus know the state of my body odour and body hair!

Malcolm wrote:

No, I look at your face book page. Anyway, my point is that while you may fantasize about being "Asian" (as if there is a generic "Asian"), you will never be accepted as anything other than Westerner with pretensions. Being a monk might make it a little easier for you. But for all that in Japan you will still be Gaijin.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 18th, 2014 at 2:03 AM

Title: Re: The Dalai Lama Says Gay Marriage Is OK

Content:

Indrajala said:

There are principles in time and the cosmos that must be considered, observed and followed lest you suffer for it.

Malcolm wrote:

Gay marriage hardly something that so contravenes the cosmic order as to cause a breach in the space/time continuum.

Gay marriage is hardly a "cosmic" issue. It is simply a civil rights issue.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 18th, 2014 at 2:02 AM

Title: Re: The Dalai Lama Says Gay Marriage Is OK

Content:

Seishin said:

And most of those "non-western" societies are ruled by dictators

Lhug-Pa said:

As if the western leaders are shining examples of justice and morality? Yea right.

Indrajala said:

That's actually a good point. Plenty of people lament a lack of gay marriage rights, yet still pay taxes to their government which routinely murders civilians in foreign countries.

Malcolm wrote:

We have too. Just because we don't condone the acts of this of that branche of our government does not mean that we are free not to pay taxes. It is a legal requirement than we must.

Indrajala said:

Meanwhile countries that mind their own business usually while also dismissing any idea of gay marriage are damned as dictatorships or simply dismissed as not worthy of consideration.

Malcolm wrote:

Oh, like Russia, for example?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 18th, 2014 at 1:59 AM

Title: Re: The Dalai Lama Says Gay Marriage Is OK

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

You are not Asian, you are a Canadian.

Indrajala said:

That's just what my passport says.

Malcolm wrote:

You are not Asian and you never will be: you are hairy, uncouth, and you smell bad.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 18th, 2014 at 1:55 AM

Title: Re: The Dalai Lama Says Gay Marriage Is OK

Content:

Lhug-Pa said:

\\

As Indrajala said Iraq was a functioning country

Malcolm wrote:

If gassing Kurds and terrorism is your idea of "functioning".

Lhug-Pa said:

Libya was a functioning country

Malcolm wrote:

Sure...

Lhug-Pa said:

At least Putin apparently stopped the west from murdering the "evil dictator" Assad.

Malcolm wrote:

Oh yes, another very stable person, not a psychopath at all....

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 18th, 2014 at 1:53 AM

Title: Re: The Dalai Lama Says Gay Marriage Is OK

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Your penchant for authoritarianism has been noted already.

That hardly makes you a conservative.

Indrajala said:

Maybe not in America.

I'm in Asia.

Malcolm wrote:

You are not Asian, you are a Canadian.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 18th, 2014 at 1:33 AM

Title: Re: The Dalai Lama Says Gay Marriage Is OK

Content:

Seishin said:

And most of those "non-western" societies are ruled by dictators - no coincidence.

Indrajala said:

I would rather live in a safe autocratic state than an unsafe democracy.

Malcolm wrote:

Your penchant for authoritarianism has been noted already.

That hardly makes you a conservative.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 18th, 2014 at 1:26 AM

Title: Re: The Dalai Lama Says Gay Marriage Is OK

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

You can make an argument against the propagation of Buddhism too. Buddhism will cause the degradation of social cohesion in say, "florida". Therefore, it should not be allowed there.

Indrajala said:

The introduction of a foreign religion on a small scale is hardly comparable to unprecedented legal reforms that most people will feel strongly about one way or another.

Malcolm wrote:

Plain and simple -- denying adult gay people to right to marry each other is violation of their civil rights because it causes all kinds of inequalities and because it unfairly advantages heterosexual couples.

Marriage is a social contract between two people to share property, inheritance, taxes, etc.

There are no sound secular reasons not to oppose marriage among, none at all. You have not come up with even one convincing argument.

There are no reasons at all to oppose gay marriage from a Buddhist perspective.

The only reasons to oppose it is because one subscribes to Judeo-Christian/Islamic values.

By even bring up opposition to the subject, you just make yourself look like an anachronistic idiot.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 18th, 2014 at 1:12 AM

Title: Re: The Dalai Lama Says Gay Marriage Is OK

Content:

Indrajala said:

In the coming decades as the west declines...

Malcolm wrote:

Probably not.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 18th, 2014 at 1:11 AM

Title: Re: The Dalai Lama Says Gay Marriage Is OK

Content:

Indrajala said:

It is different in the case of bodhisattva-oriented approaches which require one to actively engage in society for the welfare of it.

Seishin said:

And in what way will homosexual marriage degrade the welfare of society? Help me out here because I really can't see anything wrong with it.

Indrajala said:

One example is how it will draw lines between those who support and oppose it, thus degrading asabiya (social cohesion needed for unity and cooperation).

Malcolm wrote:

So if most everyone supports it, there is no degradation of social cohesion, correct?

You can make an argument against the propagation of Buddhism too. Buddhism will cause the degradation of social cohesion in say, "florida". Therefore, it should not be allowed there.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 18th, 2014 at 12:50 AM

Title: Re: The Dalai Lama Says Gay Marriage Is OK

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

and pedophilia...

Indrajala said:

The solution to that is simple: only admit adults of their own free will into monasteries.

Malcolm wrote:

But "celibate" priests who are pedophiles prey on children in their congregations, not on children in monasteries...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 18th, 2014 at 12:49 AM

Title: Re: The Dalai Lama Says Gay Marriage Is OK

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Religious professionals generally make it their job to do so. Becoming a religious professional has about the lowest entry requirements of any job there is. Even flipping burgers takes more skill.

Indrajala said:

If that's a personal attack against me, well, I'll send anyone my CV who wants to see it.

Malcolm wrote:

My point is that having a religious opinion takes no brains or particular set of skills, and it is religious professionals who typically have the most to say on such issues, who are actually often the least qualified to do so. My point is that by adopting such platforms, you are just painting yourself in with a lot of very stupid people.

I don't think Buddhist monks have any business being in the "who can marry who" business. There are no Buddhist wedding rituals, etc. There is no sustained support of heterosexual marriage in Buddhist texts, no condemnation of homosexuality (just orifices), and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 18th, 2014 at 12:43 AM

Title: Re: The Dalai Lama Says Gay Marriage Is OK

Content:

Indrajala said:

Historically having celibate monastic orders has worked well on varying levels, particularly with respect to inheritance and the transfer of land assets especially...

Malcolm wrote:

and pedophilia...

Author: Malcolm
Date: Tuesday, March 18th, 2014 at 12:37 AM
Title: Re: The Dalai Lama Says Gay Marriage Is OK
Content:

Knotty Veneer said:
Stop trying to tell other people how to live.

Malcolm wrote:
Religious professionals generally make it their job to do so. Becoming a religious professional has about the lowest entry requirements of any job there is. Even flipping burgers takes more skill.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Tuesday, March 18th, 2014 at 12:36 AM
Title: Re: The Dalai Lama Says Gay Marriage Is OK
Content:

Indrajala said:
Homosexual marriage is seen as undesirable by many people, yet they keep silent for fear of being condemned for their opinions.

Malcolm wrote:
Yes, many religious people fear the idea out of superstition.

It is of course a stupid thing to fear.

Indrajala said:
Japan and China are very secular societies nowadays, but don't have any inclination towards gay marriage.

There plenty of non-religious people in the west as well who are not keen on the idea.

Malcolm wrote:
They have nothing to lose but their bias.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Tuesday, March 18th, 2014 at 12:30 AM
Title: Re: Self-Immolation: an anti-Buddhist practice?
Content:

Simon E. said:
Again I disagree.
Attempting to force a change of behaviour from a political entity or an individual by threatening to kill oneself in a particularly horrible way is I believe an act of terrorism, even when we agree with the aims of the actor.

Malcolm wrote:

I don't think they are making threats, Simon. It is not like these people write a letter and say "This is my list of demands", etc.

I don't think it is terrorism at all. I think it is the opposite, it is a response to terrorism.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 18th, 2014 at 12:28 AM

Title: Re: The Dalai Lama Says Gay Marriage Is OK

Content:

Indrajala said:

Homosexual marriage is seen as undesirable by many people, yet they keep silent for fear of being condemned for their opinions.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, many religious people fear the idea out of superstition.

It is of course a stupid thing to fear.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 18th, 2014 at 12:26 AM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

Andrew108 said:

" Everything is unreal "

-- Chogyal Namkhai Norbu

You have 'everything' - reality. Then you have the nature of that everything - unreal.

This is the simple point that is being made.

Malcolm wrote:

No, that is not the point that is being made.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 18th, 2014 at 12:23 AM

Title: Re: The Dalai Lama Says Gay Marriage Is OK

Content:

Indrajala said:

One other fact about gay marriage that is overlooked is that it will divide a lot of countries and reduce asabiya (i.e., social cohesion) at a time when the west is faltering and facing enormous problems.

Malcolm wrote:

Total nonsense. Anyway, you are a monk. What do you really care?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 18th, 2014 at 12:22 AM

Title: Re: The Dalai Lama Says Gay Marriage Is OK

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

That's because there is no such a thing as a "traditional family". This is a Western Christian suburban white myth.

Indrajala said:

Nonsense.

In my grandfather's generation most families were made up of a married man and wife plus their children. His father's generation was more or less the same.

Malcolm wrote:

Yup, white Christians in the west.

Indrajala said:

Well there's a generalization bordering on being bigoted.

Malcolm wrote:

Seen it in person, Japan, China etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 17th, 2014 at 11:15 PM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

Andrew108 said:

So that reality that appears, when it's nature is known, is the accomplishment. Wisdom and reality in the end are not different.

Malcolm wrote:

Agreed, so why are neither of us Buddhas?

Because we may have an intellectual grasp of the subject, but we are not realized. So we both have some work to do, at least I do.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 17th, 2014 at 11:11 PM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

Andrew108 said:

I would speculate that whilst you might know alot about the mind, you don't really know that much about life.

Malcolm wrote:

You do realize that you constantly resort to ad hominem remarks?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 17th, 2014 at 10:37 PM

Title: Re: The Dalai Lama Says Gay Marriage Is OK

Content:

Knotty Veneer said:

There is a growing acceptance in the population at large of homosexual relationships and non-traditional families.

Indrajala said:

In many places there is growing intolerance of advocates for traditional families and conservative values.

Malcolm wrote:

That's because there is no such a thing as a "traditional family". This is a Western Christian suburban white myth.

Indrajala said:

As jeeprs noted, homophobic is basically equated to being bigoted nowadays. If you voice opposition to gay marriage, you're sometimes associated with racism and even slavery because you are denying "equal rights" to all persons, just as racist social arrangements and slavery does/did. Fortunately in most Asian countries such ideas have not gained much mainstream attention or consideration.

Malcolm wrote:

Asian countries are often quite racist.

Indrajala said:

If you legalize gay marriage because its advocates claim there is a human rights infringement occurring, then it sets a legal precedent for many other fringe groups to do the same whether you want to admit this immediately or not.

Malcolm wrote:

No, it doesn't. But on other hand, I see no problem with polyandry, polygamy and so on.

Indrajala said:

I do not equate homosexuality to pedophilia (I have nothing against homosexuality itself), but what is to stop pedophiles from claiming a human rights infringement based on the fact their lifestyle is presently criminal?

Malcolm wrote:

They can claim whatever they like, but in general, it is considered criminal to have sex with children and minors. I don't see this changing any time soon.

[/quote]

So, on that point, sticking with good old fashioned heterosexual values ain't so bad. They might be unfair to some people, but longstanding social values have the advantage of having been demonstratively effective, past and present.[/quote]

Right, good old fashioned western Christian heterosexual values.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 17th, 2014 at 10:07 PM

Title: Re: Self-Immolation: an anti-Buddhist practice?

Content:

Simon E. said:

I disagree completely Malcolm. I think its an expression of a pathology which forms part of the complex web that is the legacy of the Subcontinent. I think fear of sex is part of that legacy, as more distantly are suicide bombings.

Burning yourself to death because of aversion to what is, is a greater act of aggression than becoming a Muslim martyr, because more subtle and more capable of provoking moral ambivalence.

Or so it seems to me.

Malcolm wrote:

Tibetans are hardly afraid of sex. In fact, they are rather more practical about it then we are.

I don't think that the self-immolations are happening, in general, because of aversion. They are happening because of the Mahāyāna ethics these young men and woman are trained under.

It is not like the suicide bombings, which are, where they occur, part of a calculated plan of terror. These are not terrorist acts in any sense.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 17th, 2014 at 9:43 PM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

alpha said:

But still , the basis is individual for each condition ,whether we speak of humans, hungry ghosts, formless or such...And each respective condition represents in its totality the basis of that particular condition.

Malcolm wrote:

The basis represents the potentiality of each sentient being. That potentiality can be parsed a number of ways — for example, in Dzogchen texts it says "At the time of the basis, the three kāyas are dharmakāya; at the time of the path, the three kāyas are the sambhogakāya, and the time of the result, the three kāyas are the nirmanakāya". The essential point here is that the the continuum of the basis is the nature of the mind free from extremes.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 17th, 2014 at 9:38 PM

Title: Re: Self-Immolation: an anti-Buddhist practice?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Cabazon wrote a good and thoughtful article on the subject:

http://www.religiondispatches.org/archive/politics/7126/on\_the\_ethics\_of\_the\_tibetan\_self\_immolations\_/

Personally, when it first began happening I thought it fruitless and sad. Now, over the years, I have come to see that this form of protest is much superior to violent protest around the world. It is still sad, but I think that such acts being done out of love and caring for Dharma, and not just because Tibetans are being oppressed. Indeed, the whole phenomena is grounded in the notions of offering one's body for the sake of the enlightenment of others. In the article Cabazon recalls several examples, not least among them, the Buddha's own sacrifice of his body at Namo Buddha during his last human lifetime as the bodhisattva. He quotes a one writer, Jigmey who was sentenced to five years for publishing the following:

The Beijing government claims that the act of self-cremation, or the burning of one's body, contradicts the Buddhist texts, but this is a confused position. According to Buddhism, giving up one's life for the welfare of others is an act of a bodhisattva. One can know this from the biography of the compassionate Buddha himself. Before he was enlightened, the future Buddha came across a tigress and her cubs. They were on the verge of starving to death. Unable to bear their suffering, he sacrificed his own body as food for the tigress. That act of protecting the life of the tigress and her two cubs by giving up his own life is the central theme of many contemporary religious writings; it is widely known. When one reaches the highest level of Mahāyāna practice—that of “the being of great scope”—one is able to give up everything one possesses for the welfare of sentient beings. For example, if it is necessary, one is able to spend many hundreds of millions of years in hell just for the sake of a single sentient being... For all of these reasons giving up one’s own life for the sake of sentient beings or for the sake of one’s own people does not contradict the Buddhist teachings. Not only does it not contradict them, it is actually a tenet of the Mahāyāna; it is a most excellent doctrine. Hence, no one who is informed about these matters would claim that it contradicts Buddhism—no one, that is, except confused government officials and their lackeys.

Of course some will debate the effectiveness of such actions from a cynical real politick perspective, but in my view, the actions of bodhisattvas grounded in Mahāyāna motivation will always outshine such cynicism.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 17th, 2014 at 9:21 PM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

So formless realm beings have a body, speech and mind?

alpha said:

Obviously not but I thought we are talking about the basis of the human condition ?

Malcolm wrote:

No, the continuum of the basis is talking about the basis of all sentient beings, not just human beings.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 17th, 2014 at 9:21 PM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

Sherab said:

I am saying every one of us has a base. All the bases are identical to one another.

Although each base has a knowing aspect, I prefer not to use the word 'mind' to refer to the base.

Malcolm wrote:

As I pointed, all of this language concerning "the basis" comes from a passage in the Guhyasamaja uttaratantra. The continuum of the basis, since this is the reference, refers to the nature of the mind, which when recognized leads to buddhahood and when not, leads to samsara.

People get so hung up on the use of the word mind, consciousness and so on. Well, just look at these words: shes pa (jñā), rnam shes (vijñāna), shes rab (prajñā) and ye shes (jñāna). What do they all have in common? "shes". "Shes" just means "to know". If you say the basis is ye shes, that wisdom is a knower.

In any case, the commentary of the sgra thal 'gyur clearly maintains that ye shes is encompassed by a shes pa, and that shes pa exists individually in all buddhas and sentient beings as a mere knower (shes tsam).

We can conclude from this then that the basis (which really is strictly a man ngag sde term) is just a name for the continuum of the nature of the mind.

The extent to which it is unconditioned is the extent to which no one made the mind "clear and empty", the mind has been clear and empty from the very start. Thus the resting in the unfabricated mind, the unconditioned mind, is resting in that nature of the mind (inseparable clarity and emptiness) which cannot be altered or modified in anyway at all no matter what appears in it/to it(hence the mirror metaphor). You can't make it better, you can't make it worse.

We say that the nature of the mind in this sense is unconditioned because no one made it, it does not have a beginning, it cannot be altered or changed. You cannot take the clarity of the mind and make it unclear. You cannot take the emptiness of the mind and make the mind substantial.

The mind can have various experiences, suffering, happiness, affliction, purification, thus we can also say that the mind is conditioned. It is also momentary, its continuity is not substantial, it is a continuum of moments, thus it is conditioned.

Once again, we have a conditioned entity, dharmin, the mind, that has an unconditioned nature, dharmatā, the inseparability of clarity and emptiness.

The mind is not merely clear, for then it would be only conditioned. It is not merely empty, since then it would be non-existent. The unconditioned nature of the mind is the inseparability of clarity and emptiness. There is no teaching in Buddhism about the mind and the nature of the mind that goes beyond this.

When we understand the principles above, we understand the union of the two truths, we understand the continuum of the basis, Dzogchen, etc.

When it comes to Dzogchen teachings, it is crucial to understand that the differences between wisdom, shes pa and rnam shes, for example, are all based on the anatomy of the human body, and the modalities of our consciousness as embodied beings.

If we say that wisdom, for example, is beyond mind, does that mean that wisdom is inert, like a rock or a statue? No, it just means that wisdom transcends the operations of the restricted consciousness of ordinary beings, wisdom is a consciousness that has less restrictions. What is the basis for the freedom of wisdom? The pure clarity and emptiness of the mind, of course.

We do not have a refined vocabulary in English for discussing consciousness and its different modalities. But indeed, that is what Dzogchen as well Buddhist texts in general are talking about, i.e., consciousness and its various modalities, unawakened and awakened.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 17th, 2014 at 8:43 PM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

Sherab said:

I prefer not to use the word 'mind' to refer to the base.

jeeprs said:

Can you suggest another word?

alpha said:

Three words actually: body, voice and mind.

Which is to say all phenomena pure and impure are inseparable in the nature of the basis. And in this way nothing is left out. But while in the knowledge of the basis there are no such distinctions.

Malcolm wrote:

So formless realm beings have a body, speech and mind?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 17th, 2014 at 9:20 AM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

Sherab said:

What I was saying if you read my post carefully is that production from conditions or dependent existence is only possible if bhava (something permanent) is not involved. That is why it makes sense for the Buddha to talk about dependent origination. Nagarjuna's dependent existence is defined on something permanent.

Nagarjuna did not exclude dependent existence based on something impermanent.

It is because that dependent existence is based on something impermanent that talking about reification makes sense.

Malcolm wrote:

What I am saying is that Nāgārjuna explicitly refutes dependent existence. I don't know why it is so hard for you to accept this. If there is no bhāva, there is no existence.

Therefore, there cannot be dependent existence since existence is rejected out of hand by Nāgārjuna.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 17th, 2014 at 9:11 AM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Whoever has a view of inherent existence, dependent existence, existence or non-existence has not comprehended the intent of the Buddha", which is of course production from conditions, relatively speaking.

jeeprs said:

I really do understand that, but the title of the thread is 'unfabricated mind'. So the implication in that is 'mind' is not among those things which are fabricated, conditioned, and so forth. That is the meaning of the word Mind, capital-M, as in the One Mind, is it not? Isn't that why you frequently read about the importance of 'knowing Mind' in books from Tibetan sources?

Malcolm wrote:

No. There is no "one mind" in Tibetan Buddhism. "Unfabricated" simply means a mind that resides in its own nature (empty clarity) without being contaminated with conceptuality.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 17th, 2014 at 9:08 AM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

Sherab said:

But production from conditions to me is another way of saying dependent existence where the dependent existence is not based off a permanent essence (bhava).

Nagarjuna's definition of dependent existence is production that is based off something permanent. This is a crucial difference in our take.

Malcolm wrote:

The difference is that your take is realist because it involves "existence" (bhāva, sat, asti, etc.).

Nagarjuna's take is based on the idea that something supports something else, not that something is permanent. The śrāvaka schools conceived of things that existed and were also impermanent. They too had an idea of dependent existence. That idea is precisely the idea that Nāgārjuna is criticizing both in the first chapter as well as the chapter 15 of the MMK. There is a vast difference between saying "productions from conditions", which is merely a convention, and "dependent existence" which requires inherency.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 17th, 2014 at 8:58 AM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

I have no problem with dependent origination, this is the Buddha's teaching. I have a problem with dependent existence. If something exists, it does not need to depend on anything.

Sherab said:

So existence to you is restricted to independent existence. Therefore any other form of existence cannot carry the meaning of existence.

I am more liberal in my definition of existence. This is because without that more liberal space, scientific investigations make no sense. However, I do think that the more liberal meaning of existence will come to a head at some point.

Malcolm wrote:

All forms of existence carry the meaning of independent existence, that is Nāgārjuna's whole point. That is why he asks the question "where is there bhāva not included in svabhāva or parabhāva?"

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 17th, 2014 at 8:48 AM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

If something exists, it does not need to depend on anything.

jeeprs said:

For instance? What exists that does not depend on anything?

Malcolm wrote:

That's the point, one cannot find such a thing, therefore, as Nāgārjuna points out, Whoever has a view of inherent existence, dependent existence, existence or non-existence has not comprehended the intent of the Buddha", which is of course production from conditions, relatively speaking.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 17th, 2014 at 8:40 AM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

Sherab said:

Therefore, it still make sense to talk about ...dependent existence

Malcolm wrote:

Not to me.

Sherab said:

This was what I said:

Therefore, it still make sense to talk about dependent origination, or dependent existence ... up to a point.

I noticed you left out "dependent origination" and "up to a point". Why?

Malcolm wrote:

I have no problem with dependent origination, this is the Buddha's teaching. I have a problem with dependent existence. If something exist, it does not need to depend on anything.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 17th, 2014 at 8:17 AM

Title: Re: Discussion of Political Topics is Wrong Speech

Content:

tobes said:

i.e. an argument of the kind: that all speech is ignorance.

Malcolm wrote:

But that is clearly not the case.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 17th, 2014 at 7:33 AM

Title: Re: Difference between consciousness and the mind

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

From Keown's "Buddhism and Bioethics": The sources are describing, using the concepts available to them, the origin of new human life. This was understood conceptually as the point from which all subsequent development proceeds, and before which no material basis for individual life exists. Translating these requirement into modern terms we would have every reason to locate the descent of the intermediate being at fertilisation. Before this time there is no genetic individual, and after it one has come into being. All subsequent developments in the history of the individual in the present life, including implantation, can be traced back to this point but not beyond it. It is difficult to wish for a clearer point of origin, and fertilisation seems by far the most likely candidate for the point at which new life begins.

Malcolm wrote:

This is when a new body is appropriated.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 17th, 2014 at 3:00 AM

Title: Re: Difference between consciousness and the mind

Content:

Sherlock said:

What about the old story of how plants as tall as humans have devas in them?

Malcolm wrote:

Well, this is like a human moving into a house. You would not say that house had a mind.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 17th, 2014 at 1:31 AM

Title: Re: Difference between consciousness and the mind

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Appropriate means that while in the bardo a being [gandharva] has the karmic causes and conditions to take certain kinds of birth, so they cluster at these birth places "like flies on rotten meat" as one Dzogchen tantra puts it.

dzogchungpa said:

Well, do these gandharvas have material bodies? I guess I don't really understand how they go to the fertilized ovum, in the case of human birth, say, and what they actually do to "appropriate" it. Don't Buddhists hold that life begins at conception?

Malcolm wrote:

They have mental bodies, mind made bodies. In the case of womb birth, when the sperm, egg and bardo being come together, there is conception. This all clearly explained in Abhidharma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 17th, 2014 at 1:21 AM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

Andrew108 said:

...even though all phenomena appear as mind, appearance itself is the nature of the enlightenment of the Buddhas."/i]

Malcolm wrote:

This is also the point of view of anuttarayoga tantras. But it is not a method. It's a view.

Sherlock said:

So isn't Atiyoga the only path that actually turns that view into a method?

Malcolm wrote:

Of course not. This is why, for example, before even embarking on the creation stage, one meditates the on the view in Lamdre.

The purpose of the creation stage to recognize that all phenomena are nothing other than the wisdom of buddhahood.

If you respond this is the view of tregchö, the reason thögal criticizes tregchö is that with tregchö one remains in a state of impure vision. With tregchö and other kinds of Dzogchen practice this view, "all phenomena are nothing other than the wisdom of buddhahood", remains a conceptual view.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 17th, 2014 at 1:11 AM

Title: Re: Difference between consciousness and the mind

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

In terms of a physical body, it must be large enough to accommodate at least the most rudimentary sense organs. Not sure we can include sponges, etc. I think we would have to set the limit at Eumetazoa.

"Sentient" means able to feel.

Sherlock said:

Didn't you post some links about how plants can feel and respond to stimuli too?

Malcolm wrote:

The question is whether this merely biomechanics or not.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 17th, 2014 at 12:54 AM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

Andrew108 said:

...even though all phenomena appear as mind, appearance itself is the nature of the enlightenment of the Buddhas."[/i]

Malcolm wrote:

This is also the point of view of anuttarayoga tantras. But it is not a method. It's a view.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 17th, 2014 at 12:48 AM

Title: Re: Difference between consciousness and the mind

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

"Sentient" means able to feel.

odysseus said:

So I guess I´m wrong about cognizing. But what about cessation of feeling? One is still sentient?

Malcolm wrote:

Depends on what you mean by "feeling", even Buddhas have feeling.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 17th, 2014 at 12:45 AM

Title: Re: Difference between consciousness and the mind

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Sperm is not sentient.

PadmaVonSamba said:

Then how can it be attracted to the egg?

.
.
.

Malcolm wrote:

It isn't. There is no sentience in a sperm to be attracted to it. Impregnation is strictly biomechanics.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 17th, 2014 at 12:38 AM

Title: Re: Difference between consciousness and the mind

Content:

odysseus said:

But ultimately, these organisms have no autonomy. It´s attraction/reaction by inherent physical properties to be blunt.

Then you have to determine at what point the multiplication of cells acquire autonomy. Otherwise, even a complex human is merely driven by chemical interactions

(and of course, much of what we experience is. The question then becomes, 'who is experiencing the chemical interactions, such as a particular molecule, as an emotion of fear or joy.)

Also, I am not suggesting that this is a voluntary action.

A sperm doesn't think, "Well, I could swim to that egg, or I could just stay home and watch TV"

.
.
.

Malcolm wrote:

Sperm is not sentient.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 17th, 2014 at 12:36 AM

Title: Re: Difference between consciousness and the mind

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

It is possible for a mind to appropriate the body of a very simple creature. But I do not think that a mind will appropriate the body of a single cell organism.

PadmaVonSamba said:

So, about how many cells do you reckon make a being big enough for a mind to appropriate?

Also, since it is a common beginner's exercise to "try to find where in the body the mind is"

(the answer being that the mind cannot be found anywhere in the body)

--the notion that a mind requires so many cells is absurd.

Malcolm wrote:

In terms of a physical body, it must be large enough to accommodate at least the most rudimentary sense organs. Not sure we can include sponges, etc. I think we would have to set the limit at Eumetazoa.

"Sentient" means able to feel.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 17th, 2014 at 12:28 AM

Title: Re: Longde before Dzin Dharmabodhi?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

I don't, its not part of the Tibetan canon. To give a classic reply, "we don't read that sutra".

Indrajala said:

There are plenty of Indian texts that are not present in the Tibetan canon yet extant in Chinese translation. Why base your beliefs about canonical texts on whether or not they are included in the Tibetan canon rather than, by your own suggestion, judging them on their own merits rather than, say, their ethnic origins?

Malcolm wrote:

I don't base my beliefs about canonicity by what is included in the Tibetan canon. I just pay don't much attention to books I cannot read in Tibetan or English. Plus I practice within a very specific tradition, and that is where my interests lie. I am not much interested what lies outside it. So, there may be fantastic sutras and sashtras in Chinese, but for the most part they don't present anything that is not present in what we have in Tibetan already. As far as the Brahma Net sutra goes, I don't need it, so I don't use it. And I don't pay it any mind. If someone tells me I need to practice the bodhisattva path according to it, I reply, it is not part of my tradition. In general, I don't even pay that much attention to the Yogacara system of bodhisattva vows. The system I follow is the Madhyamaka system.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 17th, 2014 at 12:20 AM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

Sherab said:

Therefore, it still make sense to talk about ...dependent existence

Malcolm wrote:

Not to me.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 17th, 2014 at 12:19 AM

Title: Re: Longde before Dzin Dharmabodhi?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

I don't reject it, I just don't regard it as an improvement over Indian Mahāyāna vow literature so I don't feel the need to extend it some special status. I understand its importance in Chinese Buddhism, it is irrelevant to me however.

Indrajala said:

Supposing you consider it canonical (i.e., you don't reject it), how can it be irrelevant to you?

Malcolm wrote:

I don't, its not part of the Tibetan canon. To give a classic reply, "we don't read that sutra".

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 17th, 2014 at 12:17 AM

Title: Re: Difference between consciousness and the mind

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

It is possible for a mind to appropriate the body of a very simple creature. But I do not think that a mind will appropriate the body of a single cell organism.

dzogchungpa said:

The questions of what kind of thing can be "appropriated" by a mind, and what "appropriate" means in this context are kind of interesting to me. Does the tradition have anything to say about this?

Malcolm wrote:

There are four kinds birth:

moisture/heat birth — this means insects and invertebrates primarily egg birth — this means reptiles, birds, amphibians and fish womb birth — humans and other mammals apparitional birth — devas, pretas and hell beings.

Appropriate means that while in the bardo a being [gandharva] has the karmic causes and conditions to take certain kinds of birth, so they cluster at these birth places "like flies on rotten meat" as one Dzogchen tantra puts it.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 17th, 2014 at 12:11 AM

Title: Re: Longde before Dzin Dharmabodhi?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

I keep on stressing that what is most important about all Buddhist texts is not where they are from, but rather, what they say.

Indrajala said:

Didn't you some time ago state you reject the Brahma Net Sūtra because it has its origins in China?

Malcolm wrote:

I don't reject it, I just don't regard it as an improvement over Indian Mahāyāna vow literature so I don't feel the need to extend it some special status. I understand its importance in Chinese Buddhism, it is irrelevant to me however.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 17th, 2014 at 12:09 AM

Title: Re: Difference between consciousness and the mind

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

You can remove all the limbs of a body, but you will never cut the mind. You can cut the brain stem, but brains are not sentient. When you cut the brain stem, the heart stops, the body dies and the stream of consciousness appropriates a new body.

PadmaVonSamba said:

In that case, a single-cell organism would be sufficient for the arising of awareness.

You are saying it's not, because of certain factors that a single cell organism lacks, and then you say those same factors are not dependent on the very thing a single-cell organism lacks.

.
.
.

Malcolm wrote:

It is possible for a mind to appropriate the body of a very simple creature. But I do not think that a mind will appropriate the body of a single cell organism.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, March 16th, 2014 at 9:32 PM

Title: Re: Difference between consciousness and the mind

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

What I am getting at is that ultimately the experiencer, illusory as it may be,
is merely a complex development of this "basic awareness"

Malcolm wrote:

There is no "basic" awareness apart from the awareness of a mind. Awareness is a quality of a mind, not the other way around.

A mind and a body may have the same relationship as a flower and its scent, it may be conceived to circulate around the body on the horse of vāyu and so on; but in the end the body is just a container for the mind.

You can remove all the limbs of a body, but you will never cut the mind. You can cut the brain stem, but brains are not sentient. When you cut the brain stem, the heart stops, the body dies and the stream of consciousness appropriates a new body.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, March 16th, 2014 at 9:24 PM

Title: Re: Longde before Dzin Dharmabodhi?

Content:

heart said:

My point is that if the teachings work, their origin can not be sociopolitical pressure. This is simple cause and effect. And if sociopolitical pressure was involved when describing the lineage, you most certainly could have created a better and more solid lineage. Of course a 1000 years later it is difficult to say what actually happened and what was a vision, a dream or whatever.

Malcolm wrote:

What I said was that Buddhist ritualism. such as mandala drawing, fire pujas, etc., is clearly a response to socio-political pressure.

Buddhist practice whether sutra or tantra, still has the same progression through the five paths, six perfections, ten stages, 37 adjuncts of awakening, whether they are described one by one in the Abhidharmakosha or are presented symbolically in the form of the thirty seven goddesses of the Vajrayogini mandala and so on.

heart said:

I believe the 17 tantras reappeared in the 11th century. Maybe some parts were edited and added to but I have no doubt they are genuine teachings originally taught in the samboghkaya dimension for those mahasiddhas capable to take teachings there. Thanks to ChNNR is got a pretty clear picture of how this could happen. That is all.

Malcolm wrote:

I have spoken about this with ChNN personally. One day we were discussing the text of the Kalacakra tantra. He stopped us abruptly to emphasize the point that the text of the tantra was not the tantra itself. The tantra itself was the Kalacakra mandala experienced by a Mahāsiddha. The text was something relative, composed by a person, subject to editing, emendation and so on, a text written about the method of realizing that mandala.

I never said there were no Tibetan mahāsiddhas. There were and are. This is why I continue believe in the effectiveness of man ngag sde teachings even if I don't really accept their traditional origin story anymore.

The problem really arises because Tibetans who produced these texts in the 11th century had to cater to the socio-political pressure of sourcing their teaching outside of Tibet with a foreign teacher— this is true of Nyingma and this is true of Bon. The Nyingma and Bonpo strategy was the treasure tradition and tales of lost Sanskrit and Zhang Zhung originals (which were true in some instances, like Guhyagarbha). The reason this socio-political pressure existed was that new texts were being brought from India, and in the 11th century and beyond, if you could not prove your text was Indian, it was regarded as spurious. Now, there are all sorts of linguistic reasons (which I do not have space to detail here) that we cannot accept that the seventeen tantras are translations from even one language into Tibetan (let alone three in the case of the Rig pa rang shar, which claims it was translated from Oddiyani, Sanskrit and Chinese!!!).

Nevertheless, while we can understand the historical provenance of the 17 tantras as texts to be a fabrication, we do not have to doubt their spiritual provenance since they are a record of the spiritual experience of a number of yogically advanced scholar practitioners in the 11th century who were riffing off older material from the 8th, 9th and 10th century as well as newer innovations by Indian yogis that was being imported in the eleventh century. Thus their lineage is intact in the live experimentation of yogis, just not in the fairy tale style it is communicated to children and naive people.

For example, Mahasiddha Virupa, a magical terrorist of great power, supposedly stops the sun in India. I love Virupa, he is definitely my favorite mahasiddha, but if he really stops the sun, you would think that such a cosmologically significant event would be noticed by the Chinese, the Arabs, etc. In fact, we have to understand this story as a yogic metaphor (which is the way it is actually explained in the Caryagiti). It is a fun story. It ends with Avalokiteshvara telling Virupa to stop being a magical terrorist. Then Virupa merges with a statue of Avalokiteshvara in S. India, meaning that all along we are to understand Virupa has reached the same level of realization.

For example, the essentials of man ngag sde practice, its anatomy and so on, can be communicated in a few words. We do not need three volumes of primary text, four volumes of secondary texts and four more volumes of commentaries to explain the main points of rushan, semzins, tregchod and thogal. But people like to write books, and they like to elaborate things. Most of what is discussed in the 17 tantras is distilled into a few pages in the Vima Nyingthig, in the three testaments of the Buddhas. This latter text then sets the structure for all the later Nyinthig termas.

As you know, I personally take the view that just as Mahāyāna Buddhism went through stages of development, so did tantra. I happen to think that the authors who wrote Mahāyāna down wrote down a brilliant and sublime teaching. I happen to think the same of the authors of the tantras. But I also think they were human beings and as human beings, they responded to social and political pressures, just as the Buddha clearly did in the Pali canon teachings.

So this is how I reconcile my critical approach to the text I read, and my practice. I understand that the tantric texts of all classes of tantra are just a reflection of a process of yogic experimentation and practice, as well as guides to reproduce those experiments. For me it is interesting to understand the gradual evolution of the Buddhist tantric yogic tradition, and I take the view that it did evolve gradually in the custody of people who were practicing its precepts, just like Mahāyāna, just like Abhidharma. I understand the claims of lineage origin to be a response to critics outside this or that lineage to validate the lineage to prospective new students. I understand that there are various strategies in Tibetan Buddhism to attract new students. Among these and not restricted to these are the Nyingma strategy, "highest teachings, newest revelation, the most blessings"; the Kagyu strategy is "Most faith, most blessings"; Gelug strategy is "Most systematic, most blessing", the Sakya strategy is "Clearest Indian lineages, most blessings", etc. These are the claims these schools make, they do not cover all the claims these schools make. Other claims all based around the lineage founders, the texts, etc. And of course we already see that within a few short years of Buddhism coming to the west, we have all kinds of tertons popping out of the wood works.

So in the end, Tibetan Buddhism is moving here, and we should expect that it will undergo rigorous critical examination, just like it did in the early days in Tibet. I suggest that if we revise our expectations of what makes a text "legitimate" then the process will be less painful. But if we insist on literal adherence to narratives such as the Great History of Zhangton as a criteria for being a player, then I think that Vajrayāna is doomed in the west.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, March 16th, 2014 at 7:49 AM

Title: Re: Can't Really Work with Mahayana by the Looks of it

Content:

rob h said:

It seems like I've decided to pretty much stop working with anything Mahayana...

Malcolm wrote:

Ok.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, March 16th, 2014 at 3:39 AM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

alpha said:

I am not sure.

In the way you say it, it looks like body and speech are conditioned or are results of ignorance, or you are trying to create a kind of hierarchy where one is higher than the other, whereas the view of dzogchen is that the entire diversity of pure and impure phenomena are inseparable in the nature of the state of body, speech and mind. Since body speech and mind have the same unique nature and this nature is also the nature of phenomena, whether of samsara or nirvana i see no need of making differentiations.

Malcolm wrote:

Dzogchen texts are quite explicit on this point, everything comes from the mind, everything that appears is an appearance of the mind. As Buddha said mind is the forerunner, etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, March 16th, 2014 at 3:02 AM

Title: Re: Difference between consciousness and the mind

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Unicellular organisms, fungi, plants, and so on, do not have minds and thus to not have awareness at all in any measure. They are non-sentient life.

PadmaVonSamba said:

if a single cell is non-sentient life,

then any multiplication of that single cell,

such as you or I must therefore also be non-sentient unless perhaps you can suggest a point at which sentience begins?

.
.
.

Malcolm wrote:

Our minds do not come from the cells of our bodies. The cells of our body are not sentient.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, March 16th, 2014 at 2:59 AM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The mind is the basis, it doesn't have "the basis".

alpha said:

I thought that the basis is from the very beginning the state of body, voice and mind as the self perfected-fruit and not just the mind.

Malcolm wrote:

Body and speech come from mind, just as the rūpakāya arises from the dharmakāya.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, March 16th, 2014 at 2:57 AM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

Sherab said:

Previously, you said that the mind is not real because it cannot be established. You said that cannot be established means cannot be proven to exist dependently or inherently.

Now you said that the mind is not real because it arises from conditions. Is this not equivalent to saying that the mind is not real because it is established to exist dependently (i.e. from conditions) and not inherently?

So can or cannot the mind be established?

Malcolm wrote:

The mind cannot be established because it arises from conditions, therefore it is illusory and free from extremes.

Dependent existence is just a crib for inherent existence, as Nāgārjuna quite clearly shows in the chapter 15 of the MMK.

Sherab said:

Nagarjuna was talking of svabhava and parabhava where bhava is something permanent.

I was not talking about dependent existence as something permanent and therefore cannot be proven, BUT a dependent existence that does not have the characteristic of permanence and therefore can be proven, i.e. established. For example, a water molecule is a dependent existence arising from or emerging from the combination (governed by certain laws of nature) of an oxygen atom and two hydrogen atoms.

Malcolm wrote:

Nāgārjuna shows that bhāva is incoherent, therefore, dependent existence is incoherent. Production from conditions is not incoherent because it does not involve use the term "bhava", existence. You will never find Nāgārjuna defending any species of existence at all.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, March 16th, 2014 at 2:55 AM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

Sherab said:

In what way is this not ontological?

The tantra of the basis is the reality [gnas lugs] that is present [gnas pa] to be known. It is not cultivated by buddhas nor do sentient beings contrive it through cleverness. It is not established by any words or letters. It is the intrinsic reality of the great perfection free from extremes that is in no way incomplete.

Malcolm wrote:

It is saying that one cannot apply ontological predicates such as being, non-being and so on to the unfabricated mind, the continuum of the basis.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, March 16th, 2014 at 1:51 AM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

Since the stains of the afflictions have never existed, there are no obstacles to clear away and no qualities to develop. All phenomena are perfect from the beginning in the state of essential identity, with no need for acceptance or rejection, prohibitions or remedies: this view of primordial enlightenment is known as the great perfection.

Malcolm wrote:

Even the perfection of wisdom states this, Hevajra states this, Kalacakra states this. This not a unique feature of Dzogchen.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, March 16th, 2014 at 1:13 AM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

There is no need to talk about ontology since there the four extremes are all invalid.

gad rgyangs said:

saying that is already talking about ontology.

so, since you are already talking about ontology, you need to explain these separate, self-contained monad-bases that you claim are found in each sentient being. Its unclear mereologically what is their relation to each other and what is their collective relationship to a context that would include them all. If the context is "kadag, lundrup and thugje" then that is pointing to a basis that is their collective context.

Malcolm wrote:

I would say that kadag, lundrup and thugje are a generic context, just like "red" is a generic context for all cows that are red.

The Dzogchen tantras are not inventing a brand new theory of Buddhism, they are just riffing on Tantric Buddhism as it already exists. That being the case, Dzogchen tantras, just like all other Buddhist tantras, do not deny conventional doctrines such as mind streams (citta saṃtana) and so on, that are necessary for receiving impressions or traces (vasana, bag chags) etc.

In other words, Dzogchen tantras exist in a continuum with other texts upon which later Dzogchen tantras like the sgra thal 'gyur (which are clearly influenced by the gsar ma tantras) are based. You want to define the basis as ye shes. The sgra thal 'gyur defines wisdom as encompassed by shes pa, and its commentary indicates that the shes pa that encompass wisdom, whether in Buddhas or sentient beings, is individual and unique to each buddha and sentient being. So what this basically boils down to is a discussion of how individual sentient beings are liberated.

I don't really care about what meta discussion we can have about "what it means". I am interested in what the texts themselves say so that we can understand their intention.

Therefore, since the discussion of the basis is premised on the concept of the three continuums, and since that continuum is just the continuum of an individual sentient beings consciousness, it is pretty meaningless to me to try and insist that the Dzogchen tantras should be saying something other than what they clearly all say, i.e., sentient beings become deluded, and sentient beings become Buddhas.

You might not be satisfied with this, but so what?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, March 16th, 2014 at 1:03 AM

Title: Re: Dr. Sanderson: Phowa etc. are directly from Saivism

Content:

haha said:

Such passage/myth does not support the textual conversion but provide the hypothesis for textual conversion. So do the bio of Yogeswora Virupa.

Malcolm wrote:

All it proves is that Buddhists and Hindus were in competition.

haha said:

The Aṣṭaṅgahridayam that gives these organs in this order: Heart, lung, liver, gall bladder, spleen, kidney. But quoted passage did not used yang organ (gall bladder). Then, there are five yin organs. Thus, it is related with Wu Xing theory.

Malcolm wrote:

Not really. These five don snod, may ultimately have come from the arrangement the functional organs in Chinese medicine, but their place is so firmly established in Tibetan medicine by the 13th century when this text was written that any Chinese connection would have been long been obscured.

haha said:

lalana, rasana and avadhuti

These three are purely buddhist in origin (name as well as meaning). Ida, Pingala and Susumna are purely non-buddhist (name as well as meaning).

Malcolm wrote:

Kalacakra uses Ida, Pingala and Susumna.

haha said:

In buddhist context without Vipasyana one cannot work with avadhuti; especially in vajrayana it is directly related with sampannakrama(completion stage meditation). How can such thing derive from non-buddhist tradition?

Malcolm wrote:

Easily, as Sapan points out the two stages exist in Hinduism, the difference is in view.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, March 16th, 2014 at 12:43 AM

Title: Re: Difference between consciousness and the mind

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

So, basically you are denying that a sperm responds specifically to something other than itself.

Malcolm wrote:

I am denying that there is any awareness involved in such interactions.

PadmaVonSamba said:

maybe you wouldn't call it "awareness" in the common Buddhist use of the term, because there is no cognitive grasping.

But then what would you call it?

Responsiveness?

Malcolm wrote:

I wouldn't call it awareness in any usage of the term. Unicellular organisms, fungi, plants, and so on, do not have minds and thus do not have awareness at all in any measure. They are non-sentient life.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, March 16th, 2014 at 12:38 AM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

It is not an ontological doctrine, it is epistemic.

gad rgyangs said:

ok so if you want to co-opt the basis for your epistemology, then you simply need to use new terms to talk about ontology. So what are they? (and no cop-out saying "since there are no "beings" there is no need for "ontology").

Malcolm wrote:

There is no need to talk about ontology since the the four extremes are all invalid.

In case you missed it:

When we talk about the basis, we are talking about what is termed by the sgra thal 'gyur commentary as the tantra of primal nature [rang bzhin gyi rgyud]:

The tantra of the basis is the reality [gnas lugs] that is present [gnas pa] to be known. It is not cultivated by buddhas nor do sentient being contrived it through cleverness. It is not established by any words or letters. It is the intrinsic reality of the great perfection free from extremes that is in no way incomplete.

The tantra of the path is two-fold: the path is made into a direct perception and into a post-meditation phase on the basis of the capacity of different people.

The tantra of the result is the naturally perfected tantra of the three kāyas and the originally pure tantra of the exhaustion of dharmatā.

This passage in the sgra thal 'gyur commentary is an elaboration upon a discussion found in an early 11th century text, The Mahāyānapathakrama by Subhagavajra:

Now then, the tantra of the basis is the nature of the two truths; the method is the two stages; and the result is the two kāyas, the dharmakāya and rūpakāya. Therefore, since the result is obtained when the method is cultivated in dependence on the basis, a tantra is so called because it connects.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, March 16th, 2014 at 12:31 AM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

Sherab said:

Based on your meaning of 'to establish', I read the first quote to mean that the mind is not real because it does not exist dependently nor inherently. This implies that the mind existence is only imagined.

Malcolm wrote:

The mind is not real because it arises from conditions, whatever arises from conditions does not arise in truth and cannot be found on examination. The mind is not unreal because there is clarity, and so on.

Sherab said:

Previously, you said that the mind is not real because it cannot be established. You said that cannot be established means cannot be proven to exist dependently or inherently.

Now you said that the mind is not real because it arises from conditions. Is this not equivalent to saying that the mind is not real because it is established to exist dependently (i.e. from conditions) and not inherently?

So can or cannot the mind be established?

Malcolm wrote:

The mind cannot be established because it arises from conditions, therefore it is illusory and free from extremes.

Dependent existence is just a crib for inherent existence, as Nāgārjuna quite clearly shows in the chapter 15 of the MMK.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, March 16th, 2014 at 12:29 AM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

pensum said:

"Presence Itself"?

Malcolm wrote:

sems nyid.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, March 16th, 2014 at 12:28 AM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The mind is the basis, it doesn't have "the basis".

Sherab said:

That being the case, scientists should be able to find the mind in a rock, a river or the wind. Scientists should not be finding molecules, atoms, sub atomic particles, etc.

Malcolm wrote:

The origin of this language of "the basis" is in the trio of the basis, path and result (sthana, marga, phala), i.e. the three tantras.

It is not an ontological doctrine, it is epistemic.

When we talk about the basis, we are talking about what is termed by the sgra thal 'gyur commentary as the tantra of primal nature [rang bzhin gyi rgyud]:

The tantra of the basis is the reality [gnas lugs] that is present [gnas pa] to be known. It is not cultivated by buddhas nor do sentient beings contrive it through cleverness. It is not established by any words or letters. It is the intrinsic reality of the great perfection free from extremes that is in no way incomplete.

The tantra of the path is two-fold: the path is made into a direct perception and into a post-meditation phase on the basis of the capacity of different people.

The tantra of the result is the naturally perfected tantra of the three kāyas and the originally pure tantra of the exhaustion of dharmatā.

This passage in the sgra thal 'gyur commentary is an elaboration upon a discussion found in an early 11th century text, The Mahāyānapathakrama by Subhagavajra:

Now then, the tantra of the basis is the nature of the two truths; the method is the two stages; and the result is the two kaṃyas, the dharmakāya and rūpakāya. Therefore, since the result is obtained when the method is cultivated in dependence on the basis, a tantra is so called because it connects.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, March 16th, 2014 at 12:26 AM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

Andrew108 said:

]

And for 'Presence Itself' you may as well use the term 'life itself'. There is no need to establish the identity of mind in order to overcome delusion. Neither is there a need to posit a final destination in Buddhahood as the epitome of wisdom. When you have confidence that knowledge of 'life itself' is never separate from an experience of 'Presence Itself' then what else do you need?

Malcolm wrote:

Presence is not a good translation for "sems nyid". It just means mind-essence and is a reference to bodhicitta, the mind-essence.

The passage that prefaces this discussion runs:

Since cause and effect are differentiated into mind, phenomena and knowing, phenomena are established.

But it is never said to establish a differentiation into cause and effect in the self-originated knowing mind.
[What] is to said that should be established is that everything is established by clearly including all phenomena in the mind-essence, the great perfection.

This is really very much the same as what the perfection of wisdom sutras say:
Śāriputra, that which is absence of change and the absence of concepts in all phenomena is called "the mind essence of the mind".

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, March 15th, 2014 at 11:14 PM

Title: Re: Difference between consciousness and the mind

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

So, basically you are denying that a sperm responds specifically to something other than itself.

Malcolm wrote:

I am denying that there is any awareness involved in such interactions.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, March 15th, 2014 at 11:04 PM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Further, there is ample evidence that Dzogchen tantras are merely discussing the nature of individual consciousness and nothing more.

gad rgyangs said:

and what is the basis of those posited multiple, individual consciousnesses?

Malcolm wrote:

There is no posited basis for those multiple, individual consciousness since they are all empty, free from extremes.

As explained before, the term རྩུ་གཞི, generic basis, is just a generic set of attributes that all shes pas possess. That is why the sgra thal 'gyur clearly explains that shes pa, consciousness, exists in all buddhas and sentient beings, and that it has two basis states, pure and impure and so on.

We can continue around and around on this if you want, but there really is no further satisfactory answer. Instant presence, rig pa, is just a quality of one's mind.

As soon as one accepts that all of this is just a way of trying to describe how minds become deluded, and then free from that delusion, then at that point one has understood the purpose of the discussion. If you think Dzogchen texts are positing some permeating basis which supports instantiations of buddhas and sentient beings, then you have understood nothing.

As you know, in the end I have concluded that the Dzogchen theory of a basis is not really different from the Sakya theory of the all-basis cause continuum, or the Kagyu theory of "mahamudra of the basis". All three are clearly based on the Uttaratantra of the Guhyasamaja's statement:

A tantra is a continua.
That become three,
divided by basis, likewise, nature,
and nothing to abandon,
the basis and the nature are the cause, likewise the result has nothing to abandon.
The basis is called "the method."
The topics of tantra are included in three.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, March 15th, 2014 at 10:51 PM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

A mental event is distinct from a mind exactly how?

gad rgyangs said:

"mind" is a conceptual overlay, a non existent (in the son of a barren women sense) posited substratum or possessor that "has" mental events, or, even worse, "has" the basis.

Malcolm wrote:

The mind is the basis, it doesn't have "the basis".

Sure, mind is just a convention, so is "basis", so is "mental event", etc. When subject to analysis, each term is just as incoherent as the other two.

Therefore, all of this discussion of the basis, the arising of the basis, mind, mental events, etc., is all strictly conventional.

Further, there is ample evidence that Dzogchen tantras are merely discussing the nature of individual consciousness and nothing more.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, March 15th, 2014 at 10:46 PM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

Andrew108 said:

So which type of Buddhahood do you want? The type that comes from the realization of mind or the type that doesn't exist, can't be seen, can't be designated?

Malcolm wrote:
They are the same.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, March 15th, 2014 at 10:42 PM

Title: Re: Longde before Dzin Dharmabodhi?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

or the the increasingly detailed bios of Padmasambhava resulting in a 12 volume one "revealed" by a Bon master in the 19th century.

mutsuk said:
What is that ?

Malcolm wrote:

I don't know, Tulku Orgyan mentions he read one.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, March 15th, 2014 at 10:41 PM

Title: Re: Longde before Dzin Dharmabodhi?

Content:

heart said:

I don't agree. Zhangton wrote an an important Dzogchen history, the Great History of the Dzogchen Nyingtik (rdzogs pa chen po snying thig gi lo rgyus chen mo). I think he is simply retelling the story of the nyingthik as his masters told him (no matter how strange its seemed) but If you like Malcolm is suggesting that he wrote the 17 tantras himself that whole text is not true, which would make it a lie

Malcolm wrote:

I think the story of their origin was largely created by Chegom Nagpo, who communicated this to Zhangton. Zhangton clearly received the 17 Tantras from Chegom Nagpo with whom he studied for one year when he was 10, in 1107.

I think that Dangma Lhungyal (and perhaps some others) and Chetsun Senge Wangchuk wrote the seventeen tantras over a period of 30-40 years or so during 11th century, with six of them being written after the Hevajra tantra was translated, i.e. the the rig pa rang shar, the rig pa rang grol, the bkra shis mdzes ldan, the sgron ma 'bar ba and the mu tig phreng ba, with the sgra thal 'gyur being the last of the whole collection to be written down.

Further, Zhangton claims that he alone receives the unsurpassed secret cycle of teachings which are the Vima Nyinthig. Zhangton wrote large parts of the Vima Nyinthig, i.e. the gold, copper, agate, conch and turquoise lettered between 1115-1118. I think some of the other texts in the collection are texts he received from Chegom.

Nyang ral reports the existence of the 17 tantras in a lineage that stems from Chegom in his Dharma history, but makes no mention of the Vima Nyinthig, indicating it was not well known yet. The fact that Nyang ral's story of Vimalmitra's life (based on his treasure revelation that Eric translated as "The Lotus Born") contradicts many details of Vimalamitra's life in Zhangton's slightly earlier story [but both composed in the 12th century] shows that Zhangton's Vima Nyinthig was not widely known in the late 11th century and only circulated in a small circle of his immediate disciples surrounding his son, Nyibum.

heart said:

But perhaps you would like suggest that "the Great History of the Dzogchen Nyingtik " is an early work of fiction?

Malcolm wrote:

Of course it is.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, March 15th, 2014 at 10:05 PM

Title: Re: Difference between consciousness and the mind

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

A sperm has no mental organ or any other kind of organ, it cannot be aware.

PadmaVonSamba said:

I agreed that it has no mental organ.

But it is attracted to a chemical excreted by the egg and it swims to that egg.

it responds to the actions of the egg.

That function of response, that attraction,

is what i am talking about.

Malcolm wrote:

That does not constitute evidence of awareness.

PadmaVonSamba said:

Nearly all "alive" things exhibit some sort of response to some stimuli that they themselves do not create.

Malcolm wrote:

That does not constitute evidence of awareness.

PadmaVonSamba said:

Hence, the propensity for the experience of self/other is already there.

Malcolm wrote:

No, I don't think so.

PadmaVonSamba said:

This is the basic awareness I am talking about,

Malcolm wrote:

I think you have confused panpsychism with Buddhism.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, March 15th, 2014 at 9:59 PM

Title: Re: Longde before Dzin Dharmabodhi?

Content:

heart said:

this was how he actually thought it happened. If I was Zhangton I would have made a more believable story.

Malcolm wrote:

Two things about Zhangton. Zhangton demonstrates a very shaky grasp on events in the 11th century, placing atisha one hundred years too early and so on. Second, fabulous tales were very believable to Tibetans (and many of their students) right up to the present day.

When I have discussions with Tibetans about all of this, they demonstrate a lot of indifference to these issues, mainly being concerned with focusing on one practice or lineage. Plus they are basically hostile to text critical analysis of their tradition unless it is within the context of traditional lineage concerns. So for example, if Gorampa criticizes the kun byed rgyal po it is one thing, but if a Western scholar does the same thing it is quite another. They distrust the motives of Western scholars, and dislike the impression that Western scholars like Gyatso, Davidson, Germano etc., are just doing this because they need a job. Whereas a critic like Sapan or Gorampa is regarded as being a realized person (with Sakya), so their opinions carry great weight.

Many western students have the same attitude. I have heard students of ChNN proclaim that if ChNN says something is so, we must believe it is so.

Finally, the purpose of lo rgyus, narrative accounts, are to generate faith in the lineage. Therefore exaggeration and so on are the norm in such accounts because they generate a dramatic tone which fosters receptivity. In the Indo-Tibetan tradition it seems, the more fantastic the better it is received. Of course there are skeptics, like Taranatha, who found the whole literature of the Padma Khathangs to be worth less than the paper they were written on, so he provided the account of Padmasambhava he heard from his Indian master, Buddhaguptanatha as a corrective to the exaggerations of tertons like Nyang ral.

So what I observe in Tibetan literature of this kind is a kind of one upsmanship, like that one sees when comparing the simpler and less elaborate "sems sde" origin stories with the elaborate story of the man ngag sde lineage, or comparing the increasingly detailed accounts of the early masters of Lamdre as time moves on, or the increasing detailed bios of Milarepa, etc., or the the increasingly detailed bios of Padmasambhava resulting in a 12 volume one "revealed" by a Bon master in the 19th century.

These are, in my view, facts of text that we have to accept.

In terms of Dharma there is basically no difference in meaning between the words in the "emptiness" mantra, om svabhāva śuddha sarvadharmā svabhāva śuddho' ham (The nature of all phenomena is pure, also my nature is pure) and the term "original purity".

In the end, these issues of text origin should be kept separate from practice. I think that the traditional accounts should always be presented, whether we really believe them or not, when we are being presented with teachings for practice. When we are studying these texts for their history however, we should subject the texts to all the best methods of text criticism, archaeology, history and so on that we can muster. In some people's mind this will cause them to lose faith in this or that lineage or tradition, and that is a pity, but that is also the price of scholarship. Many Christians lost faith in Jesus because of text criticism that began to be used by German scholars in the 19th century, but we, as Buddhists, don't really care if Christians lose their faith.

My contention is that if we lose our faith in Buddhadharma (due to text criticism and a better understanding of history) because the origin of some text turns out to have been originally written Tibetan and not some Indic language, then our faith is pretty shaky to begin with and is not based on the principles of Dharma but rather on some strange beliefs that we have decided to cultivate. If we lost faith in the man ngag sde tantras because it turns out they were written in Tibetan in the 11th century, and not taught by some ancient teacher in a heaven during the first eon, then it means we have not really understood the theory and practice contained in those texts on any level at all. If we lose our faith in Kalacakra because the notion that it was taught by the Buddha in a stupa in South India and then was later set down in writing by the seventh king of Shambhala, Mañjuśrīyasa, and only brought to India some 1000 years later during the 10th century turns out to be just a didactic legend, then it means we have understood nothing of the teachings contained in that tantra. If we decide that we have no faith in the Prajñāpāramita sūtras because it turns out that it is impossible they were recovered from under the ocean by Nāgārjuna then we have not understood one word of the Prajñāpāramita.

I keep on stressing that what is most important about all Buddhist texts is not where they are from, but rather, what they say. We are left to our own devices to engage in the experiment and test for ourselves the truth of practices in Buddhist texts. When we have some evidence that the practices in these texts lead to the promised results, our faith moves from aspiring faith to unshakable faith -- but that unshakable faith doesn't mean that we then necessarily have to believe all the origin legends that accompany these texts. It means we have moved from hypothesis to confirmation for ourselves.

In the meantime, there are interesting things to learn.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, March 15th, 2014 at 8:43 PM

Title: Re: Difference between consciousness and the mind

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

Well, if the sperm is attracted by the chemical from the egg.
so, if you don't want to call it "mind" what would you call it?
I called it "bare awareness".

Malcolm wrote:

A sperm has no mental organ or any other kind of organ, it cannot be aware.

PadmaVonSamba said:

You can't deny that there is a responsive, intentional (meaning not random) contact between two separate entities.
Somehow the sperm 'knows' to swim to the egg.

Malcolm wrote:

A sperm has no mental organ or any other kind of organ, it cannot be aware.

PadmaVonSamba said:

an awareness of another object occurs even to a single-cell organism, which has no brain, no sense organs, no nerve endings.

Malcolm wrote:

Single cell organisms have no sense organs, etc., so they cannot be aware.

Attributing awareness to them is a category error.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, March 15th, 2014 at 8:37 PM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

Sherab said:

Based on your meaning of 'to establish', I read the first quote to mean that the mind is not real because it does not exist dependently nor inherently. This implies that the mind existence is only imagined.

Malcolm wrote:

The mind is not real because it arises from conditions, whatever arises from conditions does not arise in truth and cannot be found on examination. The mind is not unreal because there is clarity, and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, March 15th, 2014 at 8:36 PM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

Sherab said:

...Taken as a whole, the first quote seems to say that the mind is unreal because it is only imagined. But because of imagination (of feeling, thinking and so on), it is not unreal. The whole argument in the first quote therefore seems rather incoherent to me.

Andrew108 said:

Well the other thing is that Malcolm is saying the realization of mind's nature leads to Buddhahood. There must be something realized? if he says that mind cannot be found, then I wonder how can Buddhahood be realized?

Malcolm wrote:

Kun byed rgyal po:

Since one's mind free of proliferation is the dharmadhātu all buddhas enter into that freedom from proliferation.

And:

A buddhahood that is an object of sight cannot be seen;
since buddhahood does not exist, also there is no name "buddhahood";
The teacher has said that since buddhahood designated by a name it is an error;
the mistaken path is obtaining buddhahood somewhere else.

And:

Also the teaching of the all-creating kind is that one's mind has always been the liberated dharmatā.

There you go, Andrew, how it is explained in the bodhicitta texts of which you are so fond.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, March 15th, 2014 at 8:10 PM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

personally I don't think there is such a thing as "mind" even conventionally. "mental events" yes, but "mind" no. it stinks of reification.

Malcolm wrote:

I don't think there is such a thing as "mind" even conventionally.

???

gad rgyangs said:

mental event, no substratum or possessor

Malcolm wrote:

A mental event is distinct from a mind exactly how?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, March 15th, 2014 at 8:01 PM

Title: Re: Longde before Dzin Dharmabodhi?

Content:

heart said:

We are still waiting for your translation of the 17 Tantras in order to evaluate its actual content. But in my opinion if you wanted to make a believable story about the origin of a text you wrote you would have traveled to India and made sanskrit copies of them. The lineage that Zhangton Tashi Dorje provide is laughable in comparison the Sarma lineages. No wonder so relatively few people believed in them at the time. This is what don't make sense.

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

The Sanskrit originals for the 17 tantras are accounted for Zhangton's legend. They are asserted to be the sole copies brought from India with no other copies in India, hidden by Vimalamitra in Tibet just before he departed for China. The origin legends of all the other tantras are no more believable than Zhangton's. The difference of course is that there is no elaborate account of concealment and retrieval in Tibet to contend with for the gsar ma tantras.

In gsar ma, the general mode of the introduction new teachings is through visionary encounter. Marpa meeting Naropa, Sachen meeting Virupa, or through dreams.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, March 15th, 2014 at 11:15 AM

Title: Re: Three Turnings.

Content:

jeeprs said:

all things have no-essence, no arising, and no passing away, are originally quiescent, and are essentially in cessation

Even though this is something that is said a lot, I don't really understand what it means.

(I *think* there is a similarity to the early Greek philosophers, specifically Parmenides [and Zeno's paradoxes which were intended as proofs of Parmenides], which originated from around the same historical time. Parmenides also was concerned with 'what truly is', in comparison to which the 'phenomenal' did not truly exist.

How could what is perish? How could it have come to be? For if it came into being, it is not; nor is it if ever it is going to be. Thus coming into being is extinguished, and destruction unknown.

B 8.20-22. )

So I would be very interested to hear an explanation of what this phrase actually means in terms of modern or analytical philosophy. When it is declared that things are 'not arisen', this doesn't seem to account for the fact that things - creatures, trees, mountains, planets, and so on - actually do 'arise' or come into and then go out of existence. So what does it mean that they don't really arise?

Any supplementary readings on that, preferably from a 'Buddhist studies', rather than traditional, perspective?

Malcolm wrote:

They seem to, but not really.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, March 15th, 2014 at 11:12 AM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

personally I don't think there is such a thing as "mind" even conventionally. "mental events" yes, but "mind" no. it stinks of reification.

Malcolm wrote:

I don't think there is such a thing as "mind" even conventionally.

???

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, March 15th, 2014 at 8:37 AM

Title: Re: Difference between consciousness and the mind

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

When this basic ground of awareness arises, or interacts with an object, the result is that is experienced is mind.

Malcolm wrote:

There is no awareness outside the mind.

PadmaVonSamba said:

So, when a plant's roots grow specifically in the direction of a source of water, or a sperm cell swims to an egg, or white blood cells attack an infection, that is mind?

.
.
.

Malcolm wrote:

None of these things have minds, so they do not have awareness either.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, March 15th, 2014 at 8:35 AM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

Sherab said:

What is the meaning of established as you have used here?

Malcolm wrote:

Proven to exist.

Sherab said:

What does exist mean here? For example, to exist can mean to exist inherently, to exist dependently, to exist as an imagination.

Malcolm wrote:

Proven to exist. There is no difference between existence and inherent existence. There is no difference between dependent existence and inherent existence.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, March 15th, 2014 at 8:27 AM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

Sherab said:

So by "mind" you are really referring to the ordinary deluded mind?

Malcolm wrote:

By mind I mean that entity which can become deluded or nondeluded.

gad rgyangs said:

you sure you want to call mind an "entity"?

Malcolm wrote:

Conventionally, sure. I don't mean it has a essence, an ens. I mean it is a subject for discussion. A mind is what experiences samsara or nirvana. It can be pure or impure, to put it the way the sgra thal 'gyur puts it, wisdom is encompassed by the mind.

"Vimalamitra", having clarified that sems, blo and yid are all synonyms for shes pa, states:

The wisdom that is encompassed by the mind is inseparable in all buddhas and sentient beings as mere mind, but since it ultimately pervades them without any nature at all, that [wisdom] is encompassed by the mind [shes pa] of each one.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, March 15th, 2014 at 7:56 AM

Title: Re: Three Turnings.

Content:

Astus said:

Therefore, the unconditioned does not exist."/i]

Malcolm wrote:

Indeed, and there goes gzhan stong up in smoke hoisted on its own petard.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, March 15th, 2014 at 7:55 AM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

Sherab said:

So by "mind" you are really referring to the ordinary deluded mind?

Malcolm wrote:

By mind I mean that entity which can become deluded or nondeluded.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, March 15th, 2014 at 7:55 AM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

Sherab said:

What is the meaning of established as you have used here?

Malcolm wrote:
Proven to exist.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Saturday, March 15th, 2014 at 7:18 AM
Title: Re: Difference between consciousness and the mind
Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:
When this basic ground of awareness arises, or interacts with an object, the result is that is experienced is mind.

Malcolm wrote:
There is no awareness outside the mind.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Saturday, March 15th, 2014 at 7:16 AM
Title: Re: Three Turnings.
Content:

Malcolm wrote:
If one claims the "third turning" is definitive, defines it as a number of sutras like the Samdhinirmocana and so on, and then you cite a "first" turning sūtra, you have contradicted yourself.

jeeprs said:
Not necessarily. It might be the case that the so-called 'later' teachings unpack or explicate deeper meanings that were inherent in the earliest texts. That is why Nagarjuna could say that he was affirming the true meaning of the Buddha's teaching, even though to many of his contemporaries he seemed to be radical (well that is a point made in many of the scholarly studies of early Mahayana anyway.) But that is because the Buddha's teaching, right from the outset, was vast, profound, difficult to fathom, deep and perceptible only to the wise. It accomodates many different kinds of perspectives. So in some ways you can see as the tradition developed, there was the attempt to harmonize some of these perspectives, whilst not claiming that the later ones conflicted with or undermined the earlier. (//edit//although of course from the viewpoint of the traditionalists, the so-called 'later turnings' were simply ways to rationalize heterodoxy.)

('Unborn, unconditioned' comes from <http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/kn/ud/ud.8.03.than.html>.)

Malcolm wrote:

You are missing my point again, the gzhan stong pas like SOB, generally assert that Buddha's career had three distinct phases.

Maitreyanatha rejects this interpretation and asserts that all three turnings were turned at the same time.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, March 15th, 2014 at 7:14 AM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

No, I should use "mind", since it is the realization of that which results in buddhahood and nothing else.

Sherab said:

What is your reason for putting the word mind within quotation marks?

Malcolm wrote:

Because A108 did.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, March 15th, 2014 at 6:42 AM

Title: Re: Three Turnings.

Content:

jeeprs said:

"There is, monks, an unborn, unbecome, unmade, unconditioned. If, monks there were not that unborn, unbecome, unmade, unconditioned, you could not know an escape here from the born, become, made, and conditioned. But because there is an unborn, unbecome, unmade, unconditioned, therefore you do know an escape from the born, become, made, and conditioned."

How could such a statement be 'provisional'? Wouldn't that then be a 'conditioned unconditioned'?

Malcolm wrote:

...Not sure you got my point. If one claims the "third turning" is definitive, defines it as a number of sutras like the Saṃdhinirmocana and so on, and then you cite a "first" turning sūtra, you have contradicted yourself.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, March 15th, 2014 at 4:57 AM

Title: Re: Difference between consciousness and the mind

Content:

Son of Buddha said:

I have shown where the Buddhas says the 5 aggregates are suffering.
You claim that the suttas that say such are provisional...

Malcolm wrote:

I respond here: <https://www.dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=39&t=15837#wrap>

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, March 15th, 2014 at 4:56 AM

Title: Three Turnings.

Content:

Son of Buddha said:

I have shown where the Buddhas says the 5 aggregates are suffering.

Malcolm wrote:

Of course they are, but there are also pure aggregates.

Son of Buddha said:

You mentioned the Diamond Sutra.....well the Diamond sutra is provisional the third turning deems all 1st and second turning to be provisional, only glimmers of the absolute truth can be found in the provisional teachings and even then they rely on interpretation from the third turning, now if you ask me to prove that with Buddhist scriptural reference I can.....im only you to do the same with your assertions.

Malcolm wrote:

There is really only one reference to the three turnings of the wheel in a single sutra. The Samdhinirmocana. The way I read the Samdhinirmocana is that it confirms the teaching found in the second turning and renders it indisputable.

The Bhagavan, well disclosing the correct entry into all vehicles, beginning from the nonexistence of the inherent existence of all phenomena, beginning from their absence of arising, absence of ceasing, being peaceful from the beginning, being parinirvana by nature, turned a third very amazing wheel of Dharma. This wheel of Dharma is unsurpassable, not circumstantial, of definitive meaning and indisputable.

This is hardly a smoking gun that confirms that you are basing your opinions on the so called third turning. Frankly, there is virtually no attention this teaching in the Indian canon, though a big deal about it is made in Tibetan and Chinese Buddhism. The idea that the three turnings are based on three distinct historical epochs is rejected out of hand by such India scholars as Dharmamitra in his Abhisamayālaṃkārikāprajñāpāramitopadeśaśāstraṭīkā prasphuṭapadā.

Son of Buddha said:

<http://ancient-buddhist-texts.net/English-Texts/Exalted-Utterances/8-Pataligamiyavaggo-03.htm>

“There is, monks, an unborn, unbecome, unmade, unconditioned. If, monks there were not that unborn, unbecome, unmade, unconditioned, you could not know an escape here from the born, become, made, and conditioned. But because there is an unborn, unbecome, unmade, unconditioned, therefore you do know an escape from the born, become, made, and conditioned.”

Malcolm wrote:

By your own criteria this is provisional since it comes from the first turning.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, March 15th, 2014 at 4:16 AM

Title: Re: What major Tibetan Buddhist texts are still missing?

Content:

Indrajala said:

I recently heard about large amounts of Indian Sanskrit texts having been kept in Tibetan libraries and actually seen by foreign visitors prior to the Chinese invasion. From the sounds of it they were basically stored away and seldom ever touched, but nevertheless they were there. A similar situation existed in China where original Indian manuscripts were stored in various places and left alone for centuries only to be burnt in the Cultural Revolution.

It would be interesting to know the fate of those Indian manuscripts in Tibet.

Malcolm wrote:

The Library at Sakya still has many original Sanskrit manuscripts.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, March 15th, 2014 at 4:11 AM

Title: Re: Pronunciation (yes one of these)

Content:

vinodh said:

Additonally to Malcolm's way, I've also been taught that it's pronounced "gya" (I think this may be the most common way now, but not necessarily the most historically accurate)

Usually, this is the North Indian pronunciation of the syllable.

South Indians (including me) still pronounce it as - <dʒṇa> (dʒ is same as English /j/ & ṇ is same as spanish ñ) You'll find South Indian pronunciation of Sanskrit more conservative compared to North India. For Instance, <ai> <au> are mostly realized as monophthongs in most of North India. But they are properly realized as diphthongs only in South India (and Maharashtra).

also "dnya" which just seems weird to me, but is also supposedly correct

It is the Marathi/Oriya way of pronouncing the letter.

----

Well... Ofcourse... You can pick any of the above pronunciations and still sound "native". But I would suggest to go with <dzṇa> - the closest English rendering of which is <jnya>.

V

Malcolm wrote:

Sakya Pandita renders jñā and "gnya". Also in Varanasi, that is how it is taught there. In general, Tibetans who spoke Sanskrit followed the N. Indian mode of pronunciation and consider this the most correct. It may not match up with linguistic history, but indeed it is how they see it.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, March 15th, 2014 at 3:07 AM

Title: Re: Longde before Dzin Dharmabodhi?

Content:

heart said:

Calling the 17 Tantras a scam is really close to turning people against the Dharma. Because scams are not Dharma, pretty simple.

Malcolm wrote:

Did I call the 17 tantras a scam? No. I simple asserted that they were composed in the 11th century. Just like Kalacakra was composed in the 10th century, Hevajra and the Laghusamvara in the 9th, Guhyasamaja in the 8th and so on.

heart said:

Inventing a lineage is a classic scam, no?

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

If you choose to see it that way. I don't. I see it very much along the same lines as placing the words of Mahāyāna sūtras in the mouth of the Buddha, when it is impossible that the historical Buddha even spoke one word of them, let alone all 108 volumes of them and more. I evaluate the texts on what they say, not on the basis of their supposed origins. I think it is a superior approach when a text is evaluated on its actual content rather than who supposedly spoke it.

Let me put it another way, when Amoghavajra [i.e. Shingon tradition] claims that Nāgārjuna took the tantras out of an iron tower in South India, I also do not believe that story. That does not mean I think that the practice of the Vajradhātu mandala is spurious or worthless.

Given the environment of the 11th century, if the authors of the 17 tantras came out and said "We wrote these books, and because we have realized the meaning contained therein, you should practice this" no one would have believed them.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, March 15th, 2014 at 3:02 AM

Title: Re: African Americans & people of Color, & Buddhism in the W

Content:

zsc said:

T

The Buddha's teaching is that our current circumstances are not only due to the karma from past lives.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, the Buddha's teaching is that our current circumstances are due only to our actions from past lives.

The in the Karmavibhanga, the Buddha states:

SN 36.21 said:

"Now when these ascetics and brahmins have such a doctrine and view that 'whatever a person experiences, be it pleasure, pain or neither-pain-nor-pleasure, all that is caused by previous action,' then they go beyond what they know by themselves and what is accepted as true by the world. Therefore, I say that this is wrong on the part of these ascetics and brahmins."

2. "Master Gotama, what is the reason, what is the condition, why inferiority and superiority are met with among human beings, among mankind? For one meets with short-lived and long-lived people, sick and healthy people, ugly and beautiful people, insignificant and influential people, poor and rich people, low-born and high-born people, stupid and wise people. What is the reason, what is the condition, why superiority and inferiority are met with among human beings, among mankind?"

3. "Student, beings are owners of karmas, heirs of karmas, they have karmas as their progenitor, karmas as their kin, karmas as their homing-place. It is karmas that differentiate beings according to inferiority and superiority."

Malcolm wrote:

<http://www.accesstoinsight.org/lib/authors/nanamoli/wheel248.html#top>

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, March 15th, 2014 at 2:58 AM

Title: Re: African Americans & people of Color, & Buddhism in the W

Content:

Unknown said:

On the other hand, having complete strangers who don't care about you ask "What are you?" is annoying, as plenty of Asian-Americans say. Black women get this in the form of invasive questions about our hair ("Can I touch it?" "Do you wash it?" "Is that your real hair?" etc.). This ascribes an "alien" quality to someone that is dehumanizing. It's creepy, like we are regarded as zoo animals who need to be carefully studied.

Malcolm wrote:

Try having long blond hair in Tibet, if you want to feel like a zoo exhibit. You think these experiences are unique to black people in the US? They are not. They are experienced by anyone who travels somewhere where they are not the majority. Most of us here are widely travelled people, not ignorant rednecks in the N. Georgia mountains.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, March 15th, 2014 at 2:50 AM

Title: Re: African Americans & people of Color, & Buddhism in the W

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

[quote="zsc"

@Malcolm - To continue on what I touched on, your position of the suffering of people being only the result of their past lives ignores that documented fact that Gotama opposed the caste system, which is the logical conclusion of your stance. Gotama even opposed the caste system *even while he directly benefited from it*. There is a metaphor in there about how we should respond to all other forms of social inequality.[/quote]

The in the Karmavibhanga, the Buddha states:

Brahmaputra, therefore, listen well and bear this in mind: from knowing the various actions [karma], the various afflictions, the various views and the various behaviors of sentient beings one can describe the ripened results of positive and negative actions. Brahmaputra, there is birth among hell beings, animals and pretas because of negative actions, birth among humans, asuras and devas because of positive actions.

Brahmaputra, a short life is a vicissitude of karma, a long life is a vicissitude of karma. Frequent illness is a vicissitude of karma, infrequent illness is a vicissitude of karma. A poor complexion is a vicissitude of karma. Beauty is a vicissitude of karma. Inferior social standing is a vicissitude of karma. Superior social standing is a vicissitude of karma. Noble birth is a vicissitude of karma. Ignoble birth is a vicissitude of karma. Great wealth is a vicissitude of karma. Little wealth is a vicissitude of karma. Low intelligence is a vicissitude of karma. High intelligence is a vicissitude of karma. Birth as a hell being is a vicissitude of karma. Birth as animal is a vicissitude of karma. Birth as a preta is a vicissitude of karma. Birth in the human realm is a vicissitude of karma. Birth as a deva enjoying bliss is a vicissitude of karma. Birth as a form realm deva is a vicissitude of karma. Birth as a formless realm deva is a vicissitude of karma. Certainty of birth is a vicissitude of karma. Uncertainty of birth is a vicissitude of karma. Ripening in another land is a vicissitude of karma.

You ignored my observation that the fact that social inequality is in fact a result of karma from the Buddha's point of view does not mean we deal with it passively.

Unknown said:

But I will say, it is ironic that you chose to affirm the reality of karma from our past lives while denying other karmic circumstances in which we are born into, such as where we are born...

Malcolm wrote:

All of this comes from our past karma, I have not ignored any of it.

Unknown said:

And yet, my basic recommendation to examine personal complicity (which is woven into your own karmic situation) to see your role in today's social conditions is met with resistance.

Malcolm wrote:

All of us together mutually created the karmic ripening we observe today, and the ways in which we treat other sentient beings determines what kind of karmic reality we will experience in the future. You very well may have been a privileged white slave owner in a past life. I may have been a slave whose children were ripped away from me and sold at auction. Jews killed in the holocaust may have been reborn as Israelis, while Nazis may have been reborn as Palestinians. We have all been mothers, fathers, sons and daughters, enemies, friends, murders, rapists, thieves, kings, wealthy merchants, libertines, etc., not to mention pretas, gods, hell beings, fish, whales, bugs so many times, that to insist that others must adopt our social view based in the very temporary karmic circumstances we find in this life is just absurd.

The law of karma is unerring. If someone, like Tibetans for example, are experiencing torture, murder and so on at the hands of the PLA, for example, there is a karmic reason for it. That does not mean that Tibetans, for example, need to be passive and not insist on their rights to dignity as human beings, the same thing with Palestinians, Mayans, Rohingyas, etc. But as Buddhists we also must understand that famine, diseases, wars, etc., as well as the beauty and good fortune we have to live in the US (as imperfect as it may be) all comes from karma. How we manage this is what will determine where we take rebirth in the next life and what kind of circumstances we will meet there.

Unknown said:

Meanwhile, my insistence that how we relate to the dharma (which includes to how we relate to each other) is conditioned by our karmic situations (which includes our experiences due to our race) is met with denial. Neither statement is a concept that is alien to Buddhist thought.

Malcolm wrote:

You really must not be paying attention to what I said.

Unknown said:

In light of that, race is a fake social construct, to you "there are no black people" but to people who do everything from deny us opportunities to gun us down there certainly are black people. The same "Sunday-only" dharma referenced above that ignores the lived reality of racism that black Buddhists face, and other poc, is unsurprisingly not one that many poc will adopt. Above I have outlined why I believe this isn't Buddhist at all.

Malcolm wrote:

Race is a social construct that is quite real to many people, but it is still just an illusion. "Black people" and "White people" are just dividing labels. The extent we wish to reinforce them is the extent to which they will continue to bind us.

Unknown said:

Just like with Johnny Dangerous, I would also ask why the solutions of people of color-- in your words, a "black power sangha"--must be palatable to you?

Malcolm wrote:

I can see you really do not read what I said carefully. I said the very idea of such racially divided sanghas violated the intent of the Buddha, who did not differentiate people by caste when they became followers of Buddhadharma.

Unknown said:

Also, it should be clear from history why "white power", an assertion of power by the powerful, is a hate movement, while "black power", a reclamation of agency by systematically oppressed people, is a civil rights movement. Therefore, the two concepts are apples and oranges.

Malcolm wrote:

From a Buddhist point of view, it is just worldly bullshit caught up in the eight worldly Dharmas.

Unknown said:

In reality, black people in America have to face racism and frame it in one way or another as a necessity, to make sense of the world, whether publicly or privately.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, of course they do. There are a lot of racists out there. Many of them have "black" skin too. They are all to be pitied for their narrowness and lack of compassion.

Unknown said:

A lot of black parents dread the eventual "racism talk" they have to have with their young children for their protection. At the same time, I have read white people resenting having to have the same discussion when they were younger if they happened to have committed some social faux pas that could have been misconstrued as racism. Some white people resent having the racism talk as adults. Both ignore the fact that this talk is thought of as "optional" for them because of white privilege, while it is "required" in one way or another, for black people.

Malcolm wrote:

My mother, a caucasian women, and founder of the feminist movement in New England, marched in many Civil Rights rallies in the sixties. I was with her at these as I was a small child. I was raised in a household where it was normal to discuss racism and its negative impacts on African Americans.

I am a Buddhist, and while I sympathize with the suffering of any sentient being, I also recognize that the suffering of any sentient being comes strictly from their own karma and no one else makes it for them. You are making a common error in assuming that karmic causes and conditions are "interdependent" in a broader sense. They are not.

The discussion of general cause and condition comes first. Then the subject of dependent origination. Finally, the discussion of karmic cause and condition, i.e. how afflicted minds act, and what kinds of results they can expect to ripen as a result of those acts, both positive and negative. My karma does not ripen on you, and you have no hand in making it. Your karma does not ripen on me, and I had no hand in making it.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, March 15th, 2014 at 1:50 AM

Title: Re: Longde before Dzin Dharmabodhi?

Content:

heart said:

Calling the 17 Tantras a scam is really close to turning people against the Dharma. Because scams are not Dharma, pretty simple.

Malcolm wrote:

Did I call the 17 tantras a scam? No. I simple asserted that they were composed in the 11th century. Just like Kalacakra was composed in the 10th century, Hevajra and the Laghusamvara in the 9th, Guhyasamaja in the 8th and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, March 14th, 2014 at 10:37 PM

Title: Re: African Americans & people of Color, & Buddhism in the W

Content:

zsc said:

T

The Buddha's teaching is that our current circumstances are not only due to the karma from past lives.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, the Buddha's teaching is that our current circumstances are due only to our actions from past lives. You really don't want me to trot out the numerous citations illustrate this.

There are some revisionists who would like to deny this, but they are wrong.

This does not mean we cannot improve our current circumstances. Of course we can. But that too depends on our past karma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, March 14th, 2014 at 9:41 PM

Title: Re: Crowned Buddha images around Bodhgaya.

Content:

Indrajala said:

Does anyone know why many of the late period images of the Buddha (9th century onwards) around Bodhgaya and Nalanda have crowns and necklaces? At first I thought they might be Vairocana, but many are clearly Śākyamuni "touching the earth" at his enlightenment. Not all the late period images have such adornments, though many do.

Malcolm wrote:

The central imagery in the yoga tantras is bound up with courtly notions of the Cakravartin. That is why Sambhogakāya Buddhas wear crowns and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, March 14th, 2014 at 9:39 PM

Title: Re: African Americans & people of Color, & Buddhism in the W

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

It seems like the unintended consequences here are that you will be left with a project that has ceased to be Dharma, and is simply political. Ironically enough, there is all kinds of what some posters would call "white Buddhism" that is basically this, Dharma that has morphed into liberal activism with some Buddha images. Personally I think the things Malcolm and others have said are much too dismissive of the legitimate experiences of those who might be shut out..however, it IS worth considering that part of what is he is getting at is that this is Dharma practice, eventually, somehow, you have to do something that is removed from the values and goals of conventional political activism, and that includes the all-important issue of identity. It is not fair, and it seems to make Buddhism a tough row to hoe for particularly oppressed peoples - but doctrinally, it is true. It is not fair, it IS much easier to do that as white person, but it is still true...Buddhism does not leave much room for identity of the type typically cultivated in this sort of activism..IMO Malcolm has a legitimate point there, no matter how uncomfortable it may be.

Malcolm wrote:

I am not dismissive of their experience. One cannot contextualize one's experience (be social, political or economic) in Buddhism in absence of the teaching of karma, which states quite plainly that all sensations, pleasant, unpleasant and neutral, the social status into which one is born, one's opportunities in life, and so on result from one's own past actions in previous lives. Buddhists, of whatever "race" are well advised to use this precious human birth (that they may use to attain liberation) to good use.

Meanwhile, as part of their practice, they can devote themselves to whatever social causes strike their fancy depending on their social, political and economic concerns. Thus, if you are a person of color and you wish to devote yourself to causes involving people of color, fine. But don't buy into the non-Buddhist narratives of oppressors and victims, the non-Buddhist narrative of privileging one form of sentient life (human) over the lives of billions of other kinds of sentient life. The teaching of karma is not fuzzy, warm, and it does not feel good. The teaching of karma indicates that what we experience in this life is a result of how we have acted in past lives. If we are oppressed in this life, we can be sure that in a past life we were oppressive, and so on.

This is not a recommendation for inaction or indifference to the plight of people are not so fortunate as to have a precious human birth where they can meet the Perfect Dharma and practice it. We have to be aware of the plight of others and help where we can, and when we are asked to, it's "the bodhisattva" thing to do, and not because we wish to turn others into coreligionists. But in the end, don't ask me to respect you because you are a person of color. I respect you already because you are a human being.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, March 14th, 2014 at 9:05 PM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The "natural condition" as you call it, isn't something real; it is baseless. It isn't out there, like "atoms", "stars" and "galaxies"; it isn't inside like "blood cells", "mitochondria", etc. This "natural" condition is just the nature of your own mind. It is not an objective condition.....

Andrew108 said:

It's based on the fact that no phenomenon exists that isn't the natural condition.....No one said that the natural condition is 'real' in the limited sense that you use the term 'real'. The way you use the term 'mind' is also limited. The term you should use instead is 'life'.

Malcolm wrote:

No, I should use "mind", since it is the realization of that which results in buddhahood and nothing else.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, March 14th, 2014 at 8:26 PM

Title: Re: The Dalai Lama Says Gay Marriage Is OK

Content:

Simon E. said:

Care to name this country which embodies all the virtues of non -prejudice ?

Malcolm wrote:

I think Dzoki is from the Czech Republic.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, March 14th, 2014 at 8:19 PM

Title: Re: Longde before Dzin Dharmabodhi?

Content:

dzoki said:

Hey, he bought a book, in a free society he can do whatever he wants with it.

Malcolm wrote:

It's a fundamentalist act, that is the point. Sure, he can do what he likes, just like I can fart in a car full of people, but that does not mean that everyone will like it.

We have huge problems with fundamentalism in the world today, Christian fundamentalism, Muslim Fundamentalism, etc. Let's not add to it with Buddhist fundamentalism.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, March 14th, 2014 at 8:14 PM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

.....This is so vague as to be utterly meaningless.

Andrew108 said:

It's based on the fact that no phenomenon exists that isn't the natural condition. So ordinariness is far from ordinary. A practitioner integrates into this natural condition that is right here. There is no projection through views, or filtering through logic, or wishing through goals.

Malcolm wrote:

The "natural condition" as you call it, isn't something real; it is baseless. It isn't out there, like "atoms", "stars" and "galaxies"; it isn't inside like "blood cells", "mitochondria", etc. This "natural" condition is just the nature of your own mind. It is not an objective condition— there is no "objective condition" because there is no "subjective condition". There is no "natural" condition because there is no "unnatural condition".

There is no wisdom apart from the mind and there is no consciousness apart from the mind, there is no buddhahood apart from the mind, there is no delusion apart from the mind, there is no samsara apart from the mind, no nirvana apart from the mind. Apart from the mind, nothing else needs to be recognized.

The mind is not real because it cannot be established, it is not unreal because one cannot deny that one is feeling, thinking and so on, therefore we say it has "no reality" i.e. there is no state of being that pertains to the mind, since the mind is beyond any extreme, it's nature is sheer clarity and emptiness inseparable. You won't find the mind by resting your attention on a rock, you won't find it by resting your attention on a thought, you won't find even if you rest your attention on the mind's own sheer clarity. You won't find it even if you ascertain sheer clarity is empty. You won't find in nāḍīs, vāyus and bindus, deities, mandalas, etc.

However, that being said, if you do not have a proper method, your afflictions will not cease, you will not gather the twin stores of merit and wisdom, you will not expand your mind to the point of omniscience and you will not realize buddhahood.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, March 14th, 2014 at 6:52 PM

Title: Re: Longde before Dzin Dharmabodhi?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Why? It is an interesting book. Sounds like Nazis burning books because they were written by Jews.

heart said:

Should I have thrown it in the garbage instead, is that more respectful? Anyway you just lost the argument.

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

No magnus, you should have given it to a library. Burning books is like censoring views, we don't encourage that in a free society.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, March 14th, 2014 at 5:22 AM

Title: Re: Longde before Dzin Dharmabodhi?

Content:

Sherlock said:

You can read his book, large portions are available on Google books. But basically he didn't accept the idea of termas at all.

Sarah Harding compiles some of the https://books.google.co.uk/books?id=rlxdncBwpgC&pg=PA151&lpg=PA151&dq=aris+pema+lingpa&source=bl&ots=5unP\_g0u1-&sig=\_dsZ1jOoWaBJ4sKpgLJV-RGhYVQ&hl=en&sa=X&ei=CAQiU72WO9S2hAf\_n4GQAQ&ved=0CD4Q6AEwAg#v=onepage&q=aris%20pema%20lingpa&f=false of Aris' approach even from a scholarly perspective.

heart said:

I read that book years ago, then burnt it. He seems to have beef with Pema Lingpa that goes far beyond any rationale explanation.

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

Why? It is an interesting book. Sounds like Nazis burning books because they were written by Jews.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, March 14th, 2014 at 5:21 AM

Title: Re: Longde before Dzin Dharmabodhi?

Content:

heart said:

A burnt seed can never be the cause of any fruit, so whatever we think about this subject if we don't believe these teachings comes from "someones" realization then we have broken samaya and left the sphere of vajrayana altogether. That said I do like you a lot pensum and even if I never met Malcolm I do enjoy his brilliant intellect and his flair for drama.

Malcolm wrote:

There is no samaya that says we must believe this or that text is a product of someone's realization, even a tantra or a sutra.

Why do you think there was and is controversy around things like Shugden, Termas etc.? Certainly the Shugden folks believe their protector comes from someone's realization. The people who disbelieve in Shugden think the person who tells them Shugden is a mistaken practice is realized.

In general the recommended approach is that if you are not sure of a teaching, don't criticize it because you might unwittingly criticize and authentic teaching of the Buddhas.

However, origin stories are not Dharma. Disbelieving the claim that some text was written by Padmasambhava or Vimalamitra, then hidden and then dug up 800 years later in some backwater in Kham where it is unlikely Padmasambhava ever set foot hardly constitutes breaking "samaya". Disbelieving that Buddha taught Guhyasamaja to Indrabhuti I hardly constitutes breaking samaya. Disbelieving that the eighteen tantras fell on the roof of King Za's house and then he had to recruit Kukuraja to understand them is hardly breaking samaya.

"Breaking samaya" means trying to turn people against the Dharma. No one is doing that here.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, March 14th, 2014 at 2:01 AM

Title: Re: Longde before Dzin Dharmabodhi?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

I intended to mention his papers, but I do not have his PhD thesis, it is not on the web yet.

mutsuk said:

It has been published in 1999 by Brepols Publisher.

Not really.

Well your opinion. I worked on both and the 17 tantras from JLA and it went pretty fast...

Malcolm wrote:

I was pointing out that the two texts, Longchenpa's short texts, and Nyibum's are dissimilar.

Of course if you are cutting and pasting citations it would go much faster.

mutsuk said:

JLA informed me on the phone today that he has also done a version of it in the meantime and that he has a Nyingma student preparing another one in French, not to mention a very well-known tibetologist who has prepared a paper on that text with sources based on a second mss of the text. This last one will appear in the RET I think but I don't know when.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, I will look forward to seeing it. In the meantime, our book is due sometime this spring. I am writing the introduction as we speak.

The main point in my mentioning this, of course, was to point out that there are examples of termas where entire texts are lifted from earlier Tibetan scholars with no hint of attribution, concealed by including a setting at Samye [despite the fact that Vimalamitra only came to Tibet at least a decade if not more after Trising Detsen passed away, during the reign of Ralpacan].

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, March 14th, 2014 at 1:23 AM

Title: Re: What major Tibetan Buddhist texts are still missing?

Content:

Tsultim Namdak said:

Where does that 10% estimate come from?

Malcolm wrote:

Dezhung Tulku.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, March 14th, 2014 at 1:22 AM

Title: Re: Longde before Dzin Dharmabodhi?

Content:

Sherlock said:

Aris straight out accused Pema Lingpa of fabricating terms for personal gain.

Malcolm wrote:

Yup, so did Drukpa Kunley. But he is a national hero in Bhutan.

Sherlock said:

We can't really know if the 17 tantras were revealed in this way or composed and edited intellectually

Malcolm wrote:

Yes we can.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, March 14th, 2014 at 1:19 AM

Title: Re: Longde before Dzin Dharmabodhi?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Guess I should just lay down and die right now then.

mutsum said:

There is no shame at referring to other people's work, especially if they have done a nearly similar job before.

Malcolm wrote:

I intended to mention his papers, but I do not have his PhD thesis, it is not on the web yet.

mutsum said:

After all, what is the point of doing any scholarship or translating anything into English?

Well in this field, if you read only english, then you're pretty limited. You have no idea the amount of works that have been done in Germa, French and Italian on Dzogchen...

Malcolm wrote:

I have some.

mutsuk said:

THis is how close they are actually.

Malcolm wrote:

Not really.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, March 14th, 2014 at 12:41 AM

Title: Re: Longde before Dzin Dharmabodhi?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

a text definitely authored by Zhangton Tashi Dorje's son, Nyibum (1158-1213), that is included word for word as a terma in the Gongpa Zangthal (revealed in 1366),with its authorship attributed to Vimalamitra. Honestly, it is incredible that no one has noticed this yet, but it is true.

mutsuk said:

It is because you don't read french. .

Malcolm wrote:

Guess I should just lay down and die right now then. After all, what is the point of doing any scholarship or translating anything into English?

More to the point, since Nyibum's text has only recently become available, how could anyone have noted that dgongs pa zang thal text was a [sloppily] reattributed version of it?

Finally, Nyibum's text and Longchenpa's text are pretty different. For one, Longchenpa's text has few citations. Nor does it contain a discussion of the Nidānas and so on. It is much shorter.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, March 14th, 2014 at 12:31 AM

Title: Re: Longde before Dzin Dharmabodhi?

Content:

pensum said:

Well, as Malcolm just pointed out, within the Tibetan tradition itself there are countless cases of highly regarded lamas denouncing the terma tradition as just that—a scam. Unfortunately, due to personal and political allegiances the authors of the few modern books on the terma tradition available (for example Tulku Thondrup and Andreas Doctor) do not give adequate voice to such criticism and opposition, but rather perpetuate the claims of the tertons themselves..

Malcolm wrote:

There is the late Michael Aris's book which got him exiled from Bhutan for life and earned him the permanent ire of Dilgo Khyentse Rinpoche. And we have to remember that until Chogyur Lingpa secured the endorsement of Khyentse Wangpo, even Kongtrul was doubtful, not to mention all those who thought he was a total fraud up to that point.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, March 14th, 2014 at 12:27 AM

Title: Re: What major Tibetan Buddhist texts are still missing?

Content:

conebeckham said:

Sikkim was a hidden land of Guru Rinpoche, actually.

Malcolm wrote:

It was only opened in the late 17th century.

conebeckham said:

Maybe, but it was there before then..and according to the Sikkimese, Guru Pema was there.

Malcolm wrote:

That does not mean there is a library there filled with old texts dating from before 1959, which is kind of the point of the discussion.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, March 14th, 2014 at 12:15 AM

Title: Re: Longde before Dzin Dharmabodhi?

Content:

heart said:

The point I am making is that the 17 Tantras are not supposed to be compositions.

Malcolm wrote:

The kun byed rgyal po is not supposed to be a composition, but it clearly is and no one seriously doubts this anymore. It is very clear that the larger Mahāyāna sūtras are layered text productions. The only people who doubt this are Mahāyāna fundamentalist. They are the same people who insist that Mt. Meru is real and that the sun revolves around it. Honestly, such people sound just like Christian and Muslim fundamentalists who insist that the Bible and the Koran were written by God and Allah respectively.

We all want our books to be "special" and the non-fabrication of a book is generally the key criteria that makes one book more sacred and one less. For example, the Vedas are sacred because they are "self-originated". Dzogchen tantras too claim the same status - they are self-originated texts.

When we look at this sort of thing, we have to understand that these are just strategies for acceptance. Another interesting strategy is one by Padmasambhava in the main commentarial text in the dkon mchog spyi 'dus, the Sumeru Commentary, where he remarks his own tantra (which is the root of that cycle) is superior to Indian tantras in Sanskrit because it is the speech of the Sambhogakāyā.

So the question will be asked? Can the practice of dkon mchog spyi 'dus lead to Buddhahood? Of course it can because all the Dharma in it is sound. The story of its account is just candy for children, like all these mythological accounts.

heart said:

That is the whole point of the terma tradition.

Malcolm wrote:

The point of the terma traditions is that termas are supposed, for the most part, to be the compositions of Padmasambhava, Vimalamitra and so on.

The book I am working on publishing is a translation of a text definitely authored by Zhangton Tashi Dorje's son, Nyibum (1158-1213), that is included word for word as a terma in the Gongpa Zangthal (revealed in 1366), with its authorship attributed to Vimalamitra. Honestly, it is incredible that no one has noticed this yet, but it is true.

heart said:

If Malcolm theory is correct, that the 17 Tantras were composed then the whole lineage would be a lie.

Malcolm wrote:

Not a lie, rather it is a didactic myth. But the seventeen tantras definitely did not exist as texts earlier than dates to which I have assigned them.

Pretty much we have to accept the origin stories of all Mahāyāna texts are either lies or didactic myths. I prefer the latter term.

heart said:

And it would be a very elaborate lie, very close to what we call a scam these days.

Malcolm wrote:

Certainly there were Tibetans who regarded such text production as scams, writing vociferous renunciations of such practices. We have Nyingma authors denouncing the nefarious intent of gold-seeking Indian Panditas who forged tantras on demand in the 13th century, and Sarma authors denouncing gold-seeking tertons who made shows of digging up texts in the very same century.

heart said:

Also we have a living example in ChNNR how texts like these can be discovered, I don't really see the point of doubting him.

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

I have no doubt that Norbu Rinpoche teachings appear to him in his dreams exactly as he describes them. This does not endorse the authenticity of the origin myths cooked up Zhangton, Nyangral Nyiozer, nor for that matter the myths cooked up to explain the origin of Kalacakra, the Prajñāpāramita, and so on. We, as well as Tibetans before us, tend to take things historically literal that were always regarded as "myth" in the Indian mind. Thus, Indians can manage many competing and contradictory origin myths about the same set of phenomena, but we can't, because we, and also Tibetans, tend to be historical literalists, a literalism you have just admirably demonstrated, i.e. "If the story isn't true, it must be a lie". The Indian mythic imagination thinks "This story is but one story of many". This is why, for example, the authors of the Kalacakra could elaborate a cosmology that they knew for a fact contradicted their mathematical calculations for the position of the sun and so on. Indian tantric authors simply borrowed myths and repurposed them, so the story of Rama's defeat of Ravana becomes the defeat of the Rudra King of Lanka by Hayagriva in Buddhist tales.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 13th, 2014 at 11:43 PM

Title: Re: Longde before Dzin Dharmabodhi?

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

Is samapatti a Vajrayāna form of meditation?

Malcolm wrote:

It can be, just as śamatha can be.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 13th, 2014 at 11:28 PM

Title: Re: Longde before Dzin Dharmabodhi?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Tregchö is just a name for samapatti.

dzogchungpa said:

Does that mean you can correctly practice Tregchö without transmission?

Malcolm wrote:

Like any Vajrayāna form of meditation, it cannot be practiced without transmission.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 13th, 2014 at 9:55 PM

Title: Re: Longde before Dzin Dharmabodhi?

Content:

heart said:

so their value is completely based on the intellectual capacity of the composer?

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

Of course. Not all Mahāyāna sūtras present the Buddha in the best light, for example. We have clear evidence of Buddhist/Hindu intertextuality, etc. Some termas are much clearer than others. Some terma cycles borrow entire texts authored by early Tibetan scholars and attribute them to people like Vimalamitra. Some tantras are more interesting than other tantras. Some authors of these texts were more realized than others.

I think we are long past the time where we can accept the traditional accounts of Buddhist textual origins. We have far too much evidence of the gradual development of Buddhist texts over centuries to doubt that the evolution of Buddhist ideas from the Nikayas to Vajrayāna is anything other than human beings working out their religious impulses in a Buddhist context.

It does not mean that I disagree with or disregard the ideas expressed in these texts, quite the contrary, I agree with them very much and regard them highly overall. I am after all a practitioner. I simply do not need to subscribe to the origin myths of Mahāyāna and Vajrāyāna texts to find religious meaning in them for myself, just like I do not need to believe in Mt. Meru to do mandala offerings.

In all of this, I am not saying any thing that I have not maintained for years. The difference is that now I have more confidence in my perspective because I have read more texts more closely.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 13th, 2014 at 9:44 PM

Title: Re: Longde before Dzin Dharmabodhi?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

You say "revealed", I say "composed".

heart said:

So, do you also think the Hevajra, Chakrasamavra the Guhyasamaya and all other Tantra's and the many Mahayana sutras were composed based on various socio-political pressure?

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

Of course. As well as the Pali Canon. All of these things were written by human beings. Some of them were buddhas. Text production comes from people; people live in societies; societies exert pressures, etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 13th, 2014 at 9:43 PM

Title: Re: African Americans & people of Color, & Buddhism in the W

Content:

zsc said:

the lived experiences of black people mean nothing (specifically, this is what Malcolm is saying, over and over), then I will do my best to address it.

Malcolm wrote:

I didn't say that.

What I do maintain is that for a Buddhist things like race, class, gender, etc., really should not be very important as identity markers for oneself as well as for others. To some extent is unavoidable, because we are human beings. But they are not a desiderata, they are barriers. Sanghas that consciously define themselves on the basis of race, class or ethnicity go against the Buddha's message that dismantled caste. Then it winds up being:

The White Power Sangha

The Black Power Sangha

etc.

This is wrong. If there is a Buddhist teacher you want to study with, then go and study. Do not pay attention his or her race, do not pay attention to the race of the people attending that teacher.

Actually, there is no such thing as race. Race is a stupid word. There are different cultures, languages and histories, but is only one human race. There are no black people, no white people, only human people.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 13th, 2014 at 9:28 PM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

Andrew108 said:

Sorry, but when I use the term Presence, I don't have a Tibetan word in mind.

Malcolm wrote:

Then I have no idea what you are taking about. It is useful to have Tibetan words in mind when you are making claims about Dzogchen doctrine.

Andrew108 said:

The objective condition is right in front of you. Here it is now. Calling it 'Presence' is indeed a reification, but then thinking we need to give it a Tibetan name is going way too far away from the intentions of Dzogchen.

Malcolm wrote:

This is so vague as to be utterly meaningless.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 13th, 2014 at 9:26 PM

Title: Re: Longde before Dzin Dharmabodhi?

Content:

Sherlock said:

Orgyenpa described the land he visited as Oddiyana and Buddhaguptanatha still called the place Oddiyana centuries later, so Oddiyana was probably real.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, while Oddiyana was certainly to the north and west of Bodhgaya, Pakistan and Afghanistan are big places. We do not have any definitive proof of exactly where Shambhala or Oddiyana might have been.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 13th, 2014 at 9:22 PM

Title: Re: Longde before Dzin Dharmabodhi?

Content:

Stewart said:

1. Do you believe Mennagde Dzogchen as we know it: Rushan, Trekcho, Tegal etc was ever practiced at all, in any form, in India?

Malcolm wrote:

It is my opinion that many of the rushan practices we find in man ngag sde have antecedents in Buddhist yogic circles in India. Tregchö is just a name for samapatti. Thogal has antecedents in Buddhist pratyahara practices, in my opinion.

Stewart said:

2. Or, do you hold that Semde and Longde have roots in India and came to Tibet via Sri Singha/Vairocana, and that Mennagde is a later development from these, solely developed in Tibet?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, this is pretty much what I think. Actually, what I think is that the terms sems sde and klong sde are totally anachronistic and have no meaning or value since they originate in the Vima Nyinthig. Actually, what I think is that the man ngag sde systems was developed because of the importation of the new tantras during the eleventh century from India. The evidence suggests that the man ngag sde system did not develop wide acceptance even in the Nyingma school until the mid 13th century. 13th century Nyingma authors like Rog ban make absolutely no mention of it, even though he discusses in quite some detail the history of Dzogchen, Vairocana and Śrī Simha in his book on Dharma history. Davidson discusses this briefly in his book. He also fails to mention the terma tradition.

Stewart said:

3.What about pre Sri Singha?

Malcolm wrote:

Its all pretty hazy before 1000 CE. But I see no reason doubt the historical existence of Śrī Simha or Vimalamitra, or for that matter Mañjuśrimitra or Garab Dorje.

Stewart said:

4.What about Dzogchen in Oddiyana? Was Oddiyana even real?

Malcolm wrote:

Good question. We are not even really sure where Oddiyana was.

Stewart said:

5.Was there Dzogchen in Zhang Zhung?

Malcolm wrote:

Pre- Buddhist? Very doubtful in my opinion.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 13th, 2014 at 9:01 PM

Title: Re: Longde before Dzin Dharmabodhi?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, you like the traditional narrative, it is like comfort food. As far as I can tell, the sgra thal 'gyur was among the last of the seventeen tantras to be composed (along with the rig pa rang shar, the rig pa rang grol, the mut rig phreng ba and the bkra shis mdzes rgyan), somewhere between 1060 and 1100, most likely by Chetsun Senge Wangchuck himself. The other twelve are earlier, dating between roughly 1020-1050, very likely composed by Dangma Lungyal.

heart said:

Love comfort food. Anyway, I think I have never heard about composing Tantra's, you don't mean revealed?

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

You say "revealed", I say "composed".

The tradition has it that Dangma Lungyal takes the "seventeen" tantras out of their place of concealment around 906. But the fact that Dangma knows about the Kadampas and mentioned Atisha by name, and the fact that Dangma and Chetsun were contemporaries of Drogmi Lotsawa, and the fact that four of the 17 tantras use terms introduced to Tibet by the Hevajra tantra places the composition of all seventeen tantras in the 11th century, and the composition of a large number of them in the late 11th century. There is virtually no evidence of the type of completion stage practices using nāḍīs, vāyus and bindus that we find in the yogini tantras in Tibetan texts prior to the 11th century, especially not in Dzogchen texts. It is only with the seventeen tantras that we begin to find a body centered praxis in Dzogchen. It is my opinion, not very popular amongst "the faithful", that man ngag sde was elaborated as a response to the arrival of new tantras from India. We even have Nyingma masters [Rog Ban] from the early 12th century complaining about these new fangled heretical practices involving nāḍīs, vāyus and bindus borrowed from Hindus [probably a complaint about Kalacakra's use of Hindu terms for the rasanā, lalanā and avadhūti].

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 13th, 2014 at 7:20 PM

Title: Re: Dr. Sanderson: Phowa etc. are directly from Saivism

Content:

haha said:

Gerge, thanks for the link.

Discussion was interesting but that did not continue further.

There is nothing to say but the biography of Virupa also supports Sanderson's theory.

Malcolm wrote:

Virupa's bio does not support text conversion. His bio indicates that he went around India converting non-Buddhists through acts of magical terror.

haha said:

Analyzing

-There are five Yin organs (heart, lungs, kidney, liver, and spleen), which are probably Wu Xing/ Five Elements theory from Chinese origin.

Malcolm wrote:

No, for example, there is a passage in the Aṣṭaṅgahridayam that gives these organs in this order:

Heart, lung, liver, gall bladder, spleen, kidney.

haha said:

-Then, they are associated with three major nadis (lalana, rasana and avadhuti), clarity and energy/bliss; it is the buddhist origin, especially from masters of Mahamudra.

Malcolm wrote:

The names are from Buddhist tantra, but it is not certain whether the concepts of the three main nāḍīs are Hindu (ida, pingala or śuśumna) or Buddhist in origin.

So, I don't really agree with you about "adaptation" in this instance. There is some evidence that the nāḍī system was borrowed by the Hindus from Buddhist tantra. But in fact at this point we simply don't know.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 13th, 2014 at 6:51 PM

Title: Re: Longde before Dzin Dharmabodhi?

Content:

heart said:

I really don't think that socio-political pressure is the main formative force in Buddhism or in Dzogchen. I fully believe ChNNR when he says he isn't the composer of the Longsal teachings and that the Dra Thalgyur is a very ancient Tantra.

/magnus

ratna said:

I, too, fully believe ChNN's description of the mode of discovery of visionary teachings.

Malcolm wrote:

I don't really want to get into a discussion of this, but no one doubts that klong gsal comes from his capacity in dream yoga and that they are not fabrications.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 13th, 2014 at 6:48 PM

Title: Re: Longde before Dzin Dharmabodhi?

Content:

heart said:

In fact I was thinking about vinaya, the first rule seem to have been "no rule" and then there seem to have been added a lot of rules because "no rule" made some monks misbehave in the strangest ways. Wouldn't it then be reasonable to assume that the first empowerment was "no empowerment" and that elaborations were added on that?

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

No, because the ritualism in Buddhism was a response to external pressure to perform in the socio-political sphere in a way that was previously not imperative.

heart said:

I really don't think that socio-political pressure is the main formative force in Buddhism or in Dzogchen.

Malcolm wrote:

In terms of Buddhist ritualism found in the tantras, it most certainly is. When it comes to tantra, the reasons for their concealment and revelation are always linked to social and political conditions. The same is true of the anuttarayoga tantras (i.e. they are the most effective practice for the degenerate times we live in).

heart said:

the Dra Thalgyur is a very ancient Tantra.

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, you like the traditional narrative, it is like comfort food. As far as I can tell, the sgra thal 'gyur was among the last of the seventeen tantras to be composed (along with the rig pa rang shar, the rig pa rang grol, the mut rig phreng ba and the bkra shis mdzes rgyan), somewhere between 1060 and 1100, most likely by Chetsun Senge Wangchuck himself. The other twelve are earlier, dating between roughly 1020-1050, very likely composed by Dangma Lungyal.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 13th, 2014 at 11:01 AM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

just one more reason to leave rigpa untranslated

Malcolm wrote:

Agreed, though I prefer vidyā.

anjali said:

Why do translators seem to have such a hard with translating just the word "rigpa" into English? If we just focus on the word, the English translation is fairly simple. rigpa<-- vidya-->wisdom. Wisdom is the combination of wis + dom where, Wis is Old English and can be traced back to Proto-Indo-European wid- "to see," hence "to know" (vid). Dom is also Old English and in this case means "state or condition". So, the root meaning of wisdom is the state of knowing.

If the word has additional technical meanings, no problem. Just provide a good glossary entry explaining the nuances. Philosophers do that sort of thing all the time--taking a commonly used word and giving special, more nuanced meanings.

Obviously, I'm missing something.

Malcolm wrote:

I tried it once, it didnt work since vidya does not have the same sense as wisdom in English. It is a case where the kn/gn phoneme has shifted meanings with vid phoneme.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 13th, 2014 at 7:07 AM

Title: Re: What major Tibetan Buddhist texts are still missing?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Nepal is well accounted for already, as is Ladakh. Sikkim is a backwater, Bhutan does not have that many libraries. Assam has virtually nothing.

kirtu said:

And Tawang? They seem to have a large library.

Kirt

Malcolm wrote:

Still a backwater.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 13th, 2014 at 7:06 AM

Title: Re: What major Tibetan Buddhist texts are still missing?

Content:

conebeckham said:

Sikkim was a hidden land of Guru Rinpoche, actually.

Malcolm wrote:

It was only opened in the late 17th century.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 13th, 2014 at 5:45 AM

Title: Re: Question: "Antinomianism" in the Higher Yoga Tantras

Content:

Heterodox Garden said:
the Cakrasaṃvara Tantra

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 13th, 2014 at 5:12 AM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

gad rgyangs said:
just one more reason to leave rigpa untranslated

Malcolm wrote:

Agreed, though I prefer vidyā.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 13th, 2014 at 4:26 AM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

gad rgyangs said:
what Tibetan term does Rinpoche have in mind when he uses the term "instant presence"?

Malcolm wrote:

Rig pa.

Presence = dran pa, i.e. mindfulness.

Some translators like to translate byang chub sems, bodhicitta, as "pure perfect presence".

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 13th, 2014 at 3:41 AM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

Andrew108 said:
Sorry, but when I use the term Presence, I don't have a Tibetan word in mind.

Malcolm wrote:

Then I have no idea what you are taking about. It is useful to have Tibetan words in mind when you are making claims about Dzogchen doctrine.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 13th, 2014 at 2:40 AM

Title: Re: What major Tibetan Buddhist texts are still missing?

Content:

kirtu said:

Tibetan borderland sources?

The borderlands I had in mind were Lhadak, Nepal, Sikkim, Bhutan, Tawang and anything that might have been saved in Assam.

Kirt

Malcolm wrote:

Nepal is well accounted for already, as is Ladakh. Sikkim is a backwater, Bhutan does not have that many libraries. Assam has virtually nothing.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 13th, 2014 at 2:23 AM

Title: Re: Longde before Dzin Dharmabodhi?

Content:

Sherlock said:

Isn't dialectic a better way to put it rather than puffery? Otherwise you can conclude in the end that tantra really is no superior to sutra.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, kriya tantra isn't, really. It is only when we come to "carya" and "yog" a tantras that we begin to find statements that indicate there is something more rapid than sūtra.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 13th, 2014 at 2:21 AM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

Andrew108 said:

In the case of Kalachakra it is said that the 'space particle' exists as the objective condition prior to minds that arise dependent on that.

Malcolm wrote:

Kalachakra merely states that physical matter is composed of atoms. But when it describes the source of the universe, the Vimalaprabha states:

When the universe withdraws, this karmavāyu (by which the the perishable universe and buddhaverses were created in the past) has two natures. One is like the stars fixed in space, never moves, and never goes to any region of the perishable universe and buddhaverse. The second has the nature of revolving just like the wheel of houses in the sky. In the same way, the inanimate things included in the the perishable universe have the nature of not moving. The creatures have the nature of moving. The karmavāyu [that creates them] is a quality of consciousness [of sentient beings [that is not nondual]]"...as such, infinite karmavāyus create the the perishable universe and the buddhaverses.

We can clearly see here that what creates the universe is a quality of consciousness. That quality is called karmavāyu. The empty atoms arise from the collective consciousness of all sentient beings. The same is true in Dzogchen teachings.

Andrew108 said:

In Dzogchen, Presence is the objective condition.

Malcolm wrote:

What tibetan term do you mean by presence?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 12th, 2014 at 11:36 PM

Title: Re: Longde before Dzin Dharmabodhi?

Content:

heart said:

In fact I was thinking about vinaya, the first rule seem to have been "no rule" and then there seem to have been added a lot of rules because "no rule" made some monks misbehave in the strangest ways. Wouldn't it then be reasonable to assume that the first empowerment was "no empowerment" and that elaborations where added on that?

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

No, because the ritualism in Buddhism was a response to external pressure to perform in the socio-political sphere in a way that was previously not imperative.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 12th, 2014 at 11:35 PM

Title: Re: Longde before Dzin Dharmabodhi?

Content:

heart said:

Makes the whole thing seem completely constructed.

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

Well, it is just how the texts appear over time that makes it seem that way. Yogacara and its sutras were a reaction to Prajñāpāramitā and Tathagagarbha sūtras. So too with the tantras, each successive generation of texts claims its superiority over the previous generation, both in the primary texts themselves as well as the commentaries written by their exponents.

Thus you have gsar ma claiming its superiority over snying ma; mother tantras over father; ati yoga over mahā; unsurpassed secret cycle declaring its superiority over sems sde and klong sde, as well as the outer, inner and secret cycles; yangti over everything else; terma over karma; Gelugs declaring Tsongkhapa's views superior to the previous Sakya school they grew out of and so on. One aspect of the history of Buddhism is but the history of a contest of puffery and exaggeration.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 12th, 2014 at 9:41 PM

Title: Re: Longde before Dzin Dharmabodhi?

Content:

Sherlock said:

Do you think that maybe around the 8th century, the distinction between Mahayogatantra and yogatantra wasn't as clear-cut as it seemed later?

Malcolm wrote:

There was not distinction, the Indians only knew of three classes of tantra then, kriya, carya and yoga, with Guhyasamaja and the Buddhasamyoga included among yoga tantra.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 12th, 2014 at 8:57 PM

Title: Re: Longde before Dzin Dharmabodhi?

Content:

heart said:

I am sure I miss a lot of points Malcolm. But don't you think that the direct introduction is the original empowerment that with time was elaborated with various variations of methods as well as an outline of the path?

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

No, I think the original empowerments were the elaborate abhisheka mandala rituals found in what is now known as "kriya tantra" which never included a "nature of the mind" or "formless" abhisheka until we come to what are now known as "yoga tantra". It is characteristic of kriya tantra empowerments that they only have a body and speech blessing, but no mind blessing.

Then I think "yoga" tantra morphed in anuttarayoga tantra into India. In Tibet yoga tantra, and especially the Guhyagarbha, morphed into mahā and ati, with anu added later because Tibetans did not go to receive any new teachings in India due to the economic chaos that caused the fall of the Tibetan empire in the 840's.

In India, anuttarayoga tantra morphed into the father, mother and Kalacakra tantras, with Kalacakra representing the final development of Indian tantras; just as the 17 tantras represent the final development of Tibetan tantra. In other words. the evolution of tantras was complete in the 11th century, as process that started in the 7th century.

One thing you should understand that is that the tantras written in Tibet are far more homogenous than post 8th century Indian tantras. I chalk this up the isolation of Tibetans from India during this period between 850 and roughly 1000.

Also I should add, the realization of the Anuttarat Tantra in general lead to the Mahāmudra dohas and the Dzogchen lungs.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 12th, 2014 at 8:33 PM

Title: Re: Longde before Dzin Dharmabodhi?

Content:

Sherlock said:

What do you mean by you have no doubt about Vairocana's teachings? You mean the Vajra Bridge? Isn't it also 11th century?

Malcolm wrote:

What I mean is that I think Vairocana went to India, met an Indian teacher named Śrī Siṃha (who is happens was also the master of Vimalamitra and perhaps Padmasambhava), and returned with this teacher's oral instructions. I think that Śrī Siṃha is the original source of Dzogchen teachings. I think it is perfectly reasonable to accept the Vajra Bridge instructions as well.

We have not done enough analysis on the other texts to see which ones might be accepted as Indian in origin, and which one's are Tibetan in origin. Any so called treasure texts we can automatically exclude as Tibetan compositions. Other criteria which indicates native Tibetan composition would be etymologies of terms like "byang chub sems" or "ye shes" which bear no relationship to their original Indian etymologies (bodhicitta, jñāna), but are based wholly on their Tibetan phonemes. The point is this is not to impugn the spiritual worth of Tibetan compositions, but to know what is what so we can have a better understanding of the early history of Dzogchen and Nyingma Tantra in general. Unfortunately, the compilers of the rnying ma rgyud 'bu, rather uncritically combined kama and terma tantras together. So for example, in the klong sde section of the atiyoga section, we find Dorje Lingpa's lta kpong yangs tantra, which is definitely a man snag sde class text.

Sherlock said:

What are the historical works we know for sure (accepted by Sarma too) that were written by Vairocana? I think there was a shamatha text but what else?

Malcolm wrote:

de kho na nyid sgron ma zhes bya ba phyag na rdo rje'i sgrub thabs thams cad rdzogs pa'i rgyan / (tattvapradīpa-nāma-vajrapāṇīsarvasādhana-purāṇa-lamkāra.)

[A] klu sgrub / (nāgārjuna.), [Tr] padma 'byung gnas / (padmakara.), [Tr] glang dpal gyi seng ge (zrīsiMha.), [Rev] rgya gar phyag /

[P. No.] 3048, rgyud 'grel, bi 183a8-209a5 (vol.68, p.173)

[D. No.] 2204, , dzi 147b4-168b1. [N] bi 160a1-183b2. [Kinsha] 1052, bi 223b1 (p.113-2-1) thugs kyi sgo lcags / ([cittatāḷaka.])

[A] zrīsiGhi (zrīsiMha).

[P. No.] 4758, rgyud 'grel, mu 159a8-164a7 (vol.83, p.241243)

[D. No.] -. [N] mu 164b4-168b7. [Kinsha] 2757, mu 182b4 (p.93-1-4)

u SHN'i SHa sngags kyi man ngag gi bsgrub thabs zhes bya ba / (uSNISamantropadezasādhana-nāma.)

[A] zrīsiMha., [Tr] vairocana., [Tr] zrīsiMha.

[P. No.] 4851, rgyud 'grel, zu 149a1-153a5 (vol.86, p.111113)

[D. No.] -. [N] zu 145b1-150a2. [Kinsha] 2850, zu 194b1 (p.99-1-1)

'khor ba rtsad nas gcod pa gtan tshigs 'khor lo'i man ngag (saMsAramUlacchedakahetucakropadeza.)

[A] zrīsiGGa (zrīsiMha).

[P. No.] 5031, rgyud 'grel, ru 1a1-3a2 (vol.87, p.109-111)

[D. No.] -. [N] ru 1a1-3b3. [Kinsha] 3030, ru 1b1 (p.1-2-1)

'khor ba rtsad nas gcod pa bdud rtsi dri med kyi man ngag (saMsAramUlacchedakavimalāmr̥topadeza.)

[A] zrīsiGGa (zrīsiMha).

[P. No.] 5032, rgyud 'grel, ru 3a2-4a6 (vol.87, p.111)

[D. No.] -. [N] ru 3b3-5a2. [Kinsha] 3031, ru 3b3 (p.3-2-3)

'khor ba rtsad nas gcod pa rdo rje sems dpa'i man ngag (saMsAramUlacchedkavajrasattvopadeza.)

[A] zrīsiGGa (zrīsiMha).

[P. No.] 5033, rgyud 'grel, ru 4a7-5b2 (vol.87, p.111-112)

[D. No.] -. [N] ru 5a2-6a6. [Kinsha] 3032, ru 5b1 (p.3-4-1)

'khor ba rtsad nas gcod pa gser gyi thigs pa'i gdams ngag

(saMsAramUlacchedakakaJcanabindUpadeza.)

[A] zrisiGGa (zrlsiMha)., [Tr] vairocana.

[P. No.] 5034, rgyud 'grel, ru 5b2-6b3 (vol.87, p.112)

[D. No.] -. [N] ru 6a6-7a6. [Kinsha] 3033, ru 8b1 (p.5-3-1)

'khor ba rtsad nas gcod pa snyan rgyud yi ge med pa'i gdams ngag

(saMsAramUlacchedakakarNatantrAnakSaropadeza.)

[A] zrisiGGa (zrlsiMha).

[P. No.] 5035, rgyud 'grel, ru 6b3-7a1 (vol.87, p.112-113)

[D. No.] -. [N] ru 7a6-7b3. [Kinsha] 3034, ru 9b5 (p.5-4-5)

lta ba nam mkha' dang mnyam pa'i rgyud kyi dka' 'grel /

(AkAzasamadarzanatantrapajjikA.)

[A] dga' rab rdo rje / (surativajra.), [Tr] vairocana., [Tr] zrisiGGa (zrlsiMha).

[P. No.] 5036, rgyud 'grel, ru 7a1-10a8 (vol.87, p.113-114)

[D. No.] -. [N] ru 7b3-10b4. [Kinsha] 3035, ru 11b1 (p.7-2-1)

bsgom pa rgya mtsho dang mnyam pa'i rgyud kyi dka' 'grel /

(samudrasamabhAvanAtantrapajjikA.)

[A] dga' rab rdo rje / (surativajra.), [Tr] vairocana., [Tr] zrisiGGa (zrlsiMha).

[P. No.] 5037, rgyud 'grel, ru 10a8-12b2 (vol.87, p.114-115)

[D. No.] -. [N] ru 10b4-12b4. [Kinsha] 3036, ru 16b1 (p.9-3-1)

spyod pa nyi zla dang mnyam pa'i rgyud kyi dka' 'grel /

(sUryacandrasamacaryAtantrapajjikA.)

[A] dga' rab rdo rje / (surativajra.), [Tr] vairocana., [Tr] zrisiGGa (zrlsiMha).

[P. No.] 5038, rgyud 'grel, ru 12b2-15b2 (vol.87, p.115-116)

[D. No.] -. [N] ru 12b4-15a7. [Kinsha] 3037, yu 19a2 (p.10-2-2)

'bras bu rin po che dang mnyam pa'i rgyud kyi dka' 'grel /

(mahAratnasamaphalatantrapajjikA.)

[A] dga' rab rdo rje / (surativajra.), [Tr] vairocana., [Tr] zrisiGGa (zrlsiMha).

[P. No.] 5039, rgyud 'grel, ru 15b2-18a8 (vol.87, p.116-117)

[D. No.] -. [N] ru 15a7-17b7. [Kinsha] 3038, ru 23b1 (p.13-2-1)

lta ba ye shes mdzod chen chos kyi dbyings / (dRSTijJAnamahAkozadharmadhAtu.)

[A] zrisiGGa (zrlsiMha).

[P. No.] 5040, rgyud 'grel, ru 18a8-19b8 (vol.87, p.117-118)

[D. No.] -. [N] ru 18a1-19b3. [Kinsha] 3039, ru 28b1 (p.15-3-1)

bsgom pa ye shes gsal ba chos kyi dbyings / (bhAvanAjJAnaprakAzadharmadhAtu.)

[A] zrisiGGa (zrlsiMha).

[P. No.] 5041, rgyud 'grel, ru 19b8-20b8 (vol.87, p.118)

[D. No.] -. [N] ru 19b4-20b5. [Kinsha] 3040, ru 30a6 (p.16-1-6)

spyod pa ye shes 'bar ba chos kyi dbyings / (caryAjJAnajvaladharmadhAtu.)

[A] zrisiGGa (zrlsiMha).

[P. No.] 5042, rgyud 'grel, ru 20b8-21b3 (vol.87, p.118)
[D. No.] -. [N] ru 20b5-21b3. [Kinsha] 3041, ru 31b4 (p.17-2-4)

'bras bu ye shes sa gcig chos kyi dbyings / (phalajJAnaikabhUmidharmadhAtu.)
[A] zrisiGGa (zrlsiMha)., [Tr] virocana (vairocana).
[P. No.] 5047, rgyud 'grel, ru 28b3-30a6 (vol.87, p.121-122)
[D. No.] -. [N] ru 27b7-29b2. [Kinsha] 3046, ru 43b1 (p.23-2-1) rigs pa grub pa'i sgron ma / (nyAyasiddhAloka.)

[A] candragomin., [Tr] virocana., [Tr] zrlsiMhaprabha.
[P. No.] 5740, tshad ma, ze 197b7-198b6 (vol.138, p.51-52)
[D. No.] 4242, tshad ma, zhe 187b5-188b2. [N] ze 200b6-201b5. [Kinsha] 3740, ze 261b5
(p.131-4-5)

You will note that the Sakyapas who edited the Dege Kagyur excluded most of these texts, but they are present in earlier versions of the Tenjur. Note the presence of a short text on logic last translated by Śrī Siṃha and Vairocana.

It is likely that some texts in the Bairo Gyudbum may have actually been authored by Śrī Siṃha or Vairocana.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Wednesday, March 12th, 2014 at 8:17 PM
Title: Re: Longde before Dzin Dharmabodhi?
Content:

heart said:
I am not so sure about that. My feeling is that the duality of development and completion stages is something that wasn't so developed in the early Nyingma Tantra's.

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:
It was quite well developed which is why 9th century texts like the kun byed rgyal po went to such pains to reject it. For example the mdo bcu, thought to have been authored Vairocana states:

Since the place of Samantbhadra arises, there is not need for the creation and completion samadhis.

Or the Vajrasattvamāyājālaguhyasarvādarśa-nāma-tantra, included in the rNying ma rgyud 'bum as well as the bKa' 'gyur, states:

bskyed rdzogs thabs rim gang bstan pa/ /sgyu 'phrul dra bar 'dus pa ste

Any teaching of the stages of the method of creation and completion are included in the Māyājāla

Of course, unifying the two stages is the whole point of the process to begin with in both earlier as well as later tantra.

heart said:

I am sure your quotes are correct, but ultimately if you look deep enough in to the well of Dharma you will find the root of Dharma is actual realization. Methods were taught to facilitate that realization and without the actual realization being introduced to the student how could these methods ever work? So, from the beginning the methods taught might have been quite simple and closely related to the natural state, later (in my opinion) these become the fully fledged two phases.

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

Well, it is certainly true that realization is the goal of any vehicle within Buddhadharma.

The point is that with the elaboration of Unsurpassed Yoga Tantra (not yet known as such in India in the 8th century), the completion stage became a fully elaborated set of practices unto itself. These eventually divorced from the creation stage in the seventeen tantras and their instructions. The fact that there is ambivalence about divorcing Dzogchen from the two stages about this is indicated by such texts as the Khandro Nyingthig, which reimport Mahāyoga and Anuyoga practices, as well as borrow the sexual yoga practices of Ghantapada's Five Stages. Not only this, but the fact that the seventeen tantras elaborate a whole brand new set of empowerments, and that there are recommendations in The Heart Mirror of Vajrasattva and the Self-Arisen Vidyā to practice the three inner tantras as a unity indicates that Tibetans had considerable ambivalence about discarding the classic gradual path system of the inner tantras.

In other words, like Mahāmudra Dohas, the original Dzogchen lungs literally describe the state of realization itself, and they do not describe a path at all. They describe a result. The three traditions of "sems sde" each take different approaches to the material found in the 21 bodhicitta texts; with the upshot that they were combined into a single system at Kahthog called "rgyud mdo rdzogs", i.e. the practice of The Tantra, the Compendium, and Dzogchen.

The key point you are missing, Magnus, is that for something to be secret mantra—and Dzogchen is part of secret mantra—it must be predicated on an empowerment of some kind and a guru. Even the five original lungs of Vairocana make this abundantly clear.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 12th, 2014 at 9:57 AM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

Well, I like the idea of infinitely many minds and their traces generating appearances for each other. It's kind of like a mmorpg. Just to be clear, when you say appearances, those are mental events, right?

Malcolm wrote:

It's complicated.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 12th, 2014 at 8:30 AM

Title: Re: African Americans & people of Color, & Buddhism in the W

Content:

zsc said:

I am a black person.

.

Malcolm wrote:

In this birth. In another you were not human, in another you were a world emperor. In another, an untouchable. In another, Warren Buffet would look like a pauper next to you.

Buddhadharma comes first: race, gender, class, position, these things are not really terribly important.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 12th, 2014 at 8:15 AM

Title: Re: What major Tibetan Buddhist texts are still missing?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

We have only 10% of what existed in Tibet prior to 1959.

kirtu said:

WHAT?? What about the translated German, French and Russian texts in the 19th century and beginning 20th centuries?

Kirt

Malcolm wrote:

A drop in the bucket.

kirtu said:

More to the point, can the texts be recovered from the Mongolian texts coming to light (the ones saved from the Red Terror after 1924) and from Kalmyk, Siberian and

Malcolm wrote:

Virtually all Gelug, and most post- 17th century.

kirtu said:
Tibetan borderland sources?

Malcolm wrote:
Most of the texts in Tibet that were lost were lost due to the wholesale destruction of libraries during the cultural revolution.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Wednesday, March 12th, 2014 at 6:38 AM
Title: Re: Dr. Sanderson: Phowa etc. are directly from Saivism
Content:
haha said:
What do you say about this?

Malcolm wrote:
What is there to say?

Yamala tanta has referred Rishi Vashistha went to Mahacina. Does this Rishi have any relationship with the lineage of Dzogchen-teachers from Oddiyana and India?
No, not at all.

Is it the synthesis of Taoist and Buddhist ideas about nadi and prana/chi?
No.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Wednesday, March 12th, 2014 at 6:35 AM
Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind
Content:
dzogchungpa said:
I don't see why someone who doesn't accept "out there" accepts "other minds", if only conventionally or whatever.

Malcolm wrote:
It is quite simple. If there were not other minds "out there", when you are liberated, all other beings would be liberated.

smcj said:
Well, from your perspective, at that point they are!

Malcolm wrote:
But you recognize from their perspective, they are still trapped in the fog of ignorance. This is very clearly stated in multiple texts.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 12th, 2014 at 6:34 AM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

I don't see why someone who doesn't accept "out there" accepts "other minds", if only conventionally or whatever.

Malcolm wrote:

It is quite simple. If there were not other minds "out there", when you are liberated, all other beings would be liberated. Vasubandhu defends the existence other minds in a mind-only world in 20 verses.

dzogchungpa said:

OK, but that seems to be begging the question since you are apparently assuming that there are other beings to begin with.

Malcolm wrote:

Conventionally, no Buddhist school rejects that there are a diversity of sentient beings.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 12th, 2014 at 3:53 AM

Title: Re: Longde before Dzin Dharmabodhi?

Content:

alpha said:

I read in the big red book that Vairochana has met Garad Dorje in Dhumastira where he received the entire dzogchen cycle from him. So that would theoretically mean that he received Vajra Bridge as well ?

Also in Golden letters there is a mention of a lineage of Anuyoga where Dharmabodhi looks to be contemporary to Vairochana or just a couple of generations away. If Vajra Bridge has started with Vairochana there are lots of chances that this teaching would reach Dharmabodhi without too many problems.

In this regard of some importance would also be the exegetical treatises composed on the Vajra bridge by some of Dharmabodhi's disciples but i have no idea if these works are known or available...

Malcolm wrote:

We have Dharmabodhi's disciple, Kunzang Dorje's elaborate commentaries on the Vajra Bridge.

There were seven lineage masters between Pang Mipham and Dzeng Dharmabodhi, providing I counted correctly.

Btw, I do not have any doubt about Vairocana's teachings, though it is impossible, in my opinion, that every text attributed to him or Shri Simha was actually penned by them. What I do not accept the historicity of is the account of man ngag sde tantras.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 12th, 2014 at 3:45 AM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

I don't see why someone who doesn't accept "out there" accepts "other minds", if only conventionally or whatever.

Malcolm wrote:

It is quite simple. If there were not other minds "out there", when you are liberated, all other beings would be liberated. Vasubandhu defends the existence other minds in a mind-only world in 20 verses.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 12th, 2014 at 3:43 AM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

Andrew108 said:

Some of us are realists.

Malcolm wrote:

Some of you have no understanding of Dzogchen, or indeed Vajrayāna, at all.

Andrew108 said:

Take a look at Kalachakra. There are systems of Buddhist thought/practice that assert an objective condition.

Malcolm wrote:

What makes you think Kalacakra asserts that outer world is real? Mipham comments on 1.6 of the Kalacakra tantra:

The essence of the secret elements come from this aspect of the subtle mind, then the stuff of the inner elements etc., and by that, the external 5 elements. From those the planets, stars etc. arise. This is an important pith of all the upāya path of the secret mantra.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 12th, 2014 at 1:52 AM

Title: Re: What major Tibetan Buddhist texts are still missing?

Content:

ConradTree said:

Isn't all this stuff in Bhutan?

Bhutan was the shelter to Gelug suppression.

Malcolm wrote:

Not even remotely. Well, there are still a lot of texts in the library of Sakya no one has ever seen.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 12th, 2014 at 1:30 AM

Title: Re: What major Tibetan Buddhist texts are still missing?

Content:

ConradTree said:

Yes, but what *major* texts are missing like the commentaries on the 17 tantras?

As you know, most Tibetan Buddhist texts are redundant.

Malcolm wrote:

Three volumes of commentary on Kalacakra by Lama Dampa Sonam Gyaltzen, there are so many...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 12th, 2014 at 1:21 AM

Title: Re: What major Tibetan Buddhist texts are still missing?

Content:

ConradTree said:

What major Tibetan Buddhist texts are still missing?

Besides some of the commentaries on the 17 tantras of dzogchen menngagde.

Malcolm wrote:

We have only 10% of what existed in Tibet prior to 1959.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 12th, 2014 at 1:19 AM

Title: Re: Longde before Dzin Dharmabodhi?

Content:

heart said:

I am not so sure about that. My feeling is that the duality of development and completion stages is something that wasn't so developed in the early Nyingma Tantra's.

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

It was quite well developed which is why 9th century texts like the kun byed rgyal po went to such pains to reject it. For example the mdo bcu, thought to have been authored Vairocana states:

Since the place of Samantbhadra arises, there is not need for the creation and completion samadhis.

Or the Vajrasattvamāyājālaguhyasarvādarśa-nāma-tantra, included in the rNying ma rgyud 'bum as well as the bKa' 'gyur, states:

bskyed rdzogs thabs rim gang bstan pa/ /sgyu 'phrul dra bar 'dus pa ste

Any teaching of the stages of the method of creation and completion are included in the Māyājāla

Of course, unifying the two stages is the whole point of the process to begin with in both earlier as well as later tantra.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 12th, 2014 at 12:44 AM

Title: Re: Dr. Sanderson: Phowa etc. are directly from Saivism

Content:

Sherlock said:

OK thanks. Actually given the recent scientific study about tummo in some nuns and how the main mechanism behind the raise in temperature is due to the forceful breathing while visualization mainly helps the practitioners maintain the forceful breathing for longer periods, this makes a lot of sense rather than a concept of some nonphysocal force. The idea of a nonphysical force is the one you had been railing against for some time?

Malcolm wrote:

Well, it is not supported by our tradition. The so called "energy winds" are just vāyu, which is just the element of air. Of course, there are grosser and subtler kind of vāyu, but they all belong to the air element and are not different than the air element.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 12th, 2014 at 12:42 AM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

Andrew108 said:

Some of us are realists.

Malcolm wrote:

Some of you have no understanding of Dzogchen, or indeed Vajrayāna, at all.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 12th, 2014 at 12:32 AM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

Andrew108 said:

He is referring to the fact that 'mere' appearances also have functionality. They have energy. We are not remaking the world just by observing it and judging it. It has it's own condition that is independent of the mind that observes it. Some of us are realists.

Malcolm wrote:

No one asserted that world was made by judging and observing. The Dzogchen view of the world is that it's appearances generated by traces in the minds of sentient beings, and that the traces in the minds of sentient beings have the capacity to generate appearances for other minds. So all of our minds together, because of our strong traces to which we are habituated from beginning less time, generate the appearances of the Universe together. Of course this does not mean that the traces of the mind have some state other than bodhicitta. They arise because bodhicitta, the nature of the mind, has not been recognized.

Appearances range from function to non-functional, but in the end they merely appearances of our own minds. The point of view of Dzogchen, and indeed, Vajrayāna in general, is that there is nothing "out there" which objectively exists.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 11th, 2014 at 11:58 PM

Title: Re: Dr. Sanderson: Phowa etc. are directly from Saivism

Content:

Sherlock said:

So the way in which they physically exist is just our blood and lymph channels, the nuscular system etc?

Malcolm wrote:

Well, for example, in the system of the Vajra Bridge, Kunzang Dorje, a disciple of Dharmabodhi who lived in the later 12th century, describes the nāḍīs very clearly as follows:

"Since it is necessary to understand the critical point of nāḍīs and vāyu, though there are 80,000 nāḍīs in a single body, they are gathered into five in the organ of the heart [don snying]. Blood and vāyu exist in the heart nāḍī, the lalanā, which exists on the right. Lymph [chu ser] and vāyu exist in the lung nāḍī, the rasanā, which exists on the left.

Vāyu and bindu exist in the kidney nāḍī, the avādhuti (kun 'dar ma), which exists in the middle. The liver nāḍī generates the pure essence of the sense organs, exists above, and illuminates [sense] consciousness. Since the spleen nāḍī is the lower end of the avadhuti, it produces bliss."

They are necessarily physical structures which contain physical things such as vāyu and bindu, blood and lymph, feces and urine etc. This is merely one example I can provide out of many.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 11th, 2014 at 11:34 PM

Title: Re: Longde before Dzin Dharmabodhi?

Content:

Sherab said:

In addition to the aggregates, there has to be certain relationships in the aggregates and between the aggregates in order for there to be a proper basis for the taking of a designation.

Malcolm wrote:

There is no end. You cannot arbitrarily decide where to end the dependency. In this case, you can only designate the universe as "a self" since everything in it is a dependent relationship. Remember, the material aggregate includes all sense organs and sense objects!

For the reason a so called "dependent" self should be rejected out of hand as incoherent. "Identity" merely exists as a designation upon a collection of parts. For example, you have "a car" because this collection of parts functions according to your expectations; you have a "broken car" when it does not; and when it is a scrap yard, it is called "a dismantled car", for example, "that is a door from a BMW". But there is no dependent identity. "Identity" is merely a convention, and purely a product of designation upon an appearance, nothing more. The identity we impute is a designation based on an appearance, but the fact that identity is not dependent on the appearance can be understood from all the different identities that can be imputed upon an appearance, "Human", "Malcolm", "Löppon", "Asshole", "Heretic", "Buddhist" and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 11th, 2014 at 11:24 PM

Title: Re: Longde before Dzin Dharmabodhi?

Content:

Fa Dao said:

Magnus..I remember that as well..just trying to get a little history of practice in Longde prior to that is all

heart said:

To tell you the truth I think there have always been Tantric elements in Dzogchen.

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

It's pretty clear that Dzogchen started out life as the realization of the completion stage, identical with Mahāmudra in the gsar ma system [The Kagyupas turned Mahāmudra into an independent system in the 12th century, which as we know elicited a strong reaction from Sakya Pandita]. It was only in the 10th century that Dzogchen became a separate vehicle.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 11th, 2014 at 7:44 PM

Title: Re: Longde before Dzin Dharmabodhi?

Content:

Fa Dao said:

ChNNR has said that it was Dzin Dharmabodhi that added in the practice of Ngondzog Gyalpo into the Longde teachings. Does anyone know what they were like prior to this?

Malcolm wrote:

We have absolutely no evidence of the Vajra Bridge aka klong sde prior to Dzeng Dharmabodhi. This basically means that like everything else in Tibetan Buddhism, very little can be positively dated before the 11th century. Dates about texts and authors only begin to become clear in the 11 century. For Tibetans, even the 11th century is hazy to those in the 12th, not to mention anything prior to the 11th.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 11th, 2014 at 7:39 PM

Title: Re: Dr. Sanderson: Phowa etc. are directly from Saivism

Content:

Sherlock said:

But I thought you said before that Tibetans realized they were not physical when they dissected bodies and dddn't find any of those channels.

Malcolm wrote:

No, I have never maintained that.

What I said was that the way the nāḍīs exist in the body does not correspond to how they are visualized, not that they do not physically exist. They do physically exist because their process of development during gestation is very precisely described in tantras such as Kālacakra, sGra thaḥ 'gyur and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 11th, 2014 at 7:36 PM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

Sherab said:

Elaboration of dependent self:

A dependent self exists because of certain relationships between its parts. These relationships in turn are dependent on the laws of nature. Without a certain stability in the laws of nature for a certain duration, a dependent self cannot exist.

Those who wish to posit that the relative is ultimately illusory, must therefore show that the laws of nature are ultimately illusory. As I see it, modern science is heading in that direction, but is still far from reaching a definitive answer.

Malcolm wrote:

A self is merely a designation, and does not exist apart from designation. It has no parts. A self cannot be found in a part, nor in all of the parts combined. This is why there is no "dependent self". If there were a "dependent" self, it would have to be shown which part is the key part upon which it depended. Since a self cannot be found in one of the aggregates, all of the aggregates or separate from the aggregates, for this reason one cannot accept the existence of a so-called "dependent" self. In fact the two terms are mutually exclusive, like "dependent inherent existence".

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 11th, 2014 at 6:08 PM

Title: Re: Dr. Sanderson: Phowa etc. are directly from Saivism

Content:

Sherlock said:

According to that Germano article, the Upanishad channel involved a connection from the heart to the head, it wasn't the fully elaborated system that appears in the yoginitantras. There was no fully system of channels and cakras during the initial transmission of tantra to Tibet in the 8th-9th century so it was fully elaborated only in between then and around 1000CE.

.

Malcolm wrote:

I just wanted to add, I have looked at all the Dzogchen literature extant that could conceivably be pre- 1000, and none of it has any trace of concern or interest in anything remotely resembling the nāḍī, vāyu and bindu systems present in Hevajra, Kalacakra, and so on.

This only changes when we come to the man ngag sde tantras. For this as well as other reasons, I place the composition of the bulk of the seventeen tantras no earlier than 1020-1030 with the sgra thal 'gyur, the mu tig phreng ba, the rig pa rang shar and rang grol as well as the bkra shis mdzes ldan being the last. The sgra thal 'gyur was almost certainly composed by Chetsun Senge Wangchuck, in my opinion.

Sherlock said:

What about Bon Dzogchen?

Malcolm wrote:

It is all 11th century and later, like all bon texts.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 11th, 2014 at 6:06 PM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

Getting back to the topic, here's another "misleading" quotation, from "The Crystal and the Way of Light": The Base, or Zhi in Tibetan, is the term used to denote the fundamental ground of existence, both at the universal level and at the level of the individual, the two being essentially the same; to realize the one is to realize the other. If you realize yourself, you realize the nature of the universe.

Malcolm wrote:

This is no different than saying that if one realizes the emptiness of one thing, one realizes the emptiness of all things. The principle is the same.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 11th, 2014 at 6:02 PM

Title: Re: Pronunciation (yes one of these)

Content:

Konchog1 said:

This is sort of embarrassing, one would think that over the whole internet there would be easy to find answers that agree with each other for something so simple.

Nope.

I've been reciting the excellent Sutra of Golden Light and I am unsure of the pronunciation of part of this Dharani:

NAMO BUDDHĀYA/ NAMO DHARMĀYA/ NAMAH SANGHĀYA/ NAMO BRAHMĀYA/ NAMA
INDRĀYA/ NAMA CHATURNĀM/ MAHĀRĀJĀNĀM/ TADYATHĀ/ HILI HILI/ MILI MILI/
GAURI/ MAHĀGAURI/ GANDHARI/ MAHĀGANDHARI/ DRIMIDI/ MAHĀDRIMIDI/

DANDAKHUKHUNATI/HA HA HA HA/ HI HI HI HI/ HU HU HU HU/ HALODHAME/
GUDHAME/ CHA CHA CHA CHA/ CHI CHI CHI CHI/ CHU CHU CHU CHU/
CHANDESHVARA/ SHIKHARA/ SHIKHARA/ UTISHTHAHE BHAGAVĀN/ SAMVIDJÑĀYE
SVĀHĀ

<http://www.sutraofgoldenlight.com/2011/06/chapter-19-completed-samjnaya-lord-of.html>

CHANDESHVARA/ SHIKHARA/ SHIKHARA/ UTISHTHAHE BHAGAVĀN/ SAMVIDJÑĀYE
SVĀHĀ should be pronounced as CHANDE SW ARA/ SHIKHARA/ SHIKHARA/UTISHTHAHE BHAGA W ĀN/ SAMVID NYA YE S W ĀHĀ right?

Thank you.

Malcolm wrote:
Gnya

Author: Malcolm
Date: Tuesday, March 11th, 2014 at 9:16 AM
Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind
Content:
Sherab said:
Elaboration of dependent self:

A dependent self exists because of certain relationships between its parts. These relationships in turn are dependent on the laws of nature. Without a certain stability in the laws of nature for a certain duration, a dependent self cannot exist.

Those who wish to posit that the relative is ultimately illusory, must therefore show that the laws of nature are ultimately illusory. As I see it, modern science is heading in that direction, but is still far from reaching a definitive answer.

Malcolm wrote:
So you are realist, not different at all from Sarvastivadins.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Tuesday, March 11th, 2014 at 7:54 AM
Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind
Content:
Sherab said:

I don't agree with you argument about not naming as it seems to deny that a dependent self exists in the sphere of the relative. As for a self in the sphere of the ultimate, my take is that the experience of nirvana or enlightenment is an experience where the concept of a self or no-self as understood in the sphere of the relative becomes incoherent, but the individuality of the experience cannot be denied.

Malcolm wrote:

There is no "dependent" self, there is only a designated self. Apart its designation, the self, such as it is, is the son of a barren woman. If there were a dependent self, it would exist designated upon its parts, like a car or a cup. So what are the parts of the self upon which it is designated?

Sherab said:

There is no things, inanimate or otherwise, that exist designated on its parts. If it did, then by taking apart say a chariot and pile them into a heap, it will not be a pile of other things, but will still be designated as a chariot. A thing exists and functions only when the parts are in a particular relationship with each other. When that particular relationship exists between the parts, a dependent self exists. Upon that dependent self, a label or name is designated.

Malcolm wrote:

You just refuted a dependent self.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 11th, 2014 at 5:57 AM

Title: Re: Dr. Sanderson: Phowa etc. are directly from Saivism

Content:

Sherlock said:

According to that Germano article, the Upanishad channel involved a connection from the heart to the head, it wasn't the fully elaborated system that appears in the yoginitantras. There was no fully system of channels and cakras during the initial transmission of tantra to Tibet in the 8th-9th century so it was fully elaborated only in between then and around 1000CE.

.

Malcolm wrote:

I just wanted to add, I have looked at all the Dzogchen literature extant that could conceivably be pre- 1000, and none of it has any trace of concern or interest in anything remotely resembling the nāḍī, vāyu and bindu systems present in Hevajra, Kalacakra, and so on.

This only changes when we come to the man ngag sde tantras. For this as well as other reasons, I place the composition of the bulk of the seventeen tantras no earlier than 1020-1030 with the sgra thal 'gyur, the mu tig phreng ba, the rig pa rang shar and rang grol as well as the bkra shis mdzes ldan being the last. The sgra thal 'gyur was almost certainly composed by Chetsun Senge Wangchuck, in my opinion.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 11th, 2014 at 5:24 AM

Title: Re: Madhyamaka vs Dzogchen - Is this right?

Content:

ConradTree said:

Madhyamaka..... Dzogchen

freedom from extremes..... freedom from extremes dependent origination.....kadag, lhun grub and thugs rje two truths.....discards two truths

no tantric features.....direct introduction, dream yoga, dark retreat, description of death process, description of empty clarity etc.

Malcolm wrote:

Something like that. Dzogchen is a part of secret mantra.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 11th, 2014 at 5:23 AM

Title: Re: Dr. Sanderson: Phowa etc. are directly from Saivism

Content:

ConradTree said:

The debate is how much of Dzogchen is Indian Buddhist vs Tibetan Buddhist.

Malcolm wrote:

My guess, about 5% Indian, 95% Tibetan.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 11th, 2014 at 5:21 AM

Title: Re: Dr. Sanderson: Phowa etc. are directly from Saivism

Content:

Sherlock said:

That's a good point -- maybe the overall concept that there are subtle, not exactly physical channels and so on in the body is not uniquely Buddhist...

Malcolm wrote:

All the channels are described in the Buddhist tantras as physical structures. They are called "subtle" (sukṣma, phra) because they are very fine, not because they are immaterial or made of some quasi-material. For example, according to Kālacakra, the lower tips of the three main channels produce urine, feces and reproductive fluids. That is hard to do if they are not physical.

All the channels form during gestation in the womb. This is the same in Dzogchen.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 11th, 2014 at 5:18 AM

Title: Re: Dr. Sanderson: Phowa etc. are directly from Saivism

Content:

Sherlock said:

According to that Germano article, the Upanishad channel involved a connection from the heart to the head, it wasn't the fully elaborated system that appears in the yoginitantras.

Malcolm wrote:

Correct.

Sherlock said:

There was no fully system of channels and cakras during the initial transmission of tantra to Tibet in the 8th-9th century so it was fully elaborated only in between then and around 1000CE.

Malcolm wrote:

Correct.

Sherlock said:

Some Hindu tantras have references to tantras originating from Mahacina, which might be a reference to either China or an area to the Northeast.

Malcolm wrote:

Principally the Nilasarasvati tantras.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 11th, 2014 at 2:25 AM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

In addition, a so called "pandita" is described as "A scholar in the foundation of outer and inner objects of knowledge." A so called "kusali" is described as "One who has the most dedication inwardly after severing all outer distractions."

In terms of actual perfect Buddhahood: the first, having become knowledgeable about all objects of knowledge, has severed doubt through hearing, reflection and meditation. Then, because of severing doubt through meditating which makes samadhi essential, the pandita gradually attains Buddhahood after actualizing the Dharma of realization. A kusali necessarily has the same basis, but when considered alone, a pandita is closer to Buddhahood.

-- Sakya Pandita

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 10th, 2014 at 7:13 PM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

Sherab said:

I don't agree with your argument about not naming as it seems to deny that a dependent self exists in the sphere of the relative. As for a self in the sphere of the ultimate, my take is that the experience of nirvana or enlightenment is an experience where the concept of a self or no-self as understood in the sphere of the relative becomes incoherent, but the individuality of the experience cannot be denied.

Malcolm wrote:

There is no "dependent" self, there is only a designated self. Apart its designation, the self, such as it is, is the son of a barren woman. If there were a dependent self, it would exist designated upon its parts, like a car or a cup. So what are the parts of the self upon which it is designated?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 10th, 2014 at 9:45 AM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

You seem to be saying that what is pointed out or introduced is nothing, i.e. what ChNNR calls our real condition or natural state is nothing.

Malcolm wrote:

What I am saying is that what is pointed out is the nature of the mind, the mind essence, which you will never find when you look for it, apart from the looking itself, which when sought, is not findable either because it is free from extremes.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 10th, 2014 at 7:35 AM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

From a Dzogchen point of view, and Vajrayāna in general, there is something to point out, i.e. the nature of mind, an empty clarity.

gad rgyangs said:

oh, so there is something after all! thats a relief!

Malcolm wrote:

Clarity is also not established, that is why it is called "empty". In fact, there is nothing to point out, knowing that is clarity.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 10th, 2014 at 7:26 AM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

jeeprs said:

sectarian polemics

Malcolm wrote:

To be perfectly honest, as I have said before, from a textual POV, Dzogchen is filled to the brim with sectarian polemics. It is the most sectarian teaching in Tibet.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 10th, 2014 at 7:17 AM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The view of freedom from extremes as explained in Madhyamaka is not the slightest bit different than the view of freedom from extremes as explained in Dzogchen. That is why ChNN cites Sakya Pandita's Analysis of the Three Vows...

dzogchungpa said:

OK, but why then does ChNNR, in "The Base In Dzogchen", say this:

ChNNR said:

...Madhyamika, which is a philosophical system, negates the existence of the Base completely.

dzogchungpa said:

?

Malcolm wrote:

Because Madhyamaka negates everything completely. But that does not mean that the Dzogchen view of freedom from extremes is any different at all from the Madhyamaka view of freedom from extremes, for in fact they are formulated in precisely the same way. Further, Madhyamaka is not focused on the person, but rather in eliminating any sorts of reifications about existence, etc., whereas Dzogchen is concerned with explicating the nature of the mind. In other words, from a Madhyamaka POV there is nothing to point out, since nothing is established. From a Dzogchen point of view, and Vajrayāna in general, there is something to point out, i.e. the nature of mind, an empty clarity.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 10th, 2014 at 7:15 AM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

A large problem for people who are approaching Dzogchen is that they fall back into classical western philosophical categories.

jeeprs said:

Why is this a problem?

Malcolm wrote:

Buddhist texts need to have their own own distinctive terminologies in English, just as they do in Sanskrit, Chinese and Tibetan in order to clearly demarcate our teachings and philosophy from those of other traditions. For this reason then using terminology like "ground of being" for gzhi is wholly inadequate.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 10th, 2014 at 4:05 AM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

A nice metaphor that illustrates my point again, from the chapter on demonstrating the basis of the buddhas and sentient beings as one from the rdzogs pa chen po nges don 'dus pa:

For example, though one offers a thousand lamps, there is no more than one nature of light.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 10th, 2014 at 3:05 AM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

"Hey, hey, apparent yet nonexistent retinue: listen well! There is no object to distinguish in me, the view of self-originated wisdom; it did not exist before, it will not arise later, and also does not appear in anyway in the present. The path does not exist, action does not exist, traces do not exist, ignorance does not exist, thoughts do not exist, mind does not exist, prajñā does not exist, samsara does not exist, nirvana does not exist, vidyā itself does not even exist, totally not appearing in anyway."

-- Unwritten Tantra

gad rgyangs said:

Methinks he doth protest too much. if he really doesn't exist, shouldn't he just shut up?

Malcolm wrote:

You know that they say, the empty bucket makes the loudest noise.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Monday, March 10th, 2014 at 2:56 AM
Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind
Content:

gad rgyangs said:

if you insist there is no ultimate, no relative, no condition, no anything, then you are not really saying anything at all, at least not anything interesting.

Malcolm wrote:

Who said tathatā was supposed to be interesting? Not the Buddha:

“Hey, hey, apparent yet nonexistent retinue: listen well! There is no object to distinguish in me, the view of self-originated wisdom; it did not exist before, it will not arise later, and also does not appear in anyway in the present. The path does not exist, action does not exist, traces do not exist, ignorance does not exist, thoughts do not exist, mind does not exist, prajñā does not exist, samsara does not exist, nirvana does not exist, vidyā itself does not even exist, totally not appearing in anyway.”

-- Unwritten Tantra

“Venerable Śāriputra, if one sees it like so, all phenomena are empty, without characteristics, non-arising, unceasing, without stains, and not free from stains; not decreasing, not increasing.

“Śāriputra, in emptiness there is no matter, no sensation, no ideation, no formations, no consciousness, no eye, no ear, no nose, no tongue, no body, no mind, no form, no sound, no smell, no taste, no contact. There is no eye element up to no mental element, and also nothing up to the element of mental consciousness.

There is no ignorance; there is no end of ignorance; up to there is no aging and death and no end of aging and death.

Likewise, there is no suffering, cause, cessation and path.

There is no wisdom, nothing to obtain, and also nothing not to obtain.

-- The "Heart" Sutra

M

Author: Malcolm
Date: Monday, March 10th, 2014 at 2:54 AM
Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind
Content:

gad rgyangs said:

The metaphor does however demonstrate the source of the seemingly contradictory statements in the Tantras, some of which clearly point to a universal basis and others which point to a personal basis.

Malcolm wrote:

Its more easily reconciled on the basis of the intellectual categories to which the authors of the man ngag sde tantras in the 11th century were clearly familiar, that of the two kinds of lakṣanas, or characteristics we find in pramāṇa, samanya lakṣanas and svalakṣanas, in other words, universal and particulars. There is so much language of pramāṇa scattered through out the man ngag sde tantras, and use of it in a classical nominalist fashion in these tantras, that it is impossible these guys meant that the universal we call the thog ma spyi gzhi, the original "general or universal" basis, was meant to be anything other than a generic description of qualities and attributes possessed by specific or individual minds.

Use of hologram metaphors does not lead us anywhere near what these gentleman themselves thought of their own textual compositions, not to mention that problem that people get into when they indiscriminately cite the bodhicitta texts as the representing the sum total of Dzogchen thought. Obviously, there is a lot of problem with anachronistic readings of these texts by classical scholars such as Longchenpa. But unless you are a true believer (tm) and accept the original account of the origin of the man ngag sde literature presented in the Vima Nyingthig as historical fact, it is irresponsible to read these texts in that way. In fact the term gzhi is barely used in the bodhicitta texts.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 10th, 2014 at 2:28 AM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

smcj said:

As Dudjom R. said (ibid):

What unimpededly appears on it (the mirror) are all the things of relative reality, your mind included.
(formatting mine)

Sounds undifferentiated to me. Of course you can always say D.R. didn't know what he was talking about.

Malcolm wrote:

All the things in relative reality come about, in Dzogchen parlance, from a mind that does not recognize its own display. But it takes a mind that does not recognize its essence to produce that relative. There is no mind-essence other than in the mind.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 10th, 2014 at 2:25 AM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

all subtle & sophisticated systems east & west (including Dzogchen) agree the ultimate is beyond description, conceptualization, categorization. So that's not really open to discussion.

Malcolm wrote:

In Dzogchen, the ultimate is not established, that is also not open to discussion. The reason why the ultimate in Madhyamala, Dzogchen, etc. is beyond description has everything to do with the basis premise of niṣprapañca and what that means.

gad rgyangs said:

what I see as an interesting difference of perspective is between systems that think something in our condition is wrong, missing, or fallen,

Malcolm wrote:

There is nothing missing in our condition, since we don't have one. If we had a condition, that would be a self, and then we would really have a problem.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 10th, 2014 at 2:04 AM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

smcj said:

The same applies to Yogacara, "Great Madhyamaka" (is there a singular definition of this in the first place or is it something all teachers call their own interpretation of Madhyamaka) and other themes

Whatever the specifics of Dudjom R.'s interpretation of "Great Madhyamaka" (Empty-of-Other) were should be accepted as a legitimate view of Dzogchen. His shorthand of using the idea of a mirror as the undifferentiated Basis and the images on it as apparent phenomena should be non-controversial as one way of looking at it.

Malcolm wrote:

It is an entirely dualistic metaphor, from where to the images in this mirror arise? In any case, your interpretation that the basis is an undifferentiated unity is not supported in Dzogchen tantras. It is probably not actually supported in gzhan stong either, at this point I am too busy to look.

The Mind Mirror of Samantabhadra states:

The self-originated ultimate garbha, in the manner of being perfect without being generated, is a brilliant mirror existing in all.

The marginalia notes that the mirror is the wisdom of vidyā, which as we know is what the instantiated basis is termed. So we can clearly see that this self-originated, ultimate garbha is just a term for the mind-essence.

The Self Arisen Vidyā Tantra:

The light rays of all worlds issue forth from the mirror of perfect mind.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 10th, 2014 at 1:37 AM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

Sherlock said:

Historical Dzogchen masters familiar with the Indian schools classified the views of those schools as wrong views and described why. If you say Dzogchen teaches a view similar to the views of those schools you are either misunderstanding something or you are implying those historical masters gave misleading statements.

The views of those schools cannot be the same as Dzogchen. If you say they are similar OK but you need to work out on which points they differ.

Malcolm wrote:

The view of freedom from extremes as explained in Madhyamaka is not the slightest bit different than the view of freedom from extremes as explained in Dzogchen. That is why ChNN cites Sakya Pandita's Analysis of the Three Vows when he describes the view of Dzogchen, the full quote as follows:

Tough indeed there are levels of view in Śrāvaka and Mahāyāna, it is never explained there is a division of views in Pāramitā and Secret Mantra.
If there were a view superior to the freedom from proliferation of the Pāramitā, that view would contain proliferation.
If [the view of secret mantra] is free from proliferation, there is no difference.
Therefore, the view that is comprehended with explanation is the same, nevertheless, secret mantra is superior in the methods for realizing freedom from proliferation.

Longchenpa also admits that freedom from extremes in Prasanga and the Dzogchen view are the same.

Honestly, I don't see where the controversy is.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 10th, 2014 at 1:14 AM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

smcj said:

if aspects of them end up sounding like some other system of thought that's fine.

Malcolm wrote:

If aspects of them sound like some other system, it means that translator has been lazy and has not done his job well.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 10th, 2014 at 1:13 AM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

are Dzogchen and western theology/metaphysics saying the same thing? no.

Malcolm wrote:

If the language of western theology is invited into Dzogchen, how will people be able to distinguish the two? They will not, other than the fact that there is no term in Dzogchen that matches the term "ground of being".

gad rgyangs said:

are they talking about the same thing, i.e. the nature of reality? yes.

Malcolm wrote:

Dzogchen is talking about a state in which there is no creator [i.e. lhun grub]; Tillich is talking about a state on which there is a creator [i.e. dbang phyug]. Dzogchen rejects reality in favor of freedom from extremes, in which neither an ultimate nor relative can be established in anyway. There is no ground of being in Dzogchen, there are no beings in Dzogchen. If the basis was a "ground of being" it would be expressible. Since it is free from being, non-being, etc., it is inexpressible. In the process, Dzogchen does not go beyond Madhyamaka view in anyway at all.

gad rgyangs said:

do both traditions agree that the nature of reality is ineffable and beyond thought and categories? yes.

Malcolm wrote:

Dzogchen does not agree that there is a reality per se, a state of being that pertains to things. Freedom from all extremes is not a state of being [ity] pertaining [al] to things [res].

gad rgyangs said:

so what does their talking around the nature of reality amount to? poetic metaphors.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, when people reach their level of philosophical incompetence they, at the last resort, pull out the poetry card.

gad rgyangs said:

so is there actually a nature of reality? yes: here we are.

Malcolm wrote:

If there were an actual nature of reality, we couldn't be here.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 10th, 2014 at 12:00 AM

Title: Re: Discussion of Political Topics is Wrong Speech

Content:

tobes said:

there is far more expressively political advice on other matters. I'm not sure how one plausibly could only deny that the Ratnāvalī is filled with such content.

Malcolm wrote:

It's not that filled, it constitutes somewhat less than 10% of the total.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, March 9th, 2014 at 10:14 PM

Title: Re: African Americans & people of Color, & Buddhism in the W

Content:

rory said:

Malcolm: Oh it's a big issue here. In most Dharma centers you never find the rituals that are normal back in Asia.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, clearly you have never been to a Tibetan Buddhist center in the US.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, March 9th, 2014 at 9:53 PM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Again, if you are using the term of "ground of being", which is Christian theological term out of place in Dzogchen, you will run into many contradictions.

jeeprs said:

Interestingly, there is a Wikipedia article called

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Ground\_of\_Being\_%28Dzogchen%29 (albeit with https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Ground\_of\_Being\_%28Dzogchen%29#Nomenclature\_of\_article:\_meta-annotation.)

Malcolm wrote:

The article you mentioned is a mess. First of all, the term that gzhi translates is sthana, not āśraya. It just turns into a muddle from there.

In terms of the origins of the term, it was indeed coined by Tillich to show that "God must be called the infinite power of being which resists the threat of nonbeing."

[Systematic Theology, Vol. pg. 64] You can see why such borrowing is tempting, "The ground of being has the character of self-manifestation; it has logos character"

[Systematic Theology, Vol.1 pg. 158]

A large problem for people who are approaching Dzogchen is that they fall back into classical western philosophical categories. Indeed, Günther wrote once that Dzogchen essentially is not different than Parmenides's theory that whatever was contingent as non-being and whatever is permanent is being. Tillich writes:

"The Orphics, the Pythagoreans, Anaximander, Heraclitus, and Parmenides were driven to their philosophy by the awareness that the world they encountered lack ultimate reality. But only in Plato does the contrast between existential and the essential being become an ontological and ethical problem. Existence for Plato is the realm of mere opinion, error, and evil. It lacks true reality. True being is essential being and is present in the realm of eternal ideas, i.e., in essences. In order to reach essential being, man must rise above existence. He must return to the essential realm from which he fell into existence, In this way man's existence, is standing out of potentiality, is judged as a fall from what he essentially is. The potential is the essential, and to exist, i.e., to stand out of potentiality, is the lost of true essentiality...In God there is no difference between essential and existential being. This implies the split is not ultimately valid and that is has no relevance for the ground of being itself. God is eternally what he is. [Systematic Theology, Vol.2 ppg. 21-22]

Examining this kind of presentation that the term "ground of being" arose out of, it is easy to see why those who are not trained in Indo-Tibetan scholastics as well as Western Philosophy will be very attracted to terms like "ground of being" relationship to the term "basis" or gzhi.

The gzhi is strictly defined as lacking any essence, any svabhāva, in Dzogchen texts. Indeed its potentiality is made possible because of its empty nature. Without that coreless core, the processes of the basis by which the five lights shine out and so on are simply not possible. Emptiness, naturelessness, the absence of being, the absence of reality, the absence of extremes is precisely what makes the basis originally pure. As the sgra thal gyur tantra states:

Since there is no basis or foundation, dwell in emptiness.

The commentary merely notes that this line confirms the quality of the non-existence of one's mind.

And further it states:

Due to being free from extremes, the middle does not exist.

The commentary describes this as the Great Perfection view that is totally complete freedom from extremes:

The so-called intimate instruction of the view of the totally complete space of the great freedom from activities is the view of the totally complete freedom from extremes. Since that is free from the extreme of existence, it does not fall into the position of substantiality. Since it is free from the extreme of nonexistence, it exhausts grasping to emptiness. Since it is free from both existence and non-existence, it is free from apprehending the intrinsic nature of the apprehender, since it is free from the extreme of neither existence nor nonexistence, there is also no concept of mere non-existence.

Moreover, since it is free from the extreme of emptiness, it possesses the meaning of an intrinsically clear core. Since it is free from the extreme of being non-empty, the extreme of grasping to substantiality is avoided. Since it is free from a basis [gzhi], it is not conceived as being either "clear" or "empty", since it is free from both, there is nothing to prove nor negate. In the same way, combine [the above reasoning] for all such as the extreme of appearance and so on.

Further because it is free from extremes it is not established many. Because it is totally complete, it is not established as one. Since that is free from one and many, it is the inexpressible dharmatā that is free from falling into extremes.

Now then, if it is said "That is not Dzogchen because it begins to abandon extremes", since it is totally complete as existence, it means there is nothing to seek. Since it is totally complete as non-existence, it means there is nothing to abandon. Since it is complete as both, it means it is beyond accepting and rejecting. Since it is complete as neither, everything becomes dharmatā.

Likewise, since empty, not empty and so on are totally complete, therefore, "Great Perfection" means not falling into hope and fear or extremes.

Moreover, because it is one, proliferation is severed, because it is many, there is not need to abandon anything. Further, because there are extremes, the middle is eliminated, because there is a middle, likewise, the extremes are eliminated. As such, if it is wondered why, it is because since it is free from extremes the middle does not exist. Because the extremes are negated, it is empty of a middle; since the middle is negated, likewise, there is no perception of extremes. Therefore:

"Because it is totally complete, there is nothing to dedicate."

And:

Since there is nothing more, there are no parts.

In case someone still doubts whether the basis is just referring to one's own mind, Vajrasattvamāyājālaguhyasarvādarśa-nāma-tantra states:

The rootless mind itself is the root of all phenomena.

A passage from Bhavya's Madhyamakaratnapradīpa reinforces our understanding of this passage:

Just as from the root of the lotus leaves and so on are continually produced, likewise, though the mind is insubstantial it exists as the essence of all phenomena.

This is the meaning of that: just as the root of the lotus is not connected with anything else, exists in water, and though that root does not penetrate anything, it is able to fill a great pond with leaves, flowers, and so on. Likewise, though the mind itself is insubstantial, it exists as the nature of all external and internal phenomena in the relative.

Just as shoots of rice in a terrace spread everywhere without roots, also the rootless mind itself
pervades the furthest reaches of space.

Here, the meaning of this is: in ponds and terraces, the plants called "rice" are interlinked, they grow on the surface of a terrace with a yellow flower, their roots do not penetrate. In the same way, while the mind is rootless, it spreads throughout all space, existing as the nature of all phenomena.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, March 9th, 2014 at 9:13 AM

Title: Re: African Americans & people of Color, & Buddhism in the W

Content:

zsc said:

Trying to extract culture from the dharma to make it "pure" is actually a western cultural decision, based on Protestant-driven anxiousness to find the "pure" way, the "original" way, etc.

Malcolm wrote:

That is really not an issue here. That will be more of an issue on Dhammawheel. That is mostly a Theravadin discomfort.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, March 9th, 2014 at 9:11 AM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

asunthatneversets said:

I don't think anyone, at any point on this thread said the relative is all there is. If the ultimate lacks inherency the relative does as well.

Sherab said:

"Lacks inherency" means lacking there is nothing innate and implies that there is only dependency. In other words, everything is relative. Therefore "lacking inherency" is another way of saying that the relative is all there is.

Malcolm wrote:

The ultimate truth is nothing more and nothing less than cognition of what remains after the relative has been examined, or the non-conceptual cognition of true nature of the relative.

To answer your earlier: causes and effects can neither be the same nor can they be different. If they are same, all causes are non-causes and all effects are non-effects. If they are different, causes remain non-causes and effects remain non-effects. When causes and effects are seen as they are, i.e., neither the same nor different, than causality, conventionally speaking, is preserved, without various identity problems. Nāgārjuna states:

It is not valid that arising and perishing are the same, nor it is valid that arising and perishing are different.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, March 9th, 2014 at 12:03 AM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

These days many people express the language of Dzogchen in terms which are little more than a revenant of 19th Century British Idealism...

dzogchungpa said:

Revenant? Wow.

Well, as I've said, I like your POV better, it's much easier for me to understand. It does seem kind of strange that Guarisco is so off though.

Malcolm wrote:

I have no idea what he thinks, I can only know what he writes.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, March 8th, 2014 at 10:42 PM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

Honestly, I am just a beginner, so I can't say whether Malcolm is correct. I can see why people might think otherwise, though. Here is a passage from Elio Guarisco's introduction to "Myriad Worlds":

In the Dzog-chen system, the primal creative cause of the universe is neither the evolutionary actions of beings nor the interrelationships of the compassion of the buddhas and sen-tient beings, but rigpa, a state of pure and total awareness. This state of awareness is nothing other than the primordially pure ground of being itself (gzhi).

Malcolm wrote:

In Dzogchen texts, the gzhi is never described as a ground of being for the simple reason that being, non-being, and so on are not established either in the so-called "basis" or in appearances of the basis that has arisen. It is no wonder you are confused when you see use of terms from Paul Tillich out of context in this way. Tillich, the originator of the term, uses the ground of being to describe God.

dzogchungpa said:

and a little later on he says:

Kongtrul states that an understanding of the Dzog-chen view of cyclic life is essential if one is to understand the path and the result of this system. The Dzog-chen perspective holds that everything emerges spontaneously from the primordially pure nature of being, that everything always remains primordially pure, and that when this truth is recognized within one's own natural awareness (rang byung ye shes), one instantly recovers one's original enlightened nature, which has been there all along.

I really can't see how this is compatible with Malcolm's position.

Malcolm wrote:

Again, if you are using the term of "ground of being", which is Christian theological term out of place in Dzogchen, you will run into many contradictions.

These days many people express the language of Dzogchen in terms which are little more than a renege of 19th Century British Idealism:

Our conclusion, so far, will be this, that the Absolute is one system, and that its contents are nothing but sentient experience. It will hence be a single and all-inclusive experience, which embraces every partial diversity in concord. For it cannot be less than appearances and hence no feeling or thought, of any kind, can fall outside its limits. And if it is more than any feeling or thought which we know, it must still remain more of the same nature. It cannot pass into another region beyond what falls under the general head of sentience.

Bradley, F. H. (Francis Herbert), 1846-1924. Appearance and reality : a metaphysical essay (Kindle Locations 2251-2256). London : G. Allen.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, March 8th, 2014 at 7:31 PM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, March 7th, 2014 at 9:16 PM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

Sherab said:

If one holds the mind as a series of discrete mental moments, then by definition, there is a gap between one discrete moment and the next. In the gap, there cannot be any consciousness and therefore knowledge. Consequently, there is no guarantee that the transition from one discrete moment to another will be perfect since it is possible to postulate some disturbance during the transition of a mental moment from one to another that result in an imperfect transition.

Malcolm wrote:

But the mind is not a series of "discrete" mental moments in the way in which you are positing it. If you follow Nāgārjuna's reasoning, the mind is series of moments that are neither the same as nor different from each other. In the case of a person with āryan insight, there is no possibility of any disturbance between one moment of mind and the next because the mind stream has now been purified of causes for the arising of afflictions.

Āryan insight does not transform a relative mind into ultimate mind; it is relative mind that has the capacity to take the ultimate as an "object". The Gelugpa use the useful example of subjective clear light and objective clear light, subjective clear light is the mind that apprehends objective clear light.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, March 7th, 2014 at 9:07 PM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

Andrew108 said:

There is no first proof that mind and consciousness originated from matter.

Malcolm wrote:

Case closed.

Andrew108 said:

Not at all. Recent studies have shown that physical activity in the brain precedes mental events.

Malcolm wrote:

Still haven't discarded your brain-based physicalism, I see.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, March 7th, 2014 at 9:04 PM

Title: Re: African Americans & people of Color, & Buddhism in the W

Content:

rory said:

You've had two African-American posters tell you why they feel alienated and then you don't agree with their conclusions, say there are no differences, talk over them etc...

Ugh.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, and we have gay people tell is why they feel alienated, white people who tell is they feel alienated, and so on. But the fact remains, ultimately Buddhадharma is not about changing the world to suit us since that is impossible. Ultimately, Buddhадharma is about overcoming suffering and the causes of suffering that lay within us, not outside us.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, March 7th, 2014 at 10:56 AM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

Sherab said:

[

Those who argue that ultimately, there is no ultimate, and only the relative is all there is, is basically saying that the traces are their own ground. The consequence of this is that there can be no permanent liberation and any liberation is no different from annihilation.

Malcolm wrote:

Nonsense, one merely moves from an afflicted relative to a nonafflicted relative. Once one's mind is free of afflictions, it cannot revert because the cause of being free of afflictions is āryan insight, which cannot be lost.

From an ultimate point of view, the language of affliction or nonaffliction is incoherent.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, March 7th, 2014 at 10:53 AM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

Andrew108 said:

There is no first proof that mind and consciousness originated from matter.

Malcolm wrote:

Case closed.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, March 7th, 2014 at 2:41 AM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The variety of the world is created by the collective karma of sentient beings, not by some demiurge/s.

bob said:

I never said anything about demiurges. I simply indicated that a different class of beings than the human class is responsible for creating the illusion that is this 3-D environment, in contrast to Shabkar's assertion. However, since my view is apparently not within the Buddhist box, I will withdraw from further comment on this topic.

Malcolm wrote:

The Mahāyāna Buddhist point is that a given class of beings share a similar experience of a container universe because they have similar karma ripening at the same time. You can understand this through the classic example of humans, devas, asuras, animals, pretas and hell beings all experiencing liquids differently, as water, nectar, a home, pus and blood or molten iron. Specifically the yogacara school regards the entire container universe to consist only of projections caused by the ripening of traces.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, March 7th, 2014 at 12:51 AM

Title: Re: Dr. Sanderson: Phowa etc. are directly from Saivism

Content:

Rakshasa said:

The 'fire puja' in Vedas

Malcolm wrote:

Upon which Buddhist fire pujas are clearly based.

Rakshasa said:

The defining feature of Shramanic indigenous religion was the belief in Karma and reincarnation - which is absent in ancient Vedicism. It is a conspiracy by Brahmins and some European scholars nowadays to give credit of Shramanistic religions to the Indo-Aryan, a Caucasian tribe related to many European peoples.

Malcolm wrote:

PIE peoples believed in reincarnation.

Rakshasa said:

Nadis and cakras, from the early Upanishads and Ayurveda

Blanket statement from a very parochialistic and biased point of view. In fact, Ayurveda came from Buddhist sages.

Malcolm wrote:

The earliest Ayurvedic text we have is the Cakrasaṃhita. It is also the earliest source we have for Saṃkhya.

Rakshasa said:

Prāṇāyāma, corollaries to gñāna and so on can be found in the Yoga sutras of Patañjali, and it is a daily part of Vedic practice and has been for three millennia.

The great Indian historian, Kashi Nath Upadhyaya, himself a Brahmin, has amply proven that the Patanjali Yoga sutra was in fact influenced heavily from Early Buddhism - not even later Mahayana Buddhism, but Early Buddhism.

Malcolm wrote:

However, prāṇāyāma, and so on, things found in the Yoga sutras, clearly have no precedent in Buddhist texts. Just examine the Vibhūti-pādaḥ. While there are certainly very common ideas found in "early" Buddhist texts and the Yogasūtras, these commonality can be explained as coming from a common religious milieu, with different emphasis. For example, Patañjali has the four brahma viharas, but the mode of explanation is quite different than the Buddhas.

Rakshasa said:

It is very unlikely that Buddhism has sprouted out of Hinduism,

Malcolm wrote:

I agree, but there is ample proof right in the early suttas that the Buddha's own world view was essentially informed by Vedic cosmological concepts. Later borrowings from Shaiva and other non-buddhist traditions have precedents in the Buddha's own lifetime.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, March 7th, 2014 at 12:41 AM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

Andrew108 said:

There isn't really any proof that the physical is created by the mental. This philosophical notion is just a heuristic device to promote mindfulness. And like most buddhist philosophy, it shouldn't be taken too seriously.

Malcolm wrote:

There is no proof the mental is created by the physical either.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, March 7th, 2014 at 12:33 AM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

Sherab said:

Would a madhyamika also hold the same explanation on how the physical is produce by the mental?

Malcolm wrote:

Even Abhidharma holds that matter is produced by mind, for example, when a being takes rebirth from the formless realm into the form realm, their physical body is created by their minds since here is no other cause for the matter their body is made up of.

Sherab said:

I started out with the Gelug tradition and was taught that beings in the formless realm, have a mind-made body. I did not get any sense that the mind-made body was physical. I was also taught that a result can come only from a similar cause, and because of that, as far as I understood, it was not held that something physical can come from something mental and vice versa. At any rate, I never felt at home with the Gelug's take on a number of issues.

Anyway, I have yet to come across a Madhyamika's explanation that say that the physical is produced by the mental. I posed the question in the hope that you may have come across something to the contrary to what I know and what I've learned while I was with the Gelugpas.

Malcolm wrote:

This is because the Gelugpas adhere to a sautrantika version of relative truth in their sutra explanation.

The Sakyas, Kagyus and Nyingmas tend to favor a Yogacara Madhyamaka explanation of relative truth.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 6th, 2014 at 10:50 PM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

Sherab said:

So the process by which the physical is produced by the mental is the same in yogacara madhyamaka is the same at that in cittamatra?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, since the former takes the latter as relative truth. Kalaśīla's Madhyamakālaṃkārapañjikā states:

Since the five characteristics of external cause and condition and the dominant characteristic are false, existing as mind-only [cittamatra] is only non-arising in the manner of representation-only [vijñāpati-matra]. Therefore, whatever the non-arising of the madhyamaka school might be, that demonstrates it.

Sherab said:

Would a madhyamika also hold the same explanation on how the physical is produced by the mental?

Malcolm wrote:

Even Abhidharma holds that matter is produced by mind, for example, when a being takes rebirth from the formless realm into the form realm, their physical body is created by their minds since there is no other cause for the matter their body is made up of.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 6th, 2014 at 10:04 PM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

Sherab said:

Seems very cittamitra to me.

Malcolm wrote:

Yogacara Madhyamaka, actually, ala Shantaraksita.

Sherab said:

So the process by which the physical is produced by the mental is the same in yogacara madhyamaka is the same at that in cittamatra?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, since the former takes the latter as relative truth. Kalaśīla's Madhyamakālaṃkārapañjikā states:

Since the five characteristics of external cause and condition and the dominant characteristic are false, existing as mind-only [cittamatra] is only non-arising in the manner of representation-only [vijñāpati-matra]. Therefore, whatever the non-arising of the madhyamaka school might be, that demonstrates it.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 6th, 2014 at 9:39 PM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

Sherlock said:

The whole idea that there are other beings who create samsara but are not part of it is counter to Buddhadharma.

bob said:

FWIW, it might help to think of it as an adult class of beings creating a kindergarten environment for a child class of beings in need of behavior training. What I am suggesting is that there is a non-human class of beings who have created this stage for the human class of beings. It does not necessarily mean that the creator beings are beyond samsara (although at a certain level some might be considered "enlightened" beings by our limited descriptors).

Malcolm wrote:

Right, this view is outside of Buddhadharma and has no place within it.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 6th, 2014 at 9:38 PM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

bob said:

Yes, I understand that line of thinking, and at one time would have agreed. In a certain limited sense, there is even some truth to that, especially in regard to karma. We are all creators and creatures of each other, causing and bearing each other's burden within the sphere of our relations and so forth.

However, what I am referring to is the actual mechanics of this current manifestation which we are enjoying, known generally as "this world", which we as human beings have little hand in creating or maintaining (but are doing a pretty good job nevertheless of spoiling). We did not make the mountains, the rivers, or the tigers and elephants, or even our own bodies (which we think of as our own, at least).

In that sense, it is the work of another class of beings, just as is the sun, the moon, and the planets. Nor am I referring to some God-creator (although to most of us, these beings would appear god-like). In other words, there is a hierarchy, or ascending and descending classes of beings.

Now, I realize this comment might not align with the popular understanding of Buddhism, but nevertheless, it is the case. I am not trying to convince anyone of this, btw, but felt moved to insert it as a consideration. There is more to this world than meets the eye, or necessarily tallies with human philosophies or current scientific understanding.

Malcolm wrote:

The variety of the world is created by the collective karma of sentient beings, not by some demiurge/s.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 6th, 2014 at 9:22 PM

Title: Re: Dr. Sanderson: Phowa etc. are directly from Saivism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

So now you are claiming Buddhist tantra comes from China?

Zen Dude said:

I'd claim, that given the evidence I've seen, that some of the elements that are generally associated with Tantra, may have had origins in Pure Land/Proto-Tantric/Daoist practice in China, which of course, was conditioned, by Pure Land practice in India. For instance, obviously the Chinese wouldn't have written an apocryphal sutra named the "Abhiseka-sutra", if they didn't have knowledge of what an Abhiseka was, from India.

Malcolm wrote:

In Buddhist tantra, abhisheka and fire puja are derived from the Vedas, the mantras are similar etc.

Zen Dude said:

Likewise, the earliest records of techniques related to manipulating the subtle winds, are from the Mawangdui( <https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Mawangdui> ) manuscripts, which, to my knowledge, predate anything similar from India by quite a bit.

Malcolm wrote:

Nadis and cakras, from the early Upanishads and Ayurveda

Prāṇāyāma, corollaries to gtum mo and so on can be found in the Yoga sutras of Patañjali, and it is a daily part of Vedic practice and has been for three millennia.

Zen Dude said:

Back to my original point, I think that there's sufficient evidence that Buddhist Tantra's( at least pre-yogini ), were not simply a copy and paste job from Saivites, as Sanderson seems to be suggesting.

Malcolm wrote:

He is not suggesting it is cut and paste job. He goes to great length to point out that it isn't that simple.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 6th, 2014 at 11:22 AM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

Sherab said:

Seems very cittamitra to me.

Malcolm wrote:

Yogacara Madhyamaka, actually, ala Shantaraksita.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 6th, 2014 at 10:45 AM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

bob said:

As much as I respect your acumen, I would offer as a rough analogy that the beings who build the zoo are not of the same class as the beings who occupy the cages.

So too with the physical 3-D realm we take to be "the world", which is a stage with props provided for the training and edifying adventures of beings in a less advanced class by beings in a far more advanced class.

Of course, if we were to consider the matter from the absolute point of view, there are no beings, but that is skipping ahead a bit.

Malcolm wrote:

We build our own cage together, no one does it for us.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 6th, 2014 at 10:34 AM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Shabkar is basically claiming that the deluded perceptions of living beings are sufficient to cause similar appearances to other living beings of the same class.

bob said:

The beings who have created the illusion of the mountains are not of the same class as the beings who are perceiving the illusion as mountains.

Malcolm wrote:

Actually, they are.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 6th, 2014 at 10:03 AM

Title: Re: Dr. Sanderson: Phowa etc. are directly from Saivism

Content:

Sherlock said:

More like an innovation in India from whoever created the inner yogatantras.

Malcolm wrote:

Outer tantras.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 6th, 2014 at 10:03 AM

Title: Re: Dr. Sanderson: Phowa etc. are directly from Saivism

Content:

Zen Dude said:

=the first evidence of an abiseka...

Malcolm wrote:

Ummm...how about the rig veda?

Zen Dude said:

My understanding is that in that context, it would be only performed for gods/god-kings. Introducing it's usage to commoners looks like an innovation on the Chinese side.

Malcolm wrote:

So now you are claiming Buddhist tantra comes from China?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 6th, 2014 at 9:59 AM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The external mountain is an entity that is capable of appearing because of the force of traces of the minds of all sentient beings. Shabkar uses the example of the woman who meditated upon herself as a tiger for a year, and frightened a village into slaying her because they perceived her as a tiger and not a human woman.

Sherab said:

Could you explain the process with which the "force of traces of the minds of all sentient beings" cause the external mountain? In other words, how does something mental produce something physical.

The example used by Shabkar does not explain this process as far as I can see. It explained how the meditating woman appeared as a tiger but does not explain how other tigers appear as tigers to the people of the village. The woman could have meditated upon herself as a mountain and would appear as a mountain to the village people but that would not explain how other mountains appear as mountains to the village people.

Malcolm wrote:

Shabkar is basically claiming that the deluded perceptions of living beings are sufficient to cause similar appearances to other living beings of the same class.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 6th, 2014 at 7:14 AM

Title: Re: African Americans & people of Color, & Buddhism in the W

Content:

zsc said:

No one is an a-cultural person, but white mainstream Buddhism seems to frame their "stripped-down" practice as culture-free, when that itself is a cultural decision. Only western culture (WASP) is seen as just "normal" while poc have "cultural trappings".

Malcolm wrote:

I never maintained my practice was culture free. I still imagine Sambhogakāyas as 4th century Indian princes.

zsc said:

All I'm saying is that it's more complicated than ignoring it, or "not letting it get in your way". It doesn't "get in my way", in fact, but that doesn't mean it is a non-issue.

Malcolm wrote:

It is as much an issue as you allow it to be.

zsc said:

People do not become Buddhist unless they have the karmic connections to do so. Not saying you are doing this, but you have to understand, poc Buddhists are told what you are saying nearly every time we dare to address racism, classism, and sexism, and it reads like "ignore how poorly you are treated and regarded" as if it doesn't matter in our every day lives. It does matter, and it also forms the experiences of many different poc in many ways.

Malcolm wrote:

Buddhism appears racist, classist and sexist to many people.

You are not really talking about how "Buddhists" treat you, you are talking about how you feel treated by caucasians.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 6th, 2014 at 6:42 AM

Title: Re: Dr. Sanderson: Phowa etc. are directly from Saivism

Content:

Zen Dude said:

=the first evidence of an abiseka...

Malcolm wrote:

Ummm...how about the rig veda?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 6th, 2014 at 4:53 AM

Title: Re: African Americans & people of Color, & Buddhism in the W

Content:

zsc said:

but I understand that a lot of black people want a black Buddhist culture of their own

Malcolm wrote:

Buddhadharma may have cultural trappings, but if you have the karma to be a follower of Buddhadharma, these things will not get in your way.

zsc said:

See the part in my post about "colorblindness", which is actually racism. Opinions like this one invalidate the experiences of people of color and attempt to shut down conversations about real world issues within the sangha.

Malcolm wrote:

It does not invalidate anything. A caucasian, I have personally experienced very intense racism at the hands of Tibetans. It did not get in my way. People do not become Buddhist unless they have the karmic connections to do so.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 6th, 2014 at 4:04 AM

Title: Re: African Americans & people of Color, & Buddhism in the W

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

For that reason and others, I feel somewhat iffy about different groups trying to consciously create their own Buddhist sub-cultures, it seems a bit forced.

Malcolm wrote:

Seconded.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 6th, 2014 at 3:56 AM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

Andrew108 said:

I don't know if he is a nihilist and I couldn't care either way. I think he has more serious things to worry about.

Malcolm wrote:

You worry about your business, and I will worry about mine. In the meantime, since you obviously cannot address my citations and reasoning, be silent.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 6th, 2014 at 3:55 AM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

I never claimed reality existed, therefore I am free of the fault of claiming it does not exist.

Andrew108 said:

What on earth are you talking about? Just by sharing information and by posting here, you are making a claim that indeed at some level reality exists.

Malcolm wrote:

That's one of the silliest things you have ever said. It is like one illusory guy telling another illusory that because the second guy can respond to the first guy, the second is claiming the illusion is real.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 6th, 2014 at 3:53 AM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

I never claimed reality existed, therefore I am free of the fault of claiming it does not exist.

Andrew108 said:

What on earth are you talking about? Just by sharing information and by posting here, you are making a claim that indeed at some level reality exists. And then because you are smart you say that there is no reality.

You should stop this nonsense. Let life tell you what it is. This is much better than you and your intellect telling life what it should be.

smcj said:

Malcolm, now you're being accused of being a nihilist. This must not be your day.

Malcolm wrote:

It's not my limitation, it's mustang cave's.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 6th, 2014 at 3:49 AM

Title: Re: African Americans & people of Color, & Buddhism in the W

Content:

zsc said:

but I understand that a lot of black people want a black Buddhist culture of their own

Malcolm wrote:

Buddhadharma may have cultural trappings, but if you have the karma to be a follower of Buddhadharma, these things will not get in your way.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 6th, 2014 at 3:46 AM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

smcj said:

You really know how to thread the needle on this issue.

Malcolm wrote:

That's why they pay me the big bucks.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 6th, 2014 at 3:21 AM

Title: Re: eleventh fundamental downfall

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

so if its not "just emptiness", is that because its also clarity and compassion, or because emptiness is an extreme?

Malcolm wrote:

In this case it is because mere emptiness is an extreme. Clarity has to be a relative characteristic, since it is the foundation of the rūpakāyas.

gad rgyangs said:

i don't think the three characteristics of the basis are hierarchical : if emptiness is considered an extreme then so would be clarity and compassion.

Malcolm wrote:

Mere clarity is an extreme. That is why Dzogchen texts say thing like "Because it is empty, it is free from the extreme of existence; because it is clear, it is free from the extreme of nonexistence" and so on, when describing the mind-essence.

Lamdre texts say basically the same thing, as do Kagyu texts.

This is why we have the description of the mind essence as "the inseparability [thugs rje] of clarity [rang bzhin] and emptiness [ngo bo]". In reality, since the two truths are inseparable, so is clarity and emptiness.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 6th, 2014 at 3:16 AM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

'Malcolm said:

While it is clear that Dzogchen definitely posits the basis as a set of generic characteristics that belong to individual minds, it does not posit that appearances are mental factors.

smcj said:

So this is how you're distancing yourself from the Cittamatra?

Malcolm wrote:

One can experience only one's mind. For this reason Shabkar states in Flight of the Garuda:

Ignorance appearing as the five poisons is also the mind.
Self-originated primordial wisdom appearing as vidyā is also the mind...
There are no appearances at all apart from the mind.

smcj said:
(formatting mine)

Malcolm, I think you're in denial about having succumbed to the Cittamatra view. An intervention may be in order.

Malcolm wrote:
Subjectively speaking, all internal appearances are just mental images, whether those appearances are derived from your eyes up to your skin.

When you "see" a mountain, you are not aware of the direct perception of that mountain, since it is non-conceptual. What you are aware of is a secondary or derived perception which is an image of the mountain that your eye has captured. Gzhan stong has no theory of perception different than this.

The external mountain is an entity that is capable of appearing because of the force of traces of the minds of all sentient beings. Shabkar uses the example of the woman who meditated upon herself as a tiger for a year, and frightened a village into slaying her because they perceived her as a tiger and not a human woman.

This is not cittamatra view, this is Shantarakṣita's yogacara synthesis, where the view of relative truth is held to be cittamatra, and the view of ultimate truth is madhyamaka. Earlier Madhyamakas generally adopt the Sautrantika view for the most part for relative truth. But even here, no one confuses one's perception of the mountain, the mental image, with the mountain itself.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Thursday, March 6th, 2014 at 2:50 AM
Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind
Content:

Malcolm wrote:
What is however true is that we can only experience the contents of our own minds

gad rgyangs said:
what is this "we" that would be something distinct from mind?

Malcolm wrote:
Of course not. One can experience only one's mind. For this reason Shabkar states in Flight of the Garuda:

Ignorance appearing as the five poisons is also the mind.
Self-originated primordial wisdom appearing as vidyā is also the mind...

There are no appearances at all apart from the mind.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 6th, 2014 at 2:45 AM

Title: Re: eleventh fundamental downfall

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

so if its not "just emptiness", is that because its also clarity and compassion, or because emptiness is an extreme?

Malcolm wrote:

In this case it is because mere emptiness is an extreme. Clarity has to be a relative characteristic, since it is the foundation of the rūpakāyas.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 6th, 2014 at 2:18 AM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

smcj said:

Therefore the distinction of calling "The Basis" either your own mind or calling it an undifferentiated universal is actually the argument between the Mind Only and Empty-of-Other schools.

Malcolm wrote:

Two problems here. While it is clear that Dzogchen definitely posits the basis as a set of generic characteristics that belong to individual minds, it does not posit that appearances are mental factors. Shabkar clarifies that the delusions of sentient beings are sufficiently strong so as to generate what seem to be concrete appearances for one another. This is why, for example, mountains do not disappear when we cease looking or thinking of them. So it is not accurate to parse this discussion in terms of a Cittamatra/gzhan stong split.

What is however true is that we can only experience the contents of our own minds, whether those minds are liberated or not. The basis mythos runs as follows: when the five lights are perceived, those five lights come from potency [rtsal] of our own minds and no where else. If we reify them as external to our own minds, then we fall into samsara. This is happening all the time. To reverse this, one must practice thogal working with entoptic visions that are understood to be produced internally, not externally. If you do not work with these visions, practicing merely tregchö, one will not be able to purify those traces in our minds that give rise to impure vision, though we may be able to realize the mind-essence and dissolve our bodies at death, we will never be able to realize the body of light.

Dzogchen practitioner are fond of saying that Dzogchen practice works with "wisdom"

[ye shes] and not mind [rnam shes, sems], and this is true, but only because of a very specialized vocabulary which sharply defines the originally pure mode of consciousness [ye shes] from its derivative impure mode [rnam shes], for want of better terms in English.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 6th, 2014 at 2:03 AM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

Andrew108 said:

The intent of Madyamaka is not to establish this 'no reality' thesis. It's praxis is the assertion that genuine reality (which everyone has access to) is beyond extremes.

Malcolm wrote:

No, since this would just be a statement of existence.

Andrew108 said:

If you say that there is no reality then of course you are stating that reality does not exist.

Malcolm wrote:

I never claimed reality existed, therefore I am free of the fault of claiming it does not exist. When someone points out your bank account is empty, is it their fault that you have no money? Have they destroyed money you thought you had? Of course not. It is the same when stating "there is no reality". This is merely pointing out the conclusion of freedom from all extremes.

Āryānantamukhapariśodhananirdeśapārivarta-nāma-mahāyāna-sūtra states:

The Sugata said "existence" and "nonexistence" are extremes; whatever does not exist in the extremes, that also does not exist in the middle.

Ārya-varmavyūhanirdeśa-nāma-mahāyāna-sūtra

Since this vehicle is without extremes, also the extreme of the middle does not exist.

Ārya-kāśyapapārivarta-nāma-mahāyāna-sūtra:

Kāśyapa, "permanence" is one extreme; impermanence is the second extreme.
Whatever is the middle of those two extremes, that also cannot be examined.

Sampuṭanāma mahātantra:

There is nothing empty, not empty, and nothing to perceive in the middle.

The Meditation on Bodhicitta:

The nonexistence dependent on existence does not exist, also that nonexistence does not exist. Because the extremes do not exist, the middle does not exist, also do not rest in the middle.

The sgra thal gyur:

Because of being free from extremes, do not abide in the middle.

So we can clearly see that sutra and tantra agree on one point, i.e. there is no reality in the extremes, and there is no reality beyond the extremes. Ergo, there is no reality, since reality would have to be either existence or non-existence and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, March 6th, 2014 at 1:12 AM

Title: Re: eleventh fundamental downfall

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

in that case, conceptualizing the basis as "one's unfabricated mind" is an eleventh root downfall.

Malcolm wrote:

No, it isn't.

If you maintain that your mind-essence is just emptiness, that would be the downfall indicated. An unfabricated mind means a mind which is free from all proliferation, when the mind's own freedom from proliferation is not recognized, that mind becomes the basis for samsara; when it is recognized, that mind becomes the basis for nirvana.

However, as Jetsun Rinpoche points out, for beginners it is sufficient to recognize that phenomena are like dreams and illusions despite the fact that in reality they are free from names, etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 5th, 2014 at 11:52 PM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

Yeah, it does seem kind of silly to make such a big deal out of a generic characteristic. I don't know what Kangyur Rinpoche was smoking.

Malcolm wrote:

I answer you here:

<https://www.dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=40&t=15767>

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 5th, 2014 at 11:49 PM

Title: Re: eleventh fundamental downfall

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

From "The Treasury of Precious Qualities, Book Two":

The eleventh root downfall is to subject the ineffable, ultimate nature to logical assessment. That to which the word "dharmadhatu" refers is beyond name, example, and indication; it is beyond all conventional labeling. And even though the discursive intellect can, in its ratiocinations, understand ultimate reality as being "emptiness" and "lack of self," in fact this "no-self" of phenomena is exclusively the field of self-cognizing primordial wisdom. It stands in clean contradiction to the conventional, dualistic mind. The sharp, investigating intellect may indeed point to what is a lesser kind of emptiness of phenomena, such as the aggregates, and say that it is ultimate reality, thereby claiming a superior view. But to evaluate the unborn nature, namely, inconceivable ultimate reality, according to the criteria of ordinary thought, constitutes the eleventh downfall.

Malcolm wrote:

The reason why this definition is not very desirable is that it means only a realized person can avoid this downfall, and since samaya is the root of the path, it means that one can never achieve awakening unless you are already a realized person.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 5th, 2014 at 11:21 PM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

Andrew108 said:

Of course it's not wrong to assert non-existence, but only when non-existence is used as an adjective that is one part of the description/experience of genuine reality. Saying that reality does not exist, that there is no reality, is far from the meaning and intent of all the Mahdyamaka texts I have studied.

Malcolm wrote:

It may not be not what you have understood, it is in fact the intent of Madhyamaka to point out that there is no reality, per se. Saying there is "no reality" [gnas lugs med pa] is quite different than saying reality does not exist. In fact it is basic "Heart Sutra" and is non-controversial.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 5th, 2014 at 11:15 PM

Title: eleventh fundamental downfall

Content:

Sherlock said:

Like this?

From Berzin's site (11) Not meditating on voidness continually

As with the ninth tantric root downfall, voidness can be understood according to either the Chittamatra or Madhyamaka systems. Once we gain an understanding of such a view, it is a root downfall to let more than a day and night pass without meditating on it.

With the caveat that maybe experiencing the "view" through practice is more important than understanding according to whatever tenet system?

Malcolm wrote:

What I mean by simple is what Sapan wrote:

"The eleventh is conceptualizing those phenomena which are free from name and so on."

[This means] conceptualizing phenomena free from name and so on as being phenomena free from name and so on. In brief, if one maintains that all phenomena which lack inherent existence [ngo bo nyid med, svabhāva] and are free from proliferation as being emptiness, it is a fundamental downfall.

As Berzin points out, this is related to the ninth, expressed by Sapan here:

"The ninth is doubt about the naturally pure dharmatā"

The primal nature [rang bzhin, prakṛti] of all phenomena is free from proliferation. Since that is not understood, the doubt "Is [the nature of all phenomena] free from proliferation or not?" is a fundamental downfall.

When we consider the eleventh downfall, this effectively means that labeling phenomena as emptiness, when in fact they are free from proliferation, is a downfall.

The ninth basically means that a Vajrayāna practitioner should maintain the view at all times.

The qualm might come, how is a beginner to avoid the 11th downfall? Jetsun Dragpa Gyaltzen provides an answer:

"A beginner should think though indeed all phenomena are free from names, relatively, all phenomena appear like dreams and illusions", constantly training their minds in the example of illusion."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 5th, 2014 at 9:29 PM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

Sherlock said:

Like this?

Malcolm wrote:

Continuing this on a new thread...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 5th, 2014 at 10:57 AM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

From "The Treasury of Precious Qualities, Book Two": The eleventh root downfall is to subject the ineffable, ultimate nature to logical assessment. That to which the word "dharmadhatu" refers is beyond name, example, and indication; it is beyond all conventional labeling. And even though the discursive intellect can, in its ratiocinations, understand ultimate reality as being "emptiness" and "lack of self," in fact this "no-self" of phenomena is exclusively the field of self-cognizing primordial wisdom. It stands in clean contradiction to the conventional, dualistic mind. The sharp, investigating intellect may indeed point to what is a lesser kind of emptiness of phenomena, such as the aggregates, and say that it is ultimate reality, thereby claiming a superior view. But to evaluate the unborn nature, namely, inconceivable ultimate reality, according to the criteria of ordinary thought, constitutes the eleventh downfall.

Malcolm wrote:

I really dont accept this definition of the 11th downfall. It is much simpler than that.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 5th, 2014 at 4:49 AM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

We don't have an ultimate condition, apart from emptiness.

gad rgyangs said:

as you yourself said, emptiness is not "merely" absence of svabhava. so yes, we don't have an ultimate condition apart from the emptiness, clarity and compassion of the basis: that is the ultimate condition.

Malcolm wrote:

And that basis is just one's own mind.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 5th, 2014 at 4:20 AM

Title: Re: Tendai is a Ch'an school.

Content:

Indrajala said:

There is a lot hype and paranoia about China in the media, which is rather unfortunate, though understandable given the anti-Chinese propaganda constantly present in western (and Indian) media, to say nothing of how western Tibetan Buddhists usually uncritically accept everything their Tibetan colleagues tell them about China.

Malcolm wrote:

Having been to Chinese controlled Tibet personally, I know exactly how things there are, and things are every bit as bad as Tibetans say it is, if not much worse.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 5th, 2014 at 4:19 AM

Title: Re: Tendai is a Ch'an school.

Content:

Indrajala said:

Buddhism can operate albeit it needs to stay out of politics.

Malcolm wrote:

Right....try putting that one past Tibetans.

Indrajala said:

I really don't care what the average Tibetan thinks.

Malcolm wrote:

I know, you support Chinese imperialism in Tibet. You think it is "good for them".

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 5th, 2014 at 4:11 AM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

Andrew108 said:

@Malcolm. The purpose of going beyond the four extremes is that you are left positionless. This doesn't mean that you are left without reality. Certainly you can't use PrMa to assert that ultimately there is no reality. We both know that this is not possible.

Malcolm wrote:

If you claim there is some reality left over after having gone beyond the four extremes, that is an extreme.

One can certainly use PrMa to assert there is no reality. Even emptiness, suchness and so forth are empty. So in the end, all we are left with is our relative condition. We don't have an ultimate condition, apart from emptiness.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 5th, 2014 at 3:49 AM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

Andrew108 said:

Instead of saying that reality has no fixed identity Malcolm has made the mistake of saying that ultimately there is no reality. But everyone makes mistakes. So what.

Malcolm wrote:

Its not a mistake. There is no reality. In order for there to be "reality" (a state of being pertaining to things res+al+ity) it would necessarily be something that either existed, did not exist and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 5th, 2014 at 3:47 AM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

you have to start with something undeniable, something that no one, buddhist, hindu, western philosopher, whatever, could reject.

the only thing that fits the bill is presence: the fact that there is something rather than nothing.

not only is this the starting point, its also the endpoint: the fact that there is something rather than nothing is ultimate reality.

Malcolm wrote:

The Dzogchen tantras don't support your position. Neither does ChNN. This is why he cites Sapan in his "Questions and Answers on the Cycle of Dzogchen":

If there is a view better than madhyamaka, that view would posses proliferation.

gad rgyangs said:

you seem reluctant to accept both freedom from extremes and instsnt presence. they are not in conflict.

Malcolm wrote:

Rigpa is relative, so of course they are not in conflict.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 5th, 2014 at 3:46 AM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

Andrew108 said:

It seems clear that the universe is in an 'on state' rather than an 'off state'. It may be that ultimately there is no ultimate reality (noone knows yet), but to assert that ultimately there is no reality is very strange. Especially since Dzogchen deals with reality as it is rather than ultimate/relative varients.

Malcolm wrote:

The only thing that is clear is that we are thinking beings subject to birth, duration and destruction. Everything beyond that is pure speculation by inconstant and impermanent mental states.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 5th, 2014 at 3:33 AM

Title: Re: Dr. Sanderson: Phowa etc. are directly from Saivism

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

Does this mean that we cannot consider Goraksha awakened?

Malcolm wrote:

I don't.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 5th, 2014 at 3:30 AM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

Andrew108 said:

Positing that ultimately there is no reality is a bit strange.

asunthatneversets said:

When you encounter the reflection of the moon in water, ultimately there is no moon.

Andrew108 said:

There is reality. That is what we are trying to understand. "Ultimately there is no reality" is the same as saying that ultimately there is no information, no energy, no display. Dzogchen doesn't refute reality.

Malcolm wrote:

Ultimately there is no information, no energy, no display. These things are all relative, not ultimate.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 5th, 2014 at 3:27 AM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

you have to start with something undeniable, something that no one, buddhist, hindu, western philosopher, whatever, could reject.

the only thing that fits the bill is presence: the fact that there is something rather than nothing.

not only is this the starting point, its also the endpoint: the fact that there is something rather than nothing is ultimate reality.

Malcolm wrote:

The Dzogchen tantras don't support your position. Neither does ChNN. This is why he cites Sapan in his "Questions and Answers on the Cycle of Dzogchen":

If there is a view better than madhyamaka, that view would posses proliferation.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 5th, 2014 at 3:17 AM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

same question: so what is there, ultimately? if you say "nothing" you are a nihilist, and have done nothing to explain our presence.

Malcolm wrote:

Ultimately, there is no reality. If there were an ultimate reality, it would by necessity fall into one of the four extremes.

gad rgyangs said:

there is ultimate reality (there is something rather than nothing), but it is beyond the four extremes.

Malcolm wrote:

That is just an extreme.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 5th, 2014 at 2:19 AM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

You cannot define emptiness as being one thing or many things, since it is not a thing. It is the absence of inherent existence in things, and that is all.

ConradTree said:

But you always say emptiness is not absence of inherent existence.

Malcolm wrote:

Emptiness, in Mahāyāna, specifically refers to the absence of the four extremes in phenomena. This is the profound emptiness taught in Mahāyāna according to Gorampa and many other critics of Tsongkhapa, not the mere emptiness of inherent existence which is common which the śravaka systems.

Since phenomena cannot be found by any of the four extremes, they are illusory, and ultimately nonarisen.

I am not saying that emptiness is the mere absence of inherent existence. The "absence of inherent existence" can be understood as short hand for emptiness free from extremes. When you qualify that inherent existence which mere, it is too restrictive. It is like saying that emptiness is only the absence of inherent existence and nothing more.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 5th, 2014 at 1:44 AM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

Regarding thugs rje, here's some more from the book. In the section "A general explanation of the fundamental nature of the ground" from Kangyur Rinpoche's commentary, he says of the ground: Consequently, the ground for what appears as samsara and nirvana (nonexistent as these are)<sup>445</sup> is the nature of awareness ( rig pai chos nyid ), and this is primordially and perfectly endowed with the three kayas. Its pure nature ( ngo bo dag pa ) is dharmakaya; its luminous character ( r ang bzhin gsal ba ) is sambhogakaya; and its cognitive potency endowed with the essence of awareness ( thugs rje rig pa'i snying po can ) is nirmanakaya.<sup>446</sup>

Footnote 446 reads as follows: It is important to note that in this account of the trikaya, the sambhogakaya and the nirmanakaya are aspects of inner luminosity, as will be explained. They are distinct from the sambhogakaya and nirmanakaya of outwardly radiating luminosity (the rupakaya in the usually accepted sense).

Maybe this distinction between the 2 types of rupakayas is relevant?

Malcolm wrote:

The only entity that can know is a mind. Positing some kind of noetic entity that is not a mind is incoherent.

Oh, and no, it is not relevant. The correct translation for "thugs rje" in a Dzogchen context is "compassion" and that's all. For example, Mipham provides "karuna" as the Sanskrit equivalent for thugs rje in a Dzogchen context.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 5th, 2014 at 1:41 AM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

same question: so what is there, ultimately? if you say "nothing" you are a nihilist, and have done nothing to explain our presence.

Malcolm wrote:

Ultimately, there is no reality. If there were an ultimate reality, it would by necessity fall into one of the four extremes.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 5th, 2014 at 1:19 AM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

garudha said:

So if you think that ALL is truly Empty (including the basis) then who are you

Malcolm wrote:

Nominally speaking, malcolm, otherwise, no one.

garudha said:
and how do you arise?

Malcolm wrote:
Conventionally, due to causes and conditions; ultimately not at all.

gad rgyangs said:
this is why it makes no sense to say the basis is one's unfabricated mind: ultimately there is no "you" or "your mind", you & your mind are appearances of the basis. otherwise you are making your mind the basis of the basis!

Malcolm wrote:
Note that you use the qualifying term "ultimately", ultimately, there is also no basis; ergo, the basis is also something relative. That relative thing is just your own unfabricated mind, i.e. the mind essence, as Nyibum, Shabkar and many others state. It may not seem fun for modern "dzogchenpas", but the basis is just the mind essence. No mind, no essence. No dharmin, no dharmatā.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Wednesday, March 5th, 2014 at 12:50 AM
Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind
Content:

garudha said:
go amazon buy good sutra learn wisdom of Buddha.
Yes, this is good advice for you. I don't need to buy sutras in English since I read them in Tibetan.
I'm sorry. That last edit was not aimed at you. I didn't realise there might be such frisson before you put it like that.

Malcolm wrote:
No worries.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Wednesday, March 5th, 2014 at 12:50 AM
Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind
Content:
dzogchungpa said:
OK, why is it not invalid, if you don't mind my asking?

Malcolm wrote:
Because in Dzogchen, thugs rje is what generates mental appearances, thugs rje has/is what we call "rtsal".

dzogchungpa said:
Right, so the Padmakara translation "cognitive potency" actually seems more accurate than "compassion", in this context, doesn't it?

Malcolm wrote:

No, since it is a translation that is not based on the early commentarial imperatives. In others words, the definitions provided by "Vimalamitra" in his commentary on the sgra thal 'gyur should be regarded as the most authoritative and there can be no doubt that the term must be translated as compassion, and not whatever other glosses there are out there these days.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 5th, 2014 at 12:39 AM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

OK, why is it not invalid, if you don't mind my asking?

Malcolm wrote:

Because in Dzogchen, thugs rje is what generates mental appearances, thugs rje has/is what we call "rtsal".

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 5th, 2014 at 12:29 AM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

garudha said:

So if you think that ALL is truly Empty (including the basis) then who are you

Malcolm wrote:

Nominally speaking, malcolm, otherwise, no one.

garudha said:

and how do you arise?

Malcolm wrote:

Conventionally, due to causes and conditions; ultimately not at all.

garudha said:

Or am I completely misinterpreting Eastern mysticism ?

Malcolm wrote:

Well, to begin with, there is no such thing as "Eastern mysticism", there are a bunch of religions loosely grouped as Hinduism, there are a bunch of religions loosely grouped as Buddhism. I happen to be a follower of Buddhadharma in its Tibetan expression.

garudha said:

go amazon buy good sutra learn wisdom of Buddha.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, this is good advice for you. I don't need to buy sutras in English since I read them in Tibetan.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, March 5th, 2014 at 12:00 AM

Title: Re: Tendai is a Ch'an school.

Content:

Indrajala said:

Buddhism can operate albeit it needs to stay out of politics.

Malcolm wrote:

Right....try putting that one past Tibetans.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 4th, 2014 at 11:50 PM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

There is no such as "oneness", at least not in Buddhadharma.

All experiences are subjective.

Anyway, you have not defined what your oneness is. Are all phenomena "one" in that they are all empty? Of course. Is there some existent underlying fabric that unifies all phenomena? Not in Buddhadharma. In Hinduism of various stripes, definitely, but not Buddhadharma.

garudha said:

Look, there's no truth to be found in a play of words.

I say simply as follows:

If all dharmas are empty,

Then the true dharma is like a diamond.

Are there other diamonds? -Yes, perhaps there are, perhaps the goddess wears the diamond in a ring on her finger (but this would be pure conceptualisation and fantasy).

AFAIK; the diamond is one.

Malcolm wrote:

You cannot define emptiness as being one thing or many things, since it is not a thing. It is the absence of inherent existence in things, and that is all.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 4th, 2014 at 11:48 PM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The meaning of the wisdom of thugs rje from the sgra thal 'gyur commentary:

Thugs is the affection for sentient beings in the heart. rJe is the arising of a special empathy for them.

dzogchungpa said:

Well, I'm a little confused. From "Treasury of Precious Qualities, Book Two", translator's introduction: In the context of the Great Perfection, thugs rje means, in the words of Yonten Gyamtso, "pure and unadulterated awareness that has not yet stirred from its own true condition or state," but which has the potential to do so.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, this is a much later philosophized definition, and while it is not invalid, it really does not address the point that the mind's naturally present compassion is the basis for the arising of the nirmanakāya at the time of the result.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 4th, 2014 at 11:22 PM

Title: Re: Possible confusion regarding language - Dharmadhatu

Content:

garudha said:

Because the "Dharmadhatu" is itself aware.

Malcolm wrote:

No, it isn't. The dharmadhātu is one thing, wisdom is another. You cannot say they are the same, all you can say is that they are inseparable.

garudha said:

If you have basis in something, and you are aware, then the something is aware too.

Malcolm wrote:

Apart from one's own mind, one has no other basis, and no other basis is needed. "The basis", in Dzogchen is just a way of describing an imagined state of how one's mind might have been prior to an equally imaginary bifurcation of samsara and nirvana.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 4th, 2014 at 11:12 PM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

garudha said:

Furthermore, You seem to have completely misread my intention. My intention was to describe dharmadhātu as a shared fabric.

Malcolm wrote:

No, I understood exactly what your intention was, and I completely disagree with it. Dharmadhātu is not a fabric, it isn't a thing. It is just a categorization of emptiness.

garudha said:

do you really reject Oneness?

Malcolm wrote:

There is no such as "oneness", at least not in Buddhadharma.

garudha said:

And what about so many peoples reports of Oneness... Do you suggest that the experience "Oneness" is only to experience our own individual personal basis --and the "Oneness" is not the basis of all phenomena ?

Malcolm wrote:

All experiences are subjective.

Anyway, you have not defined what your oneness is. Are all phenomena "one" in that they are all empty? Of course. Is there some existent underlying fabric that unifies all phenomena? Not in Buddhadharma. In Hinduism of various stripes, definitely, but not Buddhadharma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 4th, 2014 at 10:57 PM

Title: Re: Possible confusion regarding language - Dharmadhatu

Content:

garudha said:

Because the "Dharmadhatu" is itself aware.

Malcolm wrote:

No, it isn't. The dharmadhātu is one thing, wisdom is another. You cannot say they are the same, all you can say is that they are inseparable.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 4th, 2014 at 10:54 PM

Title: Re: Dzogchen and the Two Stages

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Not for me. Mahayoga and Anuyoga are not my path. They can be someone elses path, but they are not mine.

Yudron said:

I'm curious: In 2008 you posted you were practicing bum chen and advised everyone to do the same. Did that not pan out for you was you had hoped?

rai said:

now i am curious, what is bum chen? is it some breathing exercise?

Malcolm wrote:

Khumbhaka.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 4th, 2014 at 10:53 PM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

responsiveness!!

Malcolm wrote:

Except for the _fact_ that the commentaries on the Dzogchen tantras clearly define thugs rje of the basis as "compassion" in the standard conventional sense of the term.

gad rgyangs said:

is compassion just a feeling or does it not also include responding to the needs of those who require compassion?

Malcolm wrote:

The meaning of the wisdom of thugs rje from the sgra thal 'gyur commentary:

Thugs is the affection for sentient beings in the heart. rJe is the arising of a special empathy for them.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 4th, 2014 at 10:51 PM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

garudha said:

Furthermore, You seem to have completely misread my intention. My intention was to describe dharmadhātu as a shared fabric.

Malcolm wrote:

No, I understood exactly what your intention was, and I completely disagree with it. Dharmadhātu is not a fabric, it isn't a thing. It is just a categorization of emptiness.

garudha said:

do you really reject Oneness?

Malcolm wrote:

There is no such as "oneness", at least not in Buddhadharma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 4th, 2014 at 9:55 PM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

responsiveness!!

Malcolm wrote:

Except for the _fact_ that the commentaries on the Dzogchen tantras clearly define thugs rje of the basis as "compassion" in the standard conventional sense of the term.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 4th, 2014 at 9:50 PM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

garudha said:

Three things in favour of a Shared-Dharmadhatu:

1. All those who have thus-gone report it to be infinite (so it includes everything else).

Malcolm wrote:

Suchness, emptiness, luminosity (all synonyms) lack finitude so this hardly novel.

garudha said:

2. Quantum physics can only be explained by a Shared-Dharmadhatu.

Malcolm wrote:

The dharmadhātu has nothing to do with quantum physics.

garudha said:

3. The Buddha gave sermons in higher realms. How could there even be communication if a shared fabric didn't exist ?

Malcolm wrote:

In Mahāyāna, dharmadhātu is just a generic characteristic (samanyalakṣaṇa).

Vasubandhu notes in his commentary on the Madhyantavibhaga:

Apart from the absence of self in phenomena, there are no phenomena. Therefore, dharmadhātu is a so called "generic characteristic of phenomena", and whoever understands it like that, he or she will be unmistaken about the generic characteristic.

The dharmadhātu is not a "fabric", it is an abstraction. And abstraction of what? It is a abstraction of the emptiness of phenomena. By definition, samanyalakṣaṇas are considered unreal in Buddhadharma.

Sthiramati adds:

The dharmadhātu is emptiness. Since it is a generic characteristic, however it is in one thing, it also like that in all things.

There is really no difference between how dharmadhātu is defined in Dzogchen as opposed to sūtra.

As one of the Nāgārjunas stated:

The dharmadhātu does not arise,
nor does it ever cease;
totally without affliction at all times,
untainted in the beginning, middle and end.

There is no significant different between this statement and how the basis is defined in Dzogchen save for one minor point. Indeed, the basis is just the dharmadhātu. And the dharmadhātu is just a generic characteristic which describes the emptiness of phenomena in toto. The minor difference between the basis in Dzogchen and the dharmadhātu however, is that the basis is not "inert", the basis describes the generic characteristics of minds. However the basis is in one mind, it is like that in all minds. This is related to the principle of gcig shes kun grol, "knowing one liberates all".

garudha said:

Without a Shared-Dharmadhatu rebirth could not occur.

Malcolm wrote:

Of course it could.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 4th, 2014 at 3:55 AM

Title: Re: Dhyana (samten) in Vajrayana, especially Dzogchen

Content:

Sherlock said:

According to the Dan Martin article, Milarepa had 2 dzogchen teachers. Sgyerston dbangnge and the other one who was called either Dre lhadga or rongston. Sgyerston was his first teacher after the magic and hailmaking teachers.

The story about Zhangston Chosbar shows that he taught Dzogchen more openly than lamdre.

Malcolm wrote:

My point was that Milarepa had ten teachers before he met Marpa. Milarepa received a major Vajrapani teaching cycle before he met Marpa. He understood creation and completion stage quite well.

Zhangston Chosbar only had one student for Lamdre, i.e., Sachen, as far as we know. My point was that while he may have taught Dzogchen, his own practice was Lamdre.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 4th, 2014 at 3:24 AM

Title: Re: Tendai is a Ch'an school.

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

Are there then 5 types, one for each skandha?

Malcolm wrote:

No, just two, because the sensation and perception skandhas, while being mental factors in fact, are isolated because of their power in keeping one attached to samsaric phenomena.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 4th, 2014 at 3:23 AM

Title: Re: Dr. Sanderson: Phowa etc. are directly from Saivism

Content:

Sherlock said:

Is there actually Phowa in the sense of transference of consciousness to a pure land in Shaivism or other Hindu tantras? I know there is transference to corpses.

Malcolm wrote:

Read Sanderson's paper.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 4th, 2014 at 3:22 AM

Title: Re: Dr. Sanderson: Phowa etc. are directly from Saivism

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

Is the Mahasiddha view necessarily a Buddhist view?

Malcolm wrote:

It is necessarily a view consistent with dependent origination, emptiness and so on, otherwise, we couldn't consider a siddha "mahā" i.e. awakened.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 4th, 2014 at 2:50 AM

Title: Re: Dr. Sanderson: Phowa etc. are directly from Saivism

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

So, in regards to the various Nath and Kapalika Mahasiddhas, it was the Mahamudra view and not the practices that lead to their realisations?

Malcolm wrote:

Which siddhas do you have in mind?

Sherab Dorje said:

Carbaripa (Carpati), Kapalapa, Minapa...

Malcolm wrote:

We have to examine whether they are "siddhas" or mahāsiddhas. There is a difference. In general, it would be their practice of tantric practices combined with Buddhist view.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 4th, 2014 at 2:43 AM

Title: Re: Dhyana (samten) in Vajrayana, especially Dzogchen

Content:

Sherlock said:

Thanks Malcolm.

Historically though Milarepa didn't seem to be expert in the two stages when he met his Dzogchen teacher. But then I don't know what his hailmaking would have involved. Zhangston Chosbar also seemed to teach Dzogchen openly.

Malcolm wrote:

Milrepa was already quite expert in the two stages before he met Marpa. He studied with ten teachers prior to meeting Marpa.

According to the Lamdre histories, Zhang ston Chos 'bar taught the Brahmin cycle of Dzogchen "by day", but he secretly practiced Lamdre, "by night".

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 4th, 2014 at 2:06 AM

Title: Re: Tendai is a Ch'an school.

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Kirt, they have no universal health care at all. If you go to hospital, you must bring cash with you or they will not even admit you. The barefoot doctor thing does not exist anymore, not for decades.

kirtu said:

If you go to most hospitals in the US you must also bring some kind of payment with you.
Kirt

Malcolm wrote:

That is not true, Kirt, at least not in my experience. It is illegal for emergency rooms to turn you away for want of cash. I have never had to pay up front for any services, and in some places, like Cambridge, they have community hospitals that are chartered to provide free service. When I lived in Cambridge, I used Cambridge City Hospital often.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 4th, 2014 at 1:53 AM

Title: Re: Tendai is a Ch'an school.

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

and then other countries that are in absolute absolute shambles despite having self-governance like India compared to authoritarian states like China which actually ensure a basic standard of living for most people despite their shortcomings.
China does not provide a basic living for most people. They do not even provide universal health care.

kirtu said:

Aside from the treatment of Tibetans, Mongolians and Uighurs (and those are huge "asides"), China is not as bad as it could be. And the US also does not provide universal health care in any form (not even the recently introduced so-called "Obamacare" does although it is a step in the right direction as far as coverage goes). One of the moderate successes of the PRC is that they did attempt to create universal health care through the Barefoot Doctors and then expanded from that point.

Kirt

Malcolm wrote:

Kirt, they have no universal health care at all. If you go to hospital, you must bring cash with you or they will not even admit you. The barefoot doctor thing does not exist anymore, not for decades.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 4th, 2014 at 1:05 AM

Title: Re: Tendai is a Ch'an school.

Content:

Indrajala said:

I used to think otherwise, but after traveling around Asia and living in several countries I've decided otherwise. For instance, I've seen countries that work well and are only semi-democratic if not having been authoritarian in the past (Japan, Taiwan, Singapore),

Malcolm wrote:

Did it occur to you this is more cultural than "human"?

Indrajala said:

and then other countries that are in absolute absolute shambles despite having self-governance like India compared to authoritarian states like China which actually ensure a basic standard of living for most people despite their shortcomings.

Malcolm wrote:

China does not provide a basic living for most people. They do not even provide universal health care.

Indrajala said:

So over time I've taken on a rather Confucian approach to political values, as offensive as it might be to a lot of westerners.

Malcolm wrote:

It is not offensive, but it is amusingly anachronistic.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 4th, 2014 at 1:00 AM

Title: Re: Karma

Content:

kresh said:

thanks for the replies!!

I have a follow up question:

is there an amount of good or bad karma? what I mean by that is: is there a difference in bad karma between say stealing a candy bar or killing someone? good karma? picking up somebodies garbage verses helping a homeless man/woman in need?

thanks

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, there are differences, but it mostly has to do with the force of your intention.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 4th, 2014 at 12:59 AM

Title: Re: Dr. Sanderson: Phowa etc. are directly from Saivism

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

So, in regards to the various Nath and Kapalika Mahasiddhas, it was the Mahamudra view and not the practices that lead to their realisations?

Malcolm wrote:

Which siddhas do you have in mind?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 4th, 2014 at 12:53 AM

Title: Re: Dhyana (samten) in Vajrayana, especially Dzogchen

Content:

Sherlock said:

E. Successful shamatha through kyerim also makes your mantras work

theanarchist said:

Mmh, as far as I understand it to make vajrayana really meaningful you have to have an experience of emptiness nature (otherwise everything involving a deity is still contrived) and shamatha does not provide an insight into emptiness nature (that would happen with vipasshana).

Malcolm wrote:

That is what happens during empowerment/direct introduction.

theanarchist said:

I see it rather the other way, mantra is a good focus of your shamatha practice. For example very occasionally I wake up during the night with a nightmare. In that non-meditative emotionally upset state to recite mantra is a powerful antidote to the disturbed feeling. After a short while the negative state completely dissolves and makes room for comfortable peace. So obviously mantra can work very well in a disturbed state of mind.

Malcolm wrote:

The meaning of mantra is Manas + tra, i.e. protector of the mind.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 4th, 2014 at 12:51 AM

Title: Re: Dhyana (samten) in Vajrayana, especially Dzogchen

Content:

Allan Wallace said:

I have also heard of many people who say they have achieved shamatha and dhyana, many claiming to have done so within a matter of days, weeks, or just a few months. But despite such reports, few appear to be able to effortlessly maintain flawless samadhi for at least four hours, with their senses fully withdrawn, while abiding in a luminous state of blissful samadhi.

Pero said:

Malcolm, is your first dhyana the same as Wallace's first dhyana? I haven't read everything available about Dzogchen or Vajrayana but in what I have I haven't seen such a requirement for practice. Seems a bit odd really.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, when you have attained the first dhyāna, you have the capacity to remain in that for as long as you want with no discomfort. It doesn't matter if it is 20 minutes or twenty hours.

The downside of the 1st dhyana is that it is easy to become addicted to it. Then you are just creating traces for rebirth in the form realms. So I think Wallace is being a little bit sutrayāna in his approach here. However, being able to sit comfortable in one posture for a long while is definitely beneficial for longde and thogal practice.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 4th, 2014 at 12:46 AM

Title: Re: Dhyana (samten) in Vajrayana, especially Dzogchen

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Rongzom is neutral on this point. He maintains that whether one is doing standard śamatha or mantra practice, one must develop these five mental factors. He does not claim one is superior to the other.

Sherlock said:

OK, but you are not really neutral, are you?

Malcolm wrote:

In fact I am neutral.

Sherlock said:

The point you had been developing is that two-stages are important for wannabe Dzogchenpas too right? Nothing wrong with sutra-style shamatha but kyerim offers more carry-over to Dzogchen practice?

Malcolm wrote:

You can either go with the classic Nyingma three inner yana approach, or follow someone like ChNN. I don't really think one can claim one approach is superior to the other. For some, sutra mahāmudra style practice might be all they need.

Sherlock said:

According to that Germano article, Longchenpa also regarded the two stages as important preliminaries. However, he also talked about the completion stage with little elaboration for those with difficulties with the developing stage. Do the other schools have practices like what we find in the 7th lojong in order to stabilize dhyana or do they typically depend on kyerim (whether with mantra or without)?

Malcolm wrote:

The point of completion stage is to allow one to rapidly access the nonconceptual state associated with a deep samadhi. Creation stage is the container for that. Dzogchen classically would be practiced by people quite expert in the creation and completion stages. This is no longer the case.

Sherlock said:

My knowledge of two-stages is quite lacking. So far I'm just trying to follow the Precious Vase. If I have the opportunity maybe I should receive teachings on more elaborate sadhana practices and try to find a teacher to clarify my doubts on how it is exactly done.

Malcolm wrote:

If you are content with ChNN's teachings, Mandarava is quite elaborate enough in terms of creation and completion.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 4th, 2014 at 12:41 AM

Title: Re: Dr. Sanderson: Phowa etc. are directly from Saivism

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

Most of the time when I hear claims like these I think to myself: "So what if they are?"

Buddhists do not have a monopoly on Dharma after all.

If a practice works why not use it?

Malcolm wrote:

Sapan clarifies that what distinguishes Hindu and Buddhist tantra is view, not practice.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 4th, 2014 at 12:17 AM

Title: Re: Tendai is a Ch'an school.

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

...your strongest attachment is through the saṃjñā skandha, rather than the vedana skandha...

dzogchungpa said:

This is interesting. Is it a traditional Buddhist idea that people typically have a strongest attachment through a particular skandha?

Malcolm wrote:

It comes from the Kosha.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, March 4th, 2014 at 12:07 AM

Title: Re: gaden nyen gyü?

Content:

Tsongkhapa said:

You'll be glad to know that the Ganden Oral Lineage is alive and well and living in this world. They are mainly special practices of Guru Yoga and Mahamudra views and methods.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, this is indeed a good thing.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 3rd, 2014 at 11:28 PM

Title: Re: Dr. Sanderson: Phowa etc. are directly from Saivism

Content:

Zen Dude said:

I find his scholarship to be extremely lacking. An example -

Malcolm wrote:

Well, we all have opinions. Personally, much of what he says is backed up in Tibetan accounts which give the purpose for promulgating Buddhist tantra, i.e., to attract Shaivas and others to Buddhism by providing them with a religious form they could relate to. Sakya Pandita is very clear virtually all the practices in Buddhist tantra have Shaiva, etc., counterparts.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 3rd, 2014 at 11:22 PM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

mutsuk said:

You should read JLA's study of the issue in his PhD. He has covered the whole thing in much more details.

Malcolm wrote:

I am sure, but it is a fact that the accounts about Shri Simha in the lo rgyus chen mo do not tally with earlier accounts of Shri Simha on any level. I have examined all the early accounts related to this, and there are serious discrepancies in the lo rgyus chen mo, beyond the fact that it is based on an account in Vima Nyinthig itself (which was thus penned by Zhang ston). Of course, Zhang ston's account of events of Vimalamitra's life, etc., was then eclipsed by Nyang ral's treasure bio of Guru P. So what we wind up with is three separate accounts, which are at serious variance with each other on key details, with the later ones (Zhang, Nyang ral) superseding the earlier ones (mainly the account found in the pan grub thugs bcud, which itself is most certainly the basis for Vairocana 'dra bags literature).

By the time we get to Longchenpa, it is all hopelessly garbled, with Longchenpa asserting that Zhangton and Chetsun met. Thus now you see it repeated everywhere that Zhangton was Chetsun's student, when in fact the two men never physically met, and in fact Zhangton was a disciple of Chegom Nagpo. Then of course there is the slanderous asserting preserved in Khetsun Zangpo's brief bio that the reason Zhang ston did not achieve rainbow body is that he allowed his semen to be released, resulting in the birth of his son, Nyibum.

mutsuk said:

I'm not talking about that, I'm talking about the detailed account of the revelation of the 17 Tantras and related material. In JLA published version of his PhD, it is pp. 81-82.

Malcolm wrote:

If we take Zhang ston on his word, then counting backwards, we get 210 years from the time lDang ma discovers the 17 tantras, 180 years from the time when they met, this gives us an approximate date of 916 when the tantras were revealed, and a date of 946 when Chetsun meets lDang ma. But this seems impossible to me because Chetsun was a contemporary of Drogmi Lotsawa. Chetsun has a student called Myang bka' dam pa, thus this places him after 1042, the year Atishas arrives in Purang. So Chetsun's datable era of activity must be between 1042 and around 1064 (the most probably date for the passing of Drogmi according to Davidson). This means that if Zhang ston is correct about when Chegom visited Chetsun's place of attaining rainbow body, this had to have happened roughly in around 1048, though this is maybe a little too soon.

The whole thing hinges on the identity of "Myang bka' dam pa". Since he knew lDang ma, this places lDang ma squarely in the eleven century. I really can't believe that that 17 tantras, in general, are earlier than lDang ma. lDang ma's death cannot be earlier than mid 11th century, which places his meeting with Chetsun in the late 1040's. Of course it is possible they were written in the first half of the 11th century, but for various reasons it is my present opinion that it is unlikely that any of them predate 1000. They demonstrate far too much influence from gsar ma tantras to be very early.

As far as I can tell, Zhang ston's own dates are a little unrealistic, apart from his date for the Buddha's Parinirvana, but he clearly reporting what Chegom told him about Chetsun and lDangma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 3rd, 2014 at 6:20 AM

Title: Re: Karma

Content:

kresh said:

I understand what the concept of karma is; actions have consequences. What my question is: what renders those actions good or bad?

Malcolm wrote:

The Buddhas defined ten natural non-virtues: taking life, taking what has not been given and sexual misconduct, lying, harsh speech, calumny and gossip, malice, greed and ignorance (of cause and effects).

That is what makes a given action non-virtuous. The opposite are virtuous karmas.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 3rd, 2014 at 6:04 AM

Title: Re: gaden nyen gyu?

Content:

lama tsewang said:

i have heard of something called an ear whispered gaden tradition . is this something within the gelugpa tradition , thats a little bit separate?

ie. maybe like some of the methods that rechungpa learned.

i have heard here and there that part of it is the lama chopra and the text on gelug-kagyu mahamudra.

and maybe chod?

These thoughts come up because just a few days ago , i was notified that dechen ling press has a new commentary out on lama chopra , and appended to the commentary in the back of the book, they added the famous text on gelug -kagyu mahamudra.

tsewang

Malcolm wrote:

It's based on a mystical book called the dge ldan sgyu phrul legs bam, the miraculous book of Ganden. According to legend, it is a book passed down to dben sa pa aka rgyal ba blo bzang don grub. There is but a single copy, and it is claimed that whenever the owner of this book needs to know something related to sutra and tantra, the answer miraculously appears in it. Indeed, Ganden Chod, Mahāmudra and the bLa ma mchod pa are supposed to be sourced in this book. Interestingly, Samten Karmey discovered a manuscript in Bhutan which is definitely from the dben sa pa lineage that bore the name blo bzang bka' 'bum. Thus the legend was grounded in fact. These days, the main promulgators of the myth of the dge ldan sgyu phrul legs bam are the Shugden folks, since they believe that this miraculous book was passed to Pabhonkga, and he to Trijang Rinpoche. Of course, HHDL quipped once that the real dye ldan sgyu phrul legs bam was the 18 volumes of Lama Tsongkhapa's collected works. According to Karmay, the dge ldan bka' rgyud both represents the views of Lama Tsongkhapa when he was younger and also "leans" Nyingma. It has always been a little controversial in Gelugpa.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 3rd, 2014 at 5:48 AM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

Sherlock said:

Leaving aside the issue of guru devotion, one of the main roles for the guru is to present all his accumulated knowledge to his students in a way that fits their capacities isn't it?

Malcolm wrote:

Indeed, but it is the job of the student to increase their capacity, and sectarianism generally arises from feeling that one's teachers presentation is sufficient, or the best, without having properly examined the presentations of others. This is why a lot of hostility on the part of some Nyingmas, Kagyus and Sakya against the views of Lama Tsongkhapa are frankly ridiculous, likewise the hostility of some Gelugpas against the views of Gorampa and Dolbuwa, and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 3rd, 2014 at 5:30 AM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

Sherlock said:

No, but his presentation would be a bit more relevant for one's practice than others'. But it's good to read other works of course.

Malcolm wrote:

I would think the Buddha's presentation would be the most relevant, don't you?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 3rd, 2014 at 5:29 AM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

mutsuk said:

You should read JLA's study of the issue in his PhD. He has covered the whole thing in much more details.

Malcolm wrote:

I am sure, but it is a fact that the accounts about Shri Simha in the lo rgyus chen mo do not tally with earlier accounts of Shri Simha on any level. I have examined all the early accounts related to this, and there are serious discrepancies in the lo rgyus chen mo, beyond the fact that it is based on an account in Vima Nyinthig itself (which was thus penned by Zhang ston). Of course, Zhang ston's account of events of Vimalamitra's life, etc., was then eclipsed by Nyang ral's treasure bio of Guru P. So what we wind up with is three separate accounts, which are at serious variance with each other on key details, with the later ones (Zhang, Nyang ral) superseding the earlier ones (mainly the account found in the pan grub thugs bcud, which itself is most certainly the basis for Vairocana 'dra bags literature).

By the time we get to Longchenpa, it is all hopelessly garbled, with Longchenpa asserting that Zhangton and Chetsun met. Thus now you see it repeated everywhere that Zhangton was Chetsun's student, when in fact the two men never physically met, and in fact Zhangton was a disciple of Chegom Nagpo. Then of course there is the slanderous asserting preserved in Khetsun Zangpo's brief bio that the reason Zhang ston did not achieve rainbow body is that he allowed his semen to be released, resulting in the birth of his son, Nyibum.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 3rd, 2014 at 5:18 AM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

Sherlock said:

If you are a student of ChNN, read The Precious Vase's section on how to practice the dhyana-paramita.

Malcolm wrote:

If one is a student of ChNN, is one required to limit oneself to his presentations?

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 3rd, 2014 at 1:17 AM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

mutsum said:

JLA was the first to note these things in 1992. He since that time has used the commentary of the Klong drug (he obtained in Chengdu in 1994) to show that the bi ma la'i klong 'grel must be another text (still unfound).

Malcolm wrote:

IN looking at the style of the citations, they do not resemble the klong drug commentary we have at all.

mutsum said:

Well there is a detailed chronology in the Lo-rgyus chen-mo which says otherwise. We have no reason to doubt that chronology, do we, since it sound pretty much non-apologetic...

Malcolm wrote:

We have every reason to doubt the lo rgyus chen mo. It is a piece of religious fiction. Anyway, this is the chronology given by Zhangton himself:

0 Parinirvana of the Buddha

360 AP Birth of Vajraprahe

544 AP Mañjuśrimitra meet Vajraprahe

830 AP Shri Siṃha meets Mañjuśrimitra

984 AP Shri Siṃha's parinirvana

994 AP Jñānasūtra's parinirvana

1080 AP Vimāla arrives in Tibet

1093 AP Vimāla leaves for China

1148 AP Nyang erects Zhwa Gon and conceals the texts

1358 AP lDang ma discovers the termas

1388 AP lDang ma gives them to lCe bTsun

1568 AP Zhang ston bKra Shis rDo rJe removes the unsurpassed secret cycle.

If we consider that Vimāla arrives in Tibet after the death of Trisong Detsen (which really is a certainty), but before 20, this means according to Nyinthig chronology, Buddha's parinirvana was between 390-370. By Zhangton's own dates them, he revealed the Vima Nyinthig between 1178-1198, which is obviously too late because he had passed away already. If we move the dates fifty years earlier, it gives an approximate date of 1128 for the revelation of the Nyinthig. Though it is often held that Zhangton met Chetsun directly, in fact this was only a visionary encounter on a bridge in Tsang between 1122-1128 after Zhangton had already revealed the Vima Nyinthig. He says at the end of the Lo rgyus chen mo:

As such, thirty years later, having gone to the place where lCe bTsun disappeared lCe sGom Nag po of mNar mDa' in Rong took out the outer, inner and secret oral lineage and the instruction was not promulgated to others apart from himself. These then spread widely in dBus and gTsang. Fifty years after the revelation by lCe sGom, I removed these unsurpassed secret cycles and the instruction was not promulgated to others apart from myself. At this time, one thousand five hundred sixty eight years have elapsed since the Buddha's parinirvana.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 3rd, 2014 at 1:04 AM

Title: Re: Hardships and Downfall of Buddhism in India

Content:

theanarchist said:

I don't know, history shows that as soon as one ruling class is removed (for example by revolution) another ruling class comes into power and the whole game starts over.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, because of the karma of some people to be in power, others to be in service, some poor, some wealthy and so on.

theanarchist said:

So, yes, it definitely depends on your karma if you become victim of these structures or not but it's not "karma" that Homo sapiens as a species developed this trait through evolution and it is genetically fixed in their brain structure.

Malcolm wrote:

When considering karma, there are no "victims". And yes, it is a result of karma that human beings developed all traits they bear.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 3rd, 2014 at 12:26 AM

Title: Re: Hardships and Downfall of Buddhism in India

Content:

Indrajala said:

Those who might have veered away from Vedic orthodoxy were still accepted no matter how eccentric they became .

theanarchist said:

That sounds so familiar.... Seems to be a worldwide phenomenon that ruling classes strive to eradicate everyone who threatens the status quo. Frankly, humanity is disgusting.

Malcolm wrote:

You need to study karma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 3rd, 2014 at 12:16 AM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

Sherlock said:

Interesting, thanks.

Do you know what kind of practices are in the Bram ze'i skor? I think that is the earliest Dzogchen cycle mentioned by a non-Dzogchen practice lineage (Sakya). Also, if Zhang ston Chos 'bar openly mentioned the word 'Dzogchen' in opposition to the new translations to Sachen, it seems that there was an awareness about the Dzogchen and its 'old' origins among the public.

Malcolm wrote:

I am pretty sure the Brahmin cycle is a terma system, but I forget which Tibetan master was responsible for its promulgation in the 11th century. It is generally classified as yang ti.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, March 3rd, 2014 at 12:06 AM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

mutsuk said:

Concerning the age of these Tantras, JLA has shown that the Klong-drug is mentioned by title in the bSam-gtan mig-sgron (although without quote, but anyway, the Kun tu bzang po klong drug pa'i rgyud is the only Tantra I know of whose abridged title is Klong-drug, the standard abridged title for this tantra).

Malcolm wrote:

The Mu tig phreng ba commentary treats the 17 tantras as a single collection, but whether it was composed before or after the Vima Nyinthig is very hard to say.

It is true that there is a mention of a text called the klong drug on folio 17a, and there is also a text mentioned called the vi ma la klong 'grel which is mentioned three times, as mentioned by Dylan Esler in his article. However, this is extremely uncertain evidence. Until someone actually goes through the whole of the extant klong drug commentary, we cannot be sure that this commentary attributed to Vimalamitra is in fact the same as the one mentioned by Nubchen, don't you agree?

There is a second issue, which is we don't really know exactly when the bSam gtan mig sgron was composed, but it certainly could not be earlier than circa 1000 CE.

So, as far as I am concerned this still leaves the seventeen tantras as roughly early 11th century compositions, since the first external mention of them is in the Vima Nyinthig, which was definitely composed around 1122 by Zhangston.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, March 2nd, 2014 at 10:45 PM

Title: Re: Dhyana (samten) in Vajrayana, especially Dzogchen

Content:

Sherlock said:

So Malcolm, am I right in saying that your point here is that:

A. Dzogchen practitioners must have stable shamatha to the level of the first dhyana

Malcolm wrote:

Check

Sherlock said:

B. Creation stage is a shamatha practice that can help develop that

Malcolm wrote:

Check

Sherlock said:

C. Visualizations are used in both creation stage and in Dzogchen practices

Malcolm wrote:

Check

Sherlock said:

D. General sutra-style shamatha doesn't usually involve visualizations

Malcolm wrote:

Check (kaśīna meditation aside, and then there are the impure dhyana topics, such as visualizing yourself as a skeleton and so on)

Sherlock said:

E. Successful shamatha through kyerim also makes your mantras work

Malcolm wrote:

Check

Sherlock said:

Conclusion: A major reason for Dzogchen practitioners to develop the dhyanic factors by training shamatha through kyerim is that the visualization skills developed will be useful in other practices, and also for the mantra benefit. Therefore it is more useful for Dzogchen practitioners than sutrayana style shamatha.?

Malcolm wrote:

Rongzom is neutral on this point. He maintains that whether one is doing standard śamatha or mantra practice, one must develop these five mental factors. He does not claim one is superior to the other.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, March 2nd, 2014 at 9:18 AM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

The texts are always experientially addressed to the reader, to discover his or her state, which of course is the basis, they never say "theres my basis and theres your basis, we really exist as separate subjects so we have separate bases."

to discover his or her state

Malcolm wrote:

You don't need to theorize all kinds of different heats, to understand that all fires have the characteristic of heat. The basis is the same, all sentient beings and buddhas have the same set of characteristics, essence, nature and compassion. The general basis (spyi gzhi, not gzhi gzhi) is just a set of characteristics shared by all sentients, whether buddhas or samsarins, just as all fires share the quality of heat, and that is all it is.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, March 2nd, 2014 at 9:14 AM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

Sherlock said:

constructors of this narrative attempted to sketch out why no one from India in the sarma period had heard of it and at the same time make it sound more powerful than anything the New Translators were returning with.

Malcolm wrote:

The hilarious about this is very late narrative is that guys like Nyibum, Rongzom etc., were very active in the gsar ma scene. Nyibum was a student of Jetsun Dragpa Gyaltsen, Nyibum's son, Guru Jober, was a student of Sapan, and so on. Chetsun Senge Wangchuk supposedly assisted Drogmi by giving him gold with which to donate to Gayadhara and so on.

The reason why no one in India had ever heard of the man ngag sde teachings is that they never existed in India at all, and were constructed by Tibetans in the 11th century. Not all Nyingma tantras were composed/revealed by Tibetans, but the Dzogchen tantras, in my opinion (as I have mentioned frequently) most certainly were composed/revealed strictly by Tibetans and never existed in India, ever, nor even "Oddiyāna".

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, March 1st, 2014 at 11:42 PM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

Sherlock said:

End of the day, my Dzogchen teachers say Dzogchen is better than Mahamudra and I believe them.

Malcolm wrote:

In the end, this is mere puffery and triumphalism. It's like saying you can't get rainbow body from practicing Vajrayogini.

You may be more interested in practicing Dzogchen rather than practicing Lamdre, or Mahamudra, etc., but in the end one does not lead to a result higher than the other.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, March 1st, 2014 at 11:22 PM

Title: Re: Myanmar considers law restricting interfaith marriage

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

Appearances are irrelevant, one's internal condition is what is important.

Sufism is also oppressed and suppressed by Shiite and Sunni governments, does that mean there is nobody practicing Sufism in Shiite and Sunni countries?

Burma is apparently a Buddhist country, if their Buddhism is being overrun by Islam then they need to ask themselves "Why?" because banning interfaith marriages is not going to be a long-term solution.

Malcolm wrote:

They are not banning interfaith marriages, they are guaranteeing the right of Buddhist women to keep their Buddhist faith if they enter into marriage with Muslims, undoubtedly to discourage Muslim men from marrying Buddhist women (who then must convert to Islam). You clearly did not read the article carefully:

The proposals include a law "to give protection and rights for ethnic Buddhists when marrying with other religions", as well as a ban on polygamy and legislation to "balance the increasing population".

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, March 1st, 2014 at 11:18 PM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

Sherlock said:

Kongtrul says completion is secondary in Creation and Completion.

Malcolm wrote:

Secondary in what sense? Secondary in the sense that yantra is a secondary practice?

The practice of completion stage is what causes one to achieve buddhahood. It is not merely for "reducing attachment" to the creation stage. On the other hand, what he may mean is the "completion" stage practice of dissolving the deity. This still cannot be construed as "secondary" since in a Nyingma sadhana practice, this is where one rests in tregchö.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, March 1st, 2014 at 11:01 PM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

Sherlock said:

I was wondering about the dhyanas in relation to Dzogchen recently. Thanks for the info.

However what about just practicing the semdzins?

Malcolm wrote:

If they induce those mental factors, great. If they don't...

Developing a stable śamatha is crucial in Dzogchen. Just look at the seventh lojong. If someone wants to pursue SMS they will get nowhere without doing many months of long 2 hour sessions. And it gets more meditation heavy the higher you go.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, March 1st, 2014 at 10:58 PM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Contrary to popular belief, Dzogchen practitioners also need to maintain their samayas (plural), not just the groovy ones like non-existence, ubiquity, singleness and natural perfection (which can't be broken anyway).

dzogchungpa said:

What are the non-groovy ones, say, for members of the DC?

Malcolm wrote:

The standard 27.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, March 1st, 2014 at 10:57 PM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

Sherlock said:

It seems to me like you are in Sakya mood again, trying to see Dzogchen as just the completion stage of Nyingma. That might have been the view of Sakya Pandita

Malcolm wrote:

Actually, it's Mipham's point of view.

Sherlock said:

Dzogchen like Jamgon Kongtrul, Karma Chagmed, Namkhai Norbu all agree that Dzogchen is different from Mahamudra.

Malcolm wrote:

Of course the path of Dzogchen thögal is different than the path of the two stages, (but it doesn't really seem to be that different when you examine the sbyor drug, despite mutsuk's protests to the contrary).

None of them would say that Dzogchen produces a Buddhahood superior to the path of the two stages. That is a Bonpo point of view.

Sherlock said:

In the two stages, the completion stage is secondary to the generation stage, to reduce attachment to the generation stage.

Malcolm wrote:

Creation and completion are to be practice in union from the beginning. Completion stage is no way secondary to creation stage. Whatever made you think it was?

Sherlock said:

Trekchod and thogal, longde four das, semde four contemplations are not secondary to Mahayoga, at least as they survive today.

Malcolm wrote:

I know a lot of people who have received all of these instructions, and just about as many who do nothing with them at all. I know many people, for example, who have received Mandarava creation and completion practices, and many who apply them regularly. I would venture a guess and say that in general, advanced Dzogchen practices remain at a level of fantasy for most people.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, March 1st, 2014 at 10:47 PM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

Sherlock said:

You don't need to spend years to get your visualization of a specific body part of a deity perfectly right in Dzogchen, also you just visualize the relevant syllables or channels depending on the practice, not the whole deity. Are you saying that in actual practice, visualization of all the fine details in the two stages is not necessary?

Malcolm wrote:

In actual practice, when you are reciting the sadhana, you just recite it clearly, i.e. without distraction; intensely, i.e. you know what you are saying, and quickly, without lingering on any part of the sadhana until you come to the end.

Let us say you are meditating the Hevajra mandala, there there are thirty-two topics. You pick one topic per session. For example, in the beginning, for the most part, one focuses on cultivating divine pride "I am yidam X". The one focuses on getting the central eye correct. Why? Because this causes the vāyu to begin to settle in the central channel. Then you move from one to the other. Eventually, by switching topics from one to another, you can immediately recall a generic image of the whole deity without any effort. Then you can dispense with this. You don't spend hours and hours trying to get each detail perfect.

In one session you apply both some equipoise on one aspect of the mandala or another, and then one does some completion stage practice, right from the very beginning. When you are doing completion stage practice, you only focus on what you need for that completion stage practice.

Mantra recitation is considered a post-equipoise practice in Sakya because it involves activity. In Nyingma, focusing on the mantra rosary is generally considered the main practice of the creation stage, and resting in the nature of the mind at the end is considered to be the main completion stage.

Even if you are a fantastic "Dzogchen" practitioner, if you recite mantras in a state of distraction, they won't work. So in fact, whether you are doing some elaborate practice like Hevajra, or an Anuyoga practice like Dragphur, you need to have good, stable concentration, otherwise your mantras won't work. The whole point of creation stage is to develop your concentration to the point that your mantras work easily and swiftly. If you think that mantras like the 25 spaces are some exception, they are not. In this case they function only if you are in a state of natural repose, unfettered equipoise i.e. cog bzhag.

Rongzom makes the point very clearly that Dzogchen practitioners must develop the mental factors that characterize the first dhyana, vitarka, vicara, priti, sukha and ekagraha, i.e. applied attention, sustained attention, physical ease, mental ease and one-pointedness. If you do not have a stable śamatha practice, you can't really call yourself a Dzogchen practitioner at all. At best, you can call yourself someone who would like to be a Dzogchen practitioner a ma rdzogs chen pa. People who think that Dzogchen frees one from the need to meditate seriously are seriously deluded. The sgra thal 'gyur clearly says:

The faults of not meditating are:
the characteristics of samsara appear to one,
there is self and other, object and consciousness,
the view is verbal,
the field is perceptual,
one is bound by afflictions,
also one throws away the path of the buddhahood, one does not understand the nature of the result,
a basis for the sameness of all phenomena does not exist, one's vidyā is bound by the three realms, and one will fall into conceptuality

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, March 1st, 2014 at 10:03 PM

Title: Re: Tendai is a Ch'an school.

Content:

Indrajala said:

The way I judge Buddhists is basically based on how much broad knowledge they possess and how well they interpret Dharma in a reasonable and realistic manner. Emotions and warm feelings are not wise guides for judging people.

Malcolm wrote:

That is because, like most religious intellectuals, your strongest attachment is through the saṃjñā skandha, rather than the vedana skandha. This is also why you promiscuously promulgate your point of view that common people should not be allowed to govern themselves, that they need guidance from their "betters" and so on. In other words your elitism is merely a factor of your afflictive make up, there is nothing objective about it at all.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, March 1st, 2014 at 9:47 PM

Title: Re: Myanmar considers law restricting interfaith marriage

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

The only thing Buddhists need as protection, is to act like Buddhists.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, the fact is that in some countries, like Lhadak, Buddhist women are "press-ganged" into marriages with Muslims. This also happens in Bangladesh. A lot of what is happening in Myanmar is a direct reaction to the oppression of Buddhists in the Chittagong hills. It does not make it right, but that is actually what is happening. The Buddhist communities in the Chittagong have had close ties with the Burmese for many centuries.

<http://www.angelfire.com/ab/jumma/bground.html>

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, March 1st, 2014 at 9:42 PM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

Sherlock said:

In semdzins and rushan, the only real "mantra" is the three syllables. There are other syllables but those are not mantras.

Malcolm wrote:

Seriously, where do you get the strange idea that the six syllables of Samantbhadara are not mantras? Certainly not from Dzogchen tantras:

Realizing the meaning of the six syllables unravels the great tantra of secret mantra. Abiding in the meaning of the six syllables is a person's nirvana. The kings that creates realization is the six sounds of syllables. All secret mantra is complete in the six syllables.

-- Mind Mirror of Vajrasattva

Sherlock said:

Your other examples are also not essential practices of Dzogchen upadesha (trekchod and thogal).

It's not important to get the fine details of the visualization compared to the two stages.

Malcolm wrote:

The fact creation and completion practices like caṇḍalī yoga are brought up in the seventeen tantras themselves and their commentarial literature proves that they are important.

The main principle of the creation stage of developing divine pride. I really don't know how much experience you have of doing elaborate creation stage practices, but your comments betray a lack of familiarity about how such creation stage is actually done in practice. Many Dzogchen/Nyingma practitioners, unfamiliar with the fine details of "gsar ma" tantras, have the idea that "sudden" or instant creation is only a principle of Anuyoga. However, the Laghusamvara Tantra explicitly teaches instant creation as well as gradual creation. The general consideration is one of experience. In the gsar ma schools, the more elaborate creation stage practices are for beginners, while advanced practitioners rely on instant creation stages. You can read about this in the Lamdre book.

In addition, there are very few people who practice thögal seriously. As Khenpo Ngachung mentions, principally thögal is used these days to stabilize tregchö. Most Dzogchen practitioners are not going to realize the body of light. Most practitioners are going attain realization in the bardo, if at all. If you maintain your samayas, no matter what system of Vajrayāna you practice, you will achieve Buddhahood within seven lifetimes, i.e. if you maintain your samayas, you are functionally equivalent to a stream entrant. Contrary to popular belief, Dzogchen practitioners also need to maintain their samayas (plural), not just the groovy ones like non-existence, ubiquity, singleness and natural perfection (which can't be broken anyway).

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, March 1st, 2014 at 7:53 PM

Title: Re: Family lineages vs tulku system vs "meritocracy"

Content:

Sherlock said:

It is best to follow one's guru. I think for ChNN, the outline of sutrayana he gives in the Precious Vase is what he expects his students to know if they want to learn in a more organized way.

Malcolm wrote:

ChNN only sets a minimum bar on what he expects people to know, but he expects _everyone_ to learn the base. Sadly, most people ignore him on this point, but it is partially because the translation is difficult to read.

Sherlock said:

I think it's because it starts from a fairly hard to understand and somewhat arcane position: contrasting the different schools in India. The first time I read it, I had problems getting past the first chapter and stopped. Later, I just read the later chapters, which were much clearer.

Malcolm wrote:

It's is principally a commentary on the man ngag lta phreng ba attributed to Padmasambhava.

The reason why we need to acquaint ourselves with these tenet systems is so that we avoid falling into the same errors, thinking our view accords with Buddhadharma, when it really doesn't.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, March 1st, 2014 at 7:48 PM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

Sherlock said:

The supreme empowerment doesn't refer to the ritualized actions of putting a vase on your head etc

heart said:

In the Vima Nyingtik the first empowerment, the elaborate, is given with a vase.

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

As is the second, the unelaborate empowerment.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, March 1st, 2014 at 7:48 PM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

Sherlock said:

The only mantra recitation is the three syllables.

Malcolm wrote:

This is seriously a very silly thing to say. Where did you get this idea? What about the six syllables of Samantabhadra, song of the vajra and so on? What about the countless mantras for recitation in the rDzogs pa Rang 'byung? What about the Ekajati practices in the khro ma nag mo rgyud?

Sherlock said:

Visualization is not very important compared to tantric mahamudra.

Malcolm wrote:

Where do you get this idea? What about semzin and rushan? What about all the praṇāyama practices that involve visualization?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, March 1st, 2014 at 7:44 PM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

Sherlock said:

How is the way of the practice the same?

The only mantra recitation is the three syllables. Visualization is not very important compared to tantric mahamudra. The supreme empowerment doesn't refer to the ritualized actions of putting a vase on your head etc, but to conveying the meaning of Dzogchen through whatever means, often just through oral explanations.

If anything, Dzogchen way of practice is more similar to sutrayana meditation than to tantra.

Malcolm wrote:

Nonsense. For example, the Vima Nyinthig has a detailed text on praṇāyama called the rlung gyi phra khrid, which gives sets of practices that are very important for Dzogchen practitioners. Praṇāyama, not important at all in sutrayāna meditation, is extremely important in Dzogchen. Likewise, the notion that view to be meditated is conferred through experiences gained during the empowerment. Not only this, but the whole contextualization of practice is completely based on the systems of nāḍīs and cakras in the human body and so on.

The supreme empowerment means, according to The Mind Mirror of Vajrasattva:

There are three kinds of empowerments, outer, inner and secret. The outer empowerment is the mandala of colored powder... The empowerments are conferred sequentially. The location of conferring them is the brahmarandhra. Having completed the outer and inner empowerments as such, one should enter into the secret empowerment. There are three syllables... As such, having completed the three empowerments, one should bestow the instructions to be bestowed. The yoga who has the complete empowerments will definitely become accomplished. The illustration of the meaning of secret mantra is granted through empowerment.

In general, the ancient texts and commentaries assume that a person who wants to practice Dzogchen will receive all four empowerments, elaborate, unelaborate and so on. Of course, the system of the direct introduction does exist in the seventeen tantras, but it is generally considered to be given only on the basis of the elaborate and so on empowerments, just as so-called "sems sde" was generally only conferred to people who had received at minimum the Guhyagarbha empowerment. "Longde" as we know, can only be practiced on the basis of an anuyoga empowerment.

And in point of fact, the Dzogs pa rang 'byung tantra mainly concerns mahayoga and anuyoga methods, various kinds of maha and anu style empowerments, as well as elaborate rites for leading practitioners through the bardo. The commentary on the sgra thaḥ 'gyur has a very elaborate Vajravārahī practice as well as other creation stage practices. These are discussed in the commentary to this passage:

Amazing, though there are countless stages of ultimate secret practice, by dividing the principle ones,
[the one of] method and [the one of] supremely profound prajñā are summarized from them.

In actuality, Dzogchen is always contextualized as a part of secret mantra in the seventeen tantras themselves.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, March 1st, 2014 at 7:06 PM

Title: Re: Family lineages vs tulku system vs "meritocracy"

Content:

Sherlock said:

It is best to follow one's guru. I think for ChNN, the outline of sutrayana he gives in the Precious Vase is what he expects his students to know if they want to learn in a more organized way.

Malcolm wrote:

ChNN only sets a minimum bar on what he expects people to know, but he expects everyone to learn the base. Sadly, most people ignore him on this point, but it is partially because the translation is difficult to read.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, March 1st, 2014 at 7:00 PM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

alpha said:

Also , if you say " Dharmadhtu is a condition common to all beings " that would imply to mean the individual basis not dharmadatu since dharmadathu per Rinpoche's explanation it means "all of existence".

Malcolm wrote:

Dharmadhātu, literally meaning "source of phenomena", in Mahāyāna means the general emptiness of all things. Dharmatā means the specific emptiness of a given thing; however, dharmatā, in Dzogchen texts, also refers to how the basis is instantiated within a given sentient being.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, March 1st, 2014 at 6:54 PM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

Sherlock said:

If the other paths in Buddhadharma really had the same view of the base, path, and fruit as Dzogchen, their way of practice would likewise be the same.

Malcolm wrote:

It is more or less the same.

The authors of Dzogchen texts wouldn't feel the need to contrast their path so much with that of the tantras either.

The Supreme Source said:

1. There is no view on which one has to meditate.
2. There is no commitment, or samaya, one has to keep.
3. There is no capacity for spiritual action one has to seek.
4. There is no mandala one has to create.
5. There is no initiation one has to receive.
6. There is no path one has to tread.
7. There are no levels of realization (bhumis) one has to achieve through purification.
8. There is no conduct one has to adopt, or abandon.
9. From the beginning, self-arising wisdom has been free of obstacles.
10. Self-perfection is beyond hope and fear.

Malcolm wrote:

Hevajra Tantra:

No meditator, no meditation,
no deity, and also no mantra.

And:

Here there is no method and wisdom,
the appearance of true reality, can't be described by another, the innate cannot be found anywhere.

And:

All migrating beings arise from me,
also the three realms also arise from me,
I pervade all of this,
the nature of migrating beings is not seen elsewhere.

And:

Therefore, no smell, no sound, no form,
no purity of taste and thought,
nothing to touch, no phenomena, everything is pure, having understood migrating beings pure by nature as migrating beings.

And:

[C]onsciousness is the form of all.

And:

No recitation of mantra, no austerity, no fire pujas, also no one in the maṇḍala, and also no maṇḍala, that is the mantra recitation, that is the austerity, that is the fire pujas, that is the one in the maṇḍala and the maṇḍala, in brief, the mind is the encompassing form.

The pure mind's nature is nirvana.

You see, the message of the bodhicitta texts is not really so unique in this respect.

The Supreme Source said:

Is it all just rhetoric? I don't think so. Maybe in actual terms, it still takes many years of retreat for both a Mahamudra practitioner and a Dzogchen practitioner to reach realization, but the way the view of the base, path and fruit differs in both paths strongly influences the actual practice.

Malcolm wrote:

The actual practice of Dzogchen is unifying the three inner tantras. When we talk about essence nature and compassion, this is really just a riff on the three samadhis of mahāyoga, etc. I.e.:

The samadhi of suchness = essence

The samadhi of universal appearance = nature

The samadhi of the cause = compassion

One of the seventeen tantras, The Mind Mirror of Vajrasattva explains:

Again he replied "Oh Vajraholder, listen! After my Nirvana, teach this to sentient beings of the future. Generation stage Mahāyoga is like the basis of all Dharma. Completion state Anuyoga is the like the path of all Dharma. Great Perfection Atiyoga is the like the result of Dharma. Therefore, the meaning of the inseparability of the trio of creation and completion is understood as the three syllables. [9/a] If it is asked what those are, they can be understood with Oṃ Aḥ Hūṃ. Therefore, hold in mind what I have clearly demonstrated. Without arising or ceasing, Om exists in oneself. Without birth and death, Āḥ exists oneself. Inseparable, Hūṃ exists in oneself. The single unwritten tantra exists in oneself. The single undemonstrated agama exists in oneself. The intimate instruction that discloses one's vidyā exists in oneself. The lamp of the essence of wisdom is very bright. The meaning of the six yānas are to be understood in three. The meaning of the six syllables are to be understood in three syllables. The tantra must be unraveled with the meaning of the trio of creation and completion to sentient beings of the future. The three syllables exist in all sentient beings. Therefore, in terms of accomplishment, explained Accomplishment Mahāyoga using the ground; explain Agama Anuyoga using space; and explained Upadesha Dzogchen using the sun and moon. The confirmation of the ultimate garbha is to be understood with this tantra.”

And:

From that basis existing in the form of a halo of light, the so called “causal condition” is the actual ignorance. Since that becomes an intellectual analysis, it is called the “dominant condition”. Since is apprehended subjectively, it is called “the object condition”. For example, like face of a person shown to a mirror. Since those three happen at the same time, it is called “the immediately simultaneous and antecedent condition”.

That is one's own basis but it was not recognized by oneself. The samsaric three realms are formed through delusion.

This tantra also demonstrates the fault of not receiving empowerment:

The demonstration of the fault of not obtaining the supreme empowerment is that the yogin, for example, will be like a boatman with out an oar, unable to deliver to the other side. If the supreme empowerment is obtained, the secret mantra that is not accomplished will be accomplished.

When it comes to the unique feature of Dzogchen, it lies in the the anatomy of thögal, and that's about it. But even in this respect, that fact that path depends on human physical anatomy classifies it along with other highest yoga tantra systems.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, March 1st, 2014 at 6:25 PM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

the basis is the basis of all phenomena of samsara and nirvana, including sentient beings and their minds. A mirror is the basis for all reflections, but it is not contained in the reflections. You said "The basis is a generic set of qualities, essence, nature and compassion, that all minds possess.". This is like saying "The mirror is a generic set of qualities that all reflections possess." This makes no sense.

Malcolm wrote:

No, it is like saying that all mirrors possess a general set of characteristics, such as reflectivity, and so on.

Again, you are just reifying the basis as if it were something like "brahman".

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, March 1st, 2014 at 6:06 AM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The ultimate is emptiness free from proliferation. When there is proliferation, there are sentient beings, buddhas, worlds, universes, etc. In order for there to be a presence or absence of proliferation, there has to be a basis for the the presence or absence of proliferation, and that basis is just the mind of a sentient [i.e. buddhas or beings].

gad rgyangs said:

this is totally circular: first you say that sentient beings are the result of proliferation, and the ultimate is free from proliferation. so far so good. then you say that the ultimate is "just the mind of a sentient being". totally circular, and also total reification of both sentient beings and the ultimate.

Malcolm wrote:

The ultimate described in words is merely a reification of a mind.

gad rgyangs said:

relatively there is a concept of a basis in the mind of a sentient being. If, however, that sentient being recognizes instant presence, then all such distinctions of "ultimate" and "relative" fall away.

Malcolm wrote:

Which proves my point that the basis is just the mind of a sentient being, for simplicities sake, when there is no proliferation in that mind, when it is unfabricated, that is buddhahood. When there is proliferation, sentient being hood.

It is inane to discuss things like a basis without discussing what a basis is a basis of (samsara and nirvana). That discussion of the basis of samsara and nirvana is only meaningful with regards to sentient beings. And yes, we are referring to an ālaya of sentient beings, not in the specialized man ngag sde usage of the term, where it refers only to ignorance, but in the more general way, in the way it is used in non-man ngag sde, in some terma cycles like the dgongs pa zang thal, and in the gsar ma schools. In short, what we are talking about is the ālaya cause continuum.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, March 1st, 2014 at 5:08 AM

Title: Re: IS THE DALAI LAMA SAFE?

Content:

odysseus said:

There ´s nothing to worry about. The Dalai Lama can handle himself. These "enemies" are not dangerous, they ´re just angry.

Malcolm wrote:

Don't be so sure...

<https://tinyurl.com/l337nwj>

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, March 1st, 2014 at 4:51 AM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

the basis is not the "cause" of samsara and nirvana, and you may choose to create an actual duality of delusion/non-delusion, but as you know that is a mistake of the lower vehicles.

Malcolm wrote:

Of course it is, that is how it is defined by Dzogchen tantras. As Nyibum notes:

The trio of the essence, nature and compassion of the original basis becomes the three ignorances.

gad rgyangs said:

this clearly says that mind "arises from intrinsic luminescence of dharmatā manifesting as the five lights". Isn't that simple enough?

Malcolm wrote:

Dharmatā here is wisdom. If the basis is not wisdom, it is inert, non-sentient. How can there be sentience apart from instantiations of sentience, i.e. minds?

gad rgyangs said:

It is important to understand that "light" in this context refers only to the luminescence [gdangs] or clarity [gsal ba] of one's own consciousness, it is not an "outside" light, it is not physical light which can bleach color out of pigments, etc.

this is what keeps tripping you up. You insist on taking the fiction of "one's own consciousness" as an absolute, imagining that "inside/outside" is an objective distinction.

Malcolm wrote:

It doesn't trip me up at all. Your problem is you think all this is all a description of some ultimate. It isn't. It is all purely conventional.

gad rgyangs said:

I have been all over these texts, and there is never any satisfactory explanation for how a mind arises out of the basis acausally. Since the basis is described as a wisdom, a wisdom must in fact be something which bears noetic capacity, and it must in fact arise as a diversity, i.e., as individual instantiations, so why do you keep saying "the basis" instead of "bases?" why do you keep referring to the basis as an "it" rather than a "them"?

Malcolm wrote:

As I pointed out, the basis is merely a generic term, just like vijñāna in vijñānadhatu is a generic term which covers all instances of consciousness.

gad rgyangs said:

Thus, there is no contradiction at all in considering the basis a general description for the nature of the mind which can either realize buddhahood or fall into samsara. same problem: all you have done is passed the buck and now you must explain what is the basis for all those individual minds.

Malcolm wrote:

The basis is a generic set of qualities, essence, nature and compassion, that all minds possess.

gad rgyangs said:

It is incoherent to talk about the basis if the basis is not in fact one's own mind. Then one has to imagine some noetic uber-field out of which instantiations of omniscient or deluded consciousnesses somehow bootstrap themselves into existence. you have set up this straw man and are having a ball tilting at the windmills, but no one says this: the basis is not a field, it is not a describable thing, period.

Malcolm wrote:

It is a describable principle, that is why Dzogchen tantras spend so much time describing it.

gad rgyangs said:

Notice that you never pull up any of the thousands of quotes in the corpus that say it is beyond conceptual constructs and free of all extremes, so of course for you it must either be X or Y, black or white, etc.

Malcolm wrote:

Those citations are not useful for the purpose at hand, which is explaining how delusion arises from something supposedly undeluded.

gad rgyangs said:

see, there you go: if you can't fit it into a category then its unacceptable to you.

Malcolm wrote:

Your inability to see that it is merely a catalogue of qualities forces you to basically assert one of the five faulty positions of the basis, i.e., that it is indeterminable.

gad rgyangs said:

yes, claiming that sentient beings with multiple bases exist is the product of a mind which reifies.

Malcolm wrote:

Right, which is your claim.

gad rgyangs said:

Your problem is that you want to avoid any discussion of the relative. But Dzogchen tantras are not so shy, and they acknowledge the two truths also, as the String of Pearls states:

The universe and inhabitants have always been empty,
the ultimate endowed with the form of the relative.

haha and how is this "ultimate" different from God or Brahman exactly? What is the "form of the relative" except illusory universes and beings?

Malcolm wrote:

The ultimate is emptiness free from proliferation. When there is proliferation, there are sentient beings, buddhas, worlds, universes, etc. In order for there to be a presence or absence of proliferation, there has to be a basis for the the presence or absence of proliferation, and that basis is just the mind of a sentient [i.e. buddhas or beings].

In the end, Dzogchen does not actually go beyond the yogacara madhyamaka synthesis.

gad rgyangs said:

And finally, the sgra thal 'gyur states:

Because mind pervades all the embodied,
there are no buddhas without sentient beings.
and the PP sutras say there are no buddhas or sentient beings.

Malcolm wrote:

Ultimately there are no sentient beings, no basis, etc.

Relatively there is a basis, i.e. the minds of sentient beings, and so on.

So, what we demonstrated here is that Dzogchen in the end, despite a lot of hyperbole and rhetoric is just another conventional scheme for describing the four noble truths: suffering, the cause, the cessation and the path.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, March 1st, 2014 at 4:37 AM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

There seems to be a slight disparity between what you, Malcolm and pensum, are saying, but I will think about it. Maybe we can discuss the first paragraph of the note: What we call the "ground" is the union of emptiness and luminosity. It is the dharmatā: motionless, ultimate reality, the tathāgatagarbha. At the slightest arising of the creative power of awareness (and there is no question of its not arising), there occurs what is called the appearance of the ground (gzhi snang). The appearance of the ground and the creative power of awareness are the same thing. This creative power moves, whereas awareness itself is always motionless. It is as when the sun rises. The sun's rays cover the earth, but the sun does not move out from itself. Its rays are like the creative power of awareness. The appearance of the ground is said to "move," in the sense that it is the ground's radiance, not because it is drawn out by something extraneous.

("creative power" = "rtsal")

I find the phrase "there is no question of its not arising" kind of intriguing. It doesn't seem to explain much.

Malcolm wrote:

This is just a description of the nature of the mind. No mind, no nature of the mind.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, March 1st, 2014 at 3:58 AM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

As such, one's mind present as the nature of all the phenomena of buddhahood is realized as buddha.

-- Nyima Bum

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, March 1st, 2014 at 3:55 AM

Title: IS THE DALAI LAMA SAFE?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

<http://www.jamyangnorbu.com/blog/2014/02/28/is-the-dalai-lama-safe/>

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, March 1st, 2014 at 3:51 AM

Title: Re: Family lineages vs tulku system vs "meritocracy"

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

What is lacking for lay people is a decent education in the basics of Buddhadharma. As I get older I can see that there is limited benefit to Varjayāna practice without some grounding, either prior too or simultaneously, in Sutrayāna teachings. There is any number of very good Sakya Khenpos. Basically in Sakya, you are either a scholar or a ritualist.

Clarence said:

Apologies for taking this off-topic, but how do you see that in regards of Dzogchen practice? Is it easier to practice Dzogchen vs Vajrayana without those basics in Buddhadharma?

Malcolm wrote:

I have wavered on this over the years, as I have in so many other things, but my present thinking is that all Vajrayāna practitioners of whatever stripe need a solid grounding in Hinayāna and Mahāyāna paths.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, March 1st, 2014 at 3:12 AM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

Malcolm, I like what you're saying, I'm just trying to understand. Could you please respond to my question here:

https://www.dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=66&t=15425&p=216335#p216335?

I find the use of "actualization" in the quotation kind of confusing. Would you, or anybody, happen to know what it might correspond to in Tibetan?

Malcolm wrote:

They mean that vidyā is the "instantiation" (mngon 'gyur) of the basis in a sentient being.

dzogchungpa said:

Those aren't scare quotes, are they?

OK, so how are we to understand "Therefore, while awareness is necessarily the ground, the ground is not necessarily awareness."?

To me, it seems incompatible with your position.

Malcolm wrote:

The basis is a set of qualities that all minds have. Vidyā is the specific instantiation of those qualities in a sentient being. The basis here has been defined for you as tathāgatagarbha, i.e. dharmakāya in a obscured form. Dharmakāya demonstrates in this instance nothing more than the potential for a sentient being to become omniscient.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, March 1st, 2014 at 3:04 AM

Title: Re: Discussion of Political Topics is Wrong Speech

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Political stability in Japan can be accounted for simply through its geographical isolation.

Indrajala said:

What are you talking about? The Yamato court was constantly at war with rivals and non-Japanese tribes (Hayato, Ebisu, etc.) until basically the 8th century. It later suffered decentralization which led to the Kamakura period and subsequent centuries of civil wars. Even in early centuries the Yamato court was at odds with Silla in Korea and invasion was a constant fear. There was a war between Japan against a Silla-Tang alliance in the 660s.

Malcolm wrote:

The Silla-Tang alliance was totally unstable, and never represented a serious threat to the Yamamoto court.

Internal stability does not mean one does not fight others. In fact, the ability to master others in war comes from internal stability. And the Yamamoto were mercenaries in the Korean Peninsula for the Baekje.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, March 1st, 2014 at 2:51 AM

Title: Re: Discussion of Political Topics is Wrong Speech

Content:

Indrajala said:

Actually the development of a centralized court model with a heavy hierarchy in Japan based on Chinese models actually was prompted by fears of foreign invasion. By the late Asuka and early Nara period the system was largely in place and it worked wonders for the economy and military. It also produced a respectable nation state that could hold its own weight in international dealings. The Cambridge History of Japan Volume 1 provides all these details.

Malcolm wrote:

Political stability in Japan can be accounted for simply through its geographical isolation.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, March 1st, 2014 at 2:45 AM

Title: Re: Family lineages vs tulku system vs "meritocracy"

Content:

jiashengrox said:

Yes, i don't deny that Sakya predates Gelug by a number of centuries, but the monastic tradition somehow was not as rigorous until the recent years (again i hope i m not wrong).

Malcolm wrote:

Of course you are wrong. Ngorpas are just as strict as Gelugpas.

jiashengrox said:

in fact, i acknowledge that je tsongkhapa somehow inherited this system from the sakya (i would presume through his sakya teacher rendawa), which can pre date to the era of sakya pandita. But this monastic training in sakya is not as prevalent as the past, hence coining the phrase "in some sense following the footsteps of the gelugpas". it is the tradition of the gelugpas that has continually maintained this rigorous monastic training.

Malcolm wrote:

You really need to revise this perspective. Ngorchon (1382-1456) established a very strict monastic order. Also Nalendra was strict. And Sangphu. Perhaps in Sakya itself monks were not as strict.

What is lacking for lay people is a decent education in the basics of Buddhadharma. As I get older I can see that there is limited benefit to Varjayāna practice without some grounding, either prior too or simultaneously, in Sutrayāna teachings. There is any number of very good Sakya Khenpos. Basically in Sakya, you are either a scholar or a ritualist.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, March 1st, 2014 at 2:41 AM

Title: Re: Discussion of Political Topics is Wrong Speech

Content:

Indrajala said:

A monarch is only as good as his circle of power.

Malcolm wrote:

Āryadeva defines monarchs, in this day and age as fools. There are none more foolish, in fact.

Indrajala said:

Democracies don't always produce decent leaders either.

Malcolm wrote:

No, but it guarantees that an ineffective leader has a limited term. Further, governance, in a Democracy does not really depend on a figure head such as a president.

Indrajala said:

In fact, in a capitalist democracy inevitably the business elites convert their wealth into political power and then serve business interests above all else.

Malcolm wrote:

Its a process of give and take, right now we are in the give part of the cycle, just like a the end of the 19th century. It will shift back.

Indrajala said:

One advantage to a hereditary monarchy is that children are raised from birth with the skills and connections they need to run a nation.

Malcolm wrote:

There is no evidence at all in history that hereditary monarchies provide long term political stability.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, March 1st, 2014 at 2:32 AM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

Malcolm, I like what you're saying, I'm just trying to understand. Could you please respond to my question here:

https://www.dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=66&t=15425&p=216335#p216335?

I find the use of "actualization" in the quotation kind of confusing. Would you, or anybody, happen to know what it might correspond to in Tibetan?

Malcolm wrote:

They mean that vidyā is the "instantiation" (mngon 'gyur) of the basis in a sentient being.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, March 1st, 2014 at 1:51 AM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

heart said:

gad rgyangs is, I think, referring to a method of giving direct introduction that ChNNR use, called Yeshe Sangtal.

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

No, he is referring to a klong gsal text called Ye shes zang thal, the red volume, volume three, I believe.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, March 1st, 2014 at 1:49 AM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

the basis is not an abstraction, neither is it a thing (res).

Malcolm wrote:

It is a mere abstraction, as such, it is not a thing.

gad rgyangs said:

nope. you are reifying sentient beings again, as those in a dream-state are wont to do.

Malcolm wrote:

Take it up with the sgra thal 'gyur:

As such, in samsara at the start and nirvana at the end, since the buddhas did not become deluded, the self-appearances were recognized as natureless [rang bzhin med] with sense organs that rose up out of the basis.
There was no lapse into mental analysis of external objects and [the self-appearances] were ascertained to be their own movements.

It is incoherent to define the basis as timeless, and then suggest that a sense organ [here the manas-indriya] rise out of it. But clearly here, a mental organ is defined.

Nyibum states:

[D]elusion came from the basis and a special awareness of the basis. Apart from generally pervading, the so-called “basis” is totally undifferentiated, without any consideration of delusion or nondelusion. That so-called “ knower” or “mind” (the assertion of a specific awareness demonstrated in our own texts) is deluded.

So somehow, a mind, or mental faculty arises (without any cause) from a basis that likewise has no cause and isn't a thing or a non-thing, according to you, but nevertheless is described as the cause of samsara and nirvana, and further, this mind [sems] or knower [shes pa po] is "deluded" but it arises from a state of non-delusion.

There is a coherent explanation of this, but it depends on that fact that the basis as such is merely describing the nature of the mind.

Further, when describing how delusion arises, the commentary of the sgar thal 'gyur states very clearly:

The mind [blo] of the conceptual analysis of the individual members of dependent origination arises from intrinsic luminescence of dharmatā manifesting as the five lights, i.e., the conceptuality about the very clear luminescence of five colors comes from thinking “I come from that” and “That comes from me”, and it is said that the mental faculty [yid] is captivated by the appearance of the light because of the buildup of external grasping. Since it is seen as only suffering, this non-delusion becomes delusion because of conceptual analysis.

It is important to understand that "light" in this context refers only to the luminescence [gdangs] or clarity [gsal ba] of one's own consciousness, it is not an "outside" light, it is not physical light which can bleach color out of pigments, etc.

All of this experience is happening with the context of an individual consciousness. The description is entirely subjective. Its subjectivity and the production of a so called "external universe" is quite easily understood in Yogacara terms, which in fact that Dzogchen tantras borrow from liberally, as we see in the sgra thal 'gyur:

The lamp of self-originated prajñā subsumes all phenomena into one taste, cutting the continuum of traces connected with this grasping to one's appearance.

I have been all over these texts, and there is never any satisfactory explanation for how a mind arises out of the basis acausally. Since the basis is described as a wisdom, a wisdom must in fact be something which bears noetic capacity, and it must in fact arise as a diversity, i.e., as individual instantiations, as the sgra thal 'gyur states:

Other than compassion arising as diversity, it is not defined as one thing like this.

Thus, there is no contradiction at all in considering the basis a general description for the nature of the mind which can either realize buddhahood or fall into samsara. Any other explanation is simply incoherent and runs into the inevitable problem of being indistinguishable from tirthika ideas such as brahman, etc., a flaw, incidentally, that Dzogchen tantras and commentaries express a great deal of interest in avoiding and spend an inordinate amount of time addressing so as to avoid the charge of being outside Buddhadharma.

It is incoherent to talk about the basis if the basis is not in fact one's own mind. Then one has to imagine some noetic uber-field out of which instantiations of omniscient or deluded consciousnesses somehow bootstrap themselves into existence. We can see from this passage in the String of Pearls that the basis is the basis of delusion and can become contaminated:

The general basis is called “the basis of delusion” [28b] because of ignorance and contamination.
Further, the object of knowledge itself appears tainted because memory and thought arise in the mind.
The essence itself is contaminated by concepts because the grasping aspect of the six minds is unceasing.
Further, dharmakāya is bound by apprehension due to being associated with subtle atoms.
Further, luminosity forms traces due to the impure perception of the four conditions.
Further, appearances arise as multiplicity because those appearances are apparent objects.

gad rgyangs said:

Conventionally speaking, samanya-lakṣanas (universals) are considered completely unreal, as opposed to svalakṣanas (particulars), which are allowed a certain species of conventional reality.

the basis is not a universal. neither is it a particular.

Malcolm wrote:

Thus, you agree, it is an abstraction. Therefore, there is no basis, unless it is a set of characteristics of one's own mind.

gad rgyangs said:

radical or not, the basis is definitely not the mind of a reified sentient being.

Malcolm wrote:

In order for there to be a reified sentient beings, there has to be a mind which reifies, it is an inescapable reduction. Reification cannot occur without a reifying mind. When a mind ceases to reify, it simple dissolves into its own nature, which is described in Dzogchen texts as the basis. The basis is just one's own unfabricated mind. Any other explanation is complete gibberish.

Your problem is that you want to avoid any discussion of the relative. But Dzogchen tantras are not so shy, and they acknowledge the two truths also, as the String of Pearls states:

The universe and inhabitants have always been empty,
the ultimate endowed with the form of the relative.

And finally, the sgra thal 'gyur states:

Because mind pervades all the embodied,
there are no buddhas without sentient beings.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, March 1st, 2014 at 12:27 AM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

pensum said:

Another way to demonstrate this is that the basis of all trees is wood, but there is no wood apart from trees. Without trees there would be no wood. Similarly the basis of all sentient beings is lucid emptiness (gsal stong), yet this empty lucidity does not exist apart from sentient beings.

It's quite simple really.

gad rgyangs said:

sentient beings definitely do not exist apart from the lucid emptiness. In the yeshe sangthal, instant presence is discovered within the vast dimension of emptiness, not the other way around.

Malcolm wrote:

And lucid emptiness does not exist apart from sentient beings and all things:

"Matter is empty, emptiness is matter, there is no matter apart from emptiness, there is not emptiness apart from matter, so too for sensation, perception, formation and consciousness."

"There is no mind in the mind, but the primal nature of the mind is luminous"

The basis in Dzogchen is merely that luminosity described in the PP Sūtras.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, March 1st, 2014 at 12:25 AM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The basis is an abstraction, thus it is not real apart from its instantiations.

gad rgyangs said:
so what, its real in its instantiations?

Malcolm wrote:
Heat is an abstraction derived from instantiations of fire.

The basis is an abstraction derived from instantiations of sapients, both buddhas and sentient beings. Conventionally speaking, samanya-lakṣanas (universals) are considered completely unreal, as opposed to svalakṣanas (particulars), which are allowed a certain species of conventional reality.

The basis is the description of the dharmatā of dharmins. Without a dharmin, a dharmatā is unintelligible, so in the end, the Dzogchen presentation of the basis is not nearly as radical as it is made out to be.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Saturday, March 1st, 2014 at 12:20 AM
Title: Re: Family lineages vs tulku system vs "meritocracy"
Content:

jiashengrox said:
Then, one might wonder, "Wouldn't it be a little too old for most of the monks to uphold the lineage only after they have completed the studies?" And there is what is an advantage of this system: it ensures quality. If you are unable to even grasp sutric concepts at the very fundamental level, then u are probably not suited to do tantra. I know Sakya has a unique POV of combining sutra and tantra and practicing them concurrently, we realise that even so, sakya is also setting up monastic colleges, which in some sense (i might be wrong again!) following the style of the gelugpas.

Malcolm wrote:
You are totally wrong considering that Sakya predates Gelug by a number of centuries and that the latter school arose out of the former.

jiashengrox said:
However, a concerning question in mind should not just be ensuring the survival of the lineage alone (I used the word alone to further emphasise that i concur that it is important to ensure the continuity of the teachings), but the quality of the teachings that are preserved. I m sure that for us who have read the history of Lam Dre lineage from "Taking Result As the Path" by Cyrus Stearns, we note that some did not continue (as in the case of Segom Jangye, the disciple of Se Kharchungwa, page 212-213 of the book) because of not being able to "sustain the practice, develop wisdom, and so forth".

Malcolm wrote:
The structure to implement the continuation of the Sakya lineage is in the hands of the 'Khon family, the Ngorpas and the Tsharpas (and the Dzongpas too).

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 28th, 2014 at 11:22 PM

Title: Re: Discussion of Political Topics is Wrong Speech

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Rome, China, India, Britain, US etc.

Indrajala said:

Rome, China and Britain had empires that arose along meta-ethnic frontiers. In the case of Rome, it was continual conflict with the Gauls that facilitated the development of high asabiya, i.e., social cohesion that lent itself to strong political stability until overpopulation meant inter-elite competition became problematic. In the case of Chinese dynasties the constant eternal enemies were from the northern steppes, such as the Xiongnu, Turks and so on, all of whom were basically permanent aliens and a dangerous "other". But that being said it was less about geography and more about a clash of civilizations. Chinese were settled on plains while the Xiongnu and their kin were largely nomadic horsemen. The Chinese could have just as well, and did, settle the pasture land of nomadic peoples. Likewise the Romans settled Gaul territory.

Malcolm wrote:

The purpose of my example was to show positive (India, US, Britain) and negative examples (China, Rome) of how geography is a key factor in political stability.

Indrajala said:

Resource distribution, unless done at gun point, tends to follow its own internal logic.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, usually becoming a pyramid scheme in which wealth concentrates more and more in the so called upper classes who prove to be too venal to do anything more than engage in more hoarding.

Indrajala said:

This is why wise leaders of the past often suggested a return to simple living, like Marcus Aurelius for example.

Malcolm wrote:

Romantics. It never happens. Usually such guidance is long overdue.

Indrajala said:

It was autocratic forms of government that elevated them from rags to riches.

Malcolm wrote:

No, it was US money that elevated them from rags to riches because they embraced US led anti-communism. Example, Cuba, Venezuela, etc., are autocratic countries excluded from US markets tend to be impoverished because they embrace communism and we won't do business with them as much as possible. Mexico however is doing quite well.

Indrajala said:

India, a democracy in name, is still in rags while their competitor China is fairly well off by regional standards.

Malcolm wrote:

India does not sell as much to the US as China.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 28th, 2014 at 11:07 PM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

claiming that the basis is "contained" within the minds of illusory sentient beings is like claiming that the mirror is contained in the reflections!

Malcolm wrote:

It is the minds of illusory buddhas and sentient beings. Why is this not a problem? The basis is an abstraction, thus it is not real apart from its instantiations. The basis merely describes the potentiality of the mind's innate nature as the three kāyas and how the mind can deviate from that nature. In other words, one's unfabricated mind is the mirror.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 28th, 2014 at 10:10 PM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

Sherlock said:

I don't really think it is just a metaphor. There are other ideas in Buddhadharma such as the six realms of existence, or like the Mahayanasutralamkara (? , not sure if I remember it correctly, but I'm thinking of the text ChNN likes to mention as thinking he managed to understand the first time he read it through, but the second and third times were much more difficult for him until he remembered his teacher's advice to try to understand in terms of his personal life) that both apply on a "cosmic" level as well as within the level of one's one lifetime; I think the cyclical universe idea works similarly.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, these cycles do work on cosmic as well as personal levels. The process of the development as well as the disappearance of our bodies mimics the process of the development and disappearance of the elements in the universe, and the same cycle is repeated through waking and sleeping, etc. But this mimesis does not bear the consequence that the general basis, a set of properties inherent to all sentients, be they buddhas or beings, is a universal mind-stratum. Consciousness permeates all sentient beings, without all sentient beings having the same consciousness.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 28th, 2014 at 10:06 PM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

Sherlock said:

If the basis is one's unfabricated mind, it is easy to see how this model applies to a personal, individual life level. However, is there a way to say that the universe as a whole has its unfabricated mind too?

Malcolm wrote:

How could there be? This would just render the universe one more sentient being.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 28th, 2014 at 10:01 PM

Title: Re: Family lineages vs tulku system vs "meritocracy"

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

To be a lineage holder in the Sakya lineage requires training from early childhood. .

theanarchist said:

Sure. But in the Tibetan monastic tradition a lot of young monks join a monastery at under 10 years of age.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, and other Kagyu and Nyingma lineages, generally only tulkus are cultivated for lineage holder training, unless, in the case of Nyingma family lineages, you are trained in the terma ritual cycle specific to your family.

