In Gelug, however, you have to study for years and years, then you have to study some more in tantric college, then you have to study some more. By the time you are a qualified lineage holder you have spent 30+ years as a scholar/practitioner and are at least in your early forties if not fifties, having only started serious Vajrayāna training in your early thirties or forties.

Even in Sakya however, even if you belong to the Khon or one of the Ngor palaces, you are not automatically selected for such training, you have to show aptitude and interest from a very young age. For this reason, none of HH Dagchen Rinpoche sons were selected for/chose to undergo such training, but his grandson is being trained to succeed HE Ratnavajra at some point. In Ngor, the abbotship traditionally shifted every few years between Khenpos from that family. However, circumstances have lead to the Abbacy of Ngor being defacto in the hands of the Luding family at this point, the senior Luding Khenpo being the uncle of the junior Luding (who is the son of HE Jetsun Kusho). The Tshar lineage however has, as far as I know, been more of a meritocracy since it is based out of Nalendra Phenpo, which was the toughest academic school in Pre-modern Tibet. It still has family connections, but also some important Tullkus, like the Zimog Tulkus. In Derge, the Sakya school depends mostly on tulkus for succession, as that is the eastern Tibetan preference or so it seems. But they send them to Ngor for their education, for the most part.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 28th, 2014 at 9:48 PM

Title: Re: Discussion of Political Topics is Wrong Speech

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

You've been living the Sinosphere too long. Geography, not politics, has been the defining feature of political stability.

Indrajala said:

On what basis do you suggest this?

Malcolm wrote:

Rome, China, India, Britain, US etc.

Indrajala said:

Historically, most political systems fail because ineptness on the part of kings and elites.

No, it is more related to resource issues and overpopulation usually. Regardless of the political system, the elites are only part of the secular cycle.

Malcolm wrote:

Resources generally mismanaged by "elites".

Indrajala said:

The very stability and internal peace that strong empires impose contain within them the seeds of future chaos. Stability and internal peace bring prosperity, and prosperity causes population increase. Demographic growth leads to overpopulation, overpopulation causes lower wages, higher land rents, and falling per capita incomes for the commoners. At first, low wages and high rents bring unparalleled wealth to the upper classes, but as their numbers and appetites grow, they also begin to suffer from falling incomes. Declining standards of life breed discontent and strife. The elites turn to the state for employment and additional income, and drive up its expenditures at the same time that the tax revenues decline because of the growing misery of the population. When the state's finances collapse, it loses the control of the army and police. Freed from all restraints, strife among the elites escalates into civil war, while the discontent among the poor explodes into popular rebellions.

Peter Turchin, War and Peace and War The Rise and Fall of Empires, 13.

Malcolm wrote:

Completely reinforces this point and the point below.

Indrajala said:

Elites usually become fragmented because they become decadent.

That's only part of the puzzle. In most empires the elites early on are modest and the wealth gap between them and the commoners low. It is resource abundance over time that leads to overpopulation and elite enrichment. That alone does not fragment them however.

Malcolm wrote:

Exactly my point, elites become more and more decadent as their power and wealth increases.

Indrajala said:

This is basically a recipe for a totalitarian government in this day and age.

In some places it worked out okay for a few decades. Look at how South Korea and Taiwan went from rags to riches.

Malcolm wrote:

Their economies are part of US economic resource infrastructure, as China too is now.

Indrajala said:

The problem is with the definition of "capable". Who defines it?

There is no universal authority to dictate those terms, but situation by situation it is often evident who is really suitable for leadership.

Malcolm wrote:

Only in hindsight, never in foresight.

Indrajala said:

What you actually suggesting is replacing the rule of law with the rule of persons. That's ok with me, but don't kid yourself that you are advocating anything other than a return to monarchy.

They're not mutually exclusive. A constitutional monarchy is such that you get rule of law which is derived from the authority of the crown, yet the crown is still bound by rule of law.

Malcolm wrote:

[/quote]

Such a monarch is a toothless monarch.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 28th, 2014 at 8:49 PM

Title: Re: The basis is one's unfabricated mind

Content:

wisdom said:

Question for anyone who might know, if the basis is ones own fabricated mind, how is my unfabricated mind connected to Dharmadhatu? What is the supreme, primordial reality and how does my personal basis abide in it, what is the relationship between these two things (my personal basis, and the universal whatever within which it finds itself)?

Malcolm wrote:

For each one if us, it is the dharmadhatu. Everything that appears to us appears to us only as the light of our own consciousness. When we reify that light, it appears to us as afflictive objects. When we do not reify it, appears to us as the pure luminescence of our own minds.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 28th, 2014 at 9:08 AM

Title: Re: Family lineages vs tulku system vs "meritocracy"

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Fortunately the Khon, Ludings, Thartses and so on are not subject to your "political correct" and "egalitarian" notions of fairness.

I personally think that the Sakya masters have done a fantastic job of maintaining the lineage just as it is for the past 1000+ years. If it works, don't fix it.

theanarchist said:

Dharma as a private elite club. Great, now THAT surely is what the buddha had in mind 2500 years ago.... As I can see it, the buddhas son didn't get a VIP treatment back then.

Malcolm wrote:

To be a lineage holder in the Sakya lineage requires training from early childhood.

The families involved in these lineages preserve not because they are private clubs but because it is what these families do and have done for many centuries. It is one thing to be a practitioner, it is quite another to be lineage holder.

Attitudes like yours come from not understanding the requirements needed to be a lineage holder.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 28th, 2014 at 3:16 AM

Title: Re: Family lineages vs tulku system vs "meritocracy"

Content:

theanarchist said:

I find it pretty unfair to put all the effort into the education of someone just based on family descendant and not based on actual talent of an individual, whereas others don't get this level of education.

That's just as with music. There have probably been 50 more Mozarts out there, that simply never got the education so they could never develop to their great potential.

If those members of this family are so above average "talented" for dharma practice then they should clearly show that in a normal monastic education. So, put all reasonable candidates into a proper education and then choose the best ones as lineage holders.

Malcolm wrote:

Fortunately the Khon, Ludings, Thartses and so on are not subject to your "political correct" and "egalitarian" notions of fairness.

I personally think that the Sakya masters have done a fantastic job of maintaining the lineage just as it is for the past 1000+ years. If it works, don't fix it.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 28th, 2014 at 1:17 AM

Title: Re: Discussion of Political Topics is Wrong Speech

Content:

Indrajala said:

Historically it has been strong leadership and a unified elite that produced the most stable and prosperous nations able to defend themselves against barbarians.

Malcolm wrote:

You've been living the Sinosphere too long. Geography, not politics, has been the defining feature of political stability.

Indrajala said:

When you politically empower inept peoples and give them a voice,

Malcolm wrote:

Historically, most political systems fail because ineptness on the part of kings and elites.

Indrajala said:

It is only when elites are fractured that rebellions can end up in revolution and subsequent chaos and anarchy.

Malcolm wrote:

Elites usually become fragmented because they become decadent.

Indrajala said:

The common people need to be looked after by their superiors, not empowered.

Malcolm wrote:

This is basically a recipe for a totalitarian government in this day and age.

Indrajala said:

In my mind the capable should be called to positions of authority while their inferiors are governed with benevolence and tough love if need be.

Malcolm wrote:

The problem is with the definition of "capable". Who defines it?

Indrajala said:

This does not mean a totalitarian state.

Malcolm wrote:

In practice, it does.

Indrajala said:

There just needs to be strong leadership with active long-term planning. There has to be unforgiving rule of law, otherwise you end up with chaos.

Malcolm wrote:

What you actually suggesting is replacing the rule of law with the rule of persons. That's ok with me, but don't kid yourself that you are advocating anything other than a return to monarchy.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 27th, 2014 at 10:02 PM

Title: Re: Family lineages vs tulku system vs "meritocracy"

Content:

jiashengrox said:

Furthermore, it was mentioned in Dezhung Rinpoche's biography, "A Saint in Seattle":

He also said there were three ways to be recognised as a great lama. The first was by familial descent, which was worst. The second was as an "incarnate lama" ( or tulku ) which also was very imperfect. The third way was through recognized merit and saintly achievement, which was best. In this connection, Dezhung Rinpoche also repeated the view: "How much better it would be to test prospective tulkus for their knowledge after they grew up than to test them as infants for their ability to identify various objects!" ( pg 259 )

kirtu said:

I don't remember that from "Saint in Seattle". I'll have to go back and reread parts for sure.

However the Sakya tradition is relatively skeptical (or at least quite conservative) concerning tulku recognition. Secondly this may be as close as Dezhung Rinpoche would come to open criticism.

Kirt

Malcolm wrote:

Correct, most Sakya tulkus come from East Tibet. But in reality, all the central Tibetan Sakya lineages are controlled by hereditary families.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 27th, 2014 at 9:44 PM

Title: Re: Family lineages vs tulku system vs "meritocracy"

Content:

Sherlock said:

From the thread about Ole Nydahl.

But frankly, all this makes me understand that the family lineage holder model has certain strengths that the other two models, i.e. Tulku succession, or nominated abbotships, as in the throne of Ganden, somewhat lack. While all are subject to manipulation, the family lineage thing has more resistance to external manipulation, at minimum. On the other hand, the Gelug model is appealing too because the head of the Gelug school is nominated on the basis of their scholarship and practice rather than money and power. So, of the three, I think the Tulku system is the weakest. However, it has the most appeal because it allows cults of personality to extend through time in an unprecedented way.

M

What exactly made the Khon family the only family lineage that lasted past a century while the other Nyingma family lineages from the same period (Gnubs, Zur etc) basically spread out while the original families were lost? (One might say from kula to kaula traditions).

Malcolm wrote:

One, the Sakya branch of the Khon settled largely in the eastern limit of the former Shang Shung kingdom. Two, they were a family that had enjoyed close connections with the Yarlung dynasty. Three, they maintained the ancestral teachings of their clan, in fact Khon Konchog Gyalpo did pass Kilaya and Yangdag to Sachen directly. Four, they were wealthy traders and benefactors. Fifth, they were the chief promulgators of Lamdre, and so on. Sixth, the Sakya branch of the Khon family ruled Tibet for roughly a hundred years. Seventh, the first five Sakya founder Masters were all amazing scholars and practitioners.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 27th, 2014 at 8:36 PM

Title: Re: Jhana and non-dualism - parallels?

Content:

Thomas_Pynchon said:

Are there parallels between how the Buddha describes his experience of Jhana, as the very vehicle of his enlightenment, and how that is understood within non-dual traditions such as Dzogchen or Advaita?

Malcolm wrote:

Dhyanas are defined by the presence or absence of specific mental factors.

The Dhyanas were not the vehicle of Buddha's awakening, rather he coursed through them in order to remove traces of rebirth associated with the form and formless realms associated with the dhyanas.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, February 26th, 2014 at 9:07 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist Hate Crimes

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

Can I ask about the responsibility for others.

E.g. If I know that somebody is hurting somebody else e.g. going after somebody with an axe, then I have a choice... Do I intervene or not intervene? Could something I do or fail to do change the outcome of the situation and the ensuing Karmic outcome for both the victim and the attacker.

I am not saying that I am karmically responsible for what the attacker does... but I am karmically responsible for what I do. I.e. intervening or not.

If, for example, I could phone the police but decide not to, or wash my hands on the matter, then a decision that I have made has the likely outcome of greater harm or even the death of the victim, even though I didn't swing the axe myself.

Surely there would be serious karmic consequences for myself if I failed to intervene in a situation that: I know about, and know that it is in my power to help?

Malcolm wrote:

We do what we can, and we wish happiness on all. But the best use of our time, until we really have the capacity to truly practice engaged bodhicitta, is to practice Dharma to increase our wisdom. Until that time we should not be giving away our limbs, nor risking our lives trying to "help" others thinking that this is somehow "bodhisattva" activity. As long as we have limited compassion, we should be judicious about how we decide we are going to "help".

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, February 26th, 2014 at 2:23 AM

Title: Re: Emptiness in Yogacara

Content:

Astus said:

As for the ultimate accomplishment, Yogacara has non-abiding nirvana, so it doesn't look like something that accepts any substantially existent things or minds.

Malcolm wrote:

We will agree to disagree.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, February 25th, 2014 at 4:10 AM

Title: Re: Question

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

The expert faker becomes an actual expert, but he just actualizes the Buddha Nature right...I mean, the Sambhogakaya is not a thing substantially separate from oneself right?

Malcolm wrote:

It is both a part of oneself and not.

Each sentient beings has dharmakāya as their buddhanature from the start. When that is realized, then one can manifest the sambhogakāya and the nirmanakāya.

Johnny Dangerous said:

What is one's relationship to the sambhogakaya prior to enlightenment then...i.e. for the purpose of the conversation, I guess what I'm asking is are Yidam etc. "the real thing" prior to this, or just our imagination on our side?

Malcolm wrote:

Prior to attaining the 8th bhumi, the only way you can relate to the Sambhogakāya is through a practice lineage.

The yidams are sambhogakāya manifestations to mahāsiddhis, who then develop the method connected with that manifestation and set that method down in a tantra.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, February 25th, 2014 at 2:42 AM

Title: Re: Ole Nydahi and Trungpa rinpoche

Content:

Stewart said:

I know for a fact that Chogye Trichen was instrumental in KTT's recognition.

Fine, can't argue with that...but from my pov, I have trust in Situ Rinpoche, I have received teachings, empowerments and advice from him over the years...I believe him to be an awakened master...but I can accept others have different opinions, that's okay. I have also received the same from Karmapa OTD, again he impressed me, but that's just my personal experience.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, of course, this all goes without saying.

Stewart said:

We don't have a stake in the game. This basically a power struggle between the Gelugs and conservative Karma Kagyus that has been going on since the war between the King of Tsang and the Ganden Phodrang in the 17th century. All of this politicking comes from that time.

Again, I accept this, and truth be told, the whole Karmapa situation doesn't concern me, it does hurt though when some of my teachers are slandered, especially in light of Akong Rinpoche's death. It's a personal thing really, my problem.

Malcolm wrote:

It is fine to want to defend your guru's reputation. You should never feel sorry about that. The situation with the Karmapas is difficult, and it is very similar to the situation with Gyalpo Shugden in Gelug. In the end, only oneself can be the judge of which perspective is right and which is wrong.

I personally generally go along with HHDL's point of view on both these matters, as does HHST, but I know there are others who disagree with him and feel that their own reasons are equally valid.

If there is a lesson to be learned, we who follow these lineages in Western dharma centers need to be cautious about getting mixed up in lineage politics we do not really understand.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, February 25th, 2014 at 2:32 AM

Title: Re: Ethics of animal slaughter (vis. Marius the Giraffe)

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

realistically speaking viruses, bacteria, etc... are way "higher" than humans when you look at the system as a whole (in a unidirectional manner).

Malcolm wrote:

It all depends on how you are looking at an ecosystem. Then different definitions are valid, depending on context.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, February 24th, 2014 at 11:08 PM

Title: Re: Ole Nydahi and Trungpa rinpoche

Content:

Stewart said:

Yes, I agree, it's a mess....but I believe that Shamar first endorsed OTD, before changing his mind... also for a long time, Shamar would not name Chogye Trichen Rinpoche as his source of support, he heavily hinted at it, but when Chogye Trichen Rinpoche was asked directly, he seemingly denied he had advised Shamar.

Malcolm wrote:

I know for a fact that Chogye Trichen was instrumental in KTT's recognition.

Stewart said:

Sakya Trizin has also gave Karmapa OTD several important transmissions, so I think the Sakyapas, perhaps wisely, have remained neutral.

Malcolm wrote:

We don't have a stake in the game. This basically a power struggle between the Gelugs and conservative Karma Kagyus that has been going on since the war between the King of Tsang and the Ganden Phodrang in the 17th century. All of this politicking comes from that time.

[quote]

If I am completely honest, this resurfaced for me recently upon Akong Rinpoche's death,

I knew him very well, for many years, and was shocked...so i reacted badly to the negative comments by various Shamar students. My bad.[/quote]

It is not your bad at all. This a part of your life and history. It is just good to recognize that it is very worldly, on both sides. If you are a Karma Kagyu however, you have to make a decision who is going to be your leader.

But frankly, all this makes me understand that the family lineage holder model has certain strengths that the other two models, i.e. Tulku succession, or nominated abbotships, as in the throne of Ganden, somewhat lack. While all are subject to manipulation, the family lineage thing has more resistance to external manipulation, at minimum. On the other hand, the Gelug model is appealing too because the head of the Gelug school is nominated on the basis of their scholarship and practice rather than money and power. So, of the three, I think the Tulku system is the weakest. However, it has the most appeal because it allows cults of personality to extend through time in an unprecedented way.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, February 24th, 2014 at 10:57 PM

Title: Re: Ethics of animal slaughter (vis. Marius the Giraffe)

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

We tend to focus on the predation part because a) it has been discerned in biology that natural top predators such as wolves, cats, bears and so on are vital for ecosystems, which often create the conditions for many species to flourish (for example, certain kinds of beetles can only flourish if there are elk kills, which leads to other things and so on

Sherab Dorje said:

The very fact that you refer to them as "top" is indicative of the hierarchical and unidirectional model which is being utilised, a model that emphasizes the role of the predator. A truly ecological model has a spherical approach to ecosystems: no elk kills, no beetles, no beetles, no elks (and thus no elk kills), etc...

Malcolm wrote:

Nonsense, greg. There are certain kinds of environmental dependencies that do break down into hierarchies, for example, without top or alternately "keystone" predators, populations of deer and so on exceed carrying the capacity of their environments. Of course there are ways of analyzing these things into mutual feedback loops and so on, but some kinds of animals play key roles in a given ecosystem, which when removed, cause the ecosystem to degrade. Other animals, when introduced into a previously stable ecosystem (rabbits in OX, mongooses in Hawaii), etc., wreak havoc on an ecosystem.

Sherab Dorje said:

We are not "top" predators. Realistically speaking we are fodder for viruses, bacteria, internal micro (and macro) organisms, worms, etc...

Malcolm wrote:

Realistically speaking, we are both: the two are not mutually exclusive.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, February 24th, 2014 at 9:19 PM

Title: Re: Ole Nydahi and Trungpa rinpoche

Content:

Stewart said:

The fact of the matter is that the whole thing backfired on Shamar big time, hardly any Kagyu, or other lineages for that matter, have backed Trinlay Thaye, at best they pay him basic respect, but in reality it's always Karmapa OTD they meet publically. So, sadly, you have begun to rely on slander and conspiracy theory to give them a foot hold.

Malcolm wrote:

Hi Stewart:

This not a fair assessment of the situation.

The "Shamar" candidate was first recognize by Chogye Trichen Rinpoche, who many assert was the most realized Tibetan teacher in a century. Trinley Thaye was granted the entire sgyud sde kun 'dus by the senior Luding Khenpo in California in a private teaching that lasted for some months.

This is not the first time in history there has been more than one recognized Karmapa. In the end, it just becomes a money and power game. That, sadly, is what the tulku system has largely degenerated into, in my opinion.

The fact that Orgyen Thaye Dorje is accorded "more" respect has more to do with HHDL's patronage than anything else, as far as I can discern. He has also been something of a hostage to the Ganden Podrang, however, and given the history between the Karmapas and the Ganden Phodrang, I can see why this makes many Karma Kagyus very uncomfortable.

The fact remains that the Karma Kagyu school suffered a blow to their reputation because of the controversy. You cannot blame one side more than the other, unless you are a partisan.

As someone with virtually no connection to Karma Kagyu, who has no stake in the game on any side, I think the whole affair is a sad mess and has weakened the Karma Kagyu school considerably.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, February 24th, 2014 at 8:36 PM

Title: Re: Ethics of animal slaughter (vis. Marius the Giraffe)

Content:

LastLegend said:

If there are no Buddhas, then there are no sentient beings?

Malcolm wrote:

No, it does not work that way. Sentient beings are the cause for Buddhas to appear. If there are no sentient beings, Buddha get to take a break.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, February 24th, 2014 at 8:22 PM

Title: Re: Ethics of animal slaughter (vis. Marius the Giraffe)

Content:

LastLegend said:

If there are no sentient beings, will there be Buddhas?

Malcolm wrote:

Of course not.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, February 24th, 2014 at 8:02 PM

Title: Re: Ethics of animal slaughter (vis. Marius the Giraffe)

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

Actually there are infinitely more examples of mutual aid in nature than there are of predation. Just that we focus on the predation aspect. It appeals to our sense of hierarchy and domination through violence.

Malcolm wrote:

We tend to focus on the predation part because a) it has been discerned in biology that natural top predators such as wolves, cats, bears and so on are vital for ecosystems, which often create the conditions for many species to flourish (for example, certain kinds of beetles can only flourish if there are elk kills, which leads to other things and so on, and b) as top predators ourselves, we humans have outcompeted all other top predators. However, we are not so healthy for the primeval environment. We are also the only animals that self-consciously create our own environment and impose it on the "natural" one.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, February 24th, 2014 at 7:57 PM

Title: Re: Ethics of animal slaughter (vis. Marius the Giraffe)

Content:

Simon E. said:

Quite. So does your Bodhisattva vow include 'emptying samsara' of roses, cabbages, and pineapples ?

kirtu said:

Plant life is not held to be sentient in Tibetan Buddhism. Otherwise, yes. The entire three realms are to be liberated.

Malcolm wrote:

Simon has a very good point: taken literally, "emptying samsara" can be construed to have some very negative consequences.

But he needn't fear since "emptying samsara" is a mere Indian literary sentiment exhorting the Buddhas and Bodhisattvas to continue to act benevolently on our behalf. Given that there infinite sentient beings, samsara will never be emptied, therefore, buddhas will always turn the wheel of dharma and bodhisattvas in the form of bees and wasps, etc will always be there to pollinate our flowers and trees (Unless we poison them all). It is a sentiment along the lines of the Zen bodhisattva vow "Sentient beings are numberless, I vow to save them all." It is an aspirational bodhicitta, not a practical one.

So Simon, as attractive as that big glowing pudding may sound, it can never happen practically speaking.

On the other hand, samsara will be emptied during the twenty dark eons when all sentient beings take rebirth in the upper two form realms, in addition to the formless realms, at the destruction of the container universe. That is, from a Buddhist cosmological perspective, a certainty.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, February 24th, 2014 at 7:21 PM

Title: Re: Ole Nydahi and Trungpa rinpoche

Content:

AlexanderS said:

Natha does not mean nephew in either Tibetan or Sanskrit. I imagine a expert translator like Malcolm could clear this up.

In the Trinley Thaye Dorje camp the wrathful emanation mentioned is generally thought to be Shamapa. He lives west from the place mentioned in the prophecy and the Shamarpa is traditionally considered an emanation of Buddha Amitabha (The Buddha of the western direction). As to being an emanation of Padmasambhava

"Karmapa and Konchog Bang(the 5th Shamarpa) and Padma Jung-ney me are all just separate in appearance; In reality there is no separation, (all) in one essence." - Padmasambhava, (from chokgyur lingpas biography).

Malcolm wrote:

Natha (savior, guide, protector) = mgon po = reference to a personal name, in this case some take this "Natha" to be the present Shamar, who is the nephew of the 16th Karmapa.

However, there are different ways of counting the Karmapa incarnations which would indicate that the troubles existed during an earlier incarnation.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, February 24th, 2014 at 2:36 AM

Title: Re: Question

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

The expert faker becomes an actual expert, but he just actualizes the Buddha Nature right...I mean, the Sambhogakaya is not a thing substantially separate from oneself right?

Malcolm wrote:

It is both a part of oneself and not.

Each sentient beings has dharmakāya as their buddhanature from the start. When that is realized, then one can manifest the sambhogakāya and the nirmanakāya.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, February 24th, 2014 at 2:33 AM

Title: Re: Guru yoga not Indian?

Content:

theanarchist said:

The spiritual practice of Guru Yoga itself is not about some a text.

I think the question should rather be, were there any vastly complex visualisation exercises around Guru Yoga in ancient India or is that a Tibetan innovation.

Malcolm wrote:

The answer to the first question is no, not in any recorded text we have, and the answer to the second is yes, as far as we know.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, February 23rd, 2014 at 11:44 PM

Title: Re: Guru yoga not Indian?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Yes. Yes. I mentioned two traditions, Hevajra and Vajrayogini. For example, there are three gurusadhanas translated by a Vibhutipandita into Tibetan. Another text entitled gurumandalasamadana vidhi translated by one of three Dro Lotsawas ('bro lo ts'a ba) which describes a method of practicing the guru, he is invited in front, one makes offerings to him, praises, etc., exactly the way that guru yogas are done in the Tibetan tradition.

Matylda said:

Yeah this sounds interesting.. I Wonder why GY did not make its way to Japan... I do not know shingon or tendai, though I know many monks and nuns of both tradition, just never asked about it. After all the guru position in both Japanese traditions seems to be very important.

Malcolm wrote:

Guru Yoga comes from Anuttarayoga tantra, which never made its way to Japan.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, February 23rd, 2014 at 11:40 PM

Title: Re: Question

Content:

Jigme Tsultrim said:

Sorry, but I believe the standard definitions are sufficient.

Malcolm wrote:

theism:

noun

Belief in the existence of a god or gods, esp. belief in one god as creator of the universe, intervening in it and sustaining a personal relation to his creatures.

I am a theist. Buddhadharma contains a whole pantheon of mundane and transcendent "gods". By the dictionary definition given above, Buddhadharma is theistic.

dogma | 'dôgmə|

noun

a principle or set of principles laid down by an authority as incontrovertibly true:

I am a dogmatic. I accept that the Buddha set forth a set of principles that are incontrovertibly true. By the dictionary definition given above, Buddhadharma is dogmatic.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, February 23rd, 2014 at 11:34 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist Hate Crimes

Content:

Jigme Tsultrim said:

To define compassion in the real and relative world so broadly that there can be no distinction between its application to a guard at Dachau and a starving child renders the word devoid of meaning.

Malcolm wrote:

No, it renders compassion impartial, which is the step before "objectless".

The buddhas and ārya-bodhisattvas do not make a distinction between a torturer and a victim, so why should we? It does not mean we do not intercede where we can to protect the victims, or convince the victimizers to restrain their violence, but we certainly do not judge the victimizer to be any other than a suffering sentient being. Extending compassion impartially does not condone those deeds acted out of the three poisons, nor does it condone the karmic ripening of those whose negative karma is ripening upon them. Your extension of compassion to the victims of a flood will have no impact on the ripening of their karma, will prevent no deaths, will not stem the loss of property and suffering. Your extension of compassion to the victims of war will not indict war criminals, nor save them from the fruit of their own actions.

Compassion needs to be wed with equanimity in order for compassion to become impartial. Otherwise, compassion swiftly turns into recrimination and judgement and bias.

When we bring to mind our bodhicitta vows we are not saying, "I vow to do this practice just to save only the sentient beings I like", we are saying "I am practicing the six perfections in order to become a Buddha so that I might rescue all beings from samsara."

In the end, we Mahāyāna Buddhist practitioners seek to develop objectless, unconditional compassion.

So what do we do? We try to stem what suffering we see, and we wish that the suffering we cannot address in others as well as ourselves be pacified. That is all we can do, and nothing more. Compassion is nothing more and nothing less than the wish that sentient beings be free from suffering. All sentient beings are suffering at all times. Some suffering is more obvious than others, which is the suffering we tend to focus on. We need to understand that the nature of samsara is suffering through and through. When we understand this, we can then understand that we should experience compassion for those sentient beings who are involved in heavy actions of warring against unarmed people, as well as the people being warred against and so on. No sentient being is less deserving of our compassion as bodhisattvas than any other.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, February 23rd, 2014 at 11:15 PM

Title: Re: Question

Content:

Jigme Tsultrim said:

Actually neither. I'm sure we could agree that Buddhism has different approaches. I have opened this discussion to oppose theism and dogmatism in Buddhist practice.

Malcolm wrote:

Define "theism".

Define "dogmatism".

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, February 23rd, 2014 at 7:46 AM

Title: Re: Creation Stage and the attainment of Bhumis

Content:

Benten said:

16th bhumi is Tathagatha

Malcolm wrote:

11th through 16th bhumi are tathāgata stages.

1-10, bodhisattva stages.

A 13th stage Vajradhara is perfect, it and the stages beyond are called "The stages of abiding in wisdom", while the 11th and 12th stages, while omniscient, do not regard phenomena as the display of wisdom.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, February 23rd, 2014 at 5:48 AM

Title: Re: Creation Stage and the attainment of Bhumis

Content:

Benten said:

actually they are both

why do you guys have to be so dualistic, jk

Malcolm wrote:

You might ask yourself the same question, son.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, February 23rd, 2014 at 1:00 AM

Title: Re: Ole Nydahi and Trungpa rinpoche

Content:

smcj said:

I remember him saying, "You don't want to put your bodhicitta in a box." So I don't think he even has that specific bodhicitta vow that you are talking about.

But that's just my guess, and a very legalistic take on the issue.

theanarchist said:

As I see it, never ever wanting to see someone again also means not wanting to engage in helping this person to attain enlightenment. Because helping someone attain enlightenment would very likely mean seeing him or her again.

Bodhisattva vow always means not picking and choosing to help one's favourite beings to attain enlightenment and abandoning the "unpleasant" ones.

Malcolm wrote:

It simply means never abandoning the wish to help them achieve awakening. Bodhisattva conduct also means avoiding the familiar company of the childish, the harmful and so on, people you can never help.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, February 22nd, 2014 at 11:23 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist Hate Crimes

Content:

Jigme Tsultrim said:

I'm not really seeking "agreement". I'm trying to raise some compassion for the victims. I'm trying to get those who consider themselves as Buddhist to realize that if they feel real compassion for those in error, that the really kind thing for all concerned is to point their error out to them. To claim that as a Buddhist one has no involvement in the activities of others, especially Buddhists, is to deny interdependence. In teaching interdependence it is pointed out when someone claims that they did something by themselves that they must consider all the others involved in making the materials that went into whatever. So, turning this around are we not all involved in the actions of others? Even leaving out the special responsibility created by the Teachings, are we not responsible as fellow human beings?

Malcolm wrote:

The Buddha said "Karma is volition and its products".

We are not involved in the actions of others apart from the extent to which we agree to the intentions pursued by others. For example, someone who opposed the Vietnam war is responsible for none of the negative karma generated by that war, while all who supported it earn the negative karma * as many people who supported that war. This is very clearly explained in Abhidharma.

Our mind streams are not interdependent in the same way the roots of trees and mycelium in a forest are. Our mind streams are unique, and the gathering and ripening of karma upon it is individual, not collective. When beings engage in similar acts, they have similar ripenings, but that is as far as it goes.

Being responsible human beings does not bear the consequence that we must be ashamed of human beings when they engage in negative actions because of the three poisons. We do not feel shame when a person with a disease does something wrong. We understand that they are ill and in need of treatment. Likewise, when sentient beings engage in the ten non-virtues, they do so only because of the three poisons in their own minds.

Can we feel sad that sentient beings engage in negative karma? Yes. Is that sadness connected to the fact that we understand all of our unpleasant experiences in samsara are connected with our own negative actions? Yes. Should we feel shame that other sentient beings engage in non-virtuous actions because of the three poisons? No. No, unless at some point, for example, we whole heartedly backed the killing of a bunch of Rohingyas for the "sin" of being Muslims because of our own afflictions. If we realize that this was wrong on our part, then we should voice that regret, confess it, and move on. But there is very little point in feeling shame at the actions of others in which we played no part.

In order to point out the error of someone, first you must gain their trust and respect. Only then will your admonishments be heeded, respected and effective. Otherwise, admonishing those who do not respect you is like pissing into the wind, it just turns back on you.

As to your point about interdependence. If I am a miner, and I unearth iron to make steel, after it goes to market I have no idea if it will make a car or a gun. So whether it is made into a car or gun has nothing to do with me. I am just mining the ore, and that is all.

One must understand that the way this is taught is that first we have the presentation of the six causes and four conditions; then there is the presentation of dependent origination, and then, only after that is there the presentation of karma, the first is part of the teaching of the noble's truth of suffering, the latter two belong to the noble's truth of the origination of suffering. Cause and condition is not moral cause and condition, so the karana-hetu, which means that everything is a cause for everything else apart from itself does not apply to moral questions of karma-vipaka. If you overextend the limit of mutual causation, even the Buddha becomes responsible for the crimes of Angulimala.

Therefore, it needs to be understood that the only thing one needs to feel shame about is one's own action that arise out of the three poisons. Feeling shame for actions of others is a misplaced sense of identity which arises from a false grasping to self.

As for our responsibility towards other humans, well, again it is question of limitations. We are very limited, our capacity to help others is miniscule. We do what we can, we act as witnesses when there are those who are committing crimes, but we don't judge, and we don't abandon the fact that everyone involved in such events also has their own karma, positive and negative which led to that karmavipaka they are experiencing, including being murdered. The Buddhist view about the karmavipaka is dispassionate. If you engaged in a lot of killing in this life, your life will be shortened in the next. If you engage in a lot of violence in this life, you can bet that in the next you will be subjected to a lot of violence. Karma, like death, is pitiless.

Further, if we engage in judgement, we will lose compassion for the those who truly deserve it, the perpetrators of those crimes. For example, who is deserving of more compassion in this example: the SS soldiers who murdered millions of Jews, or the murdered Jews? Who is going to experience more suffering as a result? Most people feel no compassion for the SS soldiers and wish them into hell, saving their compassion for those who suffered terribly in the death camps. Who is more deserving of compassion, Pol Pot and the Khmer Rouge, or the millions they left in the killing fields? Who is more deserving of compassion, Kissinger and Nixon, who murdered hundreds of thousands of Vietnamese or the murdered Vietnamese.

The reality is that they are all equally deserving of compassion. This is the Mahāyāna approach. We do not judge and say this sentient beings deserves more compassion, this one less. All sentient beings are deserving of equal levels of compassions, whether they are Hitler, Mao, Stalin or a Rohingya Muslim or Nāgaland Buddhist, or a Sinhalese Tamil.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, February 22nd, 2014 at 11:00 PM

Title: Re: Climate Change: We're Doomed

Content:

Sherab said:

Molten salt nuclear reactors are considered to be "safe and proliferation-resistant".

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, the operative word here is "considered"; Three Mile Island was "considered" safe, Fukushima was "considered" safe, Chernobyl was "considered" safe until it turned out that they weren't safe at all.

kirtu said:

TMI was in fact safe. The radiation release was heavily overblown in the press

Malcolm wrote:

Your facts are wrong here:

Gundersen, a leading technical expert on nuclear engineering, says: "When I correctly interpreted the containment pressure spike and the doses measured in the environment after the TMI accident, I proved that TMI's releases were about one hundred times higher than the industry and the NRC claim, in part because the containment leaked. This new data supports the epidemiology of Dr. Steve Wing and proves that there really were injuries from the accident. New reactor designs are also effected, as the NRC is using its low assumed release rates to justify decreases in emergency planning and containment design."

http://www.huffingtonpost.com/harvey-wasserman/people-died-at-three-mile\_b\_179588.html

kirtu said:

Fukushima was stupid design and that could easily be seen.

Malcolm wrote:

Right, which is why there is a reactor of exactly the same design sitting on Long Island Sound, and another just a few miles south of Boston, sitting on the Massachusetts Bay.

kirtu said:

However safe means, if there is a total disaster, the reactor will shut itself down with no or minimal radiation release (obviously we need to engineer this for no release).

Malcolm wrote:

You are a smart guy, and I respect your intelligence, but on this score I think you are being blinded by your enthusiasm for technological fixes. The entire nuclear industry from soup to nuts is lethally toxic and bad for the environment. There is no such thing as a "safe" nuclear power plant.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, February 22nd, 2014 at 10:46 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist Hate Crimes

Content:

Rickpa said:

As a member of a group, you should be mindful that humans tend to judge any group of which they are outside, by the worst examples.

Malcolm wrote:

Indeed, this however does not mean that one need feel "shame" for being a Buddhist merely because there are afflicted "Buddhists" out there who do murderous things to innocents.

Likewise, I feel no shame about being an American despite that fact my government has done terrible things. But those things were done without my consent and I oppose them.

Jigme Tsultrim said:

Sorry, but you should in both cases.

Malcolm wrote:

As you can tell, I don't agree. I never feel shame for negative karma that I had no hand in creating. Compassion for the people who engage in such deeds, yes; shame, never.

In any event, it is very presumptuous for you to mandate how anyone ought to feel about anything. The reason I replied was to let others know that it was not necessary to pander to "politically correct" guilt-mongering.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, February 22nd, 2014 at 6:37 AM

Title: Re: What tibetan buddhist traditions these people belong?

Content:

Punya said:

This is interesting news, since you seem to be quite fond of bagging his successor. Not that I'm saying DJKR is a scholar. He is an activity emanation, is he not? And he seems to be doing quite well on that front.

Malcolm wrote:

We are talking about Dilgo Khyentse, no?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, February 22nd, 2014 at 5:34 AM

Title: Re: What tibetan buddhist traditions these people belong?

Content:

Punya said:

Are you suggesting he made some decisions based on political considerations? Despite his father's position in Tibetan society, this seems unlikely to me.

Malcolm wrote:

No, I am suggesting that he was devoted to the greatest scholar (in my opinion) that Tibet ever saw.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, February 22nd, 2014 at 5:13 AM

Title: Re: Living in Bhutan?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The most important factor determining your next birth place is the mental factors you are experiencing when you die.

daverupa said:

Hmm... not quite.

Malcolm wrote:

Quite. For example, Nāgārjuna writes that there is a dharma called an avipranasha which is created by every karma in which one engages. The one created at the time of one's death is the factor above all others which is instrumental in determining one's next birth location.

The example that you give does not necessarily contradict this.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, February 22nd, 2014 at 3:55 AM

Title: Re: What tibetan buddhist traditions these people belong?

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

I don't know much about Sakya, or anything, for that matter, but what about this:

http://www.adarshaphotography.com/Other/Dam-Ngak-

Dzod/26568547\_m6QQ5D#!i=2242016424&k=fgBJHnS&lb=1&s=L?

Malcolm wrote:

That's true, he did give the Dam Ngag Dzod recently, I forgot, that contains Lamdre in its minimal form.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, February 22nd, 2014 at 3:18 AM

Title: Re: Living in Bhutan?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

When push comes to shove, all who die engaged in battle go to hell. Perhaps one's motivation will shorten the duration, but when they say "war is hell", they were not kidding.

Indrajala said:

It isn't so clear cut as that. Past merit and a number of other factors come into play at death.

Malcolm wrote:

It's pretty clear cut when the Buddha explains this to Pasenadi. The most important factor determining your next birth place is the mental factors you are experiencing when you die. Plus all people who voluntarily participate in a battle earn the karma of all the people they are engaged in that activity with.

There really is no positive outcome of war, karmically speaking.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, February 22nd, 2014 at 3:00 AM

Title: Re: Living in Bhutan?

Content:

Indrajala said:

If push comes to shove though someone has to do the fighting. Monks of course are obligated to remain out of the conflict, but someone has to man the walls.

The fear of karma is warranted, though I don't think it is so simple. It certainly isn't wholesome karma to inflict violence against even the enemies of Buddhism, but on the other hand it isn't entirely unwholesome either as the motivation is self-defense and preservation of the Buddhadharma in the world.

Indra after all is a stream-enterer yet continues leading armies into war against the asuras...

Malcolm wrote:

When push comes to shove, all who die engaged in battle go to hell. Perhaps one's motivation will shorten the duration, but when they say "war is hell", they were not kidding.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, February 22nd, 2014 at 2:36 AM

Title: Re: Living in Bhutan?

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

How very protestant.

According to the Lotus Sūtra a single offering to an image of the Buddha can initiate the process towards ultimate buddhahood in the distant future.

So, preserving images is actually essential to at least Mahāyāna Buddhism.
Do you preserve them with the blood of your enemies?

Malcolm wrote:

It certainly is not the job of Buddhist monks or lay people to get involved in armed struggles.

But Jeff is correct, any country should maintain a strong army to defend itself, and in particular we have seen the repeated and tragic costs to Buddhist countries that do not maintain strong armies to defend themselves. Bhutan of course does not have the power to stave off China or India, but they don't have to. Any threat to Bhutan is a threat against India itself.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, February 22nd, 2014 at 2:05 AM

Title: Re: Living in Bhutan?

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

M:

I value everything handed down by the teachers, it is important that the teachings are handed on.... but that is not the same as clinging to it out of fear.

Malcolm wrote:

I don't think Bhutan is clinging out of fear to anything.

tellyontellyon said:

That is not the same as manipulating populations to maintain a religious and cultural dominance.

Malcolm wrote:

That is the Maoist game, not the Bhutanese game.

tellyontellyon said:

If the British or whoever it was did that to Bhutan, well that is the past. Two wrongs do not make a right. The Bhutanese people of Nepali descent who were expelled were treated badly. They were just ordinary, poor people who had their lives shattered by the actions of the Bhutanese government.

Malcolm wrote:

They were mostly illegal immigrants.

tellyontellyon said:

As the world changes in technology, communication etc. then of course the cultural forms of Buddhist communities change too. This is unavoidable.

Malcolm wrote:

Many times people think they are preserving "the essence" when they change things, but really they wind up destroying the core.

tellyontellyon said:

By failing to act with compassion the label 'Vajrayana' has been made meaningless. Bhutan doesn't deserve that epithet.

Is that what you think Vajrayana comes down to... deporting ethnic minorities?

Malcolm wrote:

One, by that time, the Bhutanese (Ngalobs) were the minority in their own country, though the with the easterners, most of whom are of Assamese, monpa and so on descent, they formed a Buddhist majority.

I think that the Bhutanese acted as they did to stop illegal immigration into their country as well as rising terrorism. But you will recall they only began the mass deportations as a response to Maoist terrorism.

The situation in Bhutan is nothing like Shri Lanka or Burma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, February 22nd, 2014 at 1:11 AM

Title: Re: What tibetan buddhist traditions these people belong?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

It is also interesting to note that at the end of Dilgo Khyentse's life, when he was repairing Samye, he kept on having recurrent visions of Sakya Pandita which led to a Guru Yoga terma featuring Sakya Pandita that has an outer, inner and secret aspect to it.

pensum said:

Interesting, for Jamyang Khyentse Chokyi Lodro had given DKR a statue of Sakya Pandita which he had used as his own personal practice support.

Malcolm wrote:

DKR was a smart man, he knew which side of the bread his butter was on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, February 22nd, 2014 at 1:00 AM

Title: Re: Living in Bhutan?

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

Buddhism has made contact with Europe and the US and the rest of the world. That interaction is leading to a new Buddhism.

Malcolm wrote:

No it isn't.

tellyontellyon said:

The language, scriptures, costumes, temples... all that is wonderful and we can learn so much from that, but that is not the essence of what Buddhism is about.

Malcolm wrote:

Human cultures are worth preserving. Nepal already has one. Let Bhutan have theirs.

tellyontellyon said:

It is important that in trying to preserve cultural forms we do not lose the essence, what Buddhism is really about.

Malcolm wrote:

Bhutan is the last place in the world where the entire country (apart from the Nepalis legally living in the South) is devoted to Vajrayāna. Even if you don't think this is worth preserving, many of us do.

tellyontellyon said:

If we want Buddhism to survive then it must come from a place of compassion and love.

Malcolm wrote:

Sometimes the benefit of all takes on fearsome forms. I think Bhutan did what it needed to do to eliminate a huge population of people who emigrated to Bhutan without papers. They needed to tighten their borders. As I said, I personally have no problem with this.

tellyontellyon said:

If it comes from fear and an attempt to cling to something from the past then we have lost it already.

Malcolm wrote:

But Buddhism does look to the past, that is why we recite lineage prayers, compose religious histories and so on, so that we know where we come from and we do not forget. The past informs the present. There is no place for a Buddhist "cultural revolution". Buddhadharma has a trajectory, an arch. It will last for so long in this world system and then disappear completely. But in the meantime the traditional forms have substance and meaning. I personally believe they should be preserved.

If you want a "new Buddhism", then go follow Bachelor or some of the other advocates of Buddhist reform. As for me, I am about as conservative as one gets when it comes to preserving what we have left from the ancient Buddhist world. There is so little of it left, it needs to remain intact for the edification of the future. We unfortunately live in a world where even the Buddha's seat of awakening, on a relative level, is not immune to Muslim and Hindu attacks. Indeed, in 635 it was destroyed by Sashanka. Last year Bodhgaya was bombed by the Indian Muhajadeen. Everyone recalls the insane shelling of the Buddhas at Bamiyan by the Taliban.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, February 22nd, 2014 at 12:40 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Everything is worse. I have friends who have lived there six months out of every year for the past 20 years. According to them, it is in worse shape than ever.

theanarchist said:

But is that because of the Maoists?

Malcolm wrote:

Definitely.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 21st, 2014 at 11:30 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

theanarchist said:

Erm, yeah. If it was so great, then why were there so many dissatisfied people who turned to the maoists?

Malcolm wrote:

They didn't really — the Maoists basically forced young Nepalis to fight with them or die.

theanarchist said:

I recently read an interview with a Nepali artist who stated that everything is pretty much the same, just instead of one bureaucrat you have to bribe 5.

Malcolm wrote:

Everything is worse. I have friends who have lived there six months out of every year for the past 20 years. According to them, it is in worse shape than ever.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 21st, 2014 at 10:55 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

theanarchist said:

Whereas Hindus never had any inclination for proselytizing and here in Europe they are among the immigrants that cause the least problems.

Malcolm wrote:

You need to read the History of Nepal and India. Or for the matter the Hardship and Decline of Buddhism in India.

theanarchist said:

That's still an intra-Indian affair and a fairly ordinary power struggle of different groups. Those Nepali peasants certainly don't want to take over the government and convert all the buddhists there.

Malcolm wrote:

No, the communists tried to use an imagined Nepali majority to foment an armed rebellion and take over of the Bhutanese government to install a Marxist regime, just like the present day one in Kathmandu. I, for one, am glad they failed. Nepal was great under the old King, these days it is a total mess, largely through the customary ineptness of Marxist governments.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 21st, 2014 at 10:53 PM

Title: Re: Living in Bhutan?

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

M:

You really have to get away from equating genuine Marxism with the distorted nutjobs that are better described as Stalinists/Maoists. I don't call myself a communist for exactly the same reason. I'm not a supporter of the actions or the so called 'communist' organisations that happened in the USSR, North Korea, China, Nepal, Tibet etc. It is really dishonest of you to keep on suggesting that I do.

Malcolm wrote:

TOTO, I think that your beliefs lead to exactly what happened in the USSR, China, North Korea, Nepal, etc.

tellyontellyon said:

Do you have a problem with the fact that if you are a Mohawk Indian of Christian, etc. beliefs, you have no right to be in the government of the Mohawk Nation? I don't.

A Mohawk is a Mohawk, if the govt. of the Mohawk nation is the voice of the entire Mohawk nation it should encompass the whole community. But we are not even talking about a particular 'people' here. We are talking about a country.

Malcolm wrote:

Actually we are talking about a particular people with a specific history, language and cultural tradition.

tellyontellyon said:

People are people, why should Buddhists worry about things like the ethnic background of people.

Malcolm wrote:

We don't. Anyone can become a Buddhist.

tellyontellyon said:

I thought Buddhists embraced impermanence, rather than trying to preserve some sort of model society.

Malcolm wrote:

Buddhists, when push comes to shove, are much more conservative than you imagine. We tend to like to preserve things like, lineage, culture and so on, and if Bhutan had adopted the policies of Sikkim, there would be no Bhutan today.

tellyontellyon said:

Bhutan is not a museum.

Malcolm wrote:

No, it is a tiny nation trying to preserve its unique culture and way of life. For example, the Navaho nation, at 27,425 sq mi, is twice the size of Bhutan, though it only has about 180,000 members. Bhutan is more densely populated, at 742,737 (2012), but is little more half the size, at 14,824 sq mi. But in 1991, it had a population of 1,375,400. As you can see, there was a mass migration out of Bhutan, and it was not all forced. Many Nepalis left of their own accord. Only 108,000 were forcibly expelled.

Even today there are more speakers of Nepali in Bhutan than those who speak the national language, Dzongkha. The Nepalis are 35% of the total population. Prior to the mass exodus, they were nearly 50% of the total population, and only 15% of those were actually citizens of Bhutan.

tellyontellyon said:

The expelled people are just human beings. Why reduce them to something less than that with some silly racist label of 'illegal immigrant', and use that as a justification of the suffering imposed on them by the racist govt. of Bhutan.

Malcolm wrote:

The conditions of the camps are appalling, I have friends have been to them. But I blame the government of Nepal for that, and not Bhutan. Calling the Lhotsampas "Bhutanese" is like calling illegal immigrants to the US "US citizens". This page for example states https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Ethnic\_groups\_in\_Bhutan "The number of legal permanent Nepalese residents in the late 1980s may have been as few as 15 percent of the total Lhotshampa population, however."

In any event, in the past six years many of these unfortunate people have been resettled in Canada and the US, among other places, and will certainly have a better life here than was possible for them in Nepal or Bhutan.

As I said, Bhutan, for all its faults, is the last independent Vajrayāna kingdom in the world today. It may mean nothing to you, but it means something to me.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 21st, 2014 at 9:40 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

theanarchist said:

Whereas Hindus never had any inclination for proselytizing and here in Europe they are among the immigrants that cause the least problems.

Malcolm wrote:

You need to read the History of Nepal and India. Or for the matter the Hardship and ## Decline of Buddhism in India.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 21st, 2014 at 8:54 PM

Title: Re: What tibetan buddhist traditions these people belong?

Content:

pensum said:

the Ngor branch no longer practise the so-called 'ancestral teachings' (yab chö) of the Sakya school, such as the practices of Yangdak Heruka and Vajrakilaya."

Malcolm wrote:

This is not strictly true, actually. However, it is true that the Ngorgpas were very conservative, while the Tsharpas were more eclectic in their approach. The Khon family have always maintained strong connections with the Nyingma school.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 21st, 2014 at 8:46 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

, I have no problems with their desire to maintain the Buddhist culture of Bhutan intact without having to accommodate those of other cultures in their midst.

theanarchist said:

Wow, that sounds like Saudi Arabian religious totalitarianism of the lowest kind.

Malcolm wrote:

Do you have a problem with the fact that if you are a Mohawk Indian of Christian, etc. beliefs, you have no right to be in the government of the Mohawk Nation? I don't. That's how they set up their constitution, in order to preserve what they can of their culture and original spiritual tradition. Bhutan should be considered in the same light. You can think of it as a Buddhist "reservation".

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 21st, 2014 at 8:00 PM

Title: Re: Living in Bhutan?

Content:

Dan74 said:

I was not aware of the risk to women (somebody mentioned the word 'predatory'). Can someone shed more light on this? We also have a 5-year-old daughter.

Malcolm wrote:

Deserved or undeserved, Bhutanese men have a reputation for being womanizers. I think it has a bit to do with the Drugpa Kunley mythos.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 21st, 2014 at 7:58 PM

Title: Re: China Tells Obama not to meet Dalai Lama

Content:

Indrajala said:

The president actually gains their begrudging respect by defying their request not to meet the Dalai Lama.

Malcolm wrote:

No bunch of commies is going to tell the leader of the free world what to do.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 21st, 2014 at 7:56 PM

Title: Re: China Tells Obama not to meet Dalai Lama

Content:

Adamantine said:

"We urge the United States to take China's concerns seriously and not to facilitate or offer occasion for the Dalai Lama to conduct anti-China secessionist moves," foreign ministry spokesperson Hua Chunying said in a press release.

"By arranging a meeting between the President and the Dalai Lama, the US side will grossly interfere in the internal affairs of China, seriously violate norms governing international relations and severely impair China-US relations. China expresses firm opposition. We urge the US to take China's concerns seriously, immediately cancel the meeting, and not to provide facilitation and platform for the Dalai Lama to carry out anti-China separatist activities in the US," Hua said.

- See more at: <http://www.hindustantimes.com/world-news/china-urges-obama-to-cancel-meeting-with-dalai-lama/article1-1186409.aspx#sthash.3BbxCY0h.dpuf>

Malcolm wrote:

Well, you have to commend them on their persistence.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 21st, 2014 at 7:55 PM

Title: Re: Climate Change: We're Doomed

Content:

Sherab said:

Molten salt nuclear reactors are considered to be "safe and proliferation-resistant".

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, the operative word here is "considered"; Three Mile Island was "considered" safe, Fukushima was "considered" safe, Chernobyl was "considered" safe until it turned out that they weren't safe at all.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 21st, 2014 at 7:51 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

HHDL:

He went on to declare the command economy of the former Soviet Union, “failed,” and then critiqued American capitalism: “At the same time, United States, capitalist country, most richest, but gap rich and poor.”

At this point, Russia has the largest wealth gap. And it has turned into a Fox News paradise, at least if you followed John Stewart's analysis on Wed. night.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 21st, 2014 at 7:46 PM

Title: Re: What tibetan buddhist traditions these people belong?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

There are other high lamas in the Sakya school, like Dzongsar Khyentse, but they do not normally give Lamdre and Yogini in large settings.

dzogchungpa said:

DJKR is neither a monk nor from the Khon family, is he?

Malcolm wrote:

He also has never given any major Sakyapa transmissions to my knowledge, and there is no need for him to, considering that the Khon masters are alive and well and kicking.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 21st, 2014 at 7:45 PM

Title: Re: What tibetan buddhist traditions these people belong?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

There are other high lamas in the Sakya school, like Dzongsar Khyentse, but they do not normally give Lamdre and Yogini in large settings.

dzogchungpa said:

DJKR is neither a monk nor from the Khon family, is he?

heart said:

Maybe that is why he seems so Nyingma then.

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

In terms of tantra, he generally teaches from Nyingma; in terms of sutra, he generally teaches from the Sakya POV; and considering his education, this is not at all surprising.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 21st, 2014 at 7:41 PM

Title: Re: I am no longer a Buddhist.

Content:

Anders said:

but rather the tendency for investment in such labels in the first place.

Malcolm wrote:

...which often results in the spouting of idiocies...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 21st, 2014 at 8:05 AM

Title: Re: Living in Bhutan?

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

He only disapproves of non-marxist colonialism, he is fine with marxist colonialism. You're just talking crap now.

Malcolm wrote:

Sure you are, you just call it "Liberation". Just as the communists "liberated" Tibet, so too the communists wanted to "liberate" Bhutan. Why? Because Bhutan lies along the border with Chinese-occupied Tibet. If they could have succeeded in installing a communist Government in Bhutan as well as Nepal, this would have been very powerful for them and China. Unfortunately, the Nepali immigrants got caught up in this "liberation" movement, which is just marxist colonialism, and now we have the present situation. In any event, the US alone between 2008 and 2012 have taken in 65,000+ of these immigrants, so in the end, I think they will all do fine.

You do realize that the Maoist government of Nepal has been gunning down Tibetan refugees as well as handing them back to the Chinese authorities? The Lhotsampas were just pawns being used by the communists, plain and simple.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 21st, 2014 at 8:03 AM

Title: Re: Prophecies in Buddhism?

Content:

AlexanderS said:

Could someone please tell me the source of the famous Padmasambhava quote that several books feature that goes along the line of "When the Iron bird flies and steel ox runs of Wheels and the tibetan people are scattered like ants across the earth, my teachings will come to the land of the red men".?

Malcolm wrote:

Please see this post by Sam Van Schaik.

<http://earlytibet.com/2007/09/18/red-faced-men/>

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 21st, 2014 at 7:48 AM

Title: Re: Living in Bhutan?

Content:

Zhen Li said:

Just because they don't do it under a national flag (and some do) doesn't mean it's not colonialism, and I thought as a socialist you oppose colonialism TOTO.

Malcolm wrote:

He only disapproves of non-marxist colonialism, he is fine with marxist colonialism.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 21st, 2014 at 7:46 AM

Title: Re: Living in Bhutan?

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

It may not seem pretty or nice, but as Bhutan is the last independent Vajrayāna Kingdom in the world, I have no problems with their desire to maintain the Buddhist culture of Bhutan intact without having to accommodate those of other cultures in their midst. 'Vajrayana Kingdom'?

I reject the desire for religious states.

Malcolm wrote:

You can reject it all you like, but you can't do anything about it.

tellyontellyon said:

I think they are wrong in this day and age. All countries contain people who don't fit the national mould, or more accurately, the myth of a national mould.

Malcolm wrote:

There are plenty of Nepalis still living in southern Bhutan, but they are legally there.

tellyontellyon said:

These arguments are basically the same nationalist/racist arguments that we hear from all over the world.

Malcolm wrote:

Definitely an argument in defense of Bhutanese national sovereignty, not racist at all. In any case, I think it is great the Bhutanese are intent on preserving their traditional way of life. I think it is fine for them to run their country however they like.

In any case, you are apparently unaware of the centuries of Hindu encroachment on Buddhist Kingdoms in the Himalayas. Now we see the same thing with Communists using terrorism in Bhutan to try to achieve their goals, like the bombing in Thimphu in 2008.

tellyontellyon said:

Should Buddhists be so defensive about Buddhism that ethnic cleansing becomes acceptable? I think much more is lost by that way of thinking than is imagined might be saved.

Malcolm wrote:

You are entitled to an opinion.

tellyontellyon said:

Just think about what happens to the people that are castigated, uprooted, pushed out of their jobs and homes, children thrown out of their schools, forced to follow dress codes etc. just to satisfy some silly frightened fascist who thinks his 'culture' is disappearing.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, it is all unfortunate. It is a pity that communists pushed the Bhutanese into taking actions they had tried to avoid for many years.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 21st, 2014 at 5:43 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

Adamantine said:

Posts on Bhutan have been moved to the "Living in Bhutan" thread

<http://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=40&t=15626>

AlexanderS said:

I don't see why posts discussing a dharma monarchy don't belong in this thread.

Malcolm wrote:

They do, but the issue was not about dharma monarchies so much as the deficiencies of Bhutanese policies, so I asked the mods to move it.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 21st, 2014 at 3:45 AM

Title: Re: Prophecies in Buddhism?

Content:

Rakshasa said:

Although i'm aware that indulging in astrology and such professions is forbidden in Pali canon, yet many mahayana buddhists are known to have made prophecies, like padmasambhava. So what is the Mahayana stand? I've heard of buddhist monks even in Thailand and burma acting as oracles. Are there any prophecies by current buddhist masters?

Malcolm wrote:

Most terms have predictions.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 21st, 2014 at 1:49 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

Sönam said:

Socialism has many itemizations ... a modern form is not against the market, but offers a better redistribution of profit. But the point in this case is that the (world) market is against socialism (i.e. a better redistribution). Capital want to continue to rule the world with his own rules. Therefore, for it works, socialism should be implemented in many countries at the same time (enough for it could'nt be isolated/segregated by actors of capital) ... all that very complicated, also because otherwise capitalism will remain the same, greedy, only guided by individual profit and competition.

Malcolm wrote:

Actually the problem is that companies like Walmart exploit Government social benefits in order to keep wages down. Walmart is the largest employer in the US and each of its employees receives an average of $1000 a year in federal assistance. American fast food workers take in a staggering $7 billion a year in federal assistance.

Frankly, John Maynard Keynes ideas about the role of government in the economy provided the US and England with the most stable economies they ever had.

Unfortunately, people still keep arguing as if 19th century theories of political economy actually anticipated the global economy. They didnt' and don't, and that is why all of this talk of socialism vs. capitalism is frankly so silly, IMO.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 21st, 2014 at 1:29 AM

Title: Re: I am no longer a Buddhist.

Content:

Will said:

Malcolm: Nevertheless, refuge, bodhicitta and dedication are indispensable in Dzogchen.

How do these three differ in Dzogchen, if they do, from any of the Buddhist versions?

Malcolm wrote:

They don't. I am quite certain that Simon has not abandoned Dharma. He is merely saying that so much idiocy is spouted by Buddhists of various stripes he does not want to own any of that by identifying himself to himself as a "Buddhist".

BTW, Simon is quite capable of speaking for himself, but I think that I have captured a main part of his sentiment and he will correct me if I have erred.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 21st, 2014 at 1:22 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

Good grief Malcolm:

To consider the expelled Lhotsampa people as mainly 'illegal immigrants' is a new low. Why does an 'enlightened' system even care about ethnic origin anyway?

Can there be not a word of criticism against these enlightened leaders? No faults to be found?

Actually, most of the Lhotsampa had been born in Bhutan, and many went back generations. What happened was the Lhotsampa dared to step out of line by wanting to be treated fairly, and asking for the same rights that other citizens enjoyed. Bhutan is no Shangri-La.

<https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Lhotsampa>

Anarchists and Marxists are accused of seeking 'impossible' utopias. The supporters of Buddhist Monarchy seem to think they exist already!

Malcolm wrote:

The Lhotsampas (southern border people) however are a recent immigrant population, their history is long and complicated. Many Lhotsampas do not want to adhere to Buddhadharma, nor do they wish to adhere to essentially non-Nepalese cultural norms. The people who in camps are those who could not prove a pre 1958 citizenship. They are all culturally Nepalese, speaking Nepalese dialects, but Nepal won't have them which is all the more ironic because the present current Maoist government fomented and exacerbated the unrest. The best solution would be for Nepal to absorb them, since they are Nepalese people. The situation was not aided by the fact that Lotshampas responded with armed violence to the 1988 census which showed large numbers of them were illegal aliens in Bhutan. In fact, much of the unrest was agitated by the Communist Party of Nepal:

Some villagers willingly joined the protests; others did so under duress. The government branded the party, reportedly established by anti-monarchists and backed by the Nepali Congress Party and the Communist Party of Nepal (Unified Marxist-Leninist), as a terrorist organization. The party allegedly led its members – said to be armed with rifles, muzzle-loading guns, knives, and homemade grenades – in raids on villages in southern Bhutan, disrobing people wearing traditional Bhutanese garb; extorting money; and robbing, kidnapping, and killing people.

<https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Lhotshampa>

All of the above is very characteristic of how the Maoists in Nepal behaved while they were fighting the government. They hate Buddhism, and will stop at nothing to try and destroy Buddhism in the Himalayas in the interest of their Chinese masters.

The Bhutanese are trying their best to maintain a Buddhist kingdom surrounded on all sides by tīrthikas and enemies, and so from that point of view I think what they are doing is admirable. They observed what happened to Sikkim and determined that the same fate was not going to happen to them.

It may not seem pretty or nice, but as Bhutan is the last independent Vajrayāna Kingdom in the world, I have no problems with their desire to maintain the Buddhist culture of Bhutan intact without having to accommodate those of other cultures in their midst.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 21st, 2014 at 12:39 AM

Title: Re: I am no longer a Buddhist.

Content:

Will said:

Malcolm has also mentioned something about Dzogchen being so universal that it is beyond Buddhism (and maybe the buddhadharma?)

Malcolm wrote:

Dzogchen teachings does not require one to be a "Buddhist". Nevertheless, refuge, bodhicitta and dedication are indispensable in Dzogchen.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 20th, 2014 at 10:14 PM

Title: Re: What tibetan buddhist traditions these people belong?

Content:

Sherlock said:

Yes and I have attended some public teachings by HHST too but it seemed to me that there were higher teachings that were not taught. I.e. HHST made references to the ear-whispered teachings only given to selected disciples and the Kilaya completion stage was not taught.

Malcolm wrote:

The Kilaya completion stage practices, as far as I know, have not survived beyond a tummo practice.

As for these other rumors, well, there are always some intimate instruction or another that is not generally taught. Yogini has some sections that are taught to only three people, or one person at a time. Lamdre also has some transmissions that are one to one. Then there are other teachings like outer, inner and secret Mahakala practices that are not widely promulgated.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 20th, 2014 at 10:04 PM

Title: Re: What tibetan buddhist traditions these people belong?

Content:

Sherlock said:

So you can't access the higher Sakya teachings as a layperson unless you had already learned them while ordained?

Malcolm wrote:

No, traditionally, you cannot be lay Sakya teacher. The teachings of Lamdre and Yogini however are given widely and to anyone who wants to practice them. These days the Khon family more or less has a monopoly on those teachings outside of Tibet. Traditionally, those who could give Lamdre and so on were more or less restricted to members of the Khon family, the abbots of Ngor and the Abbots of Tshar. Other teachings in the Sakaya lineage, like the sadhanas in the sgrub thabs kun 'dus could be given by others. These days, if you are a Sakyapa, necessarily your guru will be HHST or HHSDR, Jetsun Kusho, Lunding Khens senior and junior, or Chogye Trichen. I count HHST and HHSDR as my main Sakya masters, but I have received teachings from everyone but Chogye Trichen. There are other high lamas in the Sakya school, like Dzongsar Khyentse, but they do not normally give Lamdre and Yogini in large settings.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 20th, 2014 at 9:45 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

The infant mortality rate is three times higher than even Tibet, and has a life expectancy of only 54.4 years.

Malcolm wrote:

Infant mortality rate dropped 50% in one year in Bhutan, between 2007 and 2008 and is steadily declining.

Life expectancy in Bhutan also increased the same year, between 2007 and 2008. What this means is that the high infant mortality rate (110.9) in 2000 was being factored in. When that dropped by half in 2008, the life expectancy jumped from 52 in 2000 to its present 67.88 years. If they lower their infant mortality rate again by half, you will see another jump in life expectancy.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 20th, 2014 at 9:40 PM

Title: Re: I am no longer a Buddhist.

Content:

Adamantine said:

I guess this is an example of what HHDL is considering when he generally advocates for people to stick with their native religions rather than convert to Buddhism.

Malcolm wrote:

I don't think you really understand what Simon is saying.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 20th, 2014 at 8:41 PM

Title: Re: Climate Change: We're Doomed

Content:

kirtu said:

we can now build massive dams.

Malcolm wrote:

Yuck, not acceptable. These things mess with the local environment, and disturb everything in their vicinity for years.

We need to be removing dams in order to restore fisheries in the atlantic and the pacific, not building more of them

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 20th, 2014 at 8:33 PM

Title: Re: What tibetan buddhist traditions these people belong?

Content:

Kunga said:

so if a monk gave up ordination the only way to continue would be to become Nyingma...

Malcolm wrote:

Yup, that is the deal. You don't really see any lay people leading centers in Europe or the US.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 20th, 2014 at 8:17 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

I'm not quite sure why Bhutan is being held up as an example to be followed, it is little more than a vassal state of India.

The infant mortality rate is three times higher than even Tibet, and has a life expectancy of only 54.4 years. Bhutan has more refugees outside its borders than Tibet. The racist policies of the Bhutanese government drove a fifth (134,000) of the population into exile in the early 1990's.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, most of the refugees are guest workers who stayed on, not Bhutanese people. They are ethnically Nepalese. The number of refugees living in camps in Eastern Nepal was estimate at 107,000 according to UNHCRat one time.

As for Tibetans, "Based on a CTA survey from 2009, 127,935 Tibetans were registered in the diaspora", according to this wiki page https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Tibetan\_diaspora.

The situation is complex and not straight forward. Most of the people in these camps are illegal immigrants.

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Bhutanese\_refugees.

Even the very term "Bhutanese refugee" seems to be a misnomer, kind of like calling those deported from the US for illegal immigration "American Refugees".

Alenxander Casella, a one time Director in UNHCR writes (cited from the above page):

"Normally, the UNHCR, before intervening, would have undertaken a survey of the caseload to determine exactly their nationality and reasons for departure. Had this been undertaken, the inescapable conclusion would have been that the overwhelming majority were actually Nepalese and hence, by the fact that they were in their own country, did not qualifying for refugee status"

And presently, the camps have only at most 77,000 people.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 20th, 2014 at 7:52 PM

Title: Re: I am no longer a Buddhist.

Content:

Simon E. said:

I first took Refuge nearly 40 years ago.

I have now to acknowledge what has been bubbling under for some time...I am no longer a Buddhist, and if I am honest with myself have not been for a while.

But it has been a slow process of letting go. Apart from other considerations I have invested a lot of my life in that direction. It is painful.

I have spent a long period vascillating and rushing back to 'safety '.

My Dzogchen practice will now have to continue without that particular set of references.

Thanks you to all.

If I have offended during this period of uncertainty I am sorry.

I truly wish for you all that you find peace.

Malcolm wrote:

Better to be a true practitioner of Buddhadharma than a follower of "Buddhism".

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 20th, 2014 at 8:44 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

Many Marxists would disagree. There is much evidence against Stalinism and Maoism, but to say a genuine workers democracy would inevitably degenerate into a bureaucracy, that is a quite different question.

Malcolm wrote:

Of course they will disagree. No one wants to be associated with Stalin and Mao.

But I definitely think the US is safe from being turned into a "workers democracy". In any event, the whole piece you cited keeps waffling on and on about "elimination of the state" and that, my friend, will never happen unless all civilization falls into utter barbarism and anarchy.

This is why I think you Marxists and Anarchists are just dreamers. Your stateless society will never happen.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 20th, 2014 at 8:23 AM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

conebeckham said:

This thread is like a circle.

Malcolm wrote:

You mean it is meaningless, like samsara.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 20th, 2014 at 8:22 AM

Title: Re: What tibetan buddhist traditions these people belong?

Content:

Sherlock said:

What about the Zur and gNubs families?

Malcolm wrote:

Do you know where you can find some Zurs and some gNubs? Are they still practicing their ancestral teachings? I rather doubt it.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 20th, 2014 at 8:20 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

The Chinese Maoists were a twisted, distorted caricature of Marxism that I'm sure you know by now that I don't support.

Malcolm wrote:

And I think that Stalin and Mao are the very picture of how Marxism is bound to turn out in the end, as you surely know by now. And frankly, we have more evidence on our side than you do on yours, which is why most people in the US think the modern day Marxist socialists are nutjobs.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 20th, 2014 at 8:10 AM

Title: Re: What tibetan buddhist traditions these people belong?

Content:

Sherlock said:

The Guhyagarbha transmission lineages should be at least as old.

Malcolm wrote:

You misunderstand, or I was not clear. The Khon Family (who are the heart and soul of Sakya) have practiced Vajrakilaya without any interruption since the time of Padmasambhava. They are the only religious family in Tibet who can make that claim. It makes them the most Nyingma family in Tibet.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 20th, 2014 at 8:06 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

BTW, not only was Mao against Dharma, he was against Marxism too.

Malcolm wrote:

Yeah, right. I don't think so son. I have been to the very birthplace of the Chinese revolution in Shanghai.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 20th, 2014 at 8:06 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

You think I'm wrong to say it should be discussed and understood and tested against experience?

I don't think so...

I think that is exactly what Buddha wanted us to do, not simply act like a 'faith' religion. That which is true will eventually shine through.

Malcolm wrote:

What the Buddha said actually was, until you know for yourself, you need to take it on faith from someone who does.

The Kalamas sutta for example is much misunderstood in that it was taught to non-Buddhists.

But the Eastern Gatehouse Sutta explains very clearly that until you have that taste of nirvana, which is of course based on understand dependent origination, the four noble truths and so on, you must accept the Dharma as it is taught from someone who does know. Hence the crucial importance of having a master of genuine realization.

Further, faith, in Dharma, is defined as a mental factor that brings clarity to the mind. Of course we don't want blind faith, but aspiring faith is also weak, since if your role model disappoints you, you might abandon Dharma after all. What we are looking for in Buddhadharma is unshakable faith such that if 1000 buddhas showed up and said "Sorry, it was all a mistake" you would not believe them.

Faith is one of the five faculties and one of the five powers. It is the very foundation of the path to nirvana, which is why it is considered one of the 8 transcendent faculties.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 20th, 2014 at 7:51 AM

Title: Re: What tibetan buddhist traditions these people belong?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Try telling that to some Sakyapas. Actually, Tulku Rabsal Dawa was also considered a Sakyapa Tulku and he maintained a life long practice commitment to all the main Sakya practices.

michaelb said:

Of course, the head lama and founder of Shechen Tennyi Dargyeling in exile, one of the six main Nyingma gompas, and the head lama of the entire Nyingma Tradition is a Sakyapa.

Malcolm wrote:

Yup, that's what some Sakyapas say - especially those who are connected to Derge. There is a kind of saying "If a Sakyapa gives up his monks vows, he will become Nyingma".

It is also correct to point here that Sakya is in fact the oldest Nyingma lineage in Tibet through their continuous practice of Kllaya, among other things.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 20th, 2014 at 7:46 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

The point isn't whether HHDL is a Marxist or not, although he was certainly still calling himself a Marxist in 2011.

<https://www.theguardian.com/commentisfree/belief/2011/jun/20/dalai-lama-marxist-buddhism>

Malcolm wrote:

His putative "Marxism" seems confined to the idea that he wants the best for everyone.

tellyontellyon said:

The point is that it is possible to be a Marxist and be a Buddhist. Whether HHDL still is or not is not the point, the point is that he was for most of his life and therefore being able to hold both Buddhist and Marxist ideas is not ruled out. HHDL seems able to make his own mind about these things without resorting to telling people they are 'un-dharmic' or 'worldly' for thinking this way or that.

Malcolm wrote:

He thinks that Mao was against Dharma.

tellyontellyon said:

I say it is possible to be a Buddhist and a capitalist also...However, I do object to the idea that being a capitalist is somehow the default position for Buddhists.

Malcolm wrote:

Actually, no one said that. What was said was that one will never be rid of markets, capital accumulation, and so on. And as we see, HHDL is not against markets nor capital accumulation.

tellyontellyon said:

To be honest I don't see Buddhism as a 'recieved' religion and it is all-always up for discussion.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, there you are wrong. Thinks like dependent origination, rebirth, emptiness and so are non-negotiable.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 20th, 2014 at 6:19 AM

Title: Re: HHDL on capitalism

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

And who says that I, for example, care what HHDL's political view may be? His Dharma teachings? Yes! His politics? Well...

Malcolm wrote:

You don't, but TOTO does, since he was using some of HHDL's political views stated in other places prior to 2009, when this book was published.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 20th, 2014 at 5:57 AM

Title: Re: What tibetan buddhist traditions these people belong?

Content:

michaelb said:

But Dilgo Khyentse Rinpoche was undoubtedly Nyingma.

Malcolm wrote:

Try telling that to some Sakyapas. Actually, Tulku Rabsal Dawa was also considered a Sakyapa Tulku and he maintained a life long practice commitment to all the main Sakya practices.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 20th, 2014 at 5:30 AM

Title: Re: What tibetan buddhist traditions these people belong?

Content:

Kunga said:

Thanks again, Malcolm. Much appreciated!

Malcolm wrote:

Incidentally you might note that the retinue is two Madhyamakas, Two Yogacarins, Two Vinayadharas and Two Logicians.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 20th, 2014 at 4:59 AM

Title: Re: What tibetan buddhist traditions these people belong?

Content:

Kunga said:

Fascinating, thanks! I had no idea about that. Can the sadhana/s be found in Khentse Rinpoche's published collected works? If so, I will ask for the transmission for this at Sechen gumpa.

Malcolm wrote:

bkra shis dpal 'byor. "chos rje sa skya paN+Di ta'i bla ma'i rnal 'byor ye shes bdud rtsi'i nyin byed/." In gsung 'bum/_rab gsal zla ba. TBRC W21809. 17: 585 - 596. delhi: shechen publications, 1994.

http://tbrc.org/link?RID=O2DB57601%7CO2DB576012DB61746\$W21809

Kunga said:

Thanks so much

Malcolm wrote:

The outer practice is basically a version of the normal Sapan guruyoga. The inner practice is Sapan as Manjushri surrounded by eight Indian Panditas: Aryadeva, Gunaprabha, Vasubandhu, Asanga, Candrakirti, Dharmakirti, Dignaga and Śakyaprabha with Nāgārjuna as the master of the family. The secret practice is Sapan as Vajrabhairava.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 20th, 2014 at 4:47 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

AilurusFulgens said:

Thank you for the clarification. Where is it possible to find more information on the Khon royal family? Especially them being descendant of a god of the clear light realm?

Can you also go a bit in detail concerning this?

I have always been fascinated by the stories how the very first Tibetan king did not die, but ascended back to heaven on a heavenly rope (dmu-theg).

Malcolm wrote:

This is an extract from a history of Sakya that I wrote for Lama Migmar Tseten which appears in Treasures of the Sakya Lineage published by Shambhala.

The Khon trace their origin to a class of gods called Wosel Lha, gods of luminous clarity.

The Annals of the Khon Lineage (gdung rabs), cites the fifteenth century author, Ngorchen Kunchog Lhundrup: The line of emanations of Mañjuśrī,

The Glorious Sakyapa, begins in the country of the Gods of Luminous Clarity.

There were three brothers, Chiring, Yuring, and Yuse.

Yuse, having been made a king of humans, bore four sons.

His elder brother, Yuring, came to his aid.

The sons of Yuring and Muza Dembu were the group of the seven Maza. The six oldest brothers with their father returned to the land of the gods.

The youngest son, Masang Chije and Thogcham Wurmo bore a son, Pawo Tag.

Both he and his Naga wife, Trama, bore a son called Lutsa Tagpo Woechan.

Lutsa and the Mon lady Tsomo Gyal while living together bore a son at the divide between slate and grass, and so he was named Yapang Kyes, a hero that could not be defeated by others.

In a definitive sense Mañjuśrī is held to have emanated as three gods of luminous clarity, the gods named Chiring, Yuring and Yuse or Use in order to benefit others. It is of great importance too that these gods are considered emanations of Mañjuśrī, since all males of the Khon line are considered to be descendents as well as emanations of the Bodhisattva Mañjuśrī.

These three brothers descended to the human realm where they were asked to become the ruler of human beings.

The youngest brother of the gods, Yuse, was elevated to the position of the ruler. He himself bore four sons, known as the four Se Chi Li brothers. Together they fought with the eighteen major tribes of the Dong, one of the four original clans of Tibet. The middle brother, Yuring, came to aid them, and after the Dong clan was subjugated, the Dong were made vassals.

Yuring himself married a daughter of the Mu, Muza Dembu, and they bore the seven Masang brothers. Of those seven, the eldest six returned to the country of the Gods with their father.

The youngest of the Masang brothers, Masang Chije, remained among human beings. He married Thogcham Wurmo, the daughter of the Thoglha Woedchan, they bore a son known as Thogtsad Bangpo Tag.

Thogtsad married Lucham Drama, the daughter of a Nāgā, to whom a son named Lutsa Tagpo Woechan was born.

Lutsa and a Mon lady, Tsomo Gyal were married and their single son was born on the treeline, thus he was given that name Yahpang Kyes i.e. “Born at the divide between slate and grass” i.e. on the tree line of a mountain. The significance of this is that according to the Tibetan conception of cosmology, the gods live in the heights of the mountains above the tree line, while human beings live below the treeline.

The Khon in the Tibetan Imperial Period:

Konchog Lhundrup continues his account: Then having slain the Srinpo named Kyareng Khragmey and having stolen the wife, Yahdrum Silima he married her.

They had a son named Khonpar Kye.

The son of he [Khonpar Kye] and a Lady of the Tsan, Chambu Dron was handsome and smart, rare in the human lands, named Khonpa Jegung Tag, he was known as Khonton Palpoche, who went to Nyantse.

Yahpang was engaged in a fight with a Srinpo named Kyareng Khragmed, and having slain this Srinpo, married his wife. Because their boy was born as the outcome of a feud between the gods [lha] and demons [srin po], the boy was named “Born in a Feud”, “Khon par kyes”, and this is given as the origin of the clan name of the Khon.

Khonpar Kye, the offspring of gods, humans and demons, married a lady of a type of a lesser Tibetan god, the Tsan, called Chambu Dron, and their son was known as Khonton Palpoche, i.e. the Khon Teacher who Increases Wealth. He gained his name because after being appointed one of the inner ministers of King Trisrong Detsan’s court, he increased the King’s wealth.

Khonton Palpoche married Lang Zang Nechung, the sister of a translator named Lang Khampa, and while there are slightly varying accounts as to whether there were two or four sons, most later scholars follow the tradition that there were two sons, the elder being the great scholar, the Khon Lotsawa, Lu’i Wangpo, and the younger son, Khon Dorje Rinchen. Jetsun Dragpa Gyaltsen notes in his Annals of the Khon Lineage [‘khon gyi gdung rabs]:

“Khon Lu’i Wangpo Srungs was the foremost of the seven tested men. His younger brother Khon Dorje Rinchen became a disciple of Master Padmasambhava and became a tantrika.”

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 20th, 2014 at 4:37 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Personally, I have been a religious monarchist since ...

ground said:

We would fight against each other in a revolutionary civil war ...

Malcolm wrote:

What I mean is that my first guru HHST, is a dharmarāja. As is Chogyal Namkhai Norbu, for that matter.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 20th, 2014 at 4:15 AM

Title: Re: What tibetan buddhist traditions these people belong?

Content:

Kunga said:

Fascinating, thanks! I had no idea about that. Can the sadhana/s be found in Khentse Rinpoche's published collected works? If so, I will ask for the transmission for this at Sechen gompa.

Malcolm wrote:

bkra shis dpal 'byor. "chos rje sa skya paN+Di ta'i bla ma'i rnal 'byor ye shes bdud rtsi'i nyin byed/." In gsung 'bum/_rab gsal zla ba. TBRC W21809. 17: 585 - 596. delhi: shechen publications, 1994.

http://tbrc.org/link?RID=O2DB57601%7CO2DB576012DB61746\$W21809

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 20th, 2014 at 4:05 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

AilurusFulgens said:

I don't want to sidetrack the thread, but may I ask what makes the Khon royal family the oldest surviving in the world?

Why Khon and not for instance the Japanese imperial family or some other royal lineage?

Malcolm wrote:

Well, second oldest then. Though arguably, since the Khon family were the direct descendants of a god of the clear light realm who was elevated to kingship by the clans of Tibet, but this is not historical.

The ascension of the Khon to rulership of Tibet occurred in the thirteenth century. Apart from the Japanese royal family, I personally know of no other family with such a long continuous rule in one place.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 20th, 2014 at 3:53 AM

Title: Re: Why theravada reject mahayana sutra

Content:

Kunga said:

Tibetans teach all 3 yanas, and ideally should practice all 3 - i.e., keep the outer conduct of the hinayana, possess the motivation of Mahayana to achieve buddahood to free sentient beings, and hold the view / practice the methods as contained in Vajrayana.

Ajahn Brahm is not a 'disgraced' teacher by any stretch of the imagination. He decided to ordain Bhikkhunis, which caused a stir with the patriarchs of the Thai sangha. I admire him for having had the balls to do it. However, the Sri Lankans have been doing this for years; the Thais don't accept this either - so what? To try and cast aspersions on a very senior monk whom many regard as accomplished in jhana meditation is very negative.

Malcolm wrote:

Gorampa Sonam Senge wouldn't buy it. This is why he argued against giving Gelongma ordinations in Tibet, i.e. the lineage was never brought to Tibet.

Just sayin...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 20th, 2014 at 3:29 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

Zhen Li said:

Sadhu! Sadhu!

HHDL and I went through the same line of reasoning in life.

I also agree with him that Socialists fundamentally are just well intentioned, they just want to make things better for everyone by bringing equality. It just doesn't work, and leads to more suffering. That's unfortunate and makes me feel an immense welling up of compassion in my heart whenever I meet someone who is a socialist - they really think they're doing something good and right for the world, which is admirable, even if they are naive.

May all socialists and communists be well, happy and peaceful.

Malcolm wrote:

Personally, I have been a religious monarchist since I received teachings from HH Sakya Trizin (from the Khon, the oldest surviving royal family in the world), but more or less a supporter of representative democracy my whole life. I had a good friend who was a Trot, and listening to TOTO is just like playing a conversation with him from thirty years ago, identical in both word and fervor.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 20th, 2014 at 3:24 AM

Title: Re: What tibetan buddhist traditions these people belong?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

His activities as a tertön were compassionate, but not the basis of his own personal awakening, ironically, despite his importance in Dzogchen lineages.

theanarchist said:

Erm, according to the Nyingma records his predecessor achieved realisation before there even was even a Sakya school in Tibet....

Malcolm wrote:

It is important to remember that Khyentse Wangpo was a Sakya lama whose primary ritual and literary activity was dedicated to that tradition and while he worked closely with the Kagyu Jamgon Kongtrul and the Nyingma Chogyur Lingpa, neither he nor his colleagues made any effort to merge traditions or initiate a new teaching institution.
<http://www.himalayanart.org/search/set.cfm?setid=2250>

Likewise, despite the fact that I have devoted as many years to the study of Dzogchen as I have Lamdre and so on, people still tend to think of me as a Sakyapa and my training grounds me in that school. And when push comes to shove, I still think Sakya Pandita was Tibet's greatest scholar.

It is also interesting to note that at the end of Dilgo Khyentse's life, when he was repairing Samye, he kept on having recurrent visions of Sakya Pandita which led to a Guru Yoga terma featuring Sakya Pandita that has an outer, inner and secret aspect to it.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 20th, 2014 at 2:34 AM

Title: HHDL on capitalism

Content:

Unknown said:

I am, in principle, in favor of “globalization” and the concept of “global” companies. In the past, communities and countries could live in isolation if they wanted to; that is no longer the case. Today, a stock-market crash on one side of the globe has a direct and immediate effect on the other side. Terrorism born in one country can destabilize a dozen others. And the effects of poverty, disease, and social unrest in a handful of nations impact the rest of the world. It is my opinion that global companies can be agents for positive change in our interconnected world.

Another positive result of globalization is increasing competition. Competition generates a very powerful force to produce what people want at reasonable prices. But it is a means; it is not an end. The end is to generate benefits for all. So why is it so difficult to arrive at fair competition and an equitable distribution of those benefits?

Competition generates wealth. But if leaders of businesses are interested only in enriching themselves as fast as possible, with little or no regard for any harmful consequences to others, then competition is being used in the wrong way.

For much of my life, I was attracted to the socialist or communist system because I understood its objective as to provide a decent standard of living and justice for all. I was drawn to it for its equality; in such a system, extreme differences in standards of living between people are not to be tolerated. The stated objectives of socialist systems include abolishing poverty and furthering the brotherhood among people and among countries, which I, of course, found very appealing. But over time, I found out that the countries that practiced the communist system did not reach this objective; they did not even try to. On the contrary, I found that by suppressing free markets and individual freedoms like freedom of speech and freedom to own property, these systems were actually stagnating development and furthering poverty and hardship. Although I still believe that the initial objective was right, I have come to see the flaws in such a system. It was not initially obvious to me that the abolition of private ownership would lead to ownership by the state, with a party elite in charge who would then institute their own restrictive command-and-control system and rule as an elite, like the aristocracies in the past. Of course, we now know this led to many human rights abuses.

It is through this process of listening and observing that I have come to put my faith in the free-market system. Although it has great potential for abuses as well, the fact that it allows for freedom and diversity of thought and religion has convinced me that it is the one we should be working from. Of course, I still believe we should strive for an adequate standard of living for all rather than the “survival of the fittest” position that the free market often follows. The recent developments in China demonstrate how even small movements toward a free-market system can boost economic development and help lift people out of poverty. But of course, in the case of China there is still much work to be done.

Adam Smith refers to the development of moral sense as imagining oneself in the position of others. That is what we refer to as “exchanging self for others.” Unfortunately, Adam Smith did not stress sufficiently the need of people to train in imagining themselves in the position of others. Even though he had a keen interest in and insight into moral issues, Smith believed that competition and regulation could lead to prosperity for all. But I believe that Right View and Right Conduct are also necessary. Without considering the impact of one's decisions on others, it is not possible for regulation and competition alone to result in a decent standard of living for all. Adam Smith and other economists have concerned themselves with the generation of wealth, but they do not provide any guidance on the distribution of wealth. Karl Marx, on the other hand, looked at this the other way around. He was only interested in the distribution of wealth, not in how to generate it. In my view, both the proper creation of wealth and the proper distribution of it are very important. In order to reach such goals, one requires the right policies and the application of Right View and Right Conduct. All human beings, whatever their cultural or historical background, suffer when they are intimidated, imprisoned, or tortured. It is not enough to define human rights as the United Nations has done; they must also be implemented. Rights depend on responsible action. This is why I put so much emphasis on the word "responsible" when I advocate responsible free-market economy.

Even though Adam Smith was concerned with the moral dimensions of the economic system, many of his successors ignored that aspect. I consider an economic system without a moral dimension to be dangerous. That is why I want to add the dimension of "responsibility" to "free market." I agree with the concept of freedom advocated by Smith and Hayek but feel it does not take us far enough.

Globalization is a positive development as long as leaders of global corporations act responsibly and develop a holistic view of their role in society. And since organizations are also dependent on governments to act in a responsible manner, businesses should work constructively with governments to achieve a responsible free-market economy and reject an economic system without moral values.

Capital is a means, not an end. The end is freedom and prosperity for all. This can best be reached by a free-market system in which all participants act responsibly. In my way of thinking, integrating capitalism and Buddhism happens when Right View and Right Conduct become an integral part of the economic system. I see the word "responsible" in this context as standing for Right View and Right Conduct and therefore hope that the words "responsible free-market economy" will come to replace the words "capitalist system."

Malcolm wrote:

The Leader's Way: The Art of Making the Right Decisions in Our Careers, Our Companies, and the World at Large. Crown Publishing Group. Kindle Edition.

HHDL say many more things, and his position is more nuanced than the citations I have posted might lead one to believe. But it quite clear he has abandoned his "Marxism" in favor of a free market style political economy.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 20th, 2014 at 1:49 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

Z.L.

I'm not sure about this 'Dharma is eternal law' statement....

Is anything eternal?

And by Dharma, do we mean precepts? The Vinaya?

In what sense are you using the term Dharma? How are you defining it? Can it be defined?

What exactly is it that you say is eternal?

Malcolm wrote:

Dharma is definitely "eternal" in that the principles of karma, dependent origination, emptiness and buddhanature always apply to all sentient beings in every possible universe.

When a Buddha awakens, he always awakens to these four principles.

It does not mean that Shakyamuni's dispensation is eternal; on the contrary, it is impermanent and will disappear some three thousand years hence.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 20th, 2014 at 1:29 AM

Title: Re: What tibetan buddhist traditions these people belong?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

His activities as a tertön were compassionate, but not the basis of his own personal awakening, ironically, despite his importance in Dzogchen lineages.

theanarchist said:

Erm, according to the Nyingma records his predecessor achieved realisation before there even was even a Sakya school in Tibet....

Malcolm wrote:

I recounted a list of his incarnations above, as recorded by Kongtrul. I recounted the account of his personal awakening, as recounted by Ju Mipham. You cannot get much more authoritative than that.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 20th, 2014 at 1:26 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

And let's not forget Leo Tolstoy. L.N.Tolstoy.jpg

"His literal interpretation of the ethical teachings of Jesus, centering on the Sermon on the Mount, caused him in later life to become a fervent Christian anarchist and anarcho-pacifist. His ideas on nonviolent resistance, expressed in such works as The Kingdom of God Is Within You, were to have a profound impact on such pivotal twentieth-century figures as Mohandas Gandhi and Martin Luther King, Jr."

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Leo\_Tolstoy

Malcolm wrote:

This kind of anarchist may not recognize any political authority, but they nevertheless live in a political world. From my point of view, they are basically utopians. They may be admirable, indeed, but they are not important for their political voice, they are important for their philosophical voice, much in the same way that deep ecology/ecosophy is important as an environmental philosophy but not important as a political or social movement (much to the dissatisfaction of other environmental philosophers who come mainly from the left, like Bookchin and so on,)

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 20th, 2014 at 1:18 AM

Title: Re: What tibetan buddhist traditions these people belong?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

If this does not define Kyentse Wangpo as Sakyapa, I don't know what else would.

mutsuk said:

Oh, he is indeed a Sakyapa. His non-sectarian approach was such that he also received numerous Bonpo transmissions and wrote a biography of Guru Rinpoche in the mode of the Bon-gsar tradition (together with his Bonpo tertön name, etc.). He was also a great fan of Dechen Lingpa's Collected Works and urged him to reveal several important termas. He also financed (at a time when it would mean cutting a whole forest to print xylographic works) Dechen Lingpa's collected Termas in 13 volumes which are all Bon-gsar. Khyentse was indeed an amazing individual.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, and if anyone doubts the profundity and blessings of the teachings of the Sakya school, they should take a lesson from this, since Kongtrul considered Khyentse Wangpo to be a person who had achieved total Buddhahood.

His activities as a tertön were compassionate, but not the basis of his own personal awakening, ironically, despite his importance in Dzogchen lineages.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, February 19th, 2014 at 11:41 PM

Title: Re: What tibetan buddhist traditions these people belong?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

To further illustrate my point about Khyentse Wangpo being a Sakyapa. In his short verse biography of Khyenste Wangpo, Mipham writes:

His own awakening was in all the intimate instructions and textual systems of the sublime discourses of the five founders, and the father and sons of Ngor, Gongkar and Tshar.

If this does not define Kyentse Wangpo as Sakyapa, I don't know what else would.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, February 19th, 2014 at 10:29 PM

Title: Re: What tibetan buddhist traditions these people belong?

Content:

michaelb said:

Jamyang Khyentse was also the mind incarnation of Jigme Lingpa Khyentse Ozer.
Dzongsar is, of course, a Sakya gumpa.

Malcolm wrote:

And the incarnation of several past Sakya masters, such as Jetsun Dragpa Gyaltsen, Lodro Gyaltsan, Khyenrab Je of Shwalu, Khyentse Wangchuk, the main disciple of Tsarchen, as well as Jampa Namkhai Chime, the 44th throne holder of Ngor and a younger contemporary of Jigme Lingpa.

Not to mention, Manushrimitra, Trisrong Detsen, Longchenpa, Gendun Drup, the "second Dalai Lama", Thangthong Gyalpo as well as Jigme Lingpa.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, February 19th, 2014 at 10:13 PM

Title: Re: What tibetan buddhist traditions these people belong?

Content:

fabrc said:

I would like to know what tibetan buddhist traditions Alan Wallace and Matthieu Ricard belong?

Thanks!

theanarchist said:

Mathieu Ricard is a disciple of Dilgo Khyentse Rinpoche. So Nyingma.

pensum said:

His main teacher however was Dilgo Khyentse Rinpoche who as an incarnation of Jamyang Khyenste Chokyi Lodro is formally Sakya...

Malcolm wrote:

You mean incarnation of Khyentse Wangpo, who, while being nonsectarian, was definitely Sakyapa, a member of the Ngor school, traditionally patronized by the King of Derge. The Derge region of Kham may have been a hotbed of Nyingma activity, but it's spine is Sakya through and through.

theanarchist said:

Haha, Khyentse Wangpo was a terton and all terton are incarnations of the disciples of Guru Rinpoche and the terma are the teachings of Guru Rinpoche. You can't become more Nyingma than that, even if you also additionally hold a sarma tradition..

Malcolm wrote:

Khyentse Wangpo is most definitely a Sakyapa, there is really no doubt about it. His main practice was Hevajra from the Lamdre. The vast majority of his work involved collating all the Sakyapa teachings in to two collections, the rgyud sde kun 'dus and the sgrub thabs kun 'dus. He was a member of the Ngor subschool of Sakya.

If you examine his education, training and practice, you will discover that he grew out of the Sakya school. All his main tutors were Sakyapas such as the Thartse Khenchen, and so on. His monastery is and remains a Sakya monastery. For example he received his name and later his monastic vows from the latter master.

While it is true that he was an very important terton, the emanations of Guru Rinpoche's disciples is not confined to one school, be it Nyingma (which is really just a gsar ma school too), Sakya, Gelug or the many branches of Kagyu. Emanations of Guru Rinpoche and his disciples are considered to have appeared in all of these schools.

In the end, we must conclude that Khyentse Wangpo was a Sakya pa, as any measure of his literary output will definitely show.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, February 19th, 2014 at 8:12 PM

Title: Re: What tibetan buddhist traditions these people belong?

Content:

pensum said:

His main teacher however was Dilgo Khyentse Rinpoche who as an incarnation of Jamyang Khyenste Chokyi Lodro is formally Sakya...

Malcolm wrote:

You mean incarnation of Khyentse Wangpo, who, while being nonsectarian, was definitely Sakyapa, a member of the Ngor school, traditionally patronized by the King of Derge. The Derge region of Kham may have been a hotbed of Nyingma activity, but it's spine is Sakya through and through.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, February 19th, 2014 at 6:21 AM

Title: Re: Water bowls...?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

In any case, the point is that any offerings apart from a ganapuja should be discarded in a clean place, and not reserved for personal consumption.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, February 19th, 2014 at 3:58 AM

Title: Re: Śākyamuni's non-Indo-European heritage.

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The Upanishad as well as the Vedas clearly uphold kingship as the ideal.

Zhen Li said:

The ideal for kings is dandaniti. That doesn't mean they view kingship as superior in authority to that of brahmins. Actually in practice most kings didn't really use brahmins in the ideal manner, they'd have them at court for legitimation, not for instruction in Dharma. Buddhism holds that the Brahmin can only exist in society once the king has ordered it, whereas the Brahmanical texts hold that the Brahmin was established as supreme being born from the head of Brahma, a view the Buddhists refute.

Malcolm wrote:

It is clearly states in the early Upanishads that only the ksatriyas knew the meaning of the Vedas, of which Brahmins were ignorant.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, February 19th, 2014 at 2:56 AM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

I think I've figured it out! Arguing about Dzogchen IS the meaning of life.

Malcolm wrote:

NOW it all makes sense.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, February 19th, 2014 at 2:26 AM

Title: Re: Water bowls...?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Cretan.

Sherab Dorje said:

<https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Lesbos>, actually!

Malcolm wrote:

Howard Sterns would love it.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, February 19th, 2014 at 2:09 AM

Title: Re: Water bowls...?

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

]After they had finished? Can't see why I shouldn't/wouldn't!

Malcolm wrote:

Barbarian.

Sherab Dorje said:

"Barbarian" is a Greek term:

"The term originates from the Greek word βάρβαρος (barbaros). Hence the Greek idiom "πᾶς μὴ Ἑλλήν βάρβαρος" (pas mē Hellēn barbaros) which literally means "whoever is not Greek is a barbarian"." So it seems that the shoe fits the other foot!

Malcolm wrote:

Cretan.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, February 19th, 2014 at 2:01 AM

Title: Re: Water bowls...?

Content:

Terma said:

does it really matter what we we do with it when it is time to get rid of it?

Terma

Malcolm wrote:

Would you eat the food off the plate or drink out of the cup of an honored guest? If no, then you have your answer.

Sherab Dorje said:

After they had finished? Can't see why I shouldn't/wouldn't!

Malcolm wrote:
Barbarian.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, February 19th, 2014 at 1:32 AM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

conebeckham said:

This, and the extensive Dzogchen discussion, really are tangential to the thread, though, I think.....

Malcolm wrote:

People always want to argue with me about Dzogchen no matter what thread I am in and no matter what I say.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, February 19th, 2014 at 1:31 AM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

ok, so then he's presenting the exact same view as all the Tantras and commentaries?

Malcolm wrote:

As the son of the Zhang ston Tashi Dorje, the tertön who revealed the Vima Nyinthig, I doubt his authority can be questioned.

His book, the eleven topics of Dzogchen, is the basis of Longchenpa's larger work, from which Longchenpa pinches entire passages without attribution. I know this because while I translating the GZ recension of this work, I read it carefully side by side the Tshig Don mDzod.

So, I think it is safe to say that if Nyibum is the main lineage holder of Nyinthig (he is) after his father, his views ought to have considerable weight.

smcj said:

Dudjom R. subscribed to the "Great Madhyamaka"/empty-of-other view. As the nominal "head of the Nyingma Lineage" in the 2nd half of the 20th century his views ought to have considerable weight also.

Malcolm wrote:

As I explained to you before, all schools consider their Madhyamaka "great", so that is just a sectarian jibe. Having said that, yes Dudjom R was indeed a proponent of gzhan stong following Kongtrul. On the other hand, Khenpo Zhanga, one of most influential commentators on these topics and the author of the 13 texts system of education at Dzogchen Monastery and so on, was definitely not a gzhan stong pa, nor for that matter was Mipham.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, February 19th, 2014 at 1:28 AM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

ok, so then he's presenting the exact same view as all the Tantras and commentaries?

Malcolm wrote:

As the son of the Zhang ston Tashi Dorje, the tertön who revealed the Vima Nyinthig, I doubt his authority can be questioned.

His book, the eleven topics of Dzogchen, is the basis of Longchenpa's larger work, from which Longchenpa pinches entire passages without attribution. I know this because while I translating the GZ recension of this work, I read it carefully side by side the Tshig Don mDzod.

So, I think it is safe to say that if Nyibum is the main lineage holder of Nyinthig (he is) after his father, his views ought to have considerable weight.

gad rgyangs said:

so I assume he's upholding the views of all the main Dzogchen Tantras?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes. Longchenpa's book TDD, uses virtually all of the same citations Nyibum presents, but also many more, as well since the former's is three times as long (mostly citations, not so much longer in terms of actual explanations).

So here, you see in one place, Nyibum states the basis is unfabricated mind, in another place, he states the definitive view about that basis is ka dag.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, February 19th, 2014 at 1:19 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

It sure took a lot of money for this dude to appear on Ted talk.

Sherab Dorje said:
Funny that, given we live in a capitalist system.

Malcolm wrote:
You will never escape the markets greg, not in your lifetime.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Wednesday, February 19th, 2014 at 1:17 AM
Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless
Content:

gad rgyangs said:
ok, so then he's presenting the exact same view as all the Tantras and commentaries?

Malcolm wrote:
As the son of the Zhang ston Tashi Dorje, the tertön who revealed the Vima Nyinthig, I doubt his authority can be questioned.

His book, the eleven topics of Dzogchen, is the basis of Longchenpa's larger work, from which Longchenpa pinches entire passages without attribution. I know this because while I translating the GZ recension of this work, I read it carefully side by side the Tshig Don mDzod.

So, I think it is safe to say that if Nyibum is the main lineage holder of Nyinthig (he is) after his father, his views ought to have considerable weight.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Wednesday, February 19th, 2014 at 1:13 AM
Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless
Content:

smcj said:
Isn't the definitive view of Karma Kagyu the view of Mahamudra?
Mahamudra is a practice. Shentong is a view.

BTW I know of western Mahamudra practitioners that have never studied Madhyamaka or Shentong. Mahamudra is something you do, not just think or talk about.

Malcolm wrote:
Mahāmudra has a view (ground mahāmudra), it has a path (path mahāmudra) and it has a result (result mahāmudra).

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, February 19th, 2014 at 1:11 AM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Nyibum who is an authority on this subject, could not be clearer. The basis is just one's unfabricated mind.

gad rgyangs said:

Either Nyibum is saying the same thing as all the thousands of Dzogchen Tantras and commentaries, or he is contradicting them. If he's saying the same thing, then what's the controversy? If he's contradicting them, then trying to uphold the eccentric view of one dude against the entire tradition is a little crazy.

Malcolm wrote:

I doubt you can consider Nyibums view eccentric in the least, as he is one of the most important Nyinthig lineage masters, his book, from which this quote was drawn, was repurposed word for word into a treasure revelation that forms a major text in the Gongpa Zangthal cycle. In the Gongpa Zangthal, this work is presented as the work of Vimalamitra, not Nyibum.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, February 19th, 2014 at 1:01 AM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

3) the appearances of the basis consist of all phenomena of samsara and nirvana, including "sentient beings" and their "minds":

Malcolm wrote:

"All phenomena" simply means one skandha, one āyatana and one dhātu e.g. rūpaskandha, mano-āyatana and the dharmadhātu.

And as I pointed, even the container universe arises from consciousnesses according to Buddhism through their collective activity. Dzogchen is just another way of describing this insight which is found even in Abhidharma (of which Dzogchen is a self-described part).

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, February 19th, 2014 at 12:57 AM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

3) the appearances of the basis consist of all phenomena of samsara and nirvana, including "sentient beings" and their "minds":

Malcolm wrote:

The tantra is describing the basis in abstract general terms, not as an instantiated entity which has a function. Therefore, the basis is not transpersonal in manner in which you have previously suggested.

gad rgyangs said:

The "Illuminating Lamp" says:

"From within this indeterminate spontaneous presence
There is a manifestation-process of varied plurality,
And its unceasing play accomplishes everything and anything,
As it shines forth everywhere in any way;
In its indeterminacy, there is a plurality of appearances" so yes, the basis of the mind of a sentient being is the same basis as the basis of all phenomena of samsara and nirvana: the basis beyond all words and categories.

Malcolm wrote:

Nyibum who is an authority on this subject, could not be clearer. The basis is just one's unfabricated mind. That is the basis for all samsara and nirvana. In Sakya it is called the all-basis cause continuum, in Kagyu, ground mahāmudra, in Gelug, the mind of clear light and in Jonang, tathāgatagarbha.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, February 19th, 2014 at 12:51 AM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

smcj said:

the basis" is not simply your own mind (which would be what is usually called a Yogacaran interpretation)

Malcolm wrote:

=

It is called Wisdom (Skt.: jnana) and also the dharmata. It is the essential reality of all things. It is said to be truly existent and not self-empty. As such it offends the sensibilities of people that get hysterical when the specter of brahman shows itself. As I already pointed out, wisdom is a noetic quality. It cannot be a noetic quality separate from our mind. It cannot be a singular noetic quality pervading all minds.

When the "mind" is completely purified of all taints, it is called "wisdom" (jñāna) When it is with taints it is called consciousness (vijñāna).

If we follow what you are saying, there is no hope at all of finding Buddhahood within our own minds, since buddhahood and wisdom would be extraneous to our continuums. If we are to find buddhahood within our own minds, as hundreds of texts recommend, then we have to discover that buddhahood in the essence of our own minds. That is not transpersonal.

Even gzhan stong does not presuppose a brahman like entity. They are merely stating that the three kāyas are the inherent in the nature of the mind. For example, Dolbupa, arguable the founder of gshan stong terms the tathāgatagarbhe the ālaya, the all-basis. He says too, [Hopkins, 2006, pg. 65] "Similarly the Glorious Hevajra Tantra also says that the natural clear light mind that resides in all sentient beings is buddha..." And on page 106 he says "

...Bhavya's "Lamp for (Nāgārjuna's) Wisdom" if the middle way:
It consciousness,
clear light, nirvana,
All-emptiness, and body of attributes.

[The term] "consciousness" on this occasion is in consideration of the consciousness of the noumenon and pure consciousness because it is used as a synonym for the clearly body of attributes."

On 120 he says:

If the matrix-of-the-one-gone-bliss did not exist in fact, it would incur the irreversible fallacy of contradicting the statement in the Descent to Lankā Sūtra that the mind beyond logic, the essence of the ultimate 12 grounds, natural clear light, buddha-matrix, natural virtue, basis free from all positions, final source of refuge, and exalted buddha wisdom is the matrix-of-one-gone-bliss.

So you can see, the term below "one's unfabricated mind" has exactly the same meaning and for this reason I maintain that the view of the basis proposed in Sakya, Kagyu, Gelug, Nyingma and Jonang are the same, even though they describe it differently, from different angles and with different terminology. The meaning and the subject of discussion however is the same.

As such, because the basis, one's unfabricated mind, arose as the essence of the sole reality, there is no need to search elsewhere for the place etc., i.e. it is called self-originated wisdom.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, February 18th, 2014 at 11:50 PM

Title: Re: Water bowls...?

Content:

Terma said:

does it really matter what we we do with it when it is time to get rid of it?

Terma

Malcolm wrote:

Would you eat the food off the plate or drink out of the cup of an honored guest? If no, then you have your answer.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, February 18th, 2014 at 9:29 PM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

smcj said:

the basis" is not simply your own mind (which would be what is usually called a Yogacaran interpretation)

Malcolm wrote:

The ālaya cause continuum (Sakya), the fundamental mind of luminosity (Gelug), "ground mahāmudra" (Kagyu) or the "basis" (Nyingma) all refer to the same thing, i.e., one's unfabricated mind. There is no contradiction between these positions and a position that holds that the basis is tathāgatagarbha. All of these are merely different ways of discussing tathāgatagarbha.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, February 18th, 2014 at 9:08 PM

Title: Re: short term monastic ordination in india ?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The best place to do retreat is in Western Europe or North America.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, February 18th, 2014 at 8:33 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

```
if (typeof bbmedia == 'undefined') { bbmedia = true; var e = document.createElement('script'); e.async = true; e.src = 'bbmedia.js'; var s = document.getElementsByTagName('script')[0]; s.parentNode.insertBefore(e, s); } https://phpbbex.com/ [video]
```

Malcolm wrote:

It sure took a lot of money for this dude to appear on Ted talk.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, February 18th, 2014 at 8:16 PM

Title: Re: Śākyamuni's non-Indo-European heritage.

Content:

Zhen Li said:

than the Vedic/Upanisadic model, which is actually pretty deviant from the norm of human societies. Buddhist rajas are just regular rajas.

Malcolm wrote:

The Upanishad as well as the Vedas clearly uphold kingship as the ideal.

See Dumezil.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, February 18th, 2014 at 8:06 PM

Title: Re: Water bowls...?

Content:

DiamondSutra said:

What do you think of drinking the water from water bowls?

Way better to put it outside in plants?

We eat the fruit after it's been offered, so why not the water too?

Ok to drink or not?

Malcolm wrote:

It is generally considered that you should discard it in a clean, unpolluted place. Also, you can water your plants with it.

In general, the fruit/food offerings should also be discarded in a the same kind of place.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, February 18th, 2014 at 7:05 AM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

if, instead of a basis as abgrund for all phenomena, you want to locate it in individual sentient beings' minds, then you a starting with a multiplicity. You are kind of saying that there is nothing that unifies all the sentient beings, each one is an island, self-contained with its own basis forever independent from the bases of all other sentient beings. At best this is substance svabhava, at worst it is simply crypto-materialism with minds as atoms.

Malcolm wrote:

If you say something unifies sentient beings, you're right back at a field theory.

gad rgyangs said:

as I said before you are positing sentient beings, but upon what?

Malcolm wrote:

Convention, what else?

gad rgyangs said:

you said "ka dag or emptiness" but either A) emptiness is a non-affirming negative, in which case you cannot posit consciousnesses on it or B) it is not a non-affirming negative, but it is a quality/nature, along with lhun sgrub and thugs je, describing the basis of all phenomena including, but not limited to, the minds of sentient beings.

Malcolm wrote:

Kadag is the emptiness of consciousness. It may be the emptiness of everything else as well, but given that all the elements which make up the universe and sentient beings arise from collective consciousnesses of sentient beings, there is not much point in talking about their emptiness. It is axiomatic that they are empty because they are established as mind.

The Introduction Tantra states Since all appearances are introduced as mind, gain mastery over the mind.

Since the mind essence was introduced as emptiness, emptiness is sealed by bliss. Since emptiness was introduced as vidyā, vidyā itself is the non-duality of the dhātu and wisdom.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, February 18th, 2014 at 3:07 AM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The reason people see the five lights everywhere they look

ConradTree said:

Stop right there. No need to go further.

This indicates the basis is the 5 lights.

checkmate.

Old Malcolm wins over new Malcolm.

Malcolm wrote:

The basis is not the five lights. The five lights are expressions of wisdom.

Those all just exist in one's mind, as Shabkar point out.

The basis is not something separate from you the person, and it is not some uniform transpersonal field. It is just your own mind and it's essence.

By the way I never thought the basis was a transpersonal field. But have become aware that many people interpret it as such, and therefore, I'm writing to correct this misapprehension.

In other words, Dzogchen teachings about the basis are actually "disappointingly" Buddhist and not so radical after all.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, February 18th, 2014 at 2:37 AM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

OK, thanks for the clarification. This is something I've been wondering about for a while. The specific reason I'm asking is because I'm reading "Treasury of Precious Qualities, Book Two", and in the translator's introduction they kind of make a big deal out of how to translate 'thugs rje' in this context. If you use Amazon's look inside feature here : <https://www.amazon.com/Treasury-Precious-Qualities-Book-Two/dp/1611800455> and look for the 'the third term' you can see what I'm referring to, on page xxviii. In that book they translate it as 'cognitive potency'.

pensum said:

I noticed their insistence on this point as well. However thugs rje is clearly the Tibetan translation of karuna as clearly stated by Mipham and many others. However in the context of Dzogchen, "compassion" takes on a subtle meaning, in that it refers to expressibility or the ability to manifest or appear. Tulku Ugyen explained it thus "Rigpa has a certain thugs rje. Thugs rje refers to the venue or the unobstructed medium for experience." Based on such explanations, one can readily see why Erik Pema Kunsang has opted to translate it as "capacity" rather than "compassion."

Malcolm wrote:

Nevertheless, the word primarily refers to how the nirmanakāya functions, hence "compassion".

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, February 18th, 2014 at 2:32 AM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

ConradTree said:

Someone who finishes the dzogchen menngagde practices, sees the 5 lights everywhere they look.

Not pristine unfabricated mind.

Malcolm wrote:

They are the same thing.

And no, I was slightly mistaken before.

The reason people see the five lights everywhere they look is that they no longer have traces to reify the five elements as the five elements because their consciousness has become free of all traces of the two obscurations, i.e. with those removed, what remains is wisdom.

Of course, there is nothing substantial that is ever removed, from such a mind.

Then we gave this from the Rig pa rang shar:

Son of a good family, one must recognize the awareness [shes pa] free from grasping as one's own state.

Or the Rang grol:

A vidyā that performs actions does not exist in the essence of pure awareness.

Or the Mind Mirror of Samantabhadra has an interlinear note:

The nature of one's vidyā is light. Since kāyas are the gathered in the sphere of wisdom, the meaning of the view of Samantabhadra is realized. Further, there is vidyā and the wisdom that arises from vidyā. Further, vidyā that is free from extremes and beyond multiplicity does not transcend awareness (shes pa) and knowing (rig), endowed with a core of empty wisdom free from the extremes of things.

The Sun and Moon Tantra states:

At that time, that fortunate one when the appearances are self-evident, the non-abiding awareness is called “natural”.

Anyway, there are too many references in various Dzogchen texts which state quite clearly that the basis is just one's mind. This is consistent with Buddhadharma. Other explanations are not.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, February 18th, 2014 at 2:25 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

It sounds sometimes as if I am being accused of putting socialism in place of Buddhism, or accused of saying they are the same thing.

Malcolm wrote:

I don't think you ever said any such thing. But I think you know Marxism better than you know Buddhism. And that is sad.

tellyontellyon said:

it is a question of whether Marxism is better than capitalism.

Malcolm wrote:

I see no evidence that it is.

tellyontellyon said:

Capitalism is a rampantly exploitative and violent system. Capitalists are most certainly not pacifists; it is a system that demands expansion and competition and leads inexorably to violence.

Malcolm wrote:

Every marxist revolution has ended in slaughter and terror. The fact is that market economies function best when there is an absence of political and military conflict. The market therefore, has a vested interest in peace and social stability.

tellyontellyon said:

I think Marx's analysis of capitalism is correct, and the chance of a peaceful transition is far more possible in the modern day. Even in the 19th century Marx saw some possibility of a peaceful transformation in the advanced countries. That possibility is much greater now.

Malcolm wrote:

I don't believe it, I think it is a utopian pipe dream.

tellyontellyon said:

But if you accept Marx's view that capitalism by its very nature deprives people of their humanity and essentially robs them by forcing them to give up their labour below its true value, then you will accept there are consequences for allowing this system to continue.

Malcolm wrote:

I don't agree with any of these claims.

tellyontellyon said:

I say what we need is a little less sanctimonious preaching to the poor that they need to be more 'moral'; and a little more genuine moral behaviour: actually stepping outside of our golden palaces and actually doing something of benefit.

Malcolm wrote:

Buddhism is non-evangelical. But if someone asks me, despite their best efforts to get ahead, what they need to do, and they want a Buddhist answer, I will give it to them: generate more merit. It may not ripen in this lifetime, but it will certainly ripen in future lives.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, February 18th, 2014 at 2:24 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

It sounds sometimes as if I am being accused of putting socialism in place of Buddhism, or accused of saying they are the same thing.

I am not.

Marxists don't claim to be pacifists, though I believe it is possible for a socialist transformation of society to come about peacefully and support such a peaceful transition.

The question isn't whether Marxism is better than Buddhism.... it is a question of whether Marxism is better than capitalism.

Malcolm wrote:

I see no evidence that it is.

tellyontellyon said:

Capitalism is a rampantly exploitative and violent system. Capitalists are most certainly not pacifists; it is a system that demands expansion and competition and leads inexorably to violence.

Malcolm wrote:

Every marxist revolution has ended in slaughter and terror.

tellyontellyon said:

I think Marx's analysis of capitalism is correct, and the chance of a peaceful transition is far more possible in the modern day. Even in the 19th century Marx saw some possibility of a peaceful transformation in the advanced countries. That possibility is much greater now.

Malcolm wrote:

I don't believe it, I think it is a utopian pipe dream.

tellyontellyon said:

But if you accept Marx's view that capitalism by it's very nature deprives people of their humanity and essentially robs them by forcing them to give up their labour below its true value, then you will accept there are consequences for allowing this system to continue.

Malcolm wrote:

I don't agree with any of these claims.

tellyontellyon said:

I say what we need is a little less sanctimonious preaching to the poor that they need to be more 'moral'; and a little more genuine moral behaviour: actually stepping outside of our golden palaces and actually doing something of benefit.

Malcolm wrote:

Buddhism is non-evangelical. But if someone asks me why, despite their best efforts to get ahead, what they need to do, and they want a Buddhist answer, I will give it to them: generate more merit. It may not ripen in this lifetime, but it will certainly ripen in future lives.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, February 18th, 2014 at 1:41 AM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

ka dag = śuddha

lhun grub =anābhoga/nirābhoga

thugs rje = karuna.

dzogchungpa said:

OK, then why do 'karuna' and 'abheda' have the same meaning here, if that is what you are saying?

Malcolm wrote:

No, thugs rjes is often defined as the inseparability of ka dag and lhun grub.

Ngo bo/svabhāva, i.e. emptiness is the characteristic of ka dag/śuddha

Rang bzhin/prakṛti, i.e. clarity, is the characteristic of lhun grub/ anābhoga

Thugs rjes/karuna, i.e. compassion, is the characteristic inseparability/abheda of the former pair.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, February 18th, 2014 at 1:04 AM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

May I ask what Indic term corresponds to compassion in this case?

Malcolm wrote:

Abheda.

dzogchungpa said:

OK, but why would that correspond to 'thugs rje'?

Malcolm wrote:

ka dag = śuddha

lhun grub = anābhoga/nirābhoga

thugs rje = karuna.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, February 18th, 2014 at 12:12 AM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

[Instead, I think B2 is the more proper understanding, based for example on Nyibum's remark that the basis is one's unfabricated mind. This is an authoritative citation that must be addressed and heeded. For example, the Mind Mirror of Vajrasattva states:

M

ConradTree said:

You have previously argued the basis of Dzogchen is not even the unfabricated mind:

<https://www.dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=100&t=6459&hilit=basis+Mahamudra#p76393>

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, and I was also wrong.

But as pointed out in these same texts, the basis is not merely emptiness. It also has "wisdom" (ye shes), which is a kind of shes pa or sems, a primordial or pristine consciousness, as opposed to a rnam shes, an aspected consciousness that possesses concepts.

Yes this is called Advaita Vedanta.

No, since this ye shes is personal, never transpersonal, and at the time of the basis, is merely describing the mind (shes pa, sems) in a pre-afflictive state.

In Dzogchen texts we see an analogous sequence: wisdom --> blue light --> green light --> red light --> white light -- yellow light; which when reified becomes the standard Buddhist sequence above. The only difference between the two sequences is that the former sequence occurs when the latter sequence is not recognized for being what it is, the display of a given being's own noetic capacity.

If you are defining wisdom as pristine consciousness, then this a slight twist on Advaita Vedanta.

Tibetans translate jñāna as ye shes. That term "ye shes" is frequently translated as "pristine awareness" or "primordial wisdom", etc. I am saying that Dzogchen authors take this term very literally (a literalism criticized by people like Sakya Pandita) because they are taking this mode of shes pa (jñatā, jñānatā, parijñāna, etc.), which they describe as ye shes to mean that the original state (ye nas) of the mind (shes pa) is pre-afflictive, and Dzogchen is the path to recover that primordial state.

I am not saying that this consciousness is a universal plenum, like brahman, from which all beings arise; that is exactly the mistake I think most people fall into when studying Dzogchen, i.e. they wind up falling into an unintentional brahman trap.

Thus what I am saying is the basis is personal, not universal. Each's being has their own basis since they each have their own mind, the characteristics of the basis (essence, nature and compassion) are general, and apply to all minds, just as all candles on a table are separate and unique, but all flames on those candles bear the same qualities, heat and light.

The fault that I suffered from was not seeing the fact that "rnam shes" (vijñāna), "shes rab" (prajñā), "ye shes" (jñāna), "shes pa" (jñatā) are all talking about one thing, different modalities of a single continuum from sentient being hood to Buddhahood, based on language in man ngag sde texts, reinforced very strongly by Longchenpa, which make a very hard distinction between sems (citta) and yeshe (jñāna) without recognizing the distinction is not in substance, but merely in mode i.e. afflicted/non-afflicted.

Let me add, that the way I see it now is that "rnam shes", consciousness, refers to the afflicted mind, "ye shes" refers to the unafflicted mind; and "shes pa" refers to a mind which is neutral, that can go either way depending on whether it is under the influence of vidyā or avidyā.

Really, I am not saying anything that is terribly controversial. I am recognizing that I was misled by a distinction made by Longchenpa and others who, for didactic reasons, make a hard distinction between mind/consciousness and wisdom when what they are really doing is making a hard distinction between utterly afflicted minds and utterly pure minds, and providing a literary mythology (the universe arises out of the basis) to explain the separation of sentient beings and buddhas.

I have similarly come to the conclusion that the account of the basis arising out of the basis and the separation of samsara and nirvana at some imagined start point unimaginable eons ago is just a literary myth, and it does not need to be taken literally.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, February 17th, 2014 at 11:00 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

As far as I can see, Capitalism, a term invented by Marx, is here to stay.

Sherab Dorje said:

Nothing is here to stay. As I said earlier: the longest running political/social entity (the Byzantine Empire) only lasted a thousand years.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, and in Marxists terms it also had primitive accumulations of capital, and its primitive accumulations of capital were in turn taken over from Rome, etc., etc.

People and states have always accumulated capital and they always will, markets being markets. Governments have primarily existed for two reasons, to protect citizens and to stabilize markets, and they always will.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, February 17th, 2014 at 10:53 PM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

B1, the basis as a transpersonal field out of which everything in samsara and nirvana is instantiated through its non-recognition.

gad rgyangs said:

the basis is not a field. its not an any-thing.

Malcolm wrote:

This is a faulty presentation of the basis, one of the six faulty positions about the basis described in the Six Dimensions of Samantabhadra Tantra, as well as others.

gad rgyangs said:

thats why it cannot contain traces, it would have to be some kind of existent locus for that.

Malcolm wrote:

Wisdom is suitable as a basis for traces, or so the Dzogchen texts tell us.

gad rgyangs said:

Even discussing wisdom as a the basis, even a nonsubstantiated basis as in Dzogchen does not make sense if that wisdom is not describing a noetic entity.

then what is that wisdom?

Malcolm wrote:

A mind lacking fabrications.

gad rgyangs said:

the basis is just the way a sentient being's consciousness [ shes pa rather than rnam par shes pa ] or mind [ sems, citta ] is talked about in Dzogchen texts prior to being afflicted for all the reasons I mentioned earlier.

ok, then whats the basis of that consciousness?

Malcolm wrote:

Ka dag or emptiness, the correct description of the basis according the the man ngag sde texts. But as pointed out in these same texts, the basis is not merely emptiness. It also has "wisdom" (ye shes), which is a kind of shes pa or sems, a primordial or pristine consciousness, as opposed to a rnam shes, an aspected consciousness that possesses concepts.

Basically, even though Dzogchen texts describe such a "beginning time", I personally don't believe that there is a start point ever. The description of such a start point is merely a literary device, much as Samantabhadra is a literary device.

The five elements are also included in wisdom, etc., so there is no contradiction between saying that the basis is wisdom, and the basis is empty. The problem comes only if one imagines that basis is somehow a unitary entity, a fabric, which provides the basis for the arising of sentient beings and buddhas on an objective level. But if, as I have come to understand, it is not referring to an objective entity or context, then the basis is easily described as a a set of general features which every noetic entity that we call "buddhas" or "sentient being" shares in common as an idealized "initial" set of conditions. The only difference between buddhas and sentient beings then is the extent to which they recognize this set of general features within their own continuums. Hence in this respect the so called original general basis merely describes an abstract set of qualities, but is not itself an instantiation of those qualities in any way. Those qualities are only instantiated in a sattva, a being. In this way the basis is not one, because it is instantiated individually; it is not many because it is a uniform set of qualities that are being instantiated across all beings.

This way, the general Buddhist dictum which extends all the way down to Vasubandhu's Kośabhaṣ (and clearly the authors of the Dzogchen tantras were familiar with it because they use the Kośa cosmology in such tantras as the Rigpa Rangshar), matter arises from mind/s. I.e. the order of the arising of matter presented in virtually all buddhist texts is:

Consciousness --> space --> air --> fire --> water --> earth.

In Dzogchen texts we see an analogous sequence: wisdom --> blue light --> green light --> red light --> white light -- yellow light; which when reified becomes the standard Buddhist sequence above. The only difference between the two sequences is that the former sequence occurs when the latter sequence is not recognized for being what it is, the display of a given being's own noetic capacity.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, February 17th, 2014 at 10:01 PM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Defining the basis as a sort of fabric out of which appearances arise does not solve the problem of individuated consciousnesses.

dzogchungpa said:

Honestly, does anything?

Malcolm wrote:

What is the basis in fact? The Dzogchen tantras describe this as "wisdom". This wisdom is said to have three aspects [rnam pa], original purity, its svabhāva; natural perfection, its prakṛiti; and compassion, the inseparability of the first two.

dzogchungpa said:

May I ask what Indic term corresponds to compassion in this case?

Malcolm wrote:

Abheda.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, February 17th, 2014 at 11:18 AM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

you are forgetting that at the level of the basis there is no distinction between personal and universal. If you want to call the basis a quality shared by everything that arises you have merely coopted the term ususally used for the origin/ground of everything that arises and now you need a new term for that. unless of course you want to reify individuals as independent monads of some sort, which is basically svabhava.

Malcolm wrote:

Defining the basis as a sort of fabric out of which appearances arise does not solve the problem of individuated consciousnesses.

What is the basis in fact? The Dzogchen tantras describe this as "wisdom". This wisdom is said to have three aspects [rnam pa], original purity, its svabhāva; natural perfection, its prakṛiti; and compassion, the inseparability of the first two.

Even discussing wisdom as a the basis, even a nonsubstantiated basis as in Dzogchen does not make sense if that wisdom is not describing a noetic entity. Simplistic solutions like refusing to define it as one or many simply raise more questions than they answer.

There are two propositions:

B1, the basis as a transpersonal field out of which everything in samsara and nirvana is instantiated through its non-recognition.

B2 the basis is meant only to apply to any given sentient beings. Since this applies to all sentient being, here the basis is like fire, fire as light and heat as a quality, every instantiation of fire has light and heat. Likewise, every sentient beings shares common characteristics because they are sentient, they have consciousness.

Dante, your position is B1, and while I can understand how people are lead to accept B1 as the message of Dzogchen teachings, it is an exaggeration in my estimation.

Instead, I think B2 is the more proper understanding, based for example on Nyibum's remark that the basis is one's unfabricated mind. This is an authoritative citation that must be addressed and heeded. For example, the Mind Mirror of Vajrasattva states:

That is one's own basis but it was not recognized by oneself. The samsaric three realms are formed through delusion. <sup>[1]</sup><sub>SEP</sub> Then, after the afflictions become more coarse, different forms of sentient beings emerge, deluded from the basis in that way."

This just means that each and every sentient being is deluded from their own basis; even though the basis is described in generic terms, it is not the case that all sentient beings ultimate share one basis. The basis is uniform in its nature, if you will, among all instantiations of sentient beings but each and every sentient being's basis is unique to that being. Since the Dzogchen tantras do describe wisdom as being a repository for traces, again we can try to explain this through B1 or B2.

In the B1 scenario, the basis would have to like a bank, where different people placed their traces, kind of like samsara accounts.

A B2 scenario is much simpler, since it is only means that since sentient beings did not recognize their own unfabricated minds, then they begin to develop the traces of action that produce our common karmic visions of the six realms. This is certainly the intent of Shabkar when he writes:

Therefore, since appearances are not fixed, whatever appears [appears] because of the power of traces.

And:

Therefore, everything is an appearance of the mind.
Since everything is created by the concepts of the mind, in reality, all of the appearances of the mind are empty.

More importantly Shabkar states:

Self-originated primordial wisdom appearing as vidyā is also the mind...
There are no appearances at all apart from the mind.

And:

This is the introduction that confirms the basis,
the natural reality of the mind essence.

Compare these last two with Nyibum:

As such, because the basis, one's unfabricated mind, arose as the essence of the sole reality, there is no need to search elsewhere for the place etc., i.e. it is called self-originated wisdom.

(Apologies for the last version, which was from an earlier unedited version by mistake)

My present position therefore, is B2, the basis is just the way a sentient being's consciousness [ shes pa rather than rnam par shes pa ] or mind [ sems, citta ] is talked about in Dzogchen texts prior to being afflicted for all the reasons I mentioned earlier.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, February 17th, 2014 at 10:35 AM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

smcj said:

In defense of Malcolm I'd like to point out that he is evidently presenting Dzogchen from ChNN's perspective. ChNN carries a lot of weight around here, and a lot of people who post here consider him their teacher. So it is entirely appropriate for Malcolm to clarify the teachings according to ChNN's perspective.

Malcolm wrote:

I am not clarifying anything from ChNN's perspective. I am clarifying it from my own, which is all we have anyway.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, February 16th, 2014 at 10:32 PM

Title: Re: Do you believe in ghosts?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Bhūtas, in reality, are a product of affliction that manifest as external spirits. They are formless, and according to Tibetan Medicine as well as the chöd tradition, are a product of imputation. So they exist, but they exist primarily as imputations.

dzogchungpa said:

So they are not sentient beings?

Malcolm wrote:

They can be sentient beings, but they can only harm you if you have a negative karmic relation with them.

And, even we are just products of imputation, so our status as "sentient beings" is also somewhat questionable.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, February 16th, 2014 at 10:18 PM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

As I said the basis is just your own mind.

The gzhi, in Dzogchen, has nothing to do with the mind.

cloudburst said:

Hi Malcolm

Could you give a brief account of how your view has changed on this matter? It's somewhat striking.

Thank you.

Malcolm wrote:

It is simple: the basis has nothing to do with afflicted mind, the one we ordinarily experience. The two statements may be reconciled in the following way.

The basis is simply a way of talking about the components of the universe — earth, water, fire, air, space and consciousness — from the point of view their luminous intrinsic purity. A way of saying this in Tibetan in Dzogchen terms would be ཆོས་ཐམས་ཅད་རང་བཞིན་གྱིས་ཀྱང་དག་དང་ལྷན་གྱུ་ཞེས་ (all phenomena are pure and naturally perfect by nature); a gsar ma equivalent presentation might run ཆོས་ཐམས་ཅད་རང་བཞིན་གྱིས་དག་པ་དང་འོད་གསལ་བ་ (all phenomena are pure and luminous by nature).

The Kalacakra tantra makes a very important point about this, as Tagtshang Lotsawa points out in his survey of the Vimalaprabha:

Great bliss and empty forms [śūnyatābimba, stong gzugs] are shown to exist in the basis with this wisdom element of the basis [gzhi] because Bhagavan Vajrasattva Mahāsukha explains that all three realms exist in oneself in the commentary of the third verse of this [adhyātma] chapter, and it is established through the citation of the root text and commentary of “wisdom merged into emptiness”.

What is this wisdom? He again clarifies:

Bearing the name “wisdom”, this consciousness that exists pervading the bodies of all sentient beings is merged into that emptiness which pervades all sentient beings, including the sentient beings of the bardo and the formless realm. This is taught in the commentary as existing through a relative mode.

In Kalacakra, for example, the wisdom element is considered to be the five elements counted as one. Tagtshang again:

As such, from among the ten elements, the first five are enumerated individually, i.e., the elements of space, air, fire, water and earth. Counting the latter five as one, since they are made into one so called “wisdom element”, these six elements form this womb-born body.

The fact that points towards the same meaning as the basis in Dzogchen is provided by him here:

This statement of the root text “Wisdom is merged into emptiness, uniform taste, unchanging, and permanent” is intended for the mind of the apprehending subject that apprehends the object of the empty form established through the power of meditating on the main [devatā]. Here, the meaning of uniform taste, unchanging and permanent are though to be “complete in perfection.” Further, the meaning of permanent is said to be freedom from obscurations. That also intends intrinsically lacking obscuration or without the obscurations of movements. Though there is nothing to identify here in inseparable uniform taste, while produced conditionally, the intention is that the apprehended object and the apprehending subject have a single essence, and that a transforming continuum is not possible.

This is an extremely important point and demonstrates why the body of light is possible through either Dzogchen thögal or the path of the two stages.

Now, someone might object that it is inappropriate to cite the Kalacakra to clarify points in Dzogchen tantras, but then if this is so, then all great masters from Nubchen on down to Dudjom Rinpoche are at fault for using such tantras as the Mañjuśrīnamasamgiti to clarify Dzogchen.

Now, I am just a scholar, sharing with those who are interested my research. For many people it is annoying that I change my opinions, but I only have opinions based on what I know. Since I am not an enlightened person I can only understand what is said in the texts along with my own experience. Therefore, when my learning contradicts my earlier opinions, I change the latter immediately as soon as I have confirmed them mistaken. Such is the only honest path of real scholarship. Since I am not a person who can just accept what is told to me, my path is a bit more brutal and hard than most. But I consider that I am like a goldsmith, and it would be remiss of me not to rigorously test these texts that appear to shine like gold to see if they really are gold, merely gold-plated or fool's gold.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, February 16th, 2014 at 9:59 PM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

Sherlock said:

You seem to be suggesting that the whole cyclical universe thing is entirely a metaphor for one's mind -- sure it can be that but why not at the same time also a valid description of how the universe actually arises? It sounds to me similar to how some people consider the 6 lokas to be states of being within one's own life -- it is definitely that to some degree, but at the same time in mainstream Buddhism reincarnation into the different lokas is still a given.

Malcolm wrote:

In the highest Yogacara school, the non-aspectarian school, there is in fact no container universe to reincarnate into since the containers universe is merely a projection of seeds in the ālayavijñāna.

Dzogchen does not reject the outer universe in the same. Instead it interprets the pre/non-afflictive states of the five elements as "the five lights". But we can understand that the most subtle form of the five elements exist within consciousness. Wisdom is also just a name for a pre/un-observed consciousness.

The basis is not a universal phenomena. though it is discussed in a manner resembling that for convenience. Each person has their own basis. This is why each person experiences delusion and liberation separately and at different times.

Because the basis seems to be discussed as if it were some universal "pleroma", to borrow a phrase from the Gnostics, this causes some people to go off the deep end and conclude it is some universal phenomena out of which everything arises rather than be a quality shared by everything that arises.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, February 16th, 2014 at 7:58 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

Though, I am not blind to the possibility that the old regime may threaten the new society. I think they would have as much right to defend themselves as anybody else.

Malcolm wrote:

I see, you think that the "Capitalist" regime has a right to defend itself? That's novel. I thought you were of the mind that all these people were basically felons with no right to their "means of production".

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, February 16th, 2014 at 7:57 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

Malcolm:

'Markets' or 'Trade', and 'Capitalism' are not the same thing. Explaining that is extremely complicated, capitalism are particular patterns of trade that have come to the fore in the modern world. For a proper explanation of this you will have to work through 'Capital' by Marx yourself. Though of course you could short circuit all that by declaring that you simply don't accept Marx's theory... up to you.

Malcolm wrote:

As far as I can see, Capitalism, a term invented by Marx, is here to stay. Socialism, apart from the various degrees of "socialism" in the some Western European democracies failed. It is useless to shout at me that true socialism has never been tried. I wouldn't want to try "true Socialism" in a million years, so you can keep it.

tellyontellyon said:

Also, "There have always been..." is not a logical argument....

Malcolm wrote:

It doesn't need to be an argument, its just a matter of fact.

tellyontellyon said:

I haven't said we don't have to look at our minds... but as I said about fixing my car ... we ALSO need a spanner.

We need to work on our anger, jealousy, greed, ignorance and pride... of course that. That goes without saying. That is bleeding obvious....!

Malcolm wrote:

If it were so obvious, then why is no one apart from a few Buddhists doing it?

tellyontellyon said:

But what is ALSO needed is a changed system.

Malcolm wrote:

No, we merely need to change our minds and help others where we can.

People love "systems" because they tell a story. So you have your exploitation story you call Capitalism, and you have your liberation story that you call True Socialism(tm), but they are just abstractions. In truth, no system is perfect because they are only as perfect as the people running them. And quite frankly I see no reason to believe that people will be "better people" under a True Socialist(tm) system, and I suspect that in fact people will be a lot shittier to one another than they are now given the removal of all financial incentives, the only thing left will be social status and hierarchical position.

You can quote the Marxist Dalai Lama all you want, and I can quote the free market loving Dalai Lama right back at you, but what good does that serve?

If we have learned anything, we should have learned that satisfaction of material needs does not lead to greater happiness — this fact is equally true under all political systems. Happiness both mundane and transcendent only comes from inside.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, February 16th, 2014 at 7:01 AM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The basis, as I have already shown, is just your own clear and empty mind. There is no vidyā apart from your own mind's vidyā.

gad rgyangs said:

the basis is not vidya.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, I know, the neutral awareness that can become vidyā or avidyā comes from the basis. As I said the basis is just your own mind. It is not some unitary ontological basis for everything. If it were, it would be no different than brahman. Say that it isn't sat is no help, since brahman too is considered beyond existence and non-existence. If there is a difference, it is that the basis, one's own mind, is also not established.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, February 16th, 2014 at 6:43 AM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

sentient beings complaining about appearances, forgetting that both they and the appearances are appearances of the basis, is also an appearance of the basis, so its all good.

Malcolm wrote:

Sounds like brahman to me.

gad rgyangs said:

the basis is not sat.

Malcolm wrote:

The basis, as I have already shown, is just your own clear and empty mind. There is no vidyā apart from your own mind's vidyā.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, February 16th, 2014 at 6:40 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

Even if you don't think socialism isn't the answer, we stil need to dump capitalism. It is past it's 'sell by' date and is starting to stink.

Malcolm wrote:

We are not going to dump capitalism ever, because there have always been markets and opportunities for investment and there always will be markets. What needs to happen is that human beings need to grow up and learn how to restrain their appetites, and manage their markets in such a way that they are not destructive to the planet and other creatures in general.

When this happens, we can have our cake and eat it too, we can have both a healthy planet, social justice and peace. Socialism, Neo-liberalism, Anarchism, all these political theories are not going to bring us to the point where we have a healthy planet, social justice and peace, because all of options from the left and the right up till now are predicated on violence. Whether it is violent seizure of new markets (Neo -liberalism), violent seizure of capital (Marxian Socialism) or violent disruption of society (Kropotkin style Anarchism), for as long as humans use violence to have their way in the world for that long there will never be peace, never be social justice and there will never be a healthy planet.

Those who participate and endorse violence, only get violence in future lives.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, February 16th, 2014 at 6:30 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

Not Ideals.... but changing what is worse for something better. There is nothing wrong with being pro-active about something if it seems positive. If you want to be inactive, ok.... but the capitalists are not going to be inactive. They are busy destroying the planet with their insatiable demand for the 2% - 3% compound annual growth that capitalism needs to function.

Zero growth economics is not possible under capitalism...

Malcolm wrote:

No, capitalism is doing no such thing. Human beings are doing it because they do not understand how to control their desire, hatred and ignorance. They do it just as much on Socialist countries like USSR and Communist China.

From a my point of view as a Buddhist, your insistence on focusing on external "solutions" (which in my sincere opinion will make things worse) is misguided. In any event, the market is waking up the fact that destroying its own resource base is bad for the market itself. You will see a shift in global capitalism in the next 50 years away from extractive investment towards renewable and reuse investment. This will happen.

The problem is not markets, nor capital, nor capitalists, communists, socialist, anarchists, fascists, racists, and so on. The problem that we humans are immature, and we need, as a species to grow up.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, February 16th, 2014 at 6:22 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

From what I've seen of Deep Ecology, it seems to involve not actually doing very much... just let nature take its course.

Malcolm wrote:

You haven't understood deep ecology.

tellyontellyon said:

Well, yes, if we just let things drift we can certainly trust that nature will solve all our problems.... mass depopulation resulting from starvation and various other environmental disasters .... did I say disaster...?!

Nay, this is homeostatic Gaia rebalancing the biosphere, cleansing it of those pesky humans.... well, apart from Namdrol and his cabbage patch.... lucky him.

Malcolm wrote:

That is not a deep ecological view.

tellyontellyon said:

Population down to ... what was it? 100 million down from 7.1 billion. That's what Naess suggested.

Malcolm wrote:

He suggested this was an ideal number for maintaining human cultural diversity.

tellyontellyon said:

But it sounds just a little brutal to me. I would also question whether this strategy would be 'realistic', 'cause untold suffering' and 'not be stable'.

Malcolm wrote:

It is an idealistic desiderata. It would involve people voluntarily choosing not to have children, over some number of centuries. No one is going to adopt such policies since we as a species do not have the collective maturity to enact such policies, and we understand that in deep ecology.

tellyontellyon said:

7 Billion dead. ... Is that really a more Buddhist solution than nationalising the big corporations, utilities and banks?

Malcolm wrote:

No one in deep ecology ever suggested a mass killing of humans was desirable. That would be the Deep Green Resistance people.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, February 16th, 2014 at 6:15 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

It is they who have the most brutal record of violence imaginable, stopping at nothing to overturn democratic elections if they threaten the rule of capital.

Malcolm wrote:

If you can't beat 'em, join 'em.

tellyontellyon said:
a workers' democracy.

Malcolm wrote:
Which as we have seen is just a total concentration camp.

wiki
tellyontellyon said:
Hayek's views on Pinochet's Chile.

Malcolm wrote:
You cited this already.

tellyontellyon said:
A genuine socialist govt. would not be dictatorial, it would extend and deepen democracy enormously.

Malcolm wrote:
I don't believe this for a second, "meet the new boss, same as the old boss."

tellyontellyon said:
This would be more far reaching than the parliamentary democracies of capitalism where we simply get to vote every few years for MPs who do whatever they please once elected. Instead, everybody would take part in deciding how society and the economy would run. Nationally, regionally and locally at every level, elected representatives would be accountable and subject to instant recall. So if the people who elected them didn't like what their representative did, they could make them stand for election again and, if wished, replace them. Elected representatives would receive only the average wage, keeping them in touch with ordinary people.

Malcolm wrote:
A recipe for political and economic chaos. Direct democracy does not scale.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Sunday, February 16th, 2014 at 6:08 AM
Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism
Content:

Malcolm wrote:
All that proves is that none of the three are suited to lead a society since they're all just armed thugs, devoted more to violence than peace.

Sherab Dorje said:
Yes, well, that's easy to say from the comfort of your New England home. You might have a slightly different opinion if you were living in inner city Athens, especially if you were a Pakistani immigrant (for example).

Malcolm wrote:

Sorry, Greg, I just can't condone this kind of random street violence. It is a symptom of a government that is weak.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, February 16th, 2014 at 6:06 AM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

I can see how lower yanas can have this discussion, but for the Dzoghchen POV, the only thing that is meaningless (or at least a waste of time) is complaining about the appearances of the basis.

kirtu said:

"Complaining" about appearances is quite common because people aren't stable in the view.

Even in the view people react to appearances.

But of course most people, even most Dharma people, accept the appearances as actually real.

Kirt

gad rgyangs said:

sentient beings complaining about appearances, forgetting that both they and the appearances are appearances of the basis, is also an appearance of the basis, so its all good.

Malcolm wrote:

Sounds like brahman to me.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, February 15th, 2014 at 9:54 PM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

kirtu said:

But imho the complete meaninglessness of samsara is very difficult for even Dharma people to accept.

Malcolm wrote:

They are like the liberal Marxists Mao was talking about in Zhen Li's citation. They give lip service to Buddhadharma, but they still imagine there is worldly happiness and meaning.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, February 15th, 2014 at 9:52 PM

Title: Re: Do you believe in ghosts?

Content:

Indrajala said:

I'm less interested in minor spirits and so on, and more interested in higher gods and the stories around them. Aside from invoking the names of those gods friendly to the Buddhadharma (like Indra), I don't really do much else.

Malcolm wrote:

Bhūtas, in reality, are a product of affliction that manifest as external spirits. They are formless, and according to Tibetan Medicine as well as the chöd tradition, are a product of imputation. So they exist, but they exist primarily as imputations.

Lhasa said:

Malcolm, would you explain the 'product of imputation' a bit more? Also, bhutas would be a great thread all its own, especially how to deal with them.

I have heard that when someone suffers trauma/abuse, that they leak life-force and this attracts lower spirits who feed off it. Is this somewhat the same thing as bhutas?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes. The primary cause of bhūtagraha is karma, engaging in non-virtuous deeds in this life or past lives.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, February 15th, 2014 at 9:17 PM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

tobes said:

1. Never; the activity of consciousness cannot be separated from its content.
2. Both are rupa; they are part of embodiment, but I don't see the relevance of asserting them to be either internal or external.

:

Malcolm wrote:

No, consciousness is nāma; but I agree with you that nāma is embodied (rūpaka).

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, February 15th, 2014 at 9:13 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

Here in Greece Anarchists and Communists (especially the Stalinists of the Communist Party of Greece) spend as much time beating each other up as they do beating up the neo-Nazis of Golden Dawn.

Malcolm wrote:

All that proves is that none of the three are suited to lead a society since they're all just armed thugs, devoted more to violence than peace.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, February 15th, 2014 at 9:09 PM

Title: Re: Do you believe in ghosts?

Content:

Indrajala said:

I'm less interested in minor spirits and so on, and more interested in higher gods and the stories around them. Aside from invoking the names of those gods friendly to the Buddhadharma (like Indra), I don't really do much else.

Malcolm wrote:

Bhūtas, in reality, are a product of affliction that manifest as external spirits. They are formless, and according to Tibetan Medicine as well as the chöd tradition, are a product of imputation. So they exist, but they exist primarily as imputations.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, February 15th, 2014 at 6:49 AM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

rigpa is ontological not epistemic: its not about some state of consciousness before dualism vision, it is about the basis/abgrund of all possible appearances, including our consciousness in whatever state its in or could ever be in.

Malcolm wrote:

Sorry, I just don't agree with you and think you are just falling in the Hindu brahman trap.

gad rgyangs said:

I'm talking about the perception of the relationship between nothing and something. The question of what jargon to use when talking around it is secondary, although not without historical interest.

Malcolm wrote:

Rigpa is just knowing, the noetic quality of a mind. That is all it is.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, February 15th, 2014 at 6:48 AM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

in the yeshe sangthal you dissolve all appearances into the "vast dimension of emptiness", out of which "instant presence" arises. This is cosmological as well as personal, since the two scales are nondual.

Malcolm wrote:

The way that great transference body arises:
when all appearances have gradually been exhausted, when one focuses one's awareness on the appearances strewn about on the luminous maṇḍala of the five fingers of one's hand, the environment and inhabitants of the universe returning from that appearance are perceived as like moon in the water.
One's body is just a reflection, self-apparent as the illusory body of wisdom;
one obtains a vajra-like body.
One sees one's body as transparent inside and out.
The impure eyes of others cannot see one's body as transparent, but only the body as it was before...

Shabkar, Key to One Hundred Doors of Samadhi

Outer appearances do not disappear even when great transference body is attained.
What disappears are the inner visions, that is what is exhausted, not the outer universe with its planets, stars, galaxies, mountains, oceans, cliffs, houses, people and sentient beings.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, February 15th, 2014 at 6:38 AM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

Sherlock said:

Isn't the difference between transpersonal and personal also a form of dualism?

Malcolm wrote:

The distinction is crucial. If this distinction is not made, Dzogchen sounds like Vedanta.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, February 15th, 2014 at 6:36 AM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

rigpa is ontological not epistemic: its not about some state of consciousness before dualism vision, it is about the basis/abgrund of all possible appearances, including our consciousness in whatever state its in or could ever be in.

Malcolm wrote:

Sorry, I just don't agree with you and think you are just falling in the Hindu brahman trap.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, February 15th, 2014 at 6:04 AM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

It's your own rigpa, not a transpersonal rigpa, being a function of your own mind. That mind is empty.

gad rgyangs said:

when all appearances cease, what are you left with?

Malcolm wrote:

they never cease....

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, February 15th, 2014 at 5:35 AM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Because these things are regarded as afflictive, whereas Dzogchen is trying to describe the person in his or her originally nonafflictive condition. It really is just that simple. The so called general basis is a universal derived from the particulars of persons. That is why it is often mistaken for a transpersonal entity. But Dzogchen, especially man ngag sde is very grounded in Buddhist Logic, and one should know that by definition universals are considered to be abstractions and non-existents in Buddhism, and Dzogchen is no exception.

gad rgyangs said:

there is no question of the basis being an entity, thats not the point. Rigpa is precisely what it says in the yeshe sangthal: instant presence experienced against/within the "backdrop" (metaphor) of a "vast dimension of emptiness" (metaphor).

Malcolm wrote:

It's your own rigpa, not a transpersonal rigpa, being a function of your own mind. That mind is empty.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, February 15th, 2014 at 5:20 AM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

I prefer to put my faith in the guy whose father started the whole Nyingthig thing. And what is says is verified in many Dzogchen tantras, both from the bodhicitta texts as well as others.

The basis is not a backdrop. Everything is not separate from the basis. But that everything just means your own skandhas, dhātus and āyatanas. There is no basis outside your mind, just as there is no Buddhahood outside of your mind.

gad rgyangs said:

then why speak of a basis at all? just speak of skandhas, dhātus and āyatanas, and be done with it.

Malcolm wrote:

Because these things are regarded as afflictive, whereas Dzogchen is trying to describe the person in his or her originally nonafflictive condition. It really is just that simple. The so called general basis is a universal derived from the particulars of persons. That is why it is often mistaken for a transpersonal entity. But Dzogchen, especially man ngag sde is very grounded in Buddhist Logic, and one should know that by definition universals are considered to be abstractions and non-existents in Buddhism, and Dzogchen is no exception.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, February 15th, 2014 at 5:08 AM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

Consciousness is always a phenomenon.

Malcolm wrote:

So is the basis. They are both dharmas.

Or as the Great Garuda has it when refuting Madhyamaka:

Since phenomena and nonphenomena have always been merged and are inseparable, there is no further need to explain an “ultimate phenomenon”.

An 12th century commentary on this text states (but not this passage):

Amazing bodhicitta (the identity of everything that becomes the basis of pursuing the meaning that cannot be seen nor realized elsewhere than one's vidyā) is wholly the wisdom of the mind distinct as the nine consciousnesses that lack a nature.

In the end, Dzogchen is really just another Buddhist meditative phenomenology of the mind and person and that is all.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, February 15th, 2014 at 5:06 AM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

whats an "unfabricated mind" anyway? awareness without the prapanca?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, I believe so. So basically, all that fancy Dzogchen lingo about the basis and so on is really just talking about a mind stream that is proposed to have a primordial start point which is completely free of proliferation.

We can trust Nyibum about this because his father invented/revealed the Nyinthig tradition and he himself was a great scholar who studied widely.

gad rgyangs said:

I dunno Malcolm, the basis is more like the backdrop against which any appearances appear, including any consciousness. Also, what sense would it make to say "rigpa is one's knowledge of the basis" if that basis was one's own continuum? the basis is pure no-thing as abgrund of all phenomena. Consciousness is always a phenomenon.

Malcolm wrote:

I prefer to put my faith in the guy whose father started the whole Nyinthig thing. And what he says is verified in many Dzogchen tantras, both from the bodhicitta texts as well as others.

The basis is not a backdrop. Everything is not separate from the basis. But that everything just means your own skandhas, dhātus and āyatanas. There is no basis outside your mind, just as there is no Buddhahood outside of your mind.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, February 15th, 2014 at 4:48 AM

Title: Re: Do you believe in ghosts?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

I accept the existence of bhūtas. Most seriously mentally ill people are afflicted with them. It is very easy to see.

dzogchungpa said:

May I ask how you see that someone is afflicted with bhutas? I don't doubt that you can, I would just like to know.

Malcolm wrote:

Through their behavior. If you see some dude at a yoga conference or a bhajan who seems "off", wearing white, obsessed with purity, fond of spouting off words in Sanskrit, etc., you can be sure he is suffering from devabhūtagraha i.e. demonic possession by a deva. There are also ṛṣibhūtagrahas, gurubhūtagraha, siddhabhutāgraha, pretabhūtagraha, and so on, each with their own unique behavior.

I am doing a one day workshop on bhūtas in Mexico City in March.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, February 15th, 2014 at 4:41 AM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

This I don't.

Malcolm wrote:

Sure you do. We have shown that the standard accounts of cause and effect, that they are temporally distinct, or that they are identical or different, are incoherent, from a Madhyamaka point of view. But since effects do appear to arise from causes, given that all of the above is true, this leaves only one option, that causes and their effects are neither the same nor are they different, for example, butter and milk, etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, February 15th, 2014 at 4:39 AM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

So basically, all that fancy Dzogchen lingo about the basis and so on is really just talking about a mind stream that is proposed to have a primordial start point which is completely free of proliferation.

dzogchungpa said:

Can you say a little more about what you mean by a primordial start point?

Malcolm wrote:

It doesn't really mean anything. The continuum of a mind has no beginning. What is being proposed in (some) Dzogchen texts is that at some idealized point in the most distant past beyond our imagination there was a time when our mind was in a state of non-fabrication. At that time this non-fabricated mind, aka the basis, was not aware of itself or anything else but contains within it all the qualities of buddhahood. Then somehow, and it is never really explained how, our own mind's cognitive potentiality [rtsal] stirs and rises up [phags] out of itself giving rise to neutral awareness that either becomes prajñā or ignorance depending on whether it recognizes its own potentiality or not. This kicks off the division between samsara and nirvana. It is completely personal and is not transpersonal at all. But unfortunately, because Dzogchen texts are not very clear about this, the account of the basis tends to be interpreted transpersonally, most likely due to the proliferation of Advaita.

It is my deeply held conviction that this transpersonal account which is favored by many people is a total misunderstanding based on reading these texts in Tibetan for the past 20 years and receiving detailed teachings on them from a variety of very qualified masters .

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, February 15th, 2014 at 4:30 AM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Each moment in the continuum of a knowing clarity is neither the same as nor different than the previous moment.

dzogchungpa said:

Honestly, this doesn't make any sense to me.

Malcolm wrote:

It is pretty straight forward Madhyamaka. If a cause exists at the same time as the effect, the effect is a non-effect, like a seed and its sprout existing at the same time. On the other hand if causes and effects are temporally separate, i.e. of the cause exists at a different time than the effect, the cause will amount to a non-cause and the effect, a non-effect. If the cause is the same as the effect, the cause will be a non-cause and the effect will be a non-effect. If they are different, then also cause will be a non-cause and the effect will be a non-effect.

Therefore, what Candrakirti proposes, following Nāgārjuna, is that causes and effects are neither the same nor are they different, and that they are not simultaneous nor are they temporally distinct.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, February 15th, 2014 at 3:19 AM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Sorry but the term ālaya in Dzogchen and term as it is used, for example in Sakya, are completely different.

The term basis in Dzogchen (sthāna) and the term ālaya in Lamdre for example, have precisely the same meaning, i.e. one's unfabricated mind (rang sems ma bcos pa).

gad rgyangs said:

whats an "unfabricated mind" anyway? awareness without the prapanca?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, I believe so. So basically, all that fancy Dzogchen lingo about the basis and so on is really just talking about a mind stream that is proposed to have a primordial start point which is completely free of proliferation.

We can trust Nyibum about this because his father invented/revealed the Nyinthig tradition and he himself was a great scholar who studied widely.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, February 15th, 2014 at 2:52 AM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Nyibum* states:

As such, because the basis, one's unfabricated mind, arose as the essence of reality as a single nature, there is no need to search elsewhere for the place etc., i.e. it is called self-originated wisdom.

The basis is nothing more nor nothing less this.

*the son of Zhan stong Chobar, the tertön of the Vima Nyinthig

gad rgyangs said:

I'm glad you took out the part where you said the basis is nothing but alaya!

as to the quote, the basis does not "arise", it is the basis of arising. I'm also not sure I like equating one's mind, unfabricated or not, with the basis: one's mind is clearly an appearance, not the basis.

Malcolm wrote:

Sorry but the term ālaya in Dzogchen and term as it is used, for example in Sakya, are completely different.

The term basis in Dzogchen (sthāna) and the term ālaya in Lamdre for example, have precisely the same meaning, i.e. one's unfabricated mind (rang sems ma bcos pa).

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, February 15th, 2014 at 2:35 AM

Title: Re: Do you believe in ghosts?

Content:

Indrajala said:

Or maybe the question would be better phrased as do you believe in the existence of intelligent non-corporeal beings?

This is a question that maybe divides a lot of Buddhists nowadays. Say you think pretas exist in the wrong company and you'll possibly be mocked for it. On the other hand, there's always been such beings within Buddhist cosmology, and they were not seen as symbolic or metaphorical. They were subjectively real in their own right.

There's actually an interesting book on the subject of monsters by John Michael Greer entitled Monsters: An Investigator's Guide to Magical Beings. He points out that statistically over a quarter or so of people report having had contact with some kind of disembodied intelligence at some point, which constitutes evidence suggestive of the phenomenon. You can read the introduction in the preview on Google Books.

Malcolm wrote:

As a Doctor of Tibetan Medicine I would have to say yes, I accept the existence of bhūtas. Most seriously mentally ill people are afflicted with them. It is very easy to see.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, February 15th, 2014 at 2:30 AM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Space is a repository for all things, one does not have to reify space to understand that.

gad rgyangs said:

the basis is not space.

Malcolm wrote:

Nyibum* states:

As such, because the basis, one's unfabricated mind, arose as the essence of reality of a single nature, there is no need to search elsewhere for the place etc., i.e. it is called self-originated wisdom.

The basis is nothing more nor nothing less this.

*the son of Zhang stong Chobar, the tertön of the Vima Nyinthig

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, February 15th, 2014 at 2:09 AM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The basis does not have a cause, just like space does not have a cause. But it is a repository for the build up of traces nevertheless.

gad rgyangs said:

it could only be a repository if it was reified.

The whole process is clearly personal and individual, not transpersonal.

the basis is said to have/be "rang byung ye shes", and is equated with rigpa in many texts. are these not cognitive terms?

Malcolm wrote:

Space is a repository for all things, one does not have to reify space to understand that.

"Rang byung ye shes" means "wisdom that arises from oneself". This point is very clearly explained in many places.

In any event, we can consider that the Vima Nyinthig commentary attributed to Garab Dorje authoritative:

"From now on, the stirred pit of samsara will no appear as the six kinds of living beings. for twenty thousand eons, sentient beings, having severed the stream of samsara, will not appear with a bodily form. After that, from the arising of the subtle latent defilements of different actions, it will be equivalent with the production of the previous samsara and nirvana"

Thus we find out that all this business about the basis and so on is really just a way to talk about what happens in the so called dark eons, when everything below the third and fourth rūpadhātu are held to disappear, even though the origin of the basis is often couched in terms to place in an unimaginable primeval beginning.

It's a Buddhist way to try to talk about origins without talking about origins. "I can't find where it started so I am going to call it 'self-originated'." But if someone thinks it is pointing to some transcendental uber consciousness, well, if that is what someone thinks, I think someone doesn't really understand Dzogchen at all. If someone thinks the basis is consciousness, or some cognitive or noetic principle, they have understood nothing.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, February 15th, 2014 at 1:56 AM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

gaden rgyangs said:

how could the basis be subject to karma and afflictions?

Malcolm wrote:

The basis does not have a cause, just like space does not have a cause. But it is a repository for the build up of traces nevertheless.

The way samsara arose at first is, when the trio of vāyu, vidyā and space arose from the undifferentiated basis, since vidyā was unstable because of isolation, and engaged in self-delusion, panicked at sound, frightened of the light, and fainted at the light and was covered by ignorance. After it engages in self-delusion, the duality of outer objects and inner mind arises. The mere thought of self arising from other, and other arising from self, disturbed the karmavāyus. Mind is built up by the vāyu, the analytical mind analyzes objects. The self-deluded awareness demarcated sensation and since it did not recognize its own appearances, apparent objects were apprehended as a duality. Since that accumulated traces of karma, a physical body was appropriated and the suffering of delusion is uninterrupted. For example, sentient beings formed out of ignorance are like being stuck pitch dark.

The Clear Lamp from the Ka dag rang shar

The whole process is clearly personal and individual, not transpersonal.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, February 15th, 2014 at 1:39 AM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

There is no such thing as a universal undifferentiated ultimate awareness in Buddhadharma.

mutsuk said:

In other words, following Khenpo Jikphun (transcript from JLA) :

« — You have the Base (gzhi) of the natural state. That state has a knowledge (rig pa) which, owing to the dynamism of the state (which is not static), flashes out of the Base.

Malcolm wrote:

This occurs because of latent traces of karma and affliction left over from the previous eon, according to a commentary attributed to Garab Dorje on the Single Son of All the Buddhas Tantras.

So this neutral awareness that rises out of the basis upon the stirring of vāyu in the basis actually has a cause.

Amazing!

Mere clear vidyā, this mere intermediate realization,

it is not a buddha, is not a sentient beings, neutral, dependent on both conditions.

For example, it is like a stainless crystal ball, which can produce fire or water through the condition of the sun or the moon.

Likewise, vidyā, the essence of the mind, arises as the suffering of samsara or the bliss of nirvana through conditions.

The Three Kāyas Tantra from the Ka dag rang shar

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 14th, 2014 at 11:26 PM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

Astus said:

An awareness without anything to be aware of is like seeing without anything to see.

PadmaVonSamba said:

I am not referring to cognition, rather, the causes of that cognition.

.
.
.

Malcolm wrote:

Cognitions arise based on previous cognitions. That's all.

If you suggest anything other than this, you wind up in Hindu La la land.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 14th, 2014 at 11:24 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

The name Communist has come to be equated with the Bonapartist degenerated workers state of the USSR et. al.

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Degenerated\_workers%27\_state

Also

<https://www.marxists.org/archive/trotsky/1939/05/bonapartism.htm>

So I prefer Socialist or Marxist.

Malcolm wrote:

Dude, you're a communist. As far as those of us who are not communists are concerned, it is all of a stripe.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 14th, 2014 at 9:59 PM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Even the omniscience of a Buddha arises from a cause.

PadmaVonSamba said:

isn't this cause, too, an object of awareness?

Isn't there awareness of this cause?

If awareness of this cause is awareness itself,

then isn't this awareness of awareness?

What causes awareness of awareness, if not awareness?

If awareness is the cause of awareness, isn't it its own cause?

.
.
.

Malcolm wrote:

Omniscience is the content of a mind freed of afflictions. Even the continuum of a Buddha has a relative ground, i.e. a the rosary or string of moments of clarity is beginningless.

Origination from self is axiomatically negated in Buddhadharma,

Each moment in the continuum of a knowing clarity is neither the same as nor different than the previous moment. Hence the cause of a given instant of a knowing clarity cannot be construed to be itself nor can it be construed to be other than itself. This is the only version of causation which, in the final analysis, Buddhadharma can admit to on a relative level. It is the logical consequence of the Buddha's insight, "When this exists, that exists, with the arising of that, this arose."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 14th, 2014 at 9:40 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

Malcolm, I just don't feel convinced by your point of view. So I will stick with my own precarious holding together of both Marxism and Buddhism.

I said a long time back that I know it was not possible to completely reconcile both philosophies. However, I just can't reconcile being a decent human being with the complete renunciation of either. So there we have it: Paradox.

I'll just do the best I can.

Malcolm wrote:

As I said, the Green Party is the only party which is reconcilable with Buddhist ethics. That or a Buddhist monarchy. Take your pick.

Anyway, I have no interest in convincing you of anything. You will convince yourself over time as the cognitive dissonance between being a Buddhist and a communist (not to mention the dissonance between social justice and communism) eventually becomes too much to bear.

Anyway, as Naess says, of the three great movements, the peace movement, the social justice movement and the deep ecology movement, one can pick only one to be active in, and I have chosen mine: deep ecology.

It seems you have picked social justice. More power to you.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 14th, 2014 at 9:37 PM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

if you are saying that Dharmakaya is a composite,

produced by other causes.

Malcolm wrote:

No, but as I just said, even uncompounded phenomena — of which Mahāyāna Buddhism recognizes only four: space, the two cessations and emptiness — are not truly existent.

PadmaVonSamba said:

I am talking about even the awareness of these four things.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, I understand. All awarenesses are conditioned. There is no such thing as a universal undifferentiated ultimate awareness in Buddhadharma. Even the omniscience of a Buddha arises from a cause.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 14th, 2014 at 9:25 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

Simon

I'm interested in Buddhism certainly. But not in a Buddhism that becomes so abstract and schizoid that it doesn't open it's eyes to the suffering of ordinary people in the world. When my car is broken, I get out a spanner; meditation and mindfulness is certainly in order... but also the spanner.

Viewing human problems as ultimately non-existent is fair enough if you live in a monastery, but there are two truths. We have to consider conventional reality too. We can't just lop it off and pretend to ourselves that we have achieved a non-dual state of awareness simply by closing our eyes. If I was a fully realised Buddha I could perhaps transcend all these worldly mumblings... But... BUT... I am not, and I don't think a person becomes fully realised simply by blocking out the problems of the world. We need compassion as well as wisdom. Action as well as mindfulness.

Malcolm wrote:

You don't need to block out the problems of the world. You simply need to realize, as a Buddhist, that they can only be solved through the practice of Dharma.

And as I have taken great pains to show, If you are a Buddhist, your political affiliation should be consistent with Buddhist values. As far as I can see, the only political party that even comes close to meeting that criteria is the Green Party movement. I have some reservations about the "new left" rhetoric of the US Green Party for example, but nevertheless I cannot associate myself with the Republicans or the Democrats.

In your neck of the woods:
<http://greenparty.org.uk/policies.html>

All sorts of room in the green party for petty bourgeoisie people like myself, to stalwart communist heros like yourself, and anarchist windups like Greg.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Friday, February 14th, 2014 at 8:57 PM
Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism
Content:
tellyontellyon said:
So National Socialism is really "Ethnic" Socialism or "Racial" Socialism
It's not socialism at all!

Here is the article, "What is Natonal Socialism", written in 1933:
<https://www.marxists.org/archive/trotsky/germany/1933/330610.htm>

Malcolm wrote:
It is just another form of socialism. Not all socialism is Marxist socialism.

The point the archdruid is making was that the social democracies in Western Europe have more or less adopted all the economic policies that were installed during the Weimar Republic and during the Third Reich. Why? As he said, to attempt to stave off worker rebellions.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Friday, February 14th, 2014 at 6:48 PM
Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless
Content:
smcj said:
There is not 100% agreement on that.

Malcolm wrote:
People who think dharmakāya is truly existent are simply wrong, and suffer from an eternalist bias.

In reality the three kāyas are also conventions.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Friday, February 14th, 2014 at 6:45 PM
Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism
Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

So it seems to me that our friend the "archdruid" apart from being misinformed (and misinforming) may actually either be a crypto-sympathiser of Nazism or just plain anti-leftist.

Malcolm wrote:

He is merely saying that policies of Nazi Germany were adopted by the called western European Social Democracies in order to forestall the arising of another Nazi Party along racial lines.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 14th, 2014 at 9:19 AM

Title: Re: Ordination debate - vinaya/bodhisattva/upasaka

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Quite frankly, the merit of giving dana to a so called ordained person who does not maintain his or her vows as perfectly as possible is no more than the merit of giving dana to an ordinary person dressed in maroon or yellow.

daverupa said:

The Blessed One has actually specified that there is a distinction with respect to whether the offering is pure or not on the side of the giver & the receiver, rendering four scenarios.

In either case - an ordinary person dressed in maroon or yellow, or a monastic with ill-maintained vows -

MN 142 said:

Here the donor is virtuous with good thoughts, the receiver is not virtuous with evil thoughts. Thus the offering is pure, on the side of the donor and not the receiver.

Malcolm wrote:

Nevertheless the offering is not tendered to a pure object, and therefore, there is not as much merit. From the same sutta:

of an offering made to an animal the results expected are by hundreds. Of an offering made to an ordinary not virtuous person the results expected are by thousands. Of an offering made to an ordinary virtuous person the results expected are by hundred - thousands Of an offering made to a not greedy one, turned away from sensuality the results expected are by hundred thousand millions. Of an offering made to a person fallen to the method of realizing the state of entry into the stream of the Teaching, the results expected are innumerable and unlimited. What would be the results for offering a gift to a stream entrant of the Teaching? Or one fallen to the method of realizing the state of not returning? Or one who would not return? Or one fallen to the method of realizing worthiness? Or a worthy disciple of the Thus Gone One? Or the silent enlightened One? Or the worthy, rightfully enlightened Thus Gone One?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 14th, 2014 at 9:08 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

An excerpt of an interesting post:

The working classes had their choice of several political movements. There were syndicalist parties, which sought to give workers direct ownership of the firms for which they worked; depending on local taste, that might involve anything from stock ownership programs for employees to cooperatives and other worker-owned enterprises. Syndicalism was also called corporatism; “corporation” and its cognates in most European languages could refer to any organization with a government charter, including craft guilds and cooperatives. It was in that sense that Mussolini’s regime, which borrowed some syndicalist elements for its eclectic ideology, liked to refer to itself as a corporatist system. (Those radicals who insist that this meant fascism was a tool of big corporations in the modern sense are thus hopelessly misinformed—a point I’ll cover in much more detail next week.)

There were also socialist parties, which generally sought to place firms under government control; this might amount to anything from government regulation, through stock purchases giving the state a controlling interest in big firms, to outright expropriation and bureaucratic management. Standing apart from the socialist parties were communist parties, which (after 1919) spouted whatever Moscow’s party line happened to be that week; and there were a variety of other, smaller movements—distributism, social credit, and many more—all of which had their own followings and their own proposed answers to the political and economic problems of the day.

The tendency of most of these parties to further the interests of a single class became a matter of concern by the end of the 19th century, and one result was the emergence of parties that pursued, or claimed to pursue, policies of benefit to the entire nation. Many of them tacked the adjective “national” onto their moniker to indicate this shift in orientation. Thus national conservative parties argued that trade barriers and economic policies focused on the agricultural sector would benefit everyone; national liberal parties argued that free trade and colonial expansion was the best option for everyone; national syndicalist parties argued that giving workers a stake in the firms for which they worked would benefit everyone, and so on. There were no national communist parties, because Moscow’s party line didn’t allow it, but there were national bolshevist parties—in Europe between the wars, a bolshevist was someone who supported the Russian Revolution but insisted that Lenin and Stalin had betrayed it in order to impose a personal dictatorship—which argued that violent revolution against the existing order really was in everyone’s best interests.

National socialism was another position along the same lines. National socialist parties argued that business firms should be made subject to government regulation and coordination in order to keep them from acting against the interests of society as a whole, and that the working classes ought to receive a range of government benefits paid for by taxes on corporate income and the well-to-do. Those points were central to the program of the National Socialist German Workers Party from the time it got that name—it was founded as the German Workers Party, and got the rest of the moniker at the urging of a little man with a Charlie Chaplin mustache who became the party's leader not long after its founding—and those were the policies that the same party enacted when it took power in Germany in 1933.

If those policies sound familiar, dear reader, they should. That's the other reason why next to nobody outside of specialist historical works mentions national socialism by name: the Western nations that defeated national socialism in Germany promptly adopted its core economic policies, the main source of its mass appeal, to forestall any attempt to revive it in the postwar world. Strictly speaking, in terms of the meaning that the phrase had before the beginning of the Second World War, national socialism is one of the two standard political flavors of political economy nowadays. The other is liberalism, and it's another irony of history that in the United States, the party that hates the word "liberal" is a picture-perfect example of a liberal party, as that term was understood back in the day.

Now of course when people think of the National Socialist German Workers Party nowadays, they don't think of government regulation of industry and free vacations for factory workers, even though those were significant factors in German public life after 1933. They think of such other habits of Hitler's regime as declaring war on most of the world, slaughtering political opponents en masse, and exterminating whole ethnic groups. Those are realities, and they need to be recalled. It's crucial, though, to remember that when Germany's National Socialists were out there canvassing for votes in the years before 1933, they weren't marching proudly behind banners saying VOTE FOR HITLER SO FIFTY MILLION WILL DIE! When those same National Socialists trotted out their antisemitic rhetoric, for that matter, they weren't saying anything the average German found offensive or even unusual; to borrow a highly useful German word, antisemitism in those days was salonfähig, "the kind of thing you can bring into the living room." (To be fair, it was just as socially acceptable in England, the United States, and the rest of the western world at that same time.)

<https://thearchdruidreport.blogspot.com/2014/02/fascism-and-future-part-one-up-from.html>

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 14th, 2014 at 8:54 AM

Title: Re: The 969 Movement in Myanmar (Burma)

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

The three vehicles will thrive and survive if Buddhists act like Buddhists regardless of whether if Islam is annihilated or not.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 14th, 2014 at 8:51 AM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

if you are saying that Dharmakaya is a composite,
produced by other causes.

Malcolm wrote:

No, but as a I just said, even uncompounded phenomena — of which Mahāyāna Buddhism recognizes only four: space, the two cessations and emptiness — are not truly existent.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 14th, 2014 at 8:50 AM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

I suggest it is "truly existent" meaning I used that phrase) for the reasons I have stated, the way that space is truly existent.

.

Malcolm wrote:

Space is also not "truly existent". Nirvana is not truly existent.

Read the Heart Sutra again, in case you forgot.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 14th, 2014 at 8:28 AM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

Since this basic awareness cannot be found to have a cause other than itself, and since it has no defining characteristics of its own, and since it cannot be denied, or separated into any kind of 'non-awareness' parts, I would suggest that it is truly existent, non-specific, non-self, synonymous with the meaning of Dharmakaya and the essence of realization.

Malcolm wrote:

As I said before, you have a monistic hindu nondual view. Not even dharmakāya is "truly existent".

PadmaVonSamba said:

Refute awareness.

.
.
.

Malcolm wrote:

You already did by claiming it truly existed. There is no such thing as "truly existent". I am not refuting awareness, I am refuting your claim that awareness truly exists. Individual awarenesses exist, just not "truly", they have no original cause because they are all conditioned entities. No conditioned series has an origin. Such is the logic of the Buddha.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 14th, 2014 at 8:06 AM

Title: Re: Perspective

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

"The Base, or Zhi in Tibetan, is the term used to denote the fundamental ground of existence, both at the universal level and at the level of the individual"

-ChNNR, "The Crystal and the Way of Light" pg 89

and besides, one of the meaning of sthāna is simply "place"

Malcolm wrote:

But it does not mean "ground".

You do realize that whole book was based on an edited transcript of a translation from Italian into English influenced by John Reynolds who was very active in the community then, correct? As you know quite well, these days, when referring the gzhi, ChNN uses the term "base" or "primordial state".

Personally, I don't care. But as far as I am concerned translating gzhi as ground is less accurate. That is my professional opinion.

gad rgyangs said:

fair enough, point taken.

Malcolm wrote:

BTW, are you going to HHST Kalacakra in April? If so, maybe I will see you there.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 14th, 2014 at 8:03 AM

Title: Re: Ordination debate - vinaya/bodhisattva/upasaka

Content:

rory said:

Why on earth do you feel the need to patrol the behavior of monks and nuns?

Malcolm wrote:

Much of the Vinaya was written because of lay people complaining about the behavior of monks and nuns.

Quite frankly, the merit of giving dana to a so called ordained person who does not maintain his or her vows as perfectly as possible is no more than the merit of giving dana to an ordinary person dressed in maroon or yellow.

Ordained people are supposed to function as pure fields of merit for lay people. They do so by maintaining their vows, all of them, as many as they have, whether they be pratimokṣa, bodhisattva samvara, or Vajrayāna samaya. That is their job. When they don't do their job, they are thieves of merit.

Of course, people are free to do as they wish, to maintain their vows or break them at their leisure. But there are consequences, and one such consequence is that I won't support ordained people unless I am quite sure they are doing their job. Not because I need the merit personally, but based on principle.

rory said:

the Jain monastics (sadhus and sadhvis) manage just fine with these few rules.

Malcolm wrote:

We are not Jains, we're Buddhists.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 14th, 2014 at 7:15 AM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

Since this basic awareness cannot be found to have a cause other than itself, and since it has no defining characteristics of its own, and since it cannot be denied, or separated into any kind of 'non-awareness' parts, I would suggest that it is truly existent, non-specific, non-self, synonymous with the meaning of Dharmakaya and the essence of realization.

Malcolm wrote:

As I said before, you have a monistic hindu nondual view. Not even dharmakāya is "truly existent".

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 14th, 2014 at 7:03 AM

Title: Re: Perspective

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

"The Base, or Zhi in Tibetan, is the term used to denote the fundamental ground of existence, both at the universal level and at the level of the individual"

-ChNNR, "The Crystal and the Way of Light" pg 89

and besides, one of the meaning of sthāna is simply "place"

Malcolm wrote:

But it does not mean "ground".

You do realize that whole book was based on an edited transcript of a translation from Italian into English influenced by John Reynolds who was very active in the community then, correct? As you know quite well, these days, when referring the gzhi, ChNN uses the term "base" or "primordial state".

Personally, I don't care. But as far as I am concerned translating gzhi as ground is less accurate. That is my professional opinion.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 14th, 2014 at 5:58 AM

Title: Re: Perspective

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The term gzhi translates "sthana", which bears no meaning of "ground" at all.

gad rgyangs said:

first of all, its not a translation from Sanskrit, its written in Tibetan.

second of all, the tshig mdzod chen mo gives, as the definition of "gzhi," first:

ས་ཆ་དང་གནས་ལུས། (ground) and second:

རྩ་བ (root or basis) which is why it is translated as either in various Dzogchen translations.

Malcolm wrote:

I'll take your Alak Kankar and raise you a Khyentse. Khyentse Wangpo clearly defines gzhi as sthana.

gzhi does not mean མ་ཆ་དང་གནས་ཡུལ in a Dzogchen context.

All Tibetan Vajrayāna traditions, apart from Bon, assume an Indian source for their terminology.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 14th, 2014 at 5:20 AM

Title: Re: Perspective

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

I know that, but "ye" can also by extension mean "perfectly", since that which has always been liberated is perfectly liberated, and I felt it makes more sense to leave time out of it, since at that level there is no time.

Malcolm wrote:

In fact the verse is showing a contrast, that is why "bliss, having always been liberated," etc.

gad rgyangs said:

Anyway, its poetry theres always more than one way to translate it.

Malcolm wrote:

It's didactic verse, it is not poetry in any sense whatsoever.

gad rgyangs said:

I also like "vault" for "phyam" since it plays on the image of roof supports. I see no difference between my "expansive evenness of the Ground" and your "vast uniform basis".

Malcolm wrote:

The term gzhi translates "sthana", which bears no meaning of "ground" at all. Phyam here just mean ubiquitous, in my opinion.

gad rgyangs said:

that is clearly not the case. the whole passage lists many phenomena that are "ye grol" and there is clearly no cause and effect implied between them.

Malcolm wrote:

When bliss and suffering are contrasted, there is a link. Anyway, you are free to disagree, but when I read those lines I have a very different take on them that do you.

I guess my point is "So what?" My rejoinder to that is "What is the use of primordial Buddhahood if even your coarse obscurations have not been reduced." Some people seem to think that obscurations are not a problem once you become a Dzogchen practitioner. The more realistic Dzogchen perspective is found in The String of Pearls

As such, the three realms are the five aggregates, the five sense organs, the five limbs, the five functional organs,
the five objects, the five afflictions,
the five thoughts, the five minds, the five concepts, the apprehended objects and apprehending subjects established as samsara [... ] Caught in the aggregates, sense gates and the sense elements, the apprehended object and apprehending subject, samsara itself persists for a long while.
One is placed in the dungeon of name and matter in the castle of the three realms, tortured with the barbs of ignorance and so on,
oppressed by the thick darkness of samsara, attached to the salty taste of desire,
bound by the neck with the noose of confusion, burned with the hot fire of hatred,
head covered with pride, setting a rendezvous with the mistress of jealousy, surrounded by the army of enmity... tied by the neck with the noose of subject and object, [29b] stuck in the mud of successive traces and handcuffed with the ripening of karma.
Having been joined with the ripening of karma,
one takes bodies good and bad,
one after another like a water wheel,
born into each individual class.
Having crossed at the ford of self-grasping, one sinks into the ocean of suffering and one is caught by the heart on the hook of the three lower realms.
One is bound by oneself; the afflictions are the enemy.
The body of a hell being appears as fire or water.
Pretas are frightened and intimidated.
There is a fog-like appearance for animals.
The aggregates, sense gates and sense elements of humans appear as the five elements, and also happiness, suffering and indifference.
They appear as armor and weapons to asuras and desirable qualities for devas.
Such dualistic appearances, for example, are like a quickly moving wheel spinning continuously for a long while.

As such, diverse appearances are like seeing a snake from a rope; that [rope] is not [a snake] but is apprehended as a [snake];
forming as both the outer universe and inhabitants.
If that is investigated, it is a rope.
The universe and inhabitants have always been empty, the ultimate endowed with the form of the relative.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 14th, 2014 at 4:46 AM

Title: Re: Perspective

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

བདེ་བ་ཡི་གྲོལ་ཚེས་ཉིད་ལྷན་དུ་གྲོལ། སྤྱུག་བསྐྱེད་ཡི་གྲོལ་གཞི་མཉམ་ཡངས་པར་གྲོལ། happiness perfectly liberated, in the vault of dharmata liberated.

suffering perfectly liberated, expansive evenness of the Ground liberated.

Longchenpa - chos dbyings mdzod chapter 12

Malcolm wrote:

No, it is as follows:

Bliss, having always been liberated,* is liberated as ubiquitous dharmatā.
Suffering, having always been liberated, is liberated as the vast uniform basis.
*"Ye grol" is a contraction of "ye nas grol" and shows a past tense construction, i.e.
"having always been"

These are nice sentiments, but in truth they don't express anything different than standard Mahāyāna. The first line shows the result, the second, the cause.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 14th, 2014 at 4:33 AM

Title: Re: Middle Way Politics

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

Cheers. M. Will look up those people and see what they are up to.

Malcolm wrote:

Vandana Shiva

<http://www.navdanya.org>

Wendell Barry

<http://www.wendellberrybooks.com/author.html>

Bill Mckibben

<http://www.billmckibben.com>

These are probably three of the most well known active advocates of some form or another of deep ecology.

Three decades of writings on deep ecology:

<http://trumpeter.athabascau.ca/index.php/trumpet/search/search>

I imagine in the end you will be more comfortable with social ecology, since it comes out of the left and is based on class analysis and so on:

<http://www.thegreenfuse.org/socialecology.htm>

Murray Bookchin hated deep ecology, he writes:

What Is Deep Ecology?

Deep ecology is so much of a black hole of half-digested, ill-formed, and half-baked ideas that one can easily express utterly vicious notions like Foreman's and still sound like a fiery radical who challenges everything that is anti-ecological in the present realm of ideas. The very words deep ecology, in fact, clue is into the fact that we are not dealing with a body of clear ideas but with a bottomless pit in which vague notions and moods of all kinds can be such into the depths of an ideological toxic dump.

He spews more of the same here:

http://dwardmac.pitzer.edu/Anarchist\_Archives/bookchin/soccovdeepeco.html

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 14th, 2014 at 4:08 AM

Title: Re: Perspective

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

I just had a flashback to the Bergman movie "Fanny and Alexander", which portrays two households: one which embraces life and love in all its joy and sorrow, and the other, the Bishop's household, that exemplifies self- and other-loathing, coldness, "seriousness", and violence, all under the banner of "piety" and religion.

Adamantine said:

I'm sure that the film makes valid points when aimed at a Christian Bishop. Conflating traditions is the mistake of your proposed image in the OP.

gad rgyangs said:

and having a rosy picture of asian religious institutions is an orientalist fantasy.

Malcolm wrote:

And all of this is irrelevant to the Buddha's contention "sarva dukham". You don't have to agree, but it is one of the foundation teachings of the Buddhist view. You can fight it, struggle with it, but in the end "sarva dukkham", there is nothing left out of this, apart from the path.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 14th, 2014 at 3:52 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen rhetoric and the gradual / instant dichotomy

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

Well, he is a Gemini after all.

heart said:

and I am libra,hmmm...

dzogchungpa said:

Yeah, you air types are always a bit wacky.

Malcolm wrote:

I have virgo rising, keeps my feet on the ground.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 14th, 2014 at 3:32 AM

Title: Re: Middle Way Politics

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

... great efforts at conservation are argued not only as something good and profitable for human beings, but also as something valuable for what is intended to be conserved... Without wanting to repeat myself, can you give us some kind of idea of what these 'great efforts' actually comprise of - other than the great effort you put into your particular form of healing?

I'm really not being facetious, I just don't feel I've had a satisfactory answer to my question yet. Can you give me some practical examples of the conservation activities that Deep Ecologists are actively involved in at the moment?

Malcolm wrote:

Deep ecologists can be found in all aspects of the conservation movement. But I frankly doubt that most of the people who call themselves "deep ecologists" really understand what deep ecology really means.

Basically, Arne Naess identified three great movements of the 20th century: the peace movement, the social justice movement and the deep ecology movement. All three of these can be included under the rubric of "green" politics. But he clarified, you can't do all three. You have to pick one.

For example, while green politics have been largely coopted by the new left in the form of Social Ecology, there are "greens" like myself who are deep ecologists. There is no badge that distinguishes a deep ecologist from any other type of environmentalist. There is no organization to join. However, Vandana Shiva is a deep ecologist, Joanna Macy, Julia Butterfly Hill, Gary Snyder, John Seed, Pierre-Félix Guattari, Fritzjof Capra, Wendell Barry (recently arrested demonstrating against coal mining in Appalachia) are all people who have some connection with the movement. But as it is not a left wing or right wing trip, it is not organized into cadres with political action committees and so on. Deep ecology is an organic movement. It is slow growing, but then, so are trees. It tends to propagate rhizomatically, like fungus.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 14th, 2014 at 3:12 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen rhetoric and the gradual / instant dichotomy

Content:

heart said:

He isn't really making the point that vidya needs a gradual improvement as some seems to think.

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

I never implied that was the point he was making.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 14th, 2014 at 3:10 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen rhetoric and the gradual / instant dichotomy

Content:

Sherlock said:

So your conclusion now is that basically besides its methods Dzogchen isn't very different from other Vajrayana paths?

Malcolm wrote:

Dzogchen is quite different from other Vajrayāna paths (which are really just summed up by the two stages).

But it is a path and its context must be understood in connection with how paths are expressed in Mahāyāna and General Secret Mantra.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 14th, 2014 at 2:59 AM

Title: Re: Perspective

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

The Japanese have the most sophisticated understanding of this, called <https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Wabi-sabi>.

Malcolm wrote:

Wabi-sabi (侘寂?) represents a comprehensive Japanese world view or aesthetic centered on the acceptance of transience and imperfection. The aesthetic is sometimes described as one of beauty that is "imperfect, impermanent, and incomplete".[1] It is a concept derived from the Buddhist teaching of the three marks of existence (三法印 sanbōin?), specifically impermanence (無常 mujō?), the other two being suffering (苦 ku?) and emptiness or absence of self-nature (空 kū?).

gad rgyangs said:

no one is claiming there is no such thing as suffering, the point is do you reject life altogether because of dualities like happiness/suffering (again: that other thread "make life meaningless") or practice upekṣā and non-attachment to all experience?

Sometimes it seems that Buddhism is neurotically obsessed with suffering, attached to suffering. Ironic, no?

I do object though to the attempts to negate happiness by claiming that it is actually suffering. This is a dangerous form of cultivating negativity that can lead to the very kinds of hell realms in the here-and-now that Adamantine was referring to.

Malcolm wrote:

No, I simply understand that no matter how things may appear, no matter whatever samsaric happiness I experience, everything other than path dharmas are suffering. But it doesn't mean I reach for the hair shirt.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 14th, 2014 at 2:56 AM

Title: Re: Middle Way Politics

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

I think you are reading way too much into deep ecology in order to then justify to yourself that it is Buddhist and thus not worldly dharma.

Malcolm wrote:

I don't think that deep ecology is Buddhadharma. However I think it is ethically consistent with Buddhadharma for a number of reasons.

Sherab Dorje said:

The deep, in deep ecology, means ecocentric instead of anthropocentric.

I am not going to deny that ecocentrism is undoubtedly less dualistic than anthropocentrism. But on the basis of this rhetoric capitalism, being ego and anthropo-centric, cannot fall within the milieu of non-dualism (or more correctly, ecocentrism) and thus cannot be justified as somehow fitting into a deep ecology model. When was the last time you ran into an ecologically minded CEO of Enron (for example), the World Bank, or the IMF?

Do not confound the two (non-dual and ecocentric).

Malcolm wrote:

You are quite simple mistaken. Frederick Bender clarifies this point in his The Culture of Extinction:

In Buddhism, the technical term for the ontological quality of particulars, incorporating both their phenomenality and their interdependence, is "suchness" (Skt. tathatha). To frame objects in their suchness is, in Mahayana Buddhist terminology, to express the nondualist "two-truth" doctrine. Particulars, if framed dualistically through the prevalent subject/object (egocentric) and subject/predicate (linguistic) dualities, are real only conventionally. Something similar to the Buddhist two-truth doctrine defines ecological thinking. Living beings are phenomenal manifestations of Earth's ecosphere. They are also particulars-in-relation, though not "bare," self-standing particulars. Deep ecology's so-called depth, considered ontologically, functions as a metaphor for nondualism.

Frederic L. Bender. The Culture of Extinction: Toward a Philosophy of Deep Ecology (Kindle Locations 4373-4376). Kindle Edition.

Arne Naess also states:

The belief and acceptance that all whole beings can attain Buddhahood depend upon the rejection of subject-object dualism. That is, one must abandon the sentiment that there is always and always must be an ego involved in experience. An appeal to spontaneity, perhaps especially spontaneous experience in nature, is preferable to a detached view of subject-object relations.

The nondualism in Buddhism is sometimes expressed verbally by saying that all beings are one, or that each being is one with all other beings. Such a formula must not be taken in the counterintuitive sense that, for example, I cannot be cold and hungry and somebody else warm and satisfied. The formula does not imply rejection of personal pronouns or any psychology of the ego and self.

It is an interesting problem to formulate clearly the views that have rejection of subject-object dualism as a common characteristic. Whatever way we formulate the nondualism, adherents of deep ecology tend to feel sympathy with views such as the following, expressed by Yasuaki Nara:

"n Dōgen, through the negation of the egocentric self, whole being, including man, animal, mountains, rivers, grasses, trees etc., is one with him, making both nature and himself encompassed within the world of the Buddha."

Naess, Arne (2009-05-01). The Ecology of Wisdom: Writings by Arne Naess (pp. 198-199). Counterpoint. Kindle Edition.

Sherab Dorje said:

Foremans approach does not deny humans a role in an ecosystem, it just does not make them the centre of the system. Thus it is an ecocentric platform: an approach that puts the benefit of the whole (ecosystem) above that of one of the parts (humans).

Malcolm wrote:

Naess' position is a little different. First he questions the usefulness of the term "biocentric", "ecocentric" and so on:

Supporters of the deep ecology movement like to say that they support ecocentrism, not anthropocentrism, and Spinoza certainly offers high-level premises for what has sometimes been labeled biocentric or ecocentric egalitarianism. I think these Latin or Greek terms are useless in serious discussions, but they may be helpful in offering some vague idea of a kind of basic attitude. Spinoza tried something immensely difficult, namely, to articulate with some preciseness certain basic attitudes.

He continues a bit later by saying:

It is characteristic of the deep ecology movement that great efforts at conservation are argued not only as something good and profitable for human beings, but also as something valuable for what is intended to be conserved. It is worthy of conservation, independently of any narrow human interests. This is often called the nonanthropocentric or biocentric or ecocentric view. Nevertheless, in the current social and political milieu, success in conservation efforts depends heavily on arguments that do stress narrowly human interests, especially the requirements of human health. The supporters of the deep ecology movement combine such arguments with those that are independent of narrow human interests.<sup>11</sup> It is essential that "experts" and others who influence policies agree about this combination and that the public be made aware that basically there is agreement. Otherwise, the public is deceived.

Naess, Arne (2009-05-01). The Ecology of Wisdom: Writings by Arne Naess (p. 303). Counterpoint. Kindle Edition.

This why why "hard" ecocentrism cannot be construed even remotely as deep ecology. Anyway, Bookchin claimed that Earth First! had converted to social ecology as it turned leftwing.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 14th, 2014 at 12:58 AM

Title: Re: Perspective

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

The Japanese have the most sophisticated understanding of this, called <https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Wabi-sabi>.

Malcolm wrote:

Wabi-sabi (侘寂?) represents a comprehensive Japanese world view or aesthetic centered on the acceptance of transience and imperfection. The aesthetic is sometimes described as one of beauty that is "imperfect, impermanent, and incomplete".[1] It is a concept derived from the Buddhist teaching of the three marks of existence (三法印 sanbōin?), specifically impermanence (無常 mujō?), the other two being suffering (苦 ku?) and emptiness or absence of self-nature (空 kū?).

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 14th, 2014 at 12:27 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen rhetoric and the gradual / instant dichotomy

Content:

heart said:

Like I said, rigpa doesn't last. That is the meaning of "not ripened" and so on.

Malcolm wrote:

No, that is not the meaning of "unripened", the meaning of unripened, as clearly explained in the Vima Nyingthig, is that vidyā is defined as an awareness that defiled by many cognitions. In this case there is really no difference between what is termed the clarity aspect of the mind and vidyā.

heart said:

Well, when I use the word rigpa it is only a synonym for recognizing the natural state. With the deepest respect I must say that it seems to me that you might misunderstand the meaning of these various vidya's from Vima Nyingtik.

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

With all due respect, I do not misunderstand the Vima Nyinthig. The Vima Nyinthig passage in question is extremely clear and is repeated in more than one place. So no, it is not possible that I misunderstand the meaning of the passage in question.

For example, in the Zangs Yig Can, Vimala writes:

What is that "vidyā?"

Vidyā with knowledge obscurations is knowing and lucid.

Here it is clearly stated that Vidyā can possess obscurations of knowledge.

And:

1) Characteristic is called “the vidyā which designates general phenomena and just its own names.” Its action is just-that-itself being a clear non-conceptual awareness, which is polluted by many cognitions.

2) Appropriating the basis*: when all cognitions are created when abiding in one’s body, and existing within its own clarity; this is called “the unripe vidyā.”

*basis here refers to the body.

There are three more:

the vidyā present in the basis

the vidyā of insight

the vidyā of tögal

He concludes:

Are those vidyā’ the same, or are they different?

There is nothing other than a single essence.

Therefore, vidyā has different modes depending on whether or not you have received instruction or not. The essence of the vidyā does not change. But the context of how it is understood changes depending on whether you are on the path or not. This is why it is termed "contaminated by many cognitions", and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 13th, 2014 at 11:54 PM

Title: Re: Ordination debate - vinaya/bodhisattva/upasaka

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Much harder to monitor the conduct of itinerant monks such as yourself. But this is also why posadha is so important for monastics.

Indrajala said:

You can't harm the clouds and water.

Malcolm wrote:

They can be easily polluted.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 13th, 2014 at 11:53 PM

Title: Re: Dzogchen rhetoric and the gradual / instant dichotomy

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

No, that is not the meaning of "unripened", the meaning of unripened, as clearly explained in the Vlma Nyingthig, is that vidyā is defined as an awareness that defiled by many cognitions. In this case there is really no difference between what is termed the clarity aspect of the mind and vidyā.

asunthatneversets said:

So these first two of Vimalamitra's five definitions are essentially synonymous?

The vidyā that apprehends characteristics: "the vidyā that imputes phenomena as universals and as mere personal names", is one's mere non-conceptual self-knowing awareness defiled by many cognitions.

The [vidyā that] appropriates the basis [i.e. the human body] creates all cognitions when present in one's body, and is present as the mere intrinsic clarity [of those cognitions] is called "unripened vidyā".

Malcolm wrote:

The former is talking about vidyā in its contaminated state, the second is talking about vidyā as the essence of those contaminating cognitions.

In the end, if you really pay close attention and put aside all the rhetoric, Dzogchen doctrines about the nature of the mind are not terribly different than those of Lamdre, Kalacakra and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 13th, 2014 at 11:51 PM

Title: Re: Climate Change: We're Doomed

Content:

kirtu said:

It is unfortunately what we will have to do.

Malcolm wrote:

I am not in agreement. There is no place for nuclear fission power in any ecologically sustainable future.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 13th, 2014 at 10:40 PM

Title: Re: Ordination debate - vinaya/bodhisattva/upasaka

Content:

Indrajala said:

So, which takes precedence: the norms of your community or the archaic rulebook which promises you hell for non-compliance?

Malcolm wrote:

The archaic rulebook. This why Ashokan era type reforms are occasionally needed in the Sangha to expel "Bhikṣus" who are not maintaining their vows.

Indrajala said:

This isn't really practical unless the state is involved, otherwise the sangha lacks the teeth to really do much other than ask people to go away and maybe blacklist them.

Malcolm wrote:

Monasteries can handle this. In Tibet, in the stricter monasteries like Ngor if you committed a defeat, or were a general reprobate, you would be shown the door.

Much harder to monitor the conduct of itinerant monks such as yourself. But this is also why posadha is so important for monastics.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 13th, 2014 at 10:31 PM

Title: Re: Climate Change: We're Doomed

Content:

kirtu said:

safe nuclear design (which does exist).

Malcolm wrote:

No, it doesn't. And the energy needed to extract uranium is hugely expensive, leaves radioactive waste behind, etc.

NO NUKES!

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 13th, 2014 at 10:09 PM

Title: Re: Ordination debate - vinaya/bodhisattva/upasaka

Content:

Indrajala said:

So, which takes precedence: the norms of your community or the archaic rulebook which promises you hell for non-compliance?

Malcolm wrote:

The archaic rulebook. This why Ashokan era type reforms are occasionally needed in the Sangha to expel "Bhikṣus" who are not maintaining their vows.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 13th, 2014 at 10:07 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist Hate Crimes

Content:

Jigme Tsultrim said:

committed just 3 months ago in Thailand by failing to give protection to 1500 refugees of Buddhist violence in Myanmar.

theanarchist said:

I don't see where this qualifies as BUDDHIST violence. As buddhism doesn't permit or justify violence those are clearly deeds that have absolutely nothing to do with buddhism but are motivated by racism, xenophobia and completely worldly aggression.

Why should people living in a buddhist country act differently than the inhabitants of christian or muslim countries? They all have the same negative emotions and delusions.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 13th, 2014 at 9:46 PM

Title: Re: Perspective

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

you're joking right? you've never heard the "licking honey off a razor" metaphor? Are you seriously claiming that most Buddhism doesn't portray "samsara" as nothing but suffering?

Malcolm wrote:

It is nothing but suffering, even Dzogchen tantras clearly state this.

gad rgyangs said:

There's even attempts to poison people's happiness by claiming that even when you think you're happy, you're actually suffering but you just don't know it!!!!

Malcolm wrote:

There is no need to attempt to poison such happiness, it is poisoned already. This happiness is termed "the suffering of change."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 13th, 2014 at 9:30 PM

Title: Re: Climate Change: We're Doomed

Content:

Kim O'Hara said:

I'm not sure what you mean by that ... you may have to use a few more words.

Malcolm wrote:

Houses and buildings should be designed, and retrofitted where possible, to generate their own power and provide it to the grid.

Kim O'Hara said:

I agree that's a good way to go. It is also a strategy which PV power is ideally suited to, so I'm more and more puzzled by your negativity about PV.

Malcolm wrote:

I am not so much negative about PV power generation as I am about its manner of implementation. Solar panels on a roof is one thing. Acres and acres of solar panels creates hot spots and dead zones, which add to local ambient temperatures and in many cases, at least in northern climes, require the extinction of grasslands which are just as crucial the Co2/O2 balance as trees and rain forests are.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 13th, 2014 at 9:25 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist Hate Crimes

Content:

Rickpa said:

As a member of a group, you should be mindful that humans tend to judge any group of which they are outside, by the worst examples.

Malcolm wrote:

Indeed, this however does not mean that one need feel "shame" for being a Buddhist merely because there are afflicted "Buddhists" out there who do murderous things to innocents.

Likewise, I feel no shame about being an American despite that fact my government has done terrible things. But those things were done without my consent and I oppose them.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 13th, 2014 at 9:02 PM

Title: Re: Middle Way Politics

Content:

Kim O'Hara said:

Thank you for your recent posts here, Malcolm (and to Greg and others for prompting them). Deep Ecology is something that has been on the fringe of my thinking for years and I now realise that there is more value in it for me if only I look into it more deeply and I will try to do so. Do you have any getting-up-to-speed recommendations for me?

Kim

Malcolm wrote:

Well, there is Sessions and Devall's "Deep Ecology: Living as if Nature Mattered."

But a better resource is:

<http://trumpeter.athabasca.ca/index.php/trumpet/search/search>

Here are the archives that go back to 1983, thirty-one years of journal issues on deep ecology. It is very eclectic, and there are extensive articles on the role of Buddhism in deep ecology, as well as Jainism, Hinduism, Taoism and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 13th, 2014 at 8:40 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist Hate Crimes

Content:

Jigme Tsultrim said:

Take comfort in your clean hands, if you can.

Malcolm wrote:

I don't believe in guilt by association, and neither should you. Why should all Christians be held liable for the acts of a few, or all Muslims? Therefore, all Buddhists should not be held liable for the murderous acts of a few misguided nationalists who have mistaken Buddhadharma for an ethnic identity.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 13th, 2014 at 8:34 PM

Title: Re: Dzogchen rhetoric and the gradual / instant dichotomy

Content:

heart said:

Like I said, rigpa doesn't last. That is the meaning of "not ripened" and so on.

Malcolm wrote:

No, that is not the meaning of "unripened", the meaning of unripened, as clearly explained in the Vlma Nyingthig, is that vidyā is defined as an awareness that defiled by many cognitions. In this case there is really no difference between what is termed the clarity aspect of the mind and vidyā.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 13th, 2014 at 8:33 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

Sönam said:

Just found that about anarchism, it's about what it is ... not what it is said it is.

S.

Malcolm wrote:

Sonam, that is not anarchism, that is called "Being a decent person".

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 13th, 2014 at 8:30 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist Hate Crimes

Content:

Jigme Tsultrim said:

I know I am sickened and deeply ashamed. Are YOU??

Malcolm wrote:

Am I sad that there are sentient beings out there who have afflictions, who act in ways contradictory to Buddhadharma, of course. Am I ashamed? Why should I be? I did not engage in those actions, I did not and do not condone them.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 13th, 2014 at 8:26 PM

Title: Re: Middle Way Politics

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Some people disagree with Naess. But fundamental to deep ecology is that one develops one's own ecosophy. Each person's ecosophy is personal. To understand this, you have to understand the apron diagram he and Sessions came up. He notes:

One main point in deep ecology is the deep argumentation, that is, argumentation from ultimate (philosophical, religious) premises, but there is room for very different sets of such premises.

Sherab Dorje said:

In which case one cannot judge Earth First! and say that it was not a deep ecology movement. I believe that the whole issue between people like Naess and Earth First! was the theory vs practice divide. Talking the talk vs walking the walk. The members of Earth First! sacrificed their lives putting Deep Ecology into practice (direct action to protect an ecosystem) whereas Naess produced journals and received university tenures and state sponsored awards. BOTH had a role to play in the development of Deep Ecology both as a theory and as a practice.

Malcolm wrote:

As pointed out, the architects and theorists of deep ecology do not consider Earth First! to be an expression of deep ecology. As for direct action, Naess was a direct action kind of person. He blocked access to a dam site for twenty years.

There are certain criteria that render one's view as "deep ecological", and lacking those, one cannot describe oneself as a deep ecologist no matter how ecocentric one's views may be. That is, the basis of one's philosophy must lead inevitably to the platform of deep ecology. It can be generated by different value systems such as Buddhist, Christian or Philosophical values. The "deep" in deep ecology is a gloss for "nondual". When other systems are described as shallow, it means that they stem from a dualistic perspective of the world that does not take into consideration the intrinsic non-duality which underlies dependent origination. While not formally a Mahāyāna Buddhist himself, he was a nondualist, and Naess draws upon the two truth theory as well as the tathāgatagarbha theory as he understood them, but he is educated enough to understand that there are Christians nondualisms, Islamic nondualisms and so on. He pretty much clearly states that if your ultimate philosophy is not nondualist, then you will have a hard time arriving at a deep ecology platform.

Ideally it works like this:

One's ultimate premise forms the basis. This is termed level one. Upon that one builds one's platform principles, one's view, i.e. level two. Upon that, one establishes one's policies, one's meditation, if you will, level three; and finally, one engages in practical actions, one's conduct, i.e. level four.

The way he frames this for himself is as follows, his ecosophy:

(N = norm; H=hypothesis, exclamation points represent a value norm)

N1: Self-realization!

H1: The higher the Self-realization attained by anyone, the broader and deeper the identification with others.

H2: The higher the level of Self-realization attained by anyone, the more its further increase depends upon the Self-realization of others.

H3: Complete Self-realization of anyone depends on that of all.

N2: Self-realization for all living beings!

He then offers the following for the environment:

H4: Diversity of life increases Self-realization potentials.

N3: Diversity of Life!

H5: Complexity of life increases Self-realization potentials.

N4: Complexity!

H6: Life resources of the Earth are limited.

H7: Symbiosis maximizes Self-realization potentials under conditions of limited resources.

N5: Symbiosis!

My ecosophy would, and does, run something like the following:

N1 Tathagātagarbha!

H1 All sentient beings are innately buddhas.

H2 The highest goal in life to help all sentient beings achieve that buddhahood.

N2 Bodhicitta!

H3 The way help all sentient beings achieve buddhahood is the bodhisattva path

N3 Bodhisattva!

And so on.

The problem with Foreman's platform is that it excludes humans and is overly biocentric, it is therefore shallow as it is not grounded in nondualist philosophy.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 13th, 2014 at 9:18 AM

Title: Re: Climate Change: We're Doomed

Content:

Kim O'Hara said:

I'm not sure what you mean by that ... you may have to use a few more words.

Malcolm wrote:

Houses and buildings should be designed, and retrofitted where possible, to generate their own power and provide it to the grid.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 13th, 2014 at 9:16 AM

Title: Re: karmic law vs. causal nexus

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

Thought this would make for interesting discussion, just got done reading Lojong:

Cultivating Compassion Through Training The Mind, by Traleg Kyabgon Rinpoche - great book.

Anyway there is this interesting bit on Karma that kind of stuck with me, so i'll just throw the quote out there and see what people think:

Traleg Kyabgon said:

Luckily for us, the karmic causal nexus is not a mechanical, predetermined operation but is instead quite malleable. We are not condemned to suffer its consequences.

Buddhism doesn't entertain the notion of any kind of moral law. The reference to "karmic law" is a Western concept that has been introduced into Buddhist thinking. The relationship between cause and effect far too complex and indeterminate to be a "law". There is some kind of karmic causal nexus, but there is no such thing as a cosmic law, because cause and effect is all about human action.

Johnny Dangerous said:

We get into a lot of talks on here about Karma, quite often people put forth a model of Karma that is somewhat absolute, this seems to indicate something in the opposite direction, what do you guys think about this quote?

Malcolm wrote:

I think he trying to make people (who do not understand the role of afflictions in generating karma and its results) that karma is not an external operator.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 13th, 2014 at 8:51 AM

Title: Re: Middle Way Politics

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

M,

Could you give us some idea of any practical steps that deep ecologists would engage in. It appears to be a perspective... but what do deep ecologists either do or not do? What practical steps do you engage in?

Malcolm wrote:

I told you already, I learned an ancient medical tradition, which does not rely on industrial medicine and will survive industrial civilization should it fail, and spent more than five years of my life doing so.

I studied this form of medicine as a direct outgrowth of my longstanding commitment to the principles of deep ecology as articulated by its founder, Arne Naess.

My commitment to deep ecology does not suggest that my approach is the only approach, as Naess said "The front is long", meaning that there is room for much diversity of thought in the ecological community. But while social ecology, ecofeminism and so on have useful things to say about social justice issues, etc., their approach is "shallow", meaning ultimately anthropocentric, and not deep. I also think the deep green resistance approach is shallow, and not deep because of their trenchant misanthropy. We can say that any ecological movement based on misanthropy is shallow.

Another point of Naess is that the blue/red political axis is irrelevant to deep ecology itself:

Now a short note on three great contemporary world-wide movements which call for grassroot activism.

The three movements are: the peace movement, the oldest and at present remarkably dormant. But if military expenditures are not rapidly decreasing from about 900 billion dollars a year, I expect it will revive. Then there are many movements I put together under the name 'the social justice movement'. It includes the feminist movement and part of the social ecology movement. As the third movement, one might perhaps also use the more vague term, radical environmentalism because to use the specific terminology of deep ecology will sooner or later elicit boredom and aggression. But the name 'radical environmentalism' smacks of the old metaphor suggesting humanity surrounded by something outside, the so-called environment of humans; it does not start with ecological concepts. And in the US it will take a long time before radicalism loses its connection with the political red-blue axis which now is irrelevant.

<http://trumpeter.athabasca.ca/index.php/trumpet/article/view/432/708>

Some people disagree with Naess. But fundamental to deep ecology is that one develops one's own ecosophy. Each person's ecosophy is personal. To understand this, you have to understand the apron diagram he and Sessions came up. He notes:

One main point in deep ecology is the deep argumentation, that is, argumentation from ultimate (philosophical, religious) premises, but there is room for very different sets of such premises.

Naess, Arne (2009-05-01). The Ecology of Wisdom: Writings by Arne Naess (p. 108). Counterpoint. Kindle Edition.

And:

The platform principles of the deep ecology movement can be grounded for individual supporters in a religion or an ultimate philosophy. There is a great diversity of religions and philosophies from which people can support these principles. In a loose sense, the deep ecology movement can be said to be derived from these kinds of fundamentals. The situation reminds us that a set of very similar or even identical conclusions may be drawn from divergent premises. The platform can be the same, even though the fundamental premises differ. One must avoid looking for one definite philosophy or religion among all the supporters of the deep ecology movement. Fortunately, there is a rich manifold of fundamental views compatible with the platform of the deep ecology movement. Supporters live in different cultures and have different religions. Furthermore, there is a plethora of consequences derived from the platform because of these and other differences.

Naess, Arne (2009-05-01). The Ecology of Wisdom: Writings by Arne Naess (pp. 114-115). Counterpoint. Kindle Edition.

And:

Personally, I favor the kind of powerful premises represented in Chinese, Indian, Islamic, and Hebrew philosophy, as well as in Western philosophy—namely, those having as a slogan the so-called ultimate unity of all life. They do not hide the fact that big fish eat small ones, but stress the profound interdependence, the functional unity, of such a biospheric magnitude that nonviolence, mutual respect, and feelings of identification are always potentially there, even between the predator and its so-called victim. In many cultures, identification is not limited merely to other living things but also to the mineral world, which helps us conceive of ourselves as genuine surface fragments of our planet, fragments capable of somehow experiencing the existence of all other fragments: a microcosm of the macrocosm.

Naess, Arne (2009-05-01). The Ecology of Wisdom: Writings by Arne Naess (pp. 131-132). Counterpoint. Kindle Edition.

So, I am a Buddhist practitioner with a long standing (27 years) commitment to a deep ecological outlook, and this is what informs my political outlook.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 13th, 2014 at 7:40 AM

Title: Re: Ordination debate - vinaya/bodhisattva/upasaka

Content:

Zhen Li said:

Well, if you are arguing that Mahayana does away with the Vinaya, that's clearly not true.

Malcolm wrote:

Of course it is not true.

The Ārya Akṣayamatīnirdeśatīka states:

As such, having heard the śīla regulations [saṃvara], just as the Bhagavan said, the training is to be done according the 250 śīlas such as the four defeats, the thirteen saṃghāvaśeṣāḥ and so on without the slightest infraction is how the training should be followed.

So we see that some Mahāyāna attitudes towards monastic vows and vinaya were positive for Mahāyāna monks in India, at least in the textual tradition.

There is another passage in this same texts that one's conduct, immediate activities and inclination towards virtue must be in accord with the world, one ought not be reproached by the world, that that one must follow Vinaya and not contradict the Vinaya.

I suspect that this is the reason why in Tibet, uneducated lay people were generally not permitted to know the regulations of monastic śīla since it might cause them to lose faith in monks if those monks were perceived to not be following Vinaya correctly. This is also important medically, since a number traditional medicinal formulas called for the urine of an eight year old male child or a bhikṣu of pure vows, which generally means someone who has never had sexual relations in their entire life.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 13th, 2014 at 5:31 AM

Title: Re: Ordination debate - vinaya/bodhisattva/upasaka

Content:

Indrajala said:

There's actually a class of bhikṣu called a svāgata-bhikṣu, which refers to those bhikṣus in the Buddha's sangha who never received any precepts. They just had only to show up and join the sangha to be welcomed into it, like Mahākāśyapa. This means there actually is (or was) a class of bhikṣu without any formal precepts.

Malcolm wrote:

No, by being welcomed by the Buddha, they had precepts automatically.

Indrajala said:

In China and Japan the monks came up with an idea that liquor could be "medicine liquor" and consumed as such without any violation of the precepts.

Malcolm wrote:

Bhikṣus can indeed use alcohol medicinally, there is a class of medicines, medicinal wines, called Arishtams in Ayurveda or རྩིས་ཆང་ in Tibetan, medicinal beers, and if a monk, nun or novice is ill, they can use these medicines when prescribed by a doctor. This is well known.

Indrajala said:

There's actually medical evidence suggesting a glass of wine or two a day can be good for your health. This means arguably a monk or nun could enjoy a glass of wine or two with their medicine meal and be at no fault.

Malcolm wrote:

If it was prescribed by their doctor for a specific condition, of course there is no fault.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 13th, 2014 at 4:31 AM

Title: Re: Guru Rinpoche practices within the Sakya tradition

Content:

Kunga said:

Sure, agreed, in Western Dharma centres it is as you say, particularly, I think, because the VY transmission is more frequently given and taught. The GR tsog is complicated and not easy to fit into western schedules, and actually Nyingmapa in origin.

narraboth said:

well, depends on how elaborate you want to do Guru rinpoche tsog... Nyingma tsog ritual is a little bit different from Sarma ritual, but you can always find some brief text to do (I believe Rigpa centre uses brief tsog texts). In sense of 'western schedules', they are all on the same date of Tibetan calendar.

conebeckham said:

Sure, Nyingma tsoks and Sarma Tsoks do have different ritual outlines, details, etc., no doubt. But in my experience, Nyingma tsoks, especially in the various terma traditions, are quite a bit shorter than Sarma procedures. The main thing I think is the amount of liturgy.....

Lots of Kagyupas do Konchok Chidu, Peaceful Guru, for instance, and there's a pretty condensed (but profound) tsok in that tradition.

Malcolm wrote:

I forgot to mention that in some cases on the first tenth day a Sapan Guru Yoga might be done, or perhaps a Lamdre Guru offering.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 13th, 2014 at 4:24 AM

Title: Re: Middle Way Politics

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

...belonging to a place

This sounds like a deep conservatism...

Malcolm wrote:

Deep ecology is deeply conservative. But not in the modern sense of the term.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 13th, 2014 at 4:22 AM

Title: Re: Middle Way Politics

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

Except, my dear Malcolm, there is more to Deep Ecology than just Naess. Earth First was a deep ecologist movement/organisation too you know. I have to admit that I was always more partial to social ecology, deep ecology tips towards the right (cf Ecofascism) too easily.

Malcolm wrote:

One can espouse an ecocentric view without it being consistent with ecosophy, aka deep ecology.

On David Foreman's supposed "deep ecology", George Sessions write:

Lee is adamant that Deep Ecology has been the philosophy of Earth First! although she admits that most EF!ers read very little Deep Ecology philosophy, and that specific mention of Deep Ecology did not appear in the E.F! Journal until mid-1984 (pp.18, 37, 57). It is rather painful to read about some of the positions taken by the Foreman faction in the E.F! Journal: for example, Foreman arguing that even a nuclear war would not be that damaging to the Earth and would hasten the end of industrial society, his remark that "wilderness is the real world" (it's all real! - it's just that the rest has to be restored and reinhabited) and his remarks elsewhere that we should "allow Ethiopians to starve"; Christopher Manes suggesting that one solution to overpopulation would be to dismantle the medical technology designed to save lives, and of AIDS as Nature's solution to overpopulation; and Reed Noss writing of genetic "deep ecology elite" as a "chosen people" out to save the Earth (pp. 64, 68, 83-84, 92-3, 101-3). [Paul Shepard and E.O. Wilson have claimed that all humans have the "wilderness gene" but that it is suppressed, especially in modern urban people.] Since many, but not all, of these articles appeared under various pseudonyms, this leads to speculation as to whether Foreman, Manes, and the others were merely exercising their rights as individuals to the free expression of radical and shocking (and perhaps misanthropic) ideas; whether these ideas were meant to express the philosophy of Earth First!; and/or whether they thought they were expounding ideas which were the natural outcome of Deep Ecology philosophy. If the latter, they were radically mistaken in their understanding of Deep Ecology philosophy as espoused by Naess and other Deep Ecology movement theorists.

Lee accurately points out that Edward Abbey's ideas, expressed mainly through his novels (and his association with Earth First!) "had inspired the founding of the movement" (p. 126). Given that "since Earth First!'s inception, Dave Foreman had served as its prophet and leader" (p. 105) together with Foreman's idolizing of Abbey, the predominant philosophy and ideology of Earth First! throughout the 1980's is probably best described, not as Deep Ecology, but rather as an idiosyncratic, somewhat misanthropic Abbey/Foreman version of ecocentrism, coupled with a monkey wrenching/"rednecks for wilderness" image that some people found offensive.

<http://trumpeter.athabascau.ca/index.php/trumpet/article/view/232/333>

Again, if it is not consistent with Naess or Sessions and Duvall, it is not deep ecology.

Indeed, deep ecology has been critiqued as a conservative and even a right wing movement:

Devall and Sessions do not question the distribution or ownership of land. Their first principle of land management is to "encourage agencies, legislators, property owners and managers" to flow with natural processes. 'Deep Ecology: Living as if Nature Mattered' p.145

Deep ecology is not concerned with who should own land or whether land ownership is legitimate, but only with how it is treated.

At best deep ecology is apolitical, and though it claims to be beyond such distinctions, many feel deep ecology tends towards a right-wing perspective. Social ecologists and ecofeminists agree that not enough analysis is done by deep ecology of the social forces at work in the destruction of the biosphere.

<http://www.thegreenfuse.org/deepcrit.htm#oppressive>

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 13th, 2014 at 3:36 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen rhetoric and the gradual / instant dichotomy

Content:

Adamantine said:

Or did you mean it as in: samsaric sentient beings can only perceive the nirmanakaya and possibly the sambhogakaya qualities of a Buddha, but are unable to perceive their dharmakaya quality?

Malcolm wrote:

It means that ordinary people can only see nirmanakāyas. Practitioners of specific realization on the path can see the sambhogakāya. The level at which they can see the sambhogakāya varies depending on the path. The Sambhogakāya images one sees on the four visions are not the actual sambhogakāya since those images are inert. However, at a certain point in the path of the four visions one can see the actual sambhogakāya. The sight of the dharmakāya only occurs at the end of the four visions, i.e. the exhaustion of dharmatā.

In this respect then, Dzogchen is no more non-gradual than any other Buddhist path.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, February 12th, 2014 at 10:24 PM

Title: Re: Perspective

Content:

Virgo said:

So basically can anyone perceive the Dharmakaya?

Kevin

Malcolm wrote:

Only Buddhas.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, February 12th, 2014 at 10:11 PM

Title: Re: Middle Way Politics

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

No. I am saying that the man in question lost the right to use that property. It is an entirely different kind of thing.

Sherab Dorje said:

So you give the gun back after the situation has been "defused"???

Malcolm wrote:

In the US, such a person is then deemed a felon, and as such as barred from owning any sort of firearms for life.

Sherab Dorje said:

This is just not true. A true statement would be: "As you can see some of us Deep Ecologists..."

Malcolm wrote:

If you are not following the thought of Arne Naess, you are not a Deep Ecologist.

Sherab Dorje said:

Many Deep Ecologists would go so far as to promote the sterilisation of non-indigenous humans too.

Malcolm wrote:

Those people are not Deep Ecologists, whatever else they may be. I think you are confusing the thought of the so called "Deep Greens" with Deep Ecology. Their thought is not consistent with either deep ecological ethics nor with Buddhist ethics:

But violence is a broad category of action; it can be wielded destructively or wisely. We can decide when property destruction is acceptable, against which physical targets, and with what risks to civilians. We can decide whether direct violence against people is appropriate.

Jensen, Derrick; MCBay, Aric; Keith, Lierre (2011-01-04). Deep Green Resistance: Strategy to Save the Planet (Kindle Locations 1252-1253). Seven Stories Press. Kindle Edition.

As you can clearly see, the founder of Deep Ecology, Naess, is utterly opposed to this sort of thinking.

Sherab Dorje said:

But really, it is all a juggling game, no matter which side of the non-violent fence you happen to be situated. I have a deep respect for non-violent political struggle but one must realise that in all situations where non-violent struggle was applied, there were parallel liberation movements which involved armed struggle too.

Malcolm wrote:

Those people who are engaged in violence merely condemn themselves to lower births. On this the Buddha was absolutely clear. The Deep Ecology movement has no room for violence. There are those who try to derive arguments for ecotage from Naess's thinking, things like tree spiking, destroying animal traps and so on. But Naess's criteria for such acts is generally grounded in one's belonging to place, not urban youths who decide to go save a forest with which they have no kinship.

Sherab Dorje said:

PS Good luck trying to reconcile Deep Ecology with notions of private property. You're going to need it!

Malcolm wrote:

It's not a problem at all. If one remains grounded in the thought of Naess, deep ecology and a market economy are not incompatible. He writes:

The deep ecology movement has in common with blue [right wing] politics its aversion to bureaucracy, its emphasis on personal enterprise and initiative, and a reluctance to take certain green utopias too seriously. With the old politics of the Western European kind the common ground is more obvious, the fight on the side of the underdog, solidarity with the underprivileged or the powerless, extension of care.

And:

Rich people who work in the world of business, but are supporters of the deep ecology movement, ask in all seriousness whether the green utopian societies must look so dreary. Why portray a society which seemingly needs no big entrepreneurs, only organic farmers, modest artists, and mild naturalists. A capitalist society is in a certain sense a rather wild society. We need some degree of wildness, but not exactly the capitalist sort. The usual utopian green societies seem so sober and tame. We shall need enthusiasts of the extravagant, the luxuriant, the big. But they must not dominate.

<http://trumpeter.athabasca.ca/index.php/trumpet/article/view/432/708>

So you see, Naess's thinking was not exactly pro-capitalist and not exactly anti-capitalist.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, February 12th, 2014 at 8:21 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

They don't work very well compared to ones managed by a CEO.

But they do work, some have been around for many years, even in a very competitive capitalist environment. This style of 'management' clearly has legs.

Here is an example of one of the many workers cooperatives operating in the US:

<http://www.alvaradostreetbakery.com/index.php>

Other useful website:

<http://www.usworker.coop/>

Malcolm wrote:

I think Zhen Li's point is that such entities don't scale up.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, February 12th, 2014 at 8:04 AM

Title: Re: Middle Way Politics

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

No. I am saying that the man in question lost the right to use that property.

But this is decided by secular law.

Malcolm wrote:

And in general Buddhist ethics holds that one must obey the laws of the country one is in.

tellyontellyon said:

Secular law can be changed if that is what the majority want.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, but it is not as easy as you think. And Buddhist ethics generally comes down on the conservative side when it comes to issues of political change. As the Buddha mentions in the Mahāparinibbana sutta:

"What have you heard, Ananda: do the Vajjis assemble and disperse peacefully and attend to their affairs in concord?"

"I have heard, Lord, that they do."

"So long, Ananda, as this is the case, the growth of the Vajjis is to be expected, not their decline.

"What have you heard, Ananda: do the Vajjis neither enact new decrees nor abolish existing ones, but proceed in accordance with their ancient constitutions?"

"I have heard, Lord, that they do."

"So long, Ananda, as this is the case, the growth of the Vajjis is to be expected, not their decline.

There is never a case where the Buddha predicts the success of a society where violent and radical change is imposed.

tellyontellyon said:

What if the capitalists use their ownership of the means of production in such a way as people decide that they should lose the right to use that property?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, if some country wishes to try nationalization of industries and banks through entirely peaceful means, Buddhists living in that country can of course be on either side of that decision, but if the decision is made to nationalize, they have nothing more really to say about it.

But if some citizens of a country decide to enact a violent revolution and seize banks and industries through force, Buddhist ethics would describe that as theft and no Buddhist should participate in that revolution. Not only this, it will not be successful, because those citizens would not be observing not only the seven conditions upon which a successful country is based upon, but not even one.

I never once said that Buddhists could not resist injustice. We can, but we need to do so with the principle of non-violence foremost in our minds and the understanding that as limited common people without the benefit of realization we really do not have the capacity to predict the outcomes of violent upheavals. In other words, when Buddhists enter into a social struggle they may be ready to die for their cause, but they have a higher ethical obligation to strive to preserve the lives of their "enemies" at all costs, even at the cost of their own lives.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, February 12th, 2014 at 5:31 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

What makes a system that is based on (rewards and encourages) greed and self-centredness Buddhist?

Malcolm wrote:

Nothing.

Sherab Dorje said:

Why is a system that encourages, and is based on, sharing and mutual generosity non-Buddhist?

Malcolm wrote:

Nothing.

Neither systems are Buddhist.

Sherab Dorje said:

I guess it all depends on how narrowly one defines Buddhism.

Malcolm wrote:

I define Buddha Dharma as the practice of the three trainings and the six perfections. I do not define it through political ideologies. People try to use political ideologies in the service of the Dharma, but in such cases usually the Dharma loses and the eight worldly dharmas win.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, February 12th, 2014 at 5:25 AM

Title: Re: Middle Way Politics

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

You have to know for a _fact_ that he wants to kill people. When people act in [legally defined] criminal ways, it is well established that they lose certain rights, for example, the right to own and use a gun. If a man walks into a crowd with a gun and threatens to shoot, of course you are well within your rights to confront the assailant and relieve him of his weapon (if you are foolish enough to try). You do not have that right unless you know for a fact that he is doing to act in that way.

Sherab Dorje said:

So now you are saying that it is okay to destroy private property.

Malcolm wrote:

No. I am saying that the man in question lost the right to use that property. It is an entirely different kind of thing.

Sherab Dorje said:

Okay, so tell of one instance of mining (for example) that has not been an ecological catastrophe. And then please explain to me why one should not defend the eco-system from destruction.

Malcolm wrote:

One can defend the ecosystem from catastrophe, but one must do so lawfully and non-violently. I have no problem with corporations such as BP being stripped of their property, legally, when they prove to be negligent in the conduct of their business. But I do not think it is right, or even ecologically sane, to blow up oil pipelines, transmission lines, and so on.

For example, look at all the harm people do like releasing animals from labs. This is just plain stupid as well as dangerous. This does not demonstrate any ecological awareness at all.

To Illustrate how support of monkey wrenching is inconsistent with Deep Ecology, we see that Naess writes:

In many Western countries, environmental struggle involves direct actions and violent confrontation. The norms of nonviolent group conflict as worked out by Gandhi and others exclude violence not only against the opponents, but also against their machinery and other equipment that, from a direct, causal point of view, destroy life and life conditions on a vast scale. The norms against so-called sabotage involving such equipment are based on deep attitudes that express themselves in cultural phenomena such as inochi and kuyo.

Naess, Arne (2009-05-01). The Ecology of Wisdom: Writings by Arne Naess (p. 204). Counterpoint. Kindle Edition.

As you can see, we Deep Ecologists do not support in any way violence against either people or property. We Buddhists should not either, unless the special conditions of clairvoyance that I mentioned manifest in ourselves, as in the case of the Bodhisattva when he was a sea captain.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, February 12th, 2014 at 5:02 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

What makes a system that is based on (rewards and encourages) greed and self-centredness Buddhist?

Malcolm wrote:

Nothing.

Sherab Dorje said:

Why is a system that encourages, and is based on, sharing and mutual generosity non-Buddhist?

Malcolm wrote:

Nothing.

Neither systems are Buddhist.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, February 12th, 2014 at 4:43 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

It means everybody gets what they need, and contribute what they are able to.

Malcolm wrote:

Decided by who?

tellyontellyon said:

Look at the gap between those people at the very top and the people at the very bottom, it is impossible to grasp. That gap needs to narrow by a considerable amount. Also, it doesn't mean no 'trade' or no businesses... It means taking the largest businesses, utilities and banks into public ownership.

Malcolm wrote:

Right, we covered this before. I don't agree this is wise.

tellyontellyon said:

You can bet that far more small businesses have been forced to close by the big companies! The very biggest businesses could be run democratically by their own workers and representatives of the wider society.

Malcolm wrote:

I don't believe this will work. Companies are not democracies, and cannot function as such.

tellyontellyon said:

Deep ecology for example, would you impose that?

Malcolm wrote:

No, of course not, it is against the principles Arne Naess outlined.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, February 12th, 2014 at 4:39 AM

Title: Re: Vajrakilaya and date of the 'phur gel 'bum nag

Content:

Sherlock said:

I think the main area of contention arises from the life of Padma Las 'brel rtsal, which Boord notes as "Dates uncertain".

Malcolm wrote:

Not uncertain at all, Padma Las 'brel rtsal, according to the treasury of lives website has these dates: b.1291 - d.1315.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, February 12th, 2014 at 4:09 AM

Title: Re: Middle Way Politics

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

So if you have a guy with a gun who wants to kill people and you destroy the gun it is totally against Buddhist ethics?

Malcolm wrote:

You have to know for a _fact_ that he wants to kill people. When people act in [legally defined] criminal ways, it is well established that they lose certain rights, for example, the right to own and use a gun. If a man walks into a crowd with a gun and threatens to shoot, of course you are well within your rights to confront the assailant and relieve him of his weapon (if you are foolish enough to try). You do not have that right unless you know for a fact that he is doing to act in that way.

Sherab Dorje said:

Just because monkey wrenching doesn't fit into your personal world view doesn't mean it cannot be accommodated within the framework of Buddhist ethics.

Malcolm wrote:

Monkey wrenching cannot be accommodated within Buddhist ethics, since Buddhist ethics also requires that people obey the laws of the country they live in. Monkey wrenching is just vigilantism, plain and simple, and itself is a criminal act.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, February 12th, 2014 at 4:02 AM

Title: Re: Wagner and Buddhism

Content:

Zhen Li said:

But are you never moved emotionally listening to his music?

Malcolm wrote:

Wagner is godawful crap.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, February 12th, 2014 at 3:51 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

Bismarck!

An unfortunate icon...

Wiki Bismarck distrusted democracy and ruled through a strong, well-trained bureaucracy with power in the hands of a Junker elite representing the landed aristocracy in the east.

Bismarck, an aristocratic Junker himself, had an extremely aggressive and domineering personality. He possessed not only a long-term national and international vision, but also the short-term ability to juggle many complex developments simultaneously. As the leader of what historians call "revolutionary conservatism"[2] Bismarck became a hero to German nationalists; they built hundreds of monuments glorifying the iconic symbol of powerful conservative leadership.

Malcolm wrote:

I know very well who Bismark is.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, February 12th, 2014 at 3:35 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

Simon E. said:

Without wanting to sound like a British Rush Limbaugh, I am afraid Malcolm that there is a whole generation of young Brits who feel that life owes them a living.

When they talk about 'sharing' its all one way traffic. From others to them. If they spent the time that they are on line earning a living they might have something to share.

Malcolm wrote:

Otto Bismark famously said:

He who is not a socialist at 19, has no heart. He who is still a socialist at 30, has no brain.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, February 12th, 2014 at 3:32 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

What about the people who can't afford a house?

Malcolm wrote:

Well, give them a job so they can afford housing and eventually build one of their own.

tellyontellyon said:

Is it a 'nanny state' to suggest that people look out for each other, where we can share what we have?

Malcolm wrote:

We cannot share what we don't have. Frankly, I regards things like healthcare and education to be like utilities, a basic standard should be provided for everyone because the social cost of not doing so is higher. But it still comes out of someone's taxes. I pay taxes for a school system in which I have no children nor ever will have children because I am too old to have children. So I am sharing. I don't complain. I think people are obliged to pay fair taxes for things like roads, etc. I think it is fair for power companies, regulated monopolies, to charge for electricity.

But I do not think it is the job of the government to enforce some artificial standard across the board to make sure everyone has exactly as much as everyone else. That kind of thinking is ludicrous as far as I am concerned.

tellyontellyon said:

What's so un-Buddhist about sharing?

Malcolm wrote:

Nothing, I am suggesting that you start. If you really want to help people, go to Haiti. They need help. Get a job as a volunteer with the BRC. You said that you already do some kind of social work, great.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, February 12th, 2014 at 3:05 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

I'm just talking about a secure job for everybody, one that pays a living wage...

Malcolm wrote:

Then start a business.

tellyontellyon said:

...a home for everybody that is warm and secure.

Malcolm wrote:

Then start a house building business.

tellyontellyon said:

Education, healthcare, free time to relax, meditate, take part in community life.

Malcolm wrote:

You make every too complicated with your insistence that we need this huge Nanny state to take care of everything for us.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, February 12th, 2014 at 3:03 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

I'm just talking about a secure job for everybody, one that pays a living wage, a home for everybody that is warm and secure. Education, healthcare, free time to relax, meditate, take part in community life.

Malcolm wrote:

I just figured it out -- you want to live in Norway!

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, February 12th, 2014 at 2:52 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

Ha Ha. You sounded a little bit worldly yourself when I suggested the possibility of returning your land to the communal ownership that existed under the native Americans.

Malcolm wrote:

Which ones? You mean the tribes that no longer exist? You really don't seem to understand tribal territories, expansions, conquest and so on as it occurred among Native Americans in the Northeast. Your concept that Native Americans owned land communally is complete nonsense:

In the past, most if not all North American indigenous peoples had a strong belief in individual property rights and ownership. Frederick Hodge (1910) noted that individual private ownership was “the norm” for North American tribes.

Likewise, Julian Steward (1938, 253) asserted that among Native Americans communal property was limited, and Frances Densmore (1939) concluded that the Makah tribe in the Pacific Northwest had property rights similar to Europeans.<sup>7</sup> These early twentieth-century historians and anthropologists had the advantage of actually interviewing tribal members who had lived in pre-reservation Indian society.

By the late 1940s, however, these original and firsthand sources of information had died, and false myths and historical distortions began to take dominant shape. By the mid-1960s, the tone in many college history books, history-inspired films and novels, and even speeches had completely changed (Mika 1995). A typical historical distortion, for example, is found in Baldwin and Kelley's best-selling 1965 college textbook, The Stream of American History, where they write, “Indians had little comprehension of the value of money, the ownership of land . . . and so land sharks and grog sellers found it easy to mulct them of their property” (208). These myths were further fueled by popular books such as Jacobs' (1972) Dispossessing the American Indian, which suggested that Native Americans felt that land (and other property) was “a gift from the gods” and as such not subject to private ownership. Gradually more and more people started to honestly believe that the indigenous people of North America had been historically communal, non-property oriented, and romantic followers of an economic system more harmonious with nature.

Today, tribal leaders, politicians, and various interest groups in both the United States and Canada often repeat these myths as fact when discussing business, economics, and entrepreneurship during tribal conferences and congressional hearings (Selden 2001).

Terry Anderson (1995) attributes the beginning of the myth to settlers seeking farm land in the Great Plains, who interacted only with nomadic tribes that did not view land as an important asset. These settlers mistakenly generalized the lack of interest in land to infer a lack of property rights among all tribes. We argue that this fiction was further propagated in the nineteenth century by a virtual army of East Coast newspaper journalists, dime novelists, and Washington politicians who, in spite of writing about Native Americans, often had little contact with tribal groups. Reported, retold, and unchallenged, these incorrect perceptions ended up as the basis for later laws and institutional codification.

- See more at: <http://perc.org/articles/american-indian-collectivism#sthash.QzsVsD6T.dpuf>

tellyontellyon said:

All land was originally communal: some bully built a fence that's all.

Malcolm wrote:

The fences were not built by bullies, but rather, by people who wanted to protect their crops from thieves.

The rice plants, as mentioned earlier, began to grow in separate plots and people began to divide lands and tend each other's cluster of rice fief. They became preoccupied in tending their own field. Then, as the evil and greed were aroused, there were people who begin stealing others' crops. At first, the others only warned the culprit and the culprit promised that he would never repeat it again. But when it was repeated several times, the people began punishing him with fist, stones, and then sticks. That is the origin of punishment forms. Then, people began to think that they were too busy to heed every crime and abuse that happened in their society. They grieved on the rising of evil amongst their people. But most of their time had already been invested in tending their fief. So, they appointed someone to rectify what is right and what is wrong, give warnings to those who need it, give punishment to those who deserve it, and in return, they will give him a share of their rice. So, they went to the fairest, ablest, most likeable, and most intelligent person and appointed him to do the judging and passing out sentences on the reward of a share of rice. The appointed person thus agreed and the people bestowed upon him the title : 'Maha Sammata' meaning: The People's Choice. Then, they bestowed also the second title: 'Khattiya' meaning the 'Lord of the Rice Field', and finally the third title: 'Raja' which means 'Who gladdens people with Dhamma (or Truth)'. This order was created by the people's wish and need, based on the Dhamma and not from others. The Buddha stated again that Dhamma is indeed the best of all things.

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Agga%C3%B1%C3%B1a\_Sutta

tellyontellyon said:

I thought Engaged Buddhism was about addressing the problems of worldly life?

Malcolm wrote:

[/quote][/quote]

That is what it may mean to some people. What it means to me is working with our present circumstances according to the best Buddhist ethics one can muster.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, February 12th, 2014 at 2:11 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:
Whereas those supporting capitalism are not?

Malcolm wrote:
I never said I wasn't worldly person. I also never stated that I support capitalist ideology.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Wednesday, February 12th, 2014 at 12:30 AM
Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism
Content:

tellyontellyon said:
The purpose of the precepts is to help us overcome suffering, not to lock us into it.

Malcolm wrote:
Indeed.

tellyontellyon said:
They are not god given dogma.

Malcolm wrote:
They are based on the avoidance of the natural ten non-virtues.

Malice
Greed
Wrong view
Harsh speech
Lying Calumny
Idle speech
Taking life
Taking what is not given
Sexual misconduct

Since the vows do not suppose one's mind can be directly controlled, and since of the four verbal non-virtues, lying is the worst, and because Buddha compassionately understood that people were going to yell, spread calumny and gossip he did not turn those into precepts. He forbade the three non-virtues of the body. These ten non-virtues are what drive rebirth into lower realms; their avoidance results in birth in higher realms.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Wednesday, February 12th, 2014 at 12:26 AM
Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism
Content:

tellyontellyon said:

It's not that my view is totally worldly. Perhaps it is that your view is totally unworldly?

You draw such a big distinction between worldly and unworldly. I don't think that the Buddha would draw those lines in quite the same way.

Malcolm wrote:

He drew them even harder.

tellyontellyon said:

I don't think he achieved liberation by divorcing himself from the 'world', it was more that he came to see the nature of that world.

Malcolm wrote:

He came to see the nature of the world was entirely suffering. Even happiness is suffering if that happiness does not come from Dharma practice.

tellyontellyon said:

Understanding the difference or relationship between a 'worldly' and a 'realised' point of view... well that can only come with realisation.

Malcolm wrote:

No, that comes from studying the Dharma.

tellyontellyon said:

In the meantime I think I would like to continue worrying about the 'worldly' lives of the people and all the other beings on this planet.

Malcolm wrote:

The best thing you can do for others is attain realization yourself. That will never happen while you are standing in an angry crowd denouncing some transient worldly condition.

tellyontellyon said:

I can only do what I can within my present capacities.

Malcolm wrote:

Indeed.

tellyontellyon said:

If you don't want to consider me a Buddhist that is fine, (but I'm not quite sure why you feel you have the authority to say such things). Perhaps you are playing politics?

Malcolm wrote:

I didn't say you weren't a Buddhist. Clearly you consider yourself one. But you don't sound like a Buddhist, you sound like a worldly person, entirely caught in hope and fear.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, February 11th, 2014 at 11:19 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

Everyone gains. No rational actor engages in an exchange that is disadvantageous. That's just dogma. If you need a job and the means of production (job's, land, machines, bank's) etc. are in the hands of a tiny minority, and that system inevitably produces endemic unemployment... then the power is all in the hands of that same minority. The super-rich hold all the cards. Therefore, the average wage earner is compelled to sell their labour for a poor deal.

They're compelled to sell their based on their skills based on what is of value to others. If I am a master iron worker in a defunct industry, I am not likely to be paid much for my now useless craft, am I? And those who put up the capital for such a defunct industry will generally fold as well.

If one person is gaining... someone else (or many others) are losing.
This is very simplistic thinking.
I honestly wonder if we are living in the same world?

Malcolm wrote:

We live in the world we choose to see. I live in a world where outcomes are largely determined by karma and merit. You live in a world where outcomes are produced by material relations. You may have aspirations to be a Buddhist, but your view of the world is wholly worldly, bound up as it is in these eight worldly dharmas:

hope for happiness and fear of suffering hope for fame and fear of insignificance hope for praise and fear of blame hope for gain and fear of loss

You may protest that it is not yourself for which you are concerned, but the eight worldly dharmas apply to all instances of these hopes and fears.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, February 11th, 2014 at 8:55 PM

Title: Re: Climate Change: We're Doomed

Content:

Kim O'Hara said:

Evidence:

...or choose your own favourite after oogling "solar power generation" and clicking the "Images" tag on the results page, which is all I did.

Kim

Malcolm wrote:

That is not scaling. That is ugly as shit. Also, it is an extremely inefficient use of land area.

The main problem with renewables at this point is lack of storage options (battery technology is still not very advanced), variability in power generation, and the fact that natural gas and coal plants must continue to be used to make up for deficiencies. So called smart grids might be a solution, but the problem with all these technological computer-based fixes is that they introduce increasing complexity thus creating more opportunity for calamitous failure, terrorist attack, and so on.

If any thing, centralization of power generation not a desiderata.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, February 11th, 2014 at 7:47 PM

Title: Re: Middle Way Politics

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

And I never said that I support all instances of property destruction.

Malcolm wrote:

You advocate violence in so far as you think some types of property destruction are permissible based on some arbitrary standard you impose.

But frankly, I cannot see any place in Buddhist ethics where it is permissible.

Sherab Dorje said:

Really? I don't think you have to look all that hard actually. I don't think it would be so difficult, from a Buddhist perspective, to ethically justify destroying a machine in order to save countless lives. Not difficult at all actually.

Malcolm wrote:

I see, so you are going to get out there and destroy shovels, hoes, rakes, lawn mowers, plows, cars etc? No, there really is no justification for such acts. Such acts are merely symbolic and do nothing to change systems, as the failed efforts of the Luddites clearly demonstrates. Violence, whether against people or property, is not justifiable from a Buddhist ethical standpoint unless you are a realized person in possession of such powers of prescience and clairvoyance that you can be assured of a positive outcome of your acts.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, February 11th, 2014 at 7:43 PM

Title: Re: Climate Change: We're Doomed

Content:

Kim O'Hara said:

And in those terms, it is much less bad for us to dig up what we need for solar panels than to dig up the coal we would need to generate the same amount of electricity.

Malcolm wrote:

If it scales, sure. So far I see no evidence that it does.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, February 11th, 2014 at 7:48 AM

Title: Re: Perspective

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

then the sambhogakāya level, and finally, at the end one can see the dharmakāya personally, then one is a Buddha.

Virgo said:

But isn't a state of rigpa more than the nirmanakaya level?

Kevin

Malcolm wrote:

The state of rigpa is all three kāyas combined, but while you still have obscurations, the nirmanakāya level is all you can experience. If you can experience the sambhogakāya aspect, you are a person of high realization, meaning you are beyond the third vision.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, February 11th, 2014 at 7:09 AM

Title: Re: Perspective

Content:

Virgo said:

But it is not gradual in terms of needing to create merit and purify karma, transform perceptions, in order to realize the "state", is it?

The secret is, that was already done in the past, therefore, one has the perception to understand the truth about the three kayas -- which do not arise, are not based on conditions etcetera.

Kevin

Malcolm wrote:

Here is the critical point that everyone over looks.

All Mahāyāna paths whether sūtra or tantra, have one thing in common: realization of the three kāyas. Each path works first at the nirmanakāya level, i.e. at first that's all you can see; then the sambhogakāya level, and finally, at the end one can see the dharmakāya personally, then one is a Buddha.

This is the same whether you are practicing the six perfections, the two stages, or trekchöd and thögal. The only difference is the amount of time it takes, and the methodology used.

Even in sūtra the obscurations are not regarded as something real which need to be abandoned. The Abhisamayālaṃkāra states: The wisdom of the exhaustion and non-arising of taints is called “the awakened state”.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, February 11th, 2014 at 4:52 AM

Title: Re: Perspective

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The path is gradual, not the state, but then that is true of every path in Vajrayana.

dzogchungpa said:

So what's up with all the cig car rhetoric?

Malcolm wrote:

It's rhetorical.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, February 11th, 2014 at 4:49 AM

Title: Re: Guru Rinpoche practices within the Sakya tradition

Content:

Kunga said:

Doing the self-blessing of Kachoma is often private and extra curricular.

Malcolm wrote:

You would know better than I what is done in Sakya monasteries in India.

I was just talking about the tsog, not the self blessing which is little elaborate and can only be done by those people who have done a full retreat.

Also, I was mentioning from the perspective of what is normally done in western Sakya centers, I wasn't really including monasteries in India.

The idea that the first tenth day is for Heruka practices and the second tenth day is for Dakini practices is based on the flow of the white bodhicittas. But in general the first tenth day ganapuja is for increasing merit and the second is for purifying samaya, strictly speaking.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, February 11th, 2014 at 4:33 AM

Title: Re: Perspective

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

For all its cig car rhetoric, in the end, Dzogchen is just a gradual path like everything else in Buddhadharma.

heart said:

Either you recognize the natural state directly and never leave it again or you have to do some habituation to it. I wouldn't call it gradual. It don't get more it just gets longer, easier and more natural and you have less problems letting go of mind.

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

The path is gradual, not the state, but then that is true of every path in Vajrayana.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, February 11th, 2014 at 2:41 AM

Title: Re: Middle Way Politics

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

And I never said that I support all instances of property destruction.

Malcolm wrote:

You advocate violence in so far as you think some types of property destruction are permissible based on some arbitrary standard you impose.

But frankly, I cannot see any place in Buddhist ethics where it is permissible.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, February 11th, 2014 at 2:14 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

...given you consider compulsory sterilisation a public health issue.

Malcolm wrote:

What I am saying is that it is a public health issue and it is out of my hands, it's not my decision to make. I never made any statement whatsoever about whether I approve or disapprove of the practice.

It is a complicated -- for example, termites, ants, killer bees, etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, February 10th, 2014 at 11:40 PM

Title: Re: Middle Way Politics

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

... For example, our friend Greg (Sherab Dorje) considers it just dandy to destroy private property.

Sherab Dorje said:

And our friend Malcolm has no problem with a multinational mining company wreaking havoc just because they own a title deed for the land they are destroying?

Malcolm wrote:

I didn't say that I have no problem with it. I do, I just don't believe that the solution is fire bombing their facilities and equipment.

In any event, most mining companies in the US lease the land they are mining. Not sure how it works in other places.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, February 10th, 2014 at 11:36 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

I do not support acts of violence against people or property. So no, I am not a fan of monkey wrenching. I consider that such acts stem from a shallow view.

Sherab Dorje said:

As an ecologist, do you support the compulsory sterilisation of domesticated animals (I am talking here about pets and especially strays)?

Malcolm wrote:

That is not really the question you are asking. What you are implying is, if sentient beings should be viewed as equal (in general, they should), someone who does not support violence against persons or property should not support compulsory sterilization of pets and strays.

I have no pets, so I never think about the issue. That issue is outside of my control, being a public health issue primarily.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, February 10th, 2014 at 8:41 PM

Title: Re: Middle Way Politics

Content:

Rickpa said:

This thread strikes me as about being more about systems of governance rather than politics.

Malcolm wrote:

That is where people went with the thread. What I had in mind was more how, given that there are many non-Buddhist political realities out there, Buddhists will conduct themselves in the political sphere. For example, our friend Greg (Sherab Dorje) considers it just dandy to destroy private property.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, February 10th, 2014 at 8:30 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Of course it is, it is completely ignorant. A physical structure is not a "bank". All such actions do is create more negativity, more hostility, more negative karma all around. It is an utterly ignorant and foolish—not to mention criminal— thing to do.

Sherab Dorje said:

I guess you don't support eco-terrorism either?

Malcolm wrote:

I do not support acts of violence against people or property. So no, I am not a fan of monkey wrenching. I consider that such acts stem from a shallow view.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, February 10th, 2014 at 7:32 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

I cannot speak on behalf of all Anarchists, but I certainly would not consider burning banks an unprovoked action.

Malcolm wrote:

Of course it is, it is completely ignorant. A physical structure is not a "bank". All such actions do is create more negativity, more hostility, more negative karma all around. It is an utterly ignorant and foolish —not to mention criminal— thing to do.

Sherab Dorje said:

Right, capital and property are two different things, though their meaning is commonly conflated in discussions.

Not necessarily, the first definition says: "Financial assets OR ..."

Malcolm wrote:

A financial asset is an intangible asset that derives value because of a contractual claim. Examples include bank deposits, bonds, and stocks. Financial assets are usually more liquid than tangible assets, such as land or real estate, and are traded on financial markets. ...

You mean "asset", an asset can include property such as land, buildings, bulldozers, etc.. A financial asset is a bond, stock, etc.

You are not a stupid person, so I find it a little unbelievable that you waste your time on such adolescent political theories.

Ok, I am really done with this ridiculous thread.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, February 10th, 2014 at 7:08 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Capital and property are two entirely different things. One can own thousands of acres of property and yet lack the capital to develop it.

Sherab Dorje said:

According to investopedia.com (a capitalist site): Definition of 'Capital'

1. Financial assets or the financial value of assets, such as cash.
2. The factories, machinery and equipment owned by a business and used in production.

“Capital” can mean many things. Its specific definition depends on the context in which it is used. In general, it refers to financial resources available for use. Companies and societies with more capital are better off than those with less capital.

Malcolm wrote:

Right, capital and property are two different things, though their meaning is commonly conflated in discussions.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, February 10th, 2014 at 6:59 PM

Title: Re: Climate Change: We're Doomed

Content:

Zhen Li said:

I don't think a figure of 40 years is anything to be up in arms about. After all, just about any power plant would be lucky to get past regulators running that long without major updates and replacements of key parts.

Malcolm wrote:

That's an ideal estimate. Lifespans in reality are overall much shorter.

Then of course we must mention that extraction process for the rare earth materials in solar panels, wind generators, batteries, etc., are pretty devastating to their local environments because China/Inner Mongolia is about the only place where rare earths are recoverable without significant quantities of radioactive materials, and even then they are strip mined.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, February 10th, 2014 at 6:55 PM

Title: Re: Perspective

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

Your Santideva quote is saying that mental pacification is the result of going beyond concepts: that is not inherently Buddhist, that is something you find in all religions, and is therefore truly "perennial".

Malcolm wrote:

No, actually you do not find this in "all religions".

Addendum, so my initial observation that your sentiment is perennialist' was correct.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, February 10th, 2014 at 6:53 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

Though I must admit that burning banks (a common pass-time for Greek anarchists) is hardly violence "without provocation".

Malcolm wrote:
Of course it is.

Sherab Dorje said:
That's your opinion. I imagine if you ask all the homeless families, whose houses were stolen from them by banks, they may care to disagree.

Malcolm wrote:
I see, so anarchists, who don't believe in property, are burnings banks on behalf of those whose property was taken from them by foreclosures? What a stupid thing to do, so very Weather Underground.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Monday, February 10th, 2014 at 6:51 PM
Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:
Sherab Dorje said:
There are no private property/ownership rights in an Anarchist system, so the term is an oxymoron at best.
Sorry for quoting myself but I should clarify this statement:

Under the political-economic model of capitalism property (capital) is the basis for authority, as it is the means by which a capitalist exploits (asserts authority/dominance over) somebody that does not own capital. Now of course, in the real world, capitalists quite clearly exploit the power of the state (and state owned capital) as well, in order to assert their dominance. But in a utopian capitalist reality the security forces (both executive and administrative) would be privately owned so one would just directly pay for enforcement (instead of having to bribe the state administrators).

Last year, for example, they introduced a series of laws here in Greece where one can now rent actual police officers (not private security personnel) and police equipment (helicopters, boats, etc...) for security purposes. Okay, it is a semi-measure since the money goes to the state (there is the state owned capital again) and not to the individuals, but still one can see in which direction they are pushing. Private military organisations like Haliburton and Blackwater also come to mind, as examples, when discussing issues like this.

That is why there is no such thing as anarchist capitalism, because capital (property) IS authority.

Malcolm wrote:
Capital and property are two entirely different things. One can own thousands of acres of property and yet lack the capital to develop it.

Your anarchist system might scale up as far as a hippie commune, but will fail beyond that.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, February 10th, 2014 at 6:47 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

Though I must admit that burning banks (a common pass-time for Greek anarchists) is hardly violence "without provocation".

Malcolm wrote:

Of course it is.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, February 10th, 2014 at 9:02 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

Don't worry about suffering dudes... it's all in the mind.

Malcolm wrote:

These kinds of things are very sad, but I don't see you posting pictures of all sentient beings who are suffering:

There is nothing you or I can do to prevent the ripening of someone else's karma.

Of course we try to help as much as we can, but we have to understand that we have limited capacity to help others.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, February 10th, 2014 at 8:11 AM

Title: Re: Bronkhorst's Skepticism about early Buddhism

Content:

daverupa said:

(The equation "scholarship = fundamentalism" should probably get it's own thread; I'm amazed by this suggestion.)

Malcolm wrote:

He was not saying that. He was saying that scholarship and religion have different aims. The former is merely about who lived when, what they did, where they went, and maybe what they said. The latter is about one's personal spiritual path.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, February 10th, 2014 at 7:44 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

Zhen Li said:

Suffering is caused by greed, anger and ignorance, in the MIND, not by material conditions.

Malcolm wrote:

Thank you. I am glad there is another Buddhist voice in this conversation.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, February 10th, 2014 at 7:05 AM

Title: Re: Perspective

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

Your Santideva quote is saying that mental pacification is the result of going beyond concepts: that is not inherently Buddhist, that is something you find in all religions, and is therefore truly "perennial".

Malcolm wrote:

No, actually you do not find this in "all religions".

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, February 10th, 2014 at 7:01 AM

Title: Re: Climate Change: We're Doomed

Content:

Zhen Li said:

Solar power is a great idea. I knew a man whose hydro bill (i.e. electricity here is called hydro) was something like $15.00/month because he installed high efficiency insulation, windows, and doors, and solar panels.

Malcolm wrote:

Of course it is a great idea. But it does not scale. Battery technology has not advanced in years. That said, it is perfectly reasonable for people to install their own panels and so. The only problem is that the panels themselves have a definite lifespan, 40 years at most. There are other problems too. For example, if you have trees in your yard, or live in places where there is possibility of hail and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, February 10th, 2014 at 6:54 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

I would liken it to asking the opinion of Nazi apologists about the benefits of Communism.

Malcolm wrote:

D and G are "nazi apolgists? Hardly

Sherab Dorje said:

Capitalists don't like Anarchists. Mainly because Capitalists like to throw around the term "free" thick and fast: free trade, free markets, etc... whereas their freedom is just slavery to currency.

And then, of course, there is the fact that capitalists love to pay lip service to reducing state intervention to zero, whereas in reality they take every opportunity they can to utilise the state and state structures in order to increase profit and power.

Malcolm wrote:

These people are called "anarcho-capitalists".

Sherab Dorje said:

Capitalists hate Anarchists because Anarchists show up the fact that Capitalism is quite clearly not freedom, and that Authoritarian Socialism is not the only other solution.

Malcolm wrote:

No, people are frightened of anarchists because they do stupid shit like inciting violence without provocation at demonstrations:

<http://www.kvi.com/home/featured/Seattle-anarchist-brags-about-violence-he-plans-for-May-Day-205625871.html>

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, February 10th, 2014 at 4:52 AM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

You are saying.

'nothing arises which is empty,
because if it arises, how can it be empty'

???

Malcolm wrote:

Precisely.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, February 10th, 2014 at 4:05 AM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

emptiness too is a mere convention.

PadmaVonSamba said:

objects which arise conditionally were empty of inherent existence long before the concept of emptiness was even conceived.

So, while 'emptiness' (sunyata) is, on the one hand, merely our correct understanding of phenomena

the fact that phenomena are in fact empty is the same whether we 'convene' it or not.

If it were not already so, asserting emptiness would be false.

.
.
.

Malcolm wrote:

Asserting emptiness is false.

"If there were something subtle not empty, there would be something subtle to be empty; as there is nothing not empty, where is there something to be empty?

-- Nāgārjuna

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, February 10th, 2014 at 3:57 AM

Title: Re: Does 35 Statues Mean anything?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

There are 35 Buddhas of confession. This is a famous practice anyone can do, as it is based in sutra, called the Sutra of the Three Heaps

<http://www.thubtenchodron.org/PrayersAndPractices/35Buddhas.pdf>

gaelic said:

Thank you very much! So these are all statues of Buddha? I didn't know there was confession lol. Do people build shrines to these Buddhas? Thank you very much for the link, I will read that through.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, February 10th, 2014 at 3:51 AM

Title: Re: Guru Rinpoche practices within the Sakya tradition

Content:

conebeckham said:

I have a somewhat related question.....sorry I can't help with yours.

But In Kagyu we practice Chakrasamvara on Guru Rinpoche days...wondering if Sakyapas do Hevajra puja and tsok, etc.??

Malcolm wrote:

No, Vajrayogini is done on both tenth days.

Usually HHST gives the Padmasambhava from Apong Tertons treasures.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, February 10th, 2014 at 3:08 AM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

shel said:

Yes?

Malcolm wrote:

It means that meaning is projection. IN other words, there is no meaning to meaning. It is just a convention, therefore it is the object of a false cognition.

shel said:

How is that inconsistent with meaning is emptiness?

Malcolm wrote:

Not at all, emptiness too is a mere convention.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, February 10th, 2014 at 3:06 AM

Title: Re: Does 35 Statues Mean anything?

Content:

gaelic said:

Hello and greetings! I have been planning to make a home shrine (I am learning as I go along), just setting up offering bowls and a butter lamp. In this regard, I have had a dream a few times now about building a shrine in a small cabin/hut in the forest here and that there are 35 statues. The number just stands out to me, does it mean anything? I don't count them in the dream or even know who the statues are, but in the dream I just know there are 35. Basically the dream is I am walking through the forest where I live and I come to the small cabin, open the door, and there is a shrine of 35 statues, and I pour water in offering bowls. In other variations, I am taking people with me to the hut that I have never seen before. Just was an odd dream, wondered if it had any meaning and who the statues are. I search "35 buddhist statues" but nothing particular comes up. Probably because I have been putting a lot of thought into making a home shrine lol. Thanks again!

Oh and one more thing, can I use in my home shrine a small Thanka rather than a statue?

Malcolm wrote:

There are 35 Buddhas of confession. This is a famous practice anyone can do, as it is based in sutra, called the Sutra of the Three Heaps

<http://www.thubtenchodron.org/PrayersAndPractices/35Buddhas.pdf>

<https://www.amazon.com/Confession-Downfalls-Sutra-Vajrasattva-Practice/dp/8185102856>

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, February 10th, 2014 at 2:55 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

Well, just taking diamonds as an example... high quality gem quality diamonds are much rarer than ordinary industrial diamonds, so it takes more time and effort (labour) to find them and more skill (labour) to cut and polish them.

Malcolm wrote:

Not really.

tellyontellyon said:

That capitalists make use of monopolies and restriction of production to push prices above natural value is of course understood. Supply and demand also affects price, but in general, production will be raised to meet demand. When demand and supply are equal then price tends towards natural value.

Malcolm wrote:

So you agree with marginal utility then.

tellyontellyon said:

You are not distinguishing between use value and exchange value.

Malcolm wrote:

Both are accounted for in marginal utility. If I have no use for something, for example, crack, for me it is worthless. I will never spend my money on it. If I want to buy something with whatever crack is at my disposal, however it comes into my hands, it becomes as valuable as whatever the other guy will pay me for it. A bag of smack these days is $6 in NYC. In New England on the other hand, it is $30.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, February 10th, 2014 at 2:49 AM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

shel said:

Yes?

Malcolm wrote:

It means that meaning is projection. IN other words, there is no meaning to meaning. It is just a convention, therefore it is the object of a false cognition.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, February 10th, 2014 at 2:42 AM

Title: Re: The Idea of Madhyamaka and Yogacara as Equally Correct

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

This still refers to the imagined nature viz: reification persons and things is the imagined nature, the absence of subject and object which produces the imagined is the dependent nature, the absence of existence and non-existence of the imagined nature in the dependent nature is the perfected nature. All of these three terms hinge on the imagined nature.

rob h said:

Can see what you mean, but still think it highlights the fact that Asanga tried to take the middle path. Will carry on researching/meditating anyway, and hopefully understand better as time passes.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, the Yogacarins think they are the real Mādhyamikas.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, February 10th, 2014 at 2:19 AM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

conebeckham said:

the root of ignorance is the feeling that samsaric phenomena have, among other things, meaning.

shel said:

Form is emptiness, doctrine tells us, therefore meaning is emptiness. How bout them apples?

Malcolm wrote:

No, it actually says that "Matter is empty". Then it says, "Emptiness is material." Then it says "Matter is not other than emptiness," and then, "Emptiness is not other than the material;" and concludes with "And so too for the other four aggregates."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, February 10th, 2014 at 2:08 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

This is anarchy, which is violent by nature, despite what anarchist romantic theorists would like to believe.

Sherab Dorje said:

Yes, well, if Deleuze and Guattari (post modernists and post structuralists) say it's like that then it must be. Sigh...

You do realise that the whole "post-" thing was all just capitalist apologetics, hardly an objective vantage point to judge Anarchism from.

Malcolm wrote:

This is akin to saying that Buddhist dialectics is not a fair place to judge the doctrine of self from. In other words, your objection is bollocks, to which I will pay no mind.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, February 10th, 2014 at 2:04 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

You could say the same about gravity. Unfortunately, I am unable to walk on water, walk through walls or fly unaided like superman... so I will just have to reject this superficial 'theory' of economics.

Wiki: Karl Marx died before marginalism became the interpretation of economic value accepted by mainstream economics. His theory was based on the labor theory of value, which distinguishes between exchange value and use value. In his Capital he rejected the explanation of long-term market values by supply and demand:

Nothing is easier than to realize the inconsistencies of demand and supply, and the resulting deviation of market-prices from market-values. The real difficulty consists in determining what is meant by the equation of supply and demand.[...]If supply equals demand, they cease to act, and for this very reason commodities are sold at their market-values. Whenever two forces operate equally in opposite directions, they balance one another, exert no outside influence, and any phenomena taking place in these circumstances must be explained by causes other than the effect of these two forces. If supply and demand balance one another, they cease to explain anything, do not affect market-values, and therefore leave us so much more in the dark about the reasons why the market-value is expressed in just this sum of money and no other.[58]

In his early response to marginalism, Nikolai Bukharin argued that "the subjective evaluation from which price is to be derived really starts from this price",[59] concluding: Whenever the Böhm-Bawerk theory, it appears, resorts to individual motives as a basis for the derivation of social phenomena, he is actually smuggling in the social content in a more or less disguised form in advance, so that the entire construction becomes a vicious circle, a continuous logical fallacy, a fallacy that can serve only specious ends, and demonstrating in reality nothing more than the complete barrenness of modern bourgeois theory.[60]

Similarly a later Marxist critic, Ernest Mandel, argued that marginalism was "divorced from reality", ignored the role of production, and that:

It is, moreover, unable to explain how, from the clash of millions of different individual "needs" there emerge not only uniform prices, but prices which remain stable over long periods, even under perfect conditions of free competition. Rather than an explanation of constants, and of the basic evolution of economic life, the "marginal" technique provides at best an explanation of ephemeral, short-term variations.[61]

Maurice Dobb argued that prices derived through marginalism depend on the distribution of income. The ability of consumers to express their preferences is dependent on their spending power. As the theory asserts that prices arise in the act of exchange, Dobb argues that it cannot explain how the distribution of income affects prices and consequently cannot explain prices.[62]

Dobb also criticized the motives behind marginal utility theory. Jevons wrote, for example, "so far as is consistent with the inequality of wealth in every community, all commodities are distributed by exchange so as to produce the maximum social benefit." (See Fundamental theorems of welfare economics.) Dobb contended that this statement indicated that marginalism is intended to insulate market economics from criticism by making prices the natural result of the given income distribution.[62

Malcolm wrote:

I do not believe however that you can be rid of markets, and I think the labor theory of value is inadequate for explaining many things in the economy. Labor does not give things value. What gives a thing a value is whether it is desired or not, i.e. demand. For example, diamonds -- their value bears no relationship to the capital or the labor used to extract them. Their value is determined by demand and artificial restrictions on their sales which serve to increase that demand. The value of a diamond jewel, nothing more than a piece of hardened carbon, and no more nor less expensive in terms of capital and labor to extract than an industrial diamond, is not determined by those capital and labor investments at all. Neither is the price of oil. Neither is the price of food. Prices in general are not set because labor bears an intrinsic value, because labor, like any thing else in the market, has no intrinsic value of its own. What is the value of a piece of art? If people like your paintings more, you will get more. If they like it less, you will get less. And if you are a terrible artist, your paintings will be worthless and therefore, your labor in creating them is worthless.

Price instability is a function of supply and demand. It really is that simple. Regulations are enforced in order modulate rapid fluctuations in price which are primarily caused by speculators.

BTW, remind yourself that you have decided that someone's labor is worthless the next time you do not buy something because you decide "it isn't worth it."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, February 10th, 2014 at 2:00 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

Sönam said:

Malcom,

What you try to figure out regarding Anarchism (I don't speak about communism) could also be said regarding capitalism. Capitalism, as you state it, is an utopia ... and will remains as such because in "real life" capitalism automatically leads to his "disadvantages" <http://listverse.com/2012/01/16/top-10-disadvantages-to-capitalism/> and certainly: waste, starvation, anti-social, danger and so on.

S.

Malcolm wrote:

Sonam:

I am not defending capitalism as an ideology. I am not a Capitalist with a capital C. But I do not have much patience for utopian fantasies that come from the left, or for that matter utopian fantasies that come from the right (for example, the fantasy that free markets will fix everything, etc.). The capitalist economy we have now is far from a utopia, and because of the free market policies of neoliberals, is heading into a dystopia.

I do embrace our teacher's teachings that we should be pursuing personal evolution, not external revolution. That means we need to follow a middle way. Anarchism, Communism and Libertarianism, etc., just are not it.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, February 10th, 2014 at 12:53 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

It should not be concluded that war is a state of nature, but rather that it is the mode of a social state that wards off and prevents the State.

-- Nomadology

This is anarchy, which is violent by nature, despite what anarchist romantic theorists would like to believe.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, February 10th, 2014 at 12:51 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

marginal utility.

It amounts to saying that something is simply worth what someone is willing to pay. It isn't an economic theory at all, rather it amounts to the belief that there are no economic theories, and that value is entirely subjective.

Malcolm wrote:

Which is entirely consistent with Buddhist philosophy. That is to say all value is subjective, and merely conventional. There is no such thing as essences, whether in economics or anything else.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, February 10th, 2014 at 12:42 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The concentration camps were a distraction that contributed in large measure to Hitler's losing the war.

Sherab Dorje said:

A distraction??? The concentration camps were designed to quell all internal resistance to Nazi policy and anybody that stood in the way of the implementation of Nazi policies (Trade Unionists, Communists, Democrats, Humanist Christians, etc...) and to realise Hitler's dream of the eradication of anybody he didn't consider German enough (Jews, Gypsies, etc...) The Nazi regime would not have lasted as long as it did if it wasn't for the concentration camps .

Malcolm wrote:

The Nazi Regime would have lasted much longer, and possibly have won the war on the continent if they had been content to merely expell people rather than spend enormous resources herding people about in cattle cars (on rail lines that Bismark designed to carry troops) in order to kill them.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, February 10th, 2014 at 12:39 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

From somebody that has not figured out the difference between Anarchism and chaos. This is what anarchism will lead to, predation by nomadic bands. You should read Nomadology: http://zinelibrary.info/files/nomadology\_read.pdf

The State is not an agent of war. Wars are bad for states. States generally seek to avoid war, unless they are taken over by their own nomads (as was the case of Iraq).

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, February 10th, 2014 at 12:30 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

Which is pretty sad when one stops to think about the history of Anarchism:
The democratic struggle in Spain during the 1930's (where the CNT was part of the governing democratic alliance),

Malcolm wrote:

A war where they were crushed.

Sherab Dorje said:

the International Workers of the World,

Malcolm wrote:

Lots of street battles.

Sherab Dorje said:

the liberation of the Ukraine from Imperial Russian and German forces AND the Bolsheviks in the 1920's,

Malcolm wrote:

Nonsense, never happened. Ukraine was dominated by the Communist Party during the 20's, on orders from Moscow.

Sherab Dorje said:

the ongoing self-governance and resistance of the Zapatistas, etc...

Malcolm wrote:

The Zapatistas are ethnic nationalists, not anarchists.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, February 9th, 2014 at 11:39 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

Sönam said:

and I have many the like ...

S.

Malcolm wrote:

But labor is a commodity, on this Marx agrees with Adam Smith. Labor is the "Wealth of Nations", but even the labor theory of value is obsolete.

These days many economists use quantified marginal utility.

In economics, the marginal utility of a good or service is the gain from an increase or loss from a decrease in the consumption of that good or service. Economists sometimes speak of a law of diminishing marginal utility, meaning that the first unit of consumption of a good or service yields more utility than the second and subsequent units, with a continuing reduction for greater amounts[clarification needed]. The marginal decision rule states that a good or service should be consumed at a quantity at which the marginal utility is equal to the marginal cost.[1]

The concept of marginal utility played a crucial role in the marginal revolution of the late 19th century, and led to the replacement of the labor theory of value by neoclassical value theory in which the relative prices of goods and services are simultaneously determined by marginal rates of substitution in consumption and marginal rates of transformation in production, which are equal in economic equilibrium.

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Marginal\_utility

This applies equally to labor as much as anything else. So for example, a cotton picker's labor has a marginal utility higher when there are no cotton machines to pick cotton. When cotton machines to pick cotton are introduced, that person's labor as a cotton picker becomes 0 value and they are forced to find other work. However, if a government decides, for whatever reason, that value of cotton pickers is innate, they can elect to bar cotton pickers, and thus the marginal utility of a cotton picker remains high for as long as cotton is wanted.

The labor theory of value however would declare that a person's labor is equal to what they can produce, and in Marxist terms, they ought to be rewarded one hundred percent for that. Of course that is not how it works in practice, because skilled workers can produce much more value than unskilled workers, for example, in the translation of Tibetan texts. The only way it could work in Marxist terms is to abolish markets and declare all labor is equal in value as well as all commodities produced by that labor, which is of course total nonsense. A chair made in half an hour is in no way comparable to a chair made by a fine craftsmen in 80 hours.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, February 9th, 2014 at 11:23 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

Rickpa said:

The idea behind free markets is totally voluntary. People exchange something desired for something desired to their mutual benefit. The failure that keeps visiting US markets is the failure to have free markets.

Malcolm wrote:

Sorry, Rick, the role of government is to regulate markets so they remain stable. What you are advocating is market anarchism. This is demonstrably bad for both the markets themselves as well as the economy.

Rickpa said:

Indeed, we are in peril.

Malcolm wrote:

Not really, I don't see Obama stormtroopers crossing my threshold anytime soon, unless you count the meek lady who came by my house yesterday to let us know about healthcare options.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, February 9th, 2014 at 11:20 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

kirtu said:

Nazi Germany did not try to exterminate communism or the Jewish people due to resource shortages (although Nazi propaganda hyped the necessity for living space).

Malcolm wrote:

Hitler went to war primarily to fuel the German war machine. The concentration camps were a distraction that contributed in large measure to Hitler's losing the war. But in the end, the most important objective in Hitler's campaigns were oil fields in Russia. Since he never seized them, he lost the war.

kirtu said:

WW1 was also not fought primarily due to resource competition.

Malcolm wrote:

Sure it was, it was not even possible without Bismark's train system.

kirtu said:

Neither was the Korean War.

Malcolm wrote:

Sure it was, that is why North Korea invaded South Korea.

kirtu said:

Neither were the Vietnam Wars.

Malcolm wrote:

Sure they were, the Vietnam wars were fought to oust the French, and then the Americans. The French were there for resources, the Americans (us) blundered into it because of fears that Communist control of South Vietnam would strangle shipping lanes in Indochina.

kirtu said:

Neither was the Nicaraguan wars.

Malcolm wrote:

We did not fight a war in Nicaragua.

kirtu said:

Neither were the Angolan wars.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, it was, it was sparked in response to forced cotton cultivation.

kirtu said:

The American Revolutionary War was also not fought over resource competition, even buying the taxes thing.

Malcolm wrote:

[/quote][/quote]

Of course it was. It was fought mainly because New England resented British interference in the domestic economy.

Even where wars seem to be fought for power, ultimately power brings only one thing: control over resources.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, February 9th, 2014 at 10:41 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

...future widespread Anarchist society.

Malcolm wrote:

It will never happen.

Sherab Dorje said:

Never say never.

Malcolm wrote:

Anarchist society:

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, February 9th, 2014 at 10:40 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

I think that our current political/economic model is based on theft. I think it is a form of exploitation or extortion that we have got so used to that most of us don't even stop to think about it. I believe capitalism is inherently violent: it not only pushes us into war after war, but its whole value system and praxis is dehumanising and alienating.

Malcolm wrote:

No, resource shortages push us into wars. This will happen under any political or economic system, apart from one run by awakened people (my preferred utopian vision). Therefore, the only obvious solution is to support as many people as possible in becoming awakened. Short of that, it is imperative to encourage worldly people to refrain from the ten non-virtues and to cultivate the four brahma-viharas (love, compassion, joy and equanimity).

tellyontellyon said:

How easy is it to care for all sentient beings when we have to compete with each other for our survival?

Malcolm wrote:

No one said the bodhisattva path was easy, but the first priority of a bodhisattva is preserve themselves so they can be service to others.

tellyontellyon said:

It is important for us to recognise that we all play our part in this political and economic system, none of us are innocent. We are guilty of allowing this system to continue. Some of us might have even found a comfortable little niche within it... but we have to understand that somebody else is paying for that niche.

Malcolm wrote:

Sorry, I am not guilty and I do not feel guilty. I have not stolen anything from anyone. I _want_ this present system to continue, 1. because markets are a fact of human existence regardless of the currency which is being used 2. because no proposed alternatives are workable or scale internationally.

And TOTO, evolution is all about niches, and we humans are no different, we inhabit the niches we find ourselves whether through karma or struggle to overcome our karma. You keep forgetting that a person who has no karma to be wealthy will never be wealthy even if you given them all the money in the world, they will have obstacles, or it will be robbed from them, or they will behave in such a way with it that they are sure to go to lower realms.

I am all for small scale experiments. If some want to have a anarchist commune, I am in favor of it. If some want to try and run their country or state according to Marxist principles, well, I think they are crazy but let them try. In the case of the former, they will have to deal with the fact that some people naturally are leaders and that a hierarchy will of necessity evolve, and former will have to face the fact that they will inevitably face supply and demand in the market.

While your desire for universal economic parity is admirable, it is romantic and impractical.

tellyontellyon said:

If someone want's to be a monk and live in a cave, I respect that. But for lay people who work and live in wider society we must recognise that we are playing a role in that society whether we think we are or not.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, but we don't have the right to force our vision of that society down anyone's throat.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, February 9th, 2014 at 7:38 PM

Title: Re: The Idea of Madhyamaka and Yogacara as Equally Correct

Content:

rob h said:

Just going back to this from earlier as I missed it :

Malcolm wrote:

Something cannot exist as both conditioned and unconditioned, it must be one or the other. Moreover, the former can never become the latter, nor can the latter become the former.

rob h said:

I think it can be, in the way that it's the basis for both. So while many people go through this world in delusion, others can use this exact same world to realize awakening. Or in the way that one side of the world can be in darkness, but the other side has sunlight. The world (and in turn the dependent.) can be both things at the same time, according to what situation it's looked at from.

Malcolm wrote:

All of this refers to the imagined nature. The imagined neither exists nor does not exist in truth since it never existed, being the projection of traces from the ālayavijñāna.

rob h said:

The version by Khenpo Shenga and Ju Mipham says that it's all three (bold is to point out the verse, just like the book does.) :

What is the reality of the characteristics? Once they are understood, the exaggerated and depreciative views regarding phenomena and persons do not occur. This is what characterizes the reality of the imaginary nature. Nor do the exaggerated and depreciative views of apprehended and apprehender occur, which is what characterizes the reality of the dependent nature. And in the same way, once it is understood, the exaggerated and depreciative views related to existence and non-existence do not occur. This is what characterizes the reality of the thoroughly established nature. Being unmistaken about this fundamental reality is referred to as the “reality of the characteristics.”

Malcolm wrote:

This still refers to the imagined nature viz: reification persons and things is the imagined nature, the absence of subject and object which produces the imagined is the dependent nature, the absence of existence and non-existence of the imagined nature in the dependent nature is the perfected nature. All of these three terms hinge on the imagined nature.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, February 9th, 2014 at 7:34 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

...future widespread Anarchist society.

Malcolm wrote:
It will never happen.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, February 9th, 2014 at 9:10 AM

Title: Re: Perspective

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

But the view of Dzogchen, Mahāmudra and Mahāmadhyamaka are not partial at all since they are based on direct perception of reality.

gad rgyangs said:

Doesn't direct perception of reality, by definition, transcend all concepts and views? Therefore, all conceptual and verbal constructs will be, at best, partial metaphors pointing to that direct perception. At worst, they are entangling briars from which the gullible never escape.

Malcolm wrote:

But the Buddhist view is not actually a verbal construct, and for that matter neither is Buddhist awakening.

For example, one needs only to understand the dependent nature of afflictions to become a stream entrant and so on, becoming free of the fetters. This does not require elaborate philosophy. It merely requires confidence in the teaching of dependent origination and the four truths of nobles.

Likewise, for the realization of emptiness on the path of seeing, one simple has to reflect on the absence of extremes (for a very long time, albeit), as Shantideva states, "when neither an entity or a non-entity remain before the mind, at the time, the mind is pacified", and this too is an experiential view.

In the case of Vajrayāna, the view, such as it is, is based on the experience of the example wisdom at the time of direct introduction or the third and fourth empowerments. Unfettered equipoise in the mind essence, or "ordinary awareness" is the view of Vajrayāna.

So this is why your illustration is irrelevant to Buddhadharma, and why Buddhadharma does not merit inclusion amongst "the blind men".

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, February 9th, 2014 at 7:36 AM

Title: Re: Perspective

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

A partial view is a partial view.

gad rgyangs said:

exactly, and that's all any view is going to be.

Malcolm wrote:

But the view of Dzogchen, Mahāmudra and Mahāmadhyamaka are not partial at all since they are based on direct perception of reality.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, February 9th, 2014 at 7:17 AM

Title: Re: The Idea of Madhyamaka and Yogacara as Equally Correct

Content:

rob h said:

Have found this from the Madhyantavibhanga, I know he says elsewhere in the text that something exists, but would guess that this is more of his actual view :

Once they are understood,

The exaggerated and depreciative views

Regarding phenomena and persons,

Apprehended and apprehender,

And existence and non-existence do not occur -

This is what characterizes reality.

Malcolm wrote:

All of this refers to the imagined nature. The imagined neither exists nor does not exist in truth since it never existed, being the projection of traces from the ālayavijñāna.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, February 9th, 2014 at 6:53 AM

Title: Re: The Idea of Madhyamaka and Yogacara as Equally Correct

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

No, in this case what Asanga is saying is emptiness means empty of the imagined, and that is about it. The dependent is not empty of the perfected, since it is the perfected when the imagined is recognized to be non-existent.

rob h said:

Yeah I think I remember quoting him saying something similar in another thread further down in this forum. Will carry on reading some of his works though and see if he states otherwise elsewhere.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, one must read these things for oneself. Only then can one truly decide.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, February 9th, 2014 at 6:48 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

Malcolm, really.

I think society has changed a great deal. Yes there are many of the same old problems, but many many things have been improved through social action.

I caught a bus the other day in Swansea: two men got on and were snuggling and kissing. No problem. Even forty years ago they would have risked getting beaten up and jailed. I believe in the USA black and white people can now sit in the same section of the bus and eat in the same restaurants. This sort of thing used to be the exception rather than the rule.

Malcolm wrote:

And before slavery was widespread in the US it was the rule to. And your gay friends still risk getting beaten up. Bias against gay people is not finished by a long shot. And of course racism and xenophobia is rampant in Europe right now. And let's not even mention Russia.

Some things have changed, other things have gotten worse, other things have gotten better. Things are better in our neck of the woods because we are the richest nations on the globe. Handing everyone $56,000 a year is not only impossible, but it won't solve anything.

tellyontellyon said:

People with mental health problems are not chained to the cell wall and sprayed with high pressure hoses in order to help them to become more morally sane.

Malcolm wrote:

No, they are dosed with toxic compounds which are much more effective.

tellyontellyon said:

It is no longer acceptable to hit or rape your wife.

Malcolm wrote:

For now, but when things get bad, and it will, all these things will again resurface.

tellyontellyon said:

Social action and protest is what won many of these improvements.

Malcolm wrote:

Agreed. But they are not permanent.

tellyontellyon said:

If it wasn't for organised social action we would still have 10 year old children working down the mines and nobody would know what a 'weekend' was.

Malcolm wrote:

We still do, just not in England or the US.

Incidentally, I am not saying that one should do nothing, or remain passive. One must help sentient beings. But as has been pointed out a gazillion times it must be done within the confines of Buddhist ethics.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, February 9th, 2014 at 6:40 AM

Title: Re: Perspective

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Your diagram shows them as all equivalent. That is why I said it was perennialist.

gad rgyangs said:

mais non, equivalent in partiality, not in content.

Malcolm wrote:

A partial view is a partial view.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, February 9th, 2014 at 6:23 AM

Title: Re: The Idea of Madhyamaka and Yogacara as Equally Correct

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

I think he means in a nondual sense though, not as in individuality or anything conventional.

If exists nondually, it exists, which is why the Madhyamakas claim that Yogacarins are nondual realists.

rob h said:

In a nondual sense though no polarity can be attributed, can it? I still think the problem comes down to taking what he's saying too literally. I can see how some Madhyamikas look at it in that way though. Also how maybe Asanga himself could've worded things better? Or maybe he was simply referring to what's left ultimately when everything false is discarded, and it actually does exist in some way, but with an equal nature of emptiness, so it had a balance. Would like to think that's the case anyway.

Malcolm wrote:

No, in this case what Asanga is saying is emptiness means empty of the imagined, and that is about it. The dependent is not empty of the perfected, since it is the perfected when the imagined is recognized to be non-existent.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, February 9th, 2014 at 6:21 AM

Title: Re: Perspective

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

No Dante, it really isn't like that. And Dzogchen is just an alternate scheme for explaining how one sees, progressively, the three kāyas, in reality no different than the five paths and ten stages. For all its cig car rhetoric, in the end, Dzogchen is just a gradual path like everything else in Buddhadharma.

gad rgyangs said:

Who said anything about Dzogchen? Perspectivism doesn't claim that all dṛṣṭi are equal, just that they are all partial perspectives, even the best ones, like Dzogchen. It's not that there isn't reality, its just that as soon as you conceptualize about it and open your mouth about it, you've got a limited perspective.

Malcolm wrote:

Your diagram shows them as all equivalent. That is why I said it was perennialist.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, February 9th, 2014 at 5:38 AM

Title: Re: Perspective

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, it is good to be honest about one's views, even if it amounts to eel wriggling.

That said, I go by the dictum utter by Āryadeva, realization proceeds from view. And of course the basis of the Buddhist path is samyagdṛṣṭi as you know.

gad rgyangs said:

dṛṣṭi is a dirty word since Nagarjuna, and everybody thinks their dṛṣṭi is samyak, based on which part of the elephant they felt up.

Malcolm wrote:

No Dante, it really isn't like that. And Dzogchen is just an alternate scheme for explaining how one sees, progressively, the three kāyas, in reality no different than the five paths and ten stages. For all its cig car rhetoric, in the end, Dzogchen is just a gradual path like everything else in Buddhadharma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, February 9th, 2014 at 5:36 AM

Title: Re: The Idea of Madhyamaka and Yogacara as Equally Correct

Content:

rob h said:

Are you going from the "exist in every aspect" part? Because the translation I have words it differently :

If the dependent and the absolute did not exist at all, defilement and purification would not take place.

Malcolm wrote:

It amounts to the same thing, I was translating it direct from Tibetan.

rob h said:

He does seem to contradict himself in parts, but it's maybe because he's explaining from conventional and non-conventional aspects. There's plenty of places in just the Mahayanasamgraha where he could also be said to be stating the opposite. For instance, when speaking of the fourfold pure dharma, this is the first of the four listed :
(a) The essential purity (prakṛtivyavadāna), i.e., the true nature (tathatā), emptiness (śūnyatā), the utmost point of reality (bhūtakoti), the signless (animitta), the absolute (paramārtha), the fundamental element (dharmadhātu).

Malcolm wrote:

Asanga clarifies elsewhere that he considers emptiness to be an affirming negation, like the emptiness of the Cullasuññata sutta, which cites in its Sanskrit version.

rob h said:

I think he means in a nondual sense though, not as in individuality or anything conventional.

Malcolm wrote:

If exists nondually, it exists, which is why the Madhyamakas claim that Yogacarins are nondual realists.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, February 9th, 2014 at 5:09 AM

Title: Re: Perspective

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Eel wriggling, in other words, like Sanjaya Bellaputtha.

gad rgyangs said:

one person's eel wriggling is another person's intellectual honesty.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, it is good to be honest about one's views, even if it amounts to eel wriggling.

That said, I go by the dictum uttered by Āryadeva, realization proceeds from view. And of course the basis of the Buddhist path is samyaktṛṣṭi as you know.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, February 9th, 2014 at 4:58 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

If we wait until we have eliminated all afflictions before we do anything then the planet will have gone up in flames.

Malcolm wrote:

Its going to get there anyway. This is one of the reasons why Buddhists tend to be pessimistic about social revolutions in general. When you have worldly people leading society, no matter who they are, things just get screwed up.

As the song goes:

Meet the new boss

Same as the old boss

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, February 9th, 2014 at 4:28 AM

Title: Re: The Idea of Madhyamaka and Yogacara as Equally Correct

Content:

rob h said:

It seems contradictory but maybe that's because the alayavijnana and the dependent are neither pure nor impure, conditioned nor unconditioned, nondual.

Malcolm wrote:

It's contradictory because he says it exists. That makes Yogacara realist. Something cannot exist as both conditioned and unconditioned, it must be one or the other.

Moreover, the former can never become the latter, nor can the latter become the former.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, February 9th, 2014 at 4:24 AM

Title: Re: The Idea of Madhyamaka and Yogacara as Equally Correct

Content:

smcj said:

Oh c'mon. Of course it is a matter of partiality. Unless you are saying that there is a broad consensus on the matter, which as we all know is never the case in Tibetan Dharma, then you are presenting your personal preference with an argument attached. What the possible rebuttals to your argument are I have no idea, but suffice it here to say that there are plenty of qualified khenpos that subscribe to the idea of the 3 natures that are familiar with your objection. The Tibetan system of treating the perfected nature as empty of the dependent and the imagined indeed is based on some very late Indian scholars, but it is not justified in the works of Maitreyanatha, Asanga or Vasubandhu. As you say it is a later development. There does seem to be a slippery slope effect here regarding the Buddha Nature teachings that is playing out over time. One of the things I admire about the Gelugpas is their insistence on trying to hold the line. I have a mental image of them as being like the little Dutch boy with his finger in the dike, only the entire dike has already collapsed except for the section a couple feet to the right and left of him.

Where this slippery slope ends up is in the Shentong and Chinese non-dual camps. Making too much of an issue out of it at this point is just crying over spilt milk, imo. I think an ecumenical "we will just have to agree to disagree" approach is in order.

Malcolm wrote:

Even Karl Brunholz admits that the three natures as presented by the Tibetan gzhan stong pas does not reflect their use by the original Yogacara masters. The former use what he describes as the type two schema of the three natures, while he fully admits that the latter use a type one schema. The problem arises because the Tibetan gzhan stong pas clearly claim that they are representing the thought of the original Yogacara masters, Maitreyanatha, Asanga and Vasubandhu when in fact they clearly are not, and thus Tsongkhapa, Gorampa, and so on, a whole host of Kagyu, Sakya, Nyingma and Gelug scholars can take them to task for misapplication of this doctrine.

The three natures doctrine is entirely irrelevant to the tathāgatagarbha teachings. It is wholly absent in the ten so called "tathāgatagarbha" sutras as well as the Uttaratantra. The three natures doctrine was grafted onto the tathāgatagarbha doctrine in Tibet because the tathāgatagarbha sūtras are considered "third turning" and the subject of the three natures is covered extensively in the Saṃdhinirmocana sutra, a sūtra of the Yogacara class, which provides us with the locus classicus of the three turnings, but it is so vague as to what is meant by this as to be rather useless, though much stock is placed in it by the gzhan stong pas.

Longchenpa is a perfectly good example of an author who considers the tathāgatagarbha sūtras to be definitive without mixing in the Yogacara three own natures. He also considers Prasangika to be the definitive sutra view.

My problem with the gzhan stong pas is that they do not heed the valid objections of their opponents, and as far as I can tell adhere to their tenet system out of sheer stubbornness rather than reason.

My objection to gzhan stong therefore is primarily an objection to their sloppiness of scholarship.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, February 9th, 2014 at 2:49 AM

Title: Re: Is Buddhist cosmology essentially Vedic?

Content:

theanarchist said:

If I remember Myriad Worlds by Jamgon Kongtrul right, in Buddhism has several different cosmological doctrins.

Malcolm wrote:

Three in fact: the Kośa, the Avatamska and the Kalacakra cosmologies. The much vaunted Dzogchen cosmology is actually nothing of the sort, and is just a restated version of the Kośa cosmology complete with a world tree.

It also seems that the authors of the Kalacakra Tantra knew full well that the Meru cosmology was merely symbolic because their calculations for the movements of the sun, moon, stars and planets ignore it, even though it is used to set up a hierarchy of the three lokas.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, February 9th, 2014 at 2:34 AM

Title: Re: The Idea of Madhyamaka and Yogacara as Equally Correct

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Then you still wind up with a contradiction because you are claiming that something defined as conditioned is not conditioned.

rob h said:

Isn't that problem there with anything classed as nondual, primordial, one-taste, etc, though? It could be that it's conditioned when the imaginary nature is present, or when it's still attached to, (and also mainly to point out and teach others.) but when it's let go of, it's neither conditioned nor unconditioned, because we're then leaving the realm of logic, and it's then beyond defining. So the whole concept is then let go of once it's served its purpose.

Malcolm wrote:

No, the dependent nature is defined as conditioned. The Mahāyānasamgraha states: Why? If it is asked what is the dependent, since it arises from the seeds of one's traces, given that is the case, it is the conditioned dependent.

Here, one can clearly see the other dependent is the ālayavijñāna.

Then he goes on:

If it is held that whatever appears does not exist in that way, for what reason will the dependent nature not become the total non-existence of everything? If it is asked, if that [dependent nature] does not exist, how will the non-existent perfected nature not become the non-existence of everything? Affliction and purification are perceptible.

Therefore, everything is not non-existent. A verse for that:

If the dependent and the perfected do not exist in every aspect, affliction and purification can never exist at all.

So you see, there is an assertion here by Asanga that the ālayavijñāna which is the basis of purification must be an existent in order that the perfected nature can exist; but since one is conditioned and the other is unconditioned, this Yogacara view suffers from a crucial internal contradiction.

The gzhan stong pas seek to escape this contradiction by mapping the three natures over the two truths. But this mapping is not justified in the Indian texts and in reality harms both systems. So you wind up with a system that is kind of like a tole, a sterile hybrid between a yak and cow, being neither.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, February 9th, 2014 at 2:00 AM

Title: Re: The Idea of Madhyamaka and Yogacara as Equally Correct

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The problem with the three natures is that they contain an internal contradiction: viz since the perfected nature is merely the absence of the imagined in the dependent, one must explain how the dependent, which is conditioned, becomes the perfected, which is unconditioned.

rob h said:

Yeah can see how that can be a problem, but maybe it's also an act of pointing to the idea that they're always both present? As in nirvana is also samsara. But by removing the imagined you remove the contradiction, and they're of what you could say, one taste, or nondual. So instead of trying to go from one to the other, instead you can just work on letting the attachment to the imagined go and then the nondual aspect can then arise, appear, return, and so on, in a natural way.

So you could maybe sum it up by saying that the dependent only appears to be conditioned when the imagined is present. Once that's gone, then it's nondual.

Malcolm wrote:

Then you still wind up with a contradiction because you are claiming that something defined as conditioned is not conditioned.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, February 9th, 2014 at 1:23 AM

Title: Re: The Idea of Madhyamaka and Yogacara as Equally Correct

Content:

smcj said:

I didn't realize it was the three natures that was so much of an issue, and will remember to keep that in mind when researching.

It's an issue for Malcolm personally. It's his bugaboo.

rob h said:

Am just wondering Malcolm : why don't you like the concept of the three natures?

Malcolm wrote:

It is not a matter of partiality. The problem with the three natures is that they contain an internal contradiction: viz since the perfected nature is merely the absence of the imagined in the dependent, one must explain how the dependent, which is conditioned, becomes the perfected, which is unconditioned.

The Tibetan system of treating the perfected nature as empty of the dependent and the imagined indeed is based on some very late Indian scholars, but it is not justified in the works of Maitreyanatha, Asanga or Vasubandhu.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, February 9th, 2014 at 12:25 AM

Title: Re: Perspective

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

No, perennialism states that all religions are partial revelations of a universal truth, or reality.

gad rgyangs said:

there is a fundamental difference between saying that all religions are expressing the same truth, and saying that all human conceptual systems (religious as well as secular science and philosophy) are inherently limited, metaphorical attempts to describe something that is beyond categories and definitions.

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Perennial\_philosophy is always couched in language like "all religions are one" and emphasizes similarities among religions and so-called mystical experiences. What I am suggesting with my doodle is more like

<https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Perspectivism> or

<https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Anekantavada>

Malcolm wrote:

Eel wriggling, in other words, like Sanjaya Bellaputtha.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, February 9th, 2014 at 12:07 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

Zhen Li said:

In a sense that's true. Anarchism is not unlike Libertarianism in that their goal is a state from which everything will gradually build up again.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, supposedly better, but without eradication of the the afflictions, well, it will be the same old shit all over again.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, February 9th, 2014 at 12:06 AM

Title: Re: Scotland becomes 17th country to approve same-sex marria

Content:

Zhen Li said:

(I always find it hard to wrap my head around red = right wing, blue = left wing, in the US)

Malcolm wrote:

It's a media convention collectively arrived at by the US media in the 2000 Gore/Bush contest.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, February 8th, 2014 at 11:42 PM

Title: Re: Scotland becomes 17th country to approve same-sex marria

Content:

Simon E. said:

Those who most typify the current anti-American sentiment which is widespread in the UK would agree with you..

I suspect that in part they see all that was worst about colonialism being replicated by current American foreign policy.

Malcolm wrote:

All the while oblivious to the fact their standard of living depends upon it.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, February 8th, 2014 at 10:39 PM

Title: Re: Scotland becomes 17th country to approve same-sex marria

Content:

Simon E. said:

But that's rather the point Malcolm. When an educated crowd of younger Brits break into spontaneous applause at any negative view of the USA at just about any stand-up venue, from a local Pub to the Edinburgh Festival, they are not inhibited by considerations of heinous behaviour by other nations.

As I said, its visceral. Its not a mindset that results from logic.

And the fact that Brits DO react like that can readily be attested to by anyone who has attended such venues.

If the comic wants a quick laugh then the royal family or the U.S. will get one every time.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, it is not like the British Empire was this super benevolent entity.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, February 8th, 2014 at 9:28 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

Sönam said:

Sönam

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, let's ensure world chaos...screw it...tear it all down and lets go back the pre-agricultural period and 3,000,000 million humans....oh wait...that is called "anarcho-primitivism....and then the cycle will start all over again.

If there is a utopian fantasy out there to subscribe to, I prefer the Shambhala mythos ala a Buddhist world regency.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, February 8th, 2014 at 9:25 PM

Title: Re: Scotland becomes 17th country to approve same-sex marria

Content:

Simon E. said:

As a reasonably educated Brit I would say that Moldbug has little or no understanding of the phenomenon in question at all.

His rationalisation adds upto little more than a slightly whiney and puzzled ' you guys don't really hate us .'

The reality is both more complex and more visceral.

Malcolm wrote:

He does have a good point, however. In general, the crimes of other nations, Britain, Italy, Germany, France, Japan, Australia, Canada, Mexico, Iraq, Iran, Egypt, you name it, etc. certainly place people from these countries on very shaky ground when it comes to venting spleen against the Great Satan...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, February 8th, 2014 at 8:01 AM

Title: Re: Perspective

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Certainly not as smart as you and all the perennialists out there. But being a Buddha, he does not have to be smart, merely totally awakened.

gad rgyangs said:

oops. you walked right into that one! Perennialism says that all religions are expressing the same universal truth. My graphix clearly shows that the various religions (as well as science) are all different, partial perspectives on the nature of reality.

Malcolm wrote:

No, perennialism states that all religions are partial revelations if a universal truth, or reality.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, February 8th, 2014 at 6:07 AM

Title: Re: Perspective

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

I rather doubt he intended to included his own Dharma in the above description.

gad rgyangs said:

oh, then he not as smart as I thought....

Malcolm wrote:

Certainly not as smart as you and all the perennialists out there. But being a Buddha, he does not have to be smart, merely totally awakened.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, February 8th, 2014 at 6:06 AM

Title: Re: Perspective

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

You do realize this analogy was first introduced by the Buddha?

dzogchungpa said:

Is that actually known for a fact?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, February 8th, 2014 at 6:02 AM

Title: Re: Perspective

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

elephant perspectives 6.jpg

Malcolm wrote:

You do realize this analogy was first introduced by the Buddha?

gad rgyangs said:

he so smart! How come nobody listen to him?

Malcolm wrote:

I rather doubt he intended to included his own Dharma in the above description.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, February 8th, 2014 at 5:55 AM

Title: Re: Perspective

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

elephant perspectives 6.jpg

Malcolm wrote:

You do realize this analogy was first introduced by the Buddha?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, February 8th, 2014 at 4:25 AM

Title: Re: ChNNR Longevity Mon Lam

Content:

pemachophel said:

It's not Rinpoche's style to promote His shabten because He is a good Lama.

Malcolm wrote:

ChNN uses a generic one because it covers all one's gurus.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, February 8th, 2014 at 4:21 AM

Title: Re: "the Self is real" according to T. Page

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

Thanks for the "clarification", "Malcolm".

Malcolm wrote:

I thought you understood that Kyle was my emanation...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, February 8th, 2014 at 4:05 AM

Title: Re: "the Self is real" according to T. Page

Content:

Son of Buddha said:

There is a direct reference to the Tathagatagarbha which is the Dharmakaya, and in Tathagatagarbha literature the Dharmakaya is Not-Empty.

Malcolm wrote:

What the dharmakāya is not empty of is omniscience.

Son of Buddha said:

spoken like a true Shentongpa All of its qualities are simply qualities of omniscience, and that is all.

aye it is not empty of its qualities.....spoken like a true Shentongpa. The dharmakāya is unconditioned, it has neither form or shape, so those are the only qualities it could be said to possess. It has two aspects, the emptiness aspect and the luminous aspect. Understood in this way, one understands the real meaning of purity, bliss, self, and permanence.

are you trying to quote Ven Dolpopa?

It is pure because it is empty, it is bliss because it is free from suffering, it is "self" because omniscience transcends both self and non-self and it is permanent because it not subject to decay.

M

It is pure because it is empty(of all adventitious defilements and conditions) it is bliss because it is free from suffering it is "self" because omniscience transcends both self and non-self(of the forders).....(just as Dolpopa's True Self is defined) it is permanent because it not subject to decay.

Malcolm wrote:

It is not gzhan stong. Gzhan stong requires the convoluted misapplication of the three natures to the two truths. In other words, gzhan stong is at worst, a deformed Madhyamaka; at best it is a transitional view between false aspectarian Yogacara and Madhyamaka.

Nothing stated above is inconsistent with the definitive sutras of the second turning of the wheel. The Āryāṣṭasāhasrika-prajñāpāramitā:

Kauśika, given that is so, the Tathāgata is not named tathāgata because he attained his own physical body [ātmabhāvaśarīra], but it is because he attained omniscient wisdom that the Tathāgata is called the tathāgata.

Kauśika, whatever the omniscience of the tathāgata arhat samyakbuddha is, this comes from prajñāpāramitā.

The attainment of the Tathāgatas own physical body arises from prajñāpāramitā and skill in means, and is the support for omniscient wisdom. Relying on such a support [as the prajñāpāramitā] will generate omniscient wisdom, and will also generate the body of a buddha, and will also generate the dharmakāya, and will also generate the sangha.
Thus if one wants to realize the dharmakāya and omniscience, one must rely on prajñāpāramitā.

Also here is a clear usage of "atman" which does not refer to the self, but rather is being used as a reflexive noun.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, February 8th, 2014 at 12:39 AM

Title: Re: "the Self is real" according to T. Page

Content:

Son of Buddha said:

The is a direct reference to the Tathagatagarbha which is the Dharmakaya, and in Tathagatagarbha lititure the Dharmakaya is Not-Empty.

Malcolm wrote:

What the dharmakāya is not empty of is omniscience. All of its qualities are simply qualities of omniscience, and that is all. The dharmakāya is unconditioned, it has neither form or shape, so those are the only qualities it could be said to possess. It has two aspects, the emptiness aspect and the luminous aspect. Understood in this way, one understands the real meaning of purity, bliss, self, and permanence.

It is pure because it is empty, it is bliss because it is free from suffering, it is "self" because omniscience transcends both self and non-self and it is permanent because it is not subject to decay.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, February 8th, 2014 at 12:35 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The freedom to starve is hardly utopian, it is merely pragmatic, and it happens to many people all over the world in our present global capitalist economy. Frankly, the systematic eradication of subsistence farming has been one of the great challenges developing nations face, and one of the great mistakes they have made. It is also a mistake made in the US. The centralization of agriculture is very dangerous.

Sherlock said:

The eradication of nomadic pastoralism is an even greater mistake, one which is causing global desertification. If you seen Savory's presentation on using animal husbandry to fight desertification, his map of desertifying areas basically corresponds to where nomads have been forced in great numbers to leave their traditional way of life. Rather than a complicated top-down approach to organizing herds and so on, it's better to just let them carry on their traditional lifestyle.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, I totally agree. properly managed cattle herds can actually restore soil and grassland much faster than "nature" can. There was a reason the sod in the Midwest was 8 feet deep — bison.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, February 8th, 2014 at 12:16 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Personally I am holding out for this:

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 7th, 2014 at 11:52 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

Sönam said:

If anarchy is understood as a non-system in harmony with "what is" (Libertarianism in a non political sense), it does not refer to any already experimented utopia (including capitalism). It is right that his efficiency would be much improved if human beings were aware of the three afflictions, nevertheless it's a "natural way of interfering", the nearest to the dharma. The main adage of libertarianism being: "My freedom stop where other's freedom start" ... would we really need something else to, all together, interfere?

As for capitalism, I may observe that you approach it with a pinch of utopia when you consider that: "... at least it is not authoritarian or totalitarian. Yes, you may be free to starve under this economic system, but at least you are free."

But we are not going to engage ourselves in a controversial discussion ... so I notice your present point of view.

Sönam

Malcolm wrote:

The freedom to starve is hardly utopian, it is merely pragmatic, and it happens to many people all over the world in our present global capitalist economy. Frankly, the systematic eradication of subsistence farming has been one of the great challenges developing nations face, and one of the great mistakes they have made. It is also a mistake made in the US. The centralization of agriculture is very dangerous.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 7th, 2014 at 11:47 PM

Title: Re: "the Self is real" according to T. Page

Content:

Son of Buddha said:

"Lord, the Tathagatagarbha is void(empty) of all the defilement-stores, which are discrete and knowing as not liberated.

"Lord, the Tathagatagarbha is not void(empty) of the Buddha dharmas which are nondiscrete, inconceivable, more numerous than the sands of the Ganges, and knowing as liberated.

Malcolm wrote:

This is merely a reference to dharmakāya. Of course, since dharmakāya is emptiness, as Nāgārjuna says, "for those whom emptiness possible, everything is possible..." When one directly knows emptiness, having become a Buddha, one knows everything, those are the buddha qualities being referred to.

The reason why only buddhas can see tathāgatagarbha is the same reason only buddhas can see the dharmakāya.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 7th, 2014 at 11:43 PM

Title: Re: "the Self is real" according to T. Page

Content:

Son of Buddha said:

The sutra even quotes old anatman(not self) teachings and explains them in the context of True Self.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, indeed, which is why is treated as a provisional text.

The Āryākṣayamatinirdeśa-nāma-mahāyāna-sūtra sets out the criteria for a sūtra of definitive meaning:

Any sūtrānta which explains in a variety of different terms a self, a sentient being, a living being, a personality, a person, an individual, one born from a human, a human, an agent, an experiencer — teaching an owner in what is ownerless — those sutras are called "of provisional meaning". Any sūtrānta which teaches emptiness, the signless, the wishless, the unconditioned, the non-arisen, the unproduced, the insubstantial, the non-existence of self, the non-existence of sentient beings, the non-existence of living beings, the non-existence of individuals, the non-existence of an owner up to the doors of liberation, those are called "definitive meaning". This is taught in the sūtrāntas of definitive meaning but is not taught in the sūtrāntas of the provisional meaning. This is why the tathāgatagarbha doctrine can be either provisional or definitive depending on one's understanding and method of explication.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 7th, 2014 at 9:52 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

Rickpa said:

If people are kind and ethical, anarchy would naturally work as well. In fact, nothing would be better. Are we kind and ethical at this time?

Sönam said:

Good point Rick-pa. Anarchy is certainly a non-organization in harmony with "what is" ... that we are not ready yet, as a civilization, does not mean we should not prepare for it now.

Sönam

Malcolm wrote:
Dear Sonam:

From a Buddhist point of view, all of these utopian visions require one thing in common, i.e., that all people are free from the three afflictions, or at least able to keep them in check. We presently live in the era of the five degenerations where afflictions are rampant. What are the five?

The degeneration of lifespan
The degeneration of the seasons (climate)
The degeneration of afflictions
The degeneration of view (i.e. increased reliance on materialism, like Marxism, anarcho-capitalism, etc.)
The degeneration of decline (declining health, intelligence, and so on)

For this reason I place no hope in any utopian schemes. The present economic system remains the one most accessible of improvement and tuning. Socialism, as envisioned by the 19th and early 20th century firebrands, has proven to be an utter failure. While capitalism is spiritually bereft as well, at least it is not authoritarian or totalitarian. Yes, you may be free to starve under this economic system, but at least you are free.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Friday, February 7th, 2014 at 10:03 AM
Title: Re: Scotland becomes 17th country to approve same-sex marriage
Content:

Malcolm wrote:
Indian culture is very hygienic and civilized, actually. They suffer from overpopulation in the north. The squalid nature of India has many causes, mostly colonial.

Indrajala said:
Didn't you say...
And Indian cities, by and large, are dirty, dangerous and squalid, and always have been. It is their culture. Not ours. We can visit and enjoy it or hate it, but it is not our business to tell them what to do or how to run their country.
This is contradictory.

Malcolm wrote:
Not really. Until quite recently Indian culture was largely rural, not urbanized. The problems with overcrowding in the cities in India is a result of people leaving the land. And this has largely happened in the past 40 years. Nevertheless, Indian cities have been squalid, dense and overpopulated for centuries leading to the kinds of urban problems you perceive now.

On the other hand, Indian culture has a well established customs of hygiene, that many follow very rigorously. But I have to confess, most of my experience in India is in the south. I have spent very little time in the North.

Of course, Chinese cities are just as filthy and just as dangerous. I have been to many of them, and find them to be no improvement over Indian cities. In Chinese cities you see many people dead drunk in the middle of the day, staggering around like idiots, the drinking there is appalling, not to mention the fact that everyone smokes like fiends. The country side is absolutely polluted with industrial waste, and it goes on and on.

Japanese cities, it is true, are generally quite clean, but for example, when I visited Kyoto in 1986, I was appalled at the amount of garbage there was in the woods, despite the fact that the areas where people live are neat and tidy. Also, universally, the toilets were often noisome pits rivaling some toilets I have seen in both China and India.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 7th, 2014 at 7:18 AM

Title: Re: ChNNR Longevity Mon Lam

Content:

ngodrup said:

I assume there is more than lone Longevity prayer in existence for Rinpoche.
Does anyone have one?

Malcolm wrote:

Generally it is just the one at the end of the medium thun.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 7th, 2014 at 4:27 AM

Title: Re: Meeting Taiwan's new-age Buddhists

Content:

JKhedrup said:

If laypeople lose even more confidence it does not bode well for the future of the Sangha here.

Malcolm wrote:

Arguing that the bhikṣu ordination is dispensable hardly inspires confidence.

JKhedrup said:

I have no problem with a lay priest lineage.

Malcolm wrote:

We have that in Tibet, and I am one of those.

JKhedrup said:

But a bhikṣu is a bhikṣu and the murkier the distinction becomes, the more danger there is of losing both the confidence of the lay community and the disappearance of the precious monastic form and discipline. I do not want to see the rules and community life disappear and the robes and outward appearance remain. That would be deeply troubling to me.

Malcolm wrote:

Agreed. If it is to be done, it ought to be done right and according to the traditional form.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 7th, 2014 at 3:53 AM

Title: Re: Meeting Taiwan's new-age Buddhists

Content:

Jikan said:

As an aside: Ven. Indrajala may find the practice model at California Tendai Monastery of interest, in that there's an effort being made to practice along pre-Meiji lines in terms of renunciation.

<http://caltendai.org/TempleLife.html>

note that the use of the word "monk" on the temple's website doesn't correspond to the usage preferred here; ordination in this sense follows the Brahma Net Sutra precepts, not the Vinaya.

Malcolm wrote:

Hence they are, to coin a phrase "Lay monks".

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 7th, 2014 at 3:52 AM

Title: Re: Meeting Taiwan's new-age Buddhists

Content:

JKhedrup said:

Atisha thought it was a problem. That is why he never recited posadha with other monks in Tibet. Also, he was prevented from spreading the Mahāsaṃghika lineage because all other ordination lineages were barred by royal decree.

But I am also sure you are aware of the story from Tibetan history about the ordination after the Langdarma period. Chinese Bhikshus of the Dharmagupta tradition helped make up a quorum for a Mulasarvastivada ordination

Malcolm wrote:

Nevertheless, the Vinaya was reintroduced to Tibet twice more, making for a total of three ordination lineages as I know you are aware.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 7th, 2014 at 2:50 AM

Title: Re: Meeting Taiwan's new-age Buddhists

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

I don't reject "renunciate bodhisattvas", I simply do not accept that they are bhikṣus. As far as I am concerned, they are celibate upāsakās because they have no more than five pratimokṣa vows to observe.

Indrajala said:

You said, "I don't regard it as valid."

And the Tendai model of renunciate bodhisattvas includes ten major and forty-eight minor precepts.

Malcolm wrote:

Those are bodhisattva samvara, not prātimokṣa vows.

What I do not accept as valid is that those samvaras make one equivalent to a bhikṣu.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 7th, 2014 at 2:45 AM

Title: Re: Meeting Taiwan's new-age Buddhists

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

It is generally a preliminary step in becoming a dge tshul, a sort of pre-novitiate probation, similar to the śikṣamāṇā and probably adapted from it in spirit.

Indrajala said:

So you accept an ordination that has no literal basis in scripture yet reject the idea of a renunciate bodhisattva of the Tendai model which is likewise adapted from scripture in spirit?

Malcolm wrote:

I don't reject "renunciate bodhisattvas", I simply do not accept that they are bhikṣus. As far as I am concerned, they are celibate upāsakās because they have no more than five pratimokṣa vows to observe. Those are the only vows that can be conferred in a refuge rite, whether it be Śrāvakayāna or Mahāyāna.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 7th, 2014 at 2:41 AM

Title: Re: Meeting Taiwan's new-age Buddhists

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The gomin is an upāsakā, his or her vows demand celibacy. And the bhramacarya ordination does as well. When you take the brahmacarya ordination, sexual misconduct for you is sex, period.

Indrajala said:

The five precepts in no scripture I've read actually define the third precept as being brahmacarya. You can have that intent, but that's not the letter of the law.

You speak of a brahmacarya ordination for laypeople. What basis is there for this in scripture? I know of the practice, but where is the third precept (of the five) defined for a layperson as brahmacarya?

Malcolm wrote:

It is generally a preliminary step in becoming a dge tshul, a sort of pre-novitiate probation, similar to the śikṣamāṇā and probably adapted from it in spirit. Basically, the idea goes, if you can maintain celibacy for a year, then they will consider letting you ordain as a dge tshul. I myself received this type of full upāsakā ordination many years ago, but I decided that I was not going to be a bhikṣu, that I was not suited for it by temperament. Since I am a Vajrayāna practitioner, I thought it was pointless. So I am a full Mūlasarvastivādin upāsakā (rather rare actually), but I let go of the intent to be celibate. Most people who take refuge in Tibetan Buddhism do so by a Mahāyāna refuge rite.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 7th, 2014 at 2:32 AM

Title: Re: Meeting Taiwan's new-age Buddhists

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Not just that, but one can take the upāsakā vows with the intent to be celibate.

Indrajala said:

Intent perhaps, but the actual wording and understanding of the five precepts in the lay context refers to sexual misconduct, never celibacy. The upāsakā cannot be defined as a renunciate based on their five precepts, because none of the precepts demand celibacy and abandonment of the home life.

Malcolm wrote:

The gomin is an upāsakā, his or her vows demand celibacy. And the bhramacarya ordination does as well. When you take the brahmacarya ordination, sexual misconduct for you is sex, period. Vows after all are mere intentions.

Anyway, the concept now of "going forth" is a little silly. Buddhist bhikṣus have not truly done so in 2000 years or more for the most part. And as you know, Chinese monks are scandalized to find so called "Mahāyāna" monks living with their wives, engaged in farming in certain hinterlands.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 7th, 2014 at 2:26 AM

Title: Re: Meeting Taiwan's new-age Buddhists

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

One's status is defined by one's vows, not by one's renunciation. Upāsakās can indeed be renunciates, which is why there are celibate upāsāka ordinations.

Indrajala said:

If you mean the eight precepts and fasting, this is only temporary.

Malcolm wrote:

Not just that, but one can take the upāsakā vows with the intent to be celibate. Or for example, having received them once, one can daily take the fast day vows, or one can take them for a specified period not to exceed one's lifetime.

Anyway, full upāsakās are renunciates by definition as well, for they renounce taking life, taking what has not been given, lying, intoxication and sexual misconduct. Then of course there is the gomin ordination, but these days it exists only in Theravada.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 7th, 2014 at 2:23 AM

Title: Re: Meeting Taiwan's new-age Buddhists

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Non-Buddhist vows do not convert to Buddhist vows even with a bodhisattva ordination. Why? Because the basis of that discipline is based on ignorance.

Indrajala said:

Irrelevant. The hypothetical sadhu might not have any vows at all initially. He would be a renunciate, however the upāsāka is not a renunciate. A sadhu cannot be defined as an upāsāka.

Malcolm wrote:

One's status is defined by one's vows, not by one's renunciation. Upāsakās can indeed be renunciates, which is why there are celibate upāsāka ordinations.

A renunciate who takes bodhisattva vows and no other vows immediately becomes a Bauddha upāsakā.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 7th, 2014 at 2:19 AM

Title: Re: Meeting Taiwan's new-age Buddhists

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

If mundane śramaṇas took bodhisattva vows without undergoing ordination they would be mere upāsakās.

Indrajala said:

No, because the upāsāka is not a home leaver.

Malcolm wrote:

Non-Buddhist vows do not convert to Buddhist vows even with a bodhisattva ordination. Why? Because the basis of that discipline is based on ignorance. Such a person would not be allowed to even sit with novices, let alone bhikṣus.

Holding only the five precepts at most, they would be upāsakās. Upāsakās can be renunciants. The word just means "drawing closer to the positive [dharma]".

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 7th, 2014 at 2:15 AM

Title: Re: Meeting Taiwan's new-age Buddhists

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

A śramaṇa in a Buddhist context is just a bhikṣu, bhikṣuṇī, śikṣamāṇā, śrāmaṇera or śrāmaṇerī.

Indrajala said:

Not necessarily. A renunciate or śramaṇa need not be even Buddhist. If a sadhu aspires to bodhisattvahood and he takes on the precepts, he would be a renunciate bodhisattva.

Malcolm wrote:

If mundane śramaṇas took bodhisattva vows without undergoing ordination they would be mere upāsakās.

Indrajala said:

he would be a renunciate bodhisattva.

Malcolm wrote:

And a mere upāsāka.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 7th, 2014 at 2:05 AM

Title: Re: Meeting Taiwan's new-age Buddhists

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

No, it isn't. Why? Because even lay people can receive all those vows without abandoning their status as upāsakās, etc.

Indrajala said:

A śramaṇa (and a śramaṇa is a renunciate albeit not strictly speaking a Buddhist Vinaya-based bhikṣu, bhikṣuṇī, śikṣamāṇā, śrāmaṇera or śrāmaṇerī) who receives the bodhisattva precepts is effectively a śramaṇa bodhisattva or renunciate bodhisattva, i.e., equivalent to a Śrāvakayāna bhikṣu. In other words, as a renunciate who takes on the stated set of bodhisattva precepts, you are different from the upāsakā who does, given the earlier śramaṇa lifestyle and aspirations.

Malcolm wrote:

Oh nonsense Jeff, what a load of baloney.

A śramaṇa in a Buddhist context is just a bhikṣu, bhikṣuṇī, śikṣamāṇā, śrāmaṇera or śrāmaṇerī.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 7th, 2014 at 1:57 AM

Title: Re: Meeting Taiwan's new-age Buddhists

Content:

JKhedrup said:

As for Malcolm's comment here about monks of a different Vinaya lineage reciting Posada together : As my sramanera ordination is Mulasarvastivada, and Bhikshu ordination Theravada, I asked both Lama Zopa Rinpoche and the current Jangtse Choje Rinpoche about participating in Tibetan Posada recitation. They both encouraged me to do so. Apparently HHDL has indicated this may not be a problem, but I will have to look for a source to quote on this (there were recent meetings with Burmese monks) However, it would not be good for me to act as part of a quorum in an ordination ceremony, as the lineage of the vows is different. But I am sure other more conservative masters would have different opinions.

Malcolm wrote:

Atisha thought it was a problem. That is why he never recited posadha with other monks in Tibet. Also, he was prevented from spreading the Mahāsaṃghika lineage because all other ordination lineages were barred by royal decree.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 7th, 2014 at 1:54 AM

Title: Re: Meeting Taiwan's new-age Buddhists

Content:

Indrajala said:

It was the tonsure that made the monk really, rather than the precepts. I know that sounds insufficient to people now, but even in China up until recently it was like that. Most monks from the sounds of it didn't have even novice precepts because it was the tonsure and community recognition that made you a monk. This deviates from legal definitions, yes, but nevertheless in practice it worked like that.

Malcolm wrote:
Well, that is a farce.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Friday, February 7th, 2014 at 1:52 AM
Title: Re: Meeting Taiwan's new-age Buddhists
Content:
Malcolm wrote:
A bhikṣu ordination absolutely does not exist in Mahāyāna sutra.

Indrajala said:
Not explicitly, but the meaning can be drawn out.

Malcolm wrote:
No, it can't.

Indrajala said:
The term "renunciate bodhisattva" 出家菩薩 is equivalent to a Mahāyāna bhikṣu.

Malcolm wrote:
No, it isn't. Why? Because even lay people can receive all those vows without abandoning their status as upāsakās, etc.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Friday, February 7th, 2014 at 1:39 AM
Title: Re: Meeting Taiwan's new-age Buddhists
Content:
Indrajala said:
[

This is problematic from a contemporary scholarship perspective. The Vinaya is late period literature. See the above quoting of Schopen in Bronkhorst's work.

Malcolm wrote:
I don't consider Schopen an authority on anything that has to with Dharma.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Friday, February 7th, 2014 at 1:23 AM
Title: Re: Meeting Taiwan's new-age Buddhists
Content:
Malcolm wrote:

There are not, there never has been, and there never will be two kinds of bhikṣus in the present dispensation of Buddhadharma.

Indrajala said:

Arguably there are more than two. A Mahāsāṃghika bhikṣu took 218 precepts, which is quite a lot less from other ordination lineages in India. They were another type of bhikṣu arguably.

Malcolm wrote:

You understand my point. In other words, apart from ordination in any of the "18" śrāvaka ordination lineages, there cannot be another kind of bhikṣu. There is no Mahāyāna bhikṣu ordination taught in Mahāyāna. One takes one's Mahāyāna training on the basis of whatever prātimokṣa vows one already possesses, and if one does not have those, they are received during the preliminary of going refuge, which is the first step in any Mahāyāna bodhisattva vow rite.

A bhikṣu ordination absolutely does not exist in Mahāyāna sutra.

If it did exist, the Tibetans would have preferred it.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 7th, 2014 at 1:04 AM

Title: Re: Meeting Taiwan's new-age Buddhists

Content:

Indrajala said:

My source in Chinese states otherwise.

Malcolm wrote:

They are wrong.

Indrajala said:

They are prātimokṣa, Vinaya exists to explicate the prātimokṣa in detail.

No, the Vinaya prātimokṣa only exists because of incidents. Many of the precepts in the Vinaya do not actually relate to the five precepts (like those related to preserving the image of the sangha in the face of judgmental laypeople).

Malcolm wrote:

The Vinaya exists to explain why those precepts were enacted. The precepts came first, accreted over the lifetime of the Buddha.

Indrajala said:

While different ordination lineages have different Vinayas, nevertheless, when you take bhikṣu ordination, you are pledging to hold all the prātimokṣa vows you received, not merely the one's that suit you.

The Buddha thought otherwise apparently. If he indeed stated the minor precepts could be abandoned, and that precepts which were inappropriate in different lands could likewise be ignored, then he certainly no hard liner as you seem to be in this discussion.

Malcolm wrote:

He made allowances for such things as fur and leather for those who lived in cold places. Of course we have to work with circumstances. But this does not mean we can just "adapt" what we want. It is no big deal that Tibetan monks wear the vest originally designed for nuns. Deciding however to do away with large portions of the prātimokṣa merely because it is inconvenient is not satisfactory.

Indrajala said:

No one has the authority to modify the pratimokṣa rules. That's why it was never done, even when the Buddha stated the minor prātimokṣa rules could be ignored.

The sangha has the right to modify the Vinaya as they see fit. In practice this actually happened in India, though perhaps unannounced. The proof for this is found in the Mūlasarvāstivāda Vinaya which contains some Mahāyāna allusions and elements, which means there was significant revising of the content long after the development of the other Vinaya texts.

Malcolm wrote:

The basic prātimokṣa rules remained unaltered.

Indrajala said:

So, contrary to your assertion, the sangha in India and elsewhere clearly did modify things. We need only consider how the content and number of precepts differ among the Vinaya texts of various Indian schools.

Malcolm wrote:

They did not modify the prātimokṣa rules.

Indrajala said:

Those precepts were not as sacrosanct as you assert. This is merely your opinion, whereas in actual practice in India it was not like this at all. See Schopen: There appears to be, however, no actual evidence that the textual ideal was ever fully or even partially implemented in actual practice; at least none is ever cited.

Malcolm wrote:

This is an argument from an absence of evidence, which amounts to no argument at all.

Indrajala said:

No, you automatically receive the five precepts, but you can elect to follow only those you are able to follow, unlike the higher ordinations.

In practice this is not always so.

Malcolm wrote:
In practice, it is always so.

Indrajala said:
This interpretation results in Sanghabheda.
No, not in the context of East Asia for the simple reason that karma proceedings were not carried out in the Sinosphere.

There are two types of schism: karma-bheda and cakra-bheda. The former was not possible in the Sinosphere. The alternative model proposed does not constitute the latter.

Malcolm wrote:
A Sanghabheda requires merely that some fully ordained monk declares he has a better idea than the Buddha, and sets up a new rule.

Indrajala said:
No one has the authority to do that. This is why bhikṣus of one ordination lineage are barred from reciting posadha with bhikṣus from another ordination lineage. Changing the pratimokṣa rules is a Sanghabheda offense.
At some point somebody changed the original rules otherwise there would not be multiple ordination lineages.

Malcolm wrote:
No, different people received their ordinations at different points in Buddha's lifetime, and began ordaining other monks in regions removed from the Buddha's immediate presence. This is sufficient to account for disparities in the number of rules as well as their language, and accounts of their elaboration.

Indrajala said:
The Chan "Pure Rules" and Tendai model worked fairly well however.

Malcolm wrote:
As institutional disciplines I am sure they worked quite well, but people who do not receive a proper Śrāvakayāna bhikṣu ordination are not bhikṣus in any sense of the word.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Friday, February 7th, 2014 at 12:50 AM
Title: Re: Meeting Taiwan's new-age Buddhists
Content:

Indrajala said:

Nevertheless, the early Heian bhikṣu sangha, with state support, officially recognized Saichō's reformed model as legitimate and ultimately equal Dharmagupta ordinations.

This is why I argue that Saichō's monastic model is effectively an revised bhikṣu Vinaya based on bodhisattva precepts.

Jikan said:

This recognition is interesting; it suggests that the two forms of ordination can be functionally equivalent. This doesn't mean that one is a revision of the other, however. A pen and a pencil can do the same work, but a pencil is not a revised pen.

Malcolm wrote:

There are not, there never has been, and there never will be two kinds of bhikṣus in the present dispensation of Buddhadharma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 7th, 2014 at 12:38 AM

Title: Re: Scotland becomes 17th country to approve same-sex marria

Content:

Indrajala said:

Infanticide, sati and child marriages might not be seen as a problem, but they should be halted and made criminal.

Malcolm wrote:

Infanticide, child marriage and so on existed in your Fantasy Sino-Japanese realm too.

Indrajala said:

I see, so you believe in the Strict Parent State after all. Good luck with that. It led to Mao. No, poverty, desperation and decades of civil war led to Mao. The civil religion of communism led more to Mao than Confucian values.

Malcolm wrote:

Russia would up with Stalin because of the cultural precedent set by the Czarist absolutest state, likewise, China, another historically absolutest state, wound with Mao.

Indrajala said:

Such political arrangements worked very well in China, Korea and Japan, producing in pre-modern times societies which were rather stable over the long-term.

Seriously? What nonsense.

\

You don't think the relatively good standard of living and social stability of the Tang dynasty was remarkable given the age?

Malcolm wrote:

I don't think it was that stable.

Indrajala said:

And Indian cities, by and large, are dirty, dangerous and squalid, and always have been. It is their culture. Not ours. We can visit and enjoy it or hate it, but it is not our business to tell them what to do or how to run their country.

It is virtuous to introduce civilized values and principles of hygiene as it will alleviate suffering and save lives. To argue otherwise is immoral.

Malcolm wrote:

Indian culture is very hygienic and civilized, actually. They suffer from overpopulation in the north. The squalid nature of India has many causes, mostly colonial.

Indrajala said:

The British did more good than harm in India. It is a shame they had to leave.

Malcolm wrote:

Your paternalist attitudes towards those whom you regard as your inferiors is duly noted.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 7th, 2014 at 12:31 AM

Title: Re: Meeting Taiwan's new-age Buddhists

Content:

Indrajala said:

This is why I argue that Saichō's monastic model is effectively an revised bhikṣu Vinaya based on bodhisattva precepts.

Malcolm wrote:

Except that it isn't and they are not bhikṣus.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, February 7th, 2014 at 12:29 AM

Title: Re: Meeting Taiwan's new-age Buddhists

Content:

Indrajala said:

You are mistaken. The first three of the seven past buddhas (Vipaśyin, Śikhin and Viśvabhū) never established any precepts as there was no need.

Malcolm wrote:

No, I am not mistaken. A pratimokṣa was taught by all three Buddhas you mention. Please see Prebish, Buddhist Monastic Discipline. pgs. 110-113.

Indrajala said:

You cannot take bodhisattva vows without first going for refuge; since going for refuge automatically entails receiving pratimokṣa vows, your refutation is dismantled without the need to resort to scripture.

Prātimokṣa precepts like the five precepts which come with the refuge vows are not the Vinaya. You cannot equate refuge precepts and the five precepts with the Vinaya. The Vinaya prātimokṣa was only provisionally established given the circumstances of the time. The Vinaya is not universal.

Malcolm wrote:

They are prātimokṣa, Vinaya exists to explicate the prātimokṣa in detail. While different ordination lineages have different Vinayas, nevertheless, when you take bhikṣu ordination, you are pledging to hold all the prātimokṣa vows you received, not merely the one's that suit you.

Indrajala said:

Not so. The sangha officially condoned the reform, which is in line with the Vinaya regulations which permit modifications where necessary.

Malcolm wrote:

No one has the authority to modify the pratimokṣa rules. That's why it was never done, even when the Buddha stated the minor prātimokṣa rules could be ignored. When you take bhikṣu ordination, you agree to follow all of the rules, not merely some of the rules, based on your own judgment. For this reason there is posada, to repair any breach of the rules and confess those you have broken. People who are not ready to follow all of the prātimokṣa rules, i.e. Vinaya, should not become bhikṣus.

Indrajala said:

Of course the bodhisattva samvara is "superior" to pratimokṣa vows; nevertheless they cannot be received without first going for refuge, and the receipt of the upāsakā vows is an automatic consequence of going for refuge whether it is first done in a Mahāyāna based rite of conferring the Bodhisattva trainings or not.

This is not necessarily so. You can have refuge precepts without taking the five precepts.

Malcolm wrote:

No, you automatically receive the five precepts, but you can elect to follow only those you are able to follow, unlike the higher ordinations.

Indrajala said:

Moreover, the upāsaka precepts are not the Vinaya strictly speaking.

Malcolm wrote:

They are prātimokṣa. The method of conferring upāsakā vows is discussed in Vinaya. Therefore, it is part of Vinaya.

Indrajala said:

The "Bodhisattva Vinaya" in the Tendai system is a heavily revised Vinaya system that effectively replaces the Śrāvakayāna model.

Malcolm wrote:

This interpretation results in Sanghabheda.

Indrajala said:

What if the vows are revised and then followed perfectly?

Malcolm wrote:

No one has the authority to do that. This is why bhikṣus of one ordination lineage are barred from reciting posadha with bhikṣus from another ordination lineage. Changing the pratimokṣa rules is a Sanghabheda offense.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 6th, 2014 at 10:48 PM

Title: Re: Meeting Taiwan's new-age Buddhists

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Prātimokṣa vows are the basis of bodhisattva vows.

Indrajala said:

No, it is the other way around in Mahāyāna. The prātimokṣa vows were provisionally established due to problematic circumstances during the Buddha's lifetime. The bodhisattva precepts are taught by all buddhas.

Malcolm wrote:

So was pratimokṣa.

Indrajala said:

Consequently your statement "prātimokṣa vows are the basis of bodhisattva vows" is refuted.

Malcolm wrote:

Every Buddha recites pratimokṣa as well. Not every Buddha institutes a bhikṣu Sangha however.

You cannot take bodhisattva vows without first going for refuge; since going for refuge automatically entails receiving pratimokṣa vows, your refutation is dismantled without the need to resort to scripture.

Indrajala said:

Without one, you cannot have the other.

Prātimokṣa precepts are encompassed within the bodhisattva precepts, which comprise the three sets of pure precepts:

Malcolm wrote:

See above.

Indrajala said:

A person who follows upāsakā prātimokṣa and bodhisattva vows is still just an upāsakā.

A person who follows śramaṇera prātimokṣa is still just a śramaṇera.

This is strictly speaking an orthodox Vinaya view, which is valid within the context of Śrāvakayāna. That being said it does not apply to the Japanese sangha because the sangha council in the early Heian period approved Saichō's reforms whereby a renunciate bodhisattva received alternative precepts based on bodhisattva precepts which granted him the status of a bhikṣu.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, such "monks" are merely celibate lay persons.

Indrajala said:

There is vast literature in China and Japan as well. I tend to agree with many authors of ancient times who argued for the superiority of bodhisattva precepts.

Malcolm wrote:

Of course the bodhisattva samvara is "superior" to pratimokṣa vows; nevertheless they cannot be received without first going for refuge, and the receipt of the upāsakā vows is an automatic consequence of going for refuge whether it is first done in a Mahāyāna based rite of conferring the Bodhisattva trainings or not.

Indrajala said:

You don't seem to know about or appreciate the fact that a celibate and orderly monastic model based on bodhisattva precepts was devised by Saichō and approved by the Vinaya-based sangha authorities in ancient Japan, thereby making it a valid and quite legitimate reform.

Malcolm wrote:

I am quite aware of it, for a great deal longer than you, actually [1988]. I don't regard it as valid. As I said such "monks" are celibate upāsakās in robes, no matter how realized, venerable or sublime they may be.

If you will recall, this position is what caused the Zen people to freak out on me. I still have not changed my position.

And as far as I am concerned, someone who actually goes to the trouble of receiving the vows of a śramaṇera or a bhikṣu is obliged to follow them as perfectly as they can without making excuses for not following them as strictly as possible. Otherwise, in my view, they are frauds taking advantage of the robes. Since the ordained Sangha can't seem to keep themselves honest, it is up the lay Sangha to do so by not supporting those ordained people who do not seem to be observing their vows properly.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 6th, 2014 at 10:11 PM

Title: Re: Begging, Panhandling & 8th Major Precept (Brahma Net Sut

Content:

Zhen Li said:

If we have confidence that the panhandler won't abuse a donation, there's no excuse for holding back. Just like if you're confident that you need to eat with your own mouth, you eat.

Malcolm wrote:

Āryadeva passed a blind woman on the road. Hearing him coming she begged him for one of his eyes. He obliged, and she promptly popped the eye in her mouth, and swallowed it with satisfaction. In that moment, Āryadeva suffered a pang of regret, because of course he had intended the women use it for her own sight. Because of his pang of regret, he lost the chance to have his eye miraculously restored. This is why one of his nicknames is Ekacakṣu, "One eye".

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 6th, 2014 at 10:01 PM

Title: Re: Scotland becomes 17th country to approve same-sex marria

Content:

Indrajala said:

Countries which perpetually let people make the wrong decisions end up like India or worse.

Malcolm wrote:

Seems like you are more than halfway to fascism. People have an innate right to screw up their lives.

Indrajala said:

In India people constantly make all the wrong decisions, like building a new house with no toilet inside or out because they think it will pollute them, and the fact nobody feels humble enough to clean it (not even their own). So, they defecate outside in public, and preventable diseases spread. They screw their own lives over and those of many other people. This is one example where hard handed political measures are necessary to overcome damaging behavior on the part of unintelligent commoners. India lacks the capacity and political will to do this, which is why half a billion people or more defecate in public around the subcontinent.

Malcolm wrote:

Dude, the toilets in Asia everywhere are abysmal. Some of the foulest toilets I have ever encountered were in Japan. The Japanese think nothing of littering their forests with cigarette cartons, beer cans, etc.

Indrajala said:

So, no people do not have an innate right to screw up their lives when their community suffers as a result.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, they do, if their culture does not perceive it as a problem.

Indrajala said:

I'm actually heavily inclined to Confucian political values after reading Chinese history and philosophy somewhat extensively (minus of course the obligatory animal sacrifice if you strictly follow the Li-ji 禮記). This means a strong and well-educated leadership and hierarchy is in place to solve pressing problems and enforce proper behavior on the lower classes whether they like it or not. The leadership takes into account good advice ideally and exercises the five constant virtues (humaneness, due-giving, propriety, wisdom, and trust). State officials might need to act as parental figures to untamed people if they fail to behave like civilized human beings, but it is for their own good ultimately.

Malcolm wrote:

I see, so you believe in the Strict Parent State after all. Good luck with that. It led to Mao.

Indrajala said:

Such political arrangements worked very well in China, Korea and Japan, producing in pre-modern times societies which were rather stable over the long-term.

Malcolm wrote:

Seriously? What nonsense.

Indrajala said:

Likewise, modern Japan and Korea are safe, clean, efficient and well-ordered societies founded on Confucian and Buddhist values. Taiwan is not far behind.

Malcolm wrote:

And Indian cities, by and large, are dirty, dangerous and squalid, and always have been. It is their culture. Not ours. We can visit and enjoy it or hate it, but it is not our business to tell them what to do or how to run their country.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 6th, 2014 at 9:47 PM

Title: Re: Meeting Taiwan's new-age Buddhists

Content:

Indrajala said:

In a predominately Mahāyāna society, the bodhisattva precepts take precedence over anything Hīnayāna, including the Vinaya. Consequently, implementing new precepts and procedures was warranted and acceptable even based on Vinaya law.

Malcolm wrote:

Prātimokṣa vows are the basis of bodhisattva vows. Without one, you cannot have the other. A person who follows upāsakā prātimokṣa and bodhisattva vows is still just an upāsakā. A person who follows śramaṇera prātimokṣa is still just a śramaṇera.

While it is true that receiving bodhisattva vows changes the nature of one's prātimokṣa, i.e., one is now adhering to these vows as a form of bodhisattva activity, it does not mean that one can be sloppy with them and just ignore them when convenient.

There is a great deal of Indian writing, as well as Tibetan writing on the subject of the three vows.

In general, however, it is only when a prātimokṣa vows contradict bodhisattva vows that one is to favor the latter over the former. But what is the criteria for that contradiction? In general it only covers activity that one is truly engaged in for the welfare of others.

Since a great many of the pratimokṣa rules were set down because of the complaints of laypeople about the conduct of monks, the main point is that śramaṇeras and bhikṣus and their female counterparts need to consider how they appear to lay people. When śramaṇeras or bhikṣus opines in public that their vows are not important, this leaves a very bad impression on lay people, and causes lay people to suspect (correctly) that the Sangha is degenerate and no longer worthy of respect (and so it seem to me). If one claims that only Mahāyāna vows important, than wearing robes truly is a farce, since Mahāyāna vows are the same whether one is a lay person or an ordained person.

By the way, there is nothing more new age that suggesting that prātimokṣa can be discarded.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 6th, 2014 at 9:12 PM

Title: Re: Meeting Taiwan's new-age Buddhists

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Had you seen my discussions with our friend Jeff at other occasions, you will have noted that I don't really approve of the idea that Vinaya is something that can be conveniently ignored. .

Indrajala said:
Yet it is conveniently ignored.

Like in a monastery where lunch starts at 12:00pm sharp. It is institutionally arranged so as to be actually against the rulebook.

As I keep saying, there's more to the Vinaya than the vows. There's the whole matter of karma proceedings and democratic decision making which clearly nobody feels is important.

Malcolm wrote:
To be more precise, pratimokṣa vows.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Thursday, February 6th, 2014 at 9:10 PM
Title: Re: Scotland becomes 17th country to approve same-sex marria
Content:

Indrajala said:
Countries which perpetually let people make the wrong decisions end up like India or worse.

Malcolm wrote:
Seems like you are more than halfway to fascism. People have an innate right to screw up their lives.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Thursday, February 6th, 2014 at 9:08 PM
Title: Re: Scotland becomes 17th country to approve same-sex marria
Content:

WASW said:
Yes- but I am questioning the idea that there are "unintelligent masses" who require the (quite cynical and manipulative, in this view) existence of institutions that are sanctioned by religions to keep them stable?

Indrajala said:
The masses are generally unintelligent and unable to properly look after themselves.

Malcolm wrote:
There is no such thing as "the masses".

Author: Malcolm
Date: Thursday, February 6th, 2014 at 9:35 AM

Title: Re: Meeting Taiwan's new-age Buddhists

Content:

Zhen Li said:

Yeah of course.

Malcolm wrote:

Had you seen my discussions with our friend Jeff at other occasions, you will have noted that I don't really approve of the idea that Vinaya is something that can be conveniently ignored. My opinion is that if you are going to be a bhikṣu, then be a bhikṣu and follow all the vinaya rules as best as one can, do posadha twice a month with a Sangha, etc. If you cannot do that much, then remain a dge tshul. There is no shame in not taking vows you have no intention of keeping.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 6th, 2014 at 9:22 AM

Title: Re: Meeting Taiwan's new-age Buddhists

Content:

Zhen Li said:

Okay, I read the Bhasya and it's more or less saying the same thing as you were. Again, the issue is that the Sarvastivādins did not deny that there are also cetanās related to taking the vow, so the theory being posited by Vasubandhu isn't denied. Also, that it cannot be destroyed since it is a dharma that always exists is just to take unfair advantage of the Sarvastivādan position, of course they posit that conventionally speaking it is destroyed. Imaginary? Maybe, how can we know? It's talking about a state that is non-falsifiable, I wouldn't disagree if you were to say it's meaningless - which isn't Vasubandhu's argument. But like I said before, the fact that indictative dharmas are not being denied as at play is more useful, and the notion of avijñāpti might simply be one's impression of how things are, hence a vitarka/vikalpa.

The point is, the state of being a monk, be it either a continuous stream of karmas from intention, or an actual non-informative form, is more than irrational fears of Marmite.

Malcolm wrote:

There are also arguments against avijñāpti when Vasubandhu covers the eleven forms of matter in chapter one.

Vasubandhu basically says there is no such thing and that such a dharma was never mentioned by the Buddha. It is merely a speculative theory of the Sarvastivādins.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 6th, 2014 at 8:56 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

But that doesn't have to mean automatic war.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, actually it does. Any attack launched against US soil will immediately cause the US to go on a war footing, because attacking the US directly is an act of war. Our government will respond in kind without hesitation.

tellyontellyon said:

The terrorists on the planes came from all over the place. They could have used the same reasons to have attacked Pakistan or the Yemen or Saudi Arabia etc.

Malcolm wrote:

They operated and trained out of Afghanistan. In case you have not noticed, the US has been systematically hunting down Al Qaeda terrorists and their training camps everywhere they can find them.

tellyontellyon said:

Defending the country doesn't have to mean automatic war. There is more than one way to defend yourself, full scale invasion wasn't the only option, and given Afghanistans history of resisting invasions, was unlikely to work in the long run.

Malcolm wrote:

We had no interest in holding Afghanistan, and still don't, besides what some conspiracy theory wack jobs think. We were solely interested in Al Qaeda and other allied groups. Getting involved in the Karzi thing was an error.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 6th, 2014 at 8:48 AM

Title: Re: Scotland becomes 17th country to approve same-sex marria

Content:

greentara said:

Malcom, 'ok, Chicken Little' Well I think Indrajala has made a few good points. You may not agree with them but I think they are worthy of consideration.

Nighthawk said:

I agree with him as well. Mainly on the point that feminism is to blame for the high divorce rate in western countries. Truth can be hard to swallow sometimes.

Malcolm wrote:

Utter nonsense.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 6th, 2014 at 8:05 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

Perhaps inevitable with that particular administration, but a more far-sighted administration might have avoided playing into the hands of the terrorists.

Malcolm wrote:

Any US administration would have been compelled to respond exactly the same way. The job of the president is to defend the country against enemies, both foreign and domestic.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 6th, 2014 at 6:45 AM

Title: Re: Scotland becomes 17th country to approve same-sex marria

Content:

WASW said:

Yes- but I am questioning the idea that there are "unintelligent masses" who require the (quite cynical and manipulative, in this view) existence of institutions that are sanctioned by religions to keep them stable? I think that idea is quite patronising and doesn't really reflect the historic realities for the rise of marriage-contracts, that being the control of property and inheritance (not that I think this is the rationale of how marriages need to be conceived of now and in the future, though obviously equal marriage laws do provide homosexual couples with not inconsiderable benefits in terms of protecting bereaved spouses_.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, but you must consider all those "child marriage" advocates out there who will insist that their right to wed six year olds is being infringed upon, you know, because it is all the fault of the feminazis.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 6th, 2014 at 6:22 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

I'm no fan of Saddam. I hope things are better in the long term, but the price the Iraqis as well as other forces paid was extreme.

Are the regimes in Saudi Arabia, Pakistan etc. any better?

Malcolm wrote:

So far none of them has gassed their own citizens, as far as I know.

tellyontellyon said:

In the end, these peoples will have to find their own solutions. It was always obvious that both the Iraqis and Afghans wouldn't want our troops on their soil.... anymore than you would want a foreign army to take over your government in the way it happened over there.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, America is a global power. Can't have your former puppets openly defying you on the world stage, and you can't let some pissant terrorists take out the brains of your global financial network either. In terms of real politick, what the US did is absolutely consistent with what a world power does when attacked.

tellyontellyon said:

I think we both agree a better way should have been found.

Malcolm wrote:

In terms of Iraq, perhaps. In terms of the Al Qaeda, and Afghanistan, it was never gonna happen, the minute we were attacked, Afghanistan was going to suffer punishment for harboring Al Qaeda. It was an inevitable consequence of their attack on the US.

When the Muslims attack Shambhala, The 25th Kalkin king, Rudracakravartin, will lead Shambhala in a retaliatory attack on Mecca, defeating the Muslims and making the world safe for Dharma for another 1500 years, that is, if you believe the prophecies found in the Kālacakra Tantra.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 6th, 2014 at 6:11 AM

Title: Re: Meeting Taiwan's new-age Buddhists

Content:

Zhen Li said:

It is pure vikalpa, from a Sautrantika point of view.

Well, a vitarka can be vikalpa can't it? Vikalpa isn't even a dharma in Sarvastivāda.

Vikalpa = imaginary.

Whatever Sarvastivādin reasonings may be, it is thoroughly rejected by Vasubandhu in the Bhaṣyaṃ.

I don't know his argument, but I think it might just be non-falsifiable.

Malcolm wrote:

You need to read the Abhidharmakośabhaṣyaṃ then. It is the preliminary argument in chapter four, Karma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 6th, 2014 at 6:06 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

War for regime change is against the Geneva convention anyway. It is by definition a war crime. The whole Iraq war was one big crime.

Malcolm wrote:

I didn't support the war in Iraq, and still don't; but toppling the Hussein regime was a good thing for Iraq in the long run.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 6th, 2014 at 6:03 AM

Title: Re: Scotland becomes 17th country to approve same-sex marria

Content:

greentara said:

Malcom, 'ok, Chicken Little' Well I think Indrajala has made a few good points. You may not agree with them but I think they are worthy of consideration.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, I don't agree. I think they are utterly worthless for consideration and should be dismissed out of hand as pure bigotry, something you might hear on a fundamentalist Christian television station.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 6th, 2014 at 5:58 AM

Title: Re: Meeting Taiwan's new-age Buddhists

Content:

Zhen Li said:

cittaviprayukta-saṃskāra, it's rūpa, albeit non-informative.

Malcolm wrote:

Whatever Sarvastivādin reasonings may be, it is thoroughly rejected by Vasubandhu in the Bhaṣyaṃ.

Zhen Li said:

That being said, I'm not opposed to the idea that it's not a useful classification and may more or less amount to pure vitarka.

Malcolm wrote:

It is pure vikalpa, from a Sautrantika point of view.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 6th, 2014 at 5:07 AM

Title: Re: Meeting Taiwan's new-age Buddhists

Content:

Zhen Li said:

Well, that certainly makes sense.

I'm not sure that it actually refutes the notion of Avijñapti Rūpa, since for its existence one would need vāsanā anyway. But, unfortunately, I am afraid I just realised might be non-falsifiable. I think that it might be that Avijñapti Rūpa is what 'appears' to be the case, e.g. that object X 'is' in the state of monkhood, regardless of consciousness. Even if that statehood is not informative.

But, the notion of monkhood that does away with Avijñapti Rūpa, as you related, is sufficient and more relevant to questions of value judgements about the wholesomeness and fruitfulness of the state. And the question is really, is it actually the case that the state of monkhood 'exists,' and is actually informative, i.e. vijñapti rūpa?

I am afraid this is leading a bit off topic.

Malcolm wrote:

Sautrantikas refute avijñapti, substituting intention (cetana) as being sufficient for vows.

Zhen Li said:

is it actually the case that the state of monkhood 'exists,' and is actually informative, i.e. vijñapti rūpa?

Malcolm wrote:

Apparently not, as the case of our friend Jeff (Indrajala) demonstrates, since we can't really figure out what he means by "bhikṣu".

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 6th, 2014 at 5:04 AM

Title: Re: Before Longchen Nyingthig, what was the most popular cyc

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Well, having translated the whole thing

ConradTree said:

What do you think of Erik Pema Kunsang's translations?

Nowadays, he translates rigpa as "knowing" and marigpa as "unknowing".

He translated a tiny bit of Gonpa Zangthal in Wellsprings of the Great Perfection.

Malcolm wrote:

eric's translations are fine, but our styles are very different. His translation of rig pa and ma rig pa are perfectly correct, though I would prefer ma rig pa as ignorance i.e. avidyā.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 6th, 2014 at 4:12 AM

Title: Re: Before Longchen Nyingthig, what was the most popular cyc

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Khyentse Wangpo opines that the Gongpa Zangthal is the most profound of the Nyinthig cycles.

ConradTree said:

Yes that's also my opinion.

Now, what is your opinion on the most profound Nyinthig cycle?

Malcolm wrote:

Well, having translated the whole thing, I think that there places where the GZ is definitely clearer than the VN, and its Vārāhī instructions are infinitely more detailed than what you find in the KN or the KYN.

But I don't have really any personal opinion about it. Its all good Dharma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 6th, 2014 at 2:25 AM

Title: Re: Climate Change: We're Doomed

Content:

AlexanderS said:

There is also the problem with wind energy that it is highly unreliable. When the wind doesn't blow there is no energy is produced!

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, and when it blows too strongly, the turbine must be locked.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 6th, 2014 at 2:11 AM

Title: Re: Meeting Taiwan's new-age Buddhists

Content:

Zhen Li said:

Then someone would cease being a monk when the notion is no longer at hand in their mind. Which is not to say that the intention isn't a factor.

Malcolm wrote:

No, Vasubandhu says that as long as the series is not interrupted by a contrary intention, the vow is maintained. For example, if you have taken the vow not to take life, that vow is intact in the mind stream until you decide you want to kill something. Then you lose the vow because your intention is contrary to the intention that formed the vow. But you do not need to be mindful of that vow in some persistent sense constantly reminding yourself that you have the vow. It is sufficient that you took it, and when a situation comes up that demands you either follow the vow or break it, in a person of predominately positive mental factors, the vow will be followed automatically. The Sautrantika theory is very much grounded on the notion of vasanas. The longer you do not violate the initial intent of a vow, the stronger the trace to maintain that vow is. Of course, in the beginning, that trace will be quite weak, and therefore, more active mindfulness may be required. Eventually however, mindfulness and attentiveness (saṃprajāna) become ingrained, and one is called "well trained".

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 6th, 2014 at 2:01 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

AlexanderS said:

Being caught doesn't make it any less a crime,

Malcolm wrote:

Of course not.

Anyway, we are Buddhists, we do not believe in war at all, much less wars of aggression.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 6th, 2014 at 1:52 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

AlexanderS said:

Im sorry Virgo, I'm trying to stay out of these conversations, but what you are saying here is bullshit. There are several documented instances of US soldiers comitting war crimes in Iraq and Afghanistan. A famous example was the video leaked by Bradley Manning. US marines are people trained to kill, and while US marines might be more disciplined than some of their enemies, there is no innocence in war.

Edit - Don't forget Abu Ghraib either.

Malcolm wrote:

Soldiers have rules of engagement. When those are violated, the soldiers are generally punished. Sometimes soldiers violate rules of engagement out of frustration, when caught, they are punished.

In the Manning video, the gun crew asked their CC for permission to fire. It was granted. It was not, from the US Military or US's point of view, an illegal killing. That is was a total mistake is a fact, that noncombatants were brutally killed by the US Army is a fact. Is there any legal remedy, maybe in a court of international law, but the soldiers followed proper procedures. Are the procedures themselves flawed, certainly. But then we had no business in Iraq anyway.

Abhu Ghraib has resulted in some court martials and convictions, but none were severe enough in my opinion. War is hell.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 6th, 2014 at 1:47 AM

Title: Re: Scotland becomes 17th country to approve same-sex marriage

Content:

Indrajala said:

I fear these trends will result in very undesirable developments in future decades.

Malcolm wrote:

Ok, Chicken Little.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, February 6th, 2014 at 1:18 AM

Title: Re: Scotland becomes 17th country to approve same-sex marriage

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

There is no justifiable argument that can be produced which can show that gay marriage is disadvantageous to society as a whole.

Indrajala said:

At least nothing we can discern at the moment. The future will tell.

As I said, recognizing gay marriage sets a legal precedent for any other unrecognized group seeking legal sanction for their presently unrecognized activities. This means advocates for child marriage amongst some minorities in the west will have another precedent to refer to as far as legal matters go.

Malcolm wrote:

Nonsense.

Indrajala said:

Have you checked the divorce rate lately?

Actually popular feminist values likely prompted the increase in divorce over the last few decades. This was perhaps another unforeseen consequence of rapid reforms. This is why a cautious albeit generally tolerant, conservative approach has many advantages rather than rushing through changes and attempting to stamp out disagreement.

Malcolm wrote:

Again, nonsense. The divorce rate rose in the seventies because most people married in the 60's in their early 20's. This set a precedent that continues unabated. Divorce, once scandalous, became increasingly acceptable as celebrities were marrying and divorcing at dizzying rates in the fifties and sixties.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, February 5th, 2014 at 11:32 PM

Title: Re: Scotland becomes 17th country to approve same-sex marriage

Content:

Indrajala said:

No, the author is suggesting that a stable institution like heterosexual marriage (which is condoned and supported by religion) lends support to the unintelligent masses.

Malcolm wrote:

Have you checked the divorce rate lately? It is still pretty high, and it is only declining because people are declining to be married at very young ages. In 2011 in the US there were:

Number of marriages: 2,118,000

Marriage rate: 6.8 per 1,000 total population

Divorce rate: 3.6 per 1,000 population

This is hardly what we can define as "stable marriage", for every four people that get married, two people get divorced.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, February 5th, 2014 at 11:28 PM

Title: Re: Scotland becomes 17th country to approve same-sex marriage

Content:

Indrajala said:

There is no historical precedent for this sort of thing. Gay marriage allows same-sex parents to raise children. Again, there is no historical precedent for such arrangements and it remains to be seen what this will eventually bring in western societies.

Malcolm wrote:

Having known many children of same-sex couples, all that I have met are heterosexual in orientation, though I am sure there are children of same sex couples who themselves are also gay, I just haven't met any. Since gay couples actually want children and often have to jump through high hoops to have them, they are generally much more loving and supportive as a whole population than heterosexual parents are. So, my experience with the children of same sex couples is that they do extremely well in school, are highly motivated to succeed, and are well loved and turn out to be fantastic people with few problems. So what down side can there be? Added to this, same sex couples who want kids are themselves usually in good relationships and are professionally successful.

Marriage is just a business contract. Gender orientation and marriage are not coterminous. There are many gay men and women for example in history who have married for the social protections such arrangements offered. Now gay persons can marry people of their own orientation. There is no justifiable argument that can be produced which can show that gay marriage is disadvantageous to society as a whole. People who make such arguments are like those who argued against "miscegenation". In other words, they are bigots seeking intellectual justification for their bigotry.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, February 5th, 2014 at 10:04 PM

Title: Re: Meeting Taiwan's new-age Buddhists

Content:

Zhen Li said:

I should also note an important abhidharmic element which is being denied by those who don't see the value of the Vinaya. It is that when one engages in ordination, as with many other types of status changes, one then engages in a certain Avijñapti Karma, which results in the possession of a certain Avijñapti Rūpa, or uninformative matter.

Malcolm wrote:

This theory is rejected by Vasubandhu actually. The Sautrantika position is that vows are intentions and do not create an avijñapti.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, February 5th, 2014 at 9:01 AM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

conebeckham said:

That is samsara. The Rabbit Hole. The Blue Pill.

shel said:

This touches on a point I made earlier but there was no response.

In both the fictional stories of Alice in Wonderland and the Matrix there is an illusory world, but behind that illusory world is a 'real' world, so in these cases there is a correct or meaningful use of the term illusory. So where is the real world in Buddhism?

Malcolm wrote:
It's illusion all the way down...

Author: Malcolm
Date: Wednesday, February 5th, 2014 at 8:35 AM
Title: Re: Climate Change: We're Doomed
Content:

tellyontellyon said:
Wind, wave, solar.... these are more difficult to 'own' as such. I suspect that stockmarket investors would expect less of a return on these sorts of technologies. It's not impossible that that could change over time, but renewables need to be developed now, before more damage is done to the environment.

Malcolm wrote:
You are being naive, these things are quite easy to own, they simply are expensive technologies (dependent on petroleum based manufacturing), with short lifespans (the average wind generator has a life span of about 20 years) that no one will invest in without heavy government subsidies.

Actually, in the US, renewables are a very fast growing part of the energy economy, but there are all kinds of problems with wind depending on where it is going to be sited.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Tuesday, February 4th, 2014 at 10:26 PM
Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless
Content:

Malcolm wrote:
when searched for, apart from a mere appearance, keys and other such phenomena cannot be found no matter how hard one may try.

PadmaVonSamba said:
When you say, " cannot be found ",
exactly what do mean by "keys"?
Can you be a little more descriptive?

.
.
.

Malcolm wrote:
Just what I said. Please review the seven fold reasoning of the chariot found in Chandrakirit's Madhyamaka avatara for more detail.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, February 4th, 2014 at 8:07 PM

Title: Re: Climate Change: We're Doomed

Content:

Kim O'Hara said:

That's certainly what we have been told to think ... but hold on a moment: who told us to think that?

Kim

Malcolm wrote:

It's obvious.

Kim O'Hara said:

Hi, Malcolm,

Do you mean it's, "Obvious that going after fossil fuels would destroy the world economy" or, "Obvious who told us to think that"?

I disagree with the first and can provide evidence as to its falsity, but agree with the second ... at least, I have some likely candidates in mind. You may have others and may be right about them too.

Kim

Malcolm wrote:

Kim,

At present our manufacturing capacity as well as our agricultural capacity is completely dependent on fossil fuels, not to mention the grids in various countries. Until someone discovers another relatively inexpensive source of consumable energy that does not itself depend on fossil fuels, at present world population levels it is irresponsible to start eliminating the use of fossil fuels by fiat. Is eliminating their use a desiderata? Certainly. Does our world ecology demand it, certainly. Can we do so immediately and globally? No, our addiction to fossil fuels is so deep, that it is impossible for us to withdraw from fossil fuels at this time. Every part of global trade, manufacture and agriculture extensively uses fossil fuels.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, February 4th, 2014 at 8:29 AM

Title: Re: Before Longchen Nyingthig, what was the most popular cyc

Content:

Drikung_Dzogchen said:

You are right, there is the Vima Nyingthig connection but Tulku Thondup says Longchen Nyingthig is also essence of Khandro Nyingthig.

Malcolm wrote:

Sort of, the Rigdzin Dupa is definitely modeled on a very similar sadhana found in the Khandro Nyinthig. But the Dzogchen teachings in the LN depend primarily on the Vima Nyinthig.

The Khandro Nyinthig is more or less a combination of Nyinthig with Anuyoga practices of various kinds.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, February 4th, 2014 at 8:25 AM

Title: Re: Climate Change: We're Doomed

Content:

Kim O'Hara said:

That's certainly what we have been told to think ... but hold on a moment: who told us to think that?

Kim

Malcolm wrote:

It's obvious.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, February 4th, 2014 at 8:19 AM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

shel said:

You're not making sense, all sorts of things can be found about objects besides their 'mere appearance'.

Malcolm wrote:

When you investigate one appearance, for example, "keys", you will not find "keys" in the parts, separate from the parts or in all the parts no matter how hard you try. It is the same with a person, you will not find a person in all the aggregates, one aggregate or separate from the aggregates. A person, while apparent, is just an illusion.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, February 4th, 2014 at 7:57 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

We've already discussed that workers are not free to simply go and work somewhere else.

Capitalists own the means of production, i.e. the places of employment. And capitalism, produces endemic levels of unemployment, ensures a never ending stream of unemployed people who would be willing to work for less. An engineered race to the bottom.

Just because somebody consents that does not mean they aren't being exploited. It really depends on what their other options are. In an extremely unequal society, 'consent' doesn't add up to much.

E.g. Here is an article about girls being trafficked into the sex industry and questions the concept of consent. (Malcolm will love it, it's from Harvard .)

<http://www.law.harvard.edu/students/orgs/jlg/vol27/balos.pdf>

Malcolm wrote:

It is simple. People go where there is work, and they sell their labor. The more skilled they are, the more they earn. So, the moral of the story is to make sure your kids do well in school if you want them to be more successful.

As for the sex trade, this is not a fair comparison.

Anyway, I am about done here. We will never see eye to eye about this so it is pointless to continue going around and around. As far as I can tell, there is no benefit to the types of politics you follow for anyone. At least, in the present economic system, people can and do with regularity and a bit of personal initiative pull themselves up out of poverty. There is a reason everyone wants to come to the States, and it is not because it sucks here.

More importantly, however, I think that Marxism, not to mention Anarchism, and Buddhism are utterly irreconcilable.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, February 4th, 2014 at 7:46 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

Vietnam (and now Afghanistan) were/are wars aimed at controlling heroin production and distribution.

Malcolm wrote:

Never though you went in for conspiracy theories, guess I was wrong.

Sherab Dorje said:

I am not into conspiracy theories. I worked with Afghan refugees and knew people working in Afghanistan for Medecins Sans Frontiers. Unfortunately it is not a conspiracy theory. You forget the guns for drugs antics of the Iran-Contra affair? Short memory you have there Malcolm. Was that a conspiracy theory too?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, I am well aware of the facts of the Iran/Contra case, but we are not in Afghanistan to control the heroin trade.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, February 4th, 2014 at 7:10 AM

Title: Re: Climate Change: We're Doomed

Content:

Kim O'Hara said:

oil-subsidies.jpg

Could this have something to do with why we haven't already taken strong action against fossil fuels?

Klm

Malcolm wrote:

We have not gone after fossil fuels because it would destroy the world economy.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, February 4th, 2014 at 7:05 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

Vietnam (and now Afghanistan) were/was aimed at controlling heroin production and distribution.

Malcolm wrote:

Never though you went in for conspiracy theories, guess I was wrong.

Sherab Dorje said:

If Vietnam was a proxy war with the Communists then why didn't the US invade Cambodia or Laos?

Malcolm wrote:

We did, illegally. We had a secret war there.

Sherab Dorje said:

The US needed Korea to be able to maintain a foothold (military bases) on continental East Asia.

Malcolm wrote:

That was not in our planning at the time. That is a net effect, not an intention.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, February 4th, 2014 at 7:03 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

I, on the other hand, by employing people and giving them a fair wage based on their skills, am only accruing positive karma.

And who decides if you are paying a fair wage based on their skills?...

Malcolm wrote:

The value of their labor is what they agree to sell it for. If they think they can do better, they are free to try and sell their labor elsewhere. It is the same as if I have a fish. I can try and sell for as much as I like, but the price will always be in accord with demand. That is simply the way economies work.

tellyontellyon said:

Perhaps you'll be the one with the bad Karma?

Malcolm wrote:

There is no bad karma when two people enter into an agreement of exchange and each honors their part of the bargain.

Connolly again: The capital of the master class is not their property; it is the unpaid labor of the working class - 'the hire of the laborer kept back by fraud'.

I simply do not agree that this is so. Of course employers have the option, if they choose, of profit sharing. But it is not a right that employees have, it is a privilege granted by the employer.

You cannot have a market economy under your version of Socialism where people are free to buy and sell as they wish, whatever they wish, so I do not support it. People are not free under your version of Socialism, they must do the bidding of committees and party functionaries.

I also do not agree with anarcho-capitalists, this is another extreme vision.

Markets requires sound regulations in order to keep them stable and functioning. Among those regulations may indeed be wage guarantees so that people without skills may at least make a living wage, but no more than that. We have seen in this country what happens to industries when the unions get a stranglehold on them: they become moribund, eventually sicken and then die. On the other hand, in the beginning unions were important in setting many workplace precedents, and I think that unions have positive roles to play as well. It is a delicate balance.

The fact of the matter is that my thinking comes from analyzing how I feel in these various situations.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, February 4th, 2014 at 6:03 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

Zhen Li said:

A lot of people forget the revolutions of 1848 were fundamentally bourgeois revolutions, because while they have more economic power than aristocracies, they were barred from the tables of power. "Liberalism" in the 19th century Europe meant empowering the bourgeois politically. At least that is what I was taught at Harvard.

Yes, and the great reform movement in the UK was led by the dissenters, who were great entrepreneurs. Liberalism in Europe was protestantism stripped of god, but affirming the same "god given rights" as the Puritans, i.e. equality and democracy.

Unlike Marxists, I don't believe in any materialist force behind the past 400 years, just good intentions gone too far.

I read this today, found it a fun read, and I more or less agree with all of the positions:

<http://cathedralwhatever.wordpress.com/2014/01/02/premises-of-reactionary-thought-taking-stock/>

Malcolm wrote:

I whole heartedly agree with this:

Libertarianism is retarded.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, February 4th, 2014 at 5:40 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

Zhen Li said:

Once again, this underlines the futility of many of the post-colonial critiques that really have little to no grounding in economic reality - at the same time, it obviously underlines the futility of imperialist arguments.

Malcolm, what do you think of Westphalian Peace?

Malcolm wrote:

It looks like a historical model fresh on the minds the American Colonials when they forged the Republic. The constitutional congress was very much like this. Most people do not realize for example that Puritans invaded Maryland and ruled it for ten years in the 1650's.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, February 4th, 2014 at 5:39 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

Zhen Li said:

just understand that the bourgeoisie fundamentally always leans towards the progressive, puritan, democratic, and protestant side of things in the world, and you're set.

Malcolm wrote:

A lot of people forget the revolutions of 1848 were fundamentally bourgeois revolutions, because while they have more economic power than aristocracies, they were barred from the tables of power. "Liberalism" in the 19th century Europe meant empowering the bourgeois politically. At least that is what I was taught at Harvard.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, February 4th, 2014 at 5:35 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

We didn't steal anything from Iraq. Their oil reserves were certainly not worth an invasion. We did not steal anything from Afghanistan. They have no developed industries. Maybe some US soldiers bought some heroin. Panama has been in the US sphere of influence for a Century. We did them a favor by getting rid of Noriega, even if he was originally a CIA puppet.

We didn't steal anything from Vietnam, though we did bomb the hell out of them. If you wan to accuse someone of stealing from their, look to the French. We invested hundreds of millions, but never got anything back except 50,000 dead bodies for our troubles. We did not steal anything from S. Korea, nor Japan.

Sherab Dorje said:

So the invasions and occupations were done out of the goodness of their heart? Just for the hell of it? C'mon Malcolm... Give me a break!

Malcolm wrote:

Well, it did have the net effect of injecting our manufacturing economy with increased production of weapons. After the war, in the 1970's, the bottom fell out of the arms industry in the US.

But basically everyone agrees that Iraq, Vietnam, etc. were expensive mistakes, and nothing substantial was won in these engagements.

Korea and Vietnam were just proxy wars with the Communists.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, February 4th, 2014 at 5:12 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Point 2) No, I don't think we are stealing anything from anyone.

Sherab Dorje said:

Iraq? Afghanistan? Panama? Actually, almost any Central and Southern American country you can imagine (especially during the Reagan years), Before that it was Vietnam and Laos. South Korea. Japan. Etc... Hell, they even tried to steal from Somalia, but they got their ass whipped. Imagine trying to steal from Somalia. Like stealing from a beggar, really.

Malcolm wrote:

We didn't steal anything from Iraq. Their oil reserves were certainly not worth an invasion. We did not steal anything from Afghanistan. They have no developed industries. Maybe some US soldiers bought some heroin. Panama has been in the US sphere of influence for a Century. We did them a favor by getting rid of Noriega, even if he was originally a CIA puppet.

We didn't steal anything from Vietnam, though we did bomb the hell out of them. If you want to accuse someone of stealing from there, look to the French. We invested hundreds of millions, but never got anything back except 50,000 dead bodies for our troubles. We did not steal anything from S. Korea, nor Japan.

Sherab Dorje said:

China and Japan are heavily dependent on us to buy their imports.

Why?

Malcolm wrote:

In the case of China, it is because they manufacture things cheaper than can be done in the US due to labor costs. Japan has cornered a market on cars and electronics.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, February 4th, 2014 at 5:02 AM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

shel said:

You have yet to offer a reason. With no reason it appears that you merely lack the ability to find.

Malcolm wrote:

I gave you a reason, which I will repeat a final time, in case you have not clearly understood.

The reason is precisely because, like an illusion, nothing can be ascertained of phenomena apart from their mere appearance. Just as an illusory elephant cannot be found when searched for, likewise, when searched for, apart from a mere appearance, keys and other such phenomena cannot be found no matter how hard one may try.

Now of course, if you wish, adhere to a belief in some species of "objective existence", but that's your problem and not mine.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, February 4th, 2014 at 4:55 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

Anyway.... What bothers you more: the karmic fate of your exploited workers?... Or your attachment to your 'capital investment'?

Malcolm wrote:

If I allow my employees to steal my business, they will certainly incur a great deal of negative karma. I, on the other hand, by employing people and giving them a fair wage based on their skills, am only accruing positive karma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, February 4th, 2014 at 4:53 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

M:

If it's all the ripening of Karma, why worry.... just accept it.

Malcolm wrote:

One has no choice but to accept one's ripened karma. There is nothing one can do about it, apart from becoming a realized person. One can however change the karma one has in future lives, by avoiding the ten non-virtues and adopting their opposite.

Of course, taking what has not been given is the best way to ensure that you will be a pauper or worse in your next life. One simply cannot reconcile the seizure property advocated under Marxism with Buddhist ethics.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, February 4th, 2014 at 4:44 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

Edit.... or perhaps you would be out on your ear...?

Malcolm wrote:

Maybe so, but it would be their future bad karma, but merely the ripening of my past bad karma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, February 4th, 2014 at 4:40 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

Zhen Li:

Just to point out that Marx was talking about abolishing bourgeois property, I.e. ownership of the means of production.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, thank the founding fathers that ownership of "bourgeois property" is a right protected in the US Constitution.

I can guarantee you, if I had a small factory that manufactured, say, herbal products, and people I employed decided they owned my factory and not me, after I had made all the capital investments to build that business, they would be out on their ear and looking for another job. And if they disturbed my right to conduct my business in peace, of course I would call the police, as would any sane person.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, February 4th, 2014 at 4:29 AM

Title: Re: is there a teacher in the house? or at least some advice

Content:

rubix said:

Was only asking about books doesn't matter anymore I found out what I needed to know I'm in the 5th stage I found it in one of my BOOKS

Malcolm wrote:

You can delude yourself if you like.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, February 4th, 2014 at 3:56 AM

Title: Re: is there a teacher in the house? or at least some advice

Content:

rubix said:

I posted in personal experiences about dzogchen and got no where except backwards. I'm doing the best I can without a teacher reading lots and learning a lot too, seeing how I probably won't find a teacher just like that can anyone recommend a book that outlines the completion stage of dzogchen or can someone explain it

Malcolm wrote:

No one will help you, publicly at least, because you do not have a teacher and the necessary transmissions. It is a question of samaya, the code of conduct that governs the secrecy around these teachings. And I gave you advice in the other thread. Now it is up to you.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, February 4th, 2014 at 3:52 AM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

We are discussing illusions and not keys...

shel said:

So keys are not illusory, interesting!

Malcolm wrote:

Prior to analysis, even an illusion of an elephant is taken to be an elephant at face value. One can understand keys and other phenomena in the same way.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, February 4th, 2014 at 3:35 AM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

shel said:

That is not a reason. You're only saying that it cannot bear your analysis. If you lost your keys, for example, and did not possess the ability to find them, it would be premature, to say the least, to declare you keys illusory.

Malcolm wrote:

We are discussing illusions and not keys: the analogy is thus, just as illusions cannot bear analysis, likewise, neither can phenomena. They are both the same in being phenomena that arise from conditions, but when subject to analysis, nothing can be found about them to indicate they are anything other than mere appearances.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, February 4th, 2014 at 3:31 AM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

It is a mere insubstantial appearance that cannot bear analysis.

PadmaVonSamba said:

Why? does it break down and start crying?

appearances can bear analysis. they just always fail the "inherently existent" test.

.
.
.

Malcolm wrote:

No, appearances cannot bear ultimate analysis.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, February 4th, 2014 at 3:23 AM

Title: Re: Drikung Dzogchen Lineage

Content:

Drikung_Dzogchen said:

Just wanted to clarify that Ganor Rinpoche is Nyingma and not part of the Drikung Kagyu Lineage. He is a Terton that has revealed a number of practices including a Vajrakilaya cycle. I do not know if he revealed an Achi Terma but he did have a vision of Achi Chokyi Drolma that revealed to him that Lho Ontul Rinpoches son Ratna Rinpoche was the Quality emanation of the Drikung Terton Lho Nuden Dorje. Historically Lho Ontul Rinpoche entered the Drikung Kagyu lineage in the 19th century as the older brother of Lho Nuden Dorje. But Achi Chkyi Drolma is also practiced in other lineages such as in Dujom Rinpoche's tradition. At the Khenpo brothers center in New York State her image can be seen. One of her emanations is said to be Yeshe Tsogyal. The late Khenpo Jigme Phuntsok when visiting Terdrom where the Yangzab Terma was revealed had a vision of a wrathful form of Achi Chokyi Drolma and composed a praise to her. Once H.E. Garchen Rinpoche gave me the transmission for the 108 Tara's and stopped at Achi Chokyi Drolma to let me know she was also an emanation of Tara before he finished the transmission. I would be interested to know if Ganor Rinpoche has revealed any Achi termas. Other Achi Termas were revealed by the Drikung Terton Osel Dorje as well as a very special Pure Vision practice of Achi Chokyi Drolma that was received by the previous H.E. Tritasab Rinpoche. This is an amazing practice that was brought out of Tibet by Lho Ontul Rinpoche in the 80's who then gave the transmission to H.H. Drikung Kyabgon Chetsang Rinpoche. In 2004 at the Monkey Year teachings the most current incarnation of H.E. Tritsab Rinpoche gave the transmission for this practice. In this practice Achi Chokyi Drolma can be practiced as the Lama, Yidam, Dakini, or protector. It is supplemented by many different useful concise practices. The previous H.E. Tritab Rinpoche revealed this while he was in a Chinese Labor Camp in the late sixties. It is very much a practice for these times.

Malcolm wrote:

You might try taking a breath. Paragraphs and punctuation which make for readability are nice too.

Just wanted to clarify that Ganor Rinpoche is Nyingma and not part of the Drikung Kagyu Lineage. He is a Terton that has revealed a number of practices including a Vajrakilaya cycle. I do not know if he revealed an Achi Terma, but he did have a vision of Achi Chokyi Drolma that revealed to him that Lho Ontul Rinpoche's son, Ratna Rinpoche, was the Quality emanation of the Drikung Terton Lho Nuden Dorje. Historically Lho Ontul Rinpoche entered the Drikung Kagyu lineage in the 19th century as the older brother of Lho Nuden Dorje.

Achi Chkyi Drolma is also practiced in other lineages such as in Dujom Rinpoche's tradition. At the Khenpo brothers center in New York State her image can be seen. One of her emanations is said to be Yeshe Tsogyal. The late Khenpo Jigme Phuntsok, when visiting Terdrom where the Yangzab Terma was revealed, had a vision of a wrathful form of Achi Chokyi Drolma and composed a praise to her.

Once H.E. Garchen Rinpoche gave me the transmission for the 108 Tara's and stopped at Achi Chokyi Drolma to let me know she was also an emanation of Tara before he finished the transmission. I would be interested to know if Ganor Rinpoche has revealed any Achi termas.

Other Achi Termas were revealed by the Drikung Terton Osel Dorje. Also there is a very special Pure Vision practice of Achi Chokyi Drolma that was received by the previous H.E. Tritasab Rinpoche. This is an amazing practice that was brought out of Tibet by Lho Ontul Rinpoche in the 80's, who then gave the transmission to H.H. Drikung Kyabgon Chetsang Rinpoche. In 2004, at the Monkey Year teachings, the most current incarnation of H.E. Tritsab Rinpoche gave the transmission for this practice. In this practice, Achi Chokyi Drolma can be practiced as the Lama, Yidam, Dakini, or protector. It is supplemented by many different useful concise practices. The previous H.E. Tritab Rinpoche revealed this while he was in a Chinese Labor Camp in the late sixties. It is very much a practice for these times.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, February 4th, 2014 at 3:19 AM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The only thing that is true is the cognition of dharmatā. That most certainly requires some kind of direct introduction ...

dzogchungpa said:

I'm not saying you're wrong, but is it supposed to be obvious that this requires some kind of direct introduction?

Malcolm wrote:

It is not obvious at all, hence the reason one is considered fortunate to meet secret mantra.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, February 4th, 2014 at 3:18 AM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

shel said:

Illusion in the Buddhist sense meaning merely impermanence has meaning, on the other hand.

Malcolm wrote:

Illusion in the (Mahāyāna) Buddhist sense means that when you see an illusion and you investigate it, the illusion you saw cannot be found.

shel said:

Because?

Malcolm wrote:

It is a mere insubstantial appearance that cannot bear analysis.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, February 4th, 2014 at 3:06 AM

Title: Re: Before Longchen Nyingthig, what was the most popular cyc

Content:

Drikung_Dzogchen said:

If I am correct the Longchen Nyingtig is also very related to the Khandro Nyingtig.

Malcolm wrote:

No, it is related to the Vlma Nyinthig.

Drikung_Dzogchen said:

And one of Jigme Lingpa's main practices was a different terma revealed by both Gyalwang Rinchen Phuntsog as well as his root student Sherab Ozer. I imagine that Jigme Lingpa could have very well received the Yangzab.

Malcolm wrote:
He did.

Drikung_Dzogchen said:

Jigme Lingpa was devoted enough to Gyalwang Rinchen Phuntsog that he composed a short Namthar (life story) of his Rinchen Phuntsogs life. So I could be wrong but the Yangzab could be the first concise Nyingtig cycle based on the Nyingtig Yabshi, in particular the Khandro Nyingtig.

Malcolm wrote:

That distinction goes to Ratna Lingpa.

Drikung_Dzogchen said:

The Yangzab contains everything necessary to traverse all the stages of Dzogchen practice. And yes it does have quite a few Wrathful practices but they are not the heart of the terma. We have to remember just how chaotic the 16th century was in Tibet. Gyalwang Rinchen Phuntsog who was equally a fully accomplished practitioner of Mahamudra and the traditional Drikung Kagyu teachings marks a turning point in the Drikung Kagyu lineage. He chose (in his Namthar was called by the Dakinis) to step down as the head of the Drikung Kagyu lineage and go to the mountains above Terdrom where he engaged in extensive retreat and revealed the Yangzab Terma. During this time period the Karma Kagyu and the Drikung Kagyu allied themselves against Ganden and went to war which proved to be a disaster for both lineages, Ganden prevailed. Though Gyalwang Rinchen Phuntsog was not involved in this war he undoubtedly had many enemies who wished him dead. Some of these enemies probably were from within the Drikung Kagyu lineage who help prejudices against the Nyingma teachings. So these wrathful practices were probably very necessary for the times he lived in. But though the Yangzab Terma cannot said to be the most popular cycle, that really matters very little. It has been maintained up to the present time. Gyalwang Rinchen Phuntsog transcended any type of sectarian lineage labels. He really is an early example of the Rime tradition. His root student Sherab Ozer who before meeting Rinchen Phuntsog was trained in the Sakya tradition, and possibly the Gelugpa to some degree. But more importantly he composed what may be the first Rime text outlining how all the lineages fit together as a whole and embody the Buddha's teachings without conflict. The great jamgon Kongtrul Rinpoche of the 19th century who brought the Rime movement to full bloom references this text by Sherab Ozer. There is still much research to be done but there are many interesting questions here regarding these various connections. I would be interested in anyone's input as my knowledge is more limited. But I will finish with the following. Gyalwang Rinchen Phuntsog played a major (and not always acknowledged role) in shaping the Drikung Lineage down to the present time. Dudjom Rinpoche said that Rinchen Phuntsog helped save the Nyingma lineage when it was persecuted by the Gelugpa and certain transmissions were in danger of being broken. Rinchen Phuntsog transmitted the Nyingtig Yabshi as well as many other Nyingma transmissions to Lamas who would go on to be very important in upholding the Nyingma lineage. Also Rinchen Phuntsogs's son who was a throne holder of the Drikung lineage was the father to five Tulkus, two of which were the first HH Drikung Kyabgon Chetsang and the first HH Drikung Kyabgon Chutsang. From this time on the Drikung lineage would be led reincarnations of these two HH Drikung Kyabgon tulkus. The first HH Drikung Kyabgon Chutsang who is also known as Rigzen Chokyi Dragpa was said to be the reincarnation of Rinchen Phuntsog. His collected works comprise of about 15 volumes. He composed numerous Yangzab sadhanas based on the root Terma texts revealed by Rinchen Phuntsog making the practices clearer. The Shinje or Yamantaka practice which is very special to the Drikung Kagyu lineage entered the lineage through Rinchen Phuntsog. Rigzen Chokyi Dragpa or the first HH Drikung Kyabgon Chutsang had numerous Shinje pure visions which then became the Shinje Drubchen that is practiced down to the current day. So I know I have gone on into many different topics than what I started with but I welcome input or corrections and hope my ramblings are of some benefit.

Malcolm wrote:

You can stop advertising now...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, February 4th, 2014 at 3:00 AM

Title: Re: Yangzab and Chokling tersar

Content:

Drikung_Dzogchen said:

Where does he describe the Yangzab in those terms Malcom.

Malcolm wrote:

I forget exactly where, but it is definitely in there. You can ask David Arndt also, since when I was working on these texts for him, we discussed it.

You have to understand that the outer three roots is basically just a elaborated version of the Hayagriva/Yogini sadhana in the KN.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, February 4th, 2014 at 2:40 AM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

shel said:

Illusion in the Buddhist sense meaning merely impermanence has meaning, on the other hand.

Malcolm wrote:

Illusion in the (Mahāyāna) Buddhist sense means that when you see an illusion and you investigate it, the illusion you saw cannot be found.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, February 4th, 2014 at 2:38 AM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

...the ultimate of Madhyamaka can only be established relatively ...

dzogchungpa said:

Can you explain that a little more?

Malcolm wrote:

It means that according to Madhyamaka there are two so called ultimates, one is nominal, the other is the direct perception of emptiness.

But from a Dzogchen point of view, since all relative truths are objects of false cognitions, even the cognition of the nominal ultimate is faulty. The only thing that is true is the cognition of dharmatā. That most certainly requires some kind of direct introduction which is lacking in Sutra teachings. The main advantage to Vajrayāna teachings is that dharmatā or the example wisdom, is introduced during the time of empowerment. In the case of gsar ma, it is the introduction of bliss and emptiness at the time of the third and fourth empowerments; in the case of the Dzogchen it is the introduction of the potentiality of vidyā during anyone of the four styles of empowerment, elaborate, unelaborate and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, February 4th, 2014 at 2:28 AM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, there is no contradiction.

shel said:

I never claimed a contradiction. I merely pointed out that if everything is false then nothing is false. That is also false of course, because I thought it.

Malcolm wrote:

So there you go. On the other, everything being false does not make everything true, that is a non sequitur.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, February 4th, 2014 at 2:26 AM

Title: Re: Yangzab and Chokling tersar

Content:

Drikung_Dzogchen said:

Maybe it is fair to say the Yangzab is an appendix to the Khandro Nyingtig...

Malcolm wrote:

Rinchen Puntsog himself describes the Yangzab as an appendix to the Khadro Nyinthig.
Hard to get more authoritative than that.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, February 4th, 2014 at 1:39 AM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

shel said:

How many brands are there?

Malcolm wrote:

Count how many things there are, and that will give you the number.

shel said:

Everything is an illusion, remember, including the concept of emptiness.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, there is no contradiction.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, February 4th, 2014 at 1:26 AM

Title: Re: The Idea of Madhyamaka and Yogacara as Equally Correct

Content:

conebeckham said:

Interesting....Malcolm, do you know if the actual Indian sources are translated into English? Haribadra's and Vimuktisena's works, I mean....?

Malcolm wrote:

You should Makransky's book, Buddhahood Embodied I believe, where he details all this. Sparham has translated Ārya Vimuktisena's commentary on AA in full. Dense reading, but worth it.

To My knowledge, Haribhadra's Aloka and Sphutartha remain untranslated.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, February 4th, 2014 at 1:24 AM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

shel said:

How many brands are there?

Malcolm wrote:

Count how many things there are, and that will give you the number.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, February 4th, 2014 at 1:20 AM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

shel said:

...if everything is an illusion then nothing is an illusion.

Malcolm wrote:

You have a problem with that? You need something real in contrast to an illusion?
Something non-empty so there can be emptiness?

shel said:

Emptiness is a human concept, my good man, and thus an illusion.

Malcolm wrote:

That's one kind of emptiness. But just one.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, February 4th, 2014 at 1:03 AM

Title: Re: Make Life Meaningless

Content:

shel said:

...if everything is an illusion then nothing is an illusion.

Malcolm wrote:

You have a problem with that? You need something real in contrast to an illusion?
Something non-empty so there can be emptiness?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, February 3rd, 2014 at 11:54 PM

Title: Re: Before Longchen Nyingthig, what was the most popular cyc

Content:

conebeckham said:

Lama Gongdu has mengagde level stuff, doesn't it?

Malcolm wrote:

All of these do. Typically it is often stated there are three main Nyingthigs: the Nyingthig Yabshi is the most extensive, the Gongpa Zangthal is the middle length, and Ati Zabdon is the concise one.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, February 3rd, 2014 at 11:48 PM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

So not only is the relative negated in Dzogchen, so is any concept of ultimate.

M

Tsongkhapa said:

This sounds like nihilism, can you please explain what is affirmed by Dzogchen? Anything?

Thank you

Malcolm wrote:

Self-originated wisdom, rang byung ye shes, svayambhujñāna, the three kāyas, everything thing else is false, thus there is no basis for establishing an ultimate since the relative is merely a delusion (and the ultimate of Madhyamaka can only be established relatively). Dzogchen texts frequently state there is only one stage, buddhahood.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, February 3rd, 2014 at 10:55 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

As for political instability... you never know what is lurking around the corner for the US. Anyway, wouldn't you say that its stability is based largely on gorging its population on resources stolen from other countries? Not exactly an ecological consciousness. And even with the amount of resources at its disposal it still has a HUGE foreign debt and the US still allows its citizens to go without universal health care, etc...

Malcolm wrote:

As to point 1) I don't think so.

Point 2) No, I don't think we are stealing anything from anyone.

Point 3) If I owe you a hundred dollars, I have to be nice to you. If I owe you a 100,000,000 million, you have to be nice to me.

US foreign debt is 5.6 trillion as of 1/1/13.

If you look, you will see most of debt is held by Other (29.3%) China (22.5%) and Japan (19.0%), in descending order.

China and Japan are heavily dependent on us to buy their imports. So, I don't really see this as a problem for us. The total external debt however is preposterous: 17,344,649,888,998 i.e. 17.3 trillion dollars. Followed by the UK and 10 trillion, followed by France and Germany, and so on. However, of the US debt, 12 trillion is held by Americans. So we are in no danger.

Point 4) The Affordable Care Act is meant to address that through the market. I think it is a bad idea, personally, and support Universal Health Care, but it seems the majority of Americans still cling to the illusion of market choices where their health care is concerned rather than understanding that health care, even if private, should be a regulated monopoly like any other utility.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, February 3rd, 2014 at 9:35 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Well, I've been to a lot of places in the world, Africa, Asia, India, Europe, etc., and while they all have their points, and I have enjoyed being in them all, the US offers a basic political stability and natural wealth that is hard to beat in most other places in the world. I live in one of the largest contiguous forests in the world, i.e., 25 million acres of trees from Pennsylvania to Maine. Where I live it is largely eco-conscience, we have a strong tradition of social welfare, at a local level we practice direct democracy (Town meetings, invented in the Massachusetts Bay Colony), it is water wealthy because of the forests, etc. Also the Northwest, Oregon and Washington, have a culture that mirrors ours because they were initially settled by New Englanders. There are physical advantages to living here in the Northeast that you can't really find elsewhere because of the wealth of our economy (even when it is in arrears), natural resources and so on.

India, Africa and China are eco-disasters waiting to happen for many reasons. Russia, while filled with a lot of trees, is too damn cold. Europe is nice, but restrictive. Latin America is fun, but politically unstable.

Canada, on the other hand, has many of the advantages of the United States as well.

So, I pick the US, especially the Northeast and Northwest.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, February 3rd, 2014 at 9:22 PM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

ConradTree said:

But Rongzom says Dzogchen rejects any relative truth.

Dzogchen only subscribes to 1 truth.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, we were talking about sutra.

Further, Dzogchen rejects the two truths, because relative "truth" is not true, being a deluded cognition. But Dzogchen does not reject appearances which appear to ignorance (ma rig pa).

Dzogchen substitutes vidyā and āvidyā (rig pa and ma rig pa) for the term "pāramārtha satya" and "samvṛitti satya".

Also one will discover that Dzogchen, in rejecting the two truths, also rejects ultimate truth, as it states in The Mind Mirror of Samantabhadra:

Since there is no ultimate, also the name "relative" does not exist.

And as it says in Soaring Great Garuda:

Since phenomena and nonphenomena have always been merged and are inseparable, there is no further need to explain an "ultimate phenomenon".

So not only is the relative negated in Dzogchen, so is any concept of ultimate.

M

ConradTree said:

Is there a published source on these quotes?

It would really help me out.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, not these exact translations, for they are mine, but you can find them in the Supreme Source, or Dowman's Original Dzogchen.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, February 3rd, 2014 at 9:20 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

AlexanderS said:

Which country in the world do you think is closest in fulfilling those ideals?

Malcolm wrote:

For all the crap people give the US, I'd pick the US.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, February 3rd, 2014 at 8:05 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

HH Dalai Lama:

"I am a supporter of globalization"

<http://www.dalailama.com/news/post/362-exclusive-interview---i-am-a-supporter-of-globalization>

So what it is that we need?

Dalai Lama:

I call it a "responsible free market economy

Sherab Dorje said:

And in the another article he says he is a Marxist and had great respect for Mao... go figure.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, it appears during the last decade HHDL's thinking about these things has somewhat evolved. Personally, I think what he actually means by "Marxist" is that a state should provide guaranteed minimal welfare for its citizens. This is very consistent, for example, with the recommendations found in the Ratnavali and so on. I think he also recognizes that a free market economy provides opportunities that are not possible in a planned economy. Free markets spur more than mere exchange of goods. They also spur creativity, for better or for worse.

My perspective is that in an ideal society there is a balance struck between a market economy, providing minimum support needed for citizens (health care, emergency relief, infrastructure) and the ecosystem, with the ecosystem being a dominant consideration. In other words, if a particular market has a particularly negative impact on the ecosystem, it should be be tightly regulated, etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, February 3rd, 2014 at 8:01 PM

Title: Re: Before Longchen Nyingthig, what was the most popular cyc

Content:

ConradTree said:

Okay, forget about popular.

What was considered the best Menngagde cycle before Longchen Nyingthig?

Gonpa Zangthal right?

Malcolm wrote:

Khyentse Wangpo opines that the Gongpa Zangthal is the most profound of the Nyinthig cycles.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, February 3rd, 2014 at 9:26 AM

Title: Re: Middle Way Politics

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

There is no Buddhist "political theory".

kirtu said:

There is: Nagarjuna's Precious Garland.

Kirt

Malcolm wrote:

I wouldn't go so far as to say that is a systematic political theory, Kirt. It is a Niti śāstra, advice on governance, not a well constructed political theory like Kautilya's Arthaśāstra, i.e. Treatise on Ends.

I would say that it is what it is, advice to a King, with come policy recommendations. However, I do agree that it contains the essentials for forming the basis of someone's political conscience.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, February 3rd, 2014 at 9:20 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

HH Dalai Lama:

"I am a supporter of globalization"

<http://www.dalailama.com/news/post/362-exclusive-interview---i-am-a-supporter-of-globalization>

So what it is that we need?

Dalai Lama:

I call it a "responsible free market economy

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, February 3rd, 2014 at 5:51 AM

Title: Re: Before Longchen Nyingthig, what was the most popular cyc

Content:

ConradTree said:

Before Longchen Nyingthig, what was the most popular cycle?

Gongpa Zangthal right?

Malcolm wrote:

Probably Konchog Chidu.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, February 2nd, 2014 at 11:17 PM

Title: Re: Middle Way Politics

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

We want to make the Buddha a capitalist, or a socialist, or an anarchist, or an authoritarian in order to justify our preferences.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, and this is a problem. Buddha could not have been a capitalist, but he clearly approved of markets and trade; he could not have been a socialist, but he clearly set up temporary propertyless communes that eventually became permanent. He was not by any means an anarchist, since hierarchy clearly established in his sangha with monks, novices and lay people. And he was not an authoritarian since he recommended humanitarian values to rulers.

Like I said in the (currently locked)

<http://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=66&t=15439> thread, it might well be that a truly Dharmic social/political reality may not satisfy liberal values at all. Who knows?[/quote]

We can only find out by trying to live with others according to our Buddhist values and see how they play out politically. These online forums are in fact an example of just that. And if history shows anything, it shows we still have some maturity to develop in our interactions with one another, myself included.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, February 2nd, 2014 at 11:12 PM

Title: Re: Origins of Dzogchen

Content:

mystic author said:

The fact he received numerous empowerments and did sadhana contradicts what he wrote.

Malcolm wrote:

This merely proves that you do not understand Dzogchen.

The root tantra of Dzogchen, the sGra thal gyur states quite unequivocally:

In order to utterly purify the body, voice and mind of migrating beings, fortunate one's are to ripened.

The continuums of the devoted is ripened in four different ways;

elaborately, unelaborately,

very unelaborately and extremely unelaborately.

Also, for the purpose of perfuming, the approach, accomplishment and near approach are performed by a qualified Guru.

In addition, construct the mandala coming from the tantras, with the earth rite,

the preparations, the layout and the powders.

After that, the rite of conferring empowerment begins from the the śrāvaka vehicle.

Having completed the eight stages [of vehicles], confer the Great Perfection empowerment of the potentiality of vidyā, and explain the purpose of each of those [steps], the the entry, and special power.

There are a great number of other such citations. For example, The Mirror of the Heart Tantra states:

Where will accomplishment be without relying on the empowerments of secret mantra?

For example, it is like a boatman without a paddle. How will one be able to cross to the other side? If the empowerments are fully obtained, all secret mantras not accomplished will be accomplished.

mystic author said:

Did he ever describe Togal the way, say, Jigme Lingpa or Karma Chagme does?

Malcolm wrote:

In a great more detail in fact in such collections as the bLama yang tig, the mKha' 'gro yang tig, the Zab mo yang tig, as well as the Tshig don rin po che mdzod and the Theg mchog mdzod. Without Longchenpa, the brief presentations of Jigme Lingpa and Karma Chagme would not be possible.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, February 2nd, 2014 at 9:16 PM

Title: Re: Middle Way Politics

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Here is what I am talking about:

You are a Buddhist: you have political choice a, b and c. What is your criteria for making a choice? How do your choices square with your practice as a Buddhist? How will your choices inform those around you? Etc.

There is no Buddhist "political theory". In absence of such a theory, how do we conduct ourselves in our political lives (we all have them, even the "apolitical") in accordance with Buddha's teachings?

Sherab Dorje said:

If we are limited in what political choice we can make then I guess the best we can do is choose the one we believe/feel will cause the least harm and the most benefit for the greatest number of sentient beings. I would say that anything that accords with the Noble Eightfold path would be the safest bet under most circumstances.

Malcolm wrote:

We are always limited in what political choices we can make, to a certain extent.

Secondly, we all have various political convictions, how do these square with the Buddha's teachings. More importantly, is it important that they do?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, February 2nd, 2014 at 8:27 PM

Title: Re: Middle Way Politics

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Again, I am talking about personal conduct, not political parties.

Sherab Dorje said:

Dude, your opening question was: What would a middle way politics look like, one informed by the Buddha's teachings rather than those of secular authors?
A meritocracy is not (necessarily) about political parties.

Malcolm wrote:

I never said that I was talking about a meritocracy either.

Here is what I am talking about:

You are a Buddhist: you have political choice a, b and c. What is your criteria for making a choice? How do your choices square with your practice as a Buddhist? How will your choices inform those around you? Etc.

There is no Buddhist "political theory". In absence of such a theory, how do we conduct ourselves in our political lives (we all have them, even the "apolitical") in accordance with Buddha's teachings?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, February 2nd, 2014 at 9:04 AM

Title: Re: Middle Way Politics

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

You missed Republican Democracy, which is what we have in the US. Capitalism, as has been pointed out elsewhere, it is not a political system.

Sherab Dorje said:

cf <http://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=42&t=12046&start=460> for the full twenty-something page discussion.

Republican Democracy? You do know that the word Republic is just the Latin term for the Greek word Democracy, right?

As for capitalism not being a political system, I seems that only capitalists would like to believe that one! They would like to have us believe that capitalism is just the natural method/law by which exchange functions.

Malcolm wrote:

Capitalism was a term coined by Marx. Prior to Marx, no one ever called themselves a "Capitalist". After Marx, people used the term to describe the economic system we still have at present. But it is not and never was a coherent political system. People started calling Smith's thought "Capitalism" because it was his economic thought and policy suggestions in Wealth of Nations that Marx was largely critiquing.

An argument may be made that political and economic systems are mutually dependent, and it is certainly true that as the US is a product of the Scottish Enlightenment, its political values upon which our style of democracy was founded include such items as ownership of private property, "free" markets, etc. These are enshrined in the Bill of Rights, the fifth amendment of which reads:

No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a Grand Jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the Militia, when in actual service in time of War or public danger; nor shall any person be subject for the same offense to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use, without just compensation.

This is of course why Americans by and large are hostile to socialism and communism, because both systems suggest that people do not have a right to private property. But this we are having this discussion in another thread.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, February 2nd, 2014 at 8:38 AM

Title: Re: Middle Way Politics

Content:

kirtu said:

Vermont is one of the few places where direct democracy still exists (on US soil ironically but hopefully) and in many small communities around the world.

Malcolm wrote:

Vermont, Massachusetts, New Hampshire and Main actually. The town meeting system is deeply ingrained in New England. For example, in my town, we all vote directly on the budget, etc. Then there is a board of selectman charged with carrying out the agendas the town votes on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, February 2nd, 2014 at 8:36 AM

Title: Re: The Idea of Madhyamaka and Yogacara as Equally Correct

Content:

conebeckham said:

I've not heard the Dharmakaya broken down this way before. Buddha's omniscient mind, what you call the Wisdom Truth Body, is a conventional truth but is an aspect of the Dharmakaya?

Malcolm wrote:

TKF is citing Haribhadra's presentation, followed by the Gelugpa's. . The presentation followed in Sakya, Kagyu and Nyingma for the most part is based on Ārya-Vimuktisena's earlier presentation.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, February 2nd, 2014 at 6:27 AM

Title: Re: The Idea of Madhyamaka and Yogacara as Equally Correct

Content:

smcj said:

What I get is that in the Sakya the intellectual view is introduced/utilized at some point in tantric practice.

Malcolm wrote:

In Sakya, the intellectual view is introduced prior to tantric practice, in the three visions section. In Vajrayāna, the experiential view is introduced in the empowerment, and confirmed through a precise system of meditating on various examples.

smcj said:

The first part of the sentence seems to agree with my prior post about sutra Mahamudra. The second part of the sentence starting with what I underlined I think indicates that intellectual view is incorporated into deity practice--at least in the Sakya.

Malcolm wrote:

No, it is not. What is incorporated into deity practice is the experiential view which comes from empowerment and is stabilized by the unique approach found in Sakya called "meditating the view of the inseparability of samsara and nirvana".

smcj said:

Frankly, despite polemics between Sakya and Kagyu over the issue of sutra mahāmudra, meditating the view here is not so different than sutra mahāmudra save only the name. I think I get that you are disagreeing with my post about tantric Mahamudra not needing a view--at least in Sakya.

Malcolm wrote:

Tantric Mahāmudra has a "view", but it is experiential, not intellectual, and is based on an example wisdom at the time of empowerment.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, February 2nd, 2014 at 12:41 AM

Title: Re: Middle Way Politics

Content:

David N. Snyder said:

About a month ago there was a thread on Buddhism and politics at our sister site. This is how I responded:

Some of my thoughts on different political systems / economies:

Communism - A great, noble effort; promotes egalitarianism, least amount of poverty, hunger, disparities in wealth and income -- in theory. In practice, it doesn't work well. People find ways around not being allowed private property and wealth. Where there's a will, there's a way and there was always a vast underground market in every communist nation. It is also totalitarian and a poor economic system which did not alleviate poverty for the masses as it was implemented.

Capitalism - worked okay in some instances as long as it remained at the Adam Smith free market level. As it progresses to a larger more complex society, it evolves to corporatism where the government favors certain industries and businesses over others, essentially abandoning its roots. Corruption becomes rampant and politicians are bought off. You get the military-industrial-complex, the prison-industrial-complex, among others.

Monarchies, autocracies, timocracies, and other oligarchies - totalitarian, usually hereditary, not surprising that most nations have gone away from these.

Democracy - "two wolves and a lamb voting on what's for lunch" (rule by the tyranny of the majority)

Plato's Republic I always thought sounded pretty reasonable since it is based on meritocracy. Why not have political leaders who actually know a little something? But how to implement it and choose the philosopher kings [leaders]?

In the end, I guess we're stuck with democracy and to make it the most useful and effective, have some balance between socialism and capitalism. The most successful nations in terms of least poverty and warfare appear to be those with a good mix, including the Scandinavian nations and those in Western Europe.

I see there is other interest here too in meritocracy. I think Plato's Republic would meet this principle, but how to implement it? We seem stuck in democracy but as we know this is tyranny too; a tyranny of the majority and we have seen what that can do. I don't think the Buddha would like principles being thrown out the window in the name of [democratic] compromise either. So Plato's Republic / wheel-turning monarch would be ideal but the implementation would be difficult, if not impossible.

Malcolm wrote:

You missed Republican Democracy, which is what we have in the US. Capitalism, as has been pointed out elsewhere, it is not a political system.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, February 2nd, 2014 at 12:38 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

A high caste Brahmin could be working in a steel works. His caste would be high, but he would be part of the proletariat.

In another factory. the factory boss and employer, a (capitalist), might go bust and end up working in Burger King cleaning the toilets (a proletarian).

But you can't just change caste like that. They are clearly different frameworks.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, if you define it in this way, there are almost no capitalists anymore. There are very few people who work for persons who own a factory. For the most part, corporate ownership is collective. What you are saying is that apart from the board and major stockholders, everyone else, from the CEO on down are proletariats because they do not own the means of production, and sell their labor for what they can get.

By contrast, in the nineteenth century, for the most part factories, railroads and so on were own by private persons and families, etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, February 2nd, 2014 at 12:33 AM

Title: Re: The Idea of Madhyamaka and Yogacara as Equally Correct

Content:

Tsongkhapafan said:

According to Je Tsongkhapa's teaching, you have to begin with a generic image of emptiness which depends upon holding a correct conceptual understanding of emptiness. If you hold an incorrect conceptual understanding of emptiness, it cannot be realised.

Anders said:

So tsongkhapa is the origin of the Tibetan notion that awakening is dependent on correctly assembling an intellectual jigsaw puzzle?

Tsongkhapafan said:

I don't think so, I doubt it.

Regarding views, if there is no correct view, there is no object of meditation and if there is no correct object of meditation, we cannot gain inner experience that pacifies delusions. All problems are caused by wrong view, so I can't agree with your dismissal of correct views which are the only antidote.

Malcolm wrote:

Correct view in Vajrayāna arises from the empowerment. This is the reason why in Lamdre, for example, one meditates the view only after having received the cause empowerment where it is introduced in the section of the ālaya cause continuum (tantra) among the three tantras (cause, path and result).

Despite this, of course one also meditates a sutrayāna view using śamatha and vipaśyāna (supplemented by citations from the Mahāsiddhas) at the time of the vision of experience teachings from among the three visions (impure, experiential and pure). Frankly, despite polemics between Sakya and Kagyu over the issue of sutra mahāmudra, meditating the view here is not so different than sutra mahāmudra save only the name.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, February 1st, 2014 at 10:35 PM

Title: Re: Middle Way Politics

Content:

Nemo said:

Like any other unethical system you choose or have to participate in. You make the most sophisticated ethical compromises between the available bad options. If you were forced to order off the McDonald's menu what would you get?

Malcolm wrote:

I'd rather starve.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, February 1st, 2014 at 9:05 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

This could be any of the twice born castes.

No, it couldn't.

<https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Dvija>

...is not the same thing as a capitalist.

This argument that you have that capitalism doesn't really exist is just a way of equating the classes under capitalism with rich and poor or with status, spiritual or otherwise. Although these things can co-occur to an extent they mean different things.

Malcolm wrote:

Ok, but you are using a very narrow definition of "class". It is like claiming that out of the ten definitions of Dharma there is only one valid one.

tellyontellyon said:

Both 'types' of class system can co-occur and overlap as one type of society transforms into another. This is a dialectical process. No doubt the lower caste Indians will also find themselves in a lower class in the capitalist structure, but they are two different frameworks.

Malcolm wrote:

The class into which you are born, and your opportunity for advance, lifespan, etc., whether under Marxist analysis or not, is still, and will always remain, a function of your individual karma.

tellyontellyon said:

Equating class as, Marxists use the term, with caste as the Indians used it in the Buddha's day, is an illegitimate use of the term. It is a way of stretching two different words/frameworks to mean the same thing in order to create an invalid scriptural justification for your argument.

Malcolm wrote:

Class is class.

tellyontellyon said:

Class is about a persons economic role in a capitalist society.

Malcolm wrote:

Varna or jati (caste) is about a person's economic role in Ancient Indian society. What Buddha rejected about the Caste system in ancient India is that people born in upper castes were necessarily more virtuous than those born in lower castes. What he did not reject was that idea that one's position in society, one's appearance, health, lifespan, opportunities and so on, were largely dominated by a person's actions in past lives.

tellyontellyon said:

Capitalist society operates differently than feudalism.

Malcolm wrote:

Feudalism, like capitalism, never existed. It is, like capitalism, an artificial construct of historians, and in the case of feudalism, historians who misread and misunderstood medieval documents.

tellyontellyon said:

That's what the posts about m-c-m and c-m-c were about. The economic roles under a feudal society are different, and so class means something different.

Malcolm wrote:

It is not correct to refer to ancient Indian society as "feudal", it is an anachronism.

tellyontellyon said:

If Marx coined a term for a particular phenomenon, that doesn't mean that he invented the phenomenon.

Malcolm wrote:

The point is about the twice born is that any one in those upper three castes could own land, factories, shops, and so on where they employed people who sold their labor at a market value off of which the buyer could turn a profit.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, February 1st, 2014 at 10:05 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

i. Capitalists, or bourgeoisie, own the means of production and purchase the labor power of others

Malcolm wrote:

This could be any of the twice born castes.

tellyontellyon said:

ii. Workers, or proletariat, do not own any means of production or the ability to purchase the labor power of others. Rather, they sell their own labor power.

Malcolm wrote:

These would be shudras.

tellyontellyon said:

iii. A small, transitional class known as the petite bourgeoisie own sufficient means of production but do not purchase labor power.

Malcolm wrote:

This could be any of the twice born castes.

tellyontellyon said:

Class is thus determined by property relations not by income or status. These factors are determined by distribution and consumption, which mirror the production and power relations of classes.

Malcolm wrote:

It's pretty clear that Indian shudras fit the Marxist notion of proletariat; everyone else in India were either "capitalists" or petite bourgeoisie.

tellyontellyon said:

<https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Capitalism>

Malcolm wrote:

The word was invented by Karl Marx and it did not exist in English until 1854.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, February 1st, 2014 at 8:49 AM

Title: Re: Middle Way Politics

Content:

Adamantine said:

I see, so likewise Nemo's response re: meritocracy(similar to my initial thought)is off topic, at least from your intended topic.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, it does not address my interest, but any suggestions are open.

Adamantine said:

...but expressing our politics with Middle Way principles, that's another story...you are contemplating or proposing we ponder what a Middle Way political ideology might look like?

Malcolm wrote:

More or less.

Adamantine said:

Regarding personally making political choices based on our understanding of Middle Way principles, I would imagine any of us Mahayanists are trying to do this to some degree, as it is.

Malcolm wrote:

Indeed, but in political discussions here, what I notice is these political discussions tend to become polarized on a left/right axis. "Property of theft"! cries one, the other replies, "Taking what has not been given is stealing"!

What would our politics truly look like if we strictly confined our political choices to the ethics laid out by the Buddha?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, February 1st, 2014 at 8:43 AM

Title: Re: Middle Way Politics

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

Are you going to run for office?

Virgo said:

I highly doubt it as Malcolm is not really concerned with the eight worldly concerns, as most politicians are. If he were to, however, I am sure that he would do it with a pure motivation.

Also, he comes from a political family, so I assume he really knows what he is talking about.

Kevin

Malcolm wrote:

Actually, Keven, my dad is a philosophy professor and a lawyer (retired from both).

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, February 1st, 2014 at 8:42 AM

Title: Re: Middle Way Politics

Content:

Nemo said:

Ideally it would be a meritocracy. The most spiritually advanced in the group is given near absolute authority. People stay in the collective as long as they wish. The mission obviously transcends members personal desires. The leader need not be an expert in everything. They delegate. Their main job is to purify motivation and justify the use of resources.

The game of modern politics is about selfish elites retaining undeserved wealth and power. There is no middle way of exploitation and coercion. The Buddha's life choices seem to support this thesis. You might as well be talking about Buddhist methods of warfare.

Malcolm wrote:

Again, I am talking about personal conduct, not political parties.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, February 1st, 2014 at 8:41 AM

Title: Re: Middle Way Politics

Content:

anjali said:

For those interested, the Internet Encyclopedia of Philosophy has a good article on <http://www.iep.utm.edu/polphil/>. It might be a good way to provide some basis for getting everyone on the same page. To quote one paragraph: Political philosophy has its beginnings in ethics: in questions such as what kind of life is the good life for human beings. Since people are by nature sociable – there being few proper anchorites who turn from society to live alone – the question follows as to what kind of life is proper for a person amongst people. The philosophical discourses concerning politics thus develop, broaden and flow from their ethical underpinnings.

Is there a middle-way ethics?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, of course, for Buddhists such as our selves it would be either the eight-fold path or the perfections.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, February 1st, 2014 at 8:38 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

'Capitalism doesn't exist', 'class doesn't exist, .... even if it does exist it's all part of some 'grand plan', the 'natural order of things' etc. ....

Malcolm wrote:

There are markets and there are classes. Buddha explains how classes arise. He does not say much about markets at all, except to encourage lay people to turn a good profit to support their families.

mbulance... We don't just say it's 'karma', and leave them there in the road!

Denial is simply ignorance.

tellyontellyon said:

I think that social class is a product of the economic system

Malcolm wrote:

The Buddha didn't.

tellyontellyon said:

and the economic system is a form of behavior and can therefore be changed.

Malcolm wrote:

Good luck, no one has ever succeeded in eradicating markets.

tellyontellyon said:

Nagarjuna's advice to his friend, a king, 100's of years ago was good advice in a general sense, but we don't have to take it as a justification for having 'kings' or 'free markets' today. Buddhism enshrines the possibility of change, it is not a formula for a particular political and economic system.

Malcolm wrote:

There is no such thing as a "free market". All markets are regulated.

tellyontellyon said:

Socialism isn't a panacea, but if implemented properly it could be a real step forward to a better life for everybody. Socialism is more than just regulation, it is the democratic ownership and planning of the economy. It can be done.

Malcolm wrote:

There really isn't such a thing as "democratic" ownership, the closest thing that comes to it is being a stockholder in a company.

tellyontellyon said:

Capitalism is different to simple trading, as has been explored in previous posts.

Malcolm wrote:

"Capitalism" is a Marxist construct that does not exist outside Marxist analysis.

tellyontellyon said:

We have to take responsibility for ourselves and the other life forms on this planet.

Malcolm wrote:

We do not have to take responsibility for other lifeforms, we are not "the stewards of nature" -- this is a Christian and a Social Ecological standpoint. It is shallow, not deep. What we have to do is set aside resources of land and sea and let other lifeforms do their thing. They need no help from us when left alone.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, February 1st, 2014 at 8:27 AM

Title: Re: "the Self is real" according to T. Page

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Likewise, even in Sanskrit, the term atman has several meanings, all dependent on context.

dzogchungpa said:

Just looking at the Srimala sutra, it seems that the context for its use of atman in connection with dharmakaya is the four viparyayas. So, what would you say the meaning of atman/anatman is in that context?

Malcolm wrote:

Essence.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 31st, 2014 at 10:22 PM

Title: Re: "the Self is real" according to T. Page

Content:

Son of Buddha said:

A specific word has a specific meaning you wouldnt call an airplane a turtle would you, why would you change the word Self to something else?

Malcolm wrote:

Words often have many meanings. For example, the word prajñā in Hinduism means something different than prajñā in Buddhism.

The word "rigs" in Tibetan translates these Sanskrit words: gotra, kula, yukti, etc., all words with different meanings.

Likewise, even in Sanskrit, the term atman has several meanings, all dependent on context.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 31st, 2014 at 9:01 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

And who said that socialist economic measure cannot be used for financial gain?

Malcolm wrote:

Socialists...after all, they want to eliminate markets, right?

Sherab Dorje said:

Nope, they want to control markets.

Malcolm wrote:

Then socialists are capitalists because all markets require regulation.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 31st, 2014 at 8:59 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

Anyway. I am done here. If you cannot accept the basic fact that Capitalism is political as well as economic, then we are wasting our time talking.

Malcolm wrote:

"Capitalism" is not a political doctrine, nor is it even an economic doctrine, though indeed theories have been invented to justify it. Indeed "Capitalism" was invented by Karl Marx.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 31st, 2014 at 8:52 PM

Title: Re: Middle Way Politics

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

I was not really talking so much about the role of leaders in politics, but of course this is an understandable inference. What I am really trying to get at is a means of discovering a Buddhist political sensibility which is informed by Buddha's teachings, but can be applied in how we conduct ourselves in political matters.

For example, the Buddha's original middle way was a path between indulgence and asceticism. So the real question is, "How do we Buddhists walk this path in whatever political situation we find ourselves in". That is what I mean by "Middle Way Politics". TKfan has the right idea, this is not so much about applying political remedies as a party, but what kind of political choices we make in light of our understanding of the Buddha's teaching, based on our own personal transformation dependent on our being people who live in a "polis", who are part of a "polity". So in that case, Adamantine's question about use of force is not an issue. Obviously a key point of a middle way politic would have to include ahimsa as a guiding principle.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 31st, 2014 at 8:36 PM

Title: Re: The Idea of Madhyamaka and Yogacara as Equally Correct

Content:

Tsongkhapafan said:

I know there are people who believe that a direct transmission of experience of emptiness or enlightenment can be given...

Malcolm wrote:

Not to sidetrack the discussion, but this is not exactly what direct introduction means.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 31st, 2014 at 8:35 PM

Title: Re: The Idea of Madhyamaka and Yogacara as Equally Correct

Content:

Sherab said:

why the variation in intellectual output?

Malcolm wrote:

It is very simple really: people, when in post-equipoise, resume intellectual analysis of emptiness. One could say that the only persons in whom the equipoise view and the post-equipoise view are "identical" are fully awakened buddhas since in fact they are never not in a state of equipoise.

Sherab said:

Post-equipoise, there is a resumption of intellectual analysis of emptiness. However, wouldn't post-equipoise intellectual analysis of emptiness be informed by the experience of equipoise? If yes, then variation in intellectual output would imply variation in the equipoise experienced. That would mean differences in the experiences of the third and fourth empowerment.

If not, is there then no memory of the experience of equipoise?

Malcolm wrote:

Actually, the way I understand is that one's post equipoise view will be characterized by one's remaining knowledge obscuration. Supposing that Nāgārjuna, Āsanga and Candra for example were all bodhisattvas on the stages, their differences in views could be accounted for merely by this fact alone.

When we apply this to Tibetans, the same rule would apply. Of course, there is no way the realization of anyone can be validated by ordinary persons such as ourselves...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 31st, 2014 at 9:10 AM

Title: Re: The Idea of Madhyamaka and Yogacara as Equally Correct

Content:

Sherab said:

why the variation in intellectual output?

Malcolm wrote:

It is very simple really: people, when in post-equipoise, resume intellectual analysis of emptiness. One could say that the only persons in whom the equipoise view and the post-equipoise view are "identical" are fully awakened buddhas since in fact they are never not in a state of equipoise.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 31st, 2014 at 9:07 AM

Title: Re: Middle Way Politics

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The key teaching of the Buddha is the Madhyama Pratipad, the middle way.

What would a middle way politics look like, one informed by the Buddha's teachings rather than those of secular authors?

Johnny Dangerous said:

I think it's relative depending on time, place, and circumstance..but basically one would try to help all beings achieve a state of less suffering (the suffering of suffering to be specific, since political change and the material change it brings can't do anything at all to salve the other two), with a minimum of coercion, while encouraging both participation (and a "right" and obligation to participation in that sense), and some sense of responsibility. In addition, instead of politics based on "inherent rights" of really existing beings..I wonder if the model would not be drawn from the acknowledgment of interdependence.

I think you could make a valid argument for a number of different directions, but I think that Anarchism/Libertarian leaning ideas (on the left and right, though personally I am solidly left of center) will be a more natural fit than either statist, or statist/corporatist combinations.

If I had to pick a current party from my personal point of view, I would say to me The Green Party and similar groups are at least vaguely pointed in the right direction, simply due to advocacy of things like smaller scale, cooperative tackling of problems.. even if the parties themselves are pretty lackluster right now. In Europe, it seems that democratic socialist ideals (at least on paper) fit the bill, though I gather there are plenty of complaints in practice.

However, a big part of "Dharma politics" would hopefully be honesty about what is, and is not possible, which puts it out of the running...lol. Politics runs on an unreal picture about "the future", and perpetuates itself with providing people with either fear or longing towards it..the usual endless preparation of samsara.

Malcolm wrote:

Lets not say "Dharma politics", because they should not mix. Middle Way Politics is informed by Dharma, but does not pretend to be Dharma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 31st, 2014 at 9:05 AM

Title: Re: Middle Way Politics

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The key teaching of the Buddha is the Madhyama Pratipad, the middle way.

What would a middle way politics look like, one informed by the Buddha's teachings rather than those of secular authors?

Son of Buddha said:

I would say Democratic Socialism.

what would the Buddha say? hmmm not sure ..... possibly a theocratic monarchy ran by the wheel turning King.

then again the Buddha did crush the the caste System in the Pali-Canon...but I don't remember him setting up a new view on a "future" government system.

Malcolm wrote:

Buddha refuted the brahmanical theory of the caste system, but he certainly did not "crush" it.

Democratic socialism is a secular theory.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 31st, 2014 at 9:04 AM

Title: Re: Was Nāgārjuna a misogynist?

Content:

Astus said:

Enlightened beings are not infallible or omniscient.

Malcolm wrote:

It depends on what level of awakening you are considering.

Certainly stream entrants and once returners might have some faults, as well as bodhisattvas up the seventh bhumi, but above that, bodhisattvas are faultless since they have no afflictions, and tenth stage bodhisattvas have omniscience that nearly that of a Buddhas. Buddhas of course are omniscient in two ways.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 31st, 2014 at 6:37 AM

Title: Middle Way Politics

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The key teaching of the Buddha is the Madhyama Pratipad, the middle way.

What would a middle way politics look like, one informed by the Buddha's teachings rather than those of secular authors?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 31st, 2014 at 6:31 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

And who said that socialist economic measure cannot be used for financial gain?

Malcolm wrote:

Socialists...after all, they want to eliminate markets, right?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 31st, 2014 at 5:53 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

[quote="Sherab Dorje]"if it wasn't for the US's socialist intervention via the Marshall plan[/quote]

The Marshall Plan aid was mostly used for the purchase of goods from the United States...

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Marshall\_Plan

Hardly socialist at all. Its purpose was to make Europe dependent on US exports.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 31st, 2014 at 5:47 AM

Title: Re: Was Nāgārjuna a misogynist?

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

Nagarjuna was a Mahasiddha.

Malcolm wrote:

Which Nāgārjuna are you talking about?

There were at least two, and most probably three. We do not know which Nāgārjuna wrote this text.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 31st, 2014 at 4:00 AM

Title: Re: Engaged Buddhism... what is it?

Content:

AlexanderS said:

Of course, the Buddhas teach through skillfull means. The former example used before was advice given to a monarch and not to a modern day democracy. What I mean about realized beings words carrying more weight is that their teachings come from their wisdom minds and not from delusion.

tellyontellyon said:

Yes, I see.

Though at the same time , there really is a lot of wisdom in ancient teachings that have been proven over many generations to still be beneficial. I was watching a video earlier by a monk who was talking about all the rules a monk has to follow. Apparently they are not allowed to wear a robe that is perfectly clean, there must be some sort of mark on it. It reminds me of the Islamic carpet makers that always put a deliberate mistake in their carpet designs.

The humility of such an act is a valuable way of remembering our 'pride' when we start to think we are perfect, or have nice clothes etc. So these instructions can go very deep and work on all sorts of different levels, not just a literal practical level. I suppose this comes about through practice and may not be self-evident from simply studying the 'rules' from an abstract, uninvolved perspective.

I really admire what these monks have to cope with in order to keep all their vows.

Malcolm wrote:

If you want to live in a true socialist community where there is no property, become a monk. That is the only way to become free from markets and market capitalism.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 31st, 2014 at 3:57 AM

Title: Re: Engaged Buddhism... what is it?

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

Like in the Kalama sutra? yes?

Malcolm wrote:

The Kalamas sutra is the most misunderstood sutra in the Pali canon. It was a teaching to a tribe of nonbuddhists confused about the various gurus who visited them and tried to convert them. It does not mean that once you have taken Buddhism as your path you are free to just interpret everything anyway you want. Of course, you must test everything, like one would test gold, to make sure it is authentic, but that is because you understand the value of real gold.

tellyontellyon said:

I mean, if Nagarjuna says put taxes up, or put taxes down or whatever, that is not some sort of creed or confession of faith that we must accept or otherwise not be 'proper' Buddhists, just because 'Nagarjuna says so'... you're not implying that are you?

Malcolm wrote:

What I am saying is that one does not need to inform one's politics by anything outside the Buddha's teachings, and that most political doctrines are not consistent with Buddha's teachings, increasingly the further right and left that you go.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 31st, 2014 at 3:24 AM

Title: Re: "the Self is real" according to T. Page

Content:

Tsongkhapa said:

Exist = appearing to a valid mind.

Malcolm wrote:

How is a mind established as valid?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 31st, 2014 at 12:54 AM

Title: Re: The Idea of Madhyamaka and Yogacara as Equally Correct

Content:

smcj said:

Being one of the people that post those type of offenses, I'd like to thank you allowing much of my Shentong postings to go unopposed.

Malcolm wrote:

If someone is a Vajrayāna practitioner, I don't really think it matters much which post-equipose view of emptiness they hold all that much, whether it is the "Prasanga" of the Gelugs, the view of freedom from extremes, or "gzhan stong". The view meditated in Vajrayāna depends on the experience of the third and fourth empowerments and not intellectual analysis.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 30th, 2014 at 10:49 PM

Title: Re: Engaged Buddhism... what is it?

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

Nāgārjuna advocated a lowering of excessive tax rates of previous Satavahanas, he advocated market regulation, and so on. Everything you need to conduct yourself and construct a political conscience that accords with Buddhist principles may be found in this book.

I think there is a lot of wisdom in his words. But we have to have some caution too.

There is a lot of general good advice here that is generally applicable, but some of the advice was particular to the person he was talking to and the time and situation he was talking about. He was a great philosopher and practitioner, but as Buddhists we don't accept anything as 'god given' absolute truth for all time.

Buddhism isn't a 'revealed' religion and Nagarjuna wasn't a prophet. So we can learn from Nagarjuna and all the great teachers, but we have to think and find out for ourselves too. Every day is a new day, and we can't be bound by a formulaic approach to anything.

My own teacher, Lama Rabsang (Palpung), says the Buddha gave 84'000 teachings, meaning that there are lots of ways of approaching practice, and life. For me, it is important to always keep this in mind when approaching any teachings, scripture, or teachers. It's just good sense.

I think the same must apply to engaged Buddhism.

p.s. thanks for the links.

Malcolm wrote:

The meaning is that there are 21,000 Dharmas to eliminate ignorance, 21,000 Dharmas to eliminate desire, 21,000 Dharmas to eliminate hatred, and 21,000 Dharmas to eliminate the three afflictions in combination, and that's all.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 30th, 2014 at 10:47 PM

Title: Re: Engaged Buddhism... what is it?

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

Buddhism isn't a 'revealed' religion...

Malcolm wrote:

Mahāyāna Buddhism most certainly is.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 30th, 2014 at 9:44 PM

Title: Re: The Idea of Madhyamaka and Yogacara as Equally Correct

Content:

smcj said:

I didn't realize it was the three natures that was so much of an issue, and will remember to keep that in mind when researching.

It's an issue for Malcolm personally. It's his bugaboo.

I believe that Malcolm has the kind of expertise that could argue either side of the issue effectively if he wanted to. For personal reasons he chooses to subscribe to non-Gelug Madhyamaka. That's perfectly ok, but just know that he has a strong bias and doesn't always identify it as such.

Malcolm wrote:

No, you are wrong, the three natures is a major polemical issue between the Madhyamakas and Yogacaras in India, one upon which there are hundreds of pages written. Because of this, it has become a major polemical issue in Tibet too.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 30th, 2014 at 9:41 PM

Title: Re: The Idea of Madhyamaka and Yogacara as Equally Correct

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

I understand the above phrase is translated quite literally from Tibetan, but it really does not make sense in English. In English that literally reads:

The nature of the mind is phenomena,
the nature of emptiness is mind.

What is really should say:

"The nature of all phenomena is the mind,
The nature of the mind is emptiness."

rob h said:

That seems to merge both schools really well, thanks, and thanks again Tsongkhapafan. But yeah it's interesting that others have tried to make them work together in various ways, and nice quote in relation to that Tsongkhapafan. It seems like if you synthesize these two schools, or take out the extremes from both of them, then maybe there's something that can work very well.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, in fact the Yogacara Madhyamaka that Tsongkhapa is referring to is Śāntarakṣita's. Śāntarakṣita's sole concession to Yogacara was that it was allowable to say that all phenomena are established as mind as a conventional truth. But he never goes into some lengthy analysis via the three natures, which he must therefore regards as being rather clumsy and leading one astray from Madhyamaka. Indeed the three natures theory is the main thing that comes under attack from Madhyamakās.

When it comes to the three natures theory in Tibet, this is the main thing about the Jonang presentation that Tsongkhapa attacks in his Legs bshad. He asserts their presentation deviates from how it is presented by Asanga and Vasubandhu and that they misuse it.

rob h said:

Thanks for this too, that's a great help. I didn't realize it was the three natures that was so much of an issue, and will remember to keep that in mind when researching. To be honest I don't really think about those that much either, but I do think the eight consciousness model works well, even if it isn't perfect and is just a concept that eventually has to be dropped with the others eventually. Will try to remember to read up on Santarakṣita and the Madhyamakālaṃkāra as well, it'll probably help clear a lot of things up.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, the eight consciousness model is also critiqued by Madhyamakās, and indeed Śāntarakṣita does not address it much, as far as I recall.

There are basically three trends in scholastic thinking about the five treatises in Tibet: one, that they are all definitive [gzhans stong]; two, that of the five, only the Abhisamyālaṃkāra can be considered definitive dge lugs]; three, that Abhisamyālaṃkāra is definitive, and that properly understood, the Uttaratantra is definitive; the rest are not.

Then there is my unique point of view, which I have often stated. Asanga's teacher, Ācārya Maitreya's own point of view is Yogacara (cittamātra) and his identity as Bodhisattva Maitreya is a Tibetan misattribution that has gained such wide currency as to have become a "fact". He wrote five texts in order to clarify the three main streams of Mahāyāna sūtras. For Prajñāpāramitā he composed the Abhisamyālaṃkāra in order to detail its path structure. For the Tathāgatagarbha sūtras he composed the Uttaratantra. And for Yogacara he composed Madhyantavibhanga, being an attempt to correct a perceived Madhyamaka extremism, and the Dharmadharmatāvibhanga, being a detailed treatment of the topic found in the Samdhinirmocana. He composed a treatise synthesizing these three sūtra streams from a Yogacara prespective, the Mahāyānasūtrālaṃkara.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 30th, 2014 at 8:25 PM

Title: Re: The Idea of Madhyamaka and Yogacara as Equally Correct

Content:

rob h said:

But yeah it's interesting that others have tried to make them work together in various ways, and nice quote in relation to that Tsongkhapafan. It seems like if you synthesize these two schools, or take out the extremes from both of them, then maybe there's something that can work very well.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, in fact the Yogacara Madhyamaka that Tsongkhapa is referring to is Śāntarakṣita's. Śāntarakṣita's sole concession to Yogacara was that it was allowable to say that all phenomena are established as mind as a conventional truth. But he never goes into some lengthy analysis via the three natures, which he must therefore regards as being rather clumsy and leading one astray from Madhyamaka. Indeed the three natures theory is the main thing that comes under attack from Madhyamakas.

When it comes to the three natures theory in Tibet, this is the main thing about the Jonang presentation that Tsongkhapa attacks in his Legs bshad. He asserts their presentation deviates from how it is presented by Asanga and Vasubandhu and that they misuse it.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 30th, 2014 at 8:22 PM

Title: Re: The Idea of Madhyamaka and Yogacara as Equally Correct

Content:

Tsongkhapafan said:

This all seems very intellectual!

The union of the Prasangika and Chittamatrin views was praised by Tsongkhapa as pre-eminent and is very important for Tantric meditation.

Malcolm wrote:

Everyone in Tibetan practices Vajrayāna according to this view.

Tsongkhapafan said:

It is expressed simply by Milarepa:

You should know that all phenomena are the nature of mind

And that mind is the nature of emptiness.

Malcolm wrote:

I understand the above phrase is translated quite literally from Tibetan, but it really does not make sense in English. In English that literally reads:

The nature of the mind is phenomena,
the nature of emptiness is mind.

What is really should say:

"The nature of all phenomena is the mind,
The nature of the mind is emptiness."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 30th, 2014 at 8:14 PM

Title: Re: The Idea of Madhyamaka and Yogacara as Equally Correct

Content:

rob h said:

This is difficult, because although I'm trying to point out that there is something there, because there can't possibly be nothing

Malcolm wrote:

There can't be nothing since there never was something which could become nothing.

dzogchungpa said:

Why, for there to be nothing, must there have been something to become nothing?

Malcolm wrote:

Nothing always indicates the absence of something, in common language.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 30th, 2014 at 8:11 AM

Title: Re: The Idea of Madhyamaka and Yogacara as Equally Correct

Content:

rob h said:

This is difficult, because although I'm trying to point out that there is something there, because there can't possibly be nothing

Malcolm wrote:

There can't be nothing since there never was something which could become nothing.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 30th, 2014 at 8:04 AM

Title: Re: Was Nāgārjuna a misogynist?

Content:

Indrajala said:

It begs the question how do modern liberal Buddhists reconcile such sentiments with their own values?

I don't think you can write these statements off as mere engrained cultural habits. Assuming Nāgārjuna actually wrote these (and let's assume he did), these are the words of a realized bodhisattva with only benevolent intentions..

theanarchist said:

I guess since this was mainly aimed at male monastics he wanted to paint women in the worst possible light to make renunciation easier for the poor, desire-plagued sods.

I bet dharma texts aimed at nuns would do the same with men

Malcolm wrote:

It is not really a Dharma text, it is an ancestor to Sakya Pandita's Legs bshad (subhāśita), indeed Sapan cribs a verse here and there from this text. These verses would have been read by educated persons whether monks or not. As I said it is a kind of literary sport in being clever, often at the expense of others, indulged in by Sanskritist literati back in the day.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 30th, 2014 at 3:00 AM

Title: Re: Was Nāgārjuna a misogynist?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

But then again, I have found many male monastics to have a fair bit of misogyny, so he could have learned this in his Vihara.

Indrajala said:

So a realized master is capable of misogyny? If that's the case, a lot of moral issues are entirely separate from realization of, say, emptiness, though that's problematic. A bodhisattva who has realized emptiness probably should not feel ill will towards anyone, including women. We would at least hope Nāgārjuna had the best of benevolent intentions in writing these verses.

Malcolm wrote:

If he wrote it, perhaps he penned it when he was a younger man, not in possession of realization. After all, we commonly find texts composed by teenagers and in their twenties in the various collected works of Tibetan masters. Often texts such as this serve as demonstrations of skill in composition, as you know, this being a genre called "subhāśita". In subhāśita wit at the expense of others is a desiderata, it is part of the form.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 30th, 2014 at 2:43 AM

Title: Re: The Idea of Madhyamaka and Yogacara as Equally Correct

Content:

rob h said:

It isn't an attempt to be substantialist, it's meant to try to convey the idea that there is "something" there...

Malcolm wrote:

And that is the problem, nothing there is found.

rob h said:

If it's all going to be taken literally though, doesn't this ring true also?

Since all finite concepts are negational, the concept of "middle" (madhya) is equally negated, and so one should not even try and abide in a Middle View (madhyamaka).

Malcolm wrote:

Of course.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 30th, 2014 at 2:40 AM

Title: Re: Was Nāgārjuna a misogynist?

Content:

Indrajala said:

Basically, what I'm getting at is that modern liberal values are often quite incompatible with older Buddhist ones, yet this is usually conveniently ignored or just dismissed as unimportant or simply backwards thought that we've moved beyond.

Malcolm wrote:

One must distinguish Dharma from culture, yes, even in sutras.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 30th, 2014 at 2:38 AM

Title: Re: Was Nāgārjuna a misogynist?

Content:

Indrajala said:

In the Tree of Wisdom (Tib. She-rab Dong-Bu ) attributed to Nāgārjuna there are the following verses:

63. A conqueror, a water channel, a creeping plant,
Women and the blind, these five,
How they are led by the crafty!
And this leading places them in the power of others.

182. A woman's appetite is twice (that of a man),
Her deceitfulness four times (as much),
Her shame six times,
And her passions eight times--so it is said.

194. When milk is got from a horn,
When the reed-flower drops honey,
Then, when a woman is true,
The lotus will grow in dry ground.

246. An evil man, gold, a drum,
A wild horse, women and cloth
Are controlled by beating.
These are not vessels for elegant doings.
<http://www.sacred-texts.com/bud/srdb/srdb.htm>

It begs the question how do modern liberal Buddhists reconcile such sentiments with their own values?

I don't think you can write these statements off as mere engrained cultural habits.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, they certainly are -- they are quite commonly found across the board in Indian literature and the same metaphors are found across the board in Sanskrit texts, Buddhist and Hindu.

As he states in one place here "so it is said."

But then again, I have found many male monastics to have a fair bit of misogyny, so he could have learned this in his Vihara.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 30th, 2014 at 12:07 AM

Title: Re: The Idea of Madhyamaka and Yogacara as Equally Correct

Content:

rob h said:

Yogacara...says that when looking at the whole and not individual parts, there's something there that can "be said" to have some type of existence, reality, substance, and so on, because there's actually something there ultimately when all things are seen without division.

Malcolm wrote:

This is substantialist perspective and will inevitably collapse because of its internal contradictions.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 29th, 2014 at 11:52 PM

Title: Re: Engaged Buddhism... what is it?

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

M.

Are there similar instructions for Theravadin monks?

Could you elaborate please, what part of Nagarjuna's text are you thinking of; what are the actual instructions?

Malcolm wrote:

You will have to read the book yourself, I am afraid, but in brief he encourages kings to eliminate capital punishment, provide healthcare, charity, etc.

tellyontellyon said:

We have a Queen here in the UK; however, she is a Christian and head of the Church of England. Also, there are many countries, e.g. the USA that are Republics and so don't have a king. What if you have a king that is very hostile to Buddhism? Perhaps his social policy could be damaging? So I could imagine some difficulties arising there.

Malcolm wrote:

Buddhism declined in India largely due to the hostilities of Hindu kings. The life stories of the Mahāsiddhas are full of such events.

tellyontellyon said:

What is the actual word that Nagarjuna used for 'king'?

Malcolm wrote:

Rājā.

He probably authored the text for this king:

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Satavahana\_dynasty#Gautamiputra\_Satakarni\_.2878.E2.80.93102\_CE.29

This person was the 23rd ruler of the Satavahana dynasty that ruled major portions of India from 230 BCE to 220 CE. You can see how large this kingdom was on the map.

tellyontellyon said:

So these are instructions that both monarchs and ordinary Buddhists should follow. Everybody.

Malcolm wrote:
Indeed they are.

Nāgārjuna advocated a lowering of excessive tax rates of previous Satavahanas, he advocated market regulation, and so on. Everything you need to conduct yourself and construct a political conscience that accords with Buddhist principles may be found in this book. Not only that, but of course by following the instructions in this book, you will become a perfect bodhisattva.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Wednesday, January 29th, 2014 at 8:23 PM
Title: Re: Peak oil
Content:

kirtu said:
The graphic is in millions. 15000 million =  $15 \times 10^9$ . They then avoid the difference between US and British definitions of billions (anyway Brits favor discussing things in thousands of millions).

Kirt

Malcolm wrote:
I am reporting (sans typos) what an article cited from the UN report that accompanied this graph.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Wednesday, January 29th, 2014 at 8:21 PM
Title: Re: Engaged Buddhism... what is it?
Content:

Kim O'Hara said:
As for lay Buddhists, I guess we can follow the guidelines for monastics if we can work out what they are ...
Kim

Malcolm wrote:
Or more simply, we can look at texts like the Ratnavali by Nāgārjuna which set out in some detail how kings are to set out social policies. .

Author: Malcolm
Date: Wednesday, January 29th, 2014 at 8:17 AM
Title: Re: Engaged Buddhism... what is it?
Content:

Kim O'Hara said:

I was going to point tellyontellyon towards <http://www.ecobuddhism.org> but it seems to have been taken down. Does anyone know why, or whether it has just moved?

TIA,

Kim

Malcolm wrote:

It loads for me.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 29th, 2014 at 7:46 AM

Title: Re: Peak oil

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

Also, you mean 'billion' not 'trillion'.

Malcolm wrote:

Yup.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 29th, 2014 at 7:43 AM

Title: Re: Engaged Buddhism... what is it?

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

What is Engaged Buddhism? What are it's aims, and how should Buddhists engage, generally speaking?

Malcolm wrote:

The term was coined by Thich Nhat Hahn. You can read his precepts of Engaged Buddhism here. You will particularly like precept 5:

Do not accumulate wealth while millions are hungry. Do not take as the aim of your life fame, profit, wealth, or sensual pleasure. Live simply and share time, energy, and material resources with those who are in need.

http://viewonbuddhism.org/resources/14\_precepts.html

Joanna Macy is another person who has written about this quite a bit:

<http://www.joannamacy.net/engaged-buddhism.html>

Engaged Buddhism is basically Deep Ecology with a Buddhist perspective.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 29th, 2014 at 6:00 AM

Title: Re: "the Self is real" according to T. Page

Content:

Tsongkhapa said:

I can quote Madhyamakavatara too to support dependent production:

If you say that causes do not produce effects, then so--called effects do not exist;

And without an effect there is no reason for a cause, and they do not exist.

Since both of these are just like illusions, we are not at fault;

And worldly people's things exist.

VI. 170

Malcolm wrote:

Conventionally, of course. Then you have to understand that conventions will not bear analysis.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 29th, 2014 at 5:34 AM

Title: Re: Peak oil

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

... indeed, world population appears to be declining on the whole.

dzogchungpa said:

svg

Malcolm wrote:

Right, it means that according to UN estimates, world population in 2150 could be as high as 25 trillion, the red line, or as low as 3.5 trillion, the green line. According to the report, the mathematical model favors the low number.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 29th, 2014 at 5:22 AM

Title: Re: "the Self is real" according to T. Page

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Which is to merely say that they are objects of false cognitions, which when examined cannot be found to exist or be produced in anyway at all.

PadmaVonSamba said:

Since your argument is thus, too, an object of false cognitions, can it be found to exist or be produced in anyway at all?

If they are not produced in any way at all,
even as hallucinations, then there is no samsara, not even relatively.

If that's the case, why practice Dharma since it too cannot be "... found to exist or be produced in anyway at all. "

.
.
.

Malcolm wrote:

I can but cite Candrakirti on this point:

Reflections are not real, but using them we smarten our appearances.

In just the same way we should understand that arguments

That have the power to to cleanse the face of wisdom,

Unlike your limping sophistries, engender the realization of the goal.

But if the reasoning that proves our point were something were truly real, and real also the point itself that should be understood, then arguments of contact and the rest indeed would have some truth.
But this is not the case, Your own fatigue is all you have achieved.

But we can demonstrate with easy cogency
That all phenomena lack a real intrinsic being.

The contrary indeed you cannot prove,

So why ensnare the world in webs of false logic?

(MV, verses 175-177, Introduction to the Middle Way, Shambhala, 2002.)

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 28th, 2014 at 9:39 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

I support genuine Socialism..... like many US citizens have in the past...

Malcolm wrote:

Primarily first generation Germans, German Jews, and Italians.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 28th, 2014 at 9:35 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

Nemo said:

Banks should be nationalized. Period. They were traditionally 1-2% of GDP. Now financial services are around 11% and a drain on the real economy. As are speculators. Didn't Adam Smith think speculators should be hung or at the very least taxed out of existence?.

Malcolm wrote:

As I said, the repeal of the Glass-Steagall act was a huge mistake. But investment banks have a legitimate role in the economy, just as "venture" capitalists do (they are really the same thing).

That is the beauty of having different countries, each nation is free to try out its own policies and see how it works out for them. Other nations can see the outcomes and decide to follow suit or not.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 28th, 2014 at 9:32 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

Unknown said:

As you well know I am talking about Private Property not Personal Property. Private property is the means of production. The Equipment and resources that we all depend on as a community to live. E.g. the sewer system, the electricity stations and grid, factories, roads, rail systems, banks. Society should not be held to ransom by a tiny percentage of individuals. These things should be both communally owned and communally managed democratically.

Malcolm wrote:

Toto:

One of the things that is nice about the US is that things are not centralized to the degree you imagine by "capitalists".

All the roads in the US are maintained in this order by the states and by the towns or counties.

In many places in the US utilities are in fact owned by the municipality, in other places they are not, where in fact they operate as tightly regulated monopolies.

In every city in the US, water treatment is something run by the local communities.

The rail system in the US, while originally built with private capital in the 19th century, is a now mostly a joint venture between the Feds and what remains of the rail companies that went bankrupt in the 1960's. There do remain a couple of rail systems that continue to operate independently of Amtrak.

In my view, the single biggest financial experiment that went wrong in the US was the dissolution of the long established barriers between savings and loans banks and investment banking in 1999, as well as the increase in credit offerings by the credit card companies and banks in the 1980's. Encouraging people to go into debt is short sighted economic policy. The same thing is now happening in China.

When it comes to financial markets, the main issue is how to insulate the whole of the economy against speculative risk while permitting those who wish to use their money in risk laden ventures. We ought to have learned our lesson in the 1929, but we didn't.

I strongly disagree with you that factories and so on should be "communalized" by force. Anyway, in the US it will never happen. If other countries want to experiment with such socialist remedies, more power to them, but I think that history has shown that such experiments are doomed to failure.

I do believe however that the 1819 Supreme Court Decision on Trustees of Dartmouth College v. Woodward should be reversed, or legislated out of existence. Obviously, corporations are not persons and should not be treated as such. This ruling is actually the seed of neoliberalism (which I am opposed to, of course). Naturally, I think the EU, a neoliberal experiment, should be dissolved. Britain was absolutely correct to keep its distance and currency, and in fact it should never have joined at all.

I think at base, Toto, what we have here is just a cultural difference, in addition, I do not think you have understood Buddhism really very clearly. Nor have you understood the POV of HHDL very clearly. Much is made of his preference for socialism. However, he recently wrote, in his 2009 book, The Leader's Way:

I have come to put my faith in the free-market system.... The fact that it allows for freedom and diversity of thought and religion has convinced me that it is the one we should be working from," he wrote.

He argues in this book that capitalists can learn from Buddhism. But I am sure it surprises you to learn that he supports open markets.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 28th, 2014 at 8:59 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

M:

Malcolm wrote:

You are responding to Zhen li, not me.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 28th, 2014 at 8:58 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

Zhen Li said:

The fact that half of those countries now calls themselves "Peoples Republic of ____" or "Democratic Socialist Republic of ____," and are now suffering in immense poverty, is quite germane.

Malcolm wrote:

It is germane to other issues, but not to my immediate point with SD, i.e., that the British empire was not "overcome" per se by anyone. It "fell apart", because Britain had no stomach nor money to keep armies fielded to control its colonies.

SD, Canada remains a part of the British Commonwealth and the Queen is the head of state.

The British relinquished Egypt after WWI because they revolted, etc., but even so, most of the former British Empire remain commonwealth territories, sharing the Queen as their head of state, and what's more, the cultural influences of the Empire are enduring.

When I say "bequeathed", the areas formerly dominated by the empire came to be dominated by American economic policy and military power, rather than direct colonization. A former colony, we Americans are traditionally allergic to expanding our powers through direct colonization. Our attempts at foreign intervention sadly have wrought far more harm than long term good, as far as I can tell.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 28th, 2014 at 9:50 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Feudalism (a wholly inaccurate historical construct) never existed. The English empire was not overcome, it was bequeathed to the United States after two dreadful wars that managed to ruin its economy.

Zhen Li said:

Rule by colonies is replaced by rule by development grants and loans. Which really develops the countries more?

Malcolm wrote:

Good question, but it is not germane to my point.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 28th, 2014 at 9:12 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

That's the problem with the Capitalist view, its adherents always express of sense of entitlement to that which is not theirs, whether it be wealth, factories. etc.

Malcolm wrote:

I am not advocating a capitalist view. I am pointing out, as I have over and over again, that the only way you can secure your goals is with lethal violence. I do not condone that, I am utterly opposed to it. I do not share your conviction that "workers own the factories in which they work", unless in fact they do, done so properly, legally and with the full protection of the law. I do not support your view again that the wealth of the ultra rich should be seized, because such a seizure itself would involve catastrophic international conflicts, and because such people have the means to simply remove themselves from your reach. In other words, more harm than good would arise from their temporary (seriously, what's forty years?) control of such wealth. So lets say you do give everyone in the world $49,000 [233 trillion / by world population]. How are you planning to do this? Actually you aren't. You are going to completely disrupt the economy and destroy everyone's wealth, just like the Bolsheviks did in Russia. Honestly, on this score, I think you are completely naive. But lets say we did, the same thing would happen all over again; some people, most people will squander their wealth, some people will be better at managing it, and eventually the same disparities that have arisen will just arise again.

The socialist democracies that Kirt is so fond of are a kind of rapprochement between a moderate (non-marxist) socialist view and the market economy we live in. However, they are only feasible because they are floating in a sea of money.

I guess the point is, I am not opposed to strict market regulation, it is necessary actually for a whole host of environmental reasons and social reasons. But what I am totally opposed to is the idea that we try to abolish the market economy we have now, because another one, a black one, will just take its place.

Anyway, I really don't think your revolution is ever going to happen anyway. The way global wealth is distributed, you would have to have a revolution in the US first, and that will never happen until we have a poverty crisis. Americans are completely allergic to communism.

You don't seem to have any idea what the eighteen qualities of a precious human birth are, even though you are British and a Buddhist. You should maximize your precious human birth and practice Dharma, not waste all your time on obsolete political religions.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 28th, 2014 at 8:52 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

M:

That so much wealth is concentrated into the hands of so few at this juncture in history represents a fundamental failure of market regulation brought about by the "liberalization" of the world economy which represents a failure on the part of the various governments in the world to understand the proper role regulation in the market place, so that open markets can function healthily.

You seem to have abandoned your Karmic view that the wealthy got rich via meritorious former lives? Now your argument sounds more like Glenn Beck.

Malcolm wrote:

Those people who managed to receive that wealth had merit to do so, it is not like there is a dollar figure placed on merit. For example, the same person born in the Soviet Communist world would be rich in status, part of the elite, extremely powerful, one of the 40 most powerful people in the country, a Putin.

tellyontellyon said:

It is not up to you or anyone else however to change that apart through fair taxation policies.

Nobody is asking your permission.

Malcolm wrote:

That's the problem with the Marxist view, its adherents always express of a misplaced sense of entitlement to that which is not theirs, whether it be wealth, factories. etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 28th, 2014 at 8:47 AM

Title: Re: "the Self is real" according to T. Page

Content:

Tsongkhapa said:

they have a relative degree of reality.

Malcolm wrote:

Which is to merely say that they are objects of false cognitions, which when examined cannot be found to exist or be produced in anyway at all.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 28th, 2014 at 8:41 AM

Title: Re: Peak oil

Content:

Kim O'Hara said:

We can be much smarter about energy efficiency, for instance - and it's already happening.

Malcolm wrote:

Jevons observed that England's consumption of coal soared after James Watt introduced his coal-fired steam engine, which greatly improved the efficiency of Thomas Newcomen's earlier design.

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Jevons\_paradox

So no, I don't share your technological enthusiasm. I am rather skeptical of it, actually.

Kim O'Hara said:

We can slow our population growth - and that has already happened in the West and I see no reason the developing world won't naturally follow the same path as it follows us through the same developmental sequence.

Malcolm wrote:

This is certainly a desiderata. And indeed, world population appears to be declining on the whole.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 28th, 2014 at 8:36 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

M:

Because some people have the karma to become super wealthy and others do not. Rather than bitching about the super wealthy, attend to your own causes of merit. I'm not bitching about the rich. I don't hate the rich or envy their wealth. I am just pointing out a disparity. I am also pointing out that the rich are rich because the poor are poor.

Malcolm wrote:

Again, the rich are rich and the poor are poor because of their karma.

For example, there was a yogi who supplicated the Dorje Legpa, one of three main protectors of the Dzogchen teachings. He was a very good practitioner, so when he summoned Dorje Legpa, Dorje Legpa appeared to him in person. One day the yogi said to Dorje Legpa, "I am tired of being poor, bring me as much wealth as you can." The next day Dorje Legpa returned, but he only had a small brass coin. "What's this", the yogi, said, "Why did not you not bring me more?" Being a wisdom protector, Dorje Legpa replied, "I am sorry but you do not have the karma to be wealthy so I could only bring you this much".

tellyontellyon said:

Under capitalism, the rich get rich at the expense of the poor.

Malcolm wrote:

It seems that way, but it is not really that way.

tellyontellyon said:

But even that isn't the most important thing:

If society could progress under capitalism, if the system was stable and allowed us to tackle the worlds povert and address the environmental problems effectively then it wouldn't matter all that much if the rich were rich. Thats not what bothers me really.

In it's early period capitalism was progressive, it moved the world forward, and its benefits made its faults tolerable.

But now, in late capitalism, capitalism's problems outweigh its diminishing benefits. It is a chaotic system that is leading us to barbarism.

Malcolm wrote:

As I said before, this state of affairs represents a fundamental failure of world governments to properly regulate the markets because of neoliberal policies which began to be put into place in the 1970's.

tellyontellyon said:

I feel sorry for the super-rich actually. Many of them are decent people and are just as trapped in this corrupting system as the rest of us. However, I do think a very privileged lifestyle can cut people off from what is happening to others, or they start making up rationalizations to justify the enormous differences in society.

Malcolm wrote:

It is not up to you or anyone else however to change that apart through fair taxation policies. Actually, in the US, in the 1950's all income above $100,000 a year was taxed at something like 90 percent. It provided incentive for reinvestment rather than profit taking.

tellyontellyon said:

I will have to take exception to what seemed to be a suggestion that the poor are somehow more desirous than the rich.

Malcolm wrote:

They have more desire because their need is greater. It does not mean they want to screw everything to moves.

tellyontellyon said:

It seems to me that wealth can act like a drug to some people. It is strange how the people I know with the most money hang on to it more tightly than people with less money. Perhaps they rely on it so much for their sense of value or self-esteem?

Malcolm wrote:

As I said, the wealthy, like asuras, are primarily dominated by anger and pride.

tellyontellyon said:

That's one of the things about a system that measures value in dollars and cents rather than in smiles and a meaningful existence. Marxists don't want to make everybody rich, they want to make a world where wealth doesn't matter.

Malcolm wrote:

If you are a Buddhist, wealth matters only in so far as it assists your practice. But there will always be wealthy people and poor people. Some trees will always get more nutrients and sunlight, and others less, that is just life. So get used to it.

tellyontellyon said:

Maybe Karma can create a situation where some people are born rich and others poor. I'm not sure that that means that people who are born rich therefore have earned more merit in a previous life.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, it absolutely does.

tellyontellyon said:

Many Tulku's are born into incredibly poor families. Perhaps 'wealth' can mean something different to filthy lucre?

Malcolm wrote:

Having a high Tulku in a poor family is a sure fire way for that family to gain wealth and prestige. Such families are treated like the nouveau riche are treated in the West however.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 28th, 2014 at 8:12 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

Geez Malcolm, that is the most Hindu sounding view of karma I have heard for a long time. Next you'll be arguing in support of the caste system.

Malcolm wrote:

Not at all, karma is unerring. This is the Buddha's teaching.

Sherab Dorje said:

I agree that karma is unerring and that the situations that individuals find themselves in are due to their karma. But that does not mean they have to remain trapped there. That does not mean they cannot work to change their situations either individually or through collective effort. But that does not mean they have to remain trapped there. That does not mean they cannot work to change their situations either individually or through collective effort.

Malcolm wrote:

And I never maintained that they should not try and improve their situation. Of course they should, and will. That is what all sentient beings do constantly, i.e. try and improve their situation. They are merely held back by three mental non-virtues, malice, greed, and wrong view and so their attempts, in the end, always, always fail.

Sherab Dorje said:

Feudalism was overthrown. English imperialism was overcome. Capitalist exploitation will become a thing of the past. Etc... There is present karma too.

Malcolm wrote:

Feudalism (a wholly inaccurate historical construct) never existed. The English empire was not overcome, it was bequeathed to the United States after two dreadful wars that managed to ruin its economy.

It is always a desiderata when any exploitation becomes a thing of the past, whether it is exploitation by capitalists, communists, fascists, racists and other kind of "ist" you can imagine. This does not mean that markets can be abolished (they can't), and that people should not be free to sell their goods or their labor to the person or company that will pay them the most for it. When you "abolish" open (rather than free, since there is also no such a thing as a "free" market) markets, you create the conditions for black markets, where indeed the likelihood of criminal participation is elevated, for example, the Prohibition in the United States. It is also true that some kinds of goods are deemed criminal, such as heroin, etc., and some kinds of labor are deemed criminal, such as protection rackets.

Therefore, markets require regulation, and that is the principle economic role of a government. That so much wealth is concentrated into the hands of so few at this juncture in history represents a fundamental failure of market regulation brought about by the "liberalization" of the world economy which represents a failure on the part of the various governments in the world to understand the proper role of regulation in the market place, so that open markets can function healthily. Markets cannot regulate themselves. They need a stern hand to guide them.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 28th, 2014 at 6:18 AM

Title: Re: "the Self is real" according to T. Page

Content:

Tsongkhapa said:

Matter cannot be found in dreams either, but it exists and functions. Our perceiving it and its functioning is not a wrong awareness.

Malcolm wrote:

No, the matter which appears in a dream is recognized to be unreal. Do you call that which is recognized to be unreal something that exists. I don't.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 28th, 2014 at 5:51 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

Geez Malcolm, that is the most Hindu sounding view of karma I have heard for a long time. Next you'll be arguing in support of the caste system.

Malcolm wrote:

Not at all, karma is unerring. This is the Buddha's teaching.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 28th, 2014 at 5:50 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Of course, I am not Buddhist so I cannot predict anything,

Should be:

Of course, I am not Buddha so I cannot predict anything,

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 28th, 2014 at 4:42 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

Was the struggle to end apartheid "forcing people to be virtuous".

Malcolm wrote:

No, because, having been to South Africa myself, I can tell you that people are just as non-virtuous as they were before, and apart from a rising black middle class, the apartheid system still exists more or less as before, with the main difference being that most of the cops are black, as is the government.

Johnny Dangerous said:

and if not, and you consider it positive, how do you categorically differentiate something like that from any attempt to change the economic system, revolutionary or otherwise? is it just the violence, and idea of taking by force that makes something a wrong headed attempt to make people be virtuous?

Malcolm wrote:

People are free do what they like and most people are ignorant of karma in any case, they don't believe in it. We don't accept fate in Buddhadharma any more than we do God as an explanation for the state of things. But we do accept karma as an explanation for the state of things, both individually as well as collectively (aggregated individual action). The Buddha makes it exceedingly clear that all who engage in any sort of lethal violence will experience negative results in both this life and in future lives.

All political discussion by so called Buddhists must have the view of karma in mind.

Johnny Dangerous said:

I am detecting a hint here that a belief in karma negates the possibility of trying to create a world of with more just conditions at all, albeit impermanent ones;)

Malcolm wrote:

Well, you can try, but then more unjust situations will replace the one you have solved. I am not saying "don't try", I am saying that we need to understand the limitations of being sentient beings in samsara.

Not all persons are Buddhists, and not even Buddhists act carefully with respect to karma, as we can see in Burma, Shri Lanka and elsewhere.

We can also be confident that all unjust actions will be met with karmic ripening for the perpetrators of those actions. As long as people engage in the activities motivated by the three or five afflictions there will be injustice and inequality in the world. However, you cannot remove the root of negative karma, malice, covetousness and ignorance, from people minds with a scalpel.

But what you can do is act more justly with people around you. You can act kindly, you can exemplify the virtues of our practice. But you cannot change others to your liking, and more importantly, it is very difficult to change samsara. And in particular I am saying that trying to bring the edifice of the capitalist economy crashing down artificially will merely result in more negative karma for the people who engineer it because if you think there is suffering now, you haven't seen anything.

Johnny Dangerous said:

if you aren't saying this in any way, sorry for misinterpreting you..this is why i'm asking for specifics regarding the difference between forcing people to be virtuous, and creating the conditions for people to be virtuous - from a Buddhist standpoint. I think one can see that today, in terms of our society, we are in a place that does not promote people being virtuous with their wealth..so i'm asking, again from a Buddhist standpoint, should that be entirely left alone - is that your position, or are you saying something else?

Malcolm wrote:

We do not have a Buddhist king who can advise people wisely. And I personally do not want a Socialist dictatorship directing my life. Perhaps it is because I am an American, and we Americans in general are pretty much historically opposed to Communism. Indeed, even when Socialism was popular in the US, it was popular mainly among first generations immigrants at the end of the 19th century and the beginning of the 20th, not amongst those who had been born and bred here, and for the most part, second generation immigrants, horrified by the excesses of Stalin, eschewed it.

The anti-facist Socialist idealism of the thirties in in the US pretty much died when we understood that there is structurally no difference between Marxist-Leninist Socialism and Fascism in terms of outcomes, both have planned economies, both use secret police to terrorize dissent, etc.

85 people may own 1/2 the worlds wealth, but so what? They will die, inheritance taxes will be applied, this state of affairs is very impermanent. All we need to worried about is that our own wealth is gotten virtuously, without stealing it from another.

And we need to understand that in general we cannot change the disparities between people since people have their own karma. This is the reason for example that Buddha did not give his golden alms bowl to a poor family living by a river because he saw that due to their latent afflictions they would all take rebirth in lower realms as a result of such a sudden influx of wealth. Of course, I am not Buddhist so I cannot predict anything, so I have no idea what would happen of 1/2 the world's wealth was suddenly "redistributed". But who would adjudicate it to make it fair?

You see, this is all just a bunch of proliferation.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 28th, 2014 at 3:46 AM

Title: Re: "the Self is real" according to T. Page

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Correction, these Gelugpa teachings do not do. Since the reality of matter, etc., cannot be established other than conventionally, what is the use of defending their reality at all? The Gelugpas tie themselves into knots and wind up becoming quasi realists.

Tsongkhapafan said:

No, there's no problem from a Gelugpa point of view. Form is empty of inherent existence, not empty of itself, otherwise it wouldn't exist at all - where's the problem with that?

Malcolm wrote:

Well, it is because also the existence of matter cannot be found.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 28th, 2014 at 2:22 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

He would explain it as karma.

Johnny Dangerous said:

Sure, but this does not mean he would condone a system that encourages people who have accrued such merit to work mainly in their own self-interest, and thereby exhaust their positive merit while amassing stores of demerit.

Malcolm wrote:

One cannot force people to be virtuous.

HHDL has in fact spoken often about the bad repercussions of a world full of the super-rich, and the super poor - as i'm sure you know.

Johnny Dangerous said:

I'm staying out of the greater conversation re: Marxism etc., but I feel like you are being a bit cloudy by implying (far as I can tell) that something being acknowledged as a result of Karma means that no one should do anything.

Malcolm wrote:

I am trying to point out that these various political theories of the left are not panaceas for the excesses of right.

First of, while people pair off communism and capitalism, Zhen Li was quite right in pointing out that there is no "Capitalism" per se, it is not a political ideology, unlike Communism.

Johnny Dangerous said:

I was just listening to an audiobook with Dzigar Kongtrul Rinpoche and Pema Chodron where this very subject is brought up, and the Civil Rights movement was used as a specific example of people changing their Karmic circumstances in a positive way, that was beneficial to many.

Malcolm wrote:

Sure, this can happen, but you must bear in mind that all positive, negative and neutral sensations in samsara are a result of karma.

Johnny Dangerous said:

just pointing out that something being a result of Karma in no way limits acting to change it in a positive manner

Malcolm wrote:

And I never made such a claim to the contrary, had you read the thread more closely.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 28th, 2014 at 1:46 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

You see, Buddha wanted people to become wealthy.

I don't think he was saying that in the sense of the sort of wealth I'm talking about, i.e. 85 individuals having as much wealth between them as the poorest 50 percent of the worlds population.

Malcolm wrote:

He would explain it as karma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 28th, 2014 at 1:45 AM

Title: Re: "the Self is real" according to T. Page

Content:

Sherab said:

If you read my post carefully, you will notice that I am not saying that emptiness or suchness is conditioned. I am merely pointing out the consequence of saying that emptiness is also empty.

PadmaVonSamba said:

To quote HHDL from that same book:

"...We should not, however, understand this self-emptiness or emptiness of self-nature to mean that form is empty of itself; this would be tantamount to denying the reality of form, which, as I have been repeatedly emphasizing, these teachings do not do."

.

.

.

Malcolm wrote:

Correction, these Gelugpa teachings do not do. Since the reality of matter, etc., cannot be established other than conventionally, what is the use of defending their reality at all? The Gelugpas tie themselves into knots and wind up becoming quasi realists.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 28th, 2014 at 1:43 AM

Title: Re: "the Self is real" according to T. Page

Content:

Sherab said:

Actually, my quarrel is with the application of mutually exclusive terms of conditioned and unconditioned to describe one and the same thing because it creates confusion.

Malcolm wrote:

Take it up with the Buddha.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 27th, 2014 at 10:21 PM

Title: Re: "the Self is real" according to T. Page

Content:

Sherab said:

When I was with the Gelugpas, I hear the phrase emptiness of emptiness quite a lot. To me, if one says that emptiness is also empty, one is actually saying that emptiness is conditioned and not unconditioned. I am not sure if the Gelugpas realize that though.

Malcolm wrote:

To say that emptiness is empty is to merely say that emptiness does not arise, not that emptiness is conditioned. If emptiness is conditioned, so is suchness. This kind of reasoning will cause all the Buddhas and bodhisattvas to turn their backs to one.

Sherab said:

If you read my post carefully, you will notice that I am not saying that emptiness or suchness is conditioned. I am merely pointing out the consequence of saying that emptiness is also empty.

As an aside, to say that Buddhas and bodhisattvas turning their backs to one just because of a logical argument is to belittle their compassion and patience isn't it? I for one would not have respect nor have confidence in such buddhas and bodhisattvas.

Malcolm wrote:

Its figurative, it means if you explain the Dharma poorly, without recourse to citation and reasoning, without understanding how to apply this argument this tenet system and that one to that one, one is committing an error of leading others astray. Buddhas and bodhisattvas won't condone such actions. It does not mean that will abandon you in samsara.

As I pointed out, your arguments are fundamentally an argument from substantialist reasoning whereby the conditioned must be one thing, and the unconditioned another. I have already removed those qualms.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 27th, 2014 at 10:13 PM

Title: Re: "the Self is real" according to T. Page

Content:

Sherab said:

A thing and its nature are not separate. Saying a thing arises is not different from saying the nature of the thing arises. It has to be if inseparability is to make any sense. Therefore when a thing arises, its emptiness arises with it. When a thing ceases, the emptiness of that thing ceases because there is no emptiness of that thing to point to. So there is actually no two arisings as you have asserted. There is only one arising of the phenomenon and its nature and there is only one ceasing of the phenomenon and its nature.

Malcolm wrote:

Indeed, from the perspective of Madhyamaka a thing and its nature are identical. This is not so for those in lower schools.

To elaborate, conditions are merely an appearance. The notion of conditioned and unconditioned arises out of the substantialist roots of the substantialist tenet systems. By showing that the essence of phenomena is unconditioned, you are essentially showing that phenomena are in truth unconditioned. This is why the Prajñāpāramitā makes statements like:

Any teaching by the Bhagavan that matter lacks inherent existence, does not arise, does not cease, is peace from the beginning and is parinirvana by nature, all such teaching are not the indirect meaning, nor the intentional meaning, but must be understood literally. (Ārya-pañcaśatikā-prajñāpāramitā)

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 27th, 2014 at 9:27 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

Zhen Li said:

It's pretty clear that Marx's opposition to capitalism didn't come from pure reason, it came from his emotional hatred of money and Jews.

Malcolm wrote:

People often hate what they don't have. But I thought Marx was himself Jewish.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 27th, 2014 at 9:22 PM

Title: Re: "the Self is real" according to T. Page

Content:

Sherab said:

But, if you then defined emptiness as being unconditioned and say that phenomenon A, which dependently arisen, is therefore conditioned, and is also unconditioned because it is empty, an inherent contradiction in terms between conditioned and unconditioned is introduced.

I hope it is now clearer where I am coming from.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, it was understood from the beginning where your qualm was coming from. It's only a contradiction in terms for substantialists.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 27th, 2014 at 9:07 PM

Title: Re: "the Self is real" according to T. Page

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The mind essence is like space, it does not arise.

theanarchist said:

Not so sure if modern astrophysics agrees with that claim about space.

Malcolm wrote:

There are two kinds of space detailed in Buddhist texts, unconditioned space, which is what is meant by the above, the absence of obstruction, and conditioned space, i.e., cavities and dimensionality.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 27th, 2014 at 8:57 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

What you are arguing is that the world the Buddha was talking about, and the way profit was made in the Buddha's time is fundamentally the same. I am saying it is not. That is why I posted those quotes about the capitalist means of production a few posts back.

.

Malcolm wrote:

Sure it was, there were factories, there were owners, there were workers, and there was profit.

The wise and virtuous shine like a blazing fire.
He who acquires his wealth in harmless ways like to a bee that honey gathers,[6] riches mount up for him like ant hill's rapid growth.

With wealth acquired this way,
a layman fit for household life,
in portions four divides his wealth:
thus will he friendship win.

One portion for his wants he uses,[7] two portions on his business spends, the fourth for times of need he keeps.

<http://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/dn/dn.31.0.nara.html>

You see, Buddha wanted people to become wealthy. There are many places in the sutras where he gives recommendations for how laypeople may virtuously maximize their wealth. We have already established too that one's social position depends on one's karma, and therefore, one access to initial wealth and opportunity. Of course, we must try our best to extend opportunity to everyone. The construction of schools, hospitals, roads, etc., these things are costs society must bear for everyone's benefit. But it is impossible to provide everyone with the exact same economic parity. Some people are lazier than others. Some people are more talented than others. Some people are more industrious than others because of their karmic dispositions. In reality, social classes tend to be driven by the five afflictions: the lower classes tend to be dominated by ignorance and desire, the middle classes tend to be dominated by desire and jealousy and the upper classes tend to be dominated by anger and pride (which is one reason why those from the upper classes tend to more easily fall into lower realms).

You cannot regulate how people accumulate karma, and cannot fix people's karma by regulating society.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 27th, 2014 at 8:17 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

In the modern world, the 85 richest people on the planet have accumulated as much wealth between them as half of the world's total population. I'm sure things were different in the Buddha's day.

Malcolm wrote:

Not really. Why? Because some people have the karma to become super wealthy and others do not. Rather than bitching about the super wealthy, attend to your own causes of merit.

When contrasted with the endowments of the beings of the deva realms, for example, all the wealth of the earth is just a pauper's bauble, the richest person is less than a beggar.

But since you do not seem to have a view that takes into consideration the six realms of samsara, you are myopically focused on this human life and its endowments, focused on material relations rather than Dharma practice. The ability to practice Dharma is the true wealth of Jambudvipa. If you want to help beings in a concrete way, it is better to spread Dharma than things.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 27th, 2014 at 8:14 PM

Title: Re: "the Self is real" according to T. Page

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

If Mind's original nature is also composite, as your statement, "Nothing exists that does not arise from conditions" implies, then it also cannot be the source of the perfect cessation of suffering.
How does that work for you?

Malcolm wrote:

The mind essence is like space, it does not arise, so it cannot be counted as an existent.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 27th, 2014 at 8:11 PM

Title: Re: "the Self is real" according to T. Page

Content:

Sherab said:

When I was with the Gelugpas, I hear the phrase emptiness of emptiness quite a lot. To me, if one says that emptiness is also empty, one is actually saying that emptiness is conditioned and not unconditioned. I am not sure if the Gelugpas realize that though.

Malcolm wrote:

To say that emptiness is empty is to merely say that emptiness does not arise, not that emptiness is conditioned. If emptiness is conditioned, so is suchness. This kind of reasoning will cause all the Buddhas and bodhisattvas to turn their backs to one.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 27th, 2014 at 8:09 PM

Title: Re: "the Self is real" according to T. Page

Content:

Sherab said:

So what is the meaning then of "whatever arises in dependence, that in truth does not arise"?

Malcolm wrote:

It means simply that when you examine dependently originated phenomena you cannot ascertain that they ever arose. A phenomena that never arose is defined as "unconditioned", for example, space, which is the primary metaphor used to describe the actual nature of things. Thus, when we examine phenomena for essences we cannot find one, because phenomena do not arise by virtue of an essence, they in fact, or in truth, never arise. This is what it means to say that conditioned phenomena possess an unconditioned nature, no more and no less.

If conditioned phenomena possessed a conditioned nature, that nature would also have to arise, leading to dual arising for same phenomena, which is absurd. However, since conditioned phenomena possess an unconditioned nature their arising is only apparent, not actual, merely conventional, similar with an illusion, etc. This covers all qualms you may have.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 27th, 2014 at 4:59 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

Under REAL socialism, production is for need, and doesn't need to be profitable.

Malcolm wrote:

Under Marxist socialism, all factors of life would be centralized and planned.

I simply don't agree with that model of politics and I never will.

I don't want to wear the same uniform you are wearing, the same clothes, shoes, etc. That is the consequence of "production out of the need" in a large industrial society.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 27th, 2014 at 4:50 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Of course it is, since it comes with a sense "me and mine", i.e. "I have the right to use this place, you do not".

Sherab Dorje said:

Nope, it is not the same as ownership. Simple example: when you rent a car you have rights over its use, do you own it? No. Now a rented car belongs to somebody, but the land, it did not belong to somebody. It did not belong to everybody either.

Malcolm wrote:

False, like an apartment you have signed a contract to own the car for a period, with all responsibilities that ownership entails.

Sherab Dorje said:

Necessarily, otherwise it would require "oppressive social/political and economic models". BTW, I am not suggesting that we can reduce the population by any moral means, merely that population reduction is a desiderata. This is a key point of the Deep Ecology platform.

Deep Ecologist were being accused of Malthusian misanthropy since the inception of the particular ideology.

Malcolm wrote:

Malthus is unfairly accused of Misanthropy. He was not a misanthrope, he was a pessimist.

Sherab Dorje said:

A subsistence economy, or steady state economy, can contain all forms of technological production, doing so with respect to environmental impacts, but only if human populations never exceed 100,000,000.

Who comes up with this magical number?

Malcolm wrote:

Arne Naess.

Sherab Dorje said:

Again, total nonsense. All economies function by producing surplus value...

While it is true that, historically, they try to, it is not a necessary function of an economy.

Malcolm wrote:

It is simply true that they do, and always have, and always will.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 27th, 2014 at 2:08 AM

Title: Re: "the Self is real" according to T. Page

Content:

Tom said:

Are you suggesting Jay asserts dependent origination from an ultimate stand point? I'm just not sure how you are using ultimate analysis here?

Malcolm wrote:

I do not think that is what Jay is saying. Jay and I have a disagreement over what constitutes a "satya". I maintain that as a satya is an object of cognition, what is important is whether the cognition is veridical or non-veridical. But Jay asserts that the object (veridical or non-veridical) is what is important, and thus, he concludes, wrongly in my estimation, that there is no ultimate truth, or as you have stated, that the ultimate is that there is no ultimate truth.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 27th, 2014 at 2:02 AM

Title: Re: "the Self is real" according to T. Page

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

Yes, that is very nice.

but what is your opinion?

Do you think anything arises which is not a composite?

and do you regard space as a phenomenon or as something that phenomena arise in, or both?

.
.
.

Malcolm wrote:

My opinion is stated in the quote.

Space is a phenomena. It is an unconditioned phenomena therefore it does not arise. It is actually merely nonobstruction.

Nothing arises which does not arise from conditions. Nothing exists that does not arise from conditions. Space is in fact a non-existent.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 27th, 2014 at 1:05 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

Unknown said:

The (collectively arrived at) right to use is not the same thing as ownership.

Malcolm wrote:

Of course it is, since it comes with a sense "me and mine", i.e. "I have the right to use this place, you do not".

Unknown said:

Not necessarily. I am sure you are aware of countless societies with sustainable human population levels that were based on oppressive social/political and economic models. With current population levels it would require a drastic reduction in the "quality of life" for "first worlders" and a radical shift in ideology praxis. Misanthropism is not a solution.

Malcolm wrote:

Necessarily, otherwise it would require "oppressive social/political and economic models". BTW, I am not suggesting that we can reduce the population by any moral means, merely that population reduction is a desiderata. This is a key point of the Deep Ecology platform. A subsistence economy, or steady state economy, can contain all forms of technological production, doing so with respect to environmental impacts, but only if human populations never exceed 100,000,000. Since world population is slowly crashing anyway, and will crash much more quickly once petroleum resources are no longer practical to extract, we can anticipate this with planning that encompasses centuries, rather than decades, or years.

Unknown said:

Who said that the Buddha was a Marxist/Anarchist? "Surplus value" is theft and cannot be generated without a supporting system of coercion. That is why/how economies are political.

Malcolm wrote:

Again, total nonsense. All economies function by producing surplus value, the difference is that Communism and Capitalism both regard the non-productive destruction of surplus value as immoral. They both destroy surplus value productively using different ideologies. But all economies produce surplus value, even natural communities generate surplus value until their resources are exhausted, then they die back. This is very different from your admired primitive societies, and festival societies (like old Tibet) where the non-productive destruction of surplus value was regarded as desiderata (the potlach, gilding stupas, etc.).

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 27th, 2014 at 12:45 AM

Title: Re: "the Self is real" according to T. Page

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, for example, true existents.

PadmaVonSamba said:

Do you regard space as a true existent?

Hmmmm....come to think of it, do you regard anything at all as a true existent?

Do you assert that "true existent" is an impossibility?

Malcolm wrote:

Sentient beings are not bound by anything.

If one recognizes that true existence is inherently nonexistent, taints are purified intrinsically,

like muddy water self-purifying.

All phenomena are the same in lacking inherent existence.

-- The String of Pearls Tantra

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 27th, 2014 at 12:42 AM

Title: Re: "the Self is real" according to T. Page

Content:

theanarchist said:

Cough cough... Rabbit horns..

Malcolm wrote:

Āryāṣṭasāhasrikāprajñāpāramitāpañjikāsāroṭṭamā:

All phenomena do not arise, that is the non-existence of the inherent existence of all phenomena, therefore, that absence of arising is like the horns of a rabbit.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 26th, 2014 at 10:38 PM

Title: Re: "the Self is real" according to T. Page

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

"For those whom emptiness is possible, everything is possible, for those whom emptiness is not possible, nothing is possible"

PadmaVonSamba said:

Everything can't be possible, because if everything were possible, then it would also be possible for some things not to be possible.

.
.
.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, for example, true existents.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 26th, 2014 at 9:13 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

BTW one of the twenty or so capitalist powers that was viciously and ruthlessly intervening in Russia at that time was your country, the USA. The USA can be ruthless, but the Bolshevik supporters are condemned for being ruthless in response?

Malcolm wrote:

While it is true that the US covertly funded opposition to the Bolsheviks, whom the Americans regarded as being under the control of and rightly so, our military presence in Russia was confined to fighting Cossacks along the trans-Siberian railway.

Anyway, you need to read this, it provides a clear account of our military presence in Russia:

<https://www.archives.gov/publications/prologue/2002/winter/us-army-in-russia-1.html>

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 26th, 2014 at 8:59 PM

Title: Re: "the Self is real" according to T. Page

Content:

Sherab said:

[

Merely saying that emptiness is defined as unconditioned does not address my question, which was how is it possible to have a thing that is both conditioned and unconditioned at the same time. Perhaps, you are saying it is possible as long as it is defined as possible.

Malcolm wrote:

"For those whom emptiness is possible, everything is possible, for those whom emptiness is not possible, nothing is possible"

If emptiness is a synonym for dependent arising, that would imply that dependent arising is unconditioned. Or to put it more starkly, it would mean that dependent arising does not arise dependently.

There is no entity "dependent arising", there are only phenomena that arise in dependence. Space, the two cessations and emptiness do not arise at all, so they are by definition phenomena that do not arise in dependence. Of course, this does not mean that they are not relative, for both conditioned and unconditioned phenomena are relative. Since both conditioned and unconditioned phenomena are relative, their relationship is strictly a matter of definition.

As for dependently originated phenomena being unconditioned, the Prajñāpāramitā states "Whatever arises in dependence, that in truth does not arise". The argument can be made that even so called dependently originated phenomena are unconditioned in reality, since their production cannot be ascertained at all when subjected to ultimate analysis. Again in this respect there is no contradiction between a conventionally conditioned entity having a conventionally unconditioned nature since in reality both are merely conventions. While the former bears the latter as its nature, in reality neither the former nor the latter can stand up to ultimate analysis. In other words there are no phenomena at all that can stand up to ultimate analysis.

Yes, unconditioned things can be truly existents or false existents that are not dependently arisen. But unconditioned things cannot include false existents that are dependently arisen, don't you agree?

Of course I do not agree: for example, space, an unconditioned phenomena, permeates all conditioned phenomena, and neither obstructs conditioned phenomena nor is obstructed by them. Emptiness, another unconditioned phenomena, likewise permeates all conditioned phenomena, neither obstructing them nor being obstructed by them.

It is precisely because of such contradictions that Garfield and Priest were forced to conclude from their study of Nagarjuna that ultimately there is no ultimate and that dependent arising is all there is.

Jay Garfield is a lovely guy, and an excellent analytical philosopher (he is a professor in the Philosophy Department at Smith college, along with my father (now retired)), however, he is wrong in so far that there isn't even dependent origination in the ultimate analysis.

Again, I don't think that giving a definition as an answer will resolve the logical contradiction that my question raises.

Your question presumes an entity/entity relationship, therefore your very question is flawed. Emptiness is not an entity, neither are phenomena, other than conventionally.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 26th, 2014 at 8:39 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

M:

I am telling you, all this Anarchist and Marxist thinking just does not fly when you view the world through a Buddhist lens.

...

Capitalism can't fly and we must... MUST find a better way of living on this planet, and of overcoming the coercive stranglehold that capitalists have over our planet.

Malcolm wrote:

As long as human beings are under the sway of the three poisons, for that long there will always be "I and mine".

But to be frank, TOTO, I would never want any state telling me how I can best live my life, how my labor is best disposed of. I prefer all the uncertainty under this capitalist system to a certain dreary gray totalitarian future under Communism. You may want to be a zek, but I sure don't.

tellyontellyon said:

You would need a powerful state to maintain any dictatorship.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, which is why the dictatorship of the proletariat is envisioned as being so ruthless.

tellyontellyon said:

Whatever you think the solution might look like, the capitalist mode of production is standing in the way of it.

Malcolm wrote:

The capitalist mode of production is not the problem, according to you Marxists. The problem, according to you, is who owns that means of production.

The only political theories out there that actually call into question the validity of the capitalist mode of production itself, as opposed to the question of ownership of that means of production are certain strains of anarchist thinking, Bookchin's Communalism and Deep Ecology.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 26th, 2014 at 10:31 AM

Title: Re: Western geshe and khenpos

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

because his views came under such harsh criticism from Sakya scholars such as Gorampa.

Konchog1 said:

Such as?

Malcolm wrote:

Gorampa, in his commentary on the Madhyamakāvatara lists over a hundred points where he thinks Tsongkhapa erred.

The standard summary of Gorampa's critiques of Tsongkhapa are to found in his famous "Differentiation of Views".

Thus far, Gorampa's views have not been effectively countered by any Gelug scholar I know as they generally refuse to read Gorampa.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 26th, 2014 at 10:26 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

Zhen Li said:

I did address the claim in other posts, since it comes up a lot. I'll be to the point here:

Nozick is an outlier in libertarianism, the mainstream is probably better defined by Rothbard's Ethics of Liberty (and some Rand), in that he rejects the natural inalienable rights accepted by the American Revolutionaries. This sits better with me, since I think that the main weakness of libertarianism is that people overlook the obvious theological roots of Lockean rights. It's all protestant drivel to me. However, I do not understand why you still place me in the same camp as Nozick, since fundamentally he agrees with mainstream libertarians in believing that the solution is "limited government." After what I have written, I think it is clear that I think this notion is absurd. Government can't be limited by itself, and if it's limited by something higher, then it's not a government in my use of the word.

Malcolm wrote:

I take it back.

As for Nozick, as far as I can tell, in his ASU he is making a moral argument, not a practical one. For him the state is only valid in so far as it has a monopoly on violence. When it exceeds its responsibilities in this respect, it begins to engage in immoral redistribution which people's rights.

He merely takes the Lockean state of nature as preferable to the Hobbsian one.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 26th, 2014 at 10:08 AM

Title: Re: "the Self is real" according to T. Page

Content:

greentara said:

Right meditation...

Malcolm wrote:

...follows right view, that is why right view is listed first in the eightfold path of nobles.

theanarchist said:

I doubt that anyone can have a truly right view without a direct experience of emptiness nature.

Malcolm wrote:

There are two kinds of right view: mundane and supra mundane. One uses the former to realize the latter.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 26th, 2014 at 10:06 AM

Title: Re: "the Self is real" according to T. Page

Content:

Sherab said:

So it is possible for an conditioned thing to be unconditioned? If so, then are you not essentially implying that the thing is one thing and the nature of the thing is another thing?

Malcolm wrote:

Emptiness by definition is unconditioned. In Mahāyāna, space, the two cessations and emptiness are all defined as unconditioned.

This is a contradiction, something truly existent can have no relative modes at all because a true existent, be unconditioned and uncaused, cannot express itself as a causal process.

A true existent is unconditioned as you have stated above and cannot express itself as a causal process. Yet if you say that dharmin and dharmata are inseparable, then you are saying that the nature of an unconditioned thing can be in a thing that is a casual process or the result of a causal process.

The four unconditioned phenomena defined by Mahāyāna are all empty. This is why one of the 18 emptinesses illustrated by Candrakīrti is called the emptiness of the unconditioned.

All proposed true existents are unconditioned, but not all unconditioned phenomena are true existents (such as space, the two cessations and emptiness). Therefore, in this respect, since dharmatā refers to the nature of things, which is their emptiness, dharmatā and dharmin are inseparable, yet one is unconditioned and the other, conditioned. I.e. the emptiness of things is not created, and is not subject to decay. It does not arise because things arise, and does not disappear because things disappear. Everything is empty, and that is not something subject to conditions. Therefore, emptiness is not subject to conditions.

Further, if emptiness, which is by definition unconditioned, were to be different than that conditioned thing it is the emptiness of, the thing would not be empty and the emptiness itself would not be an emptiness.

Further, emptiness is not a true existent for it itself is also empty.

If emptiness is not a true existent, then it cannot be unconditioned. Yet you have said earlier that clarity is conditioned and emptiness is unconditioned and are inseparable. Obviously it can, since emptiness in Mahāyana is not only defined as empty (cf the emptiness of emptiness), but also as unconditioned.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 26th, 2014 at 8:08 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

Zhen Li said:

By proposing basic responsibility that the Buddha advocates, in this thread I have already been called a libertarian and conservative many times. I have even been called a jingoistic American exceptionalist. It's really laughable how quickly the blind see devils.

Malcolm wrote:

You are a libertarian and a conservative. I would be surprised if you had any serious disagreements with Nozick, for example.

These days, however, most people gloss neo-conservative as "conservative", which is of course a mistake.

We can't call you a "jingoistic American exceptionalist" because you're Canadian.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 26th, 2014 at 8:03 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

Zhen Li said:

I really can't see why people don't see the basic principle of the fact that communism (and anarcho-communism), imply immorality from the Buddhist perspective. People need to stop being blinded in the first place by ideology, and question every belief they have from first principles.

Malcolm wrote:

Probably because most people in the West come to their political views fairly early in life, and Buddhism only later. Especially leftists have a bit of retrofitting to force Buddhism into a leftist model.

This is why I am an advocate of deep ecology. Deep ecology does not require any retooling to fit with Dharma. It just requires an extension of rights to the biosphere as a whole, with the corresponding consequences of that, i.e. maintaining world population at levels that do not exceed the "income of the household" (impractical, I know, just saying).

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 26th, 2014 at 7:53 AM

Title: Re: Western geshe and khenpos

Content:

smcj said:

[

Very common.

Malcolm wrote:

Yup, as time grew on later Gelugpas needed to cover up the fact that Tsongkhapa started out as a Sakyapa because his views came under such harsh criticism from Sakya scholars such as Gorampa. But you must remember, Tsongkhapa's main Guru was Rendawa Zhonnu Lodo.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 26th, 2014 at 7:38 AM

Title: Re: "the Self is real" according to T. Page

Content:

smcj said:

The unenumerated ultimate is simply the direct perception of emptiness

Hmmm. You're sounding very Yogacaric there (using the Mind Only definition).

Malcolm wrote:

This is straight out of "Prasanga" Madhyamaka texts. No Yogacara here.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 26th, 2014 at 7:33 AM

Title: Re: Western geshe and khenpos

Content:

Tom said:

I think the Kadampa masters first used the title Geshe. It seems that Bon teachers also use the title Geshe. Does anyone know if that has a long tradition? And are there any Western Bon pa Geshe?

smcj said:

Gelupas are the descendants of the Kadampas. Same DNA with a bit of Kagyu and Sakya thrown in.

Malcolm wrote:

This is a common myth. The historical facts are however that Tsongkhapa was Sakyapa originally, studied at Sakya, and refers to himself as a Sakyapa in some early commentaries. Further, his two main students were Sakyapas. It is indeed true that since his first master was a Kadampa Geshe, he always maintain an obvious affection for Lam rim, but in his training he was a Sakyapa. Most of the transmissions in Gelug come through Sakya because it is a little know fact that the Sakyapas were and still are the richest school in terms of total number of gsar ma tantric lineages from India. Probably because they were among the wealthiest religious families in Tsang. The Kagyu sngags mdzod is quite small when compared to the rgyud sde kun bdus.

Initially, Gelug was called Sakya gsar ma, i.e. new Sakyapas, until it was renamed Ganden pa after Tsongkhapa's monastery in Lhasa. "dge lugs" is a corruption of i.e. dga' lugs, short for dga' ldan pa'i lugs, i.e. "the school of the dga' ldan pas." The proper name for the Gelug school is actually "Ri bo dga' ldan pas", those of Tushita Mountain.

It is also true that Tsongkhapa received important transmissions from Drikung as well.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 26th, 2014 at 7:13 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

Zhen Li said:

This is central to one's ontological experience of the world. Every sensation gives rise to a feeling.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, either pleasurable (profitable), painful (unprofitable) or neutral (tending toward unprofitable).

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 26th, 2014 at 6:33 AM

Title: Re: "the Self is real" according to T. Page

Content:

greentara said:

Right meditation...

Malcolm wrote:

...follows right view, that is why right view is listed first in the eightfold path of nobles.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 26th, 2014 at 6:30 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

No, all human beings have notions of ownership, they simply are alien or do not correspond to the current Roman property law concepts of ownership that are actually at the root of the property law system which generally dominates capitalist countries. These societies generally instead have/had the concept of "right of use" (usufruct) for example, East Coast Native Americans in the Continental US, i.e. they would negotiate with each other about who would own the right to use this or that fishing ground, hunting territory and so on. It is true that ownership of these rights were very plastic, and could easily change since they were not tied to "property" as we understand the term, but also wars were waged when one tribe felt another tribe was violating their rights of use.

Sherab Dorje said:

You go from saying that all human beings have the notion of ownership to giving an example where human beings functioned without the notion of ownership.

Malcolm wrote:

No so, ownership of a usufruct right is ownership, plain and simple. I assume here you are excluding clothes, weapons, horses and so on from your definition of "no ownership".

Sherab Dorje said:

...but only if there is a grand catastrophe involving a shocking reduction of population to levels that were current at the beginning of the agricultural epoch.

Not at all necessary. It would, though, require a radical shift in ideology/praxis.

Malcolm wrote:

Necessarily.

Sherab Dorje said:

Merit arises from positive acts not because one wants to benefit from (capitalise on) the action but because wholesome actions bring wholesome outcomes.

Malcolm wrote:

Merit arises from positive intentions, which can include positive benefits for oneself.

Sherab Dorje said:

It has NOTHING to do with exchange (though it is true that some people think it does). The benefits arising from an act of (seeming) generosity (for example) can be reduced to zero if one's motivation behind an apparently generous act is just to gain merit.

Malcolm wrote:

No, that is not true, but what is true that in Mahāyāna parlance, that merit can be exhausted, as opposed to the merit created by an objectless dedication, which is inexhaustible. There is no comparable notion in Nikāya Buddhism.

Sherab Dorje said:

In marketplace transactions, on the other hand, deception can (and normally does) bring profit since selling an item for more than its production value is essentially theft via deception.

Malcolm wrote:

Total nonsense. Even Buddha encouraged his lay disciples to invest and make profits on their labor, so you just accused Buddha of encouraging theft.

I am telling you, all this Anarchist and Marxist thinking just does not fly when you view the world through a Buddhist lens.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 26th, 2014 at 6:22 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

Zhen Li said:

As much as you Buddhist modernists hate to admit it, in Buddhism there is an even greater manifestation of non-tangible exchange in Karma and Merit.

Malcolm wrote:

I wouldn't say that SD is a Buddhist modernist, but his political POV is more in line with the libertarian municipalism of Bookchin.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 26th, 2014 at 6:09 AM

Title: Re: "the Self is real" according to T. Page

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

a true existent, be unconditioned and uncaused, cannot express itself as a causal process.

PadmaVonSamba said:

Are you saying that relative truth does not arise within the context of ultimate truth?

Malcolm wrote:

Ultimate truth and relative truth are respectively the objects of correct and incorrect cognitions of the same thing. For example, take a pot: relative truth is the perception of its color, shape, size, etc. Ultimate truth is the perception of its emptiness, that's all. The ultimate truth of a pot cannot be found apart from the pot. The enumerated ultimate is also a conventional, relative truth. The unenumerated ultimate is simply the direct perception of emptiness. Since the emptiness of one thing is like the emptiness of all things, realizing the emptiness of one thing is realizing the emptiness of all things.

Further, emptiness is not a true existent for it itself is also empty.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 26th, 2014 at 5:54 AM

Title: Re: "the Self is real" according to T. Page

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

And, I would suggest that (what I am calling) "awareness" truly exists which precludes any differentiation, simply because it cannot be denied since it manifests as consciousness, and later, as personal experience.

.

Malcolm wrote:

This is a contradiction, something truly existent can have no relative modes at all because a true existent, be unconditioned and uncaused, cannot express itself as a causal process.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 26th, 2014 at 5:34 AM

Title: Re: "the Self is real" according to T. Page

Content:

smcj said:

If the conversation is about what the broader Karma Kagyu view is, I suggest asking somebody authoritative.

Sherab Dorje said:

And white guys/gals cannot be authoritative? Like, authority comes with skin colour???

smcj said:

Ok, ask a white khenpo. To the best of my knowledge one does not exist.

Malcolm wrote:

That is because to be a Khenpo, you must be a monk. A loppon on the other hand has the same education but is not necessarily a monk.

However, I seem to recall that Karl Brunholz was given the title Khenpo.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 26th, 2014 at 5:33 AM

Title: Re: "the Self is real" according to T. Page

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

What I am suggesting (and perhaps this is merely a suggestion, extrapolated from my vague understanding of dharma, but perhaps, I'll admit, not supported by sutras or tantras) is different from the Hindu or vedic concept, because that "pure, uncaused knower" also arises in it.

.

Malcolm wrote:

Your view here is completely incompatible with any form of Buddhism I have encountered. Buddha rejects this type of ground completely.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 26th, 2014 at 5:16 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

Many societies (both historically and currently) do not have the notion of ownership within their social/political/economic paradigms.

Malcolm wrote:

No, all human beings have notions of ownership, they simply are alien or do not correspond to the current Roman property law concepts of ownership that are actually at the root of the property law system which generally dominates capitalist countries. These societies generally instead have/had the concept of "right of use" (usufruct) for example, East Coast Native Americans in the Continental US, I.e. they would negotiate with each other about who would own the right to use this or that fishing ground, hunting territory and so on. It is true that ownership of these rights were very plastic, and could easily change since they were not tied to "property" as we understand the term, but also wars were waged when one tribe felt another tribe was violating their rights of use.

At base, ownership is a concept that arises from the three afflictions, and more specifically the delusion "I" and "mine", and this is why as long as human beings are driven by afflictions, we always will move from simpler ownership paradigms, such as those of nomadic and semi-nomadic bands (usufruct rights) to the more complicated property-based economics of the grand civilizations of Europe, African, The Americas and Asia. We could conceivably move back to such a notion of usufruct, but only if there is a grand catastrophe involving a shocking reduction of population to levels that were current at the beginning of the agricultural epoch.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 25th, 2014 at 10:11 PM

Title: Re: "the Self is real" according to T. Page

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

I should confess I have not studied Shakya Chogden in detail, and it is generally said that while Shakya Chogden's views are somewhat problematical, he was perhaps the most brilliant philosopher the Sakya school ever produced, apart from Sapan. While I am no Shakya Chogden, one of the things that annoyed people about him is that he changed his views over the years. I do that too.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 25th, 2014 at 9:10 PM

Title: Re: "the Self is real" according to T. Page

Content:

smcj said:

The fact that Khenpo Tsultrim and other modern Karma Kagyu writers use Yogacara=Shentong is painfully confusing the issue though.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, this is because the Sakyapa writer Shakya Chogden, upon whom KTG relies heavily, basically argues that Yogacara is a kind of Madhyamaka, and goes to some lengths to reinterpret Dolbuba's gzhan stong approach so it is less eternalistic.

Shakya Chogden's view would have become the main view of the Sakya school but for a divination that was done in front of Four Faced Mahākala, the protector of the view in Sakya. The mo came out in favor of the treatises of Gorampa, and the latter's Mahdyamaka perspective has been considered orthodox ever since. Indeed, I myself for the most part follow Gorampa's reading of Madhyamaka even still.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 25th, 2014 at 9:05 PM

Title: Re: "the Self is real" according to T. Page

Content:

smcj said:

So, is your awareness undifferentiated or is it individuated, i.e. a personal continuum? If the former, your view is no different than Advaita. If the latter, that is acceptable within Buddhism.

As I read it, the Yogacara/Cittamatra is the latter, and Shentong is the former.

However I must say that this understanding of mine is only a week or so old, so it is subject to change without notice.

The fact that Khenpo Tsultrim and other modern Karma Kagyu writers use Yogacara=Shentong is painfully confusing the issue though.

Malcolm wrote:

No, Yogacara/cittamatra insists forcefully that awareness/consciousness, whatever you want to call it is individuated. There really is no Buddhist school that argues for an uniform uber-consciousness out of which individual consciousness are instantiated.

Basically, folks like Tony Page really are faced two alternatives, either their "true self" is like Purusha of the Sāṃkhya school, a totally unconditioned individuated knower, as opposed to the nonsentient evolutes of prakriti (buddhi, ahaṃkāra, manas, five sense organs, five organs of action, the five subtle elements (sound, etc.) and the five coarse elements; or it is like brahmin of the Vedantins and so on. They really have only these two choices if they insist on a literal interpretation of the term "atman", bdag nyid in texts like the Nirvana Sutra and so on.

In Sāṃkhya there are an infinite number of purushas, while in Advaita, using the basic model of Sāṃkhya, proposes that purusha and brahmin are synonymous and further, that there is only one purusha, and that further, prakriti and its evolutes are also included in purusha.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 25th, 2014 at 7:40 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

Zhen Li said:

While the topic is still fresh, I found this nice quote from the same book about the Trotskyist conception of the state:

To sum up [Trotsky wrote], "the road to Socialism lies through a period of the highest possible intensification of the principle of the State ... The State, before disappearing, assumes the form of the dictatorship of the proletariat, i.e. the most ruthless form of State, which embraces the life of the citizens authoritatively in every direction" ([The Defence of Terrorism] p. 157). It would be difficult indeed to put the matter more plainly. The state of the proletarian dictatorship is depicted by Trotsky as a huge permanent concentration camp in which the government exercises absolute power over every aspect of the citizens' lives and in particular decides how much work they shall do, of what kind and in what places. Individuals are nothing but labour units. Compulsion is universal, and any organization that is not part of the state must be its enemy, thus the enemy of the proletariat. All this, of course, is in the name of an ideal realm of freedom, the advent of which is expected after an indefinite lapse of historical time. (Vol. II pg. 512)

Socialism in general must descend to this ultimately:

Bukharin, like Lenin, regarded the system of basing economic life on mass terror not as a transient necessity but as a permanent principle of socialist organization. He did not shrink from justifying all means of coercion and held, like Trotsky at the same period, that the new system called essentially for the militarization of labour – i.e. the use of police and military force to compel the whole population to work in such places and conditions as the state might arbitrarily decree. Indeed, once the market is abolished there is no longer any free sale of labour or competition between workers, and police coercion is therefore the only means of allocating “human resources”. If hired labour is eliminated, only compulsory labour remains. In other words, socialism – as conceived by both Trotsky and Bukharin at this time – is a permanent, nation-wide labour camp. (Vol III. pg. 28-9)

Malcolm wrote:

Well, this was the state of Tibet until the early 1980's under communist rule, and is the state of North Korea even today.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 25th, 2014 at 7:36 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

Zhen Li said:

Socialism in general must descend to this ultimately:

Bukharin, like Lenin, regarded the system of basing economic life on mass terror not as a transient necessity but as a permanent principle of socialist organization. He did not shrink from justifying all means of coercion and held, like Trotsky at the same period, that the new system called essentially for the militarization of labour – i.e. the use of police and military force to compel the whole population to work in such places and conditions as the state might arbitrarily decree. Indeed, once the market is abolished there is no longer any free sale of labour or competition between workers, and police coercion is therefore the only means of allocating “human resources”. If hired labour is eliminated, only compulsory labour remains. In other words, socialism – as conceived by both Trotsky and Bukharin at this time – is a permanent, nation-wide labour camp. (Vol III. pg. 28-9)

Sherab Dorje said:

Not necessarily, people do have the capacity to share, you know.

Malcolm wrote:

I imagine that under this totalitarian scenario your labor does not belong to you any more, since it has been socialized. Therefore, sharing your now "valueless" labor could be construed as a crime against the state.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 25th, 2014 at 7:34 PM

Title: Re: "the Self is real" according to T. Page

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The latter black gzhan stong is pretty much heterodox from a Buddhist point of view. SOB adheres to the latter.

Sherab Dorje said:

His confessed adherence to a belief in an Atman puts him well outside the ballpark of any kind of Buddhism I have ever encountered.

Malcolm wrote:

His confessed un-nuanced position does. But it is important to recall that terms like bdag nyid chen po [mahātma] etc regularly show up in Tantric texts all the time.

As I read gzhan stong, the emphasis is not on promulgating a belief in an ultimate self, but rather the focus is on proving that ultimate [as opposed to relative] buddha-qualities are innate.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 25th, 2014 at 7:31 PM

Title: Re: "the Self is real" according to T. Page

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, that would be consciousness, no matter what words you want to use, like awareness, etc., it is still consciousness.

So, is your awareness undifferentiated or is it individuated, i.e. a personal continuum? If the former, your view is no different than Advaita. If the latter, that is acceptable within Buddhism.

PadmaVonSamba said:

I regard 'consciousness' as arising from causes...

Also, I am not clear about what you mean by 'undifferentiated'.

Malcolm wrote:

Does "awareness" arise from causes? If it does, how is it different than consciousness? If it does not, how is this different from a number of Hindu positions that maintain the existence of pure, uncaused knower?

Undifferentiated means for example, like an ocean, or SOB's bowl of milk; individuated means like streams or rivers, individual continuums.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 25th, 2014 at 10:11 AM

Title: Re: "the Self is real" according to T. Page

Content:

Sherab said:

No amount of analysis using mutually exclusive terms on one and the same entity can ever hope to come to a sensible conclusion. That is why the Samdhinirmocana sutra practically sneers at the argument and debates among certain people.

Malcolm wrote:

The salient point is that dharmin and dharmatā are inseparable. The nature of conditioned things is unconditioned, that is the entire point.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 25th, 2014 at 9:11 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

I'm not sure that just quoting that one line gives the gist of what is being said so here it is in full

Malcolm wrote:

It explains the basic point that I was making, social class, what kind of family you are born into, is result your past karma.

tellyontellyon said:

We can help people in the here and now, we can actually change our present situation..., and in turn our actions can come back to us as positive karma in the future.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, provided we act with wisdom and in accordance with the Dharma. If we abandon the Dharma by adhering to some non-Buddhist principles, we will come to nothing but grief.

For example, if someone accumulates a great deal of money or property, this is a result of their karma. We can encourage them to use it in a socially responsible way, but if we "liberate" it for the "people", believing that a factory for example "belongs" to its workers, then we will be in for some very heavy negative karma of poverty in our future life. On the other hand, if we believe a factory is engaged in unfair practices, and we picket, and protest, appealing to the government to step in, there is no problem with this. Buddhist Vinaya has long established that in terms of matters of law, the civil law of the country you are in handles civil matters and must be obeyed.

So, I am all for people trying to make the world a better place as long as they do so civilly, non-violently and without engaging in force to achieve their ends. I can understand when people react with extreme violence to heavy oppression, understand it, but this also is really just samsaric behavior. At a certain point in your life, you have to give up attachment to samsara and your own selfish liberation and instead cultivate bodhicitta and a view which is free from grasping.

If you read and follow what is taught in Mahāyāna you will have perfect prescription for how to benefit sentient beings in this life and the next with no need to resort the theories of doctrines of materialists.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 25th, 2014 at 8:49 AM

Title: Re: "the Self is real" according to T. Page

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

... because the mind and the mind essence are inseparable, the former conditioned and the latter unconditioned.

Sherab said:

Since mind and mind essence are inseparable, mind and mind essence cannot be separate entities but merely aspects of the same entity, whatever that is. But if mind and mind essence are aspects of the same entity, whatever that is, then that entity is both conditioned and unconditioned. In other words, that entity is both a dependent-arising phenomenon and a non-dependent-arising phenomenon. That clearly makes no sense without twisting the meaning of dependent-arising so much as to make it completely unrecognizable.

Malcolm wrote:

Ah, well, to understand how this works, you must read the Analysis of how phenomena and their nature are neither the same nor different in the Samdhinirmocana sutra. Then you will understand. Otherwise, you are left with the conclusion that the dharmtā of a given thing is conditioned, i.e. that emptiness is conditioned. But emptiness is clearly unconditioned, nevertheless all conditioned things are empty.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 25th, 2014 at 8:37 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

I think some ideas around Karma might be worth thinking about. What do people think of these idea:

(sorry, more Wiki.... I did say I'm no scholar.

Loy argues that the idea of accumulating merit too easily becomes "spiritual materialism," a view echoed by other Buddhist modernists,[105] and further that "Karma has been used to rationalize racism, caste, economic oppression, birth handicaps and everything else. Taken literally, karma justifies the authority of political elites, who therefore must deserve their wealth and power, and the subordination of those who have neither. It provides the perfect theodicy: if there is an infallible cause-and-effect relationship between one's actions and one's fate, there is no need to work toward social justice, because it's already built into the moral fabric of the universe. In fact, if there is no undeserved suffering, there is really no evil that we need to struggle against. It will all balance out in the end."[104]

While some strands of later Buddhist thought did attribute all experience to past karma, the early texts explicitly did not, and in particular state that caste is not determined by karma.[106]

Does anybody know about these early texts that explicitly state that caste is not determined by Karma? Apparently the source for this statement on Wiki came from this reference:

Matthews, Bruce (1986), "Chapter Seven: Post-Classical Developments in the Concepts of Karma and Rebirth in Theravada Buddhism", in Neufeldt, Ronald W., Karma and Rebirth: Post Classical Developments, State University of New York Press,

I will also throw in this article by Thanissaro Bhikkhu:

http://buddhism.about.com/gi/o.htm?zi=1/XJ&zTi=1&sdn=buddhism&cdn=religion&tm=60&f=00&su=p284.13.342.ip\_&tt=2&bt=3&bts=80&zu=http%3A//www.accesstoinsight.org/lib/authors/thanissaro/karma.html

Malcolm wrote:

The earlier sutta citation I provided for you comes from the Majjhima Nikāya. Clearly, Buddha there states that one's social position, whether high or low is a result of karma.

From the article you shared:

From the standpoint of karma, though, where we come from is old karma, over which we have no control.

We only have control over where we are going, not what family we were born into and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 25th, 2014 at 8:23 AM

Title: Re: "the Self is real" according to T. Page

Content:

smcj said:

So, is your awareness undifferentiated or is it individuated, i.e. a personal continuum? If the former, your view is no different than Advaita. If the former, that is acceptable within Buddhism.

Beautifully put!

So the question then becomes; do you believe that the Shentong, of say either Kongtrul or Dolpoba, is the same or different than Advaita?

Malcolm wrote:

Like the Dalai Lama put it, there is a "white" gzhan stong" and a "black" gzhan stong. Following Rongton Shejya Kunrig, the former would be a transitional view between Yogacara and Madhyamaka, for in reality there is little difference between the false aspectarian Yogacara school in India (Ratnakarashanti) and gzhan stong. The latter black gzhan stong is pretty much heterodox from a Buddhist point of view. SOB adheres to the latter.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 25th, 2014 at 8:19 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

On class, I think the Buddha's idea of class or caste is different to the Marxian definition. It isn't really the same as how wealthy you are or based on culture/attitudes etc.

Malcolm wrote:

"“Under the patriarchal system, under the caste system, under the feudal and corporative system, there was division of labor in the whole of society according to fixed rules. Were these rules established by a legislator? No. Originally born of the conditions of material production, they were born of the conditions of material production; they were raised to the status of laws only much later. In this way these different forms of the division of labour became so many bases of social organization.” ‘Poverty of Philosophy’, 118.

Marx's idea is precisely this. The Buddha would say no, people are born into social stations based on their karma. The two views are therefore incompatible.

tellyontellyon said:

When Marxists talk about class they are referring to particular economic roles that only really exist under capitalism.

Malcolm wrote:

In Capital he writes:

“Manufacture, in fact, produces the skill of the detail labourer, by reproducing, and systematically driving to an extreme within the workshop, the naturally developed differentiation of trades which it found ready to had in society at large. On the other hand, the conversion of fractional work into the life-calling of one man, corresponds to the tendency shown by earlier societies, to make trades hereditary; either to petrify them into castes, or whenever definite historical conditions beget in the individual a tendency to vary in a manner incompatible with the nature of castes, to ossify them into guilds. Castes and guilds arise from the action of the same natural law that regulates the differentiation of plants and animals into species and varieties, except that when a certain degree of development has been reached, the heredity of castes and exclusiveness of guilds are ordained as a law of society.” (p. 321. Moscow edition 1974).

I see no real distinction that can be made apart from that fact that, put in Marxist terms, these castes arose as a result of primitive accumulations which were then capitalized.

tellyontellyon said:

So Capitalism as defined by Marx is a new phenomenon.

Malcolm wrote:

Specifically, modern Capitalism is a post colonial evolution based on the discovery of gold and silver in the Americas and so on.

If you take the broader view, there have been many waves of capitalism since ancient history, like a trees in a forest, beings compete for resources, some are more effective at gathering resources, other's less. Eventually, the whole forest becomes moribund and is either replaced with new species of trees, or it dies altogether.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 25th, 2014 at 7:57 AM

Title: Re: "the Self is real" according to T. Page

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

No, your positing consciousness as an undifferentiated field, which amounts the same thing as positing a self.

PadmaVonSamba said:

When did I ever suggest "consciousness as an undifferentiated field"?

I said "awareness", but that may not be the right term. is that what you are referring to? As a matter of fact, I am not sure of the specific term for what I am talking about, but it is not consciousness (which is a composite). I am talking about a "context" which precedes cognition, from which cognitive experiences such as thoughts, notions of self, etc. arise when interacting with objects of awareness.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, that would be consciousness, no matter what words you want to use, like awareness, etc., it is still consciousness.

So, is your awareness undifferentiated or is it individuated, i.e. a personal continuum? If the former, your view is no different than Advaita. If the latter, that is acceptable within Buddhism.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 25th, 2014 at 7:54 AM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

tobes said:

Nonetheless, I see how certain traditions - Dzogchen, Zen - can read Nagarjuna as denying all forms of causation.

Malcolm wrote:

Dzogchen does not reject causes and conditions conventionally, in fact it elaborates a whole elaborate scheme to explain the cause of samsara as well as consciousness, memory, etc.

tobes said:

Let me re-phrase: I see how certain interpreters of Dzogchen, Zen, can read Nagarjuna as denying all forms of causation....

Malcolm wrote:

The main point being made is that causality itself cannot withstand ultimate analysis.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 25th, 2014 at 5:20 AM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

causation can be said to operate conventionally in the same way that a person with defective vision sees hairs: in each case the appearance is accepted at face value, as in a dream.

Malcolm wrote:

Indeed, yet it appears.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 25th, 2014 at 4:56 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

I'm confused here. Are people conflating Anarchism with Marxism?

Malcolm wrote:

No, not at all.

Sherab Dorje said:

Weird, coz just a couple of posts earlier tellyontellyoff was saying that Marxists are somehow in opposition to states.

Malcolm wrote:

well, in terms of their utopia, yes.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 25th, 2014 at 4:35 AM

Title: Re: "the Self is real" according to T. Page

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

Awareness does not cease.

No 'self' arises unless awareness arises with objects of awareness again, and produces another experience of 'self'.

Malcolm wrote:

You're a Vedantin too.

PadmaVonSamba said:

I am not asserting any valid, intrinsically arising self merely the experience of a self such as the one reading this post, which arises from the interaction of (ground of) awareness and objects of awareness.

Vedantins assert an intrinsically existent self (atman).

I don't.

.
.
.

Malcolm wrote:

No, your positing consciousness as an undifferentiated field, which amounts the same thing as positing a self.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 25th, 2014 at 2:36 AM

Title: Re: "the Self is real" according to T. Page

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

Are you saying that the body is the matrix?

Malcolm wrote:

Of course. Where else can consciousness be located?

dzogchungpa said:

OK, then I'm a little confused. If I'm not mistaken 'matrix' = 'garbha', which, according to your Gorampa quote is unconditioned. Is the body then considered to be unconditioned?

Malcolm wrote:

Garbha means something that holds, what is being held, tathatā. Who holds tathatā? Sentient beings.

Sugatagarbha is a short hand way of saying "the dharmakāya encased in afflictions".

What becomes afflicted, clarity. What is the nature of clarity? Emptiness. Tathatāgarbha is just a way of saying that sentient beings have the potential for awakening because the mind and the mind essence are inseparable, the former conditioned and the latter unconditioned.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 25th, 2014 at 2:15 AM

Title: Re: "the Self is real" according to T. Page

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

Awareness does not cease.

No 'self' arises unless awareness arises with objects of awareness again, and produces another experience of 'self'.

Malcolm wrote:

You're a Vedantin too.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 25th, 2014 at 1:52 AM

Title: Re: "the Self is real" according to T. Page

Content:

Son of Buddha said:

Using a horrible analogy you are ceral in a bowl of milk(Enlightenment)

The milk is all around the ceral and has soaked into the ceral....the ceral starts to disentagrate(defilements are being removed)

When all the defilents have been removed the ceral disentigrates entirely and and all that is left is the milk.

(sorry horrible analogy)

Malcolm wrote:

Yup, you are definitely a Vedantin in intent if not by name.

Your view is not really very relevant, as long as you practice the sadhana methods properly, you will achieve realization.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 25th, 2014 at 1:25 AM

Title: Re: "the Self is real" according to T. Page

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

OK, so there's one matrix etc. for each being?

Malcolm wrote:

Each being is a matrix. This is illustrated by such statements like the Hevajra Tantra:

Great wisdom is present in the body, perfectly free from all concepts,
pervading all things,
present in, but not arising from the body.

dzogchungpa said:

Are you saying that the body is the matrix?

Malcolm wrote:

Of course. Where else can consciousness be located?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 25th, 2014 at 12:34 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

I'm confused here. Are people conflating Anarchism with Marxism?

Malcolm wrote:

No, not at all.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 25th, 2014 at 12:18 AM

Title: Re: "the Self is real" according to T. Page

Content:

Will said:

Here is Buddha (MN 2) saying that Page's 'the Self is real' is one among several wrong views:

Malcolm wrote:

They will merely reply that the Nikayas were a provisional teaching.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 25th, 2014 at 12:11 AM

Title: Re: "the Self is real" according to T. Page

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Your second question is misphrased, sentient beings are tathāgatagarbha, without them there is no possibility of Buddhahood, they are the matrix, nexus, locus etc. of tathatā.

dzogchungpa said:

OK, so there's one matrix etc. for each being?

Malcolm wrote:

Each being is a matrix. This is illustrated by such statements like the Hevajra Tantra:

Great wisdom is present in the body,
perfectly free from all concepts,
pervading all things,
present in, but not arising from the body.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 25th, 2014 at 12:10 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The Buddhist point of view is that states and classes arise inevitably because sentient beings are afflicted and driven by the three humors. In Buddhist legend, anarchy prevailed in the golden age when afflictions were very latent in humans. The golden age degenerated after humans began hoarding grains and their afflictions became activated, and thus protection societies emerged, kings were elected, classes were formed and it degenerated until the present epoch.
Should have written "poisons".

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 24th, 2014 at 11:26 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

I don't completely understand Buddhism either, do you?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, I pretty well think I do. Others of course may disagree. Of course, there are many details I can learn, some I have forgot, have gone through periods of doubt and intense questioning, but yes, I really do understand the Buddha's teachings. But, then I have done little else for the past 25 years but study and practice it. Am I a realized person, of course not. Understanding and realization are two entirely different things.

You should reflect very carefully on what I wrote above.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 24th, 2014 at 11:07 PM

Title: Re: "the Self is real" according to T. Page

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The definitive interpretation he renders as follows:

Therefor, the Sugatagarbha is defined as the union of clarity and emptiness but not simply emptiness without clarity, because that [kind of emptiness] is not suitable to be a basis for bondage and liberation. Also it is not simple clarity without emptiness, that is the conditioned part, because the Sugatagarbha is taught as unconditioned.

dzogchungpa said:

If I understand what you've written above, the clarity referred to is conditioned? If so, how can the Sugatagarbha, which is unconditioned, be the union of a conditioned part and something else?

Also, does each being have it's own Sugatagarbha?

Malcolm wrote:

Is emptiness conditioned or unconditioned? It is unconditioned. Are all conditioned things empty? Yes. Therefore, the conditioned and the unconditioned are actually non-dual.

Your second question is misphrased, sentient beings are tathāgatagarbha, without them there is no possibility of Buddhahood, they are the matrix, nexus, locus etc. of tathatā.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 24th, 2014 at 10:58 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

M.

To Marxists the state IS violence. It is a tool for one class to control another. There is an ever present threat of violence that becomes overt if you step outside the limits that are acceptable to the ruling class. Sometimes the cage is bigger, sometimes smaller, but there is always an armed guard.

Malcolm wrote:

States form out of protection societies, in general. We can see this in the case of the Buddha, who in a past life as the Bodhisattva, was appointed the first human king, or so the legend runs, and was appointed a sixth share of the harvest for his troubles.

But as long as human beings are subject to desire, hatred and ignorance, then for that long there will be classes of people, discrimination and so on. There is a reason Buddhists refer to themselves as "insiders". This means that we seek the solution to social ills and problems through personal transformation. There is no way you can remove the three afflictions merely through altering a given set of material relations. The proof of this is the psychological misery of the wealthy. Wealth does not make anyone happy. Of course this does not mean you cannot use material things to entice people into entering the teachings. The four means of converting beings to the Dharma are generosity (which itself has four aspects: giving material gifts, conferring fearlessness, loving kindness and teaching Dharma), pleasant speech, conduct and setting an example.

However, Marxist psychological theory, in contrast with Buddhist teachings, holds that all psychological states are fundamentally a result of social conditions fostered by material relationships, i.e. it is entirely materialist in its perspective. We can see that this perspective is deeply flawed because in fact as long as sentient beings like ourselves are driven by the three afflictions, there can be no happiness anywhere. Even if your Marxist utopia were possible, it would swiftly degenerate because humans are driven by afflictions.

The Buddhist point of view is that states and classes arise inevitably because sentient beings are afflicted and driven by the three humors. In Buddhist legend, anarchy prevailed in the golden age when afflictions were very latent in humans. The golden age degenerated after humans began hoarding grains and their afflictions became activated, and thus protection societies emerged, kings were elected, classes were formed and it degenerated until the present epoch.

So in fact it really seems that a doctrine of Anarchy cannot square with Buddhist teachings, in other words, from a Buddhist perspective a stateless society is completely impossible apart from the upper golden age.

It also appears that the utopia Marx imagines is also impossible as

tellyontellyon said:

But if lethal force is being used against a movement... would they have the right to self defence? That is another question?

Malcolm wrote:

The Buddha explained very clearly in the Mahaparinibbana sutta that if a country is abiding by its laws, maintaining its own boundaries, and so on, then one it would be hard to attack, and second, if attacked would be difficult to defeat.

He of course understood that countries needed defense forces. But he also clearly demonstrated that no matter what side of a conflict one were on, engaging in lethal violence of any kind would condemn one to hell. Vasubandhu clearly explains that if one belongs to a group of one hundred persons, and that group kills someone, all in that group earn the negative karma of the entire group, i.e, all the Buddhists who recently killed all those Rohingyas all will experience the ripening of murdering those people times the number of people who approve of that action. Karma is unrelenting.

tellyontellyon said:

Before Chinese rule, the Dalai Lama's and the High Lama's would resort to the use of violent force to defend their society. They armed and sent off to war young men just like every other state, and even got into arguments about arms spending.:

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Tibetan\_Army

Malcolm wrote:

As I pointed out, the principle of karma is unrelenting. For as many Tibetans who violently resisted the Chinese occupation, many thousands more resisted it non-violently in accordance with Buddhist principles. And many were simply cut down in battle by machine guns since the Tibetans had not comparable arms. I cannot say that I know for a fact that they had lower rebirths, and there certainly are one or two scarce passages in Mahāyāna literature that appear to justify violent force to protect the Dharma, but in general, the tenor of Buddhist texts is that lethal violence is unacceptable.

The Dalai Lama freely admits that Tibet fell because the policies of the Tibetan government had fallen into corruption and abuse, therefore, Tibet could be attacked and defeated successfully because of the lack of merit of his own government.

tellyontellyon said:

Even on a mundane level, if you caused trouble or broke the rules in a monastery you could expect to be treated quite roughly by some muscular dob-dobs, who were not at all gentle or sanctimonious.

<https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Dob-dob>

Malcolm wrote:

Dobdobs habitually indulged in what we would term child sexual abuse, i.e. rape.

tellyontellyon said:

I never said the Marxists were pacifists... (though it appears neither were the Tibetan lamas!)

Malcolm wrote:

Some Lamas aren't, but in general Buddhism is pacifist in orientation.

tellyontellyon said:

If that is too offensive for you, then please, shake the dust from your sandals and turn your back on the world....

But the fact is the world is a violent place, we can't demand perfection of those we associate with if we are going to get involved with trying to change the world.... but as Buddhists we may use our input to at least mitigate the worst of it and encourage less violent forms of coercion.

Malcolm wrote:

The message of the Buddha is that you cannot change the world in any substantial way through external force. You can only change the world by changing yourself.

tellyontellyon said:

No, I can't answer them very well myself, I don't have the skill, brains or time to do justice to a complex and difficult subject.

Malcolm wrote:

Why would you possibly buy into a doctrine you do not completely understand?

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 24th, 2014 at 9:55 PM

Title: Re: "the Self is real" according to T. Page

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

If there is a true self, what experiences this true self? Does this true self experience itself? If so, by what means? If the true self exists outside of phenomena and thus any points of reference, what ultimately does the true self experience? If the true self does not actually experience anything, then is it a rock? What self experiences samsaric existence? If the samsaric self can be shown to have no true existence, then is it the true self that experiences samsara? Does a being with no mental capacity have a true self? If that being with no mental capacity is essentially made of phenomena (physical matter) such as carbon, and yet has a true self, then does all carbon have a true self? The 'true self' theory raises all sorts of conundrums.

It is essentially no different than believing in god, except that in this case, instead of saying "god" one says "true self".

.
.
.

Malcolm wrote:

The term bdag nyid, atman, just means, in this case, "nature", i.e. referring to the nature of reality free from extremes as being permanent, blissful, pure and self. The luminosity of the mind is understood to be this.

There are various ways to interpret the Uttaratantra and tathāgatagarbha doctrine, one way is definitive in meaning, the other is provisional, according to Gorampa Sonam Senge, thus the tathāgatagarbha sutras become definitive or provisional depending on how they are understood. He states:

In the context of showing the faults of a literal [interpretation] – it's equivalence with the Non-Buddhist Self is that the assertion of unique eternal all pervading cognizing awareness of the Saṃkhya, the unique eternal pristine clarity of the Pashupattis, the unique all pervading intellect of the Vaiśnavas, the impermanent condition, the measure of one's body, in the permanent self-nature of the Jains, and the white, brilliant, shining pellet the size of an atom, existing in each individual's heart of the Vedantins are the same.

The definitive interpretation he renders as follows:

Therefor, the Sugatagarbha is defined as the union of clarity and emptiness but not simply emptiness without clarity, because that [kind of emptiness] is not suitable to be a basis for bondage and liberation. Also it is not simple clarity without emptiness, that is the conditioned part, because the Sugatagarbha is taught as unconditioned.

Khyentse Wangpo, often cited as a gzhan stong pa, basically says that the treatises of Maitreya elucidate the luminosity of the mind, i.e. its purity, whereas Nāgarjuna's treatises illustrate the empty nature of the mind, and that these two together, luminosity and emptiness free from extremes are to be understood as noncontradictory, which we can understand from the famous Prajñāpāramita citation "There is no mind in the mind, the nature of the mind is luminosity".

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 24th, 2014 at 8:52 PM

Title: Re: Friend or Foe.

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

And, just for the record, sometimes I don't even agree with myself.

Malcolm wrote:

Typical liberal...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 24th, 2014 at 8:30 PM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

tobes said:

Nonetheless, I see how certain traditions - Dzogchen, Zen - can read Nagarjuna as denying all forms of causation.

Malcolm wrote:

Dzogchen does not reject causes and conditions conventionally, in fact it elaborates a whole elaborate scheme to explain the cause of samsara as well as consciousness, memory, etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 24th, 2014 at 8:28 PM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

Jigme Tsultrim said:

Nagarjuna rejected causes.

Malcolm wrote:

Ultimately, yes; conventionally, no.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 24th, 2014 at 9:37 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

Zhen Li said:

All markets, for all time, have worked according to value and mediation with commodities of exchange (i.e. money, the earliest forms of which were things like cattle).

Malcolm wrote:

That and credit.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 24th, 2014 at 8:24 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

To Marxists...the bourgeois state won't simply wither away, therefore it must be removed by force (the ruling class are unlikely to give it up without a struggle).

Malcolm wrote:

So you finally admit it, Marxists advocate violence, because you certainly cannot exercise force without recourse to violence.

tellyontellyon said:

Therefore, the state must be smashed, overthrown, dismantled.

Malcolm wrote:

How can this possibly be non-violent? Even the language you use is the language of violence and coercion.

tellyontellyon said:

A workers state, a sort of temporary semi-state is established to replace it, and the task of changing society so that eventually there will no longer be two classes is begun. Therefore no longer any need for a state.

Malcolm wrote:

You mean, there will no longer be any need for protection? It will be impossible that human beings will act out of desire, hatred and ignorance?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 24th, 2014 at 5:24 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

Hiya Malcolm,

This is a key question. Marx and Engels addressed this and Lenin really focussed on this in the first chapter of his book: The State and Revolution.

He goes into what the 'State' is from a Marxist perspective, what maintains it, and why, undercapitalism, it will not 'whither away'; he explains the need for revolution and how the state would 'wither away' only after that. I guess it will not be your 'cup of tea', but if you can grit your teeth and get through the whole of the first chapter then you will have your answer.

<https://www.marxists.org/archive/lenin/works/1917/staterev/>

Malcolm wrote:

But I wanted you to summarize it for us.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 23rd, 2014 at 9:57 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

By the way, to return the thread to its original topic, Robert Nozick maintains that it is inevitable that out of anarchy, a form of minimal state will arise from the creation of protection organizations.

TOTO, Is the utopia you imagine managed or unmanaged? If it is managed, how is this a stateless society? If it is managed, how is this management different than the minimal state imagined by Nozik?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 23rd, 2014 at 9:10 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Do you accept this as an accurate description of an entire race?

Not of an entire group of people, but I would not be surprised if beneath the stereotype there was not some truth to it. In other words, I would not be surprised if indeed there were gangs of criminal Roma wandering around conning people and stealing.

For example, there is the American TV show, The Richs, starring the English comedian Eddie Izzard, and the equally English actress Minnie Driver, who portray a family of Gypsies in the Deep South who engage in one scam after another until it all catches up with them. Certainly the stereotype is international, just as there is the stereotype of the corrupt capitalist. After all, you are very quick to condemn "counter revolutionaries", "capitalists", etc., whole groups of people. But I am sure you will say "It's different".

Sönarn said:

This concerns a minority. We have that discussion in France, because a lot of Roms are migrating to it. It does exist few gangs of organized robbery in main towns (Paris, Lyon, Marseille, ...). It's generally organized from Romania (gangsters) and committed by very young peoples (which are immediately relaxed because of their young age ...). But that represents only a couple of groups. Majority of Roms just try to survive and improve their living condition ... in Romania they are considered as untermensch. So we have to be careful not to propagate this kind of much exaggerated information which only serve the right and extrem-right propaganda.

Sönarn

Malcolm wrote:

Of course.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 23rd, 2014 at 9:10 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

The point is that this is a problem. And it's related to failed immigration and integration politics, one of many symptoms of just this.

No, this is not a 'symptom' of failed immigration.

Malcolm wrote:

He said immigration politics, meaning that immigration policies of Norway are finding disfavor among Norwegians these days. You really do need to watch Lilyhammer. It will put how Norwegians feel about these things and shows the deep ambiguity Norwegians feel about "doing the right thing" in contrast to their very real and deep cultural conservatism. Until very recently, Norway was a very homogenous country, and these things we are seeing are problems Norwegians have only recently had to deal with. Of course the former British empire, we have more experience with diversity so some of the growing pains we went through over a hundred years ago seems obvious as well as their solutions.

tellyontellyon said:

This represents a very small proportion of the migrants living in Norway,

Malcolm wrote:

It seems to be sufficient to cause anxiety. Of course this is an old story around the world, immigrant population moves in, or are even invited, the local people become uncomfortable after a while, tensions brews, violence breaks out between the two groups, and eventually, if they can avoid genocide of one another, they all settle down peaceably enough.

tellyontellyon said:

It says more about a lack of tolerance to people who "..refuse to live how you are supposed to live". Like say if a muslim woman want's to wear a headscarf etc. etc.. It's just intolerance of difference that the 'right' are trying to build into hatred and fear with scare tactics'.

Malcolm wrote:

I suppose you extend this liberalism to female circumcision then?

tellyontellyon said:

'Gypsies' are a traditional target for the 'right' in Europe. Sometimes this has overflowed into pogroms and even organised genocide.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, this is completely true. Nomads are often viewed with suspicion since they are considered at the margins. Even in Tibet, nomads have a terrible reputation, while at the same time they are idealized, just as Gypsies have been here in the west.

tellyontellyon said:

It is wrong to downplay these crimes.

Malcolm wrote:

I am not downplaying these other crimes. I was clarifying for you precisely what Norwegian was talking about, i.e. assault rapes.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 23rd, 2014 at 9:24 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

But there were only 6 assault rapes out of something like 152 rapes.

Malcolm wrote:

It doesn't matter. What is defined as rape in Norway is a little different:

In Norway, rape is defined under the Norwegian Penal Code[40] § 192 as either:

1. engaging in sexual activity by means of violence or threatening behaviour,
2. engaging in sexual activity with somebody who is unconscious or for any other reason incapable of resisting the act, or
3. by means of violence or threatening behaviour compelling any person to engage in sexual activity with another person, or to carry out similar actions with him- or herself.

Further, the same section defines aggravated rape as a rape committed

- a. by multiple persons in cooperation (gang rape)
- b. in a particularly painful or offensive manner
- c. by a person previously convicted of rape under § 192 or of sexual activity with a child under the age of 14 (as per § 195 of the penal code)
- d. in such a way that the victim either dies or receives grievous bodily harm.

The section recognizes sexually transmitted diseases (defined in the Infection Protection Act) as grievous bodily harm.

So, if person A has herpes and does not inform person B of this fact, and person B contracts herpes, person A can be accused of rape in Norway.

Or if person A manages to cause pain, or is offensive to person B, this can also be defined as rape.

Basically, the bar for "rape" in Norway is much lower than it is in other countries. In the US, giving someone herpes is offensive, but the onus is on person B to protect his/her own health.

tellyontellyon said:

What about what he said about the Roma? Did you read it?

They are criticized a lot by people, because they have zero interest in behaving in accordance with Norwegian norms and laws. They don't want to work (although that's their excuse used in order to be here and beg for money). They steal, and they treat wherever it is they're staying as if it is an open toilet, defecating and urinating everywhere, be it in a kindergarten property, people's backyards, the forests, open parks, or what not (and when at one point they were given toilets to use, they shat down the toilets as well). People get fed up with the police not doing anything about them shitting everywhere, or stealing.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, of course I read it. The question is, did Norwegian personally witness such behavior or is he merely repeating hearsay. What we can understand from this, however is that Norway's push for integration is a laughable failure in many respects, and has provoked a backlash of resentment.

tellyontellyon said:

Do you accept this as an accurate description of an entire race?

Malcolm wrote:

Not of an entire group of people, but I would not be surprised if beneath the stereotype there was not some truth to it. In other words, I would not be surprised if indeed there were gangs of criminal Roma wandering around conning people and stealing.

For example, there is the American TV show, The Richs, starring the English comedian Eddie Izzard, and the equally English actress Minnie Driver, who portray a family of Gypsies in the Deep South who engage in one scam after another until it all catches up with them. Certainly the stereotype is international, just as there is the stereotype of the corrupt capitalist. After all, you are very quick to condemn "counter revolutionaries", "capitalists", etc., whole groups of people. But I am sure you will say "It's different".

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 23rd, 2014 at 8:47 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

Anyway people can read for themselves the police report and make up their own minds about what you are up to.

Just taking this claim about rape:

The actual police report is here:

https://www.politi.no/vedlegg/lokale\_vedlegg/oslo/Vedlegg\_1309.pdf

The English translation of pages 51-56:

<http://www.scribd.com/doc/76695373/Excerpt-From-Oslo-Police-District-Report-on-Rape>

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, the report states that assault rapes in Norway are overwhelmingly committed by people with non-Norwegian backgrounds. In the US, for example, apart from statutory rape, i.e. sleeping with a minor, there are no other kinds. I am quite sure that is what Norwegian is talking about, not the all the other kinds of rape defined under Norwegian law that would not even be recognized as rape, in for example, England.

What Norwegian is talking about is the fact that the immigration and integration policies are such failures in Norway that these Norwegian policies are hugely lampooned by Norwegians in such shows as Lilyhammer.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 23rd, 2014 at 8:34 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

kirtu said:

[Therefore, markets are unreliable: they produce unpredictable and unanticipated phenomena (which is why I started in with Goedel in that post). Therefore regulations cannot anticipate all undesired phenomena and some regulations that guard against undesired phenomena may constrain markets unnecessarily over the lifetime of a business cycle.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, I understand all of this. But there is no alternative.

kirtu said:

There is indeed a ready made alternative: social democracy. There is a secondary alternative: small scale communes where resources are shared and equally divided according to need (this has the actual advantage of being historically an American solution, but I am addressing the general alternative to capitalism). There is a third alternative: an economic system derived from computer simulation where alternatives are tried based on maximizing various values and selecting for long term stability and prosperity. These systems can then be integrated into the actual world economy.

Kirt

Social democracy is a political ideology that officially has as its goal the establishment of democratic socialism through reformist and gradualist methods.[1] Alternatively, social democracy is defined as a policy regime involving a universal welfare state and collective bargaining schemes within the framework of a capitalist economy.

Malcolm wrote:

What is outlined in red is what "social democracy" is today.

Your second scheme won't scale.

Your third scheme requires political coercion, being yet another form of planned economy.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 23rd, 2014 at 4:18 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

kirtu said:

The main problem in the US is that the economy has become non-functional primary due to cultural reasons and the refusal of a dead-locked government to take further action, even to acknowledge the problems. The reason that "leaders" go not acknowledge these issues is because they are counter to the received ideology and solutions tend to lay outside the scope of market forces and Keynes has been sidelined. If you have market fundamentalists at nearly every level of every institution, there isn't much to be done when market fundamentalists face a reality that shouldn't exist. You also have the hype-pragmatic stance of Americans: most trends show a slow, slow recovery (U-3 unemployment ~ 6%) by the end of 2014 so the boat seems to be righting itself without further action. The problem is that the replacement jobs are low wage and not secure.

Kirt

Malcolm wrote:

The economy functions, kirt, it may not function according to what you would like, and I understand your frustration, but your comments are a bit out of line with my personal experience of living in the US and traveling abroad extensively.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 23rd, 2014 at 3:40 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

kirtu said:

[Therefore, markets are unreliable: they produce unpredictable and unanticipated phenomena (which is why I started in with Goedel in that post). Therefore regulations cannot anticipate all undesired phenomena and some regulations that guard against undesired phenomena may constrain markets unnecessarily over the lifetime of a business cycle.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, I understand all of this. But there is no alternative.

kirtu said:

Capitalism historically fails after some period of expansion.

Malcolm wrote:

This is true of _any_ economy. I did not say that a capitalist economy was a desiderata. I said that at this point, it is better this than some socialist revolution for the time being.

kirtu said:

Americans are often blind to the diversity of political views, for good and ill, that exist outside of their country (or even next door to them). Many have noted this.

Malcolm wrote:

Some Americans, not all. There are know nothings in every country. You fantasize so much about how awesome it is in Europe, well, go live there. I have met many stupid people, and as far as I know, there are just as many stupid Germans, Norwegians, Swedes, Brits, etc., as there are stupid Americans.

kirtu said:

Black people had complete freedom in Massachusetts well before 1964-1968.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, actually they did.

Even in Norway and Sweden, there is racism and discrimination against blacks, Laplanders and so on. Not to mention discrimination against "guest workers" in Germany and so on. In fact, racism is on the rise in Europe.

kirtu said:

No, aside from the final line what I have written is factual.

Malcolm wrote:

No it isn't.

kirtu said:

As I said, America is Rome. Rome was not noted for its innovations, but for the fact that it wielded the most power. Of course Rome fell, and so too will America, but it will be a long time coming.

Rome was noted for its innovations but its military and political power overshadowed their achievements making the recognition difficult. For example a couple of decades ago it was shown that a Roman structure in Spain, that people thought was a kind of elaborate fountain, was the water power plant for a factory. Secondly I have heard that it took the world to the mid-20th century to reinvent all of Roman engineering knowledge, particularly with respect to concrete.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, America has its innovations too, but I am too polite to list them all.

kirtu said:

However you have just made Azimov's observation on anti-intellectualism in the US. Do you really want the US to follow the slanted model of Roman brutishness?

Malcolm wrote:

America is not anti-intellectual. But we have had this boring conversation before. You just have a huge chip on your shoulder, I wish you would get over it, and your prejudices.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 23rd, 2014 at 2:34 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

Norwegian said:

We have failed immigration politics, and we have failed integration politics..

Malcolm wrote:

One word: Lilyhammer...if you haven't seen it you ought to.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 23rd, 2014 at 2:32 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

Sherlock said:

America is Rome for now, and it will be for some centuries yet. So you better get used to it.

M

Is your thinking on this influenced by Spengler by any chance?

I thought his <https://archive.org/details/PrussianismAndSocialism> of Anglo-American capitalism vs Prussian/German-style socialism was pretty spot-on. He also identifies Marxism as a failed attempt to formulate a Prussian-style system based on Anglo-Saxon assumptions. This prediction, written in 1920, seems quite accurate:

"Instead of authoritarian socialism, the English or American billionaire adheres to an impressive form of private socialism, a welfare program on a grand scale which turns his own personal power into pleasure and morally vanquishes the recipient of welfare funds. The flashy techniques for distributing these millions are an effective cover-up for the methods used to obtain them in the first place. It is the same attitude as that of the old corsairs who, while banqueting in the castle just conquered, threw their table scraps to the prisoners: the voluntary surrender of property increases the value of what remains. The question whether or not such voluntary acts should become a legal duty is the chief point of contention among the economic parties of the future in England and America."

Malcolm wrote:

Well, not specifically, but I have read Spengler, but years ago.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 23rd, 2014 at 2:27 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

kirtu said:

It's safe to say that without trade their economies could not function. All economies must act on the global stage to grow beyond a certain level. Trade does not necessarily imply capitalism however. There was active trade with Soviet Russia from 60's-90.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, capitalist trade.

kirtu said:

I am not making personal comments at all. However there are very deep flaws in American culture that people born and raised here do not tend to acknowledge. I do want the US to in fact live up to it's ideals and become the greatest country on Earth. Sadly, I'm still waiting. It was only in my lifetime that African-American people were accorded liberty for example. If American's believed their ideals this wouldn't have been an issue for long.

Malcolm wrote:

Of course you are making personal comments. It is becoming rather disgusting.

You have to understand one important point about "American" ideals. They are really the ideals of two groups: New Englanders and small group of educated Virginians. There was a compromise reached with the Deep South, which was not one that was easily made.

However, I can state with confidence that states like Massachusetts, and NE in general along with New York, as well as the left coast states really do live up to "American" ideals. But America is not just one country, it is in fact a nation historically comprised of 11 distinct cultural groups. Unfortunately, people in the culture sphere of the Deep South, Appalachia and the "Western States" have rather different ideas about things. The people in the Mid-West tend to be more conservative than New Englanders, but more liberal than the latter groups.

For example, Massachusetts abolished slavery in 1781.

So don't paint the whole country with a broad brush.

kirtu said:

BTW, it's not just me who thinks that American culture is severely flawed - most citizens like myself who I have met who were born with US citizenship but were raised significantly in northern or western Europe also see this. This was confirmed a few years ago when a report came out about differences in perception among many so-called "military brats", "corporate brats" and "diplomatic brats": oftentimes they felt like de facto aliens in the US and were initially mystified at the many self-contradictions in US culture once they came to live in the US. You can read about this in the literature concerning trans-culture/third culture children.

Malcolm wrote:

This simple means that you do not understand Americans, nor the subtleties of American history.

kirtu said:

There are no shortages of toilet paper in Germany, Austria, Switzerland, Denmark, Holland, Norway, Sweden, Iceland or Finland for starters.

Malcolm wrote:

These countries are all signatories to the WTO. They have neoliberalized economies.

kirtu said:

It's not a tautology.

Malcolm wrote:

To say that markets are chaotic and capitalism is unreliable is a  $1=1$  kind of statement.

kirtu said:

That is the exact situation. There is a narrow, non-diverse spectrum of political thought in the US focusing on conservatism. Almost all people born and raised in the US are some kind of narrow political conservative. People here are simply blind to this fact.

Malcolm wrote:

This is total nonsense. As I said before, this is a symptom of the fact that you live in a culturally conservative part of the US. If you lived in Massachusetts, VT, etc., you would have a very different perspective.

kirtu said:

Actually a report for the Dept. of Defense was published recently noting American decline on the international stage as a result of the perception of inadequate dealing with economics. I'll see if I can find that report.

America has throw a great deal away as a result of the complete failure of it's educational system over at least two generations and, as part of it's cultural flaw, it's slavish adherence to forms of ideology over reasoning and analysis. It has stagnated scientifically and technologically although this is not apparent (nor is the stagnation universal - this is not a controversial statement within some tech corporations but a counter statement is that the US has the strategic people and projects it needs and can continue to acquire [buy] what it does not currently have and that some scientific and tech stagnation is not broadly relevant). It will retain it's militarial dominance but may not retain economic dominance. With an incompetent response to a contrived economic depression it has become Belgium.

Malcolm wrote:

This is all rhetorical irrelevance. As I said, America is Rome. Rome was not noted for its innovations, but for the fact that it wielded the most power. Of course Rome fell, and so too will America, but it will be a long time coming.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 23rd, 2014 at 1:09 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

smcj said:

China is swiftly exhausting its environment, in a mad push to become equal to the west in industrial capacity.

They are buying up all the natural resources they can in Africa. My neighbor goes there a lot and says there are Chinese all over the place.

Malcolm wrote:

Yup, they are.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 23rd, 2014 at 12:45 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

M:

American dominance on the world stage will last for centuries

What about the development of the BRICS?

Malcolm wrote:

India lacks natural resources. Their main resource is labor.

China is swiftly exhausting its environment, in a mad push to become equal to the west in industrial capacity.

Brazil has mainly oil.

Russia is insane and effectively landlocked.

South Africa is definitely the economic engine of Africa, but it is socially incredibly unstable.

Of these, only Russia and China has anything like the ability to challenge American dominance. But I don't think they really can.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 22nd, 2014 at 11:28 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

kirtu said:

Not just (Norway is certainly of course). Germany isn't dependent upon guest workers for manufacturing, etc. But the chief point is that these social democracies are not propped up by capitalism but have safely put it in a terrarium where it can be tightly controlled to actually benefit people rather than being left to run amok and become a cancer like it is in the UK and the US.

Malcolm wrote:

Without the global capitalism, their economies could not function.

kirtu said:

I'm sorry you see it that way. I do not sling invective at the US or it's culture at all.

Malcolm wrote:

Are you kidding? You do it every chance you get.

kirtu said:

I just want it to live up to it's stated ideals, esp. those egalitarian ones (of course Americans have confused those ideals with others like a fantasied right to bear arms in extreme circumstances [like all the time for some people]). American ideals are fantastic. Hopefully one day Americans will become Americans.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, we all have different ideas about what those stated ideals are. The Supreme Court has ruled that second amendment does indeed mean the right to carry a weapon. The court has also decided that the exact way this is carried out can be adjudicated locally. If you don't like guns, live in Massachusetts.

And again you make personal comments "Hopefully one day Americans will become Americans" as if there is some character flaw in Americans, it is really too much.

kirtu said:

Okay so you fall short of the throttling of the market in European social democracies. Please examine Goedel's Incompleteness Theorem: any sufficiently complex system has true statements which can nonetheless not be proven true within that system. Sufficiently complex means as complex as arithmetic. Certainly placing checks and balances on a capitalist economic system is far more complex than arithmetic as both can be modeled as rule based systems and the rules in capitalism far exceed the rules in arithmetic. Therefore unanticipated capitalist events will continue to occur. We don't know for sure what they are, but historically they are periods of increase followed by busts. This is a regular albeit unpredictable cycle. Another aspect is that economic markets are chaotic (in terms of chaos theory). Mathematics indicates that capitalism in the long is unreliable.

Is this problem mitigated by the social democracies tight control of it? No, but they can keep it from becoming a cancer and destroying society.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, I think experience has proven that throttling markets winds up with shortages of things that people want, like toilet paper.

"Another aspect is that economic markets are chaotic (in terms of chaos theory). Mathematics indicates that capitalism in the long is unreliable." This is a tautology.

kirtu said:

The main problem as I see it, in the USA, is that corporations have too much access to power, and regulations are unfairly applied to small businesses making it impossible for them to compete against large corporations in almost every area.

That's a problem but by far not the main problem. The complete denial of people's access to labor is one of the main problems within the system. A means of mitigating that is in fact supporting small business and permitting (helping) people who have been locked out of the labor market to start small businesses.

Malcolm wrote:

These things can all be changed and should be changed. I was thinking of farming in particular. One place I think we can all agree is that the financial services industry needs to "throttled".

kirtu said:

The main flaw that I see in the US is the unwillingness of Republicans and Democrats alike to see that their policies together are moving the US to a corporatist state ala Gentile.

In fact there is only the one National Conservative Party, whose two wings have arbitrarily labeled their positions "Republican" and "Democrat".

Malcolm wrote:

This is nice rhetoric at a cocktail party, but in reality it is not like that.

kirtu said:

Who is Gentile?

Malcolm wrote:

Giovanni Gentile, Mussolini's intellectual.

kirtu said:

Rome fell in 2008 with the contrived and ongoing Second Great Depression. Americans don't know it yet.

Malcolm wrote:

Hardly, American dominance on the world stage will last for centuries. This country is far more resilient than you imagine.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 22nd, 2014 at 10:30 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

In fact Malcolm, from just this little piece.... I'm not sure he really was that smart... Hey, but if you support him, that's your business.

Malcolm wrote:

I do not agree with Hayek, actually. You totally miss my point. My point is that capitalists must read Marx, and Marxists must read libertarians, etc.

You should read Nozick, Rawls (main philosopher articulating social justice, and a large government to bring that about), Bookchin, Naess, etc.

No one person's ideas are complete. It is folly to pick one person's book and say "This is my bible". One must read opposing views.

As I told you, my political beliefs are Deep Ecology/Left Biocentric and as a Buddhist I am committed to nonviolence, I cannot support any ideology which even permits the idea of violent revolutionary struggle. Naess has six principles for public debate which I generally adhere to naturally, but also fail at from time to time. They are:

Avoid tendentious irrelevance

Examples: Personal attacks, claims of opponents' motivation, explaining reasons for an argument.

Avoid tendentious quoting

Quotes should not be edited regarding the subject of the debate.

Avoid tendentious ambiguity

Ambiguity can be exploited to support criticism.

Avoid tendentious use of straw men

Assigning views to the opponent that he or she does not hold.

Avoid tendentious statements of fact

Information put forward should never be untrue or incomplete, and one should not withhold relevant information.

Avoid tendentious tone of presentation

Examples: irony, sarcasm, pejoratives, exaggeration, subtle (or open) threats.

These would be very good to adopt as personal commitments for online Buddhist discussions.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 22nd, 2014 at 10:25 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

Nemo said:

I don't know what planet you live on Malcolm but your claim that capitalism as practiced has moral constraints is ludicrous. Oligopoly, monopoly, monopsony and plutocracy are inevitable. Capitalism is a revolutionary force that naturally frees itself from constraints. It will devour the entire ecosystem and then devour itself.

Malcolm wrote:

No, I am making a similar claim to the Marxists, i.e., that the capitalism founded by Smith had a moral theory. Likewise, Marxist style Socialism has a moral theory.

In both cases the the beast unleashed has shaken off the collar of its moral theory every time. We all accept that the Soviet Union and Communist China represent the failure of Marx's theories of economics. No one can possibly claim that any capitalist government has murdered as many people as the communists did in the 20th century. Not even the Nazis murdered as many people as Stalin did alone.

What we have is capitalism, we do not, at present, have another economic system.

What I argue is that trying to change this economic system through revolution will be more harmful than the harm it is presently causing.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 22nd, 2014 at 9:51 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

On the subject of workers being 'free' to make contracts with employers:
(today's cut'n'paste from Wiki contribution - because I'm a bit lazy.... )

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Criticism\_of\_capitalism

Malcolm wrote:

The problems with all of these criticisms of capitalism is that they assume that all value comes solely from labor. This is fine for Smith, Ricardo and Marx, but in fact economists have found the LTV inadequate for explaining all kinds of things in economics.

I guess one of the things I find annoying about the Marxist rank and file is their amateur economics, they all act as if they really understand economics, but what they really do is just recite chapter and verse. And what I also find is that they rarely read contrary points of view. For example, have you read Nozick's Anarchy, State and Utopia? Or Hayek? Even you will never agree with what these fellows say, they are just as smart, if not smarter than Marx and co. Time to expand your horizons.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 22nd, 2014 at 9:39 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

But rejecting capitalism is foolish and extreme. We merely need to place limits on resources that can be exploited. Capitalism and a steady state economy can co-exist. But it requires checks and balances.

kirtu said:

The only places where capitalism works are the social democracies, all of which are in Scandinavia and central/western Europe and it took them 50 or so years after WW2 to iron out problems (youth unemployment for example).

Malcolm wrote:

Well, the northern European social democracies (Denmark, Sweden, Norway) are propped up by North Sea oil. Germany, manufacturing on an imported labor force. These social democracies are propped up by capitalism.

kirtu said:

Personally I am skeptical of capitalism working in any native English speaking country because of the inherent culture of aggression, domination and exploitation that accompanies English. I would like to be proven wrong but so far history bears this out.

Malcolm wrote:

You have some deep prejudices, my friend. You never avoid a chance to sling invectives at the country you live in and of which you are a citizen.

kirtu said:

However I doubt that you mean social democracy as an instrument placing checks and balances on capitalism. The very notion of checks and balances is the quaint 18th century language dealing with reigning in the powers of King and Parliament, etc. Capitalism left to itself is harmful and will always, *always*, eventually lead to economic failure, just as it has in these United States and the UK repeatedly.

Malcolm wrote:

When we say checks and balances we mean exactly that, the use of the government to check corporations so the market can function in a balanced way. Until we manage to arrive at an internationally agreed upon system of population reduction and a steady state economy, the Keynesian approach seems to be most sensible, at least here in the USA.

The main problem as I see it, in the USA, is that corporations have too much access to power, and regulations are unfairly applied to small businesses making it impossible for them to compete against large corporations in almost every area.

The main flaw that I see in the US is the unwillingness of Republicans and Democrats alike to see that their policies together are moving the US to a corporatist state ala Gentile.

kirtu said:

Anglo-American/French capitalism is historically a clear failure and a danger to civilization.

Malcolm wrote:

America is Rome for now, and it will be for some centuries yet. So you better get used to it.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 22nd, 2014 at 7:22 AM

Title: Re: HHST 2014 North America & Europe Schedule

Content:

kirtu said:

http://hhthesakyatrizin.org/schedule\_2014\_all.html

supermaxv said:

I am so excited, anyone else headed out to the New York teachings?

Malcolm wrote:

I will be attending the empowerments.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 22nd, 2014 at 6:03 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

Unknown said:

If this is what Buddhists must believe then I am a very bad Buddhist. I believe all life is precious, even non-Buddhist beings.

Malcolm wrote:

Stop being so petulant and you might learn something.

All life is precious, but a precious human birth has eighteen unique characteristics which make it "precious", the so called eight freedoms:

http://rywiki.tsadra.org/index.php/eight\_freedoms

And ten endowments:

http://rywiki.tsadra.org/index.php/ten\_endowments

Unknown said:

But rejecting capitalism is foolish and extreme. We merely need to place limits on resources that can be exploited. Capitalism and a steady state economy can co-exist. The proof is in the pudding.....

Malcolm wrote:

[/quote]

Of course, and I would not expect otherwise.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 22nd, 2014 at 5:58 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

HHDL wrote: Of all the modern economic theories, the economic system of Marxism is founded on moral principles, while capitalism is concerned only with gain and profitability.

Malcolm wrote:

Capitalism, as portrayed in Smith's Wealth of Nations, is also founded on moral principles. Indeed, the latter book must be read alongside Smith's Moral Sentiments.

Please examine this:

<http://www.theatlantic.com/business/archive/2008/08/adam-smith-on-csr/8665/>

However, the moral principles upon which Smith founds his vision of capitalism and a labor theory of value is not utopian.

The point is while Smith's systems isn't perfect, indeed it is very 18th century, but to loudly proclaim capitalism hasn't any moral theory is grossly wrong.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 21st, 2014 at 11:10 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

Malcolm says:

Further, making offerings to the Buddha (a pure object) is far more metitorious than relieving all the poverty of the world.

Perhaps we could do both?

Malcolm wrote:

How are we going to do both without violently relieving someone of their possessions?

tellyontellyon said:

We are not going to agree about Marxism, which in the modern day includes much more than just what Marx happened to say and write. We can learn from what is right and reject what is wrong and doesn't work. I don't want to be ruled by a committee, I want 'power from below', the whole of society being able to contribute to economic planning. Democracy wider and more effective than we have now.

Malcolm wrote:

How is the "whole of society" going to be able to contribute to economic planning? Running a society takes skills. Skills require education.

You want to contribute to economic planning? Then grow food, like I do. Learn a pre-industrial era skill, like I did.

tellyontellyon said:

Marxists consider marxism to be a science, not a faith. Science learns from experience and improves.

Malcolm wrote:

I am aware that Marxists consider Marxism to be scientific, a proposition I take no more seriously than I take the idea that Buddhism is science, and rather less, actually.

tellyontellyon said:

Yes in the name of Marxism terrible things have been done, also capitalist authorities have done terrible things. Stalinism was a nightmare we all know. But there can be a new Marxism... or call it what you will. You know I am not talking about violent revolution, or a repeat of previous mistakes.

Malcolm wrote:

I am not interested in Marxism at all. The proof is in the pudding, it is a failed theory.

tellyontellyon said:

Perhaps your Deep Ecology will be the future? But I don't think it will be attained under a system that requires 2% to 3% compound economic growth annually forever. That is what capitalism must have to work. Capitalism has been very progressive, but that just can't keep going on forever, the planet just can't take it. Capitalism has to go.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, I agree, the notion of infinite growth of the economy is based on the notion of infinite resources, which of course we do not have.

But rejecting capitalism is foolish and extreme. We merely need to place limits on resources that can be exploited. Capitalism and a steady state economy can co-exist. But it requires checks and balances.

tellyontellyon said:

Global warming is happening now.. in all sorts of ways capitalism is just as bad for the very wealthy... people who could be using their precious lives to attain Buddhahood are starving and dying of AIDS in numbers far greater than needs to be:

Malcolm wrote:

Human birth only becomes precious if you have met Buddhadharma.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 21st, 2014 at 10:45 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

muni said:

How can the Buddha be pure and the sentient beings impure? How can those be two?

Malcolm wrote:

Buddhas have no afflictions, sentient beings are defined by afflictions.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 21st, 2014 at 10:14 PM

Title: Re: Chinese Buddhism and the Anti-Japan War

Content:

Indrajala said:

The holy people who torched themselves in Viet Nam didn't seem to make much of a difference. Plenty of people still died and the communist regime won the war.

.

Malcolm wrote:

They made a huge difference. That image from Vietnam is one of the most enduring images in history. It will live on when most of the details of what caused it have faded from memory.

Indrajala said:

The war still continued, the communists won and America lost, only to engage in wars again and again in the following decades.

Malcolm wrote:

That image was one of the main things that caused the anti-war movement in the US. The US lost because of the US anti-war movement, not because the communists "won".

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 21st, 2014 at 9:19 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

Wrong Malcolm it is not just "more Marxist whinging", I'm actually talking about the misery of peoples lives. I don't claim any kind of realization, and the injustice of the current system can annoy me from time to time, but you are also wrong if you think that is my mindset and motivation is based on anger.

Malcolm wrote:

It is evident from the words that you write, your complaints on unfairness. Jealousy is still jealousy, even if on behalf of another. You really need to study Bodhicaryāvatara. Instead of rejoicing in people's wealth, and thereby sharing in their merit, you actually create negative karma for yourself by wanting to deprive them of that wealth.

Perhaps you should go to a Buddhist college and properly study Buddhism rather than rotting your mind with Marxist crack.

tellyontellyon said:

No Malcolm, I think we have to help people in a conventional way, that is a part of building merit. It is not enough to visualise yourself and all other beings as compassionate Buddhas... but then not actually do anything compassionate. We can do something about our Karma right now. Karma needs action as well as intention if it is to ripen.

Malcolm wrote:

The Buddha did not accumulate danapāramita by giving everyone all that they wanted, it was sufficient for him to sincerely wish that they had all their wants and needs fulfilled.

In fact, Buddha had a golden begging bowl, given to him by the gods. But he thought it ostentatious and so he threw it away in a river. Before throwing it away however, he noticed an impoverished family nearby. He thought to give it to them, but then, through his clairvoyance, he saw that this sudden wealth would merely cause this poor family all to be reborn in hell. So he threw it away. For centuries Hindus have criticized the Buddha for this act.

Further, making offerings to the Buddha (a pure object) is far more meritorious than relieving all the poverty of the world. The sentient beings of the six realms are the impure merit field. We make offerings to them out of compassion.

And, it is actually quite enough to imagine oneself and all sentient beings as buddhas. That is the Vajrayāna way of rapid Buddhahood. So yes, you even have to visualize all those capitalists, all those 300 or whatever number of wealthy people, as Buddhas. And in their guise as sentient beings, you should want them to have all the wealth that they have and rejoice in it. If they use it improperly, then that is a pity, but they had the merit to gain that wealth in this life and no one should take it away from them. If they are dodging their taxes, well, that is a different issue.

tellyontellyon said:

The socio-economic system is not something that just 'happens' to us, we are the ones doing it. Our socio-economic system is a form of activity, of action, of behaviour. But the socio-economic behaviour that we engage in under capitalism is damaging; and it pits one individual against another for survival destroying equanimity and encouraging a 'me', 'me', 'me' mentality.

Malcolm wrote:

The socio-economic behaviour under Marxism is just as damaging, as I have explained to you already, because it merely transfers ownership of production. Marxism also pits people against each other, you just don't see it yet because you are blinded by ideology.

tellyontellyon said:

I want a far more equal society, a world where one person's gain is not another person's loss.

Malcolm wrote:

There will always be loss and gain. This is natural. Increase here, a decrease there. This is just how conditioned things are.

The Marxists say they want an equal society, equal for who, and who decides what is equal? A committee? A bunch of bureaucrats? Who votes them in? Unions, the "proletariat"? Like all Marxists, you speak out of both sides of your mouth at once. Someone has to run things -- I prefer the randomness of American Democracy any day, even if it is propped up by capitalism, to the rule of a committee.

Your rhetoric is just like that of free marketeers who want unrestricted free trade, well, free for who? You are just one side of the same coin. Neither Marxism or Capitalism are adequate solutions. But of the two, I will favor capitalism, because it is the present system and it should not be brought down by a violent revolution. It cannot be brought down by a peaceful one. You must understand that this is reality. Bringing down capitalism will cause untold suffering for billions, worse suffering than there is even now.

In order for things to change, people must personally evolve, and that is the only solution to our present situation. And you cannot force people to evolve.

So, unfortunately my friend, while you are standing behind barricades fighting with the police, I will be doing what I do anyway, practicing, translating, teaching and seeing patients, fixing the bodies you break in your so called "revolution".

tellyontellyon said:

HH Dalai Lama favours the socio-economic system of socialism/Marxism as this is a better way of behaving on this planet. So I must reject your point of view. I base this not only on my own ideas and experience, but also on the fact that I give more weight and authority to HHDL's point of view than yours.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, I am well aware of HHDL's views on the matter, and I don't think you really understand his point. He does not want a revolution.

We all agree in principle that everyone deserves a fair shake and that capitalism as it stands now has problems. However, what he does not agree with is violence and revolution, and you have yet to show one single Marxist revolution that has not degenerated into total bloodshed.

Socialism and Marxism are not the same thing. There are many socialisms. Why a Buddhist picks the most evil materialist form of it is totally beyond understanding.

But beyond that, if you think a Marxist party should be in power, than vote one in. Good luck with that, because as far as I can tell, very few countries want that kind of Government.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 21st, 2014 at 7:37 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

more Marxist whinging

Malcolm wrote:

If you want to be wealthy, accumulate merit.

Basically, your view of the world is completely unBuddhist in every respect.

You are completely attached to material things. You completely lack any equanimity, your mind is a festering lagoon of resentment and anger, or so it appears.

You really need to give up this Marxist nonsense and turn your mind to Dharma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 21st, 2014 at 5:58 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

I haven't got a problem with capitalism simply because a very small minority are super rich. The richest 300 persons on Earth have more money than poorest 3 billion combined... though it is pretty awful when we consider a statistic like that.

Malcolm wrote:

Not really, wealthy has no relationship to happiness. In any case, you have the example of Bill Gates, who has taken his money and is trying to good works with it.

tellyontellyon said:

The real problem is how that wealth is wielded. In capitalism, the wealth, and control of the major levers of society, is wielded in a way that is very destructive and is leading us to social and environmental disaster. Is taking that power out of the hands of that tiny minority really so bad?

Malcolm wrote:

There are indeed problems with neoliberalism, but they will not be solved by Marxist Socialism. Its a dead end.

tellyontellyon said:

Buddhist ethics...

Malcolm wrote:

Never include taking the properties to which others lay claim without it being given to oneself freely.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 21st, 2014 at 5:54 AM

Title: Re: Internet Buddhism

Content:

tobes said:

Having said that, I think if you had Shankara around for tea one afternoon, he'd happily acknowledge that, and probably celebrate it.

Malcolm wrote:

I don't think so, after all, he shrilly denounced those who claimed Gaudapada was cribbing Buddhist arguments.

tobes said:

As well, he proposes that Buddhism at his time had degenerated into nihilism. But nonetheless, he is very careful to avoid denouncing particular views or methods, whereas Buddhists tend to proceed via a rather intense philosophical methodology of denouncing. It is an interesting difference.

Malcolm wrote:

Saying that Buddhism degenerated into nihilism is a pretty damning statement, no?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 21st, 2014 at 2:15 AM

Title: Re: Internet Buddhism

Content:

bob said:

At least on the internet, we can't literally kill each other...

Malcolm wrote:

We're working on that.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 21st, 2014 at 1:42 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

Socialism will confiscate the property of the capitalist and in return will secure the individual against poverty and oppression; it, in return for so confiscating, will assure to all men and women a free, happy and unanxious human life.

Malcolm wrote:

Promises, promises.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 21st, 2014 at 1:01 AM

Title: Re: Karma and Reincarnation

Content:

cloudburst said:

You still have the problem of how an inert object, or an object not somehow connected with consciousness, could exist without an essence. If something exists without depending upon mind, it will be inherent. You need to deal with this problem in a way other than just asserting your point.

Malcolm wrote:

That is not a problem in the slightest. Anything that arises from causes and conditions has no essence. Being nondependent on mind does not render something inherently existent.

cloudburst said:

In that case you can give an example of an object that is not and has never appeared to mind. If it is an object, it is an object of mind, or an appearance. What else?

Malcolm wrote:

No, because that would be an object that appeared to a mind. This does not however rule out the existence of things that have never appeared to any mind, which nevertheless are product so their own inert and nonsentient causes and conditions, and therefore, not inherently existent and nevertheless, not products of karma. Mental objects are one class of objects, material objects are another class of objects. You are conflating the two. A mental object (part of the dharmadhātu) is an object for the mano dhātu. A material object is an object for the other five dhātus, form for eye, etc. sure, all objects, mental and material, are objects of consciousnesses, sense or otherwise. You get nowhere differentiating mental consciousness from sense consciousness as they are all consciousness, or mind. I appreciate your presentation of the 18 elements, please explain how an object exists independently of mind without implying an essence. Before a mind is generated, if an object exists, it must exist independent of mind. Vasubandhu's presentation is finally a realist one. I am assuming you want to do better than that.

Vasubandhu's presentation is the one that Madhyamakas subscribe to conventionally. The point is that even Candrakīrti accepts that for an eye consciousness to be generated, the eye consciousness depends on an external form. According to your presentation, forms depend solely on consciousness and could never be asserted to exist externally, and as you stated, would not need eyes to be perceived. This would then render all sense organs nonfunctional and unnecessary. But there are so many negative consequences to this I could not possibly list them all.

It is not the intention of Madhyamaka to undermine this or that conventional presentation of the skandhas, dhātus and āyatanas, but merely to show that they are not paramārtha dharmas.

good.

I am interested to see if you can give an explanation of how a thunderstorm could exist that did not arise from karma, without employing a realist ontology.

[/quote]

You need to explain the karmic cause of such a storm.

Simply put however, thunderstorms arises from atmospheric causes and conditions.

There is no necessary precondition for a mind to generate those causes and conditions, and you equally cannot demonstrate how karma causes a thunderstorm.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 20th, 2014 at 10:59 PM

Title: Re: Internet Buddhism

Content:

kirtu said:

Two examples spring to mind: the total banning of references to Phabonhka Rinpoche at one point..

Malcolm wrote:

We never did that.

kirtu said:

The other thing is the banning of Zen people who said controversial things that are nonetheless in the mainstream of Zen - mainstream may be too strong, views that are acceptable in Zen but are not really mainstream Mahayana Buddhism (I remember this more as a discussion over the historical Buddha or what constitutes Buddhahood although the monk issue was there was well).

Malcolm wrote:

No one was ever banned for saying controversial things. People were suspended for their behavior, and banned for double-nicking, when they tried to go around suspensions.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 20th, 2014 at 10:06 PM

Title: Re: Mahamudra and Yogacara

Content:

smcj said:

Maybe if I'd learned Tibetan it would be less confusing.

Malcolm wrote:

Here is a fact -- among Indian authors there is very little disagreement about these things. Among Tibetans, there is great disagreement. That should clue you into something.

That some Tibetans consider Yogacara = vijñāptimātra/cittamātra is based in Indian sources. Fellows like Shtiramati were definitely classic "mind-only" proponents. He was a direct disciple of Vasubandhu. Further, another immediate, if not direct disciple, of Vasubandhu, Aryavimuktisena, criticizes Vasubandhu for his substantialism.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 20th, 2014 at 10:04 PM

Title: Re: Internet Buddhism

Content:

tobes said:

Having said that, I think if you had Shankara around for tea one afternoon, he'd happily acknowledge that, and probably celebrate it.

Malcolm wrote:

I don't think so, after all, he shrilly denounced those who claimed Gaudapada was cribbing Buddhist arguments.

tobes said:

But if you ever assert that a Buddhist master has been influenced by an orthodox Indian school, that is a charge of heresy.

Malcolm wrote:

We are not influenced by, we appropriate from, or reframe. There is a difference.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 20th, 2014 at 8:59 PM

Title: Re: Evolution and reincarnation

Content:

smcj said:

What are your feelings about maggot or insect mind?

I've often seen flys buzzing against a pane of glass in frustration. They can't see and can't understand what the obstruction is. I cannot think of a better analogy for a stifled Dharma practitioner.

Funny you should ask.

Malcolm wrote:

The three planes of existence blaze with suffering of aging and illness, here there is no protection from the intensely blazing fire of death, migrating beings born in the world are always confused, revolving like bees stuck in a pot.

--Lalitavistara Sūtra

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 20th, 2014 at 8:57 PM

Title: Re: Evolution and reincarnation

Content:

dharmagoat said:

The point that I have been making is that suffering/liberation is a solely human preoccupation. A maggot most likely has no concept of its suffering and therefore can't be considered to be suffering as a human would. As humans we can only guess how a maggot suffers, and so all we do is project our own experience. We falsely assume that a maggot has a bad life. But for a maggot, how can life be bad if there is no good life to compare it to?

Virgo said:

Surely maggots are not free of the three types of suffering?

dharmagoat said:

Actually, it would seem that maggots only suffer the first kind of suffering, that associated with birth, growing old, illness and dying. I would doubt that they have the capacity to experience the conceptually-based forms of suffering.

Malcolm wrote:

Dukha is not a feeling at base, that is the point of the third suffering, which refers to the fact that conditioned things decay.

Maggots definitely suffer. They feel pain, they feel hunger, etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 20th, 2014 at 8:54 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

Zhen Li said:

4. Who is really disenchanted with capitalism? People vote with their feet, and they prefer coming to a country ruled by law, where they can keep property without it being stolen by the government. There isn't mass migration to Venezuela or Cuba, quite the opposite, and anyone with half a brain and cerebellum has already left those countries for one where they can live and work in safety

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, but you know, all those people are counterrevolutionaries.

Zhen Li said:

If Socialists just want that transformation in the market, then they need to answer for the simple fact that if you spend more than you're making in returns, then that is unsustainable. If you haven't noticed, the US debt means it won't make it into the 22nd century as it is today.

Malcolm wrote:

It is an interesting question, as of right now, today, each US Taxpayer is 150,000 "in arrears" because of the (as of this moment) $17,336.595,xxx,xxx.xx debt the feds have wracked up.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 20th, 2014 at 7:45 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

Malcolm wrote

And you are not the rightful owner of my house

Marx would have called that personal property. When he talks about private property he is talking about the means of production. E.g. Power stations, oil companies, the pharmaceutical industry, roads, railroads, factories, banks and so forth.

Malcolm wrote:

So no free enterprise of any kind. Well, planned economies really don't work well at all, at least not at the population levels we have world wide.

tellyontellyon said:

Zhen Li wrote

Also adharmic is the notion of an "inherently right" view of a conditioned set of thoughts, known as Marxism or Socialism. They have no svabhāva, self-existence -- we can only define them according to convention, and conventionally the picture is pretty bleak for Marxism, Socialism and Communism.

Conditioned thoughts: True, but you couldn't you say the same about any written down theory, e.g. Quantum mechanics, existential philosophy, Deep Ecology, Buddhist scripture, or any conditioned set of thoughts about anything I suppose?

Malcolm wrote:

The salient point here is effectiveness. Marxist socialism has not proven to be effective, I simply think their system is unstable, results in huge inequality and condemns us to follow the course of greatest profit rather than what is best for the whole planet and the beings that live on it.

And Marx defines capitalism as progressive and a necessary phase of historical evolution. What Marx predicted was that socialism could only succeed in an advanced capitalist economy. Well, we are not there yet.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 20th, 2014 at 6:53 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

That doesn't make it ok. Land that was there for everybody, for communal use, was acquired by force by individuals.

Malcolm wrote:

This process is described by the Buddha.

Until humans beings eliminate the three afflictions from their minds (becoming Buddhas) there is no hope of your utopia.

tellyontellyon said:

To say that the Dharmic consequences have been suffered does not alter the fact that the stolen property has still not been given back to communal use. To its rightful owners .... all of us.

Malcolm wrote:

You did not define the commons. There is a commons to be sure.

But I am sure you have heard of the tragedy of the commons as well.

And you are not the rightful owner of my house. No one is but me, unless I cannot pay the taxes on its, and then the Government will seize it. So you see, there is already common ownership of everything. Governments basically grant a license of ownership. There is no such thing as absolutely ownership in our system of property law.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 20th, 2014 at 6:47 AM

Title: Re: Internet Buddhism

Content:

tobes said:

I can understand why you'd be a touch defensive about this - but note that I have not in any way singled out the mods for this; I have said nothing at all about policies or techniques of moderation.

Malcolm wrote:

Ok, my apologies.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 20th, 2014 at 5:32 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

Well, as I said before, there is a difference between personal property and private property.

Malcolm wrote:

And how is this distinction drawn? My clothes are my personal property, but my land is private property?

tellyontellyon said:

I think you are conflating violence with the aims of socialism.

Malcolm wrote:

No, I am merely pointing out the fact that communist revolutions tend to be long drawn out bloody affairs.

tellyontellyon said:

Ultimately it supports a society with no state, no money where we all contribute to each others welfare.

Malcolm wrote:

We are not headed into a utopia, my friend, we are heading into the age of strife. This imaginary stateless society you imagine will never exist. It is a pipe dream, it is a fantasy.

tellyontellyon said:

Theft: When Europeans turned up in the America's and started 'claiming' ownership of the land.

Malcolm wrote:

Actually, for the most part first English settlers at any rate, bought and paid for lands they used. Granted however they did allow themselves to take land they perceived as being unused and justified it under Lockean principles.

Then the King of England decided he owned the whole lot and started giving land grants.

tellyontellyon said:

Committing genocide against the native people who, so I've heard' had no concept of owning the land, or the sea or the sky for that matter...

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, indeed there was a cultural clash, with Indians having very different concepts of property than we did and do. The Indians lost. A human tragedy to be sure, but that happened in Britain as well. It happened to my Scottish ancestors who were pushed off their lands when the Highlands were fenced off. British soldiers murdered entire Scottish villages for resisting the fencing of the Highlands.

It has happened everywhere in the world. No one living anywhere in the world today, save a few peoples in the Amazon [and even then it is questionable] are the first people there who did not push someone else off their land.

tellyontellyon said:

When Europeans turned up and took that land... now that was theft. They have been dealing in stolen property ever since.

Malcolm wrote:

Not really. If no one owns it, it is free for the taking. That's what Europeans thought and that is now they behaved. I am sure that whatever nonvirtues the Pilgrims for example did, they experienced the ripening of their karma. I don't condone what they did, but I also don't feel responsible for it either.

I doubt very much you folks over in England of Norman blood are going to be paying reparations to the Saxons anytime soon, nor the Saxons to the Celts and so on. Or me for that matter, since you bloody Brits stole my land.

In reality, we need to remember the words of the Buddha:

"He abused me, he beat me, he defeated me, he robbed me,"--in those who harbour such thoughts hatred will never cease.

"He abused me, he beat me, he defeated me, he robbed me,"--in those who do not harbour such thoughts hatred will cease.

The basic problem with Marxist socialism is summed up nicely in the first line.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 20th, 2014 at 3:21 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

poor and rich people

Perhaps being born rich or poor is a matter of Karma? But that doesn't mean that they can't do something about it.

It is not the same as say being born with one leg... that is a fate you have to accept.

Malcolm wrote:

I nowhere said that one needed to accept the class into which one was born. You can work hard, get an education and improve your circumstances honestly.

What I said was that classes in society were a result of karma, not capitalism.

Also when your socialist brigades begin stealing people's houses "for the people", and closing their bank accounts "for the people", etc., this is just stealing, and it is a non virtuous act. Nationalizing the banks is theft. Theft results in poverty, not prosperity.

When you compare the Buddha's teachings with that of Marx, you will discover that nearly everything a revolution seeks to accomplish by Marxist methods are considered non-virtuous methods in Buddhadharma.

Incidentally, this does not mean that Buddhism regards modern capitalism as wise or virtuous, for it doesn't. It is just the other side of Marxist materialism. That was my point originally, you guys don't reject the capitalist means of production, you just want to own it. But it is that very means of production itself which is pernicious.

Frankly, my friend, I get the impression your education in Buddhadharma is rather limited.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 20th, 2014 at 3:03 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

Malcome

Malcolm wrote:

That would be "Malcolm"

tellyontellyon said:

As stated several times already. Real socialists do not consider Mao to be a socialist. He was really a Stalinist.

As with Stalin, it suited his regime to portray themselves as Marxists, in the same way that it suits the cheerleaders of capitalism to portray them as Marxists. But they are not. Mao thought that power came from the barrel of a gun, rather than from the solidarity of the 99%

Malcolm wrote:

You sound like Christians "Real Christians do not worship Pope", etc.

Mao was most certainly an ardent student of Marxist-Leninism. But you Trotskyists think you are the only "true" communists because it serves your purposes to place distance between you and the acts of your coreligionists. But Trotsky was also a murderer so as long as you support his acts, you will inherit the result of them, which is saddening for you.

tellyontellyon said:

Edit: You have a fatalistic view of Karma.

Malcolm wrote:

No, I have the Buddha's view of karma:

Master Gotama, what is the reason, what is the condition, why inferiority and superiority are met with among human beings, among mankind? For one meets with short-lived and long-lived people, sick and healthy people, ugly and beautiful people, insignificant and influential people, poor and rich people, low-born and high-born people, stupid and wise people. What is the reason, what is the condition, why superiority and inferiority are met with among human beings, among mankind?"

3. "Student, beings are owners of kammās, heirs of kammās, they have kammās as their progenitor, kammās as their kin, kammās as their homing-place. It is kammās that differentiate beings according to inferiority and superiority."

<http://www.accesstoinsight.org/lib/authors/nanamoli/wheel248.html#shorter>

Buddhism and Marxism are incompatible not least because their view of the creation of social classes is radically different. For Buddhists, social class is a result of karma. For Marxists, it is result of material relations. The two views cannot be reconciled.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 20th, 2014 at 2:10 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

I am afraid this is the more familiar picture of a revolutionary:

"The sign of a true revolutionary was his desire to kill."

Mao

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 20th, 2014 at 12:54 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

It is capitalism that produces the class divisions and antagonisms.

Malcolm wrote:

No, it is karma that create class division. Any Buddhist should be able to understand this with ease. I think you really need to study the Buddha's teachings on karma more in depth.

Class divisions existed long before capitalism, and will exist long after. The classes of the six realms were not created by capitalism. The various classes of animals were not created by capitalism. The classes of devas were not created by capitalism. etc.

Antagonism results when people whose karma landed them in inferior positions become jealous and wish to take from others who are more fortunate [for example, just as the asuras became jealous of the devas]. Likewise, when those who are more fortunate act selfishly and do not properly care for the less fortunate, this too causes class antagonism [for example, when the devas refused to share ambrosia with the asuras].

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 20th, 2014 at 12:50 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

[quote="Zhen Li"] it's just that they tend to be successful in the sense of not requiring gross injustice to maintain order.[/quotes]

In this degenerate age, that is a good start.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 20th, 2014 at 12:21 AM

Title: Re: Mahāmudrā & Dzogchen

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

You have a film on a movie projector. As you focus the image on the screen, the image appears to become brighter and more clear. But you have not changed or altered the film inside of the projector in anyway.

Likewise, though the visions appear to increase and decrease, they are not actually increasing and decreasing.

You can consider them to be the visible expression of the mind essence, this is why these appearances are termed wisdom appearances since they do not arise from mind.

Astus said:

Are you saying that one always experiences the same visions, except that there are times when one properly focuses and times when not?

Malcolm wrote:

No, Astus.

It is really useless to try and explain this to you over the internet. If you want to understand this, you must seek out a teacher and learn. Someone who can put the sugar in your hand and then have you taste it. Until you do that, you will not understand why Dzogchen makes the claims that it does.

Astus said:

That is, every experience is the same vision, but without the right eyes, they look like the ordinary five elements, but with the right eyes, they are the buddha families? Personally, I always thought of such a connection between elements and buddhas as rather symbolic, and not in a literal way that instead of a green recycle bin I see green Tara.

Malcolm wrote:

The connection between Buddha families and elements is not symbolic. It is actual. The element of air is Samayatara.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 20th, 2014 at 12:02 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

I think I have pointed out that even Marx thought that a socialist transformation of society could come about peacefully:

Malcolm wrote:

It has not succeeded yet, since it pitches classes of humans against each other.

tellyontellyon said:

I believe that the capitalist system is not capable of making the changes that society needs and that unless we make these changes we are heading towards barbarism.

Malcolm wrote:

The most barbaric period of human civilization was precisely when the communists were most active in trying to foment revolution all over the world, i.e. most of the 20th century.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 19th, 2014 at 11:51 PM

Title: Re: Mahāmudrā & Dzogchen

Content:

Astus said:

The nature of mind is without beginning or end, the visionary expressions are not. As they have beginning and end, they are dependently arisen, and as such, they are fabrications.

Malcolm wrote:

Astus: this is not correct.

You may think of this way. You have a film on a movie projector. As you focus the image on the screen, the image appears to become brighter and more clear. But you have not changed or altered the film inside of the projector in anyway.

Likewise, though the visions appear to increase and decrease, they are not actually increasing and decreasing.

You can consider them to the visible expression of the mind essence, this is why these appearances are termed wisdom appearances since they do not arise from mind.

But this is just explaining sweet to someone who has obviously never tasted sugar.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 19th, 2014 at 10:37 PM

Title: Re: Mahāmudrā & Dzogchen

Content:

mutusuk said:

No, but the visions are not objects of the senses. If you close your eyes, they arise anyway. They arise in the dark where your senses cannot perceive anything. They are not objects of the senses.

Malcolm wrote:

Just to elaborate a point here: they are an entopic phenomena which arise based on a very precise kind of subtle anatomy which is unique to Dzogchen.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 19th, 2014 at 10:28 PM

Title: Re: Mahāmudrā & Dzogchen

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

They do, but very few people understand what they are.

Astus said:

Shouldn't it be widespread at least within Tibetan Buddhism then? Many mahamudra teachers were and are familiar with dzogchen.

Malcolm wrote:

There are a lot of people who teach one thing but practice another.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 19th, 2014 at 10:13 PM

Title: Re: Mahāmudrā & Dzogchen

Content:

Astus said:

Then it should occur to everyone...

Malcolm wrote:

They do, but very few people understand what they are.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 19th, 2014 at 10:07 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

Malcolm says: "Hands up! We are looking for volunteers! .....Only a few billion."

The rest of the world says: "You first Malcolm".

Malcolm wrote:

I don't have children, and I don't intend on having children. One reduces population by not reproducing, not by executing sentient beings.

tellyontellyon said:

Well, as I said, I don't want socialists to seize political power by any means, period. Since there will be many people like me, if you try to seize power, you will be meet with resistance, and you lot will start murdering everyone who does not go along with your revolution, and it will be another red terror.

Why would they murder anybody? A revolution in a real Marxist sense is not carried out by a small band of 'reds', it is a movement involving and supported by the vast majority of the population. It is inherently democratic.

Malcolm wrote:

I see, that is why it has been so successful in the past.

tellyontellyon said:

E.g. The insurrection phase of the Russian revolution happened with barely a shot fired.

The ministers of the constituent assembly were called taxi's and sent home!
The bloodshed came about when the counter-revolutionaries, provoked and supplied with money, equipment and troops by the US,UK, France,Japan etc. etc. attacked.

Malcolm wrote:

It was not a democratic revolution. No one had a vote. The Bolsheviks nationalized all the banks, confiscated all private accounts, etc. Additionally the Cheka defined as counterrevolutionaries a very broad swath of persons, people who were wealthy were defined as counter revolutionary merely for being wealthy. This is the kind of logic that under the cultural revolution had the communists murdering high rinpoches in Tibet. My teacher, HH Sakya Trizin, still cannot return there. He was defined as a counter revolutionary when he was a young teenager.

tellyontellyon said:

That was when Russia degenerated into the brutal totalitarian democracy.

Malcolm wrote:

??? "totalitarian democracy"? This a contradiction in terms.

tellyontellyon said:

What about the democratically elected socialist govt. in Chile? Supported and cheered on by Reagan and Thatcher, a brutal dictatorship came to power and killed tens of thousands of trade unionists and socialists. Disgusting.

Malcolm wrote:

No argument there. But I have to be honest with you, compared to the millions murdered by Stalin and Mao, this pales.

tellyontellyon said:

In a genuine democracy people should be able to vote on what the laws are. Under capitalist systems (at least the ones that attempt to maintain some semblance of democracy) we still don't have real democracy. If a govt. doesn't do what international monopoly capitalism tells them to.... the generals suddenly appear.

Malcolm wrote:

It really depends on what you are defining as a democracy. For example you term the early Soviet state as a "totalitarian democracy", only the bizarre logic of Marxists could coin such a phrase.

The main point about all of this is that you, as a Buddhist, will not absolutely repudiate violence as a means to a political end. I think you have some reflection to do on the lack of suitability trying to mix Marxism with Buddhism.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 19th, 2014 at 9:50 PM

Title: Re: Mahamudra and Yogacara

Content:

conebeckham said:

and the assertion, if I recall, was that the dependent, purged of the imaginary, was the perfect nature...which would lead to the conclusion that the dependent "exists." I may be remembering this incorrectly....but for those of you interested in concepts and polemics, have at it....!!!

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, this is how Maitreyanatha, Asanga and Vasubandhu uniformly present the three natures. The idea that perfect is empty of both the dependent and the imagined is very late in Indian exegesis (10th century).

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 19th, 2014 at 9:21 PM

Title: Re: Chinese Buddhism and the Anti-Japan War

Content:

Indrajala said:

The holy people who torched themselves in Viet Nam didn't seem to make much of a difference. Plenty of people still died and the communist regime won the war.

.

Malcolm wrote:

They made a huge difference. That image from Vietnam is one of the most enduring images in history. It will live on when most of the details of what caused it have faded from memory.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 19th, 2014 at 9:17 PM

Title: Re: Internet Buddhism

Content:

tobes said:

I'll be honest: the internet gave me a massive wake up call about the state of Buddhism in non-traditional places.

The e-sangha days were remarkable in the history of Buddhism - when ever before have practitioners from every kind of existing tradition been able to communicate so effortlessly with each other?

And yet, it must be concluded that the balance between pluralism, openness, mutual learning and spiritual conceit, dogmatism, sectarian superiority, was decided in favour of the latter.

Malcolm wrote:

That is total bullshit, tobes. You really have no idea why E-Sangha evolved as it did. Most of the so called perception of sectarianism arose out of the need to ascertain who was a qualified ordained person. It was over this point that the rain of charges that we were sectarian fell.

The Theravadins split largely because they had already siloed themselves off on E-Sangha itself, and resented any perception of incursion on their turf by the moderating staff in general.

The confrontation between the ZFI folks and the board was over the question of "what is a monk".

In the end, everyone blames the moderating staff. But in the end, the failure of E-Sangha was a failure of its users, not our policies.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 19th, 2014 at 9:13 PM

Title: Re: Internet Buddhism

Content:

In the bone yard said:

Well yea, the internet is not real communication because there's no energy exchange. No one will successfully receive the pointing out instructions over the internet.

Malcolm wrote:

So you means ChNN's webcasts are useless?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 19th, 2014 at 7:29 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

reddust said:

I looked up studies through Universities on "Deep Ecology." Deep Ecology and UN's Agenda 21 are usually studied together with a bunch of other economic stuff, both want drastic reduction of human population.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, the easiest way to manage a general global population reduction would be subject parenting to licensure, which seems to me to be a good idea anyway.

Drastic (peaceful) reductions in human population will ensure there are resources for many future generations of humans, plants and animals to come. It will ensure cultural diversity amongst humans, etc. There are no downsides, only upsides.

reddust said:

I think there would be downsides because people aren't perfect and those who hold the power to license won't be perfect. I've found a lot of books on Deep Ecology, 6 of them so far and I am going to read up. I looked the theory up on the net and will do some deep study before I form an opinion. Thanks for the data Malcolm, I really appreciate new (for me) ideas and views.

Malcolm wrote:

“ Dans ses écrits, un sage Italien
Dit que le mieux est l'ennemi du bien.

(In his writings, a wise Italian says that the best is the enemy of the good) ”

-- Voltaire

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 19th, 2014 at 7:25 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

Zhen Li said:

Population might collapse without any push from governments.

Malcolm wrote:

It might. But it would be good the manage the process no?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 19th, 2014 at 6:55 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

reddust said:

I looked up studies through Universities on "Deep Ecology." Deep Ecology and UN's Agenda 21 are usually studied together with a bunch of other economic stuff, both want drastic reduction of human population.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, the easiest way to manage a general global population reduction would be subject parenting to licensure, which seems to me to be a good idea anyway.

Drastic (peaceful) reductions in human population will ensure there are resources for many future generations of humans, plants and animals to come. It will ensure cultural diversity amongst humans, etc. There are no downsides, only upsides.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 19th, 2014 at 6:05 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

The flourishing of human life and cultures is compatible with a substantially smaller human population. The flourishing of non-human life requires a smaller human population.

How much smaller and how are you planning to reduce it.

Malcolm wrote:

Ideally human world population should never exceed the world population of the late eighteenth century, so around 100,000,000.

Of course, this population reduction must be voluntary, because everyone understands the importance of a steady state economy and world.

tellyontellyon said:

Buddha was not a revolutionary in any sense that you would recognize.

That is self evidently not true as my post indicated that I do indeed consider the Buddha a revolutionary.

Malcolm wrote:

The Buddha did not intend to change society, he did not seize political power, in fact, Buddha impressed upon his disciples the need to maintain the status quo.

tellyontellyon said:

Perhaps you should reconsider your narrow view that revolution=violence.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, as I said, I don't want socialists to seize political power by any means, period.

Since there will be many people like me, if you try to seize power, you will be meet with resistance, and you lot will start murdering everyone who does not go along with your revolution, and it will be another red terror.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 19th, 2014 at 4:51 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

Basically, I prefer the present world order with all its warts and inconstancies to a world order that would be run by totalitarians such as yourself.

This tells me two things:

1) You are happy with the status quo. 2) You think I am a totalitarian.

For point 1... then why are you posting in engaged Buddhism.

On point 2.... you are simply wrong.

Malcolm wrote:

Please describe to me your "workers democracy" and how it would be different than the present democratic order. How will you bring it about? By force if necessary?

As for being happy with the status quo, that term does not apply. I am neither happy nor unhappy about it. As Arne Naess puts it:

Should the world's misery and the approaching ecocatastrophe make one sad? My point is that there is no good reason to feel sad about all this. According to the philosophies I am defending, such regret is a sign of immaturity, the immaturity of unconquered passiveness and lack of integration.

Naess, Arne (2009-05-01). The Ecology of Wisdom: Writings by Arne Naess (p. 125). Counterpoint. Kindle Edition.

What I said was that I prefer the status quo to a totalitarian regime. But I am under no illusion about the fact that things must change deeply.

tellyontellyon said:

As I said earlier, the corrupt, violent and destructive capitalist system is going to lead to even greater problems in the future including more wars, starvation, environmental disaster. Also it was economic problems and the capitalistic quest for power, markets, land and resources that led to the wars, not the other way around. Billions will die if we don't respond.

Malcolm wrote:

If you respond with force, you will just hasten the bloodshed.

The first thing we need to do is revoke the Treaty of Rome, Naess again:

Economic globalization is somewhat misleading. A better term might be globalization of the four freedoms, referring to the so-called four freedoms of the Treaty of Rome, which was the basis for the European Common Market and is still at the core of the present-day European Union (EU). The document's style of globalization implies successive expansion of its "four freedoms" until it also covers trade among the three giants, the European Union, the United States (and Canada), and Japan, and reluctantly over the rest of the globe. The term four freedoms refers to the free (duty-free) crossing of goods and materials through borders, the free flow of services, the freedom to compete for jobs anywhere (people), and the freedom of capital to flow across any borders. The four freedoms imply four prohibitions, the violation of which will be punished by the authorities. Namely, the freedoms involve strong, adequate protection—for social, medical, ecological, or other reasons of cultural relevance—against the import of certain goods or services, or against certain kinds of flow of foreign capital into a local, regional, or any other limited area, for example, the Arctic coast of Norway.

Naess, Arne (2009-05-01). The Ecology of Wisdom: Writings by Arne Naess (p. 287). Counterpoint. Kindle Edition.

In other words, we need to start undoing, legally, neo-liberal policies. But while doing that, we need to understand, as Vandana Shiva eloquently writes:

Today, we need to overcome a much wider and deeper apartheid, an eco-apartheid based on the illusion of separateness, of humans from nature, in our minds and lives. This is an illusion because we are part of nature and earth, not apart from it...Today, we need to overcome a much wider and deeper apartheid, an eco-apartheid based on the illusion of separateness, of humans from nature, in our minds and lives. This is an illusion because we are part of nature and earth, not apart from it. Redefining the economy by embedding it in society and nature is the first step in a paradigm shift. Shifting from GDP and GNP to measures of real wealth, welfare, well-being and happiness is another. Wealth is derived from “weal” (well-being), its original meaning is “condition of well-being”.

She also writes:

Commodification and privatisation are based and promoted on the flawed belief that price equals value. However, all those working for justice in land and water rights and preventing the ecological abuse of land and water, are asking for the opposite – the inalienable right to resources, and in the case of common property resources like water, the inalienability of common rights. The second paradigm of the green economy is earth-centred and people-centred. The resources of the earth vital to life – biodiversity, water, air – are a commons for the common good for all, and a green economy is based on a recovery of the commons and the intrinsic value of the earth and all her species. It would put nature’s ecological cycles as the drivers and shapers of the economy, it would put people first, not investors, and build on women’s core contributions to create economies of sustenance and care that enhance the well-being of all. The industrial/corporate system of food production uses ten times more units of energy as inputs than it produces as food. It wastes 50 per cent of the food produced; it uses and pollutes 70 per cent of the water on the planet; it has destroyed 75 per cent of the biodiversity in agriculture; and it contributes 40 per cent of the greenhouse gases that are destabilising the climate and further threatening food security. By contrast, earth-centred agriculture produces twice as much food as the inputs it uses; it conserves biodiversity; it mitigates and adapts to climate change; it protects the earth; farmers and public health.

Shiva, Vandana, Pluto Press. Kindle Edition.

My basic point here is that classical Marxism, with its narrow minded materialism and so on is just not up to the job of an ecological transformation of humanity. That transformation must spring from the world spiritual traditions.

tellyontellyon said:

Me, Karl Marx and HH Dalai Lama all believe that a non-violent transformation of society to a socialist/marxist may be possible. You are entitled to your opinion and me to mine.

Malcolm wrote:

I think you ought to leave HHDL out of it. I am quite sure he is not a socialist revolutionary. We need an ecological evolution, not a workers revolution. We need to reject the very industrial economy that lies at the heart of all our environmental, social and political troubles, and we need to do so globally and non-violently.

tellyontellyon said:

You said my view is anthropocentric? If by that you mean that I am saying the problems on this planet are caused by the humans then I would agree and don't really see why you object to that?

Malcolm wrote:

No, I mean that your view is not biocentric.

tellyontellyon said:

What then is the bio-centric or Deep Ecology way of looking at things? I must confess to not knowing about this.

Malcolm wrote:

The well-being and flourishing of human and non-human life on Earth have value in themselves (synonyms: intrinsic value, inherent worth). These values are independent of the usefulness of the non-human world for human purposes.

Richness and diversity of life forms contribute to the realization of these values and are also values in themselves.

Humans have no right to reduce this richness and diversity except to satisfy vital needs.

The flourishing of human life and cultures is compatible with a substantially smaller human population. The flourishing of non-human life requires a smaller human population.

Present human interference with the non-human world is excessive, and the situation is rapidly worsening.

Policies must therefore be changed. These policies affect basic economic, technological, and ideological structures. The resulting state of affairs will be deeply different from the present.

The ideological change will be mainly that of appreciating life quality (dwelling in situations of inherent value) rather than adhering to an increasingly higher standard of living. There will be a profound awareness of the difference between bigness and greatness.

Those who subscribe to the foregoing points have an obligation directly or indirectly to try to implement the necessary changes.

<http://www.haven.net/deep/council/eight.htm>

tellyontellyon said:

Wasn't the American constitution born out of a revolution? Wasn't the Buddha also revolutionary in his own way, he challenged the status quo, he wasn't happy to leave things as they were.

Malcolm wrote:

The Constitution was born out of centuries of Jurisprudence. It was not born of a war.

The Constitution was written because the Articles of Confederation, which was the constitution of the wartime government, was inadequate.

Buddha was not a revolutionary in any sense that you would recognize.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 19th, 2014 at 3:25 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

In a genuinely socialist/marxist society you would not be ruled by the working class.

Marx never idealised the working class. He just thought that because of their key role in production that they were in the position to overthrow capitalism.

His view was that it is capitalism that produces the different classes. His desire was for us all to be treated equally, a society without class.

If we want to get rid of the class and caste systems then I think we have to get rid of the system that produces and perpetuates them.

Malcolm wrote:

We never going to be rid of different classes in this world because the karma of sentient beings is what creates disparities, not economics. I just explained this to you.

tellyontellyon said:

Your view of Karma sounds a bit fatalistic, surely we can through our actions make a better world, and of course improve our karma for future lives.

Malcolm wrote:

My view of karma is directly based on Buddha's teachings.

tellyontellyon said:

The truth of Karma doesn't just mean we can hang our boots up and not try to do anything.

Malcolm wrote:

Of course, no one is suggesting that.

tellyontellyon said:

If Buddhist monks are getting caught up using scripture to justify nationalistic violence... well, it's still violence?

Malcolm wrote:

Indeed, but it is not Buddhist violence, it is nationalist violence. There are no Buddhist scriptures at all that advocate nationalist violence on any level. There are also no Buddhist scriptures which advocate revolution either.

tellyontellyon said:

I'm not in any way suggesting that that is the fault of Buddhism, I simply make the point that Karma is produced by action rather than ideology as such. I also wanted to make the point that mischievous people can take even a peaceful ideology and use it to their own ends.

Malcolm wrote:

Karma, my friend, is volition and what comes from volition. The fruit of karma arises from that.

tellyontellyon said:

As far as Deep Ecology is concerned. Democracy is fatally skewed by the power of the super-rich and big corporations, hedge-funds etc. "He who calls the piper calls the tune". If we want control over our environment then we need collective ownership. You can't control what you don't possess. The track record so far shows big business is guided by the profit motive, not by the needs of the many or by environmental considerations.

Malcolm wrote:

Ownership is an anthropocentric concept. It is not a biocentric concept. So your statement right there is flawed from a DE perspective.

You will not achieve collective ownership ever. In order to bring that about you will have to fight a long, bloody war with billions dead. The notions of property rights are too deeply embedded in our legal systems.

In order to change those you will have to overthrow entire governments and social orders.

Basically, I prefer the present world order with all its warts and inconstancies to a world order that would be run by totalitarians such as yourself. You will kill billions in your ideological zeal to create a "classless" society [but of course there are always classes and always elites]. It would be better for you just to pray for rebirth in a pure land, there are no classes there.

Western Democracies at this point are too stable for your kind of revolutionary politics to ever be successful (Thank Buddha). The only reason why the Russian Revolution had a prayer of success is that the war footing of the western powers created serious economic instability worldwide. The same was true of China forty years later.

The only solution to the world's problems is the abandonment of violence at all costs, and slowly educating people one person at a time. Inner evolution is the only key to the world's problems, not outer revolution.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 19th, 2014 at 2:34 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

Trots are and have always been religious fanatics. They are the Shia of the Communist world.

Malcolm, again why are you picking on muslims, in this case Shia muslims. All the muslims I have met are decent people, peaceful and not fanatics.

Malcolm wrote:

I wasn't picking on Muslims, I was making a comparison. Trots are a minority, have a charismatic leader who was killed, etc.

tellyontellyon said:

I'm sure that it is not possible to reconcile Trotskyist (orthodox marxist) ideology with Buddhist ideology. But in practice, the modern party I am involved in is involved in arguing for peace, ending wars, standing against nuclear arms.

Malcolm wrote:

There are a lot of political parties that argue for peace, ending war, and are anti-nuclear, you know, like the Green Party of the UK.

tellyontellyon said:

Despite Buddhist pacifist ideology, that same ideology has at times also been used as a justification for violence. We see that in Sri Lanka, Burma, Thailand. Most countries with Buddhist majority populations have the death penalty, all have armies. Look how Zen Buddhists priests relied on scripture to justify genocide during WWII.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, you know they didn't really. Zen Priests in Japan got mixed up in nationalism. The same problem exists in Sri Lanka, Burma and Thailand. This is the fault of nationalism, not Buddhism.

tellyontellyon said:

Like this from the Upaya-kaushalya Sutra, a Mahayana text that's name literally means 'skillful means.'

While on board a ship, Shakyamuni [Buddha] discovers that there is a robber intent on killing all five hundred of his fellow passengers. Shakyamuni ultimately decides to kill the robber, not only for the sake of his fellow passengers but also to save the robber himself from the karmic consequences of his horrendous act. In doing so, the negative karma from killing the robber should have accrued to Shakyamuni but it did not...

Malcolm wrote:

You do understand that the bodhisattva in this story possessed clairvoyance and was able to read the thief's mind? Correct? Do you possess such clairvoyance?

Without taking this fact into account, the story becomes skewed. The story in the Ārya-upāyakaśālya-nāma-mahāyāna-sūtra is not intended to demonstrate that Buddhists should engage in violent interventions. It is intended to demonstrate the amazing capacities of a bodhisattva on the stages. There is another story in the Jatakas where the bodhisattva, when he was reborn as Viśvaṃtara, gave his wife and children away to a brahmin in order to practice the perfection of giving.

tellyontellyon said:

You posted some of the most inflammatory things that Marx wrote. But Marx's ideas developed over his lifetime and must be taken in the context of the historical situation and in the context of what violence others were doing at the time. Marx also said that he thought in advanced countries, with well developed democracy that a genuinely socialist society could come about without revolution.

The fact is when we are talking about Marx we have to ask: which Marx?

You also have to use marxist language with care, for example 'Dictatorship of the Proletariat' simply means workers democracy. They used words differently in the 1840's.

Malcolm wrote:

Marx was:

a materialist (Charvaka) argued that violence was acceptable, and even necessary was a proponent of forced wealth redistribution (theft), which is and always has been bad economic policy. Taxation is always a better solution.

You have to understand I have read Marx. Marx can be amusing, for example his critique of colonialism at the end of Capital.

tellyontellyon said:

For example, revolution sounds pretty nasty but:

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Revolutionary\_socialism

The term revolutionary socialism refers to socialist tendencies that subscribe to the doctrine that social revolution is necessary in order to effect structural changes to society. More specifically, it is the view that revolution is a necessary precondition for a transition from capitalism to socialism. Revolution is not necessarily defined as a violent insurrection; it is defined as seizure of political power by mass movements of the working class so that the state is directly controlled by the working class as opposed to the capitalist class and its interests.[1] Revolutionary socialists believe such a state of affairs is a precondition for establishing socialism.

Malcolm wrote:

I don't want the state to be controlled by the working class, per se.

I have no confidence whatsoever that a workers state will have a Deep Ecological outlook. Marxism and Deep Ecology are at odds because the former is anthropocentric and the latter is biocentric.

In the end, I think that, as far as it goes, American Democracy and its analogues in other countries is the best system of government we humans have yet come up, and I do not see Marxist socialism as any improvement at all.

I am a Buddhist. Just as the Buddha did not believe in caste, I do not believe that one "class" has an inherent moral superiority to another class: this is materialist thinking.

Buddhist thinking maintains that people are born into poverty or wealth because of their karma. There are social classes because people's actions in past lives define where they are born in this one, just as their past actions define whether sentient are born as animals or devas.

tellyontellyon said:

In any case, wouldn't it be far far better to talk about what actually needs to be done rather than focus on abstract ideology and throwing quotes back and forth?

Malcolm wrote:

Marxists have very Marxian ideas about what needs to be done, and as part of the Judeo-Christian tradition, they tend to have the view that the planet is here to serve humans, its resources rightly belonging to humans. This is not only contra Buddhist principles, it is contra deep ecological principles.

tellyontellyon said:

It is our actions that really matter.

Malcolm wrote:

It is meritorious to want to help people, of course, but one must not lose sight of what actually creates diversity in this world: it is not economics, it is karma. You can be sure that those super wealthy people who do nothing to benefit others are exhausting their karma. There is nothing to be angry about. They are to be pitied because in their next life, they will be worse than paupers. Nāgārjuna says:

If one becomes a king through long veneration, one does not pursue wealth, family, and friends;
also no matter where people go or live, action follows just like a shadow.

If you accumulate positive actions in this life, in the next life you not need to struggle for your wants and needs. If you find you are in place of leisure and wealth in this life, use it for Dharma practice and to help those you can.

tellyontellyon said:

As for saying that Buddhists would be better off not getting involved in politics... well, that's not really possible. Unless you live alone in a cave (and I'm not knocking that btw), then you have a responsibility to contribute to the communal activities of living in a community. That includes working out how you are going to live together, treat each other etc. etc. Restricting contact to members of the Sangha or only to non-materialists is not always possible if you are not a monk. It certainly isn't possible where I live in Wales.

Malcolm wrote:

The commitments of refuge to the Sangha does not mean that one does not mean that one does not do business and cultivate friendships with non-buddhists, etc., it means that one avoids those who would seek to harm Buddhism or who are engaged in very non-virtuous lifestyles.

tellyontellyon said:

Even if you are a monk, then I still think that monks need to have a think about the food and donations they receive in their alms bowl: I think it is not enough simply to have gratitude... What did the worker have to go through to be able to make that donation?

Malcolm wrote:

As long as your focus is one class, you will have a biased view. Your focus needs to be on all sentient beings.

tellyontellyon said:

Think how many young women, even underage girls in places like Thailand feel pushed into prostitution in order to put meals on the family table.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, this is a pity, so of course the education of women is a desiderata around the world.

tellyontellyon said:

When monks are meditating on loving kindness, they should spend some time meditating on what some of the poorest and hardest working people in the world have to go through in order to keep them well fed.

Malcolm wrote:

Making donations to the Three Jewels is the best way to ensure one's rebirth will be higher in the next life, with more opportunity. Encouraging others to do so is also meritorious. It is also meritorious to help others as much as one can. It is not meritorious to foment social revolutions when the result is so often death, destruction and war.

tellyontellyon said:

Anyway, whether you agree with me or not. Please, Please stop having sideways stabs at the Muslims, it undermines your own argument and makes you look intolerant.

Malcolm wrote:

I have nothing personal against Muslims. It is their karma to be born Muslims, with animal sacrifice as a major and important part of their religion. In my opinion, part of the reason that Islamic countries have such a high level of violence is that their religion condones animal sacrifice. There is an observable level of poverty and violence that afflicts every nation in which there is a major religion that sanctions animal sacrifice. This is one of the reasons why Southern Hemisphere countries have such problems.

You might object, what about the 60 billion animals a year that are slaughtered for meat to feed the North? The karmic cause is different, therefore the effect is different.

I have a lot of issues with both Islam and Christianity in general. They both are authors of great destruction and havoc in the world. I don't trust Islamic states, or indeed any religious state (including "Buddhist" ones) on any level in general. Thanks goodness one of the effects of the American Constitution was the elimination of state religions in Western Democracies for the most part.

In fact, Marxism and Islam have many structural similarities, similarities noted by George Bataille in his work, The Accursed Share. You should read it.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 19th, 2014 at 12:58 AM

Title: Re: Evolution and reincarnation

Content:

shel said:

So before humans evolved all sentient beings were stuck in a 'narrow' existence, and no existence at for billions of years before life evolved in the universe.

Malcolm wrote:

You are following a "just so story". You have no idea when life first appeared in the universe, if indeed it "first appeared".

shel said:

Yeah, and the universe revolves around the earth...

Malcolm wrote:

My point is that someone told you that there was no life in the universe a x time and you believed them. You have no evidence of such a fact. As you know, the Buddha taught that universe expands and contracts cyclically. This accounts for the appearance increasing complexity, etc. if we are being completely honest, we just admit that we don't know beyond what we can observe and trust the accounts that make the most sense to us for those things we cannot observe. So for example, I don't think that Meru cosmology is particularly true as a "fact"; it is a hierarchical metaphor with roots in ancient mythology.

Evolution is something I accept because it is can predicted. Karma and rebirth is something that I accept because I do not find the materialist presentations of consciousness especially compelling. If I did, I would not bother to be a Buddhist.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 19th, 2014 at 12:40 AM

Title: Re: Evolution and reincarnation

Content:

shel said:

So before humans evolved all sentient beings were stuck in a 'narrow' existence, and no existence at for billions of years before life evolved in the universe.

Malcolm wrote:

You are following a "just so story". You have no idea when life first appeared in the universe, if indeed it "first appeared".

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 19th, 2014 at 12:10 AM

Title: Re: Sanskrit for Nang-wa Tha-yay?

Content:

pemachophel said:

Thanks for the responses. Just to be clear: so are Nang-wa Tha-yay and Od-pag-med synonyms? Are they simply two different Tibetan translations of Amitabha? IOW, when translating these into English, should both terms simply be translated as Amitabha?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, they are alternate translations of the same Sanskrit word.

Amitābha.

Amita = dpag med, immeasurable, etc.

abha = 'od, light, splendour, etc.

You can clearly see this in titles translated in the tengyur.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 18th, 2014 at 9:54 PM

Title: Re: Mahāmudrā & Dzogchen

Content:

mutsuk said:

[

For the record, this was what Astus wrote, not me.

Malcolm wrote:

My bad, I did not notice your name in there, I wrote the first post on my Ipad...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 18th, 2014 at 9:34 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

Zhen Li said:

I trust the translation, but to interpolate that this means the "consent of the people" in the modern sense of that phrase, I would not. This was the extent of your claim, and I don't accept it.

As regards the idea that the monarch is supposed to be "enlightened," no I don't believe in this either, not in the sense of buddha. However, speaking in terms of practical management of a kingdom, the rule of one who is unenlightened but selected for perceived management capacity, is wiser than the rule of all indiscriminately, who all at the same time are unenlightened. There really is such a thing as too many chefs in the kitchen, i.e. more than one. So, be careful with how far you think my claims are extending -- they may not encompass the breadth you imagine them to. However, I do appreciate your comments, they are by far the most constructive so far.

Malcolm wrote:

as you will recall, Mahā-sammata (an earlier incarnation of the Buddha, and also the Buddhist Manu) was appointed king by farmers who wanted to protect grain they had begun to store. Walsh clearly translates the Buddha explaining that the title Mahasammata means "The People's Choice" and he would only do so based on a commentarial gloss. Also you can find this explained in this alternate translation:

‘He is appointed [agreed to] by the people (mahā, janena sammato),’<sup>114</sup> Vāsetṭha and Bhāradvāja; therefore, he is called “the great elect” (mahā sammata.

<http://dharmafarer.org/wordpress/wp-content/uploads/2009/12/2.19-Agganna-S-d27-piya.pdf>

Zhen Li said:

No it doesn't. There are many nuances about democracy as it exists today that don't exist in monarchy. For one, the king is elected by those who have a real stake in the value of the kingdom, not everyone you can find (definitely no baby suffrage here).

Malcolm wrote:

This is not a valid argument, when we say "people", we obviously do not mean babies, we mean adults in full possession their faculties, not those under the authority of others such as children.

Zhen Li said:

Okay, I don't quite see your point. I thought this was about whether monarchy is actually democracy.

Malcolm wrote:

The point is that Kings derive their authority from the people, not from heaven.

Zhen Li said:

To reconsider the possibility that I might reply to tellyontellyon's post from earlier, I now think that the main problem is that tellyontellyon might be viewing Marxism in too religious a manner, interpolating all of his own desires of what he thinks the ideal Marx is, that he's unable to see that the reality of Marxism and Trotskyism is not just as he so pleases. With such faith, in place of potential reason, I don't believe it currently possible to engage in any constructive or deconstructive dialogue with regards to Marxism and Trotskyism with tellyontellyon.

Malcolm wrote:

Trots are and have always been religious fanatics. They are the Shia of the Communist world.

Zhen Li said:

However, to address the small matter of an accusation of misrepresentation on my part with regards to the title of one of Trotsky's books, the 1921 Labour Publishing Co. and Allen & Unwin, London edition is indeed named The Defence of Terrorism. Indeed, the idea that Marxist terrorism consists purely of general strikes and paper cuts from leaflets is to ignore and turn a blind eye to the millions of people who died in the name of Communist Terror as most vocally advocated and organised by Leon Davidovich Trotsky.

Malcolm wrote:

Terrorism was not invented by Marx, but he certainly considered it a valid tool to use in a revolution. And you are right, Trotsky was a mass murderer who from a Buddhist point of view is certainly suffering in a lower realm because of his own actions.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 18th, 2014 at 9:09 PM

Title: Re: Mahāmudrā & Dzogchen

Content:

Astus said:

The process is a removal of afflictions, and the visions are a sign of that, so they don't appear simply because of the natural state, and thus their disappearance is the final accomplishment. I didn't think dissolution here means total nothing, otherwise it wouldn't be the achievement of buddhahood for the benefit of all beings. Just as in mahamudra non-meditation is not about absolute non-activity. However, it seems to me that thogal and its visions is only one possible method of purification, and not the culmination of everything else, therefore other paths don't need it.

Malcolm wrote:

It is not really a process of removing afflictions, it is more of a process of afflictions becoming undone on their own.

Some people assert that the increase of the visions occurs separately from the karmic winds, using this as an example of why for example thogal is superior to other completion stage practices, but too is also not precisely correct. The movement of karmic vāyus in the body is a result of affliction, and it is precisely these that hinder the development of the thogal visions. The postures are meant to still these vāyus which is why you have to remain in them for long periods.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 18th, 2014 at 8:52 PM

Title: Re: Mahāmudrā & Dzogchen

Content:

mutsuk said:

...but that doesn't mean that they don't follow the same process of the build up of a vision and then the vision's dissolution. That's why I said it is like creation and completion.

Malcolm wrote:

The visions in dzogchen are not conceptual constructs like visualizations of the creation and completion stage.

The vanishing of the visions is likened to bands of light returning into a prism, i.e, the colors are inherent in the crystal, but there are no more conditions which cause the potentiality (rtsal) of the crystal to manifest externally.

Thus the buddhaforms and so on that one sees always exist in oneself as the potentiality of the threefold wisdom of the basis, original purity, natural perfection, and compassion. Of these three what actually appears to be an external vision is the compassion aspect.

The Sakyapa explanation of the cause of the appearance of the visions of the first stage of the six branch yoga resembles the explanation of the genesis of the thogal vision of dharmatā. The similarities seem to end there.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 18th, 2014 at 10:35 AM

Title: Re: Evolution and reincarnation

Content:

shel said:

Yes that's the point, there's no hierarchy in evolution, whereas there's a fixed hierarchy Buddhism. That constitutes an irreconcilable difference.

Malcolm wrote:

There is no "hierarchy" in terms of karma. You land where you have the karma to land and that's it.

shel said:

You're saying it's no better to land a maggot than to land a saint?

Malcolm wrote:

Quantitatively yes, qualitatively no in so far as both are sentient beings.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 18th, 2014 at 10:00 AM

Title: Re: Evolution and reincarnation

Content:

smcj said:

The seminal text for the Yogacara and subsequent views is the Uttara Tantra.

Malcolm wrote:

Not really, it is the seminal commentary on the Tathāgatagarbha school (viz total absence of reference to concepts like ālaya-vijñāna).

Madhyantavibhanga, Dharmadharmatāvibhanga and Mahāyānasūtra alambkāra are the Yogacara commentaries.

In India there were three major trends in Mahāyāna:

Prajñāpāramitā --> Tathāgatagarbha --> Yogacara

The later two incorporating and modifying ideas found in the earlier.

smcj said:

S.K. Hookam's book traces Yogacara/Shentong to the Uttaratantra. That's what I'm going by.

Malcolm wrote:

Yogacara is an Indian school; gzhan stong is a Tibetan school based on Kalacakra. They are really completely different.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 18th, 2014 at 9:58 AM

Title: Re: Mahāmudrā & Dzogchen

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

... This is the reason why vase breath is used extensively even in so called sems sde.

dzogchungpa said:

Why "so-called" ?

Malcolm wrote:

Because the term sems sde only begins to be used in the Vima sNying thig, and the later criticisms of sems sde from the point of sNying thig are more political than anything else. After all, Longchenpa's Chos dbying mdzod is pretty much a commentary on the view of the bodhicitta texts, but it is praised as being the dharmakāya in book form.

In some respects, I am sympathetic to Astus's statement that man ngag sde is a return to "tantrism", but he has it slightly wrong. man ngag sde represents a desire to ground Dzogchen in its own completely independent system of empowerments, and one can see that it takes a page out of the Kalacakra system of the common four empowerments and then a system of the "higher four empowerments". Please do recall that famed Three Words of Garab Dorje did not even exist until the 1120's when the Vima Nyingthig was revealed by Zhangton Tashi Dorje. Prior to this was the seventeen tantra system of the four empowerments [elaborated, unelaborated, etc.]

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 18th, 2014 at 9:48 AM

Title: Re: Mahāmudrā & Dzogchen

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Its not only those two systems, it is merely articulated most clearly in those two systems.

Astus said:

You mean you know some teachings from other schools too that give similar methods?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, the ṣaḍaṅgayoga system is actually rather widespread and not confined to Kalacakra, though it is mostly clearly articulated in that system.

Astus said:

Yes, the criticism of the White Self-Sufficient Remedy.

Malcolm wrote:

No, dkar po gcig thub is not the same as the system of the four yogas of mahāmudra, they are actually critiqued by Sapan separately and for entirely different reasons. The former is a sudden awakening scheme (which Sapan calls "Chinese Dzogchen"), and Sapan criticizes the latter as a misapplication of Ratnakaraśanti's presentation of of four "yogas" in his Madhyamakālaṃkara.

Astus said:

I'd rather like to understand the reason behind considering the appearance of drops and buddhas - that result in their return to the natural state anyway - is the necessary next step.

Malcolm wrote:

I don't know the Kalacakra system well enough to opine about this; but in thogal the four visions appear not because the "natural" state is somehow lacking; they appear in their sequence because persons possess affliction and afflictions attenuate the visions as as they naturally unravel the visions first increase and then vanish. However, the idea that at the end of the four visions there are no appearances is a complete misconception. I will merely quote the beginning of Shabkar's discussion of the fourth vision on this point:

It so happens that in the past some Dzogchenpas have asserted that the kāyas [visible forms] and wisdoms [expressed as the five lights] do not exist within the state of original purity, but this is a great error.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 18th, 2014 at 8:05 AM

Title: Re: Mahāmudrā & Dzogchen

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The problem I have always had articulating the unique feature of Vajrayāna view to you sutra guys is precisely summed above: wisdom merged into emptiness is the basis [sthana, gzhi], and this is what accounts for the visions in both Dzogchen [klong sde and man ngag sde] as well as Kalacakra.

Astus said:

But that's only those two systems. And even in thogal the fourth vision is the total dissolution, like going through creation and completion stages again. Mahamudra is complete with non-meditation, and there is no point in repeating the whole process of mandalas, mantras and buddhas based on the final realisation. So, I don't think I base my understanding on sutra, since that's how it looks like to me in Vajrayana.

Malcolm wrote:

Its not only those two systems, it is merely articulated most clearly in those two systems.

Also Astus, the four yogas are sūtra mahāmudra. If you do not practice the completion stage, mahāmudra according to the upadeśas is a slow path, or so it is asserted by the Sakyapas. This is the reason why vase breath is used extensively even in so called sems sde.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 18th, 2014 at 8:02 AM

Title: Re: Sanskrit for Nang-wa Tha-yay?

Content:

pemachophel said:

What's the Sanskrit for Amitabha's epithet, Nang-wa Tha-yay?

Malcolm wrote:

Amitābha.

Amita = mtha' yas, limitless abha = snang wa, light, splendour, etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 18th, 2014 at 7:41 AM

Title: Re: giant pressure in between my eyebrows

Content:

threeyears said:

For the last three years I have felt a pressure in between my eyebrows. It doesn't go away when I get off the cushion, it is always there. When I watch it, it moves around. It goes to the back of my head, the sides, into my eyesockets making them twitch, into my nose, up to the top of my head, but it always comes back to the center in between my eyebrows. And it grows incredibly big whenever I watch my thoughts. I stopped meditating for a while because it was becoming so big that I thought my head was going to explode. Its not painful, its just confusing. So for the sake of avoiding brain damage, I put my faith in the people of dharmawheel. Can you please help me?

Malcolm wrote:

Sounds like a disorder of wind -- go see an ayurvedic or tibetan doctor.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 18th, 2014 at 7:40 AM

Title: Re: Evolution and reincarnation

Content:

smcj said:

The seminal text for the Yogacara and subsequent views is the Uttara Tantra.

Malcolm wrote:

Not really, it is the seminal commentary on the Tathāgatagarbha school (viz total absence of reference to concepts like ālaya-vijñāna).

Madhyantavibhanga, Dharmadharmatāvibhanga and Mahāyānasūtra alampara are the Yogacara commentaries.

In India there were three major trends in Mahāyāna:

Prajñāpāramita --> Tathāgatagarbha --> Yogacara

The later two incorporating and modifying ideas found in the earlier.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 18th, 2014 at 5:37 AM

Title: Re: Mahāmudrā & Dzogchen

Content:

heart said:

So, thögal in tantric mahamudra?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, so it seems.

Astus said:

Interesting. I have always had this impression that thögal with its channels and visions is a "step back" to tantra from the direct simplicity of trekchö and mahamudra.

Malcolm wrote:

The problem I have always had articulating the unique feature of Vajrayāna view to you sutra guys is precisely summed above: wisdom merged into emptiness is the basis [sthana, gzhi], and this is what accounts for the visions in both Dzogchen [klong sde and man ngag sde] as well as Kalacakra.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 18th, 2014 at 3:40 AM

Title: Re: Mahāmudrā & Dzogchen

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Well, familiar terms jump out like "gaze at a garland of thighs in cloudless space" and so on.

heart said:

So, thögal in tantric mahamudra?

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, so it seems.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 18th, 2014 at 3:38 AM

Title: Re: Evolution and reincarnation

Content:

shel said:

Yes that's the point, there's no hierarchy in evolution, whereas there's a fixed hierarchy Buddhism. That constitutes an irreconcilable difference.

Malcolm wrote:

There is no "hierarchy" in terms of karma. You land where you have the karma to land and that's it.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 18th, 2014 at 12:37 AM

Title: Re: Is Psychotherapy Better Than Astrology?

Content:

Jesse said:

Psychology works with intangibles, experiences, emotions, thoughts, and habits, and that is exactly why it is considered a soft science.

Malcolm wrote:

That really depends on which program you are in, what school, etc.

For example, UVM's psychology program is pretty much hard science all the way.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 18th, 2014 at 12:31 AM

Title: Re: Evolution and reincarnation

Content:

Seishin said:

I don't disagree Malcolm, which is why I said "preferred" not "correct".

Malcolm wrote:

Sure, I just think that the preference itself is based on a misconception.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 18th, 2014 at 12:10 AM

Title: Re: Evolution and reincarnation

Content:

Seishin said:

The reason "reincarnation" is not preferred in Buddhism is because it is understood throughout the English speaking world, to mean the transmigration of the soul or spirit.

Malcolm wrote:

All terms in Sanskrit or Pali which refer to this phenomena can also be construed in this way [i.e. as transmigration of the soul], which is why there is debate about it between Buddhists and Hindus. Therefore, I reject that there is a valid distinction between "rebirth" as opposed to "reincarnation". They are in fact synonyms.

The distinction was first introduced in the early 70's by Trungpa, incidentally.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 17th, 2014 at 11:33 PM

Title: Re: Evolution and reincarnation

Content:

Seishin said:

I wasn't saying that Buddha did not teach literal rebirth, I am saying he did not teach "reincarnation" because he did not use the word according to the suttas, essentially refuting your earlier point that Shakyamuni taught "reincarnation". Please re-read what I wrote.

Malcolm wrote:

He did not teach rebirth either, since he did not use that word, according to the suttas.

Actually the term rebirth and reincarnation are just alternate translations of the same term, punarbhāva.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 17th, 2014 at 11:08 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

treehuggingoctopus said:

Just like deep ecologists, I'm afraid. (And I'm saying that as a huge fan of DE).

Malcolm wrote:

Oh definitely, DE is an intellectual movement in many respects. There is nothing to be gained by Deep Ecologists joining party politics. In the US Green Party, the DE voice has been completely suppressed by the Bookchin faction.

As David Orton points out:

Green parties have become shallow ecology defenders of industrial capitalist society, even if Arne Naess was supportive of them. The German Green Party theoretician Rudolf Bahro resigned from the party in the early 1980s, and pointed out that green party shallow ecology is content to “brush the teeth” of industrial society.

And:

There is arrogance among socialists who think that they should be leading the ecological movement, because they have a “class analysis” and are anti-capitalist. What comes across is that the Left believes it is entitled to intellectual hegemony in the green and environmental movements, by virtue of prior knowledge. The Left does not seem to be able to absorb the pluralism of green and environmental politics – as Naess informed us, “the front is long” – let alone accept the earned leadership of others by virtue of their practical or theoretical work. Ed Abbey noted, through the character Doc Sarvis in The Monkey Wrench Gang, the importance of practical involvement in actual environmental struggles: “Let our practice form our doctrine, thus assuring precise theoretical coherence.” (p. 68) The idea that deeper environmentalists and greens can come to an anti-capitalist critique based on their own experiences, without studying Marxism or social ecology, but based on field experience, seems, apparently, difficult to grasp for the Left.

<https://deepgreenweb.blogspot.com/2011/01/deep-ecology-and-left-contradictions.html>

If you are curious as to what my "practical involvement in actual environmental struggles" are, it is precisely my study of traditional medicine, in part inspired by the anarchist writer Laurel Luddites piece, Anarcho-herbalism:

Medicine is just one part of the machine that we have to take back and re-create into a form that works for the society we will become. Every herb, pill, and procedure should be judged on its sustainability and accessibility to small groups of people.

<http://www.swsbm.com/HOMEPAGE/Anarcho-herbalism.html>

As for my definition of Marxism, Marxism, as we know, is a failure. Of course the Socialist revolutions of the early 20th century were important in their contributions to shorter work days, etc., all kinds of things we take for granted today in modern post-industrial countries.

But the issue here is defining those features that make Marxism an unsuitable political philosophy for Buddhists. Its advocacy of violence is one reason, the trenchant materialism of the majority of Marxist philosophers is another.

We really do need to get beyond these eighteenth and nineteenth century political models. That is what Deep Ecology is for.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 17th, 2014 at 11:03 PM

Title: Re: Mahāmudrā & Dzogchen

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Of course there are differences in the two systems, but it is my present opinion (which could change tomorrow based on some reliably datable text) that it is unlikely that thogal developed until after the Kalacakra was introduced to Tibet (1027). My speculation is that these entopic visions were given a context by the elaborate internal anatomy presented in Kalacakra, and this was further developed by yogis in Dzogchen circles.

mutsuk said:

Both Geluk and Jonang authors concur in saying that the source of the night-time and day-time yogas is in the Prajnaparamita. It's the same in Bon.

Malcolm wrote:

We will see what the Sakyapas have to say about it when I get that far.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 17th, 2014 at 11:00 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

If you wish to be a follower of the Buddha, you will practice avihimsa.

What if you come across something that is violent, harmful and destructive, but your intervention could also be hurtful.

You intervene > harm.

You don't intervene > harm.

You sit on the fence > harm.

What is the solution?

Malcolm wrote:

If you participate in a violent revolution, advocating its aims, causing people, etc., to die, you will assuredly take rebirth in a lower realm. As Marx states:

The purposeless massacres perpetrated since the June and October events, the tedious offering of sacrifices since February and March, the very cannibalism of the counterrevolution will convince the nations that there is only one way in which the murderous death agonies of the old society and the bloody birth throes of the new society can be shortened, simplified and concentrated, and that way is revolutionary terror.

<https://www.marxists.org/archive/marx/works/1848/11/06.htm>

There can never be any harm to anyone through following ahimsa. Non-violent struggles based on ahimsa will never bring harm to anyone. People engaged in non-violent protest may be harmed, but such protest will never bring harm to others.

Then there is the knotty issue of associating with people who have a negative view of Buddhadharma. It is not consistent with one's commitment of refuge to the Sangha to associate with those who are hostile or negative towards Buddhadharma. Therefore, since Marxism is avowedly an enemy of Dharma, as it is the enemy of all religion, it is not appropriate for Buddhists to belong to Marxist political parties (indeed, it is probably better we don't belong to any political parties at all).

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 17th, 2014 at 10:29 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

treehuggingoctopus said:

I thought you're a fan of the Frankfurter.s

Malcolm wrote:

I like Adorno, yes.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 17th, 2014 at 10:27 PM

Title: Re: Mahāmudrā & Dzogchen

Content:

Jikan said:

Sorry to go temporarily off-topic, but if anyone can direct me to a copy of the translation of Mipham's commentary on the Kalacakra that Malcolm just referenced, I'd greatly appreciate it. Thank you.

Malcolm wrote:

If you participated in the recent Longsal Kalacakra, you can apply for membership in the international kalacakra website and you can find it there among the restricted texts.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 17th, 2014 at 9:40 PM

Title: Re: Mahāmudrā & Dzogchen

Content:

mutsum said:

In the Kalacakra daytime and nighttime yogas, the so-called "visions" are not described as "visions" but as signs (rtags).

Malcolm wrote:

Tagtsang Lotsawa makes the argument, and a very interesting one at that -- he asserts that if wisdom is not the basis, the visions of pratyāhāra will not arise. He then states it is because wisdom is merged with emptiness that the visions can arise:

"Great bliss and empty forms [śūnyatābimba, stong gzugs] are shown to exist in the basis with this wisdom element of the basis [gzhi]...and it is established through the citation of the root text and commentary of "wisdom merged into emptiness." The reasoning is that it is because the visions of the empty forms when mediating on withdrawal [pratyāhāra, so sor sdud pa] and so on will therefore be without a cause." I find this to be a credible account for explaining the genesis of thogal visions as well.

Mipham states in his commentary on the Wisdom Chapter of Kalacakra (as translated by Ives Waldo):

Depending on the great perfection, the path of thod rgal is still a procedure of the completion stage that involves effort. In general establishing the kāya of illusion etc. teaches the display [rtsal] of the illusory body, a teaching which also arises in the father tantras and in the mother tantras. Depending on bliss and bindu, it is taught relying on luminous display. In the Dzogchen tantras there is insight from emptiness the natural state, the wisdom of reality. From mere direct resting in luminous appearance, the conventions of the illusory body etc. are taught.

In all these [teachings], by practicing the intrinsic radiance of the luminous nature of mind as the special pith of the quick path of mantra, both dharmakāya and rūpakāya, in their respective ways are made into real objects, and one seems to enter into them. However, by the distinction of [this experience] having or not having subtle contaminations of karmic prāṇa, whichever it may be, there is the ultimate of all completion stages, the effortless great perfection, the secret path of the Oral Instruction Class, up to the four appearances of thod rgal, with paths ever higher and higher, the vast way of attaining truth that cannot be taken away. There is that explanation, but it is not presented by many writings.

I agree that the daytime yoga in Kalacakra is not thogal, but they even describe buddhaforms showing up in the center of thighs, use of postures and gazes, etc.

Of course there are differences in the two systems, but it is my present opinion (which could change tomorrow based on some reliably datable text) that it is unlikely that thogal developed until after the Kalacakra was introduced to Tibet (1027). My speculation is that these entopic visions were given a context by the elaborate internal anatomy presented in Kalacakra, and this was further developed by yogis in Dzogchen circles.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 17th, 2014 at 9:26 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

treehuggingoctopus said:

I do have three seconds though to point out that the vast majority of contemporary Marxism...

Malcolm wrote:

is a bunch of old ladies sitting around wondering why their theories don't work and why no one listens to them, so they endlessly squabble amongst themselves.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 17th, 2014 at 9:24 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

Hiya, Treehuggingoctopus, I like the avatar and the name! I've also got Terry Eagleton's book "Why Marx Was Right". It's a great book. I think he is a Christian if I'm right, and quite influenced by the SWP in the UK?

I'll repost this as well:

<http://isme.tamu.edu/ISME07/Meadors07.html>

It's a paper about Buddhist Perspectives on the use of Force, and touches on the Upaya-kaushalya Sutra. Though what this sutra says and how it has been interpreted is certainly open to question. I'm not saying the article 'proves' anything, but it raises interesting points and is well worth a read.

Malcolm wrote:

If you wish to be a follower of the Buddha, you will practice avihimsa. If you do not wish to be a follower of the Buddha, you can follow the violent creeds of any number of other religions, including the materialist religion of Communism.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 17th, 2014 at 9:19 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

Malcolm. You are seriously having a fantasy. Look at the countless millions who died under Stalin and Mao, a direct result of Marxist/Leninist principles.

They were a disgusting distortion of Marxism as explained here (for the second time)

<https://www.marxists.org/archive/trotsky/1936/revbet/>

Malcolm wrote:

I am quite familiar with Trotskyist apologetics. They are screed of the losers. I have no doubt that a Trotskyist regime would have been as brutal and murderous as Stalin's, even more so, in fact, since Trotsky was bent on permanent revolution, spread to every corner of the planet, regardless of whether his attentions were wanted or not. That is a great problem with you Marxists -- the complete lack of ability to respect others when their lack of compliance to your "forces of history" compels you to rob them of their homes, goods, and even their labor all in the name of your completely heartless proletariat revolution. Well thanks but no thanks. I do not want to live in a workers paradise. I do not want to have a dictatorship of the proletariat, it is not inevitable. I do not want to live in the ruined world that will be left after your lot burns down what is left after the failure of "advanced capitalism".

tellyontellyon said:

Oh, and yes. Marxism is materialist, true. So is the theory and practice of most scientists and engineers. Maybe it's all an illusion, but an illusion that us unenlightened folk have to try and live in on a daily basis.

Malcolm wrote:

My point, simply put, is that the thinking of Karl Marx is incompatible with Buddhism. There are all kinds of socialisms that are not, but Marxism most definitely is.

tellyontellyon said:

Sorry, I'm not going to sit by and watch people starve or die of thirst, or get murdered...

Malcolm wrote:

You are doing it right now; right now you are sitting by idly, gossiping on the internet, while people are starving, dying of thirst and being murdered. So spare me the self-righteous rhetoric.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 17th, 2014 at 9:09 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

treehuggingoctopus said:

Hell, there have been crossovers between deep ecology and Marxism, too - as any recently published ecocriticism reader should prove.

Malcolm wrote:

To the detriment of Deep Ecology...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 17th, 2014 at 5:20 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

The real weapon of the working class is the General Strike!

Malcolm wrote:

I see, so you are actually a Sorelian.

tellyontellyon said:

Are Marxists totally committed to pacifism, no. They are willing to defend themselves against attack. I mentioned that in an earlier post too.

Malcolm wrote:

Trotsky clearly defines red terror as justifiable. You have to be blind not to see it.

tellyontellyon said:

Name the Buddhist country that has no army? Most have the death penalty, something I totally disagree with.

Malcolm wrote:

There are no Buddhist Governments. The reason for that has already been provided. Seeking to be leaders is the business of fools.

tellyontellyon said:

I would hope nobody or the smallest possible number would die in the transition to democratic socialism. If people are killed it will be in self-defence.

Malcolm wrote:

You are seriously having a fantasy. Look at the countless millions who died under Stalin and Mao, a direct result of Marxist/Leninist principles.

tellyontellyon said:

But what is the alternative under a degenerating capitalism? Imperialist war for profit; for land, power, water and food as the worlds becomes unlivable.

Malcolm wrote:

Marxism proposes no alternative because it will do nothing whatsoever to change what it regards as progressive, i.e. industrial civilization (which is entirely consistent with its materialist philosophical position).

tellyontellyon said:

But as Buddhists you say we should not lift a finger. We should sit on our thumbs while billions die of war and starvation and thirst and just watch while the world burns because we are oh so compassionate.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, the Buddha did passively watch the Shakya tribe, his kin, being slaughtered and enslaved by the Kosalians when his verbal discouragement failed to move the Kosalian leaders.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 17th, 2014 at 4:44 AM

Title: Re: Is Psychotherapy Better Than Astrology?

Content:

theanarchist said:

I met a Tibetan lama who grew up with nomads, and he told us that before he met westerners he didn't even know that something like depression exists. He hadn't heard of anyone there who had that sort of emotional problem.

Malcolm wrote:

Right, nomads just have problems managing not to kill each other at the slightest pretext.

theanarchist said:

I have also been told that Tibetans usually didn't have so much trouble doing long term solitary retreats.

Malcolm wrote:

Not that many Tibetans actually do solitary retreats.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 17th, 2014 at 4:38 AM

Title: Re: Mahāmudrā & Dzogchen

Content:

thigle said:

Another point is "thögal", which you can not find in mahamudra...

Malcolm wrote:

Not so fast, Kimosabe. My recent studies of Kalacakra and sadāṅgayoga have caused me to revise my opinion about this.

Please examine Ornament of Stainless Light by Norsang Kalsang Gyatso, the section on the daytime withdrawal yoga.

heart said:

Could you elaborate a little Malcolm?

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

Well, familiar terms jump out like "gaze at a garland of thighs in cloudless space" and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 17th, 2014 at 3:41 AM

Title: Re: Mahāmudrā & Dzogchen

Content:

thigle said:

Another point is "thögal", which you can not find in mahamudra...

Malcolm wrote:

Not so fast, Kimosabe. My recent studies of Kalacakra and sadāṅgayoga have caused me to revise my opinion about this.

Please examine Ornament of Stainless Light by Norsang Kalsang Gyatso, the section on the daytime withdrawal yoga.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 17th, 2014 at 3:03 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

Marxism does not advocate terrorism. I have already answered that.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, actually it does. Trotsky quite explicitly states that is perfectly acceptable for communists to engage in terrorism, based on a just war theory.

Marx advocates violent revolution in his manifesto. He certainly is not an advocate of non-violence.

Not only this, but of course Marx is a complete materialist on every sense of the term. So how can Marxism in truth be a fit doctrine for a Buddhist to hold?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 17th, 2014 at 2:25 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

Hiya Malcolm.

Well, it does seem that capitalism is inherently unstable and leads to crises. Those crises' also seem to be affecting the whole world. Globalisation, the power of corporations seems to be expanding, and overrides democracy and morality and common sense. As one stock market trader said, "Goldman Sachs Rules The World".

Another way of saying that is "He who pays the piper calls the tune."

<https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=aC19fEqR5bA>

I think if we want to change how we produce things and use the planets resources, then we can not leave our economic system in the hands of such people. You can't control what you don't own... so ownership needs to be collective.. (at least when it comes to the important/big things). That does not mean owning everything or every small/medium business.

~~

Marx didn't only talk about industrial capitalism, he understood financial capitalism. Here's a leaflet:

It's pretty short... for marx.

<https://www.marxists.org/archive/marx/works/1865/value-price-profit/>

~~~

Again, people confuse what happened in the Bonapartist Soviet Union with what genuine Marxists today stand for.

This document gives Trotsky's view from 1937.

<https://www.marxists.org/archive/trotsky/1937/08/stalinism.htm>

Malcolm wrote:

Marx says nothing about banks and stock markets not already enunciated by Smith, et al.

Trotsky advocated terrorism. How can you admire such people?

Marx and Communism advocate violence and terrorism as valid means to end. This is repugnant.

No Buddhist should advocate Marxism in a real sense. Supporting the goals of Marxism without condemning its explicit advocacy of violent revolution is supporting that violence itself and bears all the karmic consequences of belonging to an army.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 17th, 2014 at 2:06 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

Not quite sure why you are having a pop at Islam? All the muslims I have ever met were decent peaceful people. Don't believe everything (or anything) you hear on Fox News.

Malcolm wrote:

I don't pay attention to Fox, CNN, MSNBC, etc. I watch the Daily Show for my infotainment, and not very regularly.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 17th, 2014 at 2:04 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

Hiya Malcolm.

Well, it does seem that capitalism is inherently unstable and leads to crises.

Malcolm wrote:

Marxist economies are not stable either. Since Marxist economies are predicated upon industrial capitalist means of production, they will be inherently unstable as well.

The problem again is how things scale. low level local capitalism is fine and healthy. What you are talking about is over centralized concentration of wealth. Well, that can happen just as easily in a Marxist workers paradise as a capitalist dystopia.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 16th, 2014 at 11:02 PM

Title: Re: Longchenpa at TBRC

Content:

Alex Hubbard said:

Thanks, I did that and found two versions, the one from 1973 opened in the reader but not the one from 2000.

Do you know if there are any substantial differences? I'm guessing these are different editions.

Alex.

Malcolm wrote:

No, I doubt it. The 200 edition is the same block prints, AFAIK.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 16th, 2014 at 10:44 PM

Title: Re: Longchenpa at TBRC

Content:

Alex Hubbard said:

Malcolm, yes that's it, thanks so much.

Unfortunately there something wrong as I can't access the reader. It says the RID is invalid. I'll email them. In any case, if you get round to finding your translation I'd really enjoy a read.

Alex.

Malcolm wrote:

just search on this title.

bdud rtsi zil mngar ma

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 16th, 2014 at 10:09 PM

Title: Re: Longchenpa at TBRC

Content:

Alex Hubbard said:

You're a gent, I appreciate it muchly.

According to 'Sources of the Tibetan Tradition' (which has a pretty idiosyncratic translation) it's in vol.2 pages 328.3– 331.6, but that section on TBRC has the title 'byang chub kyi sems kun byed rgyal po'i don khrin rin chen gru bo' which gave me the impression that the TBRC collection might be a different edition.

Alex.

Malcolm wrote:

dri med 'od zer. " bdud rtsi zil mngar ma/." In gsung thor bu/_dri med 'od zer/(sde dge par ma/). TBRC W23504. 2: 332 - 335. paro, bhutan: lama ngodrup and sherab drimey, 1982. http://tbrc.org/link?RID=O00EGS1013837%7CO2CN67002CN87712CN91062CN91092CN91112CN91122CN91162CN91191PD121506\$W23504

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 16th, 2014 at 10:00 PM

Title: Re: Is Psychotherapy Better Than Astrology?

Content:

AlexanderS said:

Ok, thank very much for clarifying that for me

Malcolm wrote:

Another example might be transient depression due to depleted vata as opposed to a longterm depression caused by the depletion of tarpaka kapha (located in the brain; tshim byed bad kan for the Tibetophiles out there), etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 16th, 2014 at 9:54 PM

Title: Re: Longchenpa at TBRC

Content:

Alex Hubbard said:

That's great, thanks.

I saw that name but mistook him for one of Dudjom Lingpa's sons.

I'm looking for the original tibetan of his homage to chang. It's in his 'Miscellaneous Collected Works' apparently, I'll go take a look and see if it's there.

Alex.

Malcolm wrote:

I translated it. I'll dig it up later today, it is on another computer.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 16th, 2014 at 9:46 PM

Title: Re: Karma and Reincarnation

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

Aagin this is very true, but it still provides no evidence regarding the "accusation" of hyper-realism in regards to the model of the functioning of mind. And, anyway, again, all that is happening is that you are displaying a preference for one conceptual framework over another. Unless, of course, you are saying that Theravada is not Buddhadharma, then we are getting into a whole different conversation.

Malcolm wrote:

What Kevin is saying is that for Theravadins Dharmas are real but persons are not. Perhaps "hyper" is a bit of an exaggeration, but their view is still realist, so far as it goes.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 16th, 2014 at 9:39 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

It is not capitalism per se that is the problem. The problem lies in how corporations are structured, as well as neo-liberal globalization.

But, the nature of capitalist competition itself leads to monopolies, globalisation, hierarchy, a growing disparity between rich and poor. All of this Marx predicted.

Malcolm wrote:

Marx considered capitalism progressive. One of the glaring failures of Marx's theories was his failure to perceive that the industrial capitalist mode of production itself was and is the core of the problem. But not all capitalist enterprise suffers from that because not all capitalist enterprise is necessarily industrial.

Competition, even in capitalism, is not necessarily a negative thing, either. For example, my point of view is "anti-capitalist", but not universally so. A certain amount of capitalism in an economy is necessary, it keeps people invigorated. Even the Buddha supported the notion of profitable investing.

tellyontellyon said:

Whether you agree with anything else he says it appears he was right about that. Even if you don't think marxism is the solution, I don't think capitalism can be either. Just look.

Malcolm wrote:

Marxism has been an utter failure as a solution. Its primary successes all occurred prior to WWI.

tellyontellyon said:

If you think capitalism can be fixed... ok how? What do you think could be done that could solve this? Keynes is a step in the right direction. It was tried in Europe ... and is being torn to pieces before our eyes. Global capitalism continues to become more powerful everywhere.

Malcolm wrote:

It is not a question of fixing capitalism. We already have the means to control it, we simply need to be diligent about making sure that capitalism is properly regulated in ensure the healthy competition upon which it is based. For example, Obama administration's claim that this or that bank is too big to fail is utter nonsense. On the other hand, we need to guarantee small banks.

The fact of the matter is that we already have the means and understanding the balance the social good against the excesses of capitalism. The pity is that you Marxists spend all your time reading Marx, but he is really just tearing a page out of Smith and trying to merge that with Hegel. Marx is a remarkably unoriginal thinker, with a journalists mentality. You should read Smith, thoroughly. His concept of capitalism is really well thought out and socially as well as environmentally sound in many respects. He in fact would be horrified at the modern corporatocracies we are spawning today. He writes very scathingly of those who speculate in the stock market.

However, Smith's views are also unduly enthusiastic about the newly forming industrial economy, and he too, like Marx later, fails to see that the very means of production themselves drive economic forms of life and therefore, drives politics.

The Luddites understood this quite well, and revolted because of the destruction of cottage industries (which in part arose because of the shuttering of the commons on the 16th and 17th centuries, forced a lot of subsistence level farmers in the British Isles into the trades) that occurred as a result of the burgeoning textile mills.

One of the main points of Deep Ecological thinking is that how we make things is as important as what we make. Centralized production leads to centralized economies. Industrial production is summum bonum of centralized production.

If we want to change our politics, we must change our economy. If we want to change our economy, we must change how we manufacture what we need. If we want to change how we manufacture goods, we must in the end change ourselves.

The Marxist solution is bankrupt precisely because it proposes that all we need to change is our politics and policies, and then everything else will fall into place. This sadly, is the great shortcoming of the Green Parties, who have become little more than a retread of the old left, ala Social Ecology (Murray Bookchin), attempting to foster change at the policy level, rather than at the root, how we manufacture and produce what we use and eat.

tellyontellyon said:

I'm all for reforms of capitalism, but eventually all that gets torn down. At least that is Marx's prediction... what do we see?

Malcolm wrote:

If I were you, I would be more worried about the rise of Islam as a global political force.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 16th, 2014 at 8:58 PM

Title: Re: Longchenpa at TBRC

Content:

Alex Hubbard said:

Hey folks,

sorry to be a complete dunce but I've tried searching for Longchenpa material over at the TBRC and come up with nada. Could anyone more savvy than me point me in the right direction?

Thanks!

Alex.

Malcolm wrote:

You need to search on his name, i.e. Dri med 'od zer

<http://www.tbrc.org/#!rid=P1583>

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 16th, 2014 at 8:56 PM

Title: Re: Is Psychotherapy Better Than Astrology?

Content:

AlexanderS said:

When you say that psychosis and bipolar disorder are physical diseases is that exclusive to these 2 or does it also apply to most "psychiatric illnesses"? Arent most illnesses in TBM a mixture of mental and physical imbalances?

Malcolm wrote:

From a Tibetan medical perspective, emotional disorders must be distinguished from actual psychiatric disorders. The former are fundamentally caused by imbalances in the three humors which arise from the three afflictive emotions. The latter are caused by very serious derangement of either "vata" or "pitta", along with demons. For the most part, the mental illness chapters cover various kinds of demonic causes.

M

AlexanderS said:

Could you give me a brief example of a emotional disorder contra a psychiatric disorder? I simply ask out of curiosity.

Best Alex

Malcolm wrote:

For example, a person who expresses anger compulsively due to an excess of pitta (fire element humor) as opposed to someone who is hallucinating, for example.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 16th, 2014 at 8:31 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

Zhen Li said:

3. authorized, selected, agreed upon d iii.93 (mahājana °) vin i.111; iii.150.

Malcolm wrote:

This is the sense of the term.

Zhen Li said:

I don't think we need to do a philological study here, it's pretty clear to anyone that "majority" isn't in the word.

Malcolm wrote:

Mahā...

Certainly you are not going to argue with Āryadeva that the power of the king depends on the consent of the people.

I'd like a quote or reference.

You can find this in his Catuḥśataka, v. 77

Societies servant, paid with a sixth part,

Why are you so arrogant?

Your becoming the agent of actions depends on being placed in control.

And:

Those who act at others insistence,

Are called fools on this earth.

There is no one else at all

So dependent on others as you.

He also says, v. 88:

The sensible do not acquire kingship.

Since fools have no compassion,

These merciless rulers of men, though protectors, are irreligious.

As far as enlightened rulership goes, he opines that while once it may have been possible, it is no longer possible, v. 90 states:

Virtuous rulers of the past

Protected the people like children.

Through the practices of this time of strife,

It is now like a waste without wildlife.

(Yogic Deeds of Bodhisattvas, Snow Lion, 1994).

I certainly think that history has certainly demonstrated that rulers, especially sovereign monarchs, are in general completely incompetent. The ideal of the wise, awakened kings is a myth, like the unicorn.

That just lands you smack dab in the lap of democracy again.

No it doesn't. There are many nuances about democracy as it exists today that don't exist in monarchy. For one, the king is elected by those who have a real stake in the value of the kingdom, not everyone you can find (definitely no baby suffrage here).

Athenian Democracy for example, was the province of an elite, a practice initially followed by the framers of the constitution who were unwilling or unable to fully implement the Seven Nations model of direct democracy they had encountered and admired. This also likely had to do with a conflict created by culturally embedded European notions of property rights inherited from the Romans as opposed to First Nation ideas about usufruct rights.

For another, the king has absolute authority. I can elaborate when I have some more time.

Not from a Buddhist point of view. See the above.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 16th, 2014 at 8:07 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

Even the Dalai Lama doesn't lay this at the door of Marx. I believe the Dalai Lama has great wisdom and compassion and should not be brushed aside so easily.

The world is facing an environmental crisis that threatens the life of everybody on this planet. There will be food shortages. Mineral shortages. Fuel shortages. Communities will be displaced by changing weather patterns and rising seas.

I have no faith whatsoever in capitalism to solve this, I only see the powerful grabbing all they can. I see war and famine. We must find a new way to live together on this planet and it will not be capitalism... even the Taoists may feel the need to act.

Malcolm wrote:

It is not capitalism per se that is the problem. The problem lies in how corporations are structured, as well as neo-liberal globalization.

Of course the state capitalism of the Stalinists and the CCP just turns the State into a corporation.

In fact, there is very little difference in the structure of totalitarian states whether right or left.

Totalitarianism is a scourge, whether it is in the form of a Marxist regime or a Fascist corporatist regime.

All you guys squabbling about the relative merits of worldly political systems need to step back and understand that as followers of Buddhadharma, it is not our job to solve samsara for anyone but ourselves. We cannot solve samsara for anyone else.

We can add our voice, and we can witness, but we are not going to change the behavior of worldlings.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 16th, 2014 at 9:38 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Stage nine: abandoned political theories as useless and took up learning Buddhist primary languages and used all that intellectual talent for study and practice...

Zhen Li said:

Well, I started learning primary languages in stage 7 because it doesn't take much time to figure this stuff out - it takes a lot of time to write about it... and many espressos...

More or less, being a reactionary is abandoning politics. It is saying that all politics is useless, and the natural orders and functions of the world should take over because they're more efficient and yield better results. That includes having a monarch

Malcolm wrote:

Mahasammata means, i.e., "Elected by the majority".

Certainly you are not going to argue with Āryadeva that the power of the king depends on the consent of the people.

That just lands you smack dab in the lap of democracy again.

As Churchill quipped "It has been said that democracy is the worst form of government except all the others that have been tried."

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 16th, 2014 at 6:02 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

Nemo said:

I honestly think the story behind Zhen Li's beliefs would be infinitely more interesting than debunked Austrian praxeology.

Zhen Li said:

Stage 1: Became interested in Marxism based upon the appeal of the goal appearing to be justified.

Stage 2: Decided to base my views on a logical analysis and proceeded to read the Collected Works of Marx and Engels.

Stage 3: Found that transition to Socially Direct Labour isn't explained properly by Marx, found that the Maoist model of experimentation made some sense.

Stage 4: Moral disenchantment with communism through a deeper understanding of the bloody history, and my inability to find anyone who was a pacifist or wasn't bloodthirsty in communist parties. Reduced to intellectual Marxianism.

Stage 5: Found the price-value equation to be nonsense, thus discredited the labour theory of value. Found that Marx stopped advocating historical materialism due to it's lack of empirical concordance. Found that experimentation makes no sense if historical materialism makes no sense.

Stage 6: Conditionally accepted notion of social democracy - improve conditions through government action. Was liberal/social democrat.

Stage 7: Found economically social democracy doesn't work. Was libertarian - also liked the morality in libertarianism.

Stage 8: Found that libertarianism can't work due to inherent problems with democracy. Discovered Carlyle and neo-cameralist formalism and became a reactionary dinosaur.

Malcolm wrote:

Stage nine: abandoned political theories as useless and took up learning Buddhist primary languages and used all that intellectual talent for study and practice...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 16th, 2014 at 4:11 AM

Title: Re: What if Buddhism had become the dominant faith of Europe

Content:

jeeprs said:

The key background factor in all of it was the influence of the nominalists and the overthrow of medieval scholasticism...

Malcolm wrote:

Buddhist pramāṇa is nominalist. But it did not help much at all in overthrowing Buddhist medieval scholasticism -- for example, rational people who insist that Meru cosmology is valid.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 16th, 2014 at 2:58 AM

Title: Re: Is Psychotherapy Better Than Astrology?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

And no, mental illnesses are not automatically attributed to demons. A hefty distortion of the wind energy will be sufficient.

I did not say they were I said "...as well as demons." Demons are the last place we go when we diagnose any kind of illness, when we have exhausted other options of diagnosis and treatment.

However, there are eighteen kinds of bhūtas ('byung po) described in chapter 77 of the man ngag rgyud and chapter 4 of the Uttarasthāna of the Aṣṭāṅga hṛīdāya saṃhita.

See my post here for why Tibetan Medicine practitioners ought to use vata, pitta and kapha:

<http://www.bhaisajya.net/2010/10/bad-humors.html>

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 16th, 2014 at 2:52 AM

Title: Re: Is Psychotherapy Better Than Astrology?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The latter are caused by very serious derangement of either "vata" or "pitta", along with demons.

theanarchist said:

Vata and pitta are concepts from Ayurveda, not Tibetan medicine.

Malcolm wrote:

Would it surprise you to learn that རྩུ་ is how vata is translated into Tibetan? Or that མཁྱིའི་པ་ is how "pitta" is translated into Tibetan? Or that བད་ཀན་ is how kapha is translated into Tibetan? Or that four tantras (rgyud bzhi a.k.a Amritāṅgaṣṭāghuya-upadeśatantra) is heavily based on the Indian Ayurvedic treatise, Aṣṭāṅgaḥṛdayasaṃhita? Or that the terms vata, pitta, and kapha (which are in fact rlung, mkhris pa and bad kan) are used in sutras and tantras such as Suvarnaprabhāsa, Kālacakra, etc?

The principle difference between classical Ayurveda and Tibetan Medicine is their view: Ayurveda is based on the Sāṃkhya school, Tibetan medicine is based on Buddhist sutras, tantras as well as Ayurveda treatises composed by Buddhists such as Vagbhata (author of the Aṣṭāṅga ḥṛidāya saṃhita), Nāgārjuna and so on. But they both use share the schemes of the tridośa (nyes pa gsum), saptadhātus (lus bzung bdun pa), etc.

As such, they are theoretically nearly identical. In fact, the chapters on mental illness the four tantras are cribbed nearly word for word from the Aṣṭāṅgaḥṛdayasaṃhita.

Further, I have crossed trained in both, though my degree is in Tibetan Medicine (Shang Shung/Qinghai University).

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 16th, 2014 at 2:06 AM

Title: Re: Is Psychotherapy Better Than Astrology?

Content:

AlexanderS said:

When you say that psychosis and bipolar disorder are physical diseases is that exclusive to these 2 or does it also apply to most "psychiatric illnesses"? Arent most illnesses in TBM a mixture of mental and physical imbalances?

Malcolm wrote:

From a Tibetan medical perspective, emotional disorders must be distinguished from actual psychiatric disorders. The former are fundamentally caused by imbalances in the three humors which arise from the three afflictive emotions. The latter are caused by very serious derangement of either "vata" or "pitta", along with demons. For the most part, the mental illness chapters cover various kinds of demonic causes.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 16th, 2014 at 12:41 AM

Title: Re: Karma and Reincarnation

Content:

Virgo said:

They are an outgrowth of the view of certain logicians that ascribed to a certain view. The purpose of their being described and reasoning for their being taught must be understood within the greater framework of the view of the work from which they come. Specifically, it is a work, dealing with the emptiness of persons, which drives home the same (never touching on the emptiness of all phenomena) by painstakingly describing in great detail, every phenomena which actually does arise and their causation, to show that things arise but people do not. In order to do this effectively and convincingly, it has to go into the utmost detail of the process of a mindstream, to show how none of it is a person, and yet there are mental and physical phenomena which arise.

It is realist in it's nature, not taking mental and physical phenomena as dreamlike, but as quite solid, and real.

Kevin

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 16th, 2014 at 12:24 AM

Title: Re: The Three Bodies of the Buddha Sutra

Content:

sherabzangpo said:

I translated this sutra in November 2012. I believe my translation is a better in some ways (I think there may be some mistakes in the 84000 version), but I have yet to do a thorough comparison. Here is the link:

<http://sugatagarbhatranslations.com/2012/11/28/the-three-kayas-sutra/>

Malcolm wrote:

The fact you take ālaya as the ālayavijñāna is an (understandable) error in your translation (not to mention rendering ālaya as "storehouse"). There is no evidence from the Tibetan text that such a literal reading is warranted.

Finally, in both translations, neither of you have rendered "gnas su dag" perfectly. Hence it would be better to render it as "the purified ālaya is...", "the purified afflicted mind is...".

My point is that there is no such a thing as a finished translation, and all translations are subject to scrutiny and correction, as well as differences of opinion. I have found it to be unprofitable to make bold statements about other translators work unless they are completely incompetent, and neither of you are incompetent.

Will said:

It is a short one Malcolm - give us your version please.

Malcolm wrote:

There is little point, both are fine as far as they go.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 15th, 2014 at 11:13 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

Marxist analysis is...

Malcolm wrote:

...antiquated and irrelevant, fit now only as a subject of literary criticism.

tellyontellyon said:

...but there has to be some way of living on this planet together.

Malcolm wrote:

Go Deep:

The well-being and flourishing of human and nonhuman life on Earth have value in themselves (synonyms: intrinsic value, inherent value). These values are independent of the usefulness of the nonhuman world for human purposes.

Richness and diversity of life forms contribute to the realization of these values and are also values in themselves.

Humans have no right to reduce this richness and diversity except to satisfy vital human needs.

The flourishing of human life and cultures is compatible with a substantial decrease of the human population. The flourishing of nonhuman life requires such a decrease.

Present human interference with the nonhuman world is excessive, and the situation is rapidly worsening.

Policies must therefore be changed. These policies affect basic economic, technological, and ideological structures. The resulting state of affairs will be deeply different from the present.

The ideological change is mainly that of appreciating life quality (dwelling in situations of inherent value) rather than adhering to an increasingly higher standard of living. There will be a profound awareness of the difference between big and great.

Those who subscribe to the foregoing points have an obligation directly or indirectly to try to implement the necessary changes.

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Deep_ecology#Principles

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 15th, 2014 at 11:11 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

Zhen Li said:

The US is socialist as per the idea that the government can fix stuff.

Malcolm wrote:

No, the US is a republican democracy based on Locke's notion of the social contract. It is in fact a product of the Scottish Enlightenment.

Zhen Li said:

Capitalism as per Mises is grounded in morality and the nonaggression principle. Only a capitalist economy a la Mises can minimise violence and coercion.

Malcolm wrote:

As I said you are a libertarian. Only libertarians waffle on, insisting that governments are merely about violence and coercion. And you have your head in a bag if you believe capitalism minimizes violence and coercion. Capitalist countries exports violence and coercion to provide comfort at home, generally supporting totalitarian regimes to maintain economic advantage in the market.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 15th, 2014 at 10:09 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

Zhen Li said:

The US has been socialist for decades.

Malcolm wrote:

This is pretty silly.

US has been Keynesian for decades.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 15th, 2014 at 10:07 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist Anarchism

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

You have decided that you support something called "Enlightened Despotism", but don't tell us what it is... and then you complain people won't debate you!

Malcolm wrote:

The term is self-evident. The only part I question is whether despots can ever be awake.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 15th, 2014 at 9:30 PM

Title: Re: Karma and Reincarnation

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

Because all the five sensory consciousness have to pass through the mano vijnana, which is why I said that this is probably where the mix-up occurs.

Malcolm wrote:

All six sense consciousness are actually one [momentary*] consciousness operating through the five sense gates when those gates meet their objects. This consciousness moment is so brief as to lend the illusion that we are seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting, touching and thinking at the same time. We don't, when consciousness functions as an eye consciousness it cannot function as a nose consciousness and so on.

M

The most fundamental unit of time in Abhidharma is the duration of a concept, approximately 7 nanoseconds.

xabir said:

Nice.

Are there any moments where consciousness is not seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting, touching and thinking?

Malcolm wrote:

In Madhyamaka, no. Shantideva states:

"When there neither an object or a non-object before the mind, at that time, since there is no other possibility, the mind is pacified"

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 15th, 2014 at 9:14 PM

Title: Re: The Three Bodies of the Buddha Sutra

Content:

sherabzangpo said:

I translated this sutra in November 2012. I believe my translation is a better in some ways (I think there may be some mistakes in the 84000 version), but I have yet to do a thorough comparison. Here is the link:

<http://sugatagarbhatranslations.com/2012/11/28/the-three-kayas-sutra/>

Malcolm wrote:

The fact you take ālaya as the ālayavijñāna is an (understandable) error in your translation (not to mention rendering ālaya as "storehouse"). There is no evidence from the Tibetan text that such a literal reading is warranted.

Finally, in both translations, neither of you have rendered "gnas su dag" perfectly. Hence it would be better to render it as "the purified ālaya is...", "the purified afflicted mind is...".

My point is that there is no such a thing as a finished translation, and all translations are subject to scrutiny and correction, as well as differences of opinion. I have found it to be unprofitable to make bold statements about other translators work unless they are completely incompetent, and neither of you are incompetent.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 15th, 2014 at 8:49 PM

Title: Re: Medicine Buddha Sutra translated from Tibetan?

Content:

sherabzangpo said:

Here is the link to my translation of the Concise Medicine Buddha Sutra:

<http://sugatagarbhatranslations.com/2013/04/23/the-exalted-lapis-light-dharani-that-generates-the-power-of-the-tathagatas-meditative-absorption-the-short-medicine-buddha-sutra/>

Malcolm wrote:

One observation:

In Tibetan Materia Medica Vaidurya is not lapis lazuli , it is sapphire, and more specifically star sapphire (which accounts for the checkerboard pattern of the ground in refuge visualizations.

There are blue, white and yellow Vaiduryas. There can never be a white or a yellow Lapis.

Lapis on the other hand is very clearly the stone called mu men (མུ་མེན་). Please consult འཁུངས་དཔེ་དྲི་མེད་ཤེལ་གྱི་མེ་ལོན་ -- this is the standard text reference for materia medica used in Tibetan Medical colleges.

Your reference about beryl is possible, but not definitive.

I should also add, that the word is a generic name for gems that are very shiny and catch light in very specific ways, for example, cat's eye (chrysoberyl) is also called Vaidurya.

Here however it is འུ་ཐུ་ཐོན་ལྷོ་, which is in fact star sapphire, as opposed to the more common indranila, regular blue sapphire.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 15th, 2014 at 4:00 AM

Title: Re: Is Psychotherapy Better Than Astrology?

Content:

Simon E. said:

Can we clarify our terms here ?

Psychiatry is the branch of medicine that deals with so called 'mental illness'. A psychiatrist is an M.D. Who has undergone further training in psychiatry..

Malcolm wrote:

Correct, this is what I am discussing.

Simon E. said:

You are Loppon. But others are conflating promiscuously .

Malcolm wrote:

Totally sounds like The Dowager:

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 15th, 2014 at 3:58 AM

Title: Re: Is Psychotherapy Better Than Astrology?

Content:

Simon E. said:

However many see C.B.T. As being very compatible with the development of Mindfulness.

Malcolm wrote:

CBT was developed by a Zen practitioner, so it is not suprizing.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 15th, 2014 at 3:56 AM

Title: Re: Is Psychotherapy Better Than Astrology?

Content:

Simon E. said:

Can we clarify our terms here ?

Psychiatry is the branch of medicine that deals with so called 'mental illness'. A psychiatrist is an M.D. Who has undergone further training in psychiatry..

Malcolm wrote:

Correct, this is what I am discussing.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 15th, 2014 at 1:30 AM

Title: Re: Karma and Reincarnation

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

Because all the five sensory consciousness have to pass through the mano vijnana, which is why I said that this is probably where the mix-up occurs.

Malcolm wrote:

All six sense consciousness are actually one [momentary*] consciousness operating through the five sense gates when those gates meet their objects. This consciousness moment is so brief as to lend the illusion that we are seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting, touching and thinking at the same time. We don't, when consciousness functions as an eye consciousness it cannot function as a nose consciousness and so on.

M

The most fundamental unit of time in Abhidharma is the duration of a concept, approximately 7 nanoseconds.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 14th, 2014 at 11:36 PM

Title: Re: Is Psychotherapy Better Than Astrology?

Content:

theanarchist said:

Then you had a bad experience and therefor you have a bone to pick with the whole profession and are running a smear campaign...

Malcolm wrote:

Psychiatric medicine, for the most part, cure nothing. They are palliatives only, useful in helping modulate destructive behaviors, of course, useful in suppressing psychotic ideation, of course, but in the end they are also highly destructive substances as well that often merely replace one kind of suffering with another, such as Tardive Dyskenesia, and so on. Often such drug therapies are little more than chemical straight jackets.

I have watched many people go through the diagnostic mill, one psychiatrist's diagnosis of paranoid schizophrenia is another's diagnosis of rapid cycling bi-polar disorder, etc.

There is very little evidence-based science in the diagnosis of psychiatric disorders, since they are generally diagnosis from transient behavior rather than empirically justifiable data. Further, the effects of many drugs used in the treatment of psychiatric disorders are poorly understood. Recent studies show that SSRI's are largely ineffective: They conclude that, "compared with placebo, the new-generation antidepressants do not produce clinically significant improvements in depression in patients who initially have moderate or even very severe depression".
<http://www.newscientist.com/article/dn13375-prozac-does-not-work-in-majority-of-depressed-patients.html#.UtVYp3nHFFw>

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 14th, 2014 at 8:32 PM

Title: Re: Is Psychotherapy Better Than Astrology?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

...

funny, last time I checked, I was a doctor.

Motova said:

Doctor of Medicine, MD?

Malcolm wrote:

Tibetan Medicine

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 13th, 2014 at 4:28 AM

Title: Re: Karma and Reincarnation

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

...for example, cognition of smell could arise from the eye dhātu meeting the form dhātu, etc.

anjali said:

Oddly, something like that does happen with sensory cross-over (synesthesia). For example people seeing sound or hearing light, or seeing touch, etc. How to explain this in traditional teachings? Which makes me wonder if this phenomenon might be a general property of sense consciousness, but one unrecognized and unexplored in traditional teachings.

Sherab Dorje said:

I would hazard a guess and say the mix up occurs when one of the five sense consciousness passes on the info to the mind sense consciousness.

Malcolm wrote:

It happens when one of the neural pathways in the brain floods and overloads, it is a physical issue.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 13th, 2014 at 4:24 AM

Title: Re: In the KUNJED GYALPO says it is of no use to do rituals

Content:

pueraeternus said:

But the end result is still the same. From another angle, the sutra could be seen as easier, since it does not require empowerment nor direct introduction. Of course, teachings and guidance on the path by enlightened teachers and Buddhas are still needed to learn the path.

Malcolm wrote:

If you consider three incalculable eons "easier

pueraeternus said:

But even in the Sravakayana, the path is never taken as "producing" the result - the path leads to the city of Nirvana; it doesn't build it.

Malcolm wrote:

The key distinction here is qualities. Buddhahood is not merely pacification of affliction as in Sravakayāna.

pueraeternus said:

The result does not arise from a cause.

Intimate instructions do not depend on texts.

Buddhahood is not found in the mind.

I am aware of this. It is so like Chan.

Malcolm wrote:

[/quote]

There are some superficial similarities, but Chan does not have direct introduction, since it is sutra path.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 13th, 2014 at 4:19 AM

Title: Re: Climate Change: We're Doomed

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

We taxpayers pay dearly for waste all the time-- that is what you claim is immoral. You claim that endless research is wasteful and immoral. So is externalizing the cost of the pollution of a massively polluting industry, for example, tar sands, onto governments.

Zhen Li said:

If you're buying the waste it's not an externality...

Malcolm wrote:

That is the point, no one is buying tons of garbage being sunk into the ocean, no one is buying arsenic and heavy metals that flow into the environment, but nevertheless, we taxpayers pick up the costs of disposing of this waste.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 13th, 2014 at 1:56 AM

Title: Re: Books on the kalachakra teachings

Content:

AlexanderS said:

I was wondering whether any of you can recommend me some good books that includes or provides commentary's on the kalachakra teachings.

Malcolm wrote:

There are many:

Vesna Wallaces three books.

Norsang Kasalng Gyatso's books.

Glenn Wallace has a book of translations etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 13th, 2014 at 1:21 AM

Title: Re: Karma and Reincarnation

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Greg: you presented nothing about formless realm beings.

Sherab Dorje said:

By formless realm you mean arupavacara?

Malcolm wrote:

The arūpadhātu with the four āyatana.

Sherab Dorje said:

Also, nothing you presented contradicts the basic Buddhist principle that an eye for example cannot produce the cognition of smell.

Either you seriously misread what I have been saying thus far, or you are waving around red herrings. Neither bodes well.

Malcolm wrote:

The point of the discussion was to demonstrate to cloudburst that one needs more than a manovijñāna indriya to account for various different kinds of sense cognitions.

Sherab Dorje said:

Also, you seem to be under the impression that bhavanga is as fully articulated as the Yogacara ālayavijñāna, but it is not.

It may not be as fully articulated at a theoretical/philosophical level, I agree, yet I have read accounts that conflate the bhavanga with the ālayavijñāna. (ie they basically stated that both terms describe the same phenomenon)

Malcolm wrote:

[/quote]

The most the Yogacarins say about it is that it is a Nikaya doctrine which proves that ālayavijñāna is valid. Cloudburst, being some sort of strange hybrid of Sautrantika following reasoning and Yogacara rejects the ālayavijñāna.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 13th, 2014 at 12:55 AM

Title: Re: Is Psychotherapy Better Than Astrology?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Nevertheless, these diseases are still mislabeled.

theanarchist said:

They are not.

How many people with severe mental illnesses have you ever met and talked to about their symptoms and problems? Not many I assume.

Malcolm wrote:

You would assume incorrectly.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 13th, 2014 at 12:51 AM

Title: Re: Karma and Reincarnation

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

If you are not going to take the discussion seriously then I will ignore your further contributions since they only steal my time.

Sherab Dorje said:

I am taking the discussion seriously, just not deadly seriously (ie I don't really have a horse in the race). On the other hand, if you are willing to examine what you should examine, then it is worth my time to pay attention to your contribution here.

I do examine what I need to examine. Anyway, no need to get bent out of shape just because it doesn't accord to what you believe. We must always respect other people's time, since their time is their life.

It took me plenty of time to dig up the info. that I presented here. Having said that, if you want to be useful, dig up what Theravadins say about formless realm beings.

Well, gee, since you asked so nicely...

Malcolm wrote:

Greg: you presented nothing about formless realm beings. Also, nothing you presented contradicts the basic Buddhist principle that an eye for example cannot produce the cognition of smell. Also, you seem to be under the impression that bhavanga is as fully articulated as the Yogacara ālayavijñāna, but it is not.

Also I have a mild head cold, so I am a little grumpy.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 13th, 2014 at 12:19 AM

Title: Re: Is Psychotherapy Better Than Astrology?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

These are mislabeled -- they are not "psychiatric illnesses", they are physical diseases

theanarchist said:

Again wrong. The field of psychiatry covers neurologically caused mental illnesses as well as environmentally or intrapsychologically caused mental illnesses.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, I understand what psychiatry is. Nevertheless, these diseases are still mislabeled.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 13th, 2014 at 12:18 AM

Title: Re: Is Psychotherapy Better Than Astrology?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Diagnosis, especially of mental illnesses, reflect cultural norms, not scientifically established pathologies.

theanarchist said:

No, they don't. Criteria for the existence of a mental illness is mainly the suffering. And suffering from a state of psychosis, depression, bipolar disorder etc is the same in every culture, even if the interpretations of the unusual behaviour might be different.

Malcolm wrote:

You need to read "The Normal and the Pathological".

theanarchist said:

Those symptoms DON`T reflect cultural norms.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, actually they do.

theanarchist said:

So again, if you have no knowledge about these things, I suggest you stop writing nonsense about them claiming that nonsense to be the truth.

Malcolm wrote:

funny, last time I checked, I was a doctor.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 13th, 2014 at 12:16 AM

Title: Re: Climate Change: We're Doomed

Content:

Zhen Li said:

Sure you can. People take that kind of money and sink it into luxury commodities all the time.

Malcolm wrote:

This isn't equivalent. Most luxury commodities, except in the homes of millionaire bureaucrats, are not bought by tax dollars. [/quopte]

That's what you think.

No one pays for waste. That's why it's an externality. You are suggesting making it the product you buy.

We taxpayers pay dearly for waste all the time-- that is what you claim is immoral. You claim that endless research is wasteful and immoral. So is externalizing the cost of the pollution of a massively polluting industry, for example, tar sands, onto governments.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 13th, 2014 at 12:08 AM

Title: Re: Karma and Reincarnation

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

We were discussing Madhyamaka, etc. Throwing Abhidhamma into the mix just makes things more complicated to discuss since its concepts are largely irrelevant to the mainstream of Indian Buddhism.

Sherab Dorje said:

What's wrong with complicated? Though I fail to see how Abhidhamma is irrelevant to...

Malcolm wrote:

I don't have time for it.

Sherab Dorje said:

I'm not saying that is how Theravadins view formless beings, nor am I interested in proving or disproving their view, I am just proliferating my speculations on the basis of my limited knowledge (ie adding another view to the discussion).

Malcolm wrote:

If you are not going to take the discussion seriously then I will ignore your further contributions since they only steal my time. On the other hand, if you are willing to examine what you should examine, then it is worth my time to pay attention to your contribution here.

We must always respect other people's time, since their time is their life.

Having said that, if you want to be useful, dig up what Theravadins say about formless realm beings.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 12th, 2014 at 11:27 PM

Title: Re: Karma and Reincarnation

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

So you admit that you are also proliferating a view?

Malcolm wrote:

We were discussing Madhyamaka, etc. Throwing Abhidhamma into the mix just makes things more complicated to discuss since its concepts are largely irrelevant to the mainstream of Indian Buddhism.

Sherab Dorje said:

Here is how Theravadins see a mind sense door process:

Malcolm wrote:

You need to find the specific description in this literature for a formless realm beings cognitions, sense organs, lifespan, propelling karma, etc. That's up to you, since you brought it up.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 12th, 2014 at 11:22 PM

Title: Re: Is Psychotherapy Better Than Astrology?

Content:

theanarchist said:

That's really nonsense. Back then there was not even a standard for diagnosing psychiatric illnesses and there was no evaluation of the outcome of the treatments. That guy probably had a zero cure rate with those means with anyone truly suffering from a psychiatric illness. It might have helped with some psychosomatic problems that respond well to placebo effects.

Malcolm wrote:

Diagnosis, especially of mental illnesses, reflect cultural norms, not scientifically established pathologies.

theanarchist said:

Then there are those psychiatric diseases that don't respond to psychotherapy that well, that depend on medications in their treatment, like psychosis and the bipolar disorder.

Malcolm wrote:

These are mislabeled -- they are not "psychiatric illnesses", they are physical diseases

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 12th, 2014 at 11:16 PM

Title: Re: Is Psychotherapy Better Than Astrology?

Content:

Virgo said:

I don;t think Astrology was ever really used for therapeutic purposes historically. It was more functional, ie. this is a good day to do this, this isn't; this is a good time to plant crops, this isn't; this is a good time to have a child, this isn't, etc.

Kevin

Malcolm wrote:

Astrology has been used as a diagnostic tool in medicine for centuries.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 12th, 2014 at 10:41 PM

Title: Re: Climate Change: We're Doomed

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The caveat is that it doesn't necessarily produce results which can be capitalized.

Zhen Li said:

Well they do, otherwise no one would do it.

Malcolm wrote:

The operative word is "necessarily".

Zhen Li said:

I'm not sure we can really say that there's any significant private sector research outside of engineering and technology.

Malcolm wrote:

What kind of research are we talking about?

On the other hand, publicly funded research does not need to demonstrates short term results to continue. There may a lot of waste, but so what?

So you are suggesting a model which drones on forever with low output.

Research needs to demonstrate results, that's the point. If your model is inaccurate to the level of Hansen, you would be fired in the private sector because it could mean the survival of the firm.

Not necessarily -- look at Microsoft -- worst operating system every invented.

In the public sector, you have people like that who simply say "more research is needed" whenever they come up without being able to confirm their own theory. This is the fundamental flaw in their understanding of the scientific method. You don't say more research is needed if your expected dataset isn't found to fit your theory - you change the theory. Science is pretty simple in this regard - you take what data exists, and you explain how it fits together, that is your theory. Then you have positive results no matter what data you find! Problem solved - but the public sector doesn't allow this to happen. If you are saying to the public, "we need 30 more years of observation and funding," you're saying that your current theory is unfalsifiable, and therefore unscientific. Collecting data and making measurements is fundamentally not science, that's data collection. Science is the explanation of the data, and your opinion of that explanation. That doesn't take a 30 year project, if it does, you haven't learned anything in university.

Science ought to be an open ended inquiry.

And fundamentally these kinds of attitudes are just immoral. You can't justify taking the money of productive labour to fund standstill results.

Sure you can. People take that kind of money and sink it into luxury commodities all the time.

Paying for waste can't be justified, that's just the kind of lazy and immoral mentality that one would expect from a Marxist, not a deep ecologist.

We, Joe Public, pay for waste constantly. Waste is one of the principal externalities of modern capitalism.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 12th, 2014 at 10:30 PM

Title: Re: Karma and Reincarnation

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Theravada Abhidhamma is completely irrelevant to discussions regarding Madhyamaka, Yogacara, Vajrayāna, Mahāyāna and so on.

In any case, none of what you describe demonstrates that formless realm beings are capable of more than a single cognition during their lifespans.

In fact, your citation merely supports this view, "While a mind-door process can also take any of the five sense data as object, mental object is listed to show its distinctive datum", this means that a sense organ related to the sense datum is required for the requisite cognition of that object to take place. The mind operates through any of the six indriyas, taking the name of that sense gate when it is operating through that sense gate. But the mind cannot smell a form when it is operating through the eye gateway. Since formless realm beings only have a mental indriya, they do not perceive any material objects and since they have no input, they only cognize the concept that propels their rebirth.

If you want to prove this view of the Sautrantikas incorrect, you have some work to do.

It is better to study Abhidharma if you want to understand the context of Indian Buddhism.

Abhidharmakoshaśāstram, AFAIK, there is no different explanation given in Yogācāra or for that matter in the Abhidharmasammucaya. You can understand it in the following way: without physical organs, the mental organ can only have a single object present before it, the thought that propels its rebirth into that āyatana.

You see, this is why people should study Vasubandhu in detail -- then they will have less proliferation and speculation about many things.

M

Sherab Dorje said:

Vasubandhu is merely one take on the matter. Acariya Sangaha states in the Abhidhammattha Sangaha (2000), p152 that for a mind process to occur the one needs the following conditions to be present:

- 1)The heart base (hadayavatthu)*
- 2)A mental object (dhammarammana)
- 3)The bhavanga
- 4)Attention

*"For the mind-door process, the heart-base is only required in those realms where matter is found. While a mind-door process can also take any of the five sense data as object, mental object is listed to show its distinctive datum."

He goes on to say that: "The six types of cognitive processes are conveniently divided into two groups —

(1) the five-door process (pañcadvāravīthi), which includes the five processes occurring at each of the physical sense doors; and (2) the mind-door process (manodvāravīthi), which comprises all processes that occur solely at the mind door. Since the bhavanga is also the channel from which the five-door processes emerge, the latter is sometimes called "mixed door processes" (missaka-dvāravīthi), inasmuch as they involve both the mind door and a physical sense door. The processes that occur solely at the mind door are then called "bare mind door processes" (suddha-manodvāravīthi), since they emerge from the bhavanga alone without the instrumentality of a physical sense door. As will be seen, the first five processes all follow a uniform pattern despite the difference in the sense faculty through which they occur, while the sixth comprises a variety of processes that are alike only in that they occur independently of the external sense doors. "

I see your proliferation and speculation and raise you a pedantry.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 12th, 2014 at 10:09 PM

Title: Re: In the KUNJED GYALPO says it is of no use to do rituals

Content:

pueraeternus said:

prajna is probably a better candidate if we were to favour any of them.

Malcolm wrote:

They are actually progressive in the beginning, one builds on the last.

Direct introduction is what it claims to be: a direct introduction to your own state of liberation. You have always had that state, otherwise, you could not be introduced to it. This is why the state of liberation itself is not produced from causes -- it is innate. If it were not innate, if it were something created from causes and conditions, it would be perishable, and therefore, Buddhahood would be something temporary, part of the six lokas

I do not dispute this. Such an idea is found in the earliest strata teachings on nirvana and (later on) tathagatagarbha (the un compounded, unconditioned, uncreated, etc), so I don't think its really that groundbreaking.

The difference between sutra and tantra is empowerment. There is no direct introduction in Sutra. There are also important differences in terms of how the result is contextualized in sutra and tantra in general, and dzogchen specifically.

The path of Dzogchen is exactly what it claims to be: a path upon which there is no progress since the state of liberation is introduced to oneself from the start; the sole stage since all living beings are on it; the result that does not arise from a cause, etc.

The result that does not arise from a cause, except that you do need the eight indriyas?

If the result really does not arise from a cause, then even sraddha won't be needed?

The eight indriyas do not produce the result. For example, gold is present in ore. But you still may need to process the gold with mercury and other substances in order to extract it. You would never say the gold was the result of the process, merely that the process is used to extract it. Likewise, in Dzogchen the path is used merely to extract the result, but you never say that the path produces the result. Indeed, not is the path taken as the result, as in the path of transformation, the result is the path.

I did (study) and I still do (erm, more or less) .

Then it is important to be clear about the six special features of Dzogchen teachings:

The result does not arise from a cause.

Intimate instructions do not depend on texts.

Buddhahood is not found in the mind.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 12th, 2014 at 5:47 AM

Title: Re: Karma and Reincarnation

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Formless realm beings have only a mental organ, they therefore have only one thought, which is the concept which propels their birth in the four formless āyatanas.

Sherab Dorje said:

Not wanting to be a stick in the mud, but what is your source for this?

Malcolm wrote:

Abhidharmakoshaḥ, AFAIK, there is no different explanation given in Yogacara or for that matter in the Abhidharmasammucaya. You can understand it in the following way: without physical organs, the mental organ can only have a single object present before it, the thought that propels its rebirth into that āyatana.

You see, this is why people should study Vasubandhu in detail -- then they will have less proliferation and speculation about many things.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 12th, 2014 at 3:58 AM

Title: Re: Karma and Reincarnation

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Mental objects are one class of objects, material objects are another class of objects. You are conflating the two. A mental object (part of the dharmadhātu) is an object for the mano dhātu. A material object is an object for the other five dhātus, form for eye, etc.

Sherab Dorje said:

That is one view/theory. From my understanding Theravadins put the mind as a sense organ at the same level as the other five, yet a component in the functioning of the "material" sensory process too. So it has two roles: the sensing of mental objects and the sensing of mental objects produced by the other five sense consciousness.

Malcolm wrote:

The function of vijñāna is really best comprehended by understand the complete presentation of skandhas, āyatanas and dhātus. There is no significant difference between how these are presented in the Vibhanga, for example, and the Koshaḥ.

In both systems, manovijñānadhātu arises from the contact of the mano-indriya dhātu and the dharmadhātu.

12 āyatanas, the manoāyatana covers all sense perceptions because the emphasis is different.

In brief, the emphasis of the presentation of 5 skandhas is on the sense organs, the presentation of the 12 āyatanas emphasizes the sense objects, and the presentation of the 18 dhātus emphasizes the sense consciousnesses.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 12th, 2014 at 1:51 AM

Title: Re: Karma and Reincarnation

Content:

cloudburst said:

so you are saying madhaymikas do not accept the existence of formless-realm beings?

Malcolm wrote:

I addressed this above, so I am not sure why you are asking this question.

cloudburst said:

I am interested to see if you can give a coherent explanation of external object without positing or implying an essence. So far, I don't think you've done so.

Malcolm wrote:

Sure I have, external objects are composed of the inert five elements, arising from causes and conditions, lacking any intrinsic nature.

cloudburst said:

In that case you can give an example of an object that is not and has never appeared to mind. If it is an object, it is an object of mind, or an appearance. What else?

Malcolm wrote:

Mental objects are one class of objects, material objects are another class of objects. You are conflating the two. A mental object (part of the dharmadhātu) is an object for the mano dhātu. A material object is an object for the other five dhātus, form for eye, etc.

When for example the manodhātu meets an object that is part of dharmadhātu, a manovijñāna is generated. Before a vijñāna can be generated, the object must appear to the appropriate sense organ (indriya).

When the cakṣudhātu meets the rūpadhātu a cakṣuvijñāna is generated. If it were the case that there are only mental objects any sense consciousness could arise from any sense objects, for example, cognition of smell could arise from the eye dhātu meeting the form dhātu, etc.

It is not the intention of Madhyamaka to undermine this or that conventional presentation of the skandhas, dhātus and āyatanas, but merely to show that they are not paramārtha dharmas.

Of course, as I said, if you prefer to follow the Yogacara presentation of conventional truth that's ok with me, but it was rejected by Candrakīrti.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 12th, 2014 at 1:39 AM

Title: Re: Climate Change: We're Doomed

Content:

Zhen Li said:

This is why government is a hopeless manage...

Malcolm wrote:

Your libertarianism is showing. In reality, publicly funded research is far more productive than private funded research. The caveat is that it doesn't necessarily produce results which can be capitalized. Private sector research is at the mercy of the same sorts of people that public sector research is: the only difference is their name -- in the private sector they are called "managers"; in the public sector they are called "bureaucrats". On the other hand, publicly funded research does not need to demonstrate short term results to continue. There may be a lot of waste, but so what? Compared to how much money is spent on means to kill people, it is nothing.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 11th, 2014 at 11:32 PM

Title: Re: Climate Change: We're Doomed

Content:

Unknown said:

The climate change counter-movement is lavishly funded by dark money to prevent policies limiting carbon pollution that drives man-made climate change

Malcolm wrote:

http://www.ecobuddhism.org/science/cover_up/1bycdm

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 11th, 2014 at 11:23 PM

Title: Re: Karma and Reincarnation

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

Rebirth is different from reincarnation.

.

Malcolm wrote:

Yeah, many people over the years try to make this distinction, but I think it is a reach.

As far as I am concerned reincarnation and rebirth mean the same thing.

In reality, the term in Sanskrit is punarbhāva, which literally means "repeated existence".

For eternalists, this "repeated existence" happens because of an essence, as you rightly observe. For us, it happens because of continuing nexus of action and affliction. In both case, a body is appropriated repeatedly, hence they are both theories of reincarnation. In both cases, one is born repeatedly, hence they are both theories of rebirth.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 11th, 2014 at 10:49 PM

Title: Re: In the KUNJED GYALPO says it is of no use to do rituals

Content:

Ivo said:

In textual terms, the earliest dzogchen material would be the Dunghuang manuscripts. I am not aware of any tantric references in these texts, are there? On the other hand:

Malcolm wrote:

Part of the confusions arises from the fact that Dzogchen is consistently framed as part of secret mantra (which it is). It is not however a path of renunciation or transformation.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 11th, 2014 at 10:46 PM

Title: Re: Karma and Reincarnation

Content:

duckfiasco said:

Malcolm, if we need sense organs and contact to have cognition, how does that relate to the appearance of sensory phenomena in dreams or hallucinations? I'm thinking also of things like phantom limb syndrome or the lights that appear in sensory deprivation tanks.

Malcolm wrote:

Dreams are a product of waking impressions on the mind.

Hallucinations are a product of defective or deranged sense organs (through drugs, etc.).

conebeckham said:

In the case of Hallucinogens, is it the case that it is the sense organs, or the sense consciousness(es), or the mental consciousness itself, that is "altered" (defective or deranged, to use your words)??

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, because what is affected by hallucinogens are various different paths in the brain connected with the sense organs.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 11th, 2014 at 9:45 PM

Title: Re: In the KUNJED GYALPO says it is of no use to do rituals

Content:

pueraeternus said:

The 15th-19th indriyas (sraddha, virya, smṛti, samādhi, prajña) are requisites for purification (vyavahāra) and faculties for praxis. They all need to be present and balanced for praxis to be possible in a proper manner. I don't see how this leads to "Direct introduction always works in someone who possesses devotion" - you have to explain better. If you mentioned the 3 pure indriyas - anāyatamānāśyamindriya, ajñendriya and ajñatadvindriya, then you might have a point somewhere there, but sraddha? This sounds so much like, at best, the most strident strain of Pureland faith, or at worse, evangelical Christianity.

Malcolm wrote:

It is pretty straightforward: you need to have interest, diligence, etc., for direct introduction to be of any real use. If you have interest, diligence, etc., it undoubtedly works. These eight indriyas beginning with sraddha are path dharmas yes? Since this is so, they are necessary for being on a path, even a Dzogchen path. Also this was never disputed.

Direct introduction is what it claims to be: a direct introduction to your own state of liberation. You have always had that state, otherwise, you could not be introduced to it. This is why the state of liberation itself is not produced from causes -- it is innate. If it were not innate, if it were something created from causes and conditions, it would be perishable, and therefore, Buddhahood would be something temporary, part of the six lokas

The path of Dzogchen is exactly what it claims to be: a path upon which there is no progress since the state of liberation is introduced to oneself from the start; the sole stage since all living beings are on it; the result that does not arise from a cause, etc.

If you want to understand Dzogchen concretely, you need to study and practice Dzogchen.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 11th, 2014 at 6:19 AM

Title: Re: Karma and Reincarnation

Content:

duckfiasco said:

So is the difference here then that Yogacara asserts that every sense consciousness is a form of mind consciousness, whereas Madhyamaka holds the mind to be a facet of cognition along with other elements?

Sorry to ask such a basic question but I only recently came across the idea that experience is literally a manifestation of the mind in this thread:

<https://www.dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=39&t=11280>

Trying to pick up the pieces of my blown mind here and there. Not sure how they fit back together!

Malcolm wrote:

Madhyamakas such as Candrakīrti consistently maintain that a mind will not be produced in absence of a sense organ or an object.

Sherab Dorje said:

Surely though, a being born without sense organs would still possess the mind sense organ and have experiences based on past sensations. I am thinking here of beings without a physical body.

Malcolm wrote:

Formless realm beings have only a mental organ, they therefore have only one thought, which is the concept which propels their birth in the four formless āyatanas.

Bardo beings have a subtle body with a complete complement of sense organs. It is said however in Abhidharma they do not see the sun and moon because of not being born of male and female elements.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 11th, 2014 at 6:06 AM

Title: Re: Karma and Reincarnation

Content:

duckfiasco said:

So is the difference here then that Yogacara asserts that every sense consciousness is a form of mind consciousness, whereas Madhyamaka holds the mind to be a facet of cognition along with other elements?

Sorry to ask such a basic question but I only recently came across the idea that experience is literally a manifestation of the mind in this thread:
<https://www.dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=39&t=11280>

Trying to pick up the pieces of my blown mind here and there. Not sure how they fit back together!

Malcolm wrote:

Madhyamakas such as Candrakīrti consistently maintain that a mind will not be produced in absence of a sense organ or an object.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 11th, 2014 at 5:54 AM

Title: Re: Karma and Reincarnation

Content:

duckfiasco said:

Malcolm, if we need sense organs and contact to have cognition, how does that relate to the appearance of sensory phenomena in dreams or hallucinations? I'm thinking also of things like phantom limb syndrome or the lights that appear in sensory deprivation tanks.

Malcolm wrote:

Dreams are a product of waking impressions on the mind.

Hallucinations are a product of defective or deranged sense organs (through drugs, etc.).

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 11th, 2014 at 5:42 AM

Title: Re: Karma and Reincarnation

Content:

cloudburst said:

don't need organs for appearances, but do need object. Appearances (objects) and minds are non dual, that's why appearances are not independent, so a thunderstorm other than mere karmic appearance cannot reasonably be posited.

Malcolm wrote:

If you are a Yogācāra, you only need a mental organ (and traces, etc.). If you are a Madhyamaka, however, you need a sense organ in order to have a cognition of an object. For example, Candrakīrti's definition of the two kinds of relative truth explicitly depends on possessing a healthy or defective sense organ.

Its ok with me if you want to abandon Madhyamaka, but it is a little surprising to see a Gelugpa do so.

The assertion that appearances and objects are identical is mistaken. If this were the case, there could be no common basis for the imputation of liquids by beings of the six realms.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 11th, 2014 at 5:26 AM

Title: Re: Karma and Reincarnation

Content:

cloudburst said:

if objects were more than mere appearances, they could be found upon investigation, don't you think?

Malcolm wrote:

They can be found conventionally upon investigation, don't you think? That is, they can be rationally inferred by ordinary persons.

cloudburst said:

sure, but whatever we have found in a conventional search is always mere appearance, so you have made no progress

Malcolm wrote:

There can be no subjective pole without the establishment of an objective pole. Therefore it is reasonable to assume that in addition to mind, external objects are required for appearances. You are placing all the primacy of this arrangement on mind. But equal weight must be given to the object and sense organ. For example, a blind man can not see color. He cannot even have the appearance of color. We can see color, he cannot. We can see color because all three things required for a cognition of color are present, an undeluded mind, a healthy sense organ and an external object. Madhyamakas in this respect never make mind the primary factor in cognition because that mind cannot even arise in absence of the object and the organ. So in this respect, you have to admit that the appearance is also dependent on the organ and the object, not just the mind.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 11th, 2014 at 5:16 AM

Title: Re: Karma and Reincarnation

Content:

cloudburst said:

if objects were more than mere appearances, they could be found upon investigation, don't you think?

Malcolm wrote:

They can be found conventionally upon investigation, don't you think? That is, they can be rationally inferred by ordinary persons.

Of course, then we enter the knotty complexity of the Gelug assertion that objects are only to be investigated for their ultimate nature, without negating their conventional status.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 11th, 2014 at 5:07 AM

Title: Re: Karma and Reincarnation

Content:

dude said:

So the physical world does not exist.

Malcolm wrote:

According to Cittamatra school, this would be their assertion. All that exists are minds.

I must say, you do sound pissed off most of the time.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 11th, 2014 at 5:05 AM

Title: Re: Karma and Reincarnation

Content:

cloudburst said:

The cognition of the object arises, and because this object is not itself mind, we can correctly say it is external,

Malcolm wrote:

Since you admit the existence of objects that are external to the mind, you are also admitting that thunderstorms, mountains and so on are not necessarily products of karma, regardless of whatever other products they might be.

If objects are products of karma, they are necessarily mental in nature since their cause is intention (cetana), which is another name for karma.

cloudburst said:

they are external in the sense of not being clarity that is aware, they are appearances and so and arise in dependence upon the mind. Therefore they precisely are the products of karma. If they did not arise from imprints, or mind, they would have to arise from something independent of mind.

Malcolm wrote:

It seems to me you are conflating the appearance of an object with an object itself.

I have no problem with the idea that how objects appear to us is based on our own karmic traces. I have a problem with the assertion that Madhyamakas like Candrakirti are asserting that objects are nothing other than appearances.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 11th, 2014 at 4:52 AM

Title: Re: Karma and Reincarnation

Content:

cloudburst said:

The cognition of the object arises, and because this object is not itself mind, we can correctly say it is external,

Malcolm wrote:

Since you admit the existence of objects that are external to the mind, you are also admitting that thunderstorms, mountains and so on are not necessarily products of karma, regardless of whatever other products they might be.

If objects are products of karma, they are necessarily mental in nature since their cause is intention (cetana), which is another name for karma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 11th, 2014 at 4:31 AM

Title: Re: Karma and Reincarnation

Content:

cloudburst said:

how do you square that with the fact that when you search for something with wisdom, it vanishes? If something is not merely an appearance, it would be found upon investigation.

Malcolm wrote:

According to your school (Gelug), the only thing that vanishes in that instance is the mistaken perception of inherent existence, but not the conventional appearance of a given phenomena which is posited as necessary in order in order for its emptiness to be established.

According to Madhyamaka in general, there may indeed be no appearances during equipoise, but in post-equipoise, of course there are appearances (which are illusory and unreal).

M

cloudburst said:

so in both cases, nothing is found to exist independent of mind. How does that square with the fact that you have posited that Chandrakirti accepts thunderstorms that are not mere appearances?

Malcolm wrote:

A mind will not find any appearances independent of itself, since it is axiomatic that all appearances to a mind belong to that mind, whether veridical or deluded.

On the other hand it is clear Candrakirti accepts external things from the following statement in the commentary to Intro to the Middle Way: "The intrinsic nature of all external things is of two types, relative and ultimate."

Since a cognition of an object (which is what an appearance is) cannot arise in absence of an object external to the mind (according to Candrakirti, recall any sense cognition requires the meeting of three things, a mind, an organ and object), it is suitable to infer that there are phenomena external to the mind, such as thunderstorms and so on. Even in the case of the appearance of the six realms there must be an object (for example, a liquid) which can form the basis of the six kinds of imputations of water, ambrosia, etc.

As far as I am personally concerned, it matters little to me whether you wish to take the Yogacara view of relative truth, which you are advocating here, or the Sautrantika view of relative truth which is the POV advocated by most Indian Madhyamikas including Candrakirti (for whom objects are held to be external to the mind arising through their own causes and conditions, albeit not necessarily karmic causes and conditions).

I already clarified that for Yogacara in general all appearances are generated by the activation of traces from past karma. It is a nice theory, but not one that finds much favor in Madhyamaka until Shantarakshita's Yogacara Madhyamaka synthesis.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 11th, 2014 at 4:04 AM

Title: Re: Karma and Reincarnation

Content:

cloudburst said:

There is no thunderstorm that is not a mere appearance to mind.

Malcolm wrote:

Frankly, as I said it depends on what tenet system you want to follow. If you want to follow Yogacara for your relative truth claim, I have no objection.

cloudburst said:

You are not positing a container that exists separately from our perceptions?

Malcolm wrote:

I am not positing anything, but definitely, Sautrantikas (and indeed some Yogacarins) posit a container that is independent of our perceptions. Therefore, if you are following Sautrantika presentations of relative truth (as indeed both Bhavaviveka and Candrakirti do), there are indeed thunderstorms that are not merely appearances to minds.

M

cloudburst said:

how do you square that with the fact that when you search for something with wisdom, it vanishes? If something is not merely an appearance, it would be found upon investigation.

Malcolm wrote:

According to your school (Gelug), the only thing that vanishes in that instance is the mistaken perception of inherent existence, but not the conventional appearance of a given phenomena which is posited as necessary in order in order for its emptiness to be established.

According to Madhyamaka in general, there may indeed be no appearances during equipoise, but in post-equipoise, of course there are appearances (which are illusory and unreal).

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 11th, 2014 at 3:41 AM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

pueraeternus said:

Really, the guidelines about pure meat is only relevant if you are begging for it (like mendicants as it meant to be applied to), not shopping at the supermarket.

Malcolm wrote:

Bhavaviveka reviews all the arguments against meat-eating in Mahayāna. His conclusion is that as long as the meat that you eat is pure in three ways, it is karma free.

pueraeternus said:

Sadly, many seems to have forgotten that the pursue of Buddhahood is for the sake of all sentient beings, not a self-centered goal of attaining Buddhahood, whatever that means by the time it gets to this sad state of affairs.

Malcolm wrote:

Others seem to have forgotten that followers of Buddhadharma are not Jains, nor followers of Devadatta.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 11th, 2014 at 3:36 AM

Title: Re: In the KUNJED GYALPO says it is of no use to do rituals

Content:

pueraeternus said:

[

So more cause and effect then.

Malcolm wrote:

As noted, meeting the teachings depends on meritorious causes. Liberation however does not.

Oh you mean those indriyas. But how did you get from that to "Direct introduction always works in someone who possesses devotion"? I suppose you are assuming this based on, erm, faith?

The first of eight indriyas of nirvana is śraddha.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 11th, 2014 at 3:31 AM

Title: Re: Karma and Reincarnation

Content:

cloudburst said:

There is no thunderstorm that is not a mere appearance to mind.

Malcolm wrote:

Frankly, as I said it depends on what tenet system you want to follow. If you want to follow Yogacara for your relative truth claim, I have no objection.

cloudburst said:

You are not positing a container that exists separately from our perceptions?

Malcolm wrote:

I am not positing anything, but definitely, Sautrantikas (and indeed some Yogacarins) posit a container that is independent of our perceptions. Therefore, if you are following Sautrantika presentations of relative truth (as indeed both Bhavaviveka and Candrakirti do), there are indeed thunderstorms that are not merely appearances to minds.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 10th, 2014 at 11:57 PM

Title: Re: Karma and Reincarnation

Content:

jianblade said:

Does one need to accept the concepts of reincarnation karma and the wheel of samsara to follow the teaching of the Buddha? I don't feel comfortable believing in said things...

ajohn4717 said:

A gross misunderstanding of about Buddhism exists today, especially in the notion of reincarnation. The common misunderstanding is that a person has led countless previous lives, usually as an animal, but somehow in this life he is born as a human being and in the next life he will be reborn as an animal, depending on the kind of life he has lived.

This misunderstanding arises because people usually do not know-how to read the sutras or sacred writings. It is said that the Buddha left 84,000 teachings; the symbolic figure represents the diverse backgrounds characteristics, tastes, etc. of the people. The Buddha taught according to the mental and spiritual capacity of each individual. For the simple village folks living during the time of the Buddha, the doctrine of reincarnation was a powerful moral lesson. Fear of birth into the animal world must have frightened many people from acting like animals in this life. If we take this teaching literally today we are confused because we cannot understand it rationally.

Malcolm wrote:

Of course reincarnation or rebirth can be understood rationally. As a matter of fact, the four kinds of realized persons (stream enterers, etc.) are defined precisely by how many lives they must undergo until they attain nirvana.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 10th, 2014 at 11:49 PM

Title: Re: In the KUNJED GYALPO says it is of no use to do rituals

Content:

pueraeternus said:

Could you share a few examples of such ways to introduce beings to Dzogchen when they have never come into contact with it before?

Malcolm wrote:

This is covered in the teaching call the six liberations, liberation through seeing, hearing, taste, touch, smell and recollection. These are six means to create conducive conditions for beings to meet the teachings.

pueraeternus said:

Noted. Mind refreshing my memory?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes sraddha is one of the five indriyas, which becomes the five balas, powers and so on along with recollection, prajñā, samadhi, etc.

Look into the 22 indriyas as discussed in the second chapter of the Koshabhāsyam. The first fourteen are indriyas of samsara, the final eight are the indriyas of nirvana.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 10th, 2014 at 11:29 PM

Title: Re: In the KUNJED GYALPO says it is of no use to do rituals

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, of course, there are causes and conditions related to achieving a precious human birth, who ever said otherwise.

pueraeternus said:

So ultimately the practice of the path still depends on cause and effect. Successfully introduction to the natural state is akin to the path of seeing, and even after that there is need to engage practices (even if it is just simple guru yoga) to stabilize. Not that much different from vanilla Bodhisattvayana.

Malcolm wrote:

Meeting the path depends on cause and effect, but this was never denied.

Direct introduction always works in someone who possesses devotion. That devotion will be based on past contact of the with the teachings. If someone has not had contact with Dzogchen teachings in the past, there is no chance they will even hear the word Dzogchen in this life.

If someone has no contact in the past, and hence can't even hear the word Dzogchen in this life, that would mean they will never ever be able to hear it in future lives. I didn't know there are teachings on icchantikas in Dzogchen. Just kidding - but I am sure you have thought of this illogical loop before?

There are all kinds of ways devised to ensure the beings contact with Dzogchen teachings. And the Dzogchen tantras themselves assert that all sentient beings will be liberated in the end, so no, Dzogchen does not support the concept of icchantikas.

I am afraid this is just pious fiction. Sraddha and jnana are not cognate, or relates that way. The success rate is just not very high.

I am afraid you must revisit the first of the nirvanic indriyas and revise your point of view.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 10th, 2014 at 11:23 PM

Title: Re: Dzogchen practiced on different solar systems?

Content:

Ivo said:

It is traditionally said that there are in existence more than 6 400 000 Dzogchen tantras and only a fraction of those have been taught on Earth.

Malcolm wrote:

According to tradition, there were 6,400,000 shlokas of Dzogchen, not tantras.

Those shlokas were all taught by Garab Dorje.

However, the tradition holds that not all the 6,400,000 shlokas were translated into Tibetan, for example, the bkod pa chen po in 500,000 shlokas was never translated into Tibetan.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 10th, 2014 at 11:06 PM

Title: Re: In the KUNJED GYALPO says it is of no use to do rituals

Content:

pueraeternus said:

So how do one attain this non-dual view?

Malcolm wrote:

You receive direct introduction to your own state.

pueraeternus said:

So there is cause and condition to attaining this view?

What if the direct introduction didn't work?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, of course, there are causes and conditions related to achieving a precious human birth, who ever said otherwise.

Direct introduction always works in someone who possesses devotion. That devotion will be based on past contact of with the teachings. If someone has not had contact with Dzogchen teachings in the past, there is no chance they will even hear the word Dzogchen in this life.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 10th, 2014 at 11:03 PM

Title: Re: In the KUNJED GYALPO says it is of no use to do rituals

Content:

heart said:

[Accumulation of merit is not done to gain realization it is done to assure the continued auspicious circumstances of such a practice that "abides in liberation, even if those moments of liberation are incredibly brief" until it is continuous.

Malcolm wrote:

I addressed this above.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 10th, 2014 at 10:58 PM

Title: Re: In the KUNJED GYALPO says it is of no use to do rituals

Content:

pueraeternus said:

So what is that dependent on?

Malcolm wrote:

Whether you have the non-dual view or not.

As samsara was abandoned for something else,

nirvana will not be realized

-- Hevajra Tantra

pueraeternus said:

So how do one attain this non-dual view?

Malcolm wrote:

You receive direct introduction to your own state.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 10th, 2014 at 7:42 AM

Title: Re: In the KUNJED GYALPO says it is of no use to do rituals

Content:

smcj said:

The point is that where you think you are does not matter [snang lugs], its where you actually are that counts [gnas lugs].

Well I think I don't like to suffer. If someone tells me that my suffering is ok they'd better not be within punching distance, otherwise they will quickly find out if their suffering is ok.

Malcolm wrote:

Your suffering is the ripening of your karma. There is nothing you can do about suffering you are presently experiencing or have experienced. There is something you can do about the suffering you have yet to experience, but it does not involve complicated schemes involving purification of infinite past causes of suffering. Even if you could purify the causes of suffering for 10 to the 100th power of past lives, the amount of causes for suffering left over dwarf this number.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 10th, 2014 at 7:31 AM

Title: Re: In the KUNJED GYALPO says it is of no use to do rituals

Content:

theanarchist said:

They are like the train to Paris. If you are already in Paris, then it wouldn't make sense to take the train to Paris. But if you are not there, you will need that train to get there.

Malcolm wrote:

The Dzogchen perspective is that we are all in Paris and always have been.

theanarchist said:

Yeah, but we have a VERY hefty, substantial hallucination of being in Rome. Or New York. Or Vladivostok. And the hallucination is so persistent that the buddhas in their wisdom had to give us illusory transports that we could take to get to Paris.

Malcolm wrote:

The point is that where you think you are does not matter [snang lugs], its where you actually are that counts [gnas lugs].

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 10th, 2014 at 7:14 AM

Title: Re: In the KUNJED GYALPO says it is of no use to do rituals

Content:

theanarchist said:

Rituals etc are skillful means. If you can rest in the nature of mind, then you don't need them.

heart said:

Rituals also gives opportunity to rest in the natural state, if you are capable.

/magnus

theanarchist said:

Yeah.

A vajrayana ritual on the relative level is something you can still actually do, even if you are not in a nature of mind state and it doesn't bring you into a full nature of mind state either, they have an effect.

They are like the train to Paris. If you are already in Paris, then it wouldn't make sense to take the train to Paris. But if you are not there, you will need that train to get there.

Malcolm wrote:

The Dzogchen perspective is that we are all in Paris and always have been.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 10th, 2014 at 6:27 AM

Title: Re: What is the Largest Buddhist Sect on Earth Today?

Content:

Astus said:

What defines Vajrayana?

Malcolm wrote:

Empowerment (abhiṣeka) as the entryway into the teachings.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 10th, 2014 at 6:19 AM

Title: Re: In the KUNJED GYALPO says it is of no use to do rituals

Content:

pueraeternus said:

So what is that dependent on?

Malcolm wrote:

Whether you have the non-dual view or not.

As samsara was abandoned for something else,

nirvana will not be realized

-- Hevajra Tantra

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 10th, 2014 at 5:10 AM

Title: Re: In the KUNJED GYALPO says it is of no use to do rituals

Content:

anjali said:

Are you of the opinion that people can do things to help thin the clouds and eventually get a glimpse of the ever-present Sun?

Malcolm wrote:

The sun is perfect, clouds are perfect, where can there be anything which is not already perfect?

anjali said:

Indeed. There is either knowing or not knowing, but it's sure easy to get distracted by those clouds.

So, are you of the opinion that people come by knowing through grace (not in the Christian sense, but more in the sense of spontaneously and unmerited)?

Malcolm wrote:

Its possible, but I think they are not able to articulate it very clearly.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 10th, 2014 at 5:09 AM

Title: Re: In the KUNJED GYALPO says it is of no use to do rituals

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The sun is perfect, clouds are perfect, where can there be anything which is not already perfect?

pueraeternus said:

Is suffering perfect?

Malcolm wrote:

That depends on who you are.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 10th, 2014 at 4:55 AM

Title: Re: In the KUNJED GYALPO says it is of no use to do rituals

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Listen, if you want to believe that Buddhahood arises from causes and conditions, there is not much I can say except to point you in the direction of Dzogchen texts that deny this. Then it is up to you.

But if one should assert to people that Dzogchen is a gradual path for developing realization then one would be both misleading people and misrepresenting Dzogchen teachings.

There is no progress in the core, the essence itself.

-- Rigpa Rangdrol Tantra

heart said:

It is quite easy, without a master and the auspicious coincidence of actually recognizing the natural state there is no Dzogchen. This come about through causes and conditions. The natural state itself has no causes or conditions but when you are in mind everything has causes and conditions.

Of course there is no progress in "the essence itself". When have I ever said that?

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

The essence itself is Dzogchen. Dzogchen does not depend on direct introduction. If it did, it would be produced from causes and conditions.

I already addressed this issue above, where I clarified that attaining a precious human birth certainly comes from gathering merit, etc.

In Dzogchen, buddhahood does not come from mind. The Dzogchen perspective is that a liberation based on causes and effects is incoherent.

Dzogchen is a path where one abides in liberation, even if those moments of liberation are incredibly brief:

The suffering of samsara, cannot be removed by using this stake of grasping but will be removed if [the stake is] let go.

If fabricated phenomena are abandoned, one will achieve relaxation.

Abandoning all thoughts, the ocean of wisdom does not stir.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 10th, 2014 at 4:36 AM

Title: Re: In the KUNJED GYALPO says it is of no use to do rituals

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Since there is no cause for buddhahood in the beginning,

in the end it cannot be created through a condition.

Emptiness possesses a core of wisdom.

-- Rigpa Rangshar Tantra

Wisdom is merged into emptiness: uniform in taste, unchanging and permanent.

-- Kalacakra Root Tantra

If you do not understand the view, you cannot practice Dzogchen. So first you must understand the view. The above is the view of Dzogchen.

anjali said:

Are you of the opinion that people can do things to help thin the clouds and eventually get a glimpse of the ever-present Sun?

Malcolm wrote:

The sun is perfect, clouds are perfect, where can there be anything which is not already perfect?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 10th, 2014 at 3:35 AM

Title: Re: In the KUNJED GYALPO says it is of no use to do rituals

Content:

Adamantine said:

However I am keen to know your take on this (without going into detail about total of course!)

Malcolm wrote:

You either have confidence in Dzogchen view or not. If not, it is better for one to practice according to the vehicles of cause and result until you have developed such confidence.
M

heart said:

And confidence is not related to causes?

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

Listen, if you want to believe that Buddhahood arises from causes and conditions, there is not much I can say except to point you in the direction of Dzogchen texts that deny this. Then it is up to you.

But if one should assert to people that Dzogchen is a gradual path for developing realization then one would be both misleading people and misrepresenting Dzogchen teachings.

There is no progress in the core, the essence itself.

-- Rigpa Rangdrol Tantra

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 10th, 2014 at 2:57 AM

Title: Re: In the KUNJED GYALPO says it is of no use to do rituals

Content:

Adamantine said:

but from an outer or relative POV it certainly still has the appearance of A—> B—> C in that these are Dzogchen methods applied to body speech and mind.

Malcolm wrote:

Since there is no cause for buddhahood in the beginning,
in the end it cannot be created through a condition.

Emptiness possesses a core of wisdom.

-- Rigpa Rangshar Tantra

Wisdom is merged into emptiness: uniform in taste, unchanging and permanent.

-- Kalacakra Root Tantra

If you do not understand the view, you cannot practice Dzogchen. So first you must understand the view. The above is the view of Dzogchen.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 10th, 2014 at 2:22 AM

Title: Re: In the KUNJED GYALPO says it is of no use to do rituals

Content:

Adamantine said:

However I am keen to know your take on this (without going into detail about togal of course!)

Malcolm wrote:

You either have confidence in Dzogchen view or not. If not, it is better for one to practice according to the vehicles of cause and result until you have developed such confidence.

M

Adamantine said:

I'm not sure I understand: are you implying togal practice is a vehicle of cause and result?

Malcolm wrote:

No, it definitely is not. But I am not going to talk about thogal.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 10th, 2014 at 2:08 AM

Title: Re: In the KUNJED GYALPO says it is of no use to do rituals

Content:

Adamantine said:

However I am keen to know your take on this (without going into detail about togal of course!)

Malcolm wrote:

You either have confidence in Dzogchen view or not. If not, it is better for one to practice according to the vehicles of cause and result until you have developed such confidence.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 9th, 2014 at 10:20 PM

Title: Re: In the KUNJED GYALPO says it is of no use to do rituals

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Since Dzogchen is the result that does not come from a cause, how can we say that realization of one's natural state can come about from causes and conditions?

Adamantine said:

What's always amazing though, is how much can be said about it. . . Not to split hairs, but there's an awful lot of texts and talk and verbal pointing out and internet forum discussion on the natural state. .

Malcolm wrote:

All of which is just discussions about the taste of sugar.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 9th, 2014 at 7:19 AM

Title: Re: In the KUNJED GYALPO says it is of no use to do rituals

Content:

Manju said:

Malcolm: Dzogchen realization does not depend on accumulating causes of any kind. Am new here and this was probably discussed a hundred times but still....:

How does the ability to realize the primordial/natural state, let`s say during a pointing out instruction, NOT depend on the accumulation of causes ?

About my background:

Am a Vajrayana practitioner since 3 years and under the impression that the development/completion stage practices (Maha Ati) I am doing will be helpful once the opportunity for a face to face direct introduction with my master comes.

Am I wrong ?

Manju

Malcolm wrote:

One, if by ability you mean "human birth with leisure and endowment", this absolutely depends on accumulating causes to be reborn as a human being, etc.

If you are doing completion stage practice, you have already received direct introduction through the fourth empowerment. So you should contemplate that and what it means to give rise to self-originated wisdom (rang byung ye shes).

You must recall that Dzogchen is:

The result that does not arise from a cause

The intimate instruction that does not come from a text

The buddhahood that does not come from mind.

Since Dzogchen is the result that does not come from a cause, how can we say that realization of one's natural state can come about from causes and conditions?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 8th, 2014 at 11:16 AM

Title: Re: Climate Change: We're Doomed

Content:

John Huntsman, — Twitter, Aug. 18, 2011 said:

I believe in evolution and trust scientists on global warming. Call me crazy.

Malcolm wrote:

Huntsman said this during his run in the primaries, knowing full well that these two issues go against the general grain of current Republican sentiment in the bat shit crazy bible belt states.

Romney, Oct 27th, 2011:

"My view is that we don't know what's causing climate change on this planet. And the idea of spending trillions and trillions of dollars to try to reduce CO2 emissions is not the right course for us."

Seems like he changed his mind between June and October of the same year...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 8th, 2014 at 10:23 AM

Title: Re: Climate Change: We're Doomed

Content:

Zhen Li said:

RE: Malcolm

Women and Gender Studies is a different topic altogether (and I didn't even mention children so I don't know why you brought that up).

Malcolm wrote:

You cannot mention women without mentioning children.

Zhen Li said:

Libertarians in the US want to wind back the government to adherence to the constitution of 1789.

Malcolm wrote:

And what a fricking nightmare that would be. It shows their total ignorance of the Constitution and its function.

Zhen Li said:

This is actually quite incorrect. The US spends $1.042 Billion under the EPA for the promotion of climate change, and the government issued billions more in loans for renewable energy corporations with the justification of anthropogenic global warming, the most famous of which was the $535 million U.S. Energy Department loan guarantee to Solyndra.

Malcolm wrote:

Conservative estimates place subsidies of the oil interest around 10 billion dollars a year. So, the US Government spends one dollar to prevent global warming for every nine it spends promoting the very industries that are propelling climate change.

Zhen Li said:

I really don't think you can call opposition to AGW a cult, because there's no end goal like there is in AGW, and it comes almost entirely from individual scientists, rather than activist groups.

Malcolm wrote:

This is total nonsense.

Zhen Li said:

Right now, you can't deny AGW and get elected,

Malcolm wrote:

Are you dreaming? People run on this platform in conservative parts of the US all the time and reelected again and again. If you look at the polls, if you are a Republican, you don't accept AGW. If you are a Democrat, you do. In the US this issue is completely split down party lines, unlike in other nations where conservatives tend to be more sane.

Zhen Li said:

Even Tony Abbott believes in AGW.

Malcolm wrote:

If he were an American Conservative, he could not get elected if he stated he accepted AGW.

Zhen Li said:

You see, the trend over history is that progressive causes always win.

Malcolm wrote:

You only think this because you do not live in the US.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 8th, 2014 at 10:12 AM

Title: Re: Peak oil

Content:

Zhen Li said:

But really, before peak oil is reached, the nature of the market is such that the transition will be made by the logic of the system - this is why the peak is actually shifted further and further back year by year

Kim O'Hara said:

This is a good point. What I've said about renewables can be taken into account in this way, too, with the advent of cheap renewables slowing down the exploitation of remaining oil reserves and pushing "the end of oil" ever further into the future.

Kim

Malcolm wrote:

The peak shifts year by year since the oil industry is subsidized heavily by the government, making it possible for them to extract increasingly more expensive (and tragic for the environment) "oil" reserves.

Renewables are also a farce, I am sad to say, dependent as they are on rare earths which also come at an environmental premium, and entirely dependent on an industrial infrastructure which depends on oil.

The only realistic solution to the world energy crisis is to stop using so much energy. However, the free market fundamentalists, convinced that growth is a desiderata and that the market is "intelligent", are nothing more than pied pipers leading us all down a path of destruction.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 8th, 2014 at 1:27 AM

Title: Re: Mahāmudrā & Dzogchen

Content:

In the bone yard said:

Within the rite of empowerment itself, yes.

Otherwise how can we understand something that transcends the mind?

Malcolm wrote:

If you do not attain awakening during empowerment, then you have sadhana practice, cause that's what it is for, i.e., sadhopaya, "method of accomplishment".

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 8th, 2014 at 1:25 AM

Title: Re: Mahāmudrā & Dzogchen

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The path of Varjayāna is taught so that a common, ordinary person can traverse all the paths and stages in a single life, and ideally, within the rite of empowerment itself, or at least so I have been taught (I am someone who has done a three year retreat).

smcj said:

If this is not too personal a question, may I ask in which tradition you practiced in your retreat? For some reason I have the impression it was Sakya. But if it is too personal, never mind.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, it was in Sakya. Most of my training in Sutra and Tantra is in the Sakya school. The rest in Nyingma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 8th, 2014 at 12:37 AM

Title: Re: Mahāmudrā & Dzogchen

Content:

In the bone yard said:

Well that's true but the tantras are teachings for those on the path (after realization).

There is outer tantra (Ngondro), but it should be taught by a lama when we are closer to the path.

And the meaning (or view) of prajna is different after realization. The true meaning of prajna won't be realized until after realization.

You might have read Chogyam Trungpa talk about prajna.

Malcolm wrote:

There are two kinds of prajñā, contaminated, and pure. The former exists in common practitioners, the latter in realized practitioners.

As for this distinction:

Well that's true but the tantras are teachings for those on the path (after realization).

There is outer tantra (Ngondro), but it should be taught by a lama when we are closer to the path.

The path of Varjayāna is taught so that a common, ordinary person can traverse all the paths and stages in a single life, and ideally, within the rite of empowerment itself, or at least so I have been taught (I am someone who has done a three year retreat).

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 8th, 2014 at 12:27 AM

Title: Re: Sutra Mahamudra, Tantric Mahamudra, & Mahamudra

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Read Kongtrul's encyclopedia on practice lineages, he describes it perfectly.

fckw said:

Malcolm, what exactly do you mean with "Kongtrul's encyclopedia"? Are you talking about this:

<http://www.chinabuddhismencyclopedia.com/en/index.php?title=Mahamudra>? Or is there also some book with that title?

Malcolm wrote:

Specifically, Treasury of Knowledge, Esoteric Instructions.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 7th, 2014 at 11:48 PM

Title: Re: Alaya consciousness - many questions.

Content:

smcj said:

$53. I'm not doing it. I've got enough Dharma books unread on my shelf.

Malcolm wrote:

It's actually about 25 bucks.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 7th, 2014 at 11:44 PM

Title: Re: Climate Change: We're Doomed

Content:

Zhen Li said:

Have you ever tried applying for research grants?

I had a look at the process with my provincial government a few months ago, and there are boxes of key terms which you can check. If your research deals with key terms in these areas, you're more likely to get funding. One of the boxes was for women and gender studies, and there was a box for climate change research too. These are two of the topics which get some of the highest funding, no surprise then that now climate change is also a feminist topic.

People don't set out to do a project which makes or breaks massive theories like AGW, they research specific topics and collect data in specific areas. But convincing the government to keep funding such research means convincing them that this is a matter which the government both needs to take seriously because it may be responsible, and needs to take action which can work. The grant process is, in fact, highly political, and each project provides parliament with brief lay-terms summaries.

If studying climate were just business as usual from day to day, like, say, recording migratory patterns, then it'll probably still get funding, but those numbers are not likely to make you a millionaire like this fellow:

<http://www.telegraph.co.uk/news/uknews/law-and-order/5036333/Multi-millionaire-climate-change-scientist-jailed-for-child-abuse.html> and this fellow

<http://wattsupwiththat.com/2011/11/18/dr-james-hansens-growing-financial-scandal-now-over-a-million-dollars-of-outside-income/>

Not to mention the book deals and movie sales from the hype. Then there's of course the fact that before the hype the stocks of renewable energy sources and electric car companies was relatively equal to its value, compared to the height of the hype a few years ago, when they would have made any investor a small fortune. Of course, I do support renewable energy, but that's beyond the point. If you are just investing in oil stocks, you know you won't be making much more than they're currently worth.

There are many incentives to promoting the idea of AGW. Even accepting all the AGW premises, you still have uncertainty due to the unpredictability of the system -- let's face it, there has been, and probably never will be, reliable ways of predicting climate change. Some people won't be convinced that the premises of AGW don't hold up to scrutiny until we really do have too little carbon based energy sources to utilise and they still see CO2 levels rising and falling with no help from us.

In the end, remember that this is almost all government led. The millions made by Hansen are mostly from government funded institutions, prizes and grants. People in government benefit with jobs and money, that's the bottom line. So long as government as it currently works exists, bureaucracy will keep increasing, and they'll keep paying themselves more and more because they have the monopoly on violence through taxation. Is there a solution to this problem? Not immediately, no. But vox populi vox dei. It doesn't matter what the real state of science is, it doesn't matter that there isn't a real consensus in institutions of higher learning, what works, works according to the simple equation of: public opinion + potential bureaucratic profit = public policy.

Malcolm wrote:

"One of the boxes was for women and gender studies, and there was a box for climate change research too. These are two of the topics which get some of the highest funding, no surprise then that now climate change is also a feminist topic."

Yes, because women and children will be the mostly heavily impacted by the negative effects of climate change, since they are still largely invisible.

"So long as government as it currently works exists, bureaucracy will keep increasing, and they'll keep paying themselves more and more because they have the monopoly on violence through taxation."

That is a common libertarian point of view.

But this is not a proof, this is fallacious reasoning at best, paranoia at worst.

Sorry, but I don't buy into conspiracy theories, right or left.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 7th, 2014 at 11:25 PM

Title: Re: Mahāmudrā & Dzogchen

Content:

In the bone yard said:

I couldn't agree more with respect to intellectual learning but it must be applied intelligently (to sutra not tantra).

Malcolm wrote:

It must be applied to both, that is why I cited a Dzogchen tantra as well as a Dzogchen master.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 7th, 2014 at 10:53 PM

Title: Re: Does one of the Lotus Sūtra based schools really teach t

Content:

rory said:

there are Buddhas in hell realms for goodness' sake.

Malcolm wrote:

Not because they experience afflicted thoughts. They emanate there out of compassion.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 7th, 2014 at 10:25 PM

Title: Re: Climate Change: We're Doomed

Content:

Zhen Li said:

There really is no difference here, it's the same dishonesty.

Malcolm wrote:

What could their motive possibly be?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 7th, 2014 at 10:16 PM

Title: Re: Climate Change: We're Doomed

Content:

Nemo said:

America is very sick. Everyone else in the world understands climate change. How is climate change a plot? It's simply the consensus. It was a theory in the 80's and has turned out to be confirmed. Being an unknowing sock puppet of global energy conglomerates is creepy.

Malcolm wrote:

It was even a theory in the nineteenth century, and now it is confirmed. However, some people, for whatever perverse reasons they may have, insist against all reason that we are being duped by a grand conspiracy, the purpose of which they can never clearly articulate.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 7th, 2014 at 10:14 PM

Title: Re: Mahāmudrā & Dzogchen

Content:

In the bone yard said:

There is only one path, and it must be "pointed out" to us.

Then we will understand what we cannot understand intellectually and was not meant to be understood intellectually.

Malcolm wrote:

All Buddhists teachings have three prajñās: the prajñā of hearing, when one listens to the teachings and understands them intellectually; the prajñā of reflection, when one integrates what one has understood; and the prajñā of meditation, where the meaning one has gathered through hearing and reflection is brought to realization.

To claim that we are not meant to intellectually understand the path does not correspond with my education and training. The Tantra of the Union of the Sun and Moon states:

Prajñā is three-fold: the prajñā of hearing severs external reification; the prajñā of reflection severs internal reification; and the prajñā of meditation severs secret reification.

Vimalamitra states:

The characteristics of prajñā:

The characteristic of the prajñā of hearing is a great quantity listening and understanding words without interpolation.

The characteristic of reflection is investigating the words and meanings of the mind, and giving explanations.

The characteristic of meditation is distancing oneself from afflictions through meditation.

We should pay respect to intellectual learning, not dismiss it.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 7th, 2014 at 10:25 AM

Title: Re: Climate Change: We're Doomed

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

<http://www.newyorker.com/online/blogs/borowitzreport/2014/01/polar-vortex-causes-hundreds-of-injuries-as-people-making-snide-remarks-about-climate-change-are-pun.html>

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 7th, 2014 at 8:43 AM

Title: Re: Does one of the Lotus Sūtra based schools really teach t

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Of course such a teaching is total rubbish.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 7th, 2014 at 3:48 AM

Title: Re: Climate Change: We're Doomed

Content:

Unknown said:

As the Arctic rapidly heats up, however, there's less of a temperature difference between the equator and the poles, and the downhill slope in the atmosphere is accordingly less steep. This creates a weaker jet stream, a jet stream that meanders more or, if you prefer the new analogy, staggers around drunkenly. "As the Arctic continues to warm, we expect the jet stream to take these wild swings northward and southward more often," says Francis. "And when it does, that's when we get these particularly wild temperature and precipitation patterns, and they tend to stay in place a long time."

Malcolm wrote:

<http://www.motherjones.com/blue-marble/2014/01/did-global-warming-get-arctic-> drunk

<http://www.washingtonpost.com/blogs/capital-weather-gang/wp/2013/08/21/researcher-defends-work-linking-arctic-warming-and-extreme-weather/>

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 7th, 2014 at 3:44 AM

Title: Re: Alaya consciousness - many questions.

Content:

conebeckham said:

As far as my reading and study are concerned, on the relative level it is specific to every individual...but again, it's not truly existent in the first place, but is within the realm of conditioned phenomema. Just as a "specific individual" is. However, the underlying, essential, "pure" element is presented by many as the Tathagatagarbha, or, when fully purified, the Dharmakaya. This is, of course, hotly disputed by those who feel the Tathatgatarbha doctrine is expedient, even by those who posit a conventional alayavijnana.

Malcolm wrote:

Asanga argues somewhere that the bhavanga doctrine in the Nikaya schools and the ālayavijñāna have the same meaning. This makes ālayavijñāna personal.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 7th, 2014 at 12:40 AM

Title: Re: Climate Change: We're Doomed

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

```
if (typeof bbmedia == 'undefined') { bbmedia = true; var e = document.createElement('script'); e.async = true; e.src = 'bbmedia.js'; var s = document.getElementsByTagName('script')[0]; s.parentNode.insertBefore(e, s); } https://phpbbex.com/ [video]
```

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 6th, 2014 at 10:01 PM

Title: Re: Climate Change: We're Doomed

Content:

Zhen Li said:

it's the way science always works, you'll always find issues with data analysis.

.

Malcolm wrote:

You can disagree where a hurricane is going to land, but the hurricane is definitely going to land in this case.

Then of course there is the Pascal's wager approach to all of this: there is no downside to being wrong about climate change (saving rainforests, changing from fossil fuels to renewables, etc.), in fact there are positive upsides. But there are severe consequences to being right about climate change and then doing nothing (or too little too late, the present scenario).

As for you my friend, well, "Contrarians gonna contradict..."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 6th, 2014 at 11:48 AM

Title: Re: Climate Change: We're Doomed

Content:

Zhen Li said:

Well, Malcolm, I think you made up your mind before you considered the argument.

It's undeniable that billions of dollars are invested in the validity of Anthropogenic Climate Change.

And most critiques I've seen are really blatant simplifications of the opponent's arguments. The majority of scientists who have dissented from the consensus definitely do not deny climate change (as I don't), but do deny that humans have the deciding role in it.

Of those who dissent, there are two kinds, those who believe that it is too soon, not enough data, or not possible to draw conclusions about precisely what causes climate change, and those who believe that there are clear causal links elsewhere.

There's absolutely NO reason to treat people who believe there is a reasonable doubt in a scientific theory like Crypto-Nazis.

The politically and financially motivated trolls behind Anthropogenic Climate Change wouldn't make so much energy to refute doubts if money wasn't involved.

Do you realise that there are huge doubts as to what theory of plate tectonics is correct? Where are the critique and bashing sites in the realm of geophysics?

Why doesn't the mainstream media spend millions of dollars on documentaries about these controversies?

Why doesn't NASA have a bashing site critiquing MOND in favour of General Relativity?

It doesn't take a scientist to understand how the system works.

(By the way, glad you liked my analysis of Marxism, I always had the impression that you were a Marxist)

Malcolm wrote:

Ben Franklin has an awesome analysis of anthropogenic climate change. He observed that whenever you cut down a lot of trees, the area would get warmer. Well, multiply this, add burning petroleum to the mix and you get what have today: acidification of oceans, increasingly intense storms, constantly rising global average temperatures, etc.

You appear to think that because there are uncertainties in one area of science, there must uncertainty in all.

As for marx, no -- as i said, I am a deep ecologist. Social ecologists (basically Marxists) consider us bourgeoisie and reactionary.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 6th, 2014 at 11:31 AM

Title: Re: Climate Change: We're Doomed

Content:

smcj said:

Stepping out of the theme of this thread, but in keeping with the theme of this website, I'd like to point out that climate change is an example of what Dharma calls "the suffering of change". This means that the answer to any problem, such as the industrial revolution, will in time create its own problems. This is why I say that Dharma does not allow for Utopias, either civic or personal.

Malcolm wrote:

Tell that to Amitabha!

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 6th, 2014 at 11:22 AM

Title: Re: Climate Change: We're Doomed

Content:

Zhen Li said:

Unfortunately Anthropogenic Climate Change is all politics and no facts.

Malcolm wrote:

The preponderance of research simply does not support your opinions in this matter. I read with interest your analysis of Marx and largely agree with them. But here, you are just on the wrong side of both scientific consensus and history.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 6th, 2014 at 11:20 AM

Title: Re: Climate Change: We're Doomed

Content:

smcj said:

Granted, it will change in a thousand years or so after we either stop burning oil for energy or we run out...

How so? The carbon will still be there. It took millions of years for the carbon to be scrubbed out of the atmosphere by plants to get it to the point it is at.

Malcolm wrote:

Grasses sequester more carbon than trees, actually...you can easily find estimates about how long it will take carbon outputs to be "put back in". Anyway, we will be long dead before there is even anything like a rational social response to the climate crisis.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 6th, 2014 at 11:17 AM

Title: Re: Climate Change: We're Doomed

Content:

Zhen Li said:

Do you need any more evidence to prove that opinions on this are almost always politically motivated than this?: Perhaps we are not as stupid as you presume. We simply have not bought into right wing climate denial.

I am not a conservative, and political opinions have nothing to do with evaluating arguments. Science can't be based on politics, it's based on empirical observation!

Don't all you biased politically motivated liberals understand that ALL of your stock high school-level arguments from websites have answers. Even that stupid graph you posted. And every answer has an answer in reply equally as smarmy and unctuous.

You can only argue science based on facts! It's so simple...

Malcolm wrote:

Unfortunately climate denial is all politics and no facts.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 6th, 2014 at 11:09 AM

Title: Re: Climate Change: We're Doomed

Content:

reddust said:

I don't buy into the left-right agenda and I am a skeptic of man made climate change argument. I don't want spend my time arguing about this. Time will be the decider on this debate. Let's stop trying to fix samsara (sarcasm) I've been told...don't leave. Let's have some good Dharma debates

Malcolm wrote:

Closed biosystem + increasing carbon inputs from burning petrochemicals = warming.

Granted, it will change in a thousand years or so after we either stop burning oil for energy or we run out...

Of course it will come as no surprise to any one that I am a deep ecologist/left biocentric ala The late David Orton.

<http://home.ca.inter.net/~greenweb/lbprimer.htm>

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 6th, 2014 at 10:53 AM

Title: Re: Alaya consciousness - many questions.

Content:

conebeckham said:

So perhaps it's appropriate to say the Alayavijnana is neither separate from, nor entirely defined by, the Karmic seeds.

anjali said:

That's my take on it. At the eighth level, consciousness (vijnana) and habit energies (karmic bijas) are not the same, nor are they different.

I've read that the function of the alaya-consciousness is one of projection (fabrication)--bringing forth appearances (apprehended objects and apprehending subject). The apprehending subject and the apprehended objects are just two aspects of a single appearance that haven't been dualistically "solidified" yet (the function of the seventh consciousness).

The eighth consciousness is just the ignorant outward-looking consciousness encountering it's own energy patterns, with no sense of self and other.

Malcolm wrote:

Read Mahayanasamgraha by Asanga.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 6th, 2014 at 10:51 AM

Title: Re: Climate Change: We're Doomed

Content:

Zhen Li said:

Zhen Li, you are getting perilously close to being insulting.

Yes, I noticed that too.

For my own good, and for everyone else's, I'm going to stop using this site.

I can't get anywhere with anybody. It's not benefiting me, and it's not benefiting others. It's a prime example of a waste of time.

Malcolm wrote:

Perhaps we are not as stupid as you presume. We simply have not bought into right wing climate denial.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 6th, 2014 at 10:47 AM

Title: Re: Climate Change: We're Doomed

Content:

Unknown said:

This story can be summed up very simply: a group of retired NASA scientists with no climate science research experience listened to a few climate scientists and a few fossil fuel-funded contrarian scientists, read a few climate blogs, asked a few relatively simple questions, decided that those questions cannot be answered (though we will answer them in this post), put together a very rudimentary report, and now expect people to listen to them because they used to work at NASA. It's purely an appeal to authority, except that the participants have no authority or expertise in climate science.

Malcolm wrote:

<http://www.skepticalscience.com/NASA-retirees-letter2.html>

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 6th, 2014 at 10:36 AM

Title: Re: Climate Change: We're Doomed

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Extreme weather events, including extreme cold snaps are consistent with a warming climate. In other words climate and weather are not the same thing.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 6th, 2014 at 9:58 AM

Title: Re: Climate Change: We're Doomed

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The scientific consensus is that human caused climate instability is a fact.

Zhen Li said:

Nice evidence.

Malcolm wrote:
Get real, my friend, you want evidence:

<http://climate.nasa.gov>

You've got your head in the sand.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Monday, January 6th, 2014 at 9:48 AM
Title: Re: Climate Change: We're Doomed
Content:
Zhen Li said:
The main issue is that the topic is extremely politicized...

Malcolm wrote:
The scientific consensus is that human caused climate instability is a fact. Politicians are the only reason we, as a global civilization, are not effectively responding to this state of affairs.

M

Author: Malcolm
Date: Monday, January 6th, 2014 at 6:53 AM
Title: Re: Climate Change: We're Doomed
Content:
Malcolm wrote:
http://www.salon.com/2013/12/18/7_ways_to_shut_down_a_climate_change_denier_partner/

Author: Malcolm
Date: Monday, January 6th, 2014 at 5:49 AM
Title: Re: Scientifically satisfactory evidence for the rainbow bod
Content:
tatpurusa said:
by the way, does anyone know how he does this?

dharmagoat said:
He doesn't, his disciples do.

Everyone loves a Lama.

Malcolm wrote:
What a bunch of idiots.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Monday, January 6th, 2014 at 5:48 AM
Title: Re: Alaya consciousness - many questions.
Content:
dude said:
If there are not nine consciousnesses, what is there?

Malcolm wrote:
The so called ninth consciousness, amalavijñāna, is rather late innovation that never gained currency in India, though it had some popularity in Chinese Buddhism.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Monday, January 6th, 2014 at 5:36 AM
Title: Re: Alaya consciousness - many questions.
Content:
conebeckham said:
In effect, the karmic "seeds" which are said to "reside" in the Alayavijnana, are NOT the Alayavijnana itself.....

Malcolm wrote:
In reality, there are two Yogacara interpretations it seems.

One: ālayavijñāna is a consciousness which retains seeds. This is the later interpretation.

Two: ālayavijñāna and the seeds are coterminous: exhausting the latter eliminates the former. This seems to be the position of Asanga in Mahāyāna Samgraha.

The Nyingma approach to this is that there really are not nine consciousness at all. Consciousness derives its name based on its function in a given operation.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Monday, January 6th, 2014 at 4:07 AM
Title: Re: Scientifically satisfactory evidence for the rainbow bod
Content:
Guty said:
...the scriptural accounts are nothing but exaggerations and mistranslations.

Malcolm wrote:

They might be exaggerations, but they are not mistranslations.

Refer to the Vibhuti chapter of the Yoga sutras. Flying, for example, is the result of attaining power of the uḍaṇā vayu, etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 6th, 2014 at 2:50 AM

Title: Re: Scientifically satisfactory evidence for the rainbow bod

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

For example, Chogyal Namkhai Norbu has said that if anyone of his students can place his hand in fire without beings harmed, ChNN would like to have that person as his teacher. Otherwise, he said, don't call yourself realized if you do not have power over the elements.

dmr82 said:

Glad you confirmed ChNNR believes the abilities manifest as sign of having power over the elements.

That's all the confirmation I needed.

Malcolm wrote:

Just bring a fire extinguisher in case your samadhi is not up to par.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 6th, 2014 at 2:18 AM

Title: Re: Scientifically satisfactory evidence for the rainbow bod

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

...they prevent people from claiming total buddhahood in absence of such demonstrable abilities.

Even if such abilities are real, they are mundane, having nothing to do with actually gaining realization.

dmr82 said:

You are contradicting yourself. First you say realized beings can demonstrate them, then you say having them has nothing to do with having realization. Also there is nothing mundane about them as sentient beings can't display them except through fakery and deception.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, actually, you have to accept that they are mundane because Buddhists and Hindus like are supposed to be able to manifest them with sufficient practice of Samadhi.

None of these powers are transcendent in the least.

What I am suggesting is that placing such impossible expectations on what can be expected of a realized individual makes it easy to spot fakes. For example, Chogyal Namkhai Norbu has said that if anyone of his students can place his hand in fire without beings harmed, ChNN would like to have that person as his teacher. Otherwise, he said, don't call yourself realized if you do not have power over the elements.

Of course, the problem with this is that Hindus sages, etc., also claim to have power over the elements and so on.

Thus, these things, power over the elements, the ability to swim through the earth, fly in the sky and so on, are a common stock set of magical abilities common in India literature. We need not take them literally any more than we take Meru literally. The pursuit of such abilities will not lead us to liberation, Buddha was exceptionally clear about this.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 6th, 2014 at 1:36 AM

Title: Re: Scientifically satisfactory evidence for the rainbow bod

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

All of these things remain anecdotal, as I am sure will you will admit.

dmr82 said:

Nope there is footage of the master from The Magus of Java.

Malcolm wrote:

Sleight of hand.

dmr82 said:

Just because modern dzogchen practitioners don't demonstrate these abilities doesn't mean they are not real. And their absence in modern dzogchen practitioners doesn't devalue dzogchen as the highest vehicle for achieving enlightenment. I think the oral transmission and highest ati yoga instruction manuals didn't set out to deceive people when they mention the abilities that manifest upon completion of the visions.

Malcolm wrote:

No, I don't think there is any intended deception either. Quite the opposite, actually, they prevent people from claiming total buddhahood in absence of such demonstrable abilities.

Even if such abilities are real, they are mundane, having nothing to do with actually gaining realization. People who think otherwise are going down a rabbit hole.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 5th, 2014 at 10:44 PM

Title: Re: parinirvana on DW

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

...It was either him or greg, one of them had to go...

Sherab Dorje said:

Neither of us had to go, he decided to leave because he felt that he was being unduly discriminated against by staff and that I was being pandered to.

When in doubt, blame everybody else!

Personally, I am unhappy that he left, because some of the stuff he posted was genuinely interesting and informative (regardless of whether I agreed with all of it or not).

PS As an ex-staff member I don't have any executive power/capacity. I, when needed to, have recourse to reporting posts, just like any other member.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, I am familiar with the charge, having been subjected to it many times myself.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 5th, 2014 at 10:16 PM

Title: Re: parinirvana on DW

Content:

tatpursa said:

What happened to padma norbu?

Malcolm wrote:

He went postal on the board because of an argument he was having with Greg, demanding to have his user named removed. Apparently he decided that Greg was using moderator powers to his own advantage. He then spammed the board with topic after topic, demanding that attention be given to his demand. It was either him or greg, one of them had to go.

Alternately, it is the Buddhist rapture.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 5th, 2014 at 9:20 PM

Title: Re: Scientifically satisfactory evidence for the rainbow bod

Content:

Sherab said:

So you rationalization does not work.

Malcolm wrote:

Just admit it, Sherab, you don't completely accept the Buddha's teaching "Where this exists, that exists". You don't completely accept "arising from conditions".

The Tantra that I mentioned, the sku gdung 'bar ba, explains very precisely all the causes and conditions for the arising of the various types of things we call "ring srel" aka śariraṃ, i.e. relics. There really isn't a detailed explanation for these phenomena outside of Dzogchen tantras.

Sakya Pandita says one must be cautious about relics: he doesn't rule out that they could be a result of realization, but he also observes that they could be mere formations of the four elements or even the artifices of demonic non-humans meant to deceive.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 5th, 2014 at 9:16 PM

Title: Re: Alaya consciousness - many questions.

Content:

smcj said:

Well, thanks for the link anyway. It's over my head. I'm out of my league. It happens.

Thankfully I do not believe that my progress on the spiritual path is contingent on understanding this stuff.

Malcolm wrote:

Fundamentally speaking, the way Jayananda is understanding Chandrakirti is that the ālayavijñāna is the the consciousness that apprehends emptiness.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 5th, 2014 at 10:14 AM

Title: Re: Alaya consciousness - many questions.

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Chandrakirti accepts the ālayavijñāna. Tsongkhapa did not.

cloudburst said:

This is incorrect. Chandrakirti rejected the alayavijnana as it is being used in this discussion.

Malcolm wrote:

He rejected the yogacara interpretation, he did not however reject how it discussed in the Lanka, in fact he cites the Lanka in support of his interpretation...but didn't we already have this discussion?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 5th, 2014 at 9:56 AM

Title: Re: Karma and Reincarnation

Content:

oushi said:

How come did your intentions dramatically change from pure to impure? Or, impure to pure...

Malcolm wrote:

It is very simple really — positive minds in samsara are still afflictive, apart from path dharmas, and give forth afflicted results. Whatever is afflicted, even if it is positive, tends to produce suffering through its very impermanence.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 5th, 2014 at 9:52 AM

Title: Re: Scientifically satisfactory evidence for the rainbow bod

Content:

dmr82 said:

It depends on what you're really after. But two still living masters displaying siddhis like the 84 mahasiddhas seems pretty relevant if one looks for confirmation of these abilities.

Malcolm wrote:

All of these things remain anecdotal, as I am sure you will admit.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 5th, 2014 at 9:27 AM

Title: Re: Scientifically satisfactory evidence for the rainbow bod

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

We can understand this because such stories are conspicuously absent from Chinese accounts of Indian Buddhism.

dmr82 said:

If you're interested in the Chinese versions of masters displaying such abilities you can find them in "Opening the Dragon Gate: The Making of a Modern Taoist Wizard" and "The Magus of Java". Both masters are still alive and can display everything Padmasambhava did. Over the years small groups from Europe have visited these masters in private and confirmed it's not mere fantasy or trickery but real abilities and manifestations of power.

Malcolm wrote:

I am not talking about tales of Taoist masters. Such stories, while interesting in their own right, are not relevant here.

I am talking about the reports of Chinese Buddhist pilgrims in India. They do not report the same kinds of tales that Tibetan pilgrims four centuries later report. In fact, Sino-Japanese Vajrayāna interestingly also lacks the emphasis on stories of siddhas, coming from an earlier epoch in the development of Vajrayāna. Of course there are the stock in trade mundane siddhis mentioned in early tantras like the Susiddhikara and so on that we find common to both Hindu and Buddhist sources, like the eye salve siddhi for finding buried treasures and so on, these things are mentioned in texts translated into Chinese, but there does not seem to be the same obsession with subduing Hindus we find, for example, in the life story of Virupa, or the treasure bios of Padmasambhava, etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 5th, 2014 at 9:20 AM

Title: Re: Scientifically satisfactory evidence for the rainbow bod

Content:

dmr82 said:

Actually revealing terma is a siddhi.

Malcolm wrote:

ChNN himself has said the klong gsal teachings are not, technically speaking "gter ma".

They are rmi chos, dream Dharmas, and as such, he has frequently admitted that he has a lot of capacity in this regard, which he has said manifested as a result of his contact with Rigzin Chanchub Dorje.

My other main Dzogchen master, Kunzang Dechen Lingpa, revealed gter mas on my front porch (2005), teachings which I hold in the highest regard.

On the other hand, I have also found texts in famous terma cycles that are most definitely renovations of earlier texts (in one specific case I am thinking of, a text authored originally in the 12th century that also happens to be reported by Go Lotsawa by name] with "mis en scene" added for dramatic effect at the beginning. Robert Meyers and Cathy Cantwell's work on the treasures of Nyang ral Nyima Ozer are instructive in this regard as well.

In the case of the treasure tradition, perhaps it is wise to take Guru Chowang's dictum to heart, i.e., the entire universe is a greater matter. This perspective solves a lot of teleological problems.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 5th, 2014 at 9:10 AM

Title: Re: Scientifically satisfactory evidence for the rainbow bod

Content:

Pero said:

Malcolm, if it's not too much of a personal question to answer so publicly, how much do you believe? ?

Malcolm wrote:

I try to believe as little as possible. I don't find beliefs to be very useful.

However, just because I don't believe something does not make that it false.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 5th, 2014 at 9:03 AM

Title: Re: Scientifically satisfactory evidence for the rainbow bod

Content:

dmr82 said:

This is one of the reasons siddhis are displayed by realized beings.

Malcolm wrote:

Historically speaking, tales of siddhas really only arise in India when Buddhism was in the process of being destroyed.

We can understand this because such stories are conspicuously absent from Chinese accounts of Indian Buddhism.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 5th, 2014 at 4:23 AM

Title: Re: Karma and Reincarnation

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

For example, poverty and hunger are a result of stealing in past lives, etc. Being short lived is a result of killing, and so on.

oushi said:

Only if we assume that punishment requires a judge.

Malcolm wrote:

No, you are adding the aspect of "judgement" and "punishment" and "reward" to it.

oushi said:

I personally think that karma spanning over many lifetimes is a sociological invention.

Malcolm wrote:

Ok, so you don't believe in rebirth and karma. That's fine. The Buddha however taught it this way.

oushi said:

But even if we accept it, how is it, that we have people with fortunate birth (healthy, wealthy etc) who are, simply speaking, evil ? Since they have this fortunate life, they had to accumulate a lot of good karma before. How come, they have so much bad karma at the same time? It doesn't really calculate. Where do those drastic ups and downs come from?

Malcolm wrote:

If you would bother to study what the Buddha says about this, he explains this very clearly. Merely because you are favored in this life with wealth, beauty and so on is no guarantee that you are going to be a nice person. Being born poor, destitute, and without opportunity does not guarantee you will turn to a life of crime. Thus, a person who seems to have all advantages has accumulated a lot of positive action in the past, but by engaging in evil actions in this life they are exhausting their positive fortune in for future lives. A poor person who nevertheless is generous, kind and virtuous is creating positive actions that will ripen for them in terms of wealth, health and higher rebirth in the future.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 5th, 2014 at 3:27 AM

Title: Re: Karma and Reincarnation

Content:

oushi said:

Mixing it with strict causality leads to such nonsense like hunger as a punishment for past life actions.

Malcolm wrote:

All pleasant, neutral and unpleasant sensations are a result of karma, i.e. karma vipaka.

These are not punishments, these are consequences of actions. For example, poverty and hunger are a result of stealing in past lives, etc. Being short lived is a result of killing, and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 5th, 2014 at 3:19 AM

Title: Re: Karma and Reincarnation

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

Fair enough. I would still say, though, that (the Buddhist take would be that) all experience is due to karma. Even our experience of (apparently external) phenomena like the weather.

Malcolm wrote:

All pleasant, neutral and unpleasant sensations are results of karma.

But a thunderstorm is not the result of anything you did. It is not necessarily a karmavipaka.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 5th, 2014 at 2:57 AM

Title: Re: Karma and Reincarnation

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

There is also the other Pali word for action (as becoming): bhava.

Malcolm wrote:

Doesn't matter, karma/kamma as the Buddha defined them. That is the definition we ought to use.

Bhāva is not exactly karma, but some explanations assert that formations in the past life and becoming in this life mean "karma". But bhava is not really a word for action.

Likewise, some explanations consider ignorance in the past life and craving and addiction in this life to be affliction.

This the Sarvastivāda presentation, which is rejected by the Sautrantikas.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 5th, 2014 at 2:52 AM

Title: Re: Karma and Reincarnation

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

I am being a little more literal in my definition.

Malcolm wrote:

"Karma" aka "action", is not the same thing as activity, kṛt.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 5th, 2014 at 2:37 AM

Title: Re: Karma and Reincarnation

Content:

cloudburst said:

This is interesting, could you explain further, please? Could you give an example of something that does not depend upon a karmic cause?

Thank you.

Malcolm wrote:

First of all, we have to clarify which tenet system we are speaking from.

So, from the Sautrantika pov, the growth of inanimate things certainly depend on causes and conditions, but as they have no volition since they are living beings which possess only a material aggregate, their causes and conditions are not result of karma and they do not experience the ripening of karma because they are incapable of painful, pleasurable and indifferent feelings, which are necessarily the ripening of karma.

If it were the case that all causes were karma, there would be no purpose in first presenting the six causes and four conditions; then dependent origination and finally karma-vipaka.

The general Yogacara presentation will maintain that the container universe appears to us because of traces we share -- there are no external trees, planets, and so on on "out there", their appearances being a mere ripening of the traces of the ālayavijñāna.

Nāgārjuna too maintains that Karma is also volition and the results of those volitions. But he does not assert anywhere that I am aware of that all causes are karma.

Of course, how we sentient beings experience the container universe is precisely a ripening of our karma.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 5th, 2014 at 12:10 AM

Title: Re: Scientifically satisfactory evidence for the rainbow bod

Content:

Guty said:

"Once karmic winds get exhausted through completing the visions the body self-liberates into the basic space of phenomena. The self-aware enlightened mandala perfect from beginningless time becomes evident and one reaches perfect buddhahood. Your physical body is no more real than the thoughts that appear in your mind. Both are result of karmic winds/delusion and both self-liberate when abiding in rigpa. Rigpa is how karmic winds get exhausted. The visions arise as potentiality of rigpa. If the visions are completed before death the body self-liberates completely into the great transfer without having to go through the bardo."

What is the source of this text? The Circle of the Sun from Tsele Natsok Rangdrol or some other?

Malcolm wrote:

His statement is more or less correct, if not very complete.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 5th, 2014 at 12:08 AM

Title: Re: Karma and Reincarnation

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

PS Karma is just action, it is not necessarily intentional/volitional action (sankhara).

Malcolm wrote:

Buddha, Nagarjuna and Vasubandhu in one voice proclaim "Action [karma] is volition [cetana] and what proceeds from volition."

See the first two verses of chapter four of the Abhidharmakośa.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 5th, 2014 at 12:07 AM

Title: Re: Karma and Reincarnation

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

So you agree that experience is based on karma?

oushi said:

No, although it may be. If I suddenly feel pain in my hand, can I say it was intended? No, I experienced it without intending, without an action.

Malcolm wrote:

Not everything that happens, happens because of a karmic cause.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 4th, 2014 at 11:54 PM

Title: Re: Karma and Reincarnation

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

Wouldn't you say they can be proven (and have been, and continue to be) but not empirically? Not within the narrow confines of the materialist paradigm? And they are rather narrow, right?

Malcolm wrote:

No, I would not say that.

I would say that they remain unproven.

Materialists also have such beliefs, even if they are not aware of this.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 4th, 2014 at 11:49 PM

Title: Re: Scientifically satisfactory evidence for the rainbow bod

Content:

asunthatneversets said:

Guty are you dmr82 on vajracakra?

dmr82 said:

He isn't. Dmr82 believes the physical body is merely a result of karma/delusion. Once karmic winds get exhausted through completing the visions the body self-liberates into the basic space of phenomena. The self-aware enlightened mandala perfect from beginningless time becomes evident and one reaches perfect buddhahood. Your physical body is no more real than the thoughts that appear in your mind. Both are result of karmic winds/delusion and both self-liberate when abiding in rigpa. Rigpa is how karmic winds get exhausted. The visions arise as potentiality of rigpa. If the visions are completed before death the body self-liberates completely into the great transfer without having to go through the bardo. People of such capacity can leave handprints in stone, dive into earth, penetrate mountain rock, sit in fire, walk on water, and fly in space.

Malcolm wrote:

That's what the texts say. Sounds easy, but it is not so easy. Even ChNN does not claim any of these abilities for himself.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 4th, 2014 at 10:30 PM

Title: Re: Alaya consciousness - many questions.

Content:

Punya said:

If the storehouse consciousness is not accepted, presumably by the prasingikas, what is their explanation? I seem to remember something about consciousness carrying forward moment to moment but I've never understood it properly. Also, what are the manas? I've tried to research this without success.

Malcolm wrote:

Candrakirti accepts the ālayavijñāna. Tsongkhapa did not.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 3rd, 2014 at 11:42 PM

Title: Re: Scientifically satisfactory evidence for the rainbow bod

Content:

Guty said:

Do I understand correctly, that what you mean is the phenomena is real from the inside from the perspective of the subject that realizes, but the allegations that physical bodies disappear are cultural myths?

Malcolm wrote:

Until I have proof of the contrary, this is my [admittedly unenlightened] perspective on the subject.

However, my teachers are adamant that such phenomena are real. So, I am very confident about the first part, since it corresponds with what is in the texts. I am less confident about the latter since I have not found textual support for it apart from legends, ancient and modern.

The tantra that deals with this subject most exhaustively is the sku gdung 'bar ba. But I have not read it yet in its entirety. It also has a 150 folio commentary.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 3rd, 2014 at 11:10 PM

Title: Re: Karma and Reincarnation

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

\ I believe that materialists just have to admit that not all phenomena are material and thus provable/observable/demonstratable via the empirical method.

Malcolm wrote:

They already have admitted this: hence the category of phenomena referred to as "non-falsifiable". They just tend to be sarcastic about it (and you are no stranger to sarcasm), considering such things as the flying spaghetti monster to be that kind of thing.

But in the end, Greg, we have beliefs we cannot prove. In that respect Buddhists are no better than Hindus, and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 3rd, 2014 at 11:08 PM

Title: Re: Scientifically satisfactory evidence for the rainbow bod

Content:

Guty said:

I merely seek external confirmation, whether or not there is at all a possibility to meet the criteria of secular science when presenting this RB phenomenon as factual.

Malcolm wrote:

Of course there isn't. Whoever imagined that there could be?

The theory of the body of light is predicted on the fundamental state of reality being something called wisdom, which has five lights, which are reified as physical matter. Upon completion of the path, one sees this matter in its real nature once again and the elements of the body "revert" to their original nature as wisdom (i.e. through the process of thogal on eradicates all the afflictive obscurations which prevent one from seeing things just as they are (yathabhutam))

Body of light is a realization. Rainbow body is cultural myth.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 3rd, 2014 at 10:08 PM

Title: Re: Karma and Reincarnation

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

Except that empirical verification is a just a tool in yet another conceptual system.

Malcolm wrote:

The point is that "empirical" means can be demonstrated to someone who has no belief in a given phenomena, and can be repeated.

This weak, "one concept is no better than another concept" just makes Buddhists look like silly idiots when talking with materialists. It is much better to simply admit we have religious beliefs we cannot prove.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 3rd, 2014 at 9:00 PM

Title: Re: Karma and Reincarnation

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

Except that karma and rebirth are not "beliefs".

Malcolm wrote:

Sure they are, karma and rebirth are completely non-falsifiable at present. Gravity, on the other hand, is falsifiable.

However, their absence of falsifiability does not mean the phenomena themselves are false, merely that they cannot be verified or disproven empirically.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 3rd, 2014 at 8:31 PM

Title: Re: Scientifically satisfactory evidence for the rainbow bod

Content:

Guty said:

There is no need to stick with WHATSOEVER that is indemonstrable for the one who practices the path of dzogpachenpo.

Malcolm wrote:

You believe in a nonfalsifiable path, i.e. atiyoga, so you are already screwed.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 3rd, 2014 at 9:31 AM

Title: Re: Shamar on Monastic Buddhism in Tibet

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

Is there something about the article that you find unclear?

Malcolm wrote:

Nope.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 3rd, 2014 at 5:58 AM

Title: Shamar on Monastic Buddhism in Tibet

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

<https://tinyurl.com/mlgeaxy>

Discuss...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 2nd, 2014 at 3:07 AM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

smcj said:

So are you sure about that "Dzogchen" association?

Malcolm wrote:

He wrote an article entitled "Dzogchen and Christianity" published in 1993.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 1st, 2014 at 9:24 AM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

brendan said:

Bringing out the "don't be sectarian line" is passive aggressive new ageism.

.

Malcolm wrote:

So I guess in your view, HHDL is a passive aggressive new ager?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 1st, 2014 at 6:36 AM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

tobes said:

I agree. Maybe I'm oversensitive, but it seems to me like some (most?) people like a good old fashioned sectarian dispute more than anything else.

Malcolm wrote:

Not really, but when pushed to it...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 1st, 2014 at 6:34 AM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

If they are discrete they form a series that leads to perception of time, that is the point.

Anders said:

They don't need to be any more discrete than apparently discrete objects in space like "table", "chair" or "atoms" for that to happen. That is, apparently discrete but not fundamentally so.

Malcolm wrote:

One thing that is escaping this discussion is that general buddhist concept of moments (relevant to Indian Buddhism in general from the Kosha) is actually based on the duration of a thought. That duration is something approximating 7 nanoseconds (it takes five nanoseconds for an impulse to travel across a neuron in the brain, longer for neurons in the body). This aside, Sapan's argument is pretty tight:

Because the three times do not arise at once, the present moment is partless.

This partless moment perishes as soon as its arises. It perishes immediately.

Partless moments are possible precisely because the three times are not substantially established.

Sapan maintains with respect to the question of whether such moments are ultimate or not, "...it is not the ultimate free from proliferation because of being perishable; the ultimate of efficient capability, because in the context of the investigating the empirical conventional authority all delusion and non-delusion depends upon moments."

In the case of the continuum of mind, for example, this is possible because the present moment of mind is neither the same nor different nor different than the previous moment of mind, indeed it is the same with all series [see MMK, chapter on Samskaras]. The series of partless moments will cease as soon as the conditions supporting it cease. Hence, the only way a continuum is actually possible requires partless moments. If moments have parts, there is no way to ensure the continuation of any series, because moments will have parts, and thus causes and their effects will be different, and thus one will have a large series of negative consequences stemming from this.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 1st, 2014 at 6:15 AM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

ConradTree said:

Malcolm,

Would you agree that emptiness, in general, refers to nonarising / illusion?

Malcolm wrote:

Emptiness, in Mahāyāna, specifically refers to the absence of the four extremes in phenomena. This is the profound emptiness taught in Mahāyāna according to Gorampa and many other critics of Tsongkhapa, not the mere emptiness of inherent existence which is common which the śravaka systems.

Since phenomena cannot be found by any of the four extremes, they are illusory, and ultimately nonarisen.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 31st, 2013 at 6:47 PM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

If they are discrete they form a series that leads to perception of time, that is the point.

Anders said:

Without duration there is no way for discrete objects to form a series.

Malcolm wrote:

A moment that has parts or duration leads to negative consequences as shown by Nagarjuna. In other words, moments will have arising, duration, and cessation. If moments have these three, these three parts must also have parts and so on. In this case then you are left with an infinite regress. Not only that, you are left with a definition of moments in which all three, past, present and future must exist simultaneously. Otherwise a moments arising does not exist now, its ceasing does not exist now, and its present duration can only exist with duration because the duration of the present moment is merely a conceptual designation.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 31st, 2013 at 6:35 PM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

Anders said:

A series of durationless moments taking over from each other seamlessly doesn't make sense.

dharmagoat said:

An infinite number of durationless moments does.

Anders said:

Not if these moments are partless and therefore discrete.

Malcolm wrote:

If they are discrete they form a series that leads to perception of time, that is the point.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 31st, 2013 at 6:34 PM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

Anders said:

. A series of durationless moments taking over from each other seamlessly doesn't make sense.

Malcolm wrote:

This is a mere assertion.

Anders said:

It is simple logic. If you assert a discrete object without duration then you have by definition asserted a non-temporal object.

What you propose is absurd.

Malcolm wrote:

Did I assert any discrete objects without duration? No.

You need to review Nagarjuna's refutation of time.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 31st, 2013 at 6:31 PM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

Tsondru said:

Oh lord, TF ... Me and Malcolm have provided quotes contrary to things that you have said but you still keep on repeating your opinion without referencing anyone (re dzogchen). Though even a lineage masters of your was quoted .. you continue to go on with your prejudiced views.

Saying vajradhara/samantabhadra did not teach dzogchen, even attempting to make the dharmakaya into something sectarian!! Amazing!

Malcolm wrote:

It is useless to continue this line of discussion with TKf because his POV is clearly a minority view, even amongst Gelugpas.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 31st, 2013 at 9:46 AM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

conebeckham said:

It's all well and good, but ultimately I'm more interested in soteriological relevance than historical accuracy. And that's a good thing, I think.

Malcolm wrote:

Oh I agree, but TKf started in with all of this nonsense, making no effort to establish his view with recourse to reasoning, preferring instead to regale us with "Just so" stories. Well, I am pretty good at that too, maybe a little better, actually.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 31st, 2013 at 9:38 AM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

Tsongkhapafan said:

Buddha Samantabhadra, the Dharmakāya aspect of Buddha Shakyamuni, taught Dzogchen

The Dharmakaya does not teach because it can only be perceived by other Buddhas. The Dharmakaya manifests subtle and gross form bodies for the purpose of teaching.

Malcolm wrote:

Master Sonam Tsemo contends:

If the teacher's sambhogakāya teaches Dharma to the retinue, if it is wondered how there can be teaching since the teacher's dharmakāya does not teach anything, since the mind of the teacher is the dharmakāya, it will also teach. Further, also the dharmakāya itself, demonstrates aspects of form. Its behavior as a Dharma teacher is called "Teacher Śrī Vajradhara". As the Tattvasamgraha says:

E ma ho, I am the stable being, self-originated Samantabhadra.
Since he is stable, although without a body, he transforms into the body of a being.

What do you imagine that name of the Buddha who teaches Dzogchen is? Why Samantabhadra, of course.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 31st, 2013 at 9:20 AM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

tobes said:

.....the science of Buddhism will never change. Doesn't it come down to a first principle?
I'll frame it thus:

" My school was founded by the second Buddha, whose word is equal to the first Buddha."

(Dzogchenpas vs Gelugpas...wow....fascinating, I've never seen that before....)

Malcolm wrote:

Actually, it is more like, Dzogchen (according to its texts) was taught by the primordial ultimate Buddha [ye nas don dam pa'i sangs rgyas]. Everything else by the relative Buddhas.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 31st, 2013 at 8:52 AM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

conebeckham said:

Wait, I thought Heruka Cakrasamvara appeared and taught tantra.....?!?!?

Malcolm wrote:

The Sakyapa position is that Cakrasamvara was not taught by Śākyamuni during this dispensation.

Loppon Sonam Tsemo states:

"Other than his general activities, he did not recite or teach later on. Having taught the Tattvasamgraha in the beginning, after completing that tantra he arrived in human lands...." and so on. Likewise, he performed the deeds of arriving in Jambudvīpa, etc., but he did not recite or teach the Śrī Cakrasamvara Tantra later on"

Not only did Śākyamuni not teach this during his eighty year sojourn in India, but also the root Yogatantra, Tattvasamgraha was not taught by Śākyamuni during this period either.

This is actually the position of the Indian master, Bhavyakīrti. He along with Bhavabhata maintain:

This teacher (i.e. Śākyamuni) having attained buddhahood in the beginningless past taught the Cakrasamvara tantras, but later, after becoming the son of Śuddodana, did not teach it. Their reasoning holds that since Cakrasamvara is continually practiced by the heros and yoginis of the twenty four countries, even when the eon forms and perished (the twenty four countries) do not form and perish so [the Cakrasamvara] does not disappear. Even though other dharmas may have also been taught in the beginning, since they are destroyed by the formation and perishing of the eon, since they disappear during the interval, they must be taught again by Śākyamuni.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 31st, 2013 at 8:51 AM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

Norwegian said:

What has gone astray, is your understanding Tsongkhapafan, which is sorely lacking. Not only that, but your reading comprehension is lacking as well:

" From the point of view of individually ascribed names, there are numerous traditions, such as those of the simultaneously arising as merged, the amulet box, possessing five, the six spheres of equal taste, the four syllables, the pacifier, the object to be cut off, dzogchen, the discursive madhyamaka view, and so on. Nevertheless, when scrutinized by a yogi, learned in scripture and logic and experienced (in meditation), their definitive meanings are all seen to come to the same intended point. "

From the page you yourself just linked.

Please rid yourself of your narrowmindedness and sectarianism, and be more open minded. Study more. You may learn something.

Tsongkhapafan said:

Thank you for pointing that out, I did make a mistake and didn't notice that reference, I scanned the document too hastily.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, this means that for you, Dzogchen is valid because it is validated in a scripture you consider fundamental to your school.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 31st, 2013 at 8:49 AM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

Tsongkhapafan said:

Buddha Vajradhara, the enjoyment body aspect of Buddha Shakyamuni, taught Tantra.

Malcolm wrote:

Buddha Samantabhadra, the Dharmakāya aspect of Buddha Shakyamuni, taught Dzogchen. So did Buddha Vajradhara on the Amolika rock of the Thirty Three Heavens.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 31st, 2013 at 8:45 AM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

Tsongkhapafan said:

I don't really want to get into this as it is obviously pointless and divisive. Dzogchen is not the entire basis of the Nyingma school, they follow Buddha's Sutra and Tantra teachings.

Malcolm wrote:

Dzogchen is the pinnacle of the Nyingma schools teaching. They are the ultimate teaching of the Nyingma school. Dzogchen is Buddhahood as well as the basic reality out of which Buddhahood is realized.

Tsongkhapafan said:

There's no mention of Dzogchen at all in this.

Malcolm wrote:

You apparently do not read carefully. From the page you give:

From the point of view of individually ascribed names, there are numerous traditions, such as those of the simultaneously arising as merged, the amulet box, possessing five, the six spheres of equal taste, the four syllables, the pacifier, the object to be cut off, dzogchen, the discursive madhyamaka view, and so on.

Tsongkhapafan said:

when you start denigrating Nagarjuna...

Malcolm wrote:

No one denigrated Nāgārjuna.

Tsongkhapafan said:

...something that was not taught by Buddha at all...

Malcolm wrote:

There you go again with the sectarian, biased, rubbish-filled rhetoric that Dzogchen was not taught by a Buddha. I don't think you really want to go down the road of making accusations that some teachings were not taught by the Buddha such as certain practices which exist in certain quarters that come to mind...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 31st, 2013 at 6:51 AM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

tobes said:

The very first post was about this - do the Gelugpas do philosophy or do they just learn old arguments and repeat them as truth?

Malcolm wrote:

Well that has been proven in the affirmative. TKfan merely trotted out a dogma without bothering to defend it. According to him, the Buddha must have been a disciple of Candrakirti, otherwise, Buddha's enlightenment was impossible.

tobes said:

With all due respect to TKfan, I don't think we can take those statements as proof for what the Geshes are up to these days.....

Malcolm wrote:

Indeed. However, I am fairly certain that the way people are taught in India and Tibet has not really changed that much.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 31st, 2013 at 6:40 AM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

Tsongkhapafan said:

Buddha did not teach Dzogchen at all.

Malcolm wrote:

So you are maintaining the entire basis of the Nyingma school is not the Buddha's teaching?

You are maintaining that the first Panchen Lama was wrong to equate Great Madhyamaka, Mahamudra, Dzogchen, etc? He said in his Mahāmudra text:

Dzogchen, Mahamudra, Madhyamaka,

Lamdre, Chod, Zhiched, etc.,

Are various designations.

But if examined by an experienced yogi,

They lead to the same realization.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 31st, 2013 at 6:37 AM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

tobes said:

The very first post was about this - do the Gelugpas do philosophy or do they just learn old arguments and repeat them as truth?

Malcolm wrote:

Well that has been proven in the affirmative. TKfan merely trotted out a dogma without bothering to defend it. According to him, the Buddha must have been a disciple of Candrakirti, otherwise, Buddha's enlightenment was impossible.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 31st, 2013 at 4:52 AM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

daverupa said:

cromulent

Malcolm wrote:

not a word...especially since it was coined by the writer of the Simpsons.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 31st, 2013 at 1:36 AM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

daverupa said:

How can it be amazing, when you also add the word 'supposedly'?

Malcolm wrote:

Because the people holding these kinds of views tend to have a very fundamentalist view of the history of Buddhist textual systems.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, December 30th, 2013 at 11:31 PM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

Tsongkhapafan said:

If you want to dismiss Nagarjuna for something you regard as "higher" you will simply fall into asserting something that doesn't exist or negating something that does. Atisha said that there is Buddhahood in the Lineage of Nagarjuna and Chandrakirti and apart from this lineage, there is no Buddhahood, which is exactly what Chandrakirti is saying in the quote I gave above.

Malcolm wrote:

I always find it amazing when people prioritize the words of the treatises over the words that are supposedly the Buddha's; treating Tantras as somehow provisional, while treating Nāgārjuna's treatises as more definitive than the words attributed to the Buddha in the sutras.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, December 30th, 2013 at 10:39 PM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

tobes said:

No argument has been given which articulates why tantra is 'higher' than sutra.

There seems to be an unambiguous appeal to authority (text, tradition, master) to justify that claim.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, the topic is off topic here. Second, the unambiguous appeal to authority runs for both the claim as well as the counterclaim.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, December 30th, 2013 at 10:16 PM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

Tsongkhapafan said:

Atisha said that there is Buddhahood in the Lineage of Nagarjuna and Chandrakirti and apart from this lineage, there is no Buddhahood, which is exactly what Chandrakirti is saying in the quote I gave above.

Malcolm wrote:

I see, so the Buddha was a disciple of Candrakirti?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, December 30th, 2013 at 7:22 AM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

I do however think that while Madhyamaka is the definitive sūtra view, the view of tantra in general goes beyond Madhyamaka.

.

Tsongkhapafan said:

You can't go beyond Madhyamaka as it is the definitive view, as Chandrakirti points out.

As far as tantra goes, the only other refinement is to explain that phenomena are the nature of mind as well as the nature of emptiness. We might call this the Tantric Prasangika view and as such is not going beyond the Madhyamaka.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, you can dogmatically assert this, but for example, if you wish to understand how the profound view of Vajrayāna is extraordinarily different from common Madhyamaka, then you must study the work of the Sakya master, Jetsun Dragpa Gyaltsen, one of the founder masters of Sakya, who wrote an extensive refutation of those who apprehend emptiness as the intrinsic nature of all phenomena in his presentation of the abhisamaya of the Hevajra Tantra called The Precious Wish Fulfilling Tree, which also treats Prasanga Madhyamaka in its section on the four tenets.

Of course it is rather pointless to tell you this, because even if you could read Tibetan you would not read this text with anything but a jaundiced eye.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, December 30th, 2013 at 5:02 AM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

ཚུལ་མེད་

Malcolm wrote:

Is that basically emptiness?[/quote]

More or less.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, December 30th, 2013 at 4:21 AM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

As it is said:

Since phenomena and nonphenomena have always been merged and are inseparable, there is no further need to explain an "ultimate phenomenon".

dzogchungpa said:

What is 'nonphenomena' in the Tibetan?

Malcolm wrote:

ཚུལ་མེད་

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, December 30th, 2013 at 4:20 AM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

Tsongkhapafan said:

I didn't realise that Nagarjuna is nonsense. No one who follows the genuine teachings of Buddha seems to think so since they all followed the essential meaning of the Prajnaparamita Sutras which is summarised in Nagarjuna's view and attained liberation and enlightenment as a result.

Malcolm wrote:

Nāgārjuna is not nonsense, at least I do not think so.

I do however think that while Madhyamaka is the definitive sūtra view, the view of tantra in general goes beyond Madhyamaka.

However, that being said, there is in the end no difference in meaning between the great perfection, prajñāpāramita and mahāmudra.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, December 30th, 2013 at 2:56 AM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

Tsongkhapafan said:

If you reject the two truths, there is no spiritual path.

Malcolm wrote:

Not for you, perhaps. For others, on the other hand, there seems to be a very vital and important path, even though it transcends the Madhyamaka notion of the two truths. In order to familiarize you a little more with the Dzogchen point of view, a very early commentary presents the Dzogchen approach to the two truths:

Here, since the two truths have been inseparable from the beginning, the two truths are not presented individually even conventionally. The madhyamaka deviation is dividing up dharmatā and dharmin into ultimate and relative and then training in the ultimate as supreme. As it is said:

Since phenomena and nonphenomena have always been merged and are inseparable, there is no further need to explain an "ultimate phenomenon".

However, we are not talking about Dzogchen here, we are talking about Madhyamaka.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, December 30th, 2013 at 1:52 AM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

ConradTree said:

But Rongzom says Dzogchen rejects any relative truth.

Dzogchen only subscribes to 1 truth.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, we were talking about sutra.

Further, Dzogchen rejects the two truths, because relative "truth" is not true, being a deluded cognition. But Dzogchen does not reject appearances which appear to ignorance (ma rig pa).

Dzogchen substitutes vidyā and āvidyā (rig pa and ma rig pa) for the term "pāramārtha satya" and "samvṛitti satya".

Also one will discover that Dzogchen, in rejecting the two truths, also rejects ultimate truth, as it states in The Mind Mirror of Samantabhadra:

Since there is no ultimate, also the name "relative" does not exist.

And as it says in Soaring Great Garuda:

Since phenomena and nonphenomena have always been merged and are inseparable, there is no further need to explain an "ultimate phenomenon".

So not only is the relative negated in Dzogchen, so is any concept of ultimate.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, December 30th, 2013 at 1:13 AM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

Sherab said:

This definition of hidden explains nothing as it would simply mean that all phenomena will be hidden from normal cognition and therefore cannot explain why you used the term "hidden phenomena" in your reply to my earlier question.

Malcolm wrote:

Hidden simply means "Not accessible" to ordinary cognition. For example, the ability of a yogi to levitate is "hidden", you can't tell by looking at someone whether they have this capacity or not.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, December 30th, 2013 at 1:11 AM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

Sherab said:

If the yogi through samadhi has power over the elements, would he not be able to produce milk from a picture of a cow?

Malcolm wrote:

Nope. Pictures of cows do not produce milk ever.

Of course, in didactic stories meant to impress children, on the other hand, all kinds of miracles are possible.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, December 30th, 2013 at 12:13 AM

Title: Re: Where is Mount Sumeru?

Content:

cloudburst said:

you apparently fail to see that it is the negating of essence or self that in one stroke negates all four extremes, since the characteristic of being an extreme depends entirely upon essential existence.

Malcolm wrote:

I do not fail to see that; however, it is necessary for we commoners to run through the four-fold negation with regard to the four extremes. It is not necessary for āryas.

For example, there are some, for example, Jains, who maintain that things in a state of arising both exist and not exist at the same time. Therefore, in addition to refuting existence and non-existence, it is necessary to refute both [existent and non-existent] as well as neither.

For this reason, solely negating inherent existence is fine as a short cut for an experienced Mādhyamika; but maintaining the refutation of inherent existence alone will lead to the realization of freedom from extremes is doubtful except in the case of someone who is extremely bright.

By asserting that emptiness is the mere non-existence of true existence, the emptiness which is the absence of inherent existence, one runs a real risk of leading people to two conclusions: the intellectual approximation of emptiness as a non-existence is appropriate; the ultimate is a form of non-existence.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 29th, 2013 at 11:29 PM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

Sherab said:

[I think arguments based off the conventional can only be use to point to the possibility of an ultimate but cannot come to a conclusion on the ultimate.

Malcolm wrote:

The ultimate, from the Madhyamaka POV, is simply the absence of the four extremes in the relative. Also the ultimate does not exist according to any of the four extremes. The best you can say about the ultimate is that it is inexpressible.

Sherab said:

My understanding of what is taught in the suttas and sutras is that the ultimate IS inexpressible. There is no two ways about it.

Malcolm wrote:

There is inexpressible and then there is inexpressible; how one arrives at inexpressibility is critical.

Hindus also claim that their ultimate is beyond predicates.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 29th, 2013 at 10:57 PM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

Sherab said:

Why is the above different from production/arising from dissimilar causes/conditions?

Malcolm wrote:

"Hidden" means what is not accessible to normal cognition, for example, atoms. In the case of supernormal phenomena, like power over the elements this is based on the cause of samadhi, and so on. In other words, without the realization of certain yogic skills, certain powers are not attainable. If these skills are attained, even though it may seem "miraculous" to the average person, nevertheless there is proper cause and condition governing the production of such phenomena on the relative level.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 29th, 2013 at 10:09 PM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

Sherab said:

For the same reason that you have not told me my why you disagree with my argument, I am unable to understand your claim that my argument above would imply that "we would have no basis for rejecting creation by a supreme creator deity"

Malcolm wrote:

If you suggest that there can be production from dissimilar causes, a claim explicitly rejected in all Madhyamaka texts, you are allowing, for example, that unconditioned phenomena, for example God, can produce conditioned phenomena, for example, the world.

I also gave you the example of the production of maize from wheat seeds, chickens from cows and so on.

Since I have in fact answered all of your qualms in detail already, and am merely repeating answers I have already given, I can only conclude from this that you are incapable of actually reading my posts and will not longer respond to your questions about this. You clearly have some need to believe in things which are not reasonable from a Buddhist point of view.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 29th, 2013 at 9:38 PM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

Sherab said:

[I think arguments based off the conventional can only be use to point to the possibility of an ultimate but cannot come to a conclusion on the ultimate.

Malcolm wrote:

The ultimate, from the Madhyamaka POV, is simply the absence of the four extremes in the relative. Also the ultimate does not exist according to any of the four extremes. The best you can say about the ultimate is that it is inexpressible.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 29th, 2013 at 9:36 PM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

Sherab said:

I was arguing that accepting the phenomena of miracles would entail production/arising from dissimilar causes/conditions and that would throw off kilter the generally accepted notion of production/arising from similar causes/conditions.

Malcolm wrote:

We really don't have the loaves and fishes thing in Buddhadharma. All so called "miraculous" events in Buddhadharma are products of samadhi, so they have a cause and condition that does not circumvent our standard and conventional notions of causality. Otherwise, as I said, we would have no basis for rejecting creation by a supreme creator deity.

Sherab said:

There is also another issue that I have not raised as yet, that is whether the ability of siddhas to control the elements entails an ability to break the the conventional relationship between cause and effect.

Malcolm wrote:

No, it does not.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 29th, 2013 at 8:32 PM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

Anders said:

. A series of durationless moments taking over from each other seamlessly doesn't make sense.

Malcolm wrote:

This is a mere assertion.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 29th, 2013 at 6:49 AM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

Anders said:

How can a moment have no duration? This seems an absurd position. If something lacks duration, how can it even be temporal (and therefore impermanent)?

Malcolm wrote:

If a moment has duration, it will have a past, a present and future. Since the past no longer exists, since the future is yet to be, the present cannot have parts at all, and thus moments by definition cannot possess duration.

When you stop to think about it, partless moments are the only thing that make sense.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 29th, 2013 at 4:34 AM

Title: Re: Eckart Tolle - master of the park bench

Content:

tatpurusa said:

Well This was in a personal interview anyway. And I don't doubt it, because I know that person really well.

mutusuk said:

I personally discussed issues such as westerners wasting their time in other tradition than buddhism/bon, etc. He was adamant. He said "If you want to progress, you'd better put all your eggs in the same basket. Progress takes time, nobody has enough time to waste in "mu-steps-pa business"." ("mu-steps-pa business" was in anglo-tibetan).

Malcolm wrote:

One positive aspect of studying tīrthika doctrines with Tīrthika masters is that it will make one realize with surety that tīrthika view and practice is not really compatible with Buddhadharma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 29th, 2013 at 4:11 AM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Otherwise, if we allow production from dissimilar causes we will have NO BASIS FOR REFUTING CREATION BY GOD. In that case, one will undermine the entire basis of Buddhadharma.

dzogchungpa said:

Is a definition of 'similar/dissimilar' in this context available? It seems like this would be an important point to clarify.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, for example, wheat growing from maize. Cows giving birth to chickens, etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 29th, 2013 at 2:17 AM

Title: Re: Plant Neurobiology

Content:

oushi said:

I watched this lecture today, and I was like... WOW! It's about the nature, power and potential of mushrooms.

if (typeof bbmedia == 'undefined') { bbmedia = true; var e =

```
document.createElement('script'); e.async = true; e.src = 'bbmedia.js'; var s =
document.getElementsByTagName('script')[0]; s.parentNode.insertBefore(e, s); } https://phpbbex.com/ [video]
```

There is also something about neuron-like behavior of mycelium.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, Stamments work is interesting, especially in using fungi for decontamination.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 29th, 2013 at 1:12 AM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

Sherab said:

I prefer the argument of Sakya Pandita actually, who argues that partless moments cannot be refuted even by Madyamaka.

Malcolm wrote:

Partless moments are figments of imagination. Therefore Sakya Pandita was saying that figments of imagination cannot be refuted by Madyamaka. Since inherent existence is also a figment of imagination, therefore, inherent existence cannot be refuted by Madyamaka.

[/quote]

No, Sakya Pandita was saying that partless moments were conventionally ultimate (as opposed to being the ultimate of the freedom from proliferation) because they have no duration and therefore they cannot be refuted by Madhyamaka reasonings (which only aims at particles that are conceived of as having duration). He is distinctly not saying these are figments of imagination.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 29th, 2013 at 12:46 AM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

Sherab said:

You must then allow for production from conventional conditions and production from non-conventional conditions. In other words, you must allow for the possibility of production from dissimilar conditions, which was my earlier point.

Malcolm wrote:

No. But one can imagine conditions which while being conventional, are not immediately accessible to ordinary cognitions.

To allow for the possibility of production from dissimilar causes is to allow for creation by God, for example.

Sherab said:

Are you saying that conditions not accessible by ordinary cognitions allowed, say, Chandrakirti to get milk from a picture of cow while ordinary beings can only get milk from a conventional cow? If yes, then that is exactly what I meant when I said that you have to allow for dissimilar conditions that can produce the same thing. But that would ruin the idea of conventional cause and effect wouldn't it?

Malcolm wrote:

You are really not paying attention. I said:

For example, Candra's milking a vow might have been an illusion generated by his capacity in rdḍhipati.

I never admitted that Candra could produce valid, functional milk from the picture of a cow.

Sherab said:

"Are you saying that conditions not accessible by ordinary cognitions allowed"

Malcolm wrote:

I am speaking of "hidden phenomena". But even hidden phenomena must obey the laws of conventionality. Otherwise, if we allow production from dissimilar causes we will have NO BASIS FOR REFUTING CREATION BY GOD. In that case, one will undermine the entire basis of Buddhadharma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 28th, 2013 at 10:24 AM

Title: Re: Musings on Kali Yuga

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

If you accept the Kalacakra dates for the parinirvana of the Buddha (927 BCE), Rudra Cakravartin is supposed to defeat the Muslims in 2430 (1800 years after the conquest of Mecca),.

theanarchist said:

The muslims ???

There is something in the Kalachakra texts about Muslims?

Malcolm wrote:

Yup.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 28th, 2013 at 9:53 AM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

Anders said:

And irreducible phenomena is necessarily uncaused.

Malcolm wrote:

The please explain the parts of the vedana and samjñā skandhas. For that matter, what are the "parts" of sraddha? Krodha? etc.? What are the parts of the vijñāna skandha?

I will tell you, they are momentary and exist in a causal series. But in themselves they are irreducible while being at the same time impermanent and therefore, conditioned.

Sherab said:

The argument of momentariness raise the issue of whether you take time as discrete or continuous. If you take time as discrete, then there is always a discrete moment in which a thing does not change. But this will contradict the idea of things always changing. If you take time as continuous, then there is no time between one moment and another, so no change is possible from one moment to another. (I am using an argument of Ven Nanavira here.)

Malcolm wrote:

I prefer the argument of Sakya Pandita actually, who argues that partless moments cannot be refuted even by Madyamaka.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 28th, 2013 at 9:51 AM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

Sherab said:

You must then allow from production from conventional conditions and production from non-conventional conditions. In other words, you must allow for the possibility of production from dissimilar conditions, which was my earlier point.

Malcolm wrote:

No. But one can imagine conditions which while being conventional, are not immediately accessible to ordinary cognitions.

To allow for the possibility of production from dissimilar causes is to allow for creation by God, for example.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 28th, 2013 at 6:38 AM

Title: Re: Everybody speaks about samaya, but nobody knows what it

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

That special connection is nothing more than the dependent origination you create with that teacher. You cannot take those promises outside of empowerment at all.

dzogchungpa said:

I've often wondered what exactly is going on during an empowerment. I don't see how saying this special connection is the dependent origination created with that teacher really explains anything. Could you elaborate?

Malcolm wrote:

You have five aggregates; these are the cause. The teacher arranges their connection to the five buddhas, the result, through the empowerment. If you don't attain buddhahood during the empowerment, then you have a path to follow.

Most people do not understand that abhisheka is primarily a method of attaining buddhahood, and only secondarily, an introduction to a path.

When we talk about dependent origination, there are five: outer, inner, secret, ultimate and suchness. If you really want to understand this, then you should go and study Lamdre with the Sakyapas.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 28th, 2013 at 6:38 AM

Title: Re: Everybody speaks about samaya, but nobody knows what it

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

That special connection is nothing more than the dependent origination you create with that teacher. You cannot take those promises outside of empowerment at all.

dzogchungpa said:

I've often wondered what exactly is going on during an empowerment. I don't see how saying this special connection is the dependent origination created with that teacher really explains anything. Could you elaborate?

Malcolm wrote:

You have five aggregates; these are the cause. The teacher arranges their connection to the five buddhas, the result, through the empowerment. If you don't attain buddhahood during the empowerment, then you have a path to follow.

Most people do not understand that abhisheka is primarily a method of attaining buddhahood, and only secondarily, an introduction to a path.

When we talk about dependent origination, there are five: outer, inner, secret, ultimate and sucheness. If you really want to understand this, then you should go and study Lamdre with the Sakyapas.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 28th, 2013 at 5:28 AM

Title: Re: Kalachakra in Dzogchen Community

Content:

heart said:

Interesting that Rinpoche is calling the Longsal Kalachakra Ati and Changchub Dorje's Kalachakra Anu. Or did I misunderstand?

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

No, you did not misunderstand.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 28th, 2013 at 3:14 AM

Title: Re: Everybody speaks about samaya, but nobody knows what it

Content:

theanarchist said:

It's harmful because you have made a promise, and that is the connection; this is why "dam tshig", "solemn word" is how Tibetans translate the term samaya. There is no mystical basis for samaya. It is premised strictly on accepting a set of promises.

No, it's not harmful because you have made a promise. It is harmful because in the initiation you made that special connection.

Malcolm wrote:

That special connection is nothing more than the dependent origination you create with that teacher. You cannot take those promises outside of empowerment at all.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 28th, 2013 at 3:14 AM

Title: Re: Everybody speaks about samaya, but nobody knows what it

Content:

theanarchist said:

It's harmful because you have made a promise, and that is the connection; this is why "dam tshig", "solemn word" is how Tibetans translate the term samaya. There is no mystical basis for samaya. It is premised strictly on accepting a set of promises.

No, it's not harmful because you have made a promise. It is harmful because in the initiation you made that special connection.

Malcolm wrote:

That special connection is nothing more than the dependent origination you create with that teacher. You cannot take those promises outside of empowerment at all.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 28th, 2013 at 2:49 AM

Title: Re: Musings on Kali Yuga

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

The duration and chronological starting point in human history of Kali Yuga has given rise to different evaluations and interpretations. According to the Surya Siddhanta, Kali Yuga began at midnight (00:00) on 18 February 3102 BCE in the proleptic Julian calendar, or 14 January 3102 BC in the proleptic Gregorian calendar. This date is also considered by many Hindus to be the day that Krishna left Earth to return to his abode.

From the book The Indus Script and the Rg-Veda

So that places "2000 years ago" about 1000 years into the Kali Yuga. The Kali Yuga is supposed to last 432,000 years, (and there is a 10,000 year Golden Age tucked away in there somewhere).

Malcolm wrote:

While Buddhist notion of the four ages based on Kalacakra are a little different, this is the Buddhist Kali Yuga. This is based on concept that the Buddha's teaching will endure for 5000 years. Check the Ornament of Stainless Light by the 15th century Gelug master Khedrup Norzang Gyatso.

If you accept the Kalacakra dates for the parinirvana of the Buddha (927 BCE), Rudra Cakravartin is supposed to defeat the Muslims in 2430 (1800 years after the conquest of Mecca), at the end of the Buddhist Kali Yuga. This will issue in another four Buddhist ages and all told, Buddhadharma is supposed to last in this world roughly 5000 years altogether.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 28th, 2013 at 1:24 AM

Title: Re: Musings on Kali Yuga

Content:

smcj said:

This is not like the "where's Mt. Meru" thread to me.

Malcolm wrote:

Sure it is -- in Buddhist mythological texts there is clearly described a progressive degeneration to the present day. In the treta yuga for example, humans are supposed to have had limitless lifespans. Then in the second age, lifespans of 80,000 years and so on, down to the pathetic one hundred years (if you're lucky) lifespan of the present day.

The best explanation I have seen is that a "golden" age depends on the virtue of the rulers. Hence, the longing we often see expressed on this board to return to some form of "Dharma monarchy".

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 28th, 2013 at 12:36 AM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

Anders said:

And irreducible phenomena is necessarily uncaused.

Malcolm wrote:

The please explain the parts of the vedana and samjñā skandhas.

PadmaVonSamba said:

perception = means of perception (eyes, brain) + object of perception (picture of cow) feeling = means of feeling (fingers, brain)+ object of feeling (fuzzy sweater)

.
.
.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, but what are the parts of the mental factor of feeling, the third thing that is produced? You have described how it is generated, not what it is. When you have a pleasant feeling or a painful feeling, what are the parts of that feeling itself?

You have described how a percept is caused, but not what it is. When you have discerned a blue pot, what are the parts of that percept itself?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 28th, 2013 at 12:04 AM

Title: Re: Kalachakra in Dzogchen Community

Content:

Virgo said:

How much is my limitation? If I missed the first day and listened to it on replay I did not receive the lung for the ganapuja to be done after donwong, do then I have missed my opportunity for this?

Kevin

Malcolm wrote:

He gave it again today.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 27th, 2013 at 11:47 PM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

Sherab said:

If Chandrakirti's cow milking story is to be disbelieved, we must similarly disbelieve any miracle stories. So if Nagarjuna's intent is to say that production from dissimilar causes are disallowed, then miracles are impossibilities.

Malcolm wrote:

Not necessarily. For example, Candara's milking a vow might have been an illusion generated by his capacity in ṛddhipati. Buddha's ability to levitate to the height of fourteen palms trees is clearly based on his command over the four elements.

All of these things have causes that seem miraculous to others since they do not see the inner workings of cause and condition. But I am quite certain Candara never obtained real milk from a picture of a cow. I am equally certain, since we know almost nothing of Candara from sources other than Tibetan (which conflate two Candrakīrtis anyway), that this is little more than a pedagogical legend, like most of these stories, which also generally have outer, inner and secret interpretations and generally cannot be taken at face value.

My preferred Candara story is the one where after accidentally running into a pillar at Nalanda because he was looking at a book while walking, a student said "Ha, so that pillar is really "empty", isn't it?"

To which Candara replied by passing his hand through the pillar.

All conditioned phenomena arise from conditions. When we do not understand those conditions, we call those events "miracles".

If this is not the case, then we must consider Nagārjuna, and even the Buddha, liars for presenting miracles that violate the very principle of production from conditions.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 27th, 2013 at 11:38 PM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

Anders said:

And irreducible phenomena is necessarily uncaused.

Malcolm wrote:

The please explain the parts of the vedana and samjñā skandhas. For that matter, what are the "parts" of sraddha? Krodha? etc.? What are the parts of the vijñāna skandha?

I will tell you, they are momentary and exist in a causal series. But in themselves they are irreducible while being at the same time impermanent and therefore, conditioned.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 27th, 2013 at 11:34 PM

Title: Re: Everybody speaks about samaya, but nobody knows what it

Content:

theanarchist said:

Then of course there is the four Dzogchen "samayas", which are unbreakable since they are not conditioned.

Other vajrayana samaya connections are just as unbreakable.

Malcolm wrote:

Not what I meant. What I meant was that Dzogchen samayas are connected with reality. The 22 Vajrayāna samayas of the new tantra schools or the 29 samayas of the old tantra tradition are connected with view and conduct.

theanarchist said:

Because even if it's nowhere as explicit as in dzogchen, in a highest yogatantra initiation what makes the initiation valid is the conferrence of a spark of the absolute nature of the deity.

Malcolm wrote:

No divine spark is implanted, Gurus are not creator gods.

What happens during an anuttarayoga initiation is an arrangement of dependent origination. Each initiation has its own samayas connected with the practices which it permits one to do. Please Kongtrul's Buddhist Ethics for a full account.

theanarchist said:

The vows you take during an initiation are vows, they are not the actual samaya.

Malcolm wrote:

Of course they are.

theanarchist said:

The actual samaya is the connection you make with the teacher by receiving initiation, the vows are a tool that enables the disciple to progress on that path in a meaningful way.

Malcolm wrote:

The vows are what maintain that connection. When you break those, you break the connection.

theanarchist said:

It is not harmful because you made some promise, it's harmful because it not following those rules is in itself harmful once you have made this type of connection.

Malcolm wrote:

It's harmful because you have made a promise, and that is the connection; this is why "dam tshig", "solemn word" is how Tibetans translate the term samaya. There is no mystical basis for samaya. It is premised strictly on accepting a set of promises.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 27th, 2013 at 11:34 PM

Title: Re: Everybody speaks about samaya, but nobody knows what it

Content:

theanarchist said:

Then of course there is the four Dzogchen "samayas", which are unbreakable since they are not conditioned.

Other vajrayana samaya connections are just as unbreakable.

Malcolm wrote:

Not what I meant. What I meant was that Dzogchen samayas are connected with reality. The 22 Vajrayāna samayas of the new tantra schools or the 29 samayas of the old tantra tradition are connected with view and conduct.

theanarchist said:

Because even if it's nowhere as explicit as in dzogchen, in a highest yogatantra initiation what makes the initiation valid is the conference of a spark of the absolute nature of the deity.

Malcolm wrote:

No divine spark is implanted, Gurus are not creator gods.

What happens during an anuttarayoga initiation is an arrangement of dependent origination. Each initiation has its own samayas connected with the practices which it permits one to do. Please Kongtrul's Buddhist Ethics for a full account.

theanarchist said:

The vows you take during an initiation are vows, they are not the actual samaya.

Malcolm wrote:

Of course they are.

theanarchist said:

The actual samaya is the connection you make with the teacher by receiving initiation, the vows are a tool that enables the disciple to progress on that path in a meaningful way.

Malcolm wrote:

The vows are what maintain that connection. When you break those, you break the connection.

theanarchist said:

It is not harmful because you made some promise, it's harmful because it not following those rules is in itself harmful once you have made this type of connection.

Malcolm wrote:

It's harmful because you have made a promise, and that is the connection; this is why "dam tshig", "solemn word" is how Tibetans translate the term samaya. There is no mystical basis for samaya. It is premised strictly on accepting a set of promises.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 27th, 2013 at 11:23 PM

Title: Re: Musings on Kali Yuga

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

And I started to think about all the whinging and whining in regards to Kali Yuga and the destruction of the Dharma teachings. It occurred to me that we are here now in Kali Yuga as a consequence of our karma (actions) in the past. We all lived during the Satya Yuga (the Golden Age) and yet obviously we "pissed" away our opportunity to achieve enlightenment under those incredibly fortunate conditions.

Malcolm wrote:

The four ages is a nearly universal theme worldwide.

Interestingly, some Native American schemes presents each age [parsed as Suns] as an improvement over the last.

Though not an easy read, Witzel's The Origins of the World's Mythologies provides much interesting context for all the world's mythologies such as the four ages and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 27th, 2013 at 11:19 PM

Title: Re: Kalachakra in Dzogchen Community

Content:

Tenpa said:

What is the specific use/function of this Kalachakra Atiyoga practice?
tks.

Malcolm wrote:

Total realization. Might improve your astrological skills too.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 27th, 2013 at 10:26 AM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

Sherab said:

But it would seem that the convention of how things exist relatively can be violated as well. The getting of milk from a conventional cow and from a pictorial cow comes to mind. So are conventional beings supposed to accept that radically different conditions can produce the same conventional thing?

Malcolm wrote:

I have never heard of anyone successfully milking a picture of a cow.

Sherab said:

If I remembered correctly, there was story about Chandrakirti getting milk from a picture of a cow. Anyway, Nagarjuna said that with emptiness everything is possible.

Malcolm wrote:

Including production from a dissimilar cause? i think you have not understood Nagarjuna's intent.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 27th, 2013 at 9:52 AM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

They are simples.

PadmaVonSamba said:

can you explain a little more?

.
.
.

Malcolm wrote:

They are irreducible, however they are also momentary, and hence conditioned.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 27th, 2013 at 9:38 AM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

Am I missing something?

How can these skandhas be said to happen in a way that can be called irreducible?

.
.
.

Malcolm wrote:

Irreducible does not mean unconditioned.

PadmaVonSamba said:

It means it can't be reduced to anything beyond than what it is.

I don't see how if something isn't the result of causes, it is Irreducible.

If perception and feeling can be divided into subject and object, how are they Irreducible?

are perception and feeling established as pre-existing qualities that occur even with or without the objects of perception and feeling?

.
.
.

Malcolm wrote:

They are simples.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 27th, 2013 at 9:27 AM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

Am I missing something?

How can these skandhas be said to happen
in a way that can be called irreducible?

.
.

Malcolm wrote:
Irreducible does not mean unconditioned.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Friday, December 27th, 2013 at 8:59 AM
Title: Re: Everybody speaks about samaya, but nobody knows what it
Content:

theanarchist said:
No, personal experience with empowerment, the way vajrayana practice works in general, logical conclusion taking into account the mechanics of vows and karma. And i have heard teachings on the subject.

Although I am sure I can dig up something on samaya in some scriptures, I haven't studied scriptures in a while.

Malcolm wrote:
All vows, including samaya, are nothing more than a series of intent, which are disrupted due to engaging in acts contrary to that initial intent. There is nothing mystical or psychic about receiving samaya vows. They are received when one recites the commitments after the master during the empowerment. The receipt of samaya is something very precise.

Then of course there is the four Dzogchen "samayas", which are unbreakable since they are not conditioned.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Friday, December 27th, 2013 at 8:59 AM
Title: Re: Everybody speaks about samaya, but nobody knows what it
Content:

theanarchist said:
No, personal experience with empowerment, the way vajrayana practice works in general, logical conclusion taking into account the mechanics of vows and karma. And i have heard teachings on the subject.

Although I am sure I can dig up something on samaya in some scriptures, I haven't studied scriptures in a while.

Malcolm wrote:
All vows, including samaya, are nothing more than a series of intent, which are disrupted due to engaging in acts contrary to that initial intent. There is nothing mystical or psychic about receiving samaya vows. They are received when one recites the commitments after the master during the empowerment. The receipt of samaya is something very precise.

Then of course there is the four Dzogchen "samayas", which are unbreakable since they are not conditioned.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 27th, 2013 at 8:02 AM

Title: Re: Everybody speaks about samaya, but nobody knows what it

Content:

theanarchist said:

Nope. Samaya is not a promise but a psychic connection with the teacher that you get when the teacher confers initiation and you receive it.

Malcolm wrote:

Interesting opinion. No textual support, however.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 27th, 2013 at 8:02 AM

Title: Re: Everybody speaks about samaya, but nobody knows what it

Content:

theanarchist said:

Nope. Samaya is not a promise but a psychic connection with the teacher that you get when the teacher confers initiation and you receive it.

Malcolm wrote:

Interesting opinion. No textual support, however.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 27th, 2013 at 8:01 AM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The vedana skandha and the saṃjñā skandha are irreducible.

PadmaVonSamba said:

That may be what is traditionally taught,
but it isn't how it looks to me.

Malcolm wrote:

Then you have to specify what the parts of these things are.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 27th, 2013 at 8:00 AM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

Sherab said:

But it would seem that the convention of how things exist relatively can be violated as well. The getting of milk from a conventional cow and from a pictorial cow comes to mind. So are conventional beings supposed to accept that radically different conditions can produce the same conventional thing?

Malcolm wrote:

I have never heard of anyone successfully milking a picture of a cow.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 27th, 2013 at 7:02 AM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

tobes said:

Everyone is always sure that the opponent has been nailed.

Few ever make the effort to actually understand the opponent.

Can you nail something you don't actually understand??

Malcolm wrote:

Having studied Saṃkhya at the feet of someone quite expert in it, I can say that I understand Saṃkhya well enough to endorse Buddhapaṇita's refutation of it.

Being the son of a western philosophy professor, however, I am also sure that the same arguments and examples get used in all kinds of traditions.

Huifeng is correct, however, Saṃghabhadra's (pissed off) commentary on the Kośa is a good presentation which goes to some length to preserve Sarvastivāda epistemology.

On the other hand, most tenet system literature presents a mockery of the opponents position.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 27th, 2013 at 5:00 AM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Because he is laying the intellectual basis for the later application of his ideas in Mahamudra practice, etc. There is no such thing as an actual application of western philosophy.

Ummmm, Nāgārjuna who wrote the MMK is demonstrably earlier (later [sic]) than the siddha Nāgārjuna, disciple of Saraha, who write the Bodhicittavivarana, the Pañcakrama and so on.

smcj said:

So you are saying that there is no relevance to meditation of soteriological value to the MMK?

Malcolm wrote:

MMK is pretty much strictly an analytical text. However, Rongton Sheja Kunrig explained an "intimate instruction" madhyamaka which involves contemplating the examples of illusion.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 27th, 2013 at 4:40 AM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

There are three skandhas which are caittas, mental factors, which always accompany citta i.e. the vijñāna skandha.

PadmaVonSamba said:

Yes, I understand that. but when you break those down...

- .
- .
- .

Malcolm wrote:

The vedana skandha and the saṃjñā skandha are irreducible. The formation skandha on the other hand contains 51 to 100 hundred factors depending on whose scheme you are following. These factors are also irreducible. In other words, apart from their momentariness, they have no further parts into which they can be divided.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 27th, 2013 at 4:38 AM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

I have no "outcome". I haven't yet decided if Nagarjuna is a genius, full of shit, or a bit of both. (probably a bit of both: why should he be different from any other philosopher?)

smcj said:

Because he is laying the intellectual basis for the later application of his ideas in Mahamudra practice, etc. There is no such thing as an actual application of western philosophy.

Malcolm wrote:

Ummmm, Nāgārjuna who wrote the MMK is demonstrably earlier than the siddha Nāgārjuna, disciple of Saraha, who write the Bodhicittavivarana, the Pañcakrama and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 27th, 2013 at 1:09 AM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Right, like I said, what you are terming "awareness" is actually the samjñā-skandha, which is in turn actually a mental factor.

PadmaVonSamba said:

But the skandhas are also components factors, are they not? They have to occur as a result of causes.

So, I think there is a better term than my using the word 'awareness'.

.
. .
.

Malcolm wrote:

There are three skandhas which are caittas, mental factors, which always accompany citta i.e. the vijñāna skandha.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 27th, 2013 at 12:45 AM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

People can detect consciousness.

Consciousness can be an object of awareness.

what I mean by that is you are cognitive of the fact that you yourself are thinking these words.

and you can infer that someone else wrote them.

When we meditate, we are aware of thoughts arising.

We can detect consciousness (the arising of awareness with objects of awareness) in others even though we do not directly experience their exact experience. We can ask, "what do you hear?" and observe that other beings experience cognitive function.

- .
- .
- .

Malcolm wrote:

Right, like I said, what you are terming "awareness" is actually the samjñā-skandha, which is in turn actually a mental factor.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 26th, 2013 at 11:19 PM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

People can detect consciousness.

Consciousness can be an object of awareness.

Malcolm wrote:

An unsupported consciousness cannot be an object of another's consciousness since there is nothing by which it can be perceived. A supported consciousness can be an object of another's consciousness.

However, in the view of Candrakīrti, one's own consciousness cannot take itself as an object.

I don't really know what you mean by awareness. Awareness is generally held to be a property of consciousness. It is, in my opinion, a mental factor.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 26th, 2013 at 11:01 PM

Title: Re: In the KUNJED GYALPO says it is of no use to do rituals

Content:

Ivo said:

Yes, definitely. Can we apply it as beginners? No. If we try, we will fail. We have not accumulated the causes in our midstream. We still don't have the merit.

Malcolm wrote:

This is definitely not the view of Dzogchen. Dzogchen realization does not depend on accumulating causes of any kind.

On the other hand, there is no reason to stop doing practices related to the cause and result vehicles either.

It's all good.

Since nirvana is also not perceived, there is also freedom from the convention "buddha", i.e. the great meaning, the inherently pure efforts of lower yānas are not abandoned. Since the identity of the result is naturally perfected, all effort of qualities self-arose without effort. Freedom from gradual progress in this is the naturally perfected result itself.

-- The Sun that Illuminates the Meaning (A commentary on the Cuckoo of Vidyā, which is also chapter 31 of the Kun byed rGyal po.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 26th, 2013 at 10:03 PM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

not so fast kimosabe. Conventional production=dependent origination=hallucination of illusory production by deluded beings. yes, no, or maybe?

Malcolm wrote:

It's pretty clear from Candra's language that there should be an object to be seen correctly or falsely. This means there must be an appearance about which one is either mistaken or unmistaken. When one unmistakenly sees the apparent objects which serves as the basis for imputation (hearkening back to your original qualm), depending on which strand of Tibetan Madhyamaka one is following:

- a) the objects themselves do not actually arise in truth and are considered to be no more than illusions, and so on
- b) the objects themselves arise from causes and conditions conventionally (i.e. not causelessly, from single causes, from self, other, or dissimilar causes). What objects do not do is arise inherently.

Candra presupposes a Sautrantika epistemology where sense consciousnesses only arise when sense objects are encountered by contact with sense organs. For Candra, a sense consciousness will never arise in absence of a sense object or a sense organ, and this is clearly stated in the Madhyamakāvatara. Thus, the question of what the delusion actually is remains a matter of debate amongst Mādhyamika proponents.

What we can see from all of this is that since "Mādhyamikas" cannot agree amongst themselves, not to mention the other three tenets, indeed the "science" of Buddhism has undergone much change and transformation, like any body of human knowledge.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 26th, 2013 at 9:37 PM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

Khenpo Tsultrim said:

Chandrakirti was the great proponent of the Prasangika system, and he relied a lot on arguments that show that dharmas did not arise.

Malcolm wrote:

Ultimately, or in other words, in reality, arising cannot be established for phenomena. Conventionally or relatively speaking, Candrakīrti eliminates arising without a cause, from single causes, dissimilar causes or from self or other, leaving only arising from conditions as the only valid option.

Those who do not see this point do not understand either Nāgārjuna or Candrakīrti.

smcj said:

I have no intention of investing myself in the details of this discussion, but I do have confidence enough in Khenpo Tsultrim's credentials to believe his characterization of Chandrakīrti has some credibility. YMMV.

Malcolm wrote:

It is worthwhile here to repost the master's own words from his own magnum opus, Prasannapāda:

Therefore, that being the case, here when the Bhagavan clarified the production of things depending on cause and condition, he refuted the production of things causelessly, from a single cause, a dissimilar cause, or generated by self and other. Since those were refuted, the intrinsic nature of relative things was taught according to how they exist relatively.

Please compare this with what I stated above:

Conventionally or relatively speaking, Candrakīrti eliminates arising without a cause, from single causes, dissimilar causes or from self or other, leaving only arising from conditions as the only valid option.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 26th, 2013 at 8:11 PM

Title: Re: Plant Neurobiology

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

Toes and digital pads (of a paw) are both digits, but I imagine you would not use the terms interchangeably, so... stop being unjustifiably defensive.

Malcolm wrote:

In some languages there is no separate word for toes, for example, Tibetan.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 26th, 2013 at 10:04 AM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Thus, your thesis that Nāgārjuna rejects arising conventionally is not to be found in the thought of Candrakīrti, etc.

gad rgyangs said:

There is conventional production.

Malcolm wrote:

Case closed. We agree.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 26th, 2013 at 10:03 AM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

smcj said:

Chandrakīrti was the great proponent of the Prasangika system, and he relied a lot on arguments that show that dharmas did not arise.

Malcolm wrote:

Ultimately, or in other words, in reality, arising cannot be established for phenomena. Conventionally or relatively speaking, Chandra eliminates arising without a cause, from single causes, dissimilar causes or from self or other, leaving only arising from conditions as the only valid option.

Those who do not see this point do not understand either Nāgārjuna or Chandra.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 26th, 2013 at 3:12 AM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

(glossed by Chandra as "completely deluded")

Malcolm wrote:

Candra says:

ཡང་དག་མཐོང་ཡུལ་གང་དེ་ཉིད་དེ།
མཐོང་བ་བརྟན་པ་ཀུན་རྒྱུ་བདེན་པར་གསུངས།
མཐོང་བ་བརྟན་པའང་རྣམ་པ་གཉིས་འདོད་དེ།
དབང་པོ་གསལ་དང་དབང་པོ་སྐྱོན་ཟུན་ནོ།

That object which is correctly seen is true, that falsely seen is said to be relative truth.
Also false seeing is held to be of two kinds:
a non-defective sense organ and a defective sense organ.

He also says:

ཁྱེན་ལས་བྱུང་ཕྱིར་ཁམས་གསུམ་པོ།
འདུས་བྱས་ཡིན་པར་ངེས་པར་བརྟན།
དེ་ནི་དེ་ཡིས་སྤང་ཉིད་གང་།
དེ་ནི་འདུས་བྱས་སྤང་ཉིད་གསུངས།

Because of arising from conditions, the three realms are conventionally ascertained to be conditioned.
That [the three realms] which is empty of that [the inherent existence of the three realms]; that is said to be the emptiness of the conditioned.

In this case, all that the three realms are empty of here is inherent existence, here termed "the emptiness of the conditioned".

But what they are not empty of, according to Candra, is being conventionally designated as "conditioned" since the three realms are observed to arise from conditions.

Thus, your thesis that Nāgārjuna rejects arising conventionally is not to be found in the thought of Candrakīrti, etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 26th, 2013 at 2:45 AM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

Causation is deconstructed in chapter 1 of MMK.

Malcolm wrote:

Ultimately, yes; conventionally no, as passages by Buddhapaṇita and Candra demonstrated quite clearly.

You can deconstruct the two truths if you like, and certainly the two truths are rejected in Dzogchen; but not in Madhyamaka. And conventional truth in Madhyamaka clearly demonstrates the need for causation in order to have a sensible world where everything does not arise from everything at random.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 25th, 2013 at 11:31 PM

Title: Re: Plant Neurobiology

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

In that way they will avoid the anthropomorphism which is implied by using the term "neurons".

Malcolm wrote:

I think the term you are looking for is not anthropomorphism, but rather, "zoomorphism", if we are going to be fussy about terms.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 25th, 2013 at 11:29 PM

Title: Re: Plant Neurobiology

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

Ditto on the attitude.

Malcolm wrote:

Your habitually hostile tone has been mentioned many times, buy many people. You usually defend it saying "That's just how I am....".

People say many things about me, but they never call me "hostile". They usually just say I am a bully, or a fundamentalist (), and then only when they haven't anything substantive with which to back up their argument.

Anyway

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 25th, 2013 at 11:13 PM

Title: Re: Does Dzogchen have Persian or Zoroastrian influences?

Content:

tingdzin said:

1 Sri Singha was born in China -- any of the biographies that gives a birthplace says this.

Malcolm wrote:

The sole source for this attribution is the lo rgyus chen mo by Zhang ston. This text is quite late, and seems wholly fictional apart from some details borrowed from earlier accounts of Vairocana's adventures in India, as well as sharing details of Garab Dorje's birth as well as Manjuśrimitra. None of the details of his life ever place him anywhere outside of the region of Bodhgaya in any pre-sNying thig accounts. I am not aware of any pre sNying thig text that places Śrī Singha outside of India.

tingdzin said:

His birthplace is specified as So khyam, which through comparative historical linguistics and the accounts of later Tibetan histories, which do not mention Sri Singha at all, can be identified with the Chinese district of Suo fang. This does not mean Khotan -- I've seen that silliness several times and don't know how it got started. Nor does it mean Sri Singha was ethnic Chinese -- Suo fang, though part of the T'ang Empire, fell squarely into what was called the Sogdian (hu) prefectures, because they were populated by Sogdians, an Iranic-speaking people from present-day Uzbekistan (who had a lot of influence on early Chinese Buddhism, by the way). Sri Singha was supposed to have studied in his early life at Wu T'ai Shan, very close to Suo fang.

Malcolm wrote:

This is all very interesting but none of this shows that in fact Shri Singha was Sogdian, it is not impossible, but it is not certain. Such an account is utterly lacking in the accounts of the bodhicitta texts and the vajra bridge instructions.

tingdzin said:

2 If you say that Uddiyana fell within the Indian sphere of cultural influence, I would ask you: where did that sphere stop?

Malcolm wrote:

Northwards, think we can define it to be within the region covered by the Mauryan Empire, which definitely covers all areas which can be defined as Gandhara as well as Oḍḍiyāna. Apart from Shri Lanka, Buddhism never really penetrated the deep southern portion of the subcontinent, which is accounted for by the fact that Mauryan Empire never stretched that far. We can see the influence of the Roman Empire on the map of the world even today, so such a long standing network of trade and kinships that were set up during the Maurya can be considered to have endured for hundreds of years after the fall of the Mauryan empire itself.

A note: there is a passage that records the fact that Oḍḍiyāna is a country that no longer exists in the world in the long Vajra Bridge lo rgyus.

As far as Buddhism beyond this region [Khotan, etc.], I think it is fair to consider that these are also "Indian" Buddhisms in so far as their Buddhism was of the export variety. As we know, oft times exports cannot be found at home.

tingdzin said:

3) When you sat that Buddhist Dzogchen was entirely Indic-Buddhist inspired, that is still quite hotly debated, as you, being pretty au courant with modern scholarship, must know.

Malcolm wrote:

Apart from some Chan influence [very debatable] which also has Indian roots, I see no reason to doubt otherwise.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 25th, 2013 at 10:28 PM

Title: Re: Does Dzogchen have Persian or Zoroastrian influences?

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

Thank you VERY much for your effort. But this begs the question: why did you state earlier that you have not seen any texts that refer to Mahamudra as primordial when you are the translator of a text that points out that it is primordial?

Malcolm wrote:

Mahāmudra is typically divided into three: basis, path and result. The Mahāmudra dohas treat all three. Take the passage:

All sentient beings are emanations of mahamudra, the essence of those emanations is the forever non-arising dharmadhatu, also all characteristics of dualistic appearances, happiness, suffering and so on,
are the play of mahamudra, the original dharmata.

This is not generally regarded as a statement concerning primordial buddhahood, it is generally considered to be a statement of concerning the cause continuum (rgyu rgyud).

In Mahāmudra traditions the basis is regarded as "the cause", not the result. When implanted with the seed of the ripening empowerment and the liberating instructions, the path produces a result.

The main difference is one of terminology. Everyone agrees [apart from the Bonpos] that Mahāmudra and Dzogchen provide the same buddhahood, differing primarily in how the basis and the path is presented.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 25th, 2013 at 5:46 AM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

If it means something like the aggregates of a given moment "depend" on the "previous" moment's, that only raises more questions for me.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, that is what is meant. It's very clearly stated in the passage.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 25th, 2013 at 5:44 AM

Title: Re: Plant Neurobiology

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

"Yes, plants have both short- and long-term electrical signalling, and they use some neurotransmitter-like chemicals as chemical signals," Lincoln Taiz, an emeritus professor of plant physiology at U.C. Santa Cruz and one of the signers of the Alpi letter, told me. "But the mechanisms are quite different from those of true nervous systems." Taiz says that the writings of the plant neurobiologists suffer from "over-interpretation of data, teleology, anthropomorphizing, philosophizing, and wild speculations."

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, thanks, I read the article quite closely.

The article is about plant neurobiology. Some people, like yourself, might take issue with the term since plants do not have "neurons", but they clearly have information processing capacities and cells that appear homologous with neurons, as the article also suggests.

You might also work on the attitude.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 25th, 2013 at 5:08 AM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Well, actually he is just paraphrasing Nāgārjuna's Pratītyasamutpāḍakārika:

...Although the aggregates are serially connected...

dzogchungpa said:

I don't really understand what "serially connected" means.

Malcolm wrote:

The aggregates of this life form a series connected with aggregates of the past life, etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 25th, 2013 at 5:05 AM

Title: Re: Plant Neurobiology

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

The subject of the discussion is plant neurobiology and, like I said, plants do not have neurons so the thread title is WRONG.

Malcolm wrote:

No, the subject of the discussion is the Pollen article, and therefore the title is correct.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 25th, 2013 at 3:47 AM

Title: Re: Plant Neurobiology

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

Where did I refute "intelligence"? Where did I equate "intelligence" with a brain?

Malcolm wrote:

I wasn't talking about you specifically. It is true that I practice Buddhadharma, not "Buddhism".

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 25th, 2013 at 3:33 AM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

smcj said:

It's the same for Dzogchen, and most other dharma systems.

"At no time throughout the beginningless succession of lifetimes has there ever been an actual birth. There has only been the appearance of birth. There has never been actual death, only the transformation of appearances like the shift from the dream state to the waking state... throughout the beginningless succession of lifetimes there has never been any actual experience of transition or going from one state to another, or any actual experience of being located in some other place. This is analogous to the images in a dream."

- Longchenpa

Most Dharma systems are sailing manuals to "the other shore". Longchenpa speaks from the perspective of having gotten out of the boat after having reached "the other shore".

Malcolm wrote:

Well, actually he is just paraphrasing Nāgārjuna's Pratītyasamutpāḍakārikā:

Empty dharmas are entirely produced from dharmas strictly empty;
dharmas without a self and [not] of a self.

Words, butter lamps, mirrors, seals,
fire crystals, seeds, sourness and echoes.
Although the aggregates are serially connected,
the wise are to comprehend nothing has transferred.
Someone, having conceived of annihilation, even in extremely subtle existents,
he is not wise,
and will never see the meaning of 'arisen from conditions'.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 25th, 2013 at 3:22 AM

Title: Re: Plant Neurobiology

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

Neurobiology is a misleading term here. Plants do not have neurons. That is not to deny that some sort of biofeedback system is at work here, but it is not neurological.

Malcolm wrote:

"Metaphors help stimulate the investigative imagination of good scientists," the British plant scientist Anthony Trewavas wrote in a spirited response to the Alpi letter denouncing plant neurobiology. "Plant neurobiology" is obviously a metaphor—plants don't possess the type of excitable, communicative cells we call neurons. Yet the introduction of the term has raised a series of questions and inspired a set of experiments that promise to deepen our understanding not only of plants but potentially also of brains. If there are other ways of processing information, other kinds of cells and cell networks that can somehow give rise to intelligent behavior, then we may be more inclined to ask, with Mancuso, "What's so special about neurons?"

And:

Most definitions of intelligence fall into one of two categories. The first is worded so that intelligence requires a brain; the definition refers to intrinsic mental qualities such as reason, judgment, and abstract thought. The second category, less brain-bound and metaphysical, stresses behavior, defining intelligence as the ability to respond in optimal ways to the challenges presented by one's environment and circumstances. Not surprisingly, the plant neurobiologists jump into this second camp.

Frankly it is hilarious to see Buddhists refute the intelligence of plants on the one hand, and insist on the other that a mind cannot be reduced to a brain on the other...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 25th, 2013 at 2:44 AM

Title: Re: Understanding the Abhidharmakosa

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The Kosha's verses, true, are based on Sarvāstivādin; the the bhaṣyaṃ is Sautrantika.

daverupa said:

Sure, but I hadn't seen the bhasyam mentioned yet so had not commented with it in mind.

Malcolm wrote:

The two are inseparable, i.e. the one is always studied with the other.

daverupa said:

Well, Indian Buddhadhamma covers more chronology than the last 800 years; the Abhidharmakosa is not a castle built in the sky. It is a trenchant summary position from within scholastic Buddhism, which may or may not matter to the OP, but there it is.

Malcolm wrote:

The beauty of the Kosha is that it covers pretty much every major Abhidharma trend until the fifth century, based as it is in the Mahāvibhāṣa, etc. Abhidhamma is a different thing, and was largely irrelevant to continental Buddhadharma and remains so.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 25th, 2013 at 2:41 AM

Title: Re: Plant Neurobiology

Content:

daverupa said:

Be wary of false dichotomies; big cities are just as natural as anthills.

Malcolm wrote:

Not in my opinion.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 24th, 2013 at 11:54 PM

Title: Re: Plant Neurobiology

Content:

padma norbu said:

Shared that with one person who immediately concluded it was proof of God designing it.

Malcolm wrote:

Confirmation bias...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 24th, 2013 at 11:41 PM

Title: Re: Understanding the Abhidharmakosa

Content:

daverupa said:

It presents the general anatomy and physiology of Sarvāstivādin Buddhādharma ca. 4th-5th century CE.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, this not exactly true. The Kosha's verses, true, are based on Sarvāstivādin; the the bhaṣyaṃ is Sautrantika.

In any event, it was the major Abhidharma text on the subcontinent for the last 800 years of Buddhādharma's presence on the subcontinent. If someone wants to understand Indian Buddhādharma's basics, the Kosha is the go to text.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 24th, 2013 at 11:22 PM

Title: Re: Understanding the Abhidharmakosa

Content:

dimeo said:

Can anyone give a general comment as to what is profound about this book that Buddhists appreciate and have studied it for so many centuries? Anyone have any insight on this text to share?

Malcolm wrote:

It presents the general anatomy and physiology of Buddhādharma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 24th, 2013 at 11:19 PM

Title: Plant Neurobiology

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

They injected fir trees with radioactive carbon isotopes, then followed the spread of the isotopes through the forest community using a variety of sensing methods, including a Geiger counter. Within a few days, stores of radioactive carbon had been routed from tree to tree. Every tree in a plot thirty metres square was connected to the network; the oldest trees functioned as hubs, some with as many as forty-seven connections. The diagram of the forest network resembled an airline route map.

The pattern of nutrient traffic showed how “mother trees” were using the network to nourish shaded seedlings, including their offspring—which the trees can apparently recognize as kin—until they’re tall enough to reach the light. And, in a striking example of interspecies coöperation, Simard found that fir trees were using the fungal web to trade nutrients with paper-bark birch trees over the course of the season. The evergreen species will tide over the deciduous one when it has sugars to spare, and then call in the debt later in the season. For the forest community, the value of this coöperative underground economy appears to be better over-all health, more total photosynthesis, and greater resilience in the face of disturbance.

In his talk, Mancuso juxtaposed a slide of the nodes and links in one of these subterranean forest networks with a diagram of the Internet, and suggested that in some respects the former was superior. "Plants are able to create scalable networks of self-maintaining, self-operating, and self-repairing units," he said. "Plants."

http://www.newyorker.com/reporting/2013/12/23/131223fa_fact_pollan?currentPage=all

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 24th, 2013 at 9:10 PM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

asunthatneversets said:

Malcolm, should the rig pa rang shar quote say "the dharmatā free from extremes"? Or is "the Dharma free from extremes" correct in this context?

Malcolm wrote:

Dharma is correct.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 24th, 2013 at 8:38 PM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

Malcolm's idea of causes and conditions existing conventionally? Gelugpa.

Malcolm wrote:

As Candra points out in the Prasannapāda:

Therefore, that being the case, here when the Bhagavan clarified the production of things depending on cause and condition, he refuted the production of things causelessly, from a single cause, a dissimilar cause, or generated by self and other.

Since those were refuted, the intrinsic nature of relative things was taught according to how they exist relatively.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 24th, 2013 at 8:09 PM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

all you can say is that you have seen something you call a sprout appearing where previously you have seen a seed. There is no demonstrable causal relation between them, on that both Nagarjuna and Hume agree.

Malcolm wrote:

No, they do not agree. Hume, a materialist, is rejecting causal necessity conventionally. Nāgārjuna, a Buddhist, is only rejecting arising ultimately/intrinsically.

This does not establish causality at all except as a proliferation, plain and simple. For example, in the Pratītyasamutpādhakarikavyākhyāna, Nāgārjuna states in reply to a question:

Question: Nevertheless, who is the lord of all, creating sentient beings, who is their creator?

Reply: All living beings are causes and results.

As an example of Nāgārjuna maintaining conventional causality conventionally states in the same text:

Therein, the aggregates are the aggregates of matter, sensation, ideation, formations and consciousness. Those, called 'serially joined', not having ceased, produce another produced from that cause; although not even the subtle atom of an existent has transmigrated from this world to the next.

gad rgyangs said:

plucking one member of the tetralemma out this way results in the most egregious misreading I think I have ever seen of this passage. "Arising without a cause" is not refuted to demonstrate that causes and conditions exist conventionally, it is refuted because nothing at all arises, period.

Malcolm wrote:

This is not a tetralemma, there is no fourth member. The third argument "Nothing...arises without a cause" serves to eliminate the idea that conventionally anything can arise from anything, as Buddhapaṇḍita, etc. clearly explain in their commentaries.

Remember, when we are discussing conventionalities such as causality and arising, we are not doing so from the perspective of how things actually are, we are speaking strictly from the perspective of conventional truth. Buddhapaṇḍita at the end of the first chapter says "Because results, conditions, and non-conditions do not exist, descriptions for arising are merely conventional." No Madhyamaka maintains "There is no arising in conventional truth".

Now you may prefer Hume to Nāgārjuna, but don't conflate Hume's materialism with Nāgārjuna's presentation of ultimate truth.

In fact, in every commentary around 13.6 preserves the necessity of a relationship between causes and their effects, i.e. asserting that from a Madhyamaka point of view, causal connection is necessary, for example, demonstrating how curd does not come from water because curd indeed comes from milk even though causes and effects can not be said to be the same nor different.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 24th, 2013 at 9:28 AM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The arising of appearances needs to be explained in some way, hence MMK 1.1

gad rgyangs said:

but they can't be explained, that's just the point.

Malcolm wrote:

They can indeed be explained.

gad rgyangs said:

The Madhyamaka project is to show that as long as one insists that there is an ultimate basis of imputation beyond mere appearances hang on, I thought appearances are the imputations?

Malcolm wrote:

I never said that. Not even once.

gad rgyangs said:

In the end it is very simple, this appearance, for example a sprout, depends on the appearance of that appearance, for example a seed; without the seed there is no sprout. This appearance, butter, depends on that appearance, milk., etc. this is just crypto-causality.

Malcolm wrote:

Nothing crypto about it. It is causality, plain and simple.

gad rgyangs said:

Dependent origination serves to explain causal processes without invoking essences.
causal processes are refuted in 1.1: there aren't any

Malcolm wrote:

They are not refuted conventionally in MMK 1.1.

"Nothing...arises without a cause..."

As Buddhapalita explains:

Also they do not arise without a cause, because the consequence would be that everything arising from everything permanently, and because there would be the fallacy of the purposelessness of all undertakings. Why is that so? Because the arising of existents is not accepted in all aspects, therefor, because there is no arising, the expression 'arising' is just a convention.

So even while we can refute arising ultimately, we must accept causes conventionally.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 24th, 2013 at 9:08 AM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

Appearances are mere percepts: colors, shapes, sounds, smells, etc. Everything else is conceptual overlay.

Malcolm wrote:

I see, so you have reduced your view to that of the Carvaka materialists who accept only direct perception as authorities.

Thats ok with me, but it is not Buddhadharma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 24th, 2013 at 1:54 AM

Title: Re: Hanuman in Vajrayana

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

Perhaps this is getting off topic and maybe we could start a new thread, but I am also very interested in the idea of local protectors. Does anyone have any more stories of lamas recognizing their presence outside of Tibet?

Malcolm wrote:

It is not really necessary to give them names. Bhumipatis is the general designation.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 24th, 2013 at 1:50 AM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

heart said:

I give up. If you think it is necessary to accept the idea of a self in order to teach the absence of a self I just don't agree with that.

Malcolm wrote:

The Buddha very clearly taught both self and not-self, depending on context.

heart said:

Yeah, right. you keep telling me that.

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

Nāgārjuna states:

Though a so called "self" is designated,
also non-self was taught;
The buddhas have also said
"there is no self or nonself at all"

The commentary by Buddhapalita explains that Buddhas teach the existence of a self in order to prevent beings from falling into lower realms because they will then ignore the effects of positive and negative actions. Nonself is taught in order to counter attachment to samsara in general and to higher realms specifically. But, he adds, this two are illusions taught to guide the immature. Buddhapalita states that In reality, the buddhas teach neither self nor nonself.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, December 23rd, 2013 at 10:46 PM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

appearances are a given, dependent arising is a concept. how can they be two sides of an "equation"? In that sense, dependent origination is itself an imputation made on the bases of appearances. If Madhymaka claims that the quieting of proliferations is a desideratum, why doesn't it start with itself?

In the end, Madhyamaka says exactly nothing, only that you can impute whatever you want on whatever you want. This is helpful how exactly?

Malcolm wrote:

As Rongzom points out, only Madhyamaka "harms" itself.

The arising of appearances needs to be explained in some way, hence MMK 1.1

At no time, no where do things arise from self,
from other,
or without a cause.

Madhyamaka serves to pacify proliferation through demonstrating dependent origination. This is the mangalam of MMK states that dependent origination, unceasing, non-arising, etc., is the pacification of proliferation.

From your given appearance, one might explain appearances arise causelessly [Carvaka], or from themselves [Sāṃkhya], from other [Vaiśeṣika], etc.

Nāgārjuna's project is twofold: one, to show that accounts of apparent phenomena other than dependent origination are unintelligible. Two, to show that dependently originated phenomena are empty.

He does this because of the subject/predicate [dharmin/dharmatā] problem in discussing phenomena in terms of essences. The dharmin in this case is appearances which are dependently arising. When their predicate is sought, their dharmatā, it is found to be emptiness.

Since phenomena are found to be essenceless, they are likened to appearances that everyone accepts are unreal, i.e. illusions, apparitions, space and so on.

The Madhyamaka project is to show that as long as one insists that there is an ultimate basis of imputation beyond mere appearances, for that long one will be locked into conceptuality. Since in the final analysis, one can find no basis of imputation at all, and since the object under analysis ceases to appear as either an existent or in this case as a non-existent (since a non-existent cannot be predicated without an existent), one ceases to conceive of things as existents or nonexistents. That is the desiderata.

In the end it is very simple, this appearance, for example a sprout, depends on the appearance of that appearance, for example a seed; without the seed there is no sprout. This appearance, butter, depends on that appearance, milk., etc.

Dependent origination serves to explain causal processes without invoking essences. Dependent origination is something one can witness with one's own eyes, so in that sense it is not imputation, it is how things exist. In other words, at no time has anyone ever witnessed the arising of something that did not depend on a cause.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, December 23rd, 2013 at 10:22 PM

Title: Re: Hanuman in Vajrayana

Content:

Destiny said:

As far I know, there are a few secret mantras practiced in tantric sadhanas, but the common hindu mantras don't require any transmission.

It is very, very different from Vajrayana.

Actually, it is also possible to perform homa (fire puja) to hindu gods without any initiations. You can even find instructions to do that online

I don't know anyway if this kind of practices are recommended from a buddhist point of view. Probably, if the specific god is recognized as a buddhist protector it would be fine.

Malcolm wrote:

There are, according to my yoga teacher Srivatsa Ramaswami, three kinds of "Hindu" mantras; vedic mantras, bija mantras (tantric) and loka mantras (puranic). The last do not require any sort of transmission, the first two do.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, December 23rd, 2013 at 10:05 PM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

heart said:

I give up. If you think it is necessary to accept the idea of a self in order to teach the absence of a self I just don't agree with that.

Malcolm wrote:

The Buddha very clearly taught both self and not-self, depending on context.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, December 23rd, 2013 at 9:53 PM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

I'm not asking about first causes, but rather bases of imputation in the Madhyamaka view. The whole magical person thing is bogus & irrelevant, as I have shown.

Malcolm wrote:

I already explained this: the basis of imputation is an appearance. Some trends on Madhyamaka then assert that appearances are mind. Since appearances/mind are not findable on analysis, they/it are equated with illusion. Illusions lack any inherent nature because they are dependent originations. Dependent originations are free from extremes and, in the final analysis, inexpressible. None of this is circular in anyway.

You ask, what dependently arises -- we can say all kinds of things, but in the end, it boils down to appearance. What are appearances? Dependent arisings. What dependently arises? Appearances. This is not a circularity, it is an equation appearances = dependent origination.

If you want to be more specific you can say what appearance? A rope or a car, for example. Upon what is a rope designated? It's parts. Upon what are the parts designated? Their parts, if they have any. If they do not have further parts, then they are designated upon moments, etc., until one runs out of bases of imputation. At that point, you have [intellectually] discovered emptiness, i.e., the absence of a ultimate or final basis of designation. At each stage of the analysis the previous basis of imputation no longer appears since it has been deconstructed. As Shantideva points out:

When an existent or a nonexistent does not exist in the presence of the mind, at that time since there is no other aspect [concepts] are fully pacified as there is no objective support [dmigs pa, ālambana].

gad rgyangs said:

yes, rigpa resolves all questions about the nature of reality, but there ain't no rigpa in Madhyamaka.

Malcolm wrote:

Actually, Shantideva's quote above shows that there is vidyā in Madhyamaka, as the Self-Arisen Vidyā Tantra states:

The Dharma free from the extremes of conceptual grasping.
is directly perceived without dwelling on an object.

These two statements should be understood to have the same import.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, December 23rd, 2013 at 1:03 PM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

where, and by whom, has it been demonstrated that magical people exist at all or can or cannot interact? And why should this prove that an empty statement can refute a statement claiming substance?

Malcolm wrote:

This is why N gives the example of illusions, etc., over and over again. That is point of the example from V. Emanational people can hinder other emanational people, since they can generate them. Since all statements are in fact empty, empty statements can rebut empty statements that assert substantiality.

gad rgyangs said:

here is a simile with no referent, unless Teacher (meaning of course, the Buddha) is a creator god. If we, as agents are magical beings and so are our actions, then who is the one that creates these magical beings in the way that the Buddha creates chains of magical beings?

Malcolm wrote:

You are asking an irrelevant question.

It is axiomatic in Buddhadharma that there are no first causes. The very notion of pratītyasamutpāda forbids the notion of any first cause, or creator, etc.

You might imagine you have found an answer in "rig pa", but vidyā just means knowledge of the basis, etc., and it is also baseless and essenceless as well. Keep going where your going and you are going to wind up in new age la la land.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, December 23rd, 2013 at 12:55 PM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

It's very simple:

"Where this exists, that exists. With the arising of that, this arises...."

Since we cannot in the end find anything but appearances that are found on examination to be empty, all we are left with is appearances that arise in dependence upon other appearances. For example, like an emanational person who generates further emanational persons as stated in the Vīgrahavyāvartanīṣṭi passage I provided above.

gad rgyangs said:

the concept of emanational/artificial/magical people is first raised in the V by the opponent, to say that N's empty statement cannot refute his claims for svabhava in the same way that one purportedly artificial person cannot hinder another. N replies that an artificial person can indeed hinder another, so his empty statement can refute the opponent's substantial one: "Therefore in just the same way the negation of the substance of thing is established by my empty speech". The opponent is retarded to raise the issue at all, but N's reply is no better: where, and by whom, has it been demonstrated that magical people exist at all or can or cannot interact? And why should this prove that an empty statement can refute a statement claiming substance?

However, in MMK 17.31-32 N says,

"Just as the Teacher by his supernatural power fabricates a magical being that in turn fabricates yet another magical being, so with regard to the agent, which has the form of a magical being, and the action that is done by it, it is like the case where a second magical being is fabricated by a magical being."

here is a simile with no referent, unless Teacher (meaning of course, the Buddha) is a creator god. If we, as agents are magical beings and so are our actions, then who is the one that creates these magical beings in the way that the Buddha creates chains of magical beings?

imputations require ropes and magical beings require magicians.

Malcolm wrote:

You are chasing a first cause down a rabbit hole. Blue pill or red pill?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, December 23rd, 2013 at 12:50 PM

Title: Re: Ganesh in Tibetan Buddhism

Content:

Sherab Rigdrol said:

Is there a relationship between Shiva and Chenrezig?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, Avalokiteshvara is held to have converted Shiva in the Karandavyuha sutra.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, December 23rd, 2013 at 12:06 PM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

me: "and appearances are what?"

thee: "Dependent arisings."

me : "dependent arisings of what?"

thee: "Of appearances..."

dude...

Malcolm wrote:

It's very simple:

"Where this exists, that exists. With the arising of that, this arises...."

Since we cannot in the end find anything but appearances that are found on examination to be empty, all we are left with is appearances that arise in dependence upon other appearances. For example, like an emanational person who generates further emanational persons as stated in the Vighavyāvartanivṛtti passage I provided above.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, December 23rd, 2013 at 12:01 PM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

smcj said:

I personally think 'dependent arising' is better rendered as 'interdependent arising', which is even better rendered into simple language as 'paradox'.

Malcolm wrote:

There is no "inter" in pratīyasamutpada

A more literal translation is "conditioned co-origination", where pratīya bears the sense of pratyaya, i.e. conditioned.

The tibetan "rten cing 'brel bar 'byung ba" means something like "dependent and relational origination".

There is however nothing "paradoxical" about dependent origination.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, December 23rd, 2013 at 11:52 AM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

smcj said:

I wouldn't say so. Nāgārjuna's entire exposition concerns what occurs after the basis isn't recognized in Dzogchen.

I would tend to agree with you, but a Gelugpa would not accept the idea of a "basis" at all. Once you say that there is a "basis", no matter how you define or don't define it, you've left Nagarjuna behind--unless you accept "In Praise of Dharmadhātu" as authored by Nagarjuna.

Malcolm wrote:

Not necessarily. Gelugpas accept the dharmadhātu, therefore, they accept a basis. For example, they accept the Āryākṣayamatiniṛdeśa-nāma-mahāyāna-sūtra as definitive. It states:

If it is asked what is the bodhisattva's skill in the elements [khams, dhātu], it is that which is the wisdom that engages the dharmadhātu. The dharmadhātu is the element of earth, but the dharmadhātu is not the characteristic of solidity. The dharmadhātu is the element of water, but the dharmadhātu is not the characteristic of wetness. The dharmadhātu is the element of fire, but the dharmadhātu is not the characteristic of maturation. The dharmadhātu is the element of air, but the dharmadhātu is not the characteristic of motility. The dharmadhātu is the element of the eye, but the dharmadhātu is not the characteristic of sight...The dharmadhātu is the element of the body, but the dharmadhātu is not the characteristic of touch. The dharmadhātu is the element of mind, but the dharmadhātu is not the characteristic of perception [vijñāpti]. The dharmadhātu is the element of eye consciousness, but the dharmadhātu is not the characteristic of the specific perception of form...The dharmadhātu is the element of form, but the dharmadhātu is not the characteristic of the element of perception of an eye consciousness. The dharmadhātu is the element of phenomena [chos kyī khams, dharma dhātu, one of the eighteen dhātus], but the dharmadhātu is not the characteristic of the perception of phenomena...the dharmadhātu and the element of the self are the same. The dharmadhātu, the desire realm, form realm and formless realm are the same. The dharmadhātu and the element of samsara and the element of nirvana are the same. The dharmadhātu, the element of sentient beings the element of space and the element of all phenomena, those are the same. If it is asked why they are the same, because they are the same as emptiness, they are the same. This is the basis any Gelugpa can accept.

This sutra also has a beautiful definition of wisdom as well:

If it is asked what is consciousness [vijñāna] and what is wisdom [jñāna], so called "consciousness" are the four abodes of consciousness. If it is asked what four, it is as follows: consciousness approaches matter, approaches sensation, approaches perception [samjñā] and approaches formations and abides. This is called "consciousness". If it is asked what is wisdom, whatever thoroughly knows the aggregate of consciousness in the four aggregates, this is called "wisdom". Moreover, consciousness is the earth element consciousness, the water element, the fire element and air element consciousness. This is called "consciousness". Whatever knows the consciousness that abides in these four elements to be inseparable with the dharmadhātu, this is called "wisdom".

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, December 23rd, 2013 at 9:38 AM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

gad rgyangs said:
and appearances are what?

Malcolm wrote:
Dependent arisings.

gad rgyangs said:
dependent arisings of what?

Malcolm wrote:
Of appearances...

Author: Malcolm
Date: Monday, December 23rd, 2013 at 8:59 AM
Title: Re: Ganesh in Tibetan Buddhism
Content:

Destiny said:
In general, in the White Mahākala sadhana of Shangpa there is only one Ganapati.
In the sadhana I have there are two Tso Daks. Also in the pictures one can find online one usually sees two Tso Daks. That's why I was confused and thought that Tso Dak was not exactly Ganesh, but something like a class of beings linked to him.

Malcolm wrote:
In the sadhana I have practiced on and off for the past 25 years there is only one. There must be a slight difference in lineage. I received through the Sakyapa school where it is a major wealth practice.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Monday, December 23rd, 2013 at 7:33 AM
Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."
Content:

gad rgyangs said:
and appearances are what?

Malcolm wrote:
Dependent arisings.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Monday, December 23rd, 2013 at 7:26 AM
Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."
Content:

smcj said:
Dudjom R. subscribes to the 3rd turning as definitive. You are more than welcome to follow ChNN's lead on this, but his opinion is not universally held.

Malcolm wrote:
Neither is Dudjom Rinpoche's.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, December 23rd, 2013 at 7:24 AM

Title: Re: Ganesh in Tibetan Buddhism

Content:

Destiny said:

Is there a similar sadhana in other lineages (ex. Shangpa) where one takes the form of Gonkar/White Mahakala while commanding Ganapati?

I'm asking this questions because of a dream i had last night.

Tshogs bdag is Tibetan for Ganapati.

If they are exactly the same thing, why in the sadhana of Gonkar there are 2 (two) Tso Daks under the feet of Gonkar? In the sadhana I have, these Tso Daks are also called "Lords of Demons".

I'm also interested to know if we can consider these Ganapatis part of Gonkar's wordly entourage. In that case the torma would be offered to them, also.

Malcolm wrote:

As for your first question, as far as I know, no.

Tshogs = gana bdag = pati.

In general, in the White Mahākala sadhana of Shangpa there is only one Ganapati.

Lords of Demons is an alternate name for Ganesh/Ganapati i.e. Vinayaka.

No need to offer torma to Ganapati in White Mahakāla sadhana.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, December 23rd, 2013 at 6:49 AM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

asunthatneversets said:

Either way, Dzogpa Chenpo never advocates for a substantial existence.

smcj said:

Neither does Great Madhyamaka advocate for a "substantial" existence. As I quoted Samba as saying on p. 19 of this thread, "the ineffable ground that is also empty (but not empti-ness-a-thing)" is a restating of the Great Madhyamak view.

Malcolm wrote:

It is sort of ridiculous to term gzhan stong "great madhyamaka" since it is a term used to describe several different positions amongst Tibetan Madhyamakas i.e. gzhan stong; the early Sakya/Nyingma view of free from extremes that goes right back to Kawa Paltseg, and of course Tsongkhapa's formulation.

The Indian texts also show no consistency in how the term is used, the anonymous pramāṇavidhvaṃsanaṭṭipīṭakavṛtti refers to its adherents as "great madhyamaka" and rejects the so called cittamatra madhyamaka [that Bhava advocates in the passage you reference] as inferior.

In reality, in the Indian context, "great madhyamaka" is a term mostly used in tantric treatises; even here however it is used in various different ways. The Śrī-kālacakropadeśayogaśaḍaṅgatantrapañjikā by Avadhutipāda states:

"The nature of the completion [stage] is said to be mahāmadhyamaka".

On other hand, the Śrī-dākārṇavamahāyoginītantrarājasyaṭikāvohitaṭikā by Padmavajra states:

So called "madhyamaka" is the dharma of the essence, the freedom from four extremes of the mahāmadhyamaka of the Mahāyāna and the awakening of the fortunate.

Dombi Heruka's Śrīhevajrasādhana states:

One should meditate on the great madhyamaka free from all signs.

And the Tantric Candrakīrti's Samājābhisamayālaṃkāravṛtti states

Having manifested the mahāmadhyamaka that is like space, the sunlight of compassion benefits all sentient beings

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, December 23rd, 2013 at 6:00 AM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

smcj said:

Dudjom Rinpoche stated that it's acceptable to hold a gzhan stong view in certain circumstances regarding practice. I believe he then also stated that in post-meditation and in instances where discussion/debate was occurring, the rang stong view is appropriate.

I believe what D.R. said was that Prasāṅgika view is best if the subject of emptiness is approached intellectually, and Great Madhyamaka view is best if the subject of emptiness is approached from an experiential/meditational perspective. He calls the Prasāṅgika the "coarse outer Madhyamaka" as opposed to the "subtle inner Madhyamaka". He subscribes to the 3rd turning as definitive. I've got the quote(s) somewhere in the Big Red Book. I will look them up if you so desire.

Malcolm wrote:

I have already shown that this distinction made by many gzhan stong scholars is based on a misconception, and I even trotted out the passage in question.

<https://www.dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=102&t=13306&p=174083&hilit=outer+madhyamaka#p174083>

So called subtle inner Madhyamaka is just taking appearances to be mind.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, December 23rd, 2013 at 2:10 AM

Title: Re: Ganesh in Tibetan Buddhism

Content:

Destiny said:

'Oh Ananda, when any son of noble family, daughter of noble family, monk, nun, lay man or lay woman goes to a place of worship other than where the Three Jewels (are worshipped) or enters the palace retinue of a king and practices the mantras (recited in that place) and begins with this Essence of Ganapati-Ganesvara all one's tasks will be accomplished. Have no doubts about it.

Can someone clarify this statement ? Does that mean that by using that mantra, any other non-buddhist mantras become buddhist and brings realization?

I have another question: there is a clear connection between White Mahakala (Gonkar) and Ganesh - or at least that's what I've understood.

If one practice white mahakala sadhana, do you think that if one recite the usual ganesha mantra (om gam ganapataye namaha) his practice will be enhanced?

And what is the connection between the Tso Dak that are under Gonkar's feet and Ganapati? To be more precise, what are the tso dak and their role in Vajrayana buddhism?

Thanks

Malcolm wrote:

The answer to your first question is no.

Tshogs bdag is Tibetan for Ganapati.

Ganapati is a mundane protector in Tibetan Buddhism. For example, in the Red Ganapati practice transmitted in Sakya, oneself in the form of Vajrapani commands Ganapati to perform one's wishes.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, December 23rd, 2013 at 1:55 AM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

how can aggregates, or anything else, be posited on emptiness? "Emptiness" is not a res.

Malcolm wrote:

"For those whom emptiness is possible, for them everything is possible; for those whom emptiness is not possible, for them nothing is possible."

gad rgyangs said:

sure, but that does not address the fact that the traditional presentation of imputation requires a rope first. Im sure thats why paratantra was made up. you can break it down to atoms, but what is the "rope" that atoms are imputed on?

Malcolm wrote:

The atoms are not imputed upon a rope. When the atoms are perceived, the rope no longer appears, just as when the rope is perceived, the snake no longer appears. As I mentioned above, all of these things are imputed upon appearances. When you run out of appearances, i.e. when you cannot find anything more, you run out of imputations -- hence emptiness. This is all very straightforward.

Yogacara assumes that mind is a basis for everything, hence their paratantra concept.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, December 23rd, 2013 at 1:36 AM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

ok so if we mistake the aggregates for a "self", then what is it we are mistaking as "aggregates"?

Malcolm wrote:

snake = self

rope = aggregates

atoms/moments= constituents of aggregates

Keep breaking it down, you arrive at emptiness.

gad rgyangs said:

how can aggregates, or anything else, be posited on emptiness? "Emptiness" is not a res.

Malcolm wrote:

"For those whom emptiness is possible, for them everything is possible; for those whom emptiness is not possible, for them nothing is possible."

In any event, the main point is that these things are appearances. So the real answer to your question is that all of these thing such as aggregates, etc., are posited upon appearances. These appearances are dependently arisen. Since they are dependently arisen, they are empty. That is the best you are going to get out of Madhyamaka, hence the two truths.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, December 23rd, 2013 at 12:53 AM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

if the self is posited on the aggregates, then what are the aggregates posited on? And no infinite regress please.

Anders said:

The point here is that it is not actually posited on the aggregates. But conventionally designated as the aggregates. That is to say, when people [falsely] impute a self, they do so in relation to the aggregates.

This is, structurally, no different from positing four legs and a plate as 'a table'. Table is a mere designation of apparently connected aggregates. Where the designation of 'self' differs from 'table' is that sentient beings have real hard time recognising, in realtime, that this self we posit all the time is actually a mere convention overlayed on the aggregates. But this is a practical issue, not a logical one.

gad rgyangs said:

ok so if we mistake the aggregates for a "self", then what is it we are mistaking as "aggregates"?

Malcolm wrote:

snake = self

rope = aggregates

atoms/moments= constituents of aggregates

Keep breaking it down, you arrive at emptiness.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 22nd, 2013 at 11:09 PM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

At this point the whole system becomes realist. The corrective for that is the two truths as presented in Mahāyāna.

gad rgyangs said:

ok this much is history. but can you posit one illusion upon another? and who does all this positing? another illusory "mental factor"? then we have an illusion positing an illusion on other illusions. Isn't anything said by this illusory configuration about the nature of reality itself an illusion? (I'm not saying "empty" but rather "illusion" so no replys from Vighrahavyavartani. N claims that an empty statement about emptiness is OK. I am asking about the illusory maker of that empty statement.)

Malcolm wrote:

Illusions are empty so there is really no difference between saying "an illusory agent" and "an empty agent". It amounts to the same thing. This is why the example of the illusionist is so frequently used. In the Vighrahavyavartani commentary the example of an illusionist is brought up and addressed:

ཁྱིམ་མུལ་པའི་སྒྲིམ་བྱས་སྒྲིམ་པའི་སྒྲིམ་བྱ་ཞིག་དོན་འགའ་ཞིག་གི་ཕྱིར་འོང་བར་བྱེད་པ་ལ་འགོག་པར་བྱེད་པ་དང་།
སྒྲིམ་མ་མཁན་གྱིས་ཕྱིར་བཞུགས་པའི་སྒྲིམ་བྱས་སྒྲིམ་པའི་སྒྲིམ་བྱ་གཞན་ཞིག་དོན་འགའ་ཞིག་གི་ཕྱིར་འོང་བར་བྱེད་པ་ལ་འགོག་པར་བྱེད་པ་བཞིན་ཏེ་དེ་ལ་སྒྲིམ་པའི་སྒྲིམ་བྱ་དགག་པར་བྱ་
བ་གང་ཡིན་པ་ དེ་ཡང་སྒྲིམ་པ་ཡིན།

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 22nd, 2013 at 10:41 PM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

if the self is posited on the aggregates, then what are the aggregates posited on? And no infinte regressess please.

Malcolm wrote:

Matter, mind and mental factors: dharmas the Abhidharmikas took to be pāramārtha dharmas.

They posit the material aggregate upon the four elements which make up one's sense organs and their objects. Sensation, perception and formations are posited upon mental factors. The aggregate of consciousness is posited on past (manas), present (vijñāna) and future (citta) minds.

Matter is then posited on particles (described in various ways). Mind and mental factors are posited upon moments.

At this point the whole system becomes realist. The corrective for that is the two truths as presented in Mahāyāna.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 22nd, 2013 at 10:12 PM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

dude said:

what's important is instruction.

Malcolm wrote:
Sure, of course.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Sunday, December 22nd, 2013 at 10:57 AM
Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."
Content:

dude said:
I'm talking about the Buddha's teachings themselves, not academic speculation on events.

Malcolm wrote:
Which Buddha's teaching?

dude said:
THE Buddha's teaching.
In the Nirvana Sutra, the Buddha said that supernatural powers aren't really important, what's important is instruction.

Malcolm wrote:
There are lots of Buddhas.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Sunday, December 22nd, 2013 at 10:11 AM
Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."
Content:

Sherab Rigdrol said:
I don't need a person obsessed with building a grandiose reputation as a scholar and researcher to explain it to me in terms that are less than several hundred years old.

Malcolm wrote:
Which person would that be?

Author: Malcolm
Date: Sunday, December 22nd, 2013 at 9:50 AM
Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."
Content:
Sherab Rigdrol said:
Modern practitioner here who prefers so-called Tibetan myth and supernaturalism's explanation of reality to modern science's narcissistic and limited temporal conclusions.

Malcolm wrote:
Why narcissistic?

And yes, people need certainty in their lives-- some seek it in science, others in religion; but certainty is found in neither.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Sunday, December 22nd, 2013 at 9:11 AM
Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."
Content:

dude said:
I'm talking about the Buddha's teachings themselves, not academic speculation on events.

Malcolm wrote:
Which Buddha's teaching?

Author: Malcolm
Date: Sunday, December 22nd, 2013 at 5:48 AM
Title: Re: Sexism in Buddhism
Content:

kirtu said:
The Tara's are of course. However I have a tale for you: one day Naropa was sitting outside the gate at his monastic university reading a parjnaparamita text. An aged hag come up and asked, do you understand what you are reading? Naropa answered, yes, I understand the words. The hag danced for joy. Then Naropa said "I also understand the meaning." Whereupon the hag wept bitterly.....

Kirt

Malcolm wrote:
Use of the word "hag" indicates again patriarchal expectations around female beauty, availability and desirability, in this case, Western ones since the word "hag" does not exist in Tibetan.

hag 1 |hag|
noun
1 a witch, esp. one in the form of an ugly old woman (often used as a term of disparagement for a woman): a fat old hag in a dirty apron.

In the original text by Tsang Nyon Heruka, she is simply described as an old women (rgan mo) with thirty seven signs of ugliness.

kirtu said:

Thank-you. Of course most people recounting the tale do not say "There is no word for 'hag' in Tibetan and Tsang Nyon Heruka, simply described her as an old women (rgan mo) with thirty seven signs of ugliness." This is almost always translated as "hag" and then perhaps it's mentioned that she was ugly as well as old.

Malcolm wrote:

"rgan mo" is virtually never translated as hag, and the native Tibetan dictionaries simple describes a "rgan mo" as "a women who is "high" in years" [lo na mtho ba'i bud med]. In this case the translator [Guenther] took license with the Tibetan text in an unfortunate way, looking to make the text more "dramatic".

kirtu said:

The whole use of the term is to counter patriarchal conditioning as the old woman in the story is Vajrayogini appearing to Naropa (for those playing at home). The fully enlightened being appeared in a form counter to Naropa's patriarchial expectations. And this is the lesson to us as well.

Malcolm wrote:

I clarified, had you been reading carefully, that use of the the term "hag" was a result of Western patriarchal expectations, thus undermining the intent of the original Tibetan text.

BTW, if there is a word for "hag" in Tibetan it would be 'bag mo' [འབག་མོ་, literary "mask woman"], as in Sa skya 'bag mo i.e. the witches of Sakya, three very powerful demonesses that are mundane protectors. The term 'bag mo is also used for evil women.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 22nd, 2013 at 5:41 AM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

dude said:

I think this will be harder for Tibetan Buddhists because supernaturalism is a governing principle in Tibetan Buddhism and is used as a criteria for its ultimate validity. This in itself goes against the Buddha's teachings.

Malcolm wrote:

As far as I can tell, the rise in the phenomena of recorded magical battles between Buddhists and Hindus reflected the reality that Buddhists in India were in a losing war in which Hindus, for many complicated reasons, were eventually able to drive Institutional

Buddhism to its knees.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 22nd, 2013 at 5:09 AM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

I think this will be harder for Tibetan Buddhists because supernaturalism is a governing principle in Tibetan Buddhism and is used as a criteria for its ultimate validity. Demonstrations of siddhis were the rule in ancient contests between Buddhists and Hindus, not the exception if we are to understand how Tibetans perceived the viability of the siddha tradition in ancient India.

Nighthawk said:

Is the "rainbow body" also a supernatural element of TB that Tibetan Buddhists need to get rid of?

Malcolm wrote:

I didn't say that Tibetan Buddhists needed to get rid of anything. I am pointing out that many Tibetan Buddhist beliefs need to be understood as nonfalsifiable. I have actually been saying the same thing for over 15 years now. Inferentially, because many potential "converts" are attracted to Buddhism because of its supposed rationalism, forms like Vipassana are more likely to fit it with the dominant worldview in the West and therefore gain much wider currency. Just look at how the term "mindfulness" has been expropriated from Buddhism. Of course there will always be folks who are attracted to Tibetan Buddhism precisely because of its supernatural elements. But those beliefs are not likely to sustain the transmission of Dharma in the Industrialized West. We do not, for example, see magical duels between Buddhist siddhas and Catholic priests.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 22nd, 2013 at 4:30 AM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Is this insurmountable? No, of course not. However, traditional Tibetan Buddhists will need to accommodate science into their world view.

Anders said:

I don't think Buddhism needs to dump it's myths. It just needs to hold them with a light touch so that modern practitioners may adequately compartmentalise this and science. Given the hoops scientific Christians manage to jump through to accomplish such a feat, I think that's fairly manageable for your average modern Buddhist.

Malcolm wrote:

I think this will be harder for Tibetan Buddhists because supernaturalism is a governing principle in Tibetan Buddhism and is used as a criteria for its ultimate validity.

Demonstrations of siddhis were the rule in ancient contests between Buddhists and Hindus, not the exception if we are to understand how Tibetans perceived the viability of the siddha tradition in ancient India.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 22nd, 2013 at 4:14 AM

Title: Re: Sexism in Buddhism

Content:

kirtu said:

Here are a few images of female Buddhas/10th Bhumi Bodhisattvas in Tibetan Buddhism. Some are found also in other forms of Buddhism:

Malcolm wrote:

Please note however that all these images correspond to patriarchal (Brahmanical in this case) social expectations around female beauty.

kirtu said:

The Tara's are of course. However I have a tale for you: one day Naropa was sitting outside the gate at his monastic university reading a parjnaparamita text. An aged hag come up and asked, do you understand what you are reading? Naropa answered, yes, I understand the words. The hag danced for joy. Then Naropa said "I also understand the meaning." Whereupon the hag wept bitterly....

Kirt

Malcolm wrote:

Use of the word "hag" indicates again patriarchal expectations around female beauty, availability and desirability, in this case, Western ones since the word "hag" does not exist in Tibetan.

hag 1 |hag|

noun

1 a witch, esp. one in the form of an ugly old woman (often used as a term of disparagement for a woman): a fat old hag in a dirty apron.

In the original text by Tsang Nyon Heruka, she is simply described as an old women (rgan mo) with thirty seven signs of ugliness.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 22nd, 2013 at 3:33 AM

Title: Re: Sexism in Buddhism

Content:

kirtu said:

Here are a few images of female Buddhas/10th Bhumi Bodhisattvas in Tibetan Buddhism. Some are found also in other forms of Buddhism:

Malcolm wrote:

Please note however that all these images correspond to patriarchal (Brahmanical in this case) social expectations around female beauty.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 22nd, 2013 at 3:21 AM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

I don't think it is (neither is Islam or Christianity) I think that YOU are facing a crisis of modernity (and projecting it onto Buddhism).

Malcolm wrote:

What I observe is that fundamentalism is how the world's religions are dealing with such things as evolution, science, etc.

Sherab Dorje said:

Sure, I agree. But you know what? Fundamentalism (unfortunately, as far as I am concerned) works really well at overcoming crises. REALLY well.

Malcolm wrote:

Reacting to a crisis is not the same thing as overcoming a crisis. Thus, I must disagree with your assessment.

Buddhism as a whole has a somewhat better chance of dealing with the crisis of modernity because it was reconstructed as a "science" in the late 19th century, with Theravada largely jumping on this bandwagon early on.

Tibetan Buddhism on the other hand is, at present, the least well equipped to deal with modernity because it has layers and layers of metaphysical developments due to it being the end product of 1300 years of the development and evolution of Buddhist thought in India (and of course, this includes the period between 650-1500 in Tibet itself and its unique permutations of basically Indic materials).

Is this insurmountable? No, of course not. However, traditional Tibetan Buddhists will need to accommodate science into their world view.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 22nd, 2013 at 1:43 AM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

I don't think it is (neither is Islam or Christianity) I think that YOU are facing a crisis of modernity (and projecting it onto Buddhism).

Malcolm wrote:

What I observe is that fundamentalism is how the world's religions are dealing with such things as evolution, science, etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 22nd, 2013 at 12:41 AM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

heart said:

Since I don't agree that when using "I" and "mine" I am accepting the idea of a conventional self I find it difficult to discuss this further. I just don't think the Buddha ever made a distinction between a conventional self that is existing and an unconventional non changing ultimate self that don't exist.

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, in fact he did:

"Ananda, if I — being asked by Vacchagotta the wanderer if there is a self — were to answer that there is a self, that would be conforming with those brahmans & contemplatives who are exponents of eternalism [the view that there is an eternal, unchanging soul]. If I — being asked by Vacchagotta the wanderer if there is no self — were to answer that there is no self, that would be conforming with those brahmans & contemplatives who are exponents of annihilationism [the view that death is the annihilation of consciousness]. If I — being asked by Vacchagotta the wanderer if there is a self — were to answer that there is a self, would that be in keeping with the arising of knowledge that all phenomena are not-self?"

"No, lord."

"And if I — being asked by Vacchagotta the wanderer if there is no self — were to answer that there is no self, the bewildered Vacchagotta would become even more bewildered: 'Does the self I used to have now not exist?'"

And this is a nice one:

"It's just as when a dog is tied by a leash to a post or stake: If it walks, it walks right around that post or stake. If it stands, it stands right next to that post or stake. If it sits, it sits right next to that post or stake. If it lies down, it lies down right next to that post or stake.

"In the same way, an uninstructed run-of-the-mill person regards form as: 'This is mine, this is my self, this is what I am.' He regards feeling... perception... fabrications... consciousness as: 'This is mine, this is my self, this is what I am.' If he walks, he walks right around these five clinging-aggregates. If he stands, he stands right next to these five clinging-aggregates. If he sits, he sits right next to these five clinging-aggregates. If he lies down, he lies down right next to these five clinging-aggregates. Thus one should reflect on one's mind with every moment: 'For a long time has this mind been defiled by passion, aversion, & delusion.' From the defilement of the mind are beings defiled. From the purification of the mind are beings purified.

Gaddula Sutta: The Leash (2)

Here you can clearly see how the Buddha teaches the conventional self. You have to remember, the corollary of "conventional" is "prior to analysis".

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 22nd, 2013 at 12:31 AM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Science does not reject metaphysical claims, it simply is not equipped to deal with them.

Practice said:

I think this is a half truth. It is true that science is not equipped to deal with them, and false that it does not reject metaphysical claims. I think the inherent paradigm of science has to reject it.

Malcolm wrote:

Now that you have given your position, in my opinion, I can see that you are in reaction against modernity.

You are confusing science with logical positivism, in my opinion. Science is unconcerned with metaphysics.

Practice said:

We are rapidly losing any personal contact with any inner understanding and orientation. I think this is where Buddhism shines. It addresses the inner questions of "how we be", a "quality of being".

Malcolm wrote:

Only in so far as, at its best, Buddhism deconstructs the whole ontological project and shows that it is fundamentally pointless since categories of being are proven to be mere conventions, at best.

One does not even need to commit to the bare minimum of Buddhist metaphysical tenets (rebirth, karma and so on) in order to benefit greatly from the Buddhist meditation, ethics, and so on. Of course, anyone who argues that these basic metaphysics are not essential to Buddhadharma itself is deeply mistaken.

Practice said:

All our behavior and actions are up for self review. Out of this inner inquiry and self cultivation, self understanding can grow. This is simply not the concerns of western science.

Malcolm wrote:

This is not true. Neuroscience, for example, is very concerned how social behavior, language, cognition, emotion and so on are grounded in our embodiment as human beings and what that implies for our contentment and happiness. I think you will find that many people involved in the sciences see science as a means of inner inquiry and self-understanding.

Practice said:

I personally hope Buddhism does not drift over to the paradigm of science and lose what it uniquely has to contribute to our self understanding. If it does may be we should call it Neo-Buddhism.

Malcolm wrote:

Plainly put: Buddhists will have to cope with science. They will do so in a variety of fashions. Some will retreat into fundamentalism, rejecting science (while nevertheless enjoying its fruits, such as the internet and so on); some will manage a happy coexistence, and some will want to revise Buddhism to make it "scientific".

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 21st, 2013 at 11:50 PM

Title: Re: Hanmi Buddhism

Content:

Snovid said:

Buddhist these guys are not.

In fact

I also do not consider myself to be a Buddhist

I adore Dzogchen and Bon because of shamanism

Malcolm wrote:

Shamanism and Dzogchen have nothing to do with each other.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 21st, 2013 at 10:41 PM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

heart said:

I do understand what conventional means. But I don't agree that using the "label "I" and "me", you are accepting the "existence" of a conventional self". The Buddha's teaching on the 5 skandhas is clearly pointing to the non-existence of a conventional self. I agree that label "I" and "me", you might be accepting the "existence" of a conventional person. A person is simply not a self. A self is an abstract construct based on a giant misunderstanding and person on the other hand is something quite different.

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

If you do not accept a conventional "self" you are in fact rejecting the designations "I" and "mine". I don't really have any stake in convincing you otherwise, but you will find if you pursue this line of reasoning you will be locked into some funny contradictions.

Incidentally, person [pudgala] and self [atman] are generally considered to be synonyms in Buddhist literature. I have never, in all my years of studying these texts ever seen any Indian or Tibetan author make a case that persons and selves ought to be treated as distinct and different.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 21st, 2013 at 9:14 PM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

You mean people do not use the convention "I" and "me" to refer to themselves?

heart said:

Sure they do, still no proof of an actual conventional self.

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

Conventional means "dependent on designation", not actual, truly existent, etc.

If you use the label "I" and "me", you are accepting the "existence" of a conventional self but not necessarily a real, true, actual self.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 21st, 2013 at 11:46 AM

Title: Re: Awakening the Sacred Body

Content:

Snowid said:

So if I'm working with the lowest chakra as described by TWR this means that I'm working on the base chakra in the description of the Hindu?

Crown chakra in Bon is equivalent of hindu crown chakra and the third eye ?

Malcolm wrote:

Not exactly

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 21st, 2013 at 11:43 AM

Title: Re: Dra Thalgyur Tantra

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

the abidharmakosa translation is from the french. it shouldnt be hard or take too long to translate the tantra from french to english.

Malcolm wrote:

Much if the tantra makes very little sense on its own without the commentary.

The commentary is roughly 1400 folios long.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 21st, 2013 at 11:38 AM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Conventionally, there is a self, there is birth, there is death, and rebirth. Conventionally, there is also karma. Ultimately there is no self, no birth, no death, no rebirth, and also no karma.

heart said:

I am not sure I agree with that. Even conventionally there is no self. If there was someone would be able to find it, but no such luck.

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

You mean people do not use the convention "I" and "me" to refer to themselves?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 21st, 2013 at 2:22 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen practiced on different solar systems?

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

How does that affect me here and now?

Malcolm wrote:

If you really followed that line of thinking yourself, you would never post.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 21st, 2013 at 2:18 AM

Title: Re: Awakening the Sacred Body

Content:

Snowid said:

Tenzin Wangyal Rinpoche described in his book exercises with five chakras

Why does not have all the seven?

Where can I find a description of exercise with the other two chakras?

Malcolm wrote:

IN general, five cakras is the Buddhist/Bon system. Seven is the Hindu system.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 21st, 2013 at 1:23 AM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Scientific methodology cannot verify non-falsifiable phenomena (such as karma, rebirth, God, etc.) because they cannot be tested and reproduced. Nonfalsifiability does not render something false, merely untestable at present.

PadmaVonSamba said:

Yes, that is quite correct.

But a big factor is also what the terms mean.

For example, if karma is used to express some sense of cause and effect, then that can be tested.

Malcolm wrote:

But that is not strictly what karma means. Karma refers to morally driven actions performed by a person whose continuum, either in this life or in some future life, will experience the ripening [phala] of that action.

Cause and condition [hetu and pratyaya] is a separate topic; necessary for understanding karma, but more general.

For this reason, Vasubandhu first writes about causes and conditions; then he writes about dependent origination; then he writes about karma: moving from the very general to the very specific.

PadmaVonSamba said:

if it refers only to some notion of some continuity of behavior patterns or conditions from one lifetime to another then, not so easy to test.

Malcolm wrote:

That is what karma means.

PadmaVonSamba said:

And, it depends on what you define as a 'lifetime'.
if there is no 'self', how long is a lifetime?

Malcolm wrote:

Conventionally, there is a self, there is birth, there is death, and rebirth. Conventionally, there is also karma. Ultimately there is no self, no birth, no death, no rebirth, and also no karma.

The lifespan of human beings is considered to be about 80 years.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 21st, 2013 at 12:51 AM

Title: Re: Dra Thalgyur Tantra

Content:

Fa Dao said:

Thanks Malcolm..thats what I was afraid of..and let me guess..there is no English translation/commentary, right?

Malcolm wrote:

Not yet...Jean Luc Achard has apparently rendered the whole in French however. I am slowly working on it, and have let the SSI translators know this. So who knows, perhaps my draft will someday become the basis for a publication. But I have completed less than 10 percent.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 21st, 2013 at 12:48 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen practiced on different solar systems?

Content:

Ivo said:

A careful reading of the Vimalakirti Nirdeśa Sūtra will also appeal to some Star Wars fans, and it seems to be one of the early texts, although not of Tibetan origin.

Malcolm wrote:

Indeed, the concept that this or that form of Buddhādharma is being practiced in some other world system than our own is not an innovation of Dzogchen texts, but appears in Mahāyāna texts from an early time.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 21st, 2013 at 12:44 AM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Science does not reject metaphysical claims, it simply is not equipped to deal with them.

Scientific methodology cannot verify non-falsifiable phenomena (such as karma, rebirth, God, etc.) because they cannot be tested and reproduced. Nonfalsifiability does not render something false, merely untestable at present.

smcj said:

Along the same lines, studies of complex systems, like macro economics, cannot be tested and reproduced either, which is why there are so many different economic theories.

Malcolm wrote:

Economics is often called "the dismal science", when in fact it is actually dismal science.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 21st, 2013 at 12:42 AM

Title: Re: Dra Thalgyur Tantra

Content:

Fa Dao said:

This Tantra seems to be one that is referenced a great deal by many different Dzogchen Teachers. So of course I am thinking it is of obvious importance. I have a few questions#1 Can anyone who can actually read Tibetan give a brief synopsis of the main thrust of this Tantra in comparison to say other Dzogchen Tantras? and #2 how difficult is this Tantra to read if one were to try and learn Tibetan? I just remember somewhere where ChNN had said how difficult some passages were in the Marvelous Primordial State to render into English. It seems that some things in Tibetan are more direct and pithy and others...well...not so much. Any help/insight would be greatly appreciated.

Malcolm wrote:

This tantra is a sprawling text that cannot be correctly read without the aid of a commentary.

It presents the entire path of Dzogchen, embryology, cosmology, etc.

Even if one were to learn Tibetan, a classical education in the five classical sciences is a requirement to actually understand any of these texts.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 20th, 2013 at 11:38 PM

Title: Re: Everybody speaks about samaya, but nobody knows what it

Content:

ddorje said:

Isn't this quite deconstructionist?

Malcolm wrote:

Tibetan Buddhists could take some lessons from Derrida, etc. It might stave off a lot of naive beliefs about our textual traditions.

In any event, there is a long standing critical tradition with Tibetan Buddhism, the problem with it is that it is usually only applied to the other guy's books and not our own.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 20th, 2013 at 11:38 PM

Title: Re: Everybody speaks about samaya, but nobody knows what it

Content:

ddorje said:

Isn't this quite deconstructionist?

Malcolm wrote:

Tibetan Buddhists could take some lessons from Derrida, etc. It might stave off a lot of naive beliefs about our textual traditions.

In any event, there is a long standing critical tradition with Tibetan Buddhism, the problem with it is that it is usually only applied to the other guy's books and not our own.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 20th, 2013 at 11:28 PM

Title: Re: Dzogchen practiced on different solar systems?

Content:

Ivo said:

As this topic of discussion is quite serious and has a lot of implications it will be meaningful only if some "universally" accepted teacher comes forward with some clear statements.

dzogchungpa said:

What kind of implications are you referring to?

Ivo said:

Well... think for yourself what it would mean if a certain Buddha field from which a certain doctrine is said to have originated can be correlated to a physically observable place in our universe. The implications are more than what most Dharma practitioners will be able to handle comfortably.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, the present day origin of Dzogchen teaching can be correlated to a physically identifiable place in the Universe and we are located on it. Otherwise, since most Mahāyāna practitioners who are familiar with the accounts of the universe, for example, as presented in the opening chapters of the Avatamska sutras will have no problem with the idea of the existence of planets in other solar systems and civilizations which exist in them. Nor for that matter will Star Wars fans be that surprised:

In any case, the first chapter of the sgra thal gyur identifies 13 buddhafiels where Dzogchen is practiced. The introduction to the The Supreme Source discusses these in much detail.

It should be noted however that in terms of textual history, there is no mention anywhere of this concept in Tibetan literature which can be reliably dated earlier than the sgra thal rgyur itself, which most likely was compiled between the 10th and 11th centuries.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 20th, 2013 at 10:57 PM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

Practice said:

It would be helpful for understanding your over all thesis. I truly would like to understand.

Thanks.

Malcolm wrote:

"Science" is an open-ended iterative method of inquiry into physical reality. Scientism is a belief system, which includes metaphysical beliefs, constructed out of the findings of the former.

Practice said:

To make sure that I am not misunderstanding you-

Two questions:

Does "true science" (science void of scientism) then reject any metaphysical claims?

Also, a major branch of metaphysics is ontology, would science embrace ontological inquires or consider them a form of scientism also?

Malcolm wrote:

Science does not reject metaphysical claims, it simply is not equipped to deal with them.

Scientific methodology cannot verify non-falsifiable phenomena (such as karma, rebirth, God, etc.) because they cannot be tested and reproduced. Nonfalsifiability does not render something false, merely untestable at present.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 20th, 2013 at 5:05 AM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

Can someone give an example which demonstrates how:

"Scientism is a belief system, which includes metaphysical beliefs, constructed out of the findings of the former."

Malcolm wrote:

For example, deciding that neuro-cognitive functions prove that mind is at best a epiphenomena of the brain. That is a species of metaphysical belief.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 20th, 2013 at 12:03 AM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

Practice said:

It would be helpful for understanding your over all thesis. I truly would like to understand.

Thanks.

Malcolm wrote:

"Science" is an open-ended iterative method of inquiry into physical reality. Scientism is a belief system, which includes metaphysical beliefs, constructed out of the findings of the former.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 19th, 2013 at 10:36 PM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Science (as opposed to Scientism) is always "...there is still a lot yet that we don't know".

Practice said:

Could you please be clearer on your distinction between "Science" and "Scientism"?

Please be specific, I think this is very important for communication and an understanding of your position.

Thanks.

Malcolm wrote:

<https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Scientism>

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 19th, 2013 at 12:00 AM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

luckily, Dzogchen is not a religion! rigpa is not an illusion..

Malcolm wrote:

Vidyā is knowing illusions as illusions. But vidyā itself is not something "real".

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 18th, 2013 at 9:31 PM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

heart said:

Then it turns out the universe is a hologram of a reality that is two dimensional

<http://www.nature.com/news/simulations-back-up-theory-that-universe-is-a-hologram-1.14328>

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:
Maybe, maybe not.

heart said:
This is where DJKR goes wrong it is only religion that knows because science is always "maybe, maybe not".

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:
Religions give an illusion of certainty. And of course they contradict each other on every detail.

Science (as opposed to Scientism) is always "...there is still a lot yet that we don't know".

Author: Malcolm
Date: Wednesday, December 18th, 2013 at 7:28 AM
Title: Re: Common Anatta Question
Content:
Malcolm wrote:
How is this different than Advaita Vedanta?

Tsongkhapafan said:
Because the self is not asserted as permanent.

Malcolm wrote:
You mean Buddhahood is conditioned? Whatever is impermanent is conditioned.

Tsongkhapafan said:
A Buddha's self is imputed on the Truth Body

Malcolm wrote:
A Buddha imputes a conditioned self onto the permanent dharmakāya? That seems very strange to me.

Tsongkhapafan said:
Buddhas can impute non-conceptually.

Malcolm wrote:
This is incoherent. Imputations cannot exist in absence of conceptuality, for example, in a direct perception.

Tsongkhapafan said:
It is a valid basis for imputing an I just as the parts of a car are a valid basis for imputing 'car' even though no car can be found in any of the parts of the car. The car, as a conceptual imputation, functions. So it is with the I or self - it functions in dependence upon being imputed upon the body and mind, otherwise it would be non-existent.

Malcolm wrote:

The parts of a car are not a valid basis for imputing a "car". If they were a valid basis for imputing a car, a car would work when all its parts were piled in a disorganized heap. So your assertion fails.

Tsongkhapafan said:

This verse is often misinterpreted.

Malcolm wrote:

Your alternate translation is incorrect. Mine is based directly on Candrakirti's own commentary.

Tsongkhapafan said:

It is absurd to suggest that Buddhas do not have minds.

Malcolm wrote:

Buddhas do not possess vijñāna; they possess only jñāna. This is a point poorly understood by most.

In any case, you admit that Candrakirti's verse states that all objects of knowledge are burnt by the fire of wisdom. Even you must admit a mind cannot arise in absence of an object. If there are no objects for a Buddha (as indicated by the verse above), how can a mind (citta) arise, conceptual or otherwise? Therefore, to call the wisdom of a Buddha a "mind" is at best a convention. A Buddha's mind is an omniscient nonconceptual wisdom.

Nāgarjuna states for example in the Sixty Verses of Reasonings:

When reflection-like things are seen fully with the eye of wisdom, those great beings
will not be stuck in the swamp of objects.

When there is no attachment, since there is no attachment to or engagement to those things as a self, there is no attachment to the swamp of objects. āryas are conventionally "like [those ones who have] trained their minds on reflections".

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 17th, 2013 at 10:36 PM

Title: Re: Common Anatta Question

Content:

Tsongkhapafan said:

Buddhas impute 'I' upon the Truth Body, which is their valid basis of imputation and is therefore not wrong.

Malcolm wrote:

How is this different than Advaita Vedanta?

Further, how can Buddhas impute anything? The dharmakāya is the "mind" of a Buddha, and is completely free of all concepts. How can there be imputation when there is no conceptuality?

Further, how are the body and mind "valid" bases for imputing an I? No self can be found in either.

I am afraid you have long since abandoned any form of Madhyamaka, let alone "Prasanga".

Since all of the dried fire wood of knowledge objects have been burned, that peace is the dharmakāya of the victors; at that time there is no arising, no cessation; that cessation of the mind is the direct perception of the kāya.

Candrakirti comments upon this that cessation of mind and mental factors is conventionally termed "direct perception" of the kāya.

jeeprs said:

I am struggling to understand how this is not nihilism. If it is the complete cessation of all concepts and the end of 'the person' how is this state different from non-existence?

Malcolm wrote:

"Persons" never started, so how could they end?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 17th, 2013 at 3:59 AM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

Practice said:

@ Malcolm

Your original post is well put and is a thesis that needs to be reckoned with, by all religions.

Let me ask you though, in your view what is the value, if any, to being a Buddhist? Why bother if science has a more modern and better approach to the structure of reality?

Malcolm wrote:

I don't see Buddhadharma and scientific inquiry as being inherently in conflict.

Buddhism and Scientism on the other hand, are bound to be in conflict.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 17th, 2013 at 2:04 AM

Title: Re: Common Anatta Question

Content:

Tsongkhapafan said:

Buddhas impute 'I' upon the Truth Body, which is their valid basis of imputation and is therefore not wrong.

Malcolm wrote:

How is this different than Advaita Vedanta?

Further, how can Buddhas impute anything? The dharmakāya is the "mind" of a Buddha, and is completely free of all concepts. How can there be imputation when there is no conceptuality?

Further, how are the body and mind "valid" bases for imputing an I? No self can be found in either.

I am afraid you have long since abandoned any form of Madhyamaka, let alone "Prasanga".

Since all of the dried fire wood of knowledge objects have been burned, that peace is the dharmakāya of the victors; at that time there is no arising, no cessation; that cessation of the mind is the direct perception of the kāya.

Candrakirti comments upon this that cessation of mind and mental factors is conventionally termed "direct perception" of the kāya.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 17th, 2013 at 12:28 AM

Title: Re: Khechara

Content:

Konchog1 said:

I know it is a Tantric Pure Land (whatever that means) and that Tantric practice is the cause to be reborn there (especially the practice of Vajrayogini).

Besides from that, what are the properties of Khechara? What is life there like? How does Khechara differ from Sukhavati?

Thank you.

Malcolm wrote:

For one there are women there...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 17th, 2013 at 12:24 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen: Nongradual Buddhahood?

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

Care to name the (English) source?

Malcolm wrote:

The English source ultimately is myself. I translated the Doha, revised it with Lama Migmar. He allowed Sakya Center to print it, but left my name out inadvertently.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 17th, 2013 at 12:11 AM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

Catherine of Siena said:

The Absolute Innocence of all within my Creation takes a while to understand.

dzogchungpa said:

Did he say how long?

Malcolm wrote:

I have seen Catherine's head in Sienna, where it is preserved.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, December 16th, 2013 at 11:42 PM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

Whether he actually said the things he is purported to have said or not, there are teachings you can actually practice and get the same results,

Malcolm wrote:

Have you met someone who has returned from Sukhavati and reported on it to you?

pueraeternus said:

What are your views on practices such as Phowa?

(Not a loaded question, just curious based on your take on buddhaksetras).

Malcolm wrote:

I don't have much of a view about them. I have done a few phowa retreats, got signs and so forth.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, December 16th, 2013 at 11:41 PM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

heart said:

Then it turns out the universe is a hologram of a reality that is two dimensional
<http://www.nature.com/news/simulations-back-up-theory-that-universe-is-a-hologram-1.14328>

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

Maybe, maybe not.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, December 16th, 2013 at 11:40 PM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

dude said:

Heaven in monotheism is eternal.

In Buddhism, it isn't even outside the realm of birth and death!

Malcolm wrote:

Of course, I know this. But this is a mere sectarian definition. And this does not make the Buddhist definition true and the eternalist definition false.

In short, all of these beliefs are just mediated by some book someone chooses to believe as opposed to some other books they choose not to believe.

When I say that I "don't believe" in Sukhavati, what I mean is that I am agnostic about it. I will admit though that there is certainly a poetic quality to the mandalas through which the Sukhavati and so on are described. However, remove the Buddhist context and these paradises very are very similar.

And of course there are some unappealingly sexist aspects to the Sukhavati teachings as well as such as:

"[A]fter any woman hears my name, rouses full faith and generates the mind to awaken, she will condemn the female body, and after exchanging those at that time, should she take a female body twice, I shall not attain anuttarasamyaksambodhi."

Of course, we can understand such attitudes to be symptomatic of the age. But if we take that approach, what else should we not just regard as cultural relics?

The doctrine of buddhakṣetras is of course deeply embedded in Mahāyāna Buddhist teachings from a very early period and pervades every Mahāyāna teaching including Dzogchen.

I personally think the motivation for developing such teachings comes as an early response to the doctrine that full buddhahood requires three incalculable eons to attain, i.e. imagining a place in which an ordinary person can find bliss and ease to practice dharma without having to be an 8th stage bodhisattva (required for rebirth in Akaniṣṭha Gaṇḍavyuha)

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, December 16th, 2013 at 9:01 AM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

Whether he actually said the things he is purported to have said or not, there are teachings you can actually practice and get the same results,

Malcolm wrote:

Have you met someone who has returned from Sukhavati and reported on it to you?

While there are certainly some results we can confirm in this triple realm, rebirth in realms outside the three realms is not something we can ascertain personally. So we either take them on faith, actively disbelieve, or remain agnostic regarding them.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, December 16th, 2013 at 8:02 AM

Title: Re: Common Anatta Question

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Upon what is this mere person imputed in absence of aggregates? If there is no basis of imputation, what is the difference between this mere person and horns on a rabbit?

Tsongkhapafan said:

The mere person is imputed on their mind and body which is mere appearance, one nature with emptiness. That explains why there are no aggregates in nirvana, there is just the appearance of them and the appearance of a person imputed on them.

Emptiness is appearing as these phenomena, although that's not someone's constant experience until they attain enlightenment - there is an appearance of inherently existent aggregates until the imprints of the delusions are removed and omniscience is achieved.

Malcolm wrote:

If there are no aggregates in nirvana, how can there be an appearance of aggregates? It seems you are suggesting that in fact that the appearance of aggregates in nirvana are like the appearance of horns on a rabbit. In other words, these aggregates, which you now agree do not exist in nirvana, appear there due to a false imputation. Is this correct? But if this is so, you also agree that Buddhas make this false imputation, and as Candrakirti observes, they would not then transcend samsara because whoever makes false imputations cannot be considered a Buddha.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, December 16th, 2013 at 6:15 AM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

In reality, Sukhavati is just a heaven -- no different than the heaven of Christians, Muslims, or Hindus.

PadmaVonSamba said:

In what way, exactly, is it "no different"?

.
. .
.

Malcolm wrote:

They are places where the faithful imagine they will go when they die.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, December 16th, 2013 at 6:07 AM

Title: Re: Common Anatta Question

Content:

dude said:

Do you believe in nirvana?

Malcolm wrote:

That rather depends on who is defining it, why and how.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Sunday, December 15th, 2013 at 9:16 PM
Title: Re: Common Anatta Question
Content:

Tsongkhapafan said:
Is there a person in Nirvana? What kind of person?

Malcolm wrote:
A mere person, otherwise nirvana is the extinction of existence and the extreme of nothingness.[/quote]

Upon what is this mere person imputed in absence of aggregates? If there is no basis of imputation, what is the difference between this mere person and horns on a rabbit?

Author: Malcolm
Date: Sunday, December 15th, 2013 at 9:59 AM
Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."
Content:

Malcolm wrote:
In reality, Sukhavati is just a heaven -- no different than the heaven of Christians, Muslims, or Hindus.

Nighthawk said:
How is that so? Can you practice the Dharma and manifest Buddhahood in those heavens?

Malcolm wrote:
Ummmmm.....I think the point is that I don't really believe in heavens, Buddhist or otherwise.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Sunday, December 15th, 2013 at 7:25 AM
Title: Re: Is the tulku system too exclusive?
Content:

Alfredo said:
Perhaps I am not really sold on the Buddhist teaching that samsaric activities are a waste of time...

Malcolm wrote:
In Mahāyāna skills in the sciences of all kinds are encouraged because they benefit beings. So I think a lot of Buddhists were not sold on this (early Buddhist) idea as well.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 15th, 2013 at 7:07 AM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Frankly, you are at the end of your argument. You can object to the aesthetics of meat eating, but you really do not have a moral basis to protest against it. At least animals slaughtered in a butcher house are not automatically left to rot where they are killed.

In the end, everything we eat comes from the abattoir of industrial food production. That is just how things are right now. Does it have to stay that way? No. Is it likely to stay that way? Yes.

M

gad rgyangs said:

your argument is the Johnny-not-so-Dangerously school of thought: "since one can't do everything, there's no point in doing anything", closely akin to the "kill 'em all and let Buddha sort 'em out" argument.

Malcolm wrote:

No, it is recognizing that you cannot fix samsara.

But I understand that city dwellers who do not actually participate in the act of food production other than as consumers have a very abstract view of the situation.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 15th, 2013 at 6:44 AM

Title: Re: Common Anatta Question

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

There are no aggregates in nirvana. How can it be a state of mind?

Tsongkhapafan said:

If there are no aggregates, there is no person...

Malcolm wrote:

Is there a person in Nirvana? What kind of person?

Aryadeva clearly states in 400 Verses:

[Since] there are no aggregates in nirvana,
a person cannot possibly be [in nirvana].

Candrakirti comments on this:

If there are aggregates in nirvana, there is also a person. At that time, because they exist [i.e. aggregates and persons], in contradiction with sūtra there will be a support that turns into nirvana, and samsara cannot be transcended.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 15th, 2013 at 6:10 AM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

this is actually a nice contribution to the debate: not only does eating meat contribute to the suffering and killing of animals, but it contributes to the accumulation of bad karma by other sentient beings by creating jobs in slaughterhouses, butchers etc.

Malcolm wrote:

So does eating plants by creating jobs for exterminators, hunters (used for pest control) and so on, who kill billions of insects and animals every year in order to make sure you get your tofu.

gad rgyangs said:

meat eaters not only create those jobs too, but the slaughterhouse and butcher jobs as well.

Malcolm wrote:

Frankly, you are at the end of your argument. You can object to the aesthetics of meat eating, but you really do not have a moral basis to protest against it. At least animals slaughtered in a butcher house are not automatically left to rot where they are killed.

In the end, everything we eat comes from the abattoir of industrial food production. That is just how things are right now. Does it have to stay that way? No. Is it likely to stay that way? Yes.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 15th, 2013 at 5:57 AM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

dharmagoat said:

Of course eating meat is bad, because it always involves killing... which is bad.

porpoise said:

Yes, and for most people eating meat is dependent on others doing the killing and working in slaughterhouses, which must be a soul-destroying job - which is also considered to be Wrong Livelihood.

gad rgyangs said:

this is actually a nice contribution to the debate: not only does eating meat contribute to the suffering and killing of animals, but it contributes to the accumulation of bad karma by other sentient beings by creating jobs in slaughterhouses, butchers etc.

Malcolm wrote:

So does eating plants by creating jobs for exterminators, hunters (used for pest control) and so on, who kill billions of insects and animals every year in order to make sure you get your tofu.

gad rgyangs said:

New research has found that the use of common pesticides in Europe and Australia has killed up to 42 percent of invertebrates, which make up about 95 percent of all animal species.

Malcolm wrote:

<http://www.earthweek.com/2013/ew130621/ew130621b.html>

Pest control in organic agriculture:

Here we use one kind of sentient being to kill another kind of sentient beings:

<http://www.gov.mb.ca/agriculture/crops/insects/fad64s00.html#Direct%20Treatment>

gad rgyangs said:

Pesticides are found as common contaminants in soil, air, water and on non-target organisms in our urban landscapes. Once there, they can harm plants and animals ranging from beneficial soil microorganisms and insects, non-target plants, fish, birds, and other wildlife. Chlorpyrifos, a common contaminant of urban streams (U.S. Geological Survey, 1999), is highly toxic to fish, and has caused fish kills in waterways near treated fields or buildings (US EPA, 2000). Herbicides can also be toxic to fish. According to the EPA, studies show that trifluralin, an active ingredient in the weed-killer Snapshot, "is highly to very highly toxic to both cold and warm water fish" (U.S. EPA, 1996). In a series of different tests it was also shown to cause vertebral deformities in fish (Koyama, 1996). The weed-killers Ronstar and Roundup are also acutely toxic to fish (Folmar et al., 1979; Shafiei and Costa, 1990). The toxicity of Roundup is likely due to the high toxicity of one of the inert ingredients of the product (Folmar et al., 1979). In addition to direct acute toxicity, some herbicides may produce sublethal effects on fish that lessen their chances for survival and threaten the population as a whole. Glyphosate or glyphosate-containing products can cause sublethal effects such as erratic swimming and labored breathing, which increase the fish's chance of being eaten (Liong et al., 1988). 2,4-D herbicides caused physiological stress responses in sockeye salmon (McBride et al., 1981) and reduced the food-gathering abilities of rainbow trout (Little, 1990).

Malcolm wrote:

<http://www.ncbi.nlm.nih.gov/pmc/articles/PMC2984095/>

In short, there is no kind of mass food production which does not involve the wholesale annihilation of billions of creatures, both invertebrate and vertebrate.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 15th, 2013 at 5:50 AM

Title: Re: Common Anatta Question

Content:

Tsongkhapa said:

but strictly speaking nirvana is the peace of mind that is experienced when all delusions have been removed. Only living beings can experience nirvana, inanimate objects cannot, because it is a state of mind.

Malcolm wrote:

There are no aggregates in nirvana. How can it be a state of mind?

dude said:

Good question, but it can't be oblivion either, or it wouldn't be peaceful abiding, eh?

Malcolm wrote:

Who stated nirvana was peaceful abiding? Nirvana is peace, meaning a state free from arising or ceasing.

The Mahāyāna analysis holds that as all phenomena never arose from the start, all phenomena have been in a state of nirvana from the start.

Nirvana cannot be oblivion, because "oblivion" means a state of annihilation [where it does not mean a state of unconsciousness].

Nirvana is cessation. Cessation is not annihilation, cessation is the absence of causes for further arising.

For this reason, in Mahāyana, reality is described as non-arisen and unceasing. What has not arisen cannot cease, hence nirvana.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 15th, 2013 at 5:47 AM

Title: Re: Western Myth of Zen

Content:

duckfiasco said:

Malcolm, what do you make then of the proliferation of Zen books that don't mention the Four Seals, sila, Refuge, or indeed anything other than "being in the present" and already being enlightened so there's nothing to do?

I wonder what enlightenment even means with such little context.
I add too that these books are often written for beginners or a lay audience for whom this may be the primary exposure to Buddhism.

If these are not indicative of Western or American Zen, then I'll be very relieved to be corrected.

Malcolm wrote:
You would have to give me some examples.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Sunday, December 15th, 2013 at 5:28 AM
Title: Re: Common Anatta Question
Content:
Tsongkhapa said:
but strictly speaking nirvana is the peace of mind that is experienced when all delusions have been removed. Only living beings can experience nirvana, inanimate objects cannot, because it is a state of mind.

Malcolm wrote:
There are no aggregates in nirvana. How can it be a state of mind?

Author: Malcolm
Date: Sunday, December 15th, 2013 at 12:07 AM
Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."
Content:

gad rgyangs said:
not only are all arguments about the nature of reality flawed, but so are all descriptions.
what the lady said.

Malcolm wrote:
It is not a description, it is intended as a proof that there can be a Real that is beyond all predicates.

Simply put, if one can think of a real beyond all predicates, there is a real beyond all predicates.

gad rgyangs said:
its not taken seriously anymore. and it certainly ain't no rigpa.

Malcolm wrote:
Its taken very seriously among philosophers, and like all arguments, is interesting if only as a literary phenomena.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 14th, 2013 at 11:53 PM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

not only are all arguments about the nature of reality flawed, but so are all descriptions.
what the lady said.

Malcolm wrote:

It is not a description, it is intended as a proof that there can be a Real that is beyond all predicates.

Simply put, if one can think of a real beyond all predicates, there is a real beyond all predicates.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 14th, 2013 at 11:48 PM

Title: Re: Western Myth of Zen

Content:

Astus said:

Buddhism is about meditation. It is not a religion, it only looks like one, but that is a mistake. That's why Buddhists in the West are called 'practitioners' because unless you meditate it is not even Buddhism.

ReasonAndRhyme said:

Hi Astus,

I'm not sure which part of your post is a quote and which part is you speaking, but concerning the above statement: this is not necessarily so. In Tibetan Buddhism it is a widespread view that you're a Buddhist when you accept the Four Seals. This is for instance how Dzongzar Jamyang Khyentse defines being a Buddhist in <http://www.shambhala.com/what-makes-you-not-a-buddhist.html>:

Anyone who accepts these four seals, even independently of Buddha's teachings, even never having heard the name Shakyamuni Buddha, can be considered to be on the same path as he

What sets Buddhism apart from the religions of the world? I believe it boils down to the four seals (...)

(I'm afraid I can't give any page numbers cause I'm reading the eBook.)

This is also how it was defined in a Gelug study course I participated in a while ago.

Malcolm wrote:

Sakya Pandita is more precise. To be considered a follower of Buddhadharma you must:

1. Accept the four seals*
2. Have gone for Refuge
3. Either be training in Buddhadharma through śīla, samadhi and prajñā or have realized the fruit of the three trainings.

According to his thinking, if one satisfies all three criteria listed above, only then can one be considered a follower of Buddhadharma. Personally, I agree with him.

M

*He makes an exception for pudgalavadins because while they do not accept the four seals, they nevertheless go for refuge and engage in the three trainings.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 14th, 2013 at 11:40 PM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

from Jetsunma Tenzin Palmo's FB page:

One time I saw this Russian Orthodox priest who was being interviewed, and he said the first thing they learn in the novitiate is that anything they say or think about God – it's not that. And we could say that exactly for the nature of our true existence. Whatever we think we are, we're not that. It's all just words, but the experience is beyond words.

Malcolm wrote:

The old ontological argument of St. Anselm:

Our understanding of God is a being than which no greater can be conceived.

The idea of God exists in the mind.

A being which exists both in the mind and in reality is greater than a being that exists only in the mind.

If God only exists in the mind, then we can conceive of a greater being—that which exists in reality.

We cannot be imagining something that is greater than God.

Therefore, God exists.

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Ontological_argument#Anselm

Recast:

Our understanding of the Real is a being than which no greater can be conceived.

The idea of the Real exists in the mind.

A being which exists both in the mind and in reality is greater than a being that exists only in the mind.

If the Real only exists in the mind, then we can conceive of a greater being—that which exists in reality.

We cannot be imagining something that is greater than the Real.

Therefore, the Real exists.

A flawed argument, from my POV, but there you go.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 14th, 2013 at 11:33 PM

Title: Re: Common Anatta Question

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

All Mahayana asserts that all phenomena have been in the state of nirvana from the start.

Sherab said:

I remembered something about Garab Dorje (I think) debating with scholars...

Malcolm wrote:

Manjushrimitra, in fact.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 14th, 2013 at 11:32 PM

Title: Re: Common Anatta Question

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

when delusions are removed, what remains is unobstructed awareness (nirvana).

Nirvana not something extra that is obtained, that one didn't have before.

It is what occurs when the defilements are permanently removed.

Malcolm wrote:

"Here there is nothing to remove,

there is nothing to add.

Look correctly at the real

if the real is seen, liberation."

Abhisamayālaṃkāra-nāma-prajñāpāramitopadeśaśāstrakārikā

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 14th, 2013 at 11:08 PM

Title: Re: Common Anatta Question

Content:

Tsongkhapa said:

All phenomena are not in the state of nirvana from the beginning.

Malcolm wrote:

From a sūtra you hold to be definitive:

Subhuti, further, the Tathāgata has shown that sensations, perceptions, formations and consciousness (which do not inherently exist)— non-arisen, unceasing, peaceful from the beginning — to be in parinirvana inherently; all of that which has been demonstrated is not the indirect meaning, is not the intentional meaning, but should be understood literally.

-- Ārya-pañcaśatikā-prajñāpāramitā

I can provide many other similar citations from the prajñāpāramitā sūtras.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 14th, 2013 at 10:35 PM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

What then, is the defining characteristic, from a buddhist understanding, or, since you mention other beings in other realms of samasara, of a human, of of beings in the human realm?

My understanding is that it is the suffering of change a constant sense of dissatisfaction, wanting things to change when they do not change, wanting things to stay the same when they start to change.

But it is also this very thing that gives humans the greatest opportunity for dharma understanding and practice.

.

Malcolm wrote:

All these features are lacking in Sukhavati: there is no dissatisfaction at all in Sukhavati, hence the name Sukhavativyuha, the field of bliss/happiness, etc.

Thus by your own analysis we cannot consider birth in Sukhavati a human birth place, not just because there is no womb birth in Sukhavati, according to its mythos, but because none of the feature you are defining as integral to human experience are present in that place. Hence the reason why birth in Sukhavati is a desiderata, according the Sukhavativyuha sūtras. One wishes to be born there precisely because all the obstacles we experience as human beings are lacking there. In reality, Sukhavati is just a heaven -- no different than the heaven of Christians, Muslims, or Hindus.

As I have mentioned elsewhere, there is good reason to suppose in fact that the blueprint for the concept of a Buddhist paradise arose in Central Asia (and not India) because of the Persian custom of building wall gardens, such as Cyrus the Great's walled garden at Pasargadae. The word "paradise" ultimately comes from the Avestan word "pairidaēza", which simply means walled garden where one can engage in peaceful pursuits.

And therefore, the reason I stated that human birth depends on being born from a human womb, which seemed obvious to me at the time, and still seems obvious. There are also no women in Sukhavati, and certainly our gendered experience is crucial to being human as well.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 14th, 2013 at 10:24 PM

Title: Re: Western Myth of Zen

Content:

Astus said:

Zen is therefore a style.

Malcolm wrote:

Indeed, largely, though not entirely, based on Sung dynasty Neo-confucian aesthetics as interpreted by the Japanese.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 14th, 2013 at 10:15 PM

Title: Re: Is the tulku system too exclusive?

Content:

Alfredo said:

but religions ought...not siphon off the resources...

Malcolm wrote:

But this is exactly what religions do. It is like asking a leopard to change its spots to expect otherwise.

Anyway, Buddhist institutions are bipolar in terms of whether Buddhism is a religion or not. One minute Buddhist authors like Thinley Norbu Rinpoche is siding with theistic religions because Buddhism ought properly be grounded in "faith"; the next minute HHDL is telling us that Buddhism is scientific, and empirical verification is the standard Buddhism ought to be striving for.

In the end, it seems to me (and for many years, incidentally) that Buddhism is reeling from the knocks it is taking from its encounter with modernity.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 14th, 2013 at 9:51 PM

Title: Re: Denying you're a Buddhist to outsiders

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

Is your point that as soon as one refers to Buddhism, that the 'ism' makes it a reference to one specific tradition or another, and that it is an inaccurate term because not all traditions agree on all the same doctrines, hence, there is no common ("generic") Buddhism?

Malcolm wrote:

I am making the point it is an inaccurate term for me for the reasons you state. That is why I prefer to call my "self" (a sensitive term around here, apparently) a follower of Buddhadharma, rather than a Buddhist of this or that type.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 14th, 2013 at 8:53 PM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

My point is that what describes human birth in Sukhavati is not a meat & bones body, but the still-conditioned arising, the projection of mind, of the experience of being human, hearing, seeing, and so forth, the same way as it is experienced here and now, because the causes for that result to occur have not been severed

.
.

Malcolm wrote:

Devas and asuras are also held to be anthropomorphic, but we do not term them human births.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 14th, 2013 at 8:49 PM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

The baby you were born as is dead

Malcolm wrote:

This is annihilationism. The opposite of the view you accused pensum of holding.

PadmaVonSamba said:

No, Annihilationism requires some sort of 'self' that is annihilated. The total destruction of a soul.

.

Malcolm wrote:

No, it is not that restrictive. It also means the belief that some entity (like a seed) which existed before, does not exist now. See Nagarjuna.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 14th, 2013 at 8:45 PM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

you are still clinging to a notion of an intrinsic 'self', as I suggested before.

Malcolm wrote:

You are confusing me with Pensum.

PadmaVonSamba said:

I was responding to the statement "Where ever there are humans, there is womb birth." Didn't you say that?

.

.

.

Malcolm wrote:

Sure, but it does not bear the consequence you impute.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 14th, 2013 at 11:10 AM

Title: Re: Common Anatta Question

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

That is one strand. There is also a strand of Mahayana that maintains that all perfections are perfected within prajnaparamita. This strand of Mahayana is more characteristic of the Lanka avatara sutra and other nongradual sutras.

smcj said:

Oh I understood that what you said was correct. I just thought that given your stature here you could have been a little more diligent and complete, that's all.

Malcolm wrote:

All Mahayana asserts that all phenomena have been in the state of nirvana from the start.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 14th, 2013 at 10:00 AM

Title: Re: Common Anatta Question

Content:

smcj said:

From my perspective, the difference between Mahāyāna view and the view of the Nikayas is that Nikāyas view nirvana as a result to be obtained. Mahāyāna understands that all phenomena have always been in the state of nirvana from the start.

As you know the Mahayana-Paramitayana thinks of realization as something to be attained by accumulating merit and awareness. I know it's not your favorite view, and you did start your post with "From my perspective...", but still that's not a totally fair or complete take on the Mahayana.

Sorry to nit-pick.

Malcolm wrote:

That is one strand. There is also a strand of Mahayana that maintains that all perfections are perfected within prajnaparamita. This strand of Mahayana is more characteristic of the Lanka avatara sutra and other nongradual sutras.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 14th, 2013 at 10:00 AM

Title: Re: Common Anatta Question

Content:

smcj said:

From my perspective, the difference between Mahāyāna view and the view of the Nikayas is that Nikāyas view nirvana as a result to be obtained. Mahāyāna understands that all phenomena have always been in the state of nirvana from the start.

As you know the Mahayana-Paramitayana thinks of realization as something to be attained by accumulating merit and awareness. I know it's not your favorite view, and you did start your post with "From my perspective...", but still that's not a totally fair or complete take on the Mahayana.

Sorry to nit-pick.

Malcolm wrote:

That is one strand. There is also a strand of Mahayana that maintains that all perfections are perfected within prajnaparamita. This strand of Mahayana is more characteristic of the Lanka avatara sutra and other nongradual sutras.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 14th, 2013 at 9:40 AM

Title: Re: Western Myth of Zen

Content:

duckfiasco said:

This is a major point where I think Western Zen has failed.

Malcolm wrote:

Do western Zen practitioners cultivate bodhicitta? Indeed, they do.

Do they need to believe in rebirth? No, they don't.

M

duckfiasco said:

I must've just had bad luck in the centers I went to and the books I read and the forums I visited being almost entirely devoid of talk of compassion, the paramitas, or other such things. DW has been a much appreciated exception.

Instead, it's all Buddha-nature and Dogen, and only a very small slice of his writings about zazen, as Astus noted.

I'll avoid turning this into yet another thread on rebirth. We'll just have to disagree about the importance of rebirth.

I will say that I think it's symptomatic of a larger tendency to reject the parts of Buddhism and Zen that are unpalatable to Western culture or views.

Malcolm wrote:

I did not say that rebirth was not important.

I just said they do not need to believe it.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 14th, 2013 at 9:20 AM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

Are you your body?

.

Malcolm wrote:

The Buddha suggests in the Majjhima Nikaya that if, between the body and the mind, we were to choose one to regard as our self, he suggested it was better to choose the body since it at least lasted some 80 odd years, while the mind only lasts but an instant.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 14th, 2013 at 9:18 AM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

you are still clinging to a notion of an intrinsic 'self' , as I suggested before.

.

Malcolm wrote:

You are confusing me with Pensum.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 14th, 2013 at 9:15 AM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

[

The baby you were born as is dead.

.

Malcolm wrote:

This is annihilationism. The opposite of the view you accused pensum of holding.

Although the aggregates are serially connected,
the wise are to comprehend that nothing transfers

As I said on the other thread.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 14th, 2013 at 9:14 AM

Title: Re: Common Anatta Question

Content:

dude said:

There is no self or person that undergoes rebirth in Mahāyāna. In this respect Mahāyāna view is no different than the view expressed in the Pali Canon.

Agreed, but the PC sutras do not go beyond phenomenology, while the final Mahayana teachings explain True Cause and the true aspect in full.

Malcolm wrote:

From my perspective, the difference between Mahāyāna view and the view of the Nikayas is that Nikāyas view nirvana as a result to be obtained. Mahāyāna understands that all phenomena have always been in the state of nirvana from the start.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 14th, 2013 at 9:11 AM

Title: Re: Western Myth of Zen

Content:

duckfiasco said:

This is a major point where I think Western Zen has failed.

Malcolm wrote:

Do western Zen practitioners cultivate bodhicitta? Indeed, they do.

Do they need to believe in rebirth? No, they don't.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 14th, 2013 at 8:59 AM

Title: Re: Common Anatta Question

Content:

smcj said:

Do you then accept the Pali Canon as the last word and reject the Mahayana sutras as heresy?

A lot of people do. That's 100% ok.

dude said:

People are free to believe what they will, but the reason I asked is that duckfiasco's reply is based on the Pali Canon sutras, while the Mahayana view is drastically different.

Malcolm wrote:

Huh?

There is no self or person that undergoes rebirth in Mahāyāna. In this respect Mahāyāna view is no different than the view expressed in the Pali Canon.

Although the aggregates are serially connected,
the wise are to comprehend that nothing transfers

Nāgārjuna

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 14th, 2013 at 7:40 AM

Title: Re: Is the tulku system too exclusive?

Content:

Alfredo said:

the Maitreya Project (now thankfully cancelled) could have happened.

Malcolm wrote:
Not cancelled.

"The laying of the foundation stone for a very large Maitreya Buddha statue in Kushinagar, Uttar Pradesh, India, will take place during a ceremony on Friday, December 13, 2013..."

<http://mandala.fpmt.org/2013/maitreya-project-kushinagar-takes-important-step-forward/>

See also:

<http://www.maitreyaproject.org/en/index.html>

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 14th, 2013 at 7:25 AM

Title: Re: Chimed Sogthig Instructions

Content:

vangelis said:

Can you recommend me a teacher in these places,for this practice.

Malcolm wrote:

Shenphen Dawa Rinpoche in NYC, Khenpo Sonam in LA, etc., Vajrayana Foundation etc.

Just search Yeshe Nyingpo/ Dudjom Tersar,

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 14th, 2013 at 7:11 AM

Title: Re: Chimed Sogthig Instructions

Content:

vangelis said:

Can anyone tell me where i can meet a Lama or Rinpoche who can give instructions about Dudjom Rinpoche`s Chimed Sogthig long sadhana ?

Malcolm wrote:

NYC, LA, San Fran, Oregon, etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 14th, 2013 at 7:08 AM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

...Is it because being human only happens in the human realm?

Malcolm wrote:

It is axiomatic that human birth can only happen to humans. Where ever there are humans, there is womb birth. That is not the case in our idealized paradises like Sukhavat (but unlike Abhirati) where there are no wombs at all, not even women in fact. I never met human being that did not derive in some way from a human womb (even test tube babies), have you?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 14th, 2013 at 7:06 AM

Title: Re: Western Myth of Zen

Content:

duckfiasco said:

The kind of meditation that results from this, in my opinion, becomes a way to sit in a seemingly equanimous fog as defilements play out unabated, remaining just as fierce off the cushion.

And since defilements are no issue and all we need is to "just sit" or "just eat" we can meditate for 5 minutes a day and feel real good is being done.

Malcolm wrote:

What the Chan/Zen schools have understood, like the Dzogchen and Mahāmudra traditions which followed them, is that buddhahood is not a result accomplished through effort, that afflictions are not something concrete that can be cleansed the same way we wash our clothes (in fact there is nothing to remove), and the cultivation of conditioned states of samadhi/dhyāna lead nowhere than to more conceptuality.

Since Western Zen practitioners are not harming you, why be so up in arms about it?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 14th, 2013 at 4:06 AM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

pensum said:

And yet they then turn around and claim that those who don't succeed in this life can take rebirth in a buddha realm where the circumstances are ideal and realization assured. I've never questioned it before, but i would be hard-pressed to see how such a rebirth could be considered "human". So even on that fundamental point there would seem to be some discrepancy and contradiction.

PadmaVonSamba said:

The problem is that you are still clinging to a notion of an intrinsic 'self' that takes rebirth.

.
.
.

Malcolm wrote:

Pensum? No, I don't think so at all.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 14th, 2013 at 3:03 AM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

...it's a question of testability.

bob said:

Yes, and that implies having the right instruments for measurement. However, the limitations of the human vehicle preclude access to some of the higher levels of the spectrum...

Malcolm wrote:

Then such things are cognitively closed to us and not worthy of further speculation, don't you agree?

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 14th, 2013 at 2:51 AM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Do you think this battle ended with all the lives of Ajasatru's soldiers being spared? They fought a battle. People surely died on both sides.

I can't speak for others, but there are plenty of Buddhist sutras where acts of killing are defended as virtuous, for example, the sea captain story and so on.

I am merely pointing out that the issue is not so simple as "killing is bad".

seeker242 said:

"Killing is never skillful. Stealing, lying, and everything else in the first list are never skillful. When asked if there was anything whose killing he approved of, the Buddha answered that there was only one thing: anger. In no recorded instance did he approve of killing any living being at all. When one of his monks went to an executioner and told the man to kill his victims compassionately, with one blow, rather than torturing them, the Buddha expelled the monk from the Sangha, on the grounds that even the recommendation to kill compassionately is still a recommendation to kill — something he would never condone. If a monk was physically attacked, the Buddha allowed him to strike back in self-defense, but never with the intention to kill."

<http://www.accesstoinight.org/lib/authors/thanissaro/gettingmessage.html>

Thanissaro Bhikkhu must just be wrong then? Although, I find that hard to believe. More like impossible to believe!

Malcolm wrote:

Context is everything. Soldiers are not monks. Laypeople are not monks. Monks, it is true, are not allowed to encourage killing.

Killing is less than ideal. But there are always circumstances when it cannot be avoided.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 14th, 2013 at 2:19 AM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

bob said:

rambling on about which religion or "scientific" point of view is best.

Malcolm wrote:

It is not question of "best", it's a question of testability. There are tons of things that may be true, which are nevertheless untestable.

Pramaṇa, a term which is generally glossed as "authority", is derived from two Sanskrit roots "pra" and māṇa, and really means "best measurement".

That is all Science can tell us i.e., their best measurements. There is nothing definitive about science, per se. But everyone wants reliable scales.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 14th, 2013 at 1:31 AM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

smcj said:

Power, all power, is always laced with the threat of violence, the ability to transgress boundaries, whether physical, social, or moral.

Power="the ability to do". A surgeon has the ability, or power, to heal, etc.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, but a surgeon can also kill. When you study poisons in order to cure poison, you learn how to poison as well.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 14th, 2013 at 1:26 AM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

One thing that people seem to be unaware of, because perhaps they are not very clear about the history of Buddhist ideas, is that the so called "siddha" movement largely rose in response to increasing hostility towards Buddhists...

dzogchungpa said:

I understand what you say, and I agree with it. However I think you are using a more restrictive sense of "siddha/siddhi" here than what I, and probably others posting on this thread, have in mind.

Malcolm wrote:

Power, all power, is always laced with the threat of violence, the ability to transgress boundaries, whether physical, social, or moral.

We see these themes again and again the stories of Buddhist siddhas:

Physical boundaries: master over the four elements, etc.

Social boundaries: Kings reduced to beggars like Luipa, brahmins using low caste consorts like Saraha, etc.

Moral boundaries: the five meats, the five nectars, ritual acts of violence like the famous lower activities rites of Vajrakīlaya, etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 14th, 2013 at 12:46 AM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

JKhedrup said:

The legendary battles between buddhist and non-buddhist siddhas always come down to "The fastest siddha in the East". And of course, we only record our victories, not our defeats. For a record of our defeats, we must examine Hindu sources.

Agreed, can you suggest some?

Malcolm wrote:

Take a look at the "The Hardship and Downfall of Buddhism in India" showing that Indian Buddhism was destroyed by Hindus. This book convincingly puts to rest the idea that Buddhism was not destroyed by Hindus but rather by Muslims. It shows, convincingly in my mind, that the long standing and deeply entrenched Brahmanical hostility to Buddhism was in large part responsible for the downfall of Buddhism in India, as recorded in myths and accounts in Hindu texts and archaeology.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 14th, 2013 at 12:14 AM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

seeker242 said:

What did he say of the individual soldiers who went onto the battlefield and engaged in killing the enemy?

Malcolm wrote:

If they belong to such a virtuous country, they are not at fault, because the violence is forced upon them. Run a search on Pasenadi at access to insight.

seeker242 said:

"Staying at Savatthi. Then King Ajatasattu of Magadha, the son of Queen Videha, raising a fourfold army, marched toward Kasi against King Pasenadi Kosala. King Pasenadi heard, "King Ajatasattu of Magadha, the son of Queen Videha, they say, has raised a fourfold army and is marching toward Kasi against me." So King Pasenadi, raising a fourfold army, launched a counter-attack toward Kasi against King Ajatasattu. Then King Ajatasattu & King Pasenadi fought a battle, and in that battle King Pasenadi defeated King Ajatasattu and captured him alive.

The thought then occurred to King Pasenadi: "Even though King Ajatasattu has wronged me when I have done him no wrong, still he is my nephew. What if I, having confiscated all his elephant troops, all his cavalry, all his chariots, & all his infantry, were to let him go with just his life?" So King Pasenadi — having confiscated all his elephant troops, cavalry, chariots, & infantry — let King Ajatasattu go with just his life."

And if he had taken his life and not let him go? What then? And what does all this have to do with what goes on at a slaughterhouse?

Honestly, I just can't believe you have people on a Buddhist forum actually defending the act of killing...No wonder it's called the dharma ending age...

Malcolm wrote:

Do you think this battle ended with all the lives of Ajasatru's soldiers being spared? They fought a battle. People surely died on both sides.

I can't speak for others, but there are plenty of Buddhist sutras where acts of killing are defended as virtuous, for example, the sea captain story and so on.

I am merely pointing out that the issue is not so simple as "killing is bad".

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 13th, 2013 at 11:47 PM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Meru is not presented as a visionary model in any Buddhist text It is presented by Vasubandhu as empirical fact. Since that cosmology does not conform to what is universally accessible empirical knowledge, it is relic of another time and another culture that no longer can be entertained as true.

dzogchungpa said:

You seem to accept rebirth. Is that based on universally accessible empirical knowledge?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes.

No. It's an inferential conclusion about a phenomena of which I have no direct knowledge (I have no recollection of past lives, and couldn't prove it to you even if I did). But I do have a mind, the last I checked (some may disagree of course), and as a matter of inference, is seemed unlikely to me (when I examined the question) that ultimately my stream of consciousness could have emerged from my brain alone (which is a necessary condition for sense cognitions, but in my opinion cannot account for knowing).

M

Should be..."my stream of consciousness could not have emerged..."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 13th, 2013 at 11:30 PM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

seeker242 said:

What did he say of the individual soldiers who went onto the battlefield and engaged in killing the enemy?

Malcolm wrote:

If they belong to such a virtuous country, they are not at fault, because the violence is forced upon them. Run a search on Pasenadi at access to insight.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 13th, 2013 at 11:18 PM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

Jigme Tsultrim said:

No Seeker, you're in error. "Killing is bad" is not a pan-Buddhist doctrine.

seeker242 said:

Sorry friend, but it is. What deluded Japanese soldiers did or did not do, is irrelevant to what the Buddha himself taught.

Malcolm wrote:

The Buddha himself taught that a virtuous country had the right to defend itself with violent force if need be.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 13th, 2013 at 11:04 PM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

seeker242 said:

"Monks, a lay follower should not engage in five types of business. Which five? Business in weapons, business in human beings, business in meat, business in intoxicants, and business in poison."

Why does he not mention vegetable farming? Hmm, I wonder!...

Malcolm wrote:

Buddhist monks are forbidden to dig in the ground because of the harm they will cause to small animals, thus they cannot farm, for a monk this is wrong livelihood. Likewise, monks are forbidden to travel in the rains season primarily because of all the small creatures they will kill.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 13th, 2013 at 10:48 PM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

One thing that people seem to be unaware of, because perhaps they are not very clear about the history of Buddhist ideas, is that the so called "siddha" movement largely rose in response to increasing hostility towards Buddhists. In fact, it seems it seems that the tales of magical violence match pretty well with the increasing unviability of Buddhism in India. Think on this.

The legends of siddhas in India virtually all have the context of trying to amaze or defeat non-Buddhist opponents. The legendary battles between buddhist and non-buddhist siddhas always come down to "The fastest siddha in the East". And of course, we only record our victories, not our defeats. For a record of our defeats, we must examine Hindu sources.

If we take the example of Virupa -- in the legends of siddhis he displayed for Buddhists, they are generally kind, like crossing a reflecting pond by walking on the lotus leaves. However, when confronting Hindus they are always wrathful, like causing a linga to split in two by prostrating to it, and so on. Eventually, because Virupa was such a badass, Avalokiteśvara intervened, according to the main account of his career, and asked him to stop displaying siddhis because he was freaking people out too much.

Tibetans were fascinated by such stories. When we look to the accounts of Vajrayāna in Sino-japanese Buddhism, we do not see anything like the narrative of conflict and subjugation that we see when Vajrayāna was imported to Tibet.

While the Buddha himself is said to have criticized displays of ṛddhipati as a means to engender faith, as Buddhism lost ground against hostile Shaivaites and Bhagavatis (followers of Vishnu), there is marked increase in such tales. Unfortunately for Indian Buddhists, there simply were not enough Buddhist siddhas to stave off the eventual destruction of Buddhism in India by hostile Hindus and Muslims -- not to mention Central Asia. In reality, if we examine the Buddhist siddha movement as a defensive strategy in order to preserve the faith, it failed. By the the 12th century, even Bodhgaya had been overrun by nonbuddhists. So it seems that the Buddhist siddha movement in the end completely failed at preserving the Dharma in India.

So what does this have to do with Buddhist "inner science"? Of what possible use are siddhis in taming the mind? Of what possible use are siddhis other than as a frightening display of power imbued with the threat of violence?

If you read the accounts of Buddhist siddhas, they are filled with magical violence of the most extreme kind (Tilopa killing small creatures by the side of a river; Gesar slaying hundreds of thousands of Horpas). What is admirable about stopping the sun so that crops in the field burn and animals begin to die of dehydration (Virupa)? What is admirable about the ability to incinerate your opponent with a wrathful glare (Dharmakirti)? Why do we admire this?

Honestly, I think that people should really evaluate what it is that they find so admirable about the ritual violence (that we term "siddhis") that so many Vajrayāna legends are imbued with. People really should evaluate the fact that many of the primary legends of siddhas concern their skill at destructive magical violence as evidence of their qualities of realization.

This reflection should also cause people to reconsider what is meant by Buddhist "inner science". Perhaps we should form a hypothesis (like any good scientist) and subject that hypothesis to testing.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 13th, 2013 at 9:48 PM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Meru is not presented as a visionary model in any Buddhist text It is presented by Vasubandhu as empirical fact. Since that cosmology does not conform to what is universally accessible empirical knowledge, it is relic of another time and another culture that no longer can be entertained as true.

dzogchungpa said:

You seem to accept rebirth. Is that based on universally accessible empirical knowledge?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes.

No. It's an inferential conclusion about a phenomena of which I have no direct knowledge (I have no recollection of past lives, and couldn't prove it to you even if I did). But I do have a mind, the last I checked (some may disagree of course), and as a matter of inference, is seemed unlikely to me (when I examined the question) that ultimately my stream of consciousness could have emerged from my brain alone (which is a necessary condition for sense cognitions, but in my opinion cannot account for knowing).

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 13th, 2013 at 9:15 AM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Things like Meru, which might even have been reasonable inferences once upon a time have stopped being so once Tibetan buddhism joined the world community in 1959.

Karma Dorje said:

Visionary experience != universally accessible empirical knowledge. Collapsing the two is nonsensical.

Malcolm wrote:

Meru is not presented as a visionary model in any Buddhist text It is presented by Vasubandhu as empirical fact. Since that cosmology does not conform to what is universally accessible empirical knowledge, it is relic of another time and another culture that no longer can be entertained as true.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 13th, 2013 at 9:08 AM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Otherwise all this crap about meru, siddhis, magic powers and so on is just useless prapanca people are entertaining themselves with Because they have nothing better to put their minds to.

dzogchungpa said:

Tell us what you really think, Malcolm.

Malcolm wrote:

Truthfully, even discussing it is useless prapanca.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 13th, 2013 at 8:54 AM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Quite frankly, if Buddhists continue to entertain such naive beliefs, no one will take Buddhism seriously. Basically folks, this is Buddhism's Galileo moment.

Karma Dorje said:

Nobody of your ilk perhaps, but plenty of us mere humans. Yet again you are coming off as if you believe your viewpoint is the only sensible, mature one and everyone else is simply wrong. Frankly, I find you a lot more dogmatic about your opinions than these so-called fundamentalists you are railing against. I'll stick with what I have been taught by a realized master over the opinions of a scholar, no matter how eloquently stated or forcefully argued.

Malcolm wrote:

Its not dogma. When you can show me a cosmic mountain in the middle of space somewhere, or even a human being who can fly unaided through the mere power of their will, then there is something discuss. Otherwise all this crap about meru, siddhis, magic powers and so on is just useless prapanca people are entertaining themselves with Because they have nothing better to put their minds to.

Things like Meru, which might even have been reasonable inferences once upon a time have stopped being so once Tibetan buddhism joined the world community in 1959.

Secondly, a person may be realized about the nature of their minds, utterly free of affliction, and may still be completely mistaken about all kinds of things. Realization does not equal omniscience.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 13th, 2013 at 8:35 AM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

As I said, they are fun stories, but in the end the real siddhis are the human qualities of compassion, love and awakening: in other words, the things that make us more human, not superhuman. Apart from the supreme siddhi, the other siddhis are just parlor tricks, even if they are true.

M

Karma Dorje said:

A couple or three millennia ago, the flat earth was regarded as a fact. A few hundred years ago, the heavens were thought to be geocentric rather than heliocentric. Those things that we view as self-evident today may be considered quaint 400 years from now and unrecognizable 2000 years from now.

So why be emphatic about what is possible and close off what is not based on one's own current world view? I would rather keep a sense of wonder and possibility than try to be some sort of hard-boiled denizen of modernity puffed up with the conceit of purported progress. I would rather regard life as a riot of paradoxes and fables than as a scorched earth of foolish consistency.

Malcolm wrote:

I am quite sure in 2000 years humans, if we still exist, will still discover the earth revolves around the sun, and not other way around.

For instance, a common fact that no one in any culture has ever rejected is that there is a sun and a moon. One sun, one moon. Not two, not three. Why do you think that is? Everyone understands that there are two human, biologically determined genders, not three, not four.

There are certain basic facts of our existence which are constant. Those facts are explained better today than they were 2000 years ago. Why fight it with fantasies about continents that only siddhas can fly to and so on? To insist there is a shred of truth in abhidharma meru cosmology, for example, is extremely immature. It is exactly at the same level of thinking as biblical creationism.

Quite frankly, if Buddhists continue to entertain such naive beliefs, no one will take Buddhism seriously. Basically folks, this is Buddhism's Galileo moment.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 13th, 2013 at 4:09 AM

Title: Re: Denying you're a Buddhist to outsiders

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

The fact that a school referred to as Pudgalavadins existed and asserted some type of existent 'self', even though that is inconsistent with the doctrine of anatta, regardless of what brought on their demise, it has absolutely nothing to do with this discussion.

.

Malcolm wrote:

It has everything to do with this discussion.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 13th, 2013 at 3:39 AM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

Karma Dorje said:

I am quite happy with the traditional accounts of siddhis, siddhas, etc.

Malcolm wrote:

O, I am happy with them too, they are fun to read.

Do I think they ever happened...miracles of loaves and fishes anyone? Raising Lazarus from the dead? Flying to Jerusalem on an ass? Crouching Tiger, Hidden Dragon...?

Quite frankly, I have never seen any human being swim through the earth, fly through mountains, fly in the air (except in a plane, etc.), stand in the middle of bonfire unharmed, walk through a wall, stick a kila in a rock, leave a footprint in a stone (and I have seen highly respected Tibetan Lamas laugh at the supposed photographed "miracles" of other lamas who claim to have done so (no not saying who)) and so on.

As I said, they are fun stories, but in the end the real siddhis are the human qualities of compassion, love and awakening: in other words, the things that make us more human, not superhuman. Apart from the supreme siddhi, the other siddhis are just parlor tricks, even if they are true.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 13th, 2013 at 2:24 AM

Title: Re: Good stretches for prostration.

Content:

smcj said:

Incidentally, prostrations as a "practice" are Tibetan innovation. This is not a bad thing, but it does need to be recognized as such.

Nylon strings on a classical guitar are an American invention. Nobody wants to go back to cat-gut strings. Sometimes innovation is improvement. But if you tried to put metal strings on a classical guitar you'd collapse the instrument. You've got to know what you're doing. Best to trust the experts.

Malcolm wrote:

My basic point of course, is that I have seen numerous people injure themselves severely with prostrations (knees, backs, necks, wrists). As a Doctor, my motivation is to prevent further injuries so people can practice well and long. The Nalanda style of prostrations (so called half prostrations) is better than that Vikramashila style (so called full prostrations). It is easier on the back, knees and neck.

Sun salutations is better than either in my opinion, because it works all the major joints and channels with little risk of injury done slowly and with care.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 13th, 2013 at 2:18 AM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

heart said:

So you feel siddhas exist but not the siddhis, since they are all defying the laws of science and common sense?

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

I think we can all agree that the only important siddhi is the supreme siddhi, i.e., awakening.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 13th, 2013 at 12:02 AM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

Tsongkhapafan said:

...watering Buddhism down with science and New Age philosophies.

Malcolm wrote:

BTW, I do neither. Buddhism is Buddhism, science is science. One is a religion, the other is an iterative method for advancing our knowledge of the physical universe. Sometimes their paths intersect, but mostly they do not.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 12th, 2013 at 11:59 PM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

Tsongkhapafan said:

So trying to practise what the Buddha taught is now fundamentalism?

Malcolm wrote:

Not at all.

Insisting that one must accept as literally true any traditional narratives about the origin of various Buddhist texts (for example, the idea that Nāgārjuna recovers the Prajñāpāramita from the Nāgā realm "under the ocean") is fundamentalism. Insisting that one must accept that Buddha taught Mahāyāna surrounded by millions of bodhisattvas on Rajagriha or that he taught Vajrayāna literally and personally, either inside a stupa in south India, or in some imaginary devaloka is fundamentalism.

My point is that the teachings in these texts must be able to stand on their own and be able to withstand scrutiny on the basis of the ideas presented in those texts on their own without any reference to or dependence upon some imagined authority. In the end, authority is only as strong as the weakest link in the chain. Thus Ganden Chopel said in regards to the question of authority:

"It is a tiger who testifies on behalf of the lion. It is a yak who testifies on behalf of the tiger. It is a dog who testifies on behalf of the yak. It is a mouse who testifies on behalf of the dog. It is a flea who testifies on behalf of the mouse. Therefore, a flea is the ultimate witness on behalf of all."

Not only that, but the various claims put forth by various factions about what the Buddha taught and where wildly contradict one another, especially when we come to Vajrayāna texts, where, according to late 10th century Indian accounts we have the Buddha flying with his monks to Oḍḍiyāna and granting the Guhyasamaja empowerment to King Indrabhuti, who then, with his kingdom all vanish after achieving enlightenment, only to be replaced by a lake full of nāgās out of which one transforms into a human woman many centuries later, who then travels to South India and imparts the teachings to a South Indian King. (The Nyingma version of the origin of Vajrayāna is completely at odds with this account, involving magical texts that fall from the sky, and so on). I mean these are marvelous stories, but are no more believable than the story of Mahāsiddha Virupa arresting the progress of the sun in the sky while on a drinking binge with his disciple in order to delay the arrival of his bartab.

Therefore, with regard to Buddhist texts, it is my opinion that the best way to approach them, the approach that makes the most sense to me as someone who lives in these texts everyday is to see these texts as products of gradual development and emendation over time. We have many instances of this in the long history of sutra translation into Chinese. I prefer this approach, rather than believing that these texts are a divine revelation imparted completely within the eighty year lifespan of the undoubtedly remarkable human being, Gautama Siddhārtha.

As I see it, Buddhist sutras and tantras are a remarkable record of human beings, some awakened, others not, working out what awakening means. I see it as documentary evidence of a very human process of self-discovery and self-fulfillment.

But I do not think we need to take the legendary and mythological accounts of Buddha's life, or teachings attributed to him as literal, historical fact. We do not even need to take the cosmological myths presented in the Pali canon as fact. Nor do we need to accept the legends Buddha is portrayed as telling about his past lives as fact. In the same I do not believe for an instant that Padmasambhava was, as it is claimed in numerous biographies, born in the center of a lotus blossom somewhere in modern day Pakistan, or that he was three thousand years old and so on. Nevertheless, I happily recite the seven line prayer, understanding that is meaningful symbolically, as myth, etc. But I certainly do not take it to be a literal portrayal of the facts of the life of a person we call Padmasambhava.

We can, if we so choose, accept these myths and legends as literally true, but to insist to others that they must accept these as literal facts is fundamentalism.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 12th, 2013 at 10:50 PM

Title: Re: Obstacles to Bodhicitta

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

You must merely observe reality, see that there is suffering and decide that you want to be as awakened as possible so you are finally useful to someone other than yourself. The rest will take care of itself.

Konchog1 said:

Exactly there. Some days I feel some compassion and some days I do not. But if I follow the Lam Rim procedure of recognizing beings as mothers, remembering kindnesses etc. and generate love, then generate compassion on the basis of that love, I feel stronger compassion than I usually feel. But only for a couple seconds and it isn't progressing stronger.

Malcolm wrote:

We all have good days and bad days.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 12th, 2013 at 8:50 PM

Title: Re: Does Dzogchen have Persian or Zoroastrian influences?

Content:

Aemilius said:

The name George thus means Guru of Orgyen. The myth or history of Saint George subduing, or slaughtering, the Dragon derives from the legend of Padmasambhava, who is the Guru of Orgyen, i.e. Saint George.

The name George has many variants in european languages, like italian Giorgio, german Jörg & Jürgen, hungarian György, swedish Jörgen, etc...

Malcolm wrote:

This is incredibly silly.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 12th, 2013 at 12:48 PM

Title: Re: Good stretches for prostration.

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

There are no rules, my friend., apart from those we choose to follow.

smcj said:

In my work I sometimes have to go to 3 or 4 different places a week, places I've never been to. They give me directions and a map on how to get there. Nobody forces me to follow their directions, but if I choose not to follow them I can't blame the guy that made the map if I get lost or if I am late. If I take a shortcut I do so at my own peril.

Malcolm wrote:

Maps do not specify if you are to arrive by walking, train, car, bike, bus, helicopter or motorbike.

Incidentally, prostrations as a "practice" are Tibetan innovation. This is not a bad thing, but it does need to be recognized as such.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 12th, 2013 at 12:16 PM

Title: Re: Denying you're a Buddhist to outsiders

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

Apparently the Pudgalavadins' argument didn't hold up either.

.

Malcolm wrote:

The fact that Pudgalavadins asserted a self is sufficient to demolish your claim that all buddhist schools adhered to the three or four seals, and thus renders your claim that theses are universal tenets in buddhism invalid.

Sorry, this is just a fact. You would do well to study a bit more Buddhist history . The fact that this school was long lived is born out by the fact that they were subject to polemical refutations from the time of Asoka until buddhism perished in India. That their schools did not survive owes everything to the destruction buddhism in India and nothing to successful refutation of their positions by opposing buddhist schools. This is simply a fact.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 12th, 2013 at 11:51 AM

Title: Re: Good stretches for prostration.

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

No, things like this are decided by oneself. If one chooses to follow someone else's idea, still it is one's own choice. Nothing trumps personal authority.

smcj said:

Since this is actual practice we are talking about, where do you draw the line? Can you make up your own mantra? Create a new deity or sadhana?

Malcolm wrote:

There are no rules, my friend., apart from those we choose to follow.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 12th, 2013 at 11:33 AM

Title: Re: Good stretches for prostration.

Content:

tomamundsen said:

Things like this are decided by the practitioner's guru.

Malcolm wrote:

No, things like this are decided by oneself. If one chooses to follow someone else's idea, still it is one's own choice. Nothing trumps personal authority.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 12th, 2013 at 10:33 AM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

Karma Dorje said:

Witness the growth of Islam and fundamentalist Christianity in recent years.

Malcolm wrote:

Which is exactly a result of the crisis of Modernity. Buddhists are just a little late on the scene, hence the phenomena of fledgling Buddhist fundamentalism that we see growing in groups like NKT and so on, and the attitudes of certain fundamentalist Nyingmapas etc.

Karma Dorje said:

What it makes clear is that our own personal understanding is not necessarily tied to, and might actually be counter to, what is good for the institutional survival of Buddhism. The fundamentalism may serve an important purpose in propagating the institutional forms, even though I don't intend to have them over for a beer and a BBQ any time soon.

Malcolm wrote:

If this is the case, the institutional form isn't worth saving. Fundamentalism is basically religious cancer.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 12th, 2013 at 10:17 AM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

Karma Dorje said:

Witness the growth of Islam and fundamentalist Christianity in recent years.

Malcolm wrote:

Which is exactly a result of the crisis of Modernity. Buddhists are just a little late on the scene, hence the phenomena of fledgling Buddhist fundamentalism that we see growing in groups like NKT and so on, and the attitudes of certain fundamentalist Nyingmapas etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 12th, 2013 at 10:15 AM

Title: Re: Denying you're a Buddhist to outsiders

Content:

Karma Dorje said:

Personally, when asked I just say I am a Hindu which is true....

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 12th, 2013 at 9:55 AM

Title: Re: Denying you're a Buddhist to outsiders

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

In order to demonstrate that these three or four are not universal amongst so called "Buddhists".

PadmaVonSamba said:

But you just established that they are:

anicca=impermanence

dukkha=suffering anatta=no self

Malcolm wrote:

You are apparently not listening very well. I never stated once that these were shared amongst all Buddhist schools.

In fact, Pudgalavadins, a Buddhist school, assert that there is indeed a real self that experiences rebirth. They were once the most populous school in all India. They do not accept the third "seal" above.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 12th, 2013 at 9:48 AM

Title: Re: Obstacles to Bodhicitta

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

My understanding is that bodhicitta is selfless compassion.

Malcolm wrote:

Bodhicitta is specifically the arousal [utpada] of the intent or mind [citta] to attain awakening [bodhi]. That has three forms: the intent to awaken as an arhat, as a pratyekabuddha, or as a Samyaksambuddha.

The wish to awaken as a Samyak Sambuddha is special bodhicitta, the kind cultivated by bodhisattvas.

Compassion is its condition. However, as Dharmakirti notes, love and compassion do not have the ability to cause one to achieve full awakening, i.e. the awakening of a Samyaksambuddha. One needs something more, and that something is Mahāyāna bodhicitta.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 12th, 2013 at 9:43 AM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

In short, Buddhism's "grace" period or probationary period in the West is over and done with. In order for Buddhism to hold its own in the free market of ideas, it must be able to do so without any recourse to traditional authority. If it fails at this, it will fail the test of modernity and as human civilization continues to advance and develop, Buddhism will become yet another footnote to history.

Karma Dorje said:

Has fundamentalist Islam or Christianity met this test?

They don't seem to have a problem growing, regardless of "philosophical moribundity".

Malcolm wrote:

Death throes of a dying beast.

Karma Dorje said:

I am not so convinced of it's relevancy for the bulk of the 7 billion.

Malcolm wrote:

Only time will tell.

Karma Dorje said:

The problem Buddhism faces here is not that it relies too much on traditional Indian and Tibetan epistemological premises.

Malcolm wrote:

So you don't agree that Buddhism is facing a crisis of modernity? Sure seems like it to me.

Karma Dorje said:

It is that people here are conditioned at an emotional and instinctual level to identify with the Abrahamic narratives.

Malcolm wrote:

The Abrahamic narrative thing is overstated, IMO. It is, to use a term borrowed from Witzel, just another form of the Laurasian Ur-myth that all European, Asian and American cosmological narratives share.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 12th, 2013 at 9:35 AM

Title: Re: Denying you're a Buddhist to outsiders

Content:

Unknown said:

...in order to do what?

Malcolm wrote:

In order to demonstrate that these three or four are not universal amongst so called "Buddhists".

Unknown said:

Then tell me, by what cognitive means is the arhat aware that he is an arhat?

Malcolm wrote:

His mind, what else? Surely you are not going to now suggest that arhats lack the five aggregates?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 12th, 2013 at 9:25 AM

Title: Re: Denying you're a Buddhist to outsiders

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

and yet you have listed three of the four I mentioned.

Malcolm wrote:

I didn't claim they were universal in Buddhism. You did.

PadmaVonSamba said:

Yes, and they are.

Malcolm wrote:

So all I have to do is provide one countervailing example?

PadmaVonSamba said:

And again,

do you suppose an arhat is aware he is an arhat?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, of course. For example, the Buddha.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 12th, 2013 at 9:17 AM

Title: Re: Denying you're a Buddhist to outsiders

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

and yet you have listed three of the four I mentioned.

Malcolm wrote:

I didn't claim they were universal in Buddhism. You did.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 12th, 2013 at 8:57 AM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

Unknown said:

"the conviction that rituals can cause moral purity....

Malcolm wrote:

That pretty much does in a lot of Vajrayāna ritual purity rituals.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 12th, 2013 at 8:49 AM

Title: Re: Denying you're a Buddhist to outsiders

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

How about this:

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Basic_Points_Unifying_the_Theravada_and_Mahayana?

Malcolm wrote:

That works if you are a Theravadin or Mahāyāni, it does not work so well if you are a Dzogchenpa.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 12th, 2013 at 8:33 AM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

It is much easier to define what is not Buddhist than what is "Buddhist" in fact.

dzogchungpa said:

What do you think about this attempt:

https://www.dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=39&t=14040&p=184779#p184779?

Malcolm wrote:

It is definitely more comprehensive than merely relying on the four seals. But it's not perfect, though it is a start.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 12th, 2013 at 8:26 AM

Title: Re: Obstacles to Bodhicitta

Content:

Konchog1 said:

How can you generate without force?

Malcolm wrote:

Oh, it is very easy. Just look around you.

In other words, you cannot generate bodhicitta from formulas found in books.

You must merely observe reality, see that there is suffering and decide that you want to be as awakened as possible so you are finally useful to someone other than yourself. The rest will take care of itself.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 12th, 2013 at 8:15 AM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Well, I don't think the four seals are a sufficient criteria: for example, the Sāṃkhya school regards conditioned phenomena as being nonself, suffering, and impermanent (the manner in which they do so is a bit different than the Buddha's formulation, nevertheless...), and the experience of puruṣa can easily be equated with the unsupported consciousness of the Pali suttas...so...

dzogchungpa said:

I recently read this in DJKR's Buddha Nature book: Buddhists talk about "not truly existent", and I think that in this present day, this is like the ace up our sleeves, our trump card. It is what distinguishes the Buddhist view. However, only the Sāṃkhyas, the high Sāṃkhyas, have a view that is so close to the Buddhist view as to be nearly indistinguishable.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, he is referring to the early non-theistic Sāṃkhya of the Rishi Kapila, rather than the later theistic Sāṃkhya.

But this merely goes to show that it is difficult to define a universal core set of Buddhist doctrines that are uniquely and distinctly Buddhist.

It is much easier to define what is not Buddhist than what is "Buddhist" in fact.

Universe created by God? Ok not Buddhist. And that's about it.

Actually, if there is a teaching in Buddhism that is uniquely the Buddha's, it is dependent origination i.e. where this exists, that exists, where that arose, this arose; where that does not exist, this does not exist, with the ceasing of that, this ceased, etc.

But not all "Buddhist" schools accept this as the sine qua non of Dharma. For example, in Dzogchen, the twelve limbs are considered merely a gateway for deluded people, but not the sine qua non of Dharma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 12th, 2013 at 8:02 AM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

futerko said:

He did write a book about it - "What makes you not a Buddhist", where he discusses the four seals - a definition I seem to remember you using to defend Stephen Batchelor's position a while back.

Malcolm wrote:

IN general, I was doing so because of what other people accepted, not what I accept.

futerko said:

Yes, but I think it's safe to say that DKR has outlined his position concerning your earlier question.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, I don't think the four seals are a sufficient criteria: for example, the Sāṃkhya school regards conditioned phenomena as being nonself, suffering, and impermanent (the manner in which they do so is a bit different than the Buddha's formulation, nevertheless...), and the experience of puruṣa can easily be equated with the unsupported consciousness of the Pali suttas...so...

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 12th, 2013 at 7:51 AM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

futerko said:

He did write a book about it - "What makes you not a Buddhist", where he discusses the four seals - a definition I seem to remember you using to defend Stephen Batchelor's position a while back.

Malcolm wrote:

IN general, I was doing so because of what other people accepted, not what I accept.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 12th, 2013 at 7:40 AM

Title: Re: Denying you're a Buddhist to outsiders

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

There is in fact no true standard set of Buddhist doctrines that universally apply to all instances of what we call Buddhism.

PadmaVonSamba said:

How did you determine this?

There are, in fact, four basic tenets common to all schools of Buddhism.

They are commonly referred to as the Four Seals:

All conditioned phenomena are impermanent.

The nature of conditioned (*should be afflicted) phenomena is suffering (duhkha)

All phenomena lack inherent existence (*should be not-self)

The true nature of the mind is free from suffering (nirvana) (*should be nirvana is peaceful)

Malcolm wrote:

No, sorry to contradict you but...

The Theravadins do not have a formulation using the the fourth seal. That only exists in Mahāyāna.

Theravadas use the three seals: anicca, dukkha and anatta.

What is interesting here is of course when seeking to find a common ground among Buddhist schools we depend on doctrines also found in Hindu schools such as Sāṃkhya.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 12th, 2013 at 6:45 AM

Title: Re: Denying you're a Buddhist to outsiders

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

But just out of curiosity, what do you mean by "generic Buddhism"?

If you mean that there isn't a particular school or lineage or sect called "Generic" then you are correct.

Malcolm wrote:

There is in fact no true standard set of Buddhist doctrines that universally apply to all instances of what we call Buddhism.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 12th, 2013 at 6:33 AM

Title: Re: Denying you're a Buddhist to outsiders

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

So you believe that there is no core of beliefs and practices that can be defined as Buddhist? That there is nothing that all Buddhists can agree on? Dependent origination, for example?

Malcolm wrote:

I didn't say that -- I said there was no generic Buddhism.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 12th, 2013 at 6:22 AM

Title: Re: Denying you're a Buddhist to outsiders

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

There is no generic "Buddhism".

Sherab Dorje said:

Of course there is.

Malcolm wrote:

Of course there is not.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 12th, 2013 at 5:52 AM

Title: Re: Five precepts: an inquiry

Content:

Mouse Soldier said:

What does Buddhism have to say about when life begins?

Malcolm wrote:

It begins at conception. Therefore, Buddhist women need to think long and hard before committing to an abortion. That said, since I do not believe in legislating religious belief into law, I am pro-choice.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 12th, 2013 at 4:44 AM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

heart said:

I think you are wrong, I think the Upadesa is the oldest form of Dzogchen. Semde with it aim to separate itself from Tantric teachings is in my eyes a later development.

Malcolm wrote:

You can think what you like dear Magnus, but the man ngag de texts, all of them being termas, are all demonstrably later than the bodhicitta texts, with the rig pa rang shar and the sgra thal gyur being among the latest of all (no earlier than the 11th century).

Secondly, you are incorrect about "sems sde" trying to separate itself from Anuyoga and so on. Atiyoga, as Rongzom says, is "a commentary" of the lower yānas, as well as their definitive meaning.

But this is all besides the point.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 12th, 2013 at 4:20 AM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

Tsongkhapafan said:

It's inner science and the results of the path can be proven to oneself by practising the methods.

Malcolm wrote:

This is what Scientology says as well.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 12th, 2013 at 3:31 AM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

Does that sound like "reactionary rhetoric" from someone suffering from "religious and cultural insecurity"? I am very sympathetic with what you have said in this thread, but honestly I feel that you are misrepresenting DJKR.

Malcolm wrote:

I was merely using Dzongsar Khyentse's interview as example of what I find to be a reactionary rhetoric which stems from an overall religious and cultural insecurity I have found amongst Tibetan religious professionals.

He also does not specify this "main philosophy of Buddhism" that must remain "intact".

Perhaps he can drop in and tell us what he feels that might be.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 12th, 2013 at 2:55 AM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

well, if you like simpler Dzogchen, stick with the bodhicitta texts, since they are most likely the ones which actually have a root in a historical person named "Vajraprahe".

heart said:

I am fine with what I do, thanks. I don't share your or Germano's ideas of the origin of Dzogchen.

/magnus

pensum said:

I'm assuming, Magnus, that you don't realize that Vajraprahe is no other than Garab Dorje. In Tibetan texts his name is rendered in Sanskrit as either Prahevajra or in some of the early texts that Malcolm has been researching as Vajraprahe. Or do you disagree that Garab Dorje most likely was an actual person and that the main, if not all (Buddhist anyway, Bon may be an exception), Dzogchen lineages can be traced back to him (which i believe is Malcolm's view)?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, it is my view that these persons: Garab Dorje, Manjushrimitra and Shri Simha are historical persons. It is also my view that Dzogchen as an intimate instruction must come from that source. I do not imagine however that all the texts attributed to Garab Dorje are actually by him.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 12th, 2013 at 2:49 AM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

heart said:

Of course know that dear pensum. Germano and Malcolm share the view that Dzogchen, or at least the Upadesa tradition, is an Tibetan invention. I don't share that view. Not because Tibetan invention would in itself be a bad thing, I am pretty sure that there are many elaborations of Tibetan origin in Dzogchen, but because the insistence on lineage in the Tibetan cultural sphere. I also don't think Dzogchen developed from semde to longde to upadesa or that hinayana developed to mahayana and further to vajrayana, it is just a comfortable darwinistic view that our society is full of. But I am not a scholar and what I think is of little consequence.

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

What you call the view that Germano and I share is in fact the Western academic consensus, current even among Western academics who nevertheless are practitioners.

So called sems sde and klong sde are contemporary, they are but two branches of the same teaching of the same Tibetan teacher, Vairocana -- there is nothing philosophically remarkable about klong sde that separates it from so called sems sde. In short, sems sde and klong sde are different streams of the same basic teaching.

Man ngag sde however is a different matter. It is not a Tibetan "invention". That is too crude. It is a reworking of Dzogchen based on the second contact of Tibetan civilization with late Indian Vajrayāna. It is essentially gsar ma rDzogs chen.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 12th, 2013 at 2:44 AM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

Tsongkhapafan said:
The Mahayana is not an evolution of the Dharma in the Nikayas.

Malcolm wrote:
It is not an evolution of the Dharma in the Nikayas, it is an evolution of the Dharma outside of the Nikāyas.

Tsongkhapafan said:
Both were taught by Buddha Shakyamuni...

Malcolm wrote:
Impossible, I say.

Tsongkhapafan said:
The Dharma does not evolve because the nature of samsara and nirvana does not change.

Malcolm wrote:
The Dharma has demonstrably evolved over the centuries in order to cope with changes in human cultures, economics, and civilizations. It is changing now as we speak. To refuse to see this is voluntary blindness.

The meaning of nirvana has changed over time (once a desiderata, then an extreme to be avoided). Even the meaning of samsara has changed (once something to eschew, then something not be abandoned).

Tsongkhapafan said:
The meaning of Dharma does not change, but the presentation may do to suit the capacity and lifestyle of those who are listening.

Malcolm wrote:
There is no such thing as "inherent meaning".

Tsongkhapafan said:
For example the lamrim teachings of Venerable Atisha and Je Tsongkhapa present a complete path to liberation and enlightenment that will not change in meaning, but may be presented differently as times degenerate and the wisdom of living beings wanes.

Malcolm wrote:
The very meaning of "Buddhahood" has changed over time.

++++++

Basically, Buddhism and Buddhists are facing the crisis of modernity.

Like Christianity, Buddhism has no hope of relying upon the pre-modern myths and fables which provided its narratives. The vast majority of modern people simply will not accept the narratives traditional Buddhisms have proffered for explaining our world. Buddhism[s], which once provided a complete explanation of the universe, is/are no longer capable of doing so.

Buddhism, like Christianity before it, will be forced to discover new meaning for itself, and will need to forge new narratives for itself, if it hopes to survive in the modern world. Of course Buddhism has the materials at hand to do so, like Christianity.

In other words, the validity or absence of validity of Mahāyāna does not depend on its origin legend. If Mahāyāna depends on its origin legends for its validity, then it is intellectually moribund and philosophically meagre. If on the other hand Mahāyāna does not depend upon its origin legend for its validity, then it is intellectually vital and philosophically robust. The same observation can be made about those who require the origin legend of Mahāyāna to be literally true, they are neither intellectually vital nor philosophically robust because they are incapable of defending Mahāyāna ideas purely on their own terms without recourse to some imagined authority.

The corollary however does not hold; the successful defense of Mahāyāna ideas on their own terms does not validate the legends of Mahāyāna origins.

Again, this begs the question: just how many Mahāyānas are there? How many Vajrayānas are there?

In short, Buddhism's "grace" period or probationary period in the West is over and done with. In order for Buddhism to hold its own in the free market of ideas, it must be able to do so without any recourse to traditional authority. If it fails at this, it will fail the test of modernity and as human civilization continues to advance and develop, Buddhism will become yet another footnote to history.

In order to prevent that from happening, Buddhists must in fact be the harshest critics of Buddhism.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 12th, 2013 at 12:22 AM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

heart said:

I rather sit at the feet of Garab Dorje and receive Dzogchen personally.

Malcolm wrote:

Me too, but it didn't happen and is not going to happen, so why fantasize?

heart said:

Oh, I don't fantasize, just stating what end of evolution has the most value to me.

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

well, if you like simpler Dzogchen, stick with the bodhicitta texts, since they are most likely the ones which actually have a root in a historical person named "Vajraprahe".

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 12th, 2013 at 12:20 AM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

heart said:

So if something "develops" or "evolve" it gets more complicated or diversified or just different but not better except randomly so?

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

Better/worse are human judgements. Simplicity/complexity are observable phenomena.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 12th, 2013 at 12:14 AM

Title: Re: Riwo Sang Chod

Content:

Kunzang said:

Regarding the question about a requirement for empowerment for practicing Riwo Sang Chod: the version I practice, and I think it's the most common version, has self-visualization as Padmasambhava (i.e., as Padma Thodtrengtsal). So somebody more knowledgeable should correct me if I'm wrong, but even though the RSC itself doesn't require its own empowerment (just the lung), don't you need prior empowerment before you can do any self-visualization practice?

Malcolm wrote:

The original version does not contain a self-visualization at all. The edition penned by Dudjom R., does, and in order to use it as such, one must at least have the lung, if not any suitable Guru P empowerment such as the Rigzin Sogdrup etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 12th, 2013 at 12:09 AM

Title: Re: Is the tulku system too exclusive?

Content:

Simon E. said:

And the most well known ' recognition ' that Lama Zopa made didn't work out too well, did it ?

Indrajala said:

Does that reflect more on the recognized tulku or the Lama who recognized him?

Simon E. said:

In my view it reflects on the whole process really...

Lets face it we largely know about Hita because he is a westerner...the attrition rate of 'reluctant ' tulkus might be a big proportion actually.

Malcolm wrote:

"Nature habitually overproduces..."

-- Ezra Pound.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 12th, 2013 at 12:03 AM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

heart said:

I rather sit at the feet of Garab Dorje and receive Dzogchen personally.

Malcolm wrote:

Me too, but it didn't happen and is not going to happen, so why fantasize?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 12th, 2013 at 12:02 AM

Title: Re: Is the tulku system too exclusive?

Content:

Simon E. said:

And the most well known ' recognition ' that Lama Zopa made didn't work out too well, did it ?

Indrajala said:

Does that reflect more on the recognized tulku or the Lama who recognized him?

Malcolm wrote:

Equally upon both.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 11th, 2013 at 11:57 PM

Title: Re: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

heart said:

The idea of evolution is that everything becomes better for most beings.

Malcolm wrote:

Not at all.

There are two major definitions here:

1. the process by which different kinds of living organisms are thought to have developed and diversified from earlier forms during the history of the earth.
2. the gradual development of something, esp. from a simple to a more complex form.

The idea of biological evolution is covered by definition one.

Systems of belief and thought, such as Dzogchen, Christianity, Santeria, modern science, communism, free markets, etc. are covered by the definition two.

For example, so called "sems sde" is comparatively simple when contrasted with man ngag sde. Mahāyāna is comparatively more complex than the Buddhism expressed in the Nikāyas.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 11th, 2013 at 11:50 PM

Title: Re: Obstacles to Bodhicitta

Content:

Konchog1 said:

Any advice?

Malcolm wrote:

Don't force. Anyway, bodhicitta is not something you can contrive. You either want to become an awakened person to benefit others or you don't, and some days are better than others when you are an ordinary person.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 11th, 2013 at 11:27 PM

Title: Re: Denying you're a Buddhist to outsiders

Content:

tatpurlusa said:

Dzogchenpa.

Malcolm wrote:

Ditto.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 11th, 2013 at 11:26 PM

Title: Re: Denying you're a Buddhist to outsiders

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

Rather than: "I am a buddhist"

how about: "I follow (or agree with) the teachings of buddhism"

Malcolm wrote:

Which Buddhism?

PadmaVonSamba said:

whichever buddhism you follow.

.
.
.

Malcolm wrote:

There is no generic "Buddhism".

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 11th, 2013 at 11:11 PM

Title: "...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

Content:

JKhedrup said:

The level of scholarship and debate necessary in the great [Tibetan] institutions requires a high degree of doubt and critical thinking.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, but it has strictly defined parameters. Despite all the deep learning, critical acumen, and doubt your Geshe may bring to the table, in the end, they are merely expected to master what is already accepted as true according to a consensus. Like musicians, they are merely expected to become expert at playing the scales. They are neither expected nor encouraged to open up whole new fields of learning. They are expected merely to be vessels conveying the wisdom of one generation to another, unaltered like an impression from a seal. Now, do not think that in my view this has no value. It definitely has value. It is a part of human culture and learning.

However, most of the classically educated Tibetans I know have a very hard time with the idea of evolution. They have difficulty accepting that modern humans come from Africa, and that all languages also originally come from Africa and that the pattern of human migration from Africa can be mathematically tracked. Indeed, they have difficulty with Science in general (all the while happily using the fruits of scientific endeavor in the form of electricity, cell phones, antibiotics, and so on).

This is largely because up until recently most educated Tibetans are educated into a pre-modern view of the world that includes Mt. Meru, the Buddhist myth of the origin of humans in devas whose bodies gel and thicken due to their craving for the sweet "cream of the earth" (sa zhag) on the surface of the planet and so on.

There is no fault in all this, of course, but it is important to remember that there are bound to be vast differences in the way persons like ourselves, raised and educated in a post-modern civilization will view the world when compared to those who have pre-modern educations.

For example, a common theme among Tibetan teachers is the oft repeated trope:

"...but the science of Buddhism will never change."

-- Dzongsar Khyentse

http://www.lifepositive.com/Spirit/Buddhism/Through_the_Lens_of_Reality112005.asp

"Why will Buddhism never change?", we ask; and answer as always is "Because Buddhism is based on wisdom."

Of course, anyone who has studied history will instantly recognize this to be a statement that is at best, very naive. Buddhism has undergone constant change and evolution from the beginning.

Even more questionable is the arrogation of Buddhism as a "science". It is not science, it never was and never will be. Buddhism, is, in its best aspect, a yogic tradition; at worst, a religious dogma. Buddhism may indeed have some ideas which are compatible with the worldview informed by modern science, but it equally entertains many beliefs which are not falsifiable in any respect, and hence must be considered non-scientific (which does not mean false, rather merely empirically untestable).

Now, of course, Dzongsar Khyentse can be forgiven for referring to Buddhism as a "science" because of the use of the term adhyātmavidyā (nang rig) translated as so-called "inner science" where the term "science" is used to translate the term "vidyā".

We must however see statements like Dzongsar Khyentse's for what they are: reactionary rhetoric which misses the target.

Modern science, as we know, is a method of coming up with predicative models. If one's predictions fail, one's model is defective, and one's hypothesis is either abandoned or revised by incorporating the results of one's failure. It is an iterative process, as we all know.

However, there is, in my estimation a religious and cultural insecurity which is responsible for sentiments like Dzongar Khyentse's, a sentiment right at home with similar sentiments about the Bible expressed by Christian Fundamentalists. It is an eternalization of tradition. Stating that Buddhism will never or has never changed is like asserting that words of the Bible or the Koran are infallible.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 11th, 2013 at 9:48 PM

Title: Re: Denying you're a Buddhist to outsiders

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

Rather than: "I am a buddhist"

how about: "I follow (or agree with) the teachings of buddhism"

.
.
.

Malcolm wrote:

Which Buddhism?

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 11th, 2013 at 12:15 PM

Title: Re: Denying you're a Buddhist to outsiders

Content:

padma norbu said:

I have occasionally in the past few years started just saying "I'm not really a Buddhist, though" to friends and extended family whenever they ask me about all my books and thangkas and statues...

seeker242 said:

Do they believe you? I probably wouldn't if you had Buddha statues and Buddha pictures all over the place. Does it really matter that friends and family understand the technical differences of Dzogchen vs Buddhism? That sound like a long, complicated conversation, one they probably would not understand.

padma norbu said:

They probably think I'm weird and full of crap like a new age hippy or something. I think this is better than them thinking I'm really a buddhist because I think the professional buddhists who wear robes and stuff do a much better job setting an example than I do. Yes, I could try to set a better example, but it's just not natural for me to be a teacher. If I ever found myself in that position, I'd probably abuse the power more and more with each passing year.

Malcolm wrote:

To nonbuddhists I say freely I am Buddhist. But I am not really a "buddhist". I am a practitioner of Dharma, not a follower of a school.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 11th, 2013 at 8:30 AM

Title: Re: Good stretches for postration.

Content:

supermaxv said:

Well, in my Ngondro materials from my refuge lama, there are specific guidelines and teachings in regards to the proper forms of prostrations for Ngondro accumulation.

Malcolm wrote:

These things are customs, not Dharma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 11th, 2013 at 7:37 AM

Title: Re: Does Dzogchen have Persian or Zoroastrian influences?

Content:

padma norbu said:

So, can you just answer the question? Would it matter to you if Zoroastrianism influenced Buddhism? If so, why?

Malcolm wrote:

It would not matter; but it didn't — not in any meaningful way that I can see.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 11th, 2013 at 7:36 AM

Title: Re: Does Dzogchen have Persian or Zoroastrian influences?

Content:

padma norbu said:

I mean, what are you even arguing about?

Malcolm wrote:

Vedanta originally referred the Upanishads [End of the Vedas], only two of which are pre-Buddhist (Brihadaranyaka and the Candogya).

However as a _school_, it is post- buddhist by many centuries.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 11th, 2013 at 7:14 AM

Title: Re: Does Dzogchen have Persian or Zoroastrian influences?

Content:

padma norbu said:

So, the Vajra appeared in Vedanta prior to the existence of Vajrayana...

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, and the Vajra appeared in Buddhism before Vedanta existed.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 11th, 2013 at 6:56 AM

Title: Re: Does Dzogchen have Persian or Zoroastrian influences?

Content:

padma norbu said:

Besides invisiblediamond, would anybody care either way? It doesn't seem like anyone really cares in this thread, they are just stating why it the idea is demonstrably factually incorrect. If it influenced Dzogchen the way Vedanta influenced Vajrayana, it wouldn't actually matter to anyone, right?

Just want to clear this up.

Malcolm wrote:

Who says Vedanta influenced Vajrayāna?

padma norbu said:

The Vajra (thunderbolt) is from Hindu origin, is it not? Then, we have the various deities that were assimilated into Vajrayana like Saraswati, etc.

Malcolm wrote:

The vajra is not "Hindu" it is Vedic, and is a shared mytheme in all Indian religions, just like Saraswati, Tārā and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 11th, 2013 at 6:11 AM

Title: Re: Good stretches for prostration.

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

Is it actually acceptable to do them that way?

Bump

heart said:

No, of course not. Different traditions.

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, of course it is acceptable. A prostration is a prostration.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 11th, 2013 at 6:07 AM

Title: Re: Does Dzogchen have Persian or Zoroastrian influences?

Content:

padma norbu said:

Besides invisiblediamond, would anybody care either way? It doesn't seem like anyone really cares in this thread, they are just stating why it the idea is demonstrably factually incorrect. If it influenced Dzogchen the way Vedanta influenced Vajrayana, it wouldn't actually matter to anyone, right?

Just want to clear this up.

Malcolm wrote:

Who says Vedanta influenced Vajrayāna?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 11th, 2013 at 5:50 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen: Nongradual Buddhahood?

Content:

invisiblediamond said:

Look at the west. We still flock to Thor.Where did that come from?

Malcolm wrote:

Marvel Comics.

invisiblediamond said:

We still believe in a work ethic. Where did that come from?

Malcolm wrote:

John Calvin.

invisiblediamond said:

Bonpo say, Shang Shung people were culturally more Persian. This is where dharma met persia and had a baby.

Malcolm wrote:

That is silly. Zhang zhung was literally next door to Kashmir.

Occam's razor, baby.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 11th, 2013 at 4:56 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen: Nongradual Buddhahood?

Content:

invisiblediamond said:

To clarify, DC and Z share unique ideas. This is from some where. If not from Z itself, then from what came before and it was so old it was just like the basic world view, or there was some cross pollination with Persian ascetics who must have crossed paths with Shang Shung meditators.

Malcolm wrote:

No. they really do not. Dzogchen is non-theistic. Dzogchen is not eternalist. Dzogchen uses the Indian scheme of the five elements, not the Zoroastrian scheme of seven elements which I posted to you.

I think you are tripping on this one.

Ok, over and out.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 11th, 2013 at 4:30 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen: Nongradual Buddhahood?

Content:

invisiblediamond said:

So where from in Africa do colors and elements meet? My research makes this a North Central Asian Aryan motif.

Malcolm wrote:

<http://archive.constantcontact.com/fs012/1101454195791/archive/1104070256872.html>

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 11th, 2013 at 4:25 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen: Nongradual Buddhahood?

Content:

invisiblediamond said:

From what? That what is the root cultural bias that DC seems to unwind. Bc once it got to the borderlands with Persia, Z ideas were woven in.

Malcolm wrote:

They split as in "went their separate ways".

Dzogchen is based on Indian Antecedents which then were further developed in Tibet in complete absence of any influence from Zoroastrianism, which by the time period you are talking about. We do not have any record in Tibetan, Chinese or any other language of a major contact between Tibetans and Zoroastrians. Zoroastrians strictly do not proselytize. We do have some evidence of contact between Tibetans and Manichaeans in Khotan however.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 11th, 2013 at 4:16 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen: Nongradual Buddhahood?

Content:

invisiblediamond said:

I don't believe you. Could be much older, by 10,000 years.

Malcolm wrote:

Then, inexplicably, you are being a knucklehead. And the above is total new age bullshit fueled by some very strong weed, I am sure.

Ok, I am done with this thread because it has degenerated into total nonsense.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 11th, 2013 at 4:14 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen: Nongradual Buddhahood?

Content:

OddiyanaIndia said:

I see the core error of InvisibleDiamond.

He doesn't understand geography or borders of pre-1947 India.

invisiblediamond said:

These comments are retarded bc I'm talking about PreVedic time.

Malcolm wrote:

Look, all mythologies come from a common source in Africa 130,000 years ago.

You need to read Witzel's book.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 11th, 2013 at 4:13 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen: Nongradual Buddhahood?

Content:

invisiblediamond said:

Z influence bc it's that old and pinioned between both regions.

Malcolm wrote:

[/quote][/quote][/quote]

Dude, the ancient Indo-aryan and the Ancient Iranians were enemies. Not friends. They split.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 11th, 2013 at 4:04 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen: Nongradual Buddhahood?

Content:

invisiblediamond said:

It's fascinating.

Malcolm wrote:

There are all kinds of fascinating things. But mixing up Zoroastrianism with Dzogchen? Really, there is no solid basis for this.

invisiblediamond said:

Do the Maya equate color and elements? I know of know other two groups who have this idea. They live in the same region. These are clearly coming from a common cultural root. Failing to see this is fantasizing about one's tradition.

Malcolm wrote:

Oh for christ's sake -- the Chinese also equate their elements and color, and so to the Greeks (black, red, yellow and white).

Mayan elements:

East – Red : Father Sun, the Way of the Visionary: Reed, Knowledge, Crocodile, Serpent, Offering

West – Blue/Black: Grandmother Moon/Ocean, the Way of the Teacher: Monkey, Bird, Rainstorm, Dawn, Deer

South – Yellow: Mother Earth, the Way of the Healer: Road, Wisdom, Sun, Net, Seed

North – White: Father Sky, the Way of the Sacred Warrior: Jaguar, Flint, Wind, Death, Dog

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 11th, 2013 at 4:01 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen: Nongradual Buddhahood?

Content:

invisiblediamond said:

They are missing the anthropological evidence so their text based analysis, since texts are dubious, sheds rather little light on what may or may not have really happened.

Malcolm wrote:

I see, so what is your archaeological evidence to prove an Iranian source for certain aspects of Dzogchen, namely body of light (Since everything else in Dzogchen is squarely Buddhist like emptiness, three kāyas, buddhas, bodhisattvas, etc.)?

Unless you want to try and convince us that all Mahāyāna is really just Zoroastrianism in drag.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 11th, 2013 at 3:48 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen: Nongradual Buddhahood?

Content:

invisiblediamond said:

It's fascinating.

Malcolm wrote:

There are all kinds of fascinating things. But mixing up Zoroastrianism with Dzogchen? Really, there is no solid basis for this.

Anyway, this thread has been sunk by useless speculation.

BTW Mahāmudra guys. If you really take seriously what your citations say -- then why bother with gradualism and defending it.

However, I must point out to you that it is really not possible to find the notion of primordial buddhhood in Mahamudra texts explained in the unique style of Dzogchen.

Its ok. Its not a competition. Fundamentally, we can all agree that Dzogchen and Mahamudra are describing the same state. But the paths are different.

Greg, your citations are ok, but you really should have cited Virupa:

All sentient beings are emanations of mahāmudrā, the essence of those emanations is the forever non-arising dharmadhātu, also all characteristics of dualistic appearances, happiness, suffering and so on,
are the play of mahāmudrā, the original dharmatā.

and:

Since realism is destroyed in its own state, one is liberated from samsara and nirvana.
Since vidyā is pure in the basis, it is called "Perfect Buddhahood."
Since phenomena and mind are exhausted in the state of exhaustion, therefore it is explained as "nirvana", uncontrived, unchanging, totally liberated from everything to be given up or to attain.

--Lion Doha

You guys who claim to be practitioners of Mahāmudra really need to be poked every now and again.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 11th, 2013 at 3:43 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen: Nongradual Buddhahood?

Content:

invisiblediamond said:

I need to see the evidence. .

Malcolm wrote:

Paul, with all due respect, this is a preposterous thing for you to say. You engage in wild speculation and then claim to need to see evidence?

invisiblediamond said:

I'm inferring from what the evidence shows. The similarities to Persian mysticism is unmistakable.

Malcolm wrote:

First, there is no Persian Mysticism. Parsis have not lived in Iran for centuries. They mostly live in Western India. Sure, under the Shah some were invited back, but then it stopped. There are only 30 thousand Parsis in Iran, who all were invited back by the Shah.

Second, the notion of five elements of the physical body reverting to light clearly is found in oral instructions connected to the Cakrasamvara completion stage practices that are contemporary with the Dzogchen tantras that treat the same idea.

Secondly, the notion that the five element vāyus of the body have color is widespread in India Buddhist tantra and intimate instructions. So there are plenty of places where these ideas about rainbow body/body of light can be sourced in India Buddhist texts.

Third, even your presentation of the elements of Zoroastrianism is dramatically wrong.

Sure, I can accept that ideas like Sukhavati and so on were influenced by Persian culture, no problem.

But Zoroastrianism and Dzogchen are incompatible. It is simply irresponsible speculation on your part to continue this way. You have no evidence, you have no proof.

invisiblediamond said:

I won't follow the self-deceived and self-professed.

Malcolm wrote:

You don't need to follow the self-deceived, you are doing an excellent job of deceiving yourself.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 11th, 2013 at 3:28 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen: Nongradual Buddhahood?

Content:

invisiblediamond said:

It's a good thing I'm not reputable then. I don't believe these tall tales. I don't trust historical accounts. Many of these folks say they come from Greeks. But they don't as born out by genetic testing. They are indigenous. So accounts can't be trusted.

Malcolm wrote:

Huh? Are you high? First you reject that Dzogchen is indigenous to "India". Then you claim, with no evidence at all, that it is Zoroastrian influenced on the basis of some fairly unintelligible account written in the sixties about Zoroastrian mysticism on the basis of the five elements reverting to light, which is interesting but not conclusive in any sense.

Then you reject early Tibetan accounts of the importation of Dzogchen to Tibet based on what? Your "feeling"? Your years of dedicated research on comparative religion and mastery of world history?

invisiblediamond said:

I believe the Proto-Aryan elements are part of maghada. The PreVedics revere the elements and nature.

Malcolm wrote:

You are mixing up so many periods of history, so many cultures, here it is really insane. You must be smoking some really strong weed.

There is no reason to believe that there was a teaching called "atiyoga" prior to the late 6th or 7th century. But there is every reason to accept that it was brought to Tibet by Vairocana in the late 8th.

Doctrines like "the body of light" occur rather late in the textual history of Dzogchen. If they do have Persian Influence at all, it could only be from Central Asian Manichaeans. The other possible influence is the mother tantras, specifically the śrī-vajraḍāka-nāma-mahātantrarāja.

invisiblediamond said:

Dzogchen may very well be the same thing for this Persian influenced group. Based on this I'm pretty doubtful about these yantras.

Malcolm wrote:

I think you smoking some Bonpo crack. Did you hang out with Geshe Chagphur recently or something?

I respect Bon, but their Dzogchen is entirely Buddhist in origin.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 11th, 2013 at 3:11 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen: Nongradual Buddhahood?

Content:

invisiblediamond said:

I need to see the evidence. .

Malcolm wrote:

Paul, with all due respect, this is a preposterous thing to for you to say. You engage in wild speculation and then claim to need to see evidence?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 11th, 2013 at 2:21 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen: Nongradual Buddhahood?

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

Just out of curiosity, does 'Oddiyana', the place name, have anything to do with the 'Uddiyana' of yoga's Uddiyana Bandha?

Malcolm wrote:

Possibly.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 11th, 2013 at 1:59 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen: Nongradual Buddhahood?

Content:

invisiblediamond said:

It would be difficult to pigeon-hole Swat as "culturally Indian." Then, as now, it had its distinct idiosyncrasies that made it seem a little far North of Indian.

Malcolm wrote:

Woo-Chang, or Udyana. Monasteries, and Their Ways. Traces of Buddha.

After crossing the river, (the travellers) immediately came to the kingdom of Woo-chang, which is indeed (a part) of North India. The people all use the language of Central India, "Central India" being what we should call the "Middle Kingdom." The food and clothes of the common people are the same as in that Central Kingdom. The Law of Buddha is very (flourishing in Woo-chang). They call the places where the monks stay (for a time) or reside permanently Sangharamas; and of these there are in all 500, the monks being all students of the hinayana. When stranger bhikshus arrive at one of them, their wants are supplied for three days, after which they are told to find a resting-place for themselves.

<http://ebooks.adelaide.edu.au/f/fa-hien/f15l/contents.html>

invisiblediamond said:

If there is a strong influence of Z in DC...

Malcolm wrote:

No respectable, competent scholar thinks Zoroastrianism has a "strong" influence on Dzogchen. Dzogchen is Buddhadharma. Its origins are strictly from the Indo-Buddhist cultural sphere.

In the medium history of the Vajra Bridge (klong sde), it describes nine regions (glings) in "rGya gar" (pre-partition subcontinental India including Indo-China) eight of which are sited from the center, which is of course Vajrasana: Bangla in the east, Bhaitala in the south; Orgyen in the west; Kashmir in the north; Khams bu gLing (Kampuchea) in the south east; Zangs gling (the copper country, Visnagar in Gujarat?) in the south west. Zahor in the northwest; Kamarupa in the northeast — with Vajrasana in the center of all of these.

This text further asserts that rGya gar is the source of Dzogchen; in particular, Northwestern Orgyen.

The earliest accounts we have of Garab Dorje, in the Wheel that Ascertains the Yānas (found in the Bairo rgyud 'bum, vol. nga) records that he was born to a princess from Northwestern region of Orgyen who was a Buddhist nun.

The earliest accounts state that Mañjuśrimitra was from Shri Lanka, but studied at Nalanda (founded in the 5th century AD, and all accounts describe Mañjuśrimitra as being a scholar here). Manjushrimitra meets Garab Dorje in a place within Orgyen called Danakosha, which is held to be on the shores of the great outer ocean, which can only be the Arabian Sea, somewhere on the coast of modern Pakistan.

Shri Simha was an Indian. Despite later Nyinthig accounts that he came from "rgya nag" and the attempt of some modern authors to site him as being from Khotan, the earliest accounts we have about this master indicate that he was an Indian.

We have no real reason to doubt the historicity of these three masters, especially Shri Simha, whom Vairocana met.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 10th, 2013 at 11:43 PM

Title: Re: Dzogchen: Nongradual Buddhahood?

Content:

invisiblediamond said:

It would be difficult to pigeon-hole Swat as "culturally Indian." Then, as now, it had its distinct idiosyncrasies that made it seem a little far North of Indian.

Malcolm wrote:

Woo-Chang, or Udyana. Monasteries, and Their Ways. Traces of Buddha.

After crossing the river, (the travellers) immediately came to the kingdom of Woo-chang, which is indeed (a part) of North India. The people all use the language of Central India, "Central India" being what we should call the "Middle Kingdom." The food and clothes of the common people are the same as in that Central Kingdom. The Law of Buddha is very (flourishing in Woo-chang). They call the places where the monks stay (for a time) or reside permanently Sangharamas; and of these there are in all 500, the monks being all students of the hinayana. When stranger bhikshus arrive at one of them, their wants are supplied for three days, after which they are told to find a resting-place for themselves.

<http://ebooks.adelaide.edu.au/f/fa-hien/f15l/contents.html>

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 10th, 2013 at 9:38 AM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

seeker242 said:

In the link I posted, the College is telling the meat industry to stop lying to people. You are implying that the meat industry is sponsoring people who tell that same meat industry to stop being liars? That is unheard of! The meat industry would never admit to being liars. But of course, this exchange is going nowhere. So you can dismiss my statements, and I can just as easily dismiss your statements and we can just be friends? That would be nice!

Malcolm wrote:

The meat industry as a whole is opposed to the grassfed meat producers.

It is a fact that cows should not eat corn. The article you posted asserts the opposite, i.e. that cows should be fed corn in order to increase marbling of meat. This is a standard meat industry position.

The health issue for humans is antibiotics used by the standard meat industry and so on. There are many other issues as well.

As yes, we never were not friends.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 10th, 2013 at 9:23 AM

Title: Re: Does software pirating break the second precept?

Content:

pemachophel said:

Breach of copyright is most definitely "taking what is not given freely."

dzogchungpa said:

The oracle has spoken!

However, not everyone agrees with you: In this paper, I examine the modern concepts of intellectual property and account for their significance in monastic law and culture of early Buddhism. As a result, I have come to the following conclusions: (1) the infringement of copyrights, patents, and trademarks does not amount to theft as far as Theravādin Vinaya is concerned ...

See: <http://blogs.dickinson.edu/buddhistethics/2012/10/04/intellectual-property-in-early-buddhism/>

Malcolm wrote:

Apparently the author does not believe his own paper:

Copyright Notice: Digital copies of this work may be made and distributed provided no change is made and no alteration is made to the content. Re-production in any other format, with the exception of a single copy for private study, requires the written permission of the author.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 10th, 2013 at 9:20 AM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

seeker242 said:

Christ! I didn't tell you anything.... All I said was In order for your statement to have weight, you need to prove that it's true. Simply linking to the college website does not provide that proof...

Malcolm wrote:

Smoke --> fire.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 10th, 2013 at 8:59 AM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Oh Christ — Michael Pollan's point of view is that one's diet should be primarily plant based.

On the other hand, he also supports locally sourced, grass-fed operations of the kind run by Joel Salatin.

seeker242 said:

I'm aware of both of those things, but that still does not change the fact that just dismissing it as "industry sponsored science"

Malcolm wrote:

Just look here:

<http://animalscience.psu.edu/extension/meat>

This is the department and program where Dr. John Comerford works. Still want to tell me this not industry sponsored science?

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 10th, 2013 at 8:26 AM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

"The reality is there is no evidence whatsoever that grass-fed beef has any advantage for safety, human health, or impact on the environment than grain-fed beef."

This is just industry sponsored "science". You should read Michael Pollen and so on.

seeker242 said:

"Michael Pollen is just grass fed industry marketing manifesting itself."

Now you see, that statement doesn't carry much weight without any actual evidence to back it up. The problem is, with that statement, I have provided just as much evidence as you have. That is really not good enough for an actual debate. You should read Richard Oppenlander, and others, where they debunk the myths perpetuated by Michael Pollan. Just dismissing it as "industry sponsored science" and leaving it at that, is very convenient way to not even address the arguments being made.

Malcolm wrote:

Oh Christ — Michael Pollan's point of view is that one's diet should be primarily plant based.

On the other hand, he also supports locally sourced, grass-fed operations of the kind run by Joel Salatin.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 10th, 2013 at 7:57 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen: Nongradual Buddhahood?

Content:

invisiblediamond said:

If I'm right then we might have to rework that theory. Even Kashmiri, some speak dialects which are more similar to Persian. Like Burushaski.

Malcolm wrote:

It is well established that Odḍiyāna was well within the Indo-cultural sphere. We have many reports of Chinese pilgrims going through it and so on.

As far as Burushaki goes:

Although Burushaski has been compared to almost any language on earth, no fully convincing relationships have yet been established.

<http://dickgrune.com/NatLang/Summaries/Burushaski.pdf>

While this document claims that no written Burushaki language exists, it is claimed that Nubchen translated the Anuyoga tantras from this language, and in fact Burushaki words do exist in the Anuyoga tantras.

But there is no relationship here with Persian.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 10th, 2013 at 7:47 AM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

seeker242 said:

Do you think that the current demand of meat can be met strictly by using only pasture raised, strictly grass fed beef and dairy? Apparently 6% of beef is grass fed right now. In order to meet the current demand, you would have to increase grass fed production by more than 15 times the current level. What would be the effects of that?

Malcolm wrote:

Massive grassland restoration, for one thing, properly done.

You should look into the farming methods of Joel Salatin.

seeker242 said:

"The reality is there is no evidence whatsoever that grass-fed beef has any advantage for safety, human health, or impact on the environment than grain-fed beef."

Malcolm wrote:

This is just industry sponsored "science". You should read Michael Pollen and so on.

seeker242 said:

Personally, I don't think it's all that simple. Especially when you take into account the grass fed information above, the health effects of high meat consumption on one's body and the ethical ramifications of an industry whose sole intention it is to kill sentient beings. The whole entire meat industry, grass fed or not, has one sole intention, to kill sentient beings and sell their body parts. The whole entire industry is ethically tainted by a slaughterhouse.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, not everyone shares the notion that killing animals, birds, and fish for food is morally wrong. Since they don't and are not likely too (ever), it is probably better for everyone to move people away from truly destructive practices presently found in the food production system.

seeker242 said:

That is how it's currently done but it doesn't need to be done that way IMO. The waste treatment plants in the USA that are currently and successfully using treated human waste for good fertilizer, I think is evidence that it can be done another way.

Malcolm wrote:

Because of all the crap we humans put in our bodies, I would be very skeptical of this at the present time. If human waste can be properly filtered and purified, then no problem.

Bottom line -- as long as animals are going to be killed for food (and they will, forever), it is better to move the industry to healthier standards for ourselves and the environments. You may not believe that organically raised beef, chicken and pork is better for people and the environment, but it is. It is a very simple reality.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 10th, 2013 at 7:37 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen: Nongradual Buddhahood?

Content:

michaelb said:

Garab Dorje, on the other hand, was Persian.

Malcolm wrote:

Garab Dorje was from Oḍḍiyāna.

invisiblediamond said:

That far North, the people were all Aryan sharing culture up to the Pamirs.

Malcolm wrote:

Nevertheless, Oḍḍiyāna was fully within the Indian cultural sphere, not the Persian cultural sphere.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 10th, 2013 at 7:34 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen: Nongradual Buddhahood?

Content:

invisiblediamond said:

It's not synchronic its aim is to describe Kshnoom, the esotericism of Z. I don't think the Greek and Manichean elements are in there.

Malcolm wrote:

Synchronic means that its ideas are not parsed out in terms of when they arose.

That text has a lot of strange writing which may very well be a modern Parsee mysticism, but I do not think it is very old.

invisiblediamond said:

Yes. But I have to assume the Parsees did what their site says they did, which is go to India to do one thing, preserve the true Z-ism. Including, not mix racially. I'll agree this isn't a smoking gun. But just the fact that stuff is in there is amazing.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, it is interesting.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 10th, 2013 at 7:24 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen: Nongradual Buddhahood?

Content:

invisiblediamond said:

It's not synchronic it's aim is to describe Kshnoom, the esotericism of Z. I don't think the Greek and Manichean elements are in there.

Malcolm wrote:

Synchronic means that its ideas are not parsed out in terms of when they arose.

That text has a lot of strange writing which may very well be a modern Parsee mysticism, but I do not think it is very old.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 10th, 2013 at 7:23 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen: Nongradual Buddhahood?

Content:

michaelb said:

Garab Dorje, on the other hand, was Persian.

Malcolm wrote:

Garab Dorje was from Oḍḍiyāna.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 10th, 2013 at 7:12 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen: Nongradual Buddhahood?

Content:

Simon E. said:

Dzogchen was not originally Bon OR Buddhist...it represents the essence of both and precedes both.

Either are adequate to provide a portal to it.

invisiblediamond said:

That's because it was Zoroastrian.

Malcolm wrote:

No. I am certainly open the idea that Dzogchen teachings as well as Tantric teachings in India may have been influenced by Zoroastrian and Manichean concepts, but the link you provide seems to be a Parsee document which is synchronic, i.e., it does not parse ancient Zoroastrianism from later Greek and Manichaeian ideas. This is a more clear presentation:

<http://www.iranicaonline.org/articles/elements>

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 10th, 2013 at 6:51 AM

Title: Re: Does software pirating break the second precept?

Content:

Mouse Soldier said:

The copyright law doesn't have to go anywhere for it to become archaic. They'll simply artificially create other industries in order for us to circumvent them.

Malcolm wrote:

Usually what happens is that when young people like you begin to develop a life, your attitudes change drastically depending on what you have at stake.

When your livelihood seems threatened by people who don't respect your rights, I am quite sure you will be the first one in court.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 10th, 2013 at 6:48 AM

Title: Re: Does software pirating break the second precept?

Content:

Qing Tian said:

Futerko wrote: Let's say that corporations claim ownership of the air. Are you still going to insist on legality, or will you challenge the validity of the law?

Really? I was talking about a product that has been created for the purpose of sale and you are talking about claiming ownership of something that is freely available to start with.

futerko said:

Tell that to the native populations of colonized lands.

Malcolm wrote:

Again, while I do not happen to agree with it, the notion of natural right of ownership is, in European law since Locke, superseded by the principle that the right to a resource belongs to that person who can best utilize it. John Winthrop writes in 1629, an attitude in whole derived from Locke:

That which lies common, and has never been replenished or subdued, is free to any that possess and improve it; for God hath given to the sons of men a double right to the earth — there is a natural right and a civil right. The first right was natural when men held the earth in common, every man sowing and feeding where he pleased. Then as men and their cattle increased, they appropriated certain parcels of ground by enclosing and peculiar cultivation, and this in time got them a civil right — such is the right which Ephron the Hittite had in the field of Mackpelah, wherein Abraham could not bury a dead corpse without leave, though for the out parts of the country he dwelt upon them and took the fruit of them at his pleasure. The like did Jacob, who fed his cattle as boldly in Hamor's land (for he is said to be Lord of the country) and in other places where he came, as the native inhabitants themselves. And in those times and places, that men accounted nothing their own but that which they had appropriated by their own industry, appears plainly by this — that Abimileck's servants in their own country, when they oft contended with Isaac's servants about wells which they had dug, yet never strove for the land wherein they were. So like between Jacob and Laban, he would not take a goat of Laban's without special contract, but he makes no bargain with them for the land where they fed, and it is very probable that, had the land not been as free for Jacob as for Laban, that covetous wretch would have made his advantage of it, and would have upbraided Jacob with it as he did with his cattle. As for the natives in New England, they enclose no land, neither have they any settled habitation, nor any tame cattle to improve the land by, and so have no other but a natural right to those countries. So if we leave them sufficient for their own use, we may lawfully take the rest, there being more than enough for them and for us.

But we all know how this ended...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 10th, 2013 at 6:21 AM

Title: Re: "Do not befriend the foolish"

Content:

Lindama said:

what is the context of this... could it also be talking about our own foolish parts? are we above it... and, what about family. Perhaps it is saying do not subscribe to foolishness in others.

old zen master talking to himself:

master, master... are you awake?

yes! yes!

don't be fooled by others

Malcolm wrote:

It is from the Bodhicarya-avatara. It means do not be familiar with immature people.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 10th, 2013 at 6:19 AM

Title: Re: Western world and buddhist life

Content:

pensum said:

Q: To many laypeople in the dharma today, the purity and uncompromising nature of your views will seem like a luxury, even an indulgence.

A: Many people seem to be all but overwhelmed by their jobs and their lives. To support themselves and their families there seems to be no choice but to get up each day and go to work. There is a certain kind of circularity here. People want to engage with teachings that point out that craving and clinging are root causes of stress. Yet people don't want to let go of patterns of being and consuming that fuel craving and clinging. We have to ask honestly whether the people you describe really want to be transformed or whether they are simply looking for ways to reduce their stress. What do they want?

From an interview with Mu Soeng <http://www.tricycle.com/interview/dharma-sale>

Malcolm wrote:
Reduce stress first.

Starve craving and clinging second.

You cannot let go of patterns of craving and clinging if you are stressed out.

Maslow's hierarchy of needs apply here.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Tuesday, December 10th, 2013 at 6:15 AM
Title: Re: Does software pirating break the second precept?
Content:
Malcolm wrote:
The can't claim ownership, they license bandwidth.

futerko said:
Of course, all you need to do is find a way to put a fence around it in order to claim distribution rights.

Malcolm wrote:
If you broadcast on someone else's bandwidth, you will be shutdown pretty fast.

M

Author: Malcolm
Date: Tuesday, December 10th, 2013 at 6:14 AM
Title: Re: Does software pirating break the second precept?
Content:
Qing Tian said:
I realise that my position is unpopular, but I have yet to hear a convincing argument to support piracy.

Mouse Soldier said:
I felt that my post, and the comparison to the invention of the printing press was somewhat apt. File sharing is a simple fact of life these days because it's so easy and the copyright laws concerning intellectual property are quickly becoming archaic. The printing press put many scribes out of work, but it brought with it wonderful new industries and opportunity for human development. In this analogy the printing press is the internet, and the scribes are corporations wanting to hold onto the old methods of doing things because the modern applications of the internet put their business model in jeopardy.

The biggest difference is that unlike the scribes, these corporations have a lot of money and power that they use to hold back the world from change, in the forms of copyright law and DRM technologies. Progress is inevitable, but they're certainly capable of gumming up the process some and continuing to profit from their arguably artificial means of remaining relevant. For now.

Malcolm wrote:

You are missing one tiny little fact in your analysis. Copyright laws are not going anywhere, since they are based on extremely ancient and deeply embedded principles of property rights that can be traced directly back to Roman Law:

...Roman law regulated the legal protection of property and the equality of legal subjects and their wills, and because it prescribed the possibility that the legal subjects could dispose their property through testament.

In US law, specifically copyright law is intended to ensure:

"...the Progress of Science and useful Arts, by securing for limited Times to Authors and Inventors the exclusive Right to their respective Writings and Discoveries."
Article I, Section 8, Clause 8, US Constitution.

Anything I write, be it code, music, etc., is protected by this law. This is why in the US, at any rate, it is quite illegal to download software that has been broken, DRM encryptions and so on. It is theft under US Law. Of course, if an author/artist wishes to relinquish this right, they may do so, hence Copyleft, and other alternate intellectual property schemes have been introduced.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 10th, 2013 at 6:05 AM

Title: Re: Does software pirating break the second precept?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

We are talking about whether or not it is theft/receiving stolen goods to download a pirated copy of say Logic Pro.

dzogchungpa said:

I am not saying it is right to download a pirated copy of Logic Pro. However, in all seriousness, I'm not sure it is either theft or receiving stolen goods. It might be illegal, but I don't think it is an example of either of those, legally speaking, and I don't think it's an example of either of those in the ordinary sense of those words either. Buddhists can condemn that kind of thing, but I don't think there's any point in misusing language in our eagerness to do so.

Johnny Dangerous said:

The right thing to do is download Audacity instead heh, and circumvent the whole ethical issue, as well as supporting people who want to make recording software for free, instead of people who ask $200 for a big box of cute bells and whistles;)

Malcolm wrote:

Audacity does not have all the bells and whistles. Its great for what it does. But Logic Pro infinitely more useful.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 10th, 2013 at 6:04 AM

Title: Re: Does software pirating break the second precept?

Content:

Qing Tian said:

Futerko, I felt that the claim was implicit.

As for... I personally find your relationship to rule-governed behaviour quite rigid. That's a fair point, although it is also an assumption. If people diligently followed the 8FP then I guess the 'rules' would not be required... but they don't and so they are. Discarding rules in a cavalier fashion without recourse to an acceptable ethical framework is likely to result in further suffering.

I realise that my position is unpopular, but I have yet to hear a convincing argument to support piracy.

You going to provide one?

futerko said:

Let's say that corporations claim ownership of the air. Are you still going to insist on legality, or will you challenge the validity of the law?

Malcolm wrote:

They can't claim ownership, they license bandwidth.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 10th, 2013 at 5:29 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen: Nongradual Buddhahood?

Content:

conebeckham said:

Sure, and also, important to the Kagyu Stew, he was a Kadampa Monk as well.....and then he met Milarepa.

smcj said:

And that Milarepa tried the Nyingma Dzogchen/sudden path too. It didn't work for him, so that's when he went to go find Marpa.

Malcolm wrote:

It would have, he just didn't understand the instructions and did not meditate. So Rongton sent him to Marpa.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 10th, 2013 at 5:23 AM

Title: Re: "Do not befriend the foolish"

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

གསུངས་ is both the imperative as well as the past. Tibetan does not have a "perfect past" It has only three conjugations of verbs, past/future; present/infinitive and imperative. Often the imperative is morphologically the same as the past tense.

So this line could be read both ways i.e. as a command or as past tense.

Generally, for bshes pa to be a verb, it usually requires the auxiliary "byed pa". Here the auxiliary [bya/byed] is elided, but implied.

It could also be translated completely nominally: "Do not be a friend to immature [person] at all", etc.

Depending on dialect, བྱིས་པ་ is pronounced something like "ji/chi pa"; but in Amdo, it would be "Yay pa"

kirtu said:

From Hacket, "A Tibetan Verb Lexicon": བྱིས་པ་འགའ་ཡང་བཤེས་མེན་ཞེས། །དེ་བཞིན་གཤེགས་པ་རྣམས་ཀྱིས་གསུངས།: All the Tathagatas have said "Do not befriend the foolish".

Why does Hacket insert "have" to change གསུངས། to the perfect past? Is there actually a perfect past in Tibetan as opposed to just a past tense (perfect past being things that are actually completed and often a while ago)?

How does this get parsed out: བྱིས་པ་འགའ་ཡང་བཤེས་མེན་ཞེས།:

བྱིས་པ་: foolish beings

འགའ་ཡང་: at all, whatsoever

བཤེས་: friend

མེན་: not

ཞེས།: particle indicating quote

"Do not become friends at all with foolish beings" - ? Is བཞེས actually a verb? Otherwise what is the logic behind this construction?

Also how is བྱེས་པ་ pronounced? be pa (bay pa) ?

Thanks!

Kirt

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 10th, 2013 at 4:32 AM

Title: Re: Does software pirating break the second precept?

Content:

futerko said:

Well, going back a few years, the Sex Pistols weren't too impressed with EMI...

Malcolm wrote:

The Great Rock and Roll Swindle anyone?

<http://sabotagetimes.com/reportage/the-untold-story-behind-the-great-rock-n-roll-swindle/>

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 10th, 2013 at 3:57 AM

Title: Re: Does software pirating break the second precept?

Content:

futerko said:

Debating the technicalities of whether this is theft, or receiving stolen property, or not, strikes me as rather misplaced.

On the one side - of course corporate property laws designed for maximum profit and establishing a monopoly are suspect and bordering on the exploitative.

On the other - the demand for a steady stream of high production entertainment is also unhealthy for the individual and plays right into the hands of those corporations.

Clearly it is preferable for those individuals to break the cycle of addiction, however it is also desirable to break the corporate stranglehold on artistic content.

Malcolm wrote:

Ahem....it is generally the artists themselves that want these protections....

In any case we are not really taking about Metallica.

We are talking about whether or not it is theft/receiving stolen goods to download a pirated copy of say Logic Pro.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 10th, 2013 at 3:07 AM

Title: Re: Does software pirating break the second precept?

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

If you say it's a question of degree, OK,

Malcolm wrote:

It is a question of law.

dzogchungpa said:

If you mean that it is stealing or pirating because the law forbids it, maybe that makes sense in a certain way, but I am addressing the "depriving of profits" = "stealing/pirating" argument, i.e the idea that if someone is "deprived" of profits than an act of stealing or piracy, according to the ordinary understanding of those terms, has taken place. If one accepts that idea, then honestly I believe one would have to admit that libraries are engaged in pirating books as well. For example, I have access through my local library to the link+ system: <http://csul.iii.com/screens/members.html>. I used to buy many books, both used and new, but when I started to use that system, I basically didn't need to anymore, and so I more or less stopped buying books. I doubt authors, publishers and bookstores benefited as a result. Does that mean someone stole or pirated something? It seems that some here would say yes, but I don't think so.

Malcolm wrote:

As I pointed out to you -- libraries pay a higher price for books in general than you do personally.

Also, one can loan and borrow books on Amazon [for a yearly surcharge which is part of Amazon Prime -- clearly some portion of this is being paid to the publishers].

Authors benefit because they their books are being read (they are paid a higher royalty for library sales), Libraries benefit because they can purchase more books. Bookstores do not benefit from libraries of course, but that is the market for you. Libraries and bookstores are in competition which is why B&N etc., permit you to browse and read books in their place, a deferred sales strategy, if you will.

All of this is off-topic however.

In any case: it is clear that downloading software that has been broken into by defeating its cryptographic protections is theft. Those protections are placed on software sold to companies and individuals. You or the company is issued a license to use that software. If you break the encryption or give away the key to your unique copy of that software to others, you are guilty of theft. If you download pirated software, you are not guilty of stealing exactly, you are guilty of receiving stolen goods, technically. But receipt of stolen goods is still "taking what has not been given".

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 10th, 2013 at 2:08 AM

Title: Re: Does software pirating break the second precept?

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

If you say it's a question of degree, OK,

Malcolm wrote:

It is a question of law.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 10th, 2013 at 1:38 AM

Title: Re: Does software pirating break the second precept?

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

Are libraries pirating books?

Malcolm wrote:

The answer is no. Publishers price books for libraries at a much higher price than for individuals exactly for this purpose. In fact, some publishers, like Brill, price their speciality books primarily for libraries, which is why they are so expensive.

dzogchungpa said:

OK, but let's say I give the library a book, having paid the regular price for it. Then the library would be pirating it by lending it out and thereby depriving the publisher of profits?

Malcolm wrote:

Not at all. The publisher would only be deprived of profits if you took the book out of the library copied it, and gave it to your friends. This is why most large copy shops in the US will not copy books.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 10th, 2013 at 1:18 AM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

michaelb said:

Malcolm, I thought maize had been a staple in S.American diet for a very long time, but the widespread use of modified maize syrup was linked to global rise in obesity.

Malcolm wrote:

Domestic cattle, pigs and chicken were only introduced to the Americans in the 16th century by the Spanish. The primary domesticated meat animals of the Americas were dogs and turkeys until this time.

Maize is a crop developed by humans in Central Mexico some believe around 4600 years ago, though others assert it is as old as 10,000 -- it is not clear.

Maize is the only crop we grow that is entirely dependent on human intervention for its propagation. Maize never existed in the wild, unlike wheat, rye, oats, barely and so on. Plant geneticists are still not entirely certain exactly which plants were hybridized to create Maize. The main plant that people think maize comes from is a wild grass called Teosinte.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 10th, 2013 at 1:17 AM

Title: Re: Does software pirating break the second precept?

Content:

Jainarayan said:

There are technological safeguards against photocopying and digital copying. If they are not employed by the publisher or distributor, that says to me they are well aware that the materials will be copied. One can go into a Barnes & Noble, get a Starbucks coffee, sit and read a book cover to cover, put it back on the shelf and leave. This is actually encouraged by B&N. B&N has paid for the book, and you are reading it using their facilities without paying for anything other than coffee and maybe a brownie. Is that stealing? B&N doesn't think so. The author and publisher got their share. Now, to make money by selling the copied materials is preceptually wrong as well as illegal, imo.

Malcolm wrote:

Of course, Amazon has forced B&N into near bankruptcy. And libraries around the US are shuttering their doors.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 10th, 2013 at 1:15 AM

Title: Re: Does software pirating break the second precept?

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

Are libraries pirating books?

Malcolm wrote:

The answer is no. Publishers price books for libraries at a much higher price than for individuals exactly for this purpose. In fact, some publishers, like Brill, price their speciality books primarily for libraries, which is why they are so expensive.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 10th, 2013 at 12:58 AM

Title: Re: Does software pirating break the second precept?

Content:

Karma Dorje said:

I am not making it out to be innocent. It is clearly breaking the law. What it is not doing is breaking the 2nd precept.

Malcolm wrote:

Vasubandhu established the judicial character of the second precept as follows:

To take a thing that does not have an owner is to take what is not given by the ruler of a country.

So, for Canadians, downloading music and tv shows is not a violation of the second precept since it is permitted by their government, whereas for Americans it is, since this kind of activity is prohibited by my government.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 10th, 2013 at 12:47 AM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

michaelb said:

Does anyone just feed livestock grass and hay? Do pigs and chickens eat grass? I thought, due to lack of space and the weather, even 'organic' cattle are kept inside for at least a few months a year and fed soya, bonemeal and stuff made from chicken feathers. Non-organic livestock are fed GM soya, of course as well as a bunch of other odd stuff (chickens are already cannibals, for example.)

Malcolm wrote:

Chicken meat and pork was traditionally more expensive than beef because these animals require grain in general as part of their diet. Now they are less expensive than beef pound for pound in the US because corn is subsidized by the US Government.

Not only that, but in general, meat of all kinds was traditionally also a seasonal food. In northern climes, animals would not be slaughtered until the autumn. People did not eat steaks year round. It is only with the advent of refrigeration that the modern industrial economy of meat is even possible.

For most of the year, what meat was in people's diets was usually sausage and dried meats in general, added in some portions to meals. Arguably, people were healthier as a result.

From a dietary point of view meat and dairy combined is a very building diet. It is no mistake that individuals in meat/dairy eating societies are larger, heavier and stronger (as well as more aggressive) than those in societies who eat little or no meat.

In the organic "local" beef industry, there are two kinds of programs, grass finished and grain finished. Grain finished beef has more fat. However, maize is a relatively recent crop in human history, and cattle never evolved to properly digest it. It is very harmful for them. The reason so much antibiotic is used in grain-fed feedlot beef, as well as grain-fed dairy cattle, is that corn causes acidosis in cattle which in turn leaves them open to infection, and so on.

Also, there is however another problem (similar to the biofuel craze) -- the craze for grass fed beef has led to clearing rainforest in South America and elsewhere, which is why it is important for an environmentally conscientious omnivore to only eat locally sourced meat.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 10th, 2013 at 12:17 AM

Title: Re: Does software pirating break the second precept?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

You can't even own physical things. The idea of owning physical things is also a metaphor. In fact, the criteria for stealing is based on another's sense of property, not our own.

Karma Dorje said:

If I observe your car parked in your driveway and create a replica of it, you are saying that I stole your car? There is very obviously a difference between copying something and stealing it. If I steal your car, I deprive you of its use. If I copy your car, there are now more cars.

Malcolm wrote:

If I invent a car and patent it, then you copy it and then sell it, then you are stealing.

I understand that in Canada, downloading pirated material is not illegal. But it is in the US. Hence, in the US, downloading music and software online is illegal, whereas if I make a cd of music I own and give it to someone, it is not illegal. Such is the nature of the contradictory laws.

However, in general, since a piece of code is regarded as property, under US law, downloading pirated versions of Acrobat (where the software key has been compromised) is illegal. Giving away that key to others is also illegal, as you know.

DMR also is used for the same reason. You have to break the DMR to pirate iTunes music. Of course, if you buy the CD, copy it and give those copies to your friends, this is not illegal. If you upload that copy to the internet, however, you will definitely be busted eventually if you do it a lot, and are a US citizen.

But in general the second precept refers to taking what is not given. This also applies to a $50 bill lying on the ground. If you wish to be very diligent, it is better you do not pick it up. The same applies to digital media. As I said, there are certain Academic books that I will download from Scribd (some of which I have bought in the past for $$$) to further my research. But in general, I have a policy of not using that which I have not paid for, whether it is software, music, tv, movies, etc.

In the end it is a question of individual conscience as well as local laws. If I were Canadian, I would probably not be so reticent about downloading music and so on, since it is not illegal in Canada to do so. I would not download pirated software however, because that has been digitally broken into in order to be distributed.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, December 9th, 2013 at 11:53 PM

Title: Re: Dzogchen: Nongradual Buddhahood?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

But even so, this text does not really offer a clear affirmation of primordial buddhahood.

Sherab Dorje said:

The Gampopa quote clearly does. Pretty funny when you consider that Gampopa was (for the Karma Kagyu) the "founder" of the whole gradualist approach.

Malcolm wrote:

Gampopa taught what he thought was appropriate for his audience.

You must remember however that Gampopa was a Dzogchen practitioner from a young age, as he originally was a Nyingmapa.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, December 9th, 2013 at 10:43 PM

Title: Re: Does software pirating break the second precept?

Content:

Indrajala said:

Copying and pasting data is not taking. It is copying. Sharing.

Mouse Soldier said:

It's not the data we may be "stealing", it's the money that would have been paid out had we purchased the data.

Karma Dorje said:

This makes no sense. Who is in possession of "the money that would have been paid out"? You can't steal something that someone might have in the future, only something they actually possess. All of these problem ensue from regarding a metaphor as a actuality. You can't own ideas, only physical things. If someone steals a physical book, it's theft. If someone photocopies the book, it's a copyright infringement and this has certain legal significance. Trying to intrude buddhist morality into what is simply a matter of contractual law is perverse and strange.

Malcolm wrote:

You can't even own physical things. The idea of owning physical things is also a metaphor. In fact, the criteria for stealing is based on another's sense of property, not our own.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, December 9th, 2013 at 9:38 PM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

seeker242 said:

"By eating meat we share the responsibility of climate change, the destruction of our forests, and the poisoning of our air and water. The simple act of becoming a vegetarian will make a difference in the health of our planet."

Yes, we do have a choice.

Malcolm wrote:

I think that Thich Nhat Hahn is making a massive oversimplification.

seeker242 said:

I think the statement is massively simple but at the same time does accurately reflect and summarize the complex situation. Modern day animal agriculture is extremely destructive to the environment.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes that is true. However, it is not true that eating meat necessarily adds to that. That really depends upon the source of the meat that one eats. Eating meat from commercial feed lots is very destructive, as opposed to pasture raised, strictly grass fed beef and dairy which does not depend on grain which is not environmentally destructive at all. If we wish to stem environmentally destructive meat, it is simple enough to change from industrially produced meat to locally produced meat. However, that also requires changing our plant consumption from industrial agriculture too. As i have pointed out many times, industrial level organic farming absolutely requires animal concentrates at levels possible only because of industrial levels of animal husbandry and slaughter.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, December 9th, 2013 at 11:59 AM

Title: Re: Does software pirating break the second precept?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Buddhist ethics also recognize that one must obey the laws of whatever society one belongs to.

Indrajala said:

That's just a general idea really.

Malcolm wrote:

No, it is a very specific fact of buddhist ethics which as you know has commentarial support.

The sangha is capable of adjudicating only breaches of vows, but not crimes, or even civil disputes.

Taking what is not given applies to anything someone else regards as their property, including intellectual property.

For this reason, while i certainly dont pretend to be a perfect upasaka,, i never diownload pirated music or software. I admit to downloading brilll publications however, and other academic buddhist works that are priced for libraries in order to further my research. But i recognize that it is not a perfect thing to do.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, December 9th, 2013 at 11:33 AM

Title: Re: Does software pirating break the second precept?

Content:

Indrajala said:

Copyright laws are not covered in any pre-modern discussion of Buddhist ethics because they didn't exist.

The general understanding of theft requires that you successfully physically move something you recognize as belonging to another person without their consent.

To copy and paste data does not qualify as theft in that respect. In Buddhist ethics you cannot steal a song, because a song is not something you can deprive from another.

Malcolm wrote:

Sure it does.

Buddhist ethics also recognize that one must obey the laws of whatever society one belongs to.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, December 9th, 2013 at 8:52 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen: Nongradual Buddhahood?

Content:

Caz said:

Is this Rigpa the same as Clear light ? or is it a seperate entity ?

Malcolm wrote:

That “Mind of” [kyi sems] is the unmixed totally complete essence, the primal nature of the eight consciousnesses endowed with a luminous [‘od gsal] identity which inherently never wavers into any extreme at all, free from all extremes, naturally pure and unwavering in the three times.

Now then, if it is asked “Is it not impossible for such a pure primal nature to appear to the mind of a person?”, it is possible, called “vidyā” [rig pa, the knowing aspect of the mind]. The vidyā of migrating beings itself appears as the mental consciousness in terms of apprehending subjects and apprehended objects. When vidyā manifests its own primal nature, the mental consciousness manifests as self-originated wisdom, and then the pure basis of the mental consciousness (free from the root of an apprehending subject and apprehended objects) bring samsara to an end. The wisdom of one’s vidyā (without root or leaf) — naturally perfected as it all-encompassingly subsumes everything — is the true state [de kho na nyid].

-- The Sun That Illuminates the Meaning

You really ought to read that text by Tsongkhapa that I mentioned to TK fan. It is useless to quote texts to you from the Dzogchen tradition directly in some respects, but you cannot reject the writing of the founder of your own lineage.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, December 9th, 2013 at 8:36 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen: Nongradual Buddhahood?

Content:

Caz said:

Malcolm

Well yes it is to the muddled minds of sentient beings it (samsara) is a very real object.

Malcolm wrote:

So you grant samsara is not real, is not established etc.?

Is that "muddle" in the minds of sentient beings real or not?

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, December 9th, 2013 at 8:15 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen: Nongradual Buddhahood?

Content:

Caz said:

How can Buddhahood be Inherently accomplished when it is not manifest ? If it was Inherent as suggested then by nature it would be unchanging and hence never unmanifest yet sentient beings still experience Samsaric suffering and have to work hard to accomplish Enlightenment.

The potentiality is always present but how could Buddhahood be present in the mind of an ordinary being ?

asunthatneversets said:

Primordial wisdom [ye shes] is originally pure [ka dag] and naturally perfected [lhun grub], all that is required is recognition. From the standpoint of wisdom the whole charade of samsāra and nirvāna is illusory and unreal.

Caz said:

If its naturally perfected why is it unmanifest ? If it is Primordial and naturally perfected why is there Samsara in the first place ?

Malcolm wrote:

Is samsara there in the first place?

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, December 9th, 2013 at 4:48 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen: Nongradual Buddhahood?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

I would say that Mr. Esler has a slightly anachronistic read of Nubchen. None of the text available to Nubs, AFAIK, use terms like gzhi snang and so on. In this footnote, at any rate, he is reading the man ngag sde text doctrine into the bodhicitta texts. I would say this is erroneous.

dzogchungpa said:

OK, that's interesting. Is his statement about grol-gzhi and 'khrul-gzhi accurate then? If so, would it be possible to explain how the bodhicitta texts view of gzhi differ from what he says in his footnote?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, in the bodhicitta texts, no distinction is made between the kun gzhi and the gzhi i.e. the all-basis and the basis.

It is true, however that in the bodicitta texts, the all-basis is both the basis of liberation and delusion depending upon whether one has received instructions or not.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, December 9th, 2013 at 4:31 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen: Nongradual Buddhahood?

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

Footnote 10 reads in part as: As such, the ground is always alpha-pure (ka-dag); it is according to an individual's recognition or non-recognition of the ground's illumination (gzhi-sngang) that it becomes, in the experience of a Buddha, the ground of liberation (grol-gzhi) and, in the experience of ordinary sentient beings, the ground of confusion. Of course I don't know if the above is in line with Malcolm's thinking.

Malcolm wrote:

I would say that Mr. Esler has a slightly anachronistic read of Nubchen. None of the text available to Nubs, AFAIK, use terms like gzhi sngang and so on. In this footnote, at any rate, he is reading the man ngag sde text doctrine into the bodhicitta texts. I would say this is erroneous.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, December 9th, 2013 at 2:15 AM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

seeker242 said:

"By eating meat we share the responsibility of climate change, the destruction of our forests, and the poisoning of our air and water. The simple act of becoming a vegetarian will make a difference in the health of our planet."

Yes, we do have a choice.

Malcolm wrote:

I think that Thich Nhat Hahn is making a massive oversimplification.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, December 9th, 2013 at 1:44 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen: Nongradual Buddhahood?

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

Whatever turns you on dude!

How about this one?

"Meditation:
why look for freedom in a lie?

The net of illusion:
why hold it so tight?

Trust in the truth
of the precious guru's word;

Saraha says:
I've made my declaration."

or this one:

"No tantra, no mantra,
no reflection or recollection -

Hey fool! All this is the cause of error.

Mind is unstained - don't taint it with meditation;

you're living in bliss:
don't torment yourself."
Saraha

Malcolm wrote:
As I said, Saraha is not deluded.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Monday, December 9th, 2013 at 1:07 AM
Title: Re: Dzogchen: Nongradual Buddhahood?
Content:
Sherab Dorje said:
Mhamudra is primordial too.

Malcolm wrote:
Well, parse it out for us then, Greg.

Maitripa states in the Mahāmudrākanakamālā:

In the same way, when not realized, samsara and nirvana are analyzed separately; when realized, samsara has always been the kāya of the great buddha.

But this is a little different.

Sherab Dorje said:

"1) To have a decisive understanding about the True Nature

Mahamudra has no causes.

Mahamudra has no conditions.

Mahamudra has no methods.

Mahamudra has no path.

Mahamudra has no result."

Gampopa The Very Essence of Mind, Mahamudra, the One sufficient Path

"6. For thousands of aeons, the sun that shines every day has never been clouded by darkness.

Likewise, the real nature of the mind's clear light of awareness
Has never been clouded by the cycle of samsara.

12. Never leave Thatness, but don't stay in it either and don't try to represent it.
Simply vow never to leave it, and nothing will obscure the flames [of awakening].
Beyond the reactivity of the [ordinary] mind moving toward and moving away, not trying to stay, not even trying to see it, then you will see everything there is to see!"
Tilopa Ganges Mahamudra

Malcolm wrote:

You should have cited this verse:

Practitioners of mantra, of the perfections, of discipline, and of the sutras and so on do not see the luminosity of mahāmudrā, with their own texts and theories, luminosity is not seen, obscured with such wishful thinking.

And this:

Beyond all objects of perception, the nature of the mind is clarity, without a path to traverse, the path of Buddhahood is entered, if one cultivates without an object of meditation, one will attain unsurpassed awakening.

But even so, this text does not really offer a clear affirmation of primordial buddhahood.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, December 9th, 2013 at 12:36 AM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

seeker242 said:

I do have a bias towards not abusing and not mass killing of billions of living beings.

Malcolm wrote:

Then you need to understand that all agriculture will result in the same thing (i.e. the mass killing of billions of living beings).

Factually speaking, we have a choice -- we can, as we have for the past ten millenia, continue to rely on animal inputs for fertilizing agriculture (which has a corollary, we cannot support or sustain a large population of animals that are not producing inputs into that system, hence the need for slaughter); or we can continue to poison the planet by reliance on petrochemicals (which are increasingly more difficult and dangerous for our environment to extract).

The choice is yours. We either have a living biosystem where living beings (plants and animals) feed on other living beings (plants and animals), or we have a poisoned planet where everything dies apart from humans and those plants and animals we choose to preserve.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, December 9th, 2013 at 12:29 AM

Title: Re: Evolution of Pure Land

Content:

zamotcr said:

Right now, undersating and seeying this evolution of concepts and ideas, give me a broader view of Mahayana buddhism, very different from Theravada, and that is, Mahayana is a living religion, evolving with new views and interpretations

kirtu said:

So is Theravada. There used to be 16 or 17 or so Sravaka lineages and now there is only one. And few people know the history of Theravada going back several centuries, for example. But there are still many different Mahayana lineages. We are seeing changes in Mahayana over centuries up to 2.5 millenia. The changes that we are seeing in Theravada are not so obvious and are much more incremental because we are seeing them over a period of decades to 150 years (so the lifespans of 4-5 masters max).

Kirt

Malcolm wrote:

There are three in fact: Theravada, Mulasarvastivada and Dharmaguptaka.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, December 9th, 2013 at 12:23 AM

Title: Re: Evolution of Pure Land

Content:

zamotcr said:

I have been studying the Lotus Sutra this days and I found the concept of Pure Land to be different from the general accepted view. It's like the Pure Land concept and theory (or comology, perhaps) has evolved from it's inception.

Malcolm wrote:

Chances are, the archeological foundation for the concept of the "western paradise" was <https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Pasargadae> as well as https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Persian_Gardens

See this interesting paper as well:

http://www.sino-platonic.org/complete/spp076_buddhism_paradise.pdf

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 8th, 2013 at 11:52 PM

Title: Re: Dzogchen: Nongradual Buddhahood?

Content:

invisiblediamond said:

I've got this really strong feeling that Dzogchen is a restatement of Zoroastrianism, transmuting the impure matter into light.?

Malcolm wrote:

I think you are confusing Zoroastrianism with Manichaeism.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 8th, 2013 at 11:29 PM

Title: Re: Is the tulku system too exclusive?

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

What are you talking about Malcolm? Your teacher is arecognised tulku from a family (lineage) of tulkus and nobility to boot. His son (and likely heir) is a tulku that was enthroned and "given" a monastery (seat) too. He even wore a funny hat and rode a pony to prove it. Sure, neither of them hold monks vows but they are 100% part of the tulku deal.

Malcolm wrote:

It is true that both Norbu Rinpoche and his son are tulkus. But Dzogchen Community itself has no affiliation with any monastic seat. It does not invite teachers from any specified monastic lineage. It does not feed students to any monastic establishment.

While it may be the case that both ChNN and Yeshe Namkhai are nominally abbots (via reincarnation) of two Tibetan monasteries (In the case of the former a Drukpa Kagyu Monastery in Central Tibet; in the case of the latter, a Sakya monastery near Dege), very little fund raising is ever done to support them in the DC. They are supported by Tibetans, not westerners.

As I said, the DC is independent, and is not grounded in the Tibetan monastic establishment. While ChNN has thousands of "students" in Tibet, he has focused most of his attention teaching in the West. He has spent all of his adult life in the West (Happy Bday Rinpoche!!!!), moving to Rome when he was 23 or so (in 1961).

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 8th, 2013 at 11:14 PM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

seeker242 said:

Some people just don't seem to understand that it's about the animals...

Abuse like this is commonplace...It has been found... every...single...time...they have done undercover investigations. It's the rule, not the exception. Is this ethical? How can anyone willingly be involved with this?

Malcolm wrote:

Right. It is about the animals.

But why do you assume that everyone who consumes meat lacks awareness of the horrors of industrial animal husbandry?

Why do you assume it is impossible to make other economic choices about what kind of meat is to be consumed?

And why do you assume you have to only solution to their suffering, even so?

Actually, if one consumes meat it does not add to suffering; refraining from eating meat contributes nothing to the reduction of suffering,

You may think you are reducing suffering of animals by not consuming their flesh, but it isn't so. Thinking that it is so means you understood nothing about the nature of suffering.

If you don't want to eat meat, for whatever reason, that is fine. But you should understand that your choices are not objective.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 8th, 2013 at 11:10 PM

Title: Re: Dzogchen: Nongradual Buddhahood?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

We have three kinds of proposed buddhahood in various schools:

gradual -- ala sutra and most Vajrayāna sudden/non-gradual -- Mahāmudra/Chan

primordial -- Dzogchen.

Punya said:

Sorry to backtrack but why use the word primordial which in everyday english seems to have a time connotation? What is the tibetan word and is there an alternative translation?

dzogchungpa said:

I'm sure Malcolm will respond, but I think it is most likely 'gdod ma', or possibly 'thog ma'.

Malcolm wrote:

"ye nas"

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 8th, 2013 at 11:08 PM

Title: Re: Is the tulku system too exclusive?

Content:

KonchokZoepa said:

i dont know if the story of milarepa is true or not, but if you know its not, where does your sources come from in this matter?

Malcolm wrote:

One of the difficult things in studying pre-modern cultures is sorting out myth, legend and outright fabrication from history.

As it stands, the biography of Milarepa penned by Tsang Nyon Heruka is mostly religious fiction. If you want to know the details of the evolution of Milarepa's biography and its shifting set of details between the 12th century and the 16th, consult Peter Alan Robert's book, The Biographies of Rechungpa: The Evolution of a Tibetan Hagiography

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 8th, 2013 at 11:03 PM

Title: Re: Is the tulku system too exclusive?

Content:

Pero said:

...this would be nothing other than new-age nonsense.

Indrajala said:

Not really. In most forms of Buddhism you can practice anything you read in scripture without permission or initiation of any sort. Vajrayāna is the exception.

Malcolm wrote:

And of course, the common misunderstanding of empowerments/initiations is that they are merely there to allow you to practice something. In fact empowerment is the primary method of liberation in Vajrayāna. It is only if you do not wake up from the empowerment itself that you are given a sadhana to practice.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 8th, 2013 at 10:42 PM

Title: Re: Dzogchen: Nongradual Buddhahood?

Content:

Tsongkhapa said:

Okay...while we're on this subject, I want to ask why Buddhists rely on Dzogchen when it was not taught by Buddha Shakyamuni or Buddha Vajradhara. I'm prepared to be corrected, but to my knowledge Buddha never taught about Rigpa or Dzogchen, or about primordial Buddhahood. There are the Buddhanature teachings in the Third turning of the Wheel of Dharma but these are not definitive, just interpretative. Can anyone explain the definitive source of the Dzogchen teachings and show that they are Buddhist?

Malcolm wrote:

For Gelugpas, Dzogchen was validated by Tsongkhapa in a text that appears in the first volume of the Zhol edition of Tsongkhapa's collected works called the zhu lan sman mchog bdud rtsi'i phreng ba (blo bzang grags pa'i dpal. "zhu lan sman mchog bdud rtsi'i phreng ba." In gsung 'bum/_tsong kha pa (zhol). TBRC W635. 1: 295 - 320. new delhi, india: mongolian lama guru deva, 1978-1979.

http://tbrc.org/link?RID=O2CZ7209%7CO2CZ72092CZ7221\$W635)

The English translation can be found in the LTWA publication, Life and Teachings of Tsongkhapa.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 8th, 2013 at 8:31 PM

Title: Re: Is the tulku system too exclusive?

Content:

Pero said:

IMO, the tulku system is not an actual part of my "religion". It is more like some kind of religious political system. I don't doubt there are some true tulkus but I personally couldn't care less who recognized who, it means absolutely nothing.

Indrajala said:

Yet much of your lineage leadership is presumably decided by men who were given the tulku title at birth, as decided by a group of people you have few connections with. Many exclusive resources are put into tulkus which, perhaps, part of your contributions go to.

But then I guess if you don't pay into the system, it isn't an issue. Also, it won't matter if your tradition in your home country is politically and financially autonomous.

Malcolm wrote:

Pero and i do not belong to a school grounded in the traditional tibetan monastic system. So it is not really an issue for us.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 8th, 2013 at 10:16 AM

Title: Re: Is the tulku system too exclusive?

Content:

Indrajala said:

As non-Tibetan Tibetan Buddhists, do you ever feel the tulku system ethnically excludes you? I know there are western tulkus, but not really so many (several of them don't have good track records to date too).

At best you can really just watch from the sidelines as the top Tibetan clerics make their judgements and write letters announcing a new tulku has been found. The whole administrative process and top brass are dominated by a small echelon of Tibetan men. As patrons and practitioners, doesn't it ever feel like you're being excluded from your own religion which you are supposed to be part and parcel of?

I don't ask that to be provocative. I'm actually interested in knowing what people think. You pay for and practice religious traditions which don't really embrace you or your kind into the administrative fold (at least not yet, but it doesn't seem like it will happen anytime soon).

Malcolm wrote:

No more exclusive than the catholic church...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 8th, 2013 at 9:02 AM

Title: Is the tulku system too exclusive?

Content:

Pero said:

IMO, the tulku system is not an actual part of my "religion". It is more like some kind of religious political system. I don't doubt there are some true tulkus but I personally couldn't care less who recognized who, it means absolutely nothing.

Malcolm wrote:

Seconded.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 8th, 2013 at 8:10 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen: Nongradual Buddhahood?

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

but if one rejects meditation in atiyoga, how will it not become endowed with accepting and rejecting?

Does this mean that if a dzogchen practitioner decides on the basis of the preceding part of the quotation that there is no meditation to be done, he or she will stray into accepting and rejecting?

Malcolm wrote:

Indeed.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 8th, 2013 at 7:55 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen: Nongradual Buddhahood?

Content:

invisiblediamond said:

When a student meets a sudden buddhahood teacher, and is introduced, it is different than when a student meets a primordial buddhahood teacher and is introduced, because...

Malcolm wrote:

Because the former still thinks there is something missing.

Sherab said:

There is something missing. That something is realization. Other than that, nothing else is missing.

Malcolm wrote:

What is missing is the following confidence:

The realization of the truth is that since there is nothing to realize, there is no meditation — one should have confidence that there is nothing to mediate upon. If there is something to realize, for what reason do an object to realize and a realizer not occur? All the teachings of meditation taught in the intimate instructions merely demonstrate meditating on one's vidyā without one moving because there is no inside and outside, but if one rejects meditation in atiyoga, how will it not become endowed with accepting and rejecting?

-- The Sun of the Heart

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 8th, 2013 at 6:51 AM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

Simon E. said:

Or in extreme cases posting material that suggests that meat eaters are hell bound. I think seeker242's "yes !" in the context of that thread shows clearly that he thinks that the text in question indicates that HHDL is going to hell because he is a meat eater. T

Malcolm wrote:

Well, when your path requires three incalculable eons, you have to be a bit more careful, Simon.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 8th, 2013 at 5:44 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist ethics at a national level

Content:

kirtu said:

Legal redress in the US is severely limited.

Malcolm wrote:

That is an over-generalization.

In Yankeedom and the Left Coast, things are easier.

You live on the border of the Deep South. Your perspective about the US is heavily colored by the fact that you on the edge the cultural sphere of one of the most brutal, aggressive and repressive societies every known, founded at Charleston by slavers from Barbados.

You should read American Nations (Woodard, 2011) -- it provides the answer for why I generally disagree with your characterizations of the "US". You live in a "US" I never have. I live in a "US" that you don't.

(Ironically, on another note, Obamacare was indirectly hatched by the Heritage Foundation...which is why it is such a cluster...)

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 8th, 2013 at 5:13 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist ethics at a national level

Content:

Indrajala said:

Pornography, prostitution and so on...

Malcolm wrote:

Sex work is only a vice under patriarchy.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 8th, 2013 at 5:08 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen: Nongradual Buddhahood?

Content:

invisiblediamond said:

When a student meets a sudden buddhahood teacher, and is introduced, it is different than when a student meets a primordial buddhahood teacher and is introduced, because...

Malcolm wrote:

Because the former still thinks there is something missing.

Luke said:

Then what is the difference between a Dzogchen master and an ordinary person who is completely content with ordinary life, who could care less about religion, and who doesn't feel that "there is something missing" either?

Malcolm wrote:

Nothing. Buddhas and sentient beings are nondual.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 8th, 2013 at 2:54 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen: Nongradual Buddhahood?

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

That's quite a smoke screen but it seems to me to be a long winded way of just saying "No!".

Malcolm wrote:

Nondual great bliss is the conduct of all sentient beings, demonstrated as a mistaken path by the deluded.

-- Innermost Great Potentiality

Enjoy your buddhahood while you still can, Greg.

M

Sherab Dorje said:
Fat chance, I'm too busy enjoying my ignorance!
"Existence is Nirvana - indeed, they can't be considered apart;

they lack a single nature - to me they are completely stainless."
Saraha

Malcolm wrote:
Saraha was not deluded, indeed.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Sunday, December 8th, 2013 at 2:47 AM
Title: Re: Dzogchen: Nongradual Buddhahood?
Content:
Sherab Dorje said:
Mhamudra is primordial too.

Malcolm wrote:
Well, parse it out for us then, Greg.

Maitripa states in the Mahāmudrākanakamālā:

In the same way, when not realized, samsara and nirvana are analyzed separately; when realized, samsara has always been the kāya of the great buddha.

But this is a little different.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Sunday, December 8th, 2013 at 2:35 AM
Title: Re: Dzogchen: Nongradual Buddhahood?
Content:
invisiblediamond said:
So are we primordial samyaksambuddhas then? The Four Visions are not traversed in time?

Malcolm wrote:
All qualities of buddhahood are complete in all sentient beings.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 8th, 2013 at 2:31 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen: Nongradual Buddhahood?

Content:

invisiblediamond said:

When a student meets a sudden buddhahood teacher, and is introduced, it is different than when a student meets a primordial buddhahood teacher and is introduced, because...

Malcolm wrote:

Because the former still thinks there is something missing.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 8th, 2013 at 2:13 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen: Nongradual Buddhahood?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Indeed, it is not correct to term Dzogchen "nongradual".

dzogchungpa said:

It is beyond cause and effect though, right?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, this is why the term "nongradual" is not very accurate when used to describe Dzogchen. We have three kinds of proposed buddhahood in various schools:

gradual -- ala sutra and most Vajrayāna sudden/non-gradual -- Mahāmudra/Chan
primordial -- Dzogchen.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 8th, 2013 at 2:09 AM

Title: Re: Good stretches for prostration.

Content:

smcj said:

Start doing them before the retreat. On a physical level it is like getting into shape for any physical exercise. You do NOT want to just start doing hundreds a day! You will be so sore you'll have to stop, and your other meditations will suffer as well. Get into shape before the retreat!

The important thing about prostration boards (if your teacher will allow them) is that your feet are 3"-4" below where your knees hit. That makes pushing up MUCH easier, which saves your stomach muscles. Also get a soft pad and tape it down where your knees hit. A couple pieces of spare carpet will do for hand sliders. I use a swimmers lap counter instead of a hand male to count. It fits on your finger and isn't sliding around, which can be annoying.

Good luck!

Malcolm wrote:

There are the three main injuries that turn prostrations into a harmful and injurious activity as opposed to what they are supposed to be: a yoga for loosening the main channels of the body. These are: Injuries to the cervical spine, the lumbar spine, and the knees.

To prevent injuries to the neck, lower your head as you bend down.

To prevent injuries to the small of your back as well as your knees, you should never allow your knees to "hit", nor should you slide out from a kneeling position. You should slide out to the up position of a pushup, and then lower your body in such a way that you do not "hit" your knees (which causes many practitioners to have lifelong knee injuries) nor strain the small of your back.

When you rise, keep your head down while you slide back onto your knees, and then when you stand, keep your head down until you are full standing, rolling up from the base of the spine.

Despite the masochism with which many people approach prostrations, prostrations, and indeed no spiritual activity, should be a cause for harming the body, especially if you are a Vajrayāna practitioner, since knowingly harming the body is violation of root samayas.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 8th, 2013 at 2:00 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen: Nongradual Buddhahood?

Content:

oushi said:

Both gradual and nongradual implies a doer.

Since doer is an illusion, he never existed as something fixed.

Realization still implies a person. Liberation is always free from fixation.

Thus, one can realize gradually or nongradually that liberation was always present.

Malcolm wrote:

Indeed, it is not correct to term Dzogchen "nongradual".

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 8th, 2013 at 1:53 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen: Nongradual Buddhahood?

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

Anyway, as it has been said countless times this concept of non-gradual seems to completely disregard the previous infinite lives one has lived to arrive at liberation "here and now".

Malcolm wrote:

It is irrelevant:

There is no place for birth and transmigration in the experiential field of Samantabhadra.
Since the twelve limbs of cause and condition are an explanation for the critical and the analytical, in this way, the wise should understand this as a mere doorway for the deluded.

-- Soaring Great Garuda

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 8th, 2013 at 1:50 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen: Nongradual Buddhahood?

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

That's quite a smoke screen but it seems to me to be a long winded way of just saying "No!".

Malcolm wrote:

Nondual great bliss is the conduct of all sentient beings, demonstrated as a mistaken path by the deluded.

-- Innermost Great Potentiality

Enjoy your buddhahood while you still can, Greg.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 8th, 2013 at 1:42 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen: Nongradual Buddhahood?

Content:

Sherab said:

If the quotation is to true, then it is wrong to say that there is a buddhahood that is already present and always has been.

Malcolm wrote:

"[T]o identify a prong of gold, having immersed gold in a pan of water and then boiled it, if it becomes black it is not gold. If it is gold, then it will remain gold. In the same way, the mind of sentient beings has always been dharmatā. That being so, since it is demonstrated as the view, buddhahood is inherently accomplished since it has always been accomplished."

-- The Wheel of Ascertaining the View

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 8th, 2013 at 12:16 AM

Title: Re: Good stretches for prostration.

Content:

Tsultrim T. said:

Along the same line as the other posters, I think starting slowly is better than stretching. Take it easy and gradually build up how many you are doing per session and per day over time. A platform can be helpful but a wooden or other smooth floor will work just fine. Also having something for the hands to make it easier to slide is helpful. You can make it as easy or hard on yourself as you want, just remember it is supposed to be challenging and break down mental conceptions about body, pain, etc.

Malcolm wrote:

Sun salutations is the healthiest way to do your prostrations [but that's "Hindu"...]

However, doing 108 in a row is probably a bad idea. It is better to focus on quality, not on quantity.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 8th, 2013 at 12:12 AM

Title: Re: Yangsi Penor Rinpoche found!

Content:

yegyal said:

So a couple interesting side notes to this:

1. This is the first time ever that Chatral Rinpoche has been involved with the recognition of a tulku.

Glyn said:

That is debatable. Some would say that he has informally been involved before, although he has also been critical of the tradition.

For the record, he has also recently written a letter regarding one of a set of twins. I thought this was related to the Penor Yangsi, but it's obviously not the case.

Tsultrim T. said:

He was also quite involved in the Dudjom Yangsi recognition process, making it clear that the Tibetan yangsi, Dudjom Tulku Sangye Pema Zhepa, was the true tulku. Although over time it seems everyone's stance has softened on that.

Malcolm wrote:

Hence the flaw of partisan politics and biases in the Tulku system (Dudjom Yangsi, Karmapa, I am sure we can think of other instances).

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 7th, 2013 at 11:48 PM

Title: Re: Dzogchen: Nongradual Buddhahood?

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

I didn't ask what the commentary says, I can see what it says, I asked: are YOU currently enlightened?

Malcolm wrote:

There is no buddhahood apart from rigpa. So when I am I am, and when I am not, I am not. In other words, everyone can have that experience of awakening, even if they are an "ordinary person", like me, and presumably you.

In any event, that is not really the point. The point is that awakening is fundamental feature of sentient beings. Whether or not they can access that state depends solely on whether they have access to a proper guru, introduction and confidence.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 7th, 2013 at 11:35 PM

Title: Re: Dzogchen: Nongradual Buddhahood?

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

The quote does not answer sherab's question. I personally would "dumb down" the question and simply ask: are you currently enlightened?

Malcolm wrote:

It precisely answers his question.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 7th, 2013 at 10:39 PM

Title: Re: Dzogchen: Nongradual Buddhahood?

Content:

LastLegend said:

Nongradual. What does that mean?

Malcolm wrote:

The title is not really quite right, it should be "Dzogchen: Primordial Buddhahood?"

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 7th, 2013 at 10:12 PM

Title: Re: Dzogchen: Nongradual Buddhahood?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Teachers are there to point out a buddhahood that is already present and always has been,

Sherab said:

Is buddhahood = enlighten state? If yes, does this mean that an enlightenment state can be obscured? If so, when one becomes a buddha, what is there to prevent one's enlighten state from being obscured again? If it cannot be obscured, why is it that our original enlighten state can be obscured?

Malcolm wrote:

The erroneous path of the mind that places hope for a result from any virtue, perfections, samaya, practice of accomplishment and so on are said to be deviations from the great vehicle without effort. Now then, if one proposes a cause of realization, because the absence of any activity and the absence of thought are a conducive cause, vidyā is held to arise from within. Since there are many thoughts due to activities, this is not a cause [of realization], again there is obscuration because of many perceptions.

-- The Commentary of the Inner Great Potentiality of The Great Perfection

While we can respect the notion of buddhahood from gathering two accumulations, Dzogchen practitioners do not believe it. Nevertheless, we also do dedications and so on, but from a different POV.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 7th, 2013 at 8:45 PM

Title: Re: Definition of Yangsi vs. Tulku

Content:

smcj said:

I thought the word 'tulku' was the Tibetan translation of the Sanskrit word 'nirmanakaya'. No?

Malcolm wrote:

Indeed it is, but it really cannot be taken literally when applied to your average Tibetan reincarnated lama (not that HH Penor Rinpoche was "average" in any way")

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 7th, 2013 at 8:42 PM

Title: Re: Nelson Mandela has died.

Content:

padma norbu said:

What good all-purpose prayers are there for the recently deceased? I know a Red Tara prayer, not sure if that's the best or maybe it doesn't matter.

Glyn said:

The Aspiration of Sukhavati, or Dewachen Monlam (de mon), from the Tertön Mingyur Dorje is very common. There is a long one which takes about half an hour to chant and a much shorter one.

OM AMI DEWA HRIH

Malcolm wrote:

The long one is actually by Karma Chagmed, the short one is Namcho Migyur Dorje's personal vision of Sukhavati.

However in this case, since it is not clear that Nelson Mandela has any relationship with Dharma at all, it is better to do Shitro for him, and even better, a chang chog rite would be best.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 7th, 2013 at 8:36 PM

Title: Re: Dzogchen: Nongradual Buddhahood?

Content:

invisiblediamond said:

So when student meets master, there will be no further passage of time between that and buddhahood?

Malcolm wrote:

You should start another thread.

Teachers are there to point out a buddhahood that is already present and always has been, as it states in the Inner Great Potentiality of Bodhicitta [byang chub kyi sems rtsal chen sprugs pa]:

Buddhas and sentient beings are nondual, how could there be fabrication with a path?

However, a proper guru is indispensable, from the same text:

Without an authentic master, like the scripture of a monkey, the basis and path will be erroneous, indeed one will be seized by conceptuality.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 7th, 2013 at 8:23 PM

Title: Re: Internet Buddhism

Content:

invisiblediamond said:

So when student meets master, there will be no further passage of time between that and buddhahood?

Malcolm wrote:

You should start another thread.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 7th, 2013 at 6:54 PM

Title: Re: Internet Buddhism

Content:

JKhedrup said:

Malcolm I am not sure how many people take the Hvasang stories literally these days. Even several Geshes I have spoken to are inclined to believe much of the stuff is polemical.

That being said, I still think the gradual approach has many benefits for those suited to it. The great majority of Buddhist paths advocate such an approach, and it is outlined clearly in the Buddhist canon. I don't think Lord Buddha would have spent so much teaching the superfluous- so I think such an approach must be appropriate for a great number of beings.

Malcolm wrote:

As I said, my point for bringing up dzogchen is that it is an example of something being "secret", while in reality there is nothing truly offensive to be found in dzogchen tantras, unlike say, the laghusamvara. The main reason they are considered "secret" is, as I said, they reject the idea that buddhahood is something gradual, attained by gradually developing merit and wisdom. Ironically, dzogchen is kept secret precisely because of the responses garnered here.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 7th, 2013 at 6:40 AM

Title: Re: Internet Buddhism

Content:

Alfredo said:

Dzogchen is not so radical that it casts any doubt upon the institution of the lama.

Malcolm wrote:

No, it is after all a Vajrayāna system. If someone wants to practice Dzogchen, they must of course have teacher of Dzogchen.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 7th, 2013 at 2:51 AM

Title: Re: Internet Buddhism

Content:

smcj said:

I was addressing the notion of what is "secret", why it is "secret", and the disparity in notions of secrecy.

There is an odd perspective in Dharma called the "One Yana" perspective. Is is peculiar to Vajrayana practitioners.

Malcolm wrote:

The notion of "Ekayāna" in fact derives from a number of sūtras, most notable, the Saddharmapundarika.

It is not a particularly Vajrayāna sentiment.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 7th, 2013 at 2:16 AM

Title: Re: Internet Buddhism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

why all the (off topic) trumpet blowing?

I was addressing the notion of what is "secret", why it is "secret", and the disparity in notions of secrecy.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 7th, 2013 at 2:13 AM

Title: Re: Internet Buddhism

Content:

pueraeternus said:

I have the same notion: that the idea behind the "sudden enlightenment" traditions are a form of skillful means to get people to practice and step into the stream, whereupon it will be revealed to them that they still have a very long way to go, but it is okay since they have already glimpsed Nirvana and gained the patiences. So it is a reverse technique ala the Lotus Sutra, but applied to Mahayanists instead of Sravakayanists.

Malcolm wrote:

Dzogchen is not a sudden enlightenment school.

It is a "everything is already in a state of buddhahood and always has been so" school.

pueraeternus said:

Yes - that is the usual premise such schools rest on.

Malcolm wrote:

No, it's a little different than what you think. But it is off topic.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 7th, 2013 at 12:54 AM

Title: Re: Internet Buddhism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The main "scary" thing about Dzogchen is that it teaches a path beyond cause and result. This is scary for all those people who are easily frightened by the Hashang boogyman, especially those who remain trenchantly committed to Kadampa gradualism.

Sherab Dorje said:

One could quite as easily argue that Dzogchen was devised in order to placate cowardly beings that are scared stiff by the thought that they may actually have to devote a few hundred thousand lifetimes (like the Buddha, for example) to slowly chipping away at the petrified crud that has encrusted their true nature. That it is a ploy to get scaredy-cats to not break a cold sweat over the daunting nature of the task and at least get them started on the path to liberation. I mean, since becoming a one eyed fan, has it not occurred to you that Dzogchen is just another skilful means? Anyway, if the whole deal is so "shit-hot" why all the (off topic) trumpet blowing?

pueraeternus said:

I have the same notion: that the idea behind the "sudden enlightenment" traditions are a form of skillful means to get people to practice and step into the stream, whereupon it will be revealed to them that they still have a very long way to go, but it is okay since they have already glimpsed Nirvana and gained the patiences. So it is a reverse technique ala the Lotus Sutra, but applied to Mahayanists instead of Sravakayanists.

Malcolm wrote:

Dzogchen is not a sudden enlightenment school.

It is a "everything is already in a state of buddhahood and always has been so" school.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 7th, 2013 at 12:08 AM

Title: Re: Internet Buddhism

Content:

Glyn said:

How do you feel about the interactions of the internet and Dharma?

On one level it seems a great way to give access to teachings which would otherwise not be available to great numbers of people, but on the other hand it's also an enabler of a plethora of fakes, and semi-fakes, to promote themselves and for material which should be secret, becoming publically accessible.

Malcolm wrote:

The lack of internet in old Tibet did nothing to prevent the spawn of fakes and semi-fakes.

Not only that, but in old Tibet, nothing was really secret provided you had $$$.

There may be some things in the so called anuttara tantras which probably were meant to titillate the brahmin-born scholars in whose milieu such texts were generally revealed (things entirely unremarkable to a beggar living in the streets). But the Dzogchen tantras, for example are largely free of such elements, and yet are considered super secret, even though in general the doctrines promulgated in such texts are tame in comparison to the sorcery and "antinomian" elements of the Laghusamvara, for example.

The main "scary" thing about Dzogchen is that it teaches a path beyond cause and result. This is scary for all those people who are easily frightened by the Hashang boogyman, especially those who remain trenchantly committed to Kadampa gradualism.

The only valid reason for gradually apportioning practices to students in a gradual manner that I have found is to keep people from getting very conceptual about practices of which they have no experience. Frankly, there is very little that should be kept "secret", and some practices in Vajrayāna have to be acknowledged as socially inappropriate, harmful and sexist, products of a patriarchal era in which the role of women was subordinate to the religious fantasies of wealthy scholars.

Returning to my main point: the truth is that Vajrayāna has never really been that "secret" from the beginning. Indeed, its "secrecy" was its prime marketing device and remains so even to this day.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 6th, 2013 at 9:10 AM

Title: Re: recent Jogye controversy

Content:

zed said:

would those anti-gambling Buddhist groups refuse to accept a donation from me?

Serious question.

Malcolm wrote:

Serious answer. I won't refuse it.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 6th, 2013 at 5:40 AM

Title: Re: Yangsi Penor Rinpoche found!

Content:

Punya said:

So would it be correct to say that an emanation is indicative of a higher state than that of a reincarnation? And is a tulku an emanation and a yangsi a reincarnation?

Malcolm wrote:

Correct. But as Sakya Pandita put it:

Even a common geshe is praised as an actual Buddha, what is pleasing to poets is displeasing to scholars.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 6th, 2013 at 4:53 AM

Title: Re: Yangsi Penor Rinpoche found!

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

An emanation is fully conscious before conception, during gestation and through his or her birth.

Punya said:

I know this is off topic but how does this definition distinguish the difference between emanation and reincarnation.

Malcolm wrote:

A reincarnation is not fully conscious through the entire process of rebirth.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 6th, 2013 at 4:20 AM

Title: Re: Yangsi Penor Rinpoche found!

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

He would be an emanation of Vimalamitra. As the legend has it, Vimalamitra returns to Tibet every one hundred years.

M

Punya said:

Malcolm, can you explain what emanation means please.

Malcolm wrote:

An emanation is fully conscious before conception, during gestation and through his or her birth.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 6th, 2013 at 1:03 AM

Title: Re: Yangsi Penor Rinpoche found!

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

what's the difference between a yangsi and a tulku?

Malcolm wrote:

A yang srid [punarbhāva] is literally a reincarnation. A sprul sku is a nirmanakāya.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 5th, 2013 at 10:50 PM

Title: Re: Yangsi Penor Rinpoche found!

Content:

Karma Jinpa said:

reincarnation of Vimalamitra

Malcolm wrote:

He can't be a reincarnation of Vimalamitra since Vimalamitra, according to legend, attained 'pho ba chen po, and still lives at Wutai Shan.

He would be an emanation of Vimalamitra. As the legend has it, Vimalamitra returns to Tibet every one hundred years.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 4th, 2013 at 11:36 PM

Title: Re: Advice for the young layperson

Content:

flowerbuddh said:

I have set my heart completely on liberating myself and all others from suffering... can any of you link me articles on how others have done this or provide your own insight... so, essentially, being a layperson (esp. young) and how to handle it. Thanks guys! <3

Malcolm wrote:

No one has ever managed to do this [i.e. liberate all others from suffering], not even the Buddha. But you can try.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 4th, 2013 at 11:22 PM

Title: Re: Tucker's research on reincarnation.

Content:

Indrajala said:

Now, the "variety of the world arises from the actions of living beings" is similar to saying "certain features of the universe and of living things are best explained by an intelligent cause rather than an undirected process such as natural selection". Beings in Buddhist philosophy generate karma as a result of willed action in varying degrees and types, which is saying that their variety is a result of intelligent causes, not strictly natural selection and mutations.

Malcolm wrote:

Its not similar at all.

Intelligence is accounted for in natural selection.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 1st, 2013 at 6:31 AM

Title: Re: Selling the dharma

Content:

dude said:

That's why we should present offerings without being asked or required to.

Malcolm wrote:

That works fine for sutrayāna teachings, but it is a nonstarter in Vajrayāna where empowerment fees and so on are stipulated in the tantras.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, November 30th, 2013 at 6:47 AM

Title: Re: Native vs. Tibetan language

Content:

Nighthawk said:

As a PL Buddhist following a Japanese tradition, you're saying I should be chanting it Namō Amitabha Buddha instead of Namu Amida Butsu in order to achieve the full effect?

Malcolm wrote:

That's not a mantra. It's an homage, so saying "Homage to Buddha Amitabha" would also be as effective as either the Sanskrit or the Japanese, etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, November 30th, 2013 at 12:50 AM

Title: Re: Struggling with the Concept of No/Non-Self/Emptiness

Content:

smcj said:

The āryapañcaviṃśatisāhasrikāprajñāpāramitopadeśaśāstrābhisamayālaṃkāravṛtti states, for example:

"The bodhisattva mahāsattva who wishes to overwhelm the cittopāda of the pratyekabuddha (who rejoices in patience) trains in the perfection of wisdom".

The term "generation of bodhicitta" is a gloss for the term cittopāda, "generation of the intent". Intent for what? Intent for one of the three kinds of awakening, i.e., arhat, pratyekabuddha, or samyaksambuddha.

There are many examples like this in the literature of the Abhisamayālaṃkāra which extensively discusses the differences in the creation of the various "intents" to awaken. Well yes, obviously arhats and pratyekabuddhas have 'intents to awaken'. The question at hand is if that is properly called 'bodhicitta'. Your supporting citation is hardly a slam-dunk, but that's ok. This isn't really an important subject so let's drop it.

You're a busy man and I have no wish to make you do additional work. I'd rather not irritate you on this. I will save that privilege for something else that I see as more important.

Malcolm wrote:

The point is that the term "generation of [bodhi]citta" is what is usually translated by western translators as "generation of bodhicitta". For example, the Rangjung Yeshe dictionary gives:

sems bskyed - forming the resolve; motivation/ aspiration/ to resolve oneself;
1. Bodhicitta, producing the Bodhicitta, [bodhicittotpada]; 2) producing a thought; cultivation of an enlightened attitude. arousing / generating bodhicitta, mental disposition [when not particularly referring to the development of awakening mind]; aspiration; arousing / generating bodhicitta, cultivation of an enlightened attitude [ry]

All three, arhats, pratyekabuddhas and buddhas arises from an intent to awaken [bodhicitta]. Much of Mahāyāna polemical discourse around this is to make sure that Bodhisattvas do not fall into the bodhicitta of an arhat or pratyekabuddha. All three attain bodhi, therefore, it is a misconception to say that those who aspire to arhatship and pratyekabuddhahood have no bodhicitta, but it must be recognized that these bodhicittas are considered inferior bodhicittas.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 29th, 2013 at 10:49 PM

Title: Re: BASIS FOR KARMA / REBIRTH

Content:

dude said:

You're quite right about the two being so far apart, and I think this is a positive outcome. I imagine it produced some meaningful dialogue as well with increased understanding for both parties.

mindyourmind said:

For me it was more a reminder of the positions that the two worldviews take, and the gulf of differences that remain, has to remain, in discussions like these.

dude said:

You're right, but it really bothers me because I believe in Buddhism. They're wrong, and cause suffering to self and others. Maybe I can't convince them in some cases, but it's really too bad.

What bothers me even more is Buddhists who refuse to believe in karma and rebirth. That's downright scary.

Malcolm wrote:

It is better not to be so attached to views that it causes you to have an emotional reaction when you find out that there are those who hold different views.

Theism, a belief in god, has brought peace to millions of people's minds.

Second, you don't know that they are wrong, any more than atheists are not right in asserting there is no karma and rebirth. These are all abstractions, concepts. While I personally accept rebirth and karma, I am not going to insist it is true, other than to insist it is part of the Buddhas teachings and needs to be respected as such. But there is no orthodoxy to defend in Dharma, because Dharma is based on personal experience and not on adherence to a set of views. There are many Buddhists who like the bulk of Buddha's ethical and meditative teachings, who nevertheless don't accept rebirth because they have no memories from their past lives and so on. People are better left in freedom to figure things out.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 29th, 2013 at 10:35 PM

Title: Re: Where is Mount Sumeru?

Content:

xabir said:

Because Mahāyāna sutras and tantras are filled with Indian myths and legends.

mt meru cosmology originated from pali suttas yes?

<http://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/dn/dn.32.0.piya.html>

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, also the Pali canon is filled with Indian myths and legends.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 29th, 2013 at 10:30 PM

Title: Re: Struggling with the Concept of No/Non-Self/Emptiness

Content:

smcj said:

I think Malcolm is incorrect about calling the aspiration to become an arhat as a 'grade of bodhicitta'.

Malcolm wrote:

Actually, in Mahāyāna texts, bodhicitta is presented in exactly this way -- do you really want me to drag out the citations?

smcj said:

Yes please.

Malcolm wrote:

The āryapañcaviṃśatisāhasrikāprajñāpāramitopadeśaśāstrābhisamayālaṃkāravṛtti states, for example:

"The bodhisattva mahāsattva who wishes to overwhelm the cittopāda of the pratyekabuddha (who rejoices in patience) trains in the perfection of wisdom".

The term "generation of bodhicitta" is a gloss for the term cittopāda, "generation of the intent". Intent for what? Intent for one of the three kinds of awakening, i.e., arhat, pratyekabuddha, or samyaksambuddha.

There are many examples like this in the literature of the Abhisamayālaṃkāra which extensively discusses the differences in the creation of the various "intents" to awaken.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 29th, 2013 at 1:38 AM

Title: Re: Struggling with the Concept of No/Non-Self/Emptiness

Content:

smcj said:

I think Malcolm is incorrect about calling the aspiration to become an arhat as a 'grade of bodhicitta'.

Malcolm wrote:

Actually, in Mahāyāna texts, bodhicitta is presented in exactly this way -- do you really want me to drag out the citations?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 29th, 2013 at 1:22 AM

Title: Re: Where is Mount Sumeru?

Content:

Tsongkhapa said:

Of course we need to decide whether these stories are true or not, but I would contend that Buddhism gives us tools for believing the fantastical. If everything is the mere creation of our mind, like in a dream, and nothing exists from its own side, then anything can appear in accordance with karma. The only thing that is impossible is inherent existence. A true scientific understanding of the mind according to Buddha's teachings make many hidden objects logically provable such as past and future lives, karma, the existence of god realms and hell realms and Pure Lands.

Malcolm wrote:

You realize this is merely medieval style casuistry?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 29th, 2013 at 12:55 AM

Title: Re: Native vs. Tibetan language

Content:

Indrajala said:

...but not so much with Tibetan Buddhism.

Malcolm wrote:

Tibetans, being among the last Asians to encounter the colonial west, still resist modernity.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 28th, 2013 at 11:34 PM

Title: Re: Struggling with the Concept of No/Non-Self/Emptiness

Content:

jeeprs said:

So, as I said, what is a better translation for 'Bodhicitta' than 'Compassion'?

Malcolm wrote:

In the Mahāyāna context, "the intent to awaken".

Tenzin Dorje said:

"for the sake of all sentient beings" (on the basis of having realized perfect and complete enlightenment, the ripening of all positive qualities and the elimination of all non-virtues, as the way to actually help countless sentient beings ; this is why thinking - of it - is important)

Malcolm wrote:

NO, you cannot make that statement -- because while the term bodhicitta is only defined in Mahāyāna, there are different grades of bodhicitta, the intent to awaken as an arhat, and so on. It is only the intent to awaken as a buddha for the benefit of all sentient beings that we describe as the true Mahāyāna bodhicitta, but there are in fact different intents to awaken, not all of which spring from compassion.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 28th, 2013 at 11:32 PM

Title: Re: Native vs. Tibetan language

Content:

Indrajala said:

...then people can compose their own prayers and commentaries, or do their practices exclusively in English with it being completely valid and orthodox, rather than reciting in Tibetan and then in a dead tone saying the English.

In due time the English traditions would be settled and have less need to defer to Tibetan sources or even Tibetan teachers.

Jainarayan said:

Would this include translating mantras into the vernacular? Everything I've read says that mantras lose their effectiveness unless recited or chanted in the original language, or close to it. So, I don't mean sound shifts like om mani padme hum to om mani peme hung. That's a case of approximating the sounds between languages, not any kind of literal or word for word translation. The Mahakaruna Dharani and Ushisa Vijaya Dharani do translate into English, but do they have the same effect (I don't know if there is a fully translated into Tibetan version).

I'm not challenging, just curious.

Malcolm wrote:

Mantras are a special case.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 28th, 2013 at 11:04 PM

Title: Re: Native vs. Tibetan language

Content:

Indrajala said:

What if Tibetan Buddhism in the west transitions to a primarily English medium?

Malcolm wrote:

It's not a what if. Parroting syllables in a language one does not speak is unsustainable.

Indrajala said:

In due time the English traditions would be settled and have less need to defer to Tibetan sources or even Tibetan teachers.

Malcolm wrote:

English is the new international Dharma language.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 28th, 2013 at 10:19 PM

Title: Re: Struggling with the Concept of No/Non-Self/Emptiness

Content:

jeeprs said:

I think it is perfectly sound to translate bodhicitta as 'compassion'. It is often translated that way.

Malcolm wrote:

It is a) unsound and b) no one translates bodhicitta as compassion (karuna).

Why is it unsound? Every person who has bodhicitta has compassion, but not every person who has compassion also has bodhicitta.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 28th, 2013 at 10:16 PM

Title: Re: Struggling with the Concept of No/Non-Self/Emptiness

Content:

jeeprs said:

So, as I said, what is a better translation for 'Bodhicitta' than 'Compassion'?

Malcolm wrote:

In the Mahāyāna context, "the intent to awaken".

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 28th, 2013 at 6:47 AM

Title: Re: Where is Mount Sumeru?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

That's a novel approach. Where, in any work of these two masters, do they claim to have personally visited Meru?

Tsongkhapa said:

Asanga travelled to Tushita Pure Land with Maitreya (not merely had meditational experiences of Tushita) so he would have seen it as it would be below this realm. In Nagajuna's biography it says that during the period of his second Turning of the Wheel he went to the Northern Continent of the four that surround Mount Meru and taught there for two hundred and fifty years, so he would have seen it too.

To use another example, are we to say that Tushita and Akanishta Pure Lands do not exist because they have never been the objects of human valid cognitions? (actually, while being generally true that humans cannot see Tushita Pure Land, Asanga saw it with his human conventionally valid eye consciousness).

No, this is false. Asanga had meditational experience of Tushita. He did not observe Tushita with his physical eyes

What's your source for this belief? In the widely accepted biographies of Asanga he physically travelled to Tushita and spent fifty human years there, so of course he saw it.

Malcolm wrote:

If you like reading religious novels and accepting them as truth, go for it. As for the Asanga story, I am basing myself on Chinese sources that are much earlier than Tibetan sources.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 28th, 2013 at 6:07 AM

Title: Re: Struggling with the Concept of No/Non-Self/Emptiness

Content:

KonchokZoepa said:

the five skandhas are also impermanent, as with the skillful means they ripen into the 5 primordial wisdoms.

philji said:

At a certain level this just seems yada yada yada.....why do Buddhists love to quote stuff like this when asked to help someone.....who does it help?

Malcolm wrote:

yup.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 28th, 2013 at 6:06 AM

Title: Re: Struggling with the Concept of No/Non-Self/Emptiness

Content:

Son of Buddha said:
The real nature is Buddha Wisdom.

Malcolm wrote:
Which is just a name, like suchness, emptiness, luminosity, the limit of reality, nirvana, etc., which are all synonyms.

Son of Buddha said:
Emptiness is a negation, meaning the lack thereof if Enlightenment was sheer emptiness it would be nihilism.

Malcolm wrote:
Buddha taught only three gateways to liberation:

śūnyatā alakṣaṇa apranidāna.

Emptiness, absence of characteristics and absence of aspiration.

He did not teach a fourth gate of liberation.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Thursday, November 28th, 2013 at 4:50 AM
Title: Re: Struggling with the Concept of No/Non-Self/Emptiness
Content:
SittingSilent said:
What then is this "real nature" you speak of? And mind? I read a lot about mind in Pema Chodron's books.

Malcolm wrote:
Emptiness.

dude said:
no it isn't

Malcolm wrote:
Sure it is. You can all it "luminosity" if you want, but that is also empty.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Thursday, November 28th, 2013 at 1:03 AM
Title: Re: Native vs. Tibetan language
Content:

Jainarayan said:

...it's Tibetan custom to end practices with Om Ah Hung 3 times.

Malcolm wrote:

No it isn't.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 27th, 2013 at 11:51 PM

Title: Re: Native vs. Tibetan language

Content:

Karma Jinpa said:

Admittedly, one could logically extend that line of thought and argue that Sanskrit syllables should be used rather than Tibetan ones, but I feel the Tibetan syllables to have no more or less ritual efficacy, and to be no more or less authentic than the Sanskrit.

Malcolm wrote:

There is no one standard Sanskrit shape. For example, the syllables e vaṃ; most of the explanations of these two phonemes in the tantras involve their shape, shapes which they have in some Sanskrit syllabaries, but not all, and not in Tibetan.

For example, the scripts used for the Nyingma tantras in Sanskrit in the 8th century could not be read by Indian Panditas in the 11th century.

In the end the shape of the letter merely represents a sound...it is the sound that is important, not the shape of the phoneme.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 27th, 2013 at 10:45 PM

Title: Re: Struggling with the Concept of No/Non-Self/Emptiness

Content:

SittingSilent said:

What then is this "real nature" you speak of? And mind? I read a lot about mind in Pema Chodron's books.

Malcolm wrote:

Emptiness.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 27th, 2013 at 10:39 PM

Title: Re: Where is Mount Sumeru?

Content:

JKhedrup said:

I guess it depends on how far you want to take it.

According to traditional Indian (Vedic) cosmology the moon landing could have never happened because the scriptures indicate it is the abode of Chandra and the distance calculations are incorrect. Zealously holding to this view did not win the Hare Krishnas many supporters. Below are the founder, Swami Prabhupada's, comments on the issue:

Malcolm wrote:

Incorrect according to a religious text, much in the same vein as the Buddhist texts which make similar cosmological claims.

Ancient Indian Astronomy texts at least are based on mathematical calculations and centuries of specialized observation and records.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 27th, 2013 at 10:38 PM

Title: Re: Where is Mount Sumeru?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

I submit that no human being ever perceived Mt. Meru with a conventionally valid cognition. Mt. Meru is and always been a cosmological Indian myth about which there are various and conflicting traditions.

Tsongkhapa said:

Asanga and Nagarjuna have both seen it.

Malcolm wrote:

That's a novel approach. Where, in any work of these two masters, do they claim to have personally visited Meru?

Tsongkhapa said:

They were great realised beings, so I submit that they had conventionally valid cognitions.

Malcolm wrote:

But there is no evidence that they held forth the idea that they had personally visited Meru. So you are merely engaging in proliferation, rank conceptual fabrication.

Tsongkhapa said:

To use another example, are we to say that Tushita and Akanishta Pure Lands do not exist because they have never been the objects of human valid cognitions? (actually, while being generally true that humans cannot see Tushita Pure Land, Asanga saw it with his human conventionally valid eye consciousness).

Malcolm wrote:

No, this is false. Asanga had meditational experience of Tushita. He did not observe Tushita with his physical eyes.

Tsongkhapafan said:

We cannot say that something doesn't exist just because we cannot perceive it.

Malcolm wrote:

Doesn't it strike you as odd that certain facts about the world never change (sun, moon and stars), while other facts (flat earth --> round earth) do? Basically, all this indicates to me is that we have become better at analyzing and investigating the world, not worse, and that such obsolete cosmologies as the one we are discussing come from a time prior to that ability -- i.e. these suppositions could not be tested.

Tsongkhapafan said:

If Mount Sumeru is mythological, why is it referred to in the Sutras and Tantras (for example, Heruka's palace is on top of Mount Meru)?

Malcolm wrote:

Because Mahāyāna sutras and tantras are filled with Indian myths and legends.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 27th, 2013 at 10:27 PM

Title: Re: Where is Mount Sumeru?

Content:

Tsongkhapafan said:

if my mind can perceive the thoughts, past lives and so forth of others, how can I say that others' minds exist outside my own? .

Malcolm wrote:

But your mind cannot. You do not have the five kinds of clairvoyance. So this argument is not valid.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 27th, 2013 at 9:06 AM

Title: Re: Oldest Buddhist Shrine Uncovered In Nepal

Content:

sukhamanveti said:

Now it looks as though one of the older chronologies may have been vindicated.

Malcolm wrote:

Not so fast. It is well established that the Buddha was born to his mother on a trip to a remote location. It is well known that ancient Indians maintained sacred groves [https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Sacred_groves_of_India] from time immemorial.

Without datable evidence of specifically Buddhist artifacts, it is too soon to use this as supporting the more traditional dates.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 27th, 2013 at 8:45 AM

Title: Re: Struggling with the Concept of No/Non-Self/Emptiness

Content:

SittingSilent said:

then what gives rise to the sense of me-ness?

Malcolm wrote:

Ignorance of your real nature.

The body is not your self.

Mind and mental factors are not your self.

You have no self external to the mind and body.

Your self is not the body and mind taken together.

However, one designates the body and mind as a self based on convention, and that is fine. There is no other "self" than the conventional one designated on the complex of aggregates.

It is true that some later Mahāyāna trends attempt to define suchness, or the real nature of phenomena as a "self" -- but these trends did not gain much currency in Indian Buddhism because the tortured rhetoric of "self" vs. "nonself" utilized by these trends merely serves to reinforce the concept that a self cannot be ascertained in one's five aggregates, separate from one's five aggregates or is all one's five aggregates together.

Conventionally, there is no problem using the term self. The problem arises when one imputes permanent identity, i.e. an ultimate self, onto the continuum we are now referring to as "SittingSilent", etc.

You might read Hume's refutation of the self. It's sometimes helpful for those trying to grasp what the Buddha meant by absence of self:

According to the standard interpretation of Hume on personal identity, he was a bundle theorist, who held that the self is nothing but a bundle of experiences ("perceptions") linked by the relations of causation and resemblance; or, more accurately, that the empirically warranted idea of the self is just the idea of such a bundle. This view is forwarded by, for example, positivist interpreters, who saw Hume as suggesting that terms such as "self", "person", or "mind" referred to collections of "sense-contents".[58] A modern-day version of the bundle theory of the mind has been advanced by Derek Parfit in his Reasons and Persons (1986).

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/David_Hume#The_self

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 27th, 2013 at 6:54 AM

Title: Re: Where is Mount Sumeru?

Content:

Tsongkhapa said:

The non-existence of Mount Meru FOR US is easily proved by it not being either a hidden or manifest object, but our view is not inherently the only one. The world is subjectively existent. We don't see pus and blood or nectar when we observe liquid...

Malcolm wrote:

This presumes there is a common basis of karmically determined perceptions, i.e. for a single vessel of a liquid, there are six different perceptions.

Now then, the perception of a Mt. Meru and the non-perception of Mt. Meru must have a common basis of perception if we are to accept your analogy.

We are not talking about the conventionally valid cognitions of beings of the six realms, we are only talking about the conventionally valid cognitions of human beings.

I submit that no human being ever perceived Mt. Meru with a conventionally valid cognition. Mt. Meru is and always been a cosmological Indian myth about which there are various and conflicting traditions.

Ancient Indian astronomical works as the Suryasiddhanta clearly describe our world as being round and suspended in space like an iron ball between two magnets. Further:

"The Surya Siddhanta also estimates the diameters of the planets. The estimate for the diameter of Mercury is 3,008 miles, an error of less than 1% from the currently accepted diameter of 3,032 miles. It also estimates the diameter of Saturn as 73,882 miles, which again has an error of less than 1% from the currently accepted diameter of 74,580. Its estimate for the diameter of Mars is 3,772 miles, which has an error within 11% of the currently accepted diameter of 4,218 miles. It also estimated the diameter of Venus as 4,011 miles and Jupiter as 41,624 miles, which are roughly half the currently accepted values, 7,523 miles and 88,748 miles, respectively."

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Surya_Siddhanta

Indian astronomers, while generally subscribing to a geocentric cosmology, were more advanced in their thinking than the mythic superstitions of Buddhist abhidharmikas, for whom Mt. Meru is only viewable by siddhas.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 27th, 2013 at 6:38 AM

Title: Re: Struggling with the Concept of No/Non-Self/Emptiness

Content:

Arjan Dirkse said:

Emptiness is a bit of misnomer when used to refer to sunyata.

Malcolm wrote:

No, it is actually a very precise translation.

Arjan Dirkse said:

OK, the word "misnomer" is a misnomer then...

Still, emptiness in the Buddhist sense is something else to me than what is normally conveyed by the meaning of the English word emptiness.

Malcolm wrote:

The term simply means when something lacks something, that lack is termed "emptiness".

For example, the cullasunnata sutta, the lack of a city in a village is designated as the emptiness of the village.

In yogacara "emptiness" means the perfected nature, i.e., the absence of subject and object (the imagined nature) in the dependent nature.

In madhyamaka, the absence of the four extremes in relative phenomena is ultimate, i.e. the emptiness of the things.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 27th, 2013 at 5:06 AM

Title: Re: BASIS FOR KARMA / REBIRTH

Content:

futerko said:

Let me come back to this...

The logical consequence of dependent origination is that nothing originates

PadmaVonSamba said:

No, it means that no thing originates.

In other words, in dependent origination, there is no intrinsically, self-arising thing.

futerko said:

You seem to be suggesting that something originates which is somehow not a thing.

As Oushi wrote, "To talk about time, you need change." So where do you locate any event or any arising outside of any reference to the present?

Without needing to be enlightened, we still know that time appears as a succession of moments in which change appears to occur in those subsequent moments, so if we locate temporal infinity anywhere other than right here and now then we find ourselves in a dead end - positing an uncaused cause.

Malcolm wrote:

Time depends on objects, when objects cannot be ascertained, neither can time.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 27th, 2013 at 3:40 AM

Title: Re: Struggling with the Concept of No/Non-Self/Emptiness

Content:

Arjan Dirkse said:

Emptiness is a bit of misnomer when used to refer to sunyata.

Malcolm wrote:

No, it is actually a very precise translation.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 26th, 2013 at 6:31 AM

Title: Re: Where is Mount Sumeru?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

(having already defined parabhāva as a species of svabhāva) "Where is there a bhāva which is not included in svabhāva or parabhāva?"

cloudburst said:

This is all irrelevant, as you know. This is Nagarjuna arguing against the existence of essences. No one is claiming that. Sophistry will not win the day here, although you may impress the credulous.

Malcolm wrote:

Here, Nāgārjuna is pointing out in no uncertain terms that all assertions of existence and non-existence are fraught with notion of essences automatically. It is one thing to accept that tables and chairs "exist" prior to analysis. It is quite another to assert their existence is valid predicated on deluded cognitions, i.e. a cognition of a non-veridical object, which is in essence what a conventional truth is.

The clause "therefore, since that is so...", only intends to affirm that sense organs and so on are products of the ripening of action, as previously stated, in conformity with worldly convention -- but it is not a statement of commitment on Candrakīrti's part that worldly convention is truthful, which is why he remarks that one should not get involved with how it actually is.

Affirming that eyes are products is all I need. Since they are produced according to worldly convention, they must exist according to worldly convention.

Worldly convention is predicated on cognitions of non-veridical objects, i.e. it is dependent on false cognitions. What does it matter if eyes and so on are products if the very substrate upon which the acceptance of their status as products is in itself delusion?

Madhyamakas do not make propositions concerning existence. They accept whatever is in common discourse merely for the purpose of demonstrating (to those that care) that the terms of common discourse they are using are deluded and false. What is the root delusion? Assertions of existence which always involve notions of inherency. As much as Tsongkhapa wanted to sever the discussion of called "mere existence" or conventional existence from inherent or ultimate existence, in reality, one cannot hew the two apart.

Nagarjuna's point, very simple put, is that when there are essences, only then can there be existences. When there are no essences, then there can be no existences. Such existences that are spoken about are understood to be merely conventional (meaning imputed, meaning not real), predicated on the deluded cognition of ordinary persons. These are accepted provisionally by Madhyamaka, but not asserted by Madhyamaka.

The Gelug commitment to arguing essenceless existence is fruitless because there are is no such thing as an essenceless existence. This is why it is necessary to negate merely inherent existence, but rather one must negate all four extremes in both the relative and the ultimate -- only this is the profound emptiness taught in Mahāyāna.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 26th, 2013 at 3:41 AM

Title: Re: BASIS FOR KARMA / REBIRTH

Content:

smcj said:

Whereas the Buddhists simply say that there is an infinite regression

futerko said:

No, they don't. The whole point of Buddhism is to avoid such an issue of infinite regress.

Malcolm wrote:

In fact, Buddhists accept certain kinds of infinite regression as a logical consequence of dependent origination, for example, the infinite regression of dependent causality.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 26th, 2013 at 12:27 AM

Title: Re: BASIS FOR KARMA / REBIRTH

Content:

mindyourmind said:

[

What he wants to know (and here my theism may be letting me down) is "Who made it?" In the theistic worldview all of these questions of course have a wonderfully pat answer.

Malcolm wrote:

The answer is that we (every sentient beings in the universe) all did by the force of our past actions which have no beginning.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 25th, 2013 at 10:38 PM

Title: Re: BASIS FOR KARMA / REBIRTH

Content:

mindyourmind said:

To put it in its simplest form, where does karma / rebirth "come from"? Who created such an exquisitely complex system, if there is no god?

Malcolm wrote:

Karma is volition and what proceeds from volition, state Buddha, Nāgārjuna and Vasubandhu. Karma/rebirth, therefore come from the mind.

One important Buddhist tenet is beginninglessness. There is no absolute beginning.

All the diversity that we see in the universe is a result of all the individual actions of all sentient beings.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 25th, 2013 at 3:17 AM

Title: Re: Where is Mount Sumeru?

Content:

Tsongkhapa said:

It's a good question that I've been giving some thought. I think it's because Buddha did - he said there is no creator other than mind, so although mind doesn't exist from its own side it's still the creator of all our experiences. In the Mahamudra teachings Buddha said "if you realise your own mind, you will become a Buddha. You should not seek Buddhahood elsewhere." I think it's possible to assert the primacy of mind without being a Chittamatrin, especially because karma arises from intention, which is part of mind, and the world arises from conceptual imputation which is the major function of mind.

Malcolm wrote:

You do realize that line of reasoning suffers from infinite regress?

Tsongkhapa said:
I'm curious why - please explain Malcolm

Malcolm wrote:
Well, there are two problems: one your mind is not the only mind. This automatically means that unless you are a solipsist, you automatically must accept the existence of external entities that are not products of your mind, i.e. other minds.

Second, when you claim that everything is a product of one's own mind, including the causes and conditions that give rise to the mind itself, you are locked in an infinite regress, essentially asserting that the mind causes itself.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Monday, November 25th, 2013 at 12:23 AM
Title: Re: switching from vajrayana to theravada for some time
Content:
dude said:

The Buddha wouldn't agree with the Theravadin monks. They embrace the provisional and reject the essential.

Malcolm wrote:
Which Buddha? The Mahāyāna one?

Author: Malcolm
Date: Sunday, November 24th, 2013 at 3:53 AM
Title: Re: Goenka Retreat
Content:
duckfiasco said:
* it's run entirely by donations, which I found impressive

Malcolm wrote:
They will hit you up for a donation when you leave.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Friday, November 22nd, 2013 at 6:24 AM
Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana
Content:
smcj said:
This is why Nāgārjuna also wrote: "An existent [bhāva] does not arise from an existent, an existent does not arise from a nonexistent; a nonexistent does not arise from an existent; a nonexistent does not arise from a nonexistent. How can there be arising?" Nagarjuna would have hated quantum mechanics, where things pop into and out of existence for no good reason.

Hey, doesn't that negate all his philosophy?

Malcolm wrote:

It simply means we don't have the math to understand the causality of a given phenomena, it doesn't entail the consequence that Nāgārjuna's opening statement in the MMK is incorrect:

"At no time and in no place does anything arise from itself, from other than itself, from both, or in absence of a cause."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 21st, 2013 at 11:59 PM

Title: Re: Where is Mount Sumeru?

Content:

cloudburst said:

Actually, they DO assert it. Many many examples of this can be provided. For the purposes of this discussion we will accept your own translation above "Mādhyamikas are proponents of dependent origination."

Malcolm wrote:

That is not an assertion of existence.

cloudburst said:

Of course it is.

Malcolm wrote:

No, it isn't. It is for this reason that Nāgārjuna asks the question (having already defined parabhāva as a species of svabhāva) "Where is there a bhāva which is not included in svabhāva or parabhāva?" Since there is no such thing, to call "dependent origination" a proposition of bhāva is incredibly wrong-headed. This is why Nāgārjuna also wrote: "An existent [bhāva] does not arise from an existent, an existent does not arise from a nonexistent; a nonexistent does not arise from an existent; a nonexistent does not arise from a nonexistent. How can there be arising?"

cloudburst said:

The translators are using inferences to translate the meaning, not just the words. So when they say "therefore they do exist" (which you render as "this is so"), they do so in order to demonstrate that eyes are dependently arisen results of karma. This means that they exist conventionally, so there is no problem in saying so in order to convey the meaning of the citation.

Malcolm wrote:

The clause "therefore, since that is so...", only intends to affirm that sense organs and so on are products of the ripening of action, as previously stated, in conformity with worldly convention -- but it is not a statement of commitment on Candrakīrti's part that worldly convention is truthful, which is why he remarks that one should not get involved with how it actually is.

The translation (in this instance) is not successful and does not convey the meaning Candrakirti intends. Therefore, when you use it as a citation in support of a reason, the reason also fails. No, I did not have it lying around. Since the translation seemed a bit too pat to me, I examined the source of the citation and found it was slightly off when compared to the Tibetan. The term yod pa can be a translation of several different terms, ranging from asti to sat:

yod pa - saṃ√vid:samvidyamāna yod pa - saṃniveśa yod pa - sat
yod pa - sadbhāva
yod pa - sāṃnidhya
yod pa - a-vaikalya yod pa - /as:asti
yod pa - astitā
yod pa - /vid:vidyate yod pa - vidyamānatā
yod pa - vidyamāna yod pa - upa√labh:upalabhyante yod pa - /bhū:bhavati

Since we do not have the sanskrit original of this commentary, it is a little hard to say what the proper rendering of yod pa is here in "de phyir, de yod pas", it could just as easily be "since that exists" as "since that is so". However, given that context, and given the fact that "de yod pas" bears the instrumental "s" on the yod pa, it is unlikely that to mean : "Therefore, they do exist", especially when there is no plural corresponding to "they" such as "de dag" (eṣām).

An endemic problem in online discussions is the use of citations people haven't the skill to investigate themselves in either a Sanskrit original or in a secondary language such as Tibetan. In order to have a meaningful discussion, we must have first translations we actually agree upon. If we cannot achieve that much, it is difficult to have a meaningful exchange. This is also compounded with the fact that most of these discussions are not predicated on detailed discussions of the source texts, but rather post 12th century Tibetans involved in polemics with agendas often quite removed from the context in which these texts were composed. It is for this reason I generally abstain from discussions about Tibetan Madhyamaka any more, other than to observe that Tibetans after the 12th century, such as Dolbuba, Tsongkhapa, Gorampa (who in fact does not faithfully portray the early Sakya view) and so on began to introduce novelties to Madhyamaka discussion. Khenpo Zhenga tried to remedy this by restoring study of original commentaries and texts, but thus far western disciples of Tibetans still remain committed to whatever sectarian division they were initially trained in.

On the other hand I am certainly happy to talk about Indian Madhyamaka as long as it is understood that citations from Tibetans are excluded from the discussion, since I decided long ago that Tibetan Madhyamaka was a waste of time.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 21st, 2013 at 10:03 PM

Title: Re: Where is Mount Sumeru?

Content:

Tsongkhapafan said:

It's a good question that I've been giving some thought. I think it's because Buddha did - he said there is no creator other than mind, so although mind doesn't exist from its own side it's still the creator of all our experiences. In the Mahamudra teachings Buddha said "if you realise your own mind, you will become a Buddha. You should not seek Buddhahood elsewhere." I think it's possible to assert the primacy of mind without being a Chittamatrin, especially because karma arises from intention, which is part of mind, and the world arises from conceptual imputation which is the major function of mind.

Malcolm wrote:

You do realize that line of reasoning suffers from infinite regress?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 21st, 2013 at 8:10 AM

Title: Re: A Note on "Substance"

Content:

cloudburst said:

Actually, they DO assert it. Many many examples of this can be provided. For the purposes of this discussion we will accept your own translation above "Mādhyamikas are proponents of dependent origination."

Malcolm wrote:

That is not an assertion of existence.

Chandrakirti said:

We refute here that things exist essentially; we do not refute that eyes and such are products. and are dependently arisen results of karma. Therefore they exist. Hence, when eyes and so forth are explained only as results of karma, they do exist.

Malcolm wrote:

This passage's translation is not correct.

ཁོ་ལོ་ཅག་ནི་འདིར་དངོས་པོ་རྣམས་རང་གི་ངོ་བོས་གྲུབ་པ་འགོག་གི་མེད་ལ་སོགས་པ་བྱས་ཤིང་རྟེན་ཅིང་འབྲེལ་པར་འབྱུང་བའི་ལས་ཀྱི་རྣམ་པར་སྒྲིན་པ་ཉིད་ནི་མི་འགོག་པའོ། །དེ་འབྱུང་དེ་ཡོད་པས་གང་ཞིག་རྣམ་པར་སྒྲིན་པ་ཉིད་ཀྱི་བསྐྱེད་པས་མེད་ལ་སོགས་པ་ཡོད་པ་ཉིད་དོ།

"We are here refuting that things are proven [grub] through their own entity [svarūpa], but products such as eyes and so on are not refuted, being a ripening of dependently originated actions. Therefore, that is so because that which has been explained as being a ripening are eyes and so on.

So I can't accept your reason here because the citation is not correctly translated as far as I am concerned. Further, the point of the citation is not to prove existence of eyes and so forth, but rather in the original text, the point of the citation is demonstrate that:

དེའི་ཕྱིར་མཁས་པས་འཇིག་རྟེན་པའི་དོན་ལ་ཇི་སྐད་བཤད་པའི་རྣམ་པར་དབྱེད་པ་དེ་ཁོ་ན་ནི་དམ་པོར་བ་དང་རྗེས་སུ་མཐུན་པ་མ་བཅུག་པར་ལས་རྣམས་ཀྱི་རྣམ་པར་སྤྲིན་པ་བས་མ་གྱིས་མེ་བྱུང་པ་ཉིད་ཀྱིས་སྒྲངས་

"Therefore, the wise who investigate according to how it is explained in the mundane meaning accept the inconceivable ripening of actions without getting correspondingly involved with seeing reality [de ko na nydi, tattvam]."

Thus, the citation does not say what you want it to say, nor does it match the point you wish to make.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 21st, 2013 at 1:34 AM

Title: Re: Peter Brown and Dzogchen

Content:

Son of Buddha said:

As far as claiming 3rd turning as provisional goes the chapter 7 of the Samdhinirmocana Sutra states the first and second turning are provisional and the third turning is definite. As does the Nirvana sutra.

Malcolm wrote:

There are different ways to read the hermeneutic of the three turnings.

One has to present a logical reason why the so called third turning is superior to the second turning. Then one has to carefully identify which texts are actually referred to as such and so on. Personally, I don't think the three turnings are important. Why? Because this was just a scheme by one anonymous author to elevate his own text above other texts.

Further, the elaboration of a third wheel merely shows that texts like the Samdhi-nirmocana and the Nirvana sūtra are not part of the wave of original Mahāyāna texts, and belong to the second wave of Mahāyāna revelation.

In reality, the concept of the three turnings, which becomes so important in Chinese and Tibetan Buddhism receives almost no commentarial attention from Indians themselves in the Indian treatises.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 20th, 2013 at 10:01 PM

Title: Re: Where is Mount Sumeru?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

But your mind too does not exist from its own side...so what does it depend on?

Tsongkhapa said:

Mind depends upon many factors such as its parts, energy winds, previous moments and objects.

Malcolm wrote:

Uh huh -- so why privilege mind as the arbiter of external appearances?

Why don't you just simple say "If you have the dependent origination to perceive x, then you will"?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 20th, 2013 at 7:05 AM

Title: Re: Peter Brown and Dzogchen

Content:

nyamssnanggong'phel said:

LOL

I'm on your side Malcolm.

tobes said:

Why are you so eager to choose a side and denounce anyone that you think is on the "Other" side?

dzogchungpa said:

Which side is Malcolm on anyway?

Malcolm wrote:

I wish someone would tell me, it would make life so much easier.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 20th, 2013 at 3:42 AM

Title: Re: Confused on Yangti generalities

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

What article are you referencing, the funerary buddhism one?

nyamssnanggong'phel said:

yeah.

<http://www.thlib.org/collections/texts/jiats/#!jiats=/01/germano/b8/>

Malcolm wrote:

This simply means that contemporary tertons were working with the same system of praxis in the late 11th and 12th century; it does not render snying thig superior to yang ti.

I imagine the real success of the snying thig literature is actually the compelling and fabulously rich narrative provided to it by the lo rgyus chen mo. Simply put, Zhang ston simply wrote a more interesting legend of the transmission of Dzogchen than other contemporary accounts at that point in time (mid 12th century). Of course, his account was swiftly eclipsed by the Padmasambhava legend revealed/composed/reworked by his younger contemporary, Nyang ral.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 20th, 2013 at 3:34 AM

Title: Re: Peter Brown and Dzogchen

Content:

nyamssnanggong'phel said:

Even if Dzogchen is Tibetan, it still developed within a 100% Buddhist environment according to scholars.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes. But I don't think anyone disputed this.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 20th, 2013 at 3:21 AM

Title: Re: Confused on Yangti generalities

Content:

nyamssnanggong'phel said:

If yangti is a copy, then the original is better.

Of course I could be misunderstanding Germano.

Malcolm wrote:

What article are you referencing, the funerary buddhism one?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 20th, 2013 at 3:08 AM

Title: Re: Confused on Yangti generalities

Content:

nyamssnanggong'phel said:

So we can say the unsurpassed secret cycle of nyingthig is superior to yangti.

Malcolm wrote:

What is your reasoning concerning this?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 20th, 2013 at 2:14 AM

Title: Re: Insisting on receiving instructions damages samaya

Content:

JKhedrup said:

Now that I have thought about it I am not sure this is a phenomenon completely outside our Western religious traditions. Does the Pope not call Catholics "Children of the Flock." All the priests in my father's Irish Catholic side of the family are called "Father", and nuns are called "Sister" or "Mother" depending on their rank.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, and look where infantilizing Catholics brought the Catholic Church.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 20th, 2013 at 2:11 AM

Title: Re: Where is Mount Sumeru?

Content:

Tsongkhapafan said:

Emptiness means that things do not exist from their own side in the least which means that 'reality' depends on your mind.

Malcolm wrote:

But your mind too does not exist from its own side...so what does it depend on?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 20th, 2013 at 1:21 AM

Title: Re: Insisting on receiving instructions damages samaya

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

even going so far as to call them "children" to their faces.

muni said:

Lol. I should see that as an invitation to come home.

"The "coming home" is like the son recognizing his mother. Like a young child leaping up & embracing her".

<http://www.sofiatopia.org/bodhi/dzogchen.htm>

Malcolm wrote:

It was not intended as affection...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 20th, 2013 at 1:10 AM

Title: Re: Peter Brown and Dzogchen

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

Presumably Mipham's description of dharmakaya/nature of mind/whatever in Gateway is Nyingma sutra level view?

Malcolm wrote:

Strictly so.

dzogchungpa said:

I believe you have said that in dzogchen, the thigle of elements in the heart is considered tathāgatagarbha. Is there a distinct Nyingma tantra level view of these things, i.e. something between sutra and dzogchen?

Malcolm wrote:

No, not really.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 19th, 2013 at 11:00 PM

Title: Re: Peter Brown and Dzogchen

Content:

nyamssnanggong'phel said:

Thus we can consider him as the normative Indian position, especially since he was from Vikramshila.

Malcolm wrote:

No, I don't really believe there was a normative Indian position. There were normative Tibetan biases about what more modern Madhyamaka teachings they were going to seek because of Atisha, but this does not mean that Atisha position was even a majority position in India. Recall too, Atisha, while proclaiming Candrakirti's virtue, never had anything of his translated. Instead Atisha sponsored the translation of Pseudo-Bhavaviveka's Tarkajvala, etc.

Also keep in mind that "Candrakirti's" popularity most likely had more to do with the tantric Candrakirti's commentaries on the Pañcakrama than Madhyamaka.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 19th, 2013 at 10:58 PM

Title: Re: Insisting on receiving instructions damages samaya

Content:

Karma Dorje said:

I think that Malcolm has a point that cultivating multiple relationships with teachers can give one context to prevent abuse and narrow sectarianism.

heart said:

I agree, I feel I sounded a bit too dogmatic in my response to Malcolm.

Malcolm wrote:

I tend to provoke that response in people of late.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 19th, 2013 at 10:57 PM

Title: Re: Insisting on receiving instructions damages samaya

Content:

narraboth said:

Sounds like some masters don't expect their students to act like adults.

Malcolm wrote:

I have met a few lamas who do not respect their (western) students as the adults that they are, and treat them like children, even going so far as to call them "children" to their faces. Of course, this is not a searing indictment of all Tibetan lamas. For the most part, most I have met treat their students with dignity and care.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 19th, 2013 at 10:53 PM

Title: Re: Insisting on receiving instructions damages samaya

Content:

Karma Dorje said:

Teachers really cannot discern your capacity unless they have known you for years.

M

AlexanderS said:

I thought an authentic teacher would be able to discern a student's capacity immediately through their supramundane knowledge or is that just fantasy?

Malcolm wrote:

There are all kinds of authentic teachers; some of them might have clairvoyance. Most however are just ordinary people like ourselves, trying to give us a hand up out of samsara while helping themselves as well.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 19th, 2013 at 10:44 PM

Title: Re: Peter Brown and Dzogchen

Content:

nyamssnanggong'phel said:

So to summarize the errors of those who promote Tathāgatagarbha Sutras.

1. They don't understand all the normative ancient Indian professors like Atisha said Madhyamaka was the definitive sutra teaching.

Malcolm wrote:

Just to be fair: Longchenpa states very clearly in the sgrub mtha' mdzod that Prasanga is the definitive view, Tathāgatagarbha sutras are the definitive sutras.

Second, there was in India a broad group of masters who dissented from the position you ascribe. Recall, Atisha is very, very late on the scene and had virtually no influence on Indian Buddhism that is presently discernible, apart from being a younger contemporary of Naropa, Ratnakarashanti, Vageshvarakirti, and so on.

Also, Candrakirti seems to have left very little lasting impression on Indian Madhyamaka until Atisha's time, when his works began to be upheld with enthusiasm. This is evident by the controversy they eventually sparked, leading to the composition of such texts as Ratnakarashanti's (Yogacara) Madhyamaka-alamkāra.

nyamssnanggong'phel said:

2. They don't understand there is a difference between tantric Buddha Nature of Mahamudra and sutric Buddha Nature of Tathāgatagarbha Sutras.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, this point is confusing for many people. It is made more confusing when scholars like Longchenpa regularly invoke the Uttaratantra in order to introduce concepts in Dzogchen causing people to conflate sugatagarbha teachings as they appear in Dzogchen and sūtra.

nyamssnanggong'phel said:

3. They don't understand tantra is higher than sutra.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, they can't be blamed for this since Sapan strongly argued against this position (indeed arguing against the position of his own guru, Jetsun Dragpa Gyaltzen). Since then, virtually all schools but Nyingma have maintained that the view of sutra and tantra is the same, differing only in means.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 19th, 2013 at 10:37 PM

Title: Re: Peter Brown and Dzogchen

Content:

Anders said:

[

If that is what it boils down to, doesn't that sort of put a downer on a lot of dzogchen material?

Malcolm wrote:

For some people it does, which is why they stick with causal and resultant paths.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 19th, 2013 at 9:24 AM

Title: Re: Peter Brown and Dzogchen

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

Malcolm, I happen to be reading "Gateway to Knowledge" volume 4, and maybe we could discuss the passage beginning on p.33 in the "Nirvana Is Peace" section as follows: Even more than that, by having discarded all the passing stains from the cognizant nature of mind, it becomes the identity of great natural purity, the ultimate transformation of fully perfected abandonment and realization, the dharmakaya, [the body of buddha qualities] This has countless qualities, but to summarize, these are transcendent purity, bliss, permanence and identity.

I'm assuming you have access to it, and the Tibetan is facing it. The "transcendent identity" mentioned above is "bdag gi pha rol tu phyin pa" in the Tibetan for example.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, perfection of identity, described in the Uttaratantra as being beyond self and non-self:

Having purified the proliferation of self and non-self

Since [the proliferation] is completely pacified, it is the highest self.

But, you have to realize that reality has been described already in the Uttaratantra as free from all extremes of proliferation. The dharmakāya is defined as the wisdom of Jinas, which is course is why it cannot be seen even by tenth stage bodhisattvas since they still possess a thin veil of the knowledge obscuration.

Here, that which is being described as the nature of the mind, the mind essence, is what Mipham is describing.

As far as Buddha qualities go -- it is appalling funny to see grown men arguing over whether the Buddha's penis withdrawn into a pouch ultimately exists.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 19th, 2013 at 8:26 AM

Title: Re: Peter Brown and Dzogchen

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Dharmakāya (emptiness) can be a potential. The problem with you is that you can only see things one way.

Son of Buddha said:

so Dharmakaya is only the potential to become Enlightened (which was you exact position on Buddha nature)

Malcolm wrote:

I didn't say only, I said "can", it really depends on what you are defining as Dharmakāya - and there are many ways to look at the issue.

Madhyamakas have one approach; Yogacara's a different approach and so on.

Why don't you provide us with a definition for Dharmakāya and we can start from there?

How about the ārya-dharmasaṃgīti-nāma-mahāyāna-sūtra:

"dharmakāya is the nirvana of the tathagatā".

Or ārya-trikāya-nāma-mahāyāna-sūtra

"dharmakāya means the absence of inherent existence like space"

Or the parinirvāṇasūtra:

"Without having exhausted afflictions, dharmakāya always exists"

These three statements for example can be seen as non-contradictory in the following way:

The Buddha realized nirvana; nirvana is the dharmakāya; dharmakāya is the absence of inherent existence, the absence of inherent existence, i.e. dharmakāya is a permanent fact of reality.

Here, we have an example of asserting the dharmakāya as permanent without asserting that it is something which exists, like the Hindu notion of self.

The problem as I see is that you take literally that which should be understood to be intentional or provisional.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 19th, 2013 at 8:06 AM

Title: Re: Peter Brown and Dzogchen

Content:

Son of Buddha said:

the poor research comment was in reference to reading like chapter 5 and saying the Lanka only teaches that Buddha nature is skillfull means even when the passage he is quoting doesnt actually say that..... while not knowing that chapter 6 says Buddha nature IS Buddhahood and the highest teaching.

Malcolm wrote:

Really? Give me a citation and I will compare it with the Tibetan text -- then we will see.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 19th, 2013 at 6:55 AM

Title: Re: Peter Brown and Dzogchen

Content:

Son of Buddha said:

nether the less they were posted....and they were your work.

Malcolm wrote:

Yup, which I stand by and which despite your persistent effort, you did not refute.

You merely demonstrated that you have a specific way of interpreting these texts. You did not succeed in showing that your approach is the "right one" (tm).

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 19th, 2013 at 6:52 AM

Title: Re: Peter Brown and Dzogchen

Content:

Son of Buddha said:

you actually refuted yourself seeing as you started off with how the Buddha Nature is only a potential....then you started providing passages that stated Buddha Nature was the Dharmakaya,totally undermining your own position to begin with.

Malcolm wrote:

Dharmakāya (emptiness) can be a potential. The problem with you is that you can only see things one way.

Son of Buddha said:

Since the ultimate nonmenon that is beyond dependent arising is never non existent, when one realises this, one does not fall to an extreme of non existence and is released from the extreme of deprecation.

Malcolm wrote:

And thus, since you advocate a "never nonexistent ultimate", you fall into the extreme of eternalism, and since you advocate a never existent relative, you fall into the extreme of annihilationism.

In other words, you, like the Gelugpas, get on one side of the the horse only to fall off the other side -- the funny thing is that when you are falling off one side, the Gelugpas are falling off the other.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 19th, 2013 at 6:45 AM

Title: Re: Peter Brown and Dzogchen

Content:

Son of Buddha said:

...you do realise that Malcolm's comments are a jumbled mess, half of his quotes are not even relevant to the actual topic,and many of his passages he claims to support his position don't even have anything to do with his claims,also the vast majority of the work is poorly researched...

smcj said:

I don't think that's a fair assessment of Malcolm. He knows what he is talking about. He has worked hard and has some level of expertise. He has his take on things, which I often disagree with, but his ideas are always well thought out, and within the parameters of a well-established buddhist perspective. He doesn't easily allow for other well-established perspectives, but if he did this entire site would be much more boring.

I disagree with him a lot of the time. Then again sometimes I agree with him. And sometimes (OMG!) I even learn from him. But I never dismiss him.

Malcolm wrote:

Buddhaputra also forgets that I did not post those citations, LB did, from a post that I wrote on E-Sangha nearly ten years ago. So of course they are out of context. No one asked me if I thought they were relevant to the present discussion.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 19th, 2013 at 6:35 AM

Title: Re: Peter Brown and Dzogchen

Content:

Son of Buddha said:

Buddha Nature isn't a potential for Enlightenment,

Malcolm wrote:

Of course it is exactly that; just as the potential for butter exists in milk, so too the potential for awakening exist in sentient beings. That potential is called "tathāgatagarbha". When that potential is "churned:" by practice, the result emerges just as butter emerges from milk. But if you examine milk before it has been churned you certainly will not find butter there. Likewise, if you examine sentient beings for buddha qualities you also will not find them, even though since they will arise through practice we can consider them naturally complete at the time of the cause.

Anyway, I am not sure why you are upset at being termed "eternalist" since that is exactly what your beliefs are, i.e., eternalist. You believe in the existence of something that is permanent as well as primeval.

Son of Buddha said:

The Buddha Nature/3rd turning Teachings are considered the definite teachings.

Malcolm wrote:

Apparently not by everyone, for example, me.

Secondly, you use outdated, inaccurate translations [Suzuki, etc.], and while Hodges translation of the Nirvana sutra is fine, even Hodge admits that that long Nirvana sutra flatly contradicts itself, a fact which he attributes to textual interpolation by the translator of the longest version.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 19th, 2013 at 6:16 AM

Title: Re: Peter Brown and Dzogchen

Content:

Anders said:

A person of superior faculties could understand dzogchen fully with only a very few pith phrases, and thus a minimal of hermeneutical interpolation. I don't see how the absence of presence of historical errors of dzogchen hermeneutics might impact his understanding of dzogchen.

Malcolm wrote:

Dzogchen, (apart from being a realization) essentially became hermeneutic criticism after the Tibetans invented the scheme of the nine Yānas in order to explain Dzogchen's relationship to the other strands of Buddhist theory.

Frankly, I think very few people understand Dzogchen based on a few pithy phrases, lord knows I certainly didn't and don't.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 19th, 2013 at 6:05 AM

Title: Re: Buddhism for King and Country?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

First of all, there was no Tibetan dark age. Langdarma was murdered in 841 in reaction to his taxation of the monasteries. This caused the Tibetan empire to fragment. Because of the ensuing dispute over succession.

But a dark age like Europe? Not at all. Buddhism was wide spread among aristocratic families like the Khon, the lCe, and so on. They preserved these teachings. Masters like Nubs Sang rgyas Ye shes were active and continued to translate and travel to India.

Then there was the western Tibetan Buddhist "revival", usually dated to the time of Rinchen Zangpo's return from Kashmir, in the late 10th century.

Sherlock said:

This sounds like how some people say there was no real dark age in Europe after the fall of the Western Roman Empire. Christianity survived and prospered during the Dark Age there as well, but in "mundane" standards, there was quite a big difference. There was a huge decline in artistic works, in the economy and international trade, in overall order; temples, including Samye, fell into disrepair, I think that qualifies as a dark age.

Malcolm wrote:

You make it sound like Tibetan culture and civilization came to a grinding halt. I suppose, from the point of view that grants Tibet a culture and civilization only in relationship to a recently imported foreign religion, that might be true.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 19th, 2013 at 2:06 AM

Title: Re: Buddhism for King and Country?

Content:

Indrajala said:

But then maybe decentralized models of mostly lay practitioners and a minority sangha is a plausible course of action as well.

Sherlock said:

That's how Buddhism survived in Tibet during the Dark Ages.

Malcolm wrote:

First of all, there was no Tibetan dark age. Langdarma was murdered in 841 in reaction to his taxation of the monasteries. This caused the Tibetan empire to fragment. Because of the ensuing dispute over succession.

But a dark age like Europe? Not at all. Buddhism was wide spread among aristocratic families like the Khon, the lCe, and so on. They preserved these teachings. Masters like Nubs Sang rgyas Ye shes were active and continued to translate and travel to India.

Then there was the western Tibetan Buddhist "revival", usually dated to the time of Rinchen Zangpo's return from Kashmir, in the late 10th century.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 19th, 2013 at 1:36 AM

Title: Re: Peter Brown and Dzogchen

Content:

Son of Buddha said:

So essentially Malcolm just accused the Buddha of being a realist, eternalist, and having some type of wrong view.

Malcolm wrote:

Not at all. I merely stated that there are those who understand such statements to affirm some kind of transcendent existent absolute, and that those who have such an interpretation have not understood the Buddha's teachings correctly.

The passage you cite merely states there is a state of bondage and a state of liberation. It does not state that liberation exists without the context of bondage. In fact, it predicates liberation on the fact of bondage.

It really does not say anything more than nirvana means freedom from rebirth.

The only reason you are using a Pali canon citation is that you know that Mahāyāna sūtras are not defensible as historical records of the Buddha.

Instead of giving citations, you should exercise your intellect, which is much better than becoming an expert in this or that species of dogmatics.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 19th, 2013 at 12:25 AM

Title: Re: Buddhism for King and Country?

Content:
Indrajala said:
Imperial China...

Malcolm wrote:
Warlords and petty kings, as I said.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Monday, November 18th, 2013 at 11:33 PM
Title: Re: Buddhism for King and Country?
Content:
Indrajala said:
But then maybe decentralized models of mostly lay practitioners and a minority sangha is a plausible course of action as well.

Malcolm wrote:
Well, you can always hope for serious social fragmentation that will inevitably result in warlords and petty kings again, and then you can once again have your state-supported and sanctioned "Buddhism" (and you can expel some "bonpos" for good measure).

Author: Malcolm
Date: Monday, November 18th, 2013 at 11:30 PM
Title: Re: Peter Brown and Dzogchen
Content:

Son of Buddha said:
In fact what in my statement do you even disagree with?
"I assert that the True Self/Buddha Nature(which is Enlightenment) is not-born, not-brought-to-being, not-made, and is unconditioned."

Malcolm wrote:
If you think this ultimately exists, then your assertion is realist and eternalist.

smcj said:
Ok, then so what? If you're not doing practices where that becomes an issue, then what's the harm? One can always change their mind later. Personally I'd rather say "ultimately valid" or "ultimately authentic", but that's just me playing with words.

Malcolm wrote:
That becomes an issue in all Buddhist practice, because it is an extreme view.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Monday, November 18th, 2013 at 10:26 PM

Title: Re: Chenresig Jenang initiation by HHDL Italy 2014

Content:

Karma Jinpa said:

For that matter, is the Dalai Lama considered Chenrezig because that's the so-called "patron deity of Tibet"?

Malcolm wrote:

No, it is because in a political move, the regent of the great fifth, one of the all time great scholar scoundrels in Tibetan History, Desri Sangye Gyatso, decided to promote the great fifth as such, and the appellation has stuck every since.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 18th, 2013 at 10:16 PM

Title: Re: Peter Brown and Dzogchen

Content:

Son of Buddha said:

In fact what in my statement do you even disagree with?

"I assert that the True Self/Buddha Nature(which is Enlightenment) is not-born, not-brought-to-being, not-made, and is unconditioned."

Malcolm wrote:

If you think this ultimately exists, then your assertion is realist and eternalist.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 18th, 2013 at 10:14 PM

Title: Re: Peter Brown and Dzogchen

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

We should be careful not to do the same. Otherwise, we will never understand Dzogchen fully.

Anders said:

Shouldn't that more properly be something like 'Dzogchen hermeneutical development' than just plain 'Dzogchen'?

Malcolm wrote:

How can the two be differentiated?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 18th, 2013 at 10:05 PM

Title: Re: Peter Brown and Dzogchen

Content:

Fa Dao said:

is there not another possibility besides those two..Dzogchen of Indian origin or Dzogchen as a Tibetan invention? Didnt Dzogchen come from Garab Dorje originally and wasnt he said to be from Oddiyana? And didnt Oddiyana have its own separate language, culture etc apart from India?

Malcolm wrote:

Oḍḍiyāna is not part of modern India, but was considered by Tibetans to be part of rgya gar. It's language was related to Sanskrit but was not Sanskrit, like Hindi, Gujarati, etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 18th, 2013 at 8:07 AM

Title: Re: Peter Brown and Dzogchen

Content:

Lindama said:

Malcolm: it is Dzogchen, because it really does express the religious genius of Tibetans in both its Bonpo and Buddhism forms. There is nothing like it at all in Indian Buddhism, or any other form of Buddhism.

Are you including zen in "any other form of Buddhism" (that is nothing like dzogchen). I have nothing to defend, just wondering.

Malcolm wrote:

\

Absolutely. While comparisons made be made, Zen and Dzogchen are dissimilar despite repeated attempts by some to liken them to on another.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 18th, 2013 at 8:06 AM

Title: Re: Peter Brown and Dzogchen

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

There is nothing like it at all in Indian Buddhism, or any other form of Buddhism.

Sherab Dorje said:

Uuuuummm... Mahamudra?

Malcolm wrote:

No, mahāmudra is its own thing. I have read a lot of Indian mahāmudra literature, and while certainly comparisons may be made, Atiyoga is just different.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 18th, 2013 at 7:38 AM

Title: Re: Peter Brown and Dzogchen

Content:

heart said:

... just because Malcolm says so doesn't make it so either I am afraid.

Malcolm wrote:

Why is it important to you that these texts are translations?

I mean, do you really care about the source of these texts?

If these texts are for the most part native Tibetan compositions, does that make them less profound and interesting?

The funny thing about both Tibetan Buddhism and Bon is the evident fetish for foreign teachings.

If anything has a right to call itself Tibetan Buddhism, it is Dzogchen, because it really does express the religious genius of a group of Tibetans in both its Bonpo and Buddhism forms. There is nothing like it at all in Indian Buddhism, or any other form of Buddhism. I also happen to think that Dzogchen is the most profound expression of Buddhist praxis so far. That is why I have spent most of my adult life focused on its teachings.

On the other hand I personally find that treating most (but not necessarily all) of these texts as native compositions solves many problems and answers many questions.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 18th, 2013 at 6:37 AM

Title: Re: Wang, Lung & Tri: the Trifecta

Content:

Karma Jinpa said:

This dawned on me when I read the interviews in the first few pages of Judith Hanson's translation of The Torch of Certainty:

What role does the guru play in guiding an individual through practice of the Four Foundations before, during, and after completion of the practices? What is the nature of the guru-disciple relationship?

TRUNGPA RINPOCHE: (...) Commitment to your guru and his teachings is very necessary; it gives you some guidelines for your life. Without that commitment you might begin to make up your own version of the Dharma, your own edition of the teachings, and sooner or later what you will get back is just your own ego version of the teachings. So the idea of commitment here is total surrendering, complete surrendering. You don't edit your own version of the Dharma anymore.

Thankfully I have found a guru whose instructions my egoic mind is willing to totally submit to, and the path has been made clear. That said, perhaps this thread may provide some help or guidance, bringing benefit to others. This was the intent.

supermaxv said:

Good points. I do find that far too many people on the internet are trying to "edit their own version of the Dharma" when it comes to vajrayana, but I deeply sympathize with those who wish to follow the path but don't have access to a guru and teachings.

I let my egoic mind get out of control earlier this year after receiving a deity initiation from a high Sakya lama (just the wang) that didn't have an associated practice text to go along with it (besides the short daily prayer sheet that was handed out), and I was intensely googling and bugging the lamas and monastery about if there was a more complete sadhana available for study / practice to no avail. It didn't make sense to me, why would there be an empowerment (and it wasn't an obscure one) without a practice sadhana?!? A few weeks ago I randomly found a copy at the monastery store and eagerly snatched it up before I realized that it was (a) really long, (b) really complex, (c) not a daily practice, and (d) a returned copy with some confused notes scribbled in the margins from someone who was probably in my exact state of mind a few weeks earlier.

I took a deep breath and realized I still have a lot of ego to cut through. Since then my motivation and daily practice has intensified almost exponentially.

Malcolm wrote:

IN Sakya, the lung for the practice is generally considered to be included with the empowerment.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 18th, 2013 at 6:20 AM

Title: Re: Buddhism for King and Country?

Content:

Sherlock said:

The survival of Buddhist practices during the Tibetan Dark Ages and more recently during the Communist revolutions throughout Asia might offer lessons as to how Buddhism can survive without state support.

Malcolm wrote:

But it didn't survive without state the support. The support system for Tibetan Buddhism, the aristocracy, fled to India.

it's revival in China held Tibet was also supported by state apparatus.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 18th, 2013 at 4:38 AM

Title: Re: Peter Brown and Dzogchen

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Since Tibetans like Jigme Lingpa consider the whole of Dzogchen literature as a monolithic textual edifice imported from India rather than a gradual discourse among the developed in Tibet beginning in the early ninth century, they tend to assert dogmatically formulations which derive from man ngag sde and apply them rather indiscriminately. We should be careful not to do the same. Otherwise, we will never understand Dzogchen fully.

heart said:

First I think you have to be able to prove your thesis about the Tibetan origin of the 17 tantras Malcolm, no? Just because you say so is no proof.

/magnus

Pero said:

Question I have is, where is the proof they are of Indian or other origin? Seems to me either way you go it will be hard to definitely prove anything, unless they find the original texts.

Malcolm wrote:

There is no proof that they are, which is the reason why they were excluded from the bKa' 'gyur. Even though the kun byed rgyal po is included, most scholars, even Tibetans, today accept it is a later compilation.

Anyway, why does it matter? I personally reject the view that they are translations from an Indic language because there are clear reasons to reject that view.

By and large, no one anymore believes Mahāyāna sutras were taught by the Buddha and there are many good reasons to reject that belief. Frankly, my point of view is that imagining Indic origins for the Dzogchen tantras inhibits our ability to understand them.

The problem is that people conflate the issue of origin with the issue of value. For me, the origin of these texts is not what grants them value; but the schemes people have elaborated to understand on the basis of their origin are no more effective than believing that scheme of the three turnings of the wheel grants us definitive insight in the meaning of Buddhist teachings.

What grants these texts value for me is the various ways they describe the process of delusion and how to wake up from that.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 18th, 2013 at 4:12 AM

Title: Re: Peter Brown and Dzogchen

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Since Tibetans like Jlgme Lingpa consider the whole of Dzogchen literature as a monolithic textual edifice imported from India rather than a gradual discourse among the developed in Tibet beginning in the early ninth century, they tend to assert dogmatically formulations which derive from man ngag sde and apply them rather indiscriminately. We should be careful not to do the same. Otherwise, we will never understand Dzogchen fully.

heart said:

First I think you have to be able to prove your thesis about the Tibetan origin of the 17 tantras Malcolm, no? Just because you say so is no proof.

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

You are entitled to believe whatever you like. I will continue to analyze Dzogchen tantras as a product of gradual textual evolution since that is what makes the most sense to me based on my reading of the texts.

BTW, just because you say the Bible isn't the true word of GOD, doesn't make it so.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 18th, 2013 at 3:22 AM

Title: Re: Peter Brown and Dzogchen

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Since Tibetans like Jlgme Lingpa consider the whole of Dzogchen literature as a monolithic textual edifice imported from India rather than a gradual discourse among the developed in Tibet beginning in the early ninth century, they tend to assert dogmatically formulations which derive from man ngag sde and apply them rather indiscriminately. We should be careful not to do the same. Otherwise, we will never understand Dzogchen fully.

Pero said:

Uhm why? Wouldn't that mean that Tibetans didn't understand Dzogchen fully?

Malcolm wrote:

That depends on what one means by "understand fully". What I mean is understanding the currents that are clearly obvious in Dzogchen tantras that have specific opponents in mind and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 18th, 2013 at 3:10 AM

Title: Re: Peter Brown and Dzogchen

Content:

asunthatneversets said:

"Those who, not understanding this, mistake the ālaya for the dharmakāya, are like blind men wandering in the desert without a guide. Because of their confusion about the vital points of the basis and result, they have come to a standstill on the path that accomplishes buddhahood in one lifetime."

- Jigme Lingpa

Malcolm wrote:

The only reason I brought up the distinction was because Dante made reference to the gzhi snang concept. Had he advanced the bodhicitta gambit, the discussion would have taken a different turn.

It is my opinion that the gzhi vs. kun gzhi distinction was elaborated by the early man ngag sde school as a sort of a pull back from the earlier, and more radical use of bodhicitta as kun gzhi in the bodhicitta texts.

Since Tibetans like Jigme Lingpa consider the whole of Dzogchen literature as a monolithic textual edifice imported from India rather than a gradual discourse among the developed in Tibet beginning in the early ninth century, they tend to assert dogmatically formulations which derive from man ngag sde and apply them rather indiscriminately. We should be careful not to do the same. Otherwise, we will never understand Dzogchen fully.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 18th, 2013 at 3:01 AM

Title: Re: Peter Brown and Dzogchen

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

hmmm somebody introduced a https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Red_herring how did we drive off a cliff and end up in the Great Vegetarian Debate thread???

Malcolm wrote:

All threads lead to the Great Vegetarian Debate. This the most gripping controversy in Buddhism.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 18th, 2013 at 2:07 AM

Title: Re: Peter Brown and Dzogchen

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

haha now you're conflating threads. anyway, I said that various cognitions lead to different experiences: cognizing yourself killing a cow (or having someone do it for you) and eating it will lead to a cognition in a future life of you being killed and eaten by someone else. cognizing yourself eating a potato leads to rebirth in most excellent Buddha fields where young girls will tend to your every need.

Malcolm wrote:

The cognition of eating a potato actually leads to endless births as potato bugs being killed again and again by organic pesticides...

gad rgyangs said:

no because karmic intent to commit & satisfaction over killing only happens eating steak, not potatoes.

Malcolm wrote:

nonsense. you clearly ignore the consequences to life and the environment of your dietary choices. By doing so, since you approve of all the lethal choices farmers make in producing your food, ergo, you are also culpable, karmically as well as morally.

In samsara, there is no free lunch, whoever much you wish to rationalize one.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 18th, 2013 at 1:46 AM

Title: Re: Peter Brown and Dzogchen

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

a nice story, until the concept of delusion intruded again as a value judgment.

Malcolm wrote:

You have a problem with your deluded preference for potatoes over steak being deluded? After all, they are both just the basis. Case closed, from a Dzogchen point of view, if we follow your reasoning, Veganism is bullshit.

gad rgyangs said:

haha now you're conflating threads. anyway, I said that various cognitions lead to different experiences: cognizing yourself killing a cow (or having someone do it for you) and eating it will lead to a cognition in a future life of you being killed and eaten by someone else. cognizing yourself eating a potato leads to rebirth in most excellent Buddha fields where young girls will tend to your every need.

Malcolm wrote:

The cognition of eating a potato actually leads to endless births as potato bugs being killed again and again by organic pesticides...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 18th, 2013 at 1:31 AM

Title: Re: Peter Brown and Dzogchen

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

In order to see the basis as it is, rather than the deluded superimposition (samaropa) we normally perceive, we have to uproot the all-basis, the so called ālaya. this is causal as frak.

Malcolm wrote:

It is also Dzogchen theory. You don't have to accept it, but that is how it is explained in the Dzogchen tantras, sNying thig and so on.

gad rgyangs said:

a nice story, until the concept of delusion intruded again as a value judgment.

Malcolm wrote:

You have a problem with your deluded preference for potatoes over steak being deluded? After all, they are both just the basis. Case closed, from a Dzogchen point of view, if we follow your reasoning, Veganism is bullshit.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 18th, 2013 at 1:09 AM

Title: Re: Apology to women

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

the things some guys will do to try and get laid

Nighthawk said:

Is it wrong to be male feminist?

Malcolm wrote:

Quite a number of feminists seem to think so. "Male feminism" can be seen as a patriarchal appropriation of a subaltern narrative.

It's probably better to consider yourself "anti-patriarchal", or a "pro-feminist" man than a "male feminist".

Actually, the apology to women (AKA Manifesto of Conscious Men) is one the most sexist things I have seen in a long time, which is why it was rightfully spoofed by Will Farrell.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 18th, 2013 at 12:47 AM

Title: Re: Peter Brown and Dzogchen

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

But this picture is fundamentally dualistic to begin with, because it starts with a separation of the consciousness that is or is not recognizing from that which is or is not recognized. If this separation is removed, then dualism vanishes of itself, and its called Dzogchen. This state is not created by recognition, is not lost by non-recognition: it is always already the case.

Malcolm wrote:

The interesting feature of Dzogchen is not the basis. The interesting feature of Dzogchen is its explanation of delusion.

You can keep claiming potatoes are the basis I(no need to even call them "appearances of the basis) until the cows come home. This does not help one to understand the process of delusion at all. Fundamentally, Dzogchen teachings serve to explain the process of delusion and how to unravel it.

I agree with you that the basis not improved by recognition or rendered defective by non-recognition. I also agree with you that delusion never stirs from the state of the basis itself. However, this does not mean that cognition of a potato is a cognition of the basis. It is a cognition of the all-basis.

The cognition of conventional things is produced by consciousnesses impregnated with traces of delusion without beginning. The intellectual apprehension that delusion never stirs from the basis is still just an intellectual apprehension that does nothing in terms of unraveling the fundamental delusion the produces deluded experience in the first place.

This is why for example, it is clearly stated in various places that gazing at rocks and trees for example will not lead one to experience the body of light because unlike the wisdom appearances of the four visions, the vision of rocks and trees are karmic visions supported on traces of affliction and action, i.e. the dualism of deluded vision itself.

In order to see the basis as it is, rather than the deluded superimposition (samaropa) we normally perceive, we have to uproot the all-basis, the so called ālaya.

Incidentally, in the account of the appearance of the basis it is pretty clearly stated that the appearance of the basis is perceived with sense organs that arise from the basis along with the neutral awareness that stirs from the potentiality [rtsal] of the basis.

That primordial dualism [the connate ignorance, lhan cig skye ma rig pa] collapses when that neutral awareness recognizes the appearance of the basis as its own state; but when it does not, the imputing ignorance takes the name of the all-basis, producing all of our conventional, and therefore, innately deluded experience.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, November 17th, 2013 at 11:13 PM

Title: Re: Peter Brown and Dzogchen

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

"false" is an arbitrary label. I'll save us some time:

"superimposed by who?"

"by you, me or anyone"

"and where did we come from? are we not also appearances of the basis, call them false or true?"

"or course, otherwise we and so-called "false" appearances would have a different basis than the basis of true appearances. And there are not multiple bases."

"so really, both so-called "false" or "marigpaed" appearances and so-called "true" or "rigpaed" appearances have one and the same basis, and are therefore both appearances of that basis?"

"or course, there is no other possibility."

Malcolm wrote:

Snake [false appearance of the all-basis], rope [appearance of the basis].

On the other hand without the appearance of the basis there is also no basis for deluded appearances, so I can see why you are confused. This is the principle reason why the man ngag sde school elaborated a gzhi and a kun gzhi to account for how it is that deluded appearances are not the appearance of the basis (which cannot itself give rise to deluded appearances), while demonstrating that deluded, i.e., conventional, (i.e. the false) appearances of everyday things are rooted in the nonrecognition of the basis.

In the bodhicitta texts no differentiation is made between gzhi and kun gzhi, since the concept of the appearance of the basis was not yet formulated.

If potatoes are the appearance of the basis, there is no need for the elaboration of the all-basis to account for deluded appearances.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, November 17th, 2013 at 9:39 AM

Title: Re: Peter Brown and Dzogchen

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Veridical means seeing the actual nature of a given phenomena. Surely you are not eating an ultimate potato.

It is taken for granted in the Madhyamaka view that conventional cognitions are also deluded cognitions. Nevertheless, some deluded cognitions are efficient, hence Nāgārjuna's admonition to rely in the conventional in order to realize the ultimate.

gad rgyangs said:

since this thread is in Dzogchen, I will say that the potato, as an expression of the gzhi snang (rigpa-ed or marigpa-ed) is as ultimate as anything. As you know, the emptiness of the potato cannot be separated from the potato (reified) so where else will one find an ultimate except the potato itself? The other choice, which I am equally at peace with, is there is no ultimate anything, since ultimate requires a contrasting non-ultimate, and what would that be, given gcig pu?

Malcolm wrote:

The potato is not an appearance of the basis, it a false appearance [snang lugs] superimposed on the appearance of the basis. And indeed, there is no ultimate to find apart from the real nature [gnas lugs] of the potato.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, November 17th, 2013 at 9:13 AM

Title: Re: Ancient Buddhas

Content:

Aemilius said:

Madam Blavatsky, who has been mentioned here, concretely experienced how the social order Religion and the social order of Science behave when they encountered her paranormal powers and capacities.

Malcolm wrote:

Right, she did not take kindly to being found out as a fraudulent con artist.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, November 17th, 2013 at 9:11 AM

Title: Re: Ancient Buddhas

Content:
tatpurusa said:
Back on topic:

According to Bon tradition, the founder of Bon, Buddha Tonpa Shenrab Miwoche, was born about 18000 years ago, and had a lifespan of thousands of years.

Living Bonpo masters, like Yongdzin Tenzin Namdak, do interpret these numbers literally.

Malcolm wrote:
There is not simply one tradition about this. It is like the Nyingmapa traditions around Padmasambhava. Not every account (i.e. the earlier accounts) has him appearing in a lotus blossom. Some accounts even portray him as having a human father and mother.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Sunday, November 17th, 2013 at 9:05 AM
Title: Re: Peter Brown and Dzogchen
Content:

gad rgyangs said:
ok so you are defining "absolute truth" as a cognition or mental state of an ordinary being?

Malcolm wrote:
If your cognition is absolutely veridical, it is not longer ordinary, no?

gad rgyangs said:
depends on how you define "veridical": if I recognize the baked potato I am eating right now as a baked potato, that is veridical in a conventional sense. If I shift to rigpa for an instant, then that is veridical as long as it lasts, but then I am back with my potato. last night when I dreamt that my grandmother was a bus, that was veridical at the time too, and all of these plus $2.50 will get you on the subway.

Malcolm wrote:
Yes, but as you know that is not what veridical means. Veridical means seeing the actual nature of a given phenomena. Surely you are not eating an ultimate potato.

It is taken for granted in the Madhyamaka view that conventional cognitions are also deluded cognitions. Nevertheless, some deluded cognitions are efficient, hence Nāgārjuna's admonition to rely in the conventional in order to realize the ultimate.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Sunday, November 17th, 2013 at 8:19 AM
Title: Re: Peter Brown and Dzogchen
Content:

gad rgyangs said:
who's cognition?

Malcolm wrote:
Oh god, we are not going to play this silly little Zen game are we?

Your cognition of course, any given subjects cognition.

gad rgyangs said:
ok so you are defining "absolute truth" as a cognition or mental state of an ordinary being?

Malcolm wrote:
If your cognition is absolutely veridical, it is not longer ordinary, no?

Author: Malcolm
Date: Sunday, November 17th, 2013 at 7:58 AM
Title: Re: Apology to women
Content:
Malcolm wrote:
Totally creepy.

<http://www.funnyordie.com/videos/55c51f0c23/dear-woman>

Author: Malcolm
Date: Sunday, November 17th, 2013 at 7:52 AM
Title: Re: Peter Brown and Dzogchen
Content:
asunthatneversets said:
By 'the mind which seeks to reject views' I meant a mind which deprecates the idea of views altogether and therefore would attempt to abstain from expressing views.

Malcolm wrote:
All that is required for this is the famed non-affirming negation.

A negation does not necessarily the negator holds a view of his or her own.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Sunday, November 17th, 2013 at 7:51 AM
Title: Re: Peter Brown and Dzogchen
Content:

gad rgyangs said:
who's cognition?

Malcolm wrote:
Oh god, we are not going to play this silly little Zen game are we?

Your cognition of course, any given subjects cognition.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Sunday, November 17th, 2013 at 7:11 AM
Title: Re: Peter Brown and Dzogchen
Content:
Son of Buddha said:
Everything that is NOT Nirvana falls into the catagory of Anatta.
<http://www.tbcm.org.my/mn-64-mahamalunkya-sutta-the-greater-discourse-to-malunkyaputta/>

Malcolm wrote:
You do realize this statement is pure dualism through and through?

Son of Buddha said:
Well Malcolm I am quoting from the Pali Canon which is generally considered by both True Self and Not Self Thervadans to be Dualistic in material.

http://www.accesstoinight.org/lib/authors/bodhi/bps-essay_27.html

Here is an essay by a (Not Self Thervadan) well known Ven Bodhi on what the Pali canon teaches about non duality.

I could look up a True Self Thervadans perspective on non duality if you like?
(Shouldnt be to hard to find the largest Buddhist sect in thailand is a True Self Thervadan sect)

But you would also consider their material "dualist" also

Malcolm wrote:
Yes, your view, the view of Theravada in general, etc. are all pretty much mired in trenchant dualisms of various kinds.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Sunday, November 17th, 2013 at 7:09 AM
Title: Re: Peter Brown and Dzogchen

Content:
Malcolm wrote:
Ultimate truth is a cognition

gad rgyangs said:
a cognition is a mental state. how could that ever be ultimate truth?

Malcolm wrote:
An ultimate truth is an absolutely veridical cognition. That is its definition. If you want to fight the definition, but then you are basically in humpty dumpty land.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Sunday, November 17th, 2013 at 6:40 AM
Title: Re: Peter Brown and Dzogchen
Content:
Son of Buddha said:
Everything that is NOT Nirvana falls into the catagory of Anatta.
<http://www.tbcm.org.my/mn-64-mahamalunkya-sutta-the-greater-discourse-to-malunkyaputta/>

Malcolm wrote:
You do realize this statement is pure dualism through and through?

Author: Malcolm
Date: Sunday, November 17th, 2013 at 6:38 AM
Title: Re: Peter Brown and Dzogchen
Content:
gad rgyangs said:
24.10 simply acknowledges that common speech (vyavahāra) must be used to talk about the ultimate truth that there is no ultimate truth

Malcolm wrote:
Ultimate truth is a cognition, not an external fact.

The purpose of 24.10 is to shown that the conventional must be relied upon in order to realize the ultimate. It is incorrect to say there is no ultimate truth. If you say there is no ultimate truth you are effectively saying that all minds are always deluded at all times, even the mind that apprehends the non-existence of ultimate truth which you suppose is the ultimate truth.

In other words, by disallowing veridical cognition, you are automatically consigning yourself to a state of permanent unalleviable delusion.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, November 17th, 2013 at 12:49 AM

Title: Re: Garchen giving Refuge Vows webcast

Content:

KonchokZoepa said:

does refuge vow mean the 5 lay vow's?

heart said:

No, that is a separate ceremony.

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

Refuge indeed confers the five lay vows, but magnus is also correct in that there is a separate pratimoksha ordination which is classified as Hinayāna, usually given to those who plan on becoming monks or nuns. In general, when Tibetan lamas give refuge, they are doing so from a Mahāyāna system.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, November 16th, 2013 at 4:21 AM

Title: Re: Peter Brown and Dzogchen

Content:

Lotus_Bitch said:

Go tell an Advaitan that cit is conditioned by certain factors of mentality (nama) and materiality (rupa), dependent on contact to give rise to the 6 sense media and to practice by being mindful of the arising and passing of each. You will either get a confused look, be laughed at or both.

dzogchungpa said:

I believe they would accept all of that with regards to citta.

Malcolm wrote:

But not cit. That was the point.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, November 16th, 2013 at 3:07 AM

Title: Re: Mahayana views on dying and intermediate state

Content:

Luke said:

Just about everyone has heard about the Tibetan Book of the Dead by now, but what do standard Mahayana schools think happens during death and the intermediate state?

Are there any sutras which explain these things from the Mahayana point of view?

I would like to understand how the Tibetan beliefs differ from standard Mahayana ones.

Malcolm wrote:

One, there isn't a single Tibetan system regarding the antarabhāva, or intermediate state, there are several, most derived from Indian sources.

Second, there is not much difference, other than Mahāyāna provides no methods regarding how to practice in such a state.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, November 16th, 2013 at 12:13 AM

Title: Re: Prayers for the victims of false flags

Content:

prayerwheel said:

Also there's a warning about South Flower and West Fifth Avenue in Los Angeles being the target of a false flag op, so avoid it for a while maybe?

Jikan said:

Got a source on this?

Malcolm wrote:

<https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=3y-0dHFvkV4>

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 15th, 2013 at 11:11 PM

Title: Re: Garchen giving Ratna Lingpa's Vajrakilaya

Content:

KonchokZoepa said:

oh, thanks, but its not that short. its just as long as the ratna lingpa's version.

i was hoping more like max 20 pages with starting and finishing prayers. anyway, thanks for pointing the sadhana out.

Malcolm wrote:

Depends on what you include and exclude.

The main practice is 11-33, which is more or less exactly the length you said you wanted.

For daily practice you can skip lots of elaboration.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 15th, 2013 at 10:49 PM

Title: Re: Garchen giving Ratna Lingpa's Vajrakilaya

Content:

KonchokZoepa said:

it would seem from the header of that scribd text that it is not the same sadhana as the one on theyre webstore...

Malcolm wrote:

This is the one.

<http://www.scribd.com/doc/149130531/Puja-Vajrakilaya-Sadhana-Ratna-Lingpa>

It is actually Sangye Lingpa's sadhana, employed as a short practice for the Ratling tradition.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 15th, 2013 at 10:33 PM

Title: Re: Peter Brown and Dzogchen

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The tetralemma is used in all kinds of ways by Nāgārjuna. But each use has a context.

gad rgyangs said:

didn't answer the question: name a context where the tetralemma would not apply.

Malcolm wrote:

Which tetralemma? N uses several.

gad rgyangs said:

let me restate why i am bringing this up in this thread: if, as N says in 27.30, Buddha "taught the true Dharma for the abandonment of all views", then, two questions:

1 why is it necessary to carefully distinguish the views of Buddhism and Vedanta, if they both must be abandoned anyway?

Malcolm wrote:

24.10

gad rgyangs said:

2 if the "true Dharma" is not a view, then what is it?

Malcolm wrote:

The intent of teaching dependent origination and emptiness is the elimination of views. Which views? Views of existence and non-existence, and that's all.

FYI, your query has nothing to do with the subject of the thread. The thread has actually gone off topic.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 15th, 2013 at 9:47 PM

Title: Re: FAQ: Dzogchen Community of Namkhai Norbu Rinpoche

Content:

lelopa said:

afak the next one will be adzom drugpa

Malcolm wrote:

The Padmasambhava and Adzom transmissions are identical in every respect apart from the date.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 15th, 2013 at 9:36 PM

Title: Re: Peter Brown and Dzogchen

Content:

Anders said:

Shankhara's assesment of Nagarjuna for example is that he was basically correct in his analysis, except that he does not allow for an existent unconditioned element.

Malcolm wrote:

Cough, cough....

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 15th, 2013 at 9:35 PM

Title: Re: Peter Brown and Dzogchen

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

if you cant say "is", "is not", "both", or "neither", then what exactly can you say?

Malcolm wrote:

The purpose of that passage actually is to eliminate things you can say about the tathāgata — context is everything.

gad rgyangs said:

are you claiming there are other topics not subject to the tetralemma?

Malcolm wrote:

The tetralemma is used in all kinds of ways by Nāgārjuna. But each use has a context.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 15th, 2013 at 7:43 AM

Title: Re: Peter Brown and Dzogchen

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

all the Buddha's teachings are like the toys on the lawn to get the kids out of the burning house.

Jikan said:

This is, itself, a teaching of the Buddha. Is it also provisional?

Not in the context in which it is put forward. In the Lotus Sutra, where this analogy is developed, it describes the means by which the Buddha deploys provisional teachings as a means to get to the absolute teachings (the Buddha-vehicle). Are the teachings that are characterized as "absolute" themselves merely provisional, merely upaya? Is the concept of upaya itself provisional?

Malcolm wrote:

It's upaya all the way down.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 15th, 2013 at 6:18 AM

Title: Re: Peter Brown and Dzogchen

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

if you cant say "is", "is not", "both", or "neither", then what exactly can you say?

Malcolm wrote:

The purpose of that passage actually is to eliminate things you can say about the tathāgata — context is everything.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 15th, 2013 at 5:51 AM

Title: Re: Peter Brown and Dzogchen

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

ummm, 22.11:

"we do not assert 'empty'

nor do we assert 'nonempty'

we neither assert both nor neither.

they are asserted only for the purpose of designation"

Malcolm wrote:
see 24.17-19

Dependent origination is not the "provisional" teaching of the Buddha. Otherwise, Nāgārjuna would not have introduced MMK with the mangalam praising dependent origination, free from ceasing, arising and so on as the pacification of proliferation.

Is there something more definitive in the Buddha's teaching than the pacification of proliferation? According to you it is all about relinquishing views. When there is no proliferation, how can there be a view?

gad rgyangs said:
all the Buddha's teachings are like the toys on the lawn to get the kids out of the burning house.

Malcolm wrote:
So you basically think all the Buddhas teachings then are "provisional". Ok. I don't agree.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Friday, November 15th, 2013 at 5:32 AM
Title: Re: Peter Brown and Dzogchen
Content:
gad rgyangs said:
ummm, 22.11:

"we do not assert 'empty'
nor do we assert 'nonempty'
we neither assert both nor neither.
they are asserted only for the purpose of designation"

Malcolm wrote:
see 24.17-19

Dependent origination is not the "provisional" teaching of the Buddha. Otherwise, Nāgārjuna would not have introduced MMK with the mangalam praising dependent origination, free from ceasing, arising and so on as the pacification of proliferation.

Is there something more definitive in the Buddha's teaching than the pacification of proliferation? According to you it is all about relinquishing views. When there is no proliferation, how can there be a view?

Author: Malcolm
Date: Friday, November 15th, 2013 at 4:12 AM
Title: Re: Peter Brown and Dzogchen

Content:

Jikan said:

Is dependent origination a view, or is it adequate knowledge, first hand, of how samsara works?

gad rgyangs said:

how does "first hand" knowledge of dependent origination look different from causation, which is negated in MMK 1?

both "empty" and "dependent origination" (which are really the same thing) are provisional/arbitrary teachings of the Buddha (according to MMK)

Malcolm wrote:

Ummm, no.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 15th, 2013 at 4:11 AM

Title: Re: Peter Brown and Dzogchen

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

doesn't it say somewhere something about "relinquishing all views"?

Malcolm wrote:

Well, there is the intellectual "giving up of views" and then there is realizing the nature of dependent origination which is free from views.

gad rgyangs said:

"dependent origination" is also a view.

Malcolm wrote:

You can make anything into an intellectual trip.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 15th, 2013 at 12:52 AM

Title: Re: Garchen giving Ratna Lingpa's Vajrakilaya

Content:

heart said:

Ok thanks, you know of any translation?

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

Sure, there is a translation used the Palyul folks. This is the main Kilaya tradition of Palyul.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 15th, 2013 at 12:11 AM

Title: Re: Peter Brown and Dzogchen

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

doesn't it say somewhere something about "relinquishing all views"?

Malcolm wrote:

Well, there is the intellectual "giving up of views" and then there is realizing the nature of dependent origination which is free from views.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 15th, 2013 at 12:09 AM

Title: Re: Peter Brown and Dzogchen

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

I don't really buy into the integral models of world spirituality.

Anders said:

Practically or fundamentally? Practically speaking, I could be inclined to agree. But doesn't karma more or less dictate that spirituality is fundamentally integral?

Jikan said:

the word "integral" means many different things. Would you mind explaining what you mean by the term for the purpose of this discussion?

Malcolm wrote:

Well, I had in mind the the attempt by various modern perennialists to come up with models that allows absolute equivalencies to be made and hierarchies to be established among various spiritual traditions.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 14th, 2013 at 11:32 PM

Title: Re: Peter Brown and Dzogchen

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The question here is whether or not the cessation of rebirth is effected by seeing dependent origination or by seeing an ontological totality. Take your pick and run with it. But you cannot pick both because they are mutually exclusive views.

Anders said:

I get that, but this still revolves around a 'view of the ultimate' model of liberation. If we take a 'shred of affliction' model as early Buddhism does (I think the former is really mostly useful for determining how practically useful a model is) for our measurement, it comes out to 'no-thing at all to hang a shred of clinging to' vs 'a few ontological shreds of clinging of a mostly purified mind'. I.e, cessation of rebirth is not so much effected by 'seeing dependent origination' as it is by 'ending clinging to views of self' and so forth (from which the perception of dependent origination is produced).

I am understating it here for dramatic effect and all and I do appreciate that the expected view of liberation seems to have a strong effect on the eventual outcome for its successful practitioners.

Malcolm wrote:

Any shred of clinging is sufficient to sink your battleship.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 14th, 2013 at 11:21 PM

Title: Re: Peter Brown and Dzogchen

Content:

Anders said:

Maybe a few (very) crude diagrams will illustrate the difference I am talking about:

Where 'catholicism' would fall under the umbrella of those who do good creating good karma to increase the odds of meeting with the dharma of liberation, etc.

More or less the difference I suppose between the Ekayana view of Arhats, who will continue towards buddhahood so long as they do not fall into the view of personal nirvana and the 'seed of bodhi' model, where the fruit of the Arhat is fundamentally and irreversibly distinct from the fruit of Buddhahood.

Malcolm wrote:

I don't really buy into the integral models of world spirituality.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 14th, 2013 at 11:04 PM

Title: Re: Peter Brown and Dzogchen

Content:

Anders said:

"two distinct schools with two entirely distinct results."

Malcolm wrote:

They are two distinct schools with entirely distinct results because they have entirely different bases.

Anders said:

Do elaborate.

Malcolm wrote:

Dzogchen is predicated on dependent origination and emptiness, Advaita refutes both dependent origination and emptiness. The difference, as always, is view.

If you confine your notion of liberation to controlling afflictions, there there is no difference at all between all the various ethical systems which recommend self-control in conjunction with contemplative quietude.

The question here is whether or not the cessation of rebirth is effected by seeing dependent origination or by seeing an ontological totality. Take your pick and run with it. But you cannot pick both because they are mutually exclusive views.

One of the key points of the Dzogchen tradition is understanding all these different tirthika [samsaric] and bauddha [nirvanic] tenet systems.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 14th, 2013 at 10:53 PM

Title: Re: Peter Brown and Dzogchen

Content:

Anders said:

"two distinct schools with two entirely distinct results."

Malcolm wrote:

They are two distinct schools with entirely distinct results because they have entirely different bases.

Dzogchen is predicated on dependent origination and emptiness, Advaita refutes both dependent origination and emptiness.

I am not making any truth claim here for either one. I am merely pointing out that the truth they claim is different.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 14th, 2013 at 10:44 PM

Title: Re: Garchen giving Ratna Lingpa's Vajrakilaya

Content:

Karma Jinpa said:

Do you know if what he gives now was perhaps in danger of going extinct, and thus Rinpoche began to propagate it? Or do you think perhaps this is the safest Kilaya sadhana for the Western students of his to practice?

heart said:

I don't think this particular terma is in any danger of going extinct. I don't know what you mean with "safest", Vajrakilaya is not dangerous in any way, my guess is that there is a comfortable short sadhana that fit the mentality of westerners in this cycle as well as a translation. I am sure there exist several sadhanas of various length in this cycle, there normally is.

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

Usually people use the short Kilaya sadhana of Sangye Lingpa in conjunction with this tradition.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 14th, 2013 at 10:28 PM

Title: Re: Peter Brown and Dzogchen

Content:

Anders said:

Come now. It's a lot like Brahman, which is why they are so often compared.

Malcolm wrote:

No, brahman is sat, real, where as dharmakāya is the total realization of emptiness free from all extremes and its attendant twin omniscience.

In other words dharmakāya needs a realization to bring it about. Brahman does not.

Anders said:

Unless we talk of Samantabhadra who never fell into ignorance and so forth.

Malcolm wrote:

Now you are making a huge mistake. Samantabhadra does experience ignorance, i.e., the ignorance identical with the cause, and the connate ignorance. What "he" never experiences is the imputing ignorance, thus Samantabhadra never experiences samsara.

Samantabhadra also experiences liberation; doing so without gathering virtue; just as sentient beings experience bondage without gathering nonvirtue.

Please study Dzogchen more carefully. Even rdzogs chen tantras themselves differentiate Dzogchen from Advaita.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 14th, 2013 at 9:52 PM

Title: Re: Peter Brown and Dzogchen

Content:

Anders said:

Come now. It's a lot like Brahman, which is why they are so often compared.

Malcolm wrote:

No, brahman is sat, real, where as dharmakāya is the total realization of emptiness free from all extremes and its attendant twin omniscience.

In other words dharmakāya needs a realization to bring it about. Brahman does not.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 14th, 2013 at 9:50 PM

Title: Re: Peter Brown and Dzogchen

Content:

Unknown said:

1) According to Malcolm, KTGR had to concede in a debate with him in the end that Shentong is no different from Advaita except its emphasis on Buddhahood.

Malcolm wrote:

I simply pointed out to him that the structure of the gzhan stong presentation of the two truths could not be distinguished from the way Advaita formulates the two truths. He admitted this, but replied that Advaita did not have buddhahood and that was the difference between the two. In other words for him, the structural similarities in the formulations were of less consequence than differences in the notions of total liberation between the two systems.

But lets not extend the consequences of answer to far. He was not admitting for example, that there is only one universal cit, and so on, as in Advaita.

There is also the fact that idea of bodhicitta and so on is utterly lacking in tīrthika systems.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 14th, 2013 at 8:51 AM

Title: Re: Peter Brown and Dzogchen

Content:

KonchokZoepa said:

im reading a book called Dzogchen Primer. and it takes the stance that even Tulku Urgyen Rinpoche taught the traditional path and method of dzogchen. that is to progress through the nine yanas.

Malcolm wrote:

That is not how TUR taught Dzogchen, at least not according to people I know who were personal long term disciples of his. TUR, as I understand it, taught Dzogchen based on the individual person. Some people were taught more gradually, other people less.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 14th, 2013 at 2:21 AM

Title: Re: Acharya Mahayogi Sridhar Rana Rinpoche

Content:

elpz said:

Hi. Came across this quite by accident, and created an account just to reply to this.

As a student of his I can assure you that Rana Rinpoche is definitely not a Sakyapa. His first Vajrayana teacher was Tulku Ugyen Rinpoche and while he has strong links to the Sakya tradition -- given that Chobgye Trichen, Sakya Trichen, and Karma Thinley Rinpoches have been his primary teachers since his entering retreat in 96 -- he is quite firm in stating that he is non-sectarian.

Here's our sanga's website for more info on him:

<http://www.byomakusuma.org>

Cheers.

Malcolm wrote:

The point is not his attitude towards schools, the point is who his main teachers are and what he mainly practices.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 12th, 2013 at 7:23 AM

Title: Re: 13 books of khenpo shenga

Content:

lama tsewang said:

I want to find translations of all the Thirteen Treatises of Khenpo Shenga together with his commentary, and the ones by Mipham Rinpoche , can any one help me please

Malcolm wrote:

They do not exist yet. The only one out there I know of is the translation of the Dharmadharmatā-vibhanga by the Dharmacakra Translation Committee.

There are only a few commentaries by Mipham out there as well. But all the main texts of the thirteen treatises, the indic originals, do exist in translation.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 11th, 2013 at 12:59 AM

Title: Re: Bentinho Massaro - Is he there in a dzogchen sense?

Content:

tobes said:

The former wants to preserve some universal truth that everything is one, the latter wants to preserve some particular truth that difference is meaningful and decisive.

Malcolm wrote:

They are both sectarian.

Adamantine said:

How so?

Malcolm wrote:

They both present partial views about reality.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, November 10th, 2013 at 10:13 PM

Title: Re: Mo Lha, and the 5 foremost dieties

Content:

Adamantine said:

Can anyone elaborate on this and how it relates to Tibetan Medicine, and if there are specific pujas related to these 5? And perhaps the significance of paintings like this one

Malcolm wrote:

These five deities are the deities that live on a person's body and are with him or her from birth. If they leave the body, then there can be illnesses since they have protective role.

They are mentioned among the snang srid de brgyad in the sde brgyad ser skhyem.

Adamantine said:

Thanks Malcolm. Do you know if there is a physiological relationship with their placement in the body? For instance, the Mo Lha being at the left armpit?

How do you view these, as actual entities, or metaphors for something related to our individuality?

Are they generally communicated with during sang puja? There is a concise sang by Dudjom Rinpoche the second line of which reads 'GO WA'I LHA NGA DRA LHA NYEN PO NAM

(You five superior gods and the fiercely protective dralha)
Are these five deities in particular what he is referencing?

Thanks for your insight!

Malcolm wrote:

There is a section of the eight classes that are placed on the body. You can look at the serkhyem of the eight classes and see it quite easily.

And yes, DR is referring to those five gods.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, November 10th, 2013 at 10:09 PM

Title: Re: Bentinho Massaro - Is he there in a dzogchen sense?

Content:

tobes said:

The former wants to preserve some universal truth that everything is one, the latter wants to preserve some particular truth that difference is meaningful and decisive.

Malcolm wrote:

They are both sectarian.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, November 10th, 2013 at 9:35 PM

Title: Re: Dechan Jueren and Hanmi Buddhism

Content:

BuddhasNoDieCancer said:

The problem is the discontinuity on the teachings from Dechan Jueren to the other disciples.

Malcolm wrote:

Another problem is that he is dead, passed away in 2011.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, November 10th, 2013 at 8:14 AM

Title: Re: Mo Lha, and the 5 foremost dieties

Content:

Adamantine said:

Can anyone elaborate on this and how it relates to Tibetan Medicine, and if there are specific pujas related to these 5? And perhaps the significance of paintings like this one

Malcolm wrote:

These five deities are the deities that live on a person's body and are with him or her from birth. If they leave the body, then there can be illnesses since they have protective role.

They are mentioned among the snang srid de brgyad in the sde brgyad ser skhyem.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, November 10th, 2013 at 4:21 AM

Title: Re: Longchenpa & Dolpopa: Contemporaries

Content:

udawa said:

One connection between the two is Rangjung Dorje, the 3rd Karmapa.

I think I'm right in saying that Rangjung Dorje studied alongside Longchenpa and he met Dolpopa at some point.

D

Malcolm wrote:

Kumararaja 1266 - 1343

Rangjung Dorje 1284 -1339.

Longchenpa 1308 - 1364.

If they had met, I am sure it would have been with Longchenpa being a common monk going to meet a very high Lama. I seriously doubt whether they ever studied together, but they both studied with Kumararaja.

I believe Longchenpa only meets Kumararaja when he is 29, two years prior to the death of the third Karmapa.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, November 9th, 2013 at 9:50 AM

Title: Re: Do the cultural aspects of TB practice help or hinder us

Content:

rory said:

Okay due to a recent question I do have something to add. I was interested in Amoghapasa Avalokitesvara's mantra and dharani and was answered but another thoughtful person mentioned that a tulku gave this sadhana. Now I'm rather interested but if the thing is in Tibetan then it's a confusing turn-off.

Malcolm wrote:

Amoghapasha's mantra and dharani is given in Sanskrit.

Tibetan texts give the Sanskrit in a much more accurate way than anything in Sino-Japanese Buddhism. This is simply a fact.

If a sadhana is listing things like faces, hands, etc., this should be translated in English and recited in English, irrespective of which tradition it comes from. The only exception would Shomyo chanting, etc., things like that.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 8th, 2013 at 9:20 PM

Title: Re: Daesung Sunim

Content:

greentara said:

Astus, It is unusual but not improbable. I gather the book is about self enquiry. Obviously the Zen monk Daesung Sunim, was taken by the clarity and perhaps the technique was easy to follow....hence the distribution to fellow monks.

Malcolm wrote:

I actually ran into this guy last summer in Santa Monica, while having a drink at the bar in Shutters by Beach. He really did not speak any English at all, but he was enthusiastic that we were Buddhists.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 8th, 2013 at 11:00 AM

Title: Re: new subforum to lounge

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Rime just means Sakyas, Kagyus And Gelugpas who practice Dzogchen.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 8th, 2013 at 9:27 AM

Title: Re: Legalized Marijuana - will you smoke it?

Content:

PadmaVonSamba said:

Well, here's the thing.

The thing about marijuana is , um...

uh....okay, okay. You know , like, okay. like, you aren't high, and then you, like, you are high, and there's like this thing, you know?

and, um...when you ummmmm....

....what were we talking about?

.
.
.

Malcolm wrote:
Dude! Where's my mala?

Author: Malcolm
Date: Friday, November 8th, 2013 at 8:56 AM
Title: Re: Legalized Marijuana - will you smoke it?
Content:

padma norbu said:
All I can tell you is that my main teacher now is Namkhai Norbu and he may not tell all the secret teachings to everybody, but he is teaching pure dzogchen from what I understand, from ZhangZhung ...

Malcolm wrote:
Well, no it is from Oddiyāna, for starters. Garab Dorje was from Oddiyāna.

Secondly, while ChNN definitely has criticized smoking herb because it is bad for one's meditation practice, he has also stated that anyone can try anything.

He has also said, as you remark, that you can drink, but you cannot become drunk. If you become drunk, this is a problem.

Your general pov is ok, but you should not spend so much energy conditioning other people.

padma norbu said:
That's true, especially since I really don't care. Initial post was a bit of a joke, subsequent discussion was evolved naturally by responding to accusations and questions. Thanks for your input. Do you have any knowledge about the psychotropics of ancient Vajrayana or whatever?

Malcolm wrote:
Yes, if you are a really stubborn person, then hallucinogens can be administered in order to demonstrate to you that your mind is not a fixed thing.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Friday, November 8th, 2013 at 8:53 AM
Title: Re: Do the cultural aspects of TB practice help or hinder us
Content:
Konchog1 said:
How do we create a meritorious connection?

Malcolm wrote:
Through the four means of conversion, of course:

Generosity
Pleasant speech
Purposeful behavior
Consistency

Author: Malcolm
Date: Friday, November 8th, 2013 at 8:46 AM
Title: Re: Legalized Marijuana - will you smoke it?
Content:

padma norbu said:

All I can tell you is that my main teacher now is Namkhai Norbu and he may not tell all the secret teachings to everybody, but he is teaching pure dzogchen from what I understand, from ZhangZhung ...

Malcolm wrote:

Well, no it is from Oddiyāna, for starters. Garab Dorje was from Oddiyāna.

Secondly, while ChNN definitely has criticized smoking herb because it is bad for one's meditation practice, he has also stated that anyone can try anything.

He has also said, as you remark, that you can drink, but you cannot become drunk. If you become drunk, this is a problem.

Your general pov is ok, but you should not spend so much energy conditioning other people.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Friday, November 8th, 2013 at 8:12 AM
Title: Re: Do the cultural aspects of TB practice help or hinder us
Content:

Clarence said:

[

Also, giving to someone creates a karmic debt on the receiver end, so if someone truly has realization, they will fulfill that debt through their realization. Further, giving creates a connection.

Malcolm wrote:

When one is giving, providing one is a Mahāyānī, as I assume most of us here are, one is supposed to offer dana free from the three wheels, i.e., the idea of the gift, the giver, and the recipient. In this case there can be no question of creating a karmic debt, since none is created.

Konchog1 said:

Don't we want to create karmic connections with beings so they become our disciples when we manifest Enlightenment?

Malcolm wrote:

We want to create meritorious connections with beings, of course, but not debts.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 8th, 2013 at 6:03 AM

Title: Re: Do the cultural aspects of TB practice help or hinder us

Content:

KonchokZoepa said:

why do you offer an entire universe filled with pure lands and buddhas only to your guru but not also to all sentient beings ?

Malcolm wrote:

The guru is the apex of the pure merit field who unites the Buddha, Dharma and Sangha in one.

Sentient beings are the impure merit field. What you offer sentient beings is the wish that they abide in the four immeasurables, i.e. "May all sentient beings always experience happiness, freedom from suffering, joy and equanimity".

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 8th, 2013 at 6:00 AM

Title: Re: Do the cultural aspects of TB practice help or hinder us

Content:

Clarence said:

[

Also, giving to someone creates a karmic debt on the receiver end, so if someone truly has realization, they will fulfill that debt through their realization. Further, giving creates a connection.

Malcolm wrote:

When one is giving, providing one is a Mahāyānī, as I assume most of us here are, one is supposed to offer dana free from the three wheels, i.e., the idea of the gift, the giver, and the recipient. In this case there can be no question of creating a karmic debt, since none is created.

Karmic debts are incurred only if the dana is not provided or received in such a manner. For example, Aryadeva gave his eye to a blind woman, but when she ate his proffered eye rather than using it to restore her sight, Aryadeva winced with regret at the gift. For this reason, it is said, his eye was not restored to him, as it would have been were he free from the three wheels.

Let us hope that however we exercise our generosity, we do so like wish fulfilling gems, effortlessly and without thought.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 8th, 2013 at 5:50 AM

Title: Re: Do the cultural aspects of TB practice help or hinder us

Content:

KonchokZoepa said:

well if your only giving something to your guru in one scenario and in other you are giving to all sentient beings, you think about which is more beneficial.

Malcolm wrote:

Mandala offerings are given to one's guru.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 8th, 2013 at 5:50 AM

Title: Re: Do the cultural aspects of TB practice help or hinder us

Content:

Clarence said:

You think Mandala offerings are better than giving directly to Chogyal Namkhai Norbu Rinpoche?

Malcolm wrote:

To whom do you think one is offering a mandala to other than one's root guru? How can a few dollars match the merit of offering infinite world systems and all their enjoyments?

The point I was making is that we upāsakās and upāsikās have other options to generate merit than just giving money to śramaṇeras. I was not saying that one should not do so--merely that one ought not think that this is the best or only way to generate merit.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 8th, 2013 at 5:21 AM

Title: Re: Legalized Marijuana - will you smoke it?

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

For the pot people usually smoke these days, the fifth precept definitely applies lol. I remember when I was young you could smoke a joint and still be able to walk around and function, seems less and less common these days for anyone but real potheads with a tolerance.

There is no real pot equivalent of a glass of red wine anymore lol, it's all pretty ridiculous now. Basically what i'm saying is, unless you purposely go out of your way for it, there is no longer any way to smoke without getting exceptionally intoxicated, unless you have a heavy tolerance..which obviously is a related issue heh.

padma norbu said:

It also breaks samaya of the body as well as the fifth precept.

Johnny Dangerous said:

Meh I dunno, if just inhaling smoke constitutes that...I imagine there's a difference of opinion there, else lots of remedies would also break it.

Malcolm wrote:

Anything taken as medicine will not break the fifth vow. Even monks are allowed alcohol for medicinal reasons.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 8th, 2013 at 5:16 AM

Title: Re: Do the cultural aspects of TB practice help or hinder us

Content:

lama tsewang said:

how can the beings make merit??

.

Malcolm wrote:

There are many much better ways to gather merit than making cash offerings to monks. For example, mandala offerings.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 8th, 2013 at 3:19 AM

Title: Re: Do the cultural aspects of TB practice help or hinder us

Content:

JKhedrup said:

Business enterprises are another option but of course when one mixes dharma with business it can often have disastrous results (I have heard many first-hand accounts), so I'm not sure that is the way to go, though of course it should be looked at.

Malcolm wrote:

But Buddhist monasteries have functioned as business virtually from the beginning...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 8th, 2013 at 3:14 AM

Title: Re: Do the cultural aspects of TB practice help or hinder us

Content:

lama tsewang said:

are you saying that there are persons who would request that certain rituals etcetera , be done on their behalf , and would not think it appropriate to give an offering?

Malcolm wrote:

I am saying they would never even think about hiring a monk to do such a thing.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 7th, 2013 at 8:56 PM

Title: Re: Do the cultural aspects of TB practice help or hinder us

Content:

bryandavis said:

The Dorje Kasung are obviously not an army.

Malcolm wrote:

That is not how they see themselves. Oh yes, sure it is a practice. But I have know many Kasung over the years, including one of the guys who founded them [an ex Green Beret who did several tours in Vietnam], and they definitely conceive themselves as an army, and more importantly, they conceive of themselves as a private security force, which why they were formed in the beginning.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 7th, 2013 at 9:28 AM

Title: Re: Do the cultural aspects of TB practice help or hinder us

Content:

Alfredo said:

Eventually, some Tibetan center is going to install pews, a pulpit, and an organ. (You know, like the BCA did.)

Or to take another route, maybe they'll hold hands during meditation, while a keyboardist plays soothing mood music, and the lama says things like, "With your feet flat on the floor, relax all the muscles in your body, and surround yourself with love and light..."

Malcolm wrote:

Well, in a lot places they already do the Quaker thing, they just sit silently in a room together...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 7th, 2013 at 5:33 AM

Title: Re: Do the cultural aspects of TB practice help or hinder us

Content:

conebeckham said:
Not the rancid butter...

Malcolm wrote:
It's not rancid, it's aged in airtight leather bags for one year...

Author: Malcolm
Date: Wednesday, November 6th, 2013 at 10:54 PM
Title: Re: Do the cultural aspects of TB practice help or hinder us
Content:

KonchokZoepa said:
and i dont know what is this cultural aspect of tibetan buddhism? personally i havent labeled anything that i have encountered within the tibetan buddhist tradition as "cultural".

Malcolm wrote:
All kinds of things. Another thing I observed is that we in this culture, whether we were buddhists in pasts lives or not, have no tradition of punya-sambhara, merit accumulation, which is the rational which underlies 90 precedent of Buddhist ritual, irrespective of tradition. Because of this, we do not naturally reach for our wallets when we see monks and nuns. Instead, our model is a fee-for-service.

As I have noted elsewhere, I don't see anytime soon that there is going to be much sustainability in Buddhist organizations in the West.

For example, every school and every tradition and every sub-tradition wants it own space, etc. There is no sharing of space (because of course that requires also that people cooperate). One person shared with me their puzzlement at why one tulku wanted to place a center in a region where there was already a center that belonging to the same exact school and lineage. Or in Drikung, in Lincoln Vt., there are two Drikung Kagyu centers, and there used to be three (in a town of 1200 people). In Boston there were two. There is a huge impetus to build empires.

You have to understand that the model of governance in Buddhism culture is grounded on the model of the cakravartin, the wheel turning emperor whose golden wheel [there are four grades of wheels actually] conquers any land it rolls through peacefully. Well, every Tibetan school turns its leaders into just such emperors, at least on a symbolic level, and this leads to lots of unnecessary competition and a lot of unsustainable development. It also, in the past, has lead to internecine warfare in Tibet.

All of this is totally built into Tibetan culture at this point and as proof, we have the so-called "Kingdom of Shambhala" in Halifax, Nova Scotia, complete with a king and royal family, a court, an army and a grand narrative borrowed from the Kalacakra cycle. All of this, is deeply cultural. Of course we can make the observation that Karma Dorje does and assert that it is based on one's traces, and for us this is true. But it is not a sufficient explanation.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 6th, 2013 at 10:17 PM

Title: Re: Climate Change: We're Doomed

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

<http://www.realnews24.com/gray-whale-dies-bringing-us-a-message-with-stomach-full-of-plastic-trash/>

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 6th, 2013 at 9:48 PM

Title: Re: Do the cultural aspects of TB practice help or hinder us

Content:

JKhedrup said:

I am curious as to what you all think. Do you think that the rituals incorporated into so much of the regular expression of Tibetan Buddhism are an inspiration or an obstacle?

Malcolm wrote:

Depends. Recently I was chatting with a lama who was complaining that westerners never make offerings for prayers and so on, while the Chinese and so on do.

He generally feels that it is because of a lack of faith on the part of Westerners. I responded that no, it is not due to a lack of faith, I pointed out that here especially in US where we have a strong tradition of separation of Church and State as well as strong Protestant traditions, that people tended to regard organized religion with suspicion, not because they have no faith, but because they regard organized religion as being corrupted by power and money. Also we have no cultural tradition of hiring priests to come and recite rituals, unless you are Catholic. Basically, what I was pointing out to him that most of this discomfort is grounded in sociological and historical reasons. I suspect that in Tibet, much of the competition revolved around getting people to recite your prayers, not the other guy's.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 6th, 2013 at 5:04 AM

Title: Re: FAQ: Dzogchen Community of Namkhai Norbu Rinpoche

Content:

SuryaMitra said:

By saying they never took Refuge , I meant they did n` t took the Refuge ceremony.

Thank you very much guys

Malcolm wrote:

Oh, right -- this is not necessary at all.

SuryaMitra said:

And this is something I don't understand...Why it is not necessary ? I know that for Dzogchen teachings one doesn't need formal refuge, but what about the tantric teachings and transmissions? Chod, Guru Dragpur, Simhamukha and many others secondary practices ?

I'm just trying to understand , I'm not criticizing here, but my teachers from Karma Kagyu, Sakya and Ningma traditions always taught me, that for any tantric practice, taking formal Refuge ceremony is indispensable. So, for instance, when they give initiation, they will always make sure that new people can take Refuge before initiation...So could you please explain that to me ?

Malcolm wrote:

Every initiation has a refuge ceremony, as well as a bodhisattva vow ceremony built right into it. So it is completely unnecessary to insist that people take refuge and bodhisattva vows according to their respective systems of conferring vows. It simply isn't necessary.

Their attitude come from the traditional Buddhist custom of "cutting the hair". For them, it marks one's serious commitment to the path -- this is why these kinds of traditional teachers are likely to insist that one has to have had a formal and separate refuge ceremony. Even so, it is not necessary.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 6th, 2013 at 4:55 AM

Title: Re: Icelanders and their elves.

Content:

Indrajala said:

It is interesting to see the remnants of polytheism playing a role in environmentalism, small as it may be.

Malcolm wrote:

Are you kidding? Virtually all of the indigenous and traditional people around the world who are involved in environmental movements are doing so also out of concern for non-human beings which we would call spirits, etc. It definitely should be a key point in any Buddhist environmentalist platform.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 6th, 2013 at 2:31 AM

Title: Re: Is spiritual progress worth it?

Content:

logank9 said:

I just want to know beyond a shadow of a doubt it is. Because it just doesn't make sense to me why everyone wouldn't follow it. If it is the end all be all to highest happiness why isn't everyone spiritually improving themselves all the time?

Malcolm wrote:

Some people are not spiritual.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 5th, 2013 at 1:41 AM

Title: Re: Climate Change: We're Doomed

Content:

dharmagoat said:

And our junk will continue to make great homes for all those little critters.

Malcolm wrote:

Seriously?

dharmagoat said:

On reflection, no. Not the plastic junk.

Malcolm wrote:

Phew...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 4th, 2013 at 11:23 PM

Title: Re: Climate Change: We're Doomed

Content:

dharmagoat said:

And our junk will continue to make great homes for all those little critters.

Malcolm wrote:

Seriously?

"Besides the particles' danger to wildlife, on the microscopic level the floating debris can absorb organic pollutants from seawater, including PCBs, DDT, and PAHs.[32] Aside from toxic effects,[33] when ingested, some of these are mistaken by the endocrine system as estradiol, causing hormone disruption in the affected animal.[30] These toxin-containing plastic pieces are also eaten by jellyfish, which are then eaten by larger fish."

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Great_Pacific_garbage_patch#Effect_on_wildlife

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 4th, 2013 at 7:49 AM

Title: Re: Everybody speaks about samaya, but nobody knows what it

Content:

montana said:

All the tantric lineages begin with the transmission from the deity to a guru.

Malcolm wrote:

No, they all begin with a transmission from the Sambhogakāya to a mahāsiddha, or in certain cases, like Virupa, from a Nirmanakāya to a mahāsiddha.

montana said:

How does a Buddha deity differ from Nirmanakaya and Sambhogakaya?

Malcolm wrote:

The three kāyas are our gurus. Not the methods they provide us.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 4th, 2013 at 7:49 AM

Title: Re: Everybody speaks about samaya, but nobody knows what it

Content:

montana said:

All the tantric lineages begin with the transmission from the deity to a guru.

Malcolm wrote:

No, they all begin with a transmission from the Sambhogakāya to a mahāsiddha, or in certain cases, like Virupa, from a Nirmanakāya to a mahāsiddha.

montana said:

How does a Buddha deity differ from Nirmanakaya and Sambhogakaya?

Malcolm wrote:

The three kāyas are our gurus. Not the methods they provide us.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 4th, 2013 at 7:34 AM

Title: Re: Everybody speaks about samaya, but nobody knows what it

Content:

Karma Jinpa said:

Namthar are certainly a source of generating devotion, if not the doctrine itself. Many of the most eminent masters have said that reading namthar is critical to remaining inspired while traversing the path.

Malcolm wrote:

The problem with this is when we discover that the Namthars we are supposed to rely on are merely pious fictions that deeply contradict the earliest accounts of this or that master -- Milarepa comes to mind here.

Karma Jinpa said:

Are they 100% historically accurate? Likely not. But they do represent how the lineage has come to see their forebears, and the lessons that can be learned from how they lived, having appeared (whether as ordinary or extraordinary beings).

Malcolm wrote:

Or they represent an author with an agenda which may not be so obvious on the surface.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 4th, 2013 at 7:34 AM

Title: Re: Everybody speaks about samaya, but nobody knows what it

Content:

Karma Jinpa said:

Namthar are certainly a source of generating devotion, if not the doctrine itself. Many of the most eminent masters have said that reading namthar is critical to remaining inspired while traversing the path.

Malcolm wrote:

The problem with this is when we discover that the Namthars we are supposed to rely on are merely pious fictions that deeply contradict the earliest accounts of this or that master -- Milarepa comes to mind here.

Karma Jinpa said:

Are they 100% historically accurate? Likely not. But they do represent how the lineage has come to see their forebears, and the lessons that can be learned from how they lived, having appeared (whether as ordinary or extraordinary beings).

Malcolm wrote:

Or they represent an author with an agenda which may not be so obvious on the surface.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 4th, 2013 at 7:23 AM

Title: Re: Everybody speaks about samaya, but nobody knows what it

Content:

montana said:

All the tantric lineages begin with the transmission from the deity to a guru.

Malcolm wrote:

No, they all begin with a transmission from the Sambhogakāya to a mahāsiddha, or in certain cases, like Virupa, from a Nirmanakāya to a mahāsiddha.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 4th, 2013 at 7:23 AM

Title: Re: Everybody speaks about samaya, but nobody knows what it

Content:

montana said:

All the tantric lineages begin with the transmission from the deity to a guru.

Malcolm wrote:

No, they all begin with a transmission from the Sambhogakāya to a mahāsiddha, or in certain cases, like Virupa, from a Nirmanakāya to a mahāsiddha.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 4th, 2013 at 5:23 AM

Title: Re: FAQ: Dzogchen Community of Namkhai Norbu Rinpoche

Content:

SuryaMitra said:

By saying they never took Refuge , I meant they did n` t took the Refuge ceremony.

Thank you very much guys

Malcolm wrote:

Oh, right -- this is not necessary at all.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, November 3rd, 2013 at 11:42 PM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, that's it. They are garlic, chives, leeks, onions, and asafoetida. Whatever the heck

"asafoetida" is I have no idea! [/quote]

Asafoetida is a spice also called Hing, used in Indian cooking and in Ayurveda and Tibetan medicine for controlling wind diseases. It is generally used by Brahmins as a substitute for Garlic. It is very pungent smelling.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, November 3rd, 2013 at 10:15 PM

Title: Re: Climate Change: We're Doomed

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

<http://www.theherald.com.au/story/1848433/the-ocean-is-broken/>

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, November 3rd, 2013 at 1:37 AM

Title: Re: FAQ: Dzogchen Community of Namkhai Norbu Rinpoche

Content:

SuryaMitra said:

Hi, I received teachings from ChNN, but I know very little about DC, so thank for this post.

During the retreat I spoke with some people, and they told me they never take Refuge.

Malcolm wrote:

That means they do not understand ChNN's teachings.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, November 2nd, 2013 at 5:27 AM

Title: Re: Ganapuja and the animal

Content:

max123 said:

how does practicing Ganapuja helps the dead animal that the meat belonged to if the animal has taken rebirth already?i do not know how long it takes for an animal to take rebirth but i'm wondering if it has already before a lot of the meat is eaten(maybe i am wrong i haven't practiced Ganapuja yet and i truly don't know much about it(and how old the meat is etc)but if the animal has taken rebirth would it still benefit?

Malcolm wrote:

The answer lies in the term "rtsal" or "energy, power"; we are connected through this energy.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 1st, 2013 at 10:59 PM

Title: Re: Acharya Mahayogi Sridhar Rana Rinpoche

Content:

philji said:

Does anyone know anything about this teacher?

He is a nepali who was formally practicing Hinduism and then took to Buddhism. I believe his teachers include Tulku Urgyen Rinpoche. He speaks very strongly and clearly about the differences between hindu and buddhist dharma. I would just like to know if he is considered a legitimate teacher within the Nyingma tradition.

Malcolm wrote:

He is a Sakyapa actually.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, October 31st, 2013 at 4:13 AM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

Simon E. said:

Of course. But the corporal form of those animals is all around you in the supermarket. It is too late to create a link by being involved in its living.

Sherab Dorje said:

So I say prayers for the liberation of the dead animals. I don't have to eat them to form a connection with them. Saying prayers for the liberation of their consciousness is making a connection with them in their next life (via their death in this life).

seeker242 said:

Yes, what is the reason for having to eat the flesh of a being in order to help it? Prayer isn't good enough? We don't eat the flesh of human beings in order to help those who have passed on, so why does it need to be done for animals?

Malcolm wrote:

You are misunderstanding a key point -- you have to consecrate all of your food because of all the sentient beings who died in its production, not merely meat, but every grain of rice you eat caused the death of something from field to table.

It is a global principle.

You can imagine you are "pure" because you are not eating meat, but you are not. You can imagine you are "compassionate" because you are not eating meat, but if you have no method to help all the beings who are connected to you through debt incurred through eating food, again, your compassion is "miserable", meaning lacking in depth.

Also "praying" for animals is fine, but a little useless since animals pass through the bardo very rapidly, you need another way to connect with them, another way of creating dependency.

Humans can understand humans when they are in the bardo, therefore, reciting prayers and texts like Bardo Thödröl can be very effective. Even here however, this is really only useful a) for practitioners b) must be recited in language the deceased will understand. There are other prayers that are useful for non-practitioners.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, October 30th, 2013 at 3:00 AM

Title: Re: The shapes of the sense faculties

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, the actual sense organs exist as patches of atoms on the back of the respective physical structure which have various shapes.

dzogchungpa said:

So, are you saying that there is, e.g., a crescent moon shaped patch on the back of the tongue that serves as the actual organ of taste, at least according to abhidharma?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, precisely.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, October 30th, 2013 at 1:14 AM

Title: Re: Insisting on receiving instructions damages samaya

Content:

Karma Dorje said:

I am not rationalizing their behaviour. I am saying that when the examples you cite are on the level of HHDL or Tsongkhapa, the burden is on you to show that this applies to the average practitioner.

Malcolm wrote:

It applies to anyone who is literate and still has a pulse.

At least they are acquiring teachings, as opposed to building collections of stamps and so on. There is no downside.

Receiving teachings you are not able to practice out of acquisitiveness merely leaves an imprint of acquisitiveness and craving associated with Dharma teachings.

Better to have a craving for Dharma teachings than crack or tobacco.

Receiving teachings you are not ready for, can lead one to develop all sorts of wrong conceptuality about the teachings that could be avoided by relying on the care of a realized master and following his or her prescription.

Average practitioners cannot tell if their teachers are realized. The average teacher generally is only interested in promoting their own teaching lineage.

And what kinds of wrong conceptuality are we worried about here? Why the conservatism? Especially coming from someone who hardly fits a conventional definition of a Tibetan Buddhist since by your own admission you continue to practice Hinduism?

In any event, I think it is important for people to study and receive a lot of things, rather than get stuck in these Tibetan lineage politics. Even if they spend some time in a state of confusion, life is short, teachings are rare, and deciding not to go to a teaching because "it might be bad for me" is really false thinking. If you are interested in tummo, go find a tummo teacher. If you are interested in Dzogchen, go find a Dzogchen teacher.

Teachers really cannot discern your capacity unless they have known you for years.

Of course, once you have perceived the essence of all teachings, then going to teachers is a waste of time unless you have a very specific reason for wanting this or that teaching.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, October 30th, 2013 at 12:27 AM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

So do I.

Malcolm wrote:

Your story misses the point.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, October 30th, 2013 at 12:10 AM

Title: Re: Insisting on receiving instructions damages samaya

Content:

Karma Dorje said:

Both are cases of well-established advanced practitioners making an informed decision on how to best benefit others.

Malcolm wrote:

You can rationalize their behavior however you want. There are countless other examples of the same phenomena in Tibetan biographies. My point is that there is no genuine "standard" or "tradition" upon which your sentiments are based.

Karma Dorje said:

For the average practitioner the same approach can easily end up in students acquiring teachings as if they were a stamp collection, rather than taking it as a medicine to cure sickness.

Malcolm wrote:

At least they are acquiring teachings, as opposed to building collections of stamps and so on. There is no downside.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, October 30th, 2013 at 12:00 AM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

I tend to think the "creating a link" argument is rather weak, especially when you can consider that you can create a link by saving an animal too.

Malcolm wrote:

I try to do both i.e. create a link for the living and the dead.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, October 29th, 2013 at 10:50 PM

Title: Re: Insisting on receiving instructions damages samaya

Content:

Karma Dorje said:

You suggested that if one approaches one's guru and he declines to give you a particular transmission that you should just ignore him and go get it from someone else. This only really applies if you do not have a close relationship with your teacher.

Malcolm wrote:

No, that is not really the case.

And in fact we can see from history that for example, Tsongkhapa wanted to receive Kalackra, and his guru, Rendawa, discouraged him from receiving those teachings.

We also see this today with the present Dalai Lama, who was heavily discouraged by his gurus from making a connection with Nyingmapa teachings he was interested in the sixties.

What we observe is that people's manner of receiving teachings in Tibet does not fit a settled pattern.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, October 29th, 2013 at 8:50 PM

Title: Re: Insisting on receiving instructions damages samaya

Content:

Karma Dorje said:

This is your particular perspective and not at all normative for the tradition.

Malcolm wrote:

It was and is totally normative for those people in Tibet who were able to read and had wide access to books. It is a story often repeated, for example, Longchenpa sees and reads books from the Vima Nyinthig before he finds Kumaraja and asks him for the transmission. There are many other examples from Tibetan history.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, October 29th, 2013 at 6:08 AM

Title: Re: The shapes of the sense faculties

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

I am reading "Gateway to Knowledge" by Mipham, volume 1, and on p.17 I came across the following: The [shape of the] eye faculty is similar to [the round and blue shape of] the umaka [sesame/cumin] flower; the ear faculty is similar to [the shape of] a twisted roll of birch bark; the nose faculty is similar to [the shape of] parallel copper needles; the tongue faculty is similar to [the shape of] a crescent moon disc; and the body faculty is [all-covering] similar to the skin of the smooth-to-the-touch bird.

I have to admit, this doesn't make much sense to me. Can anyone explain this to me?

Here's the Tibetan:

mig gi dbang po zar ma'i me tog lta bu/ rna ba'i dbang po gro ga'i 'jor bu gcus pa lta bu/sna'i dbang po zangs kyi mo khab gshibs pa lta bu/ lce'i dbang po zla ba bkas pa lta bu/lus kyi dbang po bya reg na 'jam gyi pags pa lta bu'o

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, the actual sense organs exist as patches of atoms on the back of the respective physical structure which have various shapes.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, October 28th, 2013 at 3:35 AM

Title: Re: Insisting on receiving instructions damages samaya

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Frankly, you should read anything that interests you. If you want to practice, go get the transmission from a Lama you like. If he does not want to give it, then go ask someone else you like.

There is never any samaya damage from wanting to practice Dharma!

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, October 27th, 2013 at 12:33 AM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

porpoise said:

Not even if there is a full range of non-meat alternatives available at the supermarket, and the person is making a clear choice to choose the meat product?

Malcolm wrote:

Not even if there is a full range of non-meat products in the market and the person is making a choice to buy meat. Since there is no sentience in a piece of meat, there is no ethical harm in eating meat that one has not killed or has had killed for oneself. In order for one to have the karma of killing on one's hands, one has to do the deed or order someone else to do it, etc. That is, unless one has Mahāyāna obligation to not eat meat, and that is a different issue altogether.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, October 26th, 2013 at 10:20 PM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

I am not responsible for the act of killing someone else performs unless I directly pay or ask them to do it.

porpoise said:

So what if somebody orders a Christmas / Thanksgiving turkey from their local turkey farm?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes. In this case the action will bear a _karmic_ consequence.

porpoise said:

And what if another person buys their turkey from a selection at the local supermarket? Would you argue that doesn't involve direct responsibility?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes. I would argue that there is no _karmic_ consequence for the latter as opposed to the former.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, October 26th, 2013 at 8:26 PM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

seeker242 said:

Good points indeed! What a lot of people don't realize though is how inefficient modern day animal agriculture really is. For example, it takes 4,000-18,000 gallons of water to make ONE hamburger! Meanwhile a pound of corn takes 110 gallons.

Malcolm wrote:

This is true only of feedlot beef. Cows should not be fed corn, since they can't digest it.

seeker242 said:

I wonder what % of the worlds beef is grain fed and what % is true pasture only, grass eating animals?

Malcolm wrote:

Worldwide, 9 percent is grass fed.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, October 26th, 2013 at 8:25 PM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

porpoise said:

Yes, I do believe we culpable for these indirect actions. If we decide to buy meat then there are consequences. I can't see the relevance of the rest of your post.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, if we decide to buy meat there are indeed consequences. If we decide not to buy meat there are also consequences.

However, these consequences are not karmic consequences. I am not responsible for the act of killing someone else performs unless I directly pay or ask them to do it.

"Karma is volition, and what proceeds from volition."

-- Buddha

I am however in a position to take some responsibility for the sources from which I obtain my food. The consequences of eating industrially produced agricultural products is something I don't like, so I avoid unsustainably produced food as much as I can. I personally try to grow food every year.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, October 26th, 2013 at 8:06 PM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

Thrasymachus said:

That still does not deal with the objection: why does the animal have to die?

Malcolm wrote:

It was their karma to die in such a horrible way.

Thrasymachus said:

Further:

If these Vajrayana people are so powerful...

Malcolm wrote:

It is not the people, it is the method.

Thrasymachus said:

If there is a source, why can't you quote it?

Malcolm wrote:

"Those with compassion eat meat."

-- Hevajra tantra.

This is once again another case of using the worse behavior of others to excuse exercising personal agency over what you can control. It is not impressive that you use the excuse of vegetarians not doing everything, so you can personally be more comfortable about doing nothing.

I am not using any excuse at all. I am simply observing facts. The fact is that people will never stop using animals for food. As long as they do so, there will always be a plentiful supply of meat to be consumed. It is really just that simple.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, October 26th, 2013 at 8:00 PM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

seeker242 said:

Good points indeed! What a lot of people don't realize though is how inefficient modern day animal agriculture really is. For example, it takes 4,000-18,000 gallons of water to make ONE hamburger! Meanwhile a pound of corn takes 110 gallons.

Malcolm wrote:

This is true only of feedlot beef. Cows should not be fed corn, since they can't digest it.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, October 26th, 2013 at 3:32 AM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Our nation throws away an astonishing amount of food everyday, to the tune of 40%-50% of all the food we produce.

IN 2011, 1.3 billion tons of food was discarded. This represents a third of global food production. The amount of food wasted per US citizen is 240 lbs per year.

Rather than worrying about who is eating what, we ought to turn our attention to who is wasting what.

And lets not get started on FOG (fats, oils and greases) that pollute our waterways.

M

Jikan said:

And here there are consequences that anyone with compassion would do well to reflect on: wasting food means wasting water, with consequences for wildlife and habitats; wasting food means accelerated erosion, fertilizer pollution, soil depletion, air pollution from harvest processing and transport, with consequences for wildlife; food production means the production of greenhouse gases, hence every wasted food item means a hotter planet to no purpose, with consequences for wildlife...

Adi said:

These seem to me excellent points, something everyone can participate in -- the "who is wasting what" and the consequences of all that waste. Instead of proscribing that everyone must eat one way or another, pay attention to what is wasted and to increased efficiencies by not wasting so much food. A middle way of sorts that leaves no one out.

On a personal note, I knew there was a lot of wasting of food in the US as I've worked in the past as a waiter and in catering. But 1.3 billion tons of food wasted in 2011? I had to go look that up. For those interested in the full report Global Food Losses and Food Waste (apologies if it was already posted in the preceding 130+ pages) by the UN group, it is here:

<http://www.fao.org/docrep/014/mb060e/mb060e00.pdf>

Adi

Malcolm wrote:

Ironically, most of the food produced in the world is grains and vegetables, which also represents vast majority of food wasted per annum. The amount of meat wasted is quite low by comparison (see chart on page four, chapter two).

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, October 26th, 2013 at 2:01 AM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

ClearblueSky said:

Factory farming is still much, much crueller to animals. By a lot. And if you want to bring up the environment, there is no comparison. Factory farming of cows is the number one cause of global warming. 15% of global warming is due to it, that's more than all the cars on earth.

And I still don't get that logic. Just because it's happening anyway, doesn't mean we have to participate. Sorry to keep referencing my previous post, but I only see how that works if people apply the same to other industries:

There was a point in time where slavery was thought to be inevitable and worldwide. Do you think the people had no karmic consequences if they bought slaves that were already captured, not by their request?

What about with the recent revealing of Seaworld's cruelty. If someone knows what they do to those whales, but still pays seaworld money to go watch them, is that okay because they have the assumption it won't ever change?

If someone explains that those are the same as eating meat, then I would understand. It's really only the separation, people saying one is okay karmically and not the other that I still don't really understand.

Malcolm wrote:

Owning a person is different than eating a the flesh of a dead animal.

One can eat meat without participating in industrial agriculture.

There are two issues in your post:

1. Ethics of eating meat
2. The karmic consequences of eating meat.

The Buddhist ethical positions have been laid out already. The majority of people who are opposing the issue of eating meat are not doing so on the basis of a strictly Buddhist position.

As for karma, karma requires intention, an object, the deed, and satisfaction that the deed was done.

No Buddhist who eats meat will satisfy the criteria for creating a perfect karma of killing. No Buddhist is happy that animals are killed for food. We all regret it.

Even if we refuse to buy meat, still animals will be killed for food. The production of organic food on a national and global scale requires the animal husbandry industry, especially for poultry litter, feather meal, bone meal, blood meal and other such organic fertilizers.

But this issue goes way beyond what Buddhists may or may not do,

A friend of mine whose father runs the largest organic produce farm in Bakersville, CA., was heard to remark that there is not enough chicken shit to produce organic food on a national scale.

Frankly, the real problem is the majority of people who live in cities who do not participate in the production of their own food, people who have no idea how their food is grown, where, and so on.

Our nation throws away an astonishing amount of food everyday, to the tune of 40%-50% of all the food we produce.

IN 2011, 1.3 billion tons of food was discarded. This represents a third of global food production. The amount of food wasted per US citizen is 240 lbs per year.

Rather than worrying about who is eating what, we ought to turn our attention to who is wasting what.

And lets not get started on FOG (fats, oils and greases) that pollute our waterways.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, October 25th, 2013 at 11:53 PM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:
gad rgyangs said:
...cannibals...

dzogchungpa said:
So you, gad rgyangs, see no difference between humans and animals?

gad rgyangs said:
in terms of suffering, no

Malcolm wrote:
There is a huge difference -- animals suffer much more.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Friday, October 25th, 2013 at 10:14 PM
Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate
Content:

Malcolm wrote:
But when you buy meat in a market, you are not engaging in that karma. There is no intention to kill, as you very well know.

porpoise said:
The intention is to eat meat. The consequences are that you expect somebody else to kill on your behalf, and you expect somebody else to do a job that a Buddhist wouldn't do.

Malcolm wrote:
Absolutely wrong. For example, I know of no Buddhist who eats meat who would eat a lobster in a lobster house because they are killed on the spot for the client.

Granted, because of our economy, meat is cheaper and more available than it was a hundred years ago, when people tended to eat meat seasonally. Chicken and pork were more expensive because they depend on grain for feed (cows should not be fed corn for any reason because they cannot digest it properly).

But this has nothing to do with the basic point that in Vajrayāna there is very clearly a tradition, like it or not, of consuming meat, mostly bovine, and combining that with a method to assist the sentient being that was connected with that flesh at one point.

I am not stating you or anyone else has to follow that tradition. But it exists.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Friday, October 25th, 2013 at 9:30 PM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

yes, after you kill them (or, by paying money into the supply chain, having someone else kill them for you)

Malcolm wrote:

You can't really kill a sentient being. All you can do is sever the connection between its mind and body.

But when you buy meat in a market, you are not engaging in that karma. There is no intention to kill, as you very well know.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, October 25th, 2013 at 9:13 PM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

Simon E. said:

In the context of a debate about meat eating which has developed to include the eating of meat in the context of a Vajrayana puja his being or not being a Buddhist is vital in assessing his lack of knowledge of same.

And incidentally your fatuous and nonsensical use of the term 'cannibals' renders your willingness or ability to debate in an objective way doubtful.

gad rgyangs said:

if sentient beings are your brothers and sisters, and yet you happily kill and eat them.....

Malcolm wrote:

You cannot eat a sentient being, you can only its parts of its body.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, October 25th, 2013 at 9:12 PM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

as if whether he is a Buddhist or not has any bearing on the veracity of his arguments. He has presented links to clear evidence that disproves a major plank in the cannibals' flimsy web of justification: the argument that, since you can't avoid killing entirely, you might as well not worry about it, and that being a vegetarian causes the death of more sentient beings through rice growing than does killing one cow to feed many.

Malcolm wrote:

He has not provided any evidence whatsoever that the majority of the world's nonbuddhists are going to adopt a vegetarian diet anytime soon. Also, his statistics do not show that the rice industry, for example, depends on chicken litter and feather meal.

His statistics ignore the fact that animal inputs are required in any sort of sustainable agriculture, at minimum manure. They ignore the fact of the millions of creatures destroyed by standard organic agriculture, not to mention industrial agriculture.

gad rgyangs said:

I have stated before the simple solution to the ganapuja problem: get the meat for the ganapuja from dumpsters, not supermarkets. And don't discriminate between dumpsters behind restaurants and those behind morgues. Only then can you consider yourself a real tantrika.

Malcolm wrote:

The point is not to be a "real tantrika". The point is aiding sentient beings.

If you are a common Mahāyānist, you should not eat meat at all. If you are a Theravadin you can eat meat. If you are a Vajrayānist, you can eat meat.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, October 25th, 2013 at 8:26 PM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

Thrasymachus said:

This is just crazy and also speciesist.

Malcolm wrote:

Humans can practice. Animals cannot. We have other methods for creating a positive cause for the eventual liberation of humans who do not practice.

Thrasymachus said:

Is there an actual canonical Buddhist source text that supports this, because you only gave one that supports vegetarianism?

Malcolm wrote:

Of course.

Thrasymachus said:

So who is really being benefited by killing animals due to an addiction to the taste of unhealthy animal products, an addiction and attachment to food, so strong that you are literally killing yourself via diet?

Malcolm wrote:

The production of meat and dairy is deeply embedded into our economy. It will never stop. If you think so you are kidding yourself. Therefore, in Vajrayāna, we have methods to help creatures that are killed as a result of food production.

You may deride them, of course, as you have here. But that just exposes your own narrow-mindedness.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, October 25th, 2013 at 8:50 AM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

Also the Buddha taught in Mahāyāna sūtra that we mustn't eat meat.

padma norbu said:

But, did he really? It seems like people believe it was added later by Mahayana buddhists who did not appreciate the meat-eating of Theravadins. Seems pretty odd that by Theravadin texts, the Buddha specifically did not make a rule against it, then with Mahayana he did and then with Vajrayana meat is back again. No sir, I don't buy it.

Malcolm wrote:

Note: I said the Buddha in Mahāyāna sūtras.

Not asking anyone to buy anything. But it is beyond doubt that the Buddha did harshly criticize meat eating in Mahāyāna sūtras.

Whether you accept that Buddha actually taught these sūtras or not is an entirely different question.

Since I consider myself a Mahāyānist, I accept the general message of Mahāyāna.

Since I am a Vajrayānist, I practice according to my understanding of the texts, without being overly concerned about their supposed historical provenance.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, October 25th, 2013 at 5:33 AM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

Malcolm, sorry if you've talked about this before, but what is the take of Tibetan medicine on meat?

Malcolm wrote:

Tibetan medicine as well as Ayurveda include meat for those with certain conditions that benefit from meat.

One's diet should be based on one's constitution. One should eat in healthy balanced manner, consistent with the one's health and the customs of the land you live in.

BTW, when Norbu Rinpoche says that being a vegetarian is "miserable" compassion, he is primarily referring to Vajrayāna Buddhists who advocate vegetarianism. Why? Because there are methods in Vajrayāna which assist the animals in question achieve liberation who are connected with the production of our food, whether they are destroyed through pesticides and cultivation or through slaughter. Thus, even if one is a vegetarian one may not justify one's choice not to eat meat through resort of arguments of compassion since one is leaving behind animals who are slaughtered for meat.

He also makes it very clear that the writings on vegetarianism by Shabkar and so on are direct towards common people who are not real Vajrayāna practitioners. Since they have no method and no understanding it is much better that they not eat meat. Also the Buddha taught in Mahāyāna sutra that we mustn't eat meat.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, October 25th, 2013 at 5:30 AM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

Jikan said:

Hence, taking his own advice, ChNN had become obese (with exercise he's looking better in recent years) in his efforts to empty samsara.

Malcolm wrote:

Norbu Rinpoche became obese primarily because he suffered from a serious illness in the late eighties, then leukemia [now in remission for many years] in 1994. He had both his knees replaced in the late nineties, and was unable to properly exercise. In addition, he was poisoned in Dege, Tibet, which led to metabolic irregularities for his entire life since then. He was very skinny until his early fifties when he started having cascading healthy issues.

He lost 45 kilos in 2011 [through practicing Chulen and eating a restrictive diet that excluded meat] and has for the most part kept the weight off. He does not really eat that much meat, AFAIK.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, October 25th, 2013 at 5:25 AM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

Thrasymachus said:

can largely be prevented or even reversed by avoiding the meat he advocates. .

Malcolm wrote:

Namkhai Norbu Rinpoche does not recommend eating meat to everyone. Quite the opposite in fact. What he clearly states is that it is better for everyone who is not a practitioner [of Vajrayāna] to be vegetarian.

This means that he thinks it is better for almost all people in the world to be vegetarians.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, October 24th, 2013 at 11:24 PM

Title: Re: Just Deserts.

Content:

Simon E. said:

During a current discussion on Dhamma Wheel a Bhikkhu member states that the sentiment ' if a person is murdered they are getting their just deserts ' in terms of vipaka, is " ubiquitous among Theosophically influenced Buddhists and common in the Vajrayana '.

Now I have little interest in what may or may not be ubiquitous among Theosophists , but what of his statement that it is a view commonly held in the Vajrayana..what do YOU think ?

Malcolm wrote:

Generally speaking, in Tibetan Buddhism justice is an idea associated with karma, dating back to the idea of Yamarāja weighing people's negative karma while sorting out the dead.

If a person is murdered, it is assumed the causes and conditions for their being murdered were laid down in the past by their own actions.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, October 23rd, 2013 at 8:18 AM

Title: Re: Tulkus who have rejected their role

Content:

smcj said:

One does not need to reject rebirth to reject the corrupt system of the recognition of reincarnations.

Do you object to the corruption, or to the recognition?

Malcolm wrote:

Both, actually.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, October 23rd, 2013 at 7:23 AM

Title: Re: Tulkus who have rejected their role

Content:

smcj said:

The politics of the tulku system revolves around power first, and money second. The 8 worldly dharmas are corrupting influences on dharma organizations and personalities, to be sure. However if one believes in reincarnation, and believes that advanced practitioners actually do return, then it seems like throwing the baby out with the bath water to dismiss the phenomena as simply corrupt or even invalid. Better perhaps to find a way to minimize the economic, political, and social benefits so that the level of b.s. is reduced as much as is possible.

Malcolm wrote:

One does not need to reject rebirth to reject the corrupt system of the recognition of reincarnations.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, October 23rd, 2013 at 3:44 AM

Title: Re: Tulkus who have rejected their role

Content:

smcj said:

It means that people, westerners, who invest their time and energy into study and practice will be recognized as incarnations after they demonstrated results of practice. There is currently in place a system for upgrading a lama's status to "rinpoche" that is, at least in theory, based on merit, without the designation of tulku being attached. The fact that there has been extreme inflationary pressure for various titles (how many "His Holinesses" are there now?), which cheapens the credibility of the entire system of titles, is a sad and seemingly unavoidable comment on our times.

In terms of tulkus there is the functional consideration of choosing which person to put on the fast-track of practice, including possible material support and access to teachers, so some choice should be made early on. Actual public recognition should wait until if and when the results of the practices are stabilized, probably no earlier than the candidate's mid-30s. That should cut down on the percentage of embarrassing train wrecks.

But that's not going to happen. Nobody is in charge to make those types of decisions. The situation will evolve however it will.

Malcolm wrote:

That system of titles comes from UN protocol for the Vatican. It should be abandoned.

The politics of the tulku system revolves around power first, and money second.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, October 23rd, 2013 at 3:40 AM

Title: Re: Tulkus who have rejected their role

Content:

smcj said:

But I would argue against the usefulness of an acting school that currently has actors in training deemed "future academy award winners", no matter how good their acting was in their previous life.

Both HHDL and HH Karmapa (Orgyen Thinley brand) were children taken from seemingly random nomad families in eastern Tibet.

Malcolm wrote:

HHDL was the child of a wealthy land-owning family from Amdo (which had a Kumbum tulku in it already) about a days' horse ride from Kumbum Monastery. I have personally been to his birth home, seen it with my own eyes. His family was not nomadic.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, October 22nd, 2013 at 9:07 PM

Title: Re: Tulkus who have rejected their role

Content:

Simon E. said:

As you say it has little impact on the vast majority of we westerners apart from any emotional investment we might have made. But if post -mortem recognition becomes the norm that carries implications for the education of such tulkus...doesn't it ?

Malcolm wrote:

It means that people, westerners, who invest their time and energy into study and practice will be recognized as incarnations after they demonstrated results of practice.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, October 22nd, 2013 at 8:42 PM

Title: Re: Tulkus who have rejected their role

Content:

Simon E. said:

What's your view Malcolm ?

Malcolm wrote:

My view on the subject is that the terma system and the tulku system both will continue to meet the needs of the client population for these phenomena, mainly Tibetans.

The terma system offers Nyingmapas the assurance that the blessings of their system of teachings never declines and the tulku system in general offers the Tibetan population as a whole, as well as some westerners, the assurance that they will always be guided by buddhas. These are powerful motivations propelling the furtherance of both traditions.

Whether they will be very relevant to us is another question.

We do not have a cultural identity wrapped up in a mythos of a golden imperial era with emanated bodhisattvas benevolently carrying out the duties of an enlightened monarch, working in concert with a foreign wizard and aiding the spread of the dharma, concealing teachings for such times when there are threats to the nation. In general, these are the terms under which termas are concealed and revealed in the Padmasambhava tradition. As a westerner, one has to be educated into these concepts, concepts which are the running background of Tibetan society in general.

As for the tulku system, the tulku system will continue, but I predict that in the West, most tulku recognitions of practitioners will be post-mortem, as it was before the Karmapas.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, October 22nd, 2013 at 4:26 AM

Title: Re: Tulkus who have rejected their role

Content:

Jikan said:

I'd thought all tertons are by definition tulkus in the sense that they are emanations or re-embodiments (the precise term escapes me, apologies) of one of Guru Padmasambhava's 25 main disciples. Am I mistaken?

Simon E. said:

Most Tulkus are not Tertons.

To be blunt, the Tulku system arose from a socio/political need. The world has changed.

Malcolm wrote:

The terton system also arises from socio/political needs.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, October 21st, 2013 at 9:08 AM

Title: Re: Dzongsar Kyentse Rinpoche brief comment on Je Tsongkhapa

Content:

invisiblediamond said:

Say, what sexual impropriety was Buddha accused of? I hadn't heard that before.

Malcolm wrote:

He was accused of impregnating a woman. She showed up with a trough under her skirt, accused him of getting her pregnant.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, October 21st, 2013 at 5:30 AM

Title: Re: Dzongsar Kyentse Rinpoche brief comment on Je Tsongkhapa

Content:

invisiblediamond said:

In Buddhism, good friendships are the meaning of life. Buddhism can be understood as the art of the beautiful relationship.

Malcolm wrote:

I never said there was no meaning to found in the universe. I said the universe was meaningless.

Two entirely different concepts.

For example, a tree can be meaningful for a carpenter, a mouse, a bird, a boring insect or a sculptor, all in different ways. None of the meaning these beings impute on that tree is inherent in that tree. The tree, so far as anyone knows, merely is born, ages, gets sick and dies. By itself, it has no meaning. By ourselves, we have no meaning. We can find meaning, if we want to, but we should not turn that meaning we have found into teleology.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, October 21st, 2013 at 5:11 AM

Title: Re: Dzongsar Kyentse Rinpoche brief comment on Je Tsongkhapa

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Sure. Even Buddha had prejudices and biases. It's very obvious when you read the Pali canon, for example.

Buddha was a human being, he had a human brain, human sense organs and all the limitations of a human body (birth, aging, sickness and death). He was accused of sexual improprieties and all kinds of other faults. He watched his entire clan be murdered and enslaved and did nothing about it (if that does not demonstrate to one that Buddha found life empty of meaning, nothing else will). Rahula was hugely disappointed in him until Rahula decided to follow the Dharma himself.

Poorbitch said:

one more scholars who falls in the darkness of materialism and false assumptions about the buddhas . So predictable

Malcolm wrote:

And your's are TRUE (tm)? Typical fundamentalist remark.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, October 21st, 2013 at 4:29 AM

Title: Re: Dzongsar Kyentse Rinpoche brief comment on Je Tsongkhapa

Content:

Clarence said:

The question I find interesting is whether or not you believe someone can be realized without having abandoned his prejudices and biases?

Malcolm wrote:

Sure. Even Buddha had prejudices and biases. It's very obvious when you read the Pali canon, for example.

Buddha was a human being, he had a human brain, human sense organs and all the limitations of a human body (birth, aging, sickness and death). He was accused of sexual improprieties and all kinds of other faults. He watched his entire clan be murdered and enslaved and did nothing about it (if that does not demonstrate to one that Buddha found life empty of meaning, nothing else will). Rahula was hugely disappointed in him until Rahula decided to follow the Dharma himself.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, October 21st, 2013 at 4:00 AM

Title: Re: Dzongsar Kyentse Rinpoche brief comment on Je Tsongkhapa

Content:

heart said:

They were all Christians and they clearly disliked mahayana and despised vajrayana.

Malcolm wrote:

Which century are you talking about? This is certainly not the case with writers like Davidson and so on.

The notion of the evolution of Mahāyāna Buddhism and then Vajrayāna is based on text critical research.

What is more amusing about your assertion is that classical Indian Buddhist historians of the eighth, ninth, tenth and eleventh century take great pains explain why there is a sudden appearance Vajrayāna in India concocting all kinds of wild schemes from Vajrasattva in an iron tower in South India (Amoghavajra and Co in China) to the account of King Dza (Nyingma, but based on Indian antecedents) to the Sakya accounts found in 12th century Presentation of the General Divisions of Tantra, not to mention the earlier and well known account of the recovery of Prajñāpāramita from the Nāgā kingdom under the ocean by Nāgārjuna.

You see, Indians themselves acknowledged from an early period in the common era that Mahāyāna also "suddenly appeared".

Text critical scholars like Davidson, etc., are trying to work out the evolution of these texts because they were pointed to in that direction by what the texts and classical commentaries themselves reveal about the origins of these later canons.

It is just too ungenerous to modern scholars like Gregory Schopen and so on to accuse them of some strange Christian biases.

BTW, the first victim of Christian text critical scholarship was the bible itself.

But text critical scholarship, while not the end all and be all of interpretation of what these texts mean, is very useful in understanding where these texts come from. But sadly, people conflate the two, assuming that if some scholar is correct about say, the Chinese origins of the Heart sutra (Nattier's theory), that therefore, somehow the Heart Sutra becomes less meaningful as a protective charm against non-humans.

The problem is that Western people of a fundamentalist bent shy away from taking text critical scholarship seriously precisely because of our cultural tendency to interpret texts teleologically (which is a Christian, indeed a very western trait inherited from Plato, etc.), a tendency we have deeply inherited from the generally Hegelian theory of history (into which Tibetan narratives predicated on the role of the Imperial period personalities like Padmasambhava and so on play nicely) that we follow.

So when we are confronted with early narratives like that in the 'Bum nag, the sBa bzhed, etc., where Padmasambhava has a human father and mother, we reject these in favor of wildly contradictory later accounts of Padmasambhava's life story because our teachers don't like the idea that Padmasambhava had a human father and mother.

In the end, there are certain Buddhist trends and narratives, especially in Vajrayāna, that play very nicely into our very Western habit of fundamentalism in thought and deed.

This is ironic, because Mahāyāna teachings often completely deconstruct so called Hinayāna teachings, just as Vajrayāna deconstructs the Mahāyāna path and Dzogchen deconstructs Vajrayāna.

We have all these Buddhist teachings deconstructing each other, and yet we have all these Buddhists, both Asian and Western, hell-bent on keeping the whole thing bound together with spit, twine and duct tape. Honestly, it is pretty funny to me.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, October 21st, 2013 at 1:53 AM

Title: Re: Dzongsar Kyentse Rinpoche brief comment on Je Tsongkhapa

Content:

heart said:

I am not really saying that, am I?

Malcolm wrote:

It seems so.

heart said:

I just think it makes sense that, no matter when they were written down, they reflect a teaching taught by the Buddha.

Malcolm wrote:

Maybe, probably not in any literal, historical sense.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, October 21st, 2013 at 1:29 AM

Title: Re: Dzongsar Kyentse Rinpoche brief comment on Je Tsongkhapa

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The point I was making was that making the leap from "Western Buddhologists don't believe Buddha taught Mahāyāna (which is effectively what DKR is talking about) to "This is why I doubt the understanding of seasoned Western practitioners". He making a very specious cultural argument, when all is said and done.

heart said:

I am making exactly the same statement and last time I looked I was a westerner. Not because DKR or anyone else says so but because it makes sense to me.

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, I see, so you are asserting you can only understand the meaning of the concept of nonduality in Mahāyāna sutras if you adopt the dualistic standpoint that they were uttered by the historical Buddha sometime about 450-400 years BCE. Right?

If I didn't know you better, I would say that this was a very fundamentalist sentiment.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, October 21st, 2013 at 1:26 AM

Title: Re: Dzongsar Kyentse Rinpoche brief comment on Je Tsongkhapa

Content:

ReasonAndRhyme said:

Afaik he was also born in Bhutan and is he not also a Bhutanese citizen? But anyway, I just wanted to hint that we all generalize and sometimes overgeneralize.

Malcolm wrote:

The Drukpas (Bhutanese) consider themselves ethnically different than Tibetans, despite sharing a very similar language. DKR's mother is Bhutanese, so I guess you could say he is half Tibetan, half Bhutanese.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, October 21st, 2013 at 12:46 AM

Title: Re: Dzongsar Kyentse Rinpoche brief comment on Je Tsongkhapa

Content:

Karma Dorje said:

This whole thread has convinced me that DKR is right about the understanding of non-duality of even seasoned Western Buddhists.

Malcolm wrote:

Frankly, I have doubts that seasoned Tibetan practitioners, including tulkus, necessarily understand nonduality.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, October 21st, 2013 at 12:39 AM

Title: Re: Dzongsar Kyentse Rinpoche brief comment on Je Tsongkhapa

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

I think we should feel free to make generalized comments about Tibetan lamas too.

ReasonAndRhyme said:

Especially if they're not Tibetan but Bhutanese

Malcolm wrote:

DKR is Tibetan. He may have been raised in Bhutan, but he is from an ancient aristocratic Tibetan family.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, October 21st, 2013 at 12:10 AM

Title: Re: Dzongsar Kyentse Rinpoche brief comment on Je Tsongkhapa

Content:

smcj said:

Malcolm,

I respect you, and I respect your practice. The point here I am trying to make is that when a tibetan lama makes a generalized comment about westerners that there may be a basis for it. What I've just written is my articulation of what I think it is they see but cannot understand. So we can be annoyed by it all we want, but that does not make it go away.

Malcolm wrote:

I think we should feel free to make generalized comments about Tibetan lamas too. There might be a basis too. They might be annoyed, but it will not make it go away.

The point I was making was that making the leap from "Western Buddhologists don't believe Buddha taught Mahāyāna (which is effectively what DKR is talking about) to "This is why I doubt the understanding of seasoned Western practitioners". He making a very specious cultural argument, when all is said and done.

Frankly, I like Popper's idea about non-falsifiability. What DKR does not seem to understand is that non-falsifiability is a completely open-ended heuristic. It does not proclaim anything wrong. It merely addresses the limited range of what ordinary humans can see and creates a category of phenomena which are outside of the range of falsifiability.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, October 20th, 2013 at 11:50 PM

Title: Re: Look what I found in Kathmandu...

Content:

Indrajala said:

People will drink their booze regardless of what Buddhism says.

Malcolm wrote:

I certainly shall continue to enjoy wine, regardless of what any Buddhists say.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, October 20th, 2013 at 11:41 PM

Title: Re: Dzongsar Kyentse Rinpoche brief comment on Je Tsongkhapa

Content:

smcj said:

If there is meaning to life, as I said above, it is only because that meaning is imputed upon it.

This is an existential/nihilistic perspective. The emotional complexities that result from it are what the lamas call "loong", and are a great impediment to the efficacy of our practice.

Malcolm wrote:

Sorry my friend, but this is total nonsense. As doctor of Tibetan Medicine I can assure you that among the many causes of lung disease, this is not one of them. It is also not an impediment to practice, at least, not to my practice.

smcj said:

Believing we live in a cold merciless meaningless universe where the only meaning is what we impute on it is a fundamentally frightened way to live.

Malcolm wrote:

No, it is a fearless way to live.

smcj said:

Trying to make things right "on our own terms" is asserting our will in such a way as to be an impediment to receiving blessings.

Malcolm wrote:

"Blessings" don't come from outside. They come from dependent origination and realization. That's about it.

smcj said:

In terms of Dharma practice that fundamental fear is not the problem. It is assumed by Dharma to be the initial operating spiritual principal in the individual. That is why the initial teachings traditionally are about the hell realms, etc. If people have fears, then direct those fears productively and bring them to Dharma. But at some point those fears need to connect to Dharma and need to begin to resolve, which is the stage of "Refuge". Our fears need to begin to be resolved into belief and trust, or as is said more traditionally faith and devotion. At the end of the path there are no more fears, and one of the epithets for buddhahood is "The Great Fearlessness". My late teacher was heard to say, "All fully revealed religions start with fear and end with love. Why? Because fear is the initial spiritual condition of all men, and love the ultimate spiritual condition of all men."

Malcolm wrote:

When we understand there is no meaning then we are at the end of fear. Fear comes from expectations about fulfilling meaning.

smcj said:

In the traditional tibetan culture people feel that they live in a universe where there is a divine justice, and there are loving divinities that are accessible on a functional basis. To them there is an "Ultimate Truth" and people achieve it on a regular basis. This allows them the maximum opportunity to trust and believe, and not be afraid. On the other hand, existential nihilism, coupled with a society in flux, families in disarray, creates frightened people that cannot trust and have no faith. This is the disadvantage we have in our practices. This is what no lama can ever conceive of, since their worldview cannot allow for it. It is our blind spot that we insist not be disturbed because when our own religion collapsed we rejected all religion, not just our religion.

Malcolm wrote:

Ascertaining that the universe has no intrinsic meaning is not existential nihilism.

Personally, I have no use for religion. I do have a use for personal experience.

There has never been any time in history nor has there ever been a culture where societies were not in flux, where families were not in disarray.

The worldview of some lamas do not allow for many things. I am not confined by the worldview of anyone else. Whether I am confined by my own is something you cannot know, but you can certainly judge it if you like.

smcj said:

This is not to say that we have more defilements than a Tibetan. Their anger, greed and such are just as great as ours. It is more like we have a computer virus in our system software that does not allow us to connect properly to the Dharma.

Malcolm wrote:

I do not suffer from any cultural viruses that cut me off from Dharma.

smcj said:

Protecting our hearts and minds from hurt by being closed makes sense in a merciless universe. Being open is terrifying, as it allows for the hurts to go even deeper. But if our spiritual practice is to be fruitful we need to allow our spirit out so it can grow. If you want to learn to swim you're going to have to get wet. And just about everyone here knows the pitfalls and failings of the modern Dharma scene.

Malcolm wrote:

In reality, the modern Dharma scene is no better and no worse than it was during the time of the Buddha, with one exception, the Buddha, or so we imagine.

smcj said:

But clearly the teachings guide us towards unconditional trust, faith and devotion.

Malcolm wrote:

Sorry, that is not where my path has lead me. It has lead me to unconditional confidence, knowledge and personal experience. I don't really respond well to the trust, faith and devotion thing.

The Buddha taught that we suffer from birth, aging, sickness and death. He taught us how to escape that condition. Later humans elaborated on the Buddha's message and taught the deeper meaning underlying it (i.e. emptiness of inherent existence). Still other humans later on decided that was too extreme and decided that the deeper meaning needed to be augmented by a somewhat more positive message about our condition, and taught tathāgatagarbha. None of this however renders the universe meaningful.

As I have said many times here and elsewhere. "Life has no meaning, but if you are a Dharma practitioner, then life is meaningful." But this is not a declaration of a teleological (<https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Teleology>) meaningfulness of the kind you are expressing here. It is also not a declaration of absolute meaningfulness. It is a strictly relative meaningfulness relevant only to humans who can think and judge. It is not a statement about the value of the universe or even the value of a spotted owl. Spotted owls are meaningful to me personally, but they are not ultimately meaningful in anyway.

The universe will perish. Generally speaking we are taught in the Dharma not to impute meaning on the impermanent, the afflicted and identityless. Since even nirvana is identityless, it is a little risky for Dharma practitioners to invest much meaning in it.

The absence of illness is health.
The absence of suffering is bliss.
The absence of meaning is freedom.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, October 20th, 2013 at 11:16 PM

Title: Re: Dzongsar Kyentse Rinpoche brief comment on Je Tsongkhapa

Content:

Indrajala said:

but they are still the words of a buddha, i.e., the sambhogakāya.

Malcolm wrote:

That is not even necessary to say.

They are just words that a human being wrote down on a piece of paper reflecting their vision of the Buddha and that is all they are. Attributing them to the sambhogakāya is also a nice tradition, but it is outside the range of ordinary human perception.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, October 20th, 2013 at 9:01 PM

Title: Re: Look what I found in Kathmandu...

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Nothing unusual about a shopkeeper in Katmandhu having a picture of HHDL.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, October 20th, 2013 at 8:48 PM

Title: Re: Look what I found in Kathmandu...

Content:

KonchokZoepa said:

are you serious ? like guns or knives ? who would do that and why ?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes.

Guns, knives, swords, canons, grenades, anything really that is capable of harm.

Who would do? Why all Tibetans. Why would they do it? Because Dharmapālas, like any army, need weapons.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, October 20th, 2013 at 8:42 PM

Title: Re: Dzongsar Kyentse Rinpoche brief comment on Je Tsongkhapa

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

You need to read the Pali suttas.

heart said:

I find them rather boring, to tell you the truth. No wonder that I get excited by the idea of some Mahayana sutras being just as ancient as the Pali suttas.

I practice Dzogchen and so for me the ultimate intention of the nine yanas are simply the realization of the natural state. That is also why they all have great benefit to practice. This point of view is of course ignoring the nine yanas own efforts to posit a ultimate goal and all the polemics that go with that as well as the constantly growing numbers of bodhisattva bumis and so on. In the natural state both samsara and nirvana self-liberate and so Shakyamuni's intention is fulfilled and anyone capable of that are inseparable from him like Garab Dorje, Guru Rinpoche and Vimalamitra. This is also why Shakyamuni is one of the Dzogchen Buddhas.

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, the Pali suttas are rather dry. One of the reasons is that they are NOT literary compositions. They reflect the extemporaneous speech of the Buddha. The themes covered are limited, oft repeated and formulaic.

Let me give an example. You can listen to any DC webcast. I guarantee you that on the first day Norbu Rinpoche will say x, y and z. He often states these things in virtually identical phrases. The Pali canon is like that -- it is an oral record of what the historical Buddha actually said.

Mahāyāna sutras are often quite interesting, because they are literary compositions intended for audiences with specific religious goals in mind. They sometimes emulate repetition, but they are not mnemonically repetitive in same way that Pali suttas are. Thus, they should not be confused with what the historical Buddha said.

The Mahāyāna Buddha is not a historical buddha by any accepted standard of historiography. Chogyal Namkhai Norbu writes on the birth date of sTon pa Shen rab: "...and since history must be studied in congruence with ordinary human perception, I prefer not to base myself on these traditions" (Drung, Deu and Bon, pg. 156). I suggest we should apply no less a rigorous standard to the study of all Buddhist texts and traditions than we do to the study of Bon and other religious traditions, and also judge them in concert with ordinary human perception.

Whatever the Buddha of Mahāyāna and Vajrayāna may mean to us personally is not relevant to what we can know about Mahāyāna sūtras through careful text critical study and archaeological finds and it is better to keep the two separate. I understand that in some people this creates a cognitive dissonance, and they feel they have to choose one or the other. I don't have that problem -- who knows, maybe it is a result of practicing years of creation stage.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, October 20th, 2013 at 8:22 PM

Title: Re: Dzongsar Kyentse Rinpoche brief comment on Je Tsongkhapa

Content:

smcj said:

What does Dzogchen say about the basis? Malcolm agreed with my teacher when he said, "Not an atom in the universe vibrates that isn't powered by love." Dharma practice isn't trying to find comfort in a cold heartless universe. It is walking the path of fulfilling the potential of the human spirit, which in turn is itself the essence of the universe.

The universe is not a cold mechanistic place, and life is full of meaning. And even an illiterate tibetan villager knows it.

Malcolm wrote:

The universe is a cold place. We seek comfort in our religions, politics, and so on, much like ants seek comfort in ant hills, more or less completely unaware of anything external to their world unless it threatens them.

If there is meaning to life, as I said above, it is only because that meaning is imputed upon it. Even attaining buddhahood is in reality meaningless. Even saving sentient beings is meaningless. If you want it to have meaning, that's ok. But in the end, when we are all dead and buried (within the next 20-60 years) most of us will not even be remembered. We will not remember our past life. We will not remember having decided to follow Buddhadharma. Some of us might no even be human beings anymore.

We are indeed free of teleological meaningfulness. I prefer to leave such concepts to Hegel and his lot.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, October 20th, 2013 at 8:15 PM

Title: Re: Look what I found in Kathmandu...

Content:

Nemo said:

At least it wasn't a gun store. Black Label you can offer to the Protectors.

Malcolm wrote:

You can offer weapons to protectors too.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, October 20th, 2013 at 6:38 AM

Title: Re: Dzongsar Kyentse Rinpoche brief comment on Je Tsongkhapa

Content:

Karma Dorje said:

I must say that I am totally shocked to hear self-described Mahayanists saying that life (including the bodhisattva motivation) has no meaning, and that ceasing to exist entirely (not just within samsara) is the ultimate aim.

Malcolm wrote:

One does not cease to exist (ucchedavada); however with the absence of the cause for arising there is cessation.

Life does not need to have any meaning for a bodhisattva (who understands the meaninglessness of life) to wish to free sentient beings from pointless rounds of samsaric existence. In fact it entirely underpins their whole motivation. They have recognized that there is no meaning to life, and they wish to rescue others from the delusion that life has meaning.

The point of Buddhadharma is to cease having the experience of birth, aging, sickness and death.

As Maitreya Bodhisattva is supposed to have said, there is not even the a needle point of happiness to be found samsara. Birth only occurs because of afflictions. When afflictions are eradicated, birth also ceases.

However, the meaningless of life does not prevent me from enjoying life. I actually rather enjoy it more, since I know that my existence is free from the burden of teleological meaningfulness.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, October 20th, 2013 at 3:50 AM

Title: Re: Dzongsar Kyentse Rinpoche brief comment on Je Tsongkhapa

Content:

heart said:

If you stay in the natural state samsara stops, that is the only cessation the Buddha ever taught.

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

That's simple not true, Magnus, it is especially untrue with respect to Dzogchen.

heart said:

We will have to agree to disagree then.

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

You need to read the Pali suttas.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, October 20th, 2013 at 2:55 AM

Title: Re: Dzongsar Kyentse Rinpoche brief comment on Je Tsongkhapa

Content:

KonchokZoepa said:

then you havent studied shantidevas bodhicharyavatara. or other mahayana text's that deal with motivation of life.

Malcolm wrote:

These texts deal with one's motivation for awakening, which is predicated on the fact that life has no intrinsic meaning. Being born, living, dying are all intrinsically meaningless from the perspective of Buddhadharma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, October 20th, 2013 at 2:39 AM

Title: Re: Dzongsar Kyentse Rinpoche brief comment on Je Tsongkhapa

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, completely. The entire teaching of Buddha Dharma is based on meaningless of samsara and ending the process of taking rebirth in it. Life = samsara. If samsara is meaningless, so is life. The ultimate desiderata is to bring the whole cycle to an end. Since sentient beings are endless, that will never happen. Nevertheless, the primary goal of Buddhadharma is to achieve a nirvana in which nothing is left behind.

M

heart said:

If you stay in the natural state samsara stops, that is the only cessation the Buddha ever taught.

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

That's simple not true, Magnus, it is especially untrue with respect to Dzogchen.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, October 20th, 2013 at 2:03 AM

Title: Re: Dzongsar Kyentse Rinpoche brief comment on Je Tsongkhapa

Content:

Karma Dorje said:

There's nothing abstract about genuine love. It's immediate and obvious. Biological self-perpetuation on the other hand, that's a huge ideological abstraction.

Malcolm wrote:

Love is not a purpose, and does not lend itself to imbuing meaning on a cosmic scale.

Life is only meaningful to those who find meaning in it. Buddha clearly didn't which is why he recommended cessation.

heart said:

? are you serious?

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, completely. The entire teaching of Buddha Dharma is based on the meaningless of samsara and ending the process of taking rebirth in it. Life = samsara. If samsara is meaningless, so is life. The ultimate desiderata is to bring the whole cycle to an end. Since sentient beings are endless, that will never happen. Nevertheless, the primary goal of Buddhadharma is to achieve a nirvana in which nothing is left behind.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, October 20th, 2013 at 1:52 AM

Title: Re: Dzongsar Kyentse Rinpoche brief comment on Je Tsongkhapa

Content:

Karma Dorje said:

There's nothing abstract about genuine love. It's immediate and obvious. Biological self-perpetuation on the other hand, that's a huge ideological abstraction.

Malcolm wrote:

Love is not a purpose, and does not lend itself to imbuing meaning on a cosmic scale.

Life is only meaningful to those who find meaning in it. Buddha clearly didn't which is why he recommended cessation.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, October 20th, 2013 at 1:01 AM

Title: Re: Dzongsar Kyentse Rinpoche brief comment on Je Tsongkhapa

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

There is no intrinsic meaning or purpose to life. That is the essence of understanding samsara. We have to make it enjoyable on our own terms, that is the essence of practicing and realizing the Dharma.

Karma Dorje said:

The intrinsic meaning and purpose of life is to yield ourselves to the service of others.

Malcolm wrote:

That also serves no purpose at all unless you subscribe to some abstract ideological which imputes such values.

But life has no purpose at all, unless you consider biological self-perpetuation a "purpose".

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, October 19th, 2013 at 11:51 PM

Title: Re: Emptiness and the two truths

Content:

Sherab said:

I thought liberation is due to wisdom

Malcolm wrote:

No, liberation is due to the eradication of afflictions.

I am not sure what you mean by "wisdom". So you mean omniscience? Or do you mean prajñā?

If the former, omniscience is not required for liberation.

If the latter, the prajñā that eradicates the afflictions is exactly the same in an arhat and a buddha.

Sherab said:

Okay, let me try again and see if I can make my trend of thought a little clearer.

I was thinking along the line that the liberation of an arhat is liberation from the 12 links of dependent origination. This is done when any link is cut. That cutting is due to a certain wisdom realized.

Since the wisdom of a buddha is far greater than the wisdom of an arhat, there must be a difference in the realization of a buddha compared to an arhat.

This implies that the wisdom realized by a buddha goes further than just cutting the 12 links of dependent origination. It is the difference in knowledge/wisdom of a buddha compared to an arhat that allows the buddha to perform greater 'miraculous' feats than an arhat. So I thought that the difference would come from the buddha having knowledge of all dependencies and not just those of the 12 links of DO. Via the buddha's knowledge/wisdom of all dependencies, the liberation of the buddha is liberation from all dependencies, in contrast to the liberation of an arhat which is only a liberation from the 12 links of DO.

Malcolm wrote:

Regarding liberation:

If you cut a rope, does it matter much whether the scissors you are using are six inches long or six feet long?

Regarding realization:

There is certainly a difference between a six inch flame and a six foot flame.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, October 19th, 2013 at 10:58 PM

Title: Re: Emptiness and the two truths

Content:

Sherab said:

I thought liberation is due to wisdom

Malcolm wrote:

No, liberation is due to the eradication of afflictions.

I am not sure what you mean by "wisdom". So you mean omniscience? Or do you mean prajñā?

If the former, omniscience is not required for liberation.

If the latter, the prajñā that eradicates the afflictions is exactly the same in an arhat and a buddha.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, October 19th, 2013 at 10:42 PM

Title: Re: Emptiness and the two truths

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

There is no difference between a Buddha and an arhat in terms of liberation, that is why all buddhas are also arhats; there is a vast difference between a buddha and arhat in terms of qualities.

Sherab said:

So there is no difference in the wisdom of an arhat and the wisdom of a buddha?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, there is a difference between their qualities (wisdom being one of them), but not their liberation, i.e., freedom from rebirth in samsara, which after all is the definition of liberation by all Buddhist traditions, as well as a number of non-Buddhist ones.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, October 19th, 2013 at 10:18 PM

Title: Re: Emptiness and the two truths

Content:

Sherab said:

If liberation means

Malcolm wrote:

Liberation simply means being free from the operation of afflictions.

Sherab said:

I thought liberation defined as being free from the operation of affliction refers to being free from the 12 links of dependent origination, i.e. the liberation of an arhat or a pratekyabuddha. In contrast to that, I thought that the liberation of a buddha would be freedom from all dependencies. Otherwise, there would be no difference in realization between a buddha and an arhat.

Malcolm wrote:

There is no difference between a Buddha and an arhat in terms of liberation, that is why all buddhas are also arhats; there is a vast difference between a buddha and arhat in terms of qualities.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, October 19th, 2013 at 9:25 PM

Title: Re: Emptiness and the two truths

Content:

Sherab said:

If liberation means

Malcolm wrote:

Liberation simply means being free from the operation of afflictions.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, October 19th, 2013 at 9:13 PM

Title: Re: Dzongsar Kyentse Rinpoche brief comment on Je Tsongkhapa

Content:

heart said:

Feel free to point me to your sources Malcolm. After almost 30 years listening to Buddhist teachings I find it very probable the Buddha taught in different ways to different disciples. The fact that they find it difficult to find proof that Hinayana is older than Mahayana is an interesting indication of that.

Malcolm wrote:

You are confusing two different factors: Physical texts with age of a given tradition.

The early Canon was largely oral. We know that by the time of Ashoka texts were starting to be written down.

There is no record of an early reaction to Mahāyāna, as you would suppose there would be, since Ashoka purged the monastic sangha at the encouragement of the Vibhajyavadins. You see reactions towards proto Mahayāna ideas such as multiplicity of Buddhas and so on. But the first solid historical evidence we have of Mahāyāna texts is their translation into Chinese, and now a few fragments from Gandhara which support the idea that Mahāyāna was current in the Gandhara region during the first century.

We have Buddhist texts written on Ashoka pillars that can be pinpointed and have been.

We know that the Pali canon was written down in Sri Lanka during at the beginning of the first century BCE. We know that there were multiple canons. We also know that in Mahāyāna sūtras books are mentioned a lot. In the Pali sūtras, books are never mentioned even once. Clearly, the primary difference between the Nikāyas and the Mahāyāna canon is the difference between collection of texts that were recalled orally for centuries prior to being committed to writing to a collection of texts that are a product of a self-conscious literary process of authorship.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, October 19th, 2013 at 8:47 PM

Title: Re: Renunciation as path of Sutra: sources?

Content:

David Chapman said:

Chögyal Namhkai Norbu Rinpoche characterizes Sutra as the vehicle whose path is renunciation. This certainly seems accurate to me. However, I've had difficulty finding any other source that says the same. Renunciation is regarded as an aspect of the sutric paths, but nowhere else does it seem to be regarded as the essence or summary.

Are there other, earlier sources that regard renunciation as the essence of the Sutric path? Or is this characterization ChNNR's specific teaching?

Thanks very much for any leads.

David

Malcolm wrote:

The Sakyapas clearly make a distinction between Sūtrayāna, which is a path of giving up sense objects, and Vajrayāna, which is a path of not abandoning sense objects.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, October 19th, 2013 at 8:44 PM

Title: Re: Dzongsar Kyentse Rinpoche brief comment on Je Tsongkhapa

Content:

heart said:

The problem with that reasoning is that there is actually no archeological evidence for it. The idea of the evolution of Buddhist spiritual practices isn't based in anything solid, and in fact the Dzogchen teachings for example completely negate this idea. Anyway, we are far away from DKR and Tsongkhapa, probably my fault.

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

Of course there is archeological evidence for it -- the evidence is in the texts themselves, all kinds of evidence -- from the naming of plants and trees, to locations, etc.

The idea of the evolution of Buddhist spiritual practice in Indian history is based on very solid evidence, inscriptions, statues, etc. There is lot of plastic evidence that tracks to evolution of Mahāyāna into Vajrayāna for example aside from texts.

Irrespective of its historical origins: Mahāyāna is valid on its own terms or it is not. I accept that it is. Bodhicitta is a unique contribution of Mahāyāna to world spiritual traditions. I fully identify as a practitioner of Mahāyāna Dharma. I understand the desire and wish to trace this sūtra or that sūtra back to Shakyamuni Buddha, but I think it is futile.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, October 19th, 2013 at 8:40 PM

Title: Re: Dzongsar Kyentse Rinpoche brief comment on Je Tsongkhapa

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Many people with entrenched biases are not stupid.

dzogchungpa said:

Yes, and DJKR is not one of them.

Malcolm wrote:

We will agree to disagree.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, October 19th, 2013 at 8:31 PM

Title: Re: Dzongsar Kyentse Rinpoche brief comment on Je Tsongkhapa

Content:

Simon E. said:

But quite a number of indications that the Theravada is a remnant of one ancient and partisan school.

heart said:

Well that is the often repeated mantra, still don't explain why there are Mahayana texts recovered among the oldest know Buddhist texts.

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

The oldest known, physically surviving Buddhist texts exist on the Ashokan pillars.

The Gandhari texts do not shown an overwhelming concern with Mahāyāna -- they reveal a few fragments of Mahāyāna texts dating to the 1st century CE, but we already know that Mahāyāna was in existence at this time due to the presence of 2nd century translations into Chinese. In order for me to be convinced that Mahāyāna was taught by anyone, let alone the Buddha, prior to the first century BCE, I would need to see some hard physical facts. Luckily for me, my soteriology does not depend on archaeology. Also my estimation of the capacity of Tibetans (or anyone else) to understand nonduality as presented in Buddhist texts does not depend on whether Buddha actually taught "nonduality".

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, October 19th, 2013 at 8:27 PM

Title: Re: Dzongsar Kyentse Rinpoche brief comment on Je Tsongkhapa

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

Does that article provide some evidence that Mahayana might have been taught by the Buddha? I looked through it and I didn't see anything like that.

heart said:

It says clearly that the oldest Buddhist texts we have are both Hinayana and Mahayana, as to what the Buddha actually taught is anybody's guess since its early history is hearsay.

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

It says nothing of their authorship. What the Buddha actually spoke is not really anybody's guess, since there is sufficient evidence to prove that what is taught in the Pali canon/Agamas is more or less directly based on what the Buddha may have actually spoken.

While it is certain that parts of these early teachings have certainly been renovated into sections of Mahāyāna sūtras, the real question is "Did Buddha actually, physically, as a historical reality, teach Mahāyāna sūtras." The answer must be, no he didn't, except in someone's pure vision.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, October 19th, 2013 at 8:22 PM

Title: Re: Dzongsar Kyentse Rinpoche brief comment on Je Tsongkhapa

Content:

smcj said:

How many people do you know that believe that there is no intrinsic purpose or meaning to life, and that we just have to make it enjoyable on our own terms? Or how about the opposite? How about the christian fundamentalist that sees the modern world as a threat and must be bullied into conforming to their beliefs?

Malcolm wrote:

Ironically, it appears to me that many Tibetan exponents of Buddhism view the modern world as a threat, in much the same way they regard science as a threat.

There is no intrinsic meaning or purpose to life. That is the essence of understanding samsara. We have to make it enjoyable on our own terms, that is the essence of practicing and realizing the Dharma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, October 19th, 2013 at 6:49 AM

Title: Re: Dzongsar Kyentse Rinpoche brief comment on Je Tsongkhapa

Content:

Karma Dorje said:

There's no yawning gulf between Tibetans and Westerners, as far as I can see. Same afflictions, same institutional bugbears, same overweening conceits of intellectual prowess...

Malcolm wrote:

It would be nice of Tibetan exponents of Buddhism such as Dzongsar would cease advertising how much more afflicted and so on Westerners are supposed to be. So far as I know, no incarnated Lama has ever been murdered by their own Western students.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, October 19th, 2013 at 6:47 AM

Title: Re: Dzongsar Kyentse Rinpoche brief comment on Je Tsongkhapa

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

Have you been to any of his empowerments?

Malcolm wrote:

No, I have not, precisely because of the kinds of things he says.

dzogchungpa said:

Well, I have. I think I am at least as western as you, and I did not get the impression that he does not understand us. Are we really that hard to understand? He's not stupid, you know.

Malcolm wrote:

Many people with entrenched biases are not stupid.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, October 19th, 2013 at 6:45 AM

Title: Re: Dzongsar Kyentse Rinpoche brief comment on Je Tsongkhapa

Content:

heart said:

But it seems to take some time to land.

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

Sorry Magnus, this does not rate.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, October 19th, 2013 at 2:44 AM

Title: Re: Dzongsar Kyentse Rinpoche brief comment on Je Tsongkhapa

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

I'm not so sure about that. Have you been to any of his empowerments?

Malcolm wrote:

No, I have not, precisely because of the kinds of things he says.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, October 19th, 2013 at 2:17 AM

Title: Re: Dzongsar Kyentse Rinpoche brief comment on Je Tsongkhapa

Content:

smcj said:

It's more that our culture creates chaotic and confused people.

Malcolm wrote:

Sorry, I guess I just can't buy into this way of thinking. Most of the people I know are neither chaotic or confused. In fact the most chaotic, the most confused people I have ever met, apart from rock and rollers, were Buddhists in Dharma centers.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, October 19th, 2013 at 2:08 AM

Title: Re: Dzongsar Kyentse Rinpoche brief comment on Je Tsongkhapa

Content:

heart said:

Actually, Mahayana might have been taught by the Buddha. The archeological proofs are becoming just as solid as for the Hinayana scriptures.

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

Really, what proof?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, October 19th, 2013 at 1:16 AM

Title: Re: Dzongsar Kyentse Rinpoche brief comment on Je Tsongkhapa

Content:

smcj said:

My teacher said to me once, "Our minds look like a wiggling can of worms to them, so they give us the Dharma and hope we can make something out of it."

Malcolm wrote:

Sorry, but I have met many Tibetans and even Tibetan lamas and teachers, for the most part their minds are just as infected with worms as ours appear to be.

I personally am rather tired of the cultural chauvinism exhibited by Tibetans. It is one thing to be appreciative of one's culture. It is another thing to rest on the laurels of history (actually socio-geographical happenstance) and use this fact to tout the superiority of one's culture.

I don't like it when American politicians waffle on about American "exceptionalism" and I don't like it when Tibetan teachers waffle on about Tibetan exceptionalism. There is nothing particularly exceptional about human beings in general, apart from our capacity to think and reason -- and even that is very questionable when viewed from a cosmic perspective.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, October 19th, 2013 at 12:59 AM

Title: Re: Dzongsar Kyentse Rinpoche brief comment on Je Tsongkhapa

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

DKR has a bad attitude about westerners. It's a pity really.

dzogchungpa said:

I kind of agree, but he has had a lot of experience with westerners, and seems to be quite appreciative of western culture. Maybe he has a point?

Malcolm wrote:

A point about what? He does not understand us.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, October 19th, 2013 at 12:16 AM

Title: Re: Dzongsar Kyentse Rinpoche brief comment on Je Tsongkhapa

Content:

Alfredo said:

Mandala, I see Tsongkhapa's presentation of Indian Buddhist philosophy (e.g. the division into four tenet systems) as a factual distortion, however fruitful it may have been for Tibetan scholasticism.

Malcolm wrote:

The four tenet system is Indian in origin.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, October 19th, 2013 at 12:13 AM

Title: Re: Dzongsar Kyentse Rinpoche brief comment on Je Tsongkhapa

Content:

Alfredo said:

Here's the quote I was thinking of:

[...] I've been talking with a lot of--a few, a few scholars in Oxford. They're very good, really good! Very good. There are many so-called Buddhist professors, or Buddhist experts, and they strongly oppose reincarnation. They don't believe that nonduality is taught by the Buddha, and stuff like that. Very good. It's a very educational for me. [smiles, audience laughs] I would just yesterday talked about--someone I had actually only heard the name, but never really learned anything about...him. Um, Karl...Karl Popper. Karl Popper? So... Also, in Oxford I was told that they're studying Buddhism "objectively." That's very interesting. [smiles, audience laughs] So this is all disorienting for me because [stammers] I had to switch my mind back to the Buddhist mind, so to speak, in order to talk about... this.

Anyway this is very important subject. [long pause] If we don't talk about nonduality, then I don't think we can really talk about Buddhism at all. And nonduality's not so easy. Recently I was talking to...Indians, just Indian intellectuals. And I was even kind of... worried...that how much we Tibetans actually manage to conceive the idea of nonduality thoroughly, as much as these Indians seems to have done. It's not that easy, this nonduality, to really conceive this. Especially if are, you think like, I think, like Karl Popper's way. And if you really think that something can be observed and valued objectively, nonduality's difficult. [shifts on seat] About a year ago I met a professor in America--Berkeley University--and he told me something very interesting. He said actually, it's very important that the Tibetan lamas know the history of Buddhism, and especially the history of Buddhism in the West. And he said especially in America because, he said, that the emergence of Buddhism in the West may be, may have...it started, you know, it started with a very Descartes-like Buddhism. So it's a very dualistic Buddhism, so to speak. I can understand him, because even the most seasoned dharma practitioner in the West sometimes I do have doubt, how much they are really understanding. Of course we are not talking about actual realization of nonduality, but we are talking about intellectual understanding of nonduality. Because the concept is just not proveable. Because every logic, language, method of measurement, is dualistic.

So dualistic method cannot measure and value something nondualistic. Always! And anything that cannot be proved, or anything that does not have a "manufacturing date," so to speak, I think in the materialistic world, modern world, it's all not really...it's a [struggle?], it's like a [struggle?], it really doesn't have much value in it.

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=NqRyAnyFNsA&list=TLh_vF6bhVwVLQjV8bMUeJ-ExvzM9778se (start from 4 minutes in)

Malcolm wrote:

This quote presents a false argument, one that is is very superficial.

DKR goes from the premise that because Buddhologists in general do not accept the idea that Mahāyāna was historically taught by the Buddha (in other words, texts were composed that used the persona of the Buddha as a mouthpiece for various Mahāyāna doctrines) that they, indeed all Westerners, therefore are under suspicion of being incapable of understanding the nondual message taught in those texts.

His argument is at base a species of cultural chauvinism. This cultural chauvinism that DKR frequently expresses in his lectures is distressingly blind.

In sum, he starts with an issue of historiography and ends up leveling a charge of philosophical incompetence. DKR has a bad attitude about westerners. Its a pity really.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, October 18th, 2013 at 10:08 PM

Title: Re: Where is Mount Sumeru?

Content:

Aemilius said:

The Sarvastivada Abhidharma knew that when it is daytime in Jambudvīpa it is night on the Kuru continent. They possessed knowledge that is still valid about the universe and the planet Earth.

Mount Kailash is not mentioned in the Abhidharmakosha, it is a later interpretation, and it is wrong for several reasons, for example: the Sun and the Moon do not revolve around Mount Kailash, but they do revolve around the South pole (or North pole), when you adopt a flat earth presentation of our planet.

Malcolm wrote:

However the Surya Siddhanta's presentation of the universe (which has Meru at the north pole) wildly conflicts with Sarvastivadin cosmology.

Honestly, it is amazing to find people in the 21st century who try to prove that Abhidharmakosha's cosmology corresponds with the known facts of the universe.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, October 17th, 2013 at 3:30 AM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

its simply a matter of intent: does one try to avoid participating in violence and killing as much as possible, or does one justify extra and unnecessary killing for the sake of one's gustatory pleasure?

Malcolm wrote:

There is no "extra" suffering in samsara.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, October 17th, 2013 at 2:25 AM

Title: Re: Sutra Mahamudra, Tantric Mahamudra, & Mahamudra

Content:

heart said:

Well, I am talking about rig pa'i rtsal bang in the mengakde. I think the purpose is quite singular or else you would be introducing something that was still mind.

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

There are different kinds of rig pa'i rtsal dbangs even within man ngag sde.

heart said:

Of course they are different. There are for Trechö and Tögal and every tradition have there own style. But are they introducing the natural state or not?

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

Its just not that simple.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, October 17th, 2013 at 2:20 AM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

thats a non-sequitur as a response to the question of intent and karma.

Malcolm wrote:

I answered your question. The answer is no (I am not claiming that intent is irrelevant when it comes to karma -- no one would unless they knew nothing about Buddhadharma).

gad rgyangs said:

then you admit that there is a karmic difference between "intent to kill & eat" vs. "intent to try and minimize killing while eating"?

Malcolm wrote:

You left out the middle one:

"Eating without intent to kill."

Anyway, killing is not the problem, the taking of life is. The latter requires intent. The former does not.

But eating anything that lives is a problem for something somewhere. All food involves the death of something else living.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, October 17th, 2013 at 1:31 AM

Title: Re: Sutra Mahamudra, Tantric Mahamudra, & Mahamudra

Content:

heart said:

Well, I am talking about rig pa'i rtsal bang in the mengakde. I think the purpose is quite singular or else you would be introducing something that was still mind.

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

There are different kinds of rig pa'i rtsal dbangs even within man ngag sde.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, October 17th, 2013 at 1:17 AM

Title: Re: Sutra Mahamudra, Tantric Mahamudra, & Mahamudra

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The descent of the wisdom vajra empowerment procedure is detailed in in chapter 17 of the Jñānasiddhi of Indrabhuti.

It is not the same as a rig pa'i rtsal dbang.

M

heart said:

Which rigpai tsal wang are you talking about, there are many? But getting introduced directly to the nature of enlightenment is exactly what the rigpai tsal wang is about.

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

It's just not that simple, Magnus. There are two systems of rig pa'i rtsal bang -- sems sde and man ngag sde. Even within man ngag sde there are different kinds of rig pa'i rtsal dbangs, not to mention different rig pa'i rtsal dbangs in anuyoga and mahayoga systems like the King's cycle of Avalokiteshvara.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, October 17th, 2013 at 1:15 AM

Title: Re: Sutra Mahamudra, Tantric Mahamudra, & Mahamudra

Content:

conebeckham said:

Well, thanks for the helpful info about Rigpa'i Tsel Wang. Can we confirm Trekcho and Essence Mahamudra are not the same as a result?

Malcolm, I believe you're familiar with Drikung Kagyu transmissions--is this transmission Paul speaks of the "Vajra Pristine Awareness Empowerment" as discussed by Indrabhuti?

Malcolm wrote:

Vajra pristine awareness = ye shes rdo rje = jñānavajra.

It is very likely the same. The Eighth Situ also discusses this in his commentary on the Mahamudra Aspiration by the Third Karmapa.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, October 17th, 2013 at 1:05 AM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

Pero said:

Yes well, I don't know when was the last time you went to a restaurant, cafeteria or a grocery etc. but these days (and as long as I've been alive) you don't come there and say "hey, I'd like some beef, go and kill some for me and I'll pay you". You come, there's meat, you buy or you don't.

It's just a silly argument.

gad rgyangs said:

the only thing this demonstrates is that you have no idea how an economy works or what "supply and demand" means.

Malcolm wrote:

And vegetarians, and especially vegans, have their head in the sand with respect to the necessity of animals being involved in the cycle of any viable sustainable, organic, local agricultural system.

for example, all that rice you eat is fertilized with feather meal and poultry litter which comes from exactly the same abattoirs you are condemning. We are all eating animal inputs all the time whenever we eat any organically produced vegetables.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, October 17th, 2013 at 12:51 AM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

so you're claiming that intent is irrelevant when it comes to karma?

Malcolm wrote:

No, I am observing that all living beings feed on other living beings. I will add that the distinction between sentient and non-sentient life is artificial and anachronistic.

M

gad rgyangs said:

thats a non-sequitur as a response to the question of intent and karma.

Malcolm wrote:

I answered your question. The answer is no (I am not claiming that intent is irrelevant when it comes to karma -- no one would unless they knew nothing about Buddhadharma).

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, October 17th, 2013 at 12:18 AM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

David N. Snyder said:

What if everyone were Buddhist? Who would man the slaughter-houses?

Malcolm wrote:

We have already performed this experiment in Tibet, Thailand, etc. The answer is that Buddhists would man the abattoirs and come up with rites of karmic expiation.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, October 17th, 2013 at 12:15 AM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

maybe it will at least keep the cannibals distracted for long enough that they eat a few less brother sentient beings.

Malcolm wrote:

Life feeds on life, intentionally or not.

M

gad rgyangs said:

so you're claiming that intent is irrelevant when it comes to karma?

Malcolm wrote:

No, I am observing that all living beings feed on other living beings. I will add that the distinction between sentient and non-sentient life is artificial and anachronistic.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, October 17th, 2013 at 12:13 AM

Title: Re: Sutra Mahamudra, Tantric Mahamudra, & Mahamudra

Content:

heart said:

You read empowerment and you think that means something grand, it is just THE pointing-out instruction. Since it is definitive it certainly appropriately could be called "the decent of the vajra wisdom". It by-pass all shamatha/vipassana and tsa-lung and is a non-gradual path.

But really, I hope you go and see Rinpoche and discuss this with him. As you know I myself practice Dzogchen even if my Guru teach both.

/magnus

conebeckham said:

You are equating the Vajra Pristine Awareness empowerment with "Ngotro," Pointing Out Instructions, etc.

The question is, is "Ngotro," Pointing Out Instruction, the Fourth Empowerment of Anuttarayogatantra, or even the Rigpa'i Tsel Wang the same as this empowerment spoken of by Kongtrul? I cannot answer that question. If you get an answer to that question from any qualified guru, I'd be interested to hear it.

Malcolm wrote:

The descent of the wisdom vajra empowerment procedure is detailed in in chapter 17 of the Jñānasiddhi of Indrabhuti.

It is not the same as a rig pa'i rtsal dbang.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, October 16th, 2013 at 11:15 PM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

maybe it will at least keep the cannibals distracted for long enough that they eat a few less brother sentient beings.

Malcolm wrote:

Life feeds on life, intentionally or not.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, October 16th, 2013 at 8:20 PM

Title: Re: khyung chen mkha' lding of Sri Simha

Content:

mutsum said:

JLA just told me some have been identified outside the Bima Nyingthik, like the khregs-chod bdun-pa (which was identified by Norbu Rinpoche).

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, I am aware of the khregs chod bdun pa.

Thanks.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, October 16th, 2013 at 3:35 AM

Title: Re: khyung chen mkha' lding of Sri Simha

Content:

mutsum said:

It is Upadesha no. 44 from the collection of 119 Upadeshas (partially included in the Bima Nyinghtik).

Malcolm wrote:

Do you have a location for the rest?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, October 15th, 2013 at 10:49 PM

Title: Re: Sutra Mahamudra, Tantric Mahamudra, & Mahamudra

Content:

Jikan said:

I have to confess: as a somewhat badly informed outsider, I find the distinction between Sutra Mahamudra & Tantric Mahamudra somewhat baffling. Would someone please clarify for me what these categories mean in practical terms? eg, generally speaking, are these different approaches to practice, are they integrated into one trajectory of practice, or...? by that I mean, are there practitioners solely of Sutra Mahamudra, or Tantric Mahamudra, or are these paths different aspects of the same phenomenon?

Many thanks

Malcolm wrote:

Read Kongtrul's encyclopedia on practice lineages, he describes it perfectly.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, October 15th, 2013 at 10:36 PM

Title: Re: Why study Sanskrit?

Content:

yegyal said:

Actually, I've never met a Tibetan scholar-practitioner that didn't think studying Sanskrit was worthwhile.

Indrajala said:

I've seldom met anyone from the Himalayas who thought the study of Sanskrit was important and pursued it even at an elementary level. I've met a few, sure, but they're exceptions.

Malcolm wrote:

As Khedrup mentions, Lama Migmar reads Sanskrit with fluency; so does Lama Pema, another Sakya graduate of Varanasi. Students at Sakya College, on the other hand, do not study so much Sanskrit.

Those Tibetans seriously interested in Indian Buddhist texts make the effort. But your average Geshe, Lama, Khenpo, probably not.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, October 15th, 2013 at 10:06 PM

Title: Re: Why study Sanskrit?

Content:

JKhedrup said:

With the thousands of volumes of Buddhist texts available in Classical Tibetan and Chinese, for example, the monks have plenty to "do nothing but study with". While Sanskrit is wonderful to study, modern Chinese and Tibetan monks still can build a firm foundational of scriptural knowledge without it.

Malcolm wrote:

Without question, knowledge of Sanskrit is very important. It is one factor that has given the Sakyapas the edge in scholarship for centuries.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, October 15th, 2013 at 9:21 PM

Title: Re: Why study Sanskrit?

Content:

Indrajala said:

Earlier a Tibetan monk said to me, "Why bother studying Sanskrit? Everything is available in Tibetan."

I have my own reasons, both personal and scholarly, for studying Sanskrit, though his question is pertinent.

Malcolm wrote:

His question is ridiculous -- much of what was translated into Tibetan cannot be properly understood without some Sanskrit grammar.

If you are never going to read a sutra or sastra from the bka' 'gyur or btan 'gyur, his point might have merit, otherwise? Not so smart.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, October 15th, 2013 at 4:31 AM

Title: Re: simple shrines

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Well, it could be worse, you could be into this:

Notice, Elvis' halo is just a little brighter than that of Jesus.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, October 15th, 2013 at 4:07 AM

Title: Re: Where is Mount Sumeru?

Content:

Zhen Li said:

This only lends further credence to the fact that our world taken as a whole is Jambudvipa.

.

Malcolm wrote:

The main thing which upsets this theory is that Ptolemy knew and mentions the Uttarakurus in his geography.

<https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Uttarakuru>

It is pretty clear Jambudvipa refers to India, before the Sarvastivadins got out of hand. They were competing with Jains and Hindus in the cosmology game.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, October 15th, 2013 at 3:56 AM

Title: Re: khyung chen mkha' lding of Sri Simha

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

No, I do not think so. The Tibetan is quite difficult and obscure in places.

Jikan said:

Thanks, Malcolm. You wouldn't know the text is so from the recent webcast on it, which has been absolutely lucid & accessible.

Malcolm wrote:

Rinpoche did not, and almost never does, literally translate the text. But of course he is lucid and accessible.

The text itself, however is not really not.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, October 15th, 2013 at 3:00 AM

Title: Re: khyung chen mkha' lding of Sri Simha

Content:

Jikan said:

Has this text been translated publicly in English?

thanks

Malcolm wrote:

No, I do not think so. The Tibetan is quite difficult and obscure in places.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, October 15th, 2013 at 12:11 AM

Title: Re: "Today I was enlightened"

Content:

Simon E. said:

And of course when and if he reads this it will confirm to him to his own satisfaction that he has transcended the outer form of Buddharma.

Malcolm wrote:

My guess is that he is an avid follower of Bud Dharma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, October 15th, 2013 at 12:09 AM

Title: Re: "Today I was enlightened"

Content:

Adamantine said:

I just don't understand why he is compelled to use the term "enlightenment", which at this point when using English in a spiritual context is a term associated with Nirvana.

Malcolm wrote:

No, not really.

Anyway, followers of Buddhadharma [The Dharma of the fully awakened one] should use the term "awakening" [bodhi, byang chub] and full awakening, which is what "Buddha" [sangs rvas] actually means. I.e. being fully [rgyas] awakened [sangs] from the slumber of ignorance.

The term enlightened is too broad to be meaningful in the context of Buddhadharma. Further, there is actually no term in all of Buddhadharma which corresponds to the English words "enlightened" or "spiritually illuminated".

But there is a term which corresponds to "waking up", "awakening" i.e. Buddha, bodhisattva, bodhi, and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, October 14th, 2013 at 10:27 PM

Title: Re: Kunrig - uprooting samsara

Content:

KonchokZoepa said:

can you use the sadhana in and of itself, is an "independent" practice to purify evil destinies, and do you need the lung and trid for it, or are these necessary?

Malcolm wrote:

You need the empowerment, the lung and the instruction.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, October 14th, 2013 at 9:13 PM

Title: Re: Kunrig - uprooting samsara

Content:

KonchokZoepa said:

Hi, i came across on vajrapublications this sadhana called Kunrig - uprooting samsara.

does anyone know what its about and that if you need lung for it and is it practiced in other than the drikung lineage and what are the origins of this sadhana.

thanks.

Malcolm wrote:

It is a sadhana for Sarvavidya related to the yoga tantra sarvadurgatiparishodana i.e. total purification of all evil destinies.

Sarvavidya is what some Kagyus, and the Sakyas and Gelugpas use for guiding people through the bardo. In Nyingma, one normally uses a practice connected with the peaceful and wrathful deities.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, October 13th, 2013 at 6:57 AM

Title: Re: does all smoking close the crown chakra

Content:

ClearblueSky said:

For example, smoking marijuana, though it doesn't have the negative chemicals of cigarettes, can still cause negative health consequences long term because you are inhaling burnt matter into your lungs.

Malcolm wrote:

For example? Which clinical studies are you citing? Oh, there aren't any since herb is illegal.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, October 13th, 2013 at 6:24 AM

Title: Re: Lama Ivo Kalushev of Bulgaria

Content:

disjointed said:

Malcolm. I would have never involved myself with that cult if Sakya Trizen, or anyone I contacted, had responded to my inquiries.

Sakya Trizen knew, Lama Migmar knew, but they didn't want to get their hands dirty.

Malcolm wrote:

Obviously you never asked me. I have always been forthright in my opinion about that situation in Miami.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, October 13th, 2013 at 4:47 AM

Title: Re: Lama Ivo Kalushev of Bulgaria

Content:

disjointed said:

Because now I can ask you, as a human, what makes you more qualified than your teachers and what makes you a worthy receptacle of terms as opposed to the other people in this forum.

Malcolm wrote:

You clearly have a lot of anger. It is misplaced and poorly expressed.

Honestly who gives two shits about what Ivo Kalushev is doing in Mexico? Hopefully, he is eating some nice tortillas, beans and rice, drinking mescal occasionally, and enjoying the diving.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, October 13th, 2013 at 4:30 AM

Title: Re: Lama Ivo Kalushev of Bulgaria

Content:

disjointed said:

KD, there is a fair amount of online information on the cult I mentioned now. Though Sakya Trizen still has not done ANYTHING to discredit it.

Malcolm wrote:

That is because Sakya Trizen never endorsed it, nor had anything to do with starting LR's fantasy to begin with.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, October 13th, 2013 at 4:21 AM

Title: Re: Lama Ivo Kalushev of Bulgaria

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

What group are you talking about?

Malcolm wrote:

He is talking about a guy in florida named Luis Riesgo.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, October 13th, 2013 at 3:52 AM

Title: Re: Lama Ivo Kalushev of Bulgaria

Content:

disjointed said:

Meanwhile, Sakya Trizen, like yourself Malcolm, did nothing to warn people about this cult using his name to validate itself, nor did he respond to people trying to verify the cult leader's claims.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, that is frankly false, as far as I am concerned. I warned many people.

But it is true I never waged a campaign against this person. That is not my job.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, October 13th, 2013 at 3:46 AM

Title: Re: Lama Ivo Kalushev of Bulgaria

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Basically, let me lay it out for you: Was anyone raped? Was any money embezzled? Was anyone deprived of their civil rights?

If the answer to those questions is no, then it is none of our business what these people or any one else is doing.

michaelb said:

Allegations of people being raped, having money embezzled and being deprived of their civil rights have been levelled against the most well known controversial 'Buddhist' groups in the west; NKT and Rigpa, for example.

I understand the caution not to turn into a Dharma cop and but if I was about to get involved with one of these groups I'd like to know about it and I'd hope Dharma practitioners on forums like this would have enough compassion to let me know before I stumbled into such a group.

Malcolm wrote:

- 1: formal religious veneration : worship
- 2: a system of religious beliefs and ritual; also : its body of adherents
- 3: a religion regarded as unorthodox or spurious; also : its body of adherents
- 4: a system for the cure of disease based on dogma set forth by its promulgator <health cults>

<http://www.merriam-webster.com/dictionary/cult>

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, October 13th, 2013 at 2:36 AM

Title: Re: Lama Ivo Kalushev of Bulgaria

Content:

disjointed said:

Malcolm.

Have you ever been the victim of a cult?

Malcolm wrote:

Have I ever been a victim of religion? No. I don't fit the profile. My egotism is much too strong.

Anyway, there are much worse things out there than tepid religious groups to get all concerned about.

Basically, let me lay it out for you: Was anyone raped? Was any money embezzled? Was anyone deprived of their civil rights?

If the answer to those questions is no, then it is none of our business what these people or any one else is doing.

Too many damn people feel like playing cop on the internet. It is a total waste of time.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, October 13th, 2013 at 2:03 AM

Title: Re: Lama Ivo Kalushev of Bulgaria

Content:

disjointed said:

Simon and Karma Dorje I have lived long enough to see cults form from innocent Buddhist groups I was involved with more than once, and many more times I have seen them turn from a distance and listened to the accounts of what transpired from students after they fall out of favor with the cult personality.

Malcolm wrote:

Wow, judge, jury and executioner.

Listen, we are talking about _religion_. All religions are cults by definition.

Just live and let live. If Ivo is the next Jim Jones, well, it is too early to tell, isn't it?

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, October 12th, 2013 at 9:52 PM

Title: Re: "Today I was enlightened"

Content:

disjointed said:

Simon. I presume you assume this Dzogchen teacher was well taught and fluent in the teachings of Dzogchen. He was not.

Malcolm wrote:

This person then was not a Dzogchen teacher, so your definition is flawed.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, October 12th, 2013 at 9:46 PM

Title: Re: Trees are sentient beings?

Content:

TheSpirit said:

I am not exactly sure what Buddhist consider sentient beings. However I am just curious if it is possible for trees to be consider a sentient beings in Buddhism? Is it possible for them to have a spiritual essence like we do?

Malcolm wrote:

In general, most writing in Buddhadharma includes plants as part of container universe.

Plants are recognized to be alive, but not sentient. The general thinking runs that plants have no [observable] sense organs, so they cannot be sentient.

There are some trends in East Asian Buddhism, however, as well as in Tibetan Buddhism (Dzogchen) that run counter to this commonly accepted notion of the nonsentience of plants.

Personally, I think plants exhibit sentient properties of various kinds. And because they use prāṇa, exhibit digestion, preferences, communicate Whatever sentience they have however is likely to be very different than the sentience we ascribe to creatures in the invertebrate/vertebrate phylums.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, October 10th, 2013 at 2:45 AM

Title: Re: does all smoking close the crown chakra

Content:

Karma Dorje said:

Why should we privilege 21st century narratives over any other? Demons and menstrual blood speak to me in ways that ethnobotany never will.

Malcolm wrote:

It is a very sexist myth which perpetuates the theme of the uncleanliness of the menstrual discharge of women. Having studied many myths of plants, I cannot remember a single one where male demonic seed is cast as responsible for the growth of a plant considered pernicious.

Also, tobacco is the religious plant par excellence of Native Americans, occupying a place similar to juniper in Tibetan culture for rites of cleansing [bsangs] and the removal of pollution.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, October 10th, 2013 at 1:51 AM

Title: Re: does all smoking close the crown chakra

Content:

KonchokZoepa said:

lol

nobody is answering my question here.

does anyone know if the ayurvedic herbal smokes close to crown chakra?, rendering phowa ineffective..

Malcolm wrote:

Should not be an issue.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, October 10th, 2013 at 1:51 AM

Title: Re: does all smoking close the crown chakra

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

On the other hand, the idea that tobacco springs from the menstrual blood of an evil demoness is a little silly since tobacco never existed in the old world until it was brought back from the new world by Europeans.

That being said, tobacco is pernicious if only for the fact that it takes up polonium 210 from the soil, rendering its smoke toxically radioactive, which is why for example, tobacco causes cancer but weed does not.

Jikan said:

Is it possible to read the text with the understanding that tobacco sprang from the menstrual blood of an evil demoness... without reference to geography or ethnobotany? That is, did the tertion really need to specify that tobacco is a North American noxious weed for his text to have value?

Malcolm wrote:

In 19th century Tibet, no. In 21st century America, yes. Moreover, tobacco, like any plant, has medicinal as well as other uses. To characterize it as a weed is wrong. A plant is only a weed when it is not wanted or not understood.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, October 10th, 2013 at 1:29 AM

Title: Re: does all smoking close the crown chakra

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

On the other hand, the idea that tobacco springs from the menstrual blood of an evil demoness is a little silly since tobacco never existed in the old world until it was brought back from the new world by Europeans.

That being said, tobacco is pernicious if only for the fact that it takes up polonium 210 from the soil, rendering its smoke toxically radioactive, which is why for example, tobacco causes cancer but weed does not.

Karma Dorje said:

Are you saying that evil demonesses do not live in the New World, or simply that they don't menstruate?

Malcolm wrote:

I am saying that the author of that terma clearly had no idea where tobacco came from originally.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, October 10th, 2013 at 1:22 AM

Title: Re: does all smoking close the crown chakra

Content:

KonchokZoepa said:

have you read about the terms that state that you will go to hell or lower realms because of smoking, are you afraid of this or do you think its something conquerable and not so solid fact?

Karma Dorje said:

I felt it definitely was negative for my health, and of course I was aware of Dudjom Rinpoche's statement on the effects of tobacco.

Malcolm wrote:

On the other hand, the idea that tobacco springs from the menstrual blood of an evil demoness is a little silly since tobacco never existed in the old world until it was brought back from the new world by Europeans.

That being said, tobacco is pernicious if only for the fact that it takes up polonium 210 from the soil, rendering its smoke toxically radioactive, which is why for example, tobacco causes cancer but weed does not.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, October 10th, 2013 at 1:10 AM

Title: Re: Guru yoga not Indian?

Content:

Matylda said:

Yeah Zhang Zhung... it was the closest. By still it was not Tibet in the sense of history, though they could pick up so much from previous kingdoms. It is just natural, that close nation, ethnically and in terms of language have some mutual exchange and influence... But I meant Tibet proper, not by whom it was influenced.

Malcolm wrote:

Zhang Zhung people were Tibetan. Zhang Zhung language is a dialect of Tibetan, and it is still spoken today.

Sherlock said:

AFAIK, this isn't what either ChNN or modern scholars say. Both agree that Zhang Zhung was related to Tibet but not quite the same.

Malcolm wrote:

The Zhang Zhung people were one of six tribes of Tibetans.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, October 9th, 2013 at 11:24 PM

Title: Re: Guru yoga not Indian?

Content:

Matylda said:

Yeah Zhang Zhung... it was the closest. By still it was not Tibet in the sense of history, though they could pick up so much from previous kingdoms. It is just natural, that close nation, ethnically and in terms of language have some mutual exchange and influence... But I meant Tibet proper, not by whom it was influenced.

Malcolm wrote:

Zhang Zhung people were Tibetan. Zhang Zhung language is a dialect of Tibetan, and it is still spoken today.

Matylda said:

But GY? was it really spread widely and accepted in India? Even in AYT texts? You mentioned only Hevajra, what about other AYT lineages in India?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes. Yes. I mentioned two traditions, Hevajra and Vajrayogini. For example, there are three gurusadhanas translated by a Vibhutipandita into Tibetan. Another text entitled gurumandalasamadana vidhi translated by one of three Dro Lotsawas ('bro lo ts'a ba) which describes a method of practicing the guru, he is invited in front, one makes offerings to him, praises, etc., exactly the way that guru yogas are done in the Tibetan tradition.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, October 9th, 2013 at 10:43 PM

Title: Re: Guru yoga not Indian?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Just who says Tibetans were poorly educated? They had writing, etc. prior to the 7th century.

Why? There were Chinese Monasteries in Lhasa. There were Indian monks, central Asian monks. Tibetans traded widely in India as well as China. And they were the bosses of Central Asia until the 840's and the Chinese economic crisis.

Matylda said:

Well, but how far the society was literate? Was it restricted to the court or some privileged groups what could be rather limited representation? And as for the seal, is one seal enough to prove wide spread written language, or was it just fancy property of the court? I have no idea if there is enough evidence of written language used by majority of Tibetans. In case of China written language was predominant in all parts of China already for ages. Yes military Tibet was very strong and occupied western parts of China, and Chinese missionaries were in Lhasa, however not only there, but in many countries outside of China. Including many monks who traveled to India since II century...

Tibet was in the VII and VIII century just entering the Buddhist way. In China it was predominant religion at that time with history of seven hundred years.

Malcolm wrote:

Tibetans had long term contact with India and Buddhists. They were surrounded by Buddhist countries for a thousand years. Buddhist yogis, as well as Hindu Yogis frequented the region around Kailash.

Zhang Zhung was a kingdom bordering India. Every evidence points to the fact that while Tibetans themselves may not have developed writing, their ethnic cousins, Zhangzhung people, had done so, and that Tibetans, in a sort of cultural fealty to Zhang Zhung, adopted their writing, customs, etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, October 9th, 2013 at 7:55 AM

Title: Re: Guru yoga not Indian?

Content:

smcj said:

Just who says Tibetans were poorly educated? They had writing, etc. prior to the 7th century.

They did? I thought written language was imported from India around then. You sure?

Any existing texts (presumably Bonpo) from that period?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, this is what western scholars would like people to believe. But this is based on an improper reading of what early Tibetan texts actually say about the issue. It is true that Thonmi Sambhota adapted Gupta script to the Tibetan language. But there is sufficient evidence that the court of Zhang Zhang was using writing during the reign of Srong btsan sgam po. We have for example Ligmincha's seal.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, October 9th, 2013 at 6:09 AM

Title: Re: Guru yoga not Indian?

Content:

Matylda said:

So when vajryana arrived in China, it had completely different background for development, also there were many more literati people to accommodate, study or practice compare to rather poorly educated Tibetan society at that time.

Malcolm wrote:

Just who says Tibetans were poorly educated? They had writing, etc. prior to the 7th century.

[/quote]

Anyway to compare state of Buddhism in China and Tibet in the mid of the VIII century is rather risky. Background of both was totally different.[/quote]

Why? There were Chinese Monasteries in Lhasa. There were Indian monks, central Asian monks. Tibetans traded widely in India as well as China. And they were the bosses of Central Asia until the 840's and the Chinese economic crisis.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, October 9th, 2013 at 12:25 AM

Title: Re: Guru yoga not Indian?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

But this is not true, and I already presented two texts which negate this idea -- which somehow you seem to ignore.

Indrajala said:

I think the key point here is the guru yoga that we now know.

Malcolm wrote:

What Guru yogas do you have in mind? As I pointed out, the basic bones of the practice was well-established in India.

The practice of turning historical teachers like Padmasambhava into objects of Guru Yoga I agree is a Tibetan innovation, but in terms of the skeleton of Guru Yoga, it is like I said. And further, in traditions like Sakya, they adhere principally to the Indian style of Guru yoga.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, October 9th, 2013 at 12:23 AM

Title: Re: Guru yoga not Indian?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The Dunhuang records indicate no such thing.

Indrajala said:

They don't indicate a strongly Buddhist culture by any means. Let me cite an immediate example that comes to mind:

Malcolm wrote:

By your post, you must think I am referring to the 7th century Tibet. But I am not. I am referring to 8th century Tibet, namely to the reign of Khri srong lde' bstan. No one disputes that Buddhism was not a presence in Tibet prior to the reign of Srong btsan sgam po.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, October 8th, 2013 at 11:46 PM

Title: Re: Guru yoga not Indian?

Content:

Indrajala said:

For one thing, the Dunhuang records indicate Tibet was hardly a Buddhist culture at the time, and the Chinese at the time didn't seem to know of that much Buddhism in Tibet throughout the Tang.

Malcolm wrote:

The Dunhuang records indicate no such thing.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, October 8th, 2013 at 11:44 PM

Title: Re: Guru yoga not Indian?

Content:

Indrajala said:

In any case, guru yoga as it is found in Tibet does not seem to have ever existed in East Asia, even in the last period of Vajrayāna transmission into China, which is noteworthy and supports Mayer's idea:

Clearly then, the guru yoga that we now know developed in Tibet, not in India.

Malcolm wrote:

But this is not true, and I already presented two texts which negate this idea -- which somehow you seem to ignore.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, October 8th, 2013 at 11:19 PM

Title: Re: Guru yoga not Indian?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Vajrayāna was introduced to China primarily by a single master.

Indrajala said:

You are mistaken. The three eminent early masters include Śubhakarasiṃha 善無畏

(637-735), Vajrabodhi (671-741) 金剛智 and Amoghavajra (705-774) 不空.

Malcolm wrote:

Note, I said primarily. These other two masters did not have the lasting influence Amoghavajra did.

Indrajala said:

The Chinese court, clergy and economy were in a better position than Tibet to provide the necessary institutions, crafts and so forth to facilitate the transmission of Vajrayāna.

It isn't all about dates.

Malcolm wrote:

Samye is a pretty sizable place. The Tibetans were the dominant power in Asia during the 8th century.

The main point however is that the kind of Vajrayāna practiced in Tibet in the late eight century was basically identical that practiced in China during the same time.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, October 8th, 2013 at 9:46 PM

Title: Re: Guru yoga not Indian?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

BTW, Jeff, you consistently say that Vajrayāna in China was "earlier" than that in Tibet. But this is not really true.

Indrajala said:

Tantric Buddhism was more systematically introduced into China before it was into Tibet it seems.

It seems the Chinese tradition preserved earlier developments more than the Tibetans did. This is the opinion of some Japanese scholars which classify Shingon/Zhenyan as 'middle period' esoteric Buddhism, while Tibetan is generally more associated with a 'later period'.

Malcolm wrote:

Vajrayāna was introduced to China primarily by a single master.

Vajrayāna was introduced some thirty years (or earlier) later into Tibet by a large number of masters. After all, Samye was completed by 779 at the latest on a Vajrayāna plan. This means that Padmasambhava was present in Tibet not later than 775. This is a mere 34 years after Amoghavajra returned from his travels in 746.

When we examine these claims purely on the basis of historical dates, the claim that Vajrayāna in China is significantly "earlier" than Tibetan Imperial period Vajrayāna seems to be vastly overstated. Further, the unrestricted translation of so called anuttarayoga texts in Tibet was actually forbidden by royal edict and the main practices of the imperial period at Samye were grounded in Tattvasamgraha and the Vajrasikhara, just as in China and in Japan (from 804 onwards). Practices such as Vajrakilaya, which do date to that period, were very secret and not public at all.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, October 8th, 2013 at 9:19 PM

Title: Re: Guru yoga not Indian?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The practice of making use of historical or quasi historical figures for Guru yoga is a Tibetan innovation. It seems in India, gurus were generally imagined in the form of one's devatā.

Konchog1 said:

So the Indians didn't visualize the lineage Gurus? Just their Guru?

Malcolm wrote:

In general, in many practices, the master of one's family meditated at the crown is one's guru, even in lower tantras.

BTW, Jeff, you consistently say that Vajrayāna in China was "earlier" than that in Tibet. But this is not really true.

Vajrayāna was brought to Tibet during the reign of khri srong lde'u btsan which lasted from 755 to 797 or 804 depending on whose account you follow. Amoghavajra only translated a portion of the Tattvasamgraha into Chinese in 754, though he translated a number of other texts. Considering that it is very likely that the yoga tantra, etc., we see comes from South India by way of Java and so on, both by tradition and by textual evidence, and the so called annutaryoga tantras such as Guhyasamaja are sited in Oḍḍiyāna from the start, this accounts for the very different characters of Tibetan and Chinese Vajrayāna traditions, not "earlier" and "later" since Guhyasamaja and so on were certainly in circulation by early 700's. Be that as it may, the main shrine in Samye was devoted to the Vajradhātu Maṇḍala pointing to the presence of Tattvasamgraha by 790 at the latest in Tibet.

sarvadurgatipariśodhanatejorājāyatathāgatasyārhatasamyaksambuddhasyakalpanāma, guhyasamaja, and so on are present in the ldan dkar catalogue pointing to its early presence in Tibet. Anyway, the Tattvasamgraha was never completely translated in Chinese until the 11th century, or perhaps the late tenth, around the same time it was translated into Tibetan.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, October 8th, 2013 at 8:47 PM

Title: Re: Guru yoga not Indian?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Jeff, you have to keep in mind that a lot of ritual procedures written by Tibetans were held in the memories of Indians practitioners since they are a deep cultural part of India.

Indrajala said:

Sure, but then we need to ask why tantric traditions in China never seemed to have had comparable practices (but correct me if I'm wrong).

Malcolm wrote:

I explained that -- Guru yoga, as well as mandala offerings, are quite specific to the annutarayoga tantra phase in India. These tantras were not imported to China in any systematic way.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, October 8th, 2013 at 8:42 PM

Title: Re: Indian Vajrayana

Content:

Khechara said:

Hello there. Well, I don't know him personally but from what I do know about him, he is far from being an 'ordinary syncretic Hindu'. The Vajrayana tradition which he belongs to is an old Nath lineage. I came across one of his short books, "In Search of Tantra: Vajrayana" on Scribd. This was published for an academic session on the subject a few years ago. I'd like to know what you discussed with him.

<http://www.scribd.com/doc/51812667/tantra-book-format-small>

Malcolm wrote:

This is basically a synthesis of Shaiva-agama with Mahāyāna Buddhism with a sprinkling of Vajrayāna thrown for good measure. A lot of talk of "god" and "self" there.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, October 8th, 2013 at 8:21 PM

Title: Re: Guru yoga not Indian?

Content:

smcj said:

Who's Lawapa?

Malcolm wrote:

Luipa, the first siddha to write down a Cakrasamvara sadhana. Also there is the Vajrayogini sadhana penned by Naropa which has a very clearly indicated guru yoga section.

Jeff, you have to keep in mind that a lot of ritual procedures written by Tibetans were held in the memories of Indians practitioners since they are a deep cultural part of India.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, October 7th, 2013 at 11:11 PM

Title: Re: Guru yoga not Indian?

Content:

Indrajala said:

I always thought it unusual how nothing comparable to Tibetan guru yoga seems to have existed in Chinese esoteric Buddhism (though correct me if I'm wrong), and attributed this perhaps to an earlier period of Indian tantra being transmitted into China. But if Mayer is correct, such guru yoga is a Tibetan innovation.

Malcolm wrote:

That entirely depends on what you mean by "innovation". Guru Yoga certainly exists in a few Indian sources. For example, a general outline of Guru Yoga as it is universally practiced today is provided in the Hevajrasya hastavyavagrāhakrama-nāma.

In general, Guru yoga is only an annutarayoga tantra practice.

The practice of making use of historical or quasi historical figures for Guru yoga is a Tibetan innovation. It seems in India, gurus were generally imagined in the form of one's devatā.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, October 7th, 2013 at 8:03 PM

Title: Re: Christian Influences in Modern Buddhism

Content:

Indrajala said:

I think this movement towards socially engaged Buddhism around the world is actually a result of Buddhists not really believing in saṃsāra any longer.

Malcolm wrote:

I would hesitate to agree with this. Instead I think that "Engaged Buddhism" largely is an offshoot of three things, Gandhi's Satyagraha, the civil rights and antiwar movements in the late sixties and early seventies.

Indrajala said:

It used to be seen as worthwhile to provide institutions and so forth for people to work towards liberation from saṃsāra, but nowadays such goals are not really seen as worthwhile in many circles. Buddhism has to justify its existence by providing liberation from worldly stress and pastoral care..

Malcolm wrote:

You mention Tibet -- but you seem to fail to recognize that the success or failure of Tibetan monasteries was entirely dependent on the perceived efficacy of lamas in a monastery and providing medical services and pastoral, a.k.a, religious services to the laity. Those in retreat were always a minority. Lay people in Tibet for the most part never concerned much with liberation, doing the usual merit dance of lay Buddhists everywhere. In fact, there is an entire literature devoted to excoriating Tibetans lay and ordained alike for their "non-belief" samsara aka engagement in eight worldly dharmas.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, October 6th, 2013 at 10:44 PM

Title: Re: blocking realization

Content:

duffster1 said:

I heard Chogyal Namkhai Noru Rinpoche say at the webcast today that everyone has the potential to realize rainbow body and then he said that one can block that potential and then one has no possibility of realizing it in this life?Is it possible to block one's possibility of having realization for their entire life?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes. It is called "having huge misconceptions about the teachings".

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, October 6th, 2013 at 9:20 PM

Title: Re: Lama Ivo Kalushev of Bulgaria

Content:

Alfredo said:

Trungpa

Malcolm wrote:

Frankly, you are flogging a dead horse. You aren't one of those one issue posters, are you? I hope to see more from you than "sexual misconduct", "Trungpa", "ethics", etc.

Otherwise, I am afraid I will find you quite boring.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, October 6th, 2013 at 9:18 PM

Title: Re: Lama Ivo Kalushev of Bulgaria

Content:

Alfredo said:

The same could be said of Mme Blavatsky.

Malcolm wrote:

The influence of the Theosophical Society on the early history of Buddhism in the West is indisputable, despite her many misconceptions about Tibetan Buddhism in particular.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, October 6th, 2013 at 7:55 PM

Title: Re: Lama Ivo Kalushev of Bulgaria

Content:

Alfredo said:

I readily admit that he is famous and influential. But in what way can he be said to have done "so much good"?

Malcolm wrote:

Hmmm, well, CTR's books have introduced literally millions of people to Buddhadharma for one...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, October 6th, 2013 at 7:06 AM

Title: Re: Lama Ivo Kalushev of Bulgaria

Content:

Alfredo said:

Malcolm wrote: Alfredo seems to think that Ivo needs to be called out as a fraud. No--not yet, anyway. I haven't seen anything to suggest that he's insincere, though it is possible that he is deluded, and many aspects of his teachings (and the group dynamics underlying them) do raise ethical concerns. Again, I would honestly appreciate additional information. For example, the anecdotes of the several people who have interacted with him in the past, and posted above, I find revealing.

Malcolm wrote:

You don't have better ways to spend your time?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, October 6th, 2013 at 3:52 AM

Title: Re: Lama Ivo Kalushev of Bulgaria

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Frankly, most of us who have been around for any length of time have come to the conclusion that trying to out unethical teachers doesn't work. Their students just cling tighter, and circle the wagons. For example, Mary Finnegan has been waging a war on Sogyal Rinpoche for more than twenty years. Is he any less successful? No. He is more successful than ever.

dzogchungpa said:

Is Sogyal an unethical teacher in your opinion?

Malcolm wrote:

If the reports are true...but I do not know that they are...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, October 6th, 2013 at 12:36 AM

Title: Re: Lama Ivo Kalushev of Bulgaria

Content:

Simon E. said:

As I said above others have the knowledge to read the nuances between the lines here than the degree of my knowledge allows..but we seem to have segued from general misgivings to association with well documented sexual predation ..is there evidence for that kind of abuse from 'Ivo ' ?

Have I missed something ?

Malcolm wrote:

Alfredo seems to think that Ivo needs to be called out at as a fraud. My own position is that whether Ivo is a fraud, deluded, or authentic does not matter to me in the slightest.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, October 5th, 2013 at 9:56 PM

Title: Re: Christian Influences in Modern Buddhism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Those deities were there from the start. But you can see Buddhist exclusivity rising in Indian Mahāyāna texts that define refuge, and so on.

Indrajala said:

Nevertheless, there is plenty of heterogenetic development to be discerned.

Malcolm wrote:

I see it as appropriation.

There are three modes of conversion in Buddhism:

Setting a good example (early Buddhism)

Charity (Middle Buddhism)

Subjugation through appropriation (Late Buddhism, esp. Vajrayāna).

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, October 5th, 2013 at 8:50 PM

Title: Re: Christian Influences in Modern Buddhism

Content:

Indrajala said:

It wasn't that exclusive when you consider how many Vedic deities were embraced. Just look at the art record alone with all the Hindu epics being splashed around temples.

Malcolm wrote:

Those deities were there from the start. But you can see Buddhist exclusivity rising in Indian Mahāyāna texts that define refuge, and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, October 5th, 2013 at 8:07 PM

Title: Re: Christian Influences in Modern Buddhism

Content:

Indrajala said:

There's a few more aspects I'd like to discuss:

- The view that the Pali canon best represents an original Buddhism via a historical Buddha, and that this is worth adhering to as a pure or authentic Buddhism (getting to the "true teachings" of the Buddha, not unlike getting to the original teachings of Christ).

Malcolm wrote:

Mostly an issue for Theravadins.

-

Indrajala said:

The new exclusive nature of Buddhism, whereby self-identifying Buddhists are actively discouraged from participating in non-Buddhist religious activities.

Malcolm wrote:

False, Tibetan Buddhism has been very exclusionary from the beginning. It has to do with how refuge is defined in late Indian texts.

Indrajala said:

- In some modern Buddhist traditions a distaste for rituals, 'superfluous iconography' and archaic liturgy (Protestant influences).

Malcolm wrote:

Some truth in this.

-

Indrajala said:

In some traditions, centralized administrations with a key figurehead and his or her elites in charge of all major decisions and policies with underlings expected to show obedience (Catholic influences).

Malcolm wrote:

Represents a total misunderstanding of the nature of Tibetan Buddhism, both here and in Tibet.

Indrajala said:

I think the most pertinent influence from Christianity has quite possibly been the second on the list: the new Buddhist self-identity where exclusivity is now seen as important and worth emphasizing. Of course in the past "Buddhists" existed, but as we know even today were often readily able and willing to participate in all manner of other practices and ideologies, and even incorporate them. Christian-like exclusivity for Buddhists is probably a fairly new development in most cultures.

Malcolm wrote:

No, I don't think so. I imagine you can find the roots of Buddhist exclusivity in the post-Gupta environment, actually.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, October 5th, 2013 at 8:04 PM

Title: Re: Lama Ivo Kalushev of Bulgaria

Content:

Alfredo said:

The notion that it is enough to focus on our own teachers, and ignore the wider ethical problems plaguing Tibetan Buddhism (or Buddhism in general), to me shows a lack of spiritual responsibility.

Malcolm wrote:

So what do you suggest? Frankly, most of us who have been around for any length of time have come to the conclusion that trying to out unethical teachers doesn't work. Their students just cling tighter, and circle the wagons. For example, Mary Finnegan has been waging a war on Sogyal Rinpoche for more than twenty years. Is he any less successful? No. He is more successful than ever.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, October 5th, 2013 at 7:07 AM

Title: Re: Lama Ivo Kalushev of Bulgaria

Content:

Alfredo said:

But some of his practices can be practiced now, without going to Mexico. Besides, where exactly do you think "here" is?

Lama Ivo has already told his side of the story in some detail on his website, so before asking him to comment, it might be better to read that first. I was actually hoping to learn what other people say about him, in the hopes that that would prove revealing.

So far my impression (from reading his website) has been mixed. On one hand, he seems serious, intense, and knowledgeable. I can hardly fault him for being a Westerner, or an iconoclast. On the other, he has obviously groomed his followers to obey him with some intensity, even when he guides them in unexpected directions. This model of guru-dom is one which I wish could be reformed out of Vajrayana, not simply universalized to make it less Tibetan. But then, I am an unenlightened wretch, so what do I know?

Malcolm wrote:

I read it.

Who cares? Unless you are interested in being his student, of what concern is it to you?

After all this nonsense about Ngagpa Chogyam, Roach, etc., if I have learned anything at all, people are going to believe whatever the hell they want no matter what anyone else says.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, October 5th, 2013 at 6:43 AM

Title: Re: Lama Ivo Kalushev of Bulgaria

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Honestly, who cares? No one here is going to run off to Mexico to become a student of Ivo's or practice these things. Best to let it alone.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, October 3rd, 2013 at 10:19 PM

Title: Re: Lama Ivo Kalushev of Bulgaria

Content:

Alfredo said:

Is anybody familiar with Lama Ivo? He is a Bulgarian with a Nyingma background, who in some sense broke away from this tradition a few years ago when he received/created a cycle of treasure-texts. His center is located in Mexico:

michaelb said:

Ivo used to be on e-sangha under a few user names.

Malcolm wrote:

Who?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, October 1st, 2013 at 12:36 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

anjali said:

Yes, the knowing quality of the mind is fundamentally empty. As far as I know, no one is saying otherwise. However, this doesn't preclude the possibility self-reflexive knowing. This is why, in a reply to daverupa, I noted that we need to be clear on the distinction between self-reflexive knowing and self-grasping. Self-knowing is just that, knowing that knows itself. Nothing more. Relative to the trikaya model, it is only the ignorance of self-grasping that imputes a substantial (instead of empty), isolated (instead of unified with it's radiance) self-knowing.

Astus said:

We know that we are sentient beings simply because we sense things and we are aware of this process. This is self-awareness. Would you call this knowing that knows itself? If so, this is not a problematic idea at all. Only if you suppose some independent knowing that knows itself is there a problem.

Malcolm wrote:

what do you mean by independent knowing?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 30th, 2013 at 6:11 AM

Title: Re: Illuminating Quotes by Malcolm Namdrol-la

Content:

WuMing said:

There is no afterlife, just one long bardo that begins with delusion and ends with awakening.

taken from

<https://www.dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=36&t=14140&view=unread&sid=85d265cd34a332ed0dc45b71dd878f6b#unread>

gad rgyangs said:

I like that one too. I've never seen it put quite that way before.

Malcolm wrote:

Can't take credit for it, it comes from Nyi ma 'bum, 11th century.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 30th, 2013 at 5:25 AM

Title: Re: Jetsun Taranatha

Content:

smcj said:

Well, that's certainly not mentioned in the Kagyu histories!

Malcolm wrote:

Not only that, but they exist in Sakya Lam 'bras as well.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 30th, 2013 at 5:14 AM

Title: Re: Jetsun Taranatha

Content:

smcj said:

Taking this thread even farther afield: Marpa's son is an adept so he transfers consciousness to another body.

This practice, which we still have the sadhana for, evidently caused a lot of problems. So it was decided to allow the practice to die out. No empowerment was given to the next generation, so the practice became inert, dead. You can get the text, and do the sadhana, but since there is no lineage empowerment available, you'd just be wasting your time. Nobody today can make it work anymore.

Malcolm wrote:

grong 'jug practices still exist in Nyingma with uninterrupted transmissions.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 30th, 2013 at 3:12 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

smcj said:

Presumably you mean a buddha's self-knowing is not self-reflexive, in that mind cannot take itself as its own object. Mind would have to take a 'step back' in order to see itself, thereby setting up an infinite regression. It must somehow know itself without taking itself as an object, correct?

Malcolm wrote:

The buddhas self-knowing is precisely self-reflexive.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 30th, 2013 at 12:35 AM

Title: Re: Music time

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

```
if (typeof bbmedia == 'undefined') { bbmedia = true; var e = document.createElement('script'); e.async = true; e.src = 'bbmedia.js'; var s = document.getElementsByTagName('script')[0]; s.parentNode.insertBefore(e, s); } https://phpbbex.com/ [video]
```

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 30th, 2013 at 12:05 AM

Title: Re: Longde Teachings

Content:

Fa Dao said:

Ok then..thanks Malcolm..so its the entire initiation that is required not just the lung.
Got it. Interesting how these things work. Sometimes all you need is just to hear Rinpoche say a mantra etc and other times you need an entire initiation. Wish there was a guideline book out there for all of these things or even have it posted on the website what exactly is required for each thing that Rinpoche teaches...sure would be helpful...

Malcolm wrote:

Correct, a lung does not have direct introduction. And typically, Rinpoche is a stickler for transmitting things he received in the manner in which he received them.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, September 29th, 2013 at 11:29 PM

Title: Re: Longde Teachings

Content:

Fa Dao said:

ok then, so if it isnt the AOM/Ngondzog Gyalpo lung then I wonder what does exactly constitute transmission for Longde?

Malcolm wrote:

The Ngondzog Gyalpo initiation.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, September 29th, 2013 at 8:12 PM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

oushi said:

This is precisely how it is described in prajnaparamita for example.

Malcolm wrote:

Sorry, but no.

oushi said:

Your "arguments" are not convincing...

Perfection of wisdom in 8000 lines, chapter XII.

Malcolm wrote:

Abhisamaya alaṃkāra, the whole book, which explains the hidden meaning of the PP sūtras, including the scope and content of the two kinds of omniscience.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, September 29th, 2013 at 8:36 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Sherab said:

By definition, conditioned and unconditioned are mutually exclusive.

Malcolm wrote:

By definition they are mutually unintelligible without the other.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, September 29th, 2013 at 8:34 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

oushi said:

This is precisely how it is described in prajnaparamita for example.

Malcolm wrote:

Sorry, but no.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, September 29th, 2013 at 4:08 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Omniscience is irreversible, that is why your statement is trivial and untrue.

oushi said:

All-knowing is always available since it is present through unknowability of all dharmas.

Because dharmas are imperceptible, omniscience is free from knowing.

Simply speaking, there is nothing that can be known.

Malcolm wrote:

Umm, that is really not how omniscience is described, you are entitled to whatever you like to think.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, September 29th, 2013 at 3:29 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

oushi said:

That which is know, can also be unknown, thus it is not ultimate.

Malcolm wrote:

Trivial and untrue.

oushi said:

I thought you can do better than that. It is very simple, thus difficult to refute. Probably that's why you went straight to trivializing it. Knowing cannot be ultimate simply because it can be unknown.

Malcolm wrote:

Omniscience is irreversible, that is why your statement is trivial and untrue.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, September 29th, 2013 at 3:16 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

When you have relinquished all traces for rebirth, automatically the twelve āyatanas will cease at the break up of the body. This is classic "hināyāna" nirvana. Peter Harvey's books suggests that after the eradication of affliction there is a tiny shred of evidence in the Nikayas that Buddha suggests that there is a which vinnana/vijñāna survives in a now unconditioned state (i.e. a state unconditioned by affliction) and that this is nirvana intended by the Buddha. He nevertheless insists that this continuum is not to be referred to as a self, and that Buddha would find it inappropriate to do so.

Koji said:

There is also that odd ayantana:

There is, monks, that ayantana wherein there is neither earth, nor water, nor fire, nor air ... and so on. (Udana VIII, i).

And speaking of Peter and the attâ:

"As will be shown below, though, the early sources used by the Theravâda are bereft of any such explicit denial. The idea that Buddhism, 'denies the self', though, has become a commonplace of Religious Studies" (Peter Harvey, The Selfless Mind, p. 7).

Malcolm wrote:

Correct, but you have to read the last chapter, where he gives his conclusion. It all basically boils down to what Nāgārjuna says, sometimes Buddha said self, sometimes he said not self, and one needs to understand the context. When the self is used as prajñāpti, a designation, then this is acceptable. When trying to discern the nature of things, it is not acceptable.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, September 29th, 2013 at 2:40 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

oushi said:

That which is know, can also be unknown, thus it is not ultimate.

Malcolm wrote:

Trivial and untrue.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, September 29th, 2013 at 2:15 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Astus said:

So, when you say that knowing knows itself, emptiness and radiance, that is actually the Huayan model. Although logically to say that knowing includes (knows) knowing is nothing but stating that knowing is knowing.

anjali said:

The question on the table is whether the knowing quality of the mind can turn back on itself (self-reflexive knowing)? To hijack a zen phrase, is it possible to "turn the light and illuminate back?" From the perspective of self-reflexive knowing, this can be interpreted as taking the light of one's awareness and turning it back on itself. There are folks who say this can be done, and describe it as a singular experience.

Malcolm wrote:

The omniscience of the a buddha is self-knowing, as I mentioned before.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, September 29th, 2013 at 12:24 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Koji said:

But religion can also be this: "All religion expresses itself in such an awareness of something outside and beyond nature." ~ Schleiermacher

Malcolm wrote:

As I said, smoke and mirrors. Pabulum to feed the confused and ignorant. As the Buddha pointed out, there is nothing outside of the twelve āyatanas.

Koji said:

Correct, there is nothing outside of the twelve āyatanas like another twelve āyatanas, or like another sabba beyond the first sabba. At SN 35:23 we learn that the sabba is the 12 ayatana. At SN 35:24 the Buddha teaches us the Dhamma for abandoning sabba (sabbappahānāya). At SN 35:28 we learn the sabba is burning. Seeing thus the Ariyasāvaka experiences a revulsion towards the 12 ayatana after which he is liberated.

Malcolm wrote:

When you have relinquished all traces for rebirth, automatically the twelve āyatanas will cease at the break up of the body. This is classic "hināyāna" nirvana. Peter Harvey's books suggests that after the eradication of affliction there is a tiny shred of evidence in the Nikayas that Buddha suggests that there is a which vinnana/vijñāna survives in a now unconditioned state (i.e. a state unconditioned by affliction) and that this is nirvana intended by the Buddha. He nevertheless insists that this continuum is not to be referred to as a self, and that Buddha would find it inappropriate to do so.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 28th, 2013 at 11:44 PM

Title: Re: Bodhidharma's Courtesan

Content:

Indrajala said:

It seems the real successor to Bodhidharma was someone other than what the official records tell us.

Any thoughts?

Malcolm wrote:

He's pretty short in the picture.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 28th, 2013 at 10:29 PM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Koji said:

But religion can also be this: "All religion expresses itself in such an awareness of something outside and beyond nature." ~ Schleiermacher

Malcolm wrote:

As I said, smoke and mirrors. Pablum to feed the confused and ignorant. As the Buddha pointed out, there is nothing outside of the twelve āyatana.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 28th, 2013 at 10:07 PM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The question is, why would anyone believe your testimony.

Koji said:

You need a NPOV on the matter.

Malcolm wrote:

This is religion, baby, it is all just smoke and mirrors.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 28th, 2013 at 8:48 PM

Title: Re: I have some proof here that there's no afterlife

Content:

gandy said:

so how does buddhism reconcile with this?

Malcolm wrote:

There is no afterlife, just one long bardo that begins with delusion and ends with awakening.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 28th, 2013 at 8:44 PM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Astus said:

In the internalised trikaya model, as you said, the three are explained separately but they are not actually three different things. There are a number of ways to explain that. The simplest is the statement of the third "kaya" that emptiness and clarity are inseparable; here it is understood that clarity includes all appearances, it is dependent origination.

Malcolm wrote:

This is in line with Mahāmudra schools like Kagyu and Sakya's take on things. But rang bzhin gsal ba which is the sambhogakāya in Dzogchen teachings is definitely not all appearances and is not dependent origination.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 28th, 2013 at 8:40 PM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

conebeckham said:

This leads to the question: for those who feel they have "had an experience" or "experienced" Wisdom or Buddhamind or whatnot, and have somehow consequently conceptualized that experience as a sort of "Self," is that "experience" really the experience of Wisdom that is talked about in Sutra, Tantra, and Upadesha? Or is it a mistaken experience?

Koji said:

Let's say I had the experience of attaining nirvana whose self-nature (svabhāva) is that of being unconditioned and, moreover, my attainment is incapable of being conceptualized. How can I be refuted? In fact, there is no way I can be refuted.

Malcolm wrote:

The question is, why would anyone believe your testimony.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 28th, 2013 at 8:36 PM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Astus said:

When there is no "internal stimulus", it means there is no mental movement, no mental phenomena. And that means unconsciousness, mindlessness.

jeeprs said:

Why then is there significance given to dhyana states such as the 'immaterial dhyanas'? Do you think when yogis are in those states they are simply inert? Might they as well be asleep? The way I would understand it, this is what is implied by 'passing beyond duality', but it is not simply 'unconsciousness'. It is consciousness without the sense of there being an observer. "Contentless consciousness" is one description I have read.

Malcolm wrote:

Those yogis are governed by the concept that propells them into that formless āyatana.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 28th, 2013 at 8:35 PM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Sherab said:

But you did not comment on this:

And since, in a non-dual state, the experiencer is the experienced, the experiencer must also be an illusion. So we could all be merely part of a computer simulation such as The Matrix and the Buddha is part of that as well. Or the Hindu belief that we are all the dream of the God Brahma is correct and Buddha is also part of the dream.

And that would be a problem.

The fact that you did not comment on the above is to me, a reflection of the difficulty of avoiding the extremes of unconditioned and conditioned, and by extension the extreme position of the other mutually exclusive pairs such as permanent and impermanent, existence and non-existence etc. by using those very words, ie. words such as conditioned and unconditioned etc.

Malcolm wrote:

It depends on what you mean by nondual. There are three kinds of non dualism. One is cognitive non dualism, i.e., everything is consciousness, for, like example Yogacara. The second is ontological nondualism, i.e. everything is brahman, god, etc. The third is epistemic nondualism, i.e., being, non-being and so on cannot be found on analysis and therefore do not ultimately exist.

The indivisibility of the conditioned and the unconditioned is based on the third. We have only experience of conditioned phenomena. Unconditioned phenomena like space are known purely through inference since they have no characteristics of their own to speak of. When we analyze phenomena, what do we discover? We discover suchness, an unconditioned state, the state free from extremes. That unconditioned state cannot be discovered apart from conditioned phenomena, therefore, we can say with confidence that the conditioned and the unconditioned are nondual. The trick is which version of nonduality you are invoking. This nonduality of the conditioned and unconditioned cannot apply to the first two nondualities for various reasons.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 28th, 2013 at 5:48 AM

Title: Re: what is a melong?

Content:

Jikan said:

Thanks to all for the helpful responses. quick follow-up on Dzogchen Community specific applications of the melong:

Have there been design changes in the DC-made melongs? The new ones have the Longsal symbol on the back, while I think I remember seeing some with a different design on the back (with the six syllables around the edge if memory serves). Is there a difference in function for each of these, or does the change in design reflect different considerations? or am I completely mistaken?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, there are three versions. The oldest version that has a triangle with a bliss swirl in the center. The version which has been in service since early ninties that has the syllables of the six lokas as well as a the longsal symbol, and the smaller version that has only the longsal symbol.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 28th, 2013 at 5:45 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The essence of the mind cannot be different than mind, otherwise it would not be the essence of the mind. It would be like suggesting that fire and the nature of fire [heat] were distinct.

dzogchungpa said:

This essence of the mind is the same as what they call the basis of the individual in Dzogchen?
bump

Malcolm wrote:

Not really.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 28th, 2013 at 4:38 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Koji said:

I am just wondering, but how does one personally know "there is just experience"? Of course we all know that anyone can imagine such as state but what the imagination concocts doesn't mean it is either real or attainable.

Astus said:

If there is something that is not an experience you don't experience it, consequently you don't know anything about it. What is not an experience is nothing more than a presumption, a hypothesis, a fantasy, an idea.

Koji said:

When you said ealier: There is neither an experienter nor an experienced, there is just experience, and even that is empty, does this pertain to "a presumption, a hypothesis, a fantasy, an idea"?

Malcolm wrote:

The emptiness of things is even something you assent to, Ardent.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 28th, 2013 at 3:48 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Son of Buddha said:

So this is not the views and tenet system you claimed to not have?

Malcolm wrote:

The essence of the mind is not something you need to analyze to discover. When you have discovered you do not need a theory to account for it, no more than you need a theory to account for the heat of a fire once you have been burned.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 28th, 2013 at 3:47 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Son of Buddha said:

I guess you think there is a Self too since you also think that Buddhahood is not an aggregate.

Malcolm wrote:

Buddhahood is merely the realization of the nature of phenomena, that is all.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 28th, 2013 at 2:21 AM

Title: Re: Longde Teachings

Content:

oldbob said:

For me, it is enough that people have a pointing out instruction on the nature of mind, and then remember that everything is included in the infinite potentiality of nature of mind.

Sönam said:

This is also what ChNN says ... integration.

Sönam

Malcolm wrote:

Right, but the question is what is required to practice the methods of Long sde.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 28th, 2013 at 1:45 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

conebeckham said:

Agreed....though we can discuss the differences between Thamal Gyi She Pa, so-called "Ordinary Mind," and discursive thinking, etc....these are terms of art, I think. Ultimately, there is only one thing...but it ain't a Self.

Malcolm wrote:

According to Yangongpa, the term tha mal gyi shes pa is just a yogis term for wisdom (ye shes). He mentions this in his commentary on Sahaja Mahāmudra.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 28th, 2013 at 1:27 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

I never said that Buddhahood was an aggregate, I cited a sūtra that states quite unequivocally that buddhahood is to be sought in one's mind, and not elsewhere.

conebeckham said:

Agreed. Mind is an aggregate, that should be obvious to anyone with a handful of Dharma study. And it should also be obvious to all that Buddhahood should be sought "in one's mind."

But Buddhahood is not "mind." It is related to Nature of Mind, which is different from Mind. Put another way, we must use "mind" to identify Nature of Mind.....that is the first step. But equating Nature of Mind with a "Great Self" is a slippery slope....expedient means, maybe, for some.

Malcolm wrote:

The essence of the mind cannot be different than mind, otherwise it would not be the essence of the mind. It would be like suggesting that fire and the nature of fire [heat] were distinct.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 28th, 2013 at 12:42 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Son of Buddha said:

Do you consider the Mind to be an Aggregate?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, of course it is an aggregate: manas, vijñāna and citta are all synonyms.

Son of Buddha said:

then as the sutras and suttas I quoted state Buddhahood is not an Aggregate so do you take Buddhahood to be an Aggregate even though the suttas/sutras say it is not?

Malcolm wrote:

I never said that Buddhahood was an aggregate, I cited a sūtra that states quite unequivocally that buddhahood is to be sought in one's mind, and not elsewhere.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 28th, 2013 at 12:41 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Son of Buddha said:

you represent the tenet system called Dzogchen.....hence why it has a label for which to label itself and its followers.

Malcolm wrote:

Dzogchen is not a tenet system.

Son of Buddha said:

sure it is do you receive a teaching in Dzogchen from a teacher?

what is his teachings to you???

Malcolm wrote:

Dzogchen is one's state which can be discovered. It is not something about which one needs to speculate and analyze.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 28th, 2013 at 12:22 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Son of Buddha said:

Do you consider the Mind to be an Aggregate?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, of course it is an aggregate: manas, vijñāna and citta are all synonyms.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 28th, 2013 at 12:16 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Son of Buddha said:

you represent the tenet system called Dzogchen.....hence why it has a label for which to label itself and its followers.

Malcolm wrote:

Dzogchen is not a tenet system.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 27th, 2013 at 11:28 PM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Son of Buddha said:

(P.S. when did I say Buddhahood lies outside the mind?)

Malcolm wrote:

When you said that your truly existent self lies outside of the aggregates, and that that is buddhahood.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 27th, 2013 at 10:35 PM

Title: Re: 13 Precious Drikung Kagyu Empowerments

Content:

heart said:

I really think you have to watch this live if you really want the empowerment. Recordings are no good.

/magnus

Karma Dorje said:

Magnus is right, the dharmakaya only pervades everything during the empowerment. The rest of the time you are SOL.

Malcolm wrote:

If people have faith in this, then fine. I don't personally believe one can receive a valid empowerment though a recording. But that is just me following the advice of my guru. Your mileage might vary.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 27th, 2013 at 10:11 PM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Son of Buddha said:

I represent one view you represent another view.....hence a living example of your duality.

Malcolm wrote:

I don't represent a view or a tenet system. But when I examine what is stated in Buddhist texts, I do not see your view of them to be a very accurate picture.

For example, The Aryātajñāna-nāma-mahāyāna-sūtra claims: The mind is realized; since it is wisdom one should meditate on the idea of not seeking buddhahood elsewhere.

The tenet system of you, Ardent, Vidyārāja, etc., is too seek a buddhahood that lies outside of the mind, the opposite of this.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 27th, 2013 at 10:09 PM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Son of Buddha said:

as did all the Tantras and Sutras err in doing the same thing.

Malcolm wrote:

The sūtras and tantras do not make that error at all.

As Kamalaśīla points out in his commentary on the Vajracchedika sūtra, "While the Tathāgata cannot be seen because by perfect marks, nevertheless, he can be seen through ultimate dharmatā."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 27th, 2013 at 9:40 PM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Son of Buddha said:

No-self is not a thing, it is a statement that something is without self, that is, a permanent identity. Self, on the other hand, is the concept that there is a permanent identity.

Malcolm wrote:

You're completely ensnared into a dualism vis a vie self and no self.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 27th, 2013 at 9:35 PM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Sherab said:

Actually I was trying to make the point that the conclusion is not that simple.

Malcolm wrote:

It's pretty simple.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 27th, 2013 at 9:04 PM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Sherab said:

That would simply mean that there is no conditioned, no compounded, no born, no transcended. And that would simply mean that all that is experienced is nothing but an illusion, a hallucination.

Malcolm wrote:

Correct.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 27th, 2013 at 9:02 PM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The core of the conditioned is unconditioned.

Sherab said:

So the core of the compounded is uncompounded, the core of the born is unborn, the core of the transcended is untranscended?

Malcolm wrote:

I agree.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 27th, 2013 at 6:19 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

conebeckham said:

It doesn't operate through the mental consciousness, either, if I recall, as that is transformed into a wisdom....??

Malcolm wrote:

Sense organs means all six.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 27th, 2013 at 6:06 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, if you are a follower of Madhyamaka.

Astus said:

I don't see how an independent awareness could fit into... Yogacara either.

Malcolm wrote:

There exists a detailed defense of reflexive cognition in Ratnakarashanti's Madhyamakālaṃkāra, not to mention the fact that epistemologists like Dharmakīrti extensively advance the idea.

Further in secret mantra it is stated that the wisdom of a tathāgata is a reflexive cognition, not only is it a reflexive cognition but it does not operate through sense organs.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 27th, 2013 at 3:57 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Astus said:

A knowing/awareness cannot be experienced - only assumed - existing in and of itself. There is always something known, there is always a content of awareness.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, if you are a follower of Madhyamaka.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 27th, 2013 at 3:34 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

conebeckham said:

Indeed, Anjali, this is my understanding as well. I try to be a good Kagyupa, myself....

Per 3rd Karmapa's Mahamudra prayer, Mind does not "exist." But Mind cannot be said to be "nonexistent." This is Tantra, but let's forget that distinction for the moment. I think you can find plenty of Sutra and Shastra sources regarding Mind, or perhaps Mere Awareness. Consciousness at it's most basic level. A "Knowing."

I think this is the sort of thing that some folks equate with the "Great Self," though my readings thus far have made it clear to me that using "self" is a bit of a misnomer, and leads to a variety of problems, many of which are outlined here on this thread.

Malcolm wrote:

This is because the term bdag nyid chen po has a different connotation than those people who merely blindly translate things literally.

The term is carefully explained by Nubchen Sangye Yeshe to mean that all phenomena are included in the state of Samantabhadra. This then is the meaning of mahātman, bdag nyid chen po, in Dzogchen teachings in general.

In general, the way the term is used in sutras and tantras is as a title, i.e., "great persons", mahātmās.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 27th, 2013 at 2:55 AM

Title: Re: when and where ? Chöd wang and lung

Content:

akatararyo said:

It is my understanding that the Chod from the Dudjom Tersar does not require empowerment to practice since there is no self-generation and T'hroma is visualized above your head.

Malcolm wrote:

You are going to find a lot of disagreement about that.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 27th, 2013 at 2:51 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

I was not saying that shes rig becomes in the sense of arising. Merely that it becomes conditioned when it becomes involved in object imputation. The notion that shes rig is momentary depends on the conventional status of mind moments. Now granted, Sakya Pandita argues that timeless moments are immune to Madhyamaka reasonings, which according to him only apply to moments with temporal phases. This becomes very similar to the idea that shes rig is unconditioned because timeless moments would themselves be unconditioned with no possibility of any intervals between their instantiation. Of course we are then left with the quandary of what do to with timeless times. Sometimes in the Dzogchen texts you see reference to a fourth time, which is a state beyond the three times, past, present and future.

dzogchungpa said:

Well, this brings up a subject I've wanted to ask about for a long time, namely the nature of time in Buddhism generally, and Dzogchen in particular. It seems to me that a lot of what underlies the kind of argument you see in this thread is that we don't really understand what time is. Does Dzogchen have something distinctive to say about time?

Malcolm wrote:

Not really, time is not established of Nāgārjuna.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 27th, 2013 at 2:48 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Parochialism in the West

Content:

Indrajala said:

In East Asia there was monasticism, sure, but it was quite different from the prescribed Indian model. Not quite "lay" but not really in line with the Vinaya either.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, a major difference too was that in Tibet there was already a strong ritualist class that took to the imported Indian rituals like ducks to water. These ritualists performed vital economic functions in the Tibetan economy such as warding off rain, hail, ensuring harvests and calves, etc., exorcising spirits connected with contagious illnesses, herbalism and so on. On the other hand, Monastics in Tibet had little to offer the lay population, since their main function was conducting state rites just like the kind of early Vajrayāna we see about the same time in Japan and China. When the monastic establishment failed in Central Tibet in the 840's, during the Asian economic downturn of the late Tang, the Buddhist ritualists in Tibet continued to provide valued services to the local populations. It was only after the monastic establishment began to integrate these local services and allied themselves with the aristocratic families like the Khon during the 11th century and so on that the populace really began to lend wholesale support to monastic establishment.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 27th, 2013 at 2:29 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

In other words, shes rig is unconditioned and timeless because time and conditions are not established in any way, but the fact of knowing awareness is indisputable, becoming conditioned only when it becomes entangled in dualistic cognitions.

dzogchungpa said:

I find statements like these very confusing. "When" would something timeless "become" at all?

Malcolm wrote:

I was not saying that shes rig becomes in the sense of arising. Merely that it becomes conditioned when it becomes involved in object imputation. The notion that shes rig is momentary depends on the conventional status of mind moments. Now granted, Sakya Pandita argues that timeless moments are immune to Madhyamaka reasonings, which according to him only apply to moments with temporal phases. This becomes very similar to the idea that shes rig is unconditioned because timeless moments would themselves be unconditioned with no possibility of any intervals between their instantiation. Of course we are then left with the quandary of what to do with timeless times. Sometimes in the Dzogchen texts you see reference to a fourth time, which is a state beyond the three times, past, present and future.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 27th, 2013 at 2:02 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Sherab said:

If no, then what is your definition of "unconditioned" and "conditioned"?

Malcolm wrote:

I just stated at the outset that the conditioned and the unconditioned are not mutually exclusive.

The unconditioned and the conditioned, as I have already stated, are neither the same nor different.

The nature of the conditioned is non-arising. Whatever does not arise is unconditioned. Non-arising, unconditioned, suchness, etc., are all synonyms.

This is why Manjushri says "Whatever is dependently originated does not truly arise."

The core of the conditioned is unconditioned.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 27th, 2013 at 1:24 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Astus said:

“Nonabiding is without any fundamental [basis]. Mañjuśrī, all dharmas are established on the fundamental [basis] of nonabiding.”[/i] (Vimalakirti Sutra, ch 7, p 126-127; tr. McRae)

Sherab said:

Understanding this is not as easy as it looks.

Malcolm wrote:

It just means that the "unconditioned and the conditioned" are in a nondual state.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 27th, 2013 at 1:23 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Sherab said:

If emptiness is equated with dependent origination, then if emptiness is unconditioned, dependent origination must also be unconditioned. If dependent origination is unconditioned, then causality must also be unconditioned. In other words, there is no cause for causality, which is a contradiction in terms.

Malcolm wrote:

Emptiness is the nature of that which is dependently originated, that's all. What is the dependently originated empty of? All extremes. That emptiness is unconditioned. That emptiness is suchness. Suchness, by every definition is unconditioned. This being the case, as I said, the conditioned and the unconditioned are not mutually exclusive since the conditioned has an unconditioned nature.

The Samdhinirmocana has a nice explanation of how dharma and dharmatā are neither the same nor different.

M

conebeckham said:

But what about Bare Awareness? Im not speaking of "mind," as in consciousness, mindstream, but of the very awareness itself....it is taught, is it not, that this is unconditioned? It is also taught that it is "empty."

Malcolm wrote:

There are two ways this can be sliced: the first way, the Sakya approach, is to assert that knowing awareness (shes rig) is relative and momentary, its emptiness is ultimate, and that the two are inseparable.

The second way to slice this is that time is predicated on objects (cf Vasubandhu) and that as objects are not established, time is not established (cf Nāgārjuna), leaving shes rig in an unconditioned state since it is not conditioned by objects (upon which imputations of time are dependent). In other words, shes rig is unconditioned and timeless because time and conditions are not established in any way, but the fact of knowing awareness is indisputable, becoming conditioned only when it becomes entangled in dualistic cognitions.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 27th, 2013 at 12:41 AM

Title: Re: Soreness in thighs.

Content:

philji said:

Any ideas or tips for dealing with pain and stiffness in thighs, especially after sitting. I have been doing more sitting of late but am noticing a real stiffness in my thigh muscles...hobbling around for a while like an old man...well I am quite old!!!!!!

Malcolm wrote:

light yoga, especially with postures held for several minutes like Paschimottasana.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 27th, 2013 at 12:37 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Sherab said:

The problem is that "vertical" dependence demands a starting point. The question then is: Is this starting point conditioned or unconditioned? If it is conditioned, then it cannot be the starting point. If it is unconditioned, how can it be the cause of all the others that is above it?

Malcolm wrote:

You are just falling into the same trap as Ardent and Co.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 27th, 2013 at 12:36 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Sherab said:

If emptiness is equated with dependent origination, then if emptiness is unconditioned, dependent origination must also be unconditioned. If dependent origination is unconditioned, then causality must also be unconditioned. In other words, there is no cause for causality, which is a contradiction in terms.

Malcolm wrote:

Emptiness is the nature of that which is dependently originated, that's all. What is the dependently originated empty of? All extremes. That emptiness is unconditioned. That emptiness is suchness. Suchness, by every definition is unconditioned. This being the case, as I said, the conditioned and the unconditioned are not mutually exclusive since the conditioned has an unconditioned nature.

The Samdhinirmocana has a nice explanation of how dharma and dharmatā are neither the same nor different.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 27th, 2013 at 12:22 AM

Title: Re: What do you really think of Western monks and nuns?

Content:

mutsum said:

But my point was that the monks consider the Bon western sangha as made of apes (dixit for males) and cows (dixit for females) just good enough to pay for "retreats" (which in my opinion are often only a series of "conferences"...).

Malcolm wrote:

Well, this is just standard Xenophobia.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 26th, 2013 at 11:34 PM

Title: Re: What do you really think of Western monks and nuns?

Content:

mutsum said:

tibetan monks are very rarely willing to share that ritual training.

Malcolm wrote:

Which, honestly speaking, is not freaking rocket science.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 26th, 2013 at 10:49 PM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Koji said:

You should say both Ardent and the Buddha romantically see the skandhas as a Mara. It would be more accurate Avuso.

Malcolm wrote:

Yup, that is one view of the matter. Not the final word however.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 26th, 2013 at 10:31 PM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Sherab said:

This means that the real reality is that there is a relation between the ultimate and the relative, the transcendent and the mundane. That is why it is so difficult to get one's head around it.

Malcolm wrote:

The prajñāpāramitā solution is that the unconditioned and the conditioned are not mutually exclusive, in fact, the nature of the conditioned is unconditioned, and that is what emptiness basically means.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 26th, 2013 at 9:29 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist Parochialism in the West

Content:

Indrajala said:

In fact, I'd argue a lay priesthood is far more adaptable to changing circumstances than a monastic community is.

Malcolm wrote:

This is precisely the argument used in Tibetan history for the existence of sngags pas. When monks fled the chaos that ensued after Langdarma was assassinated for proposing to tax the monasteries, Buddhadharma primarily survived due to the interest of aristocratic Clans such as the Khon and so on in preserving Buddhist teachings within their families.

After China's economy stabilized in the late tenth century, and trade between Tibet and China was no longer so disrupted, then the monastic community who had survived the travails of that epoch returned to Central Tibet and reestablished monasteries, encouraged by royal support.

The other factor too is that in Tibet, sngags pas are not really considered "lay" in the sense understood here in the West. They have undergone a kind of ordination, They have vows that are distinct from monastic vows, they also have garb to wear, etc. They are educated, which sets them apart from the average person and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 26th, 2013 at 9:10 PM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Basically, the problem as I see it is that line of reasoning employed by Ardent (Koji), VidyArAja, and so on is that unconditioned and conditioned phenomena are mutually exclusive.

For them the unconditioned is Self even if they cannot precisely say what that Self is (and they never seem to be able to).

Vidyārāja sees this self as the one who is aware (since he keeps asking who or what is aware of emptiness) -- this is very similar to the Samkhya based metaphysics of all the Hindu systems.

Ardent romantically sees the skandas as a mara (though how Ardent live with himself with such a negative view of his psychosomatic continuum is anyone's guess).

In other words, their view is very Manichaen, since they are addicted to an absolute dichotomy between the conditioned and unconditioned or Gnostic, in the sense that the material universe is evil and they are seekers of metanoia so they may return to the pleroma.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 26th, 2013 at 6:51 AM

Title: Re: Longde Teachings

Content:

Fa Dao said:

Does this mean that a person could get this and practice it?

Malcolm wrote:

It means they practice Nhondzog Gyalpo, not Longde.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 26th, 2013 at 6:48 AM

Title: Re: wallowing

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

Luke, I am not sure how standalone Vajrasattva practice normally works in Sakya, there is the 100 syllable mantra in some sadhana, but I do not know anyone who does it as a standalone thing...

Malcolm wrote:

You do the refuge, bodhicitta and then Vajraheruka, then dedication. It is pretty straight forward. Dezhung Rinpoche's text has a dedication specifically for people who are only working on that section.

If you have received any major Sakya empowerment such as Hevajra, etc., you already have the empowerment.

I did the entire Sakya ngondro and a three year retreat in the Sakya system, FYI.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 26th, 2013 at 5:32 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Son of Buddha said:

Dolpopa was very clear that the Buddhist Idea of True Self was not the same as the Forders....The problem he stated with the forders Idea of "Self" is that they considered impermanent things to be the Self....

Malcolm wrote:

Obviously, Dolbupa was completely ignorant of what non-Buddhists believed about "the self".

Son of Buddha said:

(I highlighted Blue on your very quote)they considered that which was not Noumena to be Noumena, and imputed what was impermanent to be that which is permanentin Dolpopas argument he states the the forders views did not actually contain the self of thusness,the pure self(ect)

Malcolm wrote:

Obviously Dolbupa erred in attributing truly existent characteristics to the signless.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 26th, 2013 at 4:12 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Karma Dorje said:

Sat is what is veridical. Look to the meaning of the underlying ideas. From Gaudapada's verses on the Mandukya Upanisad:

Malcolm wrote:

It is also what is existent, for example, Samkhya is characterized as a satkaryavāda i.e. advocates (vāda) of production (karma) from an existent (sat).

There is a correspondence in Indian philosophy between what is veridical and what is existent. To deny this is to deny 3000 years of Indian thinking on the subject.

sat mf(%{satl4})n. (pr. p. of 1. %{as}) being , existing , occurring , happening , being present (%{sato@me} , ` " when I was present " ; often connected with other participles or with an adverb e.g. %{nAmni@kRte@sati} , ` " when the name has been given " ; %{tathA@sati} , ` " if it be so " ; also ibc. , where sometimes = ` " possessed of " cf. %{sat-kalpavRkSa}) RV. &c. &c. ; abiding in (loc.) MBh. ; belonging to (gen.) S3Br. ; living Mun2d2Up. ; lasting , enduring Ka1v. RV. &c. &c. ; real , actual , as any one or anything ought to be , true , good , right (%{tan@na@sat} , ` " that is not right ") , beautiful , wise , venerable , honest (often in comp. see below) RV. &c. &c. ; m. a being , (pl.) beings , creatures RV. &c. ; a good or wise man , a sage MBh. R. ; good or honest or wise or respectable people Mn. MBh. &c. ; (%{l4}) f. see %{sati4} below ; (%{sat}) n. that which really is , entity or existence , essence , the true being or really existent (in the Veda7nta , ` " the self-existent or Universal Spirit , Brahma ") RV. &c. &c. ; that which is good or real or true , good , advantage , reality , truth ib. ; water Naigh. i , 12 ; (in gram.) the terminations of the present participle Pa1n2. 3-2 , 127 &c. ; (%{sat}) ind. (cf. %{sat-kR} &c.) well , right , fitly. [Cf. Gk. $ for $; Lat. {sens} in &343162[1134 ,2] {absens} , {pra-sens} ; {sons} , ` " guilty " , orig. ` " the real doer " ; Lith. {sa1s} , {e4sas} ; Slav. {sy} , {sas8ta}.]

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 26th, 2013 at 3:59 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

anjali said:

Let's run with this. Unfortunately, I'm not very familiar with Gaudapada and his teachings. How does he characterize sat in his system of thought? A specific quote would be very helpful, then we can take a look at how sat compares with emptiness.

Malcolm wrote:

It is pretty straightforward. In his Karikas he argues that if the ultimate is unreal, there cannot be any illusion of birth or actual birth using the example of a barren woman.

"The unreal cannot be born either really or through Māya. For the son of a barren woman is born neither in reality nor in illusion."

In other words, Gaudapada's theory of dualistic appearances depends on the reality of nondual brahman.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 26th, 2013 at 3:21 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Parochialism in the West

Content:

Jikan said:

I don't speak business-ese and I'd like to give the good people at Tara Mandala the benefit of the doubt. Can anyone clarify what is meant by "competitiveness" in this context? Does it mean that the center is interested in ensuring that their rates & fees &c are priced at about the same level as other comparable centers? Or...?

Malcolm wrote:

I think so.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 26th, 2013 at 3:20 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

So, I don't really agree that all these systems are trying to get the same point, or have the same path, etc. As far as I can tell, Advaitans are climbing up one mountain, Buddhists are climbing a different mountain altogether.

dzogchungpa said:

One man's mountain is another man's valley, I always say.

Seriously though, which mountain are Dzogchenpas climbing?

Malcolm wrote:

Dzogchen is Buddhadharma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 26th, 2013 at 3:18 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Karma Dorje said:

Receive the advaita upadesha yourself and compare. Otherwise it is just so much comparing liquids based on the differences in the vessels which contain them. Of course the paths are different. After many years of practicing both, it's not so clear to me that there is much real difference in fruit.

Malcolm wrote:

Since the reduction of afflictions is the elementary point of both systems, I am perfectly content to grant that both systems provide the means the suppress afflictions.

I find the element of insight lacking in Hindu systems, as well as bodhicitta. There is no bodhicitta in Hindu systems of any sort whatsoever.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 26th, 2013 at 2:50 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Koji said:

An aside, Nakamura in his important ground breaking work, A History of Early Vedanta Philosophy, has a lot to say about Buddhism and Vedanta. Buddhists should be cautious about asserting that some elements of Buddhism have been influenced by Vedanta. In the case of early Buddhism there was no Vedanta school. Also, Nakamura points out that "quite a few of the Vedanta lines have been greatly influenced by Buddhism, with Buddhist thought pervading them through and through"!

Malcolm wrote:

Oh lord, Ardent, you have not said one damn new thing in 18 years.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 26th, 2013 at 2:49 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Karma Dorje said:

But sat does not mean existent. Gaudapada was well acquainted with the tetralemma.

The reality of the matter is that ALL systems that posit a non-dual reality that is merely covered over by prapancha are just different philosophical franchises serving up the same tasty patties of ground beef and batons of deep-fried potato, whether on the one hand the cipher used is "emptiness" or on the other hand "Brahman". Their various brands, trademarks, hermeneutical approaches and excuses for why they are right and the other guy is wrong speak only to the different habituations of those to be tamed. One doesn't have to be a perennialist to see this.

Malcolm wrote:

What non-dual means in Buddhadharma is really quite different than what it means say to Sankara and even Gaudapada. Gaudapada may have been sympathetic towards Mahāyāna philosophy, and in the Agamasāstra he indiscriminately cribbed yogacara and madhyamaka arguments to refute Samkhya and Vaṣesika and so on.

What nisprapañca means is also different in these systems.

So, I don't really agree that all these systems are trying to get the same point, or have the same path, etc. As far as I can tell, Advaitans are climbing up one mountain, Buddhists are climbing a different mountain altogether.

Apart from a common agreement that kleśas are what is responsible for transmigration, I don't see these systems as having much in common in terms of how they present the basis, the path and the result.

Also I really don't agree that brahman = śūnyatā.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 26th, 2013 at 2:12 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

anjali said:

What is the status of the Self's existence? Would you characterize the Self as existent, non-existent, both or neither? Would you characterize it as empty?

Lotus_Bitch said:

In non-dualist philosophies such as Kashmiri Shaivism and Advaita Vedanta respectively: Shiva and Brahman are beyond existence, non-existence, both existence and non-existence and neither existence nor non-existence.

Malcolm wrote:

I think this is not really correct. Brahman is ajati because it is unconditioned. It is considered beyond existence and non-existence only in the sense of being conditioned. It is sat, meaning real.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 26th, 2013 at 2:03 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Vidyaraja said:

Nonetheless, I think what I quoted by Dolpopa on the previous page is quite clearly not the popular no-self notion.

Malcolm wrote:

I don't think you really understand the citation you cited. I think you lack sufficient education in the hermeneutics of the tantras upon which Dolbupa's entire position is predicated.

Basically, what you have admitted to is that you are merely incorporating some Buddhist masters [you poorly understand] into an over all perennialist agenda. You initiated this by attacking someone whose views you regarded as "heretical" barely even considering that the vast majority of Buddhists would consider your perspective equally outside the pale of Buddhadharma, which it is, by your own admission.

You are a perennialist eclectic, which is fine and dandy, but don't confuse your philosophical tastes with Buddhadharma, for they are not the same.

It would also be good if you learned some humility and stopped pretending you were an expert in teachings which you cannot read in a primary language.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 26th, 2013 at 1:44 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Vidyaraja said:

Not who I am in the sense that it isn't my name-form-memories-thoughts or not who I am in the ultimate sense? The Atman isn't personal, but supra-personal, so there is no grasping to self in that sense. Nonetheless, it is the nondual ground of all there is and Tat Tvam Asi.

Malcolm wrote:

If there is a nondual ground of all there is in Mahāyāna, it is emptiness. Not some divine pleroma. In the Nikayas, Buddha explicitly denies the existence of any such ground.

As he was sitting there, he said to the Blessed One, "Now, then, Master Gotama, does everything [2] exist?"

"Everything exists' is the senior form of cosmology, brahman."

"Then, Master Gotama, does everything not exist?"

"Everything does not exist' is the second form of cosmology, brahman."

"Then is everything a Oneness?"

"Everything is a Oneness' is the third form of cosmology, brahman."

"Then is everything a Manyess?"

"Everything is a Manyess' is the fourth form of cosmology, brahman. Avoiding these two extremes, the Tathagata teaches the Dhamma via the middle:

<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn12/sn12.048.than.html>

Vidyaraja said:

Therefore, the ultimate [reality] in all profound sutras and tantras which finely present thusness, and so forth, is empty of other, never empty of self-nature.

Malcolm wrote:

Dolbupa would be horrified to think that you had so misunderstood his writing. He writes:

"Since the matrix-of-the-one gone-thus is empty of the two selves, it is not similar to the self of the formers, and because uncompounded noumena transcends the momentary, it is permanent, stable, and everlasting. It is not that it, like space, is without any of the qualities, powers, and aspects of a buddha, and it is not like the self of persons that the formers impute to be permanent."

Mountain Doctrine, ppg. 118-119.

But you, from the beginning of this discussion have asserted that the other emptiness asserted by Dolbupa is exactly the affirmation of the atman of the Vedantins and so on.

This is why I say you have no idea what Dolbupa's actual perspective is.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 26th, 2013 at 1:02 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Vidyaraja said:

Is this clarity who I really am? Have you directly realized this clarity and therefore can say for certain that it is empty of Self, or are you going by the philosophy of others?

Malcolm wrote:

It is not who you are, since it is empty of all extremes. It is who you are since it is the basis of designating a person. We have an experience of clarity all the time. It is when we mistake the reflections in it for itself, that we reify outer objects as real. When we mistaken it for being a self, or a person, we engage atmagraha, grasping a self.

As it is said in many sutras and tantras, there is no buddhahood outside of the mind.

Vidyaraja said:

Seems that a large number of Buddhists (who incidentally buy into the no-self doctrine) are depressed, self-hating, and mentally unstable.

Malcolm wrote:

I don't really know any Buddhist like that. But I think that people who hang around religion groups in general usually have a lot of issues.

Vidyaraja said:

I think the vision of ultimate truth as expressed Dolpopa or various Hindu sages is a happy one.

Malcolm wrote:

Oh, I am very convinced by now that you haven't the slightest inkling of what Dolbupa really thinks or why he wrote what he did.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 26th, 2013 at 12:45 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Vidyaraja said:

Burning the seed of existence as applying to the empirical self which allows one to transcend the triple realm isn't the same burning away the ultimate Self.

Malcolm wrote:

Basically you erred in the same way all the great mystics outside Buddhadharma have erred. You have mistaken clarity for a self, without realizing that clarity too is empty.

Vidyaraja said:

You said previously that non-conceptual wisdom apprehends emptiness, but what is this non-conceptual wisdom and is it aware? What is the relation between us and this non-conceptual wisdom?

Malcolm wrote:

Nonconceptual wisdom replaces consciousness when knowledge obscurations are total eradicated. If you want to understand how this works, read the Mahāyāna Saṃgraha by Asanga which clearly explains how the aggregates transform into the four wisdoms.

Some people assert Buddhas cognize normally [Gelug] others assert that Buddhas are free from all cognitions and that their acts are totally spontaneous.

Vidyaraja said:

According this line of thought, two options are available, the reality of some part of me (like awareness or transcendent Self) and suffering, or my negation and absence to be free from suffering?

Malcolm wrote:

You clearly do not understand the purpose of the two truths.

Vidyaraja said:

Yes, it is only my opinion, but as pointed out also the opinion of most of world's sages including Hindu yogis and Buddhist masters like Dolpopa, so I think I am in good company.

Malcolm wrote:

Misery loves company.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 25th, 2013 at 11:56 PM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Vidyaraja said:

Those that do deny the Self I believe are primarily philosophers working with a system of thought, not realized yogis attempting to communicate their experiential realization of deathlessness.

Malcolm wrote:

In your opinion. Others vigorously disagree with your assertion, as do the vast majority of Mahāyāna sutras. How the tathāgatagarbha sutras (a very minor part of the Mahāyāna canon) are to be read is a bit of a contentious issue -- suffice it to say that the commentary on them reads like a standard Madhyamaka text.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 25th, 2013 at 11:54 PM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Vidyaraja said:

Now this is only relevant to me of course due to being intertwined with personal experience, but beyond that I think the universality and descriptive proximity of all the world's sages is more of an objective confirmation of the Self being Truth than the exclusive and minority position of the no-self Buddhists. To accept the latter also entails maintaining the falsity of the rest (or at least lower level, incomplete enlightenment) which isn't something I believe in either.

Malcolm wrote:

The falsity of the rest is something repeatedly stated in the Pali canon and throughout the history of Buddhist critiques of other systems.

In brief, since they never burn the seed of existence because of their extreme views of self, they never get out of the triple realm.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 25th, 2013 at 11:52 PM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

What I said was that Buddha was aware, indeed, knowledgeable in Samkhya since it was the system taught by Arāda.

Aśvaghoṣa clearly describes Arāda as being a follower of Kaplila, and gives an account of the basics of the Samkhya system in Canto 12...

dzogchungpa said:

Is that the main evidence that the Buddha was familiar with Samkhya?

Malcolm wrote:

It seems to be.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 25th, 2013 at 11:30 PM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Vidyaraja said:

Man, it is a real shame for Buddhist philosophy and soteriology if the no-Self doctrine is the actual doctrinal position as its supporters maintain for, if such is truly the case, then Buddhism is a false doctrine. Though at least it would prove that even false doctrines can produce realized sages under the right conditions (such as Dolpopa or those Thai figures who equate nibbana and atta.)

Malcolm wrote:

The teaching of the Buddha is just dependent origination, not self, not no-self.

Sariputra quotes the Buddha:

Whoever sees dependent co-arising sees the Dhamma; whoever sees the Dhamma sees dependent co-arising.

<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/mn/mn.028.than.html>

And the Buddha said:

He who sees Dhamma, Vakkali, sees me; he who sees me sees Dhamma. Truly seeing Dhamma, one sees me; seeing me one sees Dhamma.

<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn22/sn22.087x.wlsh.html>

Emptiness of a self as well as the absence of intrinsic identity in phenomena, is merely a consequence of dependent origination.

It is very clear, for example, that the tathāgatagarbha doctrine was swiftly marginalized in mainstream Mahāyāna circles. We can see this by virtue of the fact that the Lankāvatara sūtra clearly describes the ālayavijñāna as being the tathāgatagarbha. There exists but two commentaries devoted to tathāgatagarbha doctrine in the bstan 'gyur.

In general, tathāgatagarbha doctrine becomes more prominent in Vajrayāna for various reasons beyond the scope.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 25th, 2013 at 9:18 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist Parochialism in the West

Content:

Karma Dorje said:

Please share your thoughts on this.

Indrajala said:

Tibetan Buddhism in the west could introduce democratic federations which manage common retreat centers for everyone to use. The democracy means, ideally, egalitarianism and neutrality when it comes to lineages and gurus.

Malcolm wrote:

As I said, it is McDonald's vs. Burger King thinking. They are all selling burgers and fries, but they all want you to think their burgers and fries are the best.

Here is the breakdown.

McDonalds =- Gelugpas

Burger King = Kagyus

Wendy's = Sakya

KFC/Taco Bell = Nyingma

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 25th, 2013 at 9:11 PM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Astus said:

The Buddha rejected the interpretation that there is a self outside the aggregates, and some assumed this is somehow related to Samkhya (<http://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/mn/mn.022.than.html#fn-8>). Although I don't think it really matters whether Samkhya was known or not, as their views don't fit the Buddha's teachings anyway.

Koji said:

There is no passage in the nikayas that states, unambiguously, the Buddha "rejected the interpretation that there is a self outside the aggregates." To assert such is also to assert there is nothing outside or beyond the five murderous aggregates (S.iii.114) which also happen to be Mara the killer (S.iii.189). Neither the Buddha nor his disciples identified their self with the aggregates anymore then they might identify their self with a burning pile of grass, twigs, branches and foliage.

Malcolm wrote:

Hi Ardent:

Isn't boring to rehash arguments we had on AOL?

Vasubandhu (cf. Poussin/Pruden) quotes several sources from the Agamas having stated his thesis at the outset:

"There is neither direct perception nor inference of a soul (atman) independent of the skandhas. We know then that a real soul does not exist."

He then cites his authorities such as the Bimbisāra sūtra:

"A stupid ignorant Prthagjana becomes attached to words, and he imagines there is a self; but there is no self nor things pertaining to a self, but only past, present and future painful dharmas".

He cites another, also cited in the Sūtrālaṃkāra:

"Five calamities proceed from the belief in a soul(atman): one creates a theory of a soul, of a being, of a vital principle, one is not distinguished from heterodox teachers...: etc. Even the tathāgatarbha sūtras take great pains to differentiate their "atman" from the atman posited by Pudgalavadins and Hindus because the tatāgatarbha is merely a gloss for dharmatā.

For example, Ārya-tathāgatarbha-nāma-mahāyāna-sūtra states:

Whether or not that dharmatā of dharmas produces tathāgatas, these sentient beings always contain tathāgatarbha.

Now, depending on what you understand dharmatā to mean, then you will understand this in that light. But since there can be no dharmatā without dharmas, it is ludicrous to say this if this tathagātagarbha is other than the aggregates it is also the nature of the aggregates.

Personally, my impression of the main message of the tathagatagarbha sutras is that people should not feel awakening is beyond their capacity. For example, is how this passage from the Tathāgatagarbha sūtra reads:

"Sons of a good family, in the same way all sentient beings are without protection, are tormented with the sufferings of samsara, abiding in a house without a protector, the place of birth in the world. Now, the family of tathagatas exists in all sentient beings, but those it exists in them, those sentient being do not comprehend this.

Sons of a good family, because the Tathāgata do not malign sentient being themselves, sons of good family, you yourselves must not be disheartened, and have firm diligence! There will come a time when the Tathāgata enters into you and you will enter into the ranks of the bodhisattvas and will not be called "sentient beings". Further, when you have entered the ranks of the buddhas, you will not be called "bodhisattvas".

And:

It was taught, "Sentient beings who do not understand dharmatā, do not generate the thought of 'I am inferior'!"

You must set out with firm diligence, your own body will become a victor without long delay.

Once one has obtained the heart of awakening, one will be able to liberate 10,000,000,000 creatures.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 25th, 2013 at 6:43 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Parochialism in the West

Content:

smcj said:

otherwise you get every Tom, Dick and Harry wearing robes and parroting something they have heard ...

Malcolm wrote:

Ummmm and how is this different than the present state of Tibetan Buddhism, apart from that fact that their names are Tashi, Dondrup and Phuntsog?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 25th, 2013 at 5:45 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Parochialism in the West

Content:

smcj said:

The massive resentment many, if not most of us, have towards institutional religion isn't even on their radar, for the most part.

Malcolm wrote:

It is, but they ridicule it, thinking our antipathy towards organized religion is about God, when instead our antipathy towards organized religion is really more about money and power.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 25th, 2013 at 5:31 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Koji said:

Pande concludes by saying,

"It appears that Sāṅkhya influence on Buddhism has been too lightly assumed" (p. 551).

Malcolm wrote:

I didn't say that Samkhya was a major influence of Buddhism, did I? No.

What I said was that Buddha was aware, indeed, knowledgeable in Samkhya since it was the system taught by Arāda.

Aśvaghoṣa clearly describes Arāda as being a follower of Kapila, and gives an account of the basics of the Samkhya system in Canto 12 (truly required reading for everyone participating in this discussion).

So, frankly, I think Aśvaghoṣa is a more reliable source than Pande, don't you, Ardent?

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 25th, 2013 at 1:18 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Parochialism in the West

Content:

conebeckham said:

Well.....is it the students, or the teachers, who foster this sort of thing? That is the primary question you should ask yourself.

And when you've reached your conclusions, consider your alternatives.

Malcolm wrote:

In my experience, it is the teachers, mostly.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 24th, 2013 at 11:57 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist Parochialism in the West

Content:

Karma Dorje said:

I have been giving a lot of thought lately to how we as Tibetan Buddhists spend our limited resources in the West. It seems that instead of cooperating with each other to share teaching and retreat facilities, we are repeating the same balkanized organizational structures as in Tibet and the Tibetan diaspora and actually approaching other groups as competition. This to my mind is entirely counterproductive. While there are bigger differences with other forms of Buddhism from other countries, one would think that the schools are close enough to cooperate more closely in the West than they have. Instead we see even lineages within the same school competing.

Please share your thoughts on this.

Malcolm wrote:

Turf war.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 24th, 2013 at 11:47 PM

Title: Re: Tantric Tattoos

Content:

Karma Jinpa said:

Any idea if he got these pre- or post-Chinese invasion, before or after going into exile? Not that it really matters, simply curious.

By the by, I've heard the eternal knot referred to as the Tibetan form of the swastika. Does anyone know if that is accurate, or is it just a bunch of hokum?

Malcolm wrote:

In the fifties, I assume, when he was mainly in Derge studying with Jamyang Khentse Chokyi Lodo.

Hokum.

Swastikas are called gyung drung in Tibetan, as in gyung drung bon. Eternal knots are called dpal be'u. dPal be'u is a translation of śrīvatsa.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 24th, 2013 at 11:42 PM

Title: Re: Westerner who really makes it work at Sera

Content:

JKhedrup said:

LOL Malcolm it wasn't my answer, it was the Rikchung's answer. I thought your point made sense, and so asked Geshe la out of curiosity, he replied with the original answer posted above, which I bolded again, making clear both were necessary in his opinion from the beginning.

In Geshe la's answer he mentions both these imprints from the beginning, so your statement about any being born in the deva realm having sufficient causes for arousing bodhicitta was a bit of a stretch. You cannot really reasonably draw that conclusion from what G. said, as he mentions both CA and BC in his answer. That's all I'm sayin'.

If the requirement of Shinay for the arising of Bodhicitta is something debatable, that would be something to explore. Perhaps there are different views across the traditions,

Malcolm wrote:

I meant in the form realms, actually. The mind of any being in the form realm is concentrated to a degree extraordinary to a human being.

In any event, I think there is a problem of infinite regress in this argument in general. That is why I brought up the Buddha in hell point. This is traditionally where it is considered that Buddha first aroused bodhicitta. But of course it is a myth, and as such subject to interpretations.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 24th, 2013 at 10:11 PM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Koji said:

It depends on what one believes he wrote. In the Maha-prajnaparamita-shastra N appears to have affirmed the âtman.

"People who understand the meaning (artha) of the Buddhist doctrine and know the designation (prajñapti [Pali, paññatti]) say that the âtman exists. People who do not understand the meaning of the Buddhist doctrine and do not know the designation say that the âtman does not exist."

Malcolm wrote:

This simply means that "the self" exists simply as a designation, not that there is a real atman. A real atman would exist without a designation.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 24th, 2013 at 10:05 PM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Koji said:

Right now a hot debate rages in Thailand among Theravadins, between those who assert nirvana is anatta and those who assert nirvana is atta. The atta side appears to be winning.

dzogchungpa said:

<http://www.scribd.com/doc/115896892/Cholvijarn-Nibbana-As-Self-or-Not-Self-181>

Malcolm wrote:

Regarding Phae Tissadevo's position:

The anattā doctrine is only founding in Buddhism because the Buddha realised attā that is different from conditioned dhammas.

It is pretty clear this Sangharāja never studied Samkhya since in fact that is exactly what the Samkhya/Yoga schools maintains, that self or purusha is completely other than consciousness, senses, sense objects and the material body i.e. the twenty four tattvas (prakṛti, buddhi, ahaṁkara, manas, the five organs, five organs of action, the five subtle elements [tanmatras] and the five gross elements).

If an atman is what one wants to find, then there is no better system of finding it than Samkhya/Yoga.

Of course, Buddha was quite familiar with Samkhya, but for some reason did not present it in his teachings.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 24th, 2013 at 9:37 PM

Title: Re: Tantric Tattoos

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

HH Dagchen Rinpoche used to have a Swastika tattooed on the back of his left hand above his thumb. When he arrived here in the US, people freaked out so he had it covered with a bird.

Karma Jinpa said:

Would this happen to be HH Jigdral Dagchen Rinpoche, the high lama in Sakya who consecrated the Tibet Tech prayer wheels?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes. He still has an eternal knot on the same place on his right hand.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 24th, 2013 at 9:24 PM

Title: Re: The Hunting of Ed Snowden - the evolving power-play

Content:

Indrajala said:

I don't deny internal policing existed before. I'm saying I feel it is increasing over time.

Malcolm wrote:

I think you would have found 1930's US pretty damn oppressive, especially if you were in a union.

The US has always reacted to perceived external threats with invasions of privacy. Modern technology just makes it easier to accomplish and more cost effective.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 24th, 2013 at 8:58 PM

Title: Re: The Hunting of Ed Snowden - the evolving power-play

Content:

Indrajala said:

That doesn't negate the possibility we're seeing increased policing in the west. I don't mean cops on the ground arresting burglars, but behind the scenes surveillance and suppression of dissenting voices.

Malcolm wrote:

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Sedition_Act_of_1918

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 24th, 2013 at 8:50 PM

Title: Re: Tantric Tattoos

Content:

ngodrup said:

My precious Root Lama, who was born, raised and completed his training and practice in Old Tibet-- was also very traditional, to say the least. This very old school Nyingma yogi had a very small tattoo, clearly visible to anybody who looked close enough-- a swastika. So we cannot say that it was not done.

Malcolm wrote:

HH Dagchen Rinpoche used to have a Swastika tattooed on the back of his left hand above his thumb. When he arrived here in the US, people freaked out so he had it covered with a bird.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 24th, 2013 at 8:49 PM

Title: Re: Tantric Tattoos

Content:

Karma Jinpa said:

Wondering what various people have heard or experienced regarding Vajrayana subject matter as body art.

I've had different responses depending on the lama I asked... Most Karma Kagyu I'm in contact with have seemed to be ok with the idea as long as my motivation is pure. One Drikungpa said it was ok, but not necessary. Another Drikungpa said it is never ok to purposely harm one's body, and that I should do 1 million Tara mantras instead.

A translator friend warned that getting such tattoos opens one up for harm by demons, specifically those very hostile to the Dharma. Basically it puts a bullseye on ya.

What have you folks heard?

Malcolm wrote:

If you are a practitioner of completion stage practices, one Dzogchen manual advises against receiving moxabustion or bloodletting treatments (including acupuncture needles). Tattoos are a form of bloodletting. So, if you are a serious completion stage practitioner, then I would say it is better not to get tattoos. If you are not a completion stage practitioner, then just make sure the tattoo artist is hygienic. It is better if they also are a Dharma person.

Further, do not get tattoos of Dharma themes below the waist, on one's left hand (since that is the one most people in Asia wipe with) and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 24th, 2013 at 5:52 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Vidyaraja said:

I've never studied Theosophy before

Malcolm wrote:

Which is why you don't recognize it in Rhys Davies, Grimm and Coomaraswamies, etc., writings.

Koji said:

This is the no-selfer theosophical ploy which is a kind of ad hominem fallacy. It doesn't mean Mrs. Rhys Davids, I.B. Horner, Pande, Frauwallner, and the rest are dead wrong. Right now a hot debate rages in Thailand among Theravadins, between those who assert nirvana is anatta and those who assert nirvana is atta. The atta side appears to be winning.

Malcolm wrote:

Buddhadharma is not sports, though some people seem to treat it as such.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 24th, 2013 at 5:50 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

A mind or an awareness [shes pa] has a "choice" recognition or non-recognition. The recognizing mind is called vidyā or prajñā. The non-recognizing mind is called avidyā.

conebeckham said:

"A mind" or "an awareness" --are these momentary awarenesses? Is it the case that there is a moment of vidyā, followed by a moment of avidyā? Are preceding and subsequent moments of vidyā and avidyā related?

Malcolm wrote:

Not really momentary in the sense we normally think of term, however, yes, vidyā is by definition a moment of unfabricated awareness. Vidyā and avidyā are related since they can be based on the same continuum.

There are two kinds of Buddhahood in Dzogchen, abhisambodhi, which has a non-abiding nirvana; samyaksambodhi which enters nirvana without remainder.

I assume this to be the difference between temporary "abiding" in Rigpa, and the complete eradication of avidyā?

It is the difference between bringing one's practice of Dzogchen to a complete finish in this life or not.

Omniscience arises because the capacity for omniscience is present in the form of potential in the basis.

In order for "capacity" to be present in something, even as potential, doesn't that "something" have to "exist?" In Mahamudra terms, we would say, I think, that it is precisely due to the empty nature of Dharmakaya that such omniscience is possible. In other words, the empty nature of the basis is equivalent to it's "capacity" for anything whatsoever.

[/quote]

No, if that were the case, Dzogchen would be no different than Samkhya. A useful referent is the Sakya concept that lhun grub and gnas 'gyur, natural formation and transformation, are not mutually exclusive. Potentiality can be just as well explained through emptiness as it can existence, even more easily actually. In general, there is a discussion of the three kāyas of the basis i.e. emptiness, clarity and their inseparability. Because these are present as the basis, the three kāyas can manifest at the time of the result, since their base exists in the basis. But this does not mean that the three kāyas of the basis are identical with the three kāyas of the result. The basis is called the basis precisely because of nonrealization.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 24th, 2013 at 4:24 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Are you sure that you are presenting an assertion of Nāgārjuna's? Or a position that he is going to dismantle? Check carefully, you wouldn't want to make a mistake.

Koji said:

It seems that your are suggesting that Nagarjuna is likely to contradict himself in another verse saying, essentially, "Nirvana is of the created realm" or "Nirvana is abhava."

Malcolm wrote:

No, what I am suggesting is that Nāgārjuna's Mūla presents both an opponent's contention and his own refutation and you have to know which is which to properly read him. The reason why Kalupahana's translation is a disaster is that he chose to ignore this. So I am suggesting that you discover this then you will have answered your own question.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 24th, 2013 at 4:22 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Vidyaraja said:

I've never studied Theosophy before

Malcolm wrote:

Which is why you don't recognize it in Rhys Davies, Grimm and Coomaraswamies, etc., writings.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 24th, 2013 at 4:18 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The Selfless Mind: Personality, Consciousness and Nirvana in Early Buddhism by Peter Harvey. If you do not read this, it is really hard to take anything you say about this seriously. It will simply appear as if you are engaging in confirmation bias.

He systematically goes through all the claims your are fond of claiming are grounded in the Pali canon and dismembers them one by one.

Vidyaraja said:

How do you know you weren't engaged in confirmation bias while reading that book and finding it to be true? One can only be taken seriously if they've read this particular book and accepted the authors conclusions? I'll look into it though, thanks for the recommendation.

Malcolm wrote:

Because I am a pretty objective scholar who spends my time weeding away what is not present in the texts I am reading.

Vidyaraja said:

There is a difference between irrational and supra-rational. One can be logical or an accomplished logician but also maintain that truth can't be captured by logic or concepts and can only be directly intuited with our spiritual eye.

Malcolm wrote:

It is irrational to claim that with a map you cannot find a city. What you do not want to do is merely be content with possessing the map without making the journey, but an accurate map is essential to the success of any journey.

You are just mixing everything up into one big stew so you don't know if one minute you are chewing on Theosophy, the next minute Zen, the minute after that Vedanta, then slurping a bit of Dolbupa, etc.

I've never studied Theosophy before, but I don't see why a totalistic view of all Buddhism or all human spiritual endeavor and comparing and contrasting between various views should not prove a fruitful exercise. Either way, in general I agree with Frithjof Schuon about the variety of views:

You aren't comparing between different views -- you are merely changing the color of the light you want to look at.

Buddhadharma is radically different than other traditions. Our view at base is dependent origination. As the Buddha said "He who sees dependent origination, sees the Dharma". There is no room for an ultimate transcendent nirvana, self, etc., except as a provisional view for those afraid of emptiness, as stated in the Lanka-avatara sutra.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 24th, 2013 at 4:00 AM

Title: Re: Westerner who really makes it work at Sera

Content:

JKhedrup said:

No I don't think so, because the imprints of both the Shinay and bodhicitta must be present, this is clear from the answer. And the imprints for bodhicitta are more difficult to cultivate, many practitioners of different paths attain different levels of calm abiding, bodhicitta is far rarer.

I have heard mentioned by Geshe la and several other masters that BSM was able to arouse Bodhicitta in the hell realm only because of extensive cultivation of love, compassion and so forth in previous lifetimes. The arousing of bodhicitta in hell is extremely rare, most beings give rise to it in the human realm. I would think the imprints for Shinay are far more common, since many beings have at some point been born in the Devas realms that require its cultivation.

Since BSM arising of BC required both these imprints (compassion etc. as well as Shinay), I don't think you can draw that conclusion from what Geshe la said. Because in these deva realms most beings are not cultivating BC. It is clear that both are required, one isn't enough, as G. indicated in his answer:

Just as the imprints for bodhicitta were there, which allowed it to be arisen from hell from witnessing the suffering there, a level of calm abiding had been attained in a previous life.

Malcolm wrote:

Even Rakshasas love their children, so I find their answer a bit hard to accept. But that is not what I am objecting too. I am objecting to the idea that śamatha is a necessary precondition to the arousal of bodhicitta. Now you are answering that imprints for both must be present. So you are shifting your answer.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 24th, 2013 at 3:56 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

It is both, and the former will lead to the latter, which is why Āryadeva proclaimed "Realization proceeds from view." This is why there is such a huge emphasis on developing a correct view in sūtrayāna. Whereas in Vajrayāna in general, the view is taught only after empowerment, because the view cultivated in Vajrayāna should be cultivated on the basis of the experience produced during one of the empowerments (but the Gelugpas have a different perspective on this).

Vidyaraja said:

It isn't both, because I didn't ask if both were needed or useful. Rather I asked whether logic and concepts could ever capture truth, not whether they could lead to truth along with spiritual practice. What is a right view can only be truly confirmed through awakening and seeing things how they really are, not relying on the logical structures built by others, which are merely an aid or a single wing of a bird (the other being practice) in flight toward truth.

Malcolm wrote:

It is both, because in order to realize a thing, you need to be able to talk about.

This is very clearly explained by _all_ Indo-tibetan scholars including Dolbupa. He does not subscribe to your irrational mysticism at all. He is a very logical scholar, who goes step by step in presenting his logical, rational, carefully argued view because he wants people to use that as the basis of realizing the ultimate.

You are just mixing everything up into one big stew so you don't know if one minute you are chewing on Theosophy, the next minute Zen, the minute after that Vedanta, then slurping a bit of Dolbupa, etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 24th, 2013 at 3:52 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

They are dreaming. Such a doctrine exists nowhere in the Nikayas.

Vidyaraja said:

That's your opinion and your view. The various scholars mentioned previously as well as various figures in Thai Buddhism for example hold a different view. While you certainly know your stuff, you'll have to excuse me if I don't take you as a superior authority to them.

Malcolm wrote:

You know, you really need to read this book -- it will set your ideas about the Pali canon to rest completely.

The Selfless Mind: Personality, Consciousness and Nirvana in Early Buddhism by Peter Harvey. If you do not read this, it is really hard to take anything you say about this seriously. It will simply appear as if you are engaging in confirmation bias.

He systematically goes through all the claims your are fond of claiming are grounded in the Pali canon and dismembers them one by one.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 24th, 2013 at 3:40 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Vidyaraja said:

In any case, is truth able to be captured by logic or concepts, or is it supra-rational and beyond concepts? Is it knowable through reasoning, or must one awakening to it through kensho and satori as the Zen tradition would have it?

Malcolm wrote:

It is both, and the former will lead to the latter, which is why Āryadeva proclaimed "Realization proceeds from view." This is why there is such a huge emphasis on developing a correct view in sūtrayāna. Whereas in Vajrayāna in general, the view is taught only after empowerment, because the view cultivated in Vajrayāna should be cultivated on the basis of the experience produced during one of the empowerments (but the Gelugpas have a different perspective on this).

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 24th, 2013 at 3:34 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Koji said:

Malcolm, earlier you spoke about an "eternalist vision of nirvana" (Wed Sep 18, 2013 6:31 am). I am just wondering what an eternalist vision of nirvana is, exactly. Would it be outside of the realm of existence and non-existence?

Malcolm wrote:

The eternalist vision of nirvana that nirvana is as an unconditioned state to be realized, like brahman.

The non-eternalist view of nirvana (erroneously considered annihilationist in some quarters) is that nirvana is the permanent cessation of afflictions which lead to rebirth in samsara, leading to cessation of birth in samsara.

Koji said:

I read you as saying an unconditioned nirvana, like the Hindu brahman, is the eternalist vision of nirvana which, incidentally, is a view that you believe we must reject. But it is hard for me to wrap my mind around this let alone accept it when I have read from other sources like Nagarjuna's MMK, that nirvana is of the uncreated realm (XXV.13) which is different that the created realm of existence and non-existence.

Malcolm wrote:

Are you sure that you are presenting an assertion of Nāgārjuna's? Or a position that he is going to dismantle? Check carefully, you wouldn't want to make a mistake.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 24th, 2013 at 3:28 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

What about it? First of all, we have to understand the basis is empty, not just empty, since it is also clear but that emptiness is profound. This is fundamental in Dzogchen. Rig pa is not some permanent transcendent awareness. There is a point in time in which rig pa has not arisen, prior to the realization producing buddhas and nonrealization producing sentient beings. But this is a little outside the scope. Basically vidyā is just the mind that knows the appearance of the display as its own appearances. Avidyā is the mind that does not know that. Simple as pie.

conebeckham said:

I'd like to know more about the point in time prior to Rigpa's arising..but agree that's outside the scope.

The statement about vidyā and Avidyā, though.....there is the same "mind" that knows or does not know? Or are we speaking of momentary "minds"-and what of the Enlightened Ones, who abide permanently in vidyā? Or do they?

Malcolm wrote:

A mind or an awareness [shes pa] has a "choice" recognition or non-recognition. The recognizing mind is called vidyā or prajñā. The non-recognizing mind is called avidyā.

There are two kinds of Buddhahood in Dzogchen, abhisambodhi, which has a non-abiding nirvana; samyaksambodhi which enters nirvana without remainder.

Omniscience arises because the capacity for omniscience is present in the form of potential in the basis.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 24th, 2013 at 3:24 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

My understanding of Prasangika Mahdyamika (and someone please correct if i'm wrong) is not that it claims Nirvana is non-existence or something similar, it simply claims that inherent existence of anything is not findable, and it stops there, there is no underlying implication of inherent non-existence.

Malcolm wrote:

No, it is the Sautrantikas following tenets who assert that nirvana is a nonexistent.

Johnny Dangerous said:

I don't get it Malcolm, so it's correct that Prasangika does not make statements about ultimate reality, or it is incorrect?

Malcolm wrote:

They do not use syllogisms to prove emptiness. They use consequences. For example, "Production from self is meaningless and the series will be endless." This the classical example of prasanga argumentation, argument by means of demonstrating consequences.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 24th, 2013 at 3:22 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Vidyaraja said:

Yes, nirvana is supra-personal, but it is also awareness.

Malcolm wrote:

This is stated in no sūtra.

Vidyaraja said:

There was a thread on this forum called Mind vs. Self in which a few users argued quite successfully in my opinion, using citations from various scriptures including the Nikayas, for the transcendent Self. Many other intelligent scholars as well as Buddhist masters (like Dolpopa mentioned frequently in this thread) have also maintained this view. I don't think their conclusions were reached without long study or careful consideration and thus can't be said to be simply dreaming.

Malcolm wrote:

They are dreaming. Such a doctrine exists nowhere in the Nikayas.

Dolbupa was a Vajrayāna scholar first and foremost, and the majority of his views are derived from the way in which he read the three bodhisattva commentaries on Kalacakra, Hevajra, and Cakrasamvara respectively authored by Mañjuśrī, Vajragarbha, and Avalokiteśvara according to tradition.

Vidyaraja said:

Though I wonder, why are you hardline in your position that any Self is wrong and all the trends in Buddhism which have maintained it are in error, but soft and accepting of Stephen Batchelor's materialistic secular Buddhism as part of the Dharma?

Malcolm wrote:

I think Batchelor is as wrong as you are. I accept his presence in Buddhism as I accept yours, both with views in need of correction since both you and he are porting views into Buddhadharma from external sources, in your case Vedanta/Neoplatonism; in his case, secular materialism.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 24th, 2013 at 3:10 AM

Title: Re: Westerner who really makes it work at Sera

Content:

JKhedrup said:

You are on the ball Malcolm... I think it is a very reasonable qualm so I asked Geshe SN what he thought of it while bringing his evening drink.

Geshe la said the Rikchung candidate was correct, in asserting calm abiding/shinay was necessary for the attainment of bodhicitta.

How then, does one explain Lord Shakyamuni's arousing of bodhicitta in the hell realms?

Geshe la certainly a new attainment of Shinay would not be possible in the hell realms, especially when one looks at the texts and the various conditions that are required for Shinay. However, the shinay had been achieved to some degree in a previous life. Just as the imprints for bodhicitta were there, which allowed it to be arisen from hell from witnessing the suffering there, a level of calm abiding had been attained in a previous life. This attainment does not necessarily carry over from rebirth to rebirth, but in this case it did.

So, Shakyamuni was able to bring forth the Shinay necessary to arise bodhicitta despite the difficult conditions of the hell realm.

Would love to explore this further but further input from Geshe la would have to wait until breakfast (European time).

Malcolm wrote:

I think your Geshes answer is speculative at best. It amounts to saying that anyone who had attained rebirth in a deva realm has the sufficient causes for arousing bodhicitta.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 24th, 2013 at 3:05 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

My understanding of Prasangika Mahdyamika (and someone please correct if i'm wrong) is not that it claims Nirvana is non-existence or something similar, it simply claims that inherent existence of anything is not findable, and it stops there, there is no underlying implication of inherent non-existence.

Malcolm wrote:

No, it is the Sautrantikas following tenets who assert that nirvana is a nonexistent.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 24th, 2013 at 3:01 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

No such supreme seer is discussed in the sūtras. Buddhas, possessors of non-abiding nirvana, are held to possess two kinds of omniscience. But this omniscience is held to arise from a cause. As Kamalashila points out, omniscience must have a cause, otherwise it would arise randomly at all times and in every place. Even Dolbupa does not deny the need for conventionally gathering the two accumulations.

conebeckham said:

I understand we're trying to talk about "Early Buddhism and Mahayana" here, but you yourself have brought Dzgkchen into the picture (It's perhaps "Mahayana" in some sense....maybe?) ---I understand the sutras don't discuss a "Supreme Seer," but what about Dzogchen and Rigpa? What about the Natural State, and it's relation to omniscience, and it's relation to causation?

Malcolm wrote:

What about it? First of all, we have to understand the basis is empty, not just empty, since it is also clear but that emptiness is profound. This is fundamental in Dzogchen. Rig pa is not some permanent transcendent awareness. There is a point in time in which rig pa has not arisen, prior to the realization producing buddhas and nonrealization producing sentient beings. But this is a little outside the scope. Basically vidyā is just the mind that knows the appearance of the display as it own appearances. Avidyā is the mind that does not know that. Simple as pie.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 24th, 2013 at 2:45 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Vidyaraja said:

If Madhyamika were mere apophatic or via negative approach to reality in order to help us to awaken (which is what I feel it is or should be) that would be one thing, but it seems many people assert that the ultimate or nirvana is emptiness, anatta, and not eternal.

Malcolm wrote:

Nirvana is permanent (since cessations are by definition unconditioned), but it also lacks identity since there is no person in nirvana. There are no aggregates in nirvana.

Vidyaraja said:

so equally how can these Madhyamikist's statements about the ultimate be accepted merely through intellectual satisfaction or the result of logical analysis?

Malcolm wrote:

How can your irrational assertions about the nature of the ultimate be acceptable? What Madhyamakas produce is an analytical ultimate. There are reasons to criticize this from a Vajrayāna point of view, but not from a sutrayāna perspective. This is no more nor less than the analytical ultimate shown in Yogacara too, i.e., both ultimates are analytical and can be weighed on their merits in terms of argument. But the Buddhist path is not one of making dogmatic assertions about the ultimate. That is for other schools.

Further, Nāgārjuna clearly states:

Dependent on the relative, the ultimate is understood;
realizing the ultimate, nirvana is attained.

So we are to realize the non-categorized ultimate on the basis of our analysis of things -- not by mystical dogmatic assertions about transcendent nondual awarenesses.

Vidyaraja said:

The reason Buddha refrained from making assertions was to avoid metaphysical speculation or getting trapped in concepts about the ultimate rather than waking up and directly knowing it with our Dharma-eye.

Malcolm wrote:

Buddha made all kinds of metaphysical assertions apart from the fourteen famous positions he considered incorrect questions.

Vidyaraja said:

Buddha also never made the statement, "There is no self, nothing beyond the skandhas" but he did use anatta consistently as an adjective.

Malcolm wrote:

Which Buddha? The Buddha in Nikayas, Buddha in Prajñāpāramita, etc? You can't just go and cherry pick citations from this canon, that canon, and then assemble your ideal Buddha that corresponds to your biases. You need to carefully study everything. Buddha clearly states in the following passage there is no inherently existing self, while clarifying that we can agree to a conventional self:

"Ananda, if I — being asked by Vacchagotta the wanderer if there is a self — were to answer that there is a self, that would be conforming with those brahmins & contemplatives who are exponents of eternalism [the view that there is an eternal, unchanging soul]. If I — being asked by Vacchagotta the wanderer if there is no self — were to answer that there is no self, that would be conforming with those brahmins & contemplatives who are exponents of annihilationism [the view that death is the annihilation of consciousness]. If I — being asked by Vacchagotta the wanderer if there is a self — were to answer that there is a self, would that be in keeping with the arising of knowledge that all phenomena are not-self?"

"No, lord."

"And if I — being asked by Vacchagotta the wanderer if there is no self — were to answer that there is no self, the bewildered Vacchagotta would become even more bewildered: 'Does the self I used to have now not exist?'"

<http://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn44/sn44.010.than.html>

Vidyaraja said:

Why go through all the trouble saying what specifically is anatta rather than just proclaiming anatta as the ultimate to avoid all confusion? Could it be that he took it for granted that those he addressed his sermons to were well aware of the Great Self being part of the Indic spiritual culture from which they all derived?

Malcolm wrote:

No, absolutely not. Even in the tathāgatagarbha literature, the so called "self" that is being described is described in the Uttaratantra (as well as the commentary attributed to Asanga) on the basis of reality that is free from all extremes, that is to say the profound emptiness taught in Mahāyāna.

If you propose that there is some other self outside the all, Buddha would reply:

The Blessed One said, "What is the All? Simply the eye & forms, ear & sounds, nose & aromas, tongue & flavors, body & tactile sensations, intellect & ideas. This, monks, is called the All. [1] Anyone who would say, 'Repudiating this All, I will describe another,' if questioned on what exactly might be the grounds for his statement, would be unable to explain, and furthermore, would be put to grief. Why? Because it lies beyond range."

<http://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn35/sn35.023.than.html>

There is clearly no intention by the Buddha to teach some transcendent ultimate non-dual awareness in the Nikayas/Agamas. People who assert the opposite are simply dreaming.

So that's it, that's all there is.

In case you are worried that all those fabulous buddhaqualities would not be possible if emptiness is the real nature of everything, Nāgārjuna quips:

"For one whom emptiness is possible, for that one everything is possible; for one whom emptiness is not possible, for that one everything is impossible."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 24th, 2013 at 2:30 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Vidyaraja said:

I used attainment as a figure of speech, obviously one cannot attain what one already is and there is not, as you say, a person to know it, but I'd contend that the Supreme Seer "is" it and knows itself as it really is, which is not the aggregates, but rather transcendent pristine nondual Awareness. In any case, what happens when the impermanent aggregates dissolve or reenter the flux of becoming according to your view? If they cease to be in a state of becoming due to the removal of afflictions which cause rebirth, what is left?

Malcolm wrote:

No such supreme seer is discussed in the sūtras. Buddhas, possessors of non-abiding nirvana, are held to possess two kinds of omniscience. But this omniscience is held to arise from a cause. As Kamalashila points out, omniscience must have a cause, otherwise it would arise randomly at all times and in every place. Even Dolbupa does not deny the need for conventionally gathering the two accumulations.

Vidyaraja said:

I understand emptiness as applying to the phenomenal world of becoming or samsara. Once we see it as empty and anatta, we are released from it and attain awakening, which is a state free from becoming, impermanence, dukkha, and death. It is eternal, transcendent, blissful, indestructible, permanent, changeless, and Self.

Malcolm wrote:

You don't need to capitalize self.

Vidyaraja said:

Personally I don't understand how the views you and others describe, which have been accused of nihilism in the past and present and which, even if actually not nihilism, at least sounds close enough to it to have those charges brought up against it, could possibly be an attractive view of spirituality, the nature of ourselves, and our liberation. But as they say, 84,000 gates and various skillful means to account for the diversity of human needs and inclinations. I suppose the only way to know thing as they really are is to awaken.

Malcolm wrote:

We have no latent traces of attachment to divinity or any kind of supreme principle. We understand that samsara and nirvana are only possible because of the emptiness of both. We understand that both are nominal designations. As Nāgārjuna stated:

These two, samsara and nirvana do not exist.
Instead, thorough knowledge of samsara is nirvana.
And as Āryadeva stated, those who argue against emptiness, must argue for each and everything they argue is not empty, whereas Madhyamakas only need prove emptiness but once. So if your non-empty Buddhaqualities are infinite, you are left with the infinite task of proving each and everyone separately. I am sure there must be a hell for that...oh right, I forgot, it is called gzhan stong hell.

M

Author: Malcolm
Date: Tuesday, September 24th, 2013 at 2:12 AM
Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana
Content:
PorkChop said:
I thought it was the 3rd Noble Truth...

Malcolm wrote:
Cessation is the third truth of āryas.

PorkChop said:
Cessation of Dukkha right?
Dukkha is characterized by that which is "born, become, made, and conditioned" right?

Malcolm wrote:
Yes, cessations are unborn, unbecome, unmade, unconditioned.

They exist conventionally as nominal designations, not ultimately as ontological absolutes.

But many people today interpret this passage as if the Buddha was affirming an ontological absolute. They can if they like but I don't think the Buddha had the intention they seem to think he did. In the end it all boils down to opinion.

M

Author: Malcolm
Date: Tuesday, September 24th, 2013 at 1:43 AM
Title: Re: Westerner who really makes it work at Sera
Content:
Unknown said:
My partner began by asking whether calm abiding was necessary for the attainment of bodhichitta, to which I responded it was.

Malcolm wrote:

This is not correct, because if it was, Shakyamuni could not have first aroused bodhicitta in the hell realms.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 24th, 2013 at 1:12 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

PorkChop said:

I thought it was the 3rd Noble Truth...

Malcolm wrote:

Cessation is the third truth of āryas.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 24th, 2013 at 1:01 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The eternalist vision of nirvana that nirvana is as an unconditioned state to be realized, like brahman.

Vidyaraja said:

So how do we relate this to what the Buddha said here:

Malcolm wrote:

It's a pep talk, not to be taken literally as ontological commitment, IMO.

The non-eternalist view of nirvana (erroneously considered annihilationist in some quarters) is that nirvana is the permanent cessation of afflictions which lead to rebirth in samsara, leading to cessation of birth in samsara.

What is the difference between attaining the unconditioned state of nirvana and cessation of birth in samsara?

Cessations are not praptis, obtainments.

No one attains an unconditioned state of nirvana. There are no aggregates in nirvana and therefore, no person can be designated upon those aggregates. Nirvana is simply the cessation of the series of aggregates. Mind you, not the immediate cessation of aggregates, but rather the cessation of the afflictions that cause action which lead to rebirth. Another way to put it is that prajñā burns the afflictions. Once the afflictions are burnt, have no more effect, there is also no need for that prajñā so it too ceases.

If we deny the former, what is left or what are we led to in the latter? Who or what has ceased being born in samsara and what is the resultant state from such a cessation? In what way is it not eternal? If annica is impermanence and related to dukkha, how is the conquest of samsara not eternal or permanent? If it is not eternal or permanent, why bother?

Nirvana is a permanent state of cessation of birth in samsara. It is an extreme. That is why Mahāyāna conceived of the idea of so called non-abiding nirvana (in contrast with the Nikāya "abiding" nirvana), i.e., being in samsara but not of samsara. In general, the nirvana aspired to in Mahāyāna is the non-abiding nirvana.

Basically, if the word emptiness raises the hair on your neck, it is sign that in the past you were a Mahāyāna practitioner. As for me, as soon as I heard the word "emptiness" I knew I was home, and have been a adherent of the Prajñāpāramitā ever since.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 23rd, 2013 at 11:57 PM

Title: Re: The Meaning of Rebirth

Content:

undefineable said:

then there might be a 'Chance of the Gaps' among more reflective scientists

Malcolm wrote:

Buddhadharma excludes chance as a form of causation.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 23rd, 2013 at 11:10 PM

Title: Re: Ngondro

Content:

zimpickens said:

Hi,

I noticed above that deepbluehum posted that the number counting (in ngondro, I'm guessing) started in the 13th C. I'm curious about the history of this number counting and I wasn't sure that people were doing ngondro in the 13 C. so if there are any leads about this I would appreciate hearing about it.

So if deepbluehum or anyone else knows about these topics please let me know.

Thank you!

Malcolm wrote:

Hi Zim:

People did Ngondro, but the overall systematization of Ngondro seems to be a rather nineteenth century phenomena that spread from Kagyu to the other two schools i.e. Nyingma and Sakya. For example, the massive 350 folio commentary on the Lam 'bras preliminaries authored by Zimog Tulku in the nineteenth century was explicitly influenced by Kun bzang bla ma'i zhal lung. Before this text, there was no separate Sakya Ngondro commentary. And the first independent Ngondro text in Sakya was written by Dezhung Rinpoche.

However, there was ngondro from an ancient period of time. For example, the klong gsal nyi ma 'bar ma rgyud [which probably dates to the 13th century and is the root tantra for the mkha' 'gro snying thig] has a fully elaborated ngondro from chapters 63-75. For example, the refuge chapter, 67, does not give a number. Chapter 73 specifies doing Vajrasattva for 21 days, for example.

In general, I think the idea of doing 100,000 thousand comes from the idea of reciting mantras 100,000 times in the gsar ma tantras.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 23rd, 2013 at 8:35 PM

Title: Re: what is a melong?

Content:

Jikan said:

this may or may not be a DC-specific question.

what is a melong, and why would someone want one? by that I mean, what is its function?

thanks

Malcolm wrote:

Me long literally means "to arouse fire" suggesting its original use.

In general, the mirror is a symbol of rig pa. In the DC, it is worn for the purpose of Guru Yoga, primarily.

The mirrors sold by SS store are made from five metals, and all contain a bit of the original mirror given to ChNN by his guru. For DC people, other mirrors are fine, but in general it is better to use one made by Giorgio since they are made according to Rinpoche's precise specifications.

Other melongs you may see are one's crafted for long life mirrors, which function to summon all the essence of the elements reflected in that mirror. Other mirrors are worn as good luck charms. These mirrors typically are stamped with the srid pa'i ho mandala on the back and worn on one's belt. These are usually made of bell metal.

Prisms are also called "me longs."

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 23rd, 2013 at 8:23 PM

Title: Re: The Meaning of Rebirth

Content:

Seishin said:

Not only that, but it is woven into the fabric of Buddhadharma.

Malcolm wrote:

Of course, the entire point of practicing Buddhadharma, like practicing Samkhya, Yoga, Vedanta, Jainism, Bon and so on is to put an end to rebirth in samsara.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 23rd, 2013 at 8:12 PM

Title: Re: The Meaning of Rebirth

Content:

jeeprs said:

So I think understanding 'freedom from rebirth' is not actually a matter of whether you believe in reincarnation. It has a deeper meaning than that. It is about whether you are of this world, part of the whole cycle of birth-and-death, change-and-decay, rising-and-falling, that everything in nature is subject to. Nowadays we seem to think that 'natural' is good and wholesome, yet it is the case that everything in nature is subject to decay and death, even if it is temporarily beautiful, young and vital. Whatever is young becomes old, whatever is born will one day die. That is an inevitable fact for every born being.

So is there is something that is beyond change and decay, that is not subject to the constant cycle of birth and death, something that is always new, never perishing? I think that is what the Buddha found and points to. Living in the light of that, realizing what that is and making oneself available to it, is the meaning of 'liberation from the cycle of birth and death'. And I think that is the real 'meaning of rebirth' - not the exotic idea of 'I will be reborn for many lifetimes'.

Malcolm wrote:

This is a soft theory of rebirth. But it is not what was intended by the Buddha by the term punarbhāva, rebecoming. It is pretty clear [except to some confused westerners] that Buddha advocated a hard theory of rebirth.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 23rd, 2013 at 7:54 PM

Title: Re: Self hatred

Content:

Konchog1 said:

It's part of my refuge name, Konchog Namdag (rare and precious Triple Gem)

Malcolm wrote:

mchog means supreme. Look it up in any dictionary. Your name means Totally Pure Supreme Gem, actually.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 23rd, 2013 at 7:41 PM

Title: Re: The Hunting of Ed Snowden - the evolving power-play

Content:

Indrajala said:

We have less freedom now than what our grandparents enjoyed.

Malcolm wrote:

I think you are being a bit romantic. I am old enough to be your father, and have a pretty good recollection about how "free" speech was in the sixties and seventies. It was not very free. The thing is, that technology was not very advanced, it was a lot harder to track people and collect data on them. So it was easier to go under the radar. But then as now, there were the same pressures against freedom of expression. And in the generation before I was born there were the Red scares, Joe McCarthy and his gang, and so on in this country. Canada has always had more strict censorship policies than the US, following the lead of England.

Indrajala said:

Real political freedoms and freedom of speech are actively curtailed, meanwhile people are led to believe "progressive hiring policies", open-door immigration, acceptance of gay marriage and gender equality are what really count as indicators of freedom and rights.

Malcolm wrote:

Affirmative action was an important step in the US (and I guess in Canada) for moving minorities into the middle class out of step and fetch jobs. We don't have an open door immigration policy, so we don't have that issue. Gay Marriage and Gender equality are simply civil rights issues, that's all. Once the Civil Rights movement in the 1960's was more or less successful in eliminating Jim Crow laws and so on, all similar laws discriminating against people on the basis of religion, gender or gender preference were bound to fail, as they should fail.

Indrajala said:

Canada, like much of the rest of the west, is suffering a great deal of internal stress given increasing energy costs in the face of decadent levels of energy consumption. The natural reaction is to invest resources in increased policing and legitimization (like "we are the custodians of human rights").

Malcolm wrote:

I have been in a lot of places where laws were weak and persons were powerful. These places, like India, China, Mexico, and so on are more perilous places to live than the US and Canada.

I don't know about other people's experience but in the town where I live (in New England) there is so little crime that we really do not have a police force in any real sense.

I am sure than the experience of black communities in LA is quite different than mine, however.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 23rd, 2013 at 7:26 PM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Koji said:

Malcolm, earlier you spoke about an "eternalist vision of nirvana" (Wed Sep 18, 2013 6:31 am). I am just wondering what an eternalist vision of nirvana is, exactly. Would it be outside of the realm of existence and non-existence?

Malcolm wrote:

The eternalist vision of nirvana that nirvana is as an unconditioned state to be realized, like brahman.

The non-eternalist view of nirvana (erroneously considered annihilationist in some quarters) is that nirvana is the permanent cessation of afflictions which lead to rebirth in samsara, leading to cessation of birth in samsara.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 23rd, 2013 at 3:21 AM

Title: Re: Jetsun Taranatha

Content:

Karma Jinpa said:

Recently read that not only was Taranatha one of the closest disciples of the 9th Karmapa, Wangchuk Dorje, but that he also wrote about the histories of several tantras. I know some of what he penned about the Tara tantras wound up in Martin Willson's In Praise of Tara: Songs to the Saviouress, but does anyone know where his history of the Yamantaka tantras can be found?

For that matter, does anyone know what lineage(s) of Yamantaka were held by Jetsun Taranatha, and which are in Jonang? He practiced Kamtsang, Shangpa, and Jonang, so I'm all ears.

Malcolm wrote:

As a Jonangpa, he probably practiced Varjabhairava on the Rwa Lotsawa tradition, generally avoided by Kagyus because Rwa Lotsawa claimed he had ritually murdered Marpa's son.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 23rd, 2013 at 3:08 AM

Title: Re: Self hatred

Content:

KonchokZoepa said:

it actually means "rare and precious"

Malcolm wrote:

Actually it means "supremely rare"

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 23rd, 2013 at 2:35 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

Malcolm, 'basis' here means 'basis of an individual'?

Malcolm wrote:

Both.

dzogchungpa said:

What is the other one?

Malcolm wrote:

There are two bases, the original general basis and the basis of the person.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 23rd, 2013 at 1:57 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

Malcolm, 'basis' here means 'basis of an individual'?

Malcolm wrote:

Both.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 23rd, 2013 at 12:40 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

smcj said:

"Not an atom in the universe vibrates that isn't powered by love."

Malcolm wrote:

Correct, the aspect of the basis called compassion is the energy of the display of the universe and all its beings.

smcj said:

Wow. I thought that one wasn't going to find acceptance. He didn't say it to me, so I can't say this is an exact quote, but he continued, something along the lines of,

"Even hate is love; derailed by fear and ignorance, and then perverted by self-cherishing, but it is still love in its genesis."

I always assumed that was more of a Vajrayana-esque "pure view" perspective rather than a Dzogchen perspective, but he did practice Dzogchen too. Pearls before swine, I have not a clue.

Malcolm wrote:

Real "pure" view means seeing universe and beings arising as the basis. The "pure" view in Vajrayāna is merely a conceptual construction which itself needs to be remedied with the completion stage. Dzogchen skips the two stages.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 23rd, 2013 at 12:14 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

smcj said:

"Not an atom in the universe vibrates that isn't powered by love."

Malcolm wrote:

Correct, the aspect of the basis called compassion is the energy of the display of the universe and all its beings.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, September 22nd, 2013 at 11:48 PM

Title: Re: Karma Chagme & Neydo Kagyu

Content:

philji said:

I believe the Dentok Chikma , Machig guru yoga/Chod, originated with Karma Chagme

Malcolm wrote:

No, he just wrote a version based on earlier texts. Dentok Chigma is a term, not a title.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, September 22nd, 2013 at 11:26 PM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

I don't think these have been translated.

Son of Buddha said:

To Malcolm

could you link me to english translations of these Sutras if they even exist(your the only person I know who might be able to find one of these Translations)

Thank you for your time sorry to be now

Arya-dharanish-vararaja Sutra [also known as the Tathagata-maha-karuna-nidesha Sutra]

Anguli-malya Sutra

Jnana-loka-lamkara Sutra

Anuna-trapur-natva-nirdesha-parivarta Sutra

Mahab-geri Sutra

Avi-kalpa-prave-sha-dharani Sutra

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, September 22nd, 2013 at 11:04 PM

Title: Re: A Note on "Substance"

Content:

cloudburst said:

In clear words, Chandrakirti speaks of the difference in the views of ucchedavadins and Madhyamikas:

Clear Words said:

Qualm: Even so, their views are similar in one way, because nihilists consider the absence of an essence in things to be non-existence.

Reply: This is not so. They are not similar because Madhyamikas assert that things without essence exist conventionally; these nihilists do not assert them at all.

cloudburst said:

You may reflect on how this quotation also neatly puts paid to your assertions that 1) madhyamikas do not make assertions, and 2) the Gelug view is that ultimate truth is a non-existent, as Je Tsongkhapa follows Chandrakirti precisely on this point and Chandrakirti here rejects that explicit assertion.

Malcolm wrote:

The rendering you are using is a somewhat inaccurate gloss.

The text says:

saṃvṛtyā mādhyamikairastitvenābhyupagamānna tulyatā

དབུ་མ་པ་དག་གིས་ནི་ཀུན་རྫོབ་ཏུ་ཡོད་པར་ཁས་སྐྱངས་པའི་བྱིར་

"Because Mādhyamikas agree to existence in the relative..."

The text does not say they "assert" ['dod pa], or established [sgrub pa], etc. It says ābhyupagamā, which means assent, agree, etc.

The Tibetan recension contains an extra passage: དེ་དག་གིས་ཁས་སྐྱངས་པའི་བྱིར་མི་མཚུངས་པ་ནི་དེ་དོ།

"and because they [atheists] do not agree [to existence in the relative], [mādhyamikas and atheists] are not the same.

However, this passage is a clarification about what exists relatively, not ultimately. The set up for your citation is:

Here, someone contends "Mādhyamikas are no different than atheists [nāstikas, literally "deniers"]. For what reason? They claim virtuous and non-virtuous actions, agents, results and all worlds are empty of inherent existence., and also atheists also claim those things do not exist. Therefore, mādhyamikas are no different than atheists."

That is not so. Mādhyamikas are proponents of dependent origination. Because of production in connection with conditions this world and all other worlds beyond are proposed to be empty of inherent existence because they are produced in connection with conditions. Other worlds and so on are not conceived as non-existent through emptiness of inherent existence because of production in connection with conditions.

Now then, if it is asked why, they [atheists] reject other things similar to the things perceived in this world based upon the inherent perception of things of this world, having not perceived coming into this world from another world and going into another world from this world. [a complex way of saying atheists only believe what they can see]

If it is said, "In that case, because they conceive the absence of existence in the intrinsic nature of things as non-existence there is a similarity through this view." It is not so. Because Mādhyamikas agree to existence in the relative and because they [atheists] do not agree [to existence in the relative], [mādhyamikas and atheists] are not the same. The context of the language goes back to the idea that those who deny the Vedas are "nastikas", deniers or atheists [better word than nihilist, in my opinion]. Buddhists are considered nastikas by Hindus. Here Candra is rejecting the claim by pointing out cleverly that since Madhyamikas agree to [rather than assert or establish] such thing as karma, agents, results, this world, future worlds, etc., relatively speaking, even though they do not agree to essences, they agree to the moral structure of Indian religious discourse which in general is based on the idea of future lives, karma, etc.

But I don't think we can consider these so called atheists necessarily Carvakas or Lokayatis, etc., people who for example assert existence by virtue of svābhava. The classic example representing the Carvaka view is that things exist through their nature just like the colors in a peacocks feather. No one created it, it just happens that way. Unfortunately, we do not have any actual Carvaka texts, just parodies of their views here and there in Buddhist and Hindu texts and plays. These so called atheists may very well be just those who do not subscribe to a siddhanta, whether buddhist nor non-buddhist.

Finally, this passage does not defend your assertion that Tsongkhapa does not himself assert the ultimate is a non-existence, since we have already seen that you admit he does assert a non-existence as ultimate i.e. the non-existence of inherent existence in the ultimate.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, September 22nd, 2013 at 9:12 PM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

cloudburst said:

Since that which perceives or misperceives the basis is mind, you do not skip any intermediate step, and you end up as "substance dualistic," or not, as everyone else.

Malcolm wrote:

No, not exactly. But if you are interested in Dzogchen teachings [which I doubt], basically the point being underscored is that matter and intelligence are non-dual. For example, it is a special tenet of Dzogchen that even the formless realms are material, i.e., that basically, wherever there is matter, there is consciousness, wherever there is consciousness, there is matter. You can either say that matter is intrinsically conscious or that consciousness is intrinsically embodied. Either way it amounts to the same thing. "Sentient" and "non-sentient" are merely conventional designations based on appearances generated by ignorance.

cloudburst said:

And this light? What is that, precisely, photons? The truth of it is that you will engage in verbal gymnastics to avoid the use of the term "mind," but you can never stick the landing.

Malcolm wrote:

No, not photons, not physical light in the western scientific sense of the term. Precisely, the basis is ye shes. Empty luminous energetic ye shes which appears to a neutral awareness (which itself rises out of the basis when a vāyu in the basis stirs).

cloudburst said:

Mind and it's objects are the same nature, or substance.
Which substance is that?

Malcolm wrote:

They are the nature of empty appearances to awareness.

This certainly only means dependently originated appearances of material and immaterial objects.

Just wondering, since Sautrantikas like Vasubandhu clearly explain that mind and matter are different substances.

Sautrantikas say alot of things. There is a time and a place for that to be very helpful to some.

[/quote]

Generally, we understand that Gelugpas follow Sautrantika presentations of conventional truth. You know, that course outer madhyamaka that the gzhan stong pas keep yammering on about.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, September 22nd, 2013 at 8:56 PM

Title: Re: A Note on "Substance"

Content:

cloudburst said:

such as the existence of other worlds.

Malcolm wrote:

This just means a next life.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, September 22nd, 2013 at 6:40 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Vāyu means movement, and that is about it.

dzogchungpa said:
So how are the other elements defined in this context?

Malcolm wrote:
Read Germano's Tshig don mdzod

Author: Malcolm
Date: Sunday, September 22nd, 2013 at 5:56 AM
Title: Re: A Note on "Substance"
Content:

cloudburst said:
why do you say that, please?

Malcolm wrote:
Because they are advocates of "cutting off". You are conflating the ucchedavāda view with the Carvaka and Lokayati schools. They are not really the same.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Sunday, September 22nd, 2013 at 5:54 AM
Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana
Content:

Malcolm wrote:
The point is that in Dzogchen teachings mind and matter are not treated as different substances as they are in other Buddhist systems. They are equally treated as produces of the five elements. The way in which Dzogchen avoids the charge of being "physicalist" is that the five elements themselves arise from misperception of the nature of the basis [more or less emptiness endowed with light], without needing the intermediate step of proposing everything is an appearance of mind and so on. And of course the awareness that misperceives the basis arises out of a vāyu that stirs in the basis, and so on. It gets a little complex.

dzogchungpa said:
Well, this is where I get confused. What do you mean by the five elements then? Isn't vāyu one of them? It seems circular. Also, I don't mind if it gets complex, I would really like to hear the complete explanation.

Malcolm wrote:
Vāyu means movement, and that is about it.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, September 22nd, 2013 at 5:53 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

cloudburst said:

Simply dogmatically asserting your point will not convince anyone but your disciples.

Malcolm wrote:

You just admitted it.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, September 22nd, 2013 at 5:03 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

cloudburst said:

but your claim that dzogchen explains that mind is the operation of vayu in the body is a equally a form of physicalism.

Malcolm wrote:

One, it is it not a claim, it is textual fact.

Second, it would be if that were all there was to it.

The point is that in Dzogchen teachings mind and matter are not treated as different substances as they are in other Buddhist systems. They are equally treated as produces of the five elements. The way in which Dzogchen avoids the charge of being "physicalist" is that the five elements themselves arise from misperception of the nature of the basis [more or less emptiness endowed with light], without needing the intermediate step of proposing everything is an appearance of mind and so on. And of course the awareness that misperceives the basis arises out of a vāyu that stirs in the basis, and so on. It gets a little complex.

cloudburst said:

Mind and it's objects are the same nature, or substance.

Malcolm wrote:

Which substance is that? Just wondering, since Sautrantikas like Vasubandhu clearly explain that mind and matter are different substances.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, September 22nd, 2013 at 4:04 AM

Title: Re: Should Buddhists give money to Hare Krishnas?

Content:

Konchog1 said:

If the money promotes Hindu practices, then it breaks your refuge vows.

Malcolm wrote:

This is merely your opinion.

Your opinion is not supportable by scripture, it is not supportable by reason.

Ashoka, according to you, broke his vows of refuge by impartially donating money to Buddhist Sangha as well as non-Buddhist ascetics. Even the Buddha broke his vows of refuge, according to you, because he encouraged the Vajjians, the subjects of King Pasenadi, to continue to make offerings to and support non-Buddhist ascetics when they visited for offerings.

When people worry about Buddhists following the world wide trend of fundamentalism, such anti-liberal attitudes as this one you display is as far as they need to look to have their fears confirmed.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, September 22nd, 2013 at 3:58 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

cloudburst said:

[

Your information on Gelugpa is off, unfortunately. Gelugpa do not assert the ultimate to be a non-existent. Not at all.

Malcolm wrote:

Sure they do-- Tsongkhapa asserts the non-existence of inherent existence is the ultimate. Now you might argue that non-existence exists, as I am sure you will; but nevertheless, the Gelug view is that ultimate truth is a non-existence.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, September 22nd, 2013 at 3:57 AM

Title: Re: A Note on "Substance"

Content:

cloudburst said:

This is only one aspect of the Uchedavada view. They also believe many things to be non-existent, such as past and future lives, that they never conceived of as existent, as per Clear Words.

Malcolm wrote:

It is the primary sense of the term.

[/quote]

Nagarjuna only demolishes being in an ultimate sense, he and his disciples continuously assert being, or existence, on the conventional level, albeit as mere imputation as you eloquently established elsewhere in this thread.[/quote]

Well, they don't assert it, they accept it for the purposes of common discourse about appearances.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, September 22nd, 2013 at 3:13 AM

Title: Re: mala care

Content:

KonchokZoepa said:

geishhin well where do you keep it if not in a bag when not on use. i dont like holding it on my hand or wrist all the time.

Malcolm wrote:

Usually coiled on my practice texts.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, September 22nd, 2013 at 2:52 AM

Title: Re: mala care

Content:

KonchokZoepa said:

how do you wash your mala, and do you wash your mala?

Malcolm wrote:

Some people like to wash a new mala in pure water scented with pure sandalwood oil. This is actually a traditional procedure. I never bothered much with this personally. It might be nice to have a new mala blessed by some Lama, but the best blessing is your own mantra recitation.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, September 22nd, 2013 at 2:39 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

What I mean is this: Malcolm said earlier in this thread that incorrect views are not really dispelled through reasoning, but through realization, and I agree with that. I also have a lot of faith in the realization of Dudjom R and Dilgo K. If the orthodox Nyingma position, or at least the position of masters like Rongzom and Longchenpa, is not shentong, then they (DR and DKR) must have had good reason to go against that, I would think. So, there seems to be some issue here. Let me also say that I don't know enough about this stuff to have a position one way or the other, although intuitively based on what little I do know, I doubt that I would be a shentongpa.

Malcolm wrote:

As I have written elsewhere; gzhan stong principally arises from the hermeneutical urge to reconcile the treatises of Maitreya and Nāgārjuna with one another. Because Tibetan scholars typically assume that Maitreyanatha is identical to the future Bodhisattva Maitreya, they often feel they cannot privilege Nāgārjuna's views over those of Maitreya.

My feeling about Maitreyanatha is rather different. I feel he was just a normal human person, who lived at a time when there were three major trends of Mahāyāna sutras, i.e., prajñāpāramita, yogacara, and tathāgagarbha. He wrote five treatises: Sūtrālaṃkāra which presents a systematic account of Mahāyāna synthesizing all three trends primarily from a Yogacara perspective

Abhisamayālaṃkāra which presents the implicit paths and stages concealed within the prajñāpāramita sutras

Uttaratantra which synthesizes the thought of the ten tathāgatarbha sūtras

Madhyantavibhaga and the Dharmadharmatāvibhaga which analyzes specific issues in Yogacara thought.

I do not feel that it is necessary to try and reconcile these various trends. What is important is to understand the ideas presented in these three trends and then observe how they are used by later schools and scholars.

For example, the way tathāgatarbha is used in Secret Mantra and Dzogchen is quite different than the way it is presented in the Uttaratantra. The way Dolbupa uses the three nature theory is very different than the way it is used in the Yogacara of Maitreya and Asanga.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, September 22nd, 2013 at 2:29 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Koji said:

Based upon what Malcolm wrote, that emptiness is svabhava, which I assume is saying all entities lack svabhava which means entities are empty, does this create a split between those Buddhist traditions that don't see any svabhava at all, and those that follow tathagatarbha and all beings have the Buddha-nature? Right now I am getting the message that one tradition says that you have no essence, you are nothing, while the other says you have a Buddha nature. It sounds like one is nihilistic and the other is not.

Malcolm wrote:

What you say does not make any sense. Even those traditions that accept tathāgatagarbha as something like a self still maintain that entities such as matter, etc., and so on are empty of svābhāva. Their argument is that sentient beings have an essence, in other words that minds or consciousness has an essence. They are not arguing, actually, that all things have an essence.

Therefore, if you are going to attach to the label "nihilist" to those traditions that assert the absence of essence in insentient things, you would have to label all Mahāyāna traditions "nihilist", including the tathāgatagarbha schools.

If this is how you feel, you are better off following one of the non-Mahāyāna schools that assert that things exist by virtue of intrinsic characteristics.

Koji said:

I have no feelings in this matter. Nagarjuna is just confusing at times. Would you say that Nagarjuna's position that all entities are empty of svābhāva just a restatement of all entities or things are not the self (sabbe dhammā anattā, Dh 279)?

Malcolm wrote:

I would say his position is that there is no self which is the part of the aggregates or separate from them; and then when Buddha spoke self and not-self, there is a context that needs to be considered for each statement.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, September 22nd, 2013 at 12:31 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Well, that just means that the current Karma Kagyu orthodoxy is slightly eternalistic

dzogchungpa said:

It seems like the current Nyingma orthodoxy is too. Why do all these great masters succumb to the eternalist temptation?

Malcolm wrote:

I don't know why people keep on insisting this -- it isn't true. The orthodox Nyingma view represented by Rongzom, Longchenpa, and more lately Mipham and Khenpo Zhenga.

While it is true that Dilgo Khyentse and Dudjom Rinpoche followed the gzhan stong school in terms of sutrayāna, there are many masters such as Chogyal Namkhai Norbu, and so on who do not follow the gzhan stong school.

The primary reason why we think that Nyingma = gzhan stong is because the influence of Trungpa.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 21st, 2013 at 11:24 PM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

smcj said:

All I know is that in contemporary times Khenpo Tsultrim is the definitive voice on this subject for the Karma Kagyu sect. That means the quote I gave is safely said to be current Karma Kagyu orthodoxy.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, that just means that the current Karma Kagyu orthodoxy is slightly eternalistic, just as the current Gelugpa orthodoxy is slightly nihilistic, since the former assert the ultimate be an existent while the latter assert the ultimate to be a non-existent.

As for me, I will just stick with the great madhyamaka enunciated by Kawa Paltseg:
Freedom of two extremes in the ultimate is asserted as the great madhyamaka.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 21st, 2013 at 11:21 PM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Koji said:

Based upon what Malcolm wrote, that emptiness is svabhava, which I assume is saying all entities lack svabhava which means entities are empty, does this create a split between those Buddhist traditions that don't see any svabhava at all, and those that follow tathagatagarbha and all beings have the Buddha-nature? Right now I am getting the message that one tradition says that you have no essence, you are nothing, while the other says you have a Buddha nature. It sounds like one is nihilistic and the other is not.

Malcolm wrote:

What you say does not make any sense. Even those traditions that accept tathāgatagarbha as something like a self still maintain that entities such as matter, etc., and so on are empty of svābhāva. Their argument is that sentient beings have an essence, in other words that minds or consciousness has an essence. They are not arguing, actually, that all things have an essence.

Therefore, if you are going to attach to the label "nihilist" to those traditions that assert the absence of essence in insentient things, you would have to label all Mahāyāna traditions "nihilist", including the tathāgatagarbha schools.

If this is how you feel, you are better off following one of the non-Mahāyāna schools that assert that things exist by virtue of intrinsic characteristics.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 21st, 2013 at 10:32 PM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

smcj said:

The odd thing is is that Asanga was not fond of the tathāgatagarbha school.

Huh? That's kinda like saying Thomas Jefferson wasn't for independence from England!

Malcolm wrote:

You would think that if tathāgatagarbha were important to Asanga it would be mentioned in the Yogacarabhūmi, but the word de bzhin gshegs pa'i snying po, tathāgatagarbha, does not appear even once in the entire collection, and this is his Magnum Opus.

Now, it is true that there is a commentary on the Uttaratantra attributed to Asanga, and some scholars believe it is authored by him as well; but if so, this merely reinforces my elsewhere mentioned thesis that the Yogacara school and the Tathāgatagarbha were regarded as separate streams in Indian Mahāyāna and not mixed up with each other.

Of course, this statement in the Āryalaṅkāvatāra-nāma-mahāyānasūtravṛttitathāgatahṛdayālaṅkāra is very nice:

"The dharmatā of the mind liberated from the four extremes constitutes the sugatagarbha."

Here is another nice definition by Mūnīcandra in Sūtrālaṅkāravṛttibhāṣya:

"As such, since suchness exists in sentient beings, because of that, all sentient beings are tathāgatagarbhins."

This means that sentient beings enclose or hold (garbhin) the garbha of the tathāgatas, i.e., suchness.

Of course the Tarkajvala by Bhavya maintains:

The statement "The tathāgata pervades" means wisdom pervades all objects of knowledge, but it does not mean abiding in everything like Viśnu. Further,

"Tathāgatagarbhin" means emptiness, signlessness and absence of aspiration exist the continuums of all sentient beings, but is not an inner personal agent pervading everyone".

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 21st, 2013 at 9:22 PM

Title: Re: Finding One's Yidam

Content:

Karma Jinpa said:

A weird realization I just had is that there are a handful of peaceful deities in Kriya tantra that call out to me, but as far as [semi-]wrathful deities go, only 2 are of any interest in HYT. And there's nothing in between. Curious...

heart said:

The same deity often exist in various levels of Tantras so I might be a mistake to assign a deity to a certain level of Tantra, this is specially true in the Nyingma.

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

It is especially true universally in all four schools.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 21st, 2013 at 9:21 PM

Title: Re: Finding One's Yidam

Content:

Karma Jinpa said:

That said, all yidams are ultimately of the same nature and have completely realized the union of wisdom & compassion, so perhaps I'm fixating on something arbitrary due my mind wanting me to fit in a nice little slot that doesn't exist. From my academic work in Religion, including Vajrayana, I know deep down that there aren't really any solid categories and it's all more complex & fluid.

.

Malcolm wrote:

Yidams such as Jambhala and so on, other action deities (acton the sense of karma, not kriya) will not produce supreme siddhi.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 21st, 2013 at 9:19 PM

Title: Re: Finding One's Yidam

Content:

Luke said:

Sometimes the deity which is chosen for you at random is one you have a special connection with (according to Tibetan beliefs, at least).

Malcolm wrote:

This is a myth. I have been in Tibetan Buddhism for many, many years. Not once has any teacher ever picked out a yidam for me to practice. Yes, it does happen sometimes, but it is not common.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 21st, 2013 at 9:07 PM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

smcj said:

So, is there anything which is ultimately real, which does possess 'own-being'?

My favorite thing to quote is from Khenpo Tsultrim's "Progressive Stages of Meditation on Emptiness". In the chapter on Shentong he writes:

"This non-conceptual Wisdom Mind is not the object of the conceptualizing process and so is not negated by Madhyamaka reasoning. Therefore, it can be said to be the only thing that has absolute and true existence."

He goes on to explain that the non-conceptual Wisdom Mind is not self-empty like Nagarjuna's 4 points or the Prajnaparamita Sutras describe. They are "empty-of-other", that is empty of anything other than its own pure essence that is replete with the qualities of Buddhahood.

(btw Malcolm does not subscribe to this idea.)

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, and this is why gzhan stong does not really go beyond the false aspectarian yogacara of Ratnakaraśanti. The main difference between the two is that the former avoids the error of the latter, who assert that the non-existence of the imagined nature in the dependent nature is the perfected nature, thus setting up an internal contradiction that the dependent nature becomes unconditioned. Charitably, we can say that gzhan stong is an intermediate view between Yogacara and Madhyamaka.

The main error of the gzhan stong pas however, as I have written elsewhere, is the attempt to map the two truths onto the three natures, where they consider the perfected nature the ultimate and the imagined and the dependent natures relative. In doing, so, they basically do violence to the Yogacara school's own formulation of these three natures. The reason they do this is that there has been a compelling exegetical need of Tibetan scholars to rectify the treatises of Maitreya as a whole with the six texts of reasoning by Nāgārjuna. In the end, both systems lose since neither is accurately represented. Basically, gzhan stong represents an attempt to reconcile all the main lines of Indian Mahāyāna thought as I have noted elsewhere.

Further, by mixing the tathātagarbha doctrine into the mix, they also ruin that. The odd thing is is that Asanga was not fond of the tathātagarbha school.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 21st, 2013 at 7:42 AM

Title: Re: A Note on "Substance"

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

For example, when we say something is dravyasat (Tib. rdzas yod), we mean it "substantially exists".

dzogchungpa said:

What are the other kinds of sat or yod?

Malcolm wrote:

Conventional existence, ultimate existence, etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 21st, 2013 at 7:39 AM

Title: Re: A Note on "Substance"

Content:

jeeprs said:

But I don't think that can be then taken to mean that 'nothing is real', which is the error of nihilism.

Malcolm wrote:

The error of ucchedavada is that things which exist then perish, i.e., become non-existent. But Nāgārjuna tradition also demolishes being as well. Since neither being nor nonbeing are tenable, well, you don't have much left over to describe as real, or unreal, for that matter.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 21st, 2013 at 7:28 AM

Title: Re: A Note on "Substance"

Content:

jeeprs said:

Buddhism denies that there is any real essence or substance in individual things.

Malcolm wrote:

That depends entirely on which school of Buddhism you are talking about. The word we are using in Buddhism to describe something as a substance is dravya. For example, when we say something is dravyasat (Tib. rdzas yod), we mean it "substantially exists".

Many people act as if Madhyamaka and Madhyamaka influenced scholars present the truth (tm) in Buddhism. But it is not true. Madhyamakas continued to be criticized by both other Mahāyānists as well as by Nikāya schools until Buddhadharma perished in India.

It is primarily because Vajrayāna Buddhism enshrined Madhyamaka as the supreme tenet of sūtra that today we observe Madhyamaka is the something like the King of Buddhist philosophy to which everyone must pay homage, even scholars like Dolbupa.

That being said, I am myself, of course, of the conviction that Nāgārjuna got it right. Frankly, to borrow a phrase from Whithead, "The safest general characterization of the Buddhist philosophical tradition is that it consists of a series of footnotes to Nāgārjuna."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 21st, 2013 at 5:23 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

Substance dualism as far as I know is usually a Christian platonic term..that asserts that mind is a fundamentally different substance from matter.

I'm interested also to hear about the nuances of it from Malcolm.

Malcolm wrote:

Substance dualism is a description of Descartes viewpoint. It holds that mind is non-physical substance. So does Buddhism in general. For example, Vasubandhu defines mind as a dravya, which in general can be understood as "substance". In general, in Buddhism nama and rūpa are held to be different in kind and substance though mutually conditioning.

Johnny Dangerous said:

Got it, how does Dzogchen differ here? Beyond the obvious I mean... i have an inkling but i'm not sure.

Malcolm wrote:

While there are of course Dzogchen texts that describe mind and body as separate, in general, the innermost secret cycle holds that the perception that there is a difference between the animate and inanimate is a mistaken one. In the state of ultimate liberation, the distinction between animate and inanimate disappears because it is not true. Further, like other Vajrayāna traditions, Dzogchen provides a physical account for the process of rebirth. For example in the Vajramala Tantra it is proposed that the alayavijñāna inseparable with the mahāprāṇavāyu is responsible for transmigration, for the appropriation of a new series of aggregates. But Dzogchen goes a step further and explicitly identifies consciousness as the operation of a vāyu in the body. Vāyus of course are the function of the refined element of air inside the human body.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 21st, 2013 at 5:13 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Koji said:

But what definition of emptiness are you using? I am only aware of the definition found in the nikayas and agamas.

Malcolm wrote:

The definition found in Mahāyāna i.e. emptiness means empty of svābhava.

For example, in the Āryākṣayamatīrdeśatikā:

"The descriptions from the element of self (atmadhātu) up to the element of all phenomena (sarvadharmadhātu) are the nature of one taste in the ultimate dharmadhātu, emptiness. Since individual characteristics do not exist, all phenomena said to be "equivalent" since they are undifferentiated."

Koji said:

Sorry for asking another question. Is nirvana also empty of svābhava?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, of course, since it is a dharma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 21st, 2013 at 5:13 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

Substance dualism as far as I know is usually a Christian platonic term..that asserts that mind is a fundamentally different substance from matter.

I'm interested also to hear about the nuances of it from Malcolm.

Malcolm wrote:

Substance dualism is a description of Descartes viewpoint. It holds that mind is non-physical substance. So does Buddhism in general. For example, Vasubandhu defines mind as a dravya, which in general can be understood as "substance". In general, in Buddhism nama and rūpa are held to be different in kind and substance though mutually conditioning.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 21st, 2013 at 1:40 AM

Title: Re: The Hunting of Ed Snowden - the evolving power-play

Content:

Indrajala said:

And you think our present systems in the west are reflective of people investing their leadership with power? No, positions of major power are acquired by the merchant class through money. If they don't directly hold the seat of office, they are still the power behind the scenes calling the shots.

Malcolm wrote:

Depends on which leaders you mean? When it comes to major posts like "president" and the senate, yes, this is clearly a money game. In the US, the House is not so much a money game -- this is why we have such a diversity of wingnuts in the house. People actually do manage to vote people in who they feel represent their interests.

Even when the business class is "calling the shots", they will do so only so long as a) they are tolerated or b) are willing to resort to repressive measures. History shows that b) never works out in the end of for the oppressors. Oppression is a short term game with high costs for the players. So even the so-called "shot callers" are only able to call shots based in whether they are allowed to.

Indrajala said:

This is why Polybius praised the Roman model: it incorporated elements of monarchy, oligarchy and democracy.

Malcolm wrote:

As does the US system -- maybe this is why it is such a strong form of government. We have the Executive branch i.e. monarchy with a smattering of oligarchy; the judicial branch, clearly an oligarchy; and the house and the senate, democratic, with the latter tending towards oligarchic stasis. Sounds like your ideal place.

Indrajala said:

And in our present model the descendents of exploitative capitalists are increasingly corrupt and running "democratic" governments from Wall Street and other financial centers.

Malcolm wrote:

They are not increasingly corrupt, they are just as corrupt as they ever where and are ever going to get. They are just corrupt.

Indrajala said:

That's probably more to do with the wealth accumulation. Middle class people with an education are less likely to resort to petty crime. They got too much to lose (like property, a career and family).

Malcolm wrote:

It has a lot to do with the fact that it is a lot harder to get away with crime than it used to be in the US.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 21st, 2013 at 1:14 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

cloudburst said:

really, honestly and sincerely not true.

Malcolm wrote:

The manner in which the other schools resolved this is through recourse to a species of mentalism i.e. the subtle inner madhyamaka, if you will.

cloudburst said:

This is a definitional move, and a weak argument in my book.

Malcolm wrote:

No, seriously -- for example, Khyentse Wangchuk declares that there is no difference between mind and matter because everything is established as mind. This is perfectly acceptable thing to say in a Lamdre context. I have seen the same statement [everything is established as mind] coming from Gelugpas when they explain how one is to practice Vajrayāna, as opposed to how the Gelug sutra view is formed and asserted. This is also how the Kagyus phrase things.

This is not how Dzogchen deals with the issue at all. Please bear in mind that not everything said by Nyingmapas necessarily reflects the view of Dzogchen.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 21st, 2013 at 1:10 AM

Title: Re: The Hunting of Ed Snowden - the evolving power-play

Content:

Indrajala said:

Giving too many people access to political power is unwise, though such ideas are contrary to contemporary democratic ideals.

Malcolm wrote:

So you have basically become a monarchist, for all intents and purposes. Good luck with that.

Indrajala said:

I personally would rather have a ruling class that has power by virtue of inherited title

Malcolm wrote:

As if this has ever actually worked at any time in history in any civilization. Āryadeva points out the foolishness of this kind of thinking in 400 Verses. He clearly advises kings that kings (and leaders in general) rule because of the power the people invest in them and not otherwise.

Indrajala said:

It is in the interests of a landed aristocracy to look to the well-being of their populace because their power base depends on them, not business activities. I'd rather have real kings than kingmakers, so to speak.

Malcolm wrote:

Pure romanticism. The landed aristocracy in western England, for example, left their people starving and in rags. In France it was worse. Russia, even worse. There have been very few "enlightened" kings in history capable of ruling with a fair hand and with the benefit of their people as their chief priority. Mostly they are the descendants of plundering mercenaries and invaders, for example, like the Normans. Further, history shows that in general, generations of landed aristocracy become increasingly more corrupt and exploitative. It is just a form of primitive capital accumulation, that's all.

Indrajala said:

In any case, our present models in the west are rapidly unwinding. We have a lot less freedom now than our grandparents did, which should be alarming, but for many it isn't.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, but that is a social consequence of technology and economics. We also have a great deal less crime in the West than we did fifty years ago. The reason US prisons are so full is because of our ridiculous and ineffective drug laws.

Indrajala said:

As time goes on democracy will fail, tyranny will solve the problems of the day (probably at the cost of many lives) and then people will probably look back with disgust at the models of society and government we so often cherish today. Such is how political cycles operate in western civilization.

Malcolm wrote:

Maybe, maybe not. Personally, I don't believe that in our lifetime there will be much change in the world political balance status quo unless it is driven by a major energy crisis, or because of escalating climate instability. Even so, here in the US, I don't foresee much true political instability. Our system is actually fairly distributed and decentralized.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 21st, 2013 at 12:40 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

cloudburst said:

really, honestly and sincerely not true.

Malcolm wrote:

The manner in which the other schools resolved this is through recourse to a species of mentalism i.e. the subtle inner madhyamaka, if you will.

Anyway, I think you can agree a separate thread is required.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 21st, 2013 at 12:25 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Koji said:

But what definition of emptiness are you using? I am only aware of the definition found in the nikayas and agamas.

Malcolm wrote:

The definition found in Mahāyāna i.e. emptiness means empty of svābhava.

For example, in the Āryākṣayamatīrdeśatikā:

"The descriptions from the element of self (atmadhātu) up to the element of all phenomena (sarvadharmadhātu) are the nature of one taste in the ultimate dharmadhātu, emptiness. Since individual characteristics do not exist, all phenomena said to be "equivalent" since they are undifferentiated."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 20th, 2013 at 10:46 PM

Title: Re: Direct rebirth as a bug

Content:

lobster said:

It should be regarded as particular to forms of a buddhism that are perpetuated by those without a comprehensive education.

Malcolm wrote:

This is a pretty snotty and arrogant statement, as well as being factually untrue. There are all kinds of people far more educated than you, fully conversant in the latest on neuroscience, physics, and so forth, who nevertheless continue to adhere to a belief in transmigration or rebirth or reincarnation.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 20th, 2013 at 9:41 PM

Title: Re: The Hunting of Ed Snowden - the evolving power-play

Content:

Indrajala said:

As Plato and Polybius described long ago, democracy naturally leads to the most brutal of dictatorships.

Malcolm wrote:

Winston Churchill quipped "It has been said that democracy is the worst form of government except all the others that have been tried."

Indrajala said:

The expansion of competing political groups leads to political deadlock, which means major problems remain unresolved while the commonly accepted standard of living declines. The masses are quick to allow for tyranny if it is in their interests regardless of the ethical implications.

Malcolm wrote:

So what do you suggest, Monarchy?

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 20th, 2013 at 9:30 PM

Title: Re: "Sung-due" collection of sutras

Content:

Sherlock said:

Can anyone tell me more about this collection of sutras by Tsongkhapa called the "Sung-due". I found some information that might be relevant here:

<http://www.lamayeshe.com/?sect=article&id=310>

I got advice from Lama Dawa regarding this collection.

Malcolm wrote:

The gzung 'dus is mainly a compendium of dharanis [gzungs]. But I don't think it was assembled by Tsongkhapa. I could be wrong, but I think it is older than him. Anyway, it contains many extracts of the dharani portions of sutras, small sutras, for healing, repelling obstacles, it has aspiration prayers, etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 20th, 2013 at 9:19 PM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

smcj said:

Everyone agrees the absolute is ineffable, therefore all teachings are provisional.

Malcolm wrote:

No, the Gelugpas assert it is effable.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 20th, 2013 at 9:18 PM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

jeeprs said:

Emptiness - the essence of all there is Regrettably, that is a big no-no in Buddhist philosophy. Emptiness is exactly the absence of essence. In fact the one thing that everything has in common is absence of essence.

Malcolm wrote:

Candrakirti clearly says in the Prasannapāda, essencelessness is the essence of everything.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 20th, 2013 at 9:17 PM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Son of Buddha said:

“O Lord, there are two kinds of wisdom of emptiness with reference to the tathāgatagarbha.

The tathāgatagarbha that is empty is separate from, free from, and different from the stores of all defilements.

And the tathāgatagarbha that is not empty is not separate from, not free from, and not different from the inconceivable Buddha-Dharmas more numerous than the sands of the Ganges River.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, the question becomes what buddha-dharmas means in this context.

But all of this is really wide of the mark of the main conversation I was having with Vidyārāja, the essence of which "what constitutes a criteria for calling someone Buddhist or non-Buddhist", spurred by my remark that so called "Early Buddhism" is a pedantic reconstruction.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 20th, 2013 at 8:30 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Son of Buddha said:

we can separate the 2 terms but I will just quote further proof to connect them back together.

Malcolm wrote:

it's not necessary. The fact is that the term dharmadhātu has a limited usage in these sutras. The term dharmadhātu is synonymous with emptiness, which is what you asked me to show. I have shown that. Nothing you can cite will show the opposite.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 20th, 2013 at 8:25 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

jeeprs said:

So the modern rejection of the idea of 'eternal round' on the basis that it is not really a part of the original meaning of the teaching, completely changes its context. Without the prospect of being bound to the wheel of samsara for life after life, 'nirvana' then becomes simply a state of being 'stress free' and Buddhism more like a psycho-therapeutic discipline than a sadhana.

Malcolm wrote:

It all really depends on how interested you are in forcing people to follow a "religion".

jeeprs said:

Not in the least. I have no power to coerce anyone nor any interest in doing so. It is simply a matter of respect for the teaching. Secular interpretations may be fine, but they are derivative, not definitive, which is what many people are trying to make them.

Malcolm wrote:

As we have seen throughout this thread, one's persons definitive is another person's provisional.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 20th, 2013 at 7:31 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Which emptiness? Which tradition? Whose interpretation?

Vidyaraja said:

How about your interpretation? Who or what is aware of emptiness in your view?

Malcolm wrote:

The non-categorizable emptiness has no characteristics so it cannot be a direct object of a conventional mind. As Shantideva states, "the ultimate is not within the experiential range of the mind".

Obviously, categorizable emptiness can be conceived by a conventional mind since that kind of emptiness is also a convention, designated on the discovery of a non-existence such as this seed is empty of inherent existence because it is a product. Whatever inherently exists cannot be a product.

Conventionally speaking however, a non-conceptual wisdom "apprehends" emptiness.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 20th, 2013 at 7:21 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Son of Buddha said:

your search engine is off.

Malcolm wrote:

I did not use a search engine, I performed a manual search of the digital file of the two volume version present in the bka' 'gyur.

Son of Buddha said:

with that said I respectfully disagree.....But at the same time to refute you I would have to literally reread and note every single time the phrase Dharmakaya

Malcolm wrote:

We are not discussing the term dharmakāya, rather we are discussing the term dharmadhātu.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 20th, 2013 at 6:18 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

cloudburst said:

All four traditions of Tibetan Buddhism, when correctly understood, reject substance dualism. The Gelugpas, at least, also present the teachings in such a way as to allow someone prone to substance dualism to benefit from it a provisional stance. I suspect the other traditions do as well. Each tradition is very rich.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, it is true that because the five schools [we must include Bon] are tantric, they have a better shot at it. But really, honestly, only in Dzogchen teachings is the substance dualism that is a prime feature of Buddhist thought from abhidharma right up the the lower tantras truly overcome in an explicit fashion.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 20th, 2013 at 6:13 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

jeeprs said:

So the modern rejection of the idea of 'eternal round' on the basis that it is not really a part of the original meaning of the teaching, completely changes its context. Without the prospect of being bound to the wheel of samsara for life after life, 'nirvana' then becomes simply a state of being 'stress free' and Buddhism more like a psycho-therapeutic discipline than a sadhana.

Malcolm wrote:

It all really depends on how interested you are in forcing people to follow a "religion".

Frankly, all many people want from meditation and yoga is a lack of stress in this life. Buddha also provided for this kind of person, as it made perfectly clear in the Kalamas sutra. If we classify the kind of teaching that Batchelor and people like him, the so called Secular Buddhists, seem to advocate, they are teaching what is termed by the Buddha as "the vehicles of devas and humans". But that is a Buddhist vehicle, and we have to respect it as such, even if we imagine we want more, something like total liberation.

Again, it boils down to the patches on Buddha's robes.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 20th, 2013 at 6:09 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

LastLegend said:

There is a Deathless state. Why wouldn't there? "It" is not going anywhere.

Malcolm wrote:

When you have eradicated all afflictions which cause rebirth, this is all the deathlessness you need. No more birth, BAM! no more death.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 20th, 2013 at 6:08 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Vidyaraja said:

Why is it too broad? Who or what is aware of emptiness?

Malcolm wrote:

Which emptiness? Which tradition? Whose interpretation?

Vidyaraja said:

And what do we make of the following by Padmasambhava:

Malcolm wrote:

He is talking about vidyā. If you understand the context of the Dzogchen tradition from which this is derived, you will understand that non-buddhists are thought to misidentify vidyā and make incorrect imputations upon it.

Otherwise, you will observe that the list is in ascending order, from non-Buddhists to common Dzogchen terms:

vehicles of non-Buddhists = atman

sravakas = anatman

Mahāyāna denominations:

mind perfection of wisdom

tathāgatagarbha

Vajrayāna

mahamudra

thig le gnyag gcig dharmadhātu

ālaya
tha mal gyis shes pa

So I guess this means that you are happy to consider tathāgatagarbha equivalent to mind-only, correct?

Author: Malcolm
Date: Friday, September 20th, 2013 at 5:58 AM
Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana
Content:

Son of Buddha said:
so this means you don't know first hand how many times Dharma Dhatu is actually mentioned in the Tathagatagarbha Suttas, your information is based upon the search engine you are using and is only as good as the search engine that is being used.....with that said your search results are flawed.

Malcolm wrote:
The Tathāgatagarbha sūtra does not use the word dharmadhātu even once. It simply is not used in that sūtra as it is present in the bka' gyur

Yup, you are correct, in terms of the Nirvana sūtra, the search engine I used was flawed it will not return searches in texts that span two volumes.

So, I checked via other means and In the Tibetan recension of the two volumes of the Nirvana sutra the term "chos kyi dbyings" i.e. dharmadhātu occurs exactly total of sixteen times. It does not suffer this problem for shorter sutras that do not span volumes. Since the other tathāgatagarbha sūtras are quite short, I have no fear that my search was flawed. Here it is, BTW:

<http://www.istb.univie.ac.at/kanjur/xml3/xml/>

Here is another interesting quote from the Nirvana sutra:
Son of a good family, all phenomena are false, where they cease, that is called "true", "a true perception", "dharmadhātu", "wisdom of perfection", "ultimate" and "ultimate emptiness".

Son of Buddha said:
this is actually explained in the sutra, you see when the Dharmakaya is obscured by defilements it is referred to as the Tathagatagarbha.

Malcolm wrote:
Yes, I know.

Son of Buddha said:

Now Malcolm the Teachings of Emptiness is of the Tathagatagarbha/Dharmakaya is actually taught in the Buddha Nature Sutras in extreme detail.the Emptiness that is taught is "other Emptiness" i.e Shentong

Malcolm wrote:

This is highly debatable.

Son of Buddha said:

it wasn't neglected.....you just couldn't find the info in your search engine.

Malcolm wrote:

It's neglected, since a proper and thorough examination of the term dharmadhātu revealed that it occurs exactly 16 times in the Nirvana sūtra's Tibetan recension. There is no Sanskrit original, so you would have to consult the Chinese in order to cross check this. I listed the other mentions. My point still stands the same.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 20th, 2013 at 5:15 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The Buddha identifies them explicitly. Vipassi, Sikhin, etc.

Vidyaraja said:

So what about the part about the ancient way that leads to Brahma?

Malcolm wrote:

You mean this?

Vidyaraja said:

7 S.IV.117: te brāhmaṇā purāṇaṃ saranti . . . so maggo brahmapattiyā. In Itiv., 28, 29 those who follow this (ancient) Way taught by the Buddhas are called Mahātmās. [Mais, Sn.284–315, maintenant que es Brāhmaṇs ont négligé depuis longtemps leur Loi ancienne, le Bouddha la prêche à nouveau.]

Malcolm wrote:

I am sure you can find someone on Dhammawheel who can explain those passages to you correctly.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 20th, 2013 at 4:49 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Vidyaraja said:

genius of Dolpopa's Mountain Doctrine to support my affirmation of the Self in the context of Buddhism.

Malcolm wrote:

If you really want to understand this work, you need to study with Jonangpas, and practice Kalacakra.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 20th, 2013 at 4:44 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Vidyaraja said:

Also, what is the relationship between emptiness and awareness? Who or what is aware of emptiness?

Malcolm wrote:

Your question is too broad.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 20th, 2013 at 4:42 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Vidyaraja said:

Just because it isn't explicitly expressed doesn't mean it isn't implicit. There is duality between nirvana and samsara, but in my opinion the deathless Nirvana which Buddha speaks of is without differentiation.

Malcolm wrote:

Purusha is also undifferentiated, as well as uncreated, deathless, permanent, etc. Purusha satisfies all your criteria for a self. And if you don't like Samkhya plurality of purushas, you always have the Advaita interpretation of Purusha as one without a second.

Vidyaraja said:

Who were the formerly Awakened Ones he speaks of.

Malcolm wrote:

The Buddha identifies them explicitly. Vipassi, Sikhin, etc.

Vidyaraja said:

So you are an enlightened Buddha?

Malcolm wrote:

No, it just means I am certain about what Buddhadharma means to me, and which parts of it are definitive and which parts are provisional.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 20th, 2013 at 4:16 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

Honestly, I don't know. In ordinary life I seem to be able to use the word well enough. What do you mean by it?

Malcolm wrote:

Well I have already explained that Dzogchen maintains that everything including buddhahood is completely equivalent with an illusion.

dzogchungpa said:

I know, I'm sorry for being so obtuse. So, the purpose of Dzogchen is to know precisely what? A delusion?

Malcolm wrote:

Emptiness, of course.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 20th, 2013 at 4:06 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

Honestly, I don't know. In ordinary life I seem to be able to use the word well enough. What do you mean by it?

Malcolm wrote:

Well I have already explained that Dzogchen maintains that everything including buddhahood is completely equivalent with an illusion.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 20th, 2013 at 3:55 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Right, this is why I don't follow this point of view. Dzogchen has exactly the opposite point of view. The purpose of Dzogchen is to know precisely your own state.

dzogchungpa said:
Is that state real?

Malcolm wrote:
What do you mean by real?

Author: Malcolm
Date: Friday, September 20th, 2013 at 3:47 AM
Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana
Content:
cloudburst said:
You're practically a Gelugpa.

Malcolm wrote:
Thanks for the compliment, but I don't think so.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Friday, September 20th, 2013 at 3:45 AM
Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana
Content:
dzogchungpa said:
M: The body is made of food, as the mind is made of thoughts.
See them as they are. Non-identification, when natural and spontaneous, is liberation. You need not know what you are.
Enough to know what you are not. What you are you will never know, for every discovery reveals new dimensions to conquer.
The unknown has no limits.
Q: Does it imply ignorance for ever?
M: It means that ignorance never was.
Don't get mad.

Malcolm wrote:
Right, this is why I don't follow this point of view. Dzogchen has exactly the opposite point of view. The purpose of Dzogchen is to know precisely your own state.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Friday, September 20th, 2013 at 3:43 AM
Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana
Content:

Vidyaraja said:

Samkhya is dualistic, Buddhism is nondual.

Malcolm wrote:

Which Buddhism? Certainly not the Buddhism of the Pali Canon. Bhikkhu Bodhi for example has argued for a hard dualism of nirvana and samsara. Samkhya merely proposes a different account of unconditioned and conditioned. Purusha is the unconditioned, Prakṛiti is the conditioned. Purusha is the self, prakṛiti is the not self.

Basically, all you atmanvadins are doing is merely imposing Samkhya onto Buddhism.

Vidyaraja said:

Just because the Buddha had a unique conceptual system for expressing the inexpressible and leading his followers to the one Truth doesn't mean he denied the Self. Aside from that, ask Ananda Coomaraswamy points out in his book "Hinduism and Buddhism", the Buddha didn't think his way was utterly novel:

Malcolm wrote:

Honestly, you will be happier as a devotee of Advaita. You will always be miserable in Buddhadharma because you have to work so hard to find places where you think your views are expressed. But in Advaita, or Trika, it is fully present.

Vidyaraja said:

"I have seen," the Buddha says, "the ancient Way, the Old Road that was taken by the formerly All-Awakened, and that is the path I follow"; and since he elsewhere praises the Brāhmaṇs of old who remembered the Ancient Way that leads to Brahma, there can be no doubt that the Buddha is alluding to "the ancient narrow path that stretches far away, whereby the contemplatives, knowers of Brahma, ascend, set free" (vimuktāḥ), mentioned in verses that were already old when Yajñavalkya cites them in the earliest Upaniṣad.

Malcolm wrote:

Buddha used a lot of metaphors with an intellectual history. This does not prove he is a Vedantic sage, or was a proponent of Vedanta. There is absolutely no evidence of this.

Their views are important as part of the history of ideas; however, no serious expert in the field of Buddhist studies really holds their theosophically informed opinions in any regard.

These individuals weren't theosophers, some were Theravadin Sangharajas and some just Pali scholars. Coomaraswamy was a genius who was an expert in religious studies, metaphysics, and I believe could speak some 30 languages. I am sure there are also contemporary experts in Buddhist studies who maintain the view of the Great Self, like Susan K. Hookam of Oxford University for example.

The four westerners (Coomaraswamy was western educated) you mentioned are all deeply influenced by Theosophy. Coomaraswamy may have been a genius, but his understanding of Buddhism is sorely deficient as far as I am concerned.

I doubt Shenphen Hookham as the same idea about this that you do. gzhan stong is complicated, has many schools, and Kongtrul's (about which she wrote) is basically a modified version of Sakya Chogden's gzhan stong, which is markedly different than Dolbupa's version.

You are a perennialist. This is fine, but you do realize that your views are a severely minority opinion in Buddhadharma.

Seems to prop up more frequently the more I read of older Buddhist masters. For example, I've been reading on Korean Buddhism as of late, and both Chinul and later Gihwa wrote on how they believed Taoism and Neo-Confucianism (at least in the case of Gihwa who was writing during the Joseon) were valid paths.

That does not mean these scholars mistook Taoism and Ne-Confucianism as leading to the same result Buddhadharma purports.

Good luck to you in your search for truth.

I am not searching, but thanks. I am pretty clear about what I think is the real meaning of Buddha's teachings.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 20th, 2013 at 3:20 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

cloudburst said:

but they qualify those statements to make it clear that the self does exist as mere imputation.

Malcolm wrote:

Which I made clear at the outset. The self exists as an imputation, it does not exist where it is imputed, that is the meaning of "non-existent". The habit of grasping is responsible for that imputation, hence we have the term "the habit of grasping a non-existent self". This habit itself functions as an agent of karma and an object upon which karma ripens, without the self it imputes existing where it is imputed.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 20th, 2013 at 3:16 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

Malcolm, could you say more about the truth and freedom you do aspire to?

Malcolm wrote:

Perfect dharmatā is nonarising, alternately, self-liberated without grasping.

Why? The cause of self-liberation is unceasing nonattachment.

It is free from a mind of grasping attachment.
Recognize this again and again.
If one familiarizes oneself repeatedly,
one is a person who has seen the truth.
The Self-Risen Vidyā Tantra

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 20th, 2013 at 3:03 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

cloudburst said:

And yet I do not think that accepting Batchelor as a Buddhist and yet publically showing the internal contradictions, fallacies, prejudices and so forth inherent in his positions is a waste of time.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, we all make choices.

cloudburst said:

I started out as a materialist and was greatly helped by strong refutations of this materialist view found in my early studies, mostly of Nyingma teachers.

Malcolm wrote:

The funny thing is, Dzogchen texts reject the substance dualism prevalent in virtually the entire Buddhist tradition.

cloudburst said:

It is painful to try and hold a view that cannot be defended, so people move.

Malcolm wrote:

Most people just suck up the party line. It is often difficult enough just to understand that, without understanding why it might be defective or problematical.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 20th, 2013 at 2:44 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Koji said:

Just curious, are there differing standards of what Buddhadharma is or just one standard? If just one standard in which tradition or texts can we find it? I think beginners would like to know so we could say something like, "That isn't Buddhism."

Malcolm wrote:

In my opinion basic standards which would indicate a person or a school is Buddhist in orientation are:

A dharma theory based on skandhas, dhātus and āyatanas.

A theory of suffering based on of affliction and dependent origination.

A path theory based on śamatha and vipaśyāna.

Acceptance of the four seals.

A concept of refuge.

I think that this basic framework provides a wide latitude for differences of opinion, including for example eternalist interpretations of the tathāgatagarbha sutras or the austere doctrine of emptiness taught in Madhyamaka and Prajñāpāramitā. It even has room for "heretics" like Batchelor and Zenmar.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 20th, 2013 at 2:36 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

Was Dudjom Rinpoche a gzhan stong pa?

Malcolm wrote:

He was a gzhan stong pa, yes. But not really in the same way that Dolbupa was.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 20th, 2013 at 2:35 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Vidyaraja said:

I wouldn't say it is clear cut that this view is an import into Buddhadharma. Many have argued and continue to do so that the Buddha didn't deny the Self but rather used anatta as a via negativa approach to deny reality to the empirical self consisting of the impermanent aggregates. See my post in this thread for some quotes on this:

Malcolm wrote:

What you are suggesting is already found in Samkhya system. I.e. the twenty four tattvas are not the self aka purusha. Since this system was well known to the Buddha, if that's all his insight was, then his insight is pretty trivial. But Buddha's teachings were novel. Why were they novel? They were novel in the fifth century BCE because of his teaching of dependent origination and emptiness. The refutation of an ultimate self is just collateral damage.

Vidyaraja said:

Now, you are free to disagree, but if this line of thought (which is shared by other scholars like George Grimm, CAF Rhys Davids, Perez-Reimon, Ananda Coomaraswamy, the Thais of the Dhammakaya movement, other Theravadins, etc.) is correct, then the no-self doctrine as applied to Nirvana is an import into Buddhadharma.

Malcolm wrote:

Their views are important as part of the history of ideas; however, no serious expert in the field of Buddhist studies really holds their theosophically informed opinions in any regard.

Vidyaraja said:

As to saying that this view doesn't bring about realization, I think numerous Hindu sages from the time of the Vedic rishis up to modern figures like Nisargadatta Maharaj, the Christian mystics like Pseudo-Dionysius or Meister Eckhart, the Sufi sheikhs such as Ibn Arabi and Rumi, Neoplatonist mystics like Plotinus and Iamblichus, Taoists like Lao Tzu, Jains like Mahavira, the Sikhs, Kabbalists, various occult figures, and various Amerindians who speak of the Great Spirit, as well as the Buddhist masters like Dolpopa, and various Zen figures like Huang Po would disagree. Now of course, all intellectual views must be transcended to reach the wordless, intuitive, direct realization of Truth, but nonetheless. My point is, while many of these sages aren't Buddhists, the Madhyamika figures who deny the transcendent Absolute and the Great Self are the minority in the spiritual history of mankind.

Malcolm wrote:

But they are clearly defined majority in the annals of Buddhadharma, which is our subject of discussion.

Vidyaraja said:

You are free to believe that they are an elite who have had the highest realization and everyone else has been deluded or of inferior realization, but for one I refuse to believe that is the case, not only because of the unity across time, culture, religion, etc. of those figures who maintained this view, but because of my own experience tells me otherwise.

Malcolm wrote:

You are a perennialist. This is fine, but you do realize that your views are a severely minority opinion in Buddhadharma.

It is not a question of higher or lower realization. The fact is that the liberation to which you aspire is not one I share. It does not mean I am going to deny you the right to call yourself a Buddhist because you happen to hold views that I consider to be out of step with the primary trends of the evolution of Buddhist teachings. The fact is that the liberation to which Batchelor aspires is not one I share. The fact is that the liberation to which the Pure Land people aspire is not one I share. The fact is that the liberation to which the Theravadins aspire is not one I share. The fact is that the liberation to which Zen practitioners aspire is not one I share. But they are all Buddhists and they all aspire to freedom.

Beyond that, the fact is that the liberation to which Samkhya, Vedanta, Yoga, Vaiśeṣika, Nyaya and Mimamsa aspire is not one I share. But they are also seeking freedom, so I consider them Dharma, albeit, not Buddhadharma. The same goes with all other spiritual paths.

We are all alike in that we are seeking truth and freedom that truth brings. But I do not think for an instant that we all seeking the same truth or the same freedom.

The strength of Buddha's patched robe is that it is able to accommodate such disagreement and so many different point of view of about what Buddha himself meant when he discoursed about truth and freedom.

When it comes to tenets, I think Madhyamaka is the most definitive teaching, when it comes to sūtras, think the Prajñāpāramitā sūtras are the most definitive, and I when it comes to vajrayāna, I think Dzogchen is the most definitive teaching. But that is just my perspective.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 20th, 2013 at 1:31 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

smcj said:

This is an english text, so there is no possibility of correcting a translation from a tibetan text.

dzogchungpa said:

OK, you're quoting from the translator's introduction, I understand. Do you take them as authorities though?

smcj said:

If the translators can't get that right, then nothing else in the book is reliable. It is put as something fundamental to be understood before proceeding. Plus this is Dudjom R.'s position repeatedly stated in many contexts. A Google search will demonstrate this.

Malcolm wrote:

The translators did a fine job on that book. The person who didn't get it right was Dudjom Rinpoche. He just repeated a gloss that is found in many earlier books, and he apparently never looked up the original citation to check it. Tibetan scholarship in general is not known for originality, and it is also not known for detailed citation checking. Mostly people just repeat what they hear from their teachers. Great Lamas are no different in this respect.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 20th, 2013 at 1:29 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

smcj said:

OK, here's a quote from Dudjom R.'s "The Nyingma School Of Tibetan Buddhism" (a.k.a. "The Red Book") p. 26:

" The Great Madhyamaka (dbu-ma chen-po) is aloof from the reasoning of the Outer Madhyamaka which is based upon dialectics, and instead must be experientially cultivated in meditation. "

Malcolm wrote:

In Bhavya's text, the difference between the so called coarse outer madhyamaka and the inner subtle madhyamaka merely has to do with how relative truth is treated. I reproduce the entire passage below. You will notice an absence of the terms Prasanga, Svatantra. When one, as a Madhyamaka, treats relative truth from the perspective of the śravakas, this is considered coarse outer madhyamaka. When relative truth is treated from the cittamatra point of view, then this becomes the subtle inner madhyamaka:

When phenomenal entities are categorized, in this way there are two kind: material and immaterial. In this way, material entities appearing as portions of subtle atoms do not exist and also subtle atoms appearing as limited by different directions do not exist. They are immaterial mind. Meanwhile, mind and mental factors are engaged for a moment. Since appearing because of the very subtle aspect through the differentiation of past, present and future does not exist, minds and mental factors are not established, becoming the nature of the dharmadhātu, in which one should abide. The Mother states: "That mind is not mind, because the primal nature [prakṛiti] of the mind is luminosity" and "wherever the mind does not exist, that is inconceivable".

Further, all phenomena can be gathered into the mind, mind gathered into the body, after the body is gathered into the dharmadhātu, it dissolves. The meaning of this is also spoken of by the Ācārya Nāgārjuna in the Madhyamaka Bhāvaśaṃkranta:

The world comes from concepts; concepts come from the mind;

the mind is supported on the body, for that reason investigate the body.

One should dwell in such a meaning. Do not dwell on any kind of occasion or consciousness. Do not conceive anything, do not think about anything, do not dwell all extremes. The essence of any consciousness has not arisen, one should meditate on nothing at all. Further, that prajñā of through analysis does not appear. For example, since fire is produced by rubbing sticks together vigorously, if the wood is burnt, also that fire is understood to naturally pacified, because it also has become non-existent. The meaning of this can be understood in the Ārya-kāśyapaparivarta sūtra.

Further, in the Ārya-ghanavyūha sūtra:

Just the fire which is the burning agent does not exist since the burnt object does not exist, likewise if one burns the view to be incinerated,
also the fire of emptiness will cease.
At the time of the cessation of views,
the fire of wisdom will not be produced,
all afflictions having been incinerated.
If the afflictions are incinerated, the aspect is beautiful.
Mahāsukha (aka Padmavajra) says:
Having burned the bundle of firewood of views with the fire of emptiness, this is abiding in peace,
in which the fire of suchness has also ceased.
As such, having taught the coarse yoga, now the subtle yoga will be taught. This is subtle i.e. all dharmas there can be arise as the appearances of one's mere illusory mind itself. In this way, the mere illusory mind is beyond the three times. Without color or shape, luminous through its primal nature. Since it does not appear, all phenomena are to be understood as being the illusory mind itself. There are also citations. The Ārya Lankāvatara states:
In dependance on mind-only,
do not analyze outer objects;
in dependence upon suchness
one must transcend mind-only.
If one transcends mind-only,
one will abide in non-appearances.
The yogi abiding in non-appearances,
he sees the Mahāyāna.
Ārya Nāgārjuna, Ācarya Āryadeva, Ācarya Candrakīrti speak it in these words. In this way, speaking about the relative truth in the manner of the śravakas is the coarse outer madhyamaka. That [relative] existing as one's mind only is the so called "inner madhyamaka" which is subtle.

There are three things to include here: one, this author, Bhavya, is very late -- he is not the same author as Bhavaviveka. This is proven by two things: one, he mentions Candrakīrti. Second, he cites Mahasukha aka Padmavajra and directly cites Padmavajra's text Sakalatantrasambhavaśaṃcodanī-śrīguhyasiddhi-nama. Padmavajra may be the same person as Padmasambhava.

At any rate, this text itself is no later than the tenth century but no earlier than the eighth.
This places Bhavya subsequent to Padmavajra, that and Atisha brought the text to Tibet in the 11th.

Third, Bhavya mentions a great madhyamaka three times in this text. But first person we know of to use the term in any surviving text was the Tibetan Kawa Paltseg. He uses the term great madhyamaka as a sobriquet for freedom from extremes.

So frankly, when gzhan stong pas use this passage from Bhavya to support their notion that great madhyamaka is a non-analytical meditation, their reasoning is pretty flimsy when the citation they use to distinguish an outer and an inner madhyamaka.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 20th, 2013 at 12:33 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Yeah, unfortunately, this citation does not actually exist in the text it is supposed to exist in. I have mentioned this before and I am pretty sure I presented the original passage out of which this oft cited distortion is from.

dzogchungpa said:

That's disturbing. How did find it's way into that book then?

Malcolm wrote:

It is an interpretive gloss of a passage treated as a citation.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 19th, 2013 at 11:12 PM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

smcj said:

If you want my humble opinion, that is largely what much of Madhyamika, concepts like emptiness as often understood, no ultimate ground of being, anatta understood as applying to the Absolute rather than as a via negativa applied to the aggregates, and so forth are: the intellectual ideas of philosophers...

No, it is the opposite actually, in my opinion, those people within Buddhadharma who assert a transcendent absolute, a mahātman, etc. are the intellectuals since they are the ones who have to spin the most elaborate hermeneutics to justify their opinions, for example Dolbuba.

Here's a cut and paste from something Dudjom R. wrote. He starts by quoting somebody else:

Concerning the subtle, inner Great Madhyamaka of definitive meaning, it is stated in the Jewel Lamp of the Madhyamaka by the master Bhavya (skal-Idan):

The Madhyamaka of the Prasangika and the Svatantrika is the coarse, Outer Madhyamaka. It should indeed be expressed by those who profess well-informed intelligence during debates with [extremist] Outsiders, during the composition of great treatises, and while establishing texts which concern supreme reasoning. However, when the subtle, inner Madhyamaka is experientially cultivated, one should meditate on the nature of Yogacara-Madhyamaka.

Elsewhere I've seen him say that Prasangika Madhyamaka is for intellectual approach to emptiness and Great Madyamaka (Shentong) is for discussing it from a meditational standpoint without quoting anybody else, but this is what I found with a quick search.

Malcolm wrote:

Yeah, unfortunately, this citation does not actually exist in the text it is supposed to exist in. I have mentioned this before and I am pretty sure I presented the original passage out of which this oft cited distortion is from.

I will shortly present it again.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 19th, 2013 at 10:58 PM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Son of Buddha said:

can you source this in the Sutras for us all??

(I could of swore the texts that teach Buddha Nature say it is Not-Empty)

Malcolm wrote:

It is more complicated than that. I spent a few minutes this morning running a word search on the bka' 'gyur and I found that only five of the ten tathagatagarbhasūtras say anything at all about the dharmadhātu, and only four of them say anything meaningful.

The Angulimāla sūtra says:

The dhātu of all sentient beings (sarvasattvadhātu) is the dharmadhātu, since flesh is consumed of the same dhātu, the buddhas do not consume meat. It is presented in the context of eating meat. Basically, cannibalism is a taboo in general, and by making the observation that the dharmadhātu is the sattvadhātu, in this sūtra the Buddha is making an argument we ought not eat meat since we are all of the same kind.

The Nirvana Sūtra only contains two explicit mentions of the dharmadhātu:

Empty peace is the dharmadhātu...

Son of a good family, if one of average prajñā truly courses in the dharmadhātu, wisdom of perfection, ultimate truth and ultimate emptiness, that one will attain the śravakas awakening; the one of medium prajñā, the pratyekabuddha awakening, and one is best prajñā, unsurpassed awakening.

There is another sūtra, Ārya-maladevīśiṃhanāda sūtra, that states:

"Bhagavan, this tathāgatagarbha is the sublime dharmadhātu. It is the dharmakāyagarbha, it is the garbha of transcendent phenomena [lokkotaradharmas], it is the garbha of the naturally pure dharmakāya. Bhagavan, since temporary secondary afflictions are naturally pure as the tathāgatagarbha, these secondary afflictions are the site of the tathāgatas."

This sutra pretty clearly states that afflicted phenomena cannot be excluded from the tathāgatagarbha, more or less repeating the thinking of the Angulimala sūtra above.

Ok, therefore, we can see that that tathagatagarbha sūtras are of no help in defining dharmadhātu.

The Ārya-gaṇanāgajaparipṛcchā-nāma-mahāyāna-sūtra is the likely locus classicus for the explicit notion that the dharmadhātu is a source. Let me preface this by saying that in Tibetan, the term "dhātu" is glossed as a 'byung gnas, a locus of production, not as a basis or a foundation [gzhi/rtsa ba]. The nature of meaning of the term dhātu is translated into is "dbyings", which has a native meaning as a dimension [klong] or a element [khams]. When it is defined by Vasubandhu he defines the term dhātu as being similar to a mine. Now, the sūtra states:

Phenomena do not come and do not go, they dwell in the dharmadhātu;
all that appears as form, it all comes from space;
all that appears as phenomena[dharmas], those come from the dharmadhātu.
Still we are no closer to a conclusive definition of dharmadhātu.

The Lankāvatara helps us: Suchness, emptiness, nirvana and the dharmadhātu, the non-arising phenomena, are nature of the ultimate.
So here in this text we have a clear demonstration that suchness, emptiness, nirvana and the dharmadhātu are all to be treated as synonymous.

The Śatasāhasrika-prajñāpāramitā states: Further, because the dharmadhātu does not exist, it is not perceived by the bodhisattvas in the extreme of the past; because the dharmadhātu is emptiness, it is not perceived by the bodhisattvas in the extreme of the past; because the dharmadhātu is isolated it is not perceived by the bodhisattvas in the extreme of the past; because the dharmadhātu lacks an intrinsic nature, it is not perceived by the bodhisattvas in the extreme of the past. Further, because the dharmadhātu does not exist, it is not perceived by the bodhisattvas in the extreme of the future; because the dharmadhātu is emptiness, it is not perceived by the bodhisattvas in the extreme of the future; because the dharmadhātu is isolated it is not perceived by the bodhisattvas in the extreme of the future; because the dharmadhātu lacks an intrinsic nature, it is not perceived by the bodhisattvas in the extreme of the future. Further, because the dharmadhātu does not exist, it is not perceived by the bodhisattvas in the middle; because the dharmadhātu is emptiness, it is not perceived by the bodhisattvas in the middle; because the dharmadhātu is isolated it is not perceived by the bodhisattvas in the middle; because the dharmadhātu lacks an intrinsic nature, it is not perceived by the bodhisattvas in the middle.

So in reality, we see that in the Tathagatagarbha sūtra cycle, the notion of dharmadhātu is rather neglected doctrinally; I would suggest, precisely because of its association with emptiness as presented in the PP sūtras, which in no way permits a reading of a positive ground which serves as the basis for the arising of phenomena. And as we have seen above, the Nirvana sūtra explicitly defines dharmadhātu as emptiness.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 19th, 2013 at 2:19 PM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Vidyaraja said:

So for me, transcendence and a timeless, unborn Absolute reality that is the source of everything

Malcolm wrote:

Conditioned phenomena dependently originate; unconditioned phenomena do not arise at all. Other than that, there is no source. This is why dependent origination is called "profound". The logic of dependent origination precludes a "source" for conditioned phenomena, transcendent or otherwise.

Your view is just one among many imports into Buddhadharma, just like Batchelor's views. In my opinion you are both mistaken -- but that does not really matter, because intellectual views like yours and Batchelors, in the end, are not what bring about realization.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 19th, 2013 at 2:15 PM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

oushi said:

That would be true only if you give a special meaning to "nature".

Malcolm wrote:

The word here is svabhāva i.e. nature, inherent existence, etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 19th, 2013 at 2:12 PM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

But people have a hard time with the kind of intellectual discipline the study of the Buddhist history of ideas demands.

Vidyaraja said:

If you want my humble opinion, that is largely what much of Madhyamika, concepts like emptiness as often understood, no ultimate ground of being, anatta understood as applying to the Absolute rather than as a via negativa applied to the aggregates, and so forth are: the intellectual ideas of philosophers...

Malcolm wrote:

No, it is the opposite actually, in my opinion, those people within Buddhadharma who assert a transcendent absolute, a mahātman, etc. are the intellectuals since they are the ones who have to spin the most elaborate hermeneutics to justify their opinions, for example Dolbuba.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 19th, 2013 at 11:02 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

smcj said:

Since everything is empty, it is often said that everything arises from the dharmadhātu and dissolves into the dharmadhātu. It is an ocean/wave metaphor.

Sounds more like "there's an ultimate ground of being" metaphor.

Malcolm wrote:

No, not really.

But people have a hard time with the kind of intellectual discipline the study of the Buddhist history of ideas demands.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 19th, 2013 at 8:42 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

There is no fundamental ground of existence which gives rise to everything.

dzogchungpa said:

Isn't dharmadhatu something like this?

Malcolm wrote:

In Mahāyāna, the dharmadhātu is merely synonym for the general state of emptiness that pervades all things. Since everything is empty, it is often said that everything arises from the dharmadhātu and dissolves into the dharmadhātu. It is an ocean/wave metaphor.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 19th, 2013 at 7:36 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

smcj said:

Where is an 'unconditioned phenomena'? Show me one 'unconditioned phenomena'.

This is something I say you cannot do - there is no such thing anywhere.
If you believe Asanga, you own Buddha Nature is unconditioned phenomena. It is your own nature, yet cannot be taken as an object of consciousness, yours or anybody else's for that matter. It is an example of something unborn having functionality--the functionality being you!

Malcolm wrote:

If you believe the Buddha as he is presented in the Lankāvatara sutra, tathāgatagarbha is merely an intermediate doctrine for those who are frightened of emptiness.

-

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 19th, 2013 at 7:33 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

jeeprs said:

I suppose to put it in plain English, I believe in the reality of 'spirit'. 'Spirit' is a most unfortunate word, mostly misunderstood and usually maligned, but there is nothing else in English, unfortunately. Tibetans tend to use 'Mind' to denote that reality, the fundamental ground of existence, that which gives rise to everything. There seem to be many here who deny it. It's a shame, but I will put forward the opposing view from time to time, so that those reading will know that there are some don't acquiesce to this notion that the tathagatha is 'only the five aggregates'.

Malcolm wrote:

There is no fundamental ground of existence which gives rise to everything. This idea is a modern import into Buddhism. I mean, it is fine if you subscribe to it, but you won't find it in a Buddhist sutra or tantra.

As Ārya Nāgārjuna put it succinctly;

Whatever is the nature of the Tathāgata, that is the nature of the world;
since the Tathāgata has no nature, the world has no nature.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 19th, 2013 at 6:49 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Nirvana is a dharma. It is not beyond phenomena, it is a phenomena albeit, an unconditioned phenomena.

jeeprs said:

Where is an 'unconditioned phenomena'? Show me one 'unconditioned phenomena'.
This is something I say you cannot do - there is no such thing anywhere.

Malcolm wrote:

There are three kinds of unconditioned phenomena (asamskritadharma) we find in Buddhist texts: space and the two kinds of cessation. Of these two last, one is mere absence of a cause for arising, and the second is nirvana i.e. a cessation which is due to analysis.

In Mahāyāna a fourth is added i.e. śūnyatā, emptiness.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 19th, 2013 at 6:32 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

jeeprs said:

There is reality beyond existence and non-existence. It can't be spoken of directly because it is not amongst phenomena and so does not exist in the same way phenomena do.

Malcolm wrote:

Nonsense. All phenomenon [dharmas], both conditioned and unconditioned are included in one skandha, one āyatana, and one dhātu. The skandha is the material aggregate because it includes all material sense objects and sense organs; the āyatana is the mano-ayatana, which includes all minds; and the dharmadhātu which includes all mental factors, as well as the unconditioned dharmas, including nirvana. Nirvana is a dharma. It is not beyond phenomena, it is a phenomena albeit, an unconditioned phenomena.

jeeprs said:

'Not existent' - the source of existence is not among the things that exist. But it is not non-existent - it is not mere absence, mere nothingness, but the 'basis of all samsara and nirvana'. It is not simply nothing, mere cessation, absence, even though it is very easy to interpret that way.

Malcolm wrote:

This, my friend, is very far away from the meaning intended by Rangjung Dorje.

jeeprs said:

That is not 'eternalism' but a re-statement of the perennial idea of 'the eternal' within the human being.

Malcolm wrote:

There is nothing eternal within a human being. A human beings consists of five aggregates and nothing more. if there something eternal within a human, that would be a self.

avidyā is not held to be the cause of existence in dependent origination, because that would make ignorance/avidyā unconditioned itself.

In other words, it is a metaphysical concept.

You need to examine a clear explanation of the twelve nidanas. Of course, you like everyone, are free to invent whatever Buddhism you want out of whole cloth.

Just don't be so convinced that your pet theories are really the truth (tm).

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 19th, 2013 at 6:02 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

It seems like the word 'habit' is doing all the heavy lifting here.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, indeed it is.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 19th, 2013 at 5:37 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

dude said:

How can something that doesn't exist function?

cloudburst said:

the self does of course exist conventionally, allowing it to function. That's what Malcolm actually means when he says "the habit of grasping a non-existent self" in his post. He refuses to admit that explicitly, however if you press the point it will become clear.

Malcolm wrote:

What exists is an imputation of a self. We have to discover if this conventional self is one of the aggregates, all of them, or merely imputed upon them? And if it is merely imputed upon the aggregates, is this imputation veridical or merely functional? If this imputation is not veridical, then this means that the imputation is false and the self being imputed does not exist except as an imputation.

What does not exist is a self which function as a basis for that imputation. The basis for the imputation of a self is the appearance of a person constituted to our senses primarily as a rūpa skandha. We can infer the existence of the other four skandhas if that rūpa skandha gives evidence of being able to think and act. At first, we imagine that person has an identity, such as cloudburst or malcolm; but there is nothing within the five aggregates that will correspond in any way to the designations "cloudburst" and "malcolm".

The term "the habit of grasping a non-existent self" is a very precise way of describing how an imputed self (which does not exist in the aggregates, separate from them, or as one of them) may be an agent while also being a nonexistent. This is precisely the Prasangika method of describing how rebirth functions.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 19th, 2013 at 5:26 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

cloudburst said:

noooo, can't be. You are here opposing what you consider to be incorrect veiws, so your own claim is not credible. Nagarjuna did it, Buddha did it, Shantideva, Chandrkiriti, Longchenpa, Rongdzon, Mipham, Mikkyo Dorje, Sapan...

Malcolm wrote:

I am not opposing incorrect views in the manner in which you imagine, the tiered structure of tenets where the ultimate of the lower is the conventional of the higher.

I am here merely pointing out that it is foolish to deny Batchelor status as a Buddhist because we don't like his views about rebirth.

Secondly, many scholars in the past have written many refutations in the past; but in general the only people who have accepted these refutations have been the students of these polemicists, who merely repeat blindly what their masters have told them is "correct view".

One must discover for oneself what a "correct view" might be. One may arrive at some conviction about what correct view is; one might even willing to argue about it a little bit; but in reality, one cannot impose upon others a correct view, even with recourse to citation and reasoning.

In other words, one can only establish correct view for oneself; one cannot establish for others, for example, via a reasoning such as a syllogism (an inference for another).

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 19th, 2013 at 1:47 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

dude said:

How can something that doesn't exist function?

Malcolm wrote:

Well, now you are screwed. If you cannot accept that functionality of the habit of imputing a non-existence self, which in turn functions as an agent, you need to propose an existing agent to explain rebirth which is not a mere habit of grasping a self, and if you do that, you will end up with a mass of contradictions. For example, you might try and propose consciousness as an agent of rebirth (ala Bhavaviveka), but that presents a lot of problems.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 19th, 2013 at 1:46 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

cloudburst said:

Actually, this is an Indian Madhaymaka "game," intially. See my quote above where Chandrakirti explicitly disagrees with you.

Malcolm wrote:

One citation does not prove that Candrakirti disagrees with me.

Basically, if you assert there is an ultimate unborn entity [the subject of my negation] beyond existence and non-existence [the premise of Vidyārāja's assertion], since such an entity does not arise it does not exist.

Vidyārāja's nirvana is something beyond what he considered the conditioned. Its classic Buddhist eternalism.

cloudburst said:

What is it that you are saying is a waste of time? Refuting incorrect views?

Malcolm wrote:

Yeah, pretty much. They are not really refuted through reasoning but are dispelled only through realization.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 19th, 2013 at 1:26 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Well, not one person, even Batchelor, denies that Buddha talked about rebirth. There is a lot of disagreement over the what he meant when he did talk about it. For example, Buddhadassa's point of view is that we have to separate what "rebirth" means as a technical term in Dharma, as opposed to what it means in every day speech, asserting that to interpret rebirth as in every day language is violently at odds with the Buddha's real intention. As I mentioned above, Pudgalavadins claimed there is an inexpressible self responsible for transmigration. Jamgon Kongtrul sees clear light or luminosity as the kernel which transmigrates and so on.

dzogchungpa said:

Honestly, has this point ever been definitively clarified by the tradition? Malcolm you say you accept rebirth. How do you define and explain it?

Malcolm wrote:

I understand the mechanism of rebirth in a couple of ways. First, the habit of grasping a non-existent self leads to the appropriation of aggregates in which a self cannot be found. This non-existent self can function as an agent and recipient of karma.

The second has to do with tantric anatomy and principles.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 19th, 2013 at 1:20 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

dude said:

I maintain that the principles of karma and transmigration (the appearance, disappearance and reappearance in different forms) are irreducible tenets of the Buddha's teaching, to be found in the higher, lower, "earlier and later" teachings with total consistency.

I don't think it's debatable, the words of the sutras are what they are.

To deny this is to slander the Buddha, by the Buddha's own definition : "One who claims the Thus Come One did not say what he said slanders the Thus Come One."

Malcolm wrote:

Well, not one person, even Batchelor, denies that Buddha talked about rebirth. There is a lot of disagreement over the what he meant when he did talk about it. For example, Buddhadassa's point of view is that we have to separate what "rebirth" means as a technical term in Dharma, as opposed to what it means in every day speech, asserting that to interpret rebirth as in every day language is violently at odds with the Buddha's real intention. As I mentioned above, Pudgalavadins claimed there is an inexpressible self responsible for transmigration. Jamgon Kongtrul sees clear light or luminosity as the kernel which transmigrates and so on.

Batchelor is very much in tune with Buddhadassa's interpretation of emptiness and selflessness.

dude said:

Then they should explain what they mean. What I've seen so far from proponents of this line of thinking is not only unsatisfactory, it's absurd.

Malcolm wrote:

You should read the link to Buddhadasa's teaching. He explains his point of view very clearly. I don't agree with him, but I am not going exile him from Buddhist intellectual history.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 19th, 2013 at 1:04 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

cloudburst said:

This is an important point.

Malcolm wrote:

You just proved my point, since Vidyārāja was talking about "ultimately" Nirvana is beyond existence and non-existence. He was not playing into your Gelug "Great Madhyamaka" game where emptiness [an absence] exists conventionally.

cloudburst said:

I think you are wrong, Malcolm, in saying that he is teaching a profound skepticism. He actually sneers and scoffs at the notion of rebirth, and I think much of what he says is harmful. All interpretative views are meant to be refuted by higher views, and eventually by definitive views, so I think we can accept Batchelor as a Buddhist while refuting his incorrect views.

Malcolm wrote:

I never said his skepticism was profound, just that he was skeptical. My point exactly is that we can accept someone as a Buddhist, even if we vehemently disagree with their views even on fundamental principles.

cloudburst said:

If anyone really wants to have this debate, I'm up for it, (should be moved to another thread, I think) but I think its evident if you read Batchelor, he does actively deny rebirth. This means he denies any meaningful interpretation of karma, and also the existence of course of other realms. So in the Batchelordharma, there are no thoughts that turn the mind, no future worlds, no renunciation of samsara since it has been incorrectly identified, no bodhicitta etc..., its a travesty.

Malcolm wrote:

His is a very narrow, selective interpretation of early Buddhism. But he is still a Buddhist, and that was my point.

cloudburst said:

Let it benefit those for whom it is beneficial.

Malcolm wrote:

Its a waste of time, actually. All it does is convince one's own disciples.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 19th, 2013 at 12:48 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Vidyaraja said:

To be honest, I am tired of debating you so I won't continue the debate any further. If you wish to take that as triumph, feel free to do so. However, I think that article by B. Alan Wallace sums up quite nicely why Batchelorism isn't Buddhism, so I will let that do the talking for me. That said, I must ask, is your personal Buddhism based entirely on philosophy or have you had any direct experience? I ask because if you had any direct experience, I am not sure how you could possibly defend Batchelor, which isn't to say that I think he is defensible purely from a philosophical or doctrinal understanding of Buddhism either.

Malcolm wrote:

I am defending Batchelor based on the principle that Buddha's Dharma robe was cobbled together from patches of rags -- which represents his disciples, and their inability to agree with each other in the future.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 19th, 2013 at 12:45 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

dude said:

I maintain that the principles of karma and transmigration (the appearance, disappearance and reappearance in different forms) are irreducible tenets of the Buddha's teaching, to be found in the higher, lower, "earlier and later" teachings with total consistency.

I don't think it's debatable, the words of the sutras are what they are.

To deny this is to slander the Buddha, by the Buddha's own definition : "One who claims the Thus Come One did not say what he said slanders the Thus Come One."

Malcolm wrote:

Well, not one person, even Batchelor, denies that Buddha talked about rebirth. There is a lot of disagreement over the what he meant when he did talk about it. For example, Buddhadasa's point of view is that we have to separate what "rebirth" means as a technical term in Dharma, as opposed to what it means in every day speech, asserting that to interpret rebirth as in every day language is violently at odds with the Buddha's real intention. As I mentioned above, Pudgalavadins claimed there is an inexpressible self responsible for transmigration. Jamgon Kongtrul sees clear light or luminosity as the kernal which transmigrates and so on.

Batchelor is very much in tune with Buddhadasa's interpretation of emptiness and selflessness.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 19th, 2013 at 12:08 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Something that has not arisen [unborn] does not exist. If you accept that nirvana is unborn, you also accept that it does not exist. If you propose it exists, your view is no different than Hindus who believe in a permanent, unborn purusha.

Vidyaraja said:

It is not an existent to be found somewhere phenomenally. It is beyond existence and non-existence. Of course on an ultimate level it is beyond words and concepts.

Malcolm wrote:

Something beyond existence and non-existence is a non-existent by definition.

The fourth seal is merely that nirvana is peaceful. As we have seen, there are all kinds of Buddhist understandings of nirvana -- many of which flat out contradict each other. Moreover, the fourth seal does not exist in Theravada, it is a Mahāyāna interpolation. Yes, and if the material world is all that exists, then dukkha is all there is. Nirvana won't be found holding the view that Batchelor has as mentioned in the interview a few posts back, and if somehow it were, I guarantee that the one who awakened will repudiate his former materialist views.

You still have not adequately addressed even a single point I have brought up. Your reasoning is flawed, BTW. Nirvana is merely the cessation of afflictive patterning aka dukkha.

Buddhists for centuries have accused other Buddhists of "corrupting" the Dharma and indulging in superstitions. Still, you would accept Vajrayāna practitioners as Buddhists, no? How about Mahāyāna Buddhists -- they have many things that could be labeled "superstitions" by Theravādins, for example. Buddhists have accused each of false beliefs and incorrect interpretations for centuries.

All those Buddhists you mentioned accepted that the goal of Buddhism is to transcend the wheel of birth and death, which Batchelor denies.

No, Batchelor accepts that the goal of Buddhism as taught by the Buddha is to transcend birth and death. He also thinks that Buddhism has other, more immediate goals, like living a mindful ethical life based on the eight fold path. What he refuses to do is be drawn into metaphysical debates about such questions as rebirth.

However benign their intentions, their writings may be regarded as "near enemies" of Buddhism.

I think this is just polemics, just as wrongheaded as your fatwas.

You are merely flinging around a reactionary term you have not defined. What kind of materialist is Batchelor: money, cars and sex? Is he a dialectical materialist?

As defined by twentieth century philosophers William James and Alfred North Whitehead, for instance, scientific materialism is the belief that physical reality, as made available to the natural sciences, is all that truly exist.

What Batchelor stated in the interview previously also touches on what is meant by the term.

I don't think you can pin Batchelor down that easily.

Basically, all you have demonstrated in this thread is that you cannot prove that Batchelor views are in contradiction to three of the most basic tenets of Buddhadharma:

all conditioned things are impermanent all defiled things are suffering everything lacks a self.

Batchelor accepts the four noble truths:

suffering cause cessation and the path.

He just does not do so in a way that is appealing to Buddhist dogmatists.

Look, I have argued your side of this before and at length and in detail. But it is a losing argument — why? Because there are many things in many Buddhist teachings that have been regarded as heretical by someone.

The fact is, and you are just going to have to accept it — is that there are a large number of people out there who practice Zen and Vipassana who nevertheless do not accept rebirth. There are even many Nicherin Buddhists who deny that rebirth is a fact. When you take this hard position that "this is the really the teaching of the Buddha" you put yourself in a corner. The strength of the Dharma lies in the fact that it is a method of discovering the truth. We don't lay out the truth in the beginning and say "this is what you must confirm in order to be considered a Buddhist." If this were the case, we could not even have the discussion "Early Buddhism and Mahāyāna". Why? Because the Mahāyāna Buddhists themselves introduced heresies into Buddhism, heresies clearly defined in Abhidharma literatures. Then we have the heresies of Vajrayāna. Then Dzogchen. Then Bon. Then Nicherin Buddhism. Then Chan, Zen, etc.

All we can do really is say "That person's Buddhism is not for me". For example, your eternalist disposition is not for me. I am sure that Dzogchen is not to your liking. So what? Some people like Batchelor's "metaphysics free" approach. They would not even explore Buddhadharma otherwise.

We all have ignorance. All of our views are limited. Even the most perfect mental model of how things are is not how things are. This is why it is more useful to focus on the methods of Dharma and discover for ourselves what we can perceive and what we can infer. We really ought not be telling people like Batchelor that they have no right to call themselves Buddhist. It opens up oneself to the same charge. Our conceptual map is not really that relevant to our practice unless it is causing us suffering and preventing us from practicing. I don't think that practicing Dharma has much to do with our conceptual beliefs. Everyone wants to wake up. How is demonizing Batchelor helping you or anyone else given that you are no more an authority than he is, or Wallace, or me?

As far as I can tell, you don't understand Batchelor's point of view very well. I think it comes from his training in Korean Zen. He is putting it out there that there are many questions the answers to which he does not know and does not feel anyone can know without claiming special knowledge. I respect that position. It is really honest. There is a lot of dishonesty in religious discourse. People claiming as truths things they have merely heard or read and not personally experienced is the essence of dishonesty. This is why I find the polemics against Batchelor incredibly dishonest. Not one person who is criticizing Batchelor has any personal experience or realization of these so called "truths" they are enunciating.

For example, in his book Heartwood, Bhikku Buddhadasa completely rejects literal rebirth as a fiction of the Abhidhammists. Are you going to say that Buddhadasa is not a Buddhist? He says elsewhere:

If we use the Kalama Sutta and the Four Criteria, we can strictly apply the Buddha's principle to choose the right things from layers upon layers of garbage. This is not to say that all of the essays and canons are useless, but that the Buddha's principle must be strictly applied to find the right explanations. According to the Four Criteria, anything that is not in accord with the Doctrine [dhamma] and Discipline [vinaya] should be considered as erroneous hearing, memory, speech, and teaching. The doctrine of dependent origination is primarily intended to abolish the concept of a continuing existence and nihilism. Therefore, if the teaching of the doctrine involves man's transmigration in three lifetimes, then it is unacceptable in accordance with the Four Criteria.

http://www.what-buddha-

taught.net/Books6/Bhikkhu_Buddhadasa_Paticcasamuppada.htm

So you see, there are a lot of people, intelligent people, who feel that we can interpret Buddha's teaching in such a way that even proposing literal rebirth is actually opposed to Buddha's intention! But of course, according to you, they are not Buddhist.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 18th, 2013 at 11:17 PM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Vidyaraja said:

That which transcends time is timeless and unborn, not eternal in the sense of endless time.

Malcolm wrote:

Something that has not arisen [unborn] does not exist. If you accept that nirvana is unborn, you also accept that it does not exist. If you propose it exists, your view is no different than Hindus who believe in a permanent, unborn purusha.

BTW, there are many people who think Dolpopa's view i.e. gzhan stong, is a corrupt view of Buddhadharma.

Let's use a different enlightened master then. Here is something from Huang Po, brackets are mine:

One, I am not sure that translation you are using is reliable. Two, there are a lot of people who have a big problem with the "true self" and "one mind" language and so on that exists in Zen -- who see it as again, crypto -Advaita.

The fourth seal is that of nirvana, which isn't to be found in materialism.

The fourth seal is merely that nirvana is peaceful. As we have seen, there are all kinds of Buddhist understandings of nirvana -- many of which flat out contradict each other.

Moreover, the fourth seal does not exist in Theravada, it is a Mahāyāna interpolation.

What we need to understand about Batchelor, for example, and many Westerners like him, is that they are trying.

Yes, trying to corrupt Buddhism and turn it into a form of secular-atheistic materialism, going so far as making claims that teachings Buddha preached and all Buddhists have accepted historically are superstitions.

Buddhists for centuries have accused other Buddhists of "corrupting" the Dharma and indulging in superstitions. Still, you would accept Vajrayāna practitioners as Buddhists, no? How about Mahāyāna Buddhists -- they have many things that could be labeled "superstitions" by Theravadins, for example. Buddhists have accused each of false beliefs and incorrect interpretations for centuries.

At the end of the day however, eventually these new heretical Buddhist trends become accepted and canonized.

While it is true that Buddhism is based on direct experience, most Buddhist masters I've read emphasize the need for faith in the possibility of enlightenment and the efficacy of the Buddhist path in order to be successful.

What you need is śraddhā which is defined as mental clarity. You need the mental clarity to understand that exploring the Buddha's teachings will help you end your own suffering in this life.

Accepting materialism (nihilism) posing as Buddhism as a new understanding of Dharma isn't generous but erroneous and harmful.

You are merely flinging around a reactionary term you have not defined. What kind of materialist is Batchelor: money, cars and sex? Is he a dialectical materialist?

There is nothing in Batchelor's writings to indicate that he has decided that consciousness is solely a result of material interactions. Merely that he has personally abandoned all metaphysical speculations about rebirth and such questions, and feels that in the context of Buddha's teaching of anatman, Buddha's accounts of rebirth are largely mythological, generated with respect to the milieu Buddha was teaching in. I think he even grants that Buddha may have believed these stories. But his point, one to which I now agree, is that the practice of Buddhadharma does not depend on accepting the Jatakas as literally true, or accepting the Buddha's account as having been the first human king in a past life, and so on.

That being said, I imagine that Batchelor probably is a physicalist, but that is different than being a materialist.

Batchelor generally says a perfectly respectable thing: consciousnesses arise based on specific conditions. When you study Abhidharma you will discover that in Abhidharma (as well as Madhyamaka in general) claim that without a sense organ and a sense object, a consciousness cannot arise. It is never said that without a consciousness and a sense organ, the object won't arise, or that without the sense object, the sense organ won't arise. All these texts clearly state that a consciousness arises only when there is a functioning sense organ and a sense object. This is a perfectly reasonable thing to assert in the context of Buddhism.

So this is another area in which your attempt at blackballing Batchelor fails utterly.

So I can either blackball you for having an eternalist view of nirvana and blackball Batchelor for not accepting the doctrine of rebirth literally or I can be expansive and understand that even though you both suffer from some wrong views, you both are still within the Buddhadharma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 18th, 2013 at 10:08 PM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

smcj said:

his physicalism does not preclude nirvana. He can experience nirvana whether he believes in rebirth or not, providing he relinquishes his afflictions. His position is that belief in rebirth is irrelevant to the cessation of suffering.

Is not "liberation" freedom from cyclic existence (a.k.a. samsara), the cycle of rebirth?

That's pretty fundamental if one buys the original 4 Noble Truths position that dukha pervades all of life.

Malcolm wrote:

You do not have to accept rebirth literally to accept "sarva dukkham". If the solution to suffering in this life is calming the mind with shamatha and developing the insight which burns away afflictions (it is), then what does believing in rebirth have to do with it?

If you have ended your afflictions you won't take rebirth again, according to Buddha's teachings, anyway. So what does it matter? All that matters is that one sees through the matrix of conditions that create your suffering here and now.

This is the minimum requirement.

So, in this thread, we have seen three things:

- 1) The four seals do not require belief in rebirth
- 2) Refuge in the Three Jewels do not require belief in rebirth
- 3) Belief in an eternal unconditioned ultimate is not a requirement to be a Buddhist.

In reality, no beliefs of any kind are required to enter the Buddha's path.

What we need to understand about Batchelor, for example, and many Westerners like him, is that they are trying. They are inspired by the Buddha's example, and they accept what makes sense to them.

Buddhadharma is not about belief and faith. Ultimately, like all Indian yogic paths, it is about personal experience: direct perception and inferences derived from those based on one's practice. It is a personal journey, not one that exists in a catechism. There is no "bible" in Buddhadharma. Rather, Buddhadharma holds a range of teachings from belief in an inexpressible self which is neither the same nor different than aggregates [pudgalavadins] to the crypto Vedantic musings of Dolbupa, to the explicit refutation of the unconditioned by Nāgārjuna and the assertion that nirvana is a non-existent [sautrantikas].

So now, Buddhists, you have to make room for a new understanding of Dharma, one that does not include rebirth as a vital central principle. It won't kill you to be generous.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 18th, 2013 at 9:49 PM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

jeeprs said:

is 'the basis' physical? Is it something known to science?

I would have thought that 'the Buddha's opinion', whether he is 'around to tell us or not' is pretty well summed up in the idea of 'dependent origination'. If you take dependent origination out, what remains is not in any way shape or form Buddhism, as far as I can tell.

And 'dependent origination' presumes that 'the cause of existence is ignorance' (avidya). I can't see how 'ignorance' is not a metaphysical idea, and indeed the whole basis of dependent origination is not something that Western science would be able to validate.

Malcolm wrote:

I don't see Batchelor discarding dependent origination, he states:

The Buddha awakened to a glittering plurality of endlessly arising and vanishing phenomena. No God created it; no Mind underpins it; no Unconditioned lies somewhere outside it. Ethics, meditation and wisdom are not founded on some absolute truth, but grow out of a careful examination of what causes suffering and what brings it to an end.

I differ with Batchelor in that I accept rebirth. But I do not see how the above violates some sacred Buddhist principles resulting in the fatwa Vidyārāja has pronounced above.

BTW, avidyā is not held to be the cause of existence in dependent origination, because that would make ignorance/avidyā unconditioned itself.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 18th, 2013 at 9:31 PM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Vidyaraja said:

The unconditioned, i.e. nirvana, which leads to the cessation of suffering, is transcendent.

Malcolm wrote:

Since the Sautrantikas strictly define nirvana as a cessation, a non-existence, would you deny them the claim they are Buddhist because they do not support your eternalist vision of nirvana?

Batchelor feels that his view is dependent origination. He derives that view from the Buddha. Dependent origination is the essence of the Buddhist view for most people.

BTW, there are many people who think Dolpopa's view i.e. gzhan stong, is a corrupt view of Buddhadharma.

So there are two things which are not mentioned in the four seals: belief in rebirth, and belief in a transcendent existent nirvana. These two beliefs of yours are not required in order to consider someone a follower of the Buddha's teachings.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 18th, 2013 at 6:15 AM

Title: Re: What do you really think of Western monks and nuns?

Content:

JKhedrup said:

The path of dharma is so vast and takes such effort to master.

Malcolm wrote:

Seven years, according to Sakya Pandita. Dharma is not rocket science, though we like to pretend it is.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 18th, 2013 at 6:06 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

He just has problems with literal rebirth because he is a physicalist, just as you are a substance dualist. From my point of view, you are both wrong.

dzogchungpa said:

What is your take on the issue?

Malcolm wrote:

mind and matter are both products of the same basis.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 18th, 2013 at 2:58 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Vidyaraja said:

The deathless is not to be found among conditioned phenomena:

...

Batchelor's materialism precludes this. He isn't a Buddhist as he cuts out the very heart of Buddhism. Regarding rebirth, see here:

Malcolm wrote:

No, you are incorrect, his physicalism does not preclude nirvana. He can experience nirvana whether he believes in rebirth or not, providing he relinquishes his afflictions. His position is that belief in rebirth is irrelevant to the cessation of suffering.

Vidyaraja said:
I am not a substance dualist.

Malcolm wrote:
Sure you are -- you accept rebirth don't you? And you accept that nama and rūpa are distinct in kind and substance don't you?

As to what "being in line with the Dharma" means, it is impossible to say what the Buddha's opinion is, isn't it? He is not around to tell us.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Wednesday, September 18th, 2013 at 2:27 AM
Title: Re: Prophecy of Buddhism's Downfall in India
Content:
Malcolm wrote:
Yes, there are similar predictions, for example in the Manjushri Root Tantra, if memory serves me correct.

Indrajala said:
When approximately was the first version translated into Tibetan?

Malcolm wrote:
late 10th, early eleventh century.

Here is one such passage, from chapter 24:

ཀླ་བི་ཤེ་དང་བག་ཁ་ལ། མོ་རྟེ་ཡ་ནི་ཁོར་ཡུག་ཡུལ། ཁ་ཆེ་དང་ནི་སྤྱི་ཡུལ། ཁ་བ་ཅན་གྱི་མཚམས་ཀྱན་དང་། བྱང་
ཕྱོགས་སུ་ནི་གནས་བརྟེན་ལ། དག་བའི་ལྷགས་ནི་འགྲུབ་པར་འགྱུར། གང་ཡང་སངས་རྒྱས་ཐོན་གསུངས་དང་། ད་ལྟར་ཡང་ནི་གསུངས་པ་དང་། མ་
འོངས་སངས་རྒྱས་ནམས་ཀྱིས་ཀྱང་། ཁྱི་བའི་རྒྱུ་ནི་གསུངས་པ་ལྟེ། ཁ་བ་ཅན་རིའི་ནང་བྱང་བ། དོར་ནི་ཐམས་ཅད་འགྲུབ་པར་འགྱུར།

The border lands

Kā vi she, Bag ga la, O ḍi ya;
Ka che (Kashmir) and Sin dhu Land, all the borders of the Kha ba can (Himalayas) and in the north are Sthaviras accomplishing the mantras of virtue, which all the buddhas of the past said,
and all the buddhas of the present said,
and all the buddhas of the future said,
to be a cause of peace.
Arising in the mountains of Kha ba can,
there everything will be accomplished.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Wednesday, September 18th, 2013 at 2:10 AM
Title: Re: Prophecy of Buddhism's Downfall in India
Content:

Indrajala said:

I found this interesting: On one of his missions to Middle India, the Tang diplomat Wang Xuance is reported to have learned from the abbot of Mahābodhi Monastery about a belief among Indian clergy that when corrupt doctrines eventually eclipse the Indic lands, genuine Buddhist doctrines will continue to flourish in the peripheral east. In other words, after the disappearance of Buddhist doctrines from India, China would emerge as the new Buddhist realm. If this is indeed a true reflection of views of the seventh-century Indian clergy and not a fabrication of the Chinese Buddhists, it would not only explain the attempts by some of the South and Central Asian monks to authenticate the presence of bodhisattva Mañjuśrī at Mount Wutai, but also the increasing number of Indian and foreign monks making pilgrimage to China.

Tansen Sen, Buddhism Diplomacy and Trade The Realignment of Sino-Indian Relations, 600-1400 (Honolulu: University of Hawai'i Press, 2003), 84-85.

Does anyone know of anything similar with respect to Buddhism being transmitted into Tibet?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, there are similar predictions, for example in the Manjushri Root Tantra, if memory serves me correct.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 18th, 2013 at 1:54 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Vidyaraja said:

Materialism is nihilism, nihilism is against what the Buddha taught, and materialism doesn't lead to the cessation of suffering or nirvana.

Malcolm wrote:

Ucchedavada, often mistranslated as nihilism, is the view that there is a self which perishes at death. But I am quite sure that is not Batchelor's view at all.

Vidyaraja said:

Neither the Buddha himself, nor all the Buddhist masters of the past, nor any Buddhist worth their salt today would call Batchelor a Buddhist.

Malcolm wrote:

Batchelor practices that portion of Buddhadharma that he can accept. That makes him a follower of Buddhadharma whether you like it or not. He accepts that all conditioned phenomena are impermanent, that all afflicted phenomena are suffering, and that all phenomena lack self. He probably also accepts that nirvana is peaceful. In other words,

I am quite certain he accepts the four seals. Among the four seals there is not one word that mentions rebirth. He takes refuge in the Buddha, Dharma and Sangha.

I am quite certain that Buddha, being kinder than you, would find room for Batchelor among his students.

He just has problems with literal rebirth because he is a physicalist, just as you are a substance dualist. From my point of view, you are both wrong.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 17th, 2013 at 9:59 PM

Title: Re: What do you really think of Western monks and nuns?

Content:

Indrajala said:

Actually, I've discussed this with others, but I think Buddhist monks/nuns in the west will have to learn from past examples and see to their own income. If it means producing cheese or honey on a communal farm arrangement, then so be it.

Malcolm wrote:

Ok, so you have a group of people, who decide to wear special colored clothing, and adhere to a moral code and make stuff together. Not the Sangha I imagine Shakyamuni had in mind. But it is ok AFAIC. Chinese travelers reported (with some attitude) of the existence of married Mahāyāna "monks" who farmed for a living in India.

The point I was making above is that temples were positive contributors to the Tibetan economy. That is why the temple system functioned in Tibet (leave aside of course that Lang Darma was assassinated for deciding to tax Tibetan monasteries during the Asian economic crisis of the 840's -- that was a powerful message to Tibetan aristocrats by the newly powerful monastic establishment).

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 17th, 2013 at 9:42 PM

Title: Re: What do you really think of Western monks and nuns?

Content:

JKhedrup said:

We are still at a stage where for philosophical topics we are better off relying on Tibetan Geshes (or Western Geshes, but we produce so few).

Malcolm wrote:

This might be true if you are only interested in a very narrow scope of Gelugpa studies.

JKhedrup said:

I don't think my BA, even though it is from a good university, takes me even close to the level of scholarship required of a Geshe lharampa. A PhD might.

Malcolm wrote:

The difference between our system of education and the Tibetan system is that we are trained to self-educate. Tibetans were not. Curiosity is largely discouraged.

Degrees are not a measure of education. Literacy is. The education gap between the average Tibetan and a Geshe, or a Khenpo is huge. The education gap between a Geshe/Khenpo and your average college educated westerner is not so large.

Also, the useful aspect of Buddhism, what is actually needed for liberation is not found in the realms of polemical yig cha that Geshes and Khenpos specialize in. For most people, studying the niceties of the differences in opinion between scholars of dead Indian Buddhist traditions is just not that important. It is a great thing to do, but most people in the West are really not that interested in it.

JKhedrup said:

This term yogi has always confused me. If Yogi indicates some sort of level of attainment, I would say only a few would be worthy of that title. If it just means a lay practitioner, I guess it makes sense.

Malcolm wrote:

A yogi is someone who practices yoga i.e. tries to discover their real state through various means. Most Westerners actively engaged in Buddhism and Buddhist studies are yogis i.e. they practice Zen, Vipassana, Creation Stage yogas, Completion Stage yogas, etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 17th, 2013 at 9:09 PM

Title: Re: What do you really think of Western monks and nuns?

Content:

JKhedrup said:

I can think of a lot of easier ways to grab at power rather than donning the robes.

Malcolm wrote:

Its the only way a non-aristocrat who is not a tulku can rise up in Tibetan society, apart from being merchant.

Ecclesiastical hierarchies often balanced and off-set the power of aristocratic hierarchies. but this phenomena does not exist in the West anymore.

Really, what I am pointing out here is that people need to intelligently about what the social implications of a monastic Sangha is in the west, Who is it for, how is it being paid for. While it is easy to understand why ethnic Buddhists such as Cambodians and so on have an interest in having a Vihara in their neighborhood, my experience tells me that second and third generation Asians in the USA are not really that interested in the religion of their forbears.

The point I am making is that in Tibet, for example, Monasteries served a valuable social role; they stored grain, they provided medical services, education and so on. The role they played in Tibet for example was a vital one. But what are monasteries going to do for people here? Evangelize so they can sell their services to a client population that does not really believe in the power of prayer(or if they do, they are probably already Christian).

I personally believe that people are in this headspace of thinking "What are we supposed to do for monastics", but I rarely see anyone asking the question "What real value will supporting a monastic population do for Western Buddhists (who are generally yogis)?" Yes, there is the merit argument, but frankly, this is rather weak.

The monastic sangha is facing a crisis of relevance in western countries. We are already, many of us, just as well educated as any Geshe (with different skill sets of course), and often more so.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 17th, 2013 at 8:18 PM

Title: Re: What do you really think of Western monks and nuns?

Content:

jeeprs said:

I had always assumed that the monastic vocation...

Malcolm wrote:

Is actually very political. When you are not in it for sex, power becomes a primary pursuit.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 17th, 2013 at 8:15 PM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Lindama said:

The awakened ones are carefree in such matters.

Malcolm wrote:

That is just another story.

The point here is that we need to be aware of the fact that we are following narratives, preferring one narrative to another. There is not much meaning to the term "awakened one" if there is no narrative connected with their awakening. This is why there are compelling narratives around the liberations of Shakyamuni, Padmasambhava, Tonpa Shenrab and so on.

If we prefer so-called "early Buddhism" to Mahāyāna, or vice versa, we are giving preference to one story over another.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 17th, 2013 at 11:42 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Indrajala said:

The śramaṇa culture was already well-developed.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, and was systematically engaged in breaking all kinds of social taboos.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 17th, 2013 at 11:41 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

So did Shakyamuni -- like abandoning his family, living in charnel grounds, and so on, wearing dyed winding sheets, etc.

Indrajala said:

Not really. The śramaṇa culture was already well-developed. Many of the Buddha's disciples were already mendicant yogis before studying under him.

In any case, the point is that Vajrayāna seems to have responded with violence and taboo sexual practices to ongoing repression on the part of Brahmins. This was rather revolutionary given the long-standing nominal observance of non-violence and brahmacarya on the part of the Buddhist sangha.

Malcolm wrote:

Taboo sexual practices? Like having sex? With real people? Vajrayāna is just more practical, that's all. And in terms of violence, all Buddhists did in those days was appropriate the symbols of ritual violence and procedures that were well known in their culture.

What I think most people ignore is that prior to the rise of Vajrayāna, there was a huge Puranic revolution that popularized and made available many rites and rituals that previously have been the precinct only of ritual specialists i.e. Brahmins. Buddhists used these rites and symbols, even making arguments for why Buddhist homavidhi was more effective than that of traditional Brahmins. The fact is that Buddhist ritual specialists increasingly took business away from Brahmins. In the context of Indian culture, anyone sufficiently expert in the general lines of Vajrayāna ritual, derived from Brahmanic dīnācārya anyway, could replace a Brahmanic priest. This was not true in the day of the Buddha. Buddhist rulers for example continued to rely on Brahmin priests for state functions, etc. It is only after the fall of the Gupta that we see the rise in Vajrayāna texts, and this corresponds to the breaking of traditional patron/priest relationships in Northern India, and the replacement of the old order with new Buddhist ritual experts.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 17th, 2013 at 11:28 AM

Title: Re: What do you really think of Western monks and nuns?

Content:

anjali said:

"Founder" is colloquial usage. Shakyamuni Buddha turned the dharma wheel once again after the buddha-dharma was forgotten in this world. Some people wish to follow his life model as a monastic. And people have done so throughout the centuries. If Shakyamuni Buddha hadn't lived a monastic lifestyle and founded a monastic order, I doubt any of us would be discussing the prospects of Buddhist monasticism in the West.

Malcolm wrote:

It all depends on who you think really turns the wheel of dharma, i.e., nirmanakāya emanations or the sambhoghakāya.

anjali said:

Does it have to be either/or? Surely you would acknowledge the fundamental role of Shakyamuni Buddha in reestablishing the buddha-dharma in this world? I think most Buddhists would acknowledge Shakyamuni Buddha as the historical root teacher.

Malcolm wrote:

Shakyamuni is a historical teacher, and for my tradition, one of thirteen quasi-historical nirmanakāya teachers of great importance. But while important, he is not the most important teacher in my tradition.

That distinction belongs to a character known as "Garab Dorje" who hailed from Oḍḍiyāna. He was not a monk, had no Sangha, and a very small number of successors. He may in fact be entirely a Tibetan fiction, but no matter. For me he is more important than Shakyamuni Buddha.

Even so, even more important than he is the primordial Buddha Samantabhadra, of which he is but an emanation.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 17th, 2013 at 11:20 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Your Buddhism is not his Buddhism, that is all you can say.

Vidyaraja said:

If his atheistic-materialism (nihilism) is Buddhism, anything can be Buddhism, thus rendering the appellation "Buddhism" a meaningless term.

Malcolm wrote:

He feels his story is squarely grounded in the Buddha's teachings. You feel yours is. You are both interested in liberation from suffering. All that separates the two of you is that you are substance dualist and he is a physicalist. Oh, and he will readily call you a Buddhist, but you deny him (as I have in the past) the same decency -- that's another difference.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 17th, 2013 at 11:16 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Indrajala said:

Vajrayāna in India seems to have indeed incorporated otherwise taboo practices.

Malcolm wrote:

So did Shakyamuni -- like abandoning his family, living in charnel grounds, and so on, wearing dyed winding sheets, etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 17th, 2013 at 10:23 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Vidyaraja said:

[Though I will still maintain my position that Stephen Batchelor's brand of secular-atheistic "Buddhism" isn't Buddhism.

Malcolm wrote:

Your Buddhism is not his Buddhism, that is all you can say.

Vidyaraja said:

That said, what is the difference between the self-liberation of Dzogchen and renunciation or transformation? Are not Nyingma monks renunciants and do their practices not lead to transformation (even if that transformation is just awareness of our naturally, spontaneously present enlightened state which is always there?)

Malcolm wrote:

By definition, anyone who practices either Vajrayāna or Dzogchen has abandoned the path of renunciation as their path.

Vidyaraja said:

Also, what is the difference between the self-liberation of Dzogchen and the anupaya or "method-less method" or "means of no-means" of Trika/Kashmir Shaivism?

Malcolm wrote:

Very different stories.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 17th, 2013 at 9:23 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Basically, it is really pretty simple. All yogic paths in Indian religion and its offshoots, whether Buddhist, Jain or Hindu, whether in India or Tibet, or China, etc., accept one thing in common: in order to cease taking rebirth in samsara, one must deal somehow with the kleśas that drive rebirth.

Vidyaraja said:

That is true, but their views on the means to this can be deeply variant.

Malcolm wrote:

That's the point -- enlightenment, awakening, is just a story. We all subscribe to different stories of awakening. Some people like to imagine that their story is more solid, more real, than the stories of others. Certainly I have been guilty of this.

Basically, the fact that there is a story of awakening at all is the essence of Dharma. What does not matter very much are the details, except to you, the practitioner. If you ask me what story of awakening I like, I will very swiftly tell you that I like the story of awakening as it is presented in the teachings of self-liberation, Dzogchen. I like it more than the story of awakening presented in the path of renunciation or the path of transformation. I like it more than the story of awakening presented in Samkhya, Trika, Vedanta and so on. The vehicle of self-liberation is my preferred story. I can't convince you to accept my story of liberation anymore than I could have been convinced of it when I was committed to Buddhism as a religion by someone else. Likewise, I cannot convince any one here of any story about liberation they are not disposed to believe.

But the one thing we share is that we all subscribe to narrative about liberation otherwise we would not be here discussing these issues. And that is why there is no closed Canon in Buddhism, why there never can be.

Buddhists, like all other religionists, like to think that they are the only ones who have a true story. Among Buddhists, all assert their preferred story of liberation as the best, or most practical, or the only possible, or the most historically accurate, and so on.

We Dharma practitioners demonstrate our commitment to our preferred stories by the choices we make, and the practices we do. But in the end we are merely making a commitment to a narrative of liberation we have decided to accept. And that is completely subjective, personal and non-verifiable. No one's putative awakening is verifiable by any objective, empirical standard -- and in these conversations about liberation we all behave as if there were some objective criteria by which liberation can be measured. This is absurd. Every standard by which we can measure liberation and awakening is a complete and utterly arbitrary mental line drawn in space. All of our narratives of liberation come from space too, just like clouds billowing in the sky.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 17th, 2013 at 9:03 AM

Title: Re: What do you really think of Western monks and nuns?

Content:

anjali said:

I think when most people think of the Buddhist tradition they are thinking of the Buddhism with Shakyamuni Buddha as the founder.

Malcolm wrote:

Buddhadharma has no founder. It has no historical origin. That is what you discover when you read Buddhist sūtras carefully, even the so called "early" ones.

anjali said:

"Founder" is colloquial usage. Shakyamuni Buddha turned the dharma wheel once again after the buddha-dharma was forgotten in this world. Some people wish to follow his life model as a monastic. And people have done so throughout the centuries. If Shakyamuni Buddha hadn't lived a monastic lifestyle and founded a monastic order, I doubt any of us would be discussing the prospects of Buddhist monasticism in the West.

Malcolm wrote:

It all depends on who you think really turns the wheel of dharma, i.e., nirmanakāya emanations or the sambhoghakāya.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 17th, 2013 at 5:26 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Vidyaraja said:

Who has the correct view?

Malcolm wrote:

The one who is has woken up.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 17th, 2013 at 5:23 AM

Title: Re: What do you really think of Western monks and nuns?

Content:

anjali said:

I think when most people think of the Buddhist tradition they are thinking of the Buddhism with Shakyamuni Buddha as the founder.

Malcolm wrote:

Buddhadharma has no founder. It has no historical origin. That is what you discover when you read Buddhist sūtras carefully, even the so called "early" ones.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 17th, 2013 at 4:50 AM

Title: Re: What do you really think of Western monks and nuns?

Content:

anjali said:

Since the Buddha was a monk

Malcolm wrote:

There have been a lot of Buddhas, not all of them were monks.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 17th, 2013 at 4:43 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

JKhedrup said:

Whose enlightenment are you going to accept?

Still working on that one- slowly, slowly. There are such divergent opinions and paths. If one accepts in a general way skillful means perhaps one can accept there are different paths for different practitioners. But of course the more zealous practitioners of the various systems often claim that their methods are unique in offering the full attainment of enlightenment, which leads to all our wrangling.

Malcolm wrote:

Basically, it is really pretty simple. All yogic paths in Indian religion and its offshoots, whether Buddhist, Jain or Hindu, whether in India or Tibet, or China, etc., accept one thing in common: in order to cease taking rebirth in samsara, one must deal somehow with the kleśas that drive rebirth.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 17th, 2013 at 4:08 AM

Title: Re: What do you really think of Western monks and nuns?

Content:

JKhedrup said:

Thanks- so it would seem that Secularism could be said to be the dominant force in Scandinavia?

This is interesting.

Malcolm wrote:

Its the dominant force in America too, in the Blue States at any rate.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 17th, 2013 at 3:58 AM

Title: Re: What do you really think of Western monks and nuns?

Content:

JKhedrup said:

As it mentions, though, it is the Evangelical branches of Protestantism that are growing, so as I stated above people conditioned by those schools of religion are very unlikely to be interested in Buddhism anyways.

Malcolm wrote:

This is all besides the point.

The real point of your question is "Are monastics necessary for the continued transmission of Dharma in the West". I think not. It does not mean I am against people taking robes, though in the end it often proves to have been a bad decision.

There is no state support for monastics in the west. This has always served as the precondition for the success of the monastic Sangha. And it still is the condition which supports the the Tibetan monastic establishment. In fact, the only good argument for maintaing the TGIE is that it supports the monasteries in India (otherwise, it will never regain Tibet so is sort of an anachronism). Without it, I think many Tibetan monasteries in India would disappear.

The shifting fortunes of Chinese monasticism has also been tied to the state, even in modern Taiwan.

in the end, the West is a howling wilderness still for Buddhist monasticism. And given that we live in a very degenerate era, I do not think it will be relevant or able to respond to the needs of westerners in the long term.

Still, you can try.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 17th, 2013 at 3:49 AM

Title: Re: What do you really think of Western monks and nuns?

Content:

JKhedrup said:

Put your money where your mouth is Actually KD has extended assistance to Western monastics.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, that is good. I like a man who carries through on his stated convictions.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 17th, 2013 at 3:42 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Vidyaraja said:

One may judge incorrectly. The reality is, either Nichiren's claims are true or they aren't, they aren't true for some and false for others. Either enlightenment is real or it isn't.

Either Buddhist praxis is efficacious or it isn't.

Malcolm wrote:

Whose Buddhist praxis? Maybe Enlightenment is a total fantasy. Whose enlightenment are you going to accept? That one represented in the Pali Canon, Prajñāpāramitā? Chan? Zen? Pure Land? Nichirin? Dzogchen?

All of these schools have very different ideas concerning the path and the result. Whose is correct?

Again, it comes down to using one's own judgement.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 17th, 2013 at 3:39 AM

Title: Re: What do you really think of Western monks and nuns?

Content:

seeker242 said:

Western monks and nuns are an intrinsic part of the 3rd jewel of the 3 jewels! Sangha is called 3rd Jewel for a reason! A Sangha with no renunciates? What kind of sangha is that?! A one that is lacking IMO! I wish there were many more monks/nuns in the west!

Malcolm wrote:

Sangha means all practitioners/or alternatively only realized practitioners (this is the actual Sangha Jewel ".

It has nothing to do with the color of ones clothes or the length of ones hair.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 17th, 2013 at 3:38 AM

Title: Re: What do you really think of Western monks and nuns?

Content:

Karma Dorje said:

There are huge Roman Catholic communities in the US, Canada

Malcolm wrote:

Do you have any idea how much real estate the Vatican has for sale in the US? Or how much in decline the Catholic Church is in the US:

Pope Benedict XVI, who announced Monday that he is stepping down from the papacy, has led the Roman Catholic Church during a time of turmoil and change for American Catholics. Nearly one-third of Americans who were raised Catholic no longer describe themselves as Catholics. Overall, American Catholic churches lost 5 percent of their membership during the last decade, and the decline would have been much steeper if not for the offsetting impact of Catholic immigrants from Latin America.

<http://www.nationaljournal.com/politics/pope-benedict-and-the-decline-of-american-catholicism-20130211>

Karma Dorje said:

Why would we want to discourage monasticism when there are practitioners that aspire to such conduct?

Malcolm wrote:

Well, step up and start funding Lama Tsewang out in Vancouver. Put your money where your mouth is. That is my challenge to all you advocates of monasticism in the west. If you want a monastic Sangha in the West, then pay for it.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 17th, 2013 at 3:32 AM

Title: Re: What do you really think of Western monks and nuns?

Content:

JKhedrup said:

.

Protestantism of the mainline variety is on the decline in North America. I think its influence is generally overstated. Protestantism of the charismatic/evangelical variety's influence is not so important as those shaped by it have little chance of developing interest in Buddhism.

Malcolm wrote:

You completely missed my point -- as Latinos become americanized, they will also become Protestantized, and if they pick up yoga, Aryanized as well. It is not a religious thing, it is a cultural thing. And you might be surprised to learn this, but in Latin America, Protestantism is the fastest rising form of Christianity:

Home to about eight per cent of the world's 1.2 billion Catholics - more of the faithful than any country outside Brazil - Mexico has seen a slow but steady decline in people who self-identify with the faith. Currently about 82.7 per cent of Mexicans consider themselves Catholic, down from 88 per cent in 2000 and 96 per cent in 1970.

Evangelical protestant denominations are believed responsible for much of the drop.

"The Vatican is extremely concerned about competition with evangelicals," Daniel Levine, a professor at the University of Michigan who studies religious movements in Latin America, told Al Jazeera. "They are worried about losing their position as 'the' spokesperson for religion and morality in the region. It is a big change from a generation ago."

<http://www.aljazeera.com/indepth/features/2012/03/201232593459332334.html>

In any event, in the US and in Northern Europe, you absorb the cultural morays if you want to get ahead.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 17th, 2013 at 3:24 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

For those people who follow Nichiren it is true, for those of us who don't it is not.

Vidyaraja said:

So truth is relative and there is no absolute truth? It seems to me that either Nichiren's claims are true or they aren't.

Malcolm wrote:

Slippery slope there. All one is left with is one's own judgment about what to accept and reject.

Vidyaraja said:

If I revealed a new form of Buddhism wherein violence, theft, lying, and hedonistic indulgence is the path for our advanced Dharma-ending age and millions followed me, would it make that correct or worthy of being considered a form of Buddhism? I'd say no since it contradicts what the Buddha and preceding forms of Buddhism have upheld. There has to be some standard.

Malcolm wrote:

It is interesting to note that in the polemics against Bon, all kinds of standards that are raised and then abandoned when Bon meets them. In the end, Buddhists were just saying "Bon is not Buddhism because we say so".

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 17th, 2013 at 3:01 AM

Title: Re: What do you really think of Western monks and nuns?

Content:

Karma Dorje said:

Monastics provide a field of merit for lay people who do not want to immerse themselves in the practice to practice generosity. Their conduct and example can inspire. A diversity of paths benefits the greatest number of beings.

Malcolm wrote:

Most people in the west who do not practice, are also not Buddhists, so they do not care.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 17th, 2013 at 3:00 AM

Title: Re: What do you really think of Western monks and nuns?

Content:

JKhedrup said:

Well it depends. I mean, if one trains as a translator, of teachings or texts, can contribute to the running of the centre, becomes a qualified teacher, or serves the lay community, there can be very great benefit.

Malcolm wrote:

We don't need monks or nuns for this. I cannot see at all any valid reason why supporting an ordained person is better than supporting a lay person in the same role. I mean, it is not like westerners are running to monasteries to have rites recited to improve harvests, prevent frosts, etc. The context of supporting monastics to generate merit is lacking. This works in India because Indians in general support sadhus and other kinds of renunciates. It is a part of their culture. America and Northern Europe, the dominate places where there is interest outside of Asia in Buddhism are also Protestant countries. We don't like celibate priests much; we do not trust them culturally, and regard them with suspicion. And especially in Tibetan Buddhism there is a strong tradition of a trained laity who can carry out all the necessary religious roles which may be needed.

Quite frankly, most Buddhist learning is anachronistic -- the study of Abhidharma is great, but is deeply hampered by the medieval India culture that engendered it. The Prajñāparamita tradition is equally obscure and hard to make relevant. Even Madhyamaka is not so useful to most folks. "Why should I support this guy in studying such weird stuff that is not at all relevant to me?" -- this is the question that the monastic establishment must answer in the West.

There are basically four forms of Buddhism spreading in the West:

- 1) Psychological & Secular Buddhism ala Batchelor, etc.
- 2) Technological Buddhism i.e. Vajrayāna, Bon, Dzogchen etc.
- 3) Contemplative Buddhism i.e. Vipassana, Zen, etc.
- 4) Evangelical Buddhism i.e. Nichirin, Pure Land, etc.

While there are various crossovers between these four, none of these requires the basis of a monastic Sangha.

JKhedrup said:

2) People are meeting a lot of Western monks and nuns who are not qualified or behave badly, but if the standards improved they might be interested in assisting sincere practitioners who have an affinity for the path of ordination.

Malcolm wrote:

Western Buddhists who supports monastics in Asia general do so because of the "cute" factor, or because they have a personal connection with a monastery or a monastic. But it possible because it is cheap.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 17th, 2013 at 2:42 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Vidyaraja said:

If that is the case, how are we to discern which form of continual revelation is true?

Nichiren claims that only the Lotus sutra and the chanting of Daimoku can lead to liberation in this degenerate age of the Dharma. If his revelation is true, this invalidates most other forms of Buddhism.

Malcolm wrote:

For those people who follow Nichiren it is true, for those of us who don't it is not.

Vidyaraja said:

What about Stephen Batchelor's Buddhism devoid of all higher spirituality and regulated to the level of secular Buddhism? Can we say that this is also part of the continual revelation?

Malcolm wrote:

It is part of the history of Buddhism. His books have "entered the canon" so to speak as there are a large number of people who take them very seriously.

Vidyaraja said:

As to Sanderson's theories, I would say they are correct. The imagery in tantra, such as garlands of skulls or deities standing upon lesser deities or third eyes open, are absent from the Buddhism prior to Vajrayana but present within Shaivism. Hatha yoga, kundalini, occult corporeality (like chakras) are also absent from Buddhism prior to Vajrayana but also present within Shaivism. Mahakala for example, a deity absent from prior forms of Buddhism, is Bhairava, the wrathful form of Shiva. I personally respect a good deal of Shaivism, so this isn't a problem for me, but it may be for other Buddhists.

Malcolm wrote:

In fact, the first text to mention cakras is the Hevajra tantra -- even though the idea of nadis is very ancient. The notion of prāṇayāma and pratyahara, etc. are found in the Majjhima Nikaya and so on.

You need to read Davidson's book, he addresses the majority of your concerns quite well.

In this respect, there is a pan-Indian yogic culture, a toolbox of realization if you will, used by all schools who have different understandings of the results of that practice.

Buddha did not reject yoga, for example, he was a yogi. There is very little difference between how practice is described in the Yoga Sutras and what is described in Pali Buddhist scriptures. Though many people imagine that Patañjali was responding to Buddhists, I think this is a naive assumption.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 17th, 2013 at 2:33 AM

Title: Re: What do you really think of Western monks and nuns?

Content:

JKhedrup said:

The most neurotic Buddhists I have ever met were monks and nuns.

For true monasticism, where monks and nuns can practice single pointedly, some confidence and support from the lay community is required.

Malcolm wrote:

And of what benefit is this to us? Why is having a monastic sangha a desiderata?

JKhedrup said:

We cannot simply pretend that there is not a problem if we ever hope to get this way of life going here.

Malcolm wrote:

Give a good reason why supporting Western monks and nuns benefits lay people in the West?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 17th, 2013 at 2:19 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Who cares? "Early" Buddhism is not the standard of what Buddhadharma is. "Early Buddhism" is a pedantic reconstruction.

Indrajala said:

The Dharma of the Buddha stems from the figure himself, who is best represented in reconstructions of "Early Buddhism", at least if you accept the mainstream ontology of the present day.

Malcolm wrote:

I don't think so. "Early" or "Original" Buddhism is text-"critically" engendered fantasy.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 17th, 2013 at 2:15 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Vidyaraja said:

Do you say early Buddhism is not the standard of what Buddhadharma is and that attempting to discern earliest Buddhism is a pedantic reconstruction because you sincerely believe that

Malcolm wrote:

Because I believe that is it merely a pedantic reconstruction.

Vidyaraja said:

I don't have anything against it for this reason, but it seems to me that the tantra of Vajrayana is derived from Shaivist rather than Buddhist sources as Alexis Sanderson points out in this article:

Malcolm wrote:

Ronald Davidson has pointed out several shortcomings of Sanderson's theories in Indian Esoteric Buddhism.

I like what Dan Martin says, when defending Bon as a form a Buddhism:

"Eventually, and with the help of a very small band of Buddhologists who have been speaking rather too softly over the years, we will find out that Buddhism has always been a religion of continual revelation...the canonizers of Buddhist scriptures, if they were looking for integrity, would have done well to be satisfied with parts of one or two sūtras, much as our contemporary researchers for 'original Buddhism' would have us do. Then we today would be in a much better position, since ninety-nine percent of the Buddhist scriptures could be relegated to that great and greatly ignored category of 'apocrypha', could be safely dispensed with, just as the Bon canon as a whole has itself been pre-dispensed with."

Ppg 211-213 Unearthing Bon Treasures, Brill, 2001.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 17th, 2013 at 1:34 AM

Title: Re: Getting back on track after a failing teacher

Content:

Indrajala said:

I'm no arhat, but I see the wisdom in abandoning the immediate causes for suffering and anxiety. The politics and alternative universes you see in various forms of Buddhism are causes for causes for anxiety.

Malcolm wrote:

The immediate cause for suffering and anxiety is the three afflictions. There are three ways to deal with these: renunciation, transformation or self-liberation.

The latter two require instruction by a qualified guru. The former does not. In my estimation, the latter two are more effective in this day and age, as we have already discussed elsewhere.

The most neurotic Buddhists I have ever met were monks and nuns.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 17th, 2013 at 1:23 AM

Title: Re: Early Buddhism and Mahayana

Content:

Vidyaraja said:

Well the discussion as turned into general Mahayana, but my initial question was wondering which of the present forms would be most recognizable to the earliest disciples of Buddhism and which would be most alien--be it in doctrine, modes of practice, approach, etc. I suppose what is meant by early Buddhism would be Buddhism during the first few centuries of its existence.

Indrajala said:

I think Pure Land Buddhism would be seen as rather alien to the early Buddhists, especially Shinran's ideas.

Malcolm wrote:

Who cares? "Early" Buddhism is not the standard of what Buddhadharma is. "Early Buddhism" is a pedantic reconstruction.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 17th, 2013 at 1:19 AM

Title: Re: Getting back on track after a failing teacher

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

You do realize, that if you continue in this vein, whether intentionally or not, you are lending credence to the perception that you have animosity and bias towards Tibetan Buddhism.

Indrajala said:

I'm equally critical of any other form of Buddhism.

Malcolm wrote:

No, you are not, not at all. You may feel you are, but I don't see you spending much time in the Chan/Zen and Pure Land Forums, or the Nicherin Forums criticizing them. Or the Theravada forums, for that matter.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 17th, 2013 at 1:19 AM

Title: Re: Getting back on track after a failing teacher

Content:

Indrajala said:

Strictly speaking, liberation from suffering is not the same as buddhahood. The point of Vajrayana is rapid progress to buddhahood.

dzogchungpa said:

What do you think the swiftest path to liberation from suffering is?

Malcolm wrote:

Oh, its obvious by his choices. He thinks that being a renunciate is the fastest to achieve liberation from suffering, and all of his comments in this vein are stemming from his conviction in this perspective.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 17th, 2013 at 1:15 AM

Title: Re: Getting back on track after a failing teacher

Content:

Indrajala said:

The point is that if you make grand claims about advanced abilities and rapid spiritual development, then your tradition and members should readily display many good qualities and constant benevolent conduct.

Malcolm wrote:

Then at the very best, I think Vajrayāna fares quite well in that regard. At the very least, they are no worse than any other tradition within Buddhism.

You do realize, that if you continue in this vein, whether intentionally or not, you are lending credence to the perception that you have animosity and bias towards Tibetan Buddhism.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 17th, 2013 at 12:37 AM

Title: Re: Getting back on track after a failing teacher

Content:

Indrajala said:

In other words, the burden of proof is on the people making such enormous claims.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, so when are you going to start attacking the Buddha? After all, he made the grandest unsubstantiated claim of all.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 16th, 2013 at 8:37 PM

Title: Re: Getting back on track after a failing teacher

Content:

kirtu said:

Now in fact your guru may not be a perfect guru. Even Jamgon Kongtrul said that "nowadays perfect gurus are rare." So it may behoove people to read his comments in Ethics on the student/teacher relationship. This has apparently also been published under the title "The Teacher-Student Relationship" by Jamgon Kongtrul.

Kirt

Malcolm wrote:

Sounds like we are dealing with a not-even-marginally-adequate-in-terms-of-qualities guru here. And the implication of your post could lead one to believe that you disapprove separating oneself from a guru of questionable merits.

Actually, it is really, really easy to learn how to construct a mandala, read a liturgy, perform some mudras, ring a bell, wave a vajra around in the air and play a damaru, etc. Along with that, dress up in some traditional robes, look Tibetan, and walla, now you are a Guru.

The hard part about being a guru is guiding people along the path of Buddhahood when you yourself are not a Buddha — and that is where the pitfalls and dangers lay. Guiding people without conditioning them, helping them to understand and then open up their innate capacity for awakening is not easy. Frankly most so called "gurus" these days are just marketing religion in the name of awakening.

Anyone can learn a ritual or two. Waking up is a different matter.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 16th, 2013 at 4:05 AM

Title: Re: is empowerment necessary for guru rinpoche guru yoga

Content:

KonchokZoepa said:

i noticed that there are some webcasts but i dont know where, can you post the link.

malcolm, is this lung thing a bit dogmatic, since the lung transfers the lamas realization, or the seed of that. but isnt it kind of harsh that you can't do any practice without the lung for it. because not everyone has the possibility to receive lungs from lamas, but i dont think its a rule or a law that they cant because the dont have lung practice the dharma.

i have no idea when it is possible to receive lung for padmasambhava guru yoga. i dont even know if in the drikung lineage there is padmasambhava guru yoga. ive seen few on the internet and want to try them to see if my devotion flows more freely to padmasambhava than to jigten sumgön.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, in Drikung there is the three roots practice of Yangzab as well as the terma cycles of Nuden Dorje. You can get the transmission for Padmasambhava Guru yoga quite easily in drikung.

You can in the meantime supplicate Padmasambhava by reciting the seven line prayer, and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 16th, 2013 at 2:46 AM

Title: Re: Getting back on track after a failing teacher

Content:

Indrajala said:

This is of course different from the Vajrayana model, but it aims for buddhahood, which is separate discussion. Let's first get to liberation from suffering first before proceeding to more lofty goals.

Malcolm wrote:

Unless of course one is interested in Vajrayana right from the start...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 16th, 2013 at 2:34 AM

Title: Re: is empowerment necessary for guru rinpoche guru yoga

Content:

KonchokZoepa said:

i belong mainly to the lineage of drikung kagyu and i havent received the lung or the wang for ngondro but maybe next time i see rinpoche he will bless me with them.

anyway concerning padmasambhava guru yoga, id rather do guru yoga to padmasambhava than jigten sumgon. so is it allowed to practice padmasambhava guru yoga without initiation

Malcolm wrote:

Not without the lung.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, September 15th, 2013 at 11:07 PM

Title: Re: is empowerment necessary for guru rinpoche guru yoga

Content:

KonchokZoepa said:

thats my question. is empowerment and lung necessary for padmasambhava guru yoga's.

Malcolm wrote:

Generally, yes.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, September 15th, 2013 at 10:07 PM

Title: Re: Who holds the highest throne?

Content:

Alfredo said:
Thus spake Wikipedia:

Malcolm wrote:
This applies only in Gelug.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Sunday, September 15th, 2013 at 10:05 PM
Title: Re: Getting back on track after a failing teacher
Content:
Indrajala said:
The real refuge is the Dharma, because it liberates and technically infallible.
.

Malcolm wrote:
The real refuge is the Dharmakāya, because unlike the Dharma and the Sangha, it is not impermanent.

That aside; as you know, the guru considered the primary refuge in Vajrayāna because that is the person from whom one receives both the ripening empowerments, and more importantly, the liberating instructions.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Sunday, September 15th, 2013 at 9:59 PM
Title: Re: Getting back on track after a failing teacher
Content:
Indrajala said:
I'm aware folks from Tibetan Buddhism will tend to disagree with this, but then I see how disappointed Tibetan Buddhists can be with their gurus. Some spend years and years with someone only to be emotionally and spiritually devastated.

Malcolm wrote:
Hence the detailed and pointed instructions in Vajrayāna texts about taking extreme care in choosing one's guru; the kind of guru to avoid, and the pitfalls of picking a bad one.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Sunday, September 15th, 2013 at 9:57 PM
Title: Re: Getting back on track after a failing teacher
Content:
Indrajala said:
Place faith in the Dharma, not fallible humans.

Be your own teacher.

Malcolm wrote:

That attitude does not work in Vajrayāna.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, September 15th, 2013 at 9:42 AM

Title: Re: Keith Dowman's translations

Content:

Nicholas Liber said:

Dowman, on the other hand, in his effort to overcome this obstacle, he's been making use of a more free rendering that includes poetic attitude as a means

Malcolm wrote:

Sadly, and this is a huge misunderstanding of Dzogchen texts i.e. that they are poetry. They are not. To the extent that they are in verses is merely an artifact of what we term "didactic verse". It is a good thing Dzogchen texts are not poetry, because were they so, they would be completely impossible to translate in any meaningful way.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 13th, 2013 at 9:58 PM

Title: Re: Keith Dowman's translations

Content:

Andreas said:

You should read them carefully and maybe compare it with other existing translation to form a good opinion.

Malcolm wrote:

I base my opinions on the original Tibetan, not on comparisons with other English translations. Thus far, we are not there yet in terms of universally good translations of Dzogchen texts into English by anyone -- this includes my own.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 13th, 2013 at 9:51 PM

Title: Re: Keith Dowman's translations

Content:

Andreas said:

Look at his many translations which had been published in the last years, works from Longchenpa and Vairocana: Eye of the Storm, Vairotsana's Five Original Transmissions

Malcolm wrote:
Already done by Adriano Clemente.

Andreas said:
Maya Yoga: Longchenpa's Finding Comfort and Ease in Enchantment

Malcolm wrote:
Guenther

Andreas said:
Natural Perfection: Longchenpa's Radical Dzogchen

Malcolm wrote:
Barron

Andreas said:
Spaciousness: The Radical Dzogchen of the Vajra Heart, Longchenpa's Precious Treasury of the Dharmadhatu and also :

Malcolm wrote:
Barron and Waldo

Andreas said:
Great Secret of Mind: Special Instructions on the Nonduality of Dzogchen
By: Tulku Pema Rigtsal, translated by Keith Dowman

Malcolm wrote:
Ok, my bad, this is the first original text, never before appearing in English, that he has translated and presented in many years.

Just to be clear, I am not saying that Dowman's translations are better or worse than these earlier ones I have listed. Merely that his follows theirs.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Friday, September 13th, 2013 at 9:37 PM
Title: Re: when to start studying and practicing Dzogchen

Content:
philji said:

Pema. Hi..sorry once again for any offence..these online forum things do have their drawbacks... I agree with what you say about people viewing Dzogchen as super sexy etc..... I am just a beginner myself but after receiving instructions from different teachers I can now begin to see that the instructions for recognising nature of mind are contained in many , many teachings..maybe LL of them?.. Once you know where to look you see it everywhere..it's quite amazing.... I think some folks including myself view some teachings as inferior That's a shame..... Even taking refuge is an introduction to our mind essence is it not?

Malcolm wrote:

Hi Phil:

Dzogchen is not, as is commonly assumed, merely a teaching about the nature of the mind. It is, by itself, a separate vehicle and path to liberation, complete and independent from beginning to end.

Can it be approached gradually, via lower vehicles. Sort of. But it is possible, and in my opinion best, to practice Dzogchen by itself as a complete path. It is not a path for superior people, it is a superior path for inferior people.

Does Dzogchen have some common features with lower yanas such as refuge, and so on. Of course. But it is different in how it approaches such things.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 13th, 2013 at 3:27 AM

Title: Re: Getting back on track after a failing teacher

Content:

dude said:

Let's move forward as "good friends," neither master nor disciple, but fellow practioners in mutual support to seek the correct path.

Malcolm wrote:

This attitude does not really work in Vajrayāna.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 13th, 2013 at 3:26 AM

Title: Re: Getting back on track after a failing teacher

Content:

Vajrapine said:

In Vajrayana, there is so much emphasis on the guru, Samaya etc. So on top of that feeling of... betrayal I guess?... you have to wrestle with the fear of having initiated a Tantric process and relationship that might be toxic in some sense.

Malcolm wrote:

I don't care what traditional teachers might say. If you find you are in a relationship with an unqualified teacher, drop them like a hot potato, don't look back, and if you are still interested in Dharma, then find another teacher. There are many teachers out there, good ones.

If a teacher has broken his own samayas, then you must not stay with that teacher.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 13th, 2013 at 2:42 AM

Title: Re: Riwo Sangchod - ingredients question

Content:

miranda said:

Of course yes there is animal fat in the 3 white, but the fat used in sur is another one, which is not from milked products, and not ok for the riwo sang chö.

There is another point which is not clear for me: The musk is present in regular high grade tibetan incense. And some riwo sang chö texts (at least the Dudjom version of Lhatsun Namkha Jigme's) include nagas among the guests. Meanwhile I never was told not to use those incense sticks in the sang....

heart said:

Yes, I wonder about this also. The riwo sangchö sticks I use smells great and contains musk.

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

If you have doubts, just use juniper...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 13th, 2013 at 2:05 AM

Title: Re: when to start studying and practicing Dzogchen

Content:

philji said:

I am sorry if I have offended anyone through my mention of greediness for Dzogchen...I uses I am old Skool and feel the need for purification and accumulation to clear the shit away from my eyes... Having received the introduction to the nature of my mind this accumulation and purification is so much more wonderful....

Malcolm wrote:

If you feel you need purification, etc., great. But you should not extrapolate from your condition to the condition of others.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 13th, 2013 at 12:44 AM

Title: Re: when to start studying and practicing Dzogchen

Content:

KonchokZoepa said:

so am i correct that you register in your local dzogchen community that is lead by Chogyal Namkhai Norbu and then you have the acces the the archive of webcasts?

Malcolm wrote:

The way it works is like this. You can listen to any open webcast (most webcasts are open) without being a member at all.

If you want to listen to replays, then there is an archive of those online, but you must be a member of the Dzogchen Community to access them and must have a password., etc.

You cannot receive any sort of transmission from a replay, they are intended to help people remember what rinpoche taught.

IN order to receive any transmission, you must be listening live. In your case, your gar is Merigar West. So you purchase your membership through their website.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 13th, 2013 at 12:27 AM

Title: Re: when to start studying and practicing Dzogchen

Content:

KonchokZoepa said:

i dont think dzogchen outrules mahayana teachings of loving kindness and compassion.

Malcolm wrote:

Dzogchen reveals the fact that compassion is a natural expression of the primordial state. Discover that, and you will discover true compassion. Otherwise, compassion is very partial and selective -- I see this among so called "Mahāyāna" practitioners all the time.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 13th, 2013 at 12:25 AM

Title: Re: when to start studying and practicing Dzogchen

Content:

philji said:

Everyone is so greedy for Dzogchen

Malcolm wrote:

Is there a problem with wanting to receive Dzogchen teachings right away? Is there a problem with wanting to be introduced to one's primordial state directly? I should think not.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 12th, 2013 at 8:53 PM

Title: Re: when to start studying and practicing Dzogchen

Content:

KonchokZoepa said:

ive read a little bit from his website.

it is still quite unclear if it is possible for me to attend these webcasts.

Malcolm wrote:

Many webcasts are open. You can attend by clicking the following link.

<http://www.shangshunginstitute.net/webcast/>

He always gives the complete transmission of Dzogchen in every retreat (some people may disagree, but they are wrong).

So you tomorrow morning, receive some lungs etc., and then make sure you attend the next webcast retreat which is open. In the meantime, you join Dzogchen Community so you can buy restricted books, and receive a password to listen to replays of retreats.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 12th, 2013 at 8:20 PM

Title: Re: when to start studying and practicing Dzogchen

Content:

KonchokZoepa said:

can you be an ordinary semi beginner Dharma practitioner and still receive the direct introduction?

thankyouu

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, just attend the open webcasts by ChNN.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 12th, 2013 at 8:42 AM

Title: Re: Getting back on track after a failing teacher

Content:

Vajrapine said:

For some years I have followed a teacher in the Tibetan tradition, who simply put has failed.

It has been a very painful process to accept this, and in that process I have lost the drive to practice. It just dissipated. I don't mind practice in theory, but I seem to totally have lost the connection in practice.

I would be immensely grateful for any advice, especially from anyone who has been through a similar experience, on how to get back in the saddle.

VP

Malcolm wrote:
Find a teacher you respect.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Thursday, September 12th, 2013 at 8:41 AM
Title: Re: when to start studying and practicing Dzogchen
Content:
KonchokZoepa said:
https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Pointing-out_instruction if this is what you mean, can you find direct introduction or pointing out introduction in / from books?

i dont have a mulaguru with whom i study regularly, allthough i just found out that there is a nyingma rinpoche living in my country, allthough in different city.

do the Nyingmapas teach dzogchen to the beginners?

and can you even study dzogchen succesfully with books or is there a requirement for the teacher to introduce it ?

Malcolm wrote:
Just attend webcasts by Chogyal Namkhai Norbu. That is the place to start.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Thursday, September 12th, 2013 at 5:26 AM
Title: Re: when to start studying and practicing Dzogchen
Content:
KonchokZoepa said:
im quite a beginner meditator, what are the requirements concerning meditation that you can integrate the dzogchen teachings in meditation?

Malcolm wrote:

Direct introduction.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 11th, 2013 at 6:37 AM

Title: Re: Keith Dowman's translations

Content:

Jikan said:

Interesting. Is he revising/updating the translations of others, or simply republishing them wholesale?

Malcolm wrote:

I can't say what his method is -- but he definitely seems to be retranslating texts others have forged ahead before him.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 11th, 2013 at 4:46 AM

Title: Re: Keith Dowman's translations

Content:

Jikan said:

I'd like to know what knowledgeable people think of Keith Dowman's translations (of which I have read only a few). It seems to me he has a unique approach to the work of translation, and there's no question he's productive.

Thoughts? Recommendations?

Malcolm wrote:

He has not published any original translations for many years. The majority of his published translations are retranslations of texts others have already translated. Rightly or wrongly, this has tarnished his reputation.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 9th, 2013 at 2:34 AM

Title: Re: Jes Bertelsen?

Content:

Barney Fife said:

Thank you for your patience with this overly long post. Any insights and comments are most welcome and are always very helpful and interesting additions to a great discussion.

b.f.

Malcolm wrote:

Who knows? I know another person who claims they experienced rigpa by merely being in Tulku Orgyen's presence without him even uttering a single word, before they have even received a single word of Dzogchen, and according to this person, when TU was asked about this experience later on, this person claims that TU confirmed that it indeed was rigpa this person experienced. This person is also not a person who is setting themselves up as a teacher, etc.

The only really important question a person should ask, and then only to themselves "Would I take teaching from this Mr. Bertelsen?" There are three answers, yes, no and "wait and see".

At this point I do not really see what the benefit to this continued discussion is. I certainly think that Mr. Bertelesen would prefer it if we not make him a continued subject of our scrutiny, because as far as I can tell, apart from naively sharing his experience in a book, he is harming no one that I can see. After all, this is just religion and people can believe whatever the hell they want. Some people believe that Trungpa was a horrible person, other people believe he was a saint, for example. The same is true of HHDL. In the end we are merely left with our own judgements and speculations and these judgements and speculations harm us much more than they harm their object.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Saturday, September 7th, 2013 at 8:57 AM
Title: Re: Celibacy
Content:
Malcolm wrote:
Relax

Author: Malcolm
Date: Saturday, September 7th, 2013 at 4:37 AM
Title: Re: Celibacy
Content:
Dronma said:
I don't like the expression "Boss" when we talk about Rinpoche.

dzogchungpa said:
I believe there is a scene in "My Reincarnation" where Yeshe Namkhai refers to Rinpoche as "the boss".

Malcolm wrote:
Yes, many of us refer to ChNN as "the boss" on a regular basis. He is our boss.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Saturday, September 7th, 2013 at 2:36 AM
Title: Re: Jes Bertelsen?

Content:

Unknown said:

In Dzogchen, meditation experiences are not the natural state, if I have understood correctly; you are either having meditation experiences, or you are in the natural state.

Malcolm wrote:

In Dzogchen, one is to train in the recognition of the "natural state" while having experiences. Bliss, clarity and non-conceptuality are distinct experiences used for this purpose.

Both movement and stillness are the energy of vidyā.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 7th, 2013 at 2:31 AM

Title: Re: Goddess Marici and Mayajalamahatantra

Content:

Rakshasa said:

Anyone has any info about Mayajalamahatantra which is about Goddess Marici. I've heard that Goddess Marici is the goddess of military arts. Is this tantra found in Tibetan canon?

kirtu said:

I have to check my notes (and this notebook is not with me at eh moment) but I'm pretty sure that in Bari Lotsawa's cycle she appears as a bodhisattva guarding primarily against robbery.

Kirt

Konchog1 said:

Ah, I remember reading (somewhere) that she is a Kriya deity and often prayed to by travelers. The book didn't explain why she was prayed to though.

Malcolm wrote:

For protection against bandits.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 6th, 2013 at 9:52 PM

Title: Re: Dzogchen practiced on different solar systems?

Content:

In the bone yard said:

Yes.

Malcolm wrote:

Rinpoche is not talking about illusory body in this context. He really means that there are thirteen other planets where Dzogchen is present being taught.

duffster1 said:

Hi,so he IS saying Dzogchen is being practiced on other planets?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, he is. Over and over again for years.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 6th, 2013 at 6:14 AM

Title: Re: Riwo Sangchod - ingredients question

Content:

Adamantine said:

That said, Dzongsar Khyentse has said (in an online podcast you can check out) that you don't even strictly need any incense for Riwo Sang Cho, the visualization is enough if you can't do the physical offering-- at least that's what my memory says he said!)

Malcolm wrote:

Correct.

And you do not even need to recite a lot of words, use a sang stuff, smudge stick, incense, and so on.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 6th, 2013 at 6:13 AM

Title: Re: Riwo Sangchod - ingredients question

Content:

WeiHan said:

So all other substances are really just later addition?

Malcolm wrote:

Yup.

WeiHan said:

Hi Malcolm,

For a city dweller like me, life is hectic. Juniper or plants are not readily available. The best option is burning an incense stick for the daily sang practice. It is 100 times better than not practicing. I think different people have a different situation.

Malcolm wrote:

Incense is fine as long as it is pure.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 6th, 2013 at 4:42 AM

Title: Re: ChNN's Yantra yoga: Transmission or no transmission?

Content:

Lhug-Pa said:

Here it is made quite clear that anything within the following book (including the Tsadul Pranayama) can be practiced without Transmission:

Chögyal Namkhai Norbu said:

<http://www.yantrayoga.org/store3/books/tibetan-yoga-of-movement-the-art-and-practice-of-yantra-yoga/> presents what we call the Open Level of Yantra Yoga and covers the basic practice of Yantra that anyone can apply with a little training and good will. This is my intention and my hope in opening Yantra Yoga to the world.

Lhug-Pa said:

This also implies that the Four Profound Applications Breathing from the public DVD's (which doesn't even reach Minor Kumbhaka, but even so there must be some benefit from it otherwise it would have been pointless to include in the DVD's), since the public DVD's are of the Open Level of Yantra Yoga as explained above by Rinpoche.

Malcolm wrote:

This book contains:

"Table of Contents:

What is Yantra Yoga?; The Uniqueness of Yantra Yoga; Advice for Practice; Warm-ups; The Nine Purification Breathings; The Five Exercises for Loosening the Joints; The Eight Movements to Purify the Prana; The Five Exercises to Control the Channels; The Five Main Groups of Yantras: The First Group; The Second Group; The Third Group; The Fourth Group; The Fifth Group; The Vajra Wave to Eliminate Obstacles"

As I said, all the yantras apart from the seven lotuses.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 6th, 2013 at 2:11 AM

Title: Re: Anonymity and Trolling

Content:

Thrasymachus said:

This is a nonsense discourse for analyzing forums: anonymous people and their trolling.

Malcolm wrote:

A perfect example of trolling.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 5th, 2013 at 11:33 PM

Title: Re: Ajahn Sujato on hate speech re:Buddhists in Aus. mosque

Content:

Dan74 said:

At the end of the day there's something a little suss about rubbishing someone else's religion and culture, even if the said rubbishing makes good points.

Malcolm wrote:

There are many cultural practices that are abusive of people -- these should be spoken out against. Customs where rapists have the option to marry their victims to expiate their crime. The binding of women's feet is another such custom. The custom of burning wives you wish to discard. The custom of honor killings. The custom "circumcising" the clitorises of young girls. The custom of denying young women to right to fair education. The custom of abducting young boys and training them as soldiers. I could go on. None of these customs are worthy of defending or ignoring. All of these customs have cultural and religious justifications. All of these customs are brutal indignities that defy basic principles of human decency.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 5th, 2013 at 10:35 PM

Title: Re: Riwo Sangchod - ingredients question

Content:

WeiHan said:

So all other substances are really just later addition?

Malcolm wrote:

Yup.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 5th, 2013 at 10:32 PM

Title: Re: Riwo Sangchod - ingredients question

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

[quote="Sherab Dorje"

Anyway, i was more referring to the precious metals and stones, sandalwood, silk material, etc.[/quote]

You don't need any of this for Sang offerings.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 5th, 2013 at 10:01 PM

Title: Re: Riwo Sangchod - ingredients question

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

After all this discussion on suitable ingredients etc... I am going to be a party pooper and say that the thing that is of utmost importance is the internal and secret offering. Not that the external offering isn't important, but I find it hard to believe that yogis living in caves in remote areas of Tibet had access to all the necessary physical ingredients all the time, yet they practiced because they did have access to the most important ingredient: their mind.

Malcolm wrote:

Juniper grows everywhere in Tibet. Flour, honey and milk are available to everyone too.

Making sang substance is not a big deal.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 5th, 2013 at 8:52 PM

Title: Re: Ajahn Sujato on hate speech re:Buddhists in Aus. mosque

Content:

uan said:

A theocracy is antithetical to our traditions...

Sherab Dorje said:

Really? What about Tibet before the Chinese invasion?

Malcolm wrote:

Tibet was never a theocracy. Wrong term. Tibet was not internally organized in this way. If any thing, Tibet was a loose confederation of small, independent Oligarchies, some ruled by monastic interests (who generally functioned much as corporations do today), others ruled by aristocratic families.

The Lhasa government was a combination of the two, the Khashag consisting of a board made up of an equal mix of secular aristocrats and monastic bureaucrats (who, like Desri Sangye Gyatso, were not always themselves monks). The Khashag had very little concrete power outside of the immediate precincts of Ü and Tshang.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 5th, 2013 at 5:18 AM

Title: Re: Celibacy

Content:

Unknown said:

It is true that some of the books and DVDs about Yantra Yoga are in the public section of SSI webstore. However, it is necessary for someone to have received in advance, at least, the Guruyoga Transmission from Rinpoche, in order to practice the Pranayamas and the advanced Yantras. Only the preliminary practices are open to all. This I know from Laura Evangelisti during a Yantra Yoga course I followed personally.

Malcolm wrote:

Actually, all the yantras can now be practiced as well as some of the pranayamas by people without having had transmission from the Boss.

What you say used to be the case, but that has now changed.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 5th, 2013 at 1:26 AM

Title: Re: Ajahn Sujato on hate speech re:Buddhists in Aus. mosque

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Or perhaps you are not communicating effectively and need to try another approach.

Sherab Dorje said:

I considered that. That's why I explained it slightly differently each time. Now, unfortunately I am limited to expressing myself with written words, so there is only so much I can do (poetry is not my forte)!

I could post photos of dead Muslim children from all over the world, but then I would be accused of being dramatic.

Do you have something else in mind? I'm willing to try it.

Malcolm wrote:

The problem is that you are having one conversation, and Khendrup is having another. So in fact you are talking past each other.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 4th, 2013 at 11:58 PM

Title: Re: Anonymity and Trolling

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

Somebody interested in intelligent and informed discussion will take the views of the other party into account too.

Malcolm wrote:

The commonly accepted definition of a troll is someone who disrupts conversations for sheer enjoyment.

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Troll_%28Internet%29

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 4th, 2013 at 8:59 PM

Title: Re: Ajahn Sujato on hate speech re:Buddhists in Aus. mosque

Content:

Sherab Dorje said:

I'm not repeating it four times because I want you to agree with me, I am doing it because clearly you (and others) are not understanding what I am trying to say.

Malcolm wrote:

Or perhaps you are not communicating effectively and need to try another approach.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 4th, 2013 at 8:56 PM

Title: Re: Dzogchen practiced on different solar systems?

Content:

In the bone yard said:

Yes.

Malcolm wrote:

Rinpoche is not talking about illusory body in this context. He really means that there are thirteen other planets where Dzogchen is present being taught.

Nighthawk said:

In this solar system? HmMMM

Malcolm wrote:

No, not in this solar system, obviously.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 3rd, 2013 at 8:04 PM

Title: Re: Ajahn Sujato on hate speech re:Buddhists in Aus. mosque

Content:

JKhedrup said:

Definition of liberal: broad-minded; especially : not bound by authoritarianism, orthodoxy, or traditional forms

When this philosophy becomes selective, ignoring authoritarianism and traditional values that trample on the rights of others, I decided to refer to it as neo-liberalism. It is a selective application of liberal principles according to the modern laws of identity politics and political correctness, which leads to a peculiar silence that shrilly denounces human rights abuses by some and strategically ignores them by others.

Malcolm wrote:

Sorry, you can't use this — neo-liberalism already has a well defined meaning. It refers to the radical free market ideology that drives corporate globalization.

The far right in the states has coined a term that might exploit to advantage for such people that you describe: libtard.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 3rd, 2013 at 6:40 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen practiced on different solar systems?

Content:

In the bone yard said:

Yes.

Malcolm wrote:

Rinpoche is not talking about illusory body in this context. He really means that there are thirteen other planets where Dzogchen is present being taught.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 3rd, 2013 at 5:12 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen practiced on different solar systems?

Content:

In the bone yard said:

Master Norbu may be referring to the illusory body.

Malcolm wrote:
No.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Saturday, August 31st, 2013 at 11:17 PM
Title: Re: China destroys the ancient Buddhist symbols of Lhasa Cit
Content:

Lotus_Bitch said:
Actually, there is major difference between Tibet and the Andes: water. Water was never in shortage in Tibet. A major river runs right through the center of the country fed by smaller rivers on both sides. Tibetan "urban" civilization was entirely clustered around rivers. Indeed, it is supposed that the Zhang Zhung civilization centered around Kailash collapsed because of climate change, pushing the Zhang Zhung tribes into lower part of the what is the modern day TAR where there was more water.

The Andes, by comparison, are really quite dry, so water is much more of an issue for the Incas.
I don't think you could generalize about the Andes like that, the altiplano sure, but even then there's the Apurimac river to the West of Cusco with the Urubamba flanking East also.

Malcolm wrote:
There is nothing in Andes that resembles the Tsangpo river.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Saturday, August 31st, 2013 at 9:52 PM
Title: Re: Ajahn Sujato on hate speech re:Buddhists in Aus. mosque
Content:

Malcolm wrote:
This is all irrelevant to the Dharma. America is not a Dharma country (Dharmadeśa), Europe is not a Dharma country; though some buddhists might imagine it is a "central" country due to the presence of the few thousand monks.

What we have are squabbles between various worldly people and other various worldly people. Should they avoid violence? Yes.

American foreign policy has been aggressive for decades. Our Government is the Ajatasatru of the modern era.

Dar el Islam has been aggressive for centuries -- and American foreign policy has woken a sleeping behemoth. Of course there are Western educated liberal muslim scholars.

They are marginal in their own communities however. What they have to say is drowned in the rising tide of anger the Muslim world has towards the West.

The Buddha made things very clear. When a country is peaceful, minding its own business, caring for its population, then well, if they are attacked it is correct for them to respond. Do America and Europe fit this picture? No.

Therefore it should come as no surprise to us that some Moslems are attacking symbols of western imperialism since they do not yet have the power to attack us en masse directly.

The only sane response to this is for America and Europe to depart the middle east peacefully. If the whole place goes up in flames in the ensuing chaos, there is sadly nothing we can do except provide medical and humanitarian relief. But our experiments in regime changes have been utter failures so far.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 31st, 2013 at 10:09 AM

Title: Re: China destroys the ancient Buddhist symbols of Lhasa Cit

Content:

brendan said:

How can you type that but also claim there were social advancements in pre-PRC Tibetan civilisation equal to that of western civilisation who had no Realized Masters or Dharma.

Malcolm wrote:

This has nothing at all do with the whether there are more realized Tibetan masters in Tibet or India.

There are more realized Buddha masters (of Vajrayāna) with the borders of Tibet than without. I was not making any sort of claim about Indian civilization, Tibetan Civilization, Western Civilization and so on. You were the one who introduced this into the discussion.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 31st, 2013 at 9:42 AM

Title: Re: China destroys the ancient Buddhist symbols of Lhasa Cit

Content:

JKhedrup said:

To be frank I am surprised you would quote such a source and give it so much credence.

Lotus_Bitch said:

There is some credence to what Indrajala brought up though. Looking at the Incan civilization, we see that they developed running water, baths, etc. within similar conditions (of the Tibetans) in the Andes mountains....

<http://enperublog.com/2009/07/08/surprising-water-engineering-at-machu-picchu/>

http://www.tripadvisor.com/Attraction_Review-g294314-d553950-Reviews-Inca_Baths_at_Tambomachay-Cusco_Cusco_Region.html

Malcolm wrote:

Actually, there is major difference between Tibet and the Andes: water. Water was never in shortage in Tibet. A major river runs right through the center of the country fed by smaller rivers on both sides. Tibetan "urban" civilization was entirely clustered around rivers. Indeed, it is supposed that the Zhang Zhung civilization centered around Kailash collapsed because of climate change, pushing the Zhang Zhung tribes into lower part of the what is the modern day TAR where there was more water.

The Andes, by comparison, are really quite dry, so water is much more of an issue for the Incas.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 31st, 2013 at 9:27 AM

Title: Re: China destroys the ancient Buddhist symbols of Lhasa Cit

Content:

brendan said:

I understand western civilizations so called achievements are not a manifestation of "right view" and could be seen as being demonic.

Malcolm wrote:

You are making an idiot of yourself by such declarations.

brendan said:

Why? climate change seems to be a direct result of our progress.

Malcolm wrote:

There is no teaching in the Dharma that declares useful things "demonic" or somehow lacking "right view".

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 31st, 2013 at 4:01 AM

Title: Re: China destroys the ancient Buddhist symbols of Lhasa Cit

Content:

Indrajala said:

Humour isn't a sin. You should be able to laugh at Hyecho and his silly remark.

Malcolm wrote:

Humor is not a sin; bringing up that citation in the context this discussion shows an appalling lack of proportion.

Indrajala said:

Jeff, you need to study the history of Central Asia a little more carefully: it is certain that this monk's view of Tibetans was jaundiced by the fact that Tibetans (from Lhasa) held sovereignty over large swaths of Central Asia.

Sure, but the Tang history gives detailed observations of the Tibetan culture and habits at the time. Hyecho isn't my only source.

Malcolm wrote:

Consider the source: the Chinese have had nothing good to say about Tibetans since Minister Gar tricked the emperor out of his prized daughter.

Indrajala said:

Naw. I just counter the overzealous hype over Tibet.

Malcolm wrote:

No, Jeff -- your participation here was not countering any overzealous hype about Tibet. Anyone reading the thread can see this. What anyone can also see is that someone who claims to be Buddhist monk is casting racist aspersions about Tibetans, which they should not do, just as they should not invent and spread racist myths about Muslims -- which unfortunately happens in Tibet these days a lot. Tibetans happen to be very racist people in general. So when I hear racist things coming out of the mouths of Tibetans about westerners, or Muslims or Chinese people I become equally annoyed.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 31st, 2013 at 3:25 AM

Title: Re: China destroys the ancient Buddhist symbols of Lhasa Cit

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

I think you are either finding yourself amusing, or you have vastly overestimated the caloric value of yak dung as fuel. Trust me, it does not burn very hot, and it takes a very, very long time to heat water at 13,000 feet.

Indrajala said:

When I was in Ladakh at 3600 metres above sea level I managed to do a quick cold wash sponge bath before getting my clothes quickly back on. Easy enough with a small amount of cold water.

Some descriptions of pre-modern Tibet just make it sound like they weren't trying, even in terms of basic sanitation in monasteries.

Malcolm wrote:

Descriptions of pre- Modern Canada makes it sound like they weren't trying very hard, even in terms of the basic sanitation of Toronto.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 31st, 2013 at 3:24 AM

Title: Re: China destroys the ancient Buddhist symbols of Lhasa Cit

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Do you think this is funny?

Indrajala said:

Yes.

Malcolm wrote:

Many racists think their quips about the mores (whether true or false) of other people are funny. It's one of the signs by which one can tell one is racist towards a given group of people.

Indrajala said:

It is a little strange that he thinks there were no monasteries nor knowledge of Buddhism in Tibet. He clearly never visited Central Tibet in his travels.

The Tang Chinese didn't seem to think the Tibetans had much Buddhism, either. In the 8th century maybe they had a bit in the aristocratic circles.

Malcolm wrote:

Jeff, you need to study the history of Central Asia a little more carefully: it is certain that this monk's view of Tibetans was jaundiced by the fact that Tibetans (from Lhasa) held sovereignty over large swaths of Central Asia.

Indrajala said:

I think I've hit a sore spot. Some people here are rather emotionally invested in Tibet ... as Tibetan Buddhists?

Malcolm wrote:

No, if you are saying the same thing about blacks, Chinese people, mexicans, etc., I would equally take you to task.

You never spare any occasion to point barbs at Tibetans or their culture on this forum. Its pretty unbecoming conduct for a so called Buddhist monk.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 31st, 2013 at 3:08 AM

Title: Re: China destroys the ancient Buddhist symbols of Lhasa Cit

Content:

Indrajala said:

Not too long ago a Tibetan monk commented to me that he felt besides Buddhism, he thinks Tibet never really had much of a civilization.

Malcolm wrote:

I am sure your monk friend never went to Tibet and has very little understanding of Tibetan culture and history, having spent his entire life in India (no wonder non-diaspora Tibetans find diaspora Tibetans annoying).

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 31st, 2013 at 3:06 AM

Title: Re: China destroys the ancient Buddhist symbols of Lhasa Cit

Content:

JKhedrup said:

Indeed, if the Tibetans in the more remote and barren areas bathed regularly it would have become a threat to the environment- wood was that scarce and the trees would have disappeared.

Indrajala said:

Naw. An extra dung fire a day for washing wouldn't have been a big deal.

Malcolm wrote:

I think you are either finding yourself amusing, or you have vastly overestimated the caloric value of yak dung as fuel. Trust me, it does not burn very hot, and it takes a very, very long time to heat water at 13,000 feet.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 31st, 2013 at 3:03 AM

Title: Re: China destroys the ancient Buddhist symbols of Lhasa Cit

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Just read the thread. It's ridiculous and you know it.

Indrajala said:

It is kind of comical, sure, but really my point is that the Tibetans invested a lot of resources into their religion (that's fine) while maybe neglecting things like hygiene, sanitation and infrastructure which they had examples from neighbouring cultures.

The Tang Chinese for instance had mile marker stones which facilitated travel and trade. They also had a limited pension system, baths and other such useful things. The Tibetans could have emulated such projects, but for various reasons it seems they didn't take so much of an interest. In the long-term they invested their resources differently, perhaps neglecting what could have been quite beneficial projects.

Malcolm wrote:

And just exactly what do you know about public works projects and Tibetan civilization? Given how sparsely populated the country was, it is amazing what Tibetans accomplished.

Indrajala said:

I'm well aware of the climate and water issues in Tibet. They still could have taken some of their resources and built public baths. They ultimately didn't. It wasn't a big deal ultimately.

Malcolm wrote:

You are being disingenuous.

Indrajala said:

So this conversation just strikes me as quite racist and narrow minded, with an absence of reflection on the real cultural circumstances, environmental and so on that, that we find these people in.

Was there a pressing need to munch on lice as Hyecho pointed out?

Malcolm wrote:

Do you think this is funny?

Do you have a pressing need to repeat the inaccurate observations of an eighth century Korean out of context?

It is a little strange that he thinks there were no monasteries nor knowledge of Buddhism in Tibet. He clearly never visited Central Tibet in his travels.

It appears from his observation that he only passed through the nomadic region in far Western Tibet upon leaving Kashmir. So his observations must be considered rather suspect if one is to generalize from them as a whole.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 31st, 2013 at 2:32 AM

Title: Re: China destroys the ancient Buddhist symbols of Lhasa Cit

Content:

JKhedrup said:

So it seems unfair to target the Tibetans in this regard.

Malcolm wrote:

It is blatantly racist, given the way and the tone in which the subject was raised.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 31st, 2013 at 2:25 AM

Title: Re: China destroys the ancient Buddhist symbols of Lhasa Cit

Content:

brendan said:

I understand western civilizations so called achievements are not a manifestation of "right view" and could be seen as being demonic.

Malcolm wrote:

You are making an idiot of yourself by such declarations.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 31st, 2013 at 2:22 AM

Title: Re: China destroys the ancient Buddhist symbols of Lhasa Cit

Content:

Indrajala said:

Honestly, I never expected to see such racial prejudice on this forum.

I don't think you can convincingly argue that this is about race. More just poor quality sanitation and hygiene in a given civilization.

Malcolm wrote:

Just read the thread. It's ridiculous and you know it. It is not as if most people in Western Countries have had hot and cold running water prior to 1940.

The attitude being expressed here is one of total misunderstanding of a) differences in climate between the Himalayas and India; resources availability such as water -- it is not like they bathed with heated water in India, Jeff, they used water as it was from wells and rivers, heated by the sun. Rivers in Tibet are extremely cold even in the summer.

Tibetans made regular use of hot springs where they existed. But most nomads lived in places far away from such volcanically active sites, herding yaks and sheep in the meadows and plains.

In places like Lhasa, the aristocracy could afford more regular bathing, just like in Europe, whereas poorer people could not afford it. Monks, when they bathed, only bathed twice a month.

Just as in Americas during the 16th, 17th, 18th, and much of the 19th century, regular bathing was regarded as unhealthy by much of the Tibetan population, farmers and nomads. It was only after Pasteur that bathing began to take hold in Europe and the US. And daily bathing was not common in the US until after WWII, and in parts of Europe, it is still not common.

Conditions in India are different -- it is hot, people are much hairier -- Tibetans have virtually no body hair in general.

In terms of sewer systems -- Tibet never had large populations apart from in Lhasa to deal with, so it was not an issue for most Tibetans when they came to India and Nepal. Population pressure by the Chinese have forced a lot of Tibetans away from their previous, lowland winter habitations, further, most of the pollution in Tibet has been brought by the Chinese, who now outnumber Tibetans in their own land by quite a bit.

So this conversation just strikes me as quite racist and narrow minded, with an absence of reflection on the real cultural circumstances, environmental and so on that, that we find these people in.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 31st, 2013 at 1:54 AM

Title: Re: China destroys the ancient Buddhist symbols of Lhasa Cit

Content:

brendan said:

Washing is just one example.

What about woman and children?

What about medicine, giving practitioners safe infrastructure (sewage systems etc)..

Malcolm wrote:

You really actually have no clue what you are talking about. Your ignorance of Tibetan culture and history is pretty appalling.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 31st, 2013 at 1:52 AM

Title: Re: China destroys the ancient Buddhist symbols of Lhasa Cit

Content:

Indrajala said:

They didn't see the bathing as worth maintaining it seems.

.

Malcolm wrote:

Buddhist monks, according to Mula Sarvastivada Vinaya, were only permitted to bath twice a month.

Also the Tibetans understood quite well the germ theory of disease.

Honestly, I never expected to see such racial prejudice on this forum.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 31st, 2013 at 1:50 AM

Title: Re: China destroys the ancient Buddhist symbols of Lhasa Cit

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Do you people have any clue how racist you sound right now?

Have you examined the hygienic habits of 19th century Canadians and Americans in comparison to the hygienic habits of 19th century Tibetans?

Do you seriously think we were actually cleaner than Tibetans prior to the time when most Europeans and Americans had no running water in their homes?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 30th, 2013 at 10:46 AM

Title: Re: China destroys the ancient Buddhist symbols of Lhasa Cit

Content:

anjali said:

are realized masters still present in Tibet who can give authentic transmission?

Malcolm wrote:

More than in India, actually.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 30th, 2013 at 10:45 AM

Title: Re: China destroys the ancient Buddhist symbols of Lhasa Cit

Content:

Sherlock said:

There are many Chinese monastics at Larung and Yachen and many books and commentaries are translated into Chinese that are not available in English. The accuracy of the translations is a different matter, but the content is out there and there is a demand for it.

Malcolm wrote:

The Chinese actually bulldozed major sections of Larung Gar because there were Chinese people there.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 30th, 2013 at 8:45 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen practiced on different solar systems?

Content:

Barney Fife said:

Thank you malcolm, that is interesting, it does sound what I remember hearing. Don't know about past and future tense in the Tibetan language, if it is always obvious or not.

Malcolm wrote:

In this case it is quite clear in the original text.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 30th, 2013 at 7:45 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen practiced on different solar systems?

Content:

Barney Fife said:

cool. great details, etc.

i also heard that there may be a listing of 64 Dzogchen Buddhas in their respective aeons and with their respective buddhafiels and world systems.

Malcolm wrote:

Temporally, it is not hard to discern. They are prior to this eon.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 30th, 2013 at 4:52 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen practiced on different solar systems?

Content:

mutsum said:

This is clearly not the case. The meaning of thal-ba is given throughout the commentary as (reduced to) powder, etc. HE Khenpo Jigphun has a long explanation about it, directly related to the title.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, I think you are over looking the meaning of thal ba as "samatikramatikrānta".

mutsum said:

Possibly though I doubt it. I prefer to stick to Vimalamitra's interpretation in the commentary and the long explanation by HE Khenpo Rinpoche.

Malcolm wrote:

Is Khenpo Jigphun's explanation to be found in his collected works?.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 30th, 2013 at 4:36 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen practiced on different solar systems?

Content:

mutsum said:

This is clearly not the case. The meaning of thal-ba is given throughout the commentary as (reduced to) powder, etc. HE Khenpo Jigphun has a long explanation about it, directly related to the title.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, I think you are over looking the meaning of thal ba as "samatikramatikrānta".

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 30th, 2013 at 3:19 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen practiced on different solar systems?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

No, he is referring to the so called "thal ba'i gnas", of which there are thirteen.

mutsum said:

No, you are mixing these sanctuaries (thal-ba'i gnas) and the pure realms or buddhafiels (zhing khrams). There are eight of these sanctuaries only, and thirteen pure realms. Actually pure realms (zhing khams) are a subdivision of these sanctuaries.

Malcolm wrote:

There are thirteen thal bas explained in the sgra thal gyur -- it is very clearly explained:

1. thal ba dbyangs
2. thal ba 'dzin
3. thal ba skyob
4. thal ba brdal ba
5. thal ba'i be con
6. thal ba'i rgyun
7. rab tu thal bas khyab
8. thal ba'i sgra
9. thal ba'i rlung
10. rin po che'i rlung thal ba
11. 'du ba'i thal ba
12. dung ldan thal ba
13. skar ma'i thal ba

Each one is called a buddhafiield, because each one also has a teacher, retinue, teaching, etc.

While the commentary on the text indeed glosses "thal ba" as brdal ba in this context i.e. "spread out", however, Norbu Rinpoche maintains that "thal ba" means "beyond".

What the text says is that there are eight types of thal ba'i gnas.

1. 'jig rten khams (durgatiloka)
2. shing khams (kṣetraloka, buddhafiields)
3. dam bca' skyobs
4. skyon gnas
5. 'pheb pa'i sa
6. sbyor ba
7. grags
8. song ba'i gnas

We are discussing here class two: buddhafiields where Dzogchen is taught.

Perhaps we are talking past each other.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 30th, 2013 at 2:12 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen practiced on different solar systems?

Content:

Barney Fife said:

Chogyal Namkhai Norbu Rinpoche may be referring to the twelve Nirmanakaya Dzogchen Buddhas

Malcolm wrote:

No, he is referring to the so called "thal ba'i gnas", of which there are thirteen. thal ba may mean "galaxy" or it may mean "universe". It is certainly broader than a solar system.

Within these thirteen thal ba are so called "fields" (kṣetras, zhing khams). The term zhing khams is often translated as "pure land", but that is inaccurate -- there are both pure and impure kṣetras. A better term is "buddhafield", since a kṣetra is defined as the field of activity of a given Buddha or bodhisattva. All of the zhing khams mentioned in these thirteen thal bas contain buddhas.

In these thirteen thal bas and their buddhafields it is maintained that Dzogchen teachings are presently found during this epoch.

Nighthawk said:

What is the criteria to get into these buddhafields?

Malcolm wrote:

One assumes merit, just the same as what got into this buddhafield.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 30th, 2013 at 2:01 AM

Title: Re: China destroys the ancient Buddhist symbols of Lhasa Cit

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Quite the opposite -- Dharma in Tibet, while under siege, has experienced a massive intellectual resurgence, especially in Eastern Tibet, Amdo and Golok -- with thousands of books being published in Tibetan language every year on all subjects.

Indrajala said:

That rather undermines or at least takes away from the arguments of diaspora Tibetans who say Buddhism is being systematically crushed and eradicated from Tibet.

Malcolm wrote:

I already mentioned that Tibetans in Tibet do not necessarily like Diaspora Tibetans very much.

For example, in Tibetan communities in this country [US] they tend to stay separate, with the Diaspora Tibetans always suspecting the non-Diaspora Tibetans of being spies.

There are also regional issues.

However, Institutional Buddhism is being suppressed when it represents a political threat to the Chinese, but the Chinese seem to care very little to prevent Tibetan Buddhist literary production as long as it is strictly academic and religious. Of course the non-diaspora Tibetans have developed an entire vocabulary for voicing their complaints to one another, but Beijing seems not to care. if you ever watched modern Tibetan dance music, you will see all kind of coded references to independence, HHDL and so on.

Also when Chinese people become interested in teachers like Khenpo Jigme Phuntsok, the Chinese will step in to put it down. They don't seem to care if the Tibetans practice Buddhism -- but they are not happy when the Chinese become interested in it.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 30th, 2013 at 1:41 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen practiced on different solar systems?

Content:

Barney Fife said:

Chogyal Namkhai Norbu Rinpoche may be referring to the twelve Nirmanakaya Dzogchen Buddhas

Malcolm wrote:

No, he is referring to the so called "thal ba'i gnas", of which there are thirteen. thal ba may mean "galaxy" or it may mean "universe". It is certainly broader than a solar system.

Within these thirteen thal ba are so called "fields" (kṣetras, zhing khams). The term zhing khams is often translated as "pure land", but that is inaccurate -- there are both pure and impure kṣetras. A better term is "buddhafield", since a kṣetra is defined as the field of activity of a given Buddha or bodhisattva. All of the zhing khams mentioned in these thirteen thal bas contain buddhas.

In these thirteen thal bas and their buddhafields it is maintained that Dzogchen teachings are presently found during this epoch.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 30th, 2013 at 1:10 AM

Title: Re: China destroys the ancient Buddhist symbols of Lhasa Cit

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Ironically, Tibetan Buddhism in India is pretty moribund.

The best work in Tibetan Buddhism by Tibetans is being done in Tibet.

Also the best practitioners and Lamas are in Tibet for the most part, not in India.

The Tibetans in Tibet are not really thrilled with the diaspora Tibetans.

anjali said:

Would you, or someone else also in the know, say more about this? As someone with absolutely no insight into the current state of Buddhism within Tibet, I get the impression that the backbone of Buddhism in Tibet has been broken and that cultural genocide by China is steadily proceeding. Is this not the case? Is Buddhism within Tibet resilient? Or is it fragmented to the point of unsustainability, even though there may be strong pockets of practice?

Malcolm wrote:

Quite the opposite -- Dharma in Tibet, while under siege, has experienced a massive intellectual resurgence, especially in Eastern Tibet, Amdo and Golok -- with thousands of books being published in Tibetan language every year on all subjects.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 29th, 2013 at 8:18 AM

Title: Re: Ngakpa & Someone with Tantric Initiation: Difference?

Content:

Kunzang8 said:

Hi

1) What is the difference between someone who is a Ngakpa and someone who has taken higher tantric initiations - don't they have the same Tantric vows and commitments. I suppose it would be correct to say all Ngakpas are Tantric practitioners but not all Tantric practitioners are Ngakpas?

2) If one is a Ngakpa is it normal for such a person later to decide to become an ordained monk? Or for an ordained monk who for whatever reason later to become a Ngakpa (I'm not talking about reverting to being an ordinary lay person but a Ngakpa in the traditional sense). Anyone know such examples?

Thanks.

Malcolm wrote:

A lot of people like to wear a stripped robe these days, and call themselves a Ngakpa, but if your mantras have no force and power, then just what is the point of calling yourself a Mantrika? Not much.

Even if you have the formal sngags pa empowerment like me, hesitate to call yourself a sngags pa if your mantras have about as much force as wind on a still hot humid summers day.

Adamantine said:

Malcolm, did you encounter many/any ngakpas in your Tibet travels?

Malcolm wrote:

A few.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 29th, 2013 at 6:02 AM

Title: Re: Ngakpa & Someone with Tantric Initiation: Difference?

Content:

Kunzang8 said:

Hi

1) What is the difference between someone who is a Ngakpa and someone who has taken higher tantric initiations - don't they have the same Tantric vows and commitments. I suppose it would be correct to say all Ngakpas are Tantric practitioners but not all Tantric practitioners are Ngakpas?

2) If one is a Ngakpa is it normal for such a person later to decide to become an ordained monk? Or for an ordained monk who for whatever reason later to become a Ngakpa (I'm not talking about reverting to being an ordinary lay person but a Ngakpa in the traditional sense). Anyone know such examples?

Thanks.

Malcolm wrote:

A lot of people like to wear a stripped robe these days, and call themselves a Ngakpa, but if your mantras have no force and power, then just what is the point of calling yourself a Mantrika? Not much.

Even if you have the formal sngags pa empowerment like me, hesitate to call yourself a sngags pa if your mantras have about as much force as wind on a still hot humid summers day.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 29th, 2013 at 5:37 AM

Title: Re: Rigpa vs. Nature of Mind

Content:

anjali said:

So, although "mindness" is not your usual translation of sems-nyid, I think it works fairly well.

Malcolm wrote:

Its ok, it just sounds weird to me, and honestly, it does not really convey the genitive sense of sems kyi chos nyid i.e. the dharmatā of the mind, which is in my opinion what the term sems nyid is generally glossing in Tibetan.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 29th, 2013 at 5:33 AM

Title: Re: Jes Bertelsen?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Sems nyid is a translation of cittatā or citta dharmatā. The tā suffix can mean essence; it can also simply mean "is"; or also "itself" -- as you know it clearly depends on context.

In the example you give above, "the mind essence is the primal nature (prakṛti) of the mind", also redundant, but as you know sometimes tibetan texts are like that.

mutsuk said:

sems nyid as essence of mind does not help much if one comes across sems nyid sems kyi ngo bo yin (the essence of the mind is the essence of the mind). Nyid is a simple reflexive tattva case.

Malcolm wrote:

You can render it this way: the mind essence is the entity of the mind.

In Tibetan it is always redundant, "the mind itself is the essence of mind" is also redundant.

That is why it necessary to look for context. It depends on whether nyid is rendering eva i.e. just so, etc. or tā as in chos nyid.

For example "'DI DAG GIS NI SEMS NYID GZUGS SU SNANG BA NYID DU BSTAN TO"
"Both of those are the mind itself (or just the mind, only the mind) shown as appearing as matter/form" This is clearly an "eva" usage.

Here however we have a sems nyid aka sems kyi chos nyid:

SGRON MA GSAL BAR BYED PA ZHES BYA BA'I RGYA CHER BSHAD PA:
RANG GI SEMS KYI CHOS NYID LA GNAS PA NI RANG GI SEMS KYI ROL BA'O "Abiding in the nature [dharmatā] of one's mind is the play of one's mind"

Or

DBU MA RIN PO CHE'I SGRON MA ZHES BYA BA:

GANG GI TSE GZUGS LA SOGS PA'I DMIGS PA RNAMS SEMS LAS PHYI ROL NA MI
SNANG BA DE'I TSE RANG GI SEMS KYI CHOS NYID LA NGES PAR GNAS PA'I SEMS NI

GNYIS SU MED PA'I YE SHES ZHES BYA

When the perceptions of matter and so on do not appear external to the mind, at that time the mind that definitely abides in the nature [dharmatā] of one's mind is called "non-dual wisdom".

So basically, the issue is distinguishing sems nyid as cittaiva and sems nyid as a gloss for citta dharmatā -- and sometimes that can be difficult.

For example, if we take your example and apply the principle that sems nyid here means sems kyi chos nyid, your sentence in both instances makes more sense "The dharmatā (nature) of the mind is the primal nature of the mind" and "The dharmatā (nature) of the mind is the essence/entity of the mind". It becomes a little strange if we say "The mind itself is the primal nature of the mind" or "The mind itself is the essence/entity of the mind" -- so the cittaiva does not work here.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 29th, 2013 at 2:01 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen VS Mahamudra..why?

Content:

Fa Dao said:

Maybe I am just an uneducated rube but perhaps someone can explain to me why there is so much dissension. "Theyre the same" VS "theyre not the same". This seems to crop up a lot and I for one just dont get it. On the one hand you have Garab Dorje, Vimalamitra, Vairocana, Manjushrimitra, etc etc up until present day. All great Totally Realized Masters. On the other hand you have Naropa, Tilopa, Marpa, Milarepa, etc etc up until present day..also great Totally Realized Masters. It doesn't take much reading to see that their methods were different...vive la diferance...But ultimately Total Realization is Total Realization, right??? If a person hears/reads about Garab Dorje or Milarepa and one of those strikes a chord in them isn't that the most important thing? Hopefully somebody here can definitively clear this up for me....because I just don't get it

Malcolm wrote:

Mahāmudra is, generally speaking, a gradual path, Dzogchen isn't.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 29th, 2013 at 1:45 AM

Title: Re: Jes Bertelsen?

Content:

mitsuk said:

However, as far as translation is concerned, I don't know why but in English Mind (sems-nyid) is often (always?) rendered by "nature of the mind". This is actually a definition not a translation. Sems-nyid is "Mind itself" or "Mind" if you want to drop the "itself".

Choosing Mind or Mind itself would help avoiding ridiculous renderings when encountering sentences like "sems-nyid sems kyi rang bzhin yin/" -- "The nature of the mind (sems-nyid) is the nature of the mind (sems kyi rang bzhin)", which I guess all here would consider as silly, no?

Malcolm wrote:

Sems nyid is a translation of cittatā or citta dharmatā. The tā suffix can mean essence; it can also simply mean "is"; or also "itself" -- as you know it clearly depends on context.

In the example you give above, "the mind essence is the primal nature (prakṛti) of the mind", also redundant, but as you know sometimes tibetan texts are like that.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 29th, 2013 at 12:42 AM

Title: Re: Jes Bertelsen?

Content:

Clarence said:

Malcolm,

Would you mind explaining the difference?

THanks, C

Malcolm wrote:

Rigpa, vidya, is the recognition of the basis of the individual.

dzogchungpa said:

So basically it's atma vidya, no?

Malcolm wrote:

Atmya sthana vidyā

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 28th, 2013 at 11:01 PM

Title: Re: Rigpa vs. Nature of Mind

Content:

Jikan said:

In ChNN's diction, "rigpa" is "instant presence": the recognition of the nature of mind. "being in it."

the nature of mind (sems nyid) is something like a latent capacity that is unrecognized, right? so the difference between the two is being in on the secret, getting it, recognizing it? which is to say, it's a kind of knowledge?

I get this confused from time to time; if I'm still upside-down on this, I do hope someone will set me right.

heart said:

The nature of mind and the natural state are the same, so recognizing the nature of mind and rigpa is the same.

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, rig pa can be called "recognizing the nature the mind". You always have "the nature of mind".

Of course, there are Dzogchen teachings which criticize this approach however, because it is held that buddhahood cannot be found in the mind.

So calling rig pa "the recognition of the nature of the mind" is quite provisional.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 28th, 2013 at 9:50 PM

Title: Re: Jes Bertelsen?

Content:

heart said:

I certainly never heard him do that distinction, nor have I ever heard anyone else do it except for you Malcolm.

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

You need to listen more carefully then to what ChNN says, or listen to more retreats.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 28th, 2013 at 9:48 PM

Title: Re: Jes Bertelsen?

Content:

gregkavarnos said:

In the grand scheme of things...

Malcolm wrote:

In the grand scheme of things there is almost nothing one can do to stem the suffering of others in samsara. Not even Buddha can remove the suffering of others. However, one can remove one's own suffering. And for this reason these sorts of conversations, in the grand scheme of things, are critically important.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 28th, 2013 at 7:35 PM

Title: Re: China destroys the ancient Buddhist symbols of Lhasa Cit

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

That is not an argument for a lesser evil, in my opinion. It is a very different kind of argument, it is an argument for the greatest good.

Indrajala said:

Potatoh, potatoe.

Malcolm wrote:

You are ignoring the explicit argument that this form of killing, far from being evil, is actually meritorious, and benefits everyone involved, especially the person being killed. Lesser evil thought experiments never run along these lines.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 28th, 2013 at 4:02 PM

Title: Re: Jes Bertelsen?

Content:

Clarence said:

Malcolm,

Would you mind explaining the difference?

THanks, C

Malcolm wrote:

Rigpa, vidya, is the recognition of the basis of the individual.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 28th, 2013 at 3:39 PM

Title: Re: Jes Bertelsen?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Rig pa is not the nature of the mind.

heart said:

really, how come ChNNR says so every single retreat?

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

He makes a clear distinction rig pa and the nature of the mind, actually.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 28th, 2013 at 10:30 AM

Title: Re: China destroys the ancient Buddhist symbols of Lhasa Cit

Content:

Indrajala said:

In our world it is often about choosing the lesser of evils.

Malcolm wrote:

This is hardly a Buddhist ethic, Mahāyāna or otherwise.

Indrajala said:

Are you unaware of the Yogācārabhūmi Śāstra?

“If the bodhisattva sees a thief about to kill many beings out of a craving for wealth, or about to harm a venerable śrāvaka, pratyekabuddha or bodhisattva, or about to create much karma [for which he will be reborn in] Avīci Hell, seeing such things he thinks, 'If I sever that evil being's life I will fall into hell [naraka]. If it not be severed, then the karma [for which he will be reborn in] Avīci Hell will see him undergo much suffering. I should kill him and fall into hell rather than ever allow him to undergo the suffering of Avīci Hell.' Like this the bodhisattva makes an aspiration and thinks, 'I will have a virtuous or neutral mind towards the being.' Knowing in the future what is to come, he thus generates deep shame and with a compassionate mind severs the life [of the thief]. It is due to these causes and conditions that there is no violation of the bodhisattva precepts, and much merit is produced.”

Malcolm wrote:

That is not an argument for a lesser evil, in my opinion. It is a very different kind of argument, it is an argument for the greatest good.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 28th, 2013 at 10:05 AM

Title: Re: China destroys the ancient Buddhist symbols of Lhasa Cit

Content:

Indrajala said:

In our world it is often about choosing the lesser of evils.

Malcolm wrote:

This is hardly a Buddhist ethic, Mahāyāna or otherwise.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 28th, 2013 at 6:08 AM

Title: Re: Jes Bertelsen?

Content:

gregkavarnos said:

...all this seems, well... really, unbelievably, like completely... pointless and lacking any essence. So sorry for the attitude.

Malcolm wrote:

The suffering of samsara is horrible.

Actually understanding what the term "rig pa" means is important for those who wish to end their suffering, since all Dharma paths, both Hindu and Buddhist, define the cause of suffering as ignorance (avidyā, ma rig pa) and the cause of liberation as knowledge (vidyā, rig pa).

Understanding the distinction between Mahāmudra and Dzogchen is important for those who wish to follow one path versus the other, for whatever their personal reasons may be. For others the distinction may not be important.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 28th, 2013 at 5:12 AM

Title: Re: Jes Bertelsen?

Content:

gregkavarnos said:

Let's see how finely we can split this hair now, shall we?

Clarence said:

It is actually an important difference as Malcolm just showed.

gregkavarnos said:

Yes, I am sure it is, coz now that you know that sems nyid is not Rig pa, well, now you just realised the essential state, whereas up to now you only realised the nature of mind. That's how important that was. Right?

Malcolm wrote:

Are you generally going to be this snotty from now on? Or are you just having a day?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 28th, 2013 at 5:11 AM

Title: Re: Jes Bertelsen?

Content:

gregkavarnos said:

Yes, why bother to be precise when dealing with central concepts of practice? It's all just words anyway, man.

Or we can get all anally retentive about it, and split hairs all day about what is (or is not) mind, whether Mahamudra is Dzogchen, whether they differ in terms of practice or not, whether we are talking about ground or sutra mahamudra, etc... and clutter up yet another thread with the same old boring endless repetitive and essentially useless distracting discussion (ie views) since Dzogchen/Mahamudra essentially only requires pointing out for you to get it, and everything else is just (more) verbal flatulence.

Malcolm wrote:

Your reply amounts to repeating what he said:

"It's all just words anyway, man"

In other words, your reply was essentially pointless.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 28th, 2013 at 5:05 AM

Title: Re: Jes Bertelsen?

Content:

Jikan said:

I'd thought that rigpa was often but not always translated as "nature of mind."

I don't mean to throw the whole thread off track, but... what's the difference between "nature of mind" and "rigpa" in your usage, Malcolm?

Thank you

Malcolm wrote:

The term "sems nyid" is the term translated as the "nature of the mind".

Rig pa is knowledge of your primordial state.

They are not the same thing.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 28th, 2013 at 3:05 AM

Title: Re: Jes Bertelsen?

Content:

heart said:

[

You think perhaps in Dzogchen you realize something different?
My Guru teach both Dzogchen and Mahamudra.

/magnus

Karma Dorje said:
The realization is the same. The paths are different.

heart said:
This statement just define the relationship between mind and nature of mind (sem and rigpa), equally valid for both paths.

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:
Rig pa is not the nature of the mind.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Wednesday, August 28th, 2013 at 2:10 AM
Title: Re: China destroys the ancient Buddhist symbols of Lhasa Cit
Content:
JKhedrup said:
Yes, and as China becomes a net food importer this will pose a whole new set of additional pressures.

Malcolm wrote:
Indeed.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Wednesday, August 28th, 2013 at 1:25 AM
Title: Re: China destroys the ancient Buddhist symbols of Lhasa Cit
Content:
Indrajala said:
Look at what a catastrophic failure Gandhi and his team were.

Malcolm wrote:
No, this is not correct.

Indrajala said:

Partition resulted in millions of avoidable deaths and untold suffering.

Malcolm wrote:

Not Gandhi's fault. He actively opposed Partition. In fact the Congress Party was entirely opposed to it.

Partition was brought about by the Mountbatten plan, in response to the Muslim League's demands for a separate state, and almost entirely contrived by the British.

Indrajala said:

The British did a lot of good in India and it'd be nice if people recognized that.

Malcolm wrote:

The harm to India done by the British to India was recognized from the beginning:

Edmund Burke in a speech said:

What would you call it? To call it tyranny sublimed into madness would be too faint an image; yet this very madness is the principle upon which the ministers at your right hand have proceeded in their estimate of the revenues of the Carnatic, when they were providing, not supply for the establishments of its protection, but rewards for the authors of its ruin...Never did oppression light the nuptial torch; never did extortion and usury spread out the genial bed. Do any of you think that England, so wasted, would, under such a nursing attendance, so rapidly and cheaply recover?

<http://www.ourcivilisation.com/smartboard/shop/burkee/extracts/chap11.htm>

Indrajala said:

They weren't perfect and there were plenty of opportunistic characters, sure, but overall they did more good than harm. If you look at the mess India is in today, you might appreciate how British colonial rule made a lot of sense even back in the day.

Malcolm wrote:

The mess India is today is a direct result of British Mismanagement and interference in India civilization.

Indrajala said:

It was the British who rediscovered many of the Buddhist sites around the subcontinent, too. Their contributions to Indology can't be overlooked.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, someday someone will quip -- "The Chinese contribution to Tibetology cannot be over looked." Hardly even a booby prize, and of little concern to Indians for whom Buddhadharma had been dead for more than a thousand years.

Indrajala said:

That's absurd. The state which has a monopoly on violence has overwhelming authority over the populace.

Malcolm wrote:

The British thought that, and they were wrong in the case of the Colonies, in the case of India and a number of other places.

Indrajala said:

That's just reality.

Malcolm wrote:

No, it is conservative defeatism. History does not bear your pessimism out.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 28th, 2013 at 12:36 AM

Title: Re: What is the Definitive Source?

Content:

oushi said:

Maybe it's not a good moment to ask this, but anyway can someone give a commentary on this:

Listen! You state of pure and total presence,

And all sentient beings of the three realms,

Are clearly shown to be the teacher.

Because you have not seen your mind as the teacher,

Even after 100,000 aeons,

When I, the majestic creativity of the universe,

Manifest as the teacher, you own mind,

You should listen to this message: Your own mind is the teacher.

Malcolm wrote:

You can get Valby's books and see how this is commented on there.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 28th, 2013 at 12:35 AM

Title: Re: China destroys the ancient Buddhist symbols of Lhasa Cit

Content:

Indrajala said:

Tibet is controlled by the PRC. The land now belongs to them in practice and by the agreement of the international community. The Tibetans were conquered by force of arms and continue to be subjugated. This is how the real world works unfortunately: the PRC has a monopoly of violence in Tibet, so they run the show.

Malcolm wrote:

Imagine Gandhi telling the Indians to give into the Brits, because the Brits had the monopoly on violence.

Imagine Martin Luther King Jr. telling his congregation to just give in to the Southern Whites because they had a monopoly of violence.

History shows that a monopoly on violence does not guarantee power. In fact it often shows instability.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 28th, 2013 at 12:31 AM

Title: Re: China destroys the ancient Buddhist symbols of Lhasa Cit

Content:

Indrajala said:

I don't take either side. I do, however, believe the Tibetans and Tibetan Buddhism would be best served in India and Nepal unless China suddenly collapses,

Malcolm wrote:

Ironically, Tibetan Buddhism in India is pretty moribund.

The best work in Tibetan Buddhism by Tibetans is being done in Tibet.

Also the best practitioners and Lamas are in Tibet for the most part, not in India.

The Tibetans in Tibet are not really thrilled with the diaspora Tibetans.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 28th, 2013 at 12:28 AM

Title: Re: China destroys the ancient Buddhist symbols of Lhasa Cit

Content:

Indrajala said:

it is best to rely, as much as possible, on unemotional observation.

Malcolm wrote:

There is no such thing.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, August 27th, 2013 at 11:32 PM

Title: Re: China destroys the ancient Buddhist symbols of Lhasa Cit

Content:

Indrajala said:

I don't know where people get the idea I have an aversion to Tibetan Buddhism.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, go back and read what you write, if you are so puzzled.

You have spent a fair amount of time arguing that Tibetan political incompetence lead to the diaspora; that Tibetan independence is a fruitless cause; that there is no point in trying to preserve Tibetan culture, language and customs; that Tibetans do not really have a right to self-determination because it is inconsistent with Chinese real politik; that Tibetans should basically lie back and enjoy the Chinese rape of Tibetan land, culture and environment since according to you there is nothing they can do about it anyway. When you are met with indignity at your unfeeling proclamations, you then assert that people are "idealistic", unrealistic", and so on. In short you demonstrate cold-heartedness in the name of political pragmatism, and seem to care nothing about the human costs of the political situations you are commenting upon.

You have generally castigated Tibetan Buddhism for being successful in the west, and castigated Tibetan Buddhists for adopting Tibetan Buddhism.

So it is not surprising to me at all that people think you have a negative attitude about Tibetans and Tibetan Buddhism.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, August 27th, 2013 at 11:21 PM

Title: Re: China destroys the ancient Buddhist symbols of Lhasa Cit

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

This is a problem with most people. Not Buddhists in particular.

Indrajala said:

Buddhists though, my experience, tend to be even more idealistic than usual.

It is like they dislike war and therefore think it should go away because they find it disagreeable.

Malcolm wrote:

You need to get out more often.

There are many people far more idealistic than Buddhists, such as climate change advocates and so on.

In general, my experience of Buddhists is that they are pretty pessimistic, like you.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, August 27th, 2013 at 11:09 PM

Title: Re: What is the Definitive Source?

Content:

Astus said:

Is there a definitive source of Dzogchen teachings? I mean, if I want to check whether a teaching given is authentic, is there a written canon that can confirm or deny the validity of a doctrine or method? Like, can the tantras be used for this, or the writings of certain masters? Or is it only the living lineage holders who can serve as accepted sources?

Malcolm wrote:

The definitive source of Dzogchen teachings is a Buddha by the name of Garab Dorje. He taught the tantras of the three series, sems sde, klong sde and man ngag sde. Secondly, there are the various instructions that attached to these three series, such as the Vima snyin thig and so on. Finally, there are the surviving commentaries on these various texts. Then there are commentaries written by early Tibetan masters such as Vairocana and Nub Sangye Yeshe, etc. Finally there are the commentaries of Longchenpa.

This taken together can be understood as the definitive sources for Dzogchen teachings.

Of course, without a living Guru, one cannot receive transmission into Dzogchen teaching, and without that transmission, all these books are just so much dry tinder.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, August 27th, 2013 at 10:27 PM

Title: Re: What is the Definitive Source?

Content:

Sönam said:

Only confidence can help in this case ... and peoples having recognized there true nature recognize each others, that's the only point.

It is also not a question of being sure of the master, because the one who recognize is You, not the master.

If it is said that this realization is ineffable, it's because it is ... what ever would be the way we try.

Trust me, once, we the energy of the master, you've realized your nature ... doubt is eliminated.

Astus said:

That means there is no way to decide who is or who is not an authentic Dzogchen teacher. Either you recognise someone as such or not, but it's completely arbitrary. Consequently there is no basis for debating anyone's claim to being a realised Dzogchen master.

Malcolm wrote:

There is no basis for debating anyone's claim to being realized at all, including the Buddha's claims about his own realization. One either believes it or one does not.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, August 27th, 2013 at 9:51 PM

Title: Re: HHDL leaving Dharamsala?

Content:

Indrajala said:

All things considered, I think McLeodganj is rather cramped. HHDL gives public teachings and Namgyal isn't really able to accommodate the crowds so well. Some people have to sit upstairs or downstairs and watch a TV monitor.

Malcolm wrote:

Simply put, South India is nicer than North India. The food is better, the people nicer. Mysore is a decent city, Bangalore supposed to be even better.

HHDL is basically a Nyingmapa anyway, so it is fitting for him to be installed in a Nyingma monastery.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, August 27th, 2013 at 9:46 PM

Title: Re: China destroys the ancient Buddhist symbols of Lhasa Cit

Content:

Indrajala said:

This is a problem I find with a lot of Buddhists. They're idealistic and like to talk about what ought to happen rather than what probably will.

Malcolm wrote:

This is a problem with most people. Not Buddhists in particular.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, August 27th, 2013 at 9:19 PM

Title: Re: Who holds the highest throne?

Content:

JKhedrup said:

Traditionally the "pyramid" of the stature of the various lamas went something like this, according to the political structure: Dalai Lama, Panchen Lama, Sakya Trizin, Karmapa, Ganden Tripa.

Malcolm wrote:

Nope, HHDL, Sakya Trizin, Karmapa, etc. There is a text about this by Khyentse Wangpo.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, August 26th, 2013 at 1:11 AM

Title: Re: Jes Bertelsen?

Content:

Barney Fife said:

Thank you Malcolm, that's very interesting, as usual. Karma and original sin.....hmmmm.....? wondering if the idea of original sin is similar to the idea of "ignorance" in dzogchen.....and if Dzogchen thinks that teachers like Jesus removed all the negative karma from all Christians, or that other teachers removed all the negative karma from followers of their teachings? Don't want to keep bugging you Malcolm, if you are busy, but just always wondered about this, if anyone has any teachings on the subject.

b.f.

Malcolm wrote:

No, the teaching of Dzogchen is actually very simple: the difference between a buddha (awakened without the performance of even the smallest virtuous deeds) and a sentient being (wandering in samsara without initially having performed the least non-virtuous deed) is the simple recognition or non-recognition of one's own state.

There is, according to ChNN, no possible way to remove all the negative karma accumulated for countless lifetimes in samsara. So it is impossible that a teacher likewise can do this for one, from the perspective of Dzogchen teaching.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, August 26th, 2013 at 12:40 AM

Title: Re: Jes Bertelsen?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

There is nothing particularly Dzogchen about any of this apart from the citation of Tulku Orgyen's statement.

But as I understand the intent behind this book, it is quite early and is deliberately geared toward an audience that has no knowledge at all of what Dzogchen is or might be, and is therefore intentionally ecumenical.

In reality, there is no relationship between the concept of original sin and karma.

Barney Fife said:

Quotes from "Essence of Mind: An Approach to Dzogchen" by Jes Bertelsen:

"There are many types of continuous exercises. They could be divided into two large main categories. One type is a kind of preparation for meditation: channeling exercises, circulation exercises, and the use of symbolic images (channeling and circulation exercises such as the pineal-hara or yin-yang-breathing described in Presence Meditation, symbols such as a flower or a candle or a yantra in a chakra). The second type is the quintessence of prayer, centered in the heart in the form of a mantra (such as Jesus Christ; Kyrie eleison, Kriste eleison; La illah il allah; Namu amida butsu) (Kindle location 1122; p. 87)

"The other main reason that these continuous exercises are necessary is our dim Precambrian lethargy, with regard to achieving greater wakefulness. In the West, this feature has been accurately described as original sin. In the East it is called negative karma. These terms indicate that the sluggishness reaches beyond the personal and deeply into our collective hereditary backgrounds. It is a feature that is embedded in evolution itself, in our genes, in the collective unconscious." (Kindle Location 1026-130; p.80).

"It is self-evidently true that the great enlightened ones on this earth eliminate original sin and negative karma. But it is just as self-evident-- and we all see this, every day in the media-- that this does not help in the least unless each of us as individuals help the process along, with psychotherapy, ethics, prayer, meditation, and continuous exercises.

Even though this earth has seen a long line of radiant, enlightened teachers (Rumi, Krishna, Buddha, Christ, Francis, Rabia, Meera, Yeshe Tsogyel, Teresa, etc.), and even though each of them, according to their individual capacity and caliber, takes on original sin and purifies it for all the rest of us, this does not help one bit unless each individual lends a hand, too. Frankly, the world has not become a better place, and people have not improved, since the Buddha and the Christ. Rather the opposite-- when seen from the ordinary levels of consciousness.

Even though there are one billion Christians on the planet, and Christ has accepted the total load of original sin for all these one billion Christians, it doesn't work. It is only when the individual does his share of the work (psychotherapy, prayer, ethical behavior, meditation, and continuous exercises) that it turns out, again and again, that at the right moment, when the mystery opens, the enlightened consciousness has already purified the negative karma and has taken and forgiven the original sin. But this divine function can only unfold when the individual human being has prepared himself or herself through existential transformation.

The old teachers bear witness to the divine power of enlightened consciousness to eliminate original sin and negative karma for oneself and others.

Master Eckhart speaks in the West:

"Indeed, you might well turn away quickly and in a short time from all sins, so strongly and with such true revulsion, and turn so strongly to God that, though you had committed all the sins that ever were or shall be since Adam's time, they would all be forgiven you, together with the punishment for them...."

Master Tulku Urgyen speaks in the East:

"One moment in the purest rigpa can eliminate the accumulation of negative karma from a whole lifetime, or even from several lifetimes."

(Kindle Locations 1046-1064; p.81-82)

"Up to this point in the book, the description of the spiritual developmental process all the way to the process of enlightenment has been kept within the context of one lifetime, namely the present one. And-- as it is emphasized for instance in both Christian and Tibetan mysticism-- experience does show that it is possible for a person to realize the enlightenment process in one lifetime. However, Indian spiritual traditions (such as Vedanta, Jainism, Mahayana), among others, maintain that the process of spiritual enlightenment usually extends over several lifetimes, and that it is embedded in a more impersonal overarching developmental continuum. This development includes the process of the self through the progressive karma, as well as the collective karmic process at the level of joint consciousness."

(Kindle Location 1368-1374; p.106)

Would anyone be kind enough to offer some incisive Dzogchen commentary on the above passages of Jes Bertelsen's teachings? Possibly Malcolm, or someone with knowledge of the Dzogchen teachings? Thanks!

b.f.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, August 25th, 2013 at 9:54 PM

Title: Re: Psychedelics

Content:

padma norbu said:

Hmm, I skipped right to 27 minutes in where he says the thangka tradition has it's origins in shamanic culture and psychoactive substance usage, which, if true, is very interesting.

Malcolm wrote:

It's is total nonsense, of course. The orgins of thangkha art are well understood and documented, being a form of canonical painting formalized over more than a millennia.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, August 25th, 2013 at 9:23 PM

Title: Re: China destroys the ancient Buddhist symbols of Lhasa Cit

Content:

Indrajala said:

In the end they might last longer in the game than the USA.

Malcolm wrote:

I doubt it -- I vote China the country most likely to degenerate into provinces run by warlords -- they are halfway there (again) already, and things are only being very tenuously tied together by an increasingly moribund and irrelevant Communist Party leadership.

They do not have the resources the western hemisphere has, they do not have the technology, their environment is ruined, there is massive social unrest with frequent riots, and their political system is moribund as well, as noted above.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, August 25th, 2013 at 8:50 PM

Title: Re: Psychedelics

Content:

Vasana said:

By all means we have to be mindful and cautious about these things, especially if we have seen the detrimental effects they can have on some people, but we must also be open to the possibility that used under proper guidance ,in a ceremonial ritualistic setting, with careful intent,prayer,mantra,meditation, there can be benefit and merit to the path, even if it is only a temporary vehicle for some, a medicine for others, and a guru of boundless wisdom and compassion for others.

Malcolm wrote:

Whatever its benefits may be, the "shaman"'s path is a worldly path, and does not lead to liberation in the sense that those who follow Buddhadharma understand the term "liberation", which specifically means freedom from rebirth in samsara at its most basic level.

Actually, Beyer makes this quite clear in the beginning of his book about Ayahauceros, citing an example of a huge magical war that lead to the death of some his friends on one side at the magical hands of other of his friends on the other side.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, August 25th, 2013 at 10:51 AM

Title: Re: China destroys the ancient Buddhist symbols of Lhasa Cit

Content:

Indrajala said:

China doesn't need to improve its image anyway. It has the world by the balls financially and industrially.

Malcolm wrote:

Not really -- they are facing a credit bubble, a real estate bubble, their industries are actually operating at losses in general, all to prop up a growing consumer class.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, August 25th, 2013 at 4:41 AM

Title: Re: Psychedelics

Content:

Vasana said:

And Malcom, this is why i'm here. To learn from those of you with valuable advice and to disregard the Forum/Buddhist elitism many other people display.

.

Malcolm wrote:

The bardo of dharmatā itself has nothing to do with other beings -- it is a direct experience of the ultimate reality of your own state. You can also have that experience in this life, but not with drugs -- they just get in the way because they alter how you directly perceive things, they alter your sensory apparatus and nervous system. And that, from the point of view of directly experiencing your own state, is negative.

Of course, if you want to talk to plants on the other hand, well, then ayahuasca seems to have some positive qualities in that respect.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, August 25th, 2013 at 4:23 AM

Title: Re: Psychedelics

Content:

Vasana said:

